Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby. Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member for Marquette might be allowed a supplementary and the hon. member will then be recognized.

Mr. Stewart (Marquette): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Because of the loss of income to many farmers in western Canada, would the minister ask the Canadian Wheat Board to investigate the situation?

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, I will draw that question to the minister's attention also.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ACTION TO ACHIEVE INCREASED INVESTMENT BY BANKS IN CANADIAN INDUSTRY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker,

I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the disclosure in the so-called version of the Gray report which has been published by The Canadian Forum that Canadian banks are not doing what they ought to in terms of investing in Canadian industry and thus creating jobs in Canada, can the Acting Prime Minister inform the House whether or not the government intends to do something about channeling the investment dollars of Canadian banks more generally into Canadian industry?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I must repeat that the report which has been abbreviated and appears in The Canadian Forum is not a statement of government policy. When government decisions are made, and I hope they will be made soon, they will be announced.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I was not asking the Acting Prime Minister if it was government policy. What I was asking him, and I shall repeat it, is whether the government is giving serious consideration to changing the regulations actually pertaining to Canadian banking to ensure that a greater percentage of investment dollars coming from Canadian banks go into the Canadian sector of the economy?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, it is obvious from what has been revealed that this is one of the matters which has been brought to the attention of the government, but the government still has to make its decisions.

FOREIGN OWNERSHIP—REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE REFERENCE TO DETERMINE WHETHER REPORT TO CABINET WAS LEAKED

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the government House leader. Is the government prepared to refer the subject matter of the article that appeared in The Canadian Forum, which is alleged to be a copy of the Gray report, to an appropriate standing committee so that the committee may call witnesses to determine whether or not this was a deliberate leak?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): No, Mr. Speaker.

HIJACKING—RATIFICATION OF CONVENTION—AMENDMENTS TO CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, this question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs or the Minister of Justice. In view of the major hijacking which took place in Canada on Friday, is the government now ready to ratify the convention on hijacking and introduce articles in the Criminal Code to deal with the matter? I asked this question about a month ago and the government promised to take action.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, on the international front dealing with the issue of hijacking, Canada signed a convention at The Hague last December regarding hijacking of aircraft and a further convention was signed at Montreal last September dealing with other offences against aircraft, including sabotage. Both these conventions will be ratified as soon as some incidental amendments are made to the Criminal Code, which I intend to bring forward in the very immediate future.

FOREIGN OWNERSHIP—TIME OF STATEMENT ON GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister a question. In view of the statement of the hon. gentleman and the Prime Minister that the material published in The Canadian Forum is not to be taken to be government policy, but also in view of the fact that the government has not said it is not government policy, and because of the resulting confusion that exists in the country, is the Acting Prime Minister prepared to give the House any time within which the government will undertake to reach a decision and eliminate the confusion that is bound to do nothing but damage to the economy when there is already an excessive amount of unemployment and uneasiness?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can give assurance that the government would like to remove the confusion which has arisen from the unauthorized publication of this study. I think it serves to underline the inadvisability of having these preliminary studies published in this way because it leads the public to believe that this is government policy. But I assure him we are anxious to make a government decision as quickly as possible.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

INDICATION TO PROVINCES OF ISSUES UNDER DISCUSSION WITH UNITED STATES AND FEDERAL GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. Without reference to any statements which may have appeared today in respect of the conference of first ministers, particularly that by Ontario with regard to a new joint economic committee to establish economic goals for Canada, I wonder whether the government intends, through the Prime Minister or some other cabinet minister at the conference, to indicate to the provinces what issues are presently under discussion with the government of the United States and just what policy the government is adopting in respect of these particular subjects?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot speak for the Prime Minister concerning how far he may want to take the first ministers of the provinces into his confidence on these matters, but one of the problems we have at the moment is that the position of the United States itself is rather unclear. We are having a series of meetings, one of which is going on today, at which we are attempting to get some clarification of the aims and objectives of the United States, but until we know that more completely it is very difficult for us to convey anything to anyone.

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton.)]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I was asking whether the government would merely indicate to the provinces, Alberta and Ontario, for example, which have made very serious representations in this connection, what subjects are being discussed with the United States and whether the provincial authorities will be brought into the vital discussions in these negotiations?

Mr. Sharp: I must repeat what I said, but perhaps I might take advantage of this occasion to say that one of the things which is not under discussion is negotiation of the 10 per cent surcharge. The Canadian government has refused to negotiate that. There are some problems that the two countries are discussing. I say this because it has been suggested in the public press that somehow we are going to bargain energy policy against the 10 per cent surcharge and there is absolutely nothing to that.

TRADE

CREATION OF HEMISPHERIC CURRENCY AND TRADING BLOCS SUGGESTED BY UNITED STATES—CANADIAN POSITION

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Acting Prime Minister. As the United States Under Secretary of the Treasury, Charles Walker, suggests that the solution to the present surcharge and currency problems may be the creation of hemispheric currency and trading blocs, is the government prepared to consider such a formula for North America as part of bilateral talks with the United States at this time?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, no such proposal has been made to us by the United States and we have not proposed it to them.

Mr. Ryan: Mr. Speaker, will the minister assure the House that a statement on negotiable and non-negotiable Canadian trade and economic goals will be made to the House before any substantive bilateral deal is made with the United States in these areas?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I think we have made it very clear that we are not prepared to negotiate for the removal of the 10 per cent surcharge. We have said to the United States—I have said this publicly as have other members of the government—that we would like to help the United States overcome its balance of payments problems because this affects us but we are not negotiating for the removal of a tax which was placed on our trade unilaterally without negotiation.

UNITED STATES PROTECTIONIST MEASURES—PARTICIPATION BY CANADA IN EUROPEAN GOVERNMENT TALKS TO ACHIEVE COMMON FRONT

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister. There are growing reports that western European governments are trying to hammer out a common front to deal with the United States surcharge and other protectionist moves. In order to avoid the complete isolation of Canada in this crisis, is the government attempting to participate in any meaningful way in such European talks?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, other than that the Minister of Finance is a member of the Group of Ten in which the leading financial and economic countries of the world are represented. We have, of course, been talking to the United States at all levels—ministerial, official and so on—to try to discover what are the problems that are concerning the United States in their trade relations with us. So we are not isolated in any way. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, we are making as much progress with the United States as anyone else.

Mr. Crouse: As one further supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to hon. members that we have to give an opportunity not only to other members but to spokesmen on behalf of other political groups. There has to be some proportion with respect to questions and, subject to returning to the hon. member in a moment, the Chair will now recognize the hon. member for Selkirk.

[Later:]

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, this question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister and is supplementary to the question I posed a moment ago. At that time he stated that we were participating in the discussions, or rather that our Minister of Finance was participating in the discussions held by the Group of Ten. As the Acting Prime Minister is aware, the finance ministers were to meet on November 24 but that meeting has now been deferred until well into December. There is obviously a difference of opinion over what valuation should be put on currency and on gold—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should ask his question. He was recognized for the purpose of asking a supplementary question.

Mr. Crouse: Yes, Mr. Speaker. My question is this: has the government made it clear to the European countries that Canada will not be a party to any package deal that would imply appreciating the Canadian dollar over par vis-à-vis the U.S. dollar?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, we have not heard any proposal of that kind, and certainly we have not advanced any proposal to revalue the Canadian dollar over its present level.

FOREIGN OWNERSHIP—LEAKING OF REPORT TO CABINET—DESIGNATION OF ALL GOVERNMENT DOCUMENTS AS PUBLIC UNLESS OTHERWISE INDICATED

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. A few moments ago he indicated there was an investigation in train into the loss of this document. I wonder if the government is also considering reversing current government policy which requires that government documents be confidential unless otherwise designated so that all government documents would be public documents unless otherwise designated by the government?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure I speak for all those who have been charged with responsibility for government when I say that unless there are confidential relations between public servants and the government the whole system breaks down, and that is what is at issue here.

FINANCE

DATE OF NEXT MEETING OF GROUP OF TEN

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Acting Prime Minister about the Group of Ten of which he has just spoken and which decides to some extent of the western world's behaviour.

This morning, in the newspaper Le Devoir, one could read the following:

Monetary ping pong: one week without results—

That meeting was held last week.

Can the Acting Prime Minister tell us when the next international monetary ping pong game will take place?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not certain. There was a postponement of the meeting. It was to have been held earlier in December and the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States proposed a deferment for a short period. Therefore I cannot answer the question directly. However, I do suggest to the hon. gentleman that in these matters some ping pong among the Group of Ten sometimes may be as useful as ping pong can be in other connections.

PRESENTATION OF ECONOMIC AND EMPLOYMENT GOALS TO PROVINCES

Mr. John Lundrigan(Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the request by the provinces that the government and the Prime Minister spell out their short and long-term economic and employment goals for the country, will the Prime Minister be presenting these to the provinces at the present conference, and will an opportunity be taken in the immediate future to make them clear to the House and to the country?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I gather the hon. gentleman is referring to some discussions that have taken place at the federal-provincial conference with which I am not familiar. Therefore I will take his question as notice.

UNITED STATES IMPORT SURTAX—GOVERNMENT PARTICIPATION IN MULTILATERAL NEGOTIATIONS FOR REMOVAL

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of his statement a few moments ago that the government was not prepared to bargain for the removal of the 10 per cent surtax, do I take it from this that the government of Canada is not prepared to participate in any multilateral arrangements leading to the removal of the surtax?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, that is not the implication of what I said. The implication of what I said is that the United States does not have the right to put on a surtax and say, "Now you must bargain your way out of it." That is the position we have taken. I am sure that if we put a surtax on United States goods and asked them to bargain their way out of it they would refuse, and so have we. We feel we can do better by co-operating in overcoming the problems that led to the application of the surcharge.

POST OFFICE

ACTION TO AVERT THREATENED STRIKE BY LETTER CARRIERS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General, but in his absence and in view of the urgency of the matter perhaps the Acting Minister could reply or take notice of it. What steps is the government taking to deal with the threatened strike by the letter carriers of Canada in several major urban areas?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps while the question is being pondered the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Churchill.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Broadview.

Mr. Dinsdale: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Brandon-Souris rises on a point of order.

Mr. Dinsdale: With respect to the question I asked, Mr. Speaker, there seems to be nobody responsible for the Post Office in the House today, and I wonder if I could—

Mr. Stanbury: I will take it.

Mr. Dinsdale: Because of the urgency of the matter may I ask the Acting Prime Minister to see that a statement is made on this matter, and particularly to inform the House if the threatened strike arises from the fact that casual labour is being hired to avoid paying overtime to the regular letter carriers?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the Postmaster General will be in the House tomorrow and I will direct the question to him.

INCOME TAX ACT

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT RESPECTING MONEY PAID FOR ADVERTISING TO OTHER THAN CANADIAN NEWS MEDIA

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Is he in a position to say whether he or his department is in receipt of a recommendation from the chairman of the CRTC that amendments should be made to section 12(a) of the Income Tax Act with respect to moneys paid out for advertising to other than Canadian owned news media?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, it would appear that what the hon. member is referring to is a matter of tax policy and as such it would fall within the purview of the Minister of Finance rather than that of the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. Simpson: Mr. Speaker, I direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State. In view of the fact that the Minister of National Revenue has said this question should be addressed to the Minister of Finance and as the Minister of Finance has already answered by saying he is not in receipt of any such request or recommendation, would the Secretary of State look into the reported statement by the Chairman of the CRTC in Manitoba that this question is currently before Parliament and get the matter straightened out with the Chairman of the CRTC?

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

CORONERS' INQUESTS—ALLEGED IMPAIRMENT OF FAIR TRIAL FOR ACCUSED

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of the statement by the Minister of Justice that the holding of inquests impairs a fair trial for the accused, what steps does he intend taking to cope with this very serious situation?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the first part of the preamble.

Mr. Gilbert: I will repeat the question. In view of the statement by the Minister of Justice that the holding of inquests impairs a fair trial for the accused, what steps does the minister intend taking to cope with this serious situation?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I did not quite put it that way in Toronto. I said there were two aspects of coroners' inquests that disturbed me. One is that there is an indistinct difference—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the question should be put directly and the minister might reply directly. I have often quoted long established precedents to the effect that during the question period we should not rehash speeches made outside the House. The only way this can be done is by asking the Prime Minister, or someone else on behalf of the government, whether a statement represents government policy. Certainly nothing can be gained by going over what was said or what was not said outside the House. The minister might like to reply directly to the question rather than by reference to his speech.

• (3:00 p.m.)

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): There are certain aspects in provincial coroners' acts relating to the treatment a suspected accused may receive before coroners' inquiries, and the publicity attaching to those inquiries, which I should like to bring to the attention of the provincial Attorneys General at the next meeting of the uniformity conference.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond.

ROSTER SYSTEM—ATTENDANCE OF MINISTERS

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): I did not rise at any time to ask a question but I will take advantage of your generosity, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I hope the hon. member has a question because we are running short of time. However, I have recognized him and if he has a question certainly he has a right to ask it, now that he has been given the floor.

Mr. MacInnis: Thank you for your generosity, Mr. Speaker. I shall take this opportunity to ask the Acting Prime Minister if he is aware that 22 ministers are absent today and if the appearance of the Minister of National Revenue means that the roster system is breaking down? If that is the case, can we expect ministers, whether on the roster or not, to answer appropriate questions put to them?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the reason for the many absences is that most of the ministers on the roster for today are attending the federal-provincial conference.

An hon. Member: Twenty-two?

Mr. Sharp: I asked the Minister of National Revenue to appear today because he was going to be unavoidably absent later in the week.

Mr. Baldwin: He might as well have stayed away.

Mr. MacInnis: It is not by way of a compliment to the minister that he is in attendance here today, but is the Acting Prime Minister aware that the Minister of National Revenue is the first minister of this government who has attended the House when he has not been on the roster?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

HEALTH

REQUEST FOR IMPLEMENTATION OF INSURANCE PLAN TO COVER DRUG COSTS

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): My question is for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact Senator Croll's report on poverty indicates the immediate necessity for a drug care insurance plan for many of the poor, those on pensions and low income, who often do not have the necessary funds to purchase the drugs prescribed by their doctors and who end up as costly hospital casualties, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister if he would give sympathetic consideration to bringing in a plan right away?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government will give sympathetic consideration to the hon. gentleman's request.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Although we have reached the end of the question period, hon. members might agree to allow the hon. member for Hamilton West to ask the last question. I think other hon. members who are rising now have supplementaries but they have had the floor once during the question period. This is not true of the hon. member for Hamilton West.

ST. CATHARINES AND HAMILTON—INQUIRY AS TO STRIKE SITUATION

Mr. Lincoln M. I wonder if the Minister of Communications has a statement with respect to those strikes in effect right now, in view of the fact he indicated he is speaking for the minister responsible for the Post Office?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of Communications): I have no information of that kind, Mr. Speaker, but I shall be glad to make inquiries from the minister responsible for the Post Office, the Postmaster General, and ask him to convey the information to the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed, from Wednesday, November 10, consideration in committee of Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act—Mr. Benson—Mr. Honey in the chair.

The Chairman: In accordance with the statement of the hon. President of the Privy Council, as recorded at page 9528 of Hansard for Wednesday, November 10, 1971, the committee will now proceed to consideration of the sections dealing with capital gains, being sections 38 to 55 inclusive, 3, 71, 73, 85, 87, 88, 89, 96 and 111. I assume that it is the intention of the committee that this grouping is for the purpose of debate and that we will deal with each clause separately. Is that assumption correct? Shall section 38 carry?

On Clause 1—Section 38: Meaning of Capital Gain and Allowable Capital Loss.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, it is not my view that the clauses should be dealt with separately, but that we would ultimately take a separate vote on these sections. I believe the discussion on section 3, that is the one that makes the first general declaration with regard to capital gains tax, should open the discussion generally to hon. members. With the greatest respect, there is no way that one can accept section 3 without accepting the principle of a capital gains tax, the matter that is going to be under discussion. I do not think there will be any problem.

We have before us what I think is the first discussion in committee of the radical departure from former decisions on what is income for purposes of income tax. In dealing with previous sections, we have found new concepts with regard to exemptions or allowances, such as child care expenses and the workers allowance. This is the first time we have come to the other side of the question, the determination of what additional income and new kinds of income have to be considered with respect to the impact of the Income Tax Act.

The first time that the subject became a reality in relation to the taxation system in Canada was at the time of the publication of the white paper in November, 1969, when a capital gains tax was proposed. To say that this became one of the most controversial of the radical departures from the then existing pattern of Canadian income tax is perhaps the understatement of the year. I think hon. members will agree with me that in the deliberations of the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, no subject raised more controversy than this question of the capital gains tax. It involved many facets which may not appear before us today, yet they all drew their inspiration from the idea of the imposition of a capital gains tax.

It might be worth while to discuss whether one should consider a capital gains tax at this time, the nature of the economy being what it is. After all, this is not a question of an increase in the progressive rates of income tax, with all of its inflationary implications, nor is it an increase in corporation income tax with inflationary implications; rather, this is a move into an entirely new field of imposing taxes on capital gains. A lot of people have a misconception of capital gain as we know it in Canadian law. Our friends to the left talk about land speculation as being the biggest area of capital gains, but they do not read their law reports. It is very easy to talk about speculative land profits and the fact that these generally escape taxation. Therefore, it is suggested, these profits are wages levied by speculators and which ordinary citizens must pay.

But that is not the case and has not been the case for years. Oh, yes, there are individual cases no doubt where a farmer owning land abutting urban property is able to sell it as one big parcel and make a gain over its value as farmland because that land is to be used as urban residential or commercial land. That does happen. But, Mr. Chairman, let him develop that land himself; let him subdivide that land himself rather than sell it to a development company or to an individual who will develop a subdivision and the law will provide, as it has provided for years, that the funds resulting from that transaction are to be taxed at income tax rates. If you want to know why, in many instances, there has been an increase in prices of subdivided land, I say, trace the increase back to the impact of the Income Tax Act. The developer or the individual selling always looks at the price on a net or take home basis. And who is paying the tax? The purchaser of the lot is, of course, since that part of the cost is passed on, just as inflationary wage demands and increases in taxes for either individuals or companies are passed on to the consumer. It is always the consumer who ultimately pays.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): And who is the consumer? Who but the Canadian citizen. There is no difficulty about that. That is simply and understandably political science and economic fact, and anyone who dares to deny that concept must take the prize for shoving his head into the deepest, darkest sack. This is as true as that we are standing here this afternoon.

Now comes the idea of a capital gains tax and we ask, is it time for that? I make the suggestion that it is wrong at this time, when one compares present times against those of two years ago when the economy was on a much better basis and people generally felt a little easier about the imposition of this new tax. This is going to be a new tax; let no one misunderstand that. The Canadian public will have to accept the new tax. It is not one that is to be deductible from income tax or for which we will get a credit.

Although the Estate Tax Act is to be eliminated, any tax paid under the head of capital gains is not going to be treated as an offsetting credit against any succession duty of any province. That is an entirely different matter. Any deemed realization on death, because of the inclusion of capital gains in the hands of the legatee, as provided for in this act, will call for the payment of income tax. For instance, where a farmer wills his farm to members of his family, they will pay income tax at the increased rate because there may be a capital gain there. It is argued that there is no federal estate tax; but every province, bar one, has either a succession duty or estate tax, or intends to impose one. The matter of whether there should be such impositions is being discussed at another place in this city at this very time. Because there is no offsetting credit, the Canadian taxpayer in that position will be paying additional tax. Why should he pay additional tax? Is it because big brother government is better qualified to spend the money and requires the money? Is that why? We want to know about this. I know that our friends on my left think that by directing the spending of money, they can spend it to much better advantage than the private individual. Oh, yes.

Mr. Peters: At least we will be sure how the money will be spent.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is all right; but the hon. member must then admit that he is foolish on occasions in spending his own money, and that he cannot make good decisions.

Mr. Peters: Not at all.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is so; we all admit that we do not always make good decisions, but we do not say that somebody else should be able to tell us how to spend our money on all occasions. Nobody suggests that except members of the NDP.

I wish to raise a question which will be argued at greater length by some of my colleagues and by myself when we discuss this matter further. In view of the international situation, the complexity of the corporate side of income tax and the fact that the question of capital gains is involved in this, and in view of the complicated provisions with regard to international income which also involve income tax and the fact that the provinces have demanded a deferral of the implementation of a goodly portion of this bill, I wonder whether the question of the imposition of a capital gains tax should not be deferred as well. That is one position. That matter will be argued and examined.

At present, because of the time limitation at this particular stage of the debate and because I wish to bring forward an amendment, I will turn immediately to a quick review of those proposals in the white paper dealing with capital gains and see how the present proposals stack up against them. First, Mr. Chairman, you will recall that capital gains were to be included 100 per cent in income, at marginal rates, and, second, any gains could be offset by losses on capital only. Third, there was to be a valuation day. The only value to apply was the value on that day, except in the case of government bonds. In that case a sort of recapture on loss was allowed. Fourth, principal residences were to be subject to a capital gains levy, with certain periodic allowances. Fifth, and here I refer to one of the more emotional and controversial proposals which lots of hon. members seem to have forgotten, there was to be a provision with regard to a deemed realization, effective every five years, on shares of widely held corporations. This was one of the most misunderstood provisions and was certainly one that raised lots of "spooks" among the Canadian public. There was to be a capital gains tax on personal property that was quite restrictive.

What is the new proposal? I do not have time to read what was said in the Report of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. I will do that at some time in the future. First of all, we have half the capital gains and half the capital losses being considered at marginal rates. This means that the maximum rate will be about 30½ per cent. This is calculated on the basis of the maximum average federal and provincial rate being 61.1. In Manitoba, Alberta and some other provinces it is higher, but in Ontario and Prince Edward Island the rate is 61.1. This means the capital gain would be taxed at 30.5 per cent; in other words, half the capital gain at the marginal rate of 61 per cent. This is approximately the equivalent or perhaps a little less than the United States rate.

The second matter is gains versus losses. If there are insufficient losses to offset the gains, there are two ways of dealing with the matter. The first is by the purchase of a forward annuity, and the second is the write-off of accumulated or unaccounted for surpluses at $1,000 per year against income with no time limitation. The exception, of course, is listed personal property which comes under other rules that are not germane at the moment. The purpose of valuation day is to create an option under which you may use that valuation only or, second, market cost, whichever is higher, in calculating capital gains or market, cost if it is lower, in calculating losses. If one has opted for the option of valuation day, frankly there can be areas which may call for some retroactivity. We will examine that later.

Taxation of capital gains on the principal residence has been abandoned, except under certain circumstances. There is an abandonment on the deemed realization of widely held shares. That concept is gone.

Last is the matter of personal property. There was a welcome increase in minimum sale value to $1,000 per unit. There are some particular circumstances that limit averaging. It is unfortunate that the act does not cover this one area, although there have been many representations with regard to farm lands. It will not be news to the committee that I will advance an amendment with regard to this, and it will be consistent with the amendment I put forward for the consideration of the finance committee. It was voted down by the government majority. Many of my colleagues are going to expand on the point that there should not be any capital gains tax on the disposition of farmlands for bona fide farming purposes. Whether it is by sale, a gift from husband to wife or father to son or by way of a legacy, we should not impose on farmers a penalty for efficiency or good husbandry, a penalty which will serve to drive them out of business or break up the farm. This is the point. It is so easy. We have seen many ways of driving people out of business, including farmers, such as imposing taxes at the time of death. I want to talk later about estate taxes. There is a capital gains tax at the time of death because it is a disposition with a deemed realization. Even though there are some minor provisions in the act that we are trying to alleviate, it seems to us that this is quite wrong.

Agriculture is in a tough enough position as it is. It is a most difficult position. May I say in passing that the $1,000 a year allowance provided in the act for the years of occupancy applies whether it is an 80 acre farm or a 2,500 acre farm. Regardless of the size or the value of the land, this $1,000 allowance is an across the board exemption. This is wrong. Therefore, I move:

That paragraph (b) of section 3 as set forth in clause 1 of the said bill be amended by inserting in lines 15 and 21 on page 2, immediately after the word "property" in each said line, the following:

"other than land used in farming as defined in this Act and"

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I apologize for not having had the opportunity of translating it, but I think that the French-speaking members have understood what I said.

[English]

The Chairman: The Chair might ask the advice of the committee. I was under the impression we had before us sections 38 to 55 inclusive and then section 3. If the Chair is in error, I ask the advice of hon. members. My information is that we are dealing in accordance with the statement of the President of the Privy Council, with sections 38 to 55 and then section 3. We can certainly change this in accordance with the wishes of hon. members.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I think the understanding is that we have before us at this time sections 38 to 55 inclusive and the other group that begins with section 3 and ends with section 111. The understanding is that the Chair having called section 38, we are dealing with all these sections including section 3, 111 and so on and that we handle them in the same way we have handled the other groups of sections. The only difference between what Your Honour has said and what I think is our understanding is that what we have here is not two separate groups, but one group consisting of sections 38 to 55 inclusive and the group that consists of sections 3, 71, 73, 85, 87, 88, 89, 96 and 111.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Frankly, Mr. Chairman, this disposition with regard to grouping had its origin with me. Section 3 was specifically exempted from an earlier discussion because, as I indicated, section 3 is the section that first sets out capital gains. Section 38 starts in with the specifics. I ask Your Honour to look at section 3 which appears at page 2. Line 12 reads:

(i) the aggregate of his taxable capital gains for the year from dispositions of property other than listed personal property, and his taxable net gain for the year from dispositions of listed personal property.

For that reason, I have moved to exempt farm property as defined. The definition of farming appears in section 248. We will then be squarely on target, because I cannot put this amendment with regard to section 38.

The Chairman: The Chair understands precisely. It was just in order that there might be no misunderstanding at a later date. The committee has heard the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Edmonton West, so we can proceed on that basis.

The question the Chair must resolve, however, is an immediate one. It is the acceptability from a procedural standpoint of the amendment of the hon. member for Edmonton West. It does seem that if this amendment were accepted I would be permitting a private member to do something which lies within the prerogative of the Crown, that is, to take a financial initiative. The hon. member might be able to dissuade me from this view; I am merely making an initial observation and I shall invite assistance from the committee. However, it does seem to me that if farmland is made exempt, revenue with respect to capital gains would be lost to the Crown, there having been a shifting of the incidence of taxation. Possibly hon. members can assist me on that point.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Yes, Your Honour. I put it to you that any possible amendment, according to the interpretation you have suggested, must result in a shifting of the incidence of taxation. But no quantum of tax has been fixed with regard to farmland. No quantum has been fixed in this particular area. It is proposed in a general statute that there shall be a tax levied five years hence, but, with the greatest respect, what incidence of taxation is there? There is no special amount which is to be raised. It seems to me incidence of taxation relates to a quantum of money which is to be raised by the government by certain means in certain circumstances. We are now considering an event in the future. There are no revenues which are projected from this particular source, nor will there be in the future. I put it to Your Honour that in these circumstances if we follow your argument, no amendment was possible with regard, for example, to the child care allowance. To vary the statutory age limit from 21 to 18 would have meant increasing the scope of child care allowance, thus resulting in a shift in the incidence of taxation. Then again, as I recall it, an administrative change was made, without any accompanying resolution on the part of the Crown, with regard to the transfer of property in trust for minors.

This matter was discussed on Wednesday afternoon last. A change was made in the age, from 19 to 18. It may be we shall see further changes with regard to the age as a result of discussions which have taken place. If the suggestion which Your Honour has made is adhered to, then, as I understand it, outside of crossing a "t" or dotting an "i" or the substitution of one word for another so as to better express an idea, an ordinary member has no possibility of proposing changes to a statute of this type, and this I cannot accept.

We are not proposing tax increases. It is said I have introduced proposals for tax reductions. I have. This is, I agree, a proposal for a general tax reduction covering farm lands. But it does not disturb the indidence of taxation in any way. I am working within the confines of that act. I am not enlarging the scope of farming as defined in the legislation. Farming remains as defined in the act—a definition which covers even beekeeping. Had I proposed amendments to the definition clause, had I, for instance, sought to enlarge the scope to cover, say, trout farming or pheasant farming or some type of farming which is not included in the present definition, Your Honour would doubtless feel constrained by the limitations he has indicated to rule that the amendment was out of order as being beyond the scope of an hon. member who is not a member of the government.

I suggest Your Honour might review what I have said and perhaps consider some of the implications of the limitations suggested by the Chair. The subject will be debated in any case and we could perhaps obtain further clarification.

The Chairman: Are there other members who wish to make representations on the point of order which has been raised? If not, I shall recognize the hon. member for York South.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I rise to take part in the debate partly because of the observations made by the hon. member for Edmonton West and partly to deal with the problem which arises from what is before us—lack of necessary information concerning foreign control of Canada's economy.

I was not surprised when the hon. member for Edmonton West twitted our party for insisting that there should be a capital gains tax and that it should be 100 per cent of the capital gain. I say, without meaning any offence to the hon. gentleman or to his hon. friends in the Conservative party, that there is a basic difference of approach. He is concerned about gains by corporations and business. We are concerned about the lack of gains by the ordinary people. He is concerned about enabling those who make a great deal out of capital gains to retain those sums. We are concerned that the tax system should be equitable, that the rich and the powerful should fully pay their share of taxation in order that the burden falling on the poor and the less wealthy might be reduced.

Every time some section of the community gets a tax exemption, whether it is an oil corporation or a mining company or a guy playing the stock market, the rest of the community have to make up for it because government services must continue. Government services have increased over the years and will continue to increase in a modern civilized society, and somebody has to provide the funds with which these services can be carried on. Every time that the wealthy and the powerful are exempted from a share of the tax burden that they ought to carry, the less wealthy and the less powerful have to carry that part of the burden.

I am not surprised that the hon. member for Edmonton West takes the position that I have always known is the position of his party, but he makes the general statement that, in effect, he is opposed to all capital gains at this time; that this is the wrong time to impose a capital gains tax. Then, for reasons which are not very difficult to understand he zeroes in on capital gains resulting from the sale of farm land.

Again, in the way in which that approach necessarily ends, he does not make any suggestions that would really protect the farmer. He makes a blanket proposal that all land transactions be free of capital gains tax, which I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, would result in speculation on farmland of a sort which would undo what I believe the hon. member wants to achieve. The worst thing that could possibly happen to young people who may want to go on the farm is that speculation on farmland be allowed to go on because there is no capital gains tax. This would result in the price of farmland going up, and thus the prospect of starting farming becomes a thousand times more remote for the young farmer than it is today.

My colleagues will be making some amendments, or will be proposing some, Mr. Chairman, which I hope you will be able to accept. They will deal with legitimate aspects of farmers' problems, aspects which it seems to us the government's advisers have never even looked at let alone tried to solve. I will leave it to them to deal with the details, but I want to indicate three objectives, which we believe a capital gains tax as it relates to farmers ought to seek to achieve. In order to achieve those three important objectives certain situations ought to be exempted from capital gains tax. I do not mean a blanket exception of all farmland, which would invite speculation, but concrete exemptions in particular situations affecting the farmer and the future of the family farm.

The first objective is to exempt farmers from the tax so as to protect the family farm as a continuing and viable entity. One of the ways this is done—and this is the second objective—is to allow farmers to invest income which they gain from selling their land to purchase another farm—if they want to purchase another farm—and make the operation of that farm their principal or sole source of income. That is a legitimate exemption that must be considered by the House. The exemption must also try to achieve the objective of ensuring that when a farmer hands his farm on to his sons or heirs they should be able to take over the farm without having to pay any capital gains tax, again to preserve the family farm unit, to make it viable and able to survive.

Finally, we think that since the farmer, like the small businessman, has no opportunity, as the industrial worker or management has, of having some share in an industry-wide pension plan, and can only have a kind of security for himself in his old age either by buying insurance to give him an annuity or qualifying for the Canada Pension Plan—he has no opportunity like industrial workers, management and so on of joining in some kind of negotiated industry plan—we believe that this legislation ought to enable the farmer, or allow the farmer, to invest his capital gains in a retirement savings plan, which would then become taxable as income when he draws his benefit annually or monthly as a pension.

In addition to this, if there is any increase in the value of his farm and machinery as a result of his own productive efforts and that of his family, results that frequently are achieved only by mortgaging his future in order to make his farm more economic and viable, then if he desires to do so he should be enabled by law to invest that increase in value in a retirement plan so that in this way he has a pension waiting for him at retirement. As I say, most of the methods of providing for a pension for city folk are not open to the farmer.

We believe this kind of protection for the farmer is justified and necessary and would not lead to land speculation in the way in which the hon. member's amendment would lead. My colleagues who are more knowledgeable in this field than I can claim to be will deal with this aspect at great length later on in this debate, but in view of the amendment before the committee I wanted to indicate immediately what is our thinking on this subject. We have always taken the position—and we do not retreat from it for a moment—that what should be taxed is the income of people without regard to the source of that income; we except only those exemptions that human considerations make necessary, such as the exemptions to which I have just referred.

We think there is no reason why a person with an income of $10,000, $5,000, or $20,000 a year from capital gains should be able to have it taxed at half its value whereas the worker and everybody else pays on his full income. There is no reason in the world why the speculator, whether on the stock market or anywhere else, or the person who benefits from a windfall profit that is not due to any particular efforts of his own, should be taxed on that return at a much lower tax rate than people who earn wages or salaries, the small businessman and others who work hard for every dollar they have.

We have always taken the position on this issue, subject to the practical, humane exceptions that must always be made in decent tax legislation, of supporting the principle expressed in the Carter report on taxation. We believe this legislation now before us is another example of the double standard that governs the decisions of this government, and treats the man or woman who benefits from capital gains in a way that is unjustifiable in terms of tax equity.

In the few minutes remaining, I want to draw the committee's attention to another aspect of capital gains. One of the major reasons, in our view, why a capital gains tax is essential, particularly in Canada, is that the absence of such a tax has been one of the important reasons that Canadian investors have been tempted, and have yielded to the temptation, to sell out Canada to foreign corporations. The achieving in many cases of very large incomes as a result of the sale to or merger with a foreign owned corporation, and the achieving of very large incomes as a result of selling out Canadian plants, branches, industries, or mining claims or rights to minerals under the surface of the land without having to pay any tax on it has always been a great temptation or incentive to Canadian owners to sell out to foreign owners.

One of the side reasons we support a capital gains tax based on an equity tax system is that it would take away this incentive or temptation to sell out Canada to foreign corporations. At least, this would take away any important, if not all, incentives and temptations. I have said in this House and across the country on many occasions, particularly since I have been honoured to hold the position I now occupy, that I reject the notion that anyone has done wrong to Canada because they wanted to do wrong. I reject the suggestion made by many people that Canada has been raped by the United States. I suggest there can be no rape where there is invitation and consent.

The fact is that Canadian industry, political leaders and major Canadian investors have over the years invited foreign corporations, even begged them, to come into Canada and denude our non-renewable resources, build plants in Canada and the like. This is our fault and the fault of all Canadians having investment capital, and that means large Canadian corporations, including banks. This is the fault of Canadian political leaders of successive federal and other government in this country over the years. They have thought there was a fast buck available and sold Canada out without regard for future consequence, with the result that Canada has been the only country in the world to my knowledge that has permitted foreign investment without limit, without rule, without regulations—without anything. Anybody was welcome to come in and take away Canada's resources and do with them what they might, with the exception of certain areas which have arisen in recent years, namely banking, the media of communication and uranium. This is one of the things they have allowed to happen, that element of our society which is concerned only with maximizing their profits and not with the welfare of future Canadians.

One of the elements has been the absence of a capital gains tax, and one of the reasons Canadian people have permitted this to continue for more than 100 years is that successive governments have deliberately kept the Canadian people ignorant about the extent to which the Canadian economy has been controlled. Any information which successive governments have had has been kept secret on the basis of one excuse or another. As a result, the people of Canada did not know what was happening to their country and to their economy, and did not know how or even that this was affecting their lives now and would affect the future generations of this country.

It is the habit of Canadian governments to keep Canadian people ignorant about this important subject which is the very life blood of their economy and their future, and a good example of this is what has taken place in respect of the Gray report and the documents relating to it. All this sanctimonious nonsense of the Prime Minister and Acting Prime Minister, and all this sanctimonious hypocrisy about being tied by the oath of secrecy and cabinet documents does not impress any intelligent Canadian one iota. The government knows how to release papers, and it would not break any law of Canada if it released them, except information that is in the narrow sense of the word strictly cabinet information or a cabinet document, quite apart from what is in the wider sense of the word a document or information to which Members of Parliament and the people of Canada are entitled.

The most significant statement made by the Acting Prime Minister today, if you listened carefully, as I am sure you did, was to the effect that when the government has made its decision on policy, it will bring forward its decision and at that time will consider what part if any of the information should be made available to the Canadian public. That is what the Secretary of State for External Affairs said, but what does that mean?

It means the government is determined to make a decision some time, and I am glad to hear it will make it some time within the next two or three years because it has taken two years for consideration, and it will then release that part of the information which will support its decision. However, it will continue to keep secret the rest of the information the Canadian people ought to have in order to make any judgment about the decision the government will have made. The government is not only going to make a decision on policy, it is going to decide how much we Members of Parliament ought to know about the subject and how much the people of Canada ought to know about it. At times such as these and on issues such as these, the Members of Parliament and the people of Canada ought to know every bit as much as the government knows regarding the situation in this country.

We do not want doctored and carefully selected evidence that will support the government's decision.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask a question of the leader of the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member must have my permission to ask a question, and if he was rising to ask that, let me say that I do not intend to grant that permission.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I rise on a point of order.

The Chairman: The hon. member is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): The hon. leader of the New Democratic Party has been talking about selling out Canada. Why is it members of his own party—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member is not making a point of order, but rather asking a question.

Mr. Lewis: I do not know what kind of so-called point of order the hon. member was putting—

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): You don't practice what you preach.

Mr. Lewis: We certainly do, Mr. Speaker. Let me tell the hon. member for St. Boniface that if I ever wanted to preach I would not go to him to get my sermon.

At this time in Canadian history, in this difficult situation regarding Canada's economy, we are entitled to all the information that is in the hands of the government relating to the extent foreign control is having an effect on our economy.

I will conclude in two or three sentences, Mr. Chairman, and I will make them shorter than usual. Let me point out that the United States policy of the surtax, the job incentive program and the DISC program will affect many countries in the world, not only Canada, in respect of trade. When the Acting Prime Minister said today that DISC and these other programs would affect Canadian-owned corporations as well as United States subsidiaries he was of course right, but he was right only to the extent that Canadian corporations and others in the western world will be affected by the closing off of trade. In that way, we will be affected and Canadian corporations will be affected. But—and this is one of the points made in the Canadian Forum summary, or version, or whatever it may be—because of the extent of United States control of our economy Canada is in danger constantly of having subsidiary operations in Canada closed down or reduced so that Canadian jobs are lost, so that operations are exported from Canada to the United States. In that field Canadian corporations will not be affected. I therefore say I hope the Canadian people will recognize that the government's refusal to make these documents public is a betrayal of its duty to Canada.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Chairman, I should like to know if the remarks of the Leader of the New Democratic Party are relevant to the point at issue, at the moment. I suggest they are not.

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for York South has concluded his remarks, but it seemed to the Chair in the last two or three moments he was perhaps going a bit wide in so far as relevancy was concerned. However, in fairness to the hon. member, in his introductory remarks he tied in the matter of future investment in Canada with capital gains. The Chair listened very closely to the hon. member and, on balance, I believe he was relevant.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, I think we all appreciate that the well-known oratorical style of the Leader of the New Democratic Party has inflamed some quarters of the House, and certainly has brought what he had to say to the attention of hon. members. I can only hope that the very enthusiastic and vigorous manner in which the Leader of the New Democratic Party has dealt with the wickedness of control of the Canadian economy by foreigners will also be evident in his approach to the subject of labour unions with which he is quite familiar. I have no doubt that he will explain his views in that regard on the next occasion.

The subject of capital gains, which is presently before us, is not a new concept of income. I do not want to take up the time of the House in going into the background of the matter, but for some time at least some forms of capital gains have been taxable. For instance, if a person invests every few days in the stock market I believe it has been established—and I think the original case was called the Northrope-Strachan securities case—that this is in effect the basis of his income. If a person makes an investment in the stock market today, makes another investment four years later and receives a profit, it is clear that this income is not taxable. However, if he did the same thing every day it would be taxable. So, in some respects, the concept of capital gains is not altogether new.

When politicians, journalists and others get up on the platform or on the soap-box, as it is sometimes described, they tend to oversimplify the whole problem we have had in respect of exemptions. If we were to ask the man on the street if he believed there should be a tax on capital gains he would probably say "sure" and if asked why, he might say, "if some of these birds can make a fast buck on the sale of a farm which happens to be located where an airport is to be built or if somebody buys some penny stock and makes a fortune on it, should they not be taxed on this?" I do not believe there is any disagreement on that score.

However, the capital gains question is a highly complicated one. It is not something over which we should get carried away in some emotional, dogmatic approach such as we heard from the previous speaker. I believe we must be a little more pragmatic about it. We should look at some of the more complex aspects of a capital gains tax. The Income Tax Act, for instance, has many exemptions. For example, if you should have a very large income you pay a different rate than you would pay if you had a lower income. There are many such examples of provisions which are made for social and equitable reasons and we are prepared to accept them. Apparently the framers of the bill, in proposing this capital gains tax, have not given very much thought to the exemptions and the different rates which exist in respect of income tax. I do not believe there is any doubt that most members of this House—and one never wants to say "all" because there may be one or two exceptions—in all parties agree with the principle of a capital gains tax. The difference between some points of view in this House and others is in respect of the exceptions and the different rates which may be applied.

It has been pointed out by my colleague, the hon. member for Edmonton West, that farmers and perhaps fishermen may need assistance in this regard. There may be a case for an exemption from the capital gains tax in respect of the passage of a farm to another person and with regard to farms used for bona fide farming purposes. I have in front of me the amendment moved by my colleague the hon. member for Edmonton West which makes this very clear. Apparently the hon. member for York South had not had the time to carefully consider the amendment, because from what I heard he was apparently a little confused about the exact meaning of the amendment. The hon. member for Edmonton West has explained why—and others of my colleagues will also do so—farming should be exempt from the capital gains provisions. I think the same might apply to small businesses. For example, a man and wife may own a small grocery business into which they have plowed the profits over the years—which perhaps were dammed few—and when the business is sold an exemption should be made for such a situation. Again, for the same reason as in farming, working capital is pretty low in most small businesses, and the tax to be paid, even over a period of ten years, might well use up the working capital involved.

Another type of exemption might be made with respect to prospecting. Here, I am not referring to prospecting operations carried out by such huge mining corporations as Noranda and Inco, which use their own planes and electronic equipment. I point out that there are still a few areas of Canada in which individual prospectors work, trying to locate new, natural resources. I believe an exemption might be made in such cases with respect to any profits up to certain defined limits. The same type of exemption should apply to certain types of new industries. An exception should be made with respect to any capital gain made by those industries.

Then, Mr. Chairman, there is the question of employee profit sharing plans. I think the parliamentary secretary is well aware that the government's tax proposals would work a hardship in certain technical areas on employee profit sharing plans.

Another question which has been alluded to, and no doubt will be mentioned again, is that concerning certain provinces. The federal government proposes to give up the estate tax, and in lieu of that impose a capital gains tax. Undoubtedly some of the provinces will move into the estate tax field, as a result of which Canadians in certain parts of Canada will, in effect, be taxed doubly as compared with Canadians in other places. This would be unfair, and exemptions might be made in those cases.

There is also the question of applying different rates. It may not be wise to give complete exemptions with respect to some of the examples that I have cited. It might be wise to have capital gains taxed at different rates for different kinds of industries. There is a concept of taxation other than that of equity. My hon. friends to my left are always harping on the dogmatic approach that they have to the principle of equity. Mr. Chairman, everybody realizes that the principle of equity is very important, but it is not the only principle involved in taxation. As I mentioned previously, my hon. friends to my left are concerned about dividing up the melon in smaller and smaller pieces so that everybody gets some, but so far as I am concerned it is a lot more advisable to encourage the melon to grow so that we will have more pieces to divide. I believe the growth aspect is a much more practical approach.

The equity principle evolved in the London School of Economics back in the 1930's, and it was very important in poverty stricken England of those days when there was class stratification. Hon. members to my left talk about members of other parties being dinosaurs. So far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, some of my hon. friends in the NDP are economic pterodactyls. They have learned nothing and forgotten nothing, like the Bourbon kings of France after the French revolution. They do not know that there are other principles than that of equity.

Members of other parties in this House are interested in the principle of equity, but we are also interested in having more results of production to divide, something which does not seem to interest my hon. friends to my left. Their's is the typical approach of stirring up class hatred. This has always been part and parcel of the propaganda of the NDP. They have not been able to play a new tune for years and years.

Mr. Peters: The old one is so popular we don't need to.

Mr. Nesbitt: It certainly didn't prove to be popular in the recent Ontario election, but there may have been some bad players in the orchestra.

Now, leaving these pleasantries aside, Mr. Chairman, I say that the government should give careful attention to the costs of collection. I would like to know if the parliamentary secretary has any figures which would give us some idea of the costs involved in collecting the taxes that will be imposed under these proposals. I would also like to have an estimate of the amount of money that is likely to be collected in capital gains tax if the present proposal is adopted. We know that sometimes the cost of collection rises to the point where imposing the tax may not be advisable.

I can well recall that during the time when I served on the Canada-U.S. Parliamentary Committee our American colleauges said time and time again, "For heaven's sake don't make the mistake of getting into a capital gains tax; the costs are so heavy." This was the opinion expressed by both parties on the other side of the border. They said, "We wish we could get out of it; but now we are in it, we have the administrative services set up, and it isn't so easy to get out of it."

The appropriateness of the timing of these tax proposals has already been mentioned. That, of course, is a matter of opinion. It might be all right to bring in these proposals at the present time with modifications such as those that I have suggested, that others of my colleagues have suggested, and that perhaps members on the government side may suggest. But without any modification of the proposed rates of taxation, and without any modification with respect to exemptions, I cannot help but feel that it may be a very bad mistake to present these proposals at the present time, in the present state of the economy, and faced with the uncertainty of what the provinces might do.

Unless consideration is given by the government to the modifications that I and others have suggested, it might be unwise to bring in these proposals for at least a year, or perhaps two years. More time should be given to studying the types of exemptions that might be made and the different types of rates that might be charged to different industries. These are things the government has not considered as yet, and that should be considered before proceeding with this measure.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Oxford asked a couple of specific questions. On the basis of estimates of 1972 incomes, it is anticipated that capital gains tax collected from corporations in the first year of the new system will account for about $50 million in revenues, and that capital gains tax from individuals will account for some $80 million in revenues.

It is also anticipated that the costs of collection will be in line with those which we are experiencing with the present Income Tax Act, in that the new bill does continue to present a workable self-assessing income tax system. In 1970, the last year for which I have any information, the cost of collection was 73 cents per $100 of revenue.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Chairman, the absence of a capital gains tax from the Canadian tax system has been a glaring loophole that even the Liberal government could not altogether overlook. Consequently, it had to come up with some solutions to the problems created by that loophole. As a result, we now have this very lightweight proposal which provides many concessions that demonstrate that the government has bowed to the wishes of wealthy people and of large corporate interests. The absence of a tax on capital gains, within the framework of an over-all tax system, simply encouraged people to take their profits in the form of capital gains rather than in some other form that would result in a fair tax assessment being made against them.

With respect to the comments made during the debate so far this afternoon, there are a few points to which I would like to draw attention. We must keep in mind that in dealing with the subject of capital gains, essentially we are dealing with two different types of institutions and two different forms of activity where capital gains will come into play. The first is the area of corporations, corporate activity and its related aspects. This is reflected in the gain in capital value achieved by corporations within their own framework of operations which is then shown in the valuation as far as shareholders are concerned. That, along with other factors, results in a change in the valuation of shares held by individuals or institutions in these corporations. The government proposals have given every possible consideration to the situation of shareholders and corporations in order to minimize the problems they might face.

There is a second category, that is people carrying on an activity in other than a corporate pattern of operations. This involves holdings in terms of a residence, holdings in the form of a small business, in the form of farming or fishing activities and other small enterprises which are controlled by an individual or a small group of individuals on an unincorporated basis. The government has shown very little concern for this form of economic activity. It is another example of the discrimination evident in drafting and developing the tax bill now before us. Every possible consideration has been shown to corporations and corporate activity, but very little to the individual who is having a difficult time surviving against the economic strength of those corporations in today's economy.

Another area of activity concerns the financial paper held in many forms by individuals and corporations. The government has shown a surprising lack of consideration for the situation of the individual. There is some response from the government in terms of changes made with respect to the handling of capital gain on the principal residence of an individual, and I suggest that the government should have shown the same consideration to other people hurt by the capital gains proposals or where there is a potential for such damage.

This has been referred to in the context of farming activity. I know the hon. member for Edmonton West has moved an amendment in this regard and I want to acknowledge, as did the leader of my party, that I do not question his motives. But I do suggest, Mr. Chairman, that in addition to the motive we have to look at the content of the amendment and ask what it will actually do. I have a copy of the amendment before me and it proposes to exclude from any calculation of capital gains, ". . . other than land used in farming as defined in this act . . ." This would totally exempt farm lands from any consideration of capital gains, no matter who, what or what for.

I would ask the hon. member for Edmonton West and his colleagues in the Conservative party to give careful consideration to what this amendment would do. Would it actually help the farmer? I suggest not, in its present terms. If farming is exempted from capital gains tax what will be the results? I suggest the result will be a rash of speculative activity in farm lands beyond anything we have seen up to the present. There have already been serious problems in southern Ontario in particular, in the periphery of the large urban centres. A lot of this speculative activity has made things very difficult for farmers honestly attempting to carry on a farm operation. I suggest that the effect of this amendment placed before us by the hon. member for Edmonton West will be exactly opposite to what is intended; in fact, it will hurt the farm and farmers rather than helping. I hope we give serious consideration to the amendment and do not proceed with it in the form in which it now stands.

When we come to deal with the principle of capital gains as such, I think we have to fill this loophole within the framework of our tax system. The argument against the capital gains tax is that it weakens the incentive of individuals. But it must be acknowledged that in fact when the proposals in the white paper were announced originally—and I am certainly no defender of the white paper—the stock market did not collapse or slump; in fact, it rose. That was the reaction of the financial market to the government's announcement of the proposed introduction of a tax on capital gains.

I think the most glaring error in the bill as it concerns the treatment of income and the treatment of economic financial gain is the fact that the concern is not with how much money, but rather how it is made. This is a very important distinction. One thing that can be said for the Carter Commission Report is that it enunciated the philosophy that "a buck is a buck". This should have been followed by the government in a consistent fashion rather than the patchwork solutions contained in Bill C-259.

I want to make it clear, too, that I am no defender of the Carter Commission Report. It proposed a rational tax system and some principles to which those of us in this party can subscribe—the principles of equity, redistribution of income, the philosophy that "a buck is a buck". The over-all thrust of the Carter report however was an attempt to point the way to maintain and save the existing economic system without effecting fundamental changes.

As I have already said, we certainly agree that a capital gains tax should not be imposed on a taxpayer's principal residence. We also feel that it is vital to make provision for dealing with the situation and problems of farmers in order that family farms may continue as viable institutions as a result of the application of this act. The leader of the New Democratic Party has already proposed a provision allowing farmers to invest their capital gains in retirement savings plans, the proceeds of which would be taxed when received as income. He also proposed a rollover provision providing that farmers who may wish to sell one farm and invest the proceeds of the sale in another farm may continue their farming operation without being liable to pay capital gains tax.

Another real area of concern has to do with land legacies, and the passing of land from farmer to son. According to my understanding of the bill before us, if land is passed on by way of sale through an agreement for sale or by way of inheritance, there is to be a deemed realization of a capital gain and someone must pay tax on this deemed realization of a capital gain. There may be people who can meet the bill and pay in cash. Others may pay the bill over a period of time, as is already provided for in taxation legislation. Nevertheless, because of the very nature of agriculture and farming operations, many farmers will find it impossible to pay the tax which may be levied under the act on any capital gain without destroying the viability of the farm unit. It seems to me that careful consideration must be given to this matter. Farmers should either be exempt from the provisions relating to the deemed realization of capital gains which would apply when family farms are passed on within the family, or else they must be given adequate time for paying the tax on capital gains which must be paid.

The subject of capital gains received a good deal of study by the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs of the House of Commons. In this area we received many representations. Members of the New Democratic Party listened to those representations carefully. Very often those representations were framed in such a way as to suggest that they were being made on behalf of the average or typical Canadian taxpayer. Yet, very often the so-called average typical Canadian taxpayers went to the expense of having the briefs printed. They spent money on travel and accommodation and spent the necessary time to appear before the committee and protest against the capital gains tax. I suggest that many of the people who appeared before the committee—and I am in no way criticizing them for appearing or suggesting that they should not have the right to appear—certainly were not typical of the average Canadian taxpayer. Many of those people probably were able to deduct the expenses associated with their appearing before the committee from their personal taxable incomes, or from the incomes of the corporations on whose behalf they were appearing.

As I said before, we noted, when the white paper on tax reform was announced and when subsequent discussions took place, that the stock market did not collapse. It did not collapse when it was announced that there was to be a capital gains tax, because the pleas of those who opposed the capital gains tax were discounted by the facts. For the members of the New Democratic Party, the introduction of a full capital gains tax, which none the less takes into consideration some of the situations I have already mentioned, remains a sound and necessary principle if we are to have any form of an equitable and just tax system. Thus I hope that the government, in giving these matters consideration, will make the necessary changes in the bill in order to take into account suggestions which have been made to the government by members of this party.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Chairman, I welcome the chance to speak on the capital gains tax provision, especially as, in my view, it will affect the farming areas of Canada. I believe that the capital gains tax will be a tax which, when it is administered, will completely disregard the nature of the farm economy. In my opinion, this tax will seriously hamper the growth of an already troubled farm economy. Agricultural development will be seriously hindered as a result of this tax.

Many economists say that Canada does not lack the capital which is needed for expansion but that Canadians are too hesitant about investing their savings. I dispute this, Mr. Chairman. In my district there are definitely limited amounts of money available for farm and business expansion. Until the present, capital gains were one of the sources of investment income. Now, those gains will be taxed. This measure, combined with government tax measures affecting credit unions and the complete destruction of the incentive for foreign investment to come here, will definitely cut down available moneys which are desperately needed for expansion in the rural areas of Canada. I will save my criticism regarding the taxation of credit unions and express it on another occasion. However, I will make one point. Credit unions, especially, serve a tremendously useful purpose in that a credit union's loosened credit restrictions have often made moneys available to farmers and small businessmen when there was no other source available. Now these loosened credit restrictions are to be seriously curtailed.

My purpose today, Mr. Chairman, is to point out to this committee that there is a great deal of urgent concern among the agricultural community and that the present draft regulations represent a very real and immediate threat to the viability of agriculture. There is both concern and conviction with regard to this matter. It is thought that the provisions of the act applying to farms have been prepared without a full recognition of the effects of these provisions. If they are not further amended, they will have a depressing effect on the ability of farmers to maintain a viable income generating operation. If this capacity is lost or materially reduced, the implications for Canadian agriculture will, I believe, be most unfortunate.

My concern about Bill C-259 derives from the fact that I believe insufficient recognition is given to the unique and special nature of farming. I would, therefore, like to point out two of the main areas which I believe merit consideration and attention in the development of tax laws. There is, first, the high investment and low return nature of farming. It has long been recognized that the ratio of investment to return in agriculture is extremely high. Not only is this a characteristic of agriculture, but the problem is further compounded by a moderately high risk factor associated with the varieties of climate and market with which farmers and agricultural producers in general have to contend. Second, one must consider the family farm itself. This factor has been alluded to before in this debate.

The second aspect in which farming is almost unique is that the same operation remains in the same family from generation to generation. This applies to farms in a more general way than to other businesses. The reasons for this are manifold. I will not deal with them in detail at this time. Briefly, however, farming skills are most commonly attained by farm youths who are involved in the operation during their growing years. In many cases they build equity in the farm in return for labour. A related consideration, of course, is that the high investment and low return characteristic of agriculture discourages new entrants. In view of this, I believe that the transfer of an ongoing farm operation between generations should not in any way be hampered by further taxes which cannot be borne by the ongoing operation.

From looking at the various sections of the legislation, Mr. Chairman, I am convinced that farming has not been considered adequately. The provisions of Bill C-259, as they now apply, represent one of the most serious issues that has confronted agriculture in many years. A few weeks ago we talked a great deal about the grain stabilization bill and the effect it would have on farming in western Canada. I believe that the long run implications of the taxing legislation, Bill C-259, will have a far more serious effect on farming than any proposed legislation has had to this date.

There is, as I understand it, absolutely no provisions for farms to be transferred within a family, except to a spouse, whether by sale or inheritance without immediate realization of capital gain. This would be true of the sale or transfer of a farm to a son or inheritance by the son from the father. This problem can be avoided in many cases by good estate planning or incorporation of farms. However, even the death of a son who holds the common shares in a corporation could result in the realization of a taxable capital gain while the father is still in active charge of running the farm. This would create serious financial problems. However, I do not believe that it should, in all cases, be necessary for a farmer to incorporate in order to achieve stability and continuity of the farm business within the family. Payment of the capital gains tax out of the tied up assets of an on-going family farm operation could, and probably would, be disruptive and place the continuation of the enterprise in jeopardy.

Tax legislation should not be of a nature that would preclude the possibility or increase the difficulty of internal transfers. Neither do I believe that the tax structure should be such that it would have the unfortunate effect of tending to lock people into agriculture for purely tax considerations. If this piece of legislation is looked at on the basis of its long-term effects, this could very well happen. I very strongly urge the government to have another look at the capital gains tax as it affects farmers, with the view to a possible modification of it in terms of the transfer of a farm from father to son.

Also, Mr. Chairman, while the federal government has, as far as its own funding is concerned, given up use of estate and gift taxes, this does not settle the question of what may happen if the provinces impose these taxes. Under these proposals, farmers are still potentially faced with double taxation on the farm on inheritance, something which should be avoided at all costs. We have seen what has happened in Manitoba and Saskatchewan where the governments have stepped into the gap left when the federal government dropped the estate and gift taxes. We will very shortly have in these two prairie agricultural provinces a form of double taxation on some farms, not all farms but some farms. To alleviate this problem, I suggest that in the case of any province imposing estate or succession duties, a tax abatement system be introduced by the federal government so that the amount of capital gains tax payable could be reduced by the amount of succession duties payable by the producers in those particular instances.

The present proposal in section 40(2)(c), as I understand it, is that a farmer may opt for either exemption from capital gains on his principal residence or exemption of $1,000 on disposal of the farm, including his principal residence. I would like to raise one or two points in this connection. First, I think it should be provided that an incorporated farm business qualifies for these exemptions in respect of both the $1,000 provision and the principal residence provision. Also, under the provisions of the bill a farmer must be in residence on the farm for each year for which he qualifies for the $1,000 farm exemption option. This can create real problems for a great many people in the farming community.

There are a great many farmers fully occupied in farming who do not have their principal residences on their farms, but for reasons of education for their children and other social amenities live in an adjacent town or village. It should be possible for the farmer to utilize that $1,000 option provision for the years in which he was engaged in farming even if he was not a resident on the farm. This would also solve other problems relating to the use of the farm home by the son while both work on the farm, and the retirement of the farmer from the farm while the farm continues to be worked by the son or hired help, without sale or the transfer of it.

I also believe, Mr. Chairman, that it should not be necessary for the purposes of using the $1,000 per annum option for the sale of the farm to include the sale of the principal residence. Many farmers will, on retirement, wish to retain their homes. While the exemption for the $1,000 per year as applied to principal residence is desirable, it appears to be an attempt to treat the farmer in the same manner as a city dweller who is exempt from all capital gains on his principal residence.

Another provision that I think should be made in the legislation relates to the sale of a part of a farmer's land. As I read the bill, it would not be possible, unless under expropriation, for a farmer to sell land and reinvest the proceeds in the same or another farm without realization and taxation of capital gains. There are many circumstances when a reorganization of the farm business requires disposal of land and purchase of either other land or depreciable assets for the farm business. This is particularly important for a farmer who wishes to change to production of another agricultural product, such as a prairie wheat farmer who starts into cattle, hogs, or poultry. Public policy has in recent years emphasized the necessity of farmers to adapt their productions to market conditions. The capital gains tax provision now proposed would introduce a necessary rigidity. There should be no realization of capital gains on such reinvestment. This will be a real problem for many farmers and we request that it be taken into account.

Also, I would like to point out that for persons who do not need to invest their capital gains in their own enterprises, the annuity arrangement permits extensive averaging. The farmer who wishes to reinvest in farming should have the corresponding option I have suggested. There will also be many cases where the farmer will suffer capital losses on disposal of property. If he is faced at that time with new investment in the reorganization of his business, the backward averaging provision may be of little use to him, or unavailable. I recommend that in such cases a forward averaging over a period of years be provided for the farmer.

These, Mr. Chairman, are basically the areas where I find amendments should be made to the legislation. The transfer of a farm within a family, whether by sale or by inheritance, without the realization of capital gains is probably the most important area to be dealt with. I think it is absolutely necessary that the government take another look at this area because, as I have mentioned before, the family farm is a special problem in relation to other segments of our society. The $1,000 exemption for the principal residence should be amended to include farm corporations because they are becoming increasingly more numerous and are very much a part of modern day farming.

To conclude my remarks, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that the points I have made are entirely beyond realization or would be unacceptable for the government to bring in as amendments to the tax legislation. As I tried to stress earlier, farming, because of its very nature, is unique when compared to a great many other businesses and it should be treated as such in any taxation proposals that are brought forward.

[Mr. Murta.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (4:50 p.m.)

Mr. Thomson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary a question having to do with the depreciation allowances with respect to farm machinery. When I have done so I should like to make a comment or two on that item. I understand that under the new act what might be called a capital gain arising from the trade-in of capital equipment will be taken directly into a farmers' income.

Mr. Mahoney: I am sorry. Is the hon. member speaking about the present bill or the existing act?

Mr. Thomson: I am referring to the legislation before us. Will the residual value of a piece of farm machinery, when it is traded in, be taken directly into farm income, and not considered to be a capital gain?

Mr. Mahoney: To the extent that it constitutes recaptured depreciation, it is income. The only way in which capital gains would arise would be if a farmer were fortunate enough to sell a piece of machinery for more than he originally paid for it, the item of equipment having been acquired after the system comes into effect.

Mr. Thomson: I am still not clear about the position, but if I am in error, I hope the minister will correct me. The present system of dealing in farm machinery appears, now, to be out of line, in the sense that machinery companies allow a big mark-up in the value of pieces of farm machinery traded in near the end of the depreciation period. Then, the farmer has to pay what might be called an outrageous price for the new machine. Neither price reflects the true value of the equipment. It seems to me that if my understanding of the hon. gentleman's reply is correct, there would need to be a considerable adjustment of the mechanism now operating in the farm machinery market. Take, for instance, a combine which sells for $10,500. A farmer wishing to buy it will get a $5,000 trade on an old combine of his which is worth only $2,000.

I telephoned a farm machinery company to ask what their procedure was and they indicated they were already responding to the new situation by giving a cash discount and placing a truer value on the used machine. I am really wondering whether the depreciation schedule as now set up should be allowed at all. If a farmer is allowed to take a figure for depreciation of $10,000 when the value of his equipment is only $7,500, then the assumption with which we have begun is an unreasonable one. Possibly the parliamentary secretary would care to comment about this aspect in a moment or two, but it appears to me the whole system will have to be changed. The present situation illustrates the way in which systems are built up when the rules are one way. If the rules are changed, something different has to be done.

I should like to make a few comments, now, on another difficulty which arises with respect of the imposition of a capital gains tax on farm land. The last speaker pointed out that the administration of laws of this kind is extremely difficult. I have in mind problems which have arisen in connection with estate tax in the past. Perhaps these arose not because the estate tax in itself was so much out of line as because the people administering it did a poor job, in my opinion. Let me give the committee an illustration. I know a case of a house in a small town being valued for estate tax purposes as if it were situated in a city. It was not the true value. It was not possible to get a price of that sort for the house. But the officials insisted it was a true value. I believe it would be difficult to arrive at an accurate value of farm land for capital gains purposes. I have recently been arguing with the Minister of National Revenue on behalf of a farmer in my constituency about the value of a particular piece of farm land. In effect, I said: If the department is so certain that their value is a correct one, why do they not take the land at their price in payment of the tax the department says the farmer owes.

I suggest to the parliamentary secretary that the assessment of the value of a farm when it passes from father to son should bear some relationship to the capacity of that farm to produce well. Even this will present difficulties. For example, the price paid for a quarter-section of land purchased to round out an economic unit might well not bear a true relationship to what it was worth on the open market. Farmers sometimes pay much more than the true value of land in order to start a son farming or round out an economic unit. I am sure the government does not wish to penalize anyone in particular, but it appears to me there is room for debate here and considerable room for friction between the department involved and the individuals directly concerned.

The Deputy Chairman: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Temiscamingue (Mr. Caouette)—Air Canada—Request for DC-9 Air Service in Rouyn-Noranda Region; the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom)—Grain—Wheat—Statement by Minister of Supply and Services on necessity for two-price system—government policy; the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay)—Harbours—Pictou, Nova Scotia—Implementation of plans for improved facilities.

Mr. Mahoney: In response to the point raised by the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley I would grant that the existing income tax law providing for straight-line depreciation and no recapture of depreciation applicable to farm equipment may be a contributing factor to the way in which some of the pricing mechanisms have been built up in connection with the farm equipment industry. It would certainly be the sort of thing which would encourage a policy of writing up the true value of a trade-in on the one hand and of the price of the new equipment to be sold on the other. I understand that the pricing mechanisms of the farm equipment companies are overdue for an overhaul according to suggestions made by those who have studied this question with particular concern. I would say that the amendments presently before the House would at least remove one obstacle to a significant revision of this pricing mechanism.

Mr. Gundlock: Mr. Chairman, the parliamentary secretary suggested in his answer that amendments to the Income Tax Act might correct this ambiguity. Or did I misunderstand him?

Mr. Mahoney: If the committee will excuse me, I suggested amendment might remove one obstacle. I am not for a moment suggesting it is a cure-all.

Mr. Gundlock: That is exactly what I am saying. We are not talking about the Income Tax Act itself; we are talking about income tax reform. The immediate subject under discussion is capital gains made by farmers. I should like to know what the parliamentary secretary is really saying. Is he going to tell us tomorrow that this matter will be corrected by the Income Tax Act or the regulations made pursuant thereto? We have plenty of time, so why does he not tell us now what he is really saying?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I am sure that when the hon. member has had an opportunity to read my answer in Hansard tomorrow it will come through to him a little more clearly than it apparently has at the moment.

Mr. Gundlock: Mr. Chairman, we have had the opportunity of reading Hansard on so many occasions and also the act. What we are doing today is discussing capital gains as they relate to farmers. We are not talking about the Income Tax Act as such. According to the press, the parliamentary secretary from Calgary South has lamented the ineffective opposition in the debate on this bill, and now he tells me to read Hansard. The parliamentary secretary says that we are so ineffective, and I want to be effective. Since he is so worried about our ineffectiveness, he should be so magnanimous as to tell us why.

To turn to the amendment, I support it fully. Let me go back some eight or ten years to a time when we were discussing this matter in this House. As reported at page 4191 of Hansard for May 1, 1961 I said:

> I am in the particular category of farming which the hon. member mentioned. That is what is commonly known as the category of family farms. I do not think it is the intention of this government—although it may have been the intention of former governments—to remove every other farmer, as I think was mentioned, or the small family farmer.

I wish to emphasize that. One of the previous speakers was a member of the Liberal government and he spoke about a very important act that meant a great deal to Canada, particularly to our farmers. The present government had an answer to its policies as recently as last week in Saskatchewan, but the amazing thing is that the parliamentary secretary today is speaking in exactly the same vein as the hon. member to whom I referred spoke ten years ago, because he is suggesting that the family farm should close down.

The hon. member can sit there and chuckle if he likes.

Mr. Mahoney: I am shaking my head, not chuckling.

Mr. Gundlock: It is about time he shook his head. There are a lot of other people a little closer to home who will be shaking their heads, too. The parliamentary secretary has failed to answer a very pertinent question.

I should like to refer to something I said very recently, and which I have been saying for over ten years. It is rather like the little boy butting his head up against a stone wall, but repetition is the only way to get through to the government and finally, to give credit where credit is due, I think the government is beginning to listen. I was referring to the advisers of the government and asked how in the world a practical politician, such as the Minister of Finance or his parliamentary secretary, could dream up such a bill as this. I know the Chair will call me back to the amendment in a moment, but at page 8969 of Hansard for October 22, I quoted remarks made at page 8335 of Hansard by an hon. member opposite, who had this to say:

I suggest we should have a minister whose primary concern would be the co-ordination of the economic policies of all these departments and the development of general economic policies. I suggest we should have a minister of state for economic policy who would undertake this task.

By coincidence, I read on the front page of the Globe and Mail that the premier of one of our greatest provinces has called, in effect, for the same thing, namely for doing away with waste and duplication and for a joint study to decide economic goals. In deciding what our economic goals are to be we must necessarily consider farmers and small businessmen, though here we are referring in particular to farmers. We are talking about farmers and small businessmen who have built up some sort of estate, and whose heirs or successors are required to sell part of the estate to pay tax on the death of those farmers or businessmen. If you are against taxes you are popular, but we must be realistic. I quoted earlier from a speech I made here in the House dealing with the lack of regulations under the Income Tax Act regarding an exemption for the cost of rock picking. Let me now refer to section 30 of this bill which relates to land clearing exemptions.

In my area of the country there are very few trees, unlike that area around Regina, but we do have a lot of rock. Over a period of 30 years my expense for rock picking has amounted to about $50 per acre. I am not allowed to deduct that expense from the cost of my farming operation. Every other expense is spelled out, and to me rock picking is an expensive operation. This expense is not allowed under the Income Tax Act and it is not allowed apparently under this bill. If I sold my land, I would not be allowed to deduct that expense before calculating any capital gains tax, yet the clearing of that rock contributed to the increased value of the land. I will not be allowed to deduct the capital gains tax as an expense under the Income Tax Act, therefore there will be double taxation. I would be very happy if the parliamentary secretary would explain the situation. I feel this is a legitimate expense which should be allowed as a deduction under either the Income Tax Act or as a cost in calculating capital gains tax.

Mr. Mahoney: Did I understand the hon. member correctly to say that he was not allowed to deduct the cost of clearing land from his taxable income?

Mr. Gundlock: As usual, the hon. Parliamentary Secretary did not understand. I was referring to the removal of rocks from farms in certain areas. This involves a great expense but is not covered as a cost of land clearing such as clearing brush, trees and blasting stumps. Perhaps you will refer for a moment to section 30 of this bill which refers to these exemptions. It refers to the removal of trees, brush, stumps and such things but it does not refer to rocks. I pointed out that I had spent perhaps $50 an acre on rock picking, and I was not allowed to deduct this as an expense in calculating income but that this would contribute to the value of the land and therefore the capital gains tax. In that way, I would pay double taxation.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the appreciation of land value as a result of the work and investment the hon. member has put into it through rock removal would be reflected in the land value at this point, and any appreciation in value up to the time of the new system with the capital gains included in the tax base would not be subject to the capital gains tax. I do not think the hon. member is right in suggesting there would be an element of double taxation for the kind of expenditure he has made in the past, and certainly for that kind of expenditure in the future. If it is not a deductible item under the Income Tax Act, but it did contribute to the increased value of the land, it would be a capital cost that would come into the cost base in calculating the capital gain.

Mr. Gundlock: That is what we are looking for in this amendment, some sort of assurance in this regard. The hon. parliamentary secretary says he is not sure when he is talking about the future. That is the whole point of the debate. We want some assurance now for the future when we talk about capital gains in relation to agriculture. This is not a new subject. I talked about it ten years ago. The situation existed under an old law passed by the government of which the parliamentary secretary is a member, and existed for a short period even under a different government. We are now facing the same situation, and we want some assurance that a deduction will be made to allow for this kind of expense either under the Income Tax Act or the capital gains tax. This is what we are talking about and I should like to have an answer.

Apparently the parliamentary secretary is not going to say anything, and that almost leaves me without words, so I will just quote again because the agricultural people of this country are listening and want to know what is to be done. Small businessmen in many constituencies, and even those in big towns like Calgary, have an interest. All these people are affected by the agricultural communities and they want to know about this capital gains tax. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary would listen for a moment and give us an explanation. I should like an explanation about that part of the capital gains tax which requires that an individual has to be a resident in Canada in order to avail himself of these exemptions. This sounds to me as though we would have to bring back the body of a man who died outside the country in order to take advantage of the exemptions to the capital gains tax. It looks as though we will wind up with a lot of bodies here.

I have received a number of letters from farmers regarding this proposed capital gains tax and I should like to read one. This man met me at the airport yesterday before leaving to return to Ottawa. He said: "Dean, we are old friends. What are we going to do about this? I have written to the Minister of Finance, Mr. Benson, and I have written to Mr. Mahoney. I have not had any answer. What can I do?" I said: "Apparently they are not listening in the House of Commons, but I promise that if you will give me permission I will read your letter into the record on Monday when we will be talking about capital gains." The letter is dated November 14, 1971 and reads as follows:

• (5:20 p.m.)

Dear Sir,

I hope you will read this letter to the House of Commons, at Ottawa.

I read Hansard so I am pretty well posted. I can't see why this government can't separate the good legislation from the bad. Take the income tax bill, it helps some people and hurts others.

If they do away with the depreciation on farm machinery and put the capital gains tax on the farms, it will put the family farm out of business.

I could say a lot more, but think these are the most important points right now.

Sincerely yours,

A. J. Walks

After he handed me this letter, Mr. Walks pointed out that he is a life-long Liberal. I was aware of that because we are good friends. I told him he did not have to point this out to me but he said to me, "Say it; I have written the Minister of Finance and the parliamentary secretary and have had no answer. Now, I come to you." Mr. Chairman, and Mr. Parliamentary Secretary, I believe you understand what this man meant. People engaged in agriculture are not having a very good time because of the high rates of interest and so on. I hope the parliamentary secretary, and through him the minister, will consider for a moment that there might be a bit of difference between agriculture, small business and what we might call the "fast buck boys".

I have before me an article which appeared in a newspaper in western Canada entitled "Cattlemen gain tax concessions". I might say a word of commendation for my colleague, the hon. member for Crowfoot, in this regard because I believe it was mostly due to his efforts. I would hope that perhaps the farmers and small businessmen in western Canada—I put it that way although I really do not mean it in that way—as well as businessmen in all Canada would receive some of the consideration due to them. I think the government could perhaps stand this portion of the bill in order to have another look at it. It is not necessary that we in the opposition have credit for this. This is something that is needed by the country.

The other day I pointed out that a year ago in Three Rivers, Quebec, the chain stores had advertised pork at 19 cents a pound for halves and quarters, and beef at 39 cents a pound for halves and quarters. Something has to be wrong with a government administration that would allow such a situation. This goes right back to the people who have worked for years and years in agriculture and who at their retirement age are faced with such a situation. I say there must be some realignment in the government administration. I realize this is another point. There probably are controls. The United States is looking after its business, and quite rightly so. I believe it is time Canada looked after her business. There is an old axiom to the effect that if you do not look after your own business someone else will. This is exactly what will happen to the party opposite. If it does not look after Canada's business, somebody else will and that will be a great day.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman, in speaking in support of the amendment proposed by my colleague from Edmonton West I hope to do so without being bombastic or long-winded, but it occurs to me that perhaps there is a quote from a great man which might relate to what is being discussed today. I believe it was William Jennings Bryan who said, in assessing the importance of the farm to a country's economy, that if you destroy the cities and leave the farms intact the cities will spring up by themselves, but if, on the other hand, you do anything to diminish or destroy the farms there will be grass growing in the streets of every city in the land. This may be, as I said at the outset, a little bombastic, but there is an element of truth in it. I believe the government would be remiss if it underestimated the effect the family farm, and farms generally, have on the economy of this country. I think there is an excellent case to be made for exempting farms from the capital gains provisions. It would seem obvious to every thinking Canadian that the time has possibly come in this country when it is necessary to have some capital gains provisions if it is proposed to tax the wages of a worker.

I suppose in some instances it is only equity to also tax the fruits of speculation and short-term gains by speculators. It may even be necessary to tax some forms of short-term real estate transactions. What disturbs me, however, in looking at the effect of capital gains on the family farm, and indeed on real estate in general, is that at the present time we are in a very unsatisfactory state so far as federal-provincial agreement is concerned on taxation generally. Last June the Minister of Finance said something to the effect that he was proud to announce that the federal government was abdicating the fields of gift and estate taxes and instead was substituting a capital gains tax. Yet we find that at the present time many provinces, with encouragement from the federal government, intend to remain in the estate and gift tax field if certain financial arrangements are made in this regard. It seems to me that what we need more than anything else in reference to capital gains, specifically in relation to farms and real property, is a national approach to taxation.

If one looks at the records, one finds that the provinces, and many responsible people in government and in business, feel that something must be done to integrate and correlate taxes on a federal, provincial and even on the municipal level. It is good business to do this. It is not only good business, it is good for national unity. I do not see why something cannot be done to defer or to exempt to some extent some types of capital gains, particularly as they relate to assets held for a long time by working people and, in the particular context of the debate this afternoon, by people who have farms.

I would suggest that it is one of the most onerous of taxes to apply to people who have put a great deal of work into building up a farm, who have already paid tax throughout their working lives in respect of the moneys they have earned and the moneys they have used to purchase and to improve farms in order to build up a worthwhile asset not only for themselves but for the whole community. For the government to impose a capital gains tax on these people under these circumstances is, in my opinion, almost immoral, particularly when one finds there is no general agreement among the provinces as to whether some sort of arrangement will be made with the federal government on an abatement or other similar basis regarding estate tax.

Thinking back over the events of a few days ago when the hon. member for Crowfoot and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance engaged in a very interesting bit of repartee on capital gains with reference to the basic herd concept, I remember that previously I had thought the government had not given sufficient consideration to the experience that was available in the United States of America with regard to the concept of a capital gains tax. Listening to the exchange between those two hon. gentlemen reinforced my belief. I wish I were more expert in the tax field and could speak with more authority, but it seems to me there is much to be learned from the American experience with regard to long- and short-term capital gains and other aspects of taxation which the Americans have had a chance to refine over a long period of time—certainly longer than we have had, particularly with respect to capital gains.

I think it would be in the best interests of the country—and so far as that goes, of the government—if serious consideration were given to treating farmers in a definite and specific way that would exempt them, at least at this time, from the provisions of a capital gains tax. I do not think there is anything to be gained by imposing such a tax at this time, given the present state of the agricultural and national economy. I want to be definite about this. I am not opposed to the concept of a capital gains tax. I think that probably the time has come in this country when it is necessary to have it. What I am opposed to is the method, the haste, the uncertainty and the mechanics used by the government to impose such a tax at this time.

It is a matter of record that many nations—and not only undeveloped nations—do not find it necessary to have a capital gains tax. I believe that Japan, Australia, South Africa and France have no capital gains tax. I may be wrong and maybe the parliamentary secretary will disagree with. I cannot swear that this is true, but I believe it is. I believe that Belgium, Germany, Holland and Italy have a tax only on speculative gains. If this is true, I would think that an excellent case could be made in this country for exempting certain types of assets from a capital gains tax.

I do not think anyone would quarrel with taxing speculative gains, whether those gains be made in the stock market or in the real estate market. They are a fast buck method of gains and I do not think anyone would disagree with taxing it. But I think it is morally wrong, and I think the government would find it politically indefensible in years to come, to impose a capital gains tax on family farms and not take immediate steps to get together with the provinces, and even the municipalities, to stop the very real possibility developing of double taxation, at least in theory, as the proposal now stands.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, I wish to support the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Edmonton West with respect to the application of capital gains tax to farming enterprise. In view of the remarks that have already been made on this matter, there is no need to deal with the capital gains concept: I am sure that all hon. members agree that the time has come when some revenue should be derived for the public treasury from capital gains.

Whenever this subject was discussed in the House, particularly in recent years following the appointment of the Carter royal commission, I recall that the argument advanced was that the Canadian economy was not sufficiently mature or developed to contemplate adding capital gains tax to the existing income tax and corporate tax measures. However, Mr. Chairman, we must remember there was the same resistance to the introduction of income tax when it was first applied in Canada on a temporary basis during World War I. What was regarded as temporary to meet the exigencies of war has become permanent to the extent that it is now accepted without too much protest by all citizens of Canada. The concept of a capital gains tax has been going through the same process of evolution with regard to acceptability.

Canada, in terms of its economic development, is still largely dependent upon primary rather than secondary production. Those who have a substantial interest in the processes of primary production argue that to apply a regressive capital gains tax at this stage in our economic development would have a decidedly negative impact on our gradual movement toward emphasis on secondary production. Those who engage in developing the resource industry have much justification in the argument they make, that there should be no undue exacting of tax from this part of our productive processes at this particular time in our development. I am not going to engage in a discussion on the general aspects of primary producers other than to focus—and I think this is the purpose of the amendment—on the capital gains tax as it would apply to farming as part of our primary production industry.

I want to link it with the seemingly negative attitude of the government toward the agricultural industry, as has been manifest in its policy initiatives since it assumed office in 1968. I refer to the Lift program, the Lower Inventory for Tomorrow program—which was immediately re-named by the farmers whom it was supposed to benefit as the Lower Income for Tomorrow program—more recently Bill C-176, the agricultural products marketing bill, and the subject that was debated quite extensively in this House during the present session, the grain stabilization bill. I do not think it is unfair criticism to say that each of these legislative initiatives has had a negative reaction from the primary producers, the farmers, who have indicated that they feel that government policy generally is out of tune with the agricultural industry. I should like to suggest, Mr. Chairman, that this argument can justifiably be applied to the application of a capital gains tax as outlined in the voluminous legislation before us.

I want to turn to page 569 of the bill which gives the definition of "farming" for the purpose of the act. At the top of the page the marginal note "farming" appears and the definition as follows:

"farming" includes tillage of the soil, livestock raising or exhibiting, maintaining of horses for racing, raising of poultry, fur farming, dairy farming, fruit growing and the keeping of bees, but does not include an office or employment under a person engaged in the business of farming—

That is a very broad definition of the agricultural industry and it may be necessary to further delimit the terms of reference. For example, "maintaining of horses for racing" is rather a unique category of farming that might be excluded as an essential part of the industry.

In supporting the amendment I would suggest to the parliamentary secretary and the government that at this stage of development of the agricultural industry, when it is obvious that very serious economic hardship is being suffered by our farmers, there is every argument to be made that the proposed amendment is one of the best ways of avoiding further serious deterrent to the progress of the industry.

I do not have to outline the statistics or the pattern that has evolved in the past couple of decades. More and more of our farmers have been leaving the industry. It is part of what the sociologists call the rural-urban drift. Judging by government policy initiatives that I have outlined briefly, the government has accepted that the drift from the farm to the cities is an inevitable process and has decided that any policies it initiates will accelerate the process. How else can the pattern that has evolved in legislative initiatives over the past two or three years in this House be explained?

I think farmers are quite justified in resisting as strenuously as they can through farm organizations and personal protests what the government has been trying to do. Members of this House who represent farming communities have been vigorous enough in the debates on the grain stabilization bill to demonstrate to the government that it is moving in the wrong direction in dealing with the so-called farm problem.

There are still many arguments pro and con the imposition of a capital gains tax, as has been demonstrated in the debate thus far. Surely the government will accept the amendment and remove entirely from the application of capital gains tax the agricultural industry, perhaps with a narrow definition. It does not necessarily have to include horse racing. Farmers engaged in primary production are finding it increasingly difficult to comprehend the rationale of their industry at the present time, as is demonstrated by the movement of farmers from the land and by the increase in the size of farms as farmers move toward corporation farming. If this process continues to be encouraged by the government, we will have corporate farms rather than family farms and then the problem of capital gains will be resolved even if there is an exemption as recommended in this amendment. Though we have had extended debates on agricultural problems over the last few months, the government obviously has not accepted the reasonableness of our arguments.

I should like now to deal with the broader social implications of legislative initiatives as represented in this further attack on the integrity of the family farm. Perhaps this applies to western Canada more than it does to other parts of the farming economy. There is a social problem involved in the imposition of a capital gains tax which would eat at the very foundations of the preservation of the family farm, which would have serious implications with respect to the growth of our urban population at the expense of the rural population and which would aggravate and compound the social and economic problems that are increasing in the large metropolitan communities at such a rate that local government is not able to cope.

It is in urban communities that you find the major social difficulties, the problems of pollution and the problems associated with the decline and disintegration of the family as a basic social unit. That is where you will find the greatest deliquency and crime; that is where you will find problems associated with the drug culture which is espoused by young people. That problem is exercising governments at all levels to a great extent today. All these basic social issues have their origin in the phenomenon which has been part of the twentieth century, of the accelerating drift of the rural population to the big, booming metropolitan communities.

I do not think it is inevitable that this situation should persist. It is not a natural phenomenon. I think we will find, as is already occurring, that more and more young people will be moving out of the big city because there is a repeated lowering there in the quality of life associated with the pursuit of some of the basic values which are not necessarily connected with economic and fiscal values. Economic and fiscal values were perhaps the prime motivating forces in the earlier part of the twentieth century. It is significant that young people today are repudiating these values and emphasizing the qualify of life as measured in human values rather than as measured in economic and fiscal values.

Any step put before the government which will encourage the slowing down of the so-called rural-urban drift should, I think, receive the wholehearted support of members on all sides of the House. We have here an opportunity to do that. Without destroying the broader intention of section 3, in particular, of Bill C-259 we can do it by removing entirely from the legislation the application of a capital gains tax to certain groups.

Let me say again that we may require a further redefining of the agricultural industry. The government has already brought in numerous amendments and amendments to amendments, so there is no problem in this respect. Certainly, enough has been said already about this particular item. Yet we can demonstrate that the family farm should be preserved at all cost. We are moving very gingerly into the capital gains field. The rates of tax will not be applied at the regular level of income or corporation tax. Actually, certain exemptions have already been brought in by the government through its legislative initiative. For example, the basic division between securities and other forms of property is one attempt by the government to differentiate between the kinds of assets that should be taxable under the proposed capital gains provision.

I strongly recommend that the parliamentary secretary and the government accept this amendment. They have proposed many amendments of their own. The government has been reluctant to accept any amendments proposed as a result of committee hearings held prior to committee of the whole discussion at which Bill C-259 was discussed. Surely they can accept at least one amendment proposed by members of the opposition. It is designed to protect a fundamental, primary industry—the agricultural industry—from further erosion, to preserve the family farm and to slow down the drift from rural to urban communities, a drift which is having such a deleterious effect on the quality of Canadian life.

Rather than encouraging that process, let the government introduce legislation the aim of which, as opposed to the aim of the grain stabilization bill, of the Lift program and of the farm marketing bill, is to encourage farmers to stay on the land. Let them take a policy initiative that will encourage farmers to stay on the land, and encourage the preservation of rural values which to a large extent have been destroyed by the rapid and disastrous depopulation of our rural communities.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Chairman, may I call it six o'clock?

The Deputy Chairman: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Chairman, this afternoon the hon. member for Edmonton West moved an amendment which was of primary concern to farming areas throughout Canada. I will not be revealing any secret to the House when I say that many farm communities in Canada have been fighting a losing battle under the present administration. Under the circumstances, it is difficult to understand why at this time another tax is being loaded onto the backs of our farmers. Any explanations we have had from the government have attempted to prove that what is being done is necessarily good for the farm communities.

This afternoon the parliamentary secretary stated that the taxes collected will be in the order of $50 million from corporations, and $80 million from individuals. He can correct me if I am wrong on this. The tax burden will not be on the corporations, as the members of the New Democratic Party claim. This money will come from small businessmen, enterprisers and struggling individuals. These people have been paying the bulk of the taxes up until this time.

In a young country like Canada I fail to see why it is necessary to burden everyone with a capital gains tax. A capital gains tax sounds very nice. However, we must realize that the burden will be on the individual. I do not think we are so smug to suggest that we have all the money we need, that we should not have savings or that no one in this country should make money. It will be a sorry day for this country if efforts are bent upon finding loopholes whereby people will avoid paying taxes. This, surely, will not build a better Canada. I know the NDP philosophy inside out. I was born into it; I lived it.

Mr. Gleave: Did you go to school, or something?

Mr. Korchinski: The hon. member asked if I went to school. I heard the philosophy inside out. It is falling out of my ears. It will fall out of the hon. member's ears also. I do not know whether he realizes it, but it will affect his farm and his neighbour's farm. I do not care if it affects the hon. member's farm, but I am concerned about his neighbour. In reply to the member's question, yes, I did go to school. I have heard the comments of the leader of the New Democratic Party.

An hon. Member: Socialism!

Mr. Korchinski: You can call it socialism or anything you like. For the sake of $130 million, I wonder whether this country needs the NDP philosophy. I want to differentiate between capital gains that are speculative and those earned by inflation, general increases in prices. There is not very much wrong with taxing an individual who makes money by speculating. I do not argue with that. However, I do have one argument. I am talking about the farmer who made his child pick rocks and roots, and the businessman who struggled to put his child behind the counter. These people kept their children home from school in order to build a viable unit. Suddenly, for the sake of a philosophy that has been continuously pushed by the New Democratic Party, we have to swallow a philosophy of a group of people who do not amount to a hill of beans.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Slave labour.

Mr. Korchinski: It is slave labour. Capital gains are earned through slave labour. This bill does not suggest that a child will receive a minimum of $1.75, $2 an hour or whatever it may be. All the bill says is: You have it, and you must give it to us. This is the philosophy of capital gains. I do not mind the speculator being taxed. I want to differentiate from real and imaginary capital gains. Imaginary capital gains are inflation. Inflation increases prices.

It was interesting to listen to some of the speeches of the NDP. When the hon. member for Edmonton West moved a motion, they disagreed with it. Did they move a subamendment? No. They were afraid to do that. They wanted to put us in a position where it would appear that they wanted to do more for the farmer than the farmers of this party. They do not want to put their words into action. They do not want an amendment for only one reason—it defies their philosophy.

How can a leader who has always worked on behalf of labour tell me he is working on behalf of farmers? Does he realize for one moment what it is like to have to spend all your money, nothing brushed off, breaking stones, as my seatmate mentioned this afternoon? Does he realize that every bit of ditching meant a capital gain on the land? If you work hard to leave something for posterity, then one day they want it. It does not matter to them that every time you did that your assessment went up on your land and you paid your taxes accordingly.

Oh yes, they say, "If you don't pay it, somebody else will." Let me tell the leader of the NDP that the farmers who went out to work and made improvements on their land paid taxes to the municipalities for roads and other improvements that the men who are sitting as labour representatives now enjoy. They pay income tax, but so does the farmer—if he ever makes a dollar. We built the roads, the schools and paid for the teachers. We did everything else as well. But we are to pay taxes in the way now laid down for us, and if you turn around and make a capital gain because you have struggled like a devil, you have to pay a capital gains tax.

Why do I support the amendment? The people to my left do not understand. Their leader will never understand what it is like. He cannot mislead me because I know the difference between digging soil, digging rock and picking one's pocket. I find it hard to understand how the NDP movement can come to us and say, "You are all right, but this is what it will do." They suggest there will be speculation in land. The hon. member for Regina East said so in the course of his remarks. Speculation, he predicted, would become rampant and the amendment, if adopted, would encourage it. Why did he not move a subamendment to cover the situation? Maybe they will come out with one after my speech. You never know. Maybe we can get them out of their corner.

Mr. Woolliams: They said the white paper did not go far enough.

Mr. Korchinski: Let me tell the hon. member this. If we do not adopt the amendment, every time a farmer has a capital gain on his land he will seek to recover the amount of the capital gain on the price at which the land is sold. As a result, farmland will cost more. I know I would do this. If a capital gains tax were applied to my land, I would try to recover the amount. The price of land would obviously go up. Judging by his comments, the hon. member for Regina East does not realize that a man has to get his money out of the land.

Mr. Burton: I do not think he is going to get it.

Mr. Korchinski: For a long while he was getting it. I know a lot of people who have gone into farming on that basis.

Mr. Saltsman: Speculators.

Mr. Korchinski: That is right. There is nothing wrong with speculation.

Mr. Burton: I thought you did not like speculators.

Mr. Korchinski: There is nothing wrong with speculators in certain fields. If this tax were applied to people who have more than they require for a livelihood, fine and dandy. I am thinking of those who speculate in stocks and bonds. But when a man tries to set up a viable unit as a farm, it is not done for speculative purposes but to provide, he hopes, a reasonable living for himself and his family. That is the difference when it comes to speculation. If the hon. member has some money left over and uses it to speculate, I would say tax him. But when a man is trying to provide a living for himself and his family, I would never describe that as speculation but as a struggle for existence.

Mr. Burton: That is not what the amendment says.

Mr. Korchinski: The point is that the NDP is not posing any kind of amendment or subamendment. We have moved an amendment.

Mr. Burton: There has been no ruling on your amendment.

Mr. Korchinski: I do not wish to become involved in an argument with the hon. member for Regina East on that point. The chair may wish to ignore him or it may wish to ignore me.

Mr. Guay: You may meet your "Waterloo."

Mr. Korchinski: Let me tell the hon. member that about six NDP-ers have run against me in my lifetime, so that remark does not hurt my feelings one bit.

Mr. Burton: Tell us about Assiniboia.

Mr. Alexander: Tell us about Ontario.

Mr. Korchinski: It does us a lot of good sometimes to stir up the hornet's nest to my left. I have always been outspoken when it comes to expressing my views about the government: now it is the turn of the NDP. They do not like to hear these things, maybe because this capital gains tax proposal is part of their philosophy, part of their creed. They believe that provided somebody has a little more than you have, you have to get it from them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: It is like voting against a salary and taking it.

An hon. Member: That is another question.

Mr. Korchinski: I do not want a capital gains tax at this time. However, I admit there are speculators. I am not so naïve as to suggest there are not. But we differentiate between right and wrong. There can be proper taxation and there can be improper taxation. But to tax everyone on a capital gain is wrong. In these few minutes I have pointed out the difference between the two. I think the government should look carefully at the matter and make a differentiation. Let us not impose a capital gains tax overnight and then discover we are in a mess. Let us not find that having got ourselves into this position, we cannot back out of it. An amount of $130 million out of a total budget of $13 to $14 billion is not very great.

• (8:20 p.m.)

Mr. Saltsman: What's $130 million?

Mr. Korchinski: It depends where it comes from. The parliamentary secretary has already indicated that $80 million will come from individual taxpayers and $50 million from corporations. The hon. member is arguing against himself.

Mr. Saltsman: Would the hon. member permit a question? Has the hon. member—

The Chairman: Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Saltsman: I wonder whether I could direct a question to the hon. member. Has he made any calculation to see how much of the capital gains tax would come from the farming community and how much from the industrial community?

Mr. Korchinski: I have not made any calculation of that sort, and neither has the questioner.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Korchinski: But let me say this to the questioner: Whether $1 million or $2 million came from the farming community, I think he would admit that the farming community is not in a position to give up that amount at this particular time.

Mr. Osler: Mr. Chairman, I have a couple of points I should like clarified. We are talking about capital gains made on farms, but it seems to me that the motive of the present system in this country is profit. Profit can only be derived from a system that is backed by capital investment. As far as three out of the four parties in this House are concerned, there is nothing wrong with capital investment.

I think there are two classes of people who have to be considered when we talk about capital gains tax, of which I am fully in favour. Having invested capital, you expect to make a profit and also a capital gain. Profits and capital gains should both be taxed. However, there are two classes of people in Canada who are in a unique position and should be considered—the good guys and the bad guys, as it were. In this case, the good guys are the farmers and the small businessmen. I suggest that for "small businessmen" we use the definition that the government of Canada has used in other parts of this legislation, namely, someone who has accumulated no more than $400,000 worth of profits. Up to that point they are small businessmen, at least according to the way in which the government treats their profits. I suggest it is also reasonable to treat such small businessmen in exactly the same way on the subject of capital gains.

I make one simple request to those on the government side who are listening to me tonight, and it is this. As the previous speaker said, it will not cost the people of Canada a lot of money. In fact, in the long run it will probably save them a lot of money because it will ensure that the profit system will still work and that the private investment system will still work. I refer to allowing the genuine farmer—I leave it to the government to define what is a genuine farmer—and the small businessman, and I have suggested a definition for a small businessman, to take advantage of the same provision, when a capital gain is realized at death, that applies under the Estate Tax Act. I suggest the government give the estates of these two categories five years in which to pay the estate tax that is levied at death. In that event the family would continue to operate the family business. The farm and the family store are both springboards from which we have developed this country, a country that is just beginning to arrive at a take-off position.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, I listened with great interest, as did all members of the committee, to the hon. member for Mackenzie, who I hope will shortly return.

An hon. Member: He hasn't left.

Mr. Saltsman: I am delighted to see him behind the curtains. As always, I listened to him with a great deal of interest, though I was a little surprised by his rather immoderate stance this evening since I have always known him to be a man who is very careful and cautious in debate and who always qualifies the remarks that he makes. I know how concerned he is that he not be misunderstood, that he be fair to everyone in his contribution to the proceedings in the House. This is why I was rather surprised by his comments on the amendment, which I felt were rather intemperate in spots.

I think we would agree with him to the extent that farmland that is passed on to members of the family unit who continue to farm it should receive special consideration. However, the amendment does not make that provision. What it provides is that all land used for farming be exempt from capital gains tax. If we were to accept that kind of proposition, I think we could equally put forward the same proposition on behalf of small businessmen in the community. There are small businessmen as well as farmers in the hon. member's constituency.

How would these businessmen feel if the farmers were able to pass on their land free of tax, whereas if they passed on their small stores, or whatever it was, they were subject to tax on a capital gain? Surely all components of a particular community should be entitled to the same consideration and justice. After all, they all hang together. Merchants and farmers are to a certain extent dependent upon each other, which is why I was rather surprised to hear him say that only farmers should be exempt.

I was particularly surprised that he should criticize my party's position in not moving an amendment to the amendment. We did in fact look at it with a view perhaps to moving a subamendment, and had it made sense we would have done so. It is difficult to add to something that is pretty senseless in the beginning. Therefore, we want to move an amendment later in the proceedings which will indicate our position more clearly, rather than support an amendment we now feel is essentially bad.

A case can be made for farmers being granted exemptions of various kinds. Everyone in this party knows how difficult the situation can be for a farmer who has built up assets and then has to dispose of them, being subject to a tax he may not be able to meet. We are very much concerned about this. For that reason my colleagues have urged that various measures be applied. We think there should be a long-term exemption when the assets are being passed on from one member of the family to another. But if one member of the family decides to get out of farming and sells the land for real estate development, what is the rationale for granting an exemption on that type of speculative sale? Every speculator in our society would ask for an exemption—and we feel there has to be fairness among speculators.

We have talked about equity among working people and among various classes in our society. But if the hon. member for Mackenzie thinks speculators in general should be subject to a capital gains tax, how can he with any sense of fairness say that only one type of speculator shall be excluded from the provisions of the tax system? I know he is a fair man and I am quite sure that if he reconsidered some of his remarks he would realize this suggestion just does not stand up on the basis of equity.

It may be that the absence of a capital gains tax has contributed to the decline of farm prosperity in this country. A few years ago farmlands were the subject of heavy speculation. People were raising the price of farmland with the result that a farmer's son could not buy from the father at the price being asked. One difficulty facing agriculture in this country is the result of overcapitalization of land and the inability to derive an effective return from the land. The amendment we are considering will not help the farmer but might exacerbate the situation in which he finds himself. For that reason I find it difficult to support this amendment and look forward to a more suitable one being moved later.

Mr. McCutcheon: Mr. Chairman, I do not think anyone in this chamber is not in favour of equity in taxation or would not applaud the application of a capital gains tax on windfalls. I am talking about the so-called extravagant gains we hear so much about which some entrepreneurs have made on the stock-market and others who have reputedly made tremendous gains on the real estate market. I think I speak for everyone here when I say these people should pay a fair tax. But I suggest we are putting out an awfully big net to catch the few who have profited in the way in which I have suggested. It will, in fact, catch many of those who have scrimped and saved to put together a few bucks for a rainy day out of their salaries and wages from factories and industries or their incomes from the little corner grocery store to which the hon. member from Halifax-East Hants referred to the other day as being a mamma and papa type of business.

It is interesting to note that with all this talk about people making inordinate profits from the stock-market, a study of the results of stock-markets in this country over the past 10 years does not show profits of anything like those suggested. As a matter of fact, I am informed that the professional investors in Canada are not looking today at stocks for great growth factors but are investing in mortgages and bonds.

I do not think this amendment will have the effect for which our emotional patriots are calling, that is, to buy Canada back. If there was any time in the history of this country when we needed risk capital for expansion and the provision of jobs, this is the time. We are discussing an amendment which would have the effect of relieving farm property of the capital gains tax. I suggest, with great respect, that small, independent businesses could well be included under this umbrella. It is not the time in the history of Canada to implement this capital gains tax. Perhaps my reason is a little vague to some hon. members.

We will have a valuation day for farm property and independent businesses, no matter where they are situated in Canada. There has never been a time when the selling price of farm property has depreciated more than it has in the last couple of years under this government. The same argument pertains to small businesses which are now going begging. I had occasion to look at a farm in my area which would have brought $100,000 two years ago had it been put on the market.

Some hon. Member: Are you buying?

Mr. McCutcheon: Not at those prices. I would be afraid to offer $75,000 today because I do not think there is a buyer on the horizon who would touch it at anything like that price. Yet this is the time we are going to value farms and put on the capital gains tax. I am optimistic. I am looking forward to the day when we get rid of this government—

• (8:40 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCutcheon: —and the value of a farm or a piece of property will return to what it was and should be. This government intends to grab such property because it is to be valued right now, while it is depressed, at fire-sale prices.

I am also disturbed that every small, independent business in this country is in virtually the same boat. I refer to grocery stores, independent hardware stores and many other small, independent businesses. The thrust of this legislation is toward the elimination of independent businesses. This is found all through the legislation. The unfair treatment accorded these citizens has been ably pointed out during the debate. Small, unincorporated businesses are unable to take advantage of the provisions that are readily available to big business and big government bodies. The mandarins in the government service would much rather be able to place a person on a punch-card and put him through a computer than have to deal with an independent businessman who thinks for himself.

This legislation would appear to be designed with only one thought in view, and that is to make the federal government independently rich by obtaining more money at the expense of the taxpayer who has two other jurisdictions on his back. I refer to the provincial and municipal governments. No thought has been given to the fact that it is the same individual who must pay all three levels of taxation. I submit that capital gains should not be implemented at this time because of depressed land values, depressed property values and lack of investment funds for development programs.

It is interesting to note that John Meyer, writing in the Montreal Gazette of October 6, 1971, said that we need investment to create jobs. He said:

> Canada has the fastest growing labour force, relative to population, in the western world. The cost of creating jobs for the entries into the labour force is on the rise. The investment required to create a new job in conventional manufacturing is around $25,000; in advanced manufacturing—an oil refinery as an instance—around $70,000. The trend towards rising investment per job created is accelerating with each technological advance.

One might ask what cost is involved in developing a job in agriculture. Someone might say it would be somewhere between $25,000 and $70,000. I, however, very much question if it can be done at those figures. To create an efficient job in agriculture, in my humble opinion, would require the accumulation of a minimum of $75,000 to $100,000 of capital. How can that be done if we implement a capital gains tax on farms? Mr. Meyer continued:

> At the same time, successive federal governments have laid the foundations for, and erected most of the structure of, the most comprehensive and generous welfare structures in existence. The generation of the income to finance it, is already straining our resources.

I say "amen" to that. People are also bothered by fear and frustration in respect of the direction in which we are going in this country. They are frustrated over tax reform and the fear they have concerning the proposed competition act, which is another classic example for the Canadian people of "big brother" government knowing best.

Mr. Nesbitt: A real dandy, that one.

Mr. McCutcheon: Yes, a real dandy. They have fear over the Canada Development Corporation which is really causing concern among business people. There is fear in respect of the workings of the regional development program.

So I say this would be an extremely good time for the Minister of Finance to come forward with an amendment, or to agree to this amendment so that farm and agricultural properties could be exempt. Then, as we progress with this bill he might do the same for small business. Farmers should not be called upon to pay capital gains tax on their equipment. This is a retrograde step; it cannot be classed as anything else. Because of the terrible pricing structure we have, farmers have been able to survive only because of the depreciation they have been allowed on their equipment. They have had to have good equipment in order to be efficient. About the only thing they have left is a little depreciation on the equipment they use. Farmers who had given exceptional care to their equipment were able to get a little more use from it over and above the depreciated value. Now even this avenue is to be closed.

I admit that the rate for recapture is not as high as it is on income tax, but none the less it is a major consideration. There will no longer be any point maintaining the equipment, because they will not be able to remain in business. They might as well wear it out as rapidly as possible and, when it is done, throw it in a fence corner and collect some of the government's welfare payments.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I would like to quote again Mr. John Meyer, who in this article is talking about the tax reform bill and, in particular, pension funds. He summarizes the whole business of this tax measure in these words:

> Beyond these considerations is the fact that the reform measures impose generally higher taxes on production and on savings at a time when increases in production and the generation of savings have never been in greater need of encouragement. They also impose unrealistic financial structures on business activity at a time when business activity has never been in greater need to recognize reality.
> For all that, the sheer complexity of the legislation still is cause enough to delay its implementation. Parliament is being asked to pass judgment on a bill in a matter of months, which has been close to ten years in evolving to its present stage. It's being required to grapple with totally new concepts which, in the amount of rewriting that is having to be done, not even their authors clearly understand.
> It's simply too much and is recognizably too much. Mr. Benson should make clear now that he'll settle for passage of the generally non-controversial sections of the bill while holding over, for continuing discussion and amendment, the controversial sections. That would be the first step. The second step would be to withdraw those portions of the bill which drag on business activity.

For the benefit of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, who was not paying attention, I again say that the author of this article was Mr. John Meyer. I would recommend that he read some of Mr. Meyer's articles. They make more sense than the Minister of Finance.

[Mr. McCutcheon.]

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Chairman, the proposal in the bill is to levy a capital gains tax on farmland, and the amendment which is before the House would exempt farmland from such a tax. I would like to address myself to the manner in which those who propose to levy a capital gains tax on land will establish the basis upon which to assess that tax. I want the minister to tell us upon what basis, on valuaton day, are his officials going to establish the value of land. I ask the minister this question: Are you going to take the market value?

It seems to me that there are three alternatives for deciding the value of land on valuation day. The officials may decide to take the productive value of the land and attempt to establish that as the value. Alternatively, they may decide to work from the property tax basis, the existing tax assessment basis of the land. The minister and his parliamentary secretary may find this very amusing, Mr. Chairman, but I want them to answer because it is important to me as a farmer and it is important to my neighbours.

If they want farmers to hire assessors to put a valuation on our land on that particular day, in a manner satisfactory to the department, I want them to tell us that while we are still studying this bill—because one of the most important factors in the equation is not the amount of tax that will be levied on capital gains but the method by which the valuation of the land for farming purposes will be established at that point in time. I think it is up to the minister and his parliamentary secretary to answer that question before these sections of the bill are passed.

Let me remind the Minister of Finance that when we asked the minister in charge of the Wheat Board to consider net income as a factor in the provisions of his stabilization bill, he replied that nobody could satisfactorily establish the level of net income. Mr. Chairman, if no one can satisfactorily establish the level of net income, then I say by definition you cannot establish the value of the land, which is certainly one of the major factors in production costs.

Mr. Osler: Hooey.

Mr. Gleave: It isn't hooey at all; it is a fact. If you don't know that, you don't know very much.

Mr. Orlikow: He doesn't.

Mr. Osler: I don't know very much, but I do know that.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Chairman, any economist worth his salt will tell you that the cost of owning land is one of the major factors in the cost of production of farm products.

Mr. Osler: In Assiniboia I asked a bunch of farmers what their land was worth, and they told me. They knew.

Mr. Peters: They sure told you on election day.

Mr. Gleave: They will say anything to greenhorns in Assiniboia, and grain traders are their favourite mark.

Mr. Osler: Not being a greenhorn, they told me anyway.

Mr. Gleave: Fair enough. But I think it is the responsibility of those who propose to levy this tax to tell us the basis upon which they will establish the valuations.

Mr. Osler: You are just mad because the prices are down since the NDP government got in out there.

Mr. Gleave: The NDP government didn't have that much to do with it.

Mr. Osler: That is what they tell me.

Mr. Peters: That was a very small minority you were talking to.

Mr. Osler: I was talking to the ones on the farms, not in the city.

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar has the floor.

• (9:00 p.m.)

Mr. Gleave: The other matter to which I should like to call the attention of the committee, as I have before, is the effect on farm machinery prices and the method of operating and trading in farm machinery that this legislation will have. I have asked if this factor has been considered, but I have not received an answer. The hon. member for Lambton-Kent spoke just before me and he touched on the subject. He said, "What are you going to do? Run the old piece of machinery into the fence corner?" He was coming to the heart of the matter.

As a practice, across the country farm machinery has been traded in. The dealer has taken it off the hands of the farmer and in due course has disposed of it. In order to operate in this way he needed a margin and a market for the machinery. But the system worked. I say to the minister and his parliamentary secretary that they are in the process of destroying this system, whether they know it or not, and I do not think they know much about the way business operates on the farms and in the small towns of this country. One can only come to the conclusion that they do not know, or they do not give a damn. It may be the latter.

If we are going to set up a system of taxation which makes it impossible for the method that has been used in the past to operate, then we must consider whether the new method is more, or less, effective and efficient in terms of cost. I do not think this has been figured out, but if it has I would be glad to know about it. If the parliamentary secretary or the minister will rise and tell me, I am quite prepared to sit down and listen. Mr. Chairman, I address my question to those gentlemen. I should like to know whether they have considered this matter and if they can advise the House what changes will take place and how they will be affected.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: No answer.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Chairman, if they are not prepared to answer, I shall continue. When a government comes to this House and to the country and proposes a new taxation system, they should be prepared to tell the House and the people affected how it will work and how it will affect their standard of living and their way of doing business. I cannot be indifferent to a method of taxation which will affect the people in Saskatoon-Biggar, the people who live in the city of Saskatoon and do business there and the surrounding rural area.

What shocks me is the government's indifference to the situation of the ordinary citizen, whether he is operating as an individual or as a member of a co-operative. I have received a great many letters which I have forwarded to the responsible minister, but these have not been answered to my satisfaction. We are suffering, and have suffered from the policies and machinations of this government as they affect farmers in western Canada through the Lift program and others. Before any new policy is introduced, those responsible for it should be able to tell this House what the effect will be on the ordinary citizen because it is the ordinary citizen, Mr. Chairman, who pays the taxes and who either survices or does not survive under such policies.

Mr. Alkenbrack: They can like it or lump it!

Mr. Gleave: Like it or lump it is right. That is why I have posed these questions and have brought this matter before the committee. I am not concerned about particular ideologies; I want to know how the ordinary individual is going to survive under it, and I have not had an answer.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, a couple of questions have been raised which I think deserve answers. The first is about the value of farmland at the beginning of the system. The beginning of the system is defined as valuation day. First of all, the value of the farmland on that day will normally be its fair market value. This is established in the same way as it is for estate tax. The owner of the land, when it is ultimately sold, will indicate what the value was at that particular time. That will be compared with the bank of knowledge that the Department of National Revenue will accumulate with respect to sales of similar farmland in the particular area around the time of the beginning of the system.

Beyond this there is the protection in the case where somebody has bought farmland and it has gone down in value at valuation day. It may be sold at some time in the future and what the owner is getting is not really a capital gain per se but a recovery of the decrease in value between the time he bought it and valuation day. There is a provision to take care of such circumstances. This, generally, is the system.

I think if my hon. friend looks back at the problems that have arisen for the provincial and federal governments under the Estate Tax Act and the Succession Duty Act he will find that there has not been a great deal of difficulty in establishing these values. First of all, it is established by the person filing the return and then it is up to the Department of National Revenue to say whether they agree. I think there have not been any great litigation problems in this regard.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Chairman, in reply to the statement of the minister may I say that my personal experience in representations from my constituents has shown that there has been a considerable problem in establishing market value. I shall put it to the minister this way.

Usually, the Department of National Revenue will consider what a similar piece of land to the one in question has sold for in the community in recent years, maybe two or three years before. They will say, "Here is a quarter section of comparative value. This was the value placed on it, and therefore the parcel of land in question has this value." This is how market value is arrived at, and I suggest to the minister that it is in no way accurate. I have seen land values drop drastically in the last three years, so it cannot be a yardstick for what went before.

Let me put it to the minister again. In establishing value, do I understand correctly that it is not proposed to take into consideration in this equation the productive value, and it is not proposed to take into consideration the assessed value?

• (9:10 p.m.)

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, I hope the people who read this speech will also read the speech of the leader of the New Democratic Party with respect to the value of farmland.

Mr. Gleave: That is all right. In no way is the minister scaring me with those remarks.

Mr. Mahoney: The hon. member is the biggest Tory in the House.

An hon. Member: What's wrong with being a Tory?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, I should simply like to say that I disagree with my hon. friend. There are always disputes between individual taxpayers and the Department of National Revenue. If he will look at the number of cases that have gone to court over the value of farmland, he will find that over the years the number has been very small. This matter has been settled quite equitably—agreed, after argument.

I am sure that my hon. friend would argue about his farmland just as other people would argue about theirs. They will look for a low value and the Department of National Revenue will look for a higher value, and finally they will settle on something which is still below market value. There have been very few court cases in this regard. Since my hon. friend says that this is a terrible problem, will he tell me the number of court cases that have arisen in this regard?

Mr. Alexander: That does not matter. Court cases do not always show what is going on in this regard.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Chairman, I have not the slightest idea how many of these cases have gone to court. I suspect that there are not many. Let me point this out to the minister. Not far from where I farm in my constituency, an individual came to me a couple of years ago and said, "I transferred a quarter section of land and the Department of National Revenue says that I did not transfer it at the right value. They say that land is worth much more than the value at which I transferred it." He asked me what he could do and I said I did not know but that I would talk to the people concerned.

Mr. Chairman, that man did not go to court. He paid the $500. This matter cost him $500 and, as I say, he did not go to court. And why not? Because going to court would have cost him twice $500 and the people in the department would have taken that matter so far up the line that his tongue would have been hanging out before they would have settled with him.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I am sure, in view of the announced intention of the NDP government of Saskatchewan to impose succession duties, that there will be an impulse on the part of taxpayers to reach a fairly equitable value as a base value for succession duties on the one hand and as a base value for the capital gains tax on the other.

Mr. Gleave: Fine, Mr. Chairman. I am getting all the political answers from the other side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gleave: Neither the minister nor the parliamentary secretary have proposed before this committee a fair and reasonable way of arriving at the value of land on valuation day.

An hon. Member: But you people will be imposing succession duties.

Mr. Gleave: Thank you, that is fine. However, Mr. Chairman, succession duties have not yet been introduced. They may be introduced. That is not our concern here. We must deal with our responsibilities here in the House for those people, and the minister should answer this question. When you talk about market value, you do not take into consideration the productive capacity of the land or the assessed value. The market value is the most unreliable method of arriving at the actual value of a piece of farmland.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend is saying that the amount you can sell a piece of land for is the worst way of determining its value.

Mr. Gleave: Right.

Mr. Benson: I disagree with that. I would say that if I owned a piece of farmland, the best way of determining its value is to see what I can get for it. You do not determine value by saying what it would produce or what it might produce in future. You determine its value by what you can sell it for. That is what fair market value means.

Mr. Gleave: But, Mr. Chairman, on valuation day the value might be depressed.

Mr. Peters: I wonder what this provision will do to the empires of some hon. members opposite.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Gleave: Let me tell the minister, if he does not already know, and the parliamentary secretary—

Mr. Mahoney: The NDP had better throw that Tory out of the party.

Mr. Gleave: —that at this point in time, if you go to any real estate broker in Saskatoon and place in his hands some good farmland, some good wheat land which is in and around that area he will advise you, if he is a good real estate broker, not to offer it for sale. Under those circumstances, how would you at this point in time arrive at fair market value, since values are depressed? Three years from now values may be different, and three years ago they were quite different. I am pointing out to the committee that the fair market value determination is an unreliable method of arriving at the value on valuation day.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. Is the minister rising on a point of order?

Mr. Benson: I wish to say simply that if someone bought land four years ago and it went down to a market value below the value at which he bought the land, and if the land then increased in value, the increase up to the level of his previous cost would not be taken into account in calculating capital gains in the future.

Mr. Gleave: I suppose, Mr. Chairman, that will not resolve this question because we do not seem to be on the same wave-length.

An hon. Member: Thank goodness.

Mr. Gleave: I am trying to point out—I am very serious about this—that the method which the government is proposing to use to establish the value of farm property is altogether unreliable. I am shocked and very much concerned to hear a responsible minister say that this is a reliable method of arriving at the value of farm property. I am sure that those sitting on this side of the House who are farmers and who know how farm values can fluctuate, will be as much concerned about this as I am.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gleave: They will be worried about the methods to be used in arriving at property values. I can only say, for goodness sake change your methods and start taking into account actual productive values and assessment values. Add something else to your equation, for goodness sake, or you will create real hardship for the farming population of Canada.

Mr. Benson: May I answer the question, Mr. Chairman? I find it rather astounding that anyone in the opposition would say that the selling price of something, or the amount that something is worth now does not represent what that particular product or article is worth.

Mr. Gleave: The minister does not know what it is worth. Nobody knows.

Mr. Benson: No matter whether you speak of a house or any other article, the market value of the article at that time is what you can get for it and what you can sell it for.

Mr. Stanfield: But the price may be depressed.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Chairman, I listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar and I conclude that he is on the right track.

Mr. Mahoney: But in the wrong party.

Mr. Korchinski: Notwithstanding what the Minister of Finance has said, the value to be placed on a farm property on valuation day can in no way be considered as accurate if the proposed method is used. It will be contested and argued about, and this question will be dealt with in the courts for years to come. The minister should be prepared to concede that there is a relationship between assessed value and market value for valuation purposes. Any formula used should take advantage of such basic factors in arriving at property value. With regard to my land, one quarter section is not worth as much as the next quarter section. In no way can anyone say that one quarter section should be assessed at the same rate as another quarter section. I therefore suggest that there should be some relationship between assessed value and market value at least for valuation purposes. The assessor should consider the assessed value on valuation day.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Mr. Benson: If I might just define "fair market value"—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The Chair finds it difficult to allow the minister and hon. members to follow this procedure. Unless an hon. member asks a question of the minister or the parliamentary secretary, it is best to let the hon. member complete his remarks or at least complete his point before giving an explanation. This would be more productive to the work of the committee than interjection. The normal procedure would be more useful to the committee.

Mr. Korchinski: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I will not be long. I want to point out to the minister that unless there is a set formula there will be a great deal of litigation, argument and unnecessary expenditure which no one in this country should be expected to meet. They should not have to do this for the sake of a minister or a department that is not prepared to establish a fixed amount. In this way they would know the price when the property was sold.

It is entirely wrong to use the method used in the income tax department whereby a property is worth the same as another property in the area which has been sold. I have already stated that I have land in a section. You cannot tell me that two quarters of land in the same section are worth the same amount. There are certain factors which must be taken into consideration such as road allowances, proper drainage, proper slope, better contour and productivity. Certain land has greater productivity. The department does not know that. It simply asks the ag. rep. what he thinks. In other words, they accept the opinion of the age. rep. An individual may have a better appreciation of his land than the ag. rep., but theoretically they accept the value established by him.

I may have missed the point, but it is my understanding that the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar argued that it is necessary to establish a formula. That formula should be established before we get into argument, litigation and unnecessary spending. It is bad enough to be taxed later. Who wants to fight the government, with all its resources? Because people do not have the unnecessary resources, they throw in the towel. Why should anyone in this country admit that he is guilty simply because a few officials in the department suggest he is wrong? The minister should carefully consider this question and come up with a formula, rather than involve individuals in unnecessary squabbles with the department, which I am sure the department does not want. I am sure the individual will find it absolutely unnecessary.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, I find it very unusual for the hon. member to say that the government should dictate a value, with regard to farmland, which nobody can appeal. I think the use of a fair market value, which is what a willing vendor will accept from a willing purchaser, is a much better way of establishing the value of land. If the vendor thinks that the valuation is wrong, he can appeal to the courts. I am very surprised that members opposite would like us to have some dictatorial policy whereby we can say that an individual's land is worth so much and he cannot appeal it.

Mr. Korchinski: Is it other than dictatorial, the way you want to do it?

Mr. Stanfield: The problem is that prices are so depressed under your policy.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar has raised a very important question with regard to the valuation of farmland. I was amazed at the answer of the minister. In a very blasé fashion he indicated we will use the same method that has been used with regard to estate taxation in establishing market value.

Mr. Benson: Fair market value.

Mr. Burton: Fair market value. The minister has not had very much contact with western Canada if he accepts that simple proposition without any qualification. He does not know what is going on; he does not know the situation; he does not know what is happening; he does not know the real problems that families in western Canada face. The minister had better wake up and find out what is going on before he does this country any greater disservice than he has in recent months.

Mr. Mahoney: Compare your speech with the speech of the leader of your party.

Mr. Burton: I know the speech of the leader of the New Democratic Party very well. I hope the member for Calgary South looks at it very carefully. If he reads it enough times, he might then have some understanding of it.

There are some deficiencies in using a fair market value as stated by the minister. What happens with respect to what he calls the fair market value—in other words, the value of land prices in the immediate neighbourhood where the particular parcel of land under consideration is located? What are some of the considerations that come into play? First, you have what I call the urban pressures, pressures of buying up land for urban purposes. If there is a capital gain involved, an arm's length transaction, a case can be made for dealing with that on a fair and square basis.

However, when that affects the value of other land which is not involved in that transaction, it is an unreal situation. You are then forcing a farm family that is located near another parcel of land which was bought for a purpose which may not have anything to do with agriculture, to accept that valuation. In many cases, these people are forced to leave farming. They are forced out of agriculture. That has happened in the past. It will happen in the future unless the minister comes up with a different method than he has just given to the committee.

There is another fact that should be kept in mind. That is the fact of a farmer who buys a piece of land to add to his operation. He may purchase an incremental unit. He may want to add to his operation for a sound economic reason. He may be prepared to pay more for that additional land than he would be prepared to pay for his farm as a whole, an average price for his entire farm unit. That is simple economics. It makes sense. The farmer may find it worth while to pay more for a piece of land to add to his farm unit. It may make his over-all operation more economical. It may pay him to do that. That may be a perfectly sound decision on his part. On the basis of what the minister said, the higher land value for that parcel of land will affect the establishment of the fair market value for all farm units in the immediate neighbourhood. It is an unreal approach. It is not in accordance with the situation on the rural scene.

There are some alternatives to which we can turn in establishing valuation. We now have a good deal of technical and sophisticated information available on the basis of land assessment and farm management programs that are carried on in many provinces. Through these programs, and our working together with some of the provincial agencies, it will be possible to come up with a fair market evaluation for farm property on "V" day. Land prices are very often the most volatile components of the entire capital farm structure. During periods when the economy is buoyant, when prices are relatively good, there is an upward pressure on land prices. This pressure is accentuated by technological processes. Farmers are obliged to add to their farm units in order to make their operations economic, since in many cases they are bound to employ large machines for which they have to pay high prices. Then, when there is a turndown in the farm economy, such as we have experienced in recent years, land prices decline. A farmer is often locked in. He has a good deal of capital tied up in machinery upon which he is bound to make sizeable payments.

Then, again, he is possibly making payments on the land he holds and he often finds difficulty in meeting demands for such payments. The difficulties in recent years have been pretty serious. The current index of farm prices in Saskatchewan is about 90 per cent of the 1961 level, according to figures put out by Canada Statistics. During this phase of the economic cycle on the farm scene, land is undervalued, in some cases. This could be of serious consequence to farmers since they can assume valuation day will be either in a few months in the future or in the past, depending on what date is to be announced by the government. The government is ignoring these factors entirely in the approach it is taking. There needs to be a total review of this legislation if it is not to contribute further to the decline in Canada's farm economy.

Mr. Benson: If I might make a comment, I would suggest to the hon. member's farmer friends in Saskatchewan that on valuation day, whenever it may occur, they should jot down the value of their farms as compared with the price at which other farms are selling on that date, and file it away. But make sure that the valuation is a fair one, because if they value it too high, and die, their successors will have to worry about Saskatchewan succession duties.

Mr. Burton: I can assure the Minister of Finance that the farmers of Saskatchewan have a great deal less to worry about with regard to possible succession duties than about any legislation to be brought in by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Benson: No, Sir, not over the capital gains tax.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, earlier this evening I intimated I wished to make a comparison between the proposals contained in the white paper and the report of the finance committee last October. It is strange that few, if any, members from the government side who sat on the committee have taken part in this debate to draw attention to places in which the bill before us varies from the recommendations in the committee report or, if they accepted the report, to what degree they disagree with the proposals in Bill C-259.

It is obvious to me that a muzzle has been imposed on members opposite with regard to these things, because it is patently strange that a number of government supporters sat through months and months of hearings on the white paper, together with members on this side of the House, and then with regard to certain proposals—and even those which have been watered down—those members, in various localities, and I must say that some of the protestations seemed, in the phrase used by the parliamentary secretary, to be home cooking for local consumption, stated they would voice loud and clear their objections to some of these proposals—

Mr. Mahoney: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, since the hon. member for Edmonton West was the only opposition member of any party who sat on the meetings of the finance committee long enough to vote on the report, his pride and pomposity in this area are understandable. But the point is that members on this side of the House have participated in this debate throughout.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Chairman, if the parliamentary secretary and the minister are going to set such a poor example to this committee, interrupting speakers on phony points of order, I think they have a very heavy responsibility to discharge. I call upon the parliamentary secretary and the minister, while he is here, to comply with the rules of this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mahoney: If I might finish my point of order, Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The Chair must point out to the hon. member that his point was not a point of order. Although the proceedings in committee are not as strict as they are in the House, hon. members should not take advantage of points of order as a means of entering into debate.

Mr. Mahoney: I was just coming to the conclusion of my point of order.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I cannot accept the premise of the parliamentary secretary's observation. If he wishes to raise another point of order I am ready to let him have the floor, but I do not think the point he has just made is anything more than a point of debate.

Mr. Mahoney: On another point of order, then, I can only suggest that it is understandable that members on this side should not feel it necessary to speak in this debate on every subject since more than one of them participated in the decisions of the finance committee.

The Deputy Chairman: I want to be fair to all hon. members but I should say that in my opinion the committee has nothing to gain by discussing the participation or non-participation of hon. members in the work of the committee. I do not think we shall make very much progress in that way. Besides, I do not think such remarks can be relevant to the sections which are before the committee.

Mr. Stanfield: I am not calling for any disciplinary action, Mr. Chairman.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Stanfield: However, I would point out to you that the parliamentary secretary, who is presumably responsible at the moment for piloting this bill through the House, has just defied your ruling. When you ruled he did not have a proper point of order he persisted in rising, and when you insisted he could not continue it he tried to create another phony point of order. I simply say, in all sincerity, Mr. Chairman—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Stanfield: I will sit down when the Chair asks me to sit down.

Mr. Benson: The Chairman is on his feet.

• (9:40 p.m.)

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. Again I ask the co-operation of hon. members. I do not think there is much to be gained by pursuing the point that has been the centre of discussion up to now. I suggest the hon. member should return to the sections under consideration by the committee. I am grateful to all hon. members who want to help the Chair at this time, but I think the best solution to the problem is to come back to the sections under study. Therefore, I would invite the hon. member for Edmonton West to complete his remarks.

Mr. MacInnis: A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond is rising on a point of order.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, my point of order will be very brief. I would ask the Chair for a ruling whether it is proper for a member of this House, particularly the hon.

member for Calgary South, to reflect on the voting record of any other member of the House, as the hon. member did in his point of order. I would ask the Chair to rule him out of order in this respect.

Mr. Mahoney: On the same point of order, Mr. Chairman, I would remind the hon. member that I referred to participation, not voting.

Mr. MacInnis: I think the blues will show that the hon. member referred to the voting record. But whether he did or not does not matter; he cannot reflect on the action of any member of the committee.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The Chair is aware of the rules and practice of this House according to which hon. members are not supposed to reflect on on other hon. members. I do not think any such reflection has been made. I have already invited the hon. member for Edmonton West to complete his remarks, and I urge the committee to give him the chance to do so.

The hon. member for St. Boniface on a question of privilege.

[English]

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the Leader of the Official Opposition how many times he has attended the meetings of the committee to which he refers.

[Translation]

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I must point out to the hon. member that the point he has raised is certainly not a question of privilege. I would ask hon. members to co-operate as much as possible with the Chair to allow the useful work of the committee to progress.

The hon. member for Edmonton West.

[English]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, I hope the parliamentary secretary will delve into his little green book and learn what constitutes a point of order. I am not afraid of him in debate, but I should like to make my argument on this particular point and not be interrupted by phony points of order and references to votes by platooning members who had nothing to do with the committee beforehand. I know whereof I speak in that regard.

In any event, I do want to indicate what the committee had to say about capital gains. After all, we spent a good deal of time on this particular point, and this is the only public forum where we can make reference to the deliberations of the committee. In regard to the question of capital gains, the committee made this general recommendation:

> As a general rule we recommend that one-half of capital gains should be taken into income. One-half of capital losses should also be taken into account, and be deductible without limit from the taxable half of capital gains realized in the same year.

This we have done generally.

> If in that year the deductible capital losses exceeded taxable capital gains, an additional $1,000 of deductible losses should be deductible from other income.

This we have done, but how far is it removed from the original white paper that was being sold to the country as an extremely reasonable and safe proposition?

> Where gains on the sale of an asset are fully taxable, as in the exceptions previously alluded to (mineral and timber rights, goodwill, leasehold interests and depreciable assets written off for tax purposes over a very short period of time) losses would be fully deductible.

I could go on to talk about the principal residence, but generally there is to a limited extent compliance with the recommendation of the committee. I say to a limited extent because there are some restrictions regarding ownership of a principal residence and the period of occupancy. If it is occupied only part of the time, then any capital gain is allotted between the period of residence and the period it is a revenue property.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. Again I ask the co-operation of hon. members. It is very difficult for the Chair to hear what the hon. member for Edmonton West has to say, and I am sure other members have the same problem. With all due respect, I think he should be given a chance to complete his remarks. Although we are getting close to ten o'clock I think the committee wants to hear what the hon. member has to say.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, I want to finish on this point about principal residence which we will deal with when we come to the sections concerned. The point is not free from difficulty. Particularly in the case of farmland there is the question of the allocation of any so-called capital gain when there has been a forced realization, such as expropriation of the property.

While on the subject of farmlands, I think the minister left the question of valuation in a quite unsatisfactory position. The options that are open to a farmer require a valuation one way or the other, it does not matter which. If he is going to claim an exemption on the disposition of the property for the principal residence and one acre of land, or perhaps a little more, according to the amount required for the proper enjoyment of the property, there still has to be a valuation of the farm and of the residence. If, on the other hand, he wishes to avail himself of the $1,000 a year allowance for the period he the taxpayer has occupied the farm, then a valuation must still be made at the beginning in order to enable him to determine which option to take.

There is one glaring deficiency in this $1,000 a year provision which I pointed out this afternoon. I hope the minister will explain to the committee why this arbitrary amount of $1,000 a year was fixed, because it applies to the 80-acre farm as much as to the 2,500-acre farm. The larger and more valuable farms, for example in western Canada, will be penalized under this formula. Quite frankly, a lot of the answers given the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar and the hon. member for Mackenzie are derived from a strictly urban-oriented philosophy with no understanding whatever of rural problems.

The advisers to the minister in this regard have what the hon. member for Crowfoot has said is tunnel vision in respect of this problem. They just cannot see some of the values from an urban point of view as compared with the view of the majority of members of this House who are urban oriented. They just do not have a clue, yet they impose their version and thinking in respect of this type of proposal.

The proposal of capital gains realization on death in respect of a farm without a true rollover is, frankly, designed to discourage the continuation of the family farm. If there is a capital gains tax this will occasion the sale of the assets unless there has been an insurance policy to cover the cost of capital gains by providing liquid capital. There will have to be an undertaking of some obligation such as a mortgage to raise cash, or there will have to be a sale to provide the equity. In any event, there is a great shortage of capital on the part of farmers.

This is the point we are trying to impress, but this is the point that cannot be seen by hon. members with urban-oriented thinking. This is best illustrated by the attitude of the NDP. The urban wing of that party insists that farmland shall go through the same grist mill for the purpose of capital gains tax. I am surprised that government supporters from western Canada accept the idea that farmlands must go through a capital gains tax mill. It is inconceivable to me that they should support this. That is why I want them to put their courage in their mouths.

I could point the finger at individual members who have been pretty loud in their condemnation of these matters when talking to farm representations and farm organizations in western Canada. They took an entirely different attitude then. I challenge them now to stand up and justify putting farmlands which are to be continued as family farms in the same position. We are not talking about farms that change hands for real estate development; we are talking about the continuation of a farm.

Members opposite representing western constituencies have a lot of farming corporations in their areas. This is not a case of an absentee owner or a corporation using eastern or foreign capital. In some cases a progressive and advanced farmer will incorporate because his operation is better suited for incorporation. There is no provision for the principal residence on such a farm owned by a farming corporation which would allow him to escape the capital gains tax. There is no advantage there. The same privilege is not extended to the owners of a farming corporation although they are the farmers on the land. Often it is better for a father and son to incorporate than to form a partnership, but the capital gains exemption does not apply in such cases. Neither the $1,000 nor the principal residence provision applies in those cases.

I suggest that this is another result of urban-oriented thinking. A great deal has been said about members on this side regarding valuation. The minister has said that we should get a realistic valuation for the purpose of capital gains tax. We must consider the spectre of succession duties, and I pointed this out the other day. In many ways this is an abomination in this country, whether it is a provincial or a federal succession duty. In many instances this has been responsible for foreign ownership. It has caused many Canadians to prematurely dispose of family businesses. Where is the capital that is available to take up these opportunities? I suggest the available capital is foreign. In the province of Quebec this has been fantastic for years and it is fantastic today. This is the reason family businesses have been sold to strangers, whether they are from the United States or elsewhere. All you have to do is talk to the investment counsellor. They have lists the length of your arm of businesses available simply because of the heavy succession duty looming on the horizon.

It is incomprehensible to me that we should gloat with self-satisfaction because the federal government is taking away the estate tax. Why is it taking it off? There is already in existence a succession duty. What you pay to the province you can get credit for from the federal government, or vice versa, keeping in mind succession duty taxes in the provinces and the estate tax in the federal government.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 is deemed to have been moved.

AIR CANADA—REQUEST FOR DC-9 SERVICE IN ROUYN-NORANDA AREA

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I regret the absence of the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) since I was just directing a question to him a few days ago, concerning Air Canada service in northwestern Quebec. What I actually asked was whether it would be possible to replace the Viscount planes by DC-9 aircraft for the service to Val-d'Or, Rouyn, Earlton, North Bay and Toronto from Montreal-Ottawa.

Mr. Speaker, for three years I have been calling for improved Air Canada service. For three years also, petitions have been submitted and recommendations presented to Air Canada by our regional municipal authorities without any substantial improvement having been made to the service.

It is true that an evening service has been established between Montreal and Val d'Or—Rouyn, with a return flight the same evening. But the morning flight, from Montreal to Ottawa, Val-d'Or, Rouyn, Earlton, North Bay and Toronto does not generate sufficient interest from Air Canada. In fact, I have personally found out that at the Ottawa airport, local bureaucrats use the morning flight on their way back from Montreal, whereas people from Rouyn, Val-d'Or or Earlton are invited to remain on the ramp in Montreal because, they say, there is not enough room aboard the aircraft to take them to northwestern Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, I find this situation altogether unbearable, and if the present Viscount service cannot accommodate all passengers who want to fly to northwestern Quebec, I wonder why these Viscounts are not being replaced with DC-9 aircraft.

I have been told, by Air Canada as well as by Department of Transport officials, that the runways in Val-d'Or, Rouyn, Earlton, North Bay and Toronto are capable of accommodating DC-9 aircraft.

For several months now, I have been receiving complaints day after day, from citizens in my area who are left behind at the Montreal airport and who cannot board the plane to Ottawa because other passengers travelling on the morning flight from Montreal to Ottawa are taking the place of those who wish to travel to my area.

The situation is the same on the Rouyn-Val d'Or-Ottawa-Montreal route. People from my riding have to transfer from one plane to another in Ottawa in order to get to Montreal, because civil servants get on Flights 391 or 390, from Ottawa to Montreal, a 125-mile jaunt, using up the space required for travellers coming from 300 or 400 miles away.

Mr. Speaker, I have pointed out this situation to the Minister of Transport. I made representations to Air Canada, but it seems they do not understand the situation. When we leave Montreal for the North, going through Ottawa in the morning, civil servants could use another flight leaving 20 or 25 minutes later. But no! We take the plane for Val d'Or and Rouyn, and then Air Canada employees tell us the service is not profitable.

On the flight servicing Montreal-Ottawa, Val d'Or, Rouyn, Earlton, North Bay and Toronto the plane is empty from Ottawa on. Obviously, that service is not profitable.

So, I ask the Minister of Transport to tell the bureaucrats in Ottawa to take another plane for Montreal and to leave us in peace on the flights to northwestern Quebec and northeastern Ontario.

Mr. Speaker, that is why I put a question to the minister the other day. More and more people travel by air. So the Viscount should be replaced by a DC-9, thus allowing twice as many passengers to travel between Montreal and my district.

This is no extraordinary request; it makes sense. It is nonsense to take people from Montreal, bring them to Ottawa so that they will get to Toronto on an empty airplane. Those who travel between Montreal and Ottawa should board a plane other than the one that serves northwestern Quebec.

I am told the landing strips in my area are in accordance with aviation standards and can accommodate DC-9's. There are enough passengers, particularly since discussions have started on the famous James Bay project, to justify the use of a DC-9 instead of a Viscount. I would like the Minister of Transport who, to my regret, is not in the House tonight, to consider this request so that my fellow citizens may benefit by a better air transport service.

[English]

Mr. Allen B. Sulatycky (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Duquet) I am pleased to be able to reply briefly to the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette). While I can reply to most of his question, it seems to me that in part at least the problems are those of reservations being made and not being made, more than problems of facilities and of aircraft provided by Air Canada or the Department of Transport.

The hon. member's question to the minister on November 9 asked for an improvement in Air Canada's service to Rouyn-Noranda and that DC-9 aircraft be considered. Both of those matters are being studied. The Department of Transport and Air Canada are very much aware of the change in demand in traffic flows to different parts of Quebec and Canada and there is continuous review by experts as to future requirements. Air Canada have just recently completed a study of passenger traffic to points in northwestern Quebec, the results of which indicated that the occupancy rate on most days was about 75 per cent. There was a problem on Fridays when the demand was greatest. However, this problem has been overcome by adding an additional aircraft.

I have a letter which fully explains the efforts which have been made and are being made to ensure good service to the hon. member's constituency. Since it is a little lengthy, I will not read it now but I will see that a copy is given to him; and I will bring to the attention of the Minister of Transport a number of additional points raised by the hon. member this evening.

GRAIN—WHEAT—STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF SUPPLY AND SERVICES ON NECESSITY OF TWO-PRICE SYSTEM—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, on November 4 I posed a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I asked him whether the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Richardson) was "stating government policy earlier this week in Assiniboia when he said a two-price system for wheat was now necessary, with a minimum price of $3 a bushel for wheat sold domestically in Canada."

At that time the Prime Minister said he did not understand what the minister was quoted as having said but he would look at it in Hansard, see what was said and then answer the question as to whether it was government policy. After the result of the by-election in Assiniboia the government may be convinced that this should be government policy. I hope that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister (Mr. Danson) will look at the suggestion in a very favourable light when he replies.

The question of a two-price system for wheat has been debated for many years on the Prairies. For as long, and perhaps longer than I can remember, most of the major farm organizations have called for a two-price system. The Liberal Party itself while in government and in opposition at various times promised a two-price system for grain. I have here press clippings which demonstrate that in May, 1969, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) said that a two-price system for grain was something that he supported in principle. I have another quoting a statement by the minister in charge of the Wheat Board when fighting in Cabinet for a two-price system for wheat. That press clipping, of January 19, 1971, reads:

The federal cabinet has rejected for the time being a proposal that a two-price system for wheat be introduced to help the western grain farmer with his income problems.

Otto Lang, the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, made the recommendation himself to cabinet about two months ago when the government was discussing the final details of his new grains stabilization policy, though he declines to acknowledge this.

It is well know that the party on the other side of the House has for many years advocated a two-price system for wheat which would pay for the first quality of grain a price substantially more than the farmer receives from sales on the international market. What I am asking tonight is whether the Minister of Supply and Services was stating government policy when he said in Assiniboia recently that we should have a two-price system for wheat with a minimum of $3 per bushel for the first 1,000 bushels sold. I think we need this, Mr. Speaker, and we need it soon if we are to keep as many farmers as possible on the land.

As things stand today, the farmer is subsidizing the consumer of bread in Canada. Other countries of the world subsidize or support the price of grain and the Canadian farmer competes not only against those wheat farmers but against the treasuries of their countries. The wheat farmer in Canada is at a distinct disadvantage. He is probably getting less today for a bushel of wheat than in 1949. We know that costs have gone up. But what has happened to the farmer? The price of a bushel of grain has gone down, despite the fact that his costs have skyrocketed.

These things that are inequitable will have to be changed if we are to preserve the rural way of life which is such an important part of the fabric of Canada. It can be done. I do not want to underemphasize the importance of this question. All the major farm organizations have called for a two-price system of grain. The $3 per bushel for the first 1,000 bushels would in most cases guarantee a farmer a basic income of $3,000 a year. After that he would receive whatever the international market paid, and today, as we all know, that is substantially less than $3 per bushel. If we do not achieve this we will be faced with the farmers moving off the land faster and faster every year. The task force on agriculture suggests that the government should become less involved and that farms become larger and more efficient. I do not want to see this happen because I think the farmer is efficient.

There is a real social value to the family farm, and the only way to preserve it is to help the average, small farmer by way of income. An equitable way of doing that is the two-price system for grain. If this is not done, the family farm will disappear and the small towns and cities may go with it. The choice may be basically a social one, but it is important that we spend money to help the farmer. This is what the farmer wants instead of the stabilization bill. It is one of the changes he wanted made in that bill. All of us realize that we must do something like this if we are to help the farmer.

I hope the minister will tell us what is government policy. I hope the congenial parliamentary secretary will say that within a short time we will have a two-price system for wheat and that the farmer will receive at least $3 per bushel for the first 1,000 bushels.

Mr. Barnett J. Danson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): I thank the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) for referring to me as congenial. I refer to him as the congenital socialist from Yorkton-Melville. I think he will agree after the first flush of victory it is regrettable that Jim Hooker was not returned to the government side of the House so that there would be a voice for the western farmer to replace that so tragically lost by the sad death of the beloved Ab Douglas.

The minister's remarks were extemporaneous in Assiniboia and were confined to discussing the merits of the two-price system for wheat from a western viewpoint. He also pointed out at that time that there were other factors which would have to be considered before government policy on this subject could be finally determined.

HARBOURS—PICTOU, NOVA SCOTIA—IMPLEMENTATION OF PLANS FOR IMPROVED FACILITIES

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, on November 9 I raised a question with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) concerning wharf facilities and other installations at the town of Pictou, Nova Scotia. At that time the minister answered that he had been to Pictou, had seen the particular problem referred to and would send me a report. In all fairness, the minister has not had time to do this. However, he was good enough to give me some information on the day the question was asked.

Tonight I want to put on record some of the particular questions I wish dealt with. I also want to acquaint the minister, through the hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Sulatycky), of some of the submissions made by notable persons and organizations in the town of Pictou and in the county of Pictou. It is readily apparent that the general area of Pictou county is undergoing an expansionary phase. We have several important industries adjacent to the town of Pictou and it is fair to say that Pictou will be a focal point in a rapidly expanding industrial area. At least, that is what we all hope for in that part of the country.

Although responsible officials of the town of Pictou and the county of Pictou are encouraged by the work being done by the Department of Transport in operating ferry facilities at Caribou, which is near Pictou, there is a feeling amount responsible persons and industrialists there that possibly the department should concentrate more on upgrading the wharf facilities and installations in the town itself—that is, in the port of Pictou—instead of spending a great deal of money in the outlying area of Caribou where there are certain physical obstacles which prevent the running of a satisfactory, modern ferry service. In other words, some felt when the announcement was made that it would be better to phase out the Caribou-Wood Island run and replace it with a more modern Pictou to Charlottetown run, using a more modern vessel of the type that is used on the Tormentine-Borden crossing or of the Bluenose type that is used at Yarmouth.

It has been said by the Board of Trade, by the mayor and town council of Pictou, by the Pictou county planning commission and by others that there is much to be said for implementing now the kind of plant and what improvements that have been, I suggest with deference, overdue for some time. I am told that the Caribou terminal suffers from difficult night navigating conditions. There is shallow water, a windy channel and somewhat short docks. So difficult are these conditions that on occasions it has been necessary to cancel runs because of wind and water conditions. A minor modification of present docking facilities in the port of Pictou would accommodate larger and more modern vessels. Certainly, there are far better parking facilities and better conditions generally to accommodate the type of tourist traffic that results from better facilities than there are at present in the Caribou area.

I should like to read into the record part of a short statement made in the spring of this year by Mayor Clarence MacCarthy:

• (10:20 p.m.)

The town council of the town of Pictou has gone on record as being in full support of the proposals of the Pictou Chamber of Commerce respecting the following:

(1) The extension of the present seawall to pier "C".

(2) The construction of a new pier with a spur line railroad and warehouse facilities—as well as ample open dock facilities.

The town council is in full agreement that the above mentioned facilities should be provided at the earliest possible date.

It has been well over ten years since the serious fire destroyed much of the harbour installations at Pictou. Immediately after the fire a three-phase, long-range plan was prepared. It was a reconstruction program for this port. Despite the implementation of phase 1 and phase 2, the town of Pictou still suffers from lack of wharf space. There have been a great many suggestions during the past few years. At the present time, other than the limited dock space at Ferguson Industries the only modern pier available is the existing concrete seawall and what is known as pier "C".

I urge the department to immediately implement the third phase of the original plan and extend the existing concrete seawall to the present pier "C". Recently, vessels have had to berth three and four abreast. The lack of space has resulted in difficulties to Ferguson Industries. At present, this firm is building a new ferry. This demand on their facilities has resulted in their having to turn down other jobs because there is not enough wharf space. With the present unemployment problem plaguing Pictou, as it is most areas of this country, it seems a shame that these conditions are allowed to exist. When ships are being loaded or unloaded around pier "C", the wharf is blocked to traffic on and off the pier, especially when railway cars are on the spurline.

A few moments ago I had an opportunity to give the hon. member for Rocky Mountain, who is representing the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) this evening, some material which was given to me. It illustrates some of the recommendations from responsible persons and groups in the Pictou county area. I will not read these into the record but perhaps a couple of excerpts might be appropriate. The Pictou Board of Trade, in a brief submitted to the Department of Transport this year, stated that it is imperative that the Pictou port be upgraded.

As I already mentioned, there is a great need for additional wharf space. There is a rock ledge which apparently hampers certain types of vessels coming into the port of Pictou. I am informed that this is a fairly narrow ledge and could be removed by blasting. It would do a great deal to improve the conditions as far as deep sea fishing is concerned. I urge the Department of Transport, if this has not already been done, to undertake studies to determine the cost and feasibility of removing this particular obstacle.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Allen B. Sulatycky (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) I would like to reply to the question posed by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay). As one who spent some time in that delightful part of the country this summer I can understand his concern for the area. It is both understandable and commendable.

The matter of port planning, as we are all aware, is very much in the mind of the minister since the announcement of his ports policy some time ago. In the case of port facilities at Pictou, the changing demands by industrial and local users are known to the minister as a result of his recent visit to that area. I can assure the hon. member that every consideration will be given to representations which are received from the municipality and interested local groups.

As is the case with most planning, there is need for consensus at the local level as to exactly what course ought to be followed. I acknowledge receiving from the hon. member of a number of documents reflecting representations made and the position taken by people in Pictou on this subject, and I undertake to pass them on to the minister who I am sure will be very interested in them and will wish to study them before he makes a final decision.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.28 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. LEWIS—ALLEGED MISLEADING ANSWERS BY ACTING PRIME MINISTER CONCERNING DECISION ON FOREIGN OWNERSHIP POLICY

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege of which I have given Your Honour notice. The question of privilege is directed to the Acting Prime Minister and the conflict between statements which he made to the House yesterday and revelations in a document purporting to be a cabinet memorandum published in today's Montreal Gazette.

The Acting Prime Minister was asked a number of questions yesterday relating not only to the report published in The Canadian Forum but also, in one question asked by the Leader of the Opposition, specifically to the question of whether or not there was a cabinet document stating that the main policy approach to the issue of foreign ownership should be the creation of a screening agency. In answering that specific question the Acting Prime Minister said that he was prevented by his oath of office from disclosing what had happened in cabinet. However, all through his answers to questions yesterday he created the impression, and obviously intended deliberately to create it, that no decision had been made by the government and that the government was still in the process of making decisions on the question of foreign ownership and the various aspects of policy that might deal with that subject. Indeed, according to the story in the Montreal Gazette he was asked about this matter when he left the House. The report in that newspaper says:

> . . . Sharp was asked if he was denying that any part of the report in the Canadian Forum was in any way government policy.

He is reported as having answered, "Yes. We have taken no decisions yet."

Throughout the question period yesterday and in his comments outside the House the Acting Prime Minister sought to leave the impression that the government had made no decisions. If that is so, Mr. Speaker, then the article in the Montreal Gazette of this morning must be a forgery of some sort because the article in the Gazette claims to be an actual reproduction—it is all in quotes right through—of a cabinet document. At the end, D. J. Leach, superintendent of cabinet documents, is shown as the signatory of the document published in the Montreal Gazette. This is stated to be the actual document, the minute of cabinet. In paragraph (a) of the document the following statement appears:

> The cabinet agreed in principle that the main policy approach to the issue of foreign ownership should be the creation of a screening mechanism that would cover foreign takeovers of Canadian firms doing business in Canada and that the further extent and scope of the functions of a screening mechanism would be examined in full cabinet at an early September meeting.

I am not one who would suggest that every discussion in cabinet in the process of making decisions ought to be made public. I fully appreciate that under our system cabinet discussions, until a decision is reached, might well be kept to the cabinet for obvious reasons. However, that does not give a member of the cabinet, particularly when he is Acting Prime Minister, the right or discretion to make statements that mislead the House and the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: If the Acting Prime Minister had said "I will make no comment on this", "I will not deal with the matter because it is before cabinet" or had made any such statement of that sort, one could appreciate that. Indeed, his answer to the Leader of the Opposition was that he could not say what happened in cabinet because of his oath as a member of the cabinet. Whether one agrees or not with the attempt to keep it secret is a matter to which I will come in a moment. However, when the Acting Prime Minister goes out of his way to suggest to Parliament and the people of Canada that the cabinet has not reached a decision, he is misleading the House and the people of Canada and we, as Members of Parliament, have a legitimate point of privilege against that kind of answer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: I want to emphasize for Your Honour the distinction I am trying to draw. I wish Your Honour could persuade some of the donkeys to stop braying. I want to emphasize the distinction I am trying to make. I do not say that the Acting Prime Minister, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray) or anyone else was under any obligation to tell Parliament or the people of Canada what decision has been made and what decision has not been made until such time as the government is ready to announce its decision or decisions. However, when the Acting Prime Minister knows, and he could not have helped but know, that as long ago as July 29 a decision was in fact made by cabinet, he has no right, without violating every sense of privilege of Parliament and, indeed, every sense of democracy—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Lewis: —to try to convey the impression that no decision has been made by cabinet, which is exactly what he did yesterday. I question the secrecy about some matters that the government refuses to disclose, and one may question what this government is about when, despite its numerous protestations of participation and so on, it refuses to give the Canadian people basic information that is essential to the discussion of a very important subject, but that we will deal with in another situation.

I say that the Acting Prime Minister misled this House and the people of Canada yesterday by statements in the House and by a statement he made outside the House. In my humble view, that is a clear point of privilege, a violation of the privileges of members of this House. If Your Honour recognizes that there is a prima facie case of privilege, I will be pleased to move the following motion:

That the discrepancies between the statements made to this House by the Acting Prime Minister in answer to questions addressed to him on Monday, November 15, and the contents of a Privy Council document published in The Gazette of Montreal on Tuesday, November 16, be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Resign.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for York South has given notice of his intention to raise this matter by way of a question of privilege. The matter is one of some importance and perhaps some complexity. Unfortunately, because of special circumstances, the Chair has not had an opportunity to look into the precedents to the extent to which I would have liked, and rather than reach a decision which would not be founded upon the proper authorities, I would ask the hon. member's co-operation in allowing the Chair to hold the matter in abeyance for a few hours so that I might have an opportunity, later in the afternoon, to consider all the facts, to consider the hon. member's statement, in particular, and give a ruling later in the afternoon.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

ALLEGED BREAKDOWN OF CABINET SECURITY—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I am seeking the unanimous consent of the House to make a motion under Standing Order 43. The special and urgent circumstances involved would appear to be the complete breakdown of government cabinet security involving the publication in The Canadian Forum of the Gray Report, the publication in the Montreal Gazette today of what purports to be a cabinet document, and the publication in the Toronto Sun today of a story dealing with the refusal of the Prime Minister to allow the Minister of Manpower and Immigration to bring into the House of Commons the amendments to the Immigration Act which have been approved by the appropriate cabinet committee.

I would therefore move, if unanimous consent is given:

That a special committee of this House consisting of six members who support the government and six members of opposition parties be established for the purpose of reviewing, considering and reporting on the chaotic situation which exists as a result of the publication of cabinet documents provided by unauthorized persons and that such committee have the power to send for persons, papers and records and to consider and report on the right of the public to be informed and the extent to which the government may restrict that right.

[Mr. Lewis.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's motion proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43, requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is no unanimous consent.

Mr. Baldwin: Shame.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

FOREIGN OWNERSHIP—PUBLICATION OF CABINET DOCUMENT BY MONTREAL "GAZETTE"—INVESTIGATION OF SECURITY BREACH

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. Yesterday I asked the hon. gentleman whether a certain cabinet document existed. He told me then he was unable to give an answer relating to confidential cabinet information. In view of the publication in the Montreal Gazette today of what purports to be a cabinet document, a sentence from which I quoted yesterday, I should like to ask the hon. gentleman whether, in fact, the purported cabinet document published exists?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government takes a very serious view—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Sharp: —of this incident and it is clear that a member of the press, or members of the press, have gained access to a confidential cabinet document. I am glad to see, from the motion put forward by the hon. member for Peace River, that he also considers it to be a serious business. Perhaps hon. members behind him do not but he does and we do. This matter involves a serious breach of security. I should add that the report that appears in the Montreal Gazette is not completely accurate. It contains discrepancies. One to which I draw particular attention is the use of the phrase "the Gray report". This is not a quotation from the cabinet document.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Mr. Stanfield: I have a supplementary question arising from the statement of the Acting Prime Minister that he views this as a very serious breach of cabinet security. I would ask the hon. gentleman whether an investigation has been launched, what is the method of investigation that the government has chosen, and whether the hon. gentleman can report to the House today any results of that investigation?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, because the government takes this matter seriously an investigation was launched immediately the report was heard on the radio this morning—

An hon. Member: Which report?

Mr. Sharp: —and we read the report that appeared in the Gazette this morning. The procedure ordinarily followed is being followed here, namely, that of departmental and interdepartmental inquiries. If necessary, the matter will be put into the hands of the police.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Stanfield: The Acting Prime Minister has just stated that an investigation was launched this morning. If he takes this matter so seriously I should like to ask him why an investigation was not launched last Saturday when an excerpt from what purported to be a cabinet document, which was reported in the press of this country to be a confidential cabinet document, was published? If the hon. gentleman takes this matter seriously, has he any explanation why an investigation was not launched when it first became apparent that there was in fact a serious breach of cabinet security?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I gathered from the question that was put to me yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition that he had had access to some documents of which I was not aware at that time. I now find that there appeared in one newspaper on Saturday, one that I had not seen and that the Prime Minister had not seen, what purported to be an extract from a cabinet document. If at that time we had realized that the document had been revealed, then the inquiry would have been launched immediately. One was launched as soon as there was some evidence that there had been a breach of cabinet security.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, is the hon. gentleman saying that no member of the cabinet or of the staff of the Prime Minister's office or any of the large number of officials retained to advise the Prime Minister were aware on Saturday that this quotation from what purported to be a confidential cabinet document had been published in the press? Will the hon. gentleman say to me, through you, sir, that neither he nor the Prime Minister of this country was advised that this publication did in fact take place on Saturday last?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition seems to have been better informed about cabinet leaks than I was. The first news I had of this cabinet leak was this morning when I listened to the radio and then read that what purported to be a cabinet document, which, as I have said, has some discrepancies in it, had come into the hands of the press. Perhaps the hon. gentleman has better access to leaks from the cabinet than I have.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the Leader of the Opposition for the purpose of asking a supplementary question and then the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands on a supplementary.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, in view of the kind of answers we are getting this afternoon, pursuant to Standing Order 25 I move the adjournment of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order, please. The Leader of the Opposition has not indicated whether he has a seconder for the motion.

Mr. Baldwin: I second the motion.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion? All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Stanfield) which was negatived on the following division:

[Mr. Speaker.]

• (3:00 p.m.)

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In order that we may better interpret the rules of the House, I would ask Your Honour to rule whether the vote of the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Jerome) ought to be considered.

Mr. Speaker: I will consider the question. It is my impression that the hon. member is alluding to the fact that the hon. member referred to may have left his seat while the vote was being taken. Of course that does not disenfranchise the hon. member. However, I suggest to hon. members that the rule is clear. Hon. members should not leave their seats while a vote is being taken. This is a matter of order and the standing order is well known to all hon. members. Is the hon. member for Yukon rising on a point of order?

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to the rule of this House which requires the Crown to produce a document to which reference has been made in a proceeding of the House. It will be recalled that in answer to the first question of the Leader of the Opposition the Acting Prime Minister described the report in the Gazette as being inaccurate in at least one respect in that the words "the Gray report" were used. The Acting Prime Minister asserted, inferentially, that in the cabinet document no such reference was present.

In my submission it is a well known rule of the House that when a minister of the Crown refers to a document in a proceeding of the House the Crown is obliged to produce that document and to table it. The reasons for that rule are very apparent. I would like to cite for Your Honour's consideration the relevant paragraphs in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Fourth Edition, 1958. At page 134 the following is set forth in paragraph 3 toward the bottom of the page:

> It has been admitted that a document which has been cited ought to be laid upon the table of the House, if it can be done without injury to the public interest. The same rule, however, cannot be held to apply to private letters or memoranda.

The paragraph goes on—

An hon. Member: Read it properly.

Mr. Nielsen: If the hon. member would read the rules he might be able to follow the argument. I recommend that citation to Your Honour. I also refer Your Honour to Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure where at page 337 the following is set forth:

> It is a parliamentary rule that when a minister of the Crown quotes a public document in the House, and founds upon it an argument or assertion, that document, if called for, ought to be produced.

The paragraph goes on:

> The rule respecting the production of public papers, quoted by a minister of the Crown, is necessary to give the House the same information he possesses, and enable it to come to a correct conclusion on a question.

The minister has unequivocally made reference to the document in question. In order for the House to come to its own assessment, that document should be produced. In Sir T. Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice, 13th edition, at page 328, the following is set forth toward the bottom of the page:

> Another rule, or principle of debate, may be here added. A minister of the Crown is not at liberty to read or quote from a despatch or other state paper not before the house, unless he be prepared to lay it upon the table.

In my submission to Your Honour I will have a few words to say with regard to the words "read or quote". At the foot of the page it reads:

> This restraint is similar to the rule of evidence in courts of law, which prevents counsel from citing documents which have not been produced in evidence. The principle is so reasonable that it has not been contested.

It might be advanced to Your Honour that before the Crown is required to produce such a document and lay it on the table it must be cited or quoted. I submit that the minister's reference to the document, in effect disclosing a part of its contents or purporting to disclose a part of its contents, is precisely the same as quoting from the document itself.

The only other argument that I can anticipate might be advanced to Your Honour is that the proceeding that is now before the House, namely the oral question period, is not a proceeding. With regard to that anticipated argument I refer Your Honour to Ontario Reports, 1971, volume two. I know it is not a binding precedent on the House. It involves the case of Roman Corporation Limited against Hudson Bay Oil and Gas Company Limited with regard to certain statements made by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources concerning privilege with respect to statements made by those two ministers of the Crown in the House. The Chief Justice of the High Court came to the conclusion, presumably after careful and considered research, that neither the House of Commons nor any court of law had ever determined exactly what was a proceeding of the House. The honourable justice did conclude that a proceeding did in fact include a question asked or even notice of a question asked in the House.

Anticipating those two arguments which may be advanced to Your Honour, I submit there is a clear obligation from a purely technical point of view on the Crown that it must produce this document now that the minister has referred to its content. Even if there were not that technical requirement, which I submit very strongly does exist, then there certainly exists a moral obligation on the part of the Crown to clear up the confusion in the minds of the public—

An hon. Member: You are getting out of your field.

Mr. Nielsen: —and certainly in the minds of the inane members opposite so that the House can judge for itself who is lying, the Montreal Gazette or the Acting Prime Minister.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, if I may make a comment or two on the point of order raised by the hon. member with regard to an obligation on the part of the Acting Prime Minister to table a particular document, I believe there is a justification for that particular obligation—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: —if a minister of the Crown in the course of debate, as the citations indicate, is using a document, is quoting from it, is basing an argument upon it. In a circumstance of that kind it is unfair for a minister to have access to information or an analysis that is not available to other members of the House. It is unfair because other members are not in a position to assess for themselves the total context from which quotations may be taken.

Mr. Nielsen: Precisely.

Mr. MacEachen: Certainly that is related to a debate in which an argument is taking place and in which a minister has occasion to use a document and quote from it. With that situation there can be no dispute. Indeed, there is a rule of the House which requires a member, if he quotes from a letter from a constituent, to table that letter if asked to do so.

Mr. Baldwin: No.

Mr. MacEachen: That requirement has been followed in the past. In recent years it has fallen into disuse. It is not possible for any member to quote from a document unless he assimilates that document into his own speech.

The situation that has now occurred is not akin to any of those I have mentioned. The Acting Prime Minister has no document, has not quoted from any document and has not used any document in argument. All he has said in reply to a question by the Leader of the Opposition is that he takes a serious view of the security situation because a particular document has been improperly disclosed. He went on to say that the account in the Montreal Gazette contains discrepancies. It is true the Acting Prime Minister has referred to a document. It would be impossible for him to reply to the Leader of the Opposition without referring to the document. No one questions that, but it is rather silly to suggest that every document to which a person refers has to be tabled in the House. We refer to cabinet decisions that have been taken. We all know that cabinet decisions are written. Must we then table them in the House? Of course not.

In this case I would contend that because the minister has not quoted, has not used, any document in argumentation but has merely referred to the existence of a document as a result of a question asked, there is no obligation upon the government to table that document at all.

Mr. Baldwin: Very briefly, Mr. Speaker, I think that in his defence of the Acting Prime Minister the President of the Privy Council has in fact condemned him and has indicated that the point made by my hon. friend from the Yukon is well-founded. There is no doubt that in the context of the answer the Acting Prime Minister gave to my leader he indicated he was aware of the document and of its contents as printed in the Gazette. He further said, by implication, that these documents were not quite the same because there had been one change. I submit these observations with regard to the legal aspect of the matter. The point made by the hon. member for the Yukon is quite correct. So much for the law.

As to the question of equity—

An hon. Member: Come on, now.

Mr. Baldwin: I know the hon. member does not understand equity. It does not belong in the Liberal party. The fact remains that the Acting Prime Minister must be aware of this document because it is six weeks, I am told, since it was placed in the hands of the people who have used it. They knew where it was. In the circumstances, equity demands that the document be tabled in the House so that hon. members may know what it contains.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the authorities—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I should bring to the attention of hon. members the desirability of trying to resolve this point as quickly as we can. We have spent a good deal of time on it, and I think we should now try to resolve it as expeditiously as possible.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The citations referred to by the hon. member for Yukon are quite precise.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): They are citations 159, paragraphs 2 and 3. Citation 159(2) refers to the earlier citation in May to which the hon. member for the Yukon also alluded. The terms of these citations are very narrow in scope. They are equivalent to the rules of evidence applied by a court, to which the hon. member for the Yukon also referred.

> A minister of the Crown is not at liberty to read or quote from a despatch or other state paper not before the House—
> It has been admitted that a document which has been cited ought to be laid before the House—

As the government House leader has pointed out, the most the Acting Prime Minister did was to refer, indirectly or directly, to a document. There was no citation. There was no quotation. If the argument advanced by the hon. member for Yukon were to be accepted, the mere fact that a document was referred to would make it produceable, and obviously that is well beyond anything May or Beauchesne had in mind when they placed these paragraphs in their books. I refer also to citation 159(3) which says:

> It has been admitted that a document which has been cited ought to be laid upon the table of the House if it can be done without injury to the public interest.

That is another point I should like to bring to Your Honour's attention, that you should consider whether it is normally in the public interest to require the production of a cabinet document.

Mr. Baldwin: Or the Liberal interest.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): If Your Honour were to hold that despite the narrow construction placed upon this rule by May and Beauchesne, who limit it to citation and quotation, not a reference, if you were to go beyond the protection given to the public interest and require the production of the document, then I submit that production should be limited to the article in the Montreal Gazette.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I see the hon. member for Yukon seeking the floor. He knows he has already spoken to the question. It would be somewhat irregular to allow all four hon. members who have taken part in the debate to speak a second time. Perhaps the hon. member has an explanation to indicate why he should be allowed to speak a second time on the same point.

Mr. Nielsen: Yes, Mr. Speaker. In all fairness, and having regard to parliamentary justice, there ought to be an opportunity for rebuttal of the new points which have been raised.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member might indicate the precedents. There may be such precedents of which I am not aware. I do not wish to be unfair to him. I appreciate the importance of the matter which has been raised, and there is no reason why we should not debate it. It is one of interest from a procedural standpoint. The Chair is always happy to hear arguments in relation to procedural points, so I certainly do not intend to limit the discussion in any way. The hon. member says he is entitled to make a rebuttal. Perhaps the argument will come from the government side that they are entitled to offer a rebuttal of the hon. member's rebuttal. The hon. member for Yukon is perhaps confusing court proceedings with proceedings of the House of Commons. It is certainly not the practice of the House to allow a member to speak a second time to the same question. I submit this view to the hon. member with all respect.

Mr. Nielsen: In all modesty, I have been around here long enough not to confuse proceedings in this House with court proceedings, My Lord. But I think that in all fairness, in view of the importance of this question, a rebuttal should be made in response to what the Minister of Justice has stated.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have no objection to allowing the hon. member to state briefly what his point is. If he thinks he has a point of order he would be entitled to raise one in any event. We shall see where we go from there. We may be spending the whole day on rebuttals, and I am wondering whether this will lead to the orderly conduct of our business.

Mr. Nielsen: My point will be very briefly made if the braying donkeys over there will be quiet. The point is that, contrary to what the Minister of Justice has urged you to accept, the Acting Prime Minister has used his knowledge of this document to argue his case in reply to a question by the Leader of the Opposition.

An hon. Member: The same argument.

Mr. Nielsen: It is not the same argument at all. The Acting Prime Minister said a decision on foreign ownership had not been made. He described the document as a study, a working paper. He asserted that the words "Gray report" do not appear in it. All these assertions refer to the content of the document.

The rule is very clear. It is based upon the rule of evidence in a court of law which prevents people referring to documents unless they are prepared to produce them so that others who are interested can make their own observations. It is unfair to allow the minister to refer to the contents of the document without producing it so that we can make our own assessment. We must read it to know what the truth is.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: If there are no further arguments to be submitted, either in support of the hon. member's contention or in opposition thereto, I am quite prepared to make a ruling.

As hon. members know, this matter of the obligation on the part of either individual members or members of the cabinet to table or produce a document which has been quoted is a rule which is often disputed in the House. It is very seldom that a protracted debate on an important subject takes place in the House without a member rising on a point of order or a question of privilege to suggest that a document which has been referred to by another hon. member in debate ought to be tabled immediately, and the Chair is called upon to consider the precedents and citations and to make a ruling. The hon. member for Yukon will himself recognize that this is a matter of general interest that has been considered by the Chair on numerous occasions.

I suggest to hon. members that the citation to which the hon. members for Yukon and Peace River have alluded has to be interpreted rather strictly. I have to agree with the contention that if the reference made to a public document is not, as the citation says, a quotation from that document, it would be very difficult for the Chair to rule that the document ought to be tabled.

In fairness, looking at the matter as objectively as I can, I do not see how it is possible for the Chair to make a ruling at this point that a document that has simply been referred to but has not been directly quoted should be tabled in debate. I find it difficult to rule otherwise. Hon. members may look at the citations that have been quoted in a very interesting and forceful way by the hon. members for Yukon and Peace River. They are clear to me. If a document has been actually cited or quoted in debate by a minister of the Crown, it has to be tabled. If only reference is made to it, I do not see how there can be an obligation to table it.

I remember that when a similar matter was raised previously the suggestion was made that perhaps the remedy of members of the opposition is to move for the production of the document. I appreciate that this is not a very useful remedy in view of the rules. The way we have been operating is that a motion for the production of documents is sometimes debated, but it is difficult to bring it forward for debate and it very often falls to the bottom of the list and many months pass before the matter can be considered again. Therefore I cannot seriously suggest to hon. members that this is their remedy.

With respect, I have to make the ruling that the citation quoted does not apply in the present circumstances and therefore I cannot rule that the document in question should be tabled.

FOREIGN OWNERSHIP—POSSIBLE CREATION OF SCREENING MECHANISM TO REGULATE TAKEOVERS—ACCURACY OF MONTREAL "GAZETTE" VERSION OF CABINET DOCUMENT

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister which arises out of his statement that there are discrepancies between the document that appeared in the Montreal Gazette and the actual cabinet document to which it refers. May I first quote the paragraph in the alleged cabinet document headed "A":

> The cabinet agreed in principle that the main policy approach to the issue of foreign ownership should be the creation of a screening mechanism that would cover foreign takeovers of Canadian firms doing business in Canada—

May I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether that paragraph is an accurate reproduction of the words contained in the original document to which it refers?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was referring to discrepancies because I had discovered some. I cannot say for certain whether there are discrepancies in the first paragraph, but I certainly would not want to say that they were serious or that they are misleading.

Mr. Douglas: In view of the fact the Acting Prime Minister has a very selective memory and remembers some discrepancies but not others, may I ask him whether he is now telling the House that the government did not decide last July to accept in principle the concept of setting up a screening mechanism to deal with foreign takeovers?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, when this question was put to me by the Leader of the Opposition I made the statement that this was a matter of cabinet secrecy and I am bound by my oath not to disclose what goes on in cabinet. Therefore I am afraid I cannot answer that question directly without breaking my oath. What I do want to say to the hon. member and to the House is that no decisions have yet been made on the policy that this government intends to adopt toward foreign ownership, and that is the simple truth.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a final supplementary question. Since the publication of now two cabinet documents indicates either that they were stolen or that they were deliberately leaked to the press, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether this is a manifestation either of the government's gross incompetence or wilful deception?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

FOREIGN OWNERSHIP—SUGGESTED POSSESSION OF CABINET DOCUMENT BY OWNERS OF OTTAWA "CITIZEN"

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the government or the hon. gentleman can deny that the alleged cabinet memorandum reproduced in the Gazette has been in the hands of—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows that he cannot ask a question in those terms. The hon. member for Calgary Centre.

Mr. Baldwin: A point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Peace River on a point of order.

Mr. Baldwin: If Your Honour takes objection to my question I will rephrase it.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Peace River.

Mr. Baldwin: Has this cabinet document been in the hands of the owners of the Citizen for six weeks?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Since the hon. gentleman wishes to enlighten me, may I say that I did not know about this leak until this morning.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please, the Chair recognized the hon. member for Calgary Centre a moment ago.

FOREIGN OWNERSHIP—CIRCULATION OF CABINET DOCUMENT TO MINISTERS

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister in connection with this document that he has now admitted exists. It does not involve any breaking of the oath of cabinet secrecy; it is really an administrative matter. Was this document circulated to all members of cabinet, or was it circulated only to a certain number and, if so, to whom? Or was it not circulated to members of the cabinet at all?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has been a member of cabinets and he knows that records of cabinet proceedings are distributed to all ministers. There is nothing unusual about that.

FOREIGN OWNERSHIP—REQUEST THAT PRIVY COUNCILLORS BE PERMITTED TO SEE RECORD OF JULY 29 CABINET MEETING

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have a very simple question for the minister since, whether he believes it or not his credibility is now in issue as a result of the statements he has made, which have been so—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Diefenbaker: —that have clashed one with the other; I will put it that way. In order to clear up the matter, would the minister allow members of Her Majesty's Privy Council to see the record of the cabinet meeting on July 29? This would give the minister an opportunity to prove whether the disjointed stories he has been telling are well based.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister permit that?

Some hon. Members: Answer!

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in the answers I gave yesterday—and I have had an opportunity of reviewing the record very carefully—I did not in any way, I think, mislead the House. I said in answer to the specific question asked by the Leader of the Opposition that I could not discuss what was before cabinet. I said on a number of occasions, both within and without the House, that decisions regarding government policy on foreign ownership had not yet been reached. The matter is still before cabinet. We have not yet made our decisions. The document that has been released suggests there was some tentative decision in principle. This may or may not be true. I cannot either deny it or accept it, but the decisions of the government as to its policy on foreign ownership have still to be made.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, does the hon. gentleman not know that when there is a challenge in the mother of parliaments such as has taken place here the government invariably allows members of the Privy Council, bound by their oaths not to reveal what they find—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure whether that was a preamble or the question, but perhaps the right hon. gentleman might ask his supplementary question now.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I try so hard, Mr. Speaker, but those people across the way are a little frightened.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister almost convinced me in the past that he is a wit, but I am beginning to think I was only half right.

An hon. Member: That's twice in one week, Barnie.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

FOREIGN OWNERSHIP—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CABINET DOCUMENT OF JULY 29

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister? In order to clear up this matter, will he seek from his cabinet colleagues the authority to table the cabinet document of July 29 in the House tomorrow?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): As I said yesterday, Mr. Speaker, I think it is very desirable that the government should take a decision on this matter of foreign ownership. The matter is before cabinet at the present time and we are hopeful we can make a decision very shortly. I think this would be the best way of clearing up any confusion that may exist.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, pending the decision on the whole broad question, will the Acting Prime Minister seek to clear up the present confusion by asking for authority to table the one document that was passed on July 29?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I will consider this suggestion. Certainly I would have thought there was an obligation upon those who have published or got access to it to reveal the whole of the document. As I said earlier, I have looked at the cabinet decisions and this document is not a word for word transcription of them. I think it is up to those who have revealed this document to give evidence that this is the document and not for the government to refute it.

An hon. Member: Send it to a committee.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The Acting Prime Minister asserted just a moment ago and earlier in his replies to questions from this side of the House that this document is now before the cabinet for consideration.

An hon. Member: The subject.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, the record will speak for itself, and when it is examined I am sure that my assertion to you, Your Honour, will be found to be accurate in that the Acting Prime Minister has said that this document is before the cabinet now for its consideration.

On November 15, at page 9555 of Hansard, in reply to a question by the right hon. member for Prince Albert which appears in the left-hand column the Minister of National Revenue said certain things. I will read the question first.

Mr. Speaker, I think we can clear up a great deal with the Minister of National Revenue here, because this looks like Gray's elegy and not Gray's eulogy. I should like to ask him simply whether these quotations which have appeared in The Canadian Forum came from any official document in the possession of the minister, and has he any idea how they were obtained?

The Minister of National Revenue then replied:

Mr. Speaker, I would draw the right hon. gentleman's attention to the statement issued by the Prime Minister's office on Friday which said that the article in The Canadian Forum is based on only one draft of a study prepared for official discussion at one stage in the preparation of documents to be submitted to cabinet. I have no knowledge at this time as to how any information may have reached The Canadian Forum in an unauthorized way.

My point of privilege is that the Minister of National Revenue led the House to believe on November 15 that this document had not yet been submitted to cabinet, and the Acting Prime Minister says today that it has.

TRADE

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ASSIST UNITED STATES TO OVERCOME BALANCE OF PAYMENTS PROBLEM—SUBJECTS DISCUSSED IN NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, in view of the answers given by the Acting Prime Minister to the questions that have been asked, I want to turn to some other questions. Noting the Acting Prime Minister's distinction between a decision in principle and presumably an unprincipled decision, I must say that is something I cannot quite follow. I should like to ask him a question that is related, but not quite along the same line, arising out of an answer he gave yesterday in which he informed the House that the government of Canada would like to help the United States overcome its balance of payments problems because this affects us. May I ask him whether the government has reached a decision in principle, or otherwise, as to what steps it would take to help the United States overcome its balance of payments problems?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this has been the subject of discussions going on for quite some time now, and, indeed, there was one yesterday with officials of the United States government who have brought forward a series of matters on which they would like our views and assistance.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, in view of the answer the obvious supplementary therefore is, would the Acting Prime Minister inform the House and the people of Canada what subjects the United States officials or representatives have brought before Canadian officials or representatives for discussion in the area of Canada's assistance to the United States to deal with its balance of payments problems? What are the subjects?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, most of them have been in the public press from time to time. They want to talk about the automobile agreement; they want to talk about defence production sharing and they would like to talk about various parts of our program. We have raised with them a number of matters we would like to discuss with them at the same time. These are the sort of discussions that one would expect would take place under these circumstances.

Mr. Lewis: I appreciate that, Mr. Speaker, but could we have a little enlightenment as to what subjects the Canadian representatives placed before the United States spokesmen as to the kind of grievances we have against the United States in the fields of trade, exchange or any others that are being discussed now at these meetings?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I mentioned some of them some weeks ago when a similar question was asked in the House and they remain on the list. We are very concerned about the fact that the Americans have banned the importation of uranium. We are very concerned about the effects of the manufacturing clause in their copyright act. Those are irritants or grievances of long standing. These are some we would like to proceed with at the present time.

Mr. Baldwin: I have a question—

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has recognized the hon. member for Peace River. If he is not asking a supplementary the Chair will recognize the hon. member for York South.

Mr. Baldwin: My question is not supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I think my question is a relevant supplementary. I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the question of control of a large part of Canada's economy, particularly control of a large part of the manufacturing section of this country's economy, is a subject of discussion with the representatives from the United States and whether there has been any indication by the representatives of Canada that Canada intends to take some action with regard to the situation?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, this does not seem to be very directly relevant to the balance of payments problem.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the Leader of the Opposition on a supplementary.

[Translation]

I will then recognize the hon. member for Portneuf.

[English]

DISCUSSION OF SUBJECT OF ENERGY WITH UNITED STATES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether among the subjects the United States officials have indicated they want to discuss is included the subject of energy?

An hon. Member: How about the heavy water leaks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the United States and Canada were discussing the subject of energy until the emergence of the emergency measures taken by the United States which gave some priority to other matters. I do understand that the United States would like to return to having some discussion, but I want to repeat what I said yesterday, that this has no relation whatever to the 10 per cent surcharge.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In fairness the Chair has to recognize the hon. member for Portneuf. We are still on the first round and I will return to the Leader of the Opposition in a moment.

[Later:]

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Acting Prime Minister. The government of Canada having indicated that its officials were too preoccupied with other matters to resume discussions relating to energy matters, now that United States officials have asked that these discussions continue does the government of Canada propose to meet this request and resume these discussions?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The kind of discussions the United States is asking us to have we would be very happy to resume.

REQUEST BY UNION CATHOLIQUE DES CULTIVATEURS FOR IMMEDIATE ASSISTANCE TO PREVENT BANKRUPTCY OF CERTAIN PRODUCERS

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture but since he is away, I will put it to his Parliamentary Secretary.

Has the Department of Agriculture considered the telegram sent to it recently by the president general of the Catholic Farmers Union in which direct and immediate assistance was requested to prevent hog, egg and turkey producers from going bankrupt? In the affirmative, could the Parliamentary Secretary tell us what measures the government intends to take in this connection?

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the telegram referred to by the hon. member has indeed been received. In fact, I also received a copy of it.

I can assure the hon. member that the Department is considering this document. The Minister will be back tomorrow from a trip to Europe and will be in a position to inform the parties concerned about the position that the government intends to take on this subject.

REPRESENTATIONS OF QUEBEC MINISTER TO OBTAIN FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE FROM FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture.

Could he tell us if representations were made by the Quebec Minister of Agriculture on the same; matter in order to request the financial assistance of the federal government in respect of the provincial program?

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Chairman, as for the $16 millions contributed by organizations and the provincial government, I am not aware that the provincial government has asked for some assistance. It is possible that such a request was made these last few days but I am not aware of it. I will have to inquire and, if need be, I shall later provide the hon. member with an answer.

IMMIGRATION ACT

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF AMENDMENTS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the government has decided to introduce into the House for first reading amendments to the Immigration Act which have been before cabinet so the House will be aware of what is contained in these proposals and, if so, when will this be done?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure I understand whether the hon. gentleman wants to know when we will bring forward the bill. It certainly will not be brought forward for discussion this session but it may find its way on to the order paper.

TRANSPORT

REMOVAL OF «EMPRESS OF CANADA» FROM SERVICE BY CPR—REQUEST FOR POSTPONEMENT FOR PURPOSE OF RECONSIDERATION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have a question with regard to which time is of the essence. It has to do with the Empress of Canada which will be sailing from Montreal tomorrow for the last time. The CPR has decided it is going to dismantle this ship and take her out of service. All across the country I think there is a general feeling that some action should be taken. I wonder whether the minister would get in touch with the officials of the CPR and ask them to postpone action for a reasonable period of time, so that some fitting solution might be arrived at whereby this connection between Canada and the United Kingdom might be preserved?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, I can merely transmit this representation to the Canadian Pacific and I shall be glad to do that later this afternoon.

ACTION TO RESOLVE STRIKES BY LETTER CARRIERS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. In view of the continuing deterioration in morale among the postal employees as indicated by the current wave of stikes, can the hon. gentleman indicate what steps he is taking to deal with this problem?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): Once more, Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the premises of the hon. member's question. Like most hon. members, I deeply regret that some letter carriers should have decided to stage a series of illegal strikes now. I fully endorse the national executive of the Letter Carriers' Union in their efforts to have employees resume work, but a certain pattern seems to be taking shape whereby, as some letter carriers return to work in one locality, others stop work elsewhere.

The situation today is practically the same as yesterday, except for a shift in closing and re-opening of offices.

I might add, Mr. Speaker, that it has never been the department's intention not to comply with the arbitration award made following the investigation of the grievances submitted by three employees. We intend to offer them a sum of money.

With regard to the decision concerning part-time employees, there were so many applicants that, after consulting our legal advisers, we decided to ask the Treasury Board to appeal that decision.

So, we are asking the letter carriers—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

[English]

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Has the government given consideration to not using non-union men in view of the controversy concerning the adjudication report which states that only union men should be used for overtime work?

[Translation]

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): That, Mr. Speaker, is precisely the decision we intend to submit to the Public Service Staff Relations Board and, as soon as a decision is made, we shall be able to act accordingly.

At the present time, the department cannot operate without temporary or casual employees.

[English]

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister if he has received a request from the representatives of the postal workers to meet with them, and if he has received such a request will he be meeting with them?

[Translation]

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I know that the national executive of the Letter Carriers' Union and the council of the Postal Unions met this morning with officials of my department. They asked that a meeting be held which they, my deputy minister and myself would attend. I am waiting to get back to my office to give an answer.

[English]

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, the minister spoke about appealing the adjudicator's decision. Is the government contemplating going into court on some kind of certiorari motion or some other prerogative writ of that sort to challenge the adjudicator's decision? Is that what the minister is suggesting?

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): I said we were going back to the PSSRB.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INTENTION OF PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA TO LIBERATE TAIWAN—CANADIAN GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the intention of the People's Republic of China, as indicated at the United Nations where they have stated that "China is determined to liberate Taiwan and no force on earth can stop us", what is the Canadian government's position on what is equivalent to a declaration of war by the Republic of China against the free nationalist Chinese?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when Canada agreed to exchange diplomats with the People's Republic of China it was clearly stated that the Canadian government neither accepted nor challenged the statement by the PRC about the position of Formosa. We have taken no position.

• (4:00 p.m.)

Mr. Crouse: In the event of hostilities is it the government's intention to take a stand on this issue and, if so, which side will we be supporting?

Mr. Sharp: I can think of no more hypothetical question, Mr. Speaker.

TRADE

CANADA—U.S. AUTO PACT—POSSIBLE REMOVAL OF SAFEGUARDS TO AID U.S. BALANCE OF PAYMENTS PROBLEM

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As one means of aiding the Americans to overcome their balance of payments problem, could the minister inform the House whether officials of his department who were visiting Washington last week agreed or said on behalf of the government of this country that we would be willing to give up the existing safeguards in the automotive agreement?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The discussions on the subject of the auto pact at this time are exploratory. Any final Canadian decision would obviously have to be agreed to by the cabinet.

CANADA—U.S. AUTO PACT—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON SAFEGUARDS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Could the minister indicate to the House whether, on the one hand, the government has a fixed position in terms of commitment to the existing safeguards or, on the other hand, whether it has proposed some alternative to the safeguards?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): There is no commitment at this time. As I said a moment ago, the work being done now is exploratory.

OIL

PROPOSED TAPS TANKER ROUTE—CONTINUANCE OF DIPLOMATIC REPRESENTATIONS BY CANADIAN GOVERNMENT

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister in his capacity as Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the action taken by a member of this House in the United States with regard to the trans-Alaska pipeline project, has the government in fact reached a dead end in its diplomatic efforts to prevent the tanker route from endangering our west coast?

Mr. Speaker: I doubt whether a question asked in those terms is in order. The hon. member might like to rephrase it so that it is acceptable procedurally.

Mr. Aiken: May I ask the minister, then, whether diplomatic efforts are still continuing in this matter?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, and I am very happy to see the efforts that the Liberal Member of Parliament to whom the hon. member has made reference is making in support of the government's position.

RESEARCH

GOVERNMENT POLICY WITH REGARD TO CHEMICAL INDUSTRY

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce which I put to him so that he will not feel neglected this afternoon. I wish to refer to the position of the chemical industry in Canada and particularly to their research facilities. In view of the vast reductions in research personnel and in the effectiveness of research in the Canadian chemical industry which have been drawn to the attention of the minister, what has been the response of the government in this regard, and especially in light of the recommendations of the committee on scientific research in Canada?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I am well aware of the difficulties of the chemical industry. A number of things have been done in the recent past, for example, the action taken in one of the recent budgets presented by the Minister of Finance to come to the support of that industry. I am quite aware that the industry is finding it difficult to keep some of their research men at this time, but I really do not know what the hon. member is searching for so far as a statement that I could make at this time is concerned.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The minister has been, shall we say, solicitous in his attitude toward the chemical industry in response to questions from the opposition. I am wondering just what the government's response is to what is said to be the destruction of the research facilities of a Crown corporation of which the minister's own deputy minister is a director, in other words, Polymer?

Mr. Pepin: The minister responsible for Polymer has said here a number of times that the company was doing its best to maintain its personnel at the highest possible level at this time. I fail to understand what my hon. friend would like to know—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are running short of time. Perhaps the question might be pursued further tomorrow.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The minister will not be here tomorrow.

AIR TRANSPORT

HIJACKING—AMENDMENTS TO CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): My question is for the Minister of Justice. In light of the fact that on December 15, 1970, Canada signed The Hague convention with reference to air piracy, and in view of the fact that there is a vacuum in the Criminal Code regarding the laying of proper charges in Canada in this respect and, furthermore, in view of the fact that the other western nations which signed The Hague convention have brought in legislation regarding air piracy, when will the minister be bringing forth a bill?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): In speaking about the introduction of legislation I said yesterday "very soon", or words to that effect. I may say it is my understanding that charges will be laid against the man in Calgary. There are available charges for unlawful interference with an aircraft in flight as well as kidnapping and so on under the Criminal Code. We have not been standing still. We have signed The Hague convention. We have also signed an international treaty in Montreal involving other offences against aircraft, including sabotage. We have negotiated a treaty with Cuba, an extradition treaty involving hijacking, and we are prepared to sign a treaty with the United States involving hijacking.

Mr. Woolliams: May I say with the greatest respect to the minister that it has been a year since we signed The Hague convention. Would he now refer Bill C-231, which I presented almost a year ago, to the officers of the Crown and if they approve it—it is drawn up in line with The Hague convention—would he then bring it forth as a government measure so that we will have some law in this land regarding air piracy?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): We will soon have some law. I want to draw to the attention of members of the House that when you deal with a matter such as hijacking, it is essential that both domestic and international law move forward together, and we have been moving them forward together.

Mr. Speaker: We are running short of time and I ask for the co-operation of hon. members to limit supplementary questions. These important subjects might be revived tomorrow. For the moment, I will recognize the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister which arises from a statement he made earlier in the question period relating to the government's concern and its intention to stop leaks of cabinet information to the press. In doing that, I wonder whether the government would consider allowing more cabinet information to leak to the House?

MEASURES TO ALLEVIATE PROSPECTIVE SPRING BUTTER SHORTAGE

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture, I would like to direct my question to his Parliamentary Secretary.

Can he indicate whether the Department of Agriculture and the Canadian Dairy Commission have taken steps to import butter in order to alleviate the shortage anticipited for next spring?

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, according to the answer given by the Minister of Agriculture to the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar on November 4, it is anticipated that the stocks of butter might not be adequate this winter and that it might perhaps be necessary to import that commodity in order to meet the consumption for eight or ten days.

And to clarify the minister's answer, I want to add that he meant it would take several weeks before we need to import butter. However, there is presently a world shortage of butter and in order to supply the Canadian market, the Canadian Dairy Commission is taking measures to make some imports—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think such an answer aims at giving the House general information and I remind the parliamentary secretary that such a statement should normally be made on motions.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): May I ask a supplementary, Mr. Speaker?

CANADIAN COASTGUARD

POSSIBLE RELOCATION OF COLLEGE—EFFECT ON EMPLOYMENT IN CAPE BRETON

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): My question is for the Minister of Transport. Is the minister in a position today to announce that the Canadian Coastguard College will be retained in its present very suitable location and will also include expanded training facilities?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I have great difficulty in giving such an assurance today to the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys, because I have not yet had an opportunity to give thorough study to the representations of his colleague, the hon. member for St. John's West, who wants me to move it to Argentia.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Muir: The fact that we have information the minister is considering removing the college from Sydney is probably the reason my colleague is interested, and I do not blame him. Now, may I pose a supplementary question? Could the minister advise the House whether he, himself, the government or anyone else in the Department of Transport has plans to remove, now or in the future, the Canadian Coastguard College from its present location?

• (4:10 p.m.)

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I have answered this question in a variety of ways before but, to reassure the hon. member, there are no immediate plans for the removal of the college. What is under way is a thorough re-examination of the role of the college, the kind of classes it will teach, and so on, with the hope that we can integrate this training into the college in view of the fact that at the present time it is costing something like $70,000 to graduate a cadet from the college.

Mr. Muir: One further supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We reached the end of the question period a few minutes ago, but perhaps the Chair might recognize the hon. member for a last supplementary and try to see one or two hon. members who have been gallantly trying to get the floor for the last 40 minutes.

Mr. Muir: Through you, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether, in view of the fact that there is 25 per cent unemployment at the present time in the island of Cape Breton and we have the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion setting up Devco to try to create employment, the minister realizes—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member ask the question?

Mr. Muir: Does the minister realize that removing this college from Cape Breton Island will cause greater unemployment and create more economic difficulty—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think that is argument or a submission for the consideration of the minister. The hon. member for Broadview.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

METRO DEVELOPMENT CENTRE, TORONTO—ALLEGED AGREEMENT TO DEMOLISH UNION STATION

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): My question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Has Canadian National Railways entered into an agreement with Metro Development Centre to sell Union Station in Toronto and, if so, does the federal government agree with the demolition of Union Station?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have some doubts whether this question is so urgent that it should not be placed on the order paper, but perhaps other questions of about the same degree of urgency have been asked, so the minister might be allowed to reply.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member I believe is aware that it is a consortium that is planning what is commonly referred to as Metro Centre. It has the full support of the government. We have given a good deal of assistance to the main parties concerned in order to get it going. One of the objectives is a new terminal, and I believe this involves the destruction of Union Station, but I would assume that the decision whether it is to be destroyed or not would be up to the municipal—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before we go on to orders of the day there might be time for a few quick supplementaries.

A while ago, the hon. member for Bellechasse wanted to ask a supplementary.

DAIRYING—IMPORTATION OF BUTTER—REQUEST FOR MODIFICATION OF INDUSTRIAL MILK PRODUCERS QUOTAS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture.

If Canada were to import butter in the coming months, would the Minister of Agriculture or the Canadian Dairy Commission be prepared to recommend changes in the manufacturing milk quotas in order to remove the penalty imposed on producers at this time?

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, this matter of the penalty with respect to quotas is under active consideration and if it becomes necessary to review it, it will be in due time and the minister will then be in a position to inform the House. But I must say to the hon. member that representatives of the agricultural industrial do not always necessarily agree on complete revisions—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to hon. members that we have run out of time. Perhaps, as I said a moment ago, we might pursue these questions when we meet again tomorrow. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed, from Monday, November 15, consideration in committee of Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act—Mr. Benson—Mr. Honey in the chair.

On Clause 1—Section 38: Meaning of Capital Gain and allowable capital Loss.

The Chairman: When the committee rose last evening section 38 was under consideration and together with other sections in that grouping, according to the agreement reached by members of the committee. The hon. member for Edmonton West had the floor. The Chair had earlier taken under advisement the amendment moved by the hon. member for Edmonton West and the Chair is now prepared to make a ruling. I understand that the hon. member for Edmonton West would like to complete his remarks, so I recognize him now.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, I think I have about four or five minutes available to me at this time. I want to refer to one result of the introduction of the capital gains tax which is in line with the recommendation of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, as well as the strongest possible exhortations from this side of the House. I refer to the suggestion that either the estate tax be done away with or that it be modified to a very considerable extent. It has now been suggested that this tax should be eliminated.

I was rather amused to note that at the Canadian Tax Foundation meetings in Vancouver there seems to have been considerable academic discussion at a panel on this particular matter. I am afraid I have not seen the original papers that were prepared but having heard some of the hon. gentlemen who spoke when they appeared before the finance committee on the white paper, I must say, and I have to be frank, I think I am hearing a lot of academic nonsense—a sort of ideology that is completely divorced from reality.

Mr. Bird and others who want to insist upon this so-called equity as between taxpayers can do so in theory until they are blue in the face, but it is the Canadian people who are being taxed, not just university academicians. Not one of them can stand up to the view of the Canadian public which has been expressed not only in briefs to the committee but in thousands of letters which indicates the public insists it does not care one whit about equity as between taxpayers; it wants equity between itself and the government with regard to tax matters. That is the point to be considered, and that is the point upon which I wish to make the next few remarks.

It is all very well for the government to say it is doing something very grand by removing the Estate Tax Act because of the introduction of the capital gains tax. We know there is to be a deemed realization upon property that passes at death. This leaves the field wide open to the provinces, the majority of which have succession duty acts. Two of the provinces have not said as yet that they intend to move to establish a succession duty act or their version of an estate tax act. However, I do not think they can put in an estate tax because of constitutional barriers to that type of tax.

Where does this leave the taxpayer? It leaves him worse off than before, absolutely worse off than before. If there were a provincial succession duty and an estate tax with mutually interchangeable credits so that the taxpayer was not paying double duty on death, that would be fine. But now there is a possibility of a capital gains tax which is to be added to the income tax. There is a succession duty to be levied by a province. Yet the capital gains tax cannot be used as an offset against the succession duty, the net result being that the estates in question are in danger of being taxed twice. Our friends to the left will say that they support this until it affects, say, the union worker. I wonder how this aspect will be regarded by the aristocracy of union workers whose wages have now taken them up into the middle income bracket. They accumulate estates. They are not all spendthrifts. Some of them live very well and, when they die, they leave estates. They are men of ability. They are not all spendthrifts, as I said, and they will be subject to this provision. I wonder what they will say when they must face this prospect of double taxation.

I say this, Mr. Chairman. In making these changes, the federal government must arrange with the provinces for a satisfactory system of credits whereby any capital gains tax shall be credited towards any succession duty that may be levied on the decease of a taxpayer. That is the point I want to emphasize. I know that other colleagues of mine will deal with this. I say, that is the only just and equitable position to adopt.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I think perhaps this might be the appropriate time to suggest that certain amendments to the bill, which were discussed by the House leaders of the parties opposite this morning and by the government House leader, be formally moved and entered into the record. I understand that has been the practice in the past or, at least, in the debate on this particular bill. The practice has been, I think, that amendments be not read but be taken as read. May I ask if consent for that procedure is forthcoming.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The parliamentary secretary asks for the amendments to be included in the record. The government House leader was not able to make reference to them and, therefore, they will be part of the record but arguments may be advanced to the Chair as to their admissibility.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is true.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I suggest, as I did suggest, that some of the arguments that applied to amendments presented before the committee may apply, certainly, to one of the amendments that is contained in the list that it is proposed to include in the record. They are not being opposed. It would profit us little to read them into the record and, perhaps a week hence, find that they may be out of order. The government then would have to start all over again.

Mr. Mahoney: I wonder then, to satisfy the situation, if they might be moved now without being read but printed as if they were read; and they might not be accepted by the Chair until tomorrow. That would give hon. members an opportunity to look at them and to raise any procedural objections they might have tomorrow. Some of the amendments are quite lengthy, as the hon. member is well aware.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Perhaps they could be entered into the record at present merely for purposes of record, so that everyone concerned would have notice of them. They might be moved tomorrow afternoon, and tomorrow a sundry collection of clauses is to be considered. In other words, the amendments could be moved and then we could argue their admissibility or otherwise.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the amendments could not just be handled in the same way as previous amendments were handled. I suggest that they be moved now, for the purpose of getting them on the record, but that it be understood by the Chair that their admissibility can still be challenged at the point when any of these amendments is actually called.

Mr. Bell: What? More amendments?

Mr. Mahoney: They come from a very flexible and accommodating government.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that the amendments which have been referred to by the parliamentary secretary be moved and become part of the Hansard record, it being understood by the Chair, of course,—and there is no question about this—that any question of their acceptability from the procedural standpoint is always open for hon. members.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Chairman: Moved by Mr. O'Connell that the amendments which have been referred to by hon. members in this discussion, subject always to the reservations I have mentioned be received and printed in Hansard.

Mr. O'Connell: I move:

The Chairman: Before I recognize any hon. members, I wish to say something. I indicated earlier that it would facilitate debate if I were to make a ruling on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Edmonton West which I took under advisement yesterday afternoon. After the ruling is made, debate can proceed.

Yesterday the hon. member for Edmonton West proposed an amendment in the following terms:

That paragraph (b) of section 3 as set forth in clause 1 of the said Bill be amended by inserting in lines 15 and 21 on page 2, immediately after the word "property" in each said line, the following:

"other than land used in farming as defined in this Act and"

At that time the Chair suggested that the proposed amendment might have the effect of shifting the incidence of taxation. The hon. member for Edmonton West dealt with this aspect when assisting on the procedural problem. I have had the opportunity to read his remarks in Hansard, to consider them in the context of authorities and I am persuaded on this point. It no longer gives me concern.

It might be appropriate at this time to suggest to the Committee that some difficulty arises for the Chair in determining the procedural acceptability of some amendments. As the Committee is aware, the House adopted an order to the effect that the ways and means motion which preceded this bill would be set aside. In effect, therefore, the basic ground rules have been altered and it follows that there is some difficulty in applying accepted practices in every case.

As the hon. member for Edmonton West suggested in his argument yesterday, a peculiar difficulty arises because of the arrangement of the bill. There is but one clause in the bill covering a great number of substantive proposals. In other circumstances it might be possible to isolate a major proposal and bring it to a vote. The Chair is of the opinion that the construction of the bill in many cases closes that avenue.

There is, of course, authority for the statement that, in certain circumstances, a provision which has the effect of alleviating taxation is open to amendment in the Committee to further alleviate the taxation. While I have some doubts as to whether or not I should put the proposed amendment, nevertheless, for the reasons mentioned and because, in such circumstances, I feel the Committee should be given the opportunity to decide the question, I am prepared to put the amendment.

The hon. member for Edmonton West moves:

That paragraph (b) of section 3 as set forth in clause 1 of the said Bill be amended by inserting in lines 15 and 21 on page 2, immediately after the word "property" in each said line, the following:

"other than land used in farming as defined in this Act and"

[Mr. O'Connell.]

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to debate the desirability or otherwise of imposing a capital gains tax in Canada at the present stage of its development, because I am enough of a realist to perceive that the government is determined to impose such a tax and it has a big enough majority to force that decision through in the course of time. Instead, I want to address my remarks to ways in which the present legislation could be improved considerably to make it, in my opinion, much more equitable than it now is.

The chief argument advanced for the imposition of a capital gains tax is the argument of equity: that the tax will produce a greater degree of justice, fairness and equity in taxation than is evident in our present taxation system under which capital gains are not taxed. The example most frequently quoted to try and justify this position is that of the lucky speculator in the stock market who has made $5,000, $10,000, $20,000 or perhaps more. This is not subject to taxation. Compared with the wage earner who is making $5,000 to $10,000 a year and has to pay taxes, this is an inequitable situation.

The other chief example quoted is that of the person who owns land on the outskirts of a city. As the city grows, this land is converted from farmland to city building lots. There is a very large increase in the value and the price he receives for it. There are a certain number of people who are lucky speculators. There are more who are unlucky and lose money on the stock market over the course of the years. There are a limited number of people who have made considerable amounts of money because the farmland they owned happened to be on the edge of a developing city. The numbers of people in both these classes are very small indeed.

As far as this bill is concerned, it is designed to catch those people. It will catch these people all right and make them subject to tax on their gains. However, at the same time it will catch and bear heavily on a very large proportion of Canadians and, in many cases, in a very inequitable manner. In my opinion, this legislation will produce more inequity than equity in taxation. I do not think anyone will argue against the cases I have mentioned. However, on the basis of equity, certainly as far as this bill is concerned, the basic argument of producing greater equity falls to the ground. I think it can be demonstrated that carrying into effect the provisions of this bill will produce far more inequity as far as the majority of the people of Canada are concerned than the situation that exists at the present time.

The amendment moved by the hon. member for Edmonton West, which I am very glad has been allowed, is a case in point. I support that amendment strongly. The average farmer bought his land on a time payment plan. The average farmer in the future will have to buy his land on a time payment plan, perhaps more often than has been the case in the past. After having mortgaged his land, he spends the greater part of his life making mortgage payments and buying the necessary machinery to keep his farm in operation. During that period, he receives a much lower income than the average salary or wage earner. At the end of his working career or when he dies, the returns from a lifetime of labour are available, namely, whatever increase has taken place in the value of his land. This is what his wages really are for a lifetime of work. In the meantime, he and his family have enjoyed a far poorer standard of living then the average wage or salary earner. Under this legislation, practically all farmers will have to pay 23 per cent or more of what they have accumulated in a different way from other people after a lifetime of labour.

To see that this is the situation, one need only look at the statistics since the inception of the income tax during the first great war. These statistics show that the great majority of farmers have never had enough income to pay income tax. Their wages, and thus their standard of living, were sufficiently low that they did not get into the income tax paying bracket. The number of them who have been income tax payers, and I have forgotten the figure at the present time, is remarkably small. This alone is sufficient to demonstrate that the income secured by these farmers was very much less than that secured by their fellow Canadians from governments, corporations and the like. It is inequitable that farmers, more so than any other group of people in this country, should now be subjected to a capital gains levy on what, to a large extent, is the result of a lifetime of hardship.

Another point of view, and I wish to place particular emphasis on this, is that to a large extent the increased value of land in this country is the result of inflation. Except in exceptional cases where the land is close to a city or something along that line, it is chiefly due to inflation. Therefore the apparent gain which farmers secure is not a real gain at all. The same situation applies to most other Canadians who will be taxed on their capital gains under this legislation. To a very large extent, their gain is not a real gain because of the effects of inflation; it is just an apparent gain.

I suggest that for a capital gains tax to be equitable, allowance must be made for inflation; that has not been done in this legislation. That alone is sufficient to condemn this system of calculating capital gains as an unfair system. I strongly suggest that the government should again take this matter under advisement and include an inflationary factor which would result in the tax being calculated on the real value of the capital asset, not its apparent value because of inflation. The tax should be applied only on the increase in value in terms of real buying power, rather than the inflated value which results from the loss of buying power of our Canadian dollar.

An hon. Member: That is not a just society.

Mr. Harkness: As the hon. member said, that is not a just society. This should be one of the main considerations. The type of taxation proposed in this bill is anything but just. As I said at the beginning, it will undoubtedly produce far more inequities for many more people than the inequities which it will cure.

This leads me to the consideration of the application of this tax to personal possessions such as pictures, jewellery, stamp and coin collections and anything else along that line. Their increase in value has been largely due to inflation; it is not a real increase in value at all. The purchasing power realized when people sell these possessions would, in many instances, be no greater than it was before they bought them. To the extent that increases in value have not been due to inflation, I suggest that such increases were less than the return would have been had the money used to purchase them been invested in stocks, bonds or other investments of that kind. Once again an extremely unjust situation arises if we tax as a capital gain any increase in the value of articles of this sort. It is true there is an exemption of $1,000 with respect to any single article in this category of personal possession and this does provide a good deal of relief. However, it does not by any means cover the situation as a whole. Once more, I have a suggestion to make in this regard.

I suggest there should be a lump sum exemption for all such articles taken as a group as of valuation day, and this exemption should be at least $50,000. Thus, a person with a picture worth $1,000 which may realize $2,000 when he sells it 10 years later on the break-up of a family home, or something along that line, will not be penalized by the capital gains tax. A provision of this sort would remove a great deal of the resentment and antagonism felt toward this legislation by a great many people in Canada who have a basic objection to these personal possessions, pictures, manuscripts and so on suddenly becoming subject to tax. Actually, I know a few people of quite modest means whose entire savings are invested in pictures and things of that sort. People in this position would be harshly penalized by the provisions of this bill as they exist at the present time.

I should like, now, to consider ways in which a better form of capital gains tax could be devised which would keep capable Canadians working in this country, retain highly trained business and professional men and encourage the establishment of new enterprises. One of the more important arguments against the imposition of any capital gains tax is that such a tax would discourage development in Canada. I think there is considerable validity in this argument. However, it is possible to devise a form of capital gains tax which would not have this effect. It would run roughly along these lines.

The type of capital gains tax I prefer would be designed to tax the traders but not the legitimate investors who make risk-taking possible. If we accept that a capital gain on an investment in a Canadian corporation acquired and sold within one year would be taxable at 25 per cent, I would suggest that the capital gains tax on investments held beyond one year should slide off progressively at the rate of 2½ per cent per year to zero in 10 years. If greater investment incentive is required, the tax could slide off to zero over a five-year period.

This arrangement would apply to all capital gains on shares of all Canadian corporations, on family corporations and even on real estate. This proposal should deter short-term speculation—which does very little for the economy—and would encourage longer term investment by Canadians in their own future. Losses on investment should be deductible only from capital gains with the same percentages applied in respect to length of ownership. Furthermore, in order to discourage Canadians from investing in foreign corporations and to channel their investment funds instead into Canadian enterprises, I would suggest that investments by Canadians in non-Canadian corporations should be subject to the full capital gains tax without any sliding scale reduction.

Great concern has been expressed in recent years over the extent to which the Canadian economy has been dominated by foreign companies. All the questions and to-do we have heard in the last two days over the so-called Gray Report release and so on have been related to this subject. It is one which very much affects Canadians as a whole. But the application of a capital gains tax of the kind I have suggested would go a long way to correcting this situation in the future. I am surprised that this opportunity has been neglected by the government in its tax proposals now before us. They set up a task force to look into ways of keeping Canadian investment inside Canada to a great extent, and to consider means of preventing a further take-over of our natural and manufacturing resources by foreigners, then they completely neglect the possible opportunity to achieve those very ends through the careful application of a capital gains tax.

I might add that this idea as to the form of a capital gains tax is not original with me. Others have put it forward. I happen to know it was put directly to the Minister of Finance, and I am surprised he has not taken action to introduce provisions along these lines in the legislation. It is still not too late for him to do so, and I still hope the government will bring in amendments giving effect to the suggestions I have made so that capital gains tax legislation in this country will be more equitable than it would be as presently proposed and so that it might also serve the purpose of channelling Canadian enterprise and money into new Canadian businesses and thus stimulate an increase in the growth of the economy generally.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the introduction of a capital gains tax is probably the most significant part of the tax bill before us. I think it can still be said that the economic and investment consequences of adopting a capital gains tax are still debatable. Economists differ in their opinions, and the discussions which took place in committee when considering the white paper were most interesting in this regard. There is no doubt that any tax which reduces returns to investors after taxation must result in a lessening of incentive. It is generally conceded that the burden of the capital gains tax will fall on savings to some extent. On the other hand, there are those who point to the fact that in the United States, where a capital gains tax has been in existence for a long time, investment has not been adversely affected.

But in applying such a tax in Canada, if we hope to avoid unfortunate consequences, two assumptions must be made. The first is that despite higher taxation the economy will remain as buoyant as it was before, and, second, that the Canadian proposals will result in a system comparable to that in operation in the United States. We have to accept that probably the first assumption is highly dubious, particularly at a time when everyone tells us about the enormous number of jobs that need to be created. Speaking of the United States, for nearly 30 years U.S. taxpayers in the higher income brackets have enjoyed a very significant differential as between short and long-term rates. The 25 per cent long-term rate is highly preferential and of considerable benefit to those in the higher income brackets in the United States.

The adverse effect of the tax in the United States has been the exemption from capital gains tax of assets held until death, when revaluation to the benefit of the legatee takes place. This has been called a major loophole and has been used highly successfully. Since wealth and age tend to go together, families have been able to pass on closely held corporations at death without liability for tax. There has been some argument whether this has a locked-in effect, and it is not clear whether it has or not. According to the legislation before us, presumably this loophole would be blocked. In the United Kingdom, after five years or so of a capital gains tax, some psychological effect of being locked in is still evident.

When speaking of capital gains tax, we have to remember that this is the linchpin of our new income tax base. It constitutes a fundamental redefinition of our personal and corporate tax base, and also compromises a significant element in the estimated revenue resulting from the proposed changes. Third, these proposals, in effect, will change the ownership of wealth and, in the long run, will have significant redistributive effects so far as income is concerned.

During the white paper hearings, the government relied heavily on the United States estimate of the amount of taxation brought in by a capital gains tax. It is likely that there will be a considerable difference between what the United States derives from a capital gains tax and what will be derived from the proposed tax in Canada. There is implicit in many people's minds the belief that the implementation of a capital gains tax will have no great effect on taxpayers generally in view of their manner of working and their investment behaviour. Such a belief depends heavily upon economic theorizing and has really been misplaced in the real world. As the hon. member for Edmonton West has said, people do not necessarily react the way they are expected to react.

One of the great problems with a capital gains tax is its impact on inflation. While the term "equity" means one thing to the academic, it may mean something else to the taxpayer who will be highly conscious of any impact the tax has on inflation and on his own affairs. It is for this reason that most governments which tax capital gains adopt either a low preferential rate or they ignore gains realized after a given holding period; for example, in Germany it is after two years, in Italy after six years and in Sweden after ten years. Other countries use the inflation index to adjust capital gains, as in Belgium, France and Brazil. So, it is most important that these matters be looked at.

Ignoring for the moment these economic weaknesses, it might be argued that the inclusion of the capital gains tax would increase equity. In the long run, a capital gains tax is often the reverse of equity and may be impracticable. In consequence, therefore, changes in the treatment of capital gains will inevitably be introduced on an ad hoc basis and will no longer be designed to fit the integrated package contained in the tax bill.

Another aspect of a capital gains tax relates to capital losses, which under the proposed legislation will be deducted from the capital gain. In the case of losses that are greater than the original capital investment, the maximum deduction will be $1,000 a year. This means that the federal government would not be able to afford losing revenue if a large capital loss was sustained, or if the stock market depreciated.

While on the subject of implementing a capital gains tax, may I quote from the United States Congressional study of federal income tax treatment of capital gains and losses of June 1951:

> Congress has tried time and time again to find a method both practicable and equitable of taxing capital gains. Such a method has been conceived to be one which would interfere as little as possible with the realization of gains and at the same time would not stimulate loss realization too much. But finding satisfactory formulae for achieving the divergent equity and incentive objectives that are entwined in the philosophy of capital gains taxation and at the same time protecting the revenue has been a difficult problem. Consequently the history of the legal provisions has been a record of compromise and change without satisfactory solutions.

Even so, the present complications of the U.S. treatment of capital gains stem less from the actual design of the tax than from the attitudes of Congress toward taxation. During the past quarter of a century the United States has sought to moderate the excessive top rates of income tax by providing, in effect, a whole series of loopholes whereby ordinary income could be converted into capital gains. Once this practice had started, initially perhaps with some justification, it became virtually impossible not to extend the range of such preferences and, at the same time, to open up new loopholes for tax avoidance.

In the meetings currently being held in Vancouver by the Canadian Tax Foundation, the question of a capital gains tax has been raised. According to a report in this morning's Globe and Mail, it was pointed out that it is very difficult to define what is capital and what is income. Up until now capital gains have been tax free, though there has been a tendency for revenue officials and for judges who hear tax cases steadily to encroach upon this freedom and to include capital gains within income. If the government introduces a capital gains tax I think we can expect a reversion back to the original attitude. In other words, where the line is shadowy there could be a movement away from regarding it as income. On the other hand, what is now considered to be income might well come to be regarded as a capital gain, so the taxpayer would have to pay some tax to the federal treasury and this would be regarded as a satisfactory solution. In this sense, it may well be that the capital gains tax is not going to bring in as much money as we have been led to believe, because what is now considered to be income will in many cases be considered a capital gain.

Problems connected with a capital gains tax are largely considered in three ways. First, how do we attain equity of administration? In many cases there must be arbitrary administration in respect of capital gain. In fact, the tax should be on accrued gains, but the practice is it can only be on realized gains. We also have the problem of so-called bunched gains. In some cases capital gains may be realized in one year, while in other cases the capital gain may have accrued over a period of 20 years, but the individual has to pay the tax as though it was gained in the one year. This individual should receive some recognition of the fact that his assets took 20 years to be obtained. Finally, there is the problem of capital gains in relation to losses, which I mentioned before.

During the hearings on the white paper on taxation Professor Ilersic of Vancouver, who has a great deal of experience in respect of these matters in the United Kingdom, had this to say:

> It is in respect of land, in respect of real property, real estate, and also other assets which are not normally regularly valued, where difficulties arise. And most important of all, it is particularly difficult to value shareholdings in private companies, or closely held corporations. This is the biggest problem, and what has happened is that as far as the estate duty office is concerned now, the volume of work involved has substantially increased.

He was speaking of the United Kingdom and the problems there. The problems in respect of capital gains seem to be far-reaching and will be much more basic to our economy and tax structure than we think, because presently this brings in little actual revenue. The one great mistake the government is making in this bill is its failure to differentiate between long and short-term gains. For those who are willing to invest in long-term ventures and hold their investments for five or more years there may well be no capital gain. Those who invest for a short-term, for a year, perhaps should pay full tax, and so on, using the sliding scale suggested by the hon. member for Calgary Centre. Because there is no differentiation between long and short-term gains, this bill is deficient. The implications are quite clear. The effect of this will be, to some extent, a deterrent to investment.

Another thing that has been overlooked is the effect of the federal government moving out of the estate tax field. I think it must do so in order to bring in a capital gains tax and deemed realization on death. There has been no provision made for the provinces to work out some arrangement. It is almost certain that if the provinces are to get money from estate taxes, including my own province of Manitoba, they will have to levy heavy estate taxes which, combined with deemed realization on death, will mean that most estates will carry a heavy taxation load. It seems the government has been deficient in not clarifying what might happen when it vacates the estates tax field and brings in deemed realization on death by way of a capital gains tax.

One of the effects likely to flow from the combined impact of a capital gains tax and succession duties, if instituted in some provinces, is an incentive to foreign ownership of Canadian ranches and farms. Up to the present time, foreign ownership of Canadian land, as far as ranches and farms are concerned, has been minimal. Foreign ownership has been involved in our natural resources, and so on, but if the deemed realization on death, and estate taxes, continue to be levied by the provinces this will certainly mean that foreign owners will be in a position to avoid capital gains and succession duties within the framework of the law. To this extent Canadian farmers will be in an extremely disadvantaged position in competing with foreigners for Canadian farms. I think the federal government should, before it institutes a capital gains tax, work out some formula with the provinces in order that the two taxes will not cause a loss of revenue to the provinces, and so there will not be a vast jungle created with the institution of a capital gains tax and the institution of estate tax, especially in respect of farms and investment.

These problems in respect of capital gains tax are important. The government has not differentiated between long and short-term capital gain; it has not worked out with the provinces this problem of dual taxation on estates at death either by capital gains deemed realization or estate tax, and this will create a tax jungle. Furthermore, in respect of farm land, and I now speak to the amendment by the hon. member for Edmonton West, I hope the government will consider this seriously and accept it. With the deemed realization at death and estate taxes in many provinces, farm estates will face an almost impossible situation. In many cases individuals concerned will not be able to carry on. The estates will not be able to turn the property over from one member of the family to the next. I seriously commend to the government this amendment for consideration and I hope some action can be taken.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose)—Public Service—Request for publication of report of Staff Relations Committee—implementation of recommendations; the hon. member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Valade)—Labour conditions—Quebec—unemployment forecasts; the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland)—Fisheries—Federal government participation with Manitoba in income support and retraining plan for Lake Winnipeg fishermen.

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Chairman, I have a few remarks to make about the section under study, the purpose of which is to make part of a taxpayer's capital gains taxable.

In this respect, the bill, if it were to go through as it is written at present, would certainly be unfair to small property owners—those who have had to take a 9 3/4, 10, 10¼, or even 10 3/4 per cent mortgage in order to buy, or have built, a multiple-unit house.

The question is: what is a capital gain? Is it the difference between the price paid for the house and the current sale price? If somebody bought a multiple-unit house 10 years ago, and now sells it for 25 per cent more than what he paid for it then, he is not making a profit: it is a capital loss rather than a capital gain. With the progress of inflation these last few years, I think it will be very difficult for the taxpayer to determine what a capital gain really is. Perhaps I would agree with the principle of the bill, that is to tax part of the capital gain, if the rate of inflation and the time the owner has owned the house were taken into consideration in the bill.

I would not want individuals to be considered on the same footing as real estate agents, for example, who make a living out of accumulated profits, one transaction after another, who can make 50 transactions a year. An individual who would realize a capital gain on the first or second transaction, during one year, should not pay income tax.

I would like to see some protection for the small owner with a bit of cash who borrowed money to buy a small apartment house and who, at the time of the transaction has already made a profit because in order that a house be worth buying or building, a reasonable profit margin must be expected, granted the fact that before this tax reform, capital gains were not taxable, the effect of which was to maintain rents at a reasonable level.

Taxing part of capital gains will contribute to increase the cost of lodgings. Low income people will still be footing the bill because owners will obviously have to make profits, otherwise they will not invest. If they fail to invest there will be fewer housing starts, more unemployment and the whole economy will suffer.

As for a capital gains tax on a family farm, I completely agree with the hon. member for Edmonton-West (Mr. Lambert). In fact, if a man who has owned a house or a farm for 10, 12, 15 or 25 years puts it up for sale and if the capital gain is taxable, this will not encourage those who intend to buy that family farm.

It is imperative that this bill make a difference between capital gains on long and short term investments. Furthermore, we should devise a method for figuring out the real profit in terms of capital gains.

[English]

Mr. Flemming: Mr. Chairman, my first thought in rising is to refer to the speech delivered by my hon. friend, my seatmate, a few minutes ago. My general hope is that the parliamentary secretary will carry the message to the government that was conveyed so ably to the House by my seatmate. I believe many valuable suggestions were made by him. I almost had the idea of getting up and saying "amen" two or three times to the speech of my hon. friend from Calgary Centre. However, since I am on my feet, perhaps I should make a few observations.

First of all, I wish to speak on the general idea of taxation. I believe taxation, and the means of imposing it, are very dangerous weapons. In general terms, I do not believe it should be considered desirable to impose taxes. Taxes are dressed up and called revenue, but really this amounts to taxation because something is being taken from people. So, while in the course of these remarks I do not intend to indicate any tremendous proposition in respect of capital gains compared to other taxes, I do propose to attempt to convince the House, and especially my hon. friend from Calgary South, the parliamentary secretary on one or two points.

I must say at this point that the parliamentary secretary has been most faithful in his attendance here during this debate. He has indicated a great knowledge of the subject, and I should like to pay him that tribute here and now. It would seem to me that a capital gains tax must discourage people. These remarks are directed especially to younger people. I believe it is a good thing to encourage people to invest their money. It is good to encourage them to save a few dollars when they have a pay cheque and can afford to do so. However, I think it is also good to encourage them to buy something which they consider to be good value from someone who has it to sell, especially when they think that sooner or later the value will increase.

Speculators have been spoken of here as though they were public enemies. I do not subscribe to such a philosophy.

About a month ago the government announced its intention to reduce taxation. It was said that this would stimulate employment. Well, if a stimulation of employment comes about through a reduction in taxation, as was stated in this House by the Minister of Finance, then surely it is consistent for us to point out the weaknesses in the proposal to now impose a new tax, because this is a new tax. It is something which we have never had before in this country. I refer to a tax on capital gains.

In a previous speech I referred to the fact that I believed the existing statute under which we impose income tax might very well have been retained, if not in its entirety at least to an extent, by this government for whom I have only a minimum respect. The present income tax statute has some good, fundamental points. So, it would seem to me to be a good idea to retain the good points. Instead of this, however, the government gives us this three-inch document of 700 or 800 pages which no one understands very well and which I submit will cause a great deal of confusion in the minds of even the chartered accountants who will be involved with it.

I made those few remarks a month or so ago in connection with that point, and I repeat them now because nothing has happened since that time to make me change my mind. In fact, I believe that an examination of the present economic situation in this country leads me to be more convinced than ever that it would have been beneficial to retain the existing income tax statute as a base, adding to it or taking away from it whenever it is considered to be in the general public interest.

In considering the basis for taxing capital gain, surely we might properly go back over a 100 year period to see what the situation has been in that time. Under the existing statutes we have become an industrial nation, we have become an exporting nation and we have become a competitive nation. Living as we do alongside a great nation and a great people we should, and we have, at least until the coming into office of the Trudeau government, found ourselves facing tough competition from those same friends to the south who have the benefit of mass production, and a home market of immense proportions where they can dispose of a large percentage of their total production. In case of need, they can dispose of their surplus in our limited market. I do not favour tariff laws which make it possible for them to do this. So let us examine the record and see what has taken place in the last 100 years under the existing tax laws.

Let us consider in particular the last 25 years so that we may have the benefit of our experience in determining our course for the future. That seems to me to be very sensible. We should use the experience of the past in determining our course for the future. I am sure that no one within sound of my voice will argue that that is not a very desirable position to take. When I mention 25 years in general terms, I go back to the Second World War. In that war Canadians played an important and impressive part, and our fighting men and women came out of it with their heads held high. The honour and the sacrifice of those brave men and women who made up the personnel of those armed forces had not then and has never been excelled. Last week we observed Remembrance Day. All over the land we united, something which we seldom do. What united us? We united in remembrance, recognition and appreciation of what had been done in the past. We appreciated the sacrifice which they had made, those who did not return, and we expressed thankfulness to those who marched that day, for their bravery and devotion to duty in placing their services at the disposal of their country. We came out of the conflict with our reputation established, and we set to work to utilize the skills of our people in transforming and making peacetime operations out of wartime machinery. That is what we did after the Second World War.

The government of that day was very conscious of the need to utilize the skills of those who had produced the goods required for war purposes and to utilize the services of the men and women as they returned from the various theatres of war. The need for productive employment became evident. The key figure who had been in charge of war production was Mr. C. D. Howe, a man of tremendous ability and drive. I do not think that enough attention is paid to the drive and determination of an individual to do something. To me this is more important than ability and more important than education. Mr. Howe carried on under Prime Minister King and he was a key figure in the government of Mr. St. Laurent. I had the honour of knowing him personally, since he spent a portion of his free time in St. Andrew's, New Brunswick. No one could be exposed to his personality without developing an admiration for him.

The reason I mention all these things is that they were accomplished during the last 25 years under the present Income Tax Act, and yet this government suggests that they must destroy it and replace it with this three inch thick document which no one understands. That is what they propose to do. I am very much against the destruction of the statute under which we have operated during a period in which this country made great headway. That is what I object to here and now.

The capital gains tax would discourage the young man who wants to improve his financial position. He is ambitous for himself, for his wife and for his family. He is willing to work long hours beyond the call of duty when his competitors have gone home. He applies good management principles to his operation. He buys a piece of property which he feels is good value and which will enhance his capital position. The government wants to tax him because he was wise enough and thrifty enough to purchase a piece of property when it was offered to him. The government, by taking a large chunk of whatever he happens to make by way of profit, will discourage him from buying property.

I know that if the parliamentary secretary were to offer an excuse, he would say that the government must impose taxes because they need the revenue. I know that I am putting words in the parliamentary secretary's mouth, but I imagine that this is what he would say because he is quite a good debater. I want to call the attention of the committee to the Auditor General's report for the year ending 1970. On page 17 of that report, hon. members will find a review of the revenue of the last three years, all properly comparable so far as I know. The first item is the amount received from personal income taxes in the years 1967-68, 1968-69, and 1969-70. I want to put on the record the differences in the amounts of revenue derived in these years, because I wish to establish in the mind of the parliamentary secretary and in the minds of government members, the idea that had they managed the affairs of the people of this country as they should have managed them there would be no need for a capital gains tax. That is my point.

Mr. Crouse: Hear, hear!

Mr. Flemming: I will give round figures. The revenue from the personal income tax in the year 1967-68 produced $2,800,000,000. The next year, it was $3,300,000,000, and the next year, in 1970, it was four billion and nearly one hundred million dollars. The point I am making is that there has been a tremendous increase of roughly 20 per cent in both these years. In other words, between the first and the last years for which I quoted figures there has been an increase of 40 per cent. Yet, the government says they must have more money.

Let us consider the corporation income tax. My remarks are in rebuttal of the so-called need for more tax revenue. Corporation tax in the year ending March 31, 1968, was $1,600 million, in the year ending March 31, 1969, in round figures it was $2 billion, and the next year ending March 31, 1970, it was $2,611 million. This is almost the same percentage of increase. All through the figures that I am referring to there is roughly the same percentage increase. That is why I say there is no need for a capital gains tax.

Income tax on dividends, interest, etc. going abroad in the first year that I mentioned was $220 million, the next year it was down to $205 million and in the year ending March 31, 1970, it was $248 million. Social development tax, whatever that is, for the year ending March 31, 1969, was $63 million, but for the year ending March 31, 1970, it went up to $476 million. From $63 million to $476 million. I do not know the explanation for that, but I do know that $476 million is much more than $63 million.

Then we come to sales tax and there is not very much difference there. It seems as though personal income tax and corporate taxes show the largest percentage increase and the largest amounts. We have never had any explanation from the government for these increased revenues. Revenue, as I said at the outset, is really a matter of taxation. The government can dress it up and call it revenue, but it is really taxation. On the same page of the Auditor General's report we find that the total revenue for the year ending March 31, 1968, was $9,001,716,000, and for the year ending March 31, 1969, it was $10,162,843,000, in round figures. That is an increase of 9 per cent to 10 per cent. For the year ending March 31, 1970, the total was $12,323,845,000. We might be very impressed with these figures, Mr. Chairman, were it not for the fact that the government is asking for authority to impose more taxation because they say they need it and must have it. I say we need an explanation from this government and I am sure everyone will agree with that statement.

It is often emphasized that there is a capital gains tax in the United States, but I say that is not any reason why there should be one in Canada. I say that because Canada is largely an undeveloped nation. We need to encourage people to invest money here, so-called risk capital. That is what it is. If I had the time and the House was willing to listen, I could name businesses that have been carried on with foreign capital simply because they could not get a bank loan in Canada. But it is said that because the United States has a capital gains tax, Canada should have one. But the United States is a developed country and we are not, so the same principle does not apply. It is an entirely different situation in Canada and it is no argument that we should have this tax because they have it. We need risk capital and we should not discourage it.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member, but I must advise him that his time has expired and unless he receives permission of the committee he will be unable to continue his remarks. Does the committee give the hon. member permission to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Flemming: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and members for this consideration. I shall try not to be too long. I want to say a word or two about small businesses. To my certain knowledge many people, sometimes just a man and wife, carry on a small business. They work long hours and take very little out of the business except their bare expenses. They try to improve their property chiefly from money which under ordinary circumstances would give them an increase in salary. At the end of 25, 30 or sometimes even 40 years they decide to take it a little easier. The only way they can realize funds is by selling the property. Now this government suggests that if these people sell the property for $100,000 they will take 30 per cent or 40 per cent of it. I submit that this does not make for good citizenship and it does not encourage people who are the salt of the earth and who built the country.

As my hon. friend from Dauphin and my hon. friend from Calgary Centre have said—I hope the parliamentary secretary will take this into consideration—I, too, think that the government should recognize the difference between short-term speculators and long-term investors so far as capital gains are concerned. There is a great difference. I do not know that I have any great criticism of a capital gains tax on speculation. If a person is lucky, I think that is all right. But the person who puts money into a valuable property, improves it and maybe 15 or 30 years hence sells it, should not be penalized. That is my feeling on this subject.

I should like to make a few remarks on the whole question of foreign ownership. It seems to me that the ownership of business is really not very important as long as the owners abide by the laws of the country. I fail to see a great deal of difference between foreign ownership and ownership by our own people. I will say, and I know whereof I speak, that if we in the Maritimes did not have the market to the south of us, we would find it very difficult to get along; there is no question about that.

The government's action in discouraging foreign capital can be interpreted as suggesting that people coming to invest in Canada have the smallpox and should be avoided as we would avoid the plague or, alternatively, that we have more capital than we need and we must keep them out. That is the idea that comes to one from some of the things for which this government seems to stand.

I was speaking about short-term versus long-term considerations. In my opinion we need to harness our resources. We will never solve the unemployment problem of this country through government action alone. We must harness the private enterpriser so that he may employ people. We must encourage him to do that. We must harness all the resources we have, including human resources, and stimulate productivity. Incentives should be provided. We must fully utilize all our resources and encourage, not discourage, such utilization.

I do not say how I will vote. I will probably vote for what the government thinks is best. After all, we must carry on; we must keep going. I merely wanted to point out these things. I appreciate the extra time and consideration that has been extended to me and I thank members of the committee.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of interest to the speech of the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte. We were treated to the courtly, courteous and classic brand of Conservatism that we expect from him. There was, however, one area where I felt that perhaps he may have assumed something that was not entirely justified. He assumed, it seems to me, that somehow or other the capital gains tax would be piled on top of other taxes, that this was to be a source of revenue that would be an increased tax burden for Canadians on an over-all basis and that it would be an added burden to the corporation and income taxes that they have been paying in the past.

I would respectfully direct his attention to chapter 8 of the summary of the tax reform legislation which deals with the revenue consequences of the whole tax reform package. I would most particularly point out that this does not take into account subsequent tax reductions which have been announced by the Minister of Finance. It merely deals with the revenue changes flowing from the tax reform package announced in the June 18 budget and now reflected in the bill before the committee.

I note that although these changes will amount to a net increase in revenue from corporation taxes of $30 million, and that changes with respect to withholding taxes will increase revenues by $5 million, the various changes relating to individuals—that is, the increase in exemptions, the employment expenses allowances and the babysitting deduction, if I can use that expression—will result in a reduction, under this package, in personal income taxes of $290 million. Of course, the elimination of estate and gift taxes will reduce federal revenues by $65 million. In total, the package means a revenue reduction of $320 million in the income, estate and gift tax areas. The capital gains tax, it is estimated, will result in increased revenue of $50 million from corporations and $80 million from individuals. But this was all taken into account in this whole package and the net reduction in revenues is indeed significant.

I should also point out that the progressive reductions in marginal rates of tax from 17 per cent to 6 per cent for individuals and from 50 per cent to 46 per cent for corporations over the period to 1976 are designed to hold the government's revenues at the current year's level as the capital gains system matures. I am sure the hon. member would not want to leave the impression that the capital gains tax is simply being piled on top of other tax sources, that these other taxes have not been modified in order to take into account the government's real revenue position and that the capital gains tax is simply a device to bring increased revenues to the government.

Mr. Flemming: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the parliamentary secretary a question? Has the government any assurance that when it vacates the succession duties and the estate tax field, the provinces will not move in, so that the net result will be the imposition of additional taxes on some taxpayers?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, on the contrary. We have indications that a number of provinces intend to replace the revenues they will be deprived of as a result of our discontinuing estate and gift taxes. It has been indicated to us that the three provinces that presently levy succession duties, Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia, will continue to do so. However, the whole package, federally and provincially, still involves as far as we are aware a very significant reduction in revenues. It is in the order of $320 million.

I suggest that it is inconceivable that the provinces, including those which do not at present levy succession duties but are considering entering the succession duty field, would in their levies come anywhere near this revenue figure. One of the conditions that the federal government has suggested to them as a criterion for its agreeing to collect these provincial taxes, if the provinces should indicate a desire for this to be done, is that the succession duty levies adopted by them ought to be, generally, at the level of succession duties imposed in the three provinces of Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia which presently impose these taxes. There is no way in which the succession duties being contemplated by provinces newly entering the field would come anywhere near making up the difference that I indicated earlier.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Chairman, could I ask a question? Was there not an understanding among the federal government and the provinces that as a result of withdrawing from the estate tax field the provinces would not lose any revenue? I understand that the provinces are very concerned about the loss of revenue which they will suffer. They, in turn, must take action to enter the estate tax field in order to recoup revenues lost through federal government action. Could the parliamentary secretary explain that situation a little better?

This seems to be one of the matters that is deeply troubling provincial ministers of finance. It has been debated, I understand, at the conference held in Ottawa and attended by the finance ministers, the Prime Minister and members of the cabinet. This matter is of crucial importance to my province. It has been indicated that the provincial government will enter the estate tax field in order to recoup some of the revenue lost through federal action. The taxes that they must impose will in the end place an even greater burden on the taxpayers of Nova Scotia since, as the hon. member just said, the same people, in the final analysis, pay taxes to both the federal and the provincial government.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, there was no undertaking to the provinces with respect to the revenues that they might lose as a result of the federal government's discontinuing the collection of estate taxes and paying 75 per cent of those to the provinces. There was a revenue guarantee—I think the hon. member will appreciate that the federal government retained all the gift taxes and that these were not shared with the provinces—with respect to the income tax the provincial governments might lose as a result of the very substantial reduction in income tax that is involved in the tax reform package.

The revenue guarantee was initially offered for three years, which was subsequently extended to five years, and provided that no province which chose to conform its system to the system we are proposing and have the federal government continue to collect income tax as we do under the present system, would lose any income tax revenue as a result, provided that the rates of income tax they impose do not exceed a formula based on their existing rates of taxation. Subject to modifications, that formula is a factor of 30.5 as the numerator and 28 as the denominator applied to the existing provincial tax rates.

In the case of a province such as Ontario which levies a tax of 28 per cent of the federal tax, that figure would now become 30.5 per cent. In the case of a province such as Manitoba which has a current income tax rate of 39 per cent, the figure would be higher; I believe it would be 42.5 or 43 per cent. It is an arithmetical calculation which the hon. member can make. I reiterate, there was no undertaking with regard to lost revenues in so far as estate tax is concerned.

Mr. Flemming: Mr. Chairman, I wish to direct one more question to the parliamentary secretary. If, for example, the province of New Brunswick goes into the succession duty or gift tax fields vacated by the federal government, would it not be proper to say that the taxation in that province will be increased by the amount of the capital gains tax?

Mr. Mahoney: Not necessarily. Indeed, it probably would not because the federal taxation in that province would be significantly reduced because of the reduction in personal income tax that would also be involved in the province.

Mr. Stewart (Marquette): Mr. Chairman, I believe that all aspects of capital gains tax as it applies to agriculture should be withdrawn from this legislation. When the Minister of Finance originally introduced the white paper there were many protests with regard to the proposed increases in estate taxes. I was pleased when the minister withdrew these proposals and announced that the federal government was withdrawing from the estate tax field. However, with these proposals on capital gains, plus the fact that in Manitoba the NDP government wants to introduce a provincial estate tax, the farmer will definitely face double taxation. It could well mean the end of the family farm.

[Mr. Crouse.]

An hon. Member: This would only affect the people of south Winnipeg.

Mr. Stewart (Marquette): An hon. member to my left said it will only affect the people in south Winnipeg. However, judging by the statements that have been made by the Manitoba government I am sure it will get to the family farm as we know it. The Premier of Manitoba announced that the provincial government's loss will be $5 million which will have to be recovered by their share of estate taxes. Last year the Department of National Revenue in Manitoba collected $2,900,000 in estate taxes. Manitoba received three quarters of this, in the neighbourhood of $2 million. The government of Manitoba will need a very healthy estate tax plan if they intend to collect this $5 million.

At this time the family farm needs every possible encouragement if it is to survive. It is vital to our rural areas. It balances the whole economy, particularly in western Canada. In my view the biggest blow to the farmer will be capital gains on recaptured depreciation. I was in the farm implement business for 15 years and I have some very strong opinions on this subject. I wish to give some examples of how recaptured depreciation will affect our farmers in respect of all types of equipment. For example, I will use a popular make of tractor such as the model 4020 John Deere. This tractor has been on the market for seven years. As a rule a farmer will have it fully depreciated. However, because of the high price of new farm machinery, when he decides to sell this tractor it will still sell for between $6,000 and $7,000. The farmer must show this amount as recaptured depreciation. Under the present proposals, 50 per cent of this amount must be shown as taxable income on his next year's tax return. This is really just a book figure. We all know of the shortage of cash at this time in most rural areas of Canada. Members can check the value of all makes of tractors. I have used the John Deere 4020 as an example.

Another example is the Super 92 Massey-Ferguson combine. These machines have been out of production for ten years. Because of the high price of new farm machinery this combine will still bring $6,000 to a farmer as a trade-in allowance. Here again, he must declare $3,000 of this as taxable income.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair. The committee will meet again at eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Chairman: Order. May I suggest that the committee rise, report progress and request leave to sit again later this day? It is the understanding of the Chair that Mr. Speaker wishes to rule on a question of privilege raised earlier this day by the hon. member for York South. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

PRIVILEGE

MR. LEWIS—ALLEGED MISLEADING ANSWERS BY ACTING PRIME MINISTER CONCERNING DECISION ON FOREIGN OWNERSHIP POLICY—RULING BY MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: As hon. members know, a question of privilege was raised earlier today. The Chair undertook at that time to look into the matter and make a ruling later.

The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) raised a question of privilege and proposed for the consideration of a Standing Committee of the House what he termed the discrepancies between statements made to the House by the Acting Prime Minister and the contents of a document published in a newspaper. The hon. member referred to answers made in the House yesterday by the Acting Prime Minister to the effect that no decision had been reached by cabinet in reference to certain matters. He then argued that the existence of the document published by the newspaper conflicts with the Acting Prime Minister's statements.

Does this constitute a question of privilege? I said earlier today that there had been no opportunity to review the precedents. This has been done in the intervening hours. A close review of the records of the House has been carried out in an attempt to find a precedent or precedents which might support the hon. member's contention that in the stated circumstances there might be a prima facie question of privilege.

On the contrary, the pertinent precedents tend to establish in the main that statements made outside the House, or documents published elsewhere, ought not to be used for the purpose of questioning statements made in this chamber by hon. members from either side of the House. I refer, for example, to certain decisions of the Chair which may be found recorded in Hansard of February 14, 1938, at page 382; in Hansard of July 3, 1952, at page 4162 and in Hansard of December 21, 1951, at page 2346. There are many other precedents more or less on the point, which might be quoted by the Chair.

Hon. members will allow the Chair once again to refer to citation 113 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition as follows:

> A dispute arising between two members as to allegations of facts does not fulfil the condition of parliamentary privilege.

With respect, I suggest to the hon. member for York South that the point he has raised is much more a matter of debate than it is one of privilege. I must therefore rule that there is no prima facie question of privilege which would enable the Chair to put the motion proposed by the hon. member for York South.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequent upon the amendments to that act—Mr. Benson—Mr. Honey in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose, section 3 was under consideration, with an amendment to paragraph (b) proposed by the hon. member for Edmonton West. Shall the amendment carry?

On clause 1—section 38: Meaning of taxable capital gain and allowable capital loss.

Mr. Stewart (Marquette): Mr. Chairman, before six o'clock I was drawing attention to the detrimental effect which the proposals before us dealing with the application of capital gains tax to farm machinery would necessarily have on the whole farm economy. I was showing just how hard this would hit the farmer, using different lines of machinery by way of illustration. I used as an example the 4020 John Deere tractor, a popular model used by many farmers across Canada.

Since most farmers need combines, I used as a further example the Massey-Ferguson Super 92 combine. This combine has not been produced for the last nine years. If a farmer trades in a machine of this type today it will be fully depreciated. Yet because of the high cost of new farm machinery the trade-in value would still be around $6,000. This means the farmer would have to show the $6,000 as a capital gain or as recaptured depreciation, and 50 per cent of it, or $3,000, has to be declared as taxable income. These are book figures.

Another example I should like to point out as an indication of how hard a capital gains tax on farm machinery will hit the farmers is that only two years ago a Farmall M tractor, which has not been built for 20 years and which sold new for $1,600, was resold for $1,800. In these days of inflation the same tractor would sell for $7,000, but here again this shows up as recapture depreciation and is strictly a book figure.

I am surprised that the government has not brought in the Barber report on farm machinery for discussion by the Standing Committee on Agriculture. There have been complaints by all segments of the agricultural industry about the high cost of farm machinery. All farm organizations maintain that these inflationary trends will put farmers out of business. The price of farm machinery has tripled during the last 20 years. We are told by the implement companies that the reason for this increase is that improvements have been made, though I do not agree with that claim. As an example, a wide level discer has not changed materially during the last 20 years with the exception of hydraulic operation, though it has changed considerably in price. This is why the government should not delay putting the Barber report on farm machinery prices before the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

I have maintained all along that many of the government's proposed tax changes are unnecessary. Earlier this year I pointed out that the sixth annual report of the Economic Council of Canada had stated that even if there were no change in taxation during the seven-year period between 1968 and 1975, the government's revenue would still double during that period. The government seems to spend its time finding ways to spend tax dollars rather than ways to cut back and be more efficient.

The main point I want to make this evening is that the load of the farmer is already heavy enough today, particularly in view of the government's agricultural policies. I ask the government to leave the farmer alone and to withdraw its proposals regarding a capital gains tax and recapture depreciation. Actually, this form of capital gains tax is simply a tax on inflation.

Mr. Otto: Mr. Chairman, I have been listening to the discussion on capital gains and I am inclined to agree with a good number of the statements that have been made. Before I talk about section 38 and capital gains, may I remind the parliamentary secretary that the whole concept of capital gains has been derived from the Carter proposals made ten years ago when a buck was a buck. In those days it did not matter much whether a buck was made by way of salary or by way of a windfall. Capital gains were not taxed on the basis that it was either a windfall or something that was not earned and was not income, but Mr. Carter's idea was that a buck was a buck, a dollar was a dollar and should be taxed. This was before the "Nixonomics", and at that time this proposal seemed logical enough. Since a capital gain was to be regarded as an earning, it seemed very logical to all of us that it should be taxed, although some concession was made. However, this was all before August 15 of this year.

I suggest to the parliamentary secretary and to the minister that to go on debating this bill and each section of it as if nothing had happened does not make sense. It does not make sense to say that we are not going to distinguish capital gains because nothing has happened. I have put it to the minister and his parliamentary secretary that when we speak of capital gains and how they should be defined, we should consider that there are at least two different kinds of capital gain, the passive gain and the active gain.

If I am a land speculator and buy land that I know is going to rise in price because of the pressures of the community around me, and I contribute absolutely nothing to that land, and having bought it at $5,000 an acre I sell it at $10,000 an acre, this is a passive gain. It is a gain which no one contributed to making; no risk at all was taken. In such a case I think the capital gains tax should apply very strictly. In cases like this there should be no allowance made for capital loss since it would be very difficult to argue that this type of endeavour is in any way beneficial to the nation or to the nation's economy.

The same situation prevails when an insider in a corporation knows there is going to be a demand for shares and buys shares merely to turn them over again in two days, a week or a month at a profit. This also is a passive gain. It has added nothing to the economy, is speculative in nature and has to be treated very differently from a capital gain that comes to a taxpayer from investment in an active enterprise.

[Mr. Stewart (Marquette).]

On the other hand, if an investor buys shares in a corporation or in an up-and-coming enterprise, holds on to the shares and risks his money, or if the entrepreneur himself takes a gamble at great sacrifice to himself and then they make a dollar on the sale of shares or on the sale of an enterprise, money that they will probably immediately reinvest, then no one can tell me that this situation is the same as that of the land speculator. I think such investors should be treated differently from speculators.

The merging of capital gains into one grouping regardless of their effect on the economy or how desirable or undesirable they are is one of the mistakes the government has made. Whether it be agricultural policy or redevelopment policy, the government tends to make one clean sweep and merge them all. The fact is that there is a great difference between the two types of enterprise I have described and gains received from long-term investments.

In the United States, which has a record of capital gains, a distinction has been made between capital gains that are short-term and those that are long-term. A heavier tax is imposed on short-term capital gains than on long-term capital gains since these stimulate long-standing investment in companies, the growth of industry, and so on. But apparently we have not seen fit to make this distinction.

Having read the unacknowledged Gray report—I say "report" although it would not be acknowledged as a report—we find it deals with foreign investment and contains a plain recommendation that incentives will have to be given to Canadian enterprises and investors. We are now faced with the United States isolationist economic program. We may not have to worry about this foreign investment problem because I think all the foreign investors will probably go away anyway, back to the United States or elsewhere. We will still have to worry about how we will get Canadians to undertake new enterprise and invest.

This report and other acknowledged reports indicate we must give incentives. I wonder what kind of incentives the minister intends to give. Does he intend to give the Canada Medal? What are we going to give our entrepreneurs? Are we going to say to Canadians that they should leave their safe jobs as engineers, accountants or lawyers, take a risk and put their savings into enterprise? If we do, they will ask why they should. The logical answer is that they must take this kind of risk in order to make a gain.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. Would the hon. member permit a question?

The Chairman: If the hon. member wishes to rise to ask the speaker whether he will permit a question, that is not a point of order, as hon. members know. If the hon. member who has the floor will entertain a question, the hon. member may ask it.

Mr. Otto: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the hon. member is Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Supply and Services I should like to ask whether he is stating government policy.

An hon. Member: Oh, grow up.

Mr. Otto: Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman has a very far reaching idea of what is the responsibility of a parliamentary secretary, especially this one.

An hon. Member: Tell him what it is.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Otto: If I could tell you, Mr. Chairman, I would. It seems that there is a graduated scale of power, at the top of which I suspect is the deputy minister and at the bottom the parliamentary secretary. Below that, or possibly above that, is probably his secretary.

To get back to the subject, if I may, without expounding government policy, let me relate to the committee some of the concepts I have had over a period of years. I might say to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance that I have been a great champion of this reform measure. I still am. I sat on the committee when the present Minister of Finance was Minister of National Revenue. That was years ago. We went through all these things and at that time a capital gains tax in its true form seemed like a good idea. That was before the Nixon economics—and there is a difference.

We must have some sort of incentive. The one that is most acknowledged is an incentive for active participation in enterprise. That must be in the form of a return for risk. But that is not equity, and we know we must be very equitable and fair. In fact, the Carter report was based more on equity than on growth. We cannot afford this type of equity at the present time. The fact is that we have nothing to share except future poverty.

I wonder whether the minister and his parliamentary secretary would consider redefining "capital gain" so that we have a very accurate understanding of that phrase. In this concept there are two different things and we would not be doing a service to the country or to our economic position if we married them. If we give the same benefit to one who speculates and makes money in the form of capital gain, without putting in any effort whatsoever and without adding anything to the economy, as we give to the entrepreneur who has risked capital and has been active in an enterprise, producing and selling goods as well as employing men and women, then we are being equitable.

I suggest we do not have to be equitable in this sense, but that we should make a distinction between the two. We should make a distinction between passive and active capital gain. We should make a distinction between the people who invest in Canadian corporations that produce goods and employ men, thereby helping this nation, and those who invest in speculative corporations which do nothing except jack up the cost of goods and play havoc with the nation's economy. It is about time the government came to the conclusion that not everything should be treated in exactly the same way. There is a vast difference between various types of capital gains and they should be taxed at different levels.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Chairman, it is significant that a great deal of discussion on the capital gain portion of this bill has centred on farmlands and the manner in which capital gains will affect them. We have an amendment before us dealing with the taxation of capital gains on farmlands. This is significant because it reflects what is happening in our society and in governments.

Bill C-259 represents an effort by the government to put into law provisions concerning taxation on income. They are very elaborate and very thoroughly thought out. Provisions concerning corporations and corporate activity are thoroughly considered, but that is not the case when it comes to problems involving individuals and small businessmen. I think this is indicated by the capital gains tax. There has been too little understanding of the effect this will have on the individual and the small businessman in this country. These ordinary people are trying to carry on as best they can in the livelihood or occupation in which they are engaged, but they are finding it increasingly difficult because of lack of understanding and response by governments to their situation.

It must be recognized that special problems face farmers and the agricultural industry of Canada. Many farmers are in a very precarious economic situation. A number of factors have an adverse effect on the agricultural economy and the well-being of persons engaged in farming. One of the factors is the high level of investment required in carrying on a farming operation, not the least of which is the increasing cost of land. Farmers also must contend with low rates of return on investment and labour input. This is an acknowledged fact in the agricultural industry.

We must also consider the peculiar characteristics of the agricultural industry. This must be taken into account when we are considering proposals for a capital gains tax. The farmer makes a contribution to the capital growth of his farm through the unpaid labour he contributes to capital improvements on the farm. The farmer does not receive any return for that unpaid labour until he sells his farm. At that time he receives the hoped for return for the labour he contributed in terms of capital improvement.

We also must take into account the fact that land values are a very volatile component of the over-all picture of the farm capital structure, and that land values fluctuate upward and downward in respect of changing economic conditions. This also produces problems. In addition, we must take into account the fact that many of a farmer's assets also constitute a retirement fund. I think this factor also deserves consideration. The fact is that a farmer contributes his unpaid labour in the form of capital improvements on his farm. In many instances he also plows back much of the income he receives from farming into capital improvement and capital development.

Many representations were made when this matter was before the committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. The New Democratic Party members on that committee, the hon. member for Waterloo and myself, made public a minority report concerning the white paper proposals on taxation. We presented a number of proposals with regard to capital gains of farmers. Our report read as follows:

In addition, we also propose that the following provisions be made for the situation of farmers; —That there be special rules governing the realization of capital gains on family farms when ownership is transferred in the family succession to ensure that the future viability of the farm unit and the welfare of the farm family is not jeopardized by the imposition of taxes.

—That farmers be enabled on realization of capital gains to invest such funds in a retirement savings plan to be taxed as received in income.

—That there be 'roll-over' provisions to enable a farmer to invest the proceeds of a farm sale in another farm as long as he is an active operator and it is his principal source of income.

We feel these proposals would deal with the great bulk of the problems which may arise from the imposition of a tax on capital gains so far as it would affect Canadian farmers and the farming industry. Last evening an amendment was moved by the hon. member for Edmonton West on behalf of the Progressive Conservative party. It proposed that in calculating capital gains there be the following exclusion:

other than land used in farming as defined in this act—

The amendment provides that any land used in farming, so long as it meets the criteria defined in this act, would be exempt from capital gains tax. When I spoke on this matter previously I made clear that I did not question the motives of those who moved this amendment. I felt they were trying to meet any problem that exists. I hope hon. members to my right in the Conservative party will forgive me if I note that there seemed to be indecent haste when they jumped to their feet to suggest that members of the New Democratic Party were not showing concern for the question of capital gains as it would affect farming.

As a matter of fact, the hon. member for Mackenzie said that if we do not like the amendment they have moved, why do we not move an amendment of our own. This, again, demonstrates the haste shown by some members of that party. At that point the hon. member for Edmonton West had moved his amendment but Your Honour had not ruled on it. I do not think it was possible at that stage for members of this party to move an amendment to the amendment which had not been ruled upon by Your Honour. I can understand why some members such as the hon. member for Mackenzie are experiencing problems and why they are facing difficulty.

With regard to the hon. member for Mackenzie, I suppose it might be said there is a Bracken breathing down his neck, because the NDP candidate for Mackenzie in the next federal election is to be a gentleman named Lars Bracken. This should interest some members of the Progressive Conservative party since this young man is a grandson of the brother of the late John Bracken, a former leader of the Conservative party. So I can understand why they are quite concerned about what is happening to them, after the by-election in Assiniboia.

Let us look at the amendment moved by the Progressive Conservative Party. What effect would it have? I suggest that it would have two important implications which have been completely ignored, and that it would nullify the benefits they hope to gain through the amendment. The first point is that an amendment to exclude all land used in farming from any form of capital gains tax would subject all farmlands to a degree of speculation and activity by speculators such as we have never known. I suggest that would be the effect, because we are to have a capital gains tax introduced in this country through this bill and we would have this area of productive economic activity excluded. I believe this would result in a rush of speculation in this area.

The second objection which I believe can be raised to the amendment proposed by the Progressive Conservative party is that it applies to all land used in farming regardless of circumstances and who is involved. I suggest this would be an open door invitation to every large corporation to become involved in the land and farming business.

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Athabasca is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Burton: Mr. Chairman, I would be glad to entertain questions at the conclusion of my remarks. I believe the amendment proposed by the Progressive Conservative party would result in a rash of activity by corporations which could not be defined as farmers in any way, shape or form. We have the National Grain Company and other corporations moving into farming enterprises simply as another branch of their industrial empires. They are not interested in the welfare of the farmer or of agriculture but, rather, in the future welfare of their corporations. I suggest this amendment would have the effect of encouraging and abetting corporations which may be interested in getting into some form of agricultural activity. Thus, I feel the amendment as it is before us is very unsatisfactory.

However, there is a very real problem that must be dealt with and I feel it can be dealt with within the framework which has been proposed. Thus, I propose to move an amendment to the amendment as follows:

That the amendment be amended by adding the following after the word "act":

"under the following circumstances:

1. when farm property is transferred by sale, gift or legacy to a spouse or a son or daughter or a spouse thereof when the minister is of the opinion that it is the intention of the recipient of the property to continue farming.

2. when a farmer sells farm land and uses the proceeds to purchase other farm land provided that the said farmer satisfies the minister that he intends to continue farming and that his usual principal source of income is from farming.

3. any instance when a bona fide farmer on the sale of farm land is not allowed to invest the capital gain therefrom in a registered retirement savings plan which will result in the farmer concerned being taxed only on benefits received from the said plan as they are received;

and"

Mr. Baldwin: Explain.

Mr. Burton: The effect of this amendment would be to make the amended section read as follows:

other than land used in farming as defined in this act and under the following circumstances:

Following which we would have paragraphs 1, 2 and 3 as proposed in my amendment. The first point which I have made in the subamendment deals with the question of transfers of land within the family where in fact the legislation deals with sales, gifts or legacies to a spouse or to a son, a daughter or a spouse thereof—that is, transfers within the family unit.

The second point that I make deals with the proposal that there be a roll-over provision whereby a farmer could sell one farm or a piece of land and invest the proceeds in another piece of land without incurring a tax on the capital gain involved. The third point is to enable farmers to invest any proceeds which they do receive from a capital gain. There can be circumstances where they can invest those proceeds in a registered retirement savings plan, draw from that savings plan and be taxed only on the benefits as they are received. If they are not allowed to put their money into registered retirement savings plans, there would be no capital gains tax, in accordance with the wording of the third paragraph.

We feel that these three points deal with the fundamental concerns of the farming community in so far as taxation of capital gains is concerned. We feel that this would deal with the real concerns, some of which were raised last night in support of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Edmonton West. However, this subamendment also has the merit that it avoids some of the problems that would be raised by allowing the amendment to pass as it is because, as I pointed out, it would simply encourage speculation and corporation farming. We do not want that and I am sure the Conservative party do not want it either. It is for that reason that we move this subamendment and commend it to the committee.

Mr. Yewchuk: I am curious to know whether the hon. member is serious about the suggestion that not putting the capital gains tax on the sale of farmland would cause a rush of speculation. Since at present there is no capital gains tax on land, why is there no rash of speculation right now?

Mr. Burton: We already have some problems on the outskirts and the peripheries of many of our larger urban centres and this would be intensified if we allowed the proposals to stand as they are.

Mr. Nowlan: We are referring to farms, not to urban centres.

The Chairman: The committee has before it the subamendment of the hon. member for Regina East. The Chair's initial thought is that it would be in order in that it defines more precisely certain circumstances under which the capital gains tax would not apply. However, the Chair would ask the hon. member who moved the subamendment whether he in fact intended to leave in the word "and", because if that is so he would be expanding on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Edmonton West and the Chair would have some doubt about the subamendment.

It seems to the Chair that the subamendment would be in order if it were to read "other than land used in farming as defined in this act under the following circumstances".

Mr. Burton: I am quite prepared to accept the suggestion made by Your Honour. It was certainly not my intention to expand in any way on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Edmonton West. It was my intention to qualify the amendment.

The Chairman: I think the Chair and the hon. member for Regina East are in agreement, because it did seem to me that the hon. member did not intend to expand on the amendment now before the committee.

Mr. Noble: Mr. Chairman, I rise to speak in support of the amendment proposed by my colleague, the hon. member for Edmonton West. At the outset I will make some observations with respect to the bill. It seems to me that one of the problems in attempting to assess the significance of the changes proposed in Bill C-259 is that amendments continue to follow amendments and a definitive analysis can hardly be made until the regulations come down. They will not be available until some time after the draft proposals become law, and the draft proposals will not become law until the amendments stop flowing and the last one has been debated. It is a vicious circle—almost a case of the snake or the red tape-worm swallowing its own tail.

Mr. Chairman, as the draft bill now stands, my first and dominant impression is that it does not represent true tax reform but, rather, several hundred pages of additions and amendments to the Income Tax Act and related acts. Informed businessmen and their advisers seem to agree that the present Income Tax Act is badly written, difficult to interpret and full of problems. The hundreds of pages of additions and amendments incorporated in the draft bill, when added to the present Income Tax Act will still leave us with many of our old problems and a great many new ones.

The repeated introduction of amendments since June 18, and the further changes arising from the finance minister's about-face on policy because of the country's unhappily deteriorating financial and employment situation leads to one inescapable conclusion, that if the bill was not ill-conceived it was at the very least so poorly designed as to lack the resilience and elasticity needed to absorb the internal and external pressures so recently, and still, plaguing us—rising costs of raw materials and labour, rising living costs, increasing unemployment and the Nixon surcharge, to name but a few.

In view of these circumstances the bill should be scrapped. Any and all amendments leading to tax reduction, increased purchasing power and stabilization of our economic and employment situation should be processed at the earliest possible moment and, finally, another attempt at tax reform in its truest sense should be made at a time when the blood, bone and spirit of our country are somewhat healthier than they are now.

The issues raised by the government's decision to tax capital gains, since the presentation of the white paper on taxation, have been clouded by complications and the government's own uncertainty about what it really wants to accomplish. Taking the Carter commission's premise that a buck is a buck, the government decided back in 1969 that it must pursue equity at any cost. That was the year the government was frozen into a trade-off mentality. It will be recalled that in 1969 the government decided to trade off unemployment in order to control inflation. It was in the same vein that they suggested it was appropriate to trade off economic growth in favour of equity.

So stern were they in pursuit of that elusive principle that they ignored the whole spectrum of social and economic realities involved until they were confronted with a major political protest. Even then the Minister of Finance was willing to dismiss that protest as the outpouring of special interest groups who were unrelated to the average taxpayer.

The opposition is pleased that the Gallup poll assisted the minister with his arithmetic to the extent of pointing out that the total of the special interest groups was the majority of the population, and that the government has now backed off from some of its proposals. The decision not to apply a capital gains tax to a homeowner's principal residence acknowledges at last that the homeowner is not a real estate speculator and should be treated differently. We are pleased the government has abandoned its intention to tax unrealized gains, a proposal that would have been seriously harmful to investment in this country.

The argument previously used in favour of the capital gains tax was that of equity. Yet the government has ignored the requests of the opposition to utilize the more equitable system of tax credits instead of increasing exemptions. We have pointed out on many occasions that increased exemptions only update the existing tax system rather than reform it. Similarly, the government has not made any attempt to integrate federal taxes with seriously regressive provincial and municipal taxes. Obviously, the question of equity is not uppermost in this government's mind. One can only conclude that their major preoccupation in instituting a capital gains tax under these circumstances is for the purpose of raising revenue. In this objective they have shown themselves to be far more single-minded than when they were pursuing equity.

Genuine tax reform must take into account more than the single consideration of government revenue. It must be sensitive to social considerations and what consequences a reformed tax structure is likely to bring about, and it must have goals that are compatible with these considerations. The unwillingness of this government to exempt the family farm from the capital gains tax demonstrates a complete insensitivity to all these requirements.

In addition to being an economic unit, the family farm is a traditional way of life for thousands of Canadians, and in both respects the capital gains tax will be disruptive of its very existence. Yet the government has offered no evidence that it understands the problem or that it is even aware of it. Under the proposed legislation, the family farm is not looked upon as an on-going business undertaken by a whole family but as the personal property of the head of the household. When he dies, his property will be deemed realized and his heirs will have to pay a capital gains tax on an inheritance.

This attitude does not take into account the possibility that the farm may not be disposable at any given time. The fact that it may have a book value of $100,000 does not mean the heir could sell it at that time for $100,000. More likely, the heir will not wish to sell the farm because he has devoted much of his labour to it, but since the farm has now been deemed realized he will have to pay a tax on its appreciation in value and will either be forced to sell some of the farm assets or go into debt. Since farming requires continually increasing capital investment which will have to be foregone in order to pay the tax, the economic functioning of the farm will be seriously undermined.

It hardly needs to be pointed out that agriculture is having serious trouble as it is. For the government to add to that trouble by undermining the stability of the family farm is inexplicable by any standard of good government. But it is not inexplicable when examined in the context of the goals of this government.

Mr. Chairman, it is not a secret that the bureaucrats in Ottawa have blamed the family farm for the problems in agriculture today. They would like to encourage the development of huge corporate farms, and perhaps the capital gains tax is the right tool to accomplish that end. But it cannot be proven that the corporate farm would be any more economical than the family farm except in one respect—it would employ fewer people. That is hardly a desirable goal at this time. In bringing this about the government should pause to calculate the social costs involved.

The costs of dislocation and adjustment that will follow the breaking up of the family farm, a process encouraged by the capital gains tax, may far outweigh any hypothetical advantages. A way of life that has enriched this country socially and economically will be seriously strained by this tax reform legislation. Is that worth the so-called economy of the corporate farm? Is it worth the additional revenue that will be brought to the government?

As long as a farm remains in a family it should be exempt from the capital gains tax. As an on-going business that requires heavy capital investment it is foolish and unjust to disrupt its existence by removing a significant proportion of its capital because the head of the household has died. The opposition does not believe the government has made an effective case for refusing to exempt the family farm, and if it has private reasons for its refusal it should bring them out into the open where they can be debated. Mr. Chairman, it may be the case that the government is worried that the tax could be deferred indefinitely under these circumstances. If that is so, then its obsession with revenue has led it into mindless disregard for the higher priority of quality of life.

The proposal to tax capital gains from investment reflects a similar obsession with revenue without regard for consequences. In presenting his white paper on tax reform, the Minister of Finance acknowledged the possibility that investors might be unwilling to realize their capital gains if they are subject to taxation. This locking-in effect would seriously interfere with the mobility of capital in the Canadian market. The Toronto Stock Exchange raised the example of an investor who sells for $100 a share which was acquired at $50. At a personal income tax rate of 50 per cent, the capital gains tax would be $12.50, leaving $87.50 for reinvestment in a new asset. It would be necessary for this new asset to appreciate by 14.3 per cent to restore capital to the $100 value which prevailed before realization. Unless the investor is fairly certain of this appreciation he would not likely make the adjustment.

The Minister of Finance recognized two years ago that a capital gains tax would introduce an artificial element into the market. It was to prevent the locking-in effect that he proposed in his white paper to have a five-year deemed realization when everybody would pay capital gains tax whether their gains were realized or not. The ill-considered proposal was cast into such disrepute that the minister abandoned it in his proposed legislation. He is to be congratulated for doing so. However, he has not suggested any alternative means for dealing with the problem of locked-in investment, the consequences of which might be seriously detrimental to the Canadian capital market.

The opposition has long ceased to expect wisdom from the Minister of Finance but we occasionally hope for some humility. Two years ago the minister was so concerned about locked-in investment that he elaborated a scheme to counteract it that ultimately brought him some embarrassment. Is he now trying to save face by not admitting that it is a problem? Or if he admits it is a problem, is he more concerned with collecting revenue at the expense of any solution? There is a solution, one suggested by the Toronto Stock Exchange in its response to the white paper. In its brief of May, 1970, the Toronto Stock Exchange argued that a distinction should be made between capital realized for the purpose of reinvestment and capital realized for personal consumption. The mechanism proposed was a roll-over exemption to allow capital transfers within a defined period of time. Reinvested gains would be deferred as long as they remained in the capital market.

The government will probably dismiss this suggestion with the response that it would mean an investor could defer taxation of his gains forever. I will anticipate such an argument by pointing out, first, that there would be deemed realization at death and, second, that the money is doing just as much good in the capital market as it would be doing in government revenues. Furthermore, I submit that under a Liberal government the money is doing more good in the capital market. There is a consistency in the present government's approach to the federal role which is reflected in aggrandizing revenues on the one hand, and ill-considered expenditure on the other. The taxation of capital gains as it is proposed in this bill is simply one thread in that consistency.

The opposition accepts the fact that there are competing public and private claims on capital. It is obvious that private investment will go where it can obtain its best return and there is a necessary and positive role for public capital in many areas. In a mixed economy we must determine our priorities in this context. The real question facing us at this moment is whether we believe our capital market is so mature that we can take money out of it for purposes of government expenditure. And what kind of government expenditure justifies the depletion of the capital market?

Obviously, an investor is not going to put his money into an Opportunities for Youth program. But does that program have a priority over economic investment that may provide genuine jobs? Some day, when we have a very mature capital market, it may indeed have a higher priority. But surely not today. And where there is an acute need for public capital at the provincial and municipal levels, the federal government has been stingy and unco-operative. We have no assurance that it will, and much evidence that it will not, allocate this increased revenue wisely.

The opposition deplores the inability of the government to face up to the fact all our institutions are involved in these questions. A capital gains tax is not simply a matter of equity. If investment capital is performing a public role by stimulating the economy and creating jobs, then it should be analysed in that role. The question of equity only arises when capital gains are used as personal income. Nor should the government isolate the capital gains tax as purely a matter of revenue. The conversion of private capital into public capital should take place when there is a clear and defined necessity for that conversion. Nowhere, either by its legislative program, its financial relationship with other governments or by its arguments, has the government defined that necessity.

When the Minister of Finance refused Quebec's request for a one-year delay in the implementation of the tax reform legislation, he justified his refusal by pointing out that the process of tax reform has been before us for eight years. One may only wonder, in this length of time, Why the fundamental problems have not been addressed. The government has obviously not concerned itself very much with the consequences of its tax reform legislation, nor has it analysed the relationship of taxes to the health of other institutions.

It has been easy, Mr. Chairman, for the government to sink into a posture of self-righteousness on the issue of taxing capital gains. Equity is a principle to which everyone subscribes and to oppose the taxation of capital gains is to run the risk of appearing to defend special interests and unfair advantages. Yet to ignore the consequences or a capital gains tax is to ignore the economic health of our agricultural community and the direction of the potential growth of our country and, by implication, the well-being of our society.

That is why I feel it is imperative that the government re-examine the context of the capital gains tax. When capital gains are used as income it is obviously only fair that they be taxed. But when, as in the case of the family farm, they are required to sustain the activity of the farm they should be exempt. Similarly, in the case of private investment, when capital gains are reinvested and are performing a needed social function they should be rechannelled into public capital in the form of a capital gains tax.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, speaking as one who has sat in this chamber during Committee of the Whole proceedings on clause 1 of the tax reform bill now before the committee, it is clear that many parts of the income tax bill will create confusion and justifiable consternation. No part of the debate on this bill has involved more hypocrisy and mythology than the part dealing with capital gains.

Mr. Woolliams: That applies particularly to the NDP.

Mr. Nowlan: If the sections we are presently discussing go through unamended, the confusion as to how capital gains will hit not only special interest groups but all Canadians at almost all levels of life will be surpassed only by the confusion of the administrators of the act and bureaucrats in Ottawa. They will be confused about how to administer this part of the act, and thereby other Canadians will suffer. For, Mr. Chairman, I think we are looking at this question from the reverse side. We talk about equity and say that equity means fair treatment. As one of my friends to my left said, a buck is a buck; how do you distinguish between a dollar made through a capital gain and a dollar made from an income-producing job?

We can philosophize at length about concepts of equity, yet I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that in talking about the capital gains tax we are really talking about a social tax. Although I do not have the figures in front of me, I understand that the capital gains tax will produce in the first year $50 million from individuals and approximately $80 million from the corporate area.

Mr. Mahoney: It is just the reverse.

Mr. Nowlan: My hon. friend says it is the reverse. I accept his correction: he has listened to more of this debate than I have. Regardless of the figures, if you talk to people on the streets about capital gains, the impression you get is that they think the coffers of the nation will be opened up, that King Midas will walk up and down the street and that we will have money for doing all sorts of things, including money for assistance plans that are designed to help those who cannot help themselves. Actually, we are talking about a social tax. We talk about a capital gains tax when we should be talking about a social tax. The philosophy behind it is that of a social tax, the result being that in the minds of Canadians this tax is cumbersome, vague and completely confusing.

This new tax has been introduced because it will produce revenue which governments obviously need. I am informed that in the United States, a country which has long imposed such a tax and which is beginning to wonder about it, capital gains taxes produce in the neighbourhood of 3 per cent of tax derived from income. While you can argue about the percentage, there is no doubt that as far as the internal revenue service code and the regulations are concerned, the regulations and the code which have implemented capital gains in the United States have, I am informed, trebled. I refer to the code and the regulations necessary to implement the law. There is a blanket of bureaucracy—to produce what? It will produce relatively few dollars as far as the over-all picture is concerned.

I do not think any speaker will disagree that as far as social justice is concerned—the reason we are talking about capital gains—this is where the hypocrisy comes into it. We talk about land and stock speculators and the way to make a million overnight. All hon. members know that in a great number of cases those transactions are not covered by our tax law because they are deemed to be income if you set up the return pattern. There is more hypocrisy and smokescreen about where the capital gains tax is going to hit than I have heard in a long time. That is one of the reasons I am prodded to contribute a few remarks to this portion of the debate.

I am in agreement with anyone who wishes to talk about the social injustice of the land speculator. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Supply and Services mentioned the difference between a passive gain and an active gain. That might open up a whole new chapter of tax law. There is a difference in a land speculator sitting, licking his chops, letting the land value go up and up, hoping to cash in, using some land for farming, some for orchards and part of it for a subdivision. He makes a large capital appreciation. I suggest in large measure those situations are now covered. The Parliamentary Secretary knows that. Notwithstanding that, the number of taxpayers involved in this type of speculation are miniscule.

I listened with great interest to my friend from Grey-Simcoe. He talked about the necessity, from a political point of view of being reasonable to all points of view and how it may be politically incorrect to say "No capital gains whatsoever." You are then accused of favouring special groups. I want to turn the thing around. Instead of talking about social justice necessitating capital gains, against the small number of speculators who are now covered by the income tax law—and the national revenue boys know that—I want to know where the social justice and capital gain is for the widow, retired school teacher, labourer, small businessman and farmer. I will illustrate how it hits them. What about the young couple trying to save a little nest-egg so that they can move out of the syndrome of high interest and/or rent payments in an apartment complex and build a home of their home? They will not be able to do it.

I practised law in Vancouver for seven years. I met with couples, both of whom worked. They paid high rent for their apartment. They were caught in a syndrome whereby under the ordinary tax law it was difficult when they had children to break away from this vicious circle and move to the country. Somehow, some of them were able to save and invest a little, not like the great speculator playing the market day in and day out as a principal source of income but in the small hope that by investing in a little of this country they could get a small return and get out of the apartment and build a small home.

In this chamber we hear speaker after speaker and minister after minister say that we have a new housing program and a new plan for youth. Reversing the procedure of capital gains is not social injustice for the speculator in the stock or land market; it is social injustice perpetrated in respect of capital gains for the widow. How does this affect the widow? Most widows have a principal residence. If a poll were conducted I am sure that most widows would say their principal residence is protected. They think that when they die, the gain that has accrued in their lifetime will not be subject to capital gains and, therefore, the situation is not too bad. However, in reality there are two things that bother people about a principal residence. I have already referred to the situation of a widow. One is that you get one acre of land, and the other is that you must use your residence as a principal residence.

I suggest that for many widows in this country the only real asset after a constructive life of raising a family, having the children grow up and move away and the husband die, is a pension of some sort and a home. What does the widow want to do? She has four or five children scattered around the countryside whom she wants to visit.

She wants to visit two months with John, one month with Sam and, if one is in the south, she may want to go there for the winter and enjoy some of the sunlight she reads about in Air Canada ads. She is told to fly south and enjoy the birds now, because she will not enjoy them later; she will be plucked. What happens when she returns to her home? The income tax assessor tells her, "Madam, you were away for two months, five months or a year and you rented your home. You did not want to sell the family home." She wanted to keep the home because she knew one of the boys would come back or one of the families was getting too big for an apartment and wanted to use her home. For this reason she kept the home. She thought she could at least give them the home. What happens? The income tax assessor says that is not her principal residence.

Look how complicated it becomes when a gain has accrued. There is a market valuation day on the home. Because this woman has been away for a certain period she has to pay the gain on that. She may have rented the home. She may have lived away. That is how the widow gets hit. In my area the widow gets hit much more viciously. I come from a part of Canada where we do not have all the basic natural resources and the fundamental riches that the Canadian shield has produced for people living in other parts of this country. We do not have the oil and gas fields of the west, or the Rocky Mountains near where my friend from Vancouver South comes and yearns to return.

Mr. Laing: What about all the oil?

Mr. Nowlan: We do not have many homes on the water. We have floating derricks, but you will not even let us have the oil. The minister knows they do many things in British Columbia tremendously well. I was there for a while. In Nova Scotia we also do many things, but we do not yet have houses on the water. When you talk about oil, that is not only a red herring but it is pollution of the water which the Minister of the Environment would not care to handle.

Separate and apart from the principal residence owner who still has to pay taxes, is the lady left only with the home. In my area there are countless situations where there is only a little home and two or three acres of land. Do you know what "big brother" is going to do? He is going to say that under the tax act you are allowed this home and one acre surrounding it. She will ask the tax collector, "What am I going to do? I have my cow on the second acre. I have a little woodlot for firewood on the third acre. It is all scrubland. I like to walk out there and pick blueberries or enjoy the spring." The tax collector says, "I shall be reasonable. You are allowed one acre and a house, but you have to go down to the county assessment office and decide on the value of those two acres because at some time you will have to pay a little tax on them". This principal residence provision is a snare and a delusion.

An hon. Member: Is the cow a basic herd or not?

Mr. Nowlan: I was coming to the basic herd. I was trying to lay the groundwork for the acres on which the old lady might be able to develop the herd. But on this little piece of ground she could not develop a basic herd.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: There are many other reasons she could not develop a basic herd. Let us talk about the labourer.

An hon. Member: Let us talk about the bill.

Mr. Nowlan: I am talking about capital gains. I am talking about labourers, friends of my friends to the left. We always have to look there. It is a little slant vision but it is completely appropriate because they talk with forked tongues and you have to look a little slantwise. We are all familiar with the term "mobility of labour". An employee is called upon to move when his company transfers him to a job at another plant or when his old job comes to an end and he has to move in order to find a new one. He gets a job and he has to move from A to B. It is a brand new job. He goes away 40, 50, 100 or 200 miles away and rents a home. Perhaps a year or two later he comes back.

The same thing happens to him as happens in the case of the widow. He finds he will be stuck for a capital gain during the period of his absence. He does not appreciate this today, and if he listens only to the preachings from my friends to the left he will not understand it now; but he will understand it when he gets to his bank. Here are two situations, the widow and the labourer. I can think, too, of the retired schoolteacher with a little nest-egg, or of a young couple trying to buy a home. It is hard enough to save money today under the burden of taxation. I think of young persons living in apartments in cities, working to get money to move out and buy a home.

As I said earlier, all sorts of governments, regardless of political affiliation, keep talking about housing plans, a cherished dream for all and so on. A man's home is his castle. Under this capital gains tax proposal that man's castle will be as far away as most of the castles in England are removed from Canadians of ordinary means. I think of the small businessman. I believe this message is sinking in. It is the average Canadian, the small Canadian running a corner grocery store or a barbershop in a little town who is going to be socked over the head with the problem of capital gains.

Then, of course, there is the question of the family farm. The family farm, or the farm which is the subject of this amendment, has two basic characteristics which do not apply to any other vocation or endeavour. Basically, there is a very high family farm component to the bona fide farms of Canada today even though this is changing under present pressures. The other component is a very high ration of investment as compared with returns, and the fact that it takes many years to develop a farm into a viable proposition.

I suggest there is something wrong with the priorities of a government which in this tax bill will let you buy a lottery ticket and get the full benefit of that, as I understand to be the case, and yet is so preoccupied with getting every penny. You can gamble with a piece of paper and win and keep it all, yet people are penalized when they try to build up a home, a little farm, a little business, move from one town to another to keep a job or move out of an apartment to build a home. I say it is not social justice to institute a capital gains tax in this form. It is a social injustice in its impact upon the average Canadian and we should look at this proposal much closer than we have.

There are several things we could do to lessen the impact of this heavy, cumbersome and complicated new system whose effects none of us can fully appreciate. Some people have mentioned them. I shall only touch lightly on them because my time is just about up.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Nowlan: I could go on. I am very concerned about this, Mr. Chairman, because the average Canadian does not appreciate what is happening. But here is one example. As I understand it, the federal government will vacate the estate tax field because there is to be a capital gains tax. Yet we know that the provinces have already moved into the estate tax field. How, in all conscience, can we think of imposing a capital gains tax on top of estate tax in the absence of any abatement procedures for avoiding double taxation? If the parliamentary secretary and his minister think this is the type of just society Canadians want, I believe they will get a sad awakening at the right time and I hope it is not too far off.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I have been very interested in the comments which have been made in the last two days. They mostly reflect on the fact that the government does not appear to be cognizant that one very large segment of the economy does not fit into the thinking of most of the rest of the economy. I was interested in listening to the last speaker who raised a very interesting point. It is one I do not understand and I should like to understand it in its relationship to the workers and those in the organized labour force in this country, particularly those who are no longer at the end of the economic scale but have reached a fairly high level of income.

Despite taxation and despite the fact that they have enjoyed no exemptions of any description, no deductions with respect to the cars they must use in order to go to work, nothing written off for the lunch-pail or the tools of their trade, they have been able, as a result of their own efforts, to buy a house. And because of inflation, the house for which they paid $15,000 or $20,000 turns out to be priced on valuation day at $35,000 or $45,000. They have done nothing except live in the house and pay the mortgage, which is not unrealistic in relation to the total price at which the property is valued. But they will find themselves in some difficulty as a result of the capital gains proposals in this bill, just the same as other segments of our economy.

A long time ago I was in favour of a capital gains tax. I came from a mining area and could see no legitimate reason why a person who played the stock market should not pay tax on his winnings of $10,000 while I worked in the mine and earned $5,000, of which a considerable portion was taxed. I have always been in favour of the speculator, the man who manipulates money, paying tax on the return he receives since as far as he is concerned it is income, the same as my $5,000. Yet he did not pay tax and I paid a considerable amount. He could afford to pay a considerable amount of tax but did not pay any, whereas I was in the position where I could not afford to pay tax and was paying a sizeable portion of my income in tax.

The workers of this country over the years have put their savings away. We are known as a nation of savers. One of the United States president's advisers has said that Canada influences 25 per cent of the control over the United States money supply, and he is really talking about one trait Canadians have developed which we thought was admirable, namely, that of saving money. We invest only in blue chip stock, mainly in insurance companies and other forms of retirement investment. We have paid very dearly for this because of the manipulations of government over a period of time. I think it is safe to say that an insurance policy bought in 1939 or 1940 with a value on maturity of $1,000 would only have the purchasing power today equal to a few months' old age pension. The purchasing power of our money today is very limited, yet no recognition of this is given to those who have saved. People who spend everything they earn are in a much better position since the state will provide for them in terms of today's dollars, not in terms of dollars saved.

I do not think it has ever been suggested to me by those who are familiar with the purposes of a capital gains tax that such tax is similar to succession duties or estate tax levied on every Canadian who dies. It was to be a substitute for income tax or was a tax on income which previously had been tax free. The previous speaker talked about buying a lottery ticket for $2.75 and winning $100,000 on the Irish sweepstake, which amount is tax free.

Mr. Woolliams: There are only about four a year, though.

Mr. Peters: I grant that this does not apply to many people, and since it is such a limited activity perhaps we should include it in the allowances as a sop to the poor people of the nation. Then we have the poor cleaning woman in England who buys a football pool ticket for two pennies, hoping to win sufficient money to retire from her job that does not pay sufficient to enable her to buy clothes and keep warm in her apartment. In my opinion this is the type of situation where we should apply a capital gains tax.

Mr. Woolliams: How sick can you be!

Mr. Peters: I am always surprised when I find people from a certain area putting more faith in the buying of a lottery ticket than in anything else. These play people play it big. They are rich today, broke tomorrow, but smile just the same because that is their way of life. It takes all kinds to make a world. A transformation in the thinking of this government has taken place within a very short time. The government introduced an estate tax with a great deal of fanfare and announced that when a man died his widow would inherit his estate free of tax, at least up to a certain level. That money would be hers for the rest of her life, and it was not until the estate was passed on to other members of the family that tax would be paid, though a certain amount was tax free.

Then within a period of two years, before the Department of National Revenue had had time to assess the effect of that tax, whether it had been abused or lent itself to abuse, the government brought in a half-baked proposition that removed the very protection it had made so much fuss about two years previously. A great deal of objection was raised by some hon. members to the estate tax proposal, but now we see that although there was objection at the time to any estate tax at all, the government is accepting this kind of proposition and in many cases any transfers of this sort made to widows or to others will be taxed.

This is a great change to make and I am wondering whether the government can justify it. I realize the government needs large amounts of revenue. Nevertheless, the government has indicated that the revenue it will get from this tax will only be about $130 million. That is the estimated revenue from this capital gains tax in the red book. We are eliminating a tax that the government thought was so wonderful when it introduced it, and imposing a capital gains tax in its place. Such a tax will apply to farmers. The Conservative party has moved an amendment that would eliminate such a tax on land used for agricultural purposes. It would be very nice if we could abolish all taxes. We would have a Utopia. As far as I am concerned, however, if a person saves money from the operation of a farm, by running a family business or in some other way, he should at least be allowed some amount for the maintenance of the business as well as for the maintenance of his spouse and family.

The amendment that has been moved relates directly to farmers. I think it has a weakness and it is a weakness which I am not smart enough in economics to correct. It obviously is a weakness in so far as it affects other segments of our economy, particularly the labour force. As the previous speaker said, members of the labour force have developed a number of traits in the last few years which put them in a totally different position. They no longer live in tenement homes, they own their own homes. They have purchased cars and through their own endeavours have provided for retirement so the nation will not have to look after them. This bill does not give any consideration to that category of people. I am sure the urban-oriented Liberal government members should be able to come up with some solution to this situation.

There may be a limit in this regard and perhaps we should modify this tax in some areas because of hardships suffered by certain people. We could eliminate the tax in that sector of our economy. We should not allow what most Canadians do not want, that is, a hierarchy in which money generates more money generation by generation. I know that government members are not too damned interested in this phase because there are more millionaires on the government side than ever before. Most of them have inherited their money. I am sure some of them are not even competent to hang on to what they have inherited. As long as they leave it in safe securities, perhaps they will be able to keep it. But they are not interested in eliminating inherited wealth.

I am sure most Canadians would agree that tax should apply in respect of large inherited sums of money. It is not to our advantage as Canadians to provide a landed gentry class. It is not to our advantage to provide a continuation of the inherited wealthy in this country. Obviously, if a father worked hard enough some benefit should flow to his wife and to his family. This is easily understood in respect of the agricultural industry where a wife and husband have made an effort to build up an estate which in some cases is considerable.

We will probably choose December 1 or the week of December 6, or a neutral date in the future, as valuation day—but I suggest it will be relatively close to December 6, depending on the progress made with this bill. People will then have to value their properties without taking into consideration all those things which have been considered by organized business over a period of time.

I know of no farmer who charges wages on his own behalf. Whether a farmer operates a partnership with his son or farms on his own, very seldom does he charge a salary for himself or his son. Obviously, farming is not that good, otherwise speculators would get into this field and buy land. They are buying land around cities, but that land is no longer agricultural land; it is subdivided and falls within a different category. The point is that the things written off in normal business are not written off in agriculture and we arrive at a fairly high value for farm property.

It seems to me that calculating the best day for valuation should be a very simple proposition, but the basis for calculating the value of agricultural land will not be simple. Over a period of many years farmers have paid interest on mortgages. This has been paid out of family income, probably because wages were not charged and the farmers lived at a substandard level. Similar to what was suggested by the parliamentary secretary, we in Ontario put a value on land on the basis of a voluntary sale to a voluntary buyer.

Mr. Alexander: Fair market value.

Mr. Peters: It is not necessarily the market value.

Mr. Woolliams: It is the fair market value.

Mr. Peters: It is not necessarily the fair market value. In northern Ontario we find that the Liberal government which believes in socializing the land is deeply involved in this field and has provided an unfair value for land. Normally, two factors enter into valuation of land in northern Ontario. The first is the transfer of land from father to son. The father usually tries to sell the farm for only enough to provide for his wife and himself. Farmers are intelligent and they know they cannot take their money with them, and they sell to the son on that basis.

Mr. Woolliams: What utter nonsense.

Mr. Peters: The hon. member for Calgary North may have, like one of his colleagues in British Columbia, a pipeline to the Lord and can take his money with him. Perhaps he can transfer it there by bank draft; I don't know. But most people can't take theirs with them. A farmer will say to his son that he can only afford to pay so much for the farm, and that is all he needs for his retirement. So that is the price to be paid. This places an improper value on the farm which cannot be taken into account so far as the provisions of this bill are concerned. We have the same situation in respect of the Liberal government's land socializing program. An unfair value is arrived at, based on different considerations.

Under the ARDA program an old man and an old woman who have no children are approached and offered a price for land which is often based on fair value. I am not opposed to the price that is paid under this plan but in some areas it is based on social considerations. If these people are not paid a fair price they will not be able to meet their costs of living and will go on welfare. One of the largest land owners in my area is the federal government. It owns much of the land in the area as a result of this kind of deal.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I must advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Carry on.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the committee to continue his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Deputy Chairman: I am afraid the hon. member does not have unanimous consent; therefore, he may not continue.

Mr. Downey: Mr. Chairman, I am rather disappointed that members on the government side would not allow the hon. member for Timiskaming to conclude his remarks.

An hon. Member: We're not.

Mr. Peters: That's all right; I'll make the speech again tomorrow.

• (9:50 p.m.)

Mr. Downey: In respect of the amendment before us, when one looks at the special nature of the farming community it would seem essential that something be done for these people to ensure continuance of the farm unit. I do not know whether it should be exactly in the form of this amendment or through some other concepts. When one takes into consideration the importance of the agricultural industry to civilization through the centuries, I believe it is important that it be given special consideration.

This amendment, and I suggest some of the wording in the subamendment, would certainly assist in recognizing agriculture and placing it in a special position. Admittedly, there are some difficulties in making all farms completely free of capital gains tax. It is possible that some locked-in effect might accrue over the years in the accumulation of capital gains, but I would urge the minister to consider these amendments and the special nature of agriculture so that the people engaged in this field might be able to carry on in the same manner even though they are in difficult circumstances.

Certainly, if no recognition is given to the manner in which intergeneration transfers are made, farmers will be in difficult circumstances because there will never be funds available to even look after a deemed realization. I do not think the actual realization is a difficult situation when a farmer sells out, because he has the benefit of the income averaging concept. He can average his income over 15 years and I believe this will be very valuable to the farmer who sells a farm.

However, I would ask the parliamentary secretary, if the government is to go along with a suggestion in the brief presented by the stock breeders, to see if there is some way to bring in the income averaging concept on the deemed realization of intergeneration transfers. Perhaps a concept could be introduced to take the load of the deemed realization off the family farm and make it possible for these people to carry on without having their income adversely affected over a very short span of one or two years.

I believe it is unfortunate the minister has not seen fit to extend to the incorporated family farm the provisions granted individual farmers. These have become very important in the last few years. The fact that there is nothing to indicate that the provision in respect of the $1,000 annual capital gains exemption is available to the incorporated family farm is, I believe, an oversight. When 80 per cent or 90 per cent of the income of a family farm incorporation comes from the sale of agricultural products, and when 80 per cent of the shares are held by the family, I believe the family farm corporation should be treated in the same manner as the individual farmer. I hope the minister will consider an amendment to rectify the situation in the days ahead.

If we are to have capital gains, it is vital that an inflation factor be built into this concept. Inflation will hit no one harder than those in the farming community. In many cases land values today are artificial. Certainly they are not realistic when one takes into consideration the productivity of the land. The prices of agricultural products are much the same today as they were 20 or 30 years ago. While production methods have increased, productivity costs have spiralled. I suggest that a great deal of the capital gain which would seem to be evident on farmland over the past 20 years has been largely due to an inflation factor and a lessening of the value of money. I believe it is disastrous to consider a capital gains tax without taking into consideration the factor of inflation.

May I call it ten o'clock?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I might be permitted, on a point of order, to suggest what the menu might be for the next few days. Tomorrow we will resume the debate we were involved in last Wednesday on division I of part I. That is, returns, assessments, payment and appeals. Then we would proceed with division J, appeals to the Tax Review Board and the Federal Court. Following that we would deal with part XV, administration and enforcement, and part XVI, tax evasion. When we finish those tomorrow afternoon it would be the intention to return to this block of sections dealing with capital gains, and on Thursday and Friday we would proceed to sections 135, 136 and 137 dealing with co-operatives and credit unions. Without indicating the section numbers, it would then be the intention to proceed with international income next Monday and with the resource industries on Tuesday.

Progress reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. The hon. member for Chambly (Mr. L'Heureux).

THE LATE BERNARD PILON

Mr. Yvon L'Heureux (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

I should like for a moment to recall the memory of my predecessor, the friend of all hon. members, the late Bernard Pilon.

Bernard Pilon left us prematurely a year ago, following upon a heart attack which felled him as he was on his way back to Ottawa one Sunday evening.

The heart-wrenching news saddened all his friends, all his fellow citizens. All certainly wondered why that happened to one who was kindness and devotion itself, irradiating human warmth.

One day, while I was in Mr. Pilon's home, I noticed a plaque bearing a maxim expressing the philosophy of those who live according to their heart, and I quote:

When the One Great Scorer comes to write against your name, he writes: not that you won or lost but how you played the game.

Without knowing it, Bernard Pilon had posted on the wall the summary of his own life, he to whom had been given a thankless task he assumed with the sense of dedication and courtesy which was a characteristic of his life.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. This is not a question of privilege but I think the House would agree that we could forget the rules for a minute. The House will now continue with the adjournment debate.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

Resuming consideration of a motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 which was deemed to have been moved.

PUBLIC SERVICE—REQUEST FOR PUBLICATION OF REPORT OF STAFF RELATIONS COMMITTEE—IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I am certain that all members of the House were pleased to extend the necessary time in the adjournment debate in order that the hon. member for Chambly (Mr. L'Heureux) could pay his respects to the late hon. member.

To return to the point that I was attempting to raise a little earlier, about a month ago I raised some questions regarding the report on the Public Service Staff Relations Act. It might be helpful to hon. members who are unfamiliar with this matter and who are attending tonight if I quoted the exchange which took place on October 25 between the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) and myself. I quote from page 8993 of Hansard as follows:

MR. MARK ROSE (FRASER VALLEY WEST): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Since problems of morale in the public service are of long standing, many of them associated with the Public Service Staff Relations Act, and since the minister had had on his desk the report of the public service staff relations committee of three since June 15, when does the minister intend to make this report public?

HON. OTTO E. LANG (MINISTER OF MANPOWER AND IMMIGRATION): Mr. Speaker, the report referred to by the hon. member is part of work done in connection with cabinet planning of possible proposals in regard to this whole area. Any decisions about the changes that will follow in consequence thereof will be announced when the decisions are known.

MR. ROSE: Since the report is reported to contain recommendations that include the extension of the bargaining process along lines somewhat equivalent to that in the private sector, and also the right to strike under certain circumstances, when does the minister feel that these recommendations, if accepted by the government, are going to be translated into legislation?

MR. LANG: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to comment on what may or may not be in recommendations, nor try to predict the date upon which a decision will be made.

This is why I raise the question in the adjournment debate. My first comment this evening is concerned with the observation over the past three years that when this government wants to score political Brownie points it makes every effort to publicize them through white papers, press releases, various forms of flattery and draft legislation in a naked attempt to draw the people of Canada into a dialogue regarding the new policy proposal. This is not necessarily always bad. We had the white paper on taxation, the social welfare white paper and even the musings of the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) on ecological matters that are not necessarily backed up by legislation. This creates a dialogue.

On the other hand, when the issue is touchy, sensitive, liable to cost money, cause the government to give up some of its power or provide some source of embarrassment, the Liberals seek to keep all their deliberations beneath the glare of publicity and subsequent studies, paid for by the people of Canada and of vital interest to many Canadians, become internal documents meant only for the uncorruptable eyes of cabinet ministers.

This is the case with the Bryden committee study of the Public Service Staff Relations Act and related matters. Incidentally, the undercover charge made just now also applies to the Gray report of foreign ownership , the proclamation leading up to the War Measures Act and literally hundreds of other studies and reports that have been refused Members of Parliament who have requested certain public documents through the order paper procedures.

This is a very secretive government, Mr. Speaker. No wonder people are becoming increasingly disenchanted with the institution of Parliament when the government on one hand professes participation and shared decision-making, and on the other refuses to be open and frank with people and their elected representatives in developing certain intimate government plans and proposals.

It has been said frequently that this government is contemptuous of Parliament, Mr. Speaker. I for one do not believe that this government holds Parliament in contempt. Quite the opposite. I think frequently the government is terrorized by Parliament and that is precisely why in reaction to the searching initiated by the opposition the government has sought refuge in secrecy.

The plain fact of the matter is that various groups in the public service do not have even the primitive bargaining rights enjoyed in the private sector. Another fact is that there is a tremendous morale erosion in the public service because of the lethargy with which improvements have come about and the one-year stalling which the Bryden committee occupied in its deliberations. A third one is that civil servants have been jockeyed around long enough in classifications, salaries and lack of adequate appeal procedures in the current act. I am glad the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) is here. Particularly offensive is clause 7 in the act.

Finally, I believe public servants are going to demand action on the Bryden report, and they want it quickly. For not much longer will they behave as responsible supporters of the system that exploits them. Sooner or later I think they will abandon the responsible stance which they take in many of the groups of threadbare professionalism and will begin to act like a militant union, and then maybe they will get some action. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, the Bryden report has been on the minister's desk since June 15. I think it contains many progressive recommendations, and it is time it was released for all of us to see.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I am sure my hon. friend will be very satisfied with my answer. His question did not terrorize us at all and we are very happy to give the following answer.

Mr. Speaker, I can appreciate the hon. member's keen interest in staff relations in the public service. The government, too, is keenly aware that this is a most important matter and this is why the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang), who reports to Parliament for the Public Service Staff Relations Board, undertook a review of the Public Service Staff Relations Act. The minister, as the hon. member will recall, established a three-member working group to assist him in the review. The intention was to provide a vehicle whereby the views of interested parties could be co-ordinated and assessed in order that problem areas could be identified and it could be determined if revision of the act was in fact required. Submissions from all the interested parties in this area were invited and many were received and referred to the working group.

[Mr. Rose.]

As the minister indicated in the House, the report mentioned by the hon. member is a major aspect of the overall examination of staff relations in the public service. It is an integral part of the process which will enable the government to have the opportunity to give close consideration to this very important matter. It is not possible at the present time to indicate the nature or scope of proposals or to determine possible changes that will follow as a result of this review; and, Mr. Speaker, at this time I am not in a position to predict the date upon which decisions will be made or announced.

I am sure the president of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) is a good indication of our interest and the fact that we are not at all terrorized by the question of our hon. friend.

LABOUR CONDITIONS—QUEBEC—GOVERNMENT FORECAST AS TO UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I do not pretend that my intervention tonight will change even an iota of the procedure and practice the government has adopted for a few years of systematically refusing to answer the members of this House who are elected to try to inform the population through newspapers and their interventions during the debates.

I have tried for a few days now to obtain information from the government, particularly from the minister responsible for manpower, but unfortunately it has been impossible for me to obtain an answer likely to eliminate the uncertainty which prevails in that respect.

I have here a summary of the recommendations made recently by the Economic Council of Canada. May I quote a remark dealing with the very point I am trying to raise. I would like to quote a newspaper article in that connection. Here it is:

> In its annual review on the design for decision-making and their application to human resources policies, the Economic Council of Canada states that people have the right to know what is going on and what is in the making and that governments must free information from bureaucratic and political restraints which are too often imposed on it.

Mr. Speaker, a few days after this statement by the Economic Council, a press release dated November 9, 1971 and issued by the office of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) bore the title "Statutory Instruments Act" and the sub-title "Government regulations become more accessible to the public".

What amazes me is that a few days before this well-meaning statement, I was trying to obtain from the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) economic data likely to indicate to the House what the rate of unemployment would be this coming winter, as recorded at page 9034 of Hansard for October 26, 1971. But, since the minister was not in the House at that time, I put the question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), who bluntly refused to reply. I renewed my attempt the next day, October 27, as recorded at page 9089 of Hansard, and asked the Minister of Manpower and Immigration if he could give the House some indication of the extent of unemployment this winter.

My question was related to a statement made a few days before by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) during a speech in Montreal in which he had said that the government expected unemployment to reach 10 or 12 per cent during that season, especially in the province of Quebec.

I was trying to get from the minister responsible for manpower or from the Prime Minister scientific data which could enlighten the House on the present situation, or else suggestions to alleviate the disaster which threatens us.

I was surprised to realize that every time I was asked that question, I was flatly refused an answer. I would like to quote the answer of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration:

HON. OTTO E. LANG (MINISTER OF MANPOWER AND IMMIGRATION): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure, because I was not in the House yesterday, to what figures the hon. member is referring.

We all know that there are in the House a number of parliamentary secretaries whose function is precisely to inform the minister of the proceedings of the House, particularly those concerning his own department.

I cannot accept, Mr. Speaker, that under the rules of this House the ministers or parliamentary secretaries should not be allowed to answer questions of hon. members the next day.

Recently I was listening to a radio broadcast on which the right hon. Prime Minister met students near Quebec City. He did not hesitate to answer all questions, both serious and bold, which the students put to him on government policy; yet the same privilege is denied members elected for the very purpose of getting information on current problems.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) recently made a statement the text of which appeared in the Ottawa Journal on November 16. The minister predicted a growing economy, an increase in the gross national product and the creation of 234,000 new jobs. But he never said what he used as a basis for these predictions, and he refuses to give us the criteria which could help us assess the extent of unemployment we will have to face this winter. So, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired. I now recognize the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Prud'homme).

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the Department of Manpower and Immigration, jointly with Statistics Canada, conducts a monthly statistical survey on the distribution of the labour force. This survey enables us to express in percentage the employment and unemployment rates in every part of the country, not only in terms of persons who have a job or are unemployed, but including also the normal seasonal variations.

Although the department makes a continual assessment of the labour force, this monthly statistical survey is not make in order to extrapolate future employment or unemployment rates in the country.

The hon. member for Sainte-Marie knows very well that some things are unforeseeable. He also referred to a report from the Economic Council of Canada: he might also quote this part of the Council's report that suggests that we should find new manpower training formulas.

My hon. colleague might also acknowledge that, in accordance with the new policy announced for this winter, a new $20 million on-the-job manpower training program is going to be established, following the well advised recommendations of the Economic Council of Canada.

I know that the hon. member does not like us to attempt to predict things which only the Riders of the Apocalypse could predict, as he and his party could have come up with wise proposals had the rate of unemployment been high.

My hon. colleague knows very well that the government is doing its best to lower the rate of unemployment by bringing in all sorts of new programs like the one announced by the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. I am referring to the $498 million works program which is going to benefit a number of organizations. I am thinking of the local initiative program, either for municipalities or for organizations to carry out public works for which $80 million will be granted for the immediate creation of jobs—as the hon. member for Sainte-Marie should know—in order to meet a difficulty which would arise for any government in the present economic situation in view of the world situation and especially in the United States.

I am convinced that the government does its utmost to cope with that situation and, if my hon. friend has better suggestions, the government will hear him very carefully in order to reduce the unemployment rate to a minimum.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. I regret to have to interrupt the hon. Parliamentary Secretary, but his time has expired.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. The hon. member knows the rules of the House. At this point of the proceedings he cannot rise on a point of order.

FISHERIES—FEDERAL GOVERNMENT PARTICIPATION WITH MANITOBA IN INCOME SUPPORT AND RETRAINING PLAN FOR LAKE WINNIPEG FISHERMEN

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, in 1970 Lake Winnipeg was closed for fishing because certain species of fish had been found to contain levels of mercury in their flesh which made them unacceptable for human consumption. One might argue about what level of contamination is acceptable and, indeed, many people are doing so. But the fact remains that Lake Winnipeg fish were declared by the federal government to fall within the unacceptable category.

Fishermen were forced out of work. Legal proceedings were initiated by the government of Manitoba to seek damages from the companies which were believed to have contributed to the pollution of the lake, thereby bringing about its closure. A little earlier the federal government had been buying fish from the fishermen and burning them in order to prevent the possibility of contaminated fish reaching the market. Once the lake had been closed, a crash program of compensation for the fishermen affected was instituted by the federal Department of Fisheries and the government of Manitoba, the federal department supplying $1 million of the total bill of $2 million. Later, when it became obvious that the problem would not be solved immediately and that something would have to be done before the winter, the government of Manitoba established a further program costing $490,000, approached the federal Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis) for half the cost of this program and received the money.

Throughout this period the province had been working toward the establishment of income maintenance and job retraining programs which would provide a long-range solution to the problems of the fishermen affected. It was determined that this program—incidentally, it was described by federal spokesmen as imaginative—would cost somewhat in excess of $2 million for the first year. Again, the government of Manitoba went to the Minister of Fisheries with the suggestion that the federal government should pay half. But on this occasion, for some reason, the minister was unable to make such a commitment on behalf of his department. He spoke of the need to consult the departments of Manpower, Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and so forth. As a result, the implementation of the plan was delayed and became snarled in red tape.

It is even now uncertain whether contributions from the various federal departments have amounted to half the costs incurred. To this day the government of Manitoba has not received a commitment from the federal government to be responsible for half the costs incurred in attempting to help these unfortunate fishermen adjust to circumstances which were not of their making. Surely, asking the federal government to bear half the cost of this program is an extremely modest request to make, given the fact that fisheries fall under federal jurisdiction. Yet no formal recognition of its responsibility has yet been forthcoming from the federal government.

What is to happen this winter, or next year? Are the problems of the fishermen to be dealt with again on an ad hoc basis? To which federal minister must the government of Manitoba go in order to obtain a decision in principle? Logic would suggest that the appropriate person would be the Minister of Fisheries since it is he who has been involved from the beginning. Even if the money does not ultimately come from the budget of his department, surely it is he who is best equipped to go to bat for the fishermen of Manitoba before his cabinet colleagues. Surely it is he who is best able to co-ordinate federal efforts. Surely the government of Manitoba should not be expected to go from door to door. But in his answer to my question of October 19, the minister said not so. This was his reply:

> The short answer is my department is concerned with the development of an economic fishery and is not engaged in constructing an income support program for this segment of the Canadian population.

Who, then, is able to state definitely whether the federal government will accept some of the on-going financial responsibility for the problems encountered by the fishermen? The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)? Last June I asked him that question directly in the House and he intimated he would have to consult the Minister of Fisheries who, as it happened, was not in the chamber at that time.

This evening I am asking for answers to three questions. First, is the federal government prepared to accept in principle and in fact responsibility for a share of the cost incurred in meeting the problems of the fishermen involved in this special case of pollution dislocation? Second, which department and which minister are responsible for co-ordinating federal efforts in this regard? Third, when will the federal government's decision with respect to assistance be made, when will it be conveyed to the province of Manitoba, and by whom?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, we have a very difficult problem in Manitoba in respect of the fishery on Lake Winnipeg. Fishery matters, particularly conservation, and management of the fishery in that province have long been delegated to the province and are the direct responsibility of the provincial government.

Difficulties have been encountered recently in respect of income maintenance. The provincial government has developed several plans. It announces them and then asks the federal government to put up half the cost. The federal government, through its Department of the Environment, has been engaged in formulating development plans for the re-establishment of the fishery there. The fish resource was badly depleted in the 1950s and 1960s. It fell from a high of some seven million pounds, an all-time record, to half a million pounds in 1969—obviously a very poorly managed fishery.

Then the mercury problem came along. Winnipeg goldeye were fished out. Whitefish were in difficulty from a supply point of view before mercury struck. The federal Department of Fisheries, together with other provincial governments on the Prairies, had established a selling agency and was marketing all the fish from the Prairies. For a period while we were exploring the extent of the mercury problem, fish were bought and a percentage of the catch was destroyed.

Once the mercury problem indicated a closure, the federal Department of Fisheries endeavoured to develop new sources of livelihood for the fishermen. It has had a very active campaign, costing a total of $450,000 during the last 12 months as a result of which 150 fishermen have been employed. Coarse fish, fish formerly rejected and not thought to be economic, now show considerable promise.

The provincial government continues to put forward programs for income maintenance for fishermen, many of whom have had their livelihoods seriously undermined by bad management in previous years. We are hopeful that most of Lake Winnipeg can be reopened for whitefish next year. However, it will be a very low level because of the very serious depletion of the lake. Also, we are hopeful that the coarse fish operation will develop to the point where it becomes commercial and provides considerable income for a number of fishermen. Other departments have been involved in the over-all program of rehabilitation, such as the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and Manpower and Immigration. They have also assisted the provincial government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. I regret that the time allotted to the minister has expired.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.31 p.m.

PRESENCE IN SPEAKER'S GALLERY OF DR. GERHARD HERZBERG, WINNER OF NOBEL PRIZE FOR CHEMISTRY

Mr. Speaker: As hon. members know, it is only on rare occasions that the Chair can extend recognition to visitors to the Speaker's gallery who are not here in a parliamentary capacity. I am sure, however, hon. members will agree with me that on this occasion an exception should be made.

I draw to the attention of the House the presence today of Dr. Gerhard Herzberg who was recently recognized for his outstanding contribution to science by the award of the Nobel prize for chemistry.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: All Canadians were pleased and felt a great sense of pride when this outstanding scientist was recognized in this way.

On behalf of all hon. members, may I extend our congratulations to Dr. Herzberg for this great honour he has brought to himself, to the National Research Council and to Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF ADDITIONAL CONTRIBUTION FOR RELIEF OF PAKISTANI REFUGEES IN INDIA

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Canada has shown its deep concern for the plight of the Pakistani refugees in India by the contributions made by the government, provincial governments and voluntary agencies for their relief in the last few months. We have been concerned not only for the refugees themselves but for the government of India, upon whom the burden of responsibility for relief falls. It is difficult for anyone to come to grips with the dimensions and complexity of the problems caused by the greatest mass movement of mankind in modern history. These problems have both human and political aspects: it is to the human aspect that I am now addressing myself.

The response of the Indian government and people has been magnificent and their efforts to ensure that relief supplies and materials are provided and effectively distributed are beyond praise. India has had to bear a disproportionate share of the burden. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, through whom all United Nations assistance is being co-ordinated, has appealed for further contributions from the international community to meet this great humanitarian need.

To date, the nations of the world have provided approximately $240 million through multilateral and bilateral channels for refugee relief in India. Some $125 million of this amount has been pledged through the United Nations system. This amount has proved inadequate to support the massive relief program that is required and to mitigate its adverse effects on the development program of India. Without additional assistance many of the significant developmental achievements which have been made over the past two and a half decades will be jeopardized, and unless renewed efforts to share the burden are undertaken by the international community the presence of large numbers of refugees will continue to aggravate political tensions in the subcontinent.

In response to the High Commissioner for Refugees' new appeal and following the recent visit to the subcontinent of a team led by Mr. Gérin-Lajoie, the president of the Canadian International Development Agency, the government has decided that substantial additional contributions must be made available.

To date, the Canadian contribution from governmental and non-governmental sources for refugees in India amounts to $6.6 million. Of this sum, $4.3 million has been provided by the federal government, $370,000 by the provinces, and $1.9 million by voluntary agencies and the combined appeal for Pakistani relief. It is the government's intention to supplement these contributions by an amount of $18 million, seeking the authority and funds from Parliament. This will bring the Canadian government's total contribution for the relief of refugees in India to $22 million, coincidentally representing approximately one dollar for every Canadian. Members of the House will be interested to know that Mr. Gérin-Lajoie will be making a statement to this effect on behalf of Canada at the United Nations tomorrow.

In addition to the funds provided for refugees in India, Canada has contributed $7 million in food aid through the world food program for the relief of suffering in East Pakistan and provided to the United Nations $500,000 to help defray the cost of United Nations relief operations there.

The new funds to be provided will be applied in accordance with the needs and priorities as seen by the government of India, the United Nations and the CIDA fact-finding team. A part of the funds will be devoted to direct humanitarian relief through the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. Part will be directed through Canadian voluntary agencies' contributions to relief operations in India. Part will be provided to the government of India in the form of goods and services.

Different forms of assistance are required. In our view, and that of the government of India, one appropriate kind of assistance would be debt relief to ease the burden on the Indian economy. The Aid to India Consortium, meeting on October 26, discussed this particular form of aid. To be effective, such relief requires the concerted efforts and co-operation of other major donors, and Canada is ready to meet other donors to discuss this question.

Continued, increased and effective aid is a question of the greatest urgency. It will help to alleviate the suffering of those caught up in this human tragedy. Dealing with this aspect of the problem can also help to reduce tension. But it does not offer any solution to the underlying problem. A political solution must be found which will allow the refugees to return to a secure and democratic society in East Pakistan. I regret, Mr. Speaker, that at the moment I see little hope of an early resolution of the problem. Canada once again joins with other nations in urging upon the governments of India and Pakistan restraint and forbearance in the face of the grave difficulties that must be overcome before a lasting settlement can be achieved.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, there have been times in the past when I have taken exception to the actions and pronouncements of the minister and, no doubt, there will be times in the future when I shall do so. But this is not one of them. I applaud what the hon. gentleman has said. It would be easy for a member speaking for the opposition to say that Canada's contribution should be greater. But it would be iniquitous to say it should be less.

I come from one of the disadvantaged areas of Canada, a part which has too little of the economic assets of this country, and the situation is not improving in that respect. I know that among the narrow-minded and the small of heart there is a tendency to say that charity begins at home. My own observations lead me to believe that people who say this are never very charitable at home, either. So I can say to the minister that I have no intention, no matter what may lie ahead, to try to take political advantage of the fact that a goodly sum will be voted in this case.

I have reservations about some of our external aid programs and I believe the time has come to examine them. But this is not in that category. The need is so great, so compelling and so urgent that, while we want to know more precisely the form the aid will take, I applaud wholeheartedly the announcement by the government and support it with every fibre of my being. I hope there will be no wastage and administrative duplication. I hope every effort will be made and every avenue canvassed to give assistance.

I enthusiastically concur in what the minister said about the efforts of the government of India and the people of India. They have been dealing with a massive burden for which they did not ask and which they should not and cannot bear alone. Therefore we, as part of the international community, must respond as the minister has indicated we are responding. We must assist; we must do our part. Even if the minister had announced double the aid we are going to give we would still be doing far, far less than what is being done by India, a land with such immense economic and political problems of its own. The international community must continue to help; it must do more.

I welcome this new move announced by the government. I hope the governments of the provinces will help as well, and I note that some of them have made special efforts in this regard. But most important of all, I believe, is the response not of Canada's governments but of Canada's citizens. I think this, above all, is the way that we should show the extent of our compassion for what is perhaps the greatest human tragedy in modern times. Most of our people are in and of the Christian tradition. In these days when there has been a flowering of the ecumenical spirit and a breaking down of the walls of bigotry and intolerance I think this is a magnificent opportunity for people of the Christian fold to show compassion and concern for their fellow humans of a different theological belief.

I note too the minister's reference to the political situation and I feel that I must share his general outlook, which is somewhat pessimistic. I do hope that our government is using all its resources, bilaterally, within the Commonwealth and in the United Nations, to do what can be done on the political front to bring about a solution. I say here what I said in India and in Pakistan a few months ago, that war between these two Commonwealth states is an intolerable concept, something that would merely compound to the nth degree the terrible problems that already exist. Therefore something between the painful tragic status quo and war must be achieved. We cannot see repeated in the Far East the terrible, painful continuum of refugees which for so long has prevailed in the Middle East. I urge the government to press for a solution in every possible way. I also urge the government of Pakistan—and I have not joined the "hate Pakistan league"—to do everything within their country to assuage the difficulties and mitigate this terrible human problem.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I shall be relatively short. I join the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) in congratulating the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) for the step that he has announced. It is always very difficult to say just how much aid should be given because one could argue over the precise amount. But I think we can proudly say that the announcement of the minister represents a generous contribution to assist the refugees. In making this gesture to assist and aid the suffering in that unhappy part of the world I am certain the minister spoke for all Canadians.

I think that countries like Canada should make a greater effort than they have made until now—I do not say that in criticism of any government or minister—in order to seek a political solution. It is very frustrating to a good many people in the world, as it should be to members of this House, that it is possible for a military clique in a country to upset the decision of the people of that country and to oust those who were democratically elected by the people to represent them in the Parliament of that country and substitute for the democratic process a military dictatorship, which is in fact what we have in Pakistan now, and get away with it, despite the fact that millions of people are literally ejected from that country as a result of the circumstances created by the military dictatorship. I suggest the time must not be far off when the international community, through the United Nations, is able to take steps to solve a political problem of that sort.

I also suggest on behalf of my colleagues and myself that we ought not always to remain neutral in these obvious situations of evil doing by military colonels and the like. I suggest that Canada ought now to terminate all military deliveries to Pakistan as well as the economic aid that now goes to that country. When we continue to give military and economic aid what we are enabling the present government of Pakistan to do is to use the foreign currency it might need to purchase things in the world to add to its military strength in order to continue to oppress not only the people of East Pakistan but of West Pakistan as well.

In short, Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the minister for the generous contribution he has offered to assist the refugees. I plead with him and the government to take the other steps I have suggested which might help to bring about a political solution.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I will try to be brief even if we are dealing with drama suffered by a part of mankind. In fact, it can be seen that the consequences of the original sin weigh heavily on mankind.

The hon. minister has just announced that supplementary and much more generous assistance will be granted by the government to the refugees in India. We could hardly object to that decision since its purpose is to help suffering mankind.

India is presently facing serious problems due to the millions of refugees who had to flee their country. But India must also face another problem. Although it helps refugees, it would seem that they are much better treated than Indians themselves.

The problem facing that area today did not just spring up but has been around for a long time, and I admit that we should hasten the solution of that crisis through political means, for it is above all a political question.

The piper has to be paid. But India itself is not foreign to the situation prevailing in Pakistan; it is so to speak one of the outside agents of the present conflict, which goes back to 1948.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that the assistance Canada intends to give it should be used by India, not to make investments and enslave part of Pakistan, but to help the Pakistani refugees who fled before the hatred born of political differences.

AIR TRANSPORT

HIJACKING—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I ask the unanimous consent of the House to propose a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In light of the fact that Canada signed the convention at The Hague last December 16, 1970, in light of the fact that the Canadian Airline Pilots, Association has been pressing the government for legislation to cover the crime of air piracy, and in light of the fact that a terrible tragedy almost occurred on flight 812 out of the city of Calgary, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin):

That Bill C-231, an act to amend the Criminal Code of Canada, entitled air piracy, be brought forward for second reading and treated as a government measure to be sent to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs for study and final implementation.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Calgary North. This motion is moved under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The motion cannot be put.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I believe the Minister of Justice really wanted to second it and I am sure the hon. member for Peace River would withdraw as seconder.

Mr. Baldwin: I would, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure that would change the result of the inquiry that has just come from the Chair. Perhaps the hon. member might consider putting the motion again tomorrow in those terms.

SCREENING OF FOREIGN INVESTMENT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to present a motion under Standing Order 43. May I remind the House that when one seeks unanimous consent at this point he is not asking that the motion necessarily be supported by all members. One is simply asking for consent for the motion to be put so that the House can make the decision.

An hon. Member: Don't be so stupid.

An hon. Member: We understand that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend across the way says he understands that but the response from the other side does not always lead one to that conclusion. The urgent and pressing necessity for this motion is the desirability of clearing up the uncertainty of the government's position with regard to a certain matter that has been before the House during the last two or three days. I therefore ask leave, seconded by the hon.

member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), to move the following motion:

That any minute or other document recording a decision of cabinet respecting the screening of foreign investment in Canada, dated July 29, 1971, or at any time subsequent thereto, be tabled forthwith.

Mr. Speaker: Again this motion is proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43 and thus requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is obviously not unanimity on this point and the motion cannot be put.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TABLING OF STATEMENT ON CHEMICAL AND BIOLOGICAL WARFARE WITHDRAWING CANADIAN OPTION TO MAKE USE OF TEAR GAS

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table the text in both languages of the statement of Canada's position regarding chemical and biological warfare.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is not the one I asked for.

Mr. Baldwin: How about parliamentary warfare?

Mr. Sharp: This statement was made yesterday at the first committee of the United Nations General Assembly in the course of an intervention on disarmament by the Canadian delegate, Mr. George Ignatieff, and it has the effect of withdrawing Canada's previously maintained option to make first use of tear gas in warfare.

Mr. Baldwin: We give unanimous consent.

GOVERNMENT GUARANTEE OF LOAN TO MING SUNG INDUSTRIAL CO. LTD.

Question No. 1,912—Mr. MacLean:

1. With regard to the government's guarantee of a loan of $10,200,000 made by Canadian banks to the Ming Sung Industrial Company Limited, what payments, if any, has the government made to Canadian banks in addition to the $2,962,977.30 paid up until December 10, 1952?

2. Has the government recovered any of the payments made to Canadian banks under the terms of the government's guarantee of this loan?

3. Were the assets of the Ming Sung Industrial Company taken over by the Government of mainland China?

4. Has may attempt been made by the government to recover from the Government of mainland China the amount owing, either before or since the Government of mainland China was recognized by Canada?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): 1. The loan to the Ming Sung Industrial Company was for an amount of $12,750,000 not $10,200,000. Payments made to the chartered banks after December 10, 1952 totalled $11,506,205.76, including interest.

2. No.

3. The evidence suggests that most of the assets passed into the control of the local authorities of the People's Republic of China.

4. During the negotiation between Canada and the People's Republic of China which preceded the establishment of diplomatic relationship, the Canadian side referred to the existence of the Ming Sung claims. In response the Chinese indicated a willingness to discuss the matter after relations were established. The Canadian Government intends to raise this and other claims with the Government of the People's Republic of China through local diplomatic channels and hopes to negotiate an equitable settlement.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

Question No. 1,955—Mr. Godin:

1. What were the construction costs for the first Parliament Building (Centre Block)?

2. What was the value in dollars of this same building when it was restored after the fire?

3. What is the building's present value in dollars?

4. In what year were the following buildings constructed (a) East Block (b) West Block?

5. How much did they cost initially and what is their present value in dollars?

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): 1. $1,836,857,27.

2. Cost of restoration—$11,919,082.04.

3. The value of the building in relation to its intrinsic historical posture is impossible to state. The depreciated replacement value would require a very detailed analysis.

4. (a) and (b) A contract was let for both buildings in 1860 and construction continued over a period of years.

5. Initial cost: East Block—$688,444.16; West Block—$1,131,735.33; again, an assigned present value would be very difficult because of the subjective aspect of historical value.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

INDIAN AFFAIRS

INDIAN EDUCATION IN NORTHEASTERN ALBERTA

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 26 I ask leave to move a motion for the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter, namely, the crisis in Indian education in northeastern Alberta. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That the House do adjourn to discuss this important matter.

Mr. Chrétien: I wish to rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I would like to inform the uninformed member that the two reserves have voted to return to the school system and the pupils should be back in school soon if they are not back now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I did not understand clearly the purport of the minister's question of privilege. In any event, the Chair will refer to the motion proposed at this time by the hon. member for Athabasca.

The Chair has received the required notice under the provision of Standing Order 26 from the hon. member for Athabasca, dealing with the matter to which he has alluded in his proposed motion for the adjournment of the House.

I have given very earnest consideration to the problem posed by the hon. member, and I wish to state immediately that it is my view that this is a matter of great concern not only to him but I am sure to all hon. members.

I have had an opportunity to give careful consideration to the explanatory material submitted by the hon. member in conjunction with his proposed motion, and in passing I wish to say to him that I am most grateful to him for the assistance he has rendered to the Chair in its perusal of the problem. It is most helpful indeed for the Chair to have as full an understanding on a situation which might affect the granting of a debate under Standing Order 26 as possible.

Having said that, I am faced with the question whether or not the problem alluded to by the hon. member meets the procedural requirements of Standing Order 26.

I have thought about this question carefully and have come to the conclusion that, for the time being at least, I cannot agree that the scheduled business of the House should be set aside for the purpose of an emergency debate on this matter. I say this with some regret, but that regret is tempered by my understanding—that understanding was conveyed to the Chair by the hon. member in the written material which he submitted for my consideration along with his notice of motion—that there may be a desire on the part of hon. members to set some time aside by agreement for an opportunity to discuss this problem. If that is the case, consultations might lead to an arrangement under which a discussion could be held in the House at an early moment.

However, having considered all the circumstances and taking into account the possibility of a debate in other circumstances, I would not feel disposed to agree to the hon. member's request for the setting aside of our normal business under the provisions of Standing Order 26.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, notice of motion No. 260 is acceptable to the government, and I would like to table the documents forthwith.

CORRESPONDENCE CONCERNING ENVIRONMENTAL DAMAGE FROM PROPOSED TANKER ROUTE

Motion No. 260—Mr. Anderson:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House a copy of the government's communication to the Government of the United States presented in the latter half of August of 1971 concerning environmental damage from the proposed tanker route between Valdez, Alaska and Cherry Point, Washington.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call notices of motions Nos. 254 and 258.

COPY OF CORRESPONDENCE RELATIVE TO ALLEGATIONS MADE BY ROBIN AUSTIN AND JOHN FEATHERSTONHAUGH, Q.C.

Motion No. 254—Mr. MacDonald (Egmont):

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all correspondence between the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the Combines Investigation Branch relative to allegations made by Robin Austin, Esq. and John Featherstonhaugh, Q.C.

Mr. D. R. Tolmie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs: Mr. Speaker, it is contrary to public policy to produce internal correspondence of the type mentioned which are privileged and confidential communications. In the circumstances I wonder whether the hon. member would withdraw his motion.

Mr. Baldwin: I think the hon. member may want to make that decision when he returns.

Mr. MacEachen: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

CORRESPONDENCE RELATING TO ESTABLISHMENT OF HEAVY WATER PLANT IN MONTMAGNY

Motion No. 258—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and any other documents between any department or Minister of the Government of Quebec, as well as Hydro-Quebec and the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources concerning the establishment of a heavy water plant in Montmagny during the period 1965 to 1971.

[Translation]

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, a search of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources files has failed to produce any documents between that department and any department or minister of the government of Quebec as well as Hydro-Quebec concerning the establishment of a heavy water plant in Montmagny during the period 1965 to 1971. I would therefore ask the hon. member for Bellechasse to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is withdrawn.

The order is cancelled and the motion is withdrawn.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the other notices of motion be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Parliamentary Secretary when I can expect an answer to Notice of Motion No. 251 which has been on the Order Paper since September 27, 1971?

[English]

Mr. Jerome: I have made note of that, Mr. Speaker.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT—DISCREPANCIES BETWEEN CABINET DOCUMENT AND VERSION PUBLISHED IN MONTREAL «GAZETTE»—CREATION OF SCREENING MECHANISM

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister a question. In view of the answer that he gave me yesterday referring to one discrepancy between the cabinet document and the text as published in the Montreal Gazette yesterday, has the Acting Prime Minister had an opportunity to check further what was published against his own copy of the document, or has he found that his own copy is missing?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Has he had an opportunity to check it and can he tell me whether he has found any other discrepancies between his copy of the document and what was published in the Gazette?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): As I said yesterday, there are some discrepancies between what appeared and the record as disclosed in the cabinet document. That is the statement I have made and I have nothing more to add to it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Why not table it?

Mr. Stanfield: In order to clear up the confusion, which I am sure even the hon. gentleman must recognize exists, can he assure the House that, as reported in the Gazette, the cabinet has taken the position in principle that the main policy approach to the question of foreign takeovers would be the creation of a screening process?

Mr. Sharp: The hon. gentleman has been the head of a government and he knows that in the process of reaching a final decision—

Mr. Stanfield: Yes or no.

Mr. Sharp: —many decisions are taken along the way but that no decision is taken on a question until the day that a cabinet minister or the Prime Minister is authorized to make a statement. Up to that time everything is in flux.

Mr. Baldwin: The cabinet in flux.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Hon. members over there seem to be all worked up about something. I take it that the decision in principle has been made. Arising out of this leak of a cabinet document I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether there has been any communication, either formally or informally, on behalf of the government with the United States government or any officials of that government, either on the initiative of Canada or in response to questions with regard to the subject matter of the leak and, if so, what has been said to the U.S. government or its officials?

• (2:40 p.m.)

Mr. Sharp: So far as I am aware, Mr. Speaker, there has been no communication in either direction. Certainly we have taken no initiative, and I personally have not been in receipt of any communications from the United States government on this question.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question of the Acting Prime Minister. Since giving his answers yesterday has he had an opportunity to compare the original document, which he spoke about, with the document that was printed in the Montreal Gazette?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, as soon as I read that document in the Gazette it led me to find out whether there was a leak. I confirmed that it was obviously a leak but that it was not a word for word statement of what had appeared in the government document.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Acting Prime Minister has set out one discrepancy and therefore he has made some disclosure—that is obvious—will he now set out very clearly the differences between the original document and the copy that he compared so that this matter can be cleared up?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, this seems to me to be a very unreasonable request because otherwise it would be quite possible for anyone to put a document in the papers and say, "This is a government document," and then ask for the production of the one it purported to represent.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT—RESCINDING OR MODIFICATION OF DECISION RESPECTING CREATION OF SCREENING MECHANISM

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact the minister said on Monday that no decision had been taken on the basis of the published version of the Gray Report, and that yesterday a document indicated agreement had been reached in principle in the cabinet, and that the minister was quoted as saying outside the House that this was a question of a cabinet decision being conveyed illegally to the press, can the minister clear up this question of when a decision is not a decision, and may I ask the Acting Prime Minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member might like to rephrase the question. It seems to me that the hon. member is asking the Acting Prime Minister to indicate when a decision is not a decision, and at this point I think we get involved in semantics. The question might be rephrased.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, I was leading up to ask the Acting Prime Minister if any action has been taken by the cabinet to rescind or modify the decision which was taken on July 29 to agree in principle to the setting up of a screening mechanism to deal with foreign takeovers?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, all I can say without breaking my oath of secrecy is that the whole subject of foreign ownership has been under discussion many times since July 29. I am hopeful that we will not have to have many more meetings before we reach final decisions.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether he is making the categorical assertion that the statement which appeared in the Montreal Gazette yesterday, to the effect that the government had agreed in principle to the setting up of a screening mechanism, is inaccurate and no such decision was reached by the cabinet?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, there have been many of these kinds of "decisions" reached by the cabinet on many subjects over a long period of time. I say to the hon. member, as a former first minister of a government, that he knows the only time a decision is made is when some authority is given to make a statement expressing government policy.

FOREIGN OWNERSHIP—DETERMINATION OF SOURCE OF LEAK OF CABINET DOCUMENT—POSSIBILITY OF PROSECUTION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, with so many being in fear of the revelation that they might have participated in this leak and in order to clarify the situation, would the Acting Prime Minister say whether the RCMP have made any reports on their investigation or whether Goyer's refined Gestapo—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would think the right hon. gentleman would know that ministers and members ought to be referred to either by their responsibilities as members of the government or by reference to their constituencies.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, there was no identification of any member. There was simply a description of a new secret organization that has been built up.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, will the Acting Prime Minister say, in order to relieve the fears of some members of the Press Gallery and even of some of the ministers opposite, whether or not there has been any determination made as to the source of the leak and, in particular, what the government has in mind as to prosecution against those who revealed what was already known?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the right hon. gentleman would agree that before we make policy we should have the facts. We do not have the facts; we have not yet completed our inquiries, and may I add that the police have not yet been called in.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, in view of the deep sense of concern the minister expressed yesterday and the fact that for two or three days nothing has been found out by the minister himself, does he not think it is about time to start to investigate this serious matter which he spoke of in such dulcet tones?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I agree entirely with the right hon. gentleman except for the remark about dulcet tones.

Mr. Speaker: Order please. There are three or four hon. members who wish to ask supplementaries, the hon. member for Yukon, the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North and others. I think we should complete our first round of questioning and then I will return to them. The hon. member for York South.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege involving the answers given by the Acting Prime Minister both today and yesterday. If Your Honour will refer to page 9594 of yesterday's Hansard, in reply to the second question of the Leader of the Opposition the Acting Prime Minister, referring to the investigation, informed the House that "an investigation was launched immediately the report was heard on the radio this morning." That was Tuesday morning. But after the oral question period yesterday the Acting Prime Minister appeared in the Commonwealth Room at a press conference and informed the media that the Prime Minister's office had already started some investigations on the Saturday as soon as the matter was revealed in the press. One or the other of these two statements is accurate and one or the other is false. Either the investigations were started on Saturday, as the Acting Prime Minister informed a press conference yesterday, or they were started, as he informed the House, on Tuesday. I wonder which is true.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the truth is—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: We are making progress at last.

Mr. Sharp: —that when the Leader of the Opposition asked me the question I gave my own reaction to it at that time, which was that I had not had or heard that report until the morning of that day. Indeed, I was startled by the question that was put to me on the previous day by the Leader of the Opposition. Unfortunately the Leader of the Opposition then moved the adjournment of the House, preventing continuation of the discussion, and in the interval I discovered that the Prime Minister's office had already begun these inquiries.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York South.

FINANCE

DISCUSSION OF CANADIAN DOLLAR EXCHANGE RATE IN MEETINGS WITH AMERICANS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, if the Acting Prime Minister is no longer in flux and still continues to be in a mood to tell the truth I would like to ask him a question arising out of a statement by Secretary of the Treasury Connally of the United States. That other subject and the non-answers are enough for one day. As I say, I would like to ask him a question arising out of a statement by Secretary of the Treasury Connally to the effect that the No. 1 item which the Americans have placed before the Canadians in various meetings is the question of the Canadian exchange rate in relation to the American dollar, and that there has been some discussion and some agreement with regard to it. I would ask the Acting Prime Minister whether exchange rates have been a subject of discussion in the meetings he referred to yesterday in answer to a question which I asked him and whether any—

• (2:50 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would hope the hon. member would ask his question. If the hon. member looks at Hansard tomorrow I am sure he will see that the question, which normally ought to be put briefly and directly, has, it seems to me, been taking a rather inordinate amount of time to be asked. In any event, I invite him to try to ask the question as soon as possible and I apologize to him for having interrupted him.

Mr. Lewis: I was in the middle of it, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: Has the question of the exchange rate of the Canadian dollar been one of the matters discussed in the meetings between Canadian and American representatives, and has the government indicated any policy with regard to it?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the question of exchange rates has, of course, been a central issue in discussions by the United States with countries generally, including Canada. Our position has been that we have complied with the requirements laid down by Secretary Connally who asked at the International Monetary Fund meeting that governments should make tangible progress toward dismantling specific barriers to trade and that they should "be prepared to allow market realities freely to determine exchange rates for their currencies for a transitional period." We have allowed objective, impersonal forces to determine our exchange rate and therefore we feel that we have entirely complied with the requirement of the United States.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, the Acting Prime Minister gave us yesterday a list of issues which the Americans had raised at these meetings. Am I right in concluding that the question of exchange rates should have been one of the issues that the Acting Prime Minister should have mentioned yesterday, and are the discussions with regard to exchange rates continuing between the two sides?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the question that was asked of me yesterday, if I did not misunderstand it, was in relation to the meetings then going on or which had been going on on Monday. This question of exchange rates was not raised during those meetings.

Mr. Thompson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Thompson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I believe I was the first member on his feet to ask a supplementary to the original question asked by the Leader of the Official Opposition. Some hon. members are being given the opportunity to ask three or four questions.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will appreciate that, according to longstanding practice, an opportunity is given for the leader of each group in the House to lead off with a question on behalf of his group. The Leader of the Opposition led off on behalf of his party and there were a number of supplementaries. I indicated a moment ago that I would return to other hon. members, including the hon. member for Red Deer and the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North so they might ask supplementaries. In all fairness, there are other parties in the House and they must be given an opportunity to ask questions also. That is why the hon. member for York South was recognized and will be allowed to ask a further supplementary question.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a further supplementary on this subject which is obviously a very important matter for the Canadian economy and particularly the export side. Is the Acting Prime Minister in a position to tell the House whether or not the American representatives indicated the level at which they want the Canadian dollar to be with respect to the exchange in terms of rate with the United States dollar?

Mr. Sharp: Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker.

INCOME TAX

QUEBEC—REQUEST THAT BILL BE STUDIED BY FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS—SUGGESTED ONE-YEAR DELAY IN IMPLEMENTATION

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the hon. Acting Prime Minister.

Is the government ready to comply with the request of the Quebec Prime Minister who asks, first, that there be a joint federal-provincial study of the tax provisions on international undertakings before the tax reform bill is passed and, second, that implementation of the new tax system be delayed for one year because of its complexity and the numerous difficulties involved in its interpretation and implementation?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding of government policy that the government intends to proceed with the tax legislation that is before the House.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I feel it necessary to raise a question of privilege in view of what the Acting Prime Minister said a moment or two ago when explaining the answer he had given to the House yesterday in responding to a question from me as to when the government had first learned of the leak of a cabinet document. He said in part, as recorded at page 9595 of Hansard:

I now find that there appeared in one newspaper on Saturday, one that I had not seen and that the Prime Minister had not seen, what purported to be an extract from a cabinet document. If at that time we had realized that the document had been revealed, then the inquiry would have been launched immediately. One was launched as soon as there was some evidence that there had been a breach of cabinet security.

The Acting Prime Minister apparently said something different outside the House and he evidently feels it sufficient, having given that answer to me yesterday, to come into the House today and say that he had no opportunity to make a correction before the House. I have to say in all sincerity, Mr. Speaker, that the answer the Acting Prime Minister gave me yesterday was wrong.

Mr. Nielsen: It was not true.

Mr. Stanfield: It is an affront to this House that he should have gone outside and made a different statement and then have seen no reason when he came back into the House to seize the first opportunity to correct what he had said in the House and also feel no necessity to do so today. I must say that as the Leader of the Opposition I feel aggrieved. I feel I have a real grievance and that members of the House have a real grievance in that the Acting Prime Minister has failed to correct what he said in the House. I feel that this constitutes a breach of the privileges of this House by the Acting Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, if I have in any way offended the House it was quite inadvertent, and I make a profound apology. If I had had the information at the time the hon. member asked me the question, I would have so answered it then.

An hon. Member: Obviously the minister had it.

Mr. Sharp: There were inquiries under way at that time and it seemed to me that this was not a matter of very great importance. However, I regret that I appear to have offended the Leader of the Opposition, and I apologize.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT—TIME OF POLICY DECISION

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. In his statement in the Commonwealth Room yesterday he mentioned on a number of occasions the tremendous amount of confusion that has resulted from leaks of government information to the press and he indicated that in order to clear up the confusion there is necessity for an immediate decision on this matter. Can the Acting Prime Minister tell the House when he expects a decision will be rendered in this regard?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I speak for all my colleagues when I express the hope that it will be as soon as possible.

Mr. Coates: Can the Acting Prime Minister assure us that a decision will be rendered regardless of the problems associated with the 10 per cent surcharge and other problems in the United States?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I think it is important that government decisions be taken in light of all the facts, but I can assure the hon. member that the 10 per cent surcharge has very little to do with it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hope the hon. member for Red Deer has accepted the explanation I attempted to give him a moment ago and is now prepared to ask his supplementary. I would be delighted to hear from him.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT—CESSATION OF POLICY FORMULATION BECAUSE OF POSSIBLE UNITED STATES RETALIATION

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the original question asked by my leader. It is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact the Acting Prime Minister stated yesterday that any public consideration by the government of foreign investment policy at this time would muddle present talks or relations with the United States, has the government halted its policy-making on foreign investment because it might lead to United States retaliation at this time or because it fears a hardening of the United States position on the surcharge?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, what I said was that the confusion which resulted from leaks from Cabinet was not helping in the discussions with the United States. But I think we should make up our own minds as to what is in the best of interests of Canada and we should not allow any other country to determine our policy.

POLICY RESPECTING PUBLICATION OF CONFIDENTIAL CABINET DOCUMENTS—POSSIBILITY OF LEGISLATION TO PROHIBIT

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am beginning to wonder to which question my supplementary is supplementary. It arises out of the questions asked by my leader and other members of the House with regard to the news conference outside the House involving the Acting Prime Minister. Was the Acting Prime Minister expressing government policy outside the House yesterday when he is reported to have said the following with regard to the publication of confidential privy council documents, as found in a by-line story by Arthur Blakeney in the Montreal Gazette today:

This is a very, very serious matter. Moreover, not only do I think that it is very serious, but I don't really think anyone who gets access to government documents has a right to publish them. I don't think so.

Does this accurately reflect government policy, even though the security of the state is not at issue, and does the publication of fact on Tuesday make fiction out of Monday?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I stand by the statement I made.

An hon. Member: Which one?

Mr. Nowlan: In view of that answer, Mr. Speaker, I have to ask the Minister of Justice a supplementary. I hope the Acting Prime Minister understood his own statement and read it well. In view of the answer of the Acting Prime Minister, is the Minister of Justice preparing legislation to prohibit the publication of confidential privy council documents?

An hon. Member: Come on.

Mr. Nowlan: After all, he implemented the War Measures Act.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: If so, have his law officers advised him that such legislation would contravene the Bill of Rights?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

Mr. Nowlan: In view of the fact the Minister of Justice did not hear the question—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order? The Chair has recognized the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. I did not see any minister rise to reply to the hon. member's supplementary.

Mr. Nowlan: There is a problem with the sound system today, let alone the many problems across the way. To be fair to the Minister of Justice, I will repeat my question. I think this is a legitimate question. In view of the answer of the Acting Prime Minister and in view of the history of this Parliament, is the minister preparing legislation to prohibit the publication of confidential Privy Council documents and, if so, has he had any advice from his law officers that the Bill of Rights may be involved?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): No, Sir.

FISHERIES

CANADIAN POSITION ON PROHIBITION OF FISHING FOR ANADROMOUS SPECIES ON HIGH SEAS

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, the Acting Prime Minister will be relieved to know that I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Bell: He will still mess it up.

Mr. Barnett: In connection with the upcoming law of the sea conference, has the government of Canada stated a position that all high-seas fishing for anadromous species of fish beyond the 12-mile limit should be stopped and, if so, to whom has this statement of the government's position been made? Also, is it possible for the Secretary of State for External Affairs to table this statement of government policy in the House?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think this is the general policy of the Canadian government. I think the hon. member expressed it reasonably well. As to whether we have yet had an opportunity to make such a statement before a conference, I would have to determine. I do not think there has yet been an opportunity for making that public declaration.

COMPETITION BILL

POSSIBLE AMENDMENT IN LINE WITH REPORT TO CABINET BY MINISTER OF CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Has the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs reported to the cabinet with regard to the new Competition Act, as required by the cabinet memorandum of July 29? If so, does the government intend to amend the Competition Act within the terms of the request contained in that memorandum?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member should ask the minister when he is in the House tomorrow.

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am asking the Acting Prime Minister whether a report has been made to the cabinet.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my colleague that also.

HEALTH

POSSIBLE INCLUSION OF DENTAL CARE IN PROVINCIAL MEDICARE PLANS

Mr. Murray McBride (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): My question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of information supplied by the minister to this House at an earlier date concerning the fact that no province had yet decided to include dental care under its medical health care plan, do recent news reports indicate that such an agreement has now been achieved with the province of Ontario?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker. I have not been advised by the government of Ontario about a desire on their part to extend coverage under medicare to include dental care.

ATOMIC ENERGY

CAPE BRETON HEAVY WATER PLANT

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): My question is for the government House leader. Will the minister assure the House that, on behalf of all the constituents of Cape Breton, he will keep the type of representation in the future that brought to that island the heavy water plant?

Mr. McBride: Order.

Mr. MacInnis: Will the minister convey that information to the member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton and others?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Bellechasse. Order, please. I will allow the hon. member a supplementary although I am sure he appreciates that his question, of course, was more in the form of a representation. The hon. member also knows that a question has to be asked of the minister in his capacity of being responsible for certain aspects of the administration.

Mr. MacInnis: I rise on a point of order to bring to Your Honour's attention the fact that this is not a representation to the minister. To support my contention, I draw Your Honour's attention to the fact that this question was originally asked by the Premier of Nova Scotia when he was a member of this House. The question was not ruled out of order at that time. I think the minister should make available to his party's supporters who are trying to wreck—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked the hon. parliamentary secretary a question—

[Mr. Baldwin.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry, but the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond is again rising on a point of order.

[English]

Mr. MacInnis: I rise on a further point of order. I direct this to the minister. If he does not wish to protect his own government's position with regard to the renovation of the heavy water plant—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. MacInnis: I have available what I think might be considered an official document, 19 pages of copy from Hansard. I will make it available to Liberal members so they will know the truth of the matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is not a point of order. I bring to the attention of all hon. members that we are running short of time and many members are seeking an opportunity to ask questions.

REPRESENTATIONS OF QUEBEC MINISTER TO OBTAIN FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE FROM FEDERAL GOVERNMENT—STUDY OF POSSIBLE INCREASE IN HOG SUPPORT PRICE

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I put a question to the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture and he replied that he would inquire and answer me later.

Here is my question: Could he tell us whether representations were made by the Quebec minister of agriculture to the federal government calling for financial assistance in respect of the provincial program in order to assist producers of hogs, eggs and turkeys in the province of Quebec who are now enduring great hardship?

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, after checking with the department I realized that the Quebec minister of agriculture did, some time ago, make representations somewhat similar to those of the hon. member for Bellechasse. That goes back to the beginning of October.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

I would like to know if the Department of Agriculture or the Agricultural Stabilization Board is considering at this time the possibility of increasing the support price of hogs which is now $24.14.

Mr. Lessard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member undoubtedly knows that there is an Agricultural Stabilization Act which also covers hog prices. If the average price for pork this year is lower than that of previous years,—and that, on a basis of 80 per cent,—there might be a support payment—

QUEBEC—INTERPRETATION OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT CONCESSION RESPECTING CERTAIN COST-SHARING PROGRAMS

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question of the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

We are told that at the federal-provincial first ministers' conference, the federal government has agreed to increase special abatement points for Quebec from 22 to 24 in connection with hospitalization and health insurance programs. Can this concession be taken as a sign of recognition by the federal government of a special status for Quebec, at least in the fields which I have just mentioned, as was indicated yesterday by the Quebec premier at a news conference?

[English]

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker. There were previous arrangements with Quebec relative to hospital insurance dating back to 1964. These are not changed. The province does not operate under the system of tax points with reference to medicare, as the hon. member knows. The health proposals which were discussed with the provinces had to do with a new formula based on a per capita assessment and did not involve the equalization formula per se.

Mr. Speaker: I would allow the hon. member a supplementary question but the question period has to end at 3.19 p.m. There are four minutes left.

LABOUR RELATIONS

POSSIBLE STRIKE BY BELL CANADA EMPLOYEES—REQUEST FOR FEDERAL GOVERNMENT INTERVENTION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour or to the Minister of Transport, whichever of the two feels best suited to answer it, regarding the anticipated strike by Bell Canada operators. As I understand the situation, a 90 per cent vote has now authorized a strike. I am wondering whether the minister is aware of this and whether he is prepared to intervene? Is he in a position to offer some compromise formula on the basis of which the two parties can return to the bargaining table?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): I am well aware of it, Mr. Speaker. I am also aware of the fact that if the employees decide to go on strike they have a legal right to do so. I believe both parties know that my department is quite prepared, as it did two years ago, to provide mediation services provided, of course, both sides ask for those services. If not, we shall have to see how long we can make do with a strike affecting the Bell telephone system.

RESEARCH

FARM MACHINERY—ASSISTANCE TO PRAIRIE PROVINCES IN ESTABLISHING TESTING CENTRE

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker I have a question for the Minister of State for Science and Technology. In view of the statement in Professor Barber's report that Canadian farm machinery companies were not getting their fair share of the market because they could not afford to pay for the necessary technological research and development, is the minister prepared to recommend that funds be provided to assist the three prairie governments which are now setting up a research and development centre for testing farm machinery?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of State for Science and Technology): I am not familiar with the suggestion made by the hon. member but I will be pleased to take it under consideration.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT STATISTICS—ALLEGED PROHIBITION AGAINST RELEASE BY GOVERNMENT REGIONAL ECONOMISTS

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. Can the hon. gentleman inform the House why government regional economists have now been instructed not to release unemployment statistics concerning lay-offs across the country but, rather, that inquiries must be channelled through the offices of the ministers?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I shall make inquiries, Mr. Speaker.

UNEMPLOYMENT STATISTICS—INVESTIGATION INTO PUBLICATION BEFORE OFFICIAL RELEASE

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): While we are talking about security regulations, is the Acting Prime Minister in a position to reveal the results of the investigation he made known yesterday into the publication of unemployment statistics for the last two months one day in advance of the official publication?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): The inquiries are still continuing, Mr. Speaker.

POST OFFICE

WINDSOR—PELEE ISLAND—DELAY OF MAIL CAUSED BY AIR TRANSPORT WEIGHT LIMITATIONS

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Since my inquiry concerns two departments and since the Postmaster General is not here, perhaps I can direct it to the Minister of Transport, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister aware of some rather serious charges that because of weight limitations affecting air transport between the port of Windsor and Pelee Island mail is delayed, with serious consequences where prescription drugs are concerned? Would the minister look into this matter?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I have plenty of problems with weight limitation, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jamieson: —but I was not aware of this particular one. I shall take it under advisement and let the hon. member know.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PASSPORTS—REGULATIONS GOVERNING APPLICATIONS BY DIVORCED WOMEN

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton-Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister in his capacity as Secretary of State for External Affairs. In light of correspondence between Marguerite J. Trussler and the hon. gentleman's department, may I ask whether it is the policy of the government that when applying for passports divorced women must use the names of their previous husbands? If so, is any action being considered to redress this blatant discrimination against women?

Mr. Speaker: I would think this question ought to be placed on the order paper. If there is urgency, it may be considered at the time of the adjournment.

AIR TRANSPORT

USE BY ROYAL AIR FORCE OF UNITED STATES FACILITIES AT GOOSE BAY BECAUSE OF DETERIORATION OF DEPARTMENT RAMPS AND HANGARS

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): My question is for the Minister of Transport, Mr. Speaker. On November 4, I directed it to his parliamentary secretary, the minister being absent from the House. Is the hon. gentleman aware that the Royal Air Force, which up to now has been using Department of Transport facilities at Goose Bay, is now using United States air force facilities as a result of the deterioration of Department of Transport ramps and hangars? If so, what action is the minister prepared to take to ensure that this RAF activity is returned to the Canadian side? In other words, is he in a position to answer my question of November 4?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I was not advised personally of this question. I apologize for that. I would suspect that the explanation does not involve only the condition of the hangars. It may well involve a new arrangement between the RAF and the United States Air Force. But I will undertake to get a full explanation for the hon. member.

Mr. Peddle: Did I understand the minister to say he was not advised of this very important question?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. It is my habit to be honest with the House on all occasions. This one slipped through somehow or other, and I was not personally advised of it.

HEALTH

FAMILY PLANNING CONFERENCE—REQUEST FOR PUBLICITY CAMPAIGN BECAUSE OF INCREASE IN ILLEGITIMATE BIRTHS

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the welcome announcement that a national conference on family planning will be held in Ottawa next February, and in view of figures just issued by the minister's department which show a steady rise in the rate of illegitimate births in Canada from 5.3 per cent in 1963 to 9.2 per cent in 1969, will the government take the lead at this conference, financially and otherwise, in launching a campaign of public information to deal with this situation?

Mr. Speaker: I believe the hon. member's question is really in the form of a representation. If there is urgency about the matter it could be considered at the time of the adjournment. Would the hon. member like to rephrase it?

Mrs. MacInnis: May I ask a supplementary question? Can the minister tell us what organizations will be invited to take part in this conference?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Just about every organization of a voluntary nature in the private area we are aware of that has shown an interest in this subject matter in the past.

POLLUTION

POSSIBLE DANGER RESULTING FROM CONSTRUCTION OF REFINERY AT EASTPORT, MAINE.

Hon. Hugh John Flemming (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of the Environment. Has the minister received any report regarding the possible construction of an oil refinery at Eastport on the Bay of Fundy in the State of Maine, and the need for exercising extreme care in the transport of oil to that refinery in the event of its construction?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): We are investigating this matter, Mr. Speaker.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

LIFE INSURANCE—POSSIBLE BREACH OF COMBINES ACT BY ONTARIO INSURANCE ACT

Mr. J. G. Lind (Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It is my understanding that one of the purposes of the Combines Investigation Act is to ensure continued competition within the business realm. My question is directed to the recent amendment to the Ontario Insurance Act, particularly in so far as it may restrict competition within the life insurance industry. Are the officials of the hon. gentleman's department examining the amendment to the provincial insurance act passed by the present Ontario government in order to determine whether this legislation constitutes a breach of section 32 of the Combines Investigation Act?

Mr. D. R. Tolmie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Ontario Insurance Act amendments have been taken into consideration by virtue of clause 92 of Bill C-256 which makes provision for provincial legislation to be taken into account in actions under the proposed Competition Act.

ALLEGED DELAY IN DEALING WITH LOAN APPLICATIONS

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I should like to address a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Is it part of general government policy or simply departmental maladministration that applications for loans by Indians have been delayed for four months in order to frustrate the applicants?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will inform me of the particular circumstances to which he is referring, I can assure him right now that if there is any delay, it may be due to administrative errors, and is definitely not a matter of policy.

[English]

Mr. Korchinski: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I have repeatedly tried to get someone in the minister's department to provide me with certain information. I have called the department time after time and tried in vain to get an application considered. I have no recourse at this time but to bring the matter before the House. I have tried in vain to appeal the case on behalf of Hector and Virginia Bird of La Ronge, Saskatchewan. Unless the minister and his officials can be more serious I should like to give notice that on another occasion I will bring the matter up by a motion under Standing Order 26.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member might also consider the possibility of asking the question again at the time of the adjournment. That might be the occasion for him to obtain an answer.

I apologize to hon. members; I have done my best to try to get as many of our colleagues recognized in the question period as possible. I have also tried to notice those who have not been recognized, some of them front benchers, including the hon. member for Brandon-Souris. Having made a note, I will try to give these hon. members priority tomorrow.

Mr. McGrath: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out that I have what I consider to be an urgent question for a minister who will not be here tomorrow because of the roster system. I merely point out to Your Honour that you must either rule that the roster system is inconsistent with the practices and rules of the House, or I suggest that the time allotted to the oral question period should be extended.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed, from Tuesday, November 16, consideration in committee of Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that Act—Mr. Benson—Mr. Honey in the chair.

The Chairman: In accordance with the statement made by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, as recorded at page 9630 of Hansard for Tuesday, November 16, 1971, the committee will now resume consideration of the sections that were before the House on Wednesday, November 10, 1971, being sections 150 to 180 inclusive, and 220 to 244 inclusive. Sections 150 to 161 were agreed to. The committee will now consider section 162 of clause 1.

On clause 1—section 162: Penalties.

Mr. Downey: Mr. Chairman, I have a question I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary. Last Friday when we were discussing this section, I asked a question regarding advance rulings and the cost thereof. The parliamentary secretary agreed that he would look into the situation and I am wondering whether he is at this time prepared to give a close approximation of the cost involved in obtaining advance rulings.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, there is a minimum fee of $150 charged on advance rulings, and the total cost depends on the actual time spent by the officials. However, the minimum fee is $150.

Mr. Downey: May I ask a further question? Can the parliamentary secretary give us some indication of the amount of time involved when an official of the department is engaged on a particular case? Is there a charge per man-hour or man-day and, if so, what is that charge? Just what should we expect by way of cost in addition to the blanket fee of $150?

Mr. Mahoney: The fee is based on a rate of $20 per hour.

Mr. Downey: Has any consideration been given to a reduction in the cost? It may well be that many people would like to obtain an advance ruling, particularly in the case of capital gains. For example, take the case of a widow whose late husband's estate is subject to the capital gains tax. There might be only a few thousand dollars involved and, although the amount would not be large from the government's point of view it might be large from the point of view of the estate.

Has any consideration been given to setting up some sort of legal aid plan under which people who can ill-afford to get an advance ruling could obtain one in a case where it would be essential to the administration of the applicant's affairs? It could be essential for the proper administration of affairs for taxation purposes.

I suggest that $20 an hour on top of the $150 blanket fee could very well mean an additional $160 per 8-hour day if one departmental official is employed on researching a tax ruling. If two employees are engaged on that research the cost would be $320 for an 8-hour day, and this, in addition to the $150, would be prohibitive to a great many people. Therefore, I suggest that the minister and his parliamentary secretary consider reducing these fees to something a little more realistic, even though some people may be able to afford to avail themselves of an advance ruling.

Mr. Mahoney: The purpose of the advance ruling is not to give ongoing tax advice to taxpayers, it is to give taxpayers a combined ruling in advance of a transaction they propose to enter into. The purpose of setting a fee, which would go a long way at least to compensate the average taxpayer in Canada who has to carry the payroll and other charges on the Department of National Revenue, is to assure that frivolous applications for advance rulings are kept to a minimum. Those who do make these applications and appear to meet the legitimate requirements for them under ordinary circumstances will be anticipating the amount of tax involved in such a transaction and the fee for the advance ruling will be a nominal portion of the potential tax involved in the deal. It is not a system involving ongoing tax. District taxation offices provide that type of information without additional charge.

Clause 1—section 162 agreed to.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I might have raised this matter when we were discussing sections 161 and 162, but I think it has more application to section 163. This is the section which creates a penalty for failure to file a return of income, and it involves a penalty of 50 per cent of the tax that should have been paid. There is also section 239 which sets out a similar type of penalty for this offence.

[Mr. Mahoney.]

Very briefly, this bill creates a double penalty and places a person in double jeopardy for any alleged offence against the Income Tax Act. There have been objections to this system for a great many years. I think it is most unreasonable that a person who fails to file a tax return should be subject to a penalty under section 163 and also under section 239. This is contrary to normal justice and it seems to me that if the department proceeds under section 163 it should be debarred from proceeding under section 239. Such a provision would then be reasonable.

I do not know why the department has taken this opportunity to fix the penalty at 50 per cent of the amount of tax rather than leaving it as it was before, that is 25 per cent. This is merely compounding the unfairness of the section. Not only is the amount of the penalty increased under section 163 from a minimum of 25 per cent to a minimum of 50 per cent, it also provides for adding that penalty to any fine or penalty under section 239. I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary why it was felt necessary in the first place to increase the minimum penalty to 50 per cent, without any option. Second, I should like to know what his views are on the matter of the double penalty for the same offence, which is fundamentally contrary to our justice.

Mr. Mahoney: In the first place, the penalty referred to in section 163 applies to people who wilfully attempt to evade the tax payable by failing to provide a return. I call the hon. member's attention to subsection (3) of that section which places the burden of proof on the minister to establish the facts justifying the assessment of the penalty.

Then, going on to section 239, which the hon. member mentioned, subsection (3) makes it very clear that the double penalty need not be involved unless the penalty under section 163 was assessed before the information or complaint was alleged or made which would result in the penalty under section 239. So, the effect of section 163 and the penalty assessed would be known to the magistrate or the judge before he determined what he should do following a conviction under section 239. Very obviously this would be something the magistrate or the judge would take into account.

I think, on balance, considering the fact that we are talking about people who wilfully attempt to evade payment of tax, and who can be proved to have done so, and the burden of proof rests with the minister, I do not think the sections are inequitable.

Mr. Aiken: I wonder if the parliamentary secretary would answer the first question about the increase of the minimum penalty from 25 per cent to 50 per cent?

Mr. Mahoney: I really cannot cast any illumination on that, except perhaps to speculate that in cases where very small amounts of tax are involved the penalty should be increased.

Mr. Aiken: I merely want to make one final comment before yielding the floor to someone else. The parliamentary secretary says the penalty imposed under section 163 would be known to the magistrate, and he would then consider this in passing sentence. I think the fact of the matter is, this is still double jeopardy. This is the sort of thing that is not reasonable, regardless of whether an individual is fined $1 or $1,000. He should not be hit twice. I still think the principle is wrong. I know that it has been in the act for a long time, but we are revising the act now and I think it is reasonable for us to reconsider these sections, particularly in view of the increase in the penalty rate.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, what I have to say touches very closely on that same point. Perhaps I am a devil's advocate in assisting the department, but it seems to me that these sections covering penalties were drafted in a way that confuses the meaning. There is apparently no penalty as long as you file a return. The return can be imcomplete or inaccurate, but as long as it is filed within the statutory limit there is no penalty. If a person had a large amount of tax to pay, say about $1 million, it would be a simple thing for him to file an incomplete or inaccurate statement. He could continue in this manner and forward returns to the department indefinitely. Presumably, in this way he could get around the section which would impose a penalty for not coming forward with a proper return. I wonder whether this fact has been considered.

It is my understanding the penalty is 6 per cent. If so, at present rates of interests, I believe this in effect is a licence to evade the Purpose of the taxation act. If the penalty for not filing or for being delinquent in paying is only 6 per cent it would be to a person's advantage not to pay his tax and earn, shall we say, the difference between 6 per cent and 9 per cent. In other words, once could borrow from the government at a very low rate of interest.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is not quite correct. The 6 per cent, of course, is interest charged on payments which should have been made and were not made in time. In section 163(2) he will note there is also a penalty of 25 per cent of the tax which should have been paid in the case of a return filed that either contains false statements or omissions. I do not think there is really the loophole the hon. member sees in this particular case.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I do not feel like allowing this subject to drop so easily. Because of this section I believe the average citizen will accept the 50 per cent assessment on his income tax rather than fight the minister in court. The department in this case has a second lever on the individual who the officials feel has deceived them. Before making any assessment at all someone in the department may feel that a person has attempted to deceive the department. Then, having this feeling the person makes the assessment of 50 per cent and waits for the taxpayer to come back and object to it. This might be the situation if one happens to be in the department on a salary and has an impersonal attitude toward the matter. The taxpayer, however, is scared to death of being hauled into court on a charge of tax evasion even if he feels he is not guilty and, therefore, he probably will not argue about the 50 per cent but will let it go. He will pay his assessment and the 50 per cent and say, "Please, now don't bother me anymore; don't take me into court". For that reason subsection 3 to which the parliamentary secretary referred is very good in theory but in practice is of very little help except to the large corporate bodies and those who can affort to hire legal counsel and accountants to help them prepare their case.

The average person is hit two ways. He has the terrible lever over his head that if he does not pay the 50 per cent he will be taken into court. The burden of proof does not bother him very much. He does not understand exactly that the burden of proof is on the minister in this case unless he has consulted a lawyer. He would probably decide he would rather pay whatever is owing, which might be $100 or $1,000, rather than face the disgrace of being hauled into court for tax evasion. I believe this is so wrong that I move:

That clause 163 now under consideration be deleted.

I will submit the motion, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I really think the hon. member is insulting the average Canadian. I do not think the average Canadian who fails to file an income tax return does so in a wilful attempt to evade the tax payable. Certainly, there are a number of such instances, but the average case is covered in section 162 and not section 163. Section 162 provides that the person who fails to make a return as and when required is liable to a penalty of an amount equal to 5 per cent of the tax up to an amount of $10,000 of the tax payable and $500 if the amount of the tax unpaid is $10,000 or more. That covers the average Canadian. The hon. member seems to be equating the average Canadian who files a return with one who wilfully attempts to evade taxation. I believe that is wrong. I think it would be quite improper to eliminate this type of penalty from the Income Tax Act which is designed to properly penalize people who wilfully attempt to evade taxation.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I come back to the parliamentary secretary's first argument given when I raised the question. At that time it was slightly different. In this case it does not really matter whether the person concerned is big or little if the department should claim he is wilfully attempting to evade. This is a serious charge and I have no hesitation in saying such a person should be brought into court and prosecuted. But that is not what is happening here. The person is not being brought into court and prosecuted. He is being given a penalty first of 50 per cent and then must go to court to see whether or not he is going to be hit for some more. I do not think this is a proper attitude. The word "lawfully" appears here. So far as the parliamentary secretary is concerned I agree that section 162 relates to a lesser offence, but in section 163 we get into the matter of wilful evasion. So, somebody is to be penalized twice.

This weakens the argument of the parliamentary secretary. The person must satisfy the minister that he was not evading and then must go to court to defend himself. I think this is a most iniquitous section in the Income Tax Act. I dealt with this matter on many occasions while practising law. This did not involve large corporations but rather people who were involved in income tax matters. Perhaps sometimes they were guilty and sometimes perhaps they were not. The point, however, is that they were penalized twice. If they were innocent of evasion, they were sometimes penalized only once. If they were guilty they were penalized twice. There is something wrong with such a system because if these people are innocent, the 50 per cent should not be added to other penalties. I submit that practical people will pay it rather than be hauled into court. As I have said I believe this is an iniquitous situation. It is even worse when the rate of taxation is increased from 25 per cent to 50 per cent.

Mr. McCutcheon: Mr. Chairman, I, too, should like to add my support to what the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka has said. This is a most iniquitous section and, in my humble opinion, is being used by some branches of the income tax department—I will not say by all of them but by some specific branches—the officials of which are bucking for a corporal's stripes and use this method to intimidate taxpayers. As the hon. member has mentioned, if the department can prove wilful evasion, then the taxpayer is hit twice. However, if they cannot prove it, he is hit only once. In my humble opinion that is definitely unfair, and I have no hesitation in recommending the amendment of the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, I just want to make a short comment regarding the burden of proof. The burden of proof, which is the responsibility of the Crown, is exceptionally easy to satisfy. As anybody who has ever had to go to court knows, as soon as the Crown has established what is called a prima facie case on the simple facts established by the accounting department that the taxpayer is delinquent in the matter of taxation, the burden of proof is switched to the taxpayer and the responsibility of proving himself innocent rests upon him. So I also want to lend whatever support I can to the amendment of the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka.

Mr. Smerchanski: I should like to make a comment regarding the same section which appears on page 424, section 152 (4)(a)(i), which reads:

> has made any misrepresentation that is attributable to neglect, carelessness or wilful default—

I should like to deal with misrepresentation because the penalty referred to by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka is a heavy one. The question to be asked is what is misrepresentation? It might be that a bookkeeper or someone else in one's office might have made a representation that is attributable to neglect or carelessness, and then the taxpayer is faced with a heavy penalty which might be an unfair one. The point was raised that there is a double penalty. I suggest that instead of increasing the penalty from 25 per cent to 50 per cent, it should be decreased to 10 per cent so that the taxpayer is not penalized unnecessarily and so that the legislation is fair. This section refers to misrepresentation which can be attributable to neglect and carelessness of someone working in one's office or one's corporation, and this is very important. This is a very far-reaching piece of legislation, and I suggest that we take a hard look at it because in my view this penalty section is unfair.

[Mr. Aiken.]

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question on the amendment.

Mr. Downey: I have a question or two on the penalty section, Mr. Chairman. In the Summary of 1971 Tax Reform Legislation it is stated:

> In addition, documents seized other than by search warrant in the course of an investigation must be returned within a reasonable time unless a court decides otherwise. A person whose documents are seized will have the opportunity of reviewing them.

What are the other circumstances in which documents can be seized other than by search warrant? Could the parliamentary secretary clarify this for me?

Mr. Mahoney: We are dealing at the moment with sections 162 and 163 and I am wondering where one finds the particular words which the hon. member has read in those sections. I would be glad to reply to his question, but I do not see these words in the sections we have been discussing.

Mr. Downey: They may not be in the specific sections but, in essence, they are relevant to this subject. I wonder whether the parliamentary secretary could clarify this situation to a certain extent.

There is another question which I would like to ask him with regard to the enquiries section. This part reads:

> At the present time, an enquiry may be held in the course of the administration or enforcement of the Income Tax Act without the presence of the taxpayer concerned. The new legislation will entitle the taxpayer, in most cases, to attend or be represented.

In what situation would the taxpayer not be entitled to be represented? The reference is to, "most cases", and I wonder in what cases he would not be represented.

Mr. Mahoney: Again, we are dealing with a block consisting of some 53 sections. If the hon. member would be good enough to give the section numbers when he asks questions, I would be very happy to look at them and try to give him answers if the references are to the particular sections with which we are dealing at the moment. Certainly, the questions he is asking are relevant to the block—I am not arguing about that—but I do not see the words he quoted in either section 162 or 163.

Mr. Downey: I ask the parliamentary secretary whether or not it really matters if I provide him with section numbers. My questions are pertinent to the sections with which we are dealing. Why is he not able to give us a simple and concise answer to the questions I asked him, and why is he trying to run me off the tracks by asking me to provide him with certain section numbers? Would the parliamentary secretary tell me in what cases a taxpayer will not be able to be in attendance or be represented when an inquiry is being conducted? Of course, he will recall the first question I asked him. Would he please give me an answer to my questions.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Alexander: I am seeking some clarification. I also support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka to section 163(1) which puts the minister in the position of imposing a double penalty. I do not know whether the parliamentary secretary has as yet answered any questions with respect to the increase in the penalty. Perhaps he has, but I have not heard him. It seems to me that there must be some reason that the parliamentary secretary, on behalf of the minister, has found it necessary to increase the penalty from 25 per cent to 50 per cent, keeping in mind that a person who is eventually charged with wilfully attempting to evade payment of tax can, in the long run, be faced with another penalty. Why is it necessary to have this section amended in order to increase the penalty?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, previously under this section the minister had discretion to levy a penalty of between 25 per cent and 50 per cent. It is felt inappropriate that the minister should have discretion in this particular situation, and it is also felt appropriate that the 50 per cent penalty be retained.

Mr. Alexander: With respect to the penalities previously levied or exacted, is the parliamentary secretary in a position to advise whether they were mainly in the lower range of the percentage or in the higher range? Were there more penalties on the 25 per cent level than on the 50 per cent level?

Mr. Mahoney: I am afraid I have no idea, nor do I have any idea whether that information is available. I will be glad to inquire and, if it is available, I will supply it.

Mr. Alexander: I can recall, from some limited experience I had with respect to court actions concerning the Income Tax Act, that it was always the minimum penalty that was exacted. If the precedents indicate that the minimum was always exacted, why is it now necessary to go to the maximum?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I would dispute the hon. member's assertion that the minimum was always exacted. He says he is speaking of court cases where a magistrate levied a penalty, and I have no information on the matter he raised regarding the practice of the Minister of National Revenue in exacting penalties under the section as it stood previously.

Mr. Hogarth: Mr. Chairman, I have a question for the parliamentary secretary on section 163(1). First, am I correctly construing that section, in the Crown's view or in the minister's view, when I suggest that two things are required to be proven under section 163? First of all is it required to be proven that there was a failure to file the return and, secondly, that in addition there was a willful attempt to evade or is the failure to file the return automatically considered a wilful attempt to evade? It appears to me that it can be read either way.

Secondly, in drafting the statute why did the minister not follow the usual wording of penal sections and say "is guilty of an offence, and is liable on conviction to—"? Why is there a deliberate evasion, if I may use that phrase, of the customary phraseology for penal sections in statutes?

Mr. Mahoney: In answer to the first question, the hon. member's observation is correct. Both elements of the offence have to be established. The hon. member might look at section 162 where the simple case of failure to file a return is dealt with.

On the second question, this is not an offence under section 163 at this point. We get to that when we reach section 239. What we have in section 163 is the minister making a determination that there was a wilful attempt to evade payment of tax by failure to file a return. Then, the minister makes the penalty assessment, and of course the taxpayer has the regular right of appeal to the Tax Appeal Board and on to the Federal Court, as a result of the assessment made by the Minister of National Revenue. It is at this point that section 163(3) comes in, and where there is an appeal by the taxpayer the burden of proof rests upon the minister.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to pursue this much longer but I point out that in line 28 the words "is liable" appear, which may mean that a person may be liable to a fine, but not necessarily so. I ask the further question as to why this section does not read as similar sections do in other legislation, for example, "liable to not more than" say, 50 per cent? That would give some leeway. I ask the question directly: does "is liable" mean that a mandatory penalty will be exacted? Further, why has some leeway not been provided, as in many other sections, so that whoever is going to administer the law may exercise some judgment? Was this not considered?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, obviously that was considered because the determination was made to change the previous law which allowed the minister discretion to levy a penalty of from 25 per cent to 50 per cent. With regard to the first part of the hon. member's question, it would be the government's feeling that once the minister made the determination that a wilful attempt had been made to evade payment of tax by failure to file a return, he would have a duty to enforce the penalty.

Mr. Alexander: So then it is mandatory.

Mr. Smerchanski: Mr. Chairman, I would like some clarification of section 163(2) which reads:

> Every person who, knowingly, or under circumstances amounting to gross negligence in the carrying out of any duty or obligation—

The insertion of the word "knowingly" is self-explanatory, but I would like an explanation of what is meant by "amounting to gross negligence"?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, the term "gross negligence" is one that has been subject to a great many determinations at law in various cases under various circumstances. It is not a term that is defined in the Income Tax Act. This is getting into something that we encountered with the hon. member for Battle River and one or two others the other day, in trying to say what is or is not at arm's length. We can give an example and say that something is or is not a non-arm's length transaction, but to ask for an over-all simple definition of the concept of gross negligence is to ask an impossible question.

Mr. Smerchanski: In order to get clarification of a piece of legislation being considered by members of the House of Commons is it necessary to leave it in such a vague state that the ordinary taxpayer has to seek an interpretation from the courts? Is this the intention, to frame our rules and laws in such a way as to place this added burden on the taxpayer? Mr. Chairman, I say that this is an unfair burden to place on the taxpayer. It would be far better for the minister to clarify this matter of gross negligence. I think it is incumbent upon the members of this House to get clarification of this part of the section rather than leave it worded in such a confused manner that the taxpayer will have to go to the expense of appealing to the courts for a ruling. Many taxpayers would not want to do that. We should have clarification of it now. I cannot accept the explanation that gross negligence is a matter of legality. I am not a lawyer and many taxpayers are not lawyers, and I think we are placing an unfair burden on taxpayers.

Mr. Downey: Mr. Chairman, may I return to the point I brought up earlier. It seems that the parliamentary secretary was not interested in answering me and he asked me to refer to the specific section I was talking about. I cannot tell him that, since I was reading from the Summary of 1971 Tax Reform Legislation, the booklet which is produced by the department for the benefit of the average taxpayer so that he may understand the workings of the 707 page tax bill. I am afraid that most often lawyers will look at it and some of them may not understand it. May I read a paragraph entitled "Enquiries" on page 60 of this little red booklet, the Summary of 1971 Tax Reform Legislation. It reads:

> At the present time, an enquiry may be held in the course of the administration or enforcement of the Income Tax Act without the presence of the taxpayer concerned. The new legislation will entitle the taxpayer, in most cases, to attend or be represented.

Let me ask the parliamentary secretary again to what part of the act that paragraph pertains. The officials of the department are sitting at the little table; surely he can ask them. To what part of this 707 page bill does the paragraph I have read refer? I ask him to clarify this matter, so that his answer may be recorded in Hansard. That way, taxpayers who read the Summary of 1971 Tax Reform Legislation will know, if they read the answer in Hansard, the part of the bill to which the paragraph I read has reference.

Mr. Mahoney: The particular matter the hon. member is raising is dealt with in section 231 of the act, which is in Part XV. That is in the next block of sections we shall deal with after we have finished dealing with the sections in divisions I and J. I wonder if the hon. member would be satisfied to deal with it when we get to that point, instead of dealing with it under the particular sections we are now considering.

Mr. Downey: That would be satisfactory, Mr. Chairman. I would appreciate it if the parliamentary secretary would, on his own, bring this matter up and indicate what the part I have read means. I am satisfied if we proceed on that basis.

Amendment (Mr. Aiken) negatived: yeas, 14; nays, 33.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall section 163 carry?

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, we have disposed of the amendment. Obviously, section 163 will remain in the bill. However, I am not satisfied and neither are other hon. members, because we have not been told the reasoning behind the increased rate. I am talking about penalties, which are to be raised to a flat rate of 50 per cent. There is to be no adjustment and no discretion, as there was formerly. The penalty rate might have been 25 per cent, which may have been reasonable. I do not want to press the parliamentary secretary beyond his ability to answer; yet he has not answered our question except to say that it was deemed best to do this. That, surely, is not a proper answer.

I realize the situation he is in and I suspect that within the department lots of problems have arisen. Perhaps one assessor has been asking for 25 per cent, another for 50 per cent and still another for 37½ per cent. I think I agree with him that it was fairest to fix the rate. I am not sure that I disagree with that. I will not argue that point too strongly because it will be fairer to everyone across the board if the same rate is applied. If a person pushes his case to the limit and goes to court, the rate might be reviewed. Nevertheless, the increase bothers me. I do not know why the rate has been jumped to 50 per cent. Surely, the parliamentary secretary can tell us why the rate was increased to the level of the maximum. Why was it not left at the minimum level in a section that involves double jeopardy and a double penalty?

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Speaker, I must agree thoroughly with the last speaker. Since there is a mandatory penalty of 50 per cent, surely in cases where perhaps $1 million might be involved, extracting $500,000 by way of penalty will be unconscionable. If we were dealing with the criminal law and were concerned about punishment, a man would first have to be found guilty, in this case guilty of depriving the people of Canada of legitimate tax money. He would be just as guilty if he deprived them of $1,000 as if he deprived them of $1 million. I do not think under British law, and I presume we are still a British country, that you could in all conscience impose a penalty of $500,000 in the situation to which I have referred. Nevertheless, taxation law is not criminal law, in the true sense.

From time immemorial most Anglo-Saxons have thought that it was the duty of the Crown to prove 100 per cent that it has a right to your property. A taxation statute merely says that the Crown has a right to your property. I suggest that every man has the right to protect his property, and therefore the onus is on the Crown to prove its case. Of course, I like to think that our courts are always right in their decisions; nevertheless, I still feel that this section may provide, in some circumstances, for a silly penalty. Perhaps $1 million is a large figure to take as an example, because in that case the statutory penalty would be $500,000 under the present wording of the act. Of course, people who face the prospect of paying this kind of penalty can afford to hire the best legal brains in the world and fight the case. On the other hand, the man who may have to pay, perhaps, $1,000 cannot afford a $2,500 lawsuit in order to protect the $1,000, so to speak, that he does not want to pay. Here a stiff penalty would be imposed merely because a man did not want to go to court.

Mr. Hogarth: Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the parliamentary secretary a question in order to see if three sections have been correctly construed. I want to put before him the case of the taxpayer who deliberately fails to file a return, for the purpose of evading tax, and, 300 days after the return is due, he files a return in which he gives false information. Let us say that he is finally caught, that everything is fixed, so to speak, and that the amount of tax involved is $5,000. Am I correct that under section 162 this person might be assessed 5 per cent for failing to file a return, which amounts to $250? He might also be assessed under section 163(1) for 50 per cent of the tax for failing to file a return, which would be $2,500. He might be assessed under section 163(2) for putting in false information when he did file a return, and that would amount to an additional $2,500. Under section 238 he may be charged in the police court with the offence of failing to file a return. The minimum penalty for that offence is $25 a day for 300 days which amounts to $7,500.

If I am correct, this person would have to pay $15,000 in penalties and assessments for failing to file a return and making a false statement if he were liable for $5,000 in taxes. If I am wrong, please correct me or show me where I am wrong. Also, please state the correct assessable penalty in the event that I am mistaken. It seems there would be a hell of a pile of money to pay.

Mr. Mahoney: First, Mr. Chairman, the penalties under sections 162 and 163 cannot both be levied.

Mr. Hogarth: Are they leviable? That is what I want to know.

Mr. Mahoney: If I may answer to the best of my ability, the penalties under sections 162 and 163 cannot both be levied at the same time. The offence under section 162 is only one of the elements in the offence under section 163. If the minister decided to proceed with section 163, that is where he would go. In the situation the hon. member described, the person ultimately got around to filing a return, and that clearly takes him out of the provisions of sections 163(1) and puts him into the provisions of section 163(2). That person is still subject to prosecution under section 239 and to the penalties that might be imposed under that offence section.

This gets us back to the point originally raised by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka where we started the discussion on this section. It is quite true that both penalties could be levied under section 163 and under section 239, but the point is that the penalty under section 163 could not be assessed unless it had been assessed before the information and complaint were made. Therefore, the magistrate or judge trying the case under section 239 would be aware and would presumably take into account the section 163 penalty in deciding what penalty he should levy under section 239.

Mr. Hogarth: Mr. Chairman, I want to know what penalties could be assessed. I do not say they would be assessed. I do not say the minister would move under both sections. I want to know if they could be assessed.

It is my understanding from what the parliamentary secretary said a few minutes ago that the gist of the offence under section 163 is for evasion of filing a return. It seems this is not part and parcel of 162. Section 162 relates to failing to file a return. Section 163(1) is concerned with evasion. First, I do not think they are one and the same offence or that one is included in the other. Second, I cannot see any prohibition against the minister assessing under both those sections if my first premise is correct. Third, I cannot see where there is any obligation on the magistrate to be concerned with whether the man has been assessed under section 162 or section 163, because the penalty is not less than $25 a day for each day of default.

It is my understanding that the failure to file a return is a failure to file a return as required by section 150. Surely, if you are 300 days late you are not filing as required by section 152. Even assuming I am wrong on the first argument that sections 162 and 163 are one and the same and there would not be an assessment under both sections, is is true this person can be assessed $12,500 in penalties or fines for failure to pay $5,000 in taxes and evading the payment thereof?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I am afraid I was not able to follow this. I leave it to Hansard. I will have somebody do the arithmetic and report to the hon. member.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Chairman, I think this is a pretty serious situation. With the defeat of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka, I cannot understand why members on the government side are in such a hurry to support an unreasonable policy which, as someone has said, can put a taxpayer into triple jeopardy.

Section 163 is quite small. It only has three subsections. Since it deals directly with penalties, it should be placed at the end of the bill. This is usual. This is the first bill I have seen, either in this House or in other places, that does not have the penalties listed at the end where they should be listed. I move:

That this section be stood at this time and be included with other sections that are already stood.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member knows the normal procedure is to ask the committee to consent to standing a clause of the bill. In my opinion, the hon. member cannot do this by means of a formal motion. The Chair is at the disposal of the committee. If it accepts the suggestion of the hon. member, I will gladly stand the particular section.

Mr. Alkenbrack: I ask the parliamentary secretary to do that at this time. We could consider it later when there are more representatives present on both sides of the House. This can be dealt with in a conclusive fashion later along with some of the other sections that have been stood. It would be better for the government and better for the committee if this were done.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I was going along very well with the hon. member until he started to give the reasons for doing this. This is something the committee should decide. The members who happen to be here at this time are the committee. I am not sure why the member feels he needs additional members on his side of the House to help him make a determination on this matter. I really cannot agree with the reasons given to stand the section.

Mr. Alkenbrack: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I did not make any recommendation along a political line. I think the parliamentary secretary has misinterpreted the meaning of my remarks.

Mr. Downey: Mr. Chairman, I am in complete agreement with the member who just spoke. We should stand this section. The parliamentary secretary did not seem to be in agreement with the reasons given. However, if you look at the penalties being handed out under other laws, you are inclined to think that the judiciary is becoming more permissive in its interpretation of the law. I recall a prominent legal counsel, a member of this chamber, speaking about a situation with regard to a case he defended. It concerned some bank robbers and something in the area of $1 million which was removed from a chartered bank. In the final analysis, fines of $1,000 were assessed against those concerned. This was about two years ago.

We might consider also the degree of permissiveness in the capital punishment area. What has been done to the people involved in the incidents which brought the War Measures Act upon us a year or so ago. Capital punishment is supposedly still with us for murderers of policemen and prison guards. But as I recall it, the last occasion when a man received the maximum penalty in Canada was in 1962. I stand to be corrected, but I think it was about that time. It seems odd to me, bearing in mind the direction society is taking, that in an income tax law we should be asked to double the penalties, and I would use this argument in support of the proposition that the clause before us should be stood, reconsidered and brought forward at a future date.

Mr. Mahoney: I am quite agreeable to standing the section if good reason can be shown. However, I did not feel that the reason given by the hon. member for Frontenac-Lennox and Addington, namely that the members who were present here today were not competent to pass on the section and that we should wait for others to come and discuss it, was a valid one. If the reason is to give the government an opportunity to consider what has been said as to the substance of the clause, and the validity of the arguments advanced, I would be quite prepared to stand it.

Mr. Alkenbrack: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman. The parliamentary secretary intimated I had said the members of this committee who are present today were not competent to deal with the bill before us. I made no such statement. I know perfectly well, and so does the parliamentary secretary, that the members present here are perfectly competent. But if there were more members present from the government side we would be that much more competent to deal with this subject and that much more determined to correct this proposal and give it further consideration. I make one more appeal to the parliamentary secretary to use his good offices and stand this section along with the other sections which have been stood so we can reach a satisfactory conclusion in the near future.

Mr. Ritchie: I should like to add a few words in support of the proposal that the government stand this bill and have a further look at it. The committee should bear in mind that the previous penalty was, generally, 25 per cent, at least in the experience of one person who had some connection with it. The parliamentary secretary does not seem to be sure why the penalty has been raised from 25 per cent to 50 per cent. It looks as though some bureaucratic action has been taken on the basis that since it was between 25 per cent and 50 per cent, things could be simplified by making the penalty 50 per cent.

As my hon. friend has just pointed out, in this day and age we have become more permissive in many directions and it seems unusual that the penalties should be increased in this particular area unless a very good reason can be supplied. In my opinion, the parliamentary secretary has not yet been able to supply this information.

Mr. Hogarth: I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary whether he would not consider the following to be a valid reason for standing the section. First, there is no limitation as to the number of sections under which the minister can assess. He can assess under 162, 163(1) and 163(2). And even then, he can prosecute under section 238. With respect, I ask the parliamentary secretary whether he does not consider that this is being a little vindictive in the light of the fact that there is a minimum penalty under section 238. Either the department should move to assess or it should prosecute under section 238. One or the other.

Mr. Mahoney: Well, some time ago I agreed to stand the section. However, it seems that this would deprive hon. members of their opportunity to continue to debate the matter. I am quite agreeable to standing the section—not, as the hon. member for Dauphin suggested, the bill, but certainly this section. On the other hand, if hon. members wish to continue the debate today, I cannot stand it.

Mr. Aiken: I am not rising to debate the section further, Mr. Chairman. If we had received any reasonable explanation as to why the rate had been set at a straight 50 per cent, we would feel that at least we had carried our objections as far as we could. This is the real point at issue, the point with regard to which, as far as I am concerned, we would like an answer.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall section 163 stand?

On clause 1—section 164—Refunds

Mr. Downey: With regard to this section, the parliamentary secretary will correct me if I am wrong, but I gather that refunds amount to some 10 per cent of the total taxes which are collected. Since there is sometimes a long delay in paying these amounts back to the individuals concerned, a great many people are involved. I think we should establish once and for all that what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander, and that the taxpayer should be put on an equal footing with the tax department. The question is, who is the master and who is the servant? Are not the officials of the tax department the servants of the taxpayers and the members of this House? Or is it the case that the taxpayers are supposed to make things easier for the tax department?

• (4:40 p.m.)

Under the old act interest was payable in some cases at the rate of 3 per cent. If a taxpayer successfully contested a case with the department, it seems interest was payable to him at the rate of 6 per cent. If he was unsuccessful, of course, the rate was only 3 per cent. Under the new bill interest is payable at a prescribed rate per annum, and it does not say whether the rate is 2 per cent or 3 per cent, as it was before, or 15 per cent. I suggest some provision should be written into the legislation that will put the taxpayer on the same footing as the tax department. If there were a prescribed rate of interest then the taxpayer would know in advance what it is. I suggest this would lead to greater efficiency and refunds would be handled more expeditiously.

In keeping with this thought, I should like to move the following amendment:

That subsection (3) of section 164, as set forth in clause 1 of the said bill, be amended by inserting therein at line 31 on page 436, next after the word "annum", the following:

"that shall return not less than the maximum cost that would be receivable on the amount of a loan under subsection (2) of section 3 of the Small Loans Act.

For the benefit of the committee may I read that particular section of the Small Loans Act. It provides:

(2) The cost of a loan shall not exceed the aggregate of

(a) two per cent per month on any part of the unpaid principal balance not exceeding three hundred dollars,

(b) one per cent per month on any part of the unpaid principal balance exceeding three hundred dollars but not exceeding one thousand dollars, and

(c) one-half of one per cent per month on any remainder of the unpaid principal balance exceeding one thousand dollars.

I suggest that such an amendment would give the department greater incentive to make refunds to wage earners and civil servants. If the refund was $300, it would accumulate interest at the rate of 2 per cent per month. If the refund was below $1,000 but more than $300, the interest rate would be at 12 per cent per annum. If the amount of the refund is large and exceeds $1,000, in order that no unnatural benefit should accrue to the taxpayer the government would pay interest on his refund on the terms set out in the act at the rate of 6 per cent per annum. I think such a provision is realistic if the Department of National Revenue wishes to be equitable to all taxpayers. On this basis I hope the minister will consider this amendment.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is quite correct in suggesting that approximately 10 per cent of taxpayers in Canada annually claim and receive a refund of income tax. However, the basic reason for this is the changes that occur in their domestic circumstances. Births or marriages change their exemptions during the course of the year, and there is the usual failure to file new information sheets with their employer so that their deductions can be changed. Then, in certain cases there are unusually high medical expenses, increased charitable donations and so on. All of this changes their taxable income and is not taken into account on the information sheet. Accordingly, I suggest that the hon. member's amendment is neither acceptable nor reasonable.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps at this time the Chair should put the amendment to the committee. I might have some question as to its financial implications, but in view of the previous decision I am ready to put it at this time. The hon. member for Battle River moves:

That subsection (3) of section 164, as set forth in clause 1 of the said bill, be amended by inserting therein at line 31 on page 436, next after the word "annum", the following:

"that shall return not less than the maximum cost that would be receivable on the amount of a loan under subsection (2) of section 3 of the Small Loans Act.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, I hear groans from hon. gentlemen opposite who are usually the so-called champions of the little people. With 150 members, it seems to me the Liberal party could well put up one or two members who are interested enough to protect the rights of Canadian taxpayers.

The sections just referred to were extremely fierce, up to double and triple jeopardy, for the taxpayers who were unfortunate enough to be guilty of some error in filing their tax returns. However, when the small taxpayer has a refund due to him, what does he get? He gets nothing, no consideration whatever. The hon. member has made a very valid argument in suggesting that some consideration should be given to the small taxpayer who wants to spend his money just as much as an ever-greedier government wants to spend every bit of what he earns.

The individual taxpayer in Canada still has the right to have members of this House spend a moment or two begging that his point of view be heard. This large volume in front of us is largely taken up with a new invasion of a Canadian's right to own property. I think that this government, with its array of computers and public servants who are all very capable and efficient, should ensure that the taxpayers should get at least a reasonable return on their money. It is not right that a delinquent taxpayer should be called upon to pay an enormous sum of money—in fact, in some cases, unreasonably large sums of money—because of his evasion.

When the government owes money to a taxpayer because of an over-deduction of taxes, it should pay interest on that money just as it demands that the taxpayer must pay interest on the money he owes the government. There is no reason the government should not pay interest except the very shallow one that it is too much trouble for this army of civil servants with their computers to decide how much should be paid. This should not be difficult to calculate. Any money owing the taxpayer after the year ending March 31 should be paid with the addition of interest at 8 per cent. It would not make any difference whether the taxpayer had a great deal of money coming or a small amount, the situation would be equitable.

If it were possible for a taxpayer to commence a lawsuit against the government I am sure an equitable rate could be worked out. Anyone who borrows money must pay a reasonable carrying charge. When we have war bond drives or patriotic drives to sell bonds, the government offers between 6 per cent and 8 per cent. The income tax department should pay interest on the money it owes the taxpayer because that money is collected from the beginning of the year and the taxpayer has no choice since it is deducted. The taxpayer should be entitled to this interest on his overpayment. I commend the hon. member for Battle River for bringing this amendment forward, and I am surprised it did not meet with unanimous acceptance.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I was really surprised when the hon. member who resumed his seat took part in this debate because there was an indication from the other side that he was perhaps prolonging the debate. Most of us on this side had the privilege of sitting on the other side of the House at one time and appreciate that this sort of debate or argument gets a little bit dull.

For those members who have not been following the debate, I should like to say that the biggest complaint of citizens in Canada can be related to the fact that if they do not pay their income tax, if they are late in paying it or if they fail to file a return they are assessed interest, penalties and costs across the board. However, when the government owes them money they get it back six months or a year later with 3 per cent or 5 per cent interest, or perhaps no interest at all. This is the basic complaint of the people to whom I have spoken.

Income tax is deducted from source at the beginning of every year. Income tax is paid from January of 1971, for example, and if there is an overpayment, by the summer of 1972, if the taxpayer is lucky, he will get back his overpayment—a year and a half later. This money has been deducted under the provisions of the Income Tax Act and represents an overdeduction. In many cases, these people have had to go to the bank, finance companies or small loan companies to borrow the amount of money they know they will be getting back at a rate of interest from 18 per cent to 20 per cent. Keeping this in mind, I think the amendment is reasonable because it relates in some way to the overpayment of tax and the interest an individual must pay on the money he borrows. We should not pass over this point too lightly. There is not a lot of money involved, although I do not know the exact figure.

I should like to ask at this time whether it is possible to get an indication of how much is paid in interest to people who are receiving overpayments of income tax. This may involve an impossible task and, if so, I will not press the matter, but I should like to have some idea of what the amount is. I should also like to ask what the exact rate of interest is. Perhaps it varies, but according to this section the interest would be paid at a prescribed rate which, of course, could be any amount. I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary to tell us the rate of interest now paid on repayments of overpaid income tax. What does this amount to in relation to the total amount of income tax? If it does not amount to much, I suggest that if it were paid the people would be more than satisfied. It might amount to only $4 or $5, but if people felt they were getting the same deal from the government that the government demands from them, I am sure they would be happy. If they are paying 8 per cent they should be getting 8 per cent. What is the rate of interest on overpayments? Is it the same rate that is charged by the government on tax not paid by the individual taxpayer? Perhaps we could get that information, as I think it would be helpful.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, the rate paid under the statute on voluntary or inadvertent payments, as a matter of course, is 3 per cent. The intention of this section is to have the rate established on a periodic basis that does, in fact, bear a realistic relationship to interest rates at which the government borrows its money, and so on. This will be established periodically. The 6 per cent rate of interest is payable where the refund to the taxpayer results from a successful appeal in respect of an assessment the minister has made.

I can only point out to the hon. member again that these overpayments are not the result of any malicious design on the part of the government. The simple fact is that people do get married during the year and they do have children during the year. Deduction tables take into account the standard $100 deduction for charitable and medical expenses, and if no other circumstances change and the taxpayer did actually make charitable donations in excess of $100 there would be a refund coming because of the provisions of the act.

The vast majority of these amounts is very small. I do not know what the total figure is but we will try to find it. I am sure it is available but I just do not have it. This involves about 10 per cent of our individual taxpayers and in almost all the cases it results from either a change in domestic or family circumstances during the taxation year or because of medical or charitable expenses and donations in excess of those built into the tables.

Mr. Aiken: Might I also suggest to the parliamentary secretary that some of the overpayments are incurred by people who may work for only part of the year but have deductions based on 12 months' employment. I think this is the most grievous complaint. Individuals do get married during the year or fall into some of the categories suggested, but they are getting a windfall in the form of a tax return because the money was properly deducted in the first place. The people who really are hurt are those who were on a high salary perhaps for a relatively short period of the year and therefore had a large chunk deducted. I have one last question. Can the parliamentary secretary tell us how this prescribed rate is to be established. The 3 per cent now on the books is not very close to reality. I wonder how close to reality the prescribed rate will be and how it is to be prescribed.

• (5:00 p.m.)

Mr. Mahoney: It would be prescribed by Order in Council.

Mr. Aiken: But on what basis? Here we are attempting to make the point that the basis of interest ought to be a reasonable one. Now, the government seems to consider it reasonable to collect a large interest rate and pay back a much smaller one. Can we have any assurance that the prescribed rate will be anywhere near reasonable, because lacking that the amendment of the hon. member for Battle River is the only alternative.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I am afraid the statute does not prescribe the criteria the Governor in Council would use in arriving at the rate to be established by Order in Council each year. Obviously, this section would not have been opened up if it were not the intention, as expressed publicly by the Minister of Finance, that this rate should bear a relationship to a realistic interest rate and better than 3 per cent. The interest rate presently established by statute is ridiculous.

Mr. Nesbitt: I have a very brief question, Mr. Chairman. The parliamentary secretary has told us that in the case of overpayments, where an appeal has been successfully launched by the appellant taxpayer the money is refunded with interest at 6 per cent. As we all know, a great many objections to tax levies never reach the stage of appeal, even to the district or departmental offices. Sometimes representations are made informally to the local tax offices or perhaps to the minister's office, the matter is rectified and the money returned. In these cases, the matter never reaches the Income Tax Appeal Board but has been settled on sort of an informal basis beforehand. Would the parliamentary secretary consider having the money returned with the appropriate rate of interest in cases such as this in which there has been genuine error, either in fact or in judgment, although the matter has been settled sort of informally without actually reaching the stage of appeal.

Mr. Mahoney: If the hon. member would look at section 164(4) he will note that where the refund is the result of either an appeal, as I indicated a moment ago, or a notice of objection which the taxpayer has filed to the assessment, even if it does not go before the Tax Appeal Board, the interest paid will be at exactly the same rate that is applicable to deficient payments by the taxpayer to the Receiver General. So, the Crown and the taxpayer will be on precisely the same grounds in this situation. The rate we are talking about here to be established by Order in Council is the rate which will apply to the ordinary run-of-the-mill overpayment which results from a person's exemptions changing during the year or something like that, where there is no dispute about the amount and where it is simply a matter of the taxpayer having paid a little more on instalments than was necessary.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I did not make myself quite clear. The parliamentary secretary referred to a successful appeal or a formal notice of objection. I realize, of course, that that is the case, but I was referring particularly to cases in which there has been no formal notice of objection or appeal and in which a genuine error has been made in the assessment or something. I am speaking of cases in which no formal notice has been filed by the taxpayer himself or of cases in which perhaps a Member of Parliament on his behalf has written to the minister or deputy minister in charge of taxation in order to have the matter cleared up. In such cases, when the money is refunded would the money bear interest.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I believe the hon. member's situation is covered because when we talk about a notice of objection we are talking about a person objecting to an assessment. The only prerequisite here is that there be an erroneous assessment as the hon. member suggests.

Mr. Nesbitt: I am satisfied.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, I have already stated I am prepared to support the amendment and, therefore, I am simply making another appeal along the same line. I think the rate paid the taxpayer should be exactly the same as the rate the government expects to collect when the taxpayer owes the government money. I do not see any argument in favour of anything else. If it is simply a matter of the difficulty involved in the process of bookkeeping, I suggest this is no argument. We have computers and we have a large number of unemployed people who could be engaged in working out these returns so the money might be sent back in a much shorter period than six months.

There should be no problem today in processing these returns. If the rate in respect of overdue accounts is to be set by Order in Council, it would seem strange that the bureaucrats do not take upon themselves the responsibility for setting the penalties in the same way. The House of Commons is seized with the responsibility of setting the penalty and, apparently, of giving its approval to a triple penalty. However, when it comes to making payments to taxpayers with a reasonable rate of interest we say we cannot possibly handle this because it is too difficult; we must hand it over to the bureaucrats so that it will come out in the form of an Order in Council. Personally, I believe the people of Canada are tired of rule by Order in Council and expect us to do these things here. We are now paid a reasonable salary. We are capable men from a general cross-section of the country.

As has been ably pointed out this afternoon, I believe the people are looking to us in respect of this large tax bill of 750 pages, plus amendments, to do something which will be of benefit to the small taxpayers. In respect of overpayments, I believe in most cases we are speaking of amounts of perhaps $200 or less. It has been said that this involves a difficult problem for the bookkeepers. I say it is not a difficult problem at all. At one time I made a typographical error in my return and believe me I was told about it within two weeks after I had filed my return. It did not take long for them to examine the return and put it through the computers. It was found that I owed the government $1.38 and they wanted the money immediately. The penalties under the law for not doing this are still very considerable indeed.

So, I make that appeal again. A citizen certainly pays a reasonable rate of interest on the money which he owes the government, and if the government has the right to take more money from him in the first place and keep it for a year or 18 months, it can well afford to pay those taxpayers, the ones who need that $200 perhaps more than most of us do now, at a reasonable rate of interest. I think that we in the House of Commons should be seized with the responsibility of finding out what a reasonable rate of interest might be, and this should not be hidden in the fine print in the rules and regulations which lie behind this act.

[Translation]

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, I should also like to appeal to the parliamentary secretary and ask him to consider seriously the matter since, in my opinion, this request is quite reasonable. Indeed, it concerns a great number of taxpayers each year.

In his answer, the parliamentary secretary explained that refunds were sometimes due to taxpayers, but that in almost all cases, it was because they had failed to provide the required information.

However, as stated by my colleague for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken), if often happens that owing to temporary unemployment or lower wages, an employee is taxed for part of the year at a very high rate, while for the remainder of the year, when it comes to filing his income tax return, he should be granted a refund of at least 6 per cent, as the government itself requires from taxpayers. Surely the parliamentary secretary knows that this generates much dissatisfaction with the people. People who find out that they are thus taxed 6 per cent for a mistake or for having failed to enter the precise amount on their income tax return are greatly annoyed when they have to pay 6 per cent more, whereas the government assumes none of the responsibilities that it imposes upon the taxpayers. So, I believe that it would be wise to give the taxpayer a chance proportionate to what the government requires from him.

I feel that the Quebec government, if it has not already taken measures to suppress the anomaly which afflicts taxpayers, will do so very soon. In fact, I believe that the minister of finance or revenue of the province of Quebec has already expressed the opinion that this should be done. This would be a matter of equity for the taxpayer, and I dare hope that the parliamentary secretary will be kind enough to accept this reasonable request.

[English]

Mr. Smerchanski: Mr. Chairman, with reference to this section on refunds, I think we possibly misunderstand the purpose of subsection (4). I believe that it is fair in that at present an interest rate of 3 per cent is paid on any refunds that are due. If you are successful in an appeal, you get 6 per cent. But the new regulation suggests that this be equalized, and inasmuch as the government must pay a fair rate of interest on the refund, likewise you would pay the same rate of interest if you owed the government money. In other words, I feel that this offsets the inequity that existed under the initial regulation. The only thing that it does not spell out is that the rate of interest shall be a prescribed rate per annum. Perhaps we could resolve that prescribed rate of interest by tying it either to the Bank of Canada prime rate of interest or tying it to the rate of interest that is paid on small business loans, farm credit loans, or something of that nature. Possibly that would tend to clarify the matter of refunds. I submit that as a suggestion.

Mr. Yewchuk: I just wanted to make a few comments in support of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Battle River. I think that the practice under the legislation passed by this government in dealing with interest rates on various items such as loans from government agencies has been to leave it open and not set a specific rate. This might be easier in some ways in that the legislation does not have to be amended as often. At the same time, I think it is a rather sloppy way of presenting legislation because the people who are dealing with the legislation do not know exactly where they stand. This becomes more of a guessing game. In dealing with a refund to a taxpayer on an overpayment of taxes to the revenue department, one finds that there is a great similarity to a small loan made to the government because the government can use those funds for whatever purpose it might find necessary while this money is in its possession. Because of the fact that it resembles a small loan, there is no particular reason the government should not pay an interest rate equivalent to that which a citizen would have to pay if he obtained a small loan from a government agency. So, this kind of amendment makes a good deal of sense.

Even though I indicated at the beginning of my remarks that I do not like unspecified interest rates, this amendment does not set a specific figure either, but it ties the rate to that which would be prescribed on a loan which an individual might obtain from a government institution. The parliamentary secretary said that the present prescribed rate is in the vicinity of 3 per cent. If such a rate were applied, it would certainly not be an inequitable rate. In all fairness, we should have a definite reassurance from the government that the rate which would be paid on refunds would be much more in keeping with the existing rates in the country at that time. I know that the parliamentary secretary indicated that an order in council could be passed from time to time prescribing these rates, but I think that this is not a neat way of doing it. I think it would be much more sensible to adopt this amendment and apply the rate prescribed for small loans.

Could the parliamentary secretary indicate what guidelines would be used in prescribing the rate on a refund? Let us say that this amendment is not accepted by the government. What guideline would be used in setting an interest rate on overpayments of taxes when a refund is made to a citizen? I wonder also if he could answer at the same time how the 3 per cent figure was arrived at previously?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I answered that question some time ago, and I indicated that I regretted I could not give the answer sought. Certainly, there are no criteria in the bill to guide the Governor in Council in making that determination, and I am not aware of what criteria would be used in doing it. I think the hon. member should clearly understand that the 3 per cent rate is one that is prescribed by the existing Income Tax Act. It is not a rate that was established by regulation. Certainly, there is nothing in past history to indicate that the government would wish to continue a rather unrealistic rate such as the 3 per cent rate has become. Indeed, that is the reason the matter has been opened up by the government in this particular tax reform package, in order to permit the government from time to time to alter the interest rate as interest rates in the market place change, and to relate it to something realistic in that area. However, what actual factors would be taken into account, I cannot answer.

Mr. Yewchuk: Would it be reasonable to assume that the rate prescribed could well be that which is charged for small loans under the sections of the Small Loans Act referred to in this amendment?

Mr. Mahoney: No, Mr. Chairman. The Small Loans Act is an act that sets upward limits which private companies can charge for small loans as defined in that act. This rate has no relationship whatsoever to any interest rate either paid by or charged by the government or any government agency.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is difficult to make a case that the interest rate should be set out in this section. The parliamentary secretary has said that 3 per cent is an unrealistic rate, and that it is the government's intention to set a rate that is fair and in line with present rates of interest within the business community. It seems to me that the proposal advanced here is a very practical one. If the government finds this phraseology unacceptable, it could introduce its own amendment. As one of the hon. members to my right said, it is our responsibility as parliamentarians to protect the rights of the ordinary citizen, and to have legislation clearly defined so that the ordinary citizen or accountant may understand the limits within which he can operate. That is the purpose of this amendment, and on that basis we can support it.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I am afraid we cannot accept the amendment which would enshrine a particular rate of interest in the statute. The problem there is that these rates do not get changed often enough when they are set by statute. The proposal that the rate be established by Order in Council would give us an opportunity to review it on a more regular basis and keep it within some realistic relationship with the facts of the market place at a particular time. Earlier the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka indicated that most of the members opposite had sat on this side of the House at one time. Indeed, they were sitting on this side of the House the last time this section was revised. In 1958 the Conservative government very generously raised the interest rate from 2 per cent to 3 per cent.

With due respect, Mr. Chairman, I think that since we have come up with something that will allow some flexibility, and hon. members opposite have come up with nothing that will satisfy the realities of the situation—and certainly in six years of being in office they were unable to do anything but increase the rate from 2 per cent to 3 per cent per annum—the amendment should be defeated and the section adopted by the committee.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Chairman, I want to go on record as supporting the amendment proposed by my colleague. I believe that some measure of incentive should be placed in the bill to make governments refund moneys that they owe. I am dealing with a case right now of a farmer who has been waiting for a refund of $5,277 from the Department of National Revenue since April, 1971. It arose as a result of the five year averaging of his income. Now, it is November and he still has not received the refund. In the meantime he has been forced to borrow money at bank interest rates, and sometimes higher, at the 8 per cent to 10 per cent level.

The relationship between the department and the normal taxpayer is such that the department treats the taxpayer with a form of contempt. I submit that if an interest rate were tied to the amount of overpayment it would be an incentive to the government to get on its toes and return money to the taxpayer. I cannot see any reason in the world why this farmer should have to wait that length of time to get a refund of $5,277.78.

I took up this matter with the Minister of National Revenue. He in turn stepped on someone's toes and I understand the money is being refunded this week. But why in the name of Heaven should we have to go to all that trouble? Some formula should be provided to give incentive to the government to refund such payments. What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. I know that if an individual owed the federal treasury $5,277.78 some pretty drastic steps would be taken by the department.

The relationship between the taxpayer and the department should be upgraded. There should be mutual trust and respect. A lot can be gained by improving that relationship. Making the interest rate realistic in this case would help to do that. The government should consider a reasonable amendment, such as that which has been proposed from this side of the House. I repeat that I strongly support the amendment.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, a minute or two ago the parliamentary secretary was poking fun at the Conservatives for coming up with a better idea when they are on this side of the House than when they were the government. I express the hope that next year, when the Liberals are on this side of the House, they will come up with better ideas than they have put forward in this bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Downey: Mr. Chairman, I listened to the parliamentary secretary belittling the previous Conservative administration for raising the interest level from 2 per cent to 3 per cent. That was a 50 per cent increase. What can be more generous than a 50 per cent increase?

Mr. Mahoney: Would the hon. member settle for 4½ per cent?

Mr. Downey: That would be much better than what we have. I am not suggesting that the amendment I proposed is perfect. I am merely groping for something that will be acceptable to the committee, to the parliamentary secretary and to the minister. I am suggesting that tying the interest rates we are concerned about here to those applying under the Small Loans Act may not be acceptable. I am merely suggesting an amendment which would say that the Department of National Revenue shall pay the same rate of interest as it requires others to pay on funds owing to the department. What could be fairer than that? Is an amendment along those lines not acceptable? Would the parliamentary secretary agree to the same rate of interest being paid by the Department of National Revenue? Would he agree to a rate that is the same as the one the department demands on funds owing to it? Is there anything wrong with that concept? Would the parliamentary secretary comment on the acceptability of an amendment along those lines?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I do not think that type of amendment would be acceptable. I should again remind the hon. member that that is precisely what this bill provides in cases where the overpayment and refund are consequential upon an assessment by the minister—that is, where that assessment proves to have been erroneous. We are still, basically, talking about a situation in which the overpayment has resulted from extra deductions and in which those extra deductions, in turn, have resulted from changes in the domestic situation of the taxpayer. There might be extra charitable donations, and so on. These would be matters over which the taxpayer has some control and therefore he could minimize, in many cases, an overpayment by filing an up to date information sheet with his employer.

It does not seem appropriate that the general revenue should meet that particular interest rate in those cases. I could not agree more that the same interest rate should apply in cases where the minister has demanded more tax and where the taxpayer has successfully refuted that attempt through an appeal. The case of the taxpayer who, through his own action, has paid more tax than he ought to have paid is not comparable to the case of the taxpayer who has refuted the demand for more tax, and the hon. member's amendment would not be appropriate.

Amendment (Mr. Downey) negatived: yeas, 18; nays, 35.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Clause 1—section 164, agreed to.

On clause 1—section 165: Objections to assessment

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question about section 165(3)(b). Where there are several appeals of a similar type before the department, apparently taxpayers may file copies of the notice of objection and the appeal can be entered with the minister's consent. Why has it been inserted here that the minister must consent? I do not think, if a taxpayer wants his case to be considered again, he should need the consent of the minister. In many cases one cannot do anything without ministerial consent, and this is another situation like that. Why was it necessary to say that the minister must consent to the filing of an appeal?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, the reason is to allow the appealing taxpayer to go directly to court, that is either to the Tax Appeal Board or to the federal court, as he elects, without waiting for the minister's formal reply to his notice of objection. That would arise in cases where, (a) the minister and the taxpayer agree that there is a bona fide case of dispute to be dealt with before the appeal tribunal and, (b) where the best interests of all would be served if the case were dealt with expeditiously and if certain preliminary formalities otherwise necessary were waived.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask another question about subsection (7) and specifically about lines 27 and 28 which cover the situation in which no notice of objection is required with respect to reassessment. The words I am concerned about are, "Where . . . the Minister . . . makes an additional assessment in respect thereof, . . .". It is not clear from this section or from any other part of the legislation in what sort of situation the minister can make an additional assessment. Could that be clarified?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, this situation would arise in cases where the new assessment was issued after the matter was already before the court. This would allow the revision of the assessment without it being necessary to go back over the ground and recommence the appeal in court.

Mr. Hogarth: Mr. Chairman, one comment I wish to make about section 165 is this: the notice of objection must be made in prescribed form. On the other hand, subsection 6 says that the minister may accept a notice of objection despite the fact that it was not served in duplicate or in the manner required by subsection (2). I understand that the intention, when the act was originally enacted, was to make procedures for going before the Tax Appeal Board informal. Surely, we could add words to subsection (6) to provide that the minister may accept a notice that is not in the prescribed form so that the informality of the procedure may be continued. I would like to propose an amendment to subsection 6 to the effect that there be added after the last line the words:

—or is not in the prescribed form

Mr. Mahoney: I wonder if the hon. member can give some indication of what he means. How could the minister determine whether he had a notice of objection or a letter of complaint in this particular situation? The minister has to have some ground rules in this particular instance. Frankly, I question very much whether the particular amendment would be administratively feasible at least.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka.

Mr. Hogarth: I have not moved that far east, Mr. Chairman. The point is if a taxpayer, 89 days after the assessment came to him, wanted to object, surely he could write a letter saying that he objects to the assessment and wants to appeal to the Tax Appeal Board. Because of the fact he did not have a prescribed form in front of him, he would be out of court. He might not have a form. Whether or not it was a notice of objection would be a question of fact for the tribunal to determine. The minister could say the letter he wrote was not a letter of objection but merely a letter of complaint. That is a question for the tribunal to determine. I suggest that to require the taxpayer to file a particular form is very dangerous, keeping in mind the purpose of this particular provision.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, the particular instance that the hon. member cited would certainly be in the prescribed form because it clearly states that it is a notice of objection. I call to the hon. member's attention that it must be in a prescribed form, not that it be on a form supplied by the department. It must be in a form that clearly stipulates that it is an objection. It can be a letter if it clearly states the intent of the writer. The actual forms are available at district taxation offices throughout the country, but I am advised that the particular example which the hon. member gave would indeed be an objection in the prescribed form.

Mr. Smerchanski: Mr. Chairman, I would like a little more clarification of lines 34, 35 and 36 on page 439. What happens if the taxpayer waives his right for the reconsideration of the assessment and if the minister does not consent? Is it the intention that the minister will automatically consent if the taxpayer waives his reconsideration of the assessment by going directly to either the tax review board or the Federal Court?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, if the minister has not responded to the notice of objection within 180 days, the taxpayer can proceed in any case without awaiting further word from the minister.

Mr. Smerchanski: There must be another part of this bill where the 180 days is still acknowledged as the time limit within which the minister can either consent or disagree. If he does not, it automatically goes to the Tax Appeal Board or the Federal Court as the case may be.

Mr. Mahoney: If the hon. member will read a few pages ahead to section 169, he will find this.

Clause 1, section 165, agreed to.

On Clause 1—Section 166: Irregularities

Mr. Downey: I note, Mr. Chairman, that in section 166 there is very little room for any humane attituded. I would like the parliamentary secretary to comment on this. The section reads:

> An assessment shall not be vacated or varied on appeal by reason only of any irregularity, informality, omission or error on the part of any person in the observation of any directory provision of this Act.

I would like to know what this entails. Suppose a taxpayer has information which he is mailing to the tax department and is involved in a car accident or has a heart attack on the way to the post office. The forms are lost. As a result of something of this nature, the tax form is late. Instances like this may come under this section of the act. It refers to an omission or error. It would be very easy to make an error in computing income tax on the basis of a complicated document such as this.

Suppose the tax which this person owes is relatively little. For the sake of argument, let us say $50 or $100. An individual who owes this amount of tax can hardly afford to hire the services of an accountant or a tax lawyer to look after his forms. With his education, he may not be able to comprehend this 707 page document or the sections that pertain to his business or type of work. Earlier this afternoon the parliamentary secretary stated that the fee charged by the department for manpower to enable a taxpayer to obtain an advance tax ruling is $20 an hour. The cost of an accountant may be $10 an hour. This person with very low income and little education could very easily run afoul of a section like this.

I would like the parliamentary secretary to comment on circumstances such as these. There are circumstances where accidents and errors do occur. This may happen to any of us. It may happen to some people more frequently than others. What provisions are there to safeguard a situation such as this?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, the particular sections we are now considering deal with assessments, not income tax returns. It is purely administrative and does not relieve anyone of errors in matters of substance or of law. It does relieve in the case of inadvertent irregularities in procedural matters. The next section, 167, deals with many of the circumstances that would legitimately prevent a taxpayer for some reason or other meeting time limits and so on. Perhaps when the hon. member has looked at it, he will have a good part of the answer to his question.

Clause 1, section 166 agreed to.

On Clause 1—Section 167: Application to Review Board for time extension

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Section 167 has an amendment proposed by the Minister of National Revenue. It appears on page 8956 of Hansard for October 22.

Mr. Hogarth: Can we have an explanation?

Mr. Mahoney: Perhaps it would be a sufficient explanation for the hon. member for New Westminster to know that the amendment is a correction in the French text.

Amendment (Mr. Gray) agreed to.

Mr. Hogarth: As I understand it, section 167(1) is a relieving section for a person who has failed to file a notice of objection within 90 days. If you do not do that within 90 days, you are out of court. You cannot go to the Tax Appeal Board or the Federal Court unless you can get an extension of time under this section. The only way in which you can get an extension of time is to apply to the board or the Federal Court under subsection (4). The only basis upon which this extension of time can be given is in the event of death, an incapacitating sickness or bankruptcy of a taxpayer.

I suggest there might be any number of valid reasons why a taxpayer should be given an extension of time. For instance, I can see a case where a taxpayer's lawyer or accountant died and he could not get the material out of the office of his professional adviser, or something like that. For him not to be given an extension of time in these circumstances would be restrictive. So, I would ask the parliamentary secretary to consider an amendment to that section, section 167(1) reading: "Where no objections under section 165 is filed within the time . . . then the Board may extend the time." The Board could then decide whether or not there should be an extension of the time. It would not have to depend upon the taxpayer being dead, or bankrupt or being incapacitated through sickness. Similarly, in subsection (4), so that the ground may be broader and more just.

Those of us who have been concerned with appeals to the courts find that these time limitations are often missed. Lawyers have to take a lot of responsibility for this. But the courts are not as restrictive as this section when it comes to extending the time limit. They will do it in certain circumstances which they feel to be just, and it does not depend on the death or sickness of the litigant.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall the subsection as amended carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall section 168 carry?

Mr. Hogarth: Mr. Chairman, I asked the parliamentary secretary whether he would consider an amendment because I did not wish to move an amendment without hearing his point of view as to section 167 (1) and 167 (4).

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: I have to say I did not see the parliamentary secretary getting up to answer, so I put the question. But I could now give the floor to the parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Mahoney: Without reopening the section, the reason is that the Tax Appeal Board up until now has chosen to construe its discretion very narrowly and has not allowed appeals in many cases, although there might have been very good reason for doing so. I would say that this is to give them some guidance and to indicate that perhaps there are cases where they should exercise a discretion of this nature. I am sure that as we see how this works out, if there appears to be merit to seeking further ground for extension of time, we would be glad to entertain such a proposition but I would be most reluctant at this time, on the basis of the speculation here, to handle the matter in that particular way.

Mr. Hogarth: The Tax Appeal Board, as a result of legislation we have passed in this Parliament, is now to be a very informal board, no longer to be confined to strict forms. I do not believe these restrictions should be approved and in particular I do not think a federal court should be restricted as it is in subsection (4). I would therefore move:

That subsection (1) be amended by the deletion of the words "because of the death, incapacity, sickness, or bankruptcy of a taxpayer".

And that the same words be deleted from subsection (4).

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Mahoney: I was under the impression that this particular section was carried and that I was simply responding to a question. In the circumstances I would certainly much prefer an opportunity, in view of the hour and the importance of the debate which would take place on this amendment, to suggest that it is six o'clock and that the question be not now put.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

PRIVILEGE

MR. NIELSEN—ALLEGED CONTRADICTORY STATEMENTS BY SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND MINISTER OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege of which I gave rather belated notice to Your Honour through no fault of my own.

My question concerns contradictory statements made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and by the Minister of National Revenue. These statements are contradictory in themselves, and the two ministers have contradicted each other. The statements concern official documents of the executive government of Canada. These documents the government has refused to table. The statements also concern other documents which have been reproduced in the public press. The publishers allege them to be in one case an authentic version of one of the documents first mentioned, and in the other case a true copy of one of the documents first mentioned.

Certain of these statements have been made by the ministers in this chamber and others have been outside this chamber to the public media. Whether made in this chamber or outside it, these statements have themselves been reproduced in the public media. Again, the statements made outside this chamber have been the subject of questions in this chamber.

At this point I intend to meet an argument which I anticipate may be advanced. It is that statements made outside this chamber by members of the House are outside the jurisdiction of the House to deal with as a matter of privilege. In other words, a minister of the Crown, although constitutionally responsible to the House, may quite properly inform the House on a matter of public business by making a statement in the House, and may inform the public on the same matter of business by making a contradictory statement outside the chamber. And, because these contradictory statements are made by the minister when he is physically in two different places—although these places be only 100 feet removed—the House does not have the right to investigate these contradictory statements. If the law of Parliament says that, Mr. Speaker, my submission is that the law of Parliament is, as Mr. Bumble said, an ass.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, the law of Parliament does not say that, however much the ministers of the Crown may feel at home with such an interpretation.

The privileges which members of the House enjoy are exercised in trust in the right of the public. The right of this House to be informed in this chamber on a matter of public business is the right of the citizen to be informed, whether the citizen is informed in this House or outside it. It is strictly from Alice in Wonderland to say that the citizen is entitled to one version in the House and another version outside it. It is a parody of the privilege of freedom of speech to hold that the citizen does not have access to the courts with respect to a statement made by a minister in the House because the minister is protected by the privilege of freedom of speech and at the same time to hold that this House cannot investigate statements made by a minister outside the chamber which do not agree with statements made inside it on the same matter. In this regard I would refer your Honour to the excerpt contained in paragraph 4 on page 419 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition.

Because of the overriding importance of the whole matter, the right of members of this House to be informed, the right of the citizen to be informed, and because of the serious nature of the contradictions within the statements made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs himself, and between those of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Revenue, I ask leave to move the following motion:

This House orders that the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections forthwith investigate all statements made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Revenue concerning the Gray report, so-called, the published so-called authentic version of that report and the purported cabinet document dated July 29, 1971, concerning a screening mechanism to control foreign investment in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Yukon has given notice of his intention to bring this matter forward by way of a question of privilege. As the hon. member knows, there is a slight technical difficulty in that the Standing Order does require an hour's notice to give the Chair an opportunity of looking into the matter and considering precedents and citations. Unfortunately, because of circumstances beyond the hon. member's control, there was a slight delay. I am satisfied that the hon. member is not responsible for that delay and I am prepared to accept the notice on this basis as satisfying, on that count, the requirement of the Standing Order.

The hon. member has put forward for the consideration of the Chair and submission to the House a proposed question of privilege which I submit is essentially the same as one proposed the day before yesterday. The Chair considered the matter extensively having asked for the forbearance of hon. members and the co-operation of the House to give me an opportunity to look into the precedents and citations, which I did for some hours in the afternoon. As a result of this consideration I made a ruling which is reported at pages 9618 and 9619 of the Commons Debates for November 16.

I suggest to the hon. member that the precedents quoted therein are applicable to the circumstances on which the proposed question of privilege is based. I do not want to be unfair to the hon. member, but the impression I get is that he has considered the ruling that the Chair delivered on November 16, found it wanting, and in a way is now appealing, in effect, that decision. I do not think an appeal is possible, either directly or indirectly, from a decision of the Chair. If a ruling is delivered by the Chair on a given set of circumstances, I think it would be highly irregular for the Chair, on the same set of circumstances, to deliver a different ruling two days later.

The hon. member has made much of the ruling of the Chair in regard to statements made outside the House. The hon. member knows even better than I the rulings which have been made on this subject, Speaking from memory now I would refer to the ruling in 1964, I believe, by my distinguished predecessor, Mr. Speaker Macnaughton, on statements made outside the House. I was Deputy Speaker at that time and following these matters with some interest, and my recollection is that a very strong argument was made then by the hon. member for Yukon in which he invited the Chair to make a distinction between statements made outside the House and statements made inside the House.

I might say that the arguments used at that time by the hon. member for Yukon have been used by the Chair on a number of occasions since. The Chair did agree with the arguments forcefully made at that time by the hon. member, and the arguments that he brought to the fore then are applicable equally to the present circumstances. I feel I cannot alter, change, amend or reverse a ruling made on a similar set of circumstances, and that the matter cannot be referred to a committee or put to the House at this time as there is no prima facie case of privilege.

FRUIT

ANNOUNCEMENT OF PAYMENT TO BLUEBERRY PRODUCERS AND GRANT TO PROMOTE DOMESTIC APPLE CONSUMPTION

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, further to my recent statements on the program to provide assistance to agricultural producers, I now wish to advise of programs authorized for blueberries and apples.

Blueberry producers this year received reduced returns and direct payments will be made to them through the Agricultural Stabilization Board. Data will be collected on sales to distributors and processors and payments of one and a half cents per pound will be made upon proof of sale.

Support to apple producers selling to the fresh market will be provided in the form of a grant for apple promotion. The Agricultural Stabilization Board has developed a program in consultation with the Canadian Horticultural Council and producer groups. The grant will be used to promote domestic apple consumption. Producers now pay a levy for apple promotion purposes. This grant will be used to reduce their levy payments this year and will therefore improve producers' returns.

Details of these programs are going to the producer groups and payments will be made when data has been collected.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, the statement by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) is most welcome, although rather brief. I hope the support programs are sufficiently large. In complimenting the minister may I say I have some knowledge of the discussions between the minister and representatives of the producer groups and the Canadian Horticultural Council about a support program for apples. I only hope that in terms of dollars and cents payments to the apple industry will be much larger than the statement of the minister today. It is commendable that at long last discussions have been held with producer groups in this country regarding support that is so necessary as far as apples are concerned. This is a basic industry which has suffered in so many ways apart from anything the apple producers could do. I am glad the minister has made this statement and I hope he will give us the details later. I hope that the result in terms of dollars and cents to the industry will be much larger than this statement.

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, in response to the minister's statement, which was received at ten minutes after two this afternoon, my remarks, of necessity, must be both brief and general. Coming from a province which is a major producer of both apples and blueberries I welcome the news that there is to be support for both these proudcts.

The fruit industry of British Columbia, in fact the whole agricultural industry in Canada, is not in a state of vigorous health today. Anyone who has followed the debates in the House of Commons dealing with the problems of grain production facing the western farmers could find little to disagree with in that statement.

Regardless of what kind of promotion we may be able to undertake with this assistance from the Agricultural Stabilization Board, the main problem is the low price of imported apples from Japan and Mainland China which are used mainly in the pie-making industry across Canada.

In addition, the depressing of the price of the local product because of the low price of United States apples to wholesalers has injured Canadian growers even though none of these apples are actually imported. Returns from many agricultural products, including apples, have been reduced. At the same time, many families in Canada are deprived of apples for their children. Perhaps we should be thinking along the lines of a free school lunch program that might include apples. Instantly available machinery is definitely needed for the protection of our producers when injury is caused by cheap imports.

In addition to the action announced by the minister today, I hope we can look forward to further studies of this very important problem. If we look at some of the measures the United States has taken recently to protect its economy, perhaps we will realize that while we do not want to engage in overt retaliation we should do no less for our own people.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the minister for what he has just announced.

I would however draw his attention to the fact that the new program might help on a temporary basis perhaps the blueberry producers. Because I live in the main blueberry-producing area of Quebec I feel qualified to talk about it.

In fact, the decrease in the income of blueberry producers can be attributed to two causes: first of all, to a blueberry shortage and secondly, to a drop in prices.

The blueberry shortage is essentially due to the fact that oil is used to burn the blueberry fields. It was thought, in the past, when forest fires happened every 10, 15 or 20 years, that blueberry crops were enhanced by these fires. People came to the conclusion that blueberry fields had to be burnt every two or three years, which has brought about the systematic destruction of almost all our blueberry fields in the North, because all new shoots are burnt. Results can easily be anticipated.

Government experts have set up their research centre in Saint-Léon in a neighbouring constituency where there are only two blueberry fields, while we have 14. All our blueberry fields are being destroyed by that excessive burning.

The main cause of the decrease in income is the shortage of blueberries which has grown worse in the last two or three years.

The second reason is the price. Prices have gone down steadily, especially when the blueberry pickers union came into the picture and tried to corner the blueberry market. Competition was not tolerated. American buyers used to come every year. I have seen bumper years where 16 to 20 buyers showed up. Now, there is not one. Such few as do come all deal with the union, setting their own price, so that pickers are not even interested.

I believe those are the two main reasons for the slump. The department will have to tackle them, listening not to the self-styled experts in Saint-Léon, but to buyers who know something about blueberries. They know they are wild fruit and that destroying their habitat, which is the forest, results in their disappearing. Actually, they are trying to grow blueberries in "deserts". That's the main trouble.

Mr. Speaker, I merely want to draw this matter to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture—I would have a lot more to say—that he might have a serious inquiry made by blueberry producers, those who really know the business, and not by people who know nothing about it. Then we might get a sensible report.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Bellechasse on a point of order.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, it is with much hesitation that I do so, because on many previous occasions I have thought of drawing the attention of the Chair to the following fact: when a minister makes a statement, it is normal for a representative of each party to express his opinion on the reaction of his party to the statement. But when it is time for the Social Credit spokesman to take the floor and speak in French as he has every right to do, very often hon. members talk between themselves so that the hon. member who has the floor can hardly be heard.

I realize that there is no ill-will, but I request that, in future, the right of speech of any member of my party be respected so that one may hear what he has to say.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure that all hon. members will consider the remarks of the hon. member for Bellechasse. I believe them to be well founded, and I invite all members to remember that those who speak on behalf of their party, following a ministerial statement, have the right, under our Standing Orders, to be heard by their colleagues.

EFFECT OF U.S. DISC LEGISLATION—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Steven Otto (York East): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to request the unanimous consent of the House to make a motion in connection with the passage of the Domestic International Sales Corporation provisions by the Senate of the United States yesterday. The pressing and urgent nature of the situation arises out of the fact that the DISC legislation will lead to a massive exodus of manufacturing plants from Canada to the United States in order to gain the advantage of a tax-free position. The effect will be to close down half of Canada's industrial production and produce massive unemployment. In these circumstances it is imperative that this House debate what measures should be taken to ensure Canada's economic survival. I would therefore move, if unanimous consent is given, the following motion:

That this House now consider what economic measures should be taken in response to the passage of the DISC legislation in the United States.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: We agree, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Mr. Baldwin: And I will second the motion, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member indicated who is seconding the motion?

Mr. Otto: Mr. Speaker, I believe a volunteer has already indicated that he will second it.

Mr. Baldwin: I second the motion, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I will inquire whether there is unanimous consent. I should like to bring to the attention of the hon. member for York East and the hon. member for Peace River, who has seconded the motion, that there might be some difficulty about the form of this motion since it asks the House to consider what economic measures should be taken. I am not sure how this would be done or what would happen if the motion were carried. I appreciate, however, that if the motion were carried unanimously perhaps we might agree on the form of the debate, so I will not pursue the procedural aspect of the motion and will simply inquire whether there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent and the motion cannot be put.

Mr. Baldwin: Who said no?

Mr. McGrath: It was the parliamentary secretary opposite.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

NUMBER OF JOBS AVAILABLE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to move a motion under Standing Order 43. Its import will be obvious from its content. If there is consent, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin):

That the striking contradiction between the Prime Minister's assertion that there are plenty of jobs available if the unemployed really wanted to work and the results of a survey of Canada Manpower Centres which shows that there are 480,762 persons registered with Manpower looking for work and only 48,057 vacancies to be filled by Manpower—a ratio of 10 to 1 of people looking for jobs over available jobs—be referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration for immediate investigation.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North. This motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent and the motion cannot be put.

UNITED STATES DISC PROPOSAL—PRESENTATION TO FIRST MINISTERS' CONFERENCE OF MEASURES TO OVERCOME DIFFICULTIES FACING CANADIAN EXPORTERS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, before I ask the Prime Minister a question I want to say on behalf of myself, and particularly on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, how much we welcome him back.

Mr. Sharp: I second the motion.

Mr. Baldwin: In view of the statement in the communiqué tabled today by the Prime Minister that the provincial first ministers were informed of the efforts of the federal government directed at the reconsideration by the United States of proposed economic measures and at mitigating the effects of such measures, can the Prime Minister tell the House whether the federal government presented to the conference any specific measures to enable Canadian exporters to face the difficulties posed by the proposed tax incentives for U.S. exporters and the DISC proposal?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Nothing beyond what has been stated in the House, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Baldwin: As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, does the rather brief and truncated economic review delivered by the Minister of Finance to the conference contain the sum total of the presentation made by the federal government to the provinces on this particular issue?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I apoligize. I missed hearing the question. There was something about a truncated statement. If the hon. member would repeat it I would be glad to answer.

Mr. Baldwin: I am always glad to repeat a question in different form. Does the unusually truncated and brief statement that the Minister of Finance made to the conference contain the sum total of the presentation made by the federal government to the provinces on this issue?

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Mr. Speaker, a communiqué is not a repetition of the speeches which are made. A communiqué is as brief a summary as possible of the general lines and substance of a presentation, so obviously it is not a total summary of what the minister said throughout three days of the conference.

Mr. Baldwin: In view of the decision taken by both Houses of the United States Congress in favour of tax incentives for U.S. exporters, and DISC in one form or another, has the government any contingency plans to assist Canadian exporters and the Canadian economy in this event, and when will these plans be presented to the House of Commons for discussion and appropriate action or, if not presented, will the plans be leaked in the usual way by the government?

UNITED STATES DISC PROPOSAL—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON GOVERNMENT MEASURES—PLANT RELOCATION MONITORING—GENERAL ADJUSTMENT ASSISTANCE PLAN EXPANSION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the Nixon administration and the United States Senate and House of Representatives have all agreed in principle on the DISC proposal and its passage awaits only a conference of the Senate and the House to determine the percentage of the tax deferment that will be permitted, and in view of the very serious repercussions that this will have on Canadian exports and Canadian jobs, is the Prime Minister prepared now, or will he be prepared on motions tomorrow, to make a statement on the measures that the Canadian government proposes to take to deal with this matter? In particular, may I ask him if any monitoring machinery has been set up to ascertain whether there are indications of plant relocation south of the border, or in order to monitor any future indications of such plant relocation that might arise?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will consider the suggestions made by the hon. member, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Douglas: In view of the fact that according to the alleged cabinet document of July 29 the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce was asked by the cabinet to prepare plans for an expansion of the General Adjustment Assistance Plan, GAAP, have such plans been completed, and when will the government be able to tell us what this expansion of GAAP entails?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do not think it would be good practice to comment on cabinet documents which have not been made public.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Hamilton West on a supplementary and return to the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands later.

[Later:]

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister if it is the government's intention to expand the General Adjustment Assistance Program, and in view of the fact that contingent upon such expansion would be an outline of the government's industrial strategy, does the government intend within the next few days to make a statement both with respect to its industrial strategy and expansion of the GAAP?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I will inform myself of the intentions of the various ministers in this regard.

Inquiries of the Ministry

UNITED STATES DISC PROPOSAL—POSSIBLE SPLITTING OF INCOME TAX BILL TO ENABLE RECONSIDERATION OF CERTAIN PROVISIONS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, now that the DISC program is more than likely to come into effect, and in view of the fact that in this House we are dealing with a tax bill that is now outdated, is it the intention of the government just to introduce the more attractive features of that bill and hold the other controversial parts for further consideration?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

UNITED STATES DISC PROPOSAL—ESTIMATE OF UNEMPLOYMENT THAT MAY BE CAUSED IN CANADA

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): In view of the fact that at the time the United States surcharge was invoked on August 15 the government produced figures with respect to the trade losses and the jobs that would be lost as a result of that surcharge, has the government now got any figures on what the DISC program will mean in terms of unemployment in Canada? As I recall it, the government estimated that if the surcharge remained in effect for a year the unemployment caused by it would total some 90,000 jobs. Has the government any figures in this regard?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, the figures we do have show that exports have continued to go up in the past ten months.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I direct one further supplementary question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the fact that the country will certainly be faced with massive lay-offs in the future, can the minister advise when in fact he will have the regulatory provisions regarding bi-weekly and bi-monthly computations in order that industry can now calculate the type of formula that will be used?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): I hope fairly soon, Mr. Speaker. The hon. gentleman has pointed to an area which is very complex, and I think he can well understand the degree of planning required necessitates a certain degree of co-operation and openness that hitherto has not always been available.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary to the original question and I will direct it to the Prime Minister as soon as I can get his attention. In view of the fact that I and other Members of Parliament are on the mailing list of the Prime Minister's office, would the Prime Minister give consideration to putting members of the House on the leak list?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

HEALTH

MEDICARE—STUDY OF WAYS TO MEET COSTS AND PROVIDE SERVICES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare arising out of discussions at the recent federal-provincial conference concerning the costs of medical care. In view of the rising costs in this area, is the government giving consideration to an over-all and comprehensive study of ways in which these costs can be met and services provided, rather than just trying to solve the problem by cutting off what the federal government would pay and leaving the rest to be paid by the provinces?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, there is no suggestion of cutting off what the federal government is paying. The suggestion is that if we can implement many of the reforms identified, of which there were some 80 in the joint federal-provincial study on health costs, we could have funds available to do many other needed things that should be done and that indeed many provinces are doing in their own way.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is the only answer of the government in that area to tie the federal contribution to the level of the GNP and not to consider other factors?

Mr. Munro: No, Mr. Speaker. The suggestion is that the formula be on a base year and be escalated in accordance with annual increases in the GNP. There would also be further moneys, some $640 million over a five-year period, as an incentive to the provinces to get into new areas and bring about reforms in the health services system.

ABOLITION OF INDIRECT TAXES TO ALLEVIATE INFLATION AND UNEMPLOYMENT—PRICE AND WAGE FREEZE

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

Would he tell the House whether the government agrees with the Senate Standing Committee on National Finance that indirect taxes should be abolished in order to check inflation and unemployment in Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member is referring to a report to be tabled in the Senate at this very moment. As I was not able to obtain copies of the report as quickly as the hon. member, I have not yet read it and I cannot now answer the question.

Mr. Beaudoin: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker?

Could the Prime Minister tell us if the government intends to freeze prices and wages in order to fight inflation and unemployment and to stop the 10 per cent American surtax on some Canadian products exported to the United States from having adverse effects on our economy?

Mr. Trudeau: As we have said on previous occasions, Mr. Speaker, that is an alternative which we have considered and to which we are ready to give further consideration if the need should arise. For the present, as the hon. member knows, inflation is not what is threatening the Canadian economy.

PROPOSED REDUCTION OF FEDERAL SALES TAX

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a supplementary question to the Prime Minister.

Does the government feel that reducing taxes, the sales tax included, would improve the economic situation in Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance told us, barely fifteen days ago, I think, as well as in June that personal and corporation taxes had been greatly reduced. So as far as tax cuts are concerned, we indicated our agreement. It remains to determine where such cuts will benefit the economy most.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

U.S.-CANADA PRODUCTION-SHARING AGREEMENT—UNITED STATES REQUEST FOR GREATER CANADIAN PURCHASES FROM THAT COUMTRY

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): My question is directed to the Minister of National Defence and relates to the agreement entered into on June 6, 1963 between Mr. MacNamara on behalf of the United States and the present President of the Treasury Board, then Minister of National Defence, in connection with the sale and production of defence material. Last year the credit balance in favour of Canada was, I think, well over half a billion dollars. Has the United States now called on Canada to make greater purchases in the United States in order to bring about what was described in the agreement as a fair balance of expenditure? Has there been anything like that recently?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the primary responsibility for this agreement lies with my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. However, I can confirm to the right hon. gentleman that in particular the United States has been very enthusiastic in pressing upon us the purchase of the Lockheed Orion aircraft as a long-range patrol aircraft. At all stages I have made it clear to the Americans that we would buy such equipment as was suitable to our needs in what we regarded as the best possible market.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Apparently the United States has been exerting some pressure on Canada. The simple question is: Has the American administration asked for a reasonable balance as between these purchases and, in particular, that in the next year or two Canada should purchase from the United States a great deal more defence material than ever before? If so, has the government of Canada pointed out that to bring about that balance under the agreement of 1963 would mean a loss to Canada of $500 million a year in trade and increased unemployment within our country?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I share the right hon. gentleman's viewpoint. In general terms, no, the United States officially has not impressed upon me the necessity of righting this balance. As I have said, any representations made to me have only been in regard to the Orion aircraft which, as I have said, we will not necessarily buy, nor any other American aircraft, if it does not meet our requirement.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will allow a supplementary to the right hon. member for Prince Albert but I would invite hon. members to limit supplementaries as I am anxious to recognize those who were not given an opportunity to ask their questions yesterday and are waiting to do so now.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I just want an answer to that simple question whether the United States is now applying pressure to Canada in this regard. Has the Canadian government pointed out to the United States the adverse results of anything like a balance being established for defence as between our two countries?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to respond to the hon. gentleman for the third time. There has not been general pressure on me as Minister of National Defence. There has been with regard to the Orion aircraft—

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is defence material.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): —as I pointed out to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath).

ALLEGED RELUCTANCE OF UNEMPLOYED TO ACCEPT CERTAIN KINDS OF JOBS OR LEAVE HOMES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Based on the report that the Prime Minister stated on Friday that many jobs are going begging in Canada because Canadians do not want certain kinds of work or are not prepared to leave their homes, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if this kind of evidence is provided by the Department of Manpower and Immigration and, if so, will this statistical information be made available to the House?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I think this is information I got from a member of the opposition, Mr. Speaker, who was complaining that in his riding there were not enough workers to pick fruit from the trees of his constituents.

Mr. Baldwin: How about parliamentary secretaries?

Mr. McGrath: May I ask the Prime Minister if it is his view that Canadians are in fact too lazy to go to work and are not prepared to leave their homes?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

AVAILABILITY OF JOBS IN THOMPSON AND SUDBURY

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the fact that in the last couple of weeks International Nickel Company has announced lay-offs in Thompson and Sudbury, may I ask on what information the Prime Minister based his statement that jobs are available in those two centres?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was referring to a statement I had made a year ago when there were jobs. In the same answer I referred to a comment on my answer which had been made at that time by Mr. Mahoney of the steelworkers saying that I should ask permission before saying there were jobs in Thompson.

Do the provincial authorities have the criteria and forms necessary to assist municipalities in making application for loans under the new $160 million loan fund recently set up to encourage employment during winter months?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I think the Minister of Finance wrote to all the provinces saying what the criteria are and setting down the conditions. We have forms here in Ottawa but they do not have to fill in their applications on those forms. They have all the necessary information and they just have to follow the guidelines and forward their requests.

Mr. Baldwin: Is that for this year or next year?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): This year.

Mr. Cafik: Are any further agreements required between the provinces, particularly Ontario, and the federal government before this program can be implemented?

NORWAY HOUSE AND CROSS LAKE—FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO PROVIDE TELEVISION SERVICE

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development but in his absence I shall address it to the acting minister or the parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Simpson: If neither is available I shall address it to the Prime Minister. In the areas of Canada where large numbers of Indian people are living, such as the closely adjacent communities of Norway House and Cross Lake in Manitoba, and television services are non-existent, can the Prime Minister say whether the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is considering any means whereby they can assist financially in providing this greatly needed service?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that this question ought normally to be placed on the order paper. I realize that the matter is important but if there is urgency it is not apparent to the Chair. Perhaps it might be given priority in being considered at the time of adjournment.

Mr. Simpson: On a point of order, with the greatest respect, Mr. Speaker, I thought that the minister might be able to throw some light on this question, and in view of the fact I was not able to ask the question during the last two days when he was present, I felt I should ask it today because the answer is very important.

If so, is the government studying this report and will a statement be made on these vital relationships?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest most respectfully that this again is the type of question which ought to be placed on the order paper. The question might be answered to the extent of whether a statement will be made on motions.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, except that these are not plans; these are realities. We have had discussions with the members of the European Commission. We are now in the process of establishing the kind of links to which the hon. member has referred.

Mr. Macquarrie: May I ask the minister if he has any lack of confidence in this area in that we might be left out in the cold unless we do a little more?

ALLEGED WIDENING OF EQUALIZATION PAYMENT SYSTEM

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister a question.

Following the Premiers' conference the Prime Minister said yesterday on television that the province of Quebec and the federal government had agreed on how to enlarge the equalization plan, which the premier of Quebec denied categorically.

Could the Prime Minister clarify that situation and tell us whether the federal government and the province of Quebec have really reached an agreement on a formula to enlarge the equalization plan?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot have said that there has been an agreement on the enlargement equalization plan in the sense proposed by the province of Quebec and by other provinces. I have said that in fact there has been—and that appears in the communiqué—an enlargement of $18 million which will be added to the amounts subject to equalization, but it is following a technical review that we have improved the application of the system to a point.

Mr. Valade: I want to ask the Prime Minister a supplementary.

I would like to ask him whether a mere technical difficulty, or more basic principles, are involved in this discussion.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, there is one basic principle on which all provinces were in agreement—that the rich provinces should help the less privileged ones. Because of this principle, the province of Quebec received hundreds of millions of dollars under the equalization formula. It is asking for more, but the provinces which have to foot the bill say that too much money has been redistributed already.

The federal government improved the system, without, however, going as far as some of the poorer provinces would have wished. It still went much further than the Conservative government had planned to do in 1962. The 1967 formula is far more generous towards the poorer provinces.

In his absence I should like to direct it to the Minister of Labour. Has there been any change in the regulations pertaining to the winter works program? In particular, I have in mind the 30 man-month regulation. Can he tell us what changes have been made, since many of the smaller communities have not been able to comply with some of these regulations?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Perhaps I may have missed the point, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration will be away until the end of next week in connection with his responsibilities as minister in charge of immigration. With regard to the specific question which was asked concerning regulations, I am not aware, frankly, that there has been any change. I know this matter has been under consideration in light of certain representations which have been made. I will find this out today and make sure that a report is made to the House tomorrow, either by myself or by one of my colleagues.

AIR TRANSPORT

HIJACKING—REQUEST FOR IMPROVED SECURITY MEASURES AT AIRPORTS AND IN THE AIR

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport. What steps has he taken to improve security at our airports and on our airlines in view of the latest hijacking incident and repeated requests from the Canadian Airline Pilots Association?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): A great many steps have been, and are being, taken. I am sure the hon. member would not wish me to disclose them in detail in public. We have consulted with the pilots association at each step of the way. I do not think it is a breach of secrecy to indicate that detection devices have been installed at a number of airports and that others are on order. As soon as they have been received they will be installed. The department has agreed to pay for them so the burden will not be borne by the airlines.

Mr. McGrath: May I ask the minister what steps he is taking to improve security in the air?

Mr. Jamieson: Again, this is a very difficult question to answer briefly. I think we have taken part in every international conference which has been held on this subject. The difficulty is to devise rational responses to acts which are totally irrational. We do the very best we can, and I think that up to now our efforts have received the full co-operation of the pilots and other groups, including the airlines.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Since most of the detection devices to which the minister has referred, or a good many of them, are installed in the major airports on a portable basis, can the hon. gentleman assure us there will be a change of policy in this regard and that permanent detection devices will be installed?

Mr. Jamieson: I cannot give a categorical answer to that question. I can say that we are trying to find the best possible solution to the problem. I am sure Your Honour would not be indulgent enough to allow me time in which to answer in detail. The volume of traffic at certain airports is much greater than at others and we are trying to deal, first, with the airports which are used most. Eventually, I hope we shall have most of our airports covered.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to remind hon. members again that we are running short of time. I realize the importance of this question, but if hon. members feel that further supplementaries might be left until tomorrow I will recognize the hon. member for Peace River.

COMPETITION BILL

REQUEST FOR WITHDRAWAL AND REFERENCE OF SUBJECT MATTER TO COMMITTEE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In light of the decision by the minister to withdraw the new Competition Act and bring in a new bill next session, may I ask whether the subject matter of the new bill will first be referred to a committee so that a more acceptable piece of legislation than the existing bill may be available?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): On behalf of my colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, I would point out that he was really reaffirming his previous position that the present bill would not be advanced this session but that a new one would be brought forward in the next session. I do not think there is any question of withdrawing it.

Mr. Baldwin: The minister did not answer the last part of my question. Is it the intention of the government to first refer the subject matter of this bill, as with other repugnant bills, to a committee with a view to getting better legislation?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): No, Mr. Speaker. Neither is it a repugnant bill.

INCLUSION OF PROVISIONS TO DEAL WITH FOREIGN OWNERSHIP

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary to the previous question directed to the Acting Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the statement that the competition bill is to be revised, I wonder whether the hon. gentleman, or the parliamentary secretary, can tell us whether there will be any proposals in the bill to deal with foreign ownership?

[Later:]

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I did not catch the first part of the question asked by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville. I cannot answer as to the general proposition he made, but I will bring the matter to the attention of my colleague directly he returns to Ottawa.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ALLEGED NEED FOR LEGISLATION PROHIBITING STRIKES BY EMPLOYEES IN ESSENTIAL SERVICES

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Would the minister consider introducing into the House at once legislation withdrawing the right to strike in all essential services under federal jurisdiction and substituting the rule of law, and including in the legislation the telephone service and air traffic control?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman should know that Air traffic control does not come within the responsibility of the Minister of Labour but under the public service. Whether or not we can do without telephone service over the next month depends, of course, entirely on how much we use it. As to whether I am going to bring in anti-labour legislation in this House to suit the wishes of the hon. gentleman, the answer is categorically no.

Mr. Hellyer: Does the minister not feel that ordinary citizens have some right to the continuous provision of essential services?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Obviously the hon. member and the minister are anxious to embark on a debate, but I would not think this is the time for it.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

FOREIGN INVESTMENT POLICY—STUDY OF OPTIONS OPEN TO CANADA IN ECONOMIC RELATIONS WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister arising from the right hon. gentleman's announcement that a statement on government policy with regard to foreign capital will perhaps be made before the end of the year. Has the government under intensive study at this time the options that Canada would have open to it in its economic relations with the United States ranging from, say, a commodity agreement like the auto pact to a customs union as proposed by the Premier of British Columbia?

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

REASON FOR REMOVAL OF AEROVOX CANADA LIMITED FROM HAMILTON TO ANOTHER PROVINCE

Mr. Colin Gibson (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Did the policy of his department cause the removal of an industry from the city of Hamilton to a poor area of Canada? For instance, was an amount of money paid Aerovox Canada Limited, as the mayor of Hamilton claimed, if we are to believe the news report published yesterday in the Hamilton Spectator?

[English]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I am ready to make the same effort and to answer in English; I hope I will be as clear as the question was. There is no doubt that the decision to close down the Aerovox plant in Hamilton was taken even before an application was made to my department.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question which I address to the minister and also to the questioner. Is he aware of the fact that the question asked and the answer given are a reflection on Premier Regan and his administration?

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

Has the French version of the report of the Senate Committee on Poverty been tabled?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did not understand the question. Would the hon. member mind repeating it?

Mr. Matte: Has the French version of the report of the Senate Committee on Poverty been tabled?

Mr. Speaker: I feel that question should be put in the other place.

REPRESENTATIONS ON BEHALF OF CANADIAN PRODUCERS TO HIGH TARIFF COUNTRIES

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. At the meetings of the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization, did the minister make representations on behalf of Canadian agricultural producers to those countries that have high tariffs and levy systems, thereby making it impossible for Canadian products to be exported to those countries? Were talks along that line held and were representations made?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the formal sessions of FAO are not designed for the purpose of negotiating trade arrangements or agreements. Nevertheless, informal discussions do take place during the meetings, especially after hours, and at all times I can assure the hon. member that the interests of the Canadian farmers were promoted vigorously by all members of the Canadian delegation.

Mr. McKinley: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have just about run out of time. Perhaps the hon. member might pursue the matter tomorrow. I was anxious to give the hon. member a chance to ask his question.

Mr. McKinley: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member can ask his supplementary at ten o'clock, and he will be given priority again since this is obviously an urgent matter. The hon. member for Kootenay West will be allowed a question, and then we will call orders of the day.

PROPOSED FLOODING OF SKAGIT RIVER VALLEY—INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION REPORT

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the government received a report from the International Joint Commission on its recent investigation into the proposed flooding of the Skagit Valley and, if not, when is a report expected?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet received the report but I will make inquiries.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I raise my usual Thursday point of order. I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader about the business for the rest of this week and next.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, we will continue in committee of the whole on the tax bill. In accordance with earlier discussions, we will carry on with groupings so that discussion on any one of the sections in a group will constitute discussion on all of them. In line with that, we will deal today and tomorrow with co-operatives and credit unions.

On Monday we will deal with international income, on Tuesday mining and petroleum, and then one day on each of the following subjects later in the week, namely corporations and their shareholders, and business and property income. It is not possible at this moment to say exactly which days the last two groups will fall on because there have been some preliminary discussions about using the fifth day of next week, wherever it may fall, as an opposition day. Discussions on that subject are continuing.

We have endeavoured, as in the past, to prepare a list of sections that will be dealt with under each heading, and if the House is so inclined I should like to go through the sections at this time, since I think there is a high level of interest in them. I have prepared a list and will distribute copies to the House leaders.

Monday's debate on international income will include sections 2, 17, 56 to 58 inclusive, 90 to 95 inclusive, 113 to 116 inclusive, 126, 133, 134, 212, 219 and 257. It will be observed that some of those sections are overlapping with ones already discussed but not passed. We have purposely included them in the list to make sure that the discussion has full range.

Mr. Baldwin: Would the parliamentary secretary circulate that list among his backbenchers who are showing unusual interest in the bill at the present time?

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order, one that I had hoped to raise before the Prime Minister left the House. It relates to the protests made from this side of the House with respect to the roster system. The appearance in the House today of five ministers who were not supposed to be here according to the roster appears to indicate a breakdown in the management of the roster system by the Prime Minister. In view of the many protests raised on this side of the House, I thought in all fairness that I should draw to Your Honour's attention and to the attention of the House the fact that the roster system has completely broken down, as indicated by their presence, and at the same time object to the fact that ten ministers who according to the roster are supposed to be here are not present today.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed, from Wednesday, November 17, consideration in committee of Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act—Mr. Benson—Mr. Honey in the chair.

The Chairman: In accordance with the statement made by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, as recorded at page 9630 of Hansard for Tuesday, November 16, 1971, the committee will now proceed to sections 135, 136 and 137 dealing with co-operatives and credit unions. Hon. members will know that with respect to these three sections there are four amendments before the committee that were moved by the government.

On clause 1—section 135: Deduction in computing income.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment to section 135 carry? The hon. member for Regina East. May I beg the pardon of the hon. member for Regina East. I did not notice the hon. member for Moncton in his place. I think I should recognize him in the first round of debate on this group as a spokesman for the official opposition.

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I presume, in speaking on these sections, we will probably follow the practice we have followed of discussing these three sections, 135, 136 and 137, at the same time because they definitely are related. Is this correct?

The Chairman: That is my understanding.

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Chairman, these three sections of Bill C-259 illustrate very vividly the problems this House faces in attempting to intelligently and dispassionately discuss this bill. Very few other sections have caused as much controversy as these three. There has been a great deal of argument pro and con concerning the purpose and effect of these amendments. I should like briefly to discuss, as dispassionately and objectively as I can, the reason the government has brought in these amendments and my view concerning why I believe these amendments are not desirable.

In most of the presentations which come in on either side of the fence, there is obvious concern about the purpose of the amendments and the reason the government deems them to be desirable. I have read the white paper and all the preliminary background material to this bill. The only excuse the government has given for these sections is contained in the statement of the Minister of Finance to the House on the proposed amendments to these sections. At that time the minister stated that the original changes created a great deal of discussion and went on to say:

> The government's intention in the tax reform bill has been to provide a more appropriate tax treatment of these organizations in relation to other business enterprises.

[Mr. Speaker.]

That statement says very little and many things can be read into it. One thing I read into it, however, is that the minister considers these amendments to be reform. Many things have been said or done under the guise of reform in this tax bill. We continually hear the government spokesman, the parliamentary secretary, talk about reforms and how these sections will benefit the taxpayer and make the act more equitable. I have yet to have explained to me—and perhaps the parliamentary secretary will do so later—how these sections contribute to tax reform. I should like to know how they reform a section of the Income Tax Act which has been the subject of a great deal of controversy for a great many years and, in fact, ever since its existence. If the parliamentary secretary can explain this later, I would be happy to have him do so. However, since we are talking about tax amendments or tax reform I believe we must keep in mind that a good tax system demands certain prerequisites. There are many and varied ideas concerning a tax system and what it should do. Briefly, I should like to present to the House my ideas of what a tax system should be, and how I feel these sections are in conflict with the basic principles of a good tax system.

First, I think any tax system should be designed with simplicity of application in mind. After all we are dealing here with hundreds of thousands of individual taxpayers and any good law should be an intelligible law. I do not need to comment further on how these sections meet this criterion, other than to say that these sections along with the more than 700 pages of the bill, the more than 100 amendments, the amendments to amendments and second and third editions of amendments have not only confused the ordinary taxpayer but have also confused the tax consultants, tax accountants and tax lawyers. In fact, these sections, along with other sections of this bill, lead to such complete confusion that most responsible people are now suggesting the government should start all over again.

The second criterion I would suggest which should be very essential to a tax system is the principle of equity. Equity oversimplified simply means that taxpayers in similar circumstances should carry an equal share of the tax burden. This is a theory which was made popular by the late Kenneth Carter and has led to the "cops and robbers" theory of taxation which this government has adopted and in which the Minister of Finance has become the proclaimed Robin Hood. A taxation system is much more complex than the simple theory of equity according to which everyone pays an equal share of the tax burden. I was interested in reading an article by Howard Ross of the Private Planning Association of Canada in which he discusses this apparent preoccupation of the government with the theory of equity in taxation to the exclusion of all else. Page 19 of this booklet of the Private Planning Association of Canada contains this statement:

> I would be much happier if the minister talked, not of his great ambition to give us an equitable tax system, but rather of making our system work better. I despair of a really satisfactory solution unless we abandon the defender-of-the-poor posture and adopt a tough clinical determination to look at our problems unemotionally. We will not have achieved the right atmosphere for optimum solutions until someone can get up and announce publicly that he is not in favour of attempting to close all loopholes in our tax legislation.

It would seem to me that Mr. Ross has put his finger right on the core of the whole government attitude in respect of this tax reform bill. The government has become so obsessed with the fact that a few big fish have been getting away with tax evasion that it has put out a big net to haul in everyone indiscriminately. The result is there are many ridiculous situations created by this bill. Two such situations are created by these particular sections. There are many situations resulting from this bill which should not occur under a valid, viable tax system. Mr. Ross went on to say:

> But very often relatively small amounts are involved, and if, to close the loophole, the government must hire more staff to administer the necessary machinery and all of us have to fill out more forms to effect compliance, then in such cases it may be better to forget about the whole thing.

He goes on to point out that a review of this magnitude of the tax system should not have been undertaken lightly merely because the minister wanted to plug some loopholes. He points out that it has been said our tax system is full of loopholes. He asks, if our system is riddled with these loopholes, how bad is it really. After comparing our system with that of the United States and of the United Kingdom, he says that our tax system does not compare too badly and there is no great disadvantage. Apparently the minister has been totally preoccupied with plugging these loopholes. The Department of Finance, in referring to co-operatives and credit unions in its news release, says that many of them have now grown to a point where they compete with large-scale business enterprises and should be subject to a fair burden of taxation.

Here, again, the minister was preoccupied with equity, imaginary or real. I question the minister's approach to this whole business of tax reform that is before us. Apparently, although we are interested in equity, the department is suggesting arbitrary concepts for the levying of taxation and no explanation has been given as to how they have arrived at the rates involved. For example, the capital employed concept in the present act has apparently been pulled out of thin air. No one has explained to me how the 3 per cent figure was arrived at except by saying that that is a reasonable figure. As I say, no government spokesman has said why that figure was arrived at. When the white paper was produced the government must have said, "well, 3 per cent is too low, so we had better make it higher." And what rate did they come up with? They said to themselves apparently, "we had better set the percentage at about the rate currently charged for farm loans." That rate of interest at that time was approximately 8½ per cent. Then, after protests started pouring in, the Minister of Finance apparently said, "that rate seems to be too high; perhaps we had better set the rate at 5 per cent for capital employed in the co-op." Therefore, the whole hit and miss approach is not far different from that used back in 1946, when the capital employed concept was originally introduced into the act.

Let us suppose, for the sake of argument, that the minister's approach to plugging tax loopholes is valid, and I do not for a minute admit that it is valid. However, let us, for the sake of argument, say that there are loopholes and that they should be plugged. If that argument has any validity it is fair to ask, what loopholes is he trying to plug with these sections? What tax advantages have co-operatives been enjoying, since the minister seems to be saying that from now on they should bear their fair share of taxation. Furthermore, are these loopholes real or imaginary?

We are all aware of the arguments to the effect that co-operatives enjoy a tax advantage, that they do not pay their full share of the tax load, and so on. I submit to the committee that this is just not so, because you are oversimplifying the argument when you merely talk about tax payments. Even if you argue that the co-op itself may not pay a certain tax, you must consider the tax that is paid at the individual's level and that a co-operative still pays taxes on retained earnings. For that reason, I question whether co-operatives enjoy any real tax advantage. We have also heard it argued that co-operatives enjoy a special advantage because they may deduct patronage dividends before paying taxes. It is not true that they thereby enjoy an advantage. Any corporation may deduct the same patronage dividend payments.

I was interested in reading another article by a tax expert, Dr. A. K. Eaton. He is just as much an expert in his own right as Mr. Carter was. In his statement before the Royal Commission on Banking and Finance in October 1962, Dr. Eaton said:

> All in all, we have in Canada, pretty sensible laws for co-operatives. Actually, the main provision which alleviates their tax position is not limited to co-operatives at all but applies to any company. Any company which holds forth the prospect of patronage dividends to its customers may deduct the amounts disbursed in this way in computing its income for tax purposes.

He went on to say later:

> There is no special privilege in this tax provision. It merely recognizes one of the ordinary practices in doing business. Profit-sharing plans are not uncommon in private industry.

Interestingly enough, Dr. Eaton goes on to refer to the rather curious provision limiting the deduction of patronage dividends. Of course, he was referring to this business of capital employed which, as he says, makes no sense and is a bit farfetched. So, I submit to those who would support these sections of the bill on the ground that co-operatives enjoy an unfair advantage, that this is just not so and that they do not.

Let us suppose, and I do not for one moment admit this, that there is a difference in the levying of taxes as between co-operatives and private corporations. I say that this difference is still valid under principles of equity, because an equitable tax system simply demands that taxpayers in similar circumstances bear a similar share of the tax burden. However, I submit that there is a valid distinction as between co-operatives and other types of corporations.

I do not want to repeat old arguments about the nature of co-operatives. Such arguments have been advanced many times in the House and no doubt will be repeated. Nevertheless, there is a basic difference between co-operatives and other corporations. The main difference, of course, is that the members of the co-operative combine together, through their own efforts, to obtain increased services from the co-operative. They do not join the co-operative for the sake of obtaining a profit. If they joined it for that reason they would be ill advised, because they could better invest their money in a corporation which pays dividends. Therefore, the members of the co-operative join that co-operative for services rendered and not for the sake of making profits. I could recite the other basic differences, namely, that the member's share in the co-operative must be redeemed by him, that it cannot be sold on the market as other shares listed on an exchange may be sold, and that there is no capital gain on the members share. All these differences and distinctions are well known to the committee. Knowing these differences, I cannot understand why the minister would take the approach he has taken.

Not long ago I read an article by John C. Satterfield, past president of the American bar association. In it he talked about co-operatives, and said that co-operatives are criticized for not paying their fair share of taxes, for being fore-runners of socialism, and so on. He raised all the well-known arguments. Nevertheless, he pointed to something that I have known for many years when he said:

In the free-enterprise economy, which is ours in the United States of America today, the co-operative is a potent factor in retarding the rapid march of this country toward socialism and a government manipulated economy.

Here, we are getting down to the crux of the argument on co-operatives. These people have pulled themselves up, as it were, by their own bootstraps. This is individual enterprise in its purest form. Now, under the guise of taxation reform, the state has started to step in and put controls on these people. One thing we must always remember about a co-operative is that it represents enterprise in its purest, elementary form.

Mr. Satterfield went on to shoot down the argument that a co-op enjoys an advantage over other conventional organizations. He said:

The fact is that the profits of the conventional business corporation belong to the corporation and not to its individual stockholders, may be retained or distributed in the discretion of the directors and are properly part of the corporation's taxable income.

Exactly the opposite is true of the margins between the amount received by a co-operative from its patrons and the cost of the goods or services furnished to its patrons or patron-stockholders—

Tax favouritism, tax advantages or tax discrimination in favour of co-operatives does not exist.

Whether or not the committee agrees with my assessment is immaterial at this point because I know there is a vast difference of opinion on the subject of how co-operatives should be taxed vis-à-vis other corporations. But I would like to go into my third criterion for a good tax system, which I think is important at this time.

The Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member. I do so to advise him and the committee that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Chairman: There is an indication that the committee would like the hon. member to continue. I should ask if there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: It is agreed. The hon. member for Moncton.

[Mr. Thomas (Moncton).]

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): I thank hon. members for their indulgence and I will not abuse it. It is pretty widely admitted that co-operatives have performed a very useful function in this country. The Minister of Finance said so in the statement that I quoted. He said he was concerned about the fact that co-operatives had a part to play in our society, and that was why he was bringing in his amendments to the original proposal.

I would emphasize to the committee that any sections of a tax bill, or of any other bill, that are as contentious as these three sections are, should be considered very carefully before becoming law. If there is any doubt at all that this principle is bad we certainly should not aggravate the situation by making it more difficult for co-operatives to operate. If there is any danger at all, and I am firmly convinced there is, of smaller co-operatives not being able to function under these new proposals, again I say the committee should not pass these sections.

If the government will not accept any amendments, and is determined to pass this bill in its entirety, then I plead with the parliamentary secretary to at least consider passage of the bill with immediate implementation only of those sections which have met general agreement, and with deferral of sections such as this for further study, on the understanding that such sections would not become law until the House has made a further determination. By doing this we would show good faith both to those who are advocating higher taxes on co-operatives and those who claim that higher taxes will force some co-operatives out of business.

I submit that very little intelligent analysis has been made of these proposals when the Minister of Finance simply pulls a percentage out of the hat and does not attempt to justify it, other than to say the previous limit was too low. It is quite obvious that these sections were not given thorough study, and I request the parliamentary secretary to give them much close thought and study before they are passed.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Chairman, after studying the government's proposals and amendments as they affect taxation of co-operatives and credit unions, I have come to the conclusion that their effect will be to strangle the co-operative movement. The original proposals in Bill C-259 would have resulted in quick strangulation. The amendments that have since been introduced will change that to slow strangulation. I am not sure which is preferable. Of course co-operatives do have an alternative if the government's proposals are adopted. They can adjust their structure and carry on their operations like an ordinary corporation, such as paying out dividends on capital; but if they do so they will destroy themselves as co-operatives. I ask hon. members to reflect seriously on this matter.

What kind of society are we living in if we cannot devise a tax system that is capable of taking into account a form of economic organization different from the corporate structure which is characteristic of private economic endeavour? I maintain that the co-operative approach is different. I maintain that any society that cannot adjust to a different form of doing things is doomed in the long run.

It is also necessary to make reference to the token support and half-hearted, patronizing encouragement given to small co-operatives. I think that sometimes we even see crocodile tears shed for them. It is said by some that our tax laws should help small co-ops, and that large co-operatives are just like any other business so they should be subject to tax like any other corporation. In support of this argument, it is suggested that large co-operatives are no longer close to their members and are no longer really co-operative. Anybody who says this does not know what he is talking about. He does not know how bodies such as the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, the Federated Co-ops Ltd. and Co-op Implements work with their members and keep in touch with their members. Such an argument also ignores the fact that many of the large co-ops were formed by the smaller co-ops and are today an integral part of their operations.

However, there is another important and subtle point involved in such an argument. There are some people who really are not worried about the small co-op that has to try and survive on an independent basis in today's economic jungle. It does not really count by itself in a world of corporate power. What those people are worried about are the co-operatives that are big enough to have some economic clout, that are in a position to really help people on a major scale.

In dealing with this bill I would like to review the situation as it affects co-operatives and credit unions. First of all, I would like to say that any suggestion that either co-ops, or the dividends paid by co-ops, are exempt from taxation at the present time is inaccurate, and in some cases dishonest. Co-operatives have been subject to tax since 1946 under a formula which, for most co-ops, involved paying tax on surpluses up to a level of 3 per cent of capital employed, as defined. The white paper proposed raising the percentage to 7 per cent. Bill C-259 split the difference and came up with a figure of 5 per cent. At the same time, however, it widens the definition of capital employed in a way that will seriously hurt some co-operatives.

We have before us an amendment that provides for an option to tax co-operatives at a level equivalent to one-third of taxable income as calculated on a corporate basis. This will provide some relief to many co-operatives and may look very good on the surface. But it ignores the double taxation involved, it ignores the nature of a co-operative, and most important, it opens the door to taxing co-operatives on a straight corporate basis. The one-third figure is arbitrary and can be changed to one-half, two-thirds or 100 per cent just as the 3 per cent capital employed figure is now being changed to 5 per cent and was originally proposed at 7 per cent. There are other changes as well that I shall not go into now.

However, I shall make brief mention of one illustration of the type of thing for which we have to watch. Mention has been made that there is an amendment before the Committee which would provide a ten-year phase-in rule for co-operatives. I think it is important to note that this provision does not apply to some co-operatives in the way the bill is set out. It will not apply to any co-operative that is handled and governed on a delegate basis. If the government will look at section 136, and the way the new phase-in rule applies, they will see that that is certainly the effect of the rule.

What is the significance of these gyrations in the government position? They demonstrate that some people do not understand what co-ops are all about. More ominously, though, there must be people who do know what they are doing to the co-operative movement. We know that there has been a well financed movement for years whose sole object is to destroy the co-operative movement as an effective economic instrument. The government has listened to these people. But even the government had to back off to some degree from its impossible position. The changes have only been in degree. There is no logic or rationale to the government's proposals. They are indefensible as they stand.

I should like to turn now to the position of credit unions and caisses populaires. They were not previously subject to income tax in Canada. First of all, Bill C-259 proposes to apply the capital employed concept to credit unions, and now the one-third of income formula has been introduced with respect to credit unions, in the same way as to co-operatives. This completely ignores the fact that while co-operatives and credit unions are based on similar principles, their capital structure and their operations are very much different. It is ludicrous to think of using the capital employed concept for credit unions.

Mr. Burton: Bill C-259 poses other problems for credit unions. Interest or dividends on share capital could not be deducted from taxable income if this had the effect of reducing the capital employed below the 5 per cent level. This has been changed by the amendments. Credit unions could not qualify for the small business tax incentive. This situation has been improved with the amendments. There remains the problem of how reserves are treated. Credit union reserves are not the same as bank reserves. A credit union is not the same as a bank. Statutory reserves are required by provincial legislation I believe in every case across Canada, and most reserves are ineligible for distribution to members at any time, even if the credit union is being dissolved.

There remains a curious question. If the government did respond to credit union representations, and I acknowledge this fact, why didn't it respond to co-operative representations? Again, I can only conclude that there are forces behind the scenes working to destroy co-operatives. I think we need to take careful note of the co-operative position on taxation. Mr. E. K. Turner, President of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool made his position clear in a statement on October 22, which contains a number of important points which we need to consider. He said:

> Co-operatives are prepared to pay tax at the ordinary corporate rate on any earnings retained by the co-operative. Earnings returned to the member should become part of his income.

In addition, I might say that it was made clear that in cases where income is not distributed, where it is retained, co-operatives are prepared to accept taxation of such income as a whole.

> For a taxation act to force an imputed taxable corporate income on a co-operative is to interfere with the democratic right of members to run their own business. Such a treatment is not applied to co-operatives in any other country, to our knowledge.

Income Tax Act

Mr. Turner said:

The taxation proposals completely ignore the basic principle of a co-operative, which is that earnings are a result of surplus on operations and belong to members. Earnings are not a return on investment.

I think we need to keep clearly in mind, Mr. Chairman, that co-operatives are designed to provide a service to their members at cost or as close to it as possible. They are not designed to operate for profit.

Mr. Turner then went on to state:

The fundamental characteristics of a co-operative must be respected in the taxation bill:

(1) That co-operatives provide primarily a self-help service required by members.

(2) That co-operatives distribute earnings to members in proportion to member business.

(3) That co-operatives raise and service equity capital by revolving the same in relation to the use of the co-operative by its member.

(4) That capital contributed by a member of the co-operative is to provide himself with service and not to produce a return on investment.

The Co-operative Union of Canada, speaking on behalf of co-operatives, has also made its position clear in opposition to the capital employed concept in particular, and has presented an alternative. I quote from their recent submission to the Minister of Finance:

Co-operatives request that they be permitted to distribute to their members the annual earnings resulting from business done with their members, with any earnings retained in the hands of the co-operative to be taxed at a corporate rate of tax. This proposal is subject to the following restrictions and conditions:

1. That there be paid by the co-operative a withholding tax on all distributions made by way of a patronage refund.

2. That the withholding tax paid in respect to patronage refunds be creditable toward the recipient's personal tax. If the recipient is not taxable, the withholding tax will be refundable upon filing the usual tax return.

3. That the payment of patronage refunds be limited to the extent of income derived from member business and that any income derived from non-member business be taxed at the appropriate corporate rate, unless patronage refunds are paid to both members and non-members.

4. Any surplus remaining in the co-operative after making distributions by the co-operative, shall be taxed in the hands of the co-operative at an appropriate rate of corporate tax.

In particular, Mr. Chairman, co-operatives object to the capital employed concept. No other country to my knowledge uses it. No other industry in Canada is subject to it. It erodes and can destroy the very existence of co-operatives. It hurts the operating position of co-operatives because of the turnover of equity capital. It will eliminate or substantially reduce the only source of equity capital for co-operatives. It will result in double taxation because tax will have to be paid on the imputed income of the co-op and on most patronage refunds when they are allocated to the recipient. This, I suggest, is a clear case of discrimination when we take account of the fact that shareholders of corporations are allowed a dividend tax credit of 33 per cent under the new income tax bill before us.

The capital employed concept will make it impossible for most co-ops to pay cash dividends. It strikes at the very heart of the co-operative movement. In addition, I have already outlined why the option proposed in the government amendment is unacceptable. This is the central issue and this is why I feel it is necessary to deal with this matter at this time. I would like to propose an amendment at this stage which would remove these objectional features. The amendment will do away with the capital employed concept and also the alternative which has been proposed by the government. Neither are adequate in terms of the situation facing the co-operative movement and the reality of their operations. I move:

That the amendment to Section 135 be amended by deleting all words after the words "page 356" and substituting the following:

The effect of this amendment will be to remove from section 135 subsection 3, subsection 4(f) and subsection 6. These contain all the references in section 135 to the capital employed concept and also to the option proposed in the government amendment. I should also note at this time that if this amendment is accepted, and it is proposed to accept the co-op proposal, it will be necessary to further amend section 153 which has already been passed by this committee. It will be necessary to reopen this section and propose the following amendment. I quote the amendment it would be necessary to propose but, of course, I cannot place it before the committee at this stage. The amendment would read as follows:

that Section 153(1) be amended by adding thereto after paragraph (h):

"(i) allocations in proportion to patronage."

This would make it possible for the Department of National Revenue to apply a withholding tax to patronage refunds in the same way they now do with regard to payroll deductions, lump sum payments of pension contribution refunds and a number of other categories set out in section 153 (1). I urge the committee to give this amendment serious consideration. It involves the very life of the co-operative movement. It will be a very heavy responsibility on this committee and this House if a set of provisions are passed which will have the long-run effect of strangling the co-operative movement, however gently it might be done from year to year. For this reason, I suggest this is a very serious situation. It deserves the earnest consideration of members of all parties in the House.

The Chairman: The Chair will put the amendment. I might say I have some doubt about its acceptability. It seems the hon. member might achieve the same thing in a more procedurally acceptable manner by voting against the proposed amendment and then moving consequential amendments with regard to the other parts that are deleted. However, I do not think this is a serious matter. If there are no objections, I think it would be in the—the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I just want to make it clear that the intent and the effect of the amendment would be to transfer the tax burden from one taxpayer or one class of taxpayer, the co-operatives, to another taxpayer or class of taxpayer, the members of co-operatives. This is clearly what the hon. member is stating. As such, I think the amendment is very definitely out of order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, the point that the parliamentary secretary seeks to raise is, of course, quite different from the point which Your Honour drew to our attention. As for the point raised by the parliamentary secretary, I think Your Honour's rulings have been quite consistent throughout the debate on this bill. When a member seeks merely to reduce a tax on any particular group of taxpayers, providing he does not move to put a tax on another group, Your Honour has found no objection to that kind of amendment. All this amendment does is give us an opportunity to exercise our right to vote against certain subsections of the section that is before us at the present time. I submit, therefore, that there is no validity to the objection raised by the parliamentary secretary.

I also wish to comment briefly on the point Your Honour raised a moment ago. Merely to vote against the amendment of the Minister of National Revenue that is before us leaves us in the position of accepting what is previously in the bill as subsection (3). We are opposed to both versions, both subsection (3) as it was originally drafted or as it has been proposed by the Minister of National Revenue. That is why we prefer to deal with it in the manner in which the hon. member for Regina East has placed it before Your Honour.

The amendment would strike out the substitute wording that has been proposed by the Minister of National Revenue and also leave out the original wording which was already there. That is what the minister's amendment does, namely strike out the original wording and put something else in its place.

Since the other two parts, subsection 4(f) and subsection 6 are relevant to the same issue and consequent to the removal of subsection 3, it seems to us that the simplest thing to do would be to have one vote on the whole issue of the capital employed concept. If Your Honour feels there is not that much one way or the other, I hope you will consent to this amendment being put. In one vote it will give hon. members the opportunity to say "yes" or "no" to the capital employed concept as far as co-operatives are concerned.

The Chairman: I thank the parliamentary secretary and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I expressed initial reservations because, although I have some reservations about the procedural acceptability of the proposed amendment; I feel the Chair should try to expedite the proceedings rather than spend our time on procedural arguments. I should put on record that I agree in principle with the argument of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I indicated this a day or two ago in my ruling on the proposed amendment by the hon. member for Edmonton West. I suggested that, with complexity of this bill and the somewhat unusual procedure we have been following, unless we give a bit of latitude hon. members will not have the opportunity to express opinions on the substantive aspects of the bill. In this instance it may be, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has argued that if we follow the procedure suggested in the subamendment of the hon. member for Regina East, it would give members of the committee a better chance to register an expression of opinion.

With respect to the argument put forward by the parliamentary secretary, I think this is a point which does not raise much difficulty. I was really concerned with finding the best way of dealing with the matter which the hon. member for Regina East wishes to bring before the committee. Unless there are further objections, I am prepared to put the subamendment in the name of the hon. member for Regina East.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Chairman, my remarks will be mostly about section 137 concerning Caisses populaires.

I should like to call the attention of the Parliamentary Secretary to the well marked difference that exists between private corporations and Caisses populaires. Then, I shall read communications from persons concerned with Caisses populaires.

The Parliamentary Secretary is well aware that there is a vast difference between private corporations that I shall describe as capitalist corporations, and Caisses populaires. As a matter of fact, they are capitalist corporations since they exist mostly for the purposes of capital-money. In those institutions, each share entitles the holder to one vote. That is what we call capitalistic companies.

However, there are institutions where the directors establish the terms of the voting rights. In a co-operative institution, all shareholders have their say as long as they have one share. Even if one shareholder has 50 shares and his neighbour has only one, each is entitled to a single vote.

That is the whole difference between these two kinds of institutions, and I think that today, with the bill that we are in the process of passing, we are discriminating against co-operative institutions and credit unions as regards deductions allowed when computing income tax.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney) will perhaps tell me that the government has proposed amendments. At page 9158 of Hansard, I read the amendment on the computation of cumulative deductions:

> (4.2) For the purposes of subparagraph 125(6) (b) (i), the amount of a credit union's taxable income for a taxation year shall be deemed to be the amount, if any, by which its taxable income for the year otherwise determined exceeds the lesser of $25,000 and ½ of its taxable income for the year otherwise determined.'

Mr. Chairman, I will point out that co-operatives with capital stock just have to convert it and invest it. As for co-operatives, they can do so, especially the caisses populaires which are corporations with capital stock. Thus they cannot put it into reserves; they do not have the alternative offered to a private corporation, that is either to put it into reserves or invest it.

For example, if the caisses populaires decided to transform their reserves into capital stock, this would create a problem because a member can withdraw his capital stock at any time. This represents a serious danger to the security of the caisses populaires, which does not happen to private corporations. This is why, despite a few weaknesses still contained in this legislation and account being taken of the small amendment brought in, we would hope that the government raise the exemption ceiling from $25,000 to $50,000. I think this would be most helpful, especially to small credit unions because they certainly need the first reserve funds to assure their future and give confidence to their members.

So, without wanting to be too long—this is just a reminder to the parliamentary secretary—I would like to read the communications which we receive. The first, given by the chapter of credit unions affiliated to the Ontario Federation of Credit Union is as follows:

On behalf of the credit unions affiliated to our chapter, I want to express our concern regarding the legislation now under consideration, Bill C-259, relating to the section dealing with caisses populaires and credit unions.

Despite the few favourable amendments brought in the House recently, it is evident that even exports do not know the effect this bill will have on caisses populaires and credit unions in Canada.

Since 1900, the co-operative movement has been fighting usury in Canada and trying to improve the financial situation of our people who need it most. It would be unfortunate if the government of Canada, in order to collect more revenue, ruined the ideal means for Canadians to help themselves.

Another spokesman of the Fédération des Caisses Populaires du Québec says what follows:

Caisses populaires and Credit Unions very much appreciated your co-operation and the interest you expressed regarding the methods of taxing them as proposed in Bill C-259.

There have been several amendments to section 137. They will allow Caisses populaires and Credit Unions to maintain the services their members expect from them while integrating them into the new tax system. We have already informed the Minister of Finance of the importance of those amendments.

However one point is still of concern to us. That is the application to small companies of the concept of total business limit, as provided in section 125.

We requested that the first $50,000 taxable revenue be excluded from the computation of the total business limit. The proposed amendment grants a $25,000 deduction in this regard.

We feel our request was reasonable because:

(a) Our reserves are built up solely in the interest of the group to which they belong.

(b) They are for the most part required by provincial legislation.

(c) They are not subject to distribution among members.

(d) They never result in capital gains or personal benefits.

(e) The tax paid on such reserves will never result in tax credits.

To that effect, we have asked the Minister of Finance, whether he could review amendment 137(4.2).

At the present time, we are still waiting for the draft of the regulations applicable to Caisses populaires and Credit Unions. We hope that those regulations will continue to recognize the characteristics of Credit Unions and Caisses populaires.

Those were the comments which I wanted to make to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance and I am sure that if he considers the requests of the representatives of co-operatives and Caisses populaires, he will surely propose an amendment, as requested by the federations for the common good of the Caisses populaires.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Hales: Mr. Chairman, I will limit my remarks to credit unions and caisses populaires in discussing the section dealing with co-operatives and credit unions. I do not think there is a member in the House who has not received some correspondence expressing great concern at the proposed taxation of credit unions and caisses populaires. I think it is only right that we pause a minute to think of the great value of the work of credit unions in the community. I doubt that there is a member of the House who does not have a credit union or caisse populaire in his constituency, be it a credit union at a factory, at a college or university, or one in the community at large.

In many areas of western Canada there would be no financial institutions had it not been for credit unions. In areas that were too small for banking institutions, credit unions offered their services. In the province of Quebec there are caisses populaires in many areas which banks consider too small to serve, and these provide a very useful and necessary service.

May I repeat very briefly some remarks made by the McDougall report in 1945, which report was tabled in the House of Commons. Page 52 of the report reads as follows:

It—

That is, credit unions.

—provides a method whereby people in poor circumstances are encouraged to develop a habit of thrift, since by pooling their savings they can provide a source of credit for themselves in times of need.

The bond of association, occupation or other community interest on which the membership of credit unions is based tends to minimize the element of risk which has to be considered by another type of lending institution when considering an application for a loan from an individual with little or no collateral security.

Accordingly, it provides a service for those who are either not provided with credit services from other lending institutions at all, or only at much higher rates because of the risks involved.

The tangible material and other benefits which can be derived through the credit union form of activity enable and encourage the members to solve their problems through self help rather than by relying on government aid in times of emergency or depressed conditions.

Then, at the same page the report continues:

Credit unions return to their members a very high proportion of their surplus earnings. In some cases, however, they are retaining amounts which appear to be larger than are required for reserves against bad loans and losses on the basis of past experience. If they were to be taxed by the methods we have recommended for co-operative associations, additions to these excess reserves would be made subject to tax. However, the individual amounts to be assessed would, in many cases, be very small.

As a result, the royal commission recommended that the income of credit unions continue to be excepted from taxation. I would like to challenge anyone who claims that credit unions are not motivated today by the very same principles and philosophy that impressed the legislators in 1945. If the movement is larger today than it was then, it is only because credit unions have met an enormous need in Canada. I do not think there was any doubt in the mind of the royal commission about the usefulness of credit unions and caisses populaires. I am very concerned that the minister is taxing these organizations in a way that makes it quite evident that the smaller credit unions will have to close, and that will mean a real service will be lost to the community as a result of the minister's action. I realize the minister has made some amendments, but the amendments do not go far enough to enable the credit unions to survive.

I am sure all members of the House could quote letters they have received on this issue, and I should like to quote one or two. For example, the fiberglass employees credit union at a large factory in Guelph has this to say:

A credit union is beneficial to the lower and middle income population of our country. We feel that taxation is extremely heavy in this area at present and Mr. Benson appears to be trying to drain even more.

Then, the tobacco workers' credit union, again at Guelph, make this point:

We regard our credit union operation as simply a sensible, share-the-risk extension of loaning money between member employees. The fact that full tax is paid by member employees receiving compensation for use of their money, we question the reasoning behind the credit union being also taxed.

Many letters along similar lines have been sent to me. As I understand it, the amendments that the minister tabled on October 28 relating to credit unions and caisses populaires will hopefully facilitate their transition from what was tax-free status to that of a taxable financial institution. The first of these amendments relates to the small business tax incentive, and the second and third amendments deal with the level of tax-free reserves.

In the case of the first amendment this new tax reform bill provides that the Canadian controlled private corporation will pay 25 per cent of its first $50,000 of annual business income and that beyond that level of income the rate will be the 50 per cent rate generally applicable to other corporations. Once such corporations accumulate a taxable income over $400,000 the lower rate of tax will no longer be applied but the corporation can extend the use of the lower rate by paying regular dividends to its shareholders. Every $3 of dividends would reduce the taxable income by $4 according to the Department of Finance. Although the small business incentive is available to credit unions and caisses populaires the credit unions and caisses populaires are not permitted to pay dividends under their statutory reserves. So, this again will not be of much use to them. They will not be able to pay dividends under their statutory reserves and therefore are inhibited in their ability to reduce accumulative income by dividend payments as other business corporations are allowed to do.

After these amendments were tabled on October 28 I received a letter from one of the credit unions, the College Heights Community Credit Union Limited, which reads as follows:

Some of these amendments will help our movement, but one area still remains a grave major problem.

This is the part to which I draw attention.

This is in the area of reserves and is primarily one of a conflict between federal and provincial governments. Ottawa looking for money, regards our reserves as being too high. The provinces on the other hand, by statute, require all credit unions to set aside for bad debt purposes amounts varying from 9.5 per cent of yearly earnings, in the case of Nova Scotia to 20 per cent in several other provinces including Ontario, to protect the weakest links in the credit union movement. (Incidentally this bad debt reserve will account for approximately 90 per cent of the reserves Ottawa regards as so high!). The reserve for bad debt purposes cannot be used for anything other than covering the write-off of bad debts. Under most provincial statutes should a credit union be wound up, this reserve must be distributed to charity.

I say again that the credit unions and caises populaires are not permitted to pay dividends under statutory reserves and therefore are inhibited in their ability to reduce accumulated income by dividend payments. In the other place, this matter was discussed at some length. I believe a very sensible recommendation was made. I wish to read it so that we, the parliamentary secretary and the minister can give further consideration to the very important matter of the survival of credit unions and caisses populaires. I used the word "survival" because I think it is that important. The Senate Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce made this recommendation:

That caisses populaires and credit unions should not be required to include in their 'cumulative deduction account' (for purposes of determining the available balance of their total business limit of $400,000) such portion of their taxable income as is set aside in the year as a reserve to the extent that such reserve is not available for distribution to members. This should be subject to the further limitation that no recognition be given to any such reserve to the extent that the total amount set aside does not exceed, say, 5 per cent of the organization total deposits and share capital at the commencement of the year.

The Senate Committee considered it sufficiently important to recommend that this matter be given further consideration by the government since the effect of other amendments introduced by the government differs from the above recommendation. When we have a body of men of experience and ability studying this matter and making a recommendation like this, surely the government should pay attention to the recommendation. I realize there is a problem here. A credit union may be a very large organization and someone might suggest, since it is somewhat in the position of a bank, that it should be taxed the same as a bank.

Perhaps the department would give some thought to having an escalated scale of taxation. I am thinking of the small type of credit union or caisse populaire such as might be found in a very small area of the country. In such cases the members often do much of the work for nothing. There may be only one paid executive in a community co-operative. Why should we drive these people out of business. Perhaps there should be a tax free area up to a certain level of, for instance, $100,000 or $200,000 and then over that level the tax would apply. It would seem to be an almost impossible task to strike a tax rate for credit unions if it is to be done on a fair and equitable basis.

I hope the parliamentary secretary and his officials will give consideration to the protection of the small, most useful credit unions and caisses populaires which are so prevalent across Canada. I hope also that amendments will still be made that would make it possible for these essential financial organizations to exist, flourish and continue to serve a very useful purpose.

Mr. Blair: Mr. Chairman, we are having a most interesting discussion and the remarks I propose to make immediately are not, I regret to say, the final views I will express on this subject because I hope that today and tomorrow there may be an opportunity for all members who are interested to contribute their ideas in this debate. I think the first thing that must be said is with reference to the comment made by the parliamentary secretary a few minutes ago when he said with respect of the amendment of the hon. member for Regina East that it shifted the incidence of taxation from the co-operative or credit union to the member. I have a feeling that many people in the country are unaware of the true incidence of taxation as it applies to co-operatives and their members. The fact is that the incidence of tax now falls upon the members no matter what happens, and the effect of the proposals which are being made to us by the credit union and co-operative movement is to reinforce this integration of tax liability upon the members, rather than upon the organization which they have formed to render service to themselves.

I think also it is important to bear in mind that neither the co-operatives nor the credit unions are seeking exemption from taxation but are inviting this House to consider the fairest way of applying it and achieving an equitable incidence of that taxation as between these organizations and their members. I hope hon. members will have registered very carefully the serious point made by the hon. member for Regina East in which he pointed out that there is a defect of serious proportions in the definition of a co-operative in the bill. The present definition, as I understand it, would exclude the large co-operatives which are well known to all of us, the large co-operatives in western Canada such as the prairie wheat pools and others which operate on a delegate system of voting. This, to me, is something which requires immediate repair and attention and I do not think it would be prudent for any of these sections to be incorporated until this type of curative amendment is placed before us.

At this stage, Mr. Chairman, I should also like to comment on the substance of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Regina East. He was quite correct in asserting that the basis for the computation of tax against credit unions and the co-operative movement is entirely novel. These are the only organizations in the country to whom income is imputed for the purpose of computing tax. And this basis of the imputation of income is one which co-operatives have consistently and correctly objected to, in my opinion, for many years. It is proposed that parliament take advantage of the fact that our tax system is undergoing major review and that this type of artificial approach be eliminated. The proposal is that tax be levied, as it should be, on the cash which flows through to individual members and that some appropriate, average rate of tax be applied that would give proper recognition to the reality of the operation of co-operatives and credit unions. These organizations propose that the incidence of the tax shall apply, not artificially, to the corporate body but, rather, to the members. I hope that hon. members will have an opportunity to comment on the detailed suggestions made by the co-operatives and credit unions. I suppose I ought to give fair warning of my further intervention at a later stage of debate.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, let me begin by saying that for the first time since the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton was elected, I agree with the position he has taken and look forward to seeing him vote for the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Regina East when that vote is called.

Ever since the Carter Commission report was published, we have seen in this country a concerted effort by the vested interests of this country to get the government to reject, in principle and detail, every useful recommendation made in that report. Virtually every proposal for equity spelled out in that report has been either ignored or watered down by the government, and almost nothing remains of the original commission recommendations. If the government were not so concerned about protecting the interests of this country's corporations and of this country's self-employed people who, as Carter pointed out, have done very well over the years out of the existing tax system, we would not need to consider a bill like Bill C-259 which runs for more than 700 pages. A bill running to more than 700 pages is needed because the government has taken so many steps to protect the concessions which have been made over the years to business interests and to self-employed people.

Ever since the Carter Commission made its report, representations have been coming to the government and to Members of Parliament from mining companies, oil companies, manufacturers and the self-employed. These representations have attempted to show why the principles enunciated in the Carter Commission report should not be implemented. When the government brought out its white paper we saw, at that time, just how far the government had moved away from those principles which had been enunciated in the Carter Commission report. Yet, even the white paper was met by hostility, almost universal hostility I might add, from the business community of this country. The business community is still not satisfied. It still attacks the modified provisions of Bill C-259, because business feels that those provisions infringe on the rights and privileges which business has enjoyed until now.

The ordinary citizen, as usual, has not been included in the representations made to the government on tax questions. The ordinary citizen who pays income tax cannot afford to hire tax lawyers and chartered accountants to put his case before the government. Our ordinary citizens have been virtually unrepresented. However, the credit unions and co-operatives which, by their very nature, deal with ordinary citizens have made representations to the government. Every single Member of Parliament, I am sure, has heard from credit unions and co-operatives in his constituency. It is no small wonder that members have heard from them, because the provisions of this bill affecting credit unions and co-operatives might just as well have been written by officials of the tax department, by the finance companies, by the Equitable Tax Foundation, by the private grain companies or by companies like the Richardson Securities Company. And, Mr. Chairman, they could not have done a better job of attempting to destroy the credit unions and co-operatives than do the provisions of the bill we are now discussing.

As a result of the complaints of credit unions made to Members of Parliament on the government side as well as to members on the opposition side, the government made some concessions. Some amendments have been brought in to lighten the full force of the crippling effect that certain provisions of this tax bill would have had on credit unions. However, I do not believe it is by accident that those sections which will most seriously affect credit unions remain virtually intact and remain precisely as the government first introduced them.

I join in supporting hon. members from all parties who have said that if the provisions of this bill affecting credit unions are passed in their present form, many credit unions will disappear completely and the ability of others to serve their members will be so severely curtailed that the major function they have performed for their members will disappear. The parliamentary secretary has always impressed me as being a man with a great deal of business experience. He represents very well—and I am not criticizing him—the members of the business community. They, too, are entitled to be represented just as everyone else is. They, too, are entitled to have their spokesmen.

As I say, the parliamentary secretary has always impressed me as one whose major interest and experience has been in the business community. Does he not realize the effect which these sections of the tax bill will have on credit unions? Does he realize that the tax the government proposes to impose will mean that the most important area of reserves which must be set aside under the provisions of provincial legislation will be very adversely affected? Not only are the transfers to reserves non-discretionary because of provincial legislation under which credit unions operate, but there is a legislative bar to their distribution to the members even on the winding up of the credit union. What this means is that the basic principle, that shares in a credit union which may only be redeemed at par irrespective of the amount of reserves on hand, will not be able to operate. The fact that these reserves are beyond the reach of the shareholders removes in effect shareholder ownership, a very cardinal quality of income as contemplated in the Income Tax Act.

Commercial corporations are in an entirely different position. Retention of corporate income increases the value of the shares, and in this way gives a benefit to the shareholder. Or alternatively, amounts reserved may be paid out as dividends, again benefiting the shareholder and earning for him a tax credit on his dividend, which essentially represents a rebate of the corporate tax. The effect of the provincial legislation controlling credit unions is to deny these benefits, which are available to corporations, to credit unions. Because of the lack of equality of income, and because these non-discretionary reserves cannot be distributed to members, credit unions find themselves trapped by section 125 of the Income Tax Act. There reserves will be considered income in the "business limit" of $50,000 per year and in the total "business limit" of $400,000 which is contemplated under this bill.

The very fact that the credit union is statute barred from distributing these reserves means that the "total business limit" will automatically be reached in a very short period of time. Aggravating this situation is the fact that transfers to the reserve must be tax paid. No provision exists permitting income taxes to be charged against these reserves. The sum of these factors means that section 125, which provides for a reduction of tax under certain conditions, will not apply to a medium sized credit union beyond five years, after which time a transfer of $50,000 to reserve will attract a tax of $50,000. Mr. Chairman, talk about confiscatory taxation—that is what the government is proposing for the credit unions.

The credit unions have proposed that section 137, the credit union taxation provision, be amended to provide that amounts required to be transferred to statutory reserves be excluded from the calculation of the "business limit" and the "total business limit" in the application of section 125. The effect of such an amendment would be that tax paid transfers to reserve would attract a tax equal to 33 per cent of the reserve requirement as opposed to a tax equal to 100 per cent of the reserve requirement. Surely, if the government is concerned about the so-called tax advantages which the credit unions and the co-ops have been able to enjoy as compared with ordinary corporations, it ought to be willing to agree to this very modest proposal made by the credit unions unless, as some of us who are politically partisan and motivated believe, the government is out to help destroy the credit unions.

Mr. Mahoney: Nonsense.

Mr. Orlikow: The parliamentary secretary says no. It would be interesting to hear him explain to members on both sides, including his colleague the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, why the government, at least up until now, is insisting on imposing these punitive tax provisions on the credit unions.

Earlier, Mr. Chairman, I said that the government had agreed to some amendments of the tax legislation affecting the credit unions. But to date there has not been the slightest indication, to my knowledge, that the government is prepared to meet in any way, shape or form the criticisms of the co-ops with respect to this tax legislation. And if the parliamentary secretary can agree with me on anything, although I sometimes wonder about that, I am certain he can agree with me when I say that co-ops by their very nature are not very radical, revolutionary, aggressive organizations. They are part of the free enterprise or mixed economy system which exists today. When they have made representations to government I have always felt that if they erred, they erred on the side of moderation. Yet, Mr. Chairman, there has not been a single indication on the part of the government that it is prepared to modify this tax legislation one jot, one little, to meet the criticisms and requests of the co-ops.

Let us look at what the co-ops have said about this tax legislation. I know that the government will say, "Well, we are prepared to protect the little co-operative, the little consumer co-operative and the little credit union, but it is the big co-ops, which are really in the same league as private corporations—the wheat pools and the Federated Co-operative—which we think have not been paying their fair share of taxation." I say to the parliamentary secretary and to the government that the little co-ops in the towns, villages and cities of Canada, and the little credit unions would not have been able to survive unless they had the assistance, the technical advice and the detailed knowledge that they have been able to receive from the wheat pools, from the United Co-operatives in Ontario, and from the Credit Union League, all of which were built up through the contributions of the ordinary members of the credit unions.

What have the co-ops said? The President of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool has called for further amendments to this bill because he says that the proposed amendments still limit the way in which co-ops pay patronage refunds to their members.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being five o'clock it is my duty to rise, report progress and request leave to sit again later this day.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie)—Fisheries; the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave)—Grain; the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Latulippe)—External Trade. It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions (papers), private bills and public bills.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of two of my colleagues I wonder if I may ask for consent for the first two items under the heading of "Motions for Papers" on today's order paper to be withdrawn. I refer to order No. 24 in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), and to order No. 49 in the name of the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave).

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Orders discharged and motions withdrawn.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

COMMUNICATIONS

TELECOMMUNICATIONS SATELLITES—REQUEST FOR COPY OF AGREEMENT BETWEEN HUGHES AIRCRAFT, NORTHERN ELECTRIC AND SPAR AEROSPACE

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough) moved:

That an order of the House do issue for a copy of the agreements between Hughes Aircraft Co. on the one hand and Northern Electric Co. of Montreal and Spar Aerospace Ltd., Malton, Ont. respecting component parts for telecommunications satellites.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the original inquiry now seems a bit ancient since it was raised here in November, 1970. The matter with which it deals, however, has not by any means become obsolescent. Indeed, it is a strange coincidence that in many ways this question is especially germane in this Parliament and in this country today. It deals with documentation which is not revealed. As we have often thought in recent months, far too many publications are concealed from study by Members of Parliament and from perusal by the public which they concern.

The matter, of course, also deals with the tremendously important item of competition from foreign industry, an eternal situation I suppose in recent years. It reveals a collapse of the expectations which the government had created in and for the Canadian people. I recall the heady days of yesteryear when the present hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Kierans) used to have such high-flown hopes and such lofty ambitions for what was to be done in the stratosphere in the realm of telecommunications.

Mr. Bell: Whatever happened to him?

Mr. Dinsdale: He went into orbit.

Mr. Macquarrie: I often thought when things got worse in the postal department that the rosy hopes in the communications branch became more and more rosy. Lower and lower went the morale of the Post Office and up and up into the stratosphere went the satellites. I used to say of the former incumbent that as a postmaster general he was a good economist. I still think he is a good economist, and in these matters he should be listened to by his associates across the way. I ask for these documents because I am very concerned about what has happened to the hopes which we had been led to entertain in reference to a very important matter, the development of a domestic telecommunications system for this country. Important legislation was passed, very serious scrutiny and discussion in committees ensued and there was a good deal of public discussion and a great deal of public expectation on this extremely important matter.

One of the prime inducements which was set before this House as the bill was passed and as the estimates were passed and this money was voted, was that the development of a domestic satellite system would add tremendously to Canadian technology, especially in the advanced field of scientific technology. We were led to believe that there would be a tremendous spin-off, that Canada would advance itself immeasurably because of the application of the ability of its scientists and of its highly refined and sophisticated industrial workers in this very important scientific equipment.

We were led to expect breath-taking gains in the important field of scientific and technological innovation. I believe it was not so much the spinning of the satellite itself but the spin-off from the industrial technological development which sold the people of Canada on this. There was no reason Canadians should not look upon that future as reasonably hopeful. Canadians were not and are not infants in the field of space age technology. The Alouette satellite went up years ago and proved to be extremely successful. The life span and performance reached was better than expected. Alouette II was also very successful. Isis A and B "flew" very well. They were well constructed and were very capable, operating birds, if I may use the expression.

When the government produced its white paper it was under the imprimatur and inscription of the then minister of industry, who is now President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury). There was some clear outline of what would happen. I shall read a paragraph or two from the white paper called "A Domestic Satellite Communication System for Canada" published in 1968. This, we were told, and I think rightly so, was the guideline for the program which led to the Telesat establishment. At page 50, appears the following:

It is at this early stage of the development of a satellite communication system that Canada must decide whether to be simply a user of these new means, as they may be developed by others, or to be a leader in their development. Only the latter will permit the realization of their full benefits and opportunities for the Canadian public.

It is evident that Canada already possesses to a large degree the essential technology to determine the design and construction of its own domestic satellite system as a result of successful programs of the Department of Industry, the Defence Research Board and the Department of Transport. This is not to say that every part of the system be manufactured in Canada. Components or sub-systems may be brought from other countries when the volume might not justify Canadian development of production. When this is the case, however, effective control can only be maintained through the exercise of choice and specification. The control of specification, design, and construction, can and must be retained in Canadian hands. The development of satellite communications will employ the most advanced "state of the art" in many fields of technology. An important corollary, therefore, to the undertaking of such development by Canadian industry will be to enable it to apply the resulting skills to the development of other high technology products. The complex technology of satellite systems involving advanced techniques, new planning methods and higher standards of industrial performance will, in a few years, become the technology of many industries. It demands the rapid evolution of techniques, reliability of products, control of production, interdisciplinary development work, anticipatory research and system management, and long term program planning.

I am almost overwhelmed, Mr. Speaker, as I read this document, even at this late date. I am filled with nostalgia. At page 52, I find this:

National identification is intimately associated with technological progress. The power of programs such as this to attract and hold scientists, engineers and others, and to cause them to identify their own aims with those of Canada, cannot be ignored.

The programs, both private and public, to prepare Canadian industry for participation in space communications, have been markedly successful. The government intends to use to the full this capability in realizing a domestic satellite communication system.

I shall end the lesson there, Mr. Speaker. Then, I recall the minister of communications at that time thinking out loud. He was a very engaging minister in the House and outside and I may say that I miss him profoundly. He reflected one day that:

A 100 per cent Canadian-built satellite will come with a price tag, both in dollars and in the length of time it takes to build.

A 100 per cent foreign-built satellite will come more cheaply and more quickly, but bring with it no benefits to Canadian scientists, engineers, industries.

It boils down to deciding the price we are prepared to pay for being Canadians.

That was on January 27, 1969.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the inquiry for papers was prompted by what happened to this outburst of technological nationalism, if I may call it that. Who is constructing the satellite? Is it being built by a Montreal firm, a Toronto firm, a Brandon firm or a Charlottetown firm? The name is the Hughes Aircraft Co. of California. How much Canadian content will there be in the Canadian satellite? If you combine the bit that was given to Spar and the bit that was given to Northern Electric you get something a little less than 20 per cent Canadian content in the satellite, the whole system of which may cost this country many, many millions of dollars.

When it was suggested that we buy off the shelf one of the American satellites and send it up at a very low price, it was said that we could not do this to our own technology and that it was worthwhile to pay a little more. However, there is surely here the fear that we have, as is so often the case, fallen between the two stools. We do not pay the price to have a purely Canadian operation, and we do not go into the market place purely on business terms and buy an American satellite.

So far, we have taken the costly road. We reached the stage where we used Hughes Aircraft Company of California. They became the principal creators of our satellite. We do not know the terms. We do not know the correspondence. We do not know what went on between the relevant department and the Canadian firms who were interested. We do not know what kind of arrangements were made for and with Hughes, yet this is one of the most costly and important developments which the Canadian government and, therefore, the Canadian people have moved into in our day and age. I resent the secrecy profoundly. There is no reason, in terms of competition on an economic or commercial basis, this information should not be revealed. It is high time someone told us the full story of our collapsed hopes in industrial nationalism as revealed by this business.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to support my colleague who has made an eloquent presentation here this afternoon. I am sorry that the present Minister of Communications (Mr. Stanbury) is not in the House because I sometimes get the feeling that the present Minister of Communications, who inherited the mantle of his predecessor, is not fully aware of the complete background that has given rise to the motion that has been put forward here today.

I followed very closely the development of the idea of a Canadian communications satellite. In fact, I attended most of the committee meetings. Like the hon. member who has just spoken, I was impressed by the eloquence and the spirit of the white paper which was the basis upon which the Parliamentary committee conducted its deliberations. The optimism expressed in terms of the development of the Canadian satellite communications technology was one of the reasons the bill, when it came before the House in 1969, received such enthusiastic and unanimous consent. As has been pointed out, the rules have been changed in the middle of the game. We are now heading in a completely opposite direction from that which was presented to the committee and the House when the act was under consideration.

I wish to review briefly the history of Canada's participation in the satellite program. In 1962, the decision was made to proceed with the launching of our first 100 per cent Canadian satellite; that was Alouette 1. It was such an overwhelming success that Canada went on from strength to strength. I believe we now have four of the Alouette series in orbit. It was my privilege to be at the Vandenburg air base last April when number four in the series was launched. I was impressed to discover that all four of the Canadian built satellites were still in orbit, functioning and producing useful information in the bigger function of atmospheric probing. The other statistics given to us at that time were also impressive. I discovered that Canada was number three in terms of functioning satellites still in orbit.

It was interesting to hear the briefing of the experts at the Vandenburg air base where NASA was charged with the responsibility of hurtling the Canadian satellite into orbit. Throughout the day's briefing, they were full of negatives. They said that many things could happen. We were told that so much of the technology was marginal in launching one of these complex gadgets into space that it was highly likely that this fourth launching would not be a success. Notwithstanding the misgivings and the warning that had been issued throughout the day, when the launching finally took place that evening with a thunderous roar, Alouette 4 went off into outer space. I think the statistics indicated it entered orbit within two miles of the designated point. This indicates that Canada has indeed achieved remarkable technological skill in sophisticated space technology.

When the decision was made in 1962, we were at the beginning of the decade of the sixties. We were moving toward Expo 67 and our centennial. Canadians were aglow with confidence. That spirit still prevailed in 1969 when the Parliament of Canada made its decision with regard to proceeding to develop our own communications satellite. Within the past two years, Mr. Speaker, that optimism, glowing spirit of Canadianism and confidence in Canadian technology has unfortunately deteriorated. This is one of the reasons I wholeheartedly support the motion we are discussing this afternoon. A government that has completely reversed itself in such a short space of time should certainly be responsible enough to the House of Commons to indicate by the publication of documents why it has now backed away from this positive and optimistic note and is moving in a completely negative and pessimistic direction.

I also support the mover's note that today we are facing a general climate in Canada of growing concern over the penetration of American technology into the Canadian economy. This is one of the major issues that seems to be before the country as a result of the leaks that have emerged within the past few days. Today, we are looking for documents which have not been made available to the public or to this House. I hope it does not become necessary to have another leak in the ship of state in order to get the information that Parliament has the right to expect, in view of the wholehearted support that it gave to the original intentions of the government. That support was based on more than the white paper to which reference has been made this afternoon. It was based on a detailed report which was referred to as the Chapman Report, presented in 1966, which supported wholeheartedly the concept of a Canadian domestic space program. The author of that report is now the Deputy Minister of the Department of Communications. He appeared before the committee when the proposed legislation was under discussion and no doubt we shall have an opportunity in due course to examine a number of officials, including Dr. Chapman, with respect to the reversal of that policy. As I re-read that report—and it has been necessary to go over the documentation—I see that this was to have been an entirely Canadian project. It was to depend upon NASA, the United States space agency, for launching only. This is the program on which the Allouette series was predicated. It was the anticipated basis with respect to the operation of Canadian satellites.

Today we find that the rules have changed radically, as compared with the proposals in the Chapman Report. I would point out that in 1967 the Science Council of Canada endorsed the Chapman Report. It was out of both these preliminary documents that the white paper of 1968 came forward in support of Canadian technology in such eloquent terms as were quoted by my hon. friend. To sum up the spirit of these reports—and they were examinations of the subject in depth—the conclusion was that Canada could not afford to become completely dependent in this field upon the super powers, whether the United States or the U.S.S.R.

What has happened since then, is, of course, that the policy has been reversed. This is why I had hoped the Minister of Communications might have been in attendance during this debate; had he been here he might have thrown some light on the current thinking of the government in this regard. The former minister originally shared the enthusiasm of the reports I have outlined today. He stated emphatically when the Telesat Canada Act was before the House in 1969 that a Canadian designed and built satellite with associated ground facilities would result from the passage of that measure.

It was then, Mr. Speaker, that the Hughes Aircraft Corporation of America got into the act—I am not referring to the act of parliament itself. They put in a bid on the project and it was then that the accent used by the former minister of communications (Mr. Kierans) took on a slightly southern tone. He began to talk of a 100 per cent Canadian effort as a case in Canada re-inventing the wheel. So, we were moving into an entirely new scheme of things after the bill had been passed unanimously by the House. Apparently there is a cost figure involved here which has not been explained in any detail by representatives of the government. We have been given some inkling as to why the government has changed its mind. Instead of a project with a 67 per cent Canadian content, United States technology playing only a minor role, they talk now of a 20 per cent Canadian content to be provided by such Canadian firms as Northern Electric and Spar Aerospace Products Limited of Malton, Ontario.

There has been a further development. The United States authorities themselves are now getting into the act and urging a joint United States-Canadian project. From what I gather from the meagre information available from government sources, this is where the matter stands at the moment. It is no longer a 100 per cent Canadian effort. It is now a Canada-United States joint project, with the huge Hughes Aircraft Corporation providing the technological skills and Canada reverting to the role she has assumed only too often of following in the footsteps of the United States giant. And this in spite of the fact that we have proof of our skill and competence in this area in four successful satellites which are still in orbit; that we happen to be No. 3 in terms of functioning satellites still orbiting. Nevertheless, there has been no attempt made by the government to reveal in any detail even the financial picture which persuaded it to completely change its concept of a 100 per cent Canadian communications satellite.

It boils down to this. Government policy in this field, as in others, has been confusing because of its meandering from one position to another. The same criticism could be made with respect to other areas of the government's activities. For example, we are presently debating a government bill proposing tax reform. It has gone from complexity to complexity and from confusion to confusion until the whole of the Canadian economy finds a pall of uncertainty hanging over it. I know that in the field of satellite technology, Canadian firms such as R.C.A., Northern Electric and Spar Aerospace feel they are competent to move into this area. I appeal to the government, not only on behalf of opposition members but for the sake of its own backbenchers as well, to table the document which has been requested and which has been withheld.

I believe that having regard to the leaky condition of the ship of state at the moment we shall get the documents anyway. But let us do this in the regular way, not by the back door method. Evidently there are those in the civil service who are becoming disenchanted with the government's disposition to keep all these matters away from the public. The government should move to restore our faith, and it can only do so by showing less readiness to resort to a cloak of secrecy and taking Members of Parliament into its confidence.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Charles Turner (London East): Mr. Speaker, the motion of the hon. member for the production of the contract signed between Telesat Canada and the Hughes Aircraft Company for the construction of Telesat Canada's domestic communications satellites must be opposed for the reasons set out in the Telesat Canada Act of 1969. The act clearly establishes that Telesat Canada is not an agent of Her Majesty or a Crown corporation within the meaning of the Financial Administration Act. Rather, it is an independently operating commercial corporation which only reports to government respecting certain matters delineated in the Telesat Canada Act. The powers of the company are spelled out in section 6 of that act.

On several occasions in statements to this House and in answers to questions, the Minister of Communications (Mr. Stanbury) has stressed that as a result of the commercial nature of the company it would not be in the interests and objects of the company to have information of a private and confidential nature made public. In short, then, Telesat Canada is a private company subject to certain limited powers possessed by the Minister of Communications or the government as laid down in the Telesat Canada Act. Essentially it is a common carrier which is subject to certain government regulations in the same way that the other, old common carriers are.

Telesat is a limited company in which the government is a major but not controlling shareholder and in which other shareholders also have rights. Aside, therefore, from certain corporate actions specified in the Telesat Canada Act in which either the Minister of Communications or the Governor in Council must concur, the management of the company is responsible to shareholders in the company. Given this private, commercial nature it is particularly important that Telesat's right to privacy in its negotiations with members of the communications industry be preserved.

Telesat's contract with the Hughes Aircraft Company is a complex commercial and technical document dealing with the most advanced technological equipment. Some of the confidential information included in it is the property of the Hughes Aircraft Company, which almost certainly, and quite understandably, would regard its public disclosure by Telesat Canada as a breach of faith.

Since the hon. member's motion for the production of the Telesat-Hughes contract and other documents was made, the company's 1970 annual report has been tabled in this House as provided by the Telesat Canada Act. It contains up to date information on the financial and program activities of the company as required by the Canada Corporations Act and the Telesat Canada Act. In July of this year a semi-annual report was distributed to shareholders of record in the company. I am further advised that the company, like any other Canadian commercial corporation, will respond to any private inquiries for additional information in connection with its program.

For the above reasons I cannot support the motion at this time and suggest the hon. member should contact the president of Telesat for the information he desires.

Mr. Dinsdale: Would the hon. member who has just spoken accept a question? He made the point that it would not be possible to reveal information because of the involvement of private companies. Is he aware that the Trans-Canada Telephone System and the CN-CP Telecommunications system offered to build a Canadian communications satellite without any public involvement at all, and had it not been for government insistence we would have had our domestic satellite communications system?

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, this is another opportunity for members to point out to the government their resentment at the retention of information in a field of general interest if not of general advantage. The hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) referred to the technology we have developed in Canada, of which all Canadians are duly proud—the Alouette satellite, which was not a highly secretive program. I understand that some of the so-called scientists took parts of it home and worked on it in the basement, that they did not have proper insulating materials and used the fibre-type coffee cup. Then they talked the United States into putting this mass of coffee cups in the air, and the satellite is still up there working very satisfactorily, probably much to the chagrin of every other scientific body in the world.

Liberal governments have a habit of not allowing information to be made public. I am not familiar with what is in these particular papers or with the background outlined by previous speakers, but I do know that many Canadians are of the opinion that the Telesat operation should be a public utility in Canada, that it should operate to the advantage of communications systems in this country and play a useful role in sending messages to all parts of the world. In addition, this would enable Canada to stay in a prominent position in the communications field.

While it may have been necessary to bring in a consortium to provide the scientific knowledge, most Canadians were of the opinion that we had decided to go that particular program alone and were increasing the expertise we had already developed in this field. The Canadian public was aware of the fact that we are the second or third most interested country in this type of communication. We have a vast area geographically, and therefore need scientific knowledge of this sort.

When the Liberal government suggests that the publication put out by the Telesat Corporation was sufficient to provide information about the changes that have taken place in government thinking over the last several years, it seems to me that they have not read the pamphlet, since all it gives is the names of the board of directors and very little else. It does not say why we did the things we did. It does not say why we had to negotiate a contract with Hughes.

I had thought the argument had been resolved on the side of Canadian development, and I was given the impression the other night from a television program that we were building a plant at Shirleys Bay for the purpose. I stand to be corrected, but I think we are now building a plant in California, where the sun shines much longer than it does in Canada and where everything is done in a big way, and Hughes may make a big splash with this as he did with other projects over the years, much to the dismay of many shareholders in that corporation. However, I suggest that the government is obligated to give the information asked for in both motion No. 96 and motion No. 97. I think the Canadian public is entitled to know whether or not we have totally abandoned the building of telecommunications facilities of the kind we believed we were embarking upon.

The former Minister of Communications did admit a cost factor was involved, and this raised another problem. I suppose in the Liberal party there are two lines of thought. There are those who believe that Canadian development is worth while though it may cost something; there are others who believe it is better to give the money to the United States and buy technology. Perhaps we will now give the money to the Russians since they seem to be doing pretty well, too, in certain fields. Or perhaps we should shop around in Eaton's and Simpsons'.

I think there are many people in this country who agree with the former Minister of Communications who said, in effect, "So what?"—because there is a change. We spent a lot of money developing much useless scientific knowledge in this country, and here is a place in which we have established some expertise and have decided we can build a communications facility which can be used not only by Canada but by other countries, and to which we can add in order to do the things which will be necessary to make a contribution in the communications field which we are unable to do in other fields. I presume the same difficulty exists in the Conservative party, because as I understand the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie)—and I am always very interested in listening to his speeches because he seems to be taking a new line in the Conservative party—

Mr. Dinsdale: It is Progressive Conservative.

Mr. Peters: He may be the progressive in that party, progressing to a new position in the political spectrum. But he seems to be saying in a very progressive way that we should take the money and buy it as cheaply as possible, and what is wrong with buying it from the United States? The hon. member for Brandon-Souris is a little more old-fashioned and says there might be some merit in keeping it in Canada. I should like to see these papers so we could look at the developments that have been made.

Mr. Dinsdale: We started this in 1962.

Mr. Peters: That proves the point. A real Conservative never lets go of something. The year 1962 seems to have become a fixation. The hon. member for Hillsborough, however, is really talking about something happening right now, and I am particularly interested in something which will happen in the future. I believe most Canadians are interested in the development of expertise in certain fields. We have made some bad mistakes in this country. We have made them in the aircraft industry. We developed probably the best team of scientific experts in the aeronautical field in Canada and then, through government intervention and lack of foresight among other things—this is history—we scrapped the project and lost these scientists.

This cost us a lot of money. In my opinion we had the largest expenditure in that field and only had to find out what we would do with the baby. We had to make up our minds whether we had a bomber, a fighter aircraft, a trooper or what. However, we scrapped it. It seems to me this is what we are doing in respect of the expertise we have developed in the telecommunications field. I was interested in the fact that Northern Electric is involved in this development. Northern Electric, as you know, Mr. Speaker, is a subsidiary of Bell Canada, which is another public utility. Bell Canada is before us now, wanting more money.

I should like to learn from these papers just what Northern Electric is doing. It is interesting to note that Northern Electric has started to lay off a number of people and close down its wire and hardware division. It has laid off people in my area and has closed down in Ontario, I am told, something like 16 outlets. It has laid off a large number of employees who have been with the company for a long time. It does not appear to be too interested in an aggressive sales program. I am wondering how that company fits in with the Telesat program and with other developments in this field.

I should like to see these documents. Also, I should like to see them published so that the news media could see them and perhaps do some research into the question of why we became involved with Hughes Aircraft Company in the United States. I was of the opinion, as I believe most people in the country were, that we had decided this was a field of prime importance to Canada because of the need for television in the Arctic and in remote and inaccessible areas. I do not know whether we will pay for the launching or how we will get it into orbit, but we probably have figured that out. However, we were to build it. It was to be ours and we would have a commodity in which we could sell space communications to other people.

Mr. Dinsdale: A good, Conservative policy.

Mr. Peters: As my friend says, "A good, Conservative policy". I think it was, but the new Conservative policy amuses me because it is one the Liberals had for a few months. The Liberals gave up their position of continentalism and my friends in the Conservative party have taken it up. I do not know where this leaves them. These papers might indicate where it leaves them.

I have not supported that proposition in either the old or the new position, but believe Canadians should do all they can and should be as expert as possible in fields where it is feasible. I wholeheartedly accept the proposition that these papers should be made public and ask that the government, in the interest of the Canadian public, not provide this information through leaks but in a formal manner so that business can be conducted in an orderly fashion.

Mr. Jacques-L. Trudel (Montreal-Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, I have listened closely to the comment made by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) who, apparently, wanted to emphasize three main points.

He stated first of all that there was a lack of information and he attempted to give reasons for this. He then quoted the white paper.

Then, to show that Canada's share was not very great, he referred to certain speeches.

His colleague from Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) proceeded in a totally different manner, and he proved that there was in fact a telecommunications system in Canada by going over past events.

I share the view of the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) that the hon. member was then showing that there had in fact been participation and that we did participate in the telecommunications system. He spoke of the Alouette and the trip he made to Vandenberg last April when another satellite was launched.

If I may answer the question asked by these two members concerning the lack of information, I would like to make some remarks. On the contrary, it seems to me that we have the necessary information in order to ascertain just how far we have gone in the field of telecommunications.

There is a point on which I would like to insist before commenting on another subject. The hon. member for Brandon-Souris seemed to suggest that we reversed the engine, that we had changed the government policy. On the contrary, I think he has demonstrated himself that not only did our policy remain unchanged but also that we still apply what has been decided previously.

At this point, I would like to review for the information of hon. members certain striking facts which certainly concern the national system of telecommunication by satellites, including Telesat, which was established by the government.

On July 31, 1970, after it received permission to do so from the government of Canada, Telesat opened negotiations with the Hughes Aircraft Company, which led to a contract under which Hughes Aircraft was to build the spacecraft needed by Telesat for its national satellite communications system.

On September 30, a month later, after the Minister of Communications had approved the Canadian contents of the project, as required under the Telesat Canada Act, representatives of Telesat Canada and the Hughes Aircraft Company signed the contract, which amounted to some $31 million.

The contract stated that Hughes Aircraft would provide three spacecraft for implementation of the space part of the Telesat system. Before this contract was signed, Hughes Aircraft had signed contracts with its two main sub-contractors—the Northern Electric Company in Montreal, and the Spar Aerospace Products Ltd. in Toronto. Northern Electric is to provide the whole electronic system—particularly all the communication devices of the spacecraft—which would represent not a 20 per cent content, as mentioned by the hon. member for Hillsborough, but rather a 100 per cent content in that case. Spar Aerospace Products Ltd. will supply the structure of the spacecraft and the technical support staff. The suggestions of the hon. member for Hillsborough might perhaps be vindicated by saying that owing to the contribution of two Canadian sub-contractors, more than 20 per cent of the elements of the spacecraft will be Canada-made.

Contracts have also been signed by Hughes Aircraft, Spar Aerospace and Northern Electric whereby the two Canadian companies would provide the electronic system and structure for about fifteen other similar spacecraft which Hughes Aircraft hopes to sell on the world market.

It is interesting to note that the structure of the first spacecraft which will be launched has already been delivered to Hughes Aircraft by Spar Aerospace Products Ltd. on August 23, long before the deadline and that works on the electronic equipment are progressing at the new Northern Electric plant at Lucerne in Quebec.

The contract between Telesat and Hughes Aircraft calls for delivery of the first spacecraft in October 1972; the second and third are to be delivered at four months' intervals. The contract of some $31 million calls for performance pay to Hughes Aircraft during the whole useful life of the satellites and penalties payable by Hughes Aircraft for delays in delivery. In other words, Hughes Aircraft will not receive the total amount stipulated in the contract as long as the satellite's performance has not been satisfactory for its whole useful life. The company will also be penalized if it does not deliver the spacecraft as scheduled.

Telesat will be one, if not the first national satellite telecommunications system in the word to use satellites on synchronous orbit.

Each satellite will have 12 channels of which ten will be available for commercial use, and the other two reserved. Each channel will be able to carry a signal for colour television, or the equivalent in message traffic, that is a maximum of 960 unilateral telephone lines.

Present plans foresee the launching of the first satellite Anik I for the end of 1972, and the start of commercial operations early in 1973. The second satellite will be launched after six months of satisfactory operation of the system. This second satellite will thus offer a maximum degree of system reliability, and the same capacity as Anik I, for the number of usable channels. The third spacecraft will be kept on the ground as a standby.

Furthermore, in their remarks, the hon. member for Brandon-Souris and the hon. member for Hillsborough have said that there was a lack of documentation, that no figures were available and that we were groping in the dark.

Allow me to give a few other figures. Amounts in the neighborhood of $30 million were mentioned in the motion for tabling of papers. It is important to consider that the Canadian telecommunications industry is among the most sophisticated in the world. Its investments are estimated at more than $5 billion, a figure which will double over the coming decade if this industry keeps its present rate of growth.

Canada also has the longest micro-wave system, 50,000 miles, on a per capita basis. It comprises three main relays, owned by public corporations in the telecommunications field, such as the Trans-Canada Telephone System and Canadian National-Canadian Pacific.

I still have many notes before me. The information they contain is public and they are available to hon. members.

As other hon. members wish to speak, I shall let them have the floor. As for the reservations expressed by the hon. member for London East (Mr. Turner), I cannot, at this time and after reading them, be in favour of the production of papers.

Mr. J. Roland Comtois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I think I should also take exception to two notices of motions of the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) who is asking for a copy of the agreements between private companies supplying spacecraft to Telesat Canada. Such a request is based on the fact that these matters are of no public interest or of no interest to Telesat Canada, a private concern.

The agreements referred to in the notice of motion could be either the sub-contractor agreements negotiated between Hughes Aircraft and the two Canadian firms for making components for the spacecraft of Telesat Canada, or else the agreement under which the two Canadian companies will participate in building other similar telecommunications satellites whose number—it was given a while ago—could reach 15 and which Hughes Aircraft hopes to sell on the world market.

In either case, it concerns agreements between Hughes Aircraft and two Canadian sub-contractors, Northern Electric and Spar Aerospace Products Limited. Telesat knows the terms of the sub-contractor contracts concerning satellite construction, but is not a contracting party. Mr. Speaker, I think that is important. The arrangements Hughes Aircraft and the two Canadian companies made regarding their participation in the production of similar satellites for future customers were negotiated between the three private corporations which are the ones concerned and not Telesat.

That is why it would be impossible for Telesat to make public all arrangements of which it could be aware and which would bind Hughes Aircraft, Northern Electric and Spar Aerospace Products Ltd. in view of a future market where other customers are involved.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry but I must interrupt the hon. parliamentary secretary; the time provided for private members' business has now expired. The House now resumes the debate interrupted at 5 o'clock.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequent upon the amendments to that act—Mr. Lachance in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman (Mr. Lachance): Order, please. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair. The committee will meet again at eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

[English]

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

On clause 1—section 135: Deduction in computing income.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, when I spoke this afternoon I tried to put on the record the difficulties which this legislation, as it is now drafted, will create for credit unions. The difficulties which will be created for co-operatives are even more serious because up to this point the government has refused to make any changes in the legislation despite the most strenuous objections by the co-operatives and, I understand, despite the very careful and moderate representations made in private to the government by representatives of the major co-operatives.

The president of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool has made the position of his organization with regard to the legislation very clear. He has said that the proposed amendments will give a choice of a formula based on one-third of income or 5 per cent of capital employed. He has said:

This results in forced imputation of taxable income and is not acceptable.

In its news release the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool said:

The proposed formula of 5 per cent of capital employed compares with 3 per cent at present. It would be introduced gradually, over a ten year-period.

We feel that this formula has no basis in reason and must be discarded.

Co-operatives are prepared to pay tax at the ordinary corporate rate on any earnings retained by the co-operative. Earnings returned to the member should become part of his income.

For a taxation act to force an imputed taxable corporate income on a co-operative is to interfere with the democratic right of members to run their own business. Such a treatment is not applied to co-operatives in any other country.

I think that the members of this House, members of co-operatives and the public in general have a right to know why the government is taking such an extremely hostile approach to credit unions and co-operatives. As I said earlier this afternoon, it seems to me that the government is following the suggestions made on many occasions over a long period of years by the finance companies which are upset, as well they should be, by the rapid growth of credit unions.

Surely the government and the parliamentary secretary know that for the hundreds of thousands of people who belong to credit unions and caisses populaires there is really no alternative except the not very gentle clutches of the finance companies. Surely the parliamentary secretary does not want us to think that he wants the ordinary citizens of this country to have to go to the finance companies and pay 18 per cent or 24 per cent on the money that they must borrow? Yet this legislation will help to destroy credit unions and will boost finance companies.

Similarly, Mr. Chairman, co-operatives such as the wheat pools, which have done a tremendous job for the farmers of western Canada, have their very existence challenged by this legislation. I cannot think of anybody except the private grain companies and organizations such as the Equitable Tax Foundation who can be happy with the legislation now before the committee.

I say to the parliamentary secretary and to the Minister of Finance that deathbed repentance is better than no repentance at all. On three or more occasions the minister introduced pretty substantial amendments to the bill as originally proposed, and it is not too late for him to introduce the kind of reasonable amendments, moderate amendments which would permit credit unions and co-ops to continue the very fine work they have been doing, to give their members the kind of service which they have been giving and to give the people of Canada alternatives to the completely free enterprise, profit-oriented companies to which otherwise they must resort.

Again I say to the parliamentary secretary that it is not too late to introduce the kind of amendments which credit unions and major co-operatives have been seeking, giving them some of the equity which those of us who greeted the Carter commission recommendations with a great deal of joy hoped to see in the new tax legislation when it was finally introduced.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, the section of the bill now before the committee affords members of the House an opportunity to speak on a very important phase of Canadian life, namely, the co-operative movement. Nowhere in Canada is the small co-op more important and nowhere does it play a more important role in the life of the community at large than in the province of Newfoundland. There is not a constituency in the province of Newfoundland that does not have more than one active co-operative. In this respect I refer specifically to my colleague, the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador, who has a very active co-op movement in his constituency and has worked closely with it in relation to the amendments contained in the bill before the committee.

It is interesting, and I think worth placing on the record, that the latest statistics available to members of the committee and released by the Department of Agriculture show that at the end of 1969 there were 2,373 co-operatives in Canada, consisting of approximately 1,600,000 members. These co-ops range in size from the large, super co-operatives in western Canada to the much smaller ones scattered all over the country. The smaller ones are especially active in the Atlantic provinces and more particularly in my own province of Newfoundland.

It appears to me, Mr. Chairman, that the drafters of this bill and the subsequent amendments have forgotten the essential nature, indeed the method of operation of the co-operative, and the essential difference in the purpose of the co-operative and in its capital structure from that of an ordinary corporation. This fact has been given little or no attention and it seems to me that it is not very well understood.

This legislation is forcing co-operatives to adopt a position which is at variance with their philosophic foundation. It forces them to take a financial approach to their operation which was never intended by the co-op movement. We believe, as many co-operatives across the country do, that the fundamental distinctions in the nature of the co-operatives must be respected by the tax laws of this country. These distinctions are: first, the co-operative provides a self-help service required by its members; second, the co-operative distributes its earnings to its members in proportion to member business and on the basis of capital equity; third, the co-operative raises and services its equity capital by revolving the use to its members and, fourth, the capital contributed by a member of the co-operative is to provide him with service and not to produce a return on investment, which the government in this proposed amendment is forcing it to do.

In general, co-operatives are objecting to the provisions for taxation contained in section 135 of the bill which retain the requirement that prior to the payment of any patronage refunds, income must be allocated to the capital of co-operatives on the basis of a fixed percentage of "capital employed by the taxpayer at the commencement of the taxation year". This, according to co-operatives, interferes with their freedom and ability to distribute earnings as patronage refunds. I think that fact has been forgotten by the government.

Section 135 of Bill C-259 gives co-operatives two choices, in my view. They can pay tax on the capital employed formula or they can pay tax on the basis of one-third of their income. Both choices, according to co-operative spokesmen, result in a forced imputation of taxable income to the co-operative. This changes the whole thrust of what a co-op is supposed to be doing. The concept contained in Bill C-259 substantially reduces the amount of patronage refunds which could be paid to members on business done with members of the co-operatives.

Even with the amendments proposed by the minister, the basic, underlying principles of the taxation of co-operatives have not been changed. The tax amendments provide co-operatives with the right to elect either to pay tax on 5 per cent—formerly 3 per cent—of members' contributions and capital existing after 1971, or to pay tax on one-third of the income before patronage dividends but after interest is given to members. This forces co-ops, if they wish to attain minimum taxation, into reorienting the whole basis of their business.

I might also add that although the taxation position of co-operatives in different countries varies considerably, in no other country is a minimum tax base or minimum earnings imputed to co-operatives by law. This legislation forces co-operatives to become oriented toward the return of earnings on investment rather than the return of savings to members.

Mr. Chairman, I realize that the parliamentary secretary has demonstrated great patience during the discussion of various amendments to this bill in committee—

Mr. Mahoney: Flexibility and understanding as well.

Mr. McGrath: —and is a little tired of this whole process. I would say the solution to this problem, however, lies within his own jurisdiction. I would suggest to him a choice which should be taken by the government, and that is to realize that the very detailed clause by clause examination of the bill should be referred to a committee of this House and should not be taking up the time of the committee of the whole House.

Mr. Reid: An excellent idea.

Mr. McGrath: I am thinking, Mr. Chairman, of the parliamentary secretary because I am concerned for his welfare. Perhaps there is no better way to illustrate what I have been trying to say than to quote from a letter which I received from a co-operative in my constituency. This is a co-op organization in Newfoundland which has grown to over 500 active members, with gross sales almost reaching $1 million. The co-op writes:

> This success has been due to a combination of a very hard working board of directors, management and staff and a dedicated membership. Our patronage dividends returned to our members (while operating on a competitive basis with other businesses)— > —have been 6 per cent for the past three years. This tremendous savings to our members has been a godsend in many cases. Our board of directors at the last meeting were very much concerned with Bill C-259 which will have the effect of just about wiping out savings earned by members in the form of patronage dividends, destroy all incentive in co-operatives and result in the total collapse of the co-operative movement. We strongly protest the passage of this bill in its present form and request that you do everything within your power to have the contentious sections 135 and 136 rescinded as they apply to co-operatives.

This is important.

Mr. Chairman, I repeat what I said at the outset of my remarks, that co-operatives in the Atlantic provinces and particularly in the province of Newfoundland are not large. Generally speaking they are very small, but they are a very important aspect of the social life of the community. They are in fact a different form of enterprise to that which is familiar to the parliamentary secretary who comes from the great city of Calgary, Alberta. They are self-help organizations which are always Canadian and, generally speaking, always locally owned; in fact, they are owned at the community level.

They fulfil a very important function and a very important social need in the community. They are generally found in primary production areas of the country for the marketing of grain, dairy, farm and fishing products, and the merchandising carried on largely serves the industries or groups of people located in these areas as required. In many instances they require services which, if they did not initiate them or show enterprise, would be denied to the people living there. Should people be denied the right to self-help organization recognition because their attempts to cut living costs cause some profit-oriented corporations to lose some business thereby?

I can only speak from the experience of the co-operative movement in my own province of Newfoundland. In many cases the only competition to the resident merchant in a small community is the co-op. If it did not exist, he would have a monopoly on the retail business in that area. This is a fact the government has lost sight of in drafting this bill. I strongly believe that the government has lost sight of the very simple fact that the co-operative movement is a people-oriented movement designed essentially to serve people at the local level. The government should take cognizance of this fact.

I hope the parliamentary secretary, who is a dedicated member of this House and has sat in on all of the meetings of committee of the whole and patiently listened to the speeches, will take this fact into consideration. I realize that this will be very difficult for the parliamentary secretary, coming from the city of Calgary, Alberta, where I am sure the co-operative movement is not an actual fact. I would like the parliamentary secretary to leave Calgary some time and travel across this country. If he visited the small communities of eastern Canada, the Atlantic provinces and Newfoundland, he would see how important the co-operative movement is to people in our smaller communities. If he did that, he would not sit so smugly trying to defend these amendments to the bill which are, in fact, repugnant to the co-operative movement of this country.

Mr. Mahoney: I would first like to say, Mr. Chairman, that coming from the city of Calgary I am not entirely ignorant of the importance of the co-operative movement or its significance in Canadian life, economically and socially. I subscribe to a school of thought that believes that the co-operative movement does indeed fill a need socially and economically. While one of Tory persuasion might feel that the private enterprise system should do all these things, the fact is the conventional private enterprise system has not succeeded in achieving everything. People have had to organize in something less than traditional ways in order to maximize the benefits they can achieve from our economic system. In the result I regard the co-operative and credit union movements most highly.

Second, I do not wish the hon. member and others to make speeches in the House representing that the very serious points that have been brought to the government, members of Parliament and the public by co-operatives and credit unions have gone unheard. As I listen to successive speeches and hear quotations from various representations made by the credit union and co-operative movement read verbati into the record by hon. members, sometimes giving credit for them and at other times adopting them as their own words but nevertheless paying attention to them, I cannot help but say that the representations have been heard. They have been heard by hon. members on all sides of the House. They have been heard by the government, and the government has paid attention to them.

Since first reading of the bill now before us the government has introduced substantive amendments that go a long way toward meeting the legitimate complaints that came in response to the bill as originally tabled. At this point I think it is appropriate to note that the particular areas of dispute and the intensity of dispute that has arisen regarding this tax reform measure in so far as they affect co-operatives and credit unions is a very explainable thing because these movements did not take particular exception to the philosophy of the white paper. The idea of flow through and gross up and credit was entirely in accord with their philosophy. Accordingly, we did not hear a great deal from the co-operative and credit union movement during the white paper debate that extended for almost a year from November 1969.

Subsequently, and as a result of changes made due to the input of public representations, the philosophy of the white paper was not followed through, at least in that particular area, and the credit union and co-operative movements were presented with a real problem. I know many people have been critical of these movements for not stating their views earlier and for the intensity of the type of campaign that has been mounted since then. That criticism is not justified because the white paper did not present the problems to them that the tax bill does.

I thought the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre might be somewhat more silent tonight than usual. Perhaps his TV was on the blink last night.

Mr. Benjamin: Next year.

Mr. Mahoney: The great "next year" country. In any event, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Regina East and the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton raised a practical point today that perhaps certain co-operatives, because of a definition contained in Bill C-259, will be excluded from some of the provisions that are intended to apply to all co-operatives. This is not the intention of the government. I can assure members on all sides of the House that as a result of these representations we are taking a close look at that particular aspect of the bill.

I can also say that if it is indicated that amendments to the legislation, rather than an administrative ruling, are necessary to make sure that all co-operatives are treated alike under the bill, an amendment to the bill will be presented.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mahoney: I say this in the sense that where we have had the opportunity, not only throughout the white paper debate but throughout the debate on Bill C-259 to deal with specifics, to come to grips with particular issues that are raised as a result of the policy decisions made by the government, the government is flexible. The government is willing to accommodate legitimate representations. However, I must say that general indictments of this, that or the other policy such as we have sometimes heard, not on this particular block of sections but on others, are not likely to prove fruitful.

The government has made some policy decisions. For example, it made a decision, I may remind some members of the official opposition, to tax capital gains. That is a decision for which it will account to the electorate.

Mr. McGrath: It sure will.

Mr. Mahoney: It is not a decision that is likely to be renegotiated on the floor of the House of Commons in committee of the whole. However, where people are willing to take this bill and the amendments that the government has presented to the bill and debate these in specific terms and illustrate where the bill and the amendments heretofore presented do not in fact reflect the policy declarations of the government in the budget speech of June 18, we are certainly willing to entertain and introduce amendments.

I am sorry that on occasion the hon. member for Peace River seeks to say that the government should not be introducing amendments, or says in a ridiculing way, "What, more amendments?" I am not the least bit ashamed of and I do not apologize for any amendments that the government may present as a result of representations made by interested individuals, taxpayers, organizations and by members of this House in committee of the whole.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, I find the parliamentary secretary's contribution, if it can be classed as that, to be rather unfortunate at this stage of the debate. I make no apology whatsoever for putting forward in committee of the whole the views of the co-operative movement in Canada. Secondly, I say to the parliamentary secretary that I find his remarks to be inconsistent with the role he is charged with, that of piloting this bill through the House. I find his remarks to be inconsistent with the amendments now before the committee. I say to the parliamentary secretary that if he continues to manifest this attitude in committee of the whole we will be here for a long time on this bill.

• (8:30 p.m.)

Mr. Mahoney: Filibuster; that's it, Jim.

The Chairman: Is the hon. member for Peace River rising on a point of order?

Mr. Baldwin: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I find the parliamentary secretary is more to be pitied than anything else.

Mr. McGrath: He is losing his cool.

Mr. Baldwin: I think he is stir happy; he has been confined too long.

Mr. Gibson: You should be confined somewhere.

Mr. Baldwin: He is a prisoner of the bill. However, with respect to his observation, what we have witnessed is the most ridiculous, stupid, nonsensical thing I have ever seen in this House. Amendments to this bill were brought in on October 22—96 of them. Amendments were brought in on October 29—28 of them. Now we have eight amendments to the amendments to the amendments to the bill. This is absolutely stupid. I know what will happen. When we go to the other place asking for royal assent, the parliamentary secretary will rush into the Senate and say to Mr. Speaker there, "I have another amendment to make."

I could go on for some time in this vein, Mr. Chairman, but I think I am slightly out of order. I think you will agree with me there. I was provoked to enter the debate, having been sitting quietly behind the curtains minding my own business. Then I was invited to come in so I made that point. In my opinion, the reason this bill has taken so long is that it is the stupid action of a stupid government.

[Translation]

Mr. Leblanc (Laurier): Mr. Chairman, taking part in this debate, I would like in the first place to point out my interest in this matter, since I am one of the founders of the Caisse populaire Saint-Denis in Montreal and was president of that caisse up to 1964, the year I was elected to Parliament.

As the previous speakers, I am in a position to appreciate the important social and economic role played by the caisses populaires. I am pleased to note in the galleries this evening people interested in co-operatives, credit unions and caisses populaires and I hasten to welcome them.

Evidently, it is easy for the opposition to criticize a tax bill carrying out a complete and essential tax reform which Her Majesty's loyal opposition undertook in 1962 by creating the Carter Commission. At the present time, they are criticizing several points of the bill under consideration and they have become the protectors of the widow and child. This evening more especially, they want to be the sole defenders of co-operatives, credit unions and caisses populaires. I want to put on the official record that we too, of the Liberal party, are most concerned by this subject, and, obviously, we want to make this legislation as equitable as possible.

To this purpose, we have finally managed to bring before the House a reform which may not be perfect, but, to my knowledge, no income tax act is perfect in any country. The bill before us is but an attempt to correct certain anomalies which existed previously, to fill several loopholes, and to tax certain people who, previously, did not pay any taxes.

Let us not think, Mr, Chairman, that the caisses populaires in particular are opposed to paying taxes. I think this is worth mentioning. When their representatives appeared before the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs—of which I had the honour to be a member—we heard during the morning of Thursday, June 18, the representatives of co-operatives, and in the afternoon, those of the caisses populaires. On that occasion, I was pleased to put certain questions to them. At page 6613 of the proceedings, one can read what Mr. André Morin, Director of the research service of the Fédération des caisses populaires Desjardins de Lévis, said, and I quote:

Mr. Leblanc, if you don't mind I will try to answer your question. In the past co-operatives were not subject to taxation during the first three years. In our brief, we agree that this assisted co-operatives to begin operations. We do not have too many examples of this to give you. We agree that this exemption of three years should be eliminated—

[Mr. Baldwin.]

Regarding my suggestion that the Caisses populaires do not object to being taxed, Mr. Morin had this to say:

We agree that this exemption of three years should be eliminated for the simple reason that in practice during the first three years a co-operative does not have that much surplus.

Reference is mostly made to co-operatives as no taxes were then levied on Caisses populaires. But I know the same principle applies equally to the latter and we had the privilege, at the recent Quebec caucus, to welcome the representatives of the Caisse populaire of Lévis which is the main organization of its kind in Quebec.

We were repeatedly told that the movement was prepared to pay taxes but not according to the ways set up in Bill C-259 before the amendments were introduced. In fact, when they were submitted to the House the amendments of the minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) were not tabled in full.

Certain amendments to the bill have been tabled since that time.

And Mr. Morin went on:

In practice there would be very little tax to pay. And if it is a privilege which is granted to co-operatives only, this might give rise to political difficulties. There will be talk about the co-operatives' privileges when, in fact, this privilege brings them very little tax relief.

Of course, they are prepared to pay taxes because they have today assets which the founder of the Caisses populaires evidently never expected they would build.

In their brief which can be found on page 66:146 of the Proceedings of the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs there is the following introduction and I quote:

INTRODUCTION

This brief was prepared by La Fédération de Québec des Unions régionales des Caisses populaires Desjardins, grouping in Quebec 1,310 Caisses populaires, owned by 2,375,000 members. As of December 1969, the total assets of these 1,310 Caisses populaires amounted to $1,854,000,000.

One must therefore admit the importance—and this is fortunate for the province of Quebec—gained by those financial institutions. In fact they render tremendous services but they no longer want to be cast aside and be denied participation in our overall economy.

One of the points raised following the introduction of Bill C-259, and which I consider most appropriate, deals with the global business ceiling set at $400,000 by this bill as the cumulative income before tax to enable corporations to qualify for the 25 per cent rate. And in a submission to the Minister of Finance dated July 1971, the representative of the caisses populaires stated the following:

The method to be used in computing the total business limit of $400,000 under section 125, calls for some explanation in the case of caisses populaires.

Now, since then, we have given some explanations to the caisses populaires. I resume the quotation:

We believe that an equitable formula to establish annually the portion of the surplus after taxes which should be used as a basis for the computation of the total business limit of the caisses populaires, would be that portion of the surplus after taxes, if any, retained by the caisses populaires and which exceeds an annual reserve of $50,000.

As to the amendments proposed on October 28, the Minister of Finance appreciates the merits of the request made by the caisses populaires and determines that contrary to small corporations, the caisses populaires may benefit from an accumulated income after taxes, which means that if a caisse populaire or a corporation has a taxable income of $50,000, its accumulated income after eight years would reach $400,000 and would be liable to the rate applicable to other so-called public corporations, according to the definition to be found in Bill C-259.

Now, the Minister of Finance having recognized the merits of the request of the caisses populaires said this: If, by any chance, your taxable income is $50,000, you will pay $25,000 in taxes and thereafter that amount of $25,000 will be deducted from your income for the purpose of computing the business limit. This means that before reaching a total business limit of $400,000, according to the examples given and those I have in mind, a period of 16 years instead of eight would have to elapse.

Moreover, the amendments provided for the payment of tax at the rate of one tenth per year, so as to enable the Caisses populaires, the co-operatives and the credit unions to become acquainted with the new responsibilities that will automatically be theirs under the act and to enable them also to plan their finances according to the new income tax act.

We achieved something reasonable there. I believe the caisses populaires find that satisfactory in general. Of course, there is not a taxpayer who is always pleased with his lot. Our taxes are always too high and we always believe that we pay more then our neighbor.

However, I believe the government did its best. The amendments are most acceptable and I hope the caisses populaires will also accept them.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Chairman, like many other hon. members, I would like to express my views on the sections which we are discussing tonight, and which are extremely important for the Canadian people.

Several hon. members have already asked the minister to show greater understanding towards the co-operative movement, which includes credit unions and caisses populaires.

I believe it is the duty of every member to ask the government to give special attention to co-operative movements, in view of the aims which they pursue.

I do not think it is necessary to state the origin and objectives of these movements again. Representations have been made to the government on several occasions asking them to safeguard the special nature of co-operative movements. I still believe that those representations were definitely justified. I therefore hope that few hon. members will hesitate to take part in the debate on those sections in order to sensitize the minister to the requirements of co-operative movements.

True, some corrective action has been taken following representations by those movements. Yet it seems that that action could have been still more favourable to co-operative movements, caisses populaires and credit unions.

I would like to point out particularly the objectivity of the briefs which were submitted. I have read attentively many of them, and they make one realize to what extent those movements respect the government. I am pleased to see that those organizations have not tried to run down or criticize the government, but have rather given a positive approach to their representations, and that explains already the step made by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) in favour of these movements. But a new and more precise orientation for the benefit of these movements still must be asked of the minister.

It is obviously important that each member does not limit his efforts in order to sensitize the government and the minister responsible so that these corrections to be made as soon as possible. If I understood him well a few moments ago, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (M. Mahoney) confessed that the government is still considering the possibility of submitting new amendments if necessary. I dare believe that through the co-operation of all members who understand what a co-operative movement is, for they have some in their respective constituency, the government will meet the request of these co-operatives, account taken of the interests these movements represent. Some members from the province of Quebec will doubtless express their views on the co-operative movement in their area, but I am too familiar with the work of the caisses populaires not to make a few remarks. They have always fought for public interests, and like all co-operative movements generally, they have the right to expect the government to protect and help them, as we all should.

I ask that all members spend a few minutes and try to make the minister aware of the interest the people have in this movement, and of the consideration it deserves.

The Caisses populaires Desjardins in the province of Quebec were, in a sense, a school of thrift. They taught thousands of Quebecers the need to save, why there was a need to save and how to save. I also know that these movements have succeeded in inducing Quebecers to go into business and this through the efforts of the Caisses Desjardins which have given all kinds of assistance to low income people.

We are all aware in Quebec that the Caisses Desjardins have achieved marvels. Going through the caisses populaires' history we find that at the beginning they were not taken seriously by some businessmen who thought they were of interest to middle-class Canadians only.

Today we realize that from an economic viewpoint, the organization has been most successful in the province of Quebec and we are happy with it as with the co-operative movement which through efforts of its own is pursuing the most commendable objectives. I think the performance of our co-operative movements, of our savings funds and credit unions is of the noblest kind.

In view of the aims of those organizations, I think it is my duty as member for Joliette to ask the government to allow them to preserve their particular character and to find a way of giving them still greater assistance.

There are people who claim that the Caisses populaires today will agree to pay taxes because they are on a sounder financial basis, since caisses populaires, co-operative movements or some co-operatives are now enjoying a certain stability. Of course, privileges have been granted to them and I dare hope they will be maintained. I hope the government will not hesitate to support and help an organization which has the interests of the community at heart.

It is most important to give such an opportunity to these movements that enable every citizen to capitalize at a level that gives him economic strength. Every citizen wishes to control at least a good part of his savings.

Co-operatives and the Desjardins movement pursue the noble aim of seeking the participation of citizens and giving them economic guidelines for the benefit of their area.

Keeping in mind such high and commendable objectives, I urge the government to give special consideration to granting whatever assistance it can to those co-operative movements. I am convinced that not one hon. member in this House intends to object to such a policy. And even though the hon. minister knows all about the representations made by the various movements, I feel that more should be done for them.

I believe the hon. minister, who might not as yet have had the opportunity to take an active part in co-operative movements, will have heard so many opinions and claims as to appreciate the significance of this issue. I even hope that the Quebec members, of all parties, will not hesitate—

An hon. Member: Do not forget the independent members!

Mr. La Salle: Of course, the independent members are always anxious to take part in a debate over a serious matter. Thus, like other members, I am, in a very independent way, acting as the spokesman for those movements that operate in my riding. I would hope to see other members do the same and realize that it is their duty—apart from any party considerations—to fight for the interests of their co-operatives and credit unions the fruitful achievements of which are well known to us all. If we act this way, we will succeed in shedding enough light on the matter for the Minister of Finance so that it will be a pleasure, and not a duty, for him to inform these organizations that they will keep their particular character, their privileges, for the good of their operation and for the economic wellbeing of their members.

[English]

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Chairman, I just wish to point out two things. The parliamentary secretary said that if we on this side of the House stay with certain limits, what we say will be noted in due time. It is very nice of him to be so kind to us. He said that some representations will be fruitful and, by implication, that some will not be fruitful. When he was speaking he did not make one of the most important observations he might have made, which is whether the particular amendment before us is acceptable. He says that debate on specific terms will be accepted, and so on. This is a specific amendment.

In all kindness to the parliamentary secretary I would say the opinions and debate he is getting on the question of co-operatives should not surprise him at all, because surely before this House recessed at the end of June there had been discussion on taxation proposals with the co-operatives and how this legislation would affect them. To my knowledge, members of co-operative organizations have been coming to Ottawa and talking to the department concerned about the taxation proposals set out in this bill. They were here last summer and fall, and the minister and his parliamentary secretary have not lacked notice of the attitude of co-operatives and their members to these proposals.

The government made the basic mistake of accepting the advice and opinion of certain organizations which tried to peddle the line that co-operatives are one thing but that members of co-operatives are quite another. That reminds you of the line sometimes taken in foreign affairs. People say, "People in this other country would be very nice if only they were not represented by such objectionable leaders".

An hon. Member: As in this country.

Mr. Gleave: This government is saying that co-operatives are very nice, that the principle is fine and the only trouble is that sometimes they get big enough to do something for the people who put them together.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gleave: I have read statements by the responsible minister—

An hon. Member: The irresponsible minister.

An hon. Member: Which one is responsible?

Mr. Gleave: —and I have never seen such nonsense. During the time I have been farming I have put money into co-operatives. I have lent them money and collected dividends. I have had dividends retained by co-operatives because they had to do certain things which were required. This legislation is saying, Mr. Chairman, "If you have a little co-operative that is all right, but don't let it get too big."

Mr. Mahoney: Is that a family co-operative?

Mr. Gleave: What was that intervention?

An hon. Member: Don't bother; it was not worth while.

Mr. Gleave: Does the parliamentary secretary think it is more important for me to have access to a co-operative store in Biggar where I can buy fuel for the farm or groceries, or to have access to a co-operative of the nature of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool which can build a terminal at the west coast and handle my grain? Is the government really trying to peddle this line to the people of Canada and to this House?

Mr. Mahoney: You tell us which is more important.

Mr. Gleave: I will tell the parliamentary secretary. Probably the terminal at Vancouver is more important because nobody but the co-operative would build it. The government "Joe'd" the co-operative into building it. Furthermore, the government Joe'd the co-operatives to set up XCAN. I do not know whether the parliamentary secretary knows that: I expect he does, since he moves in business circles in Calgary and he said to one member from Newfoundland that Calgary and Alberta are not without knowledge of co-operatives. We are not without knowledge of them in Saskatchewan.

I say to the government, in all seriousness, that it had better adopt a different approach and consider what co-operatives really do, what they were designed to do and what the people who put them together intended them to do. If this legislation as drawn up by the government is passed, one knows only too well what will happen. Co-operatives will have to change their structure altogether and their methods of accounting, or they will not be able to build up the reserves necessary and the money which is needed to do the various things they need to do.

I find the government's attitude somewhat amazing. A few weeks ago a little volume came to my desk, complete with a picture of a rather "beat" looking, whiskery-faced man. The volume was entitled, "Poverty in Canada." It was the report on poverty.

An hon. Member: That was not a picture of Pat Mahoney.

Mr. Gleave: No, it was not his picture. On the one hand members of the other place have been going across the country holding hearings and bringing out a report which tells us what is happening to all the poor people in Canada, and if we are to do something about poverty we should introduce the guaranteed annual income, yet on the other hand the government has come before this House with an attempt to destroy what the disadvantaged people of this country have put together from Vancouver Island to Newfoundland over the last century and a half.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Chairman, that is what is being attempted. You can read what the Equitable Tax Foundation says—

Mr. Gibson: That is the most exaggerated statement of the year.

Mr. Gleave: Does the hon. member think so?

Mr. Gibson: Yes.

Mr. Peters: Just because Mahoney told you to say that does not mean it is true.

Mr. Gleave: The hon. member may suggest that that is a most exaggerated statement, but I tell him and others on that side of the House that the wheat pool committees, the credit unions and the local co-operatives in my constituency do not think it is exaggerated, Mr. Chairman. That applies not only to my constituency but to all constituencies across this country. I get letters from Ontario, from Alberta and from the Maritimes—and I am a Saskatchewan member. I get letters from all these places and they do not suggest that what I am saying is exaggerated.

An hon. Member: Only the Liberals think so.

Mr. Mahoney: They don't know what you are saying.

Mr. Gleave: They are all very much concerned.

Mr. Peters: The parliamentary secretary thinks that these people cannot read or listen to television.

Mr. Gleave: I do not know how the hon. member arrived at his conclusion.

Mr. Peters: They may be poor, but they are not stupid.

Mr. Gleave: Listen to what the Equitable Tax Foundation says about co-operatives and their method of building reserves:

> This device of 'paper dividends' provides all other co-operatives with a similar and completely unwarranted advantage over their investor-owned competitors.

What people do they think own these co-operatives? Do they think they are people who come from the ocean? At any rate, that is the Foundation's approach and that is the idea which is behind the proposals that have been put before this House.

Mr. Mahoney: Oh, no.

Mr. Gleave: The co-operatives have been told, according to what I have learned, "If you pay interest on what these people are talking about—that is, on the dividends that are retained—your taxes will be reduced." In other words, if they reduce the amount of money they retain, they will not pay so much tax. Mr. Chairman, it is not the business of those on the other side of the House to determine whether or not a co-operative should pay interest, or the amount of interest it should pay. That is not their business and it is not the business of the Equitable Tax Foundation. It is my business, because it is my money. And if I think I am making a satisfactory earning through its being used in the manner in which it is being used, that is my business.

• (9:10 p.m.)

Mr. Mahoney: That is screwy socialism.

Mr. Gleave: Probably the parliamentary secretary does not know anything about socialism. He probably went to one of our orthodox Canadian schools which spent a great deal of time trying to tell him how to run the standard system that we have in Canada, and not much time on teaching him how to do anything else.

Mr. Mahoney: I agree with you. I just don't know how you support David Lewis.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Chairman, I have noticed the predelection of the parliamentary secretary, not only tonight but on previous occasions, that when he runs out of logic he starts needling the other side because of some ideology held by it or because of what some provincial government is doing. I sincerely hope that a few of the backbenchers opposite who do know something about co-ops and how important they are will take him behind the woodshed and acquaint him with the facts of life before too long, in the next few days if possible.

The government is attempting to make things more difficult for organizations that have attempted to bring some balance into the economic structure of this country and give some weight to those who are economically disadvantaged and who lack bargaining power. These organizations can retain some industry in Canadian ownership.

That is another factor which must be considered. Co-operatives are Canadian owned; they are not subject to raiding or foreign takeover.

We spent a lot of money getting a report on the price of farm machinery and spare parts. The Barber commission report was costly. I only hope that one day some minister will be able to rise in his place and tell of just one thing good that has happened to our farmers as a result of that report. The organization that is really trying to do something for farmers with respect to the price of farm machinery is Co-op Implements, but this legislation will make things more difficult for it.

An hon. Member: Come on, Alf.

Mr. Gleave: My hon. friend to my right may disagree. Perhaps I would not agree if I were in his position. But it is about time people on the government side of the House realized what this legislation is all about and what it can mean to Canadians. The government should pause to consider the matter, in light of the amount of investment that has been quoted tonight and the importance of the co-op movement across Canada.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think the co-op movement is any great threat to the multinational corporations that now control much of our industry and economy. I do not know why they are getting into such a sweat. I urge the government to consider carefully the possibility of accepting these amendments before passage of these sections of the bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Chairman, I have studied with great interest the proposed amendments tabled by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) concerning the new tax burden which co-operatives, credit unions and caisses populaires will have to bear.

My interest is all the greater as I pointed out, a short time ago, the inequity of a number of the new provisions submitted initially.

As I was giving particular attention at that time to the case of co-operatives, I had stressed the concept of "capital employed" and the new limitations which it was introducing in relation to the payment of patronage dividends to members.

I had taken the hypothetical case of a co-operative with a total capital of $800,000 made up as follows: shareholders' holdings, $500,000; long-term debt, $300,000. To substitute to the present method of computing tax that which is proposed in the bill meant for such a co-operative an increase in taxable income of some $19,000 and tax increase of between $1,500 and $6,250, that is a sharp rise of over 400 per cent.

While everyone recognizes the principle of tax equity, one must nevertheless consider that the bill, as it now reads, gives rise to an extremely sudden change which would seriously jeopardize the very existence of some co-operatives whose level of development is not such as to allow them to support a tax burden which is so much heavier.

I had emphasized at the same time that in addition to penalizing unfairly and inconsiderately the individual and collective efforts of co-operative members, the new tax provisions introduced by the Minister of Finance would have harmful effects. First, there was the danger of creating double taxation conditions, at least theoretically. Some of those co-operatives could thus be caught in a financial and inextricable deadlock, where they would find themselves unable to repay the members the shares of the social capital rightfully claimed by those wishing to withdraw from the movement. And finally, on account of that still controversial concept of capital employed and also of the necessary accumulation of minimum reserves, a co-operative could have found itself in the ridiculous situation of having to pay, for a given fiscal year, more tax than during the previous year, even if its profit for the current year might have been the same or even lower than that of the previous year.

Mr. Chairman, the amendments proposed by the Minister of Finance help however to ward off some fears or threats. In fact, we can but rejoice that, under these amendments, a co-operative may choose the lesser amount arrived at by either methods for computing taxation. At that, the government has not discarded the concept of capital employed, so much decried by the Canadian co-operative movement, but at least the co-operative can pay as patronage dividends up to two-thirds of its profits, which shows greater respect for the traditional operating rules of the co-operatives. No doubt this is an interesting compromise as compared to the rigid initial rate of 5 per cent of capital employed.

If we come back to the case of the co-operative with a total capitalization of $800,000, we can see that for a given year during which the registered profit was $60,000, the tax payable could be somewhat different according to the computation method used.

Here is an example: The employed capital method implies taxation at 5 per cent of $500,000 which results in a taxable income of $25,000 and a tax assessment of $6,250, or 25 per cent of $25,000.

On the other hand, under the amendment, the second method would be the profit volume method: With an aggregate profit of $60,000, less the portion payable as patronage dividends (or 2/3 of $60,000), profits amount to $40,000. Therefore, the taxable amount is 1/3 of profits, namely $20,000, with a tax assessment of $4,000, or 25 per cent of $20,000.

Of course, a certain latitude is given to the co-operatives which, however, are not spared the burden of the capital employed concept which puts between the co-operative and its members a taxation mechanism and, thus, government action which is contrary to the co-operative principle and interferes with the normal relations which should prevail between this institution and its member for business transactions entered into by them in a quite legitimate way. The amendment in question leaves at best a little more elbow-room, but only where the second computation method permits to alleviate the tax burden of the co-operative involved in a given taxation year.

So, I am glad to point out that this will be unavoidably the case of co-operative corporations with relatively moderate profits. I am not pleased at the thought that the profits will be limited, but I am only looking at this with the legislation in mind. We say again that this is not a partial recognition of the particular nature of the co-operative movement.

I hoped that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), in addition to introducing a progressive tax provision whereby each co-op would pay over ten years only an escalating percentage of the increase in taxes they will thereafter have to pay, would give as much consideration to my second suggestion demanding that appropriate selection provisions be included in the tax treatment of the different co-operatives. It is because, as much as the government and probably more so, I so fully support the principle of tax equity that I would like the new tax system for co-operatives to apply only to those which obviously and effectively tend to compete with other ordinary companies.

I regret very much that consideration has not been given neither to the level of development reached by individual co-operatives nor to their type of activity and other factors which would be significant indicators as to each one's ability to come under the new tax system.

I ask the government to reconsider the matter and try to understand, for example, that a small farmers' co-operative in Quebec or in the Maritimes cannot be treated on the same basis as a huge Prairies wheat pool.

The Social Crediters would be most happy if the government would set up guidelines enabling the small co-operatives to still be subject to the present tax system until such time as their growth level and development will allow them to be integrated, like the flourishing and strong co-operatives, into the proposed tax system, unless naturally the government simply gives up the notion of capital employed.

This additional mitigation which I advocate would bring at least a measure of respect and confidence towards the co-operative movement, for due to unconditional tax leveling and no longer to simple tax fairness, it would be inconsistent to lay upon small co-operatives a burden which they would not be in a position to carry.

It seems very interesting to spread the cost over a period of ten years, but it remains nevertheless that there will then be other newly-formed and little developed co-operatives which will also have to abide by the same tax regulations which will have by then come to full maturity and will simply apply with all their severity.

We must therefore state again that co-operatives are above all associations of men who pool their efforts, and are not simple aggregations of capital. It cannot be said too often, because it is imperative, to my mind, that the marked difference be recognized.

I also point out that values such as "work" and "co-operative effort" override any other essentially material consideration. Finally, it may be useful to add that the co-operative movement cannot be conceived as a dangerous industrial or commercial trust: instead, it should be considered as a wholesome extension of the current notion of enterprise, which enables our present system to be more humane, more equitable and better suited to the needs of individuals.

In closing, I should like to recall some of the positions adopted by the co-operatives after the Minister of Finance introduced his amendments.

The co-operatives did not ask, and are not asking, to be exempted from corporate taxes on voluntarily retained earnings. They merely ask not to be forced, through an arbitrary formula, to retain their earnings. In other words, they ask that their structures and their own operating rules be respected. This is what the president of the Co-operative Union of Canada had to say in his letter to hon. members:

> Patronage dividends constitute one of the main sources of funds to ensure the liquidity required to maintain a stable capital structure and to improve the services required by the members.

And he added:

> The members, by contributing to the capital of a co-operative, are not investing. Above all else, they aim to improve and extend the services they need, and receive at year end dividends in proportion to the use they made of those services.

The Finance Minister's press release of October 28 last recognizes that co-ops have special obligations because of their capital movements. The amendments introduced are no doubt a step in the right direction. I welcome them but on the other hand I would ask the minister to see if other relief measures would not be possible, especially for small or average co-ops. According to the release, discussion showed that amendments were necessary in order to take into account certains aspects and certain needs of these establishments.

I would like to add that if some progress was made, it is first due to such organizations which have succeeded in efficiently bringing forth their views and drawing them to the attention of the political power. I congratulate and encourage them to persevere so that the representatives of the people be always better informed of the needs and aspirations of the people who, on the other hand, would be able to consider Parliament and the legislative mechanism, not as the docile instrument of an omnipotent government, but as the expression of the will of the sovereign people.

This afternoon, my colleague, the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) dealt with the effects of Bill C-259 and particularly with sections now before us regarding caisses populaires and credit unions. I wish merely to draw the attention of the government on the fact that we must again distinguish a co-operative service organization from a profit-making one.

On October 28, as shown on page 3 of the document, the hon. Minister of Finance made the following statement about credit unions and caisses populaires:

> These corporations were exempted from taxation, but under the provisions of Bill C-259, they will be taxable generally in the same way as other financial institutions.

In my view, we should not consider the Caisses populaires as financial institutions enjoying the same benefits as chartered banks. Banking institutions enjoy privileges that are not awarded to the Caisses populaires or Credit unions. That is why I say these two types of financial institutions should not be taxed or imposed in the same manner.

It would also be perfectly logical to affirm that the credit so created by the banks, under a privilege granted to them, constitutes some sort of reserve which should be considered for taxation purposes. There is therefore a very great difference between the operations of these two types of institutions. That is why it is unfair to impose the same tax burden on Caisses populaires and Credit Unions. From page 3 of a brief submitted to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) by the Federation of "Caisses populaires" and Credit Unions, I quote the following:

> Corporation shares in a "Caisse populaire" are basically different from shares in a company. They are redeemable on demand, although subject to notice thereof according to regulations. No share certificates are issued. The "Caisse populaire" delivers instead to its member a booklet into which deposits and withdrawals from his capital account are entered, just as is done for bank savings accounts. As a general rule, a member may transfer his capital to his savings account, and vice versa.

That is, generally speaking, the practice in the caisses populaires.

I quote further:

> Both the Porter Royal Commission on banking and the Carter Royal Commission on taxation have recognized that the social capital of members is essentially made of savings ... And one must consider that if the caisses populaires would have to pay bonuses or dividends from those surpluses after tax they would be in a inequitable position as compared with other financial institutions. Indeed, the mere fact that the social capital of the caisses populaires is reimbursable on demand makes it impossible to pay bonuses or dividends in the form of shares and to establish an immobilized capital by transferring at the same time the burden of the tax and safeguarding 50 per cent of the taxable income within the business operation. That situation certainly will create a cash problem for the caisse populaire.

For my part, I believe that we must take those recommendations into better account if we want to keep the caisses populaires alive, and the co-operative movement of credit unions to preserve the impetus which has kept them going for the past 25 years. In the interest of our country's economy, we have to keep the co-operative movement alive. And if we are to keep it alive, we should not drain it of the economic blood it needs in order for its operation to remain profitable for its members.

I have here a letter, dated November 6, 1971, I received from the Toronto and Niagara Area Chapter of the Caisses Populaires, which seem to share the views of Quebec and Western co-operatives. I will quote only a few lines:

> Since 1900, this co-operative movement has been fighting exorbitant interest rates in Canada and working to improve the financial situation of those of our citizens who most need it.

It says so in so many words! I quote further:

> It would be unfortunate to have our Canadian government destroy the ideal means which Canadians have to help themselves, and this, only for the purpose of collecting additional revenues.

So, Mr. Chairman, as it is—

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

[English]

Mr. Gibson: Mr. Chairman, I enter this debate with some humility.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order.

There is a custom, in this House, to the effect that when the time of an hon. member has expired, the Chair requests from the House leave for that member to conclude his remarks. Now, I am convinced that the Chair did not show any ill-will, but—

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. I understood the point of order. However, the hon. member knows the Standing Orders. He must have the unanimous consent of the House to carry on with his remarks.

Is there unanimity?

An hon. Member: No.

[English]

Mr. Gibson: Mr. Chairman, at the outset I would like to apologize if by chance I rose too soon. I had no intention of interrupting the interesting speech of the hon. member. I enter this debate with some humility.

• (9:40 p.m.)

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Leblanc) rises on a point of order.

Mr. Leblanc (Laurier): Mr. Chairman, with regard to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert), I am under the impression that the House has given him unanimous consent to continue his comments. So, I cannot see why—

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. If the Chair chose to recognize the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Gibson), it is because I heard some "no's".

[English]

Mr. Gibson: Mr. Chairman, I approach this debate with some humility as one who is not an expert on credit unions and caisses populaires.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gibson: However, in my limited experience I have had the advantage of travelling across Canada and, as a member of the constitutional committee, heard briefs on the benefits of credit unions, caisses populaires and the like. In my respectful opinion the amendments proposed are good and are fairly courageous. I would like to see a little more life pumped into them. It is very much like a football team which in the fifty-ninth minute of the game is down to the ten-yard line. I would like the government to have the courage to support the credit unions more and increase the exemptions substantially, if possible.

I say that because it has been said by the government that allowing relief to credit unions would tend to let them compete with other financial institutions. In my respectful submission that is a healthy sign that the credit union movement has done much social good in this country, particularly when compared to some of our banking institutions.

The loan policies of credit unions, caisses populaires and the like are of social benefit to Canada. I do not want to push the government too hard on this.

• (9:40 p.m.)

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Gibson: Because together with bringing in the capital gains tax it would be hypocritical, as the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar would say. He wants the tax and he wants complete exemption for certain groups. We cannot go too far along this line because all people in this country are supposed to be equal under the rule of law.

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): The Prime Minister doesn't believe that.

Mr. Gibson: Oh, yes, he does. He is one of the greatest believers in the rule of law. He might have made a mistake—

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Gibson: —but you will not find he makes many. The criticisms coming from the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar are the wild, half-baked ideas of the New Democratic Party. They would ruin our economy and drive us back to the middle ages when we were just hewers of wood and drawers of water. The ideas of the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar are no more than impractical dreams and visions. None of them has had any successful experience of running a business. They are hypocritical in their approach. They pretend they want the tax, and as soon as we bring in the tax they say they do not want it. There has to be some common sense and balance when taxes such as these are brought in.

Mr. Gleave: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I do not mind the hon. member taking exception to my opinions and point of view with regard to co-ops, but I think I have a legitimate question of privilege when he says I was never able to run a successful business. I am entitled to say that I have successfully operated a business, that I am perfectly competent to do so and that the hon. member is ill-informed.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. That is not a question of privilege. The hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth has the floor.

Mr. Gibson: I am glad to hear the hon. member is a capitalist. I welcome him to this side of the House. He must be the only capitalist in that party. As for the criticism directed against my hon. friend from Calgary South who has sat here day after day conducting himself in a brilliant manner, although he is not a cabinet minister—I hope he soon will be—

Mr. Baldwin: Irrelevant and incorrect.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. The Chair is having a difficulty time following the speech of the hon. member. I wish the hon. member would direct his comments to the Chair.

Mr. Gibson: The government has stated that the co-operatives will be given ten years in which to adjust to the increase in the level of their taxes. I do not think ten years is enough.

Mr. Gleave: Not for you.

Mr. Gibson: Knowing the difficulties faced by the co-operatives, I suggest that about 18 years would be more appropriate.

Mr. Peters: What about a hundred?

Mr. Gibson: The hon. member asks, "What about a hundred?" I think that is ridiculous. It is typical of the irresponsible comments and views of the NDP. They are incapable of any really constructive approach.

I believe there should be more latitude given here. Eighteen years would give the credit unions and co-operatives a chance to adjust their operations, and I think they are entitled to it. I say this as a lawyer who has known people who have sustained an accident or suffered a calamity which has deprived them of every source of funds except those available from a credit union plan. I am a firm booster of the credit union movement and I hope the government will consider action along the lines I have suggested.

Mr. Simpson: Mr. Chairman, while the committee is dealing with amendments to sections 135, 136 and 137 of Bill C-259 I think it is opportune to mention that once again the House of Commons has been presented with an omnibus monstrosity. It is a monstrosity which only this government could dream up, a real nightmare. If ever there was legislation which should have been presented by way of several different bills, it is Bill C-259 which is one more glaring piece of evidence of the incompetence of the government.

Mr. Mahoney: You don't believe that. You are just reading that stuff they gave you.

Mr. Simpson: The parliamentary secretary has made one or two interjections this evening. I am pleased he has. Later in my speech I shall draw a comparison between remarks he has made and some of the statements the minister has made on this subject.

We have seen other examples of the way in which the government endeavours to patch up its mistakes in a piecemeal manner by introducing omnibus legislation. For example, there were the changes made to the Criminal Code and the bumbling manner in which they handled the abolition of capital punishment, to name only two instances. One thing is certain about this monstrosity, Bill C-259: some of the non-contentious items such as the removal from the tax rolls of a considerable number of low-income earners should have been presented by way of separate legislation so that the House might have dealt with them expeditiously, thereby assuring to this group of people relief from an unjustifiable tax burden. We repeatedly asked the government to do this, and I am sure every member of the House is in favour of such a move, but the government has said no. As a result, we are obliged to deal with this 707-page monstrosity into which some 95 or 100 amendments have already been injected by the government itself—

Mr. Mahoney: One hundred and forty-five.

Mr. Simpson: —not counting numerous amendments to be put forward by the opposition. Then the government says, "If you don't pass the bill quickly you will be preventing several hundred thousand low wage earners from receiving tax relief."

Mr. Mahoney: Actually, 5½ million.

Mr. Simpson: First, the government produced a white paper which it indicated was the plan. Then after a deluge of protests from groups and individuals representing all segments of the economy the government made it known there would be some backtracking as far as some of the resource industries were concerned. Then came the bill itself, a massive piece of ill-conceived legislation, proven so by the large number of government amendments already proposed. No doubt there are more to come. Only a few weeks ago the Minister of Finance introduced further measures adding more changes to an already obscure picture.

Let us consider some of the provisions which particularly affect co-operatives and the credit union movement. There appears no room for doubt that the government is determined to penalize these two organizations which have proven extremely helpful to hundreds of thousands of Canadians. I am quite certain that the Consumers Co-operative which functions in the city in which I live has been a strong factor in keeping prices reasonably in line. A very admirable service has also been provided by the local credit union.

My seatmate, the hon. member for Wellington, has already put on the record this afternoon the structure of credit unions and caisses populaires in Canada and the services they provide, so there is no need for me to repeat it. I think this will probably meet with the favour of the hon. member for Calgary South, who as I have said was earlier on his feet telling members of the opposition they are being too repetitious and that the government does not need to hear the same thing over and over again. What I am attempting to do in the short period of time available to me this evening is to re-emphasize some of the things the government has been told but about which they have obviously done nothing.

The co-ops and credit unions were extremely concerned by indications in Bill C-259 that their future was undoubtedly very bleak. However, after meetings with the minister and representations made by members of the opposition the co-ops and credit unions were told that the implications in the bill would be reviewed by the government. Amendments have been proposed to the sections relating to co-ops and credit unions but the damage that will be done to these organizations is still very apparent.

As far as the co-ops are concerned, the use of capital employed as a base for taxation is entirely wrong and discriminatory, and although the government has come forth with amendments to sections 135, 136 and 137 of the bill I do want to impress upon the minister, through his parliamentary secretary, that the measures the government originally introduced might quite easily have sounded the death-knell of many co-operatives. Certainly the amendments proposed by the government are unsatisfactory from the point of view of these organizations.

I suggest to the government that co-operatives be allowed to continue to distribute annual savings in a form which would enable members to continue their investment in the co-operative. It would also make it possible for co-operatives to carry on with the essential policy of retirement of equity of those members who no longer use the co-operative.

Since the disclosure in June that credit unions will be very much affected by the tax reform legislation they have been exceedingly concerned with the threat that the tax proposals constitute for them. If enacted, the proposals will severely undermine the definitive characteristics of credit unions and will surely place them at a disadvantage in the competitive business market. Bill C-259 reveals a very basic misunderstanding of the nature of credit unions, and although some amendments have been introduced by the government, the proposals still project a tax formula that is inequitable.

May I also point out to the minister that these amendments do not meet the objections of the co-operatives, who insist that the fundamental distinctions in their nature be respected by the taxation statute. These distinctions are as follows: First, the co-operative provides primarily a self-help service that is required by its members. Second, the co-operative distributes its earnings to its members in proportion to member business. Third, it raises and services its equity capital by revolving the same in relation to the use of the co-operative by its members. Finally, the capital contributed by a member of a co-operative provides the member with services and does not produce for him a return on investment.

As all of us know, the members of co-operatives have strenuously objected to the "capital employed" concept contained in Bill C-259 which substantially reduces the amount of patronage refunds which could be paid to members on business done with themselves. Reducing patronage refunds hits at the economic existence of co-operatives. These refunds are part of the investment required to enable the co-operative to continue to exist.

Members usually invest some of these refunds in their co-operative which provides a substantial portion of the capital required for the operation and growth of the co-operative, and especially for the revolving of member capital to keep the ownership of the co-operative in the hands of the user of the co-operative. I am pleased that the minister has been convinced of the error of his original ideas in respect of co-ops and credit unions. However, again I assure him that the members of these organizations are still far from satisfied.

In conclusion, I say to the parliamentary secretary from Calgary South, who a short while ago gave the committee a lecture on what he called the repetitiveness of the speeches by members of the opposition, that it appears quite obvious from a letter that all Members of Parliament received this afternoon from the Co-operative Union of Canada, signed by its president, that this government needs to be told things many, many times before it gets the message. I quote part of this letter which reads as follows:

> Co-operatives have recently received a letter from the hon. Minister of Finance, the final paragraph of which reads:
> "The government considers that the proposed new tax bill, as amended, will result in a fairer distribution of the tax burden while helping co-operatives in the transition from exempt to taxable status".

This illustrates very well that the government has to be told these things time and time again since the co-operatives are not presently exempt from taxation.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

FISHERIES—ASSERTION BY CANADA OF MANAGEMENT JURISDICTION OVER CONTINENTAL SHELF

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, on October 13 I asked the Minister of the Environment and Fisheries (Mr. Davis) this question:

In the wake of last week's conference over which the minister presided, is the government now giving serious consideration to asserting Canada's jurisdiction over the continental shelf in so far as fisheries management is concerned and, if so, when may an announcement be expected?

The minister gave this reply:

Mr. Speaker, our primary concern is for sound conservation out over our continental shelf, and we require the co-operation of other nations to bring that about.

The minister is always very precise in his replies. It was once said of an official of this House years and years ago that while he may never have lacked conviction, he was sometimes a little short on accuracy. I remember a matter raised by my colleague from St. John's East who had noted that in an official publication of the House the minister was designated only as Minister of the Environment. I note that the parliamentary secretary is listed in Hansard as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment, not to the Minister of the Environment and Fisheries, so I take it he has not troubled to make that correction. While it was not in the designation, what I think is far more important is whether or not the fisheries aspect is in the consideration of the man in charge of the portfolio.

It is interesting that at this time when our country is troubled about the state of its secondary industries, when we are in great travail over those industries, our basic or primary industries are at their nadir. No one has to talk about wheat, no one has to mention mining; certainly no one has to talk about what is happening to the great pulp and paper industry, or what happened long before "Nixonomics." We have watched with great anxiety what is happening to the most ancient of our industries, namely, fisheries.

There is a serious story in so far as the east coast is concerned. Stocks are being depleted and many important fish are in very serious short supply. There is overfishing. There is foreign intrusion with dangerously sophisticated equipment. All sorts of fish are being swept up from the bottom of our seas. This constitutes a grave challenge. I am afraid there is not sufficiently high priority for the fishing industry of Canada.

In my province—I think this is unique to that province—the government has managed to elude, evade or escape its proper and constitutional responsibility for fishing centres, the fishing industry and, more important, the harbours in this precarious industry. According to the British North America Act, section 91, subsections 9, 10 and 12, special responsibilities are set out in respect of beacons, buoys and lighthouses. These are clearly the responsibility of the federal government. In the province of Prince Edward Island, under the device of designated ports some ports get the attention of the federal government through the Department of Public Works and these are designated not by the federal government, which has the responsibility, but by the provincial government. So there is a clear evasion of responsibility. But on October 13 I was particularly interested in what was being done on the international front in respect of our dangerously depleted fisheries.

As one looks at this problem one is concerned about the contradistinction which is being made by the government, that the vigorous unilateralism in the Arctic is not reproduced in reference to the Atlantic. In reference to the issue of the 12-mile limit I remember when the former Secretary of State for External Affairs, now government leader of the Senate, came to the External Affairs Committee and proclaimed the 12-mile limit. My colleague, the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), said there were so many officials there that there must be some announcement no less important or world shattering than a declaration of war. Then we had the appearance of the Vice-Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the Soviet Union. I am not one of those who deplore that or one who fears or criticizes it, but I say in reference to that visit that through all the current exercises in summitry we must ask the question: What is the concrete result thereof?

In the communiqué which followed the exchange of pleasantries at the time of the visit of the distinguished leader of the Soviet Union to our country, there was no place or priority for fisheries. I had hoped that that occasion would have served as an opportunity to express our concern about our fishery and the control of the continental shelf. I have attended many international gatherings and I know that when you have the Soviet bloc you have quite a bloc: they are fairly numerous and extremely cohesive. But, Mr. Speaker, after all the tumult and shouting about coexistence had died down, and after the captains and kings had departed, what was there left for the east coast fisherman? Did we move one inch forward in our claim to management of fisheries resources over our continental shelf? Did we get the support of the Soviet Union? Did we gain their assistance for any future international conclave?

Now comes the question that the minister must answer and that his parliamentary secretary, who is here tonight, must answer. Are we trying hard enough to safeguard the livelihood of the men who are engaged in this most perilous of industries? I would profoundly, happily and joyously welcome some indication to show that apart from our interesting talk about controlling the environment and advancing on many esoteric grounds, some serious attention has been given to this much assaulted industry and that action has been taken.

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I would be a fool if I were to disagree with the hon. member who has just spoken and suggest that there is not a serious depletion of our fisheries resources on the east coast particularly. This is a recognized fact. The government is conscious of it and is conscious also of its responsibilities as a coastal state. The government knows that the sea must be managed more intelligently in the future. As I say, the government knows this. It is determined to do everything in its power to prevent destruction by pollution and overfishing as well as by undue exploitation the life-giving resources of our coastal seas.

On the other hand, the government is also aware of its responsibilities as a member of the international fishing community. It is anxious to achieve its objectives in a spirit of co-operation with its neighbours wherever possible. During the past two years, as the hon. member himself just outlined, the government has taken various steps to correct some of the wrongdoings which have taken place in the past, as well as some of the mismanagements of the past in the hope of arriving at better international agreements regarding the management of the fisheries.

The government of Canada has drawn base lines from headland to headland, has established a 12-mile territorial sea limit and has established closing lines to close off large bodies of water such as the Gulf of St. Lawrence and the Bay of Fundy for the exclusive use of Canadian fishermen. All this was done on Canada's own initiative. The government at present is also in the process of phasing out from our exclusive fishing areas countries which have had traditional fishing practices there. Also, it has initiated a series of negotiations which should bear fruit in the very near future.

Hon. members will recall that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) stated in the House on September 27 that we are making very rapid and satisfactory progress on a treaty with the French government which will cover a number of these matters. The government further intends to discuss with fishing countries the question of the management of this resource on the whole of our continental shelf and the practices necessary for a sustained yield harvesting of the fisheries resource. The minister announced recently that he hoped to convene next year a meeting of all international fishing nations of the world in order to discuss this very important subject.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member referred to the recent visit of the Premier of the Soviet Union and the role that Canada played at that time to bring to the attention of our neighbour to the north our great concern about the overfishing of the fisheries. Answering a question put to him in the House by the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse), the minister said that we have not failed to reach an understanding with the U.S.S.R., that we have made various submissions and that we hope we will be able to carry out our points and get the U.S.S.R. to agree to our proposals.

GRAIN—LIFT PROGRAM—REPAYMENT REQUESTS TO FARMERS—REFERENCE TO LEGAL OFFICERS OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I raise this question this evening because I have not been able to obtain satisfactory information. On October 13 I asked a question of the minister in charge of the Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) in regard to certain letters sent to farmers demanding repayment of moneys which they were paid under the Lift program. On November 1, I again asked a question with regard to the legal aspects of the matter. I asked whether the individual cases of farmers were examined by counsel in the Department of Justice or in any other department of government before repayment was demanded by letter. I would like the answers tonight.

I would like to know how many letters were sent out by the department demanding repayment. I would like to know how much money in total has been demanded from farmers. I would like to know how much research was undertaken in each case before letters were written demanding money. From time to time I return to my constituency. Last weekend I attended a meeting where I met a number of farmers. Some came to me saying, "I have been asked for so much money. I have received a letter demanding repayment. What shall I do?" They do not know the basis upon which they are asked for repayment.

I am sorry that the minister is not in the chamber tonight. The Lift program was hastily put together. We know that through necessity the government may have hired people who were inexperienced and asked them to undertake supervision of the program. But to demand from a farmer that he repay money on the basis of an aerial photograph, showing this or that in regard to his farm, is just not right.

To demand repayment from a farmer because in the opinion of the people concerned in the department he had not cut a cover crop as of a given day, even though extensions had been publicly granted that summer, is not right. To demand money from a person under these circumstances is not right. It is not right to send a letter to such an individual asking him to sign what in effect is a promissory note to undertake eventual payment of the amount demanded.

The minister responsible should rise in this House on motions and explain what is happening. We should be given answers, but we are not getting them. The hon. member for Meadow Lake (Mr. Cadieu) also asked for answers on this subject. I do not know what he got but I know what I got. I sincerely hope that this evening we will receive some worth-while answers.

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago on behalf of the minister I provided some information that was requested by the hon. member for Meadow Lake (Mr. Cadieu). The hon. member who has just spoken has asked for more information. I regret that I am not in a position to give him a complete answer right now but I would say to him that one of the main aims of Operation Lift was quickly to provide co-operating prairie farmers with some much needed cash. To achieve this, cheques covering an initial payment were sent out to producers following a quick examination of their applications. Later, a more detailed examination was carried out, and in those cases where it was evident that an overpayment had been made the producer was advised of the discrepancy and a return of the overpayment was requested.

It was originally estimated that about 4,168 overpayments had been made, and to date more than 888 producers have replied to the request. Of these, more than 528 have returned the overpayment and more than 360 have provided further explanation which has justified their original payment.

As I pointed out in the original reply to the hon. member, each individual case was not examined by the Department of Justice. However, the Department of Justice has endeavoured to classify the reasons for overpayment into a number of categories: for example, a change of facts since the original submission, a change of residence, etc., with a view to determining what course of action should be taken with respect to each category. Our department is still awaiting a reply from the Department of Justice. We are also awaiting a reply from some farmers who have been asked to reimburse the money. As I pointed out, some of them have complied with the request and others who feel they should not reimburse the department have given satisfactory explanations and things are settled. I suppose among those cases which remain to be settled there will be many more farmers who will give a proper explanation that will settle the matter. We hope this will be the case.

TRADE

MEASURES TO ALLEVIATE WORLD MARKET COMPETITION

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, on September 28 I did put a question that was considered too general in scope to call for an immediate answer. I will quote the question I then put to the hon. Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce:

> What policy does the government plan to implement in view of the re-organization of trade blocks in the world, and how will the Canadian economy subsist in the next few years if it tolerates cost increases such as those we experienced in the last few years while being able to meet the competition on world markets?

Mr. Speaker, we already have to face the European Common Market the members of which can certainly produce cheaper than we can even if their economy differs from ours. Our economy is one of increase in taxes, interest rates, salaries, cost of living and, consequently, in products. The more we progress, the more we experience such a situation. The more prices and costs increase, the more difficult it is to compete with other countries.

I was asking the government what kind of solution it had to suggest to cope with the serious economic conditions which we are experiencing.

I would term that, Mr. Speaker, an unfair economic advantage, an economic unbalance. This unbalance is obvious, because we will witness in the near future a considerable decrease in Canadian exports, such as we have known and are experiencing at the present time. These decreasing exports are due to the high interest rates which the industry, as well as ourselves, has to pay to obtain the necessary capital to carry on in business. This condition is also ascribable to exorbitant federal, provincial, municipal and school taxes which still raise the cost of all products. Thus in all those sectors it becomes more and more difficult to compete with other countries.

We can expect in future even worse conditions than the present ones. I was asking the government whether it could not give us satisfactory answers and tell us, for instance, what is being done now to remedy this situation, to find other means of financing our industries at lower interest rates and to improve the situation with regard to bonds and loans.

Consider the case of debentures. When manufacturers have to issue debentures on the market, they do so because they have enormous bills to pay and carry tremendous overhead expenses. Even the cost of insurance is too high for manufacturers. The financing of production and warehousing is also too costly. Formula 88, as put out by the banks and financial institutions, entails a 12. per cent interest rate.

Those are as many factors that contribute to increasing prices, to creating problems for the Canadians, to restricting our imports, for prices are endlessly going up.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I ask the government whether it could not find some technical formula such as a compensated discount to reduce prices. We must absolutely establish a price reduction policy in order to control all factors of increase. That is why I am asking the government what kind of policy it can offer the Canadian people and our industries in that regard.

[English]

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Latulippe) has raised an interesting question this evening because Canada is indeed concerned about its trade problems around the world. Canada has a reputation of being the highest per capita trader in the world. Of course, we are particularly concerned because of developments in the trading world such as the enlargement of the European Economic Community.

I caution the hon. member against taking too pessimistic a view because of the situation. Temporary adjustments will be necessary. I advise him to look at the opportunities that exist in the enlarged economic community in Europe. The large market that exists there is growing every year. Their average tariff level is very reasonable. There are many opportunities for Canada as a great trading nation.

We have been very conscious of the problems that exist in making those adjustments. We carried on discussions with the British as they considered their entry into the Common Market. We were able to make special arrangements with the British, which they carried into the market on behalf of Canada, with regard to special products of great concern to Canadian trade. We are doing other things as well. We are promoting the development of multilateral trading negotiations within the OECD. We believe that real progress in advancing Canada's interest in international trade will be made when there is a new round of trading negotiations. This will lead to freer trade in the world.

The hon. member referred to the problem of keeping costs in line in order that we may maintain our trading advantages in the world. We should remind ourselves over and over again that Canada has the lowest cost of living increase of any of the western nations. The figures published by the OECD last year showed that Canada had a cost of living increase of 3.4 per cent. This is the lowest of any of the OECD countries.

I would remind the hon. member that the OECD countries include the great trading nations of the western world, the nations with which we do business, so we have not done too badly in this regard. Everyone in the country should, of course, be concerned about increases in costs. The government has been extremely concerned, and we shall continue to be concerned, about this important ingredient in maintaining our trading position. But we have experienced a notable increase in our world trade despite difficulties in the world trading picture. Last year there was a record merchandise trading surplus of $3 billion, the largest we have ever known—

TABLING OF REPORT ON SNOWMOBILE SAFETY

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, last week I indicated to the House in answer to a question from the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) that I would table a study carried out for my department on the matter of snowmobile safety. Therefore, in accordance with Standing Order 41(2) I wish to table in the two official languages a report entitled "An Evaluation of Snowmobile Safety", prepared by Hovey and Associates Limited, of Ottawa.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

PROVISION OF SHORT-RANGE ECONOMIC FORECASTING ORGANIZATION AND INFORMATION ON GOVERNMENT PROJECTIONS—GREATER PARLIAMENTARY INVOLVEMENT IN POLICY FORMATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the recommendation contained in the report of the Senate Committee on National Finance regarding growth, employment and price stability, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government is now prepared to set up an independent commission for economic analysis charged with the responsibility of producing short-term forecasts and short-term analyses of economic performance as I requested on December 4, 1970, and on May 5 and May 17 of this year?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the report was only tabled and made public yesterday and I have not had a chance to study the argument. I will do so and consider the case made for the establishment of a short-term body.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that the right hon. gentleman has not had an opportunity to study the report in detail, but I had hoped he would have had an opportunity to give certain matters of principle some consideration. I should like to ask whether he is prepared to accept in principle the recommendation of the Senate committee that there should be a new openness in the process of formation of economic policy in Canada and, at the very least, whether the government will report to Parliament and through Parliament to the Canadian people its own specific projections in respect of the performance of the economy and employment in the coming months? Is the right hon. gentleman prepared to accept the principle of the need for more openness and, if so, is he prepared to have the government give this kind of projection?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, we report to Parliament on our views in respect of the present and future state of the economy. We have occasion to do this in our budgetary speeches and we do it sometimes as often as two or three times a year. I do not know whether the recommendations of the committee go farther than that. As I say, the report was only made public yesterday and I have not read it.

As to new openness, I am not sure what the Leader of the Opposition has in mind. Perhaps he could ask a supplementary and say what he means by "new openness". Does he mean that we should make the budget public before announcing it to the House of Commons, or some other alternative? I do not know what the report recommends.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, in response to the request of the Prime Minister for further enlightenment I should like to ask whether he is prepared to involve the House of Commons and Parliament more actively in the formation of economic policy as recommended by the Senate committee, specifically, for example, by establishing a short-term forecasting commission, as I have recommended, and having the report of that commission as well as the report of the Economic Council of Canada referred to a standing committee adequately strengthened with resource personnel? Is the right hon. gentleman prepared to adopt that kind of openness in the formation of economic policy in this country?

Mr. Trudeau: Certainly if committees of the House want to study in more detail the report of the Economic Council of Canada the government sees absolutely no objection. There is no lack of openness in the possibilities offered to the opposition parties and the people of Canada generally to state their views on the economy and what should be done. I have noticed no lack of interest in the opposition ranks in stating their views on the economy. Therefore this is all open. I am not clear, once again, what the Leader of the Opposition desires in terms of the eventual decisions which have to be taken on budgetary measures. Does he suggest these should be discussed in the open?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Obviously at this point we are engaging in a debate. The Chair will allow the Leader of the Opposition to ask a supplementary question in a moment, but we are getting involved in debate when the right hon. Prime Minister suggests that a supplementary question might be asked and the Leader of the Opposition asks a supplementary. This is more in the form of a conversation and exchange of views between the hon. gentlemen. I would not think that is in keeping with the spirit of the question period.

Mr. Stanfield: I agree, Mr. Speaker, but I am simply trying to carry out my usual policy of co-operating with the right hon. gentleman at every opportunity. I would simply commend to him the reading of these recommendations by the Senate committee.

STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF JUSTICE RESPECTING UNEMPLOYMENT AND NEED FOR MORE COMPREHENSIVE ECONOMIC POLICY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Was the Minister of Justice stating government policy in his address yesterday to the Empire Club of Toronto when he said that Canada's rate of unemployment is totally unacceptable and that the situation calls for a more comprehensive government economic policy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is hardly a question of policy; it is a statement of fact. It is a fact that we have recognized in government ranks that we would like to see the unemployment rate lowered. If it is a policy, it is certainly a multilateral policy which we all share.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What steps is the government taking to implement the policy called for by the minister, a more comprehensive approach to the whole problem of economic growth?

Mr. Trudeau: That is what the Minister of Justice and the other ministers have been engaged in in the past few years, trying to reach a more comprehensive approach.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

INVOLVEMENT OF PROVINCES AND INDUSTRY IN FORMULATION OF POLICY TO ACHIEVE GREATER INDEPENDENCE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary on a matter closer to home and more recent. Was the Minister of Justice stating government policy when he said that an economic policy to give us more independence and international muscle must involve closer federal-provincial liaison and a closer relationship between government and industry? Is this now becoming government policy and when will the government in fact be moving toward this new type of policy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am glad this excellent speech has attracted so much commendation from the opposition ranks and that they now have begun to realize the direction in which the government is moving.

FULL EMPLOYMENT GOAL

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question on unemployment for the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister say whether or not the government endorses and will adopt the recommendation of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty that Canada must have a goal of full employment?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

PENSIONS

OLD AGE SECURITY—FULL COST OF LIVING INCREASE ADJUSTMENT MECHANISM

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister. As recommended by the Senate committee report, is the government considering putting a full adjustment mechanism in old age security pensions as the cost of living rises and, if so, when will legislative action be taken?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): When the Senate forms the government, Mr. Speaker.

SUGGESTED REVISION OF POLICIES AND INTRODUCTION OF NEW PROGRAMS

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to put my question to the hon. Minister of Regional Economic Expansion but, since he is away, I will put it to the right hon. Prime Minister. Following an accusation made yesterday by Quebec Premier Bourassa against the federal government to the effect that it did not meet its electoral promises of three years ago in order to eliminate regional disparities and faced with this obvious failure noted by the premiers of Quebec and of the other provinces, does not the present government think that its regional development policies should be revised without delay and new programs developed after consultation with the provinces?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the premises of the question. I should be very surprised if the Quebec premier had said anything like that.

With regard to the regional economic expansion program, Quebec got far more out of it than any other province in Canada, and I would be very surprised if the Quebec premier expressed dissatisfaction with the funds invested in his province as a result of the program implemented by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary to the right hon. Prime Minister and ask him if he has read the article published in the Globe and Mail this morning. Can he tell us whether what was published about Mr. Bourassa reflects the policy of the government? I quote:

[English]

... it is normal that people question the general effect of these policies, the justification for these policies.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Prime Minister can obviously answer the question, but I would hope that the questions asked during the question period were not based on newspaper reports especially not when they are quoted as the hon. member did.

Anyhow, I recognize the importance of the question and the Prime Minister can obviously answer.

Mr. Trudeau: As you seem to admit it, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Bourassa does not usually communicate with me through the Globe and Mail. When he wishes to speak to me, he does it viva voce. When he wants to speak about regional economic expansion, he communicates with the responsible minister. Moreover, we are frequently in touch. Mr. Bourassa has never spoken to me in the terms referred to by the member.

• (11:20 a.m.)

Mr. Valade: To clarify the situation, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether, in fact, he and his Quebec counterpart have discussed a review of the regional development policy. Could he assure the provinces that they Lwwiill be consulted before any new program is developed?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the Premier of Quebec did not raise this question when we met recently.

NATIONAL ANTHEM

SUGGESTED CANCELLATION OF RIGHT TO CHARGE COPYRIGHT FEE FOR PLAYING OF "O CANADA"

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I ask the Prime Minister to give consideration to a problem that has arisen as a result of the royalties being collected by the Authors, Publishers and Composers Association of Canada for the use of "O Canada" when played at any time by any organization which charges admission. Up to the present time "God Save the Queen" and "O Canada" have been accepted as national anthems. This organization, this all-powerful behemoth of art, have a copyright on "O Canada". Will the Prime Minister give consideration to bringing before Parliament the necessary legislation to cancel the copyright as such a preposterous anachronism whereby Canadians have to pay for the privilege of having "O Canada" played?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is our stated intention to bring in legislation on this matter. It will not be possible at this session, but we intend doing so as soon as we find time in Parliament.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. member for Prince Albert.

Mr. Gibson: A supplementary question.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member in a moment but at this moment I have recognized the right hon. member for Prince Albert on a supplementary.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not want to intrude on the hon. member. I always put him first. In the meantime, will the Prime Minister use his good offices to get in touch with this group and point out that what is being done is not acceptable to this government, this Parliament or the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I certainly welcome the suggestion by the right hon. member. I will ensure that someone from my good offices will get that message across.

Mr. Colin D. Gibson (Hamilton-Wentworth): I have a supplementary question. Is it possible for the Prime Minister to prevail on the right hon. member of the Conservative party to prevail on his colleagues to support an amendment to the Dominion Day Act to change the name to Canada Day?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

NATIONAL DEFENCE

U.S.-CANADA PRODUCTION-SHARING AGREEMENT—POSSIBLE BROADENING TO PERMIT SIMILAR AGREEMENTS WITH OTHER COUNTRIES

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question arises out of a line of questioning yesterday by the right hon. member for Prince Albert concerning the possible dangers to Canada inherent in the American desire for changes in the defence production-sharing agreement. I ask the Minister of National Defence whether, in view of the point made in the version of the Gray report contained in The Canadian Forum that the present arrangement "has made it difficult to develop similar defence production arrangements with other countries", the government is suggesting a broadening of the arrangement to the United States in its discussions so that similar agreements may be made with other countries, or has the government attempted to enter into any defence production-sharing arrangements with other countries?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I regret to say I have not read The Canadian Forum, but if it is a question of trade policy I suggest that the hon. member might direct it to my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Rowland: Mr. Speaker, it is not a question of trade policy as much as of the defence production-sharing agreement for which the Minister of National Defence has some responsibility.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, it falls under the responsibilities of my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

POST OFFICE

POSSIBLE STRIKE BY LETTER CARRIERS—AVOIDANCE OF DISRUPTION OF CHRISTMAS MAIL DELIVERY

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Postmaster General. We welcome him back to the House after being lost in the mails while engaged in important negotiations. Can he assure the House that on the basis of these negotiations there will be no serious disruption of the Christmas mail service?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the discussions that we have held have not been that long. In fact, I do not know yet what decisions the members of the executive will take when they gather on Monday. But if they decide to vote for a strike, they will have to bear the consequences.

[English]

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, based on the letter edged in black that we received from the minister this morning the main issue in contention seems to be the hiring of casuals to avoid paying overtime to the regular employees. Is the minister pursuing this point of contention so that a successful solution will be found for all concerned?

[Translation]

Mr. Côté: Mr. Speaker, we are not afraid to discuss with them the measures that the department might consider with regard to a new method of work allocation in the case of unmanned routes. We are ready to discuss this matter and, if possible, to affect members of the bargaining unit to mail delivery in case of continuing need, but the department cannot undertake not to hire casual workers, because it could not then hire the 60,000 normally needed during the Christmas season.

[Mr. Rowland.]

POSSIBLE STRIKE BY LETTER CARRIERS—ACTION TO ENSURE DELIVERY OF OLD AGE PENSIONERS' AND VETERANS' CHEQUES

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Postmaster General a supplementary question. In case there is a walkout toward the end of the month, would the minister do something to assure that old age pension cheques and veterans' cheques are delivered to those needy people?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, that is a hypothetical question.

[English]

LETTER CARRIERS—POSSIBLE REMOVAL OF RIGHT TO STRIKE

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Labour. I understand that in a speech last night the Minister of Labour indicated that it may be necessary to remove the right to strike in order to protect the public interest and maintain public services. Was he thinking of the letter carriers in this instance?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have some hesitation about allowing the question in those terms. The hon. member knows it is not quite regular to ask questions of ministers in relation to speeches made outside the House. Perhaps we can assume that the question has been asked directly and the minister might be allowed to reply.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, what I did say was that in the case of disputes where it has become evident that the dispute must be brought to an end in the best interests of the public, I would have no hesitation introducing legislation removing the right to strike from the union in question and providing ways and means of settling that dispute. In the case of the postal workers I would suggest to them that their collective agreement and the Public Service Act provide a legal method for settling honest differences of opinion on any particular clause in the agreement, and any premature walkout or strike on Monday next would make it very difficult for those people who understand the labour movement to agree with their action. In other words, through irresponsible actions they make it very difficult for their friends to help them. I hope they understand precisely what I am talking about, Mr. Speaker.

that time any recommendations for the future of that institute?

FOREIGN INVESTMENT—SPECIAL TALKS AND JOINT RESEARCH WITH PROVINCES

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister as soon as I can get his attention. It has been reported that the government has further agreed to consult the provinces on foreign investment. I should like to ask whether the government is prepared to hold special talks and undertake joint research with the provinces on this very important matter?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): If they so desire, Mr. Speaker, we can have joint talks and research, but our intention now would be to consult them one by one. It would be a more harmonious conversation, I believe, if we heard their opinions singly rather than together.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPORTED ATMOSPHERIC NUCLEAR EXPLOSION BY PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA—CANADIAN PROTEST

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. Can he indicate whether the government was advised by the government of the People's Republic of China regarding that country's recent atmospheric nuclear explosion, and can he advise what channels the government will be using to protest against this further proliferation of pollution?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we are trying to verify whether this explosion actually took place.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: We have heard that such a likelihood is possible. If it is confirmed that there has been a nuclear explosion we will express our protest to the government of China through the usual channels, our embassy in Peking, as we did express to them our opposition after the House of Commons adopted the resolution condemning nuclear tests. The position of the Canadian government is that we are against all nuclear testing of all kinds everywhere.

Mr. Macquarrie: For clarification, Mr. Speaker, is the Prime Minister advising that our government has no information that an explosion took place yesterday?

An hon. Member: No leak there yet.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, my information is that we are trying to confirm the accuracy of the report. This should be a relatively simple matter.

Mr. Bell: Then he is going to protest.

OIL

PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—AFFIRMATION OF GOVERNMENT SUPPORT—ENVIRONMENTAL AND SOCIAL STUDIES

Mr. R. J. Orange (Northwest Territories): I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Would the minister please advise whether statements are correct which are attributed in the press to Secretary Morton of the United States to the effect that the Canadian alternative oil pipeline route is not being considered because it does not appear to have the support of the Canadian government?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member knows that a question cannot be asked in those terms. Would the hon. member resume his seat. The hon. member is asking the government to confirm a report in the newspapers. I do not think that a question asked in those terms is in order. The hon. member could rephrase the question.

Mr. Orange: Can the minister say whether the suggested alternative oil pipeline down the Mackenzie Valley still has the support of the Canadian government?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I should like to advise and confirm to the House the continuing interest and willingness of the government of Canada to examine and discuss any proposals relating to the transport of Alaskan petroleum resources through Canada to market in the United States. Together with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources I announced guidelines to northern pipelines on August 13, 1970.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: Those guidelines—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister knows that if he wants to make a statement in the House he should be prepared to do so on motions.

An hon. Member: What a smuggling job!

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I have only one more line.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the Minister has only one more line he might be allowed to finish.

Mr. Chrétien: I should like to thank members who have given me the opportunity to practise my English. Those guidelines made it clear that, in principle, oil and gas pipelines were acceptable to the government of Canada but on the conditions stated in the guidelines.

Mr. Orange: Can the minister indicate the degree of priority which has now been given by the government to the environmental and social studies necessary before such pipelines are constructed?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the House knows very well that the government has given the highest priority to the environmental and social studies on which we have spent millions of dollars. We have made a lot of progress and are ready to entertain any application.

PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—RESULTS OF ENVIRONMENTAL STUDIES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development whether the studies have now been completed with regard to environmental protection and environmental risk resulting from such a pipeline through the Canadian north and, if so, is the minister prepared to be open with the House and the country and indicate the results of this research?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I cannot certify that all studies are completed. I said earlier that we made considerable progress in that regard and that we could examine any application we would receive. Then decisions would probably be taken after completion of the studies.

[English]

PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—DISCUSSION WITH INDIANS ON SETTLEMENT OF LAND CLAIMS

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): I have a supplementary question for the minister since he seems to be so well prepared to answer these questions today. Has he yet had any consultations with the Indian people whose lands, which any proposed route must traverse, are involved with respect to settling their land claims? If he has not had such discussions, when does he intend to commence them?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know that Indians have had their own committee to study their rights and treaties for two years already and that they are examining that problem while Commissioner Barber is doing the same work for the government.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Since the minister did not answer my question I can only assume that he did not hear it. Has the minister had any discussions with the Indian people concerning their land rights in these areas of the north and, if not, when does the government intend to commence them?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I have explained to the House that there is a mechanism in place. Probably the hon. member was not aware of it.

Mr. Nielsen: That is still no answer.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for New Westminster for a last supplementary on this subject. We will soon be running short of time and I have to seek the co-operation of hon. members to limit the number of supplementaries.

PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—CONSTRUCTION BY GOVERNMENT WITH CANADIAN FUNDS

Mr. Douglas A. Hogarth (New Westminster): I should like to ask the minister whether the government will give consideration to the possibility of the construction of such a pipeline by the Canadian government with Canadian funds?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: You are in the wrong party, Doug.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the matter of Canadian participation in the construction of the pipeline was dealt with in statements made in August 1970. In fact, we would be happy that Canadians take part in it to the greatest extent possible.

AIR TRANSPORT

USE OF FRENCH LANGUAGE BY TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS IN QUEBEC

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, about two weeks ago I asked a question of the Acting Prime Minister at that time concerning difficulties in air traffic control towers which could have caused accidents in the province of Quebec. It was indicated at that time that indeed a serious situation did exist. I should like to ask the Minister of Transport if investigations are going on, if they are completed in any respect, and if he has anything to report to the House in regard to this matter?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, first, investigations have been carried out. Second, I am satisfied there is no danger involved in any of the practices to which the hon. member refers. Third, I am meeting with CATA, the air transport association representative group, on Thursday for further discussions on this matter.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): With respect to the stated government intention of establishing French unilingual speaking controllers in certain areas in the province of Quebec, and having regard to the recommendation of CATA and the necessity for maintaining high standards of safety in the control of aircraft, will the minister assure the House that, in keeping with the maintenance of these high standards of safety in the operation of control activities, English will be the language spoken by controllers in these areas?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that not only in those areas but throughout the world English is the acknowledged language for air controllers. I can assure him that nothing will be done with regard to Canadian policy that will compromise the safety that is implicit in that arrangement.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock.

Mr. Mather: Mr. Speaker, both the questions I wanted to ask have been asked.

AIRPORTS

ALLEGED SELECTION OF PETERS CORNERS AS SITE FOR SECOND TORONTO INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. In view of the government's decision to build the second Toronto international airport at Peters Corners just northwest of Hamilton, may I ask when construction will commence on that secondary airport?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member must be talking about some kind of toy outfit to operate the kind of toy aircraft that he will have, because I do not know anything about such an arrangement.

An hon. Member: The hon. member was toying with the truth.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, I was just revealing another government leak and I thought the minister might like to confirm it.

[Later]

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I should like to clear up a shaded area left by the answer the Minister of Transport gave to the hon. member for Broadview. Has a decision in fact been taken with respect to the site of the new airport for Toronto? If not, how soon does the hon. gentleman expect a decision to be reached so that it may be announced in the House?

An hon. Member: Or late.

Mr. Jamieson: No decision has been made. The Minister of Transport for Ontario has been enjoying a somewhat well-earned rest, I understand, after his hectic activities in October. I believe he is due back shortly or may be back now. I am ready to see him whenever he is ready. That should be some time next week.

NATURAL RESOURCES

ATLANTIC SEABOARD—SUGGESTED RECONSIDERATION OF GOVERNMENT POSITION ON OFFSHORE MINERAL ROYALTIES

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Prime Minister. In view of the statement made by the chairman of Mobil Oil Corporation to the New York Security Analysts Society to the effect that restrictive regulations out of all proportion to the problems they are intended to solve as well as continuing hassles about offshore development are handicapping operations in many promising areas on the Atlantic seaboard, will the Prime Minister reconsider his arbitrary 50-50 stand on offshore mineral royalties so that orderly development of the oil and gas potential off the Atlantic seaboard may be carried out?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the offer we made to the provinces more than two years ago was not an arbitrary one. At the time, as I recall, no opposition member suggested a better formula. They just sat back to wait and see how the wind was going to blow.

Mr. Crouse: In view of the statement by the chairman of Mobil Oil that if exploration and development can be proceeded with it will be a matter for political and not industry decision, will the Prime Minister meet with the premiers of the Atlantic provinces in order to stop the present impasse? Let me also give him another suggestion. We in Atlantic Canada believe in a formula that will give the Atlantic provinces 100 per cent of all offshore royalties.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

RETENTION OF PROVISIONS IN BILL RESPECTING TECHNOLOGICAL CHANGE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Is the minister now in a position to confirm to the House that when Bill C-253 is brought forward even if at the next session under another number, it will still contain the provisions that are in it now respecting technological change?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, when the bill comes back the philosophy of that section will remain but it probably will be amended and improved upon. That will depend not on the volume of mail but on the quality of briefs and representations made to me in the interval and to the standing committee of Labour, Manpower and Immigration of which the hon. member is a member.

MANPOWER

CO-OPERATIVE FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL APPROACH TO SOLVE UNEMPLOYMENT PROBLEM

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the continuing problem of unemployment and in view of the failure of the federal-provincial conference to come to grips with that problem, does the government have any plans for a more co-operative approach on the part of the provincial governments and the federal government in regard to manpower, particularly in view of the consortium approach being developed in Alberta?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not clear as to what—

Mr. MacInnis: Read Turner's speech.

Mr. Trudeau: I will.

HOUSING

STABILIZATION OF INFLATIONARY FORCES—DISCUSSION WITH PROVINCES AND INDUSTRY

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In light of last month's .7 increase in prices in the housing sector and predictions by experts in this sector that stop and start federal housing policies are leading to a new round of inflation in housing, is the government going to discuss with the provinces and the housing industry ways to stabilize inflationary forces in the house building industry? If so, when will such talks be held?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the stop and start aspect of the matter in my opinion has no validity now because there has been a sustained supply of mortgage funds for almost three years at an unprecedented rate in this country. In fact, we will exceed the target of 220,000 housing starts set for this year by a considerable margin. With regard to other factors causing increased housing costs, we are constantly seeking solutions in consultation with the provinces. Actually there has been a considerable degree of encouragement in getting a mandate to pursue better consultative mechanisms, flowing from the federal-provincial conference held earlier this week.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate has a supplementary to a previous question.

TRANSPORT

RECOMMENDED CLASSIFICATION OF OFFSHORE DRILLING RIGS AS CANADIAN PORTS—AMENDMENT OF CANADA SHIPPING ACT

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport and is supplementary to an earlier question by the hon. member for South Shore. Can the minister say whether the recommendation of the Darling report that offshore drilling rigs be classified as Canadian ports will be accepted, and will there be an amendment to the Canada Shipping Act to accommodate that recommendation?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give a categorical answer because, as the hon. member is aware, I have asked for representations from all the affected parties. A great many have been received and there is quite a diversity of views on this subject. In a general way I think I can answer by saying it is my position, and I believe I reflect the government's position, that we want as much Canadian involvement as possible in this offshore drilling and, hopefully, our actions will reflect that desire.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SALE OF YUKON AIRCRAFT—ESTIMATED LIFE—CERTIFICATES OF AIRWORTHINESS

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence and relates to the 11 Yukon aircraft which, according to reports this morning, have been sold for $100,000 each. What was the estimated life of these aircraft? In other words, how long were they still good for and did they all carry certificates of airworthiness?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the aircraft do not have certificates of airworthiness and it was for that reason that we had difficulty in disposing of them at a favourable price. The arrangement for sale involves placing one of the aircraft with Canadair for purposes of refitting and trials to see if it can be brought up to airworthiness standards. Therefore it is difficult to say at the moment what length of life remains for these aircraft. Of course, from now on that will remain the problem of the purchaser and not of the Department of National Defence.

POLLUTION

POSSIBLE WATERFRONT CESSPOOL IN HAMILTON BEACH AREA

Mr. Colin D. Gibson (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Will the minister attempt to prevent a possible pollution crisis in the nature of a waterfront cesspool which could arise, as alleged by Alderman Custeau in yesterday's Hamilton Spectator, as a result of the exchange of lands by the city of Hamilton and the Hamilton Harbour Board in the Hamilton beach area?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think I can flatly and unequivocally say that I have come out strongly against cesspools, wherever they happen to be.

Mr. Baldwin: Resign, then.

SNOWMOBILES—NOISE CAUSED BY OVERPOWERED MACHINES—STUDY OF THREAT TO ECOLOGY AND MAN

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport and arises out of the recent conference on snowmobiles and all-terrain vehicles. Is the minister's department planning to undertake a study of the charges made at the recent conference concerning the threat to the ecology and to humans by noisy and overpowered machines?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, may I call the hon. member's attention to the fact that the report of the first study on snowmobile safety, conducted under the auspices of the Department of Transport, was tabled this morning. It contains some references to the matter which the hon. member has commented upon and perhaps may provide him with some of the answers.

If so, will someone be making a statement about the government's intentions in this regard?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that I accept the premise that the cards are stacked, in government purchasing, in favour of any particular part of Canada. There is, of course, a continuing review of our contracting and procurement procedures. This will be continued in the light of the recommendation of the Senate committee.

Can the minister say whether he or his department has arranged a meeting respecting the movement of grain?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have been in touch with both railways and Canadian National and Canadian Pacific will have representatives here next Thursday immediately following the question period, I believe. We will arrange to circulate information as to the time and place of this meeting to all interested members before then.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

SUSPENSION OF CONSIDERATION OF INCOME TAX BILL TO DEAL WITH UNITED STATES ECONOMIC MEASURES

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton-Centre): My question is for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Is the government considering dropping the tax bill and starting a new session this year, as suggested by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue, to deal specifically with DISC and other United States economic threats to the Canadian economy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): There would have to be DISC legislation before we would want to announce our decision on that.

Mr. Paproski: Will the government outline its contingency plans in connection with DISC and its policy on foreign investment before the Christmas recess and in time for parliamentary discussion this year?

Mr. Trudeau: I do not see the advantage of outlining a contingency plan relative to a contingency which has not yet arisen.

Mr. Gray: On a brief question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I think I should inform the House that contrary to the suggestion of the hon. member I do not have a parliamentary secretary.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: You need a dozen.

Mr. Peters: How about Steve Paproski?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed, from Thursday, November 18, consideration in committee of Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act—Mr. Benson—Mr. Honey in the chair.

On Clause 1—Section 135: Deduction in Computing Income.

The Chairman: Order. When the committee rose last evening section 135 of clause 1 was under consideration with an amendment proposed by the Minister of National Revenue and a subamendment proposed by the hon. member for Regina East. Sections 135, 136 and 137 were grouped for debate.

Shall the subamendment carry?

Mr. Downey: I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary whether he would clear up several areas of doubt which are in my mind, and in the minds of those who have presented briefs to hon. members and also, I assume, to the Minister of Finance, on the question of possible double taxation of co-operatives under the proposals contained in the bill before us.

Mr. Mahoney: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member's microphone does not appear to be effective. I wonder if he realizes he is not bound to sit in his own seat, in committee I should like to hear his question and I am finding difficulty with the transmission from his present location.

Mr. Downey: Is it working, now?

Mr. Mahoney: That is fine.

Mr. Downey: I have some questions with regard to the taxation of co-operatives. Many representations have been made to us on this subject and the possibility of double taxation keeps cropping up. It appears to some of those who are interested in this subject that dividends flowing from co-operatives might be taxed both in the hands of the co-operative and in the hands of individuals who receive them. Would the parliamentary secretary fully explain to us which aspects of double taxation are involved with regard to the system proposed, and whether there are any provisions in the amendments before us which would materially change the position as it stands at present under the existing act?

Mr. Mahoney: First, there is no material change proposed in the law in that respect as far as I am aware. Corporate dividends received by a co-operative would be received tax-free. Patronage dividends paid out by a co-operative are deductible from its income for taxation purposes down to the floor indicated in the bill. So, there is no tax paid by the co-operative on earnings paid out as patronage dividends.

Whether these are taxable in the hands of recipients is, of course, the question. They are in some cases. In the case of consumer co-operatives it amounts really to a reduction in the purchase price of the commodities the party concerned is buying. I cannot, myself, identify any area where double taxation would be a matter of particular concern to the co-operatives.

Mr. Downey: Do I understand, then, that the incidence of double taxation is no worse under the new bill than under the present act?

Mr. Mahoney: I suppose a case of double taxation could arise if the co-operative were to choose to distribute patronage dividends to an extent which brought its retention below 5 per cent of the capital or one-third of earnings. Once it got into that area there could be some element of double taxation. So I suppose the change from 3 per cent to 5 per cent would create an area where there might be a greater possibility of double taxation arising. I am not aware whether co-operatives would ordinarily make distributions down to the point at which the difficulty would actually be encountered.

Mr. Downey: Mr. Chairman, there has been a great deal of concern expressed by credit unions over the special status of their reserve accounts, especially since it is mandatory that these be maintained at a certain level, much in the same way as deposit reserves with the chartered banks. I would ask the parliamentary secretary, in view of the representations that have been made, whether he would explain to us the changes he has made giving additional recognition to the special status that reserve accounts have with credit unions as opposed to the reserve accounts in ordinary co-operatives, for example.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, the problem we have is that the reserve requirements are established by provincial governments and vary from province to province. The suggestion that the reserve allowance provided in Bill C-259 should correspond to provincial reserve requirements just is not valid. Indeed, in the case of other financial institutions such as banks, insurance companies and so on, their reserve requirements, which are governed by the laws applicable to them, vary considerably compared with the reserves permitted them by the Income Tax Act.

It is possible that provincial law would require that a credit union maintain its reserves at a level higher than would be allowed for tax purposes by the Income Tax Act. However, we have not seen any way of solving this problem in view of the great diversity of provincial policy in this regard. In some provinces the question of reserves is, in a practical sense, left much to the discretion of directors or managers of credit unions. I do not think we could agree that they should have discretion to establish their own tax situation in this regard.

Mr. Downey: I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary if the provinces were consulted in the drafting of this legislation in view of the implications of the special arrangements provinces make with credit unions.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, the provincial requirements are based, of course, on ensuring solvency of credit unions. There were extensive consultations with the provinces about the whole formulation of the policy contained within Bill C-259. As to whether this particular item was a matter of intense discussion, I cannot answer because I was personally not a party to the negotiations.

Mr. Downey: Mr. Chairman, as a final question I should just like to read a paragraph from a letter that the Minister of Finance sent to one of the pools and perhaps the parliamentary secretary could explain or clarify it. It reads as follows:

> The impact of this new formula could have been severe for some co-operatives because of the way in which the capital of a co-operative revolves. Co-operatives typically raise capital through patronage dividends which are reinvested in shares, and they redeem the shares as members die, retire or give up farming. This requirement for an annual redemption of capital is one which the investor-owned corporation does not face. Where the earnings of a co-operative are relatively low, the proposed limit on patronage dividends could have caused financial difficulty for the co-operative. Accordingly, under an amendment tabled October 13, an alternative limit will permit patronage dividends to be fully deducted to the extent of two-thirds of the income of the co-operative before patronage dividends.

In the case of the wheat pools, the particular group in question here, how would the amendment that was made on that date to provide an alternative limit appreciably improve their position in this regard?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I have no more access than the hon. member or anybody else to individual tax returns, so I am not able to answer questions regarding specific taxpayers. The amendment does not exactly permit an option though it is an either or situation; it is either the lesser of 5 per cent of the capital employed or one-third of the taxable income for the year before allowed deductions. However, on a gross basis, and as far as the co-operative movement is concerned, the taxation will be approximately one-third of what it would have been but for the amendment. This assumes, of course, the full application of the amendment ten years hence; it will be much less during the intervening period as the particular provision is being phased in.

Mr. Downey: Mr. Chairman, that is the extent of my questions at this time and I thank the parliamentary secretary for his answers.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Chairman, I have not taken much part in this debate, indeed any at all, since the matter has come before the House though I have listened to a lot of comments made about co-operatives and credit unions, some of which have been very appropriate. It is obvious to me that some people who have talked about co-ops and credit unions think there may be some political advantage in talking about them. I want to make it clear that I, as a Liberal member, and as what I call a real Liberal, am a strong supporter of co-ops and credit unions and always have been.

I might add that the first time I became active in public life was in the co-operative movement with my local co-operative, the Harrow Farmers Co-operative. This was when I was 17 years of age and wanted an advance so that I could buy a farm tractor. The banks would not give me the money I required. No one wanted to lend this poor farm boy money, and so I went to see the local manager of my co-operative in Amherstburg, who was a Scotsman by the name of MacDonald, and he gave me an advance which enabled me to enter the agricultural industry.

My local co-op has also helped many other young people, as well as older people and new Canadians in the area. Some of them owe their very existence today to their local co-operative. However, this co-op, as is the case with others in Canada today, is finding it very difficult to stay alive, let alone be a threat to big business. As a farmer I have always felt that my co-op was just another machine which did a necessary job and enabled me to carry on my farming operations. I felt that I owned just a little piece of that machine along with about 700 other farmers. I later became president of this co-operative which was and is mainly a farm supply co-operative, along with a large grain business owning probably three of the most modern grain elevators in the country. I might say to western members that from what I know of their elevators, having visited them, ours are even more modern than those in western Canada. The co-operative also has grain dryers and a large storage space which was built in recent years.

Being a member of this co-operative I later became a director of the United Co-Operatives of Ontario which, by the way, elects its directors by a vote of the delegates that are sent to its conventions by the local co-operatives. The procedure is not the same as in some of the big companies which pick their directors from among members of the other place, or in some manner such as that. In the co-operative movement, the directors are elected. This way it is a truly democratic organization and you must take your chances on being elected. I might say that I was a delegate at large and when I ran for a directorship, I was elected by the delegates from all Ontario, not just by those from my own area. I repeat, the directors are not appointed. The United Co-Operatives of Ontario is owned by all the other co-operatives in Ontario. It is mainly a wholesale house for the locals all over Ontario. Some have stated that co-operatives have not being paying their fair share of taxes. Co-operatives have not been paying taxes for many years. Here in Ottawa United Co-Operatives and organizations on which I have had the privilege of serving as a board member, this year provided $350,000 for payment of income taxes, and last year this amount was over $300,000. We hardly consider this to be in the exempt class. If the minister considers this to be exempt, no wonder co-operatives are concerned when they think of what their taxable status might be.

Another point I should like to make, and this is very confusing to me, is that on the one hand the government appeared to be encouraging co-operatives and self-help programs, particularly for Indian and Eskimo housing, and so on. I can remember when the united co-operatives sent one of its personnel skilled in organizing co-operatives to help the Eskimos organize a co-operative. Why then is this government, through its proposed tax legislation, trying to kill established co-operatives, because that is what this will do. Why does the government keep insisting that co-operatives have preferential tax treatment? We do not have such treatment.

The government is concerned about the consumer and keeps a watchful eye on prices and price increases. This is as it should be. I was a member of the consumer affairs committee and I thought this was something we should have been doing years ago. Members of the consumer co-operatives have long been aware of the high prices people have to pay for goods and services. So, on their own initiative they tried to do something about it by forming their own organization, the object being to obtain goods and services at as low a price as possible through an organization under their control. Technically any overcharge is returned to the member as a patronage dividend. The same effect could be obtained by lowering the purchase price in the first instance. Some co-operatives do this now. The direct charge co-operative here in Ottawa offers its members groceries at cost prices and charges them a fee to cover the costs of operation such as rent, staff costs, lights, heat and water. No matter what the method, the principle is the same. The object is to reduce costs and improve the economic well-being of the participants. Why does the government accept the principle in one case and reject it in another through the application of the tax reform bill?

Why does the government insist on taxing co-operatives on the basis of imputed income? Where else in the world has such a concept ever been applied? If such a concept were applied to normal commercial enterprises they would face chaos and disorder. Why then force co-operatives to pay tax on capital employed? Would it not be more practical and make more sense to follow the recommendations of the co-operative people to have a withholding tax or some other method that is at least related to fundamental tax principles?

The principle of double taxation has generally been avoided by the government. In this legislation it is proposed that taxes be imposed on the commercial level, whereas the earnings are also taxable in the hands of the co-operative members when distributed as patronage dividends. I say to the parliamentary secretary that any farmer who does receive a patronage dividend this year from his co-operative is damned lucky because costs are higher and co-operatives are working on lower margins and the farmers are receiving low prices for their grain. For instance, if a farmer receives a patronage dividend as a result of the purchase of fertilizer, that reduces his cost and increases his taxable income. He pays tax on that at his rate. Why should there be double taxation?

The unfairness and inconsistency of the legislation is again shown by the tax on capital employed. In the definition of capital, reserves are included. If a co-operative places taxable earnings in reserves, and then those reserves are used as the basis for the imposition of a further tax that is unfair. This amount which is in reserve could compound itself until it strangled the co-operative. No wonder members of these co-operatives feel they are not receiving equitable treatment under this legislation.

I should refer again to our concern for principle as members of the co-operative movement. I am still a member of a co-operative. If patronage dividends reduce the costs of goods and services in a co-operative or in any other business, why should there be any restriction on this procedure? What recommendations put forward by the co-operatives were unreasonable? This is something I have never understood or been told. Why can we not be told what is wrong with the demand of the co-operatives?

I say to the parliamentary secretary, through you, Mr. Chairman, that I do not know who the minister's advisers are. I know a lot of people but I do not know those who are really advising him on this matter. This is much like writing unsigned letters to the daily newspaper. I have recommended on occasion in letters to the minister that some of his top advisers be fired, with little result.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: I say through you, Mr. Chairman, that if the minister's top adviser on credit unions and co-operatives is the person to whom I just referred, I again recommend that he be fired. If the advice is coming from some of the subordinates I do not know, I recommend that they be fired also.

An hon. Member: Fire the lot of them.

Mr. Whelan: It is more difficult to get rid of a civil servant than a backbencher, because top civil servants are here forever and backbenchers come and go like the wind. If we pass this legislation in its present form, when this backbencher goes he will go in the damndest storm you ever saw.

I also want to say that Carter and all those other so-called smart people can make all the recommendations and reports they want. I remember who appointed Carter to make this report. However, the Members of Parliament are the ones who are elected to run this country, and I know that the majority of the Members of Parliament are not in favour of taxation for co-operatives and credit unions in the manner presently suggested.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (12.20 p.m.)

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I have been very interested in the remarks made by the Liberal backbencher from Essex on this matter.

An hon. Member: An outstanding member.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He should be on the front bench.

Mr. Peters: It seems to me he has pointed out the problem which faces us without becoming involved in all the detail and the complex arguments which have been made by the parliamentary secretary. After listening to him, I am impelled to ask the parliamentary secretary what we have done about the churches. Have we decided to tax the income of all churches? I remember when I was a small child my father spent a good deal of his time organizing the co-operative movement all across northern Ontario. He organized one for the government of Ontario which was very much like to a religious organization. He believed the people should get together and should work together in a specific field to set up a co-op. He established a creamery co-op in an area where there was no market for the producer's cream. He established a co-op for a group of farmers in the Kapuskasing area. He organized a number of co-operatives for people pretty much in the manner the hon. member for Essex described. He believed people should be able to help themselves. He believed they could help themselves if they were provided with certain background material that would allow them to organize together and to work together to help themselves. No co-operative was ever established for the purpose of making money. Co-operatives are established only for the purpose of helping their members.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peters: It has always been necessary for a co-operative to establish a limited amount of capital, sometimes in order to buy equipment. A little co-op was started in Ottawa which probably is a good example. A group of people decided to get together and donate their time. They did so and established a grocery co-op. They did not have a paid cashier or paid manager. No one was to be paid. This co-op obtained a small building, went to a wholesaler and purchased the material for the co-op. Then, these people started distributing the commodities in the store to themselves. One person volunteered to work today, another volunteered to work the next day and so on. No money was involved. Pretty soon, however, it was found that there was a certain amount of breakage and, I suppose there were losses in other ways. It was found a charge of about 1 per cent was necessary in order to cover these losses.

Then, this group found they needed a refrigerator and the problem was, how to get a refrigerator. Do you go to the Salvation Army and ask for a charitable donation? They wanted to do things themselves, so they had to raise a little capital to buy a refrigerator. In addition, it was decided it would be advantageous to add to the equipment in the store. This was a very basic co-op. In the beginning, as I say, a number of people got together and decided to serve their own ends. In some cases this necessitates the accumulation of capital and the investment of it.

If this government is honest, which is not likely, perhaps it will tell us what it is doing in respect of the churches. Some church organizations might own perhaps 1,000 houses in a city, the income from which is plowed back into the church operation. Are these churches taxed? No. The government does not have the guts to tax the churches. The municipalities do not have the guts to tax the churches. Some people may also say that the organized religions of this country have been able to buy churches because most people in this country have decided they have the right to organize themselves for their own purpose, not in a manner that would hurt anyone else, not a competitive manner, but only to serve their own ends. In many cases these churches have amassed, over a very long period of time, a very large amount of capital, and because of circumstances have a very rich portfolio of real estate.

The co-op is in the same position. It does not pay patronage dividends to someone who is not a member. I am not paid any dividends, although I belong to several co-ops. I have shares in a co-operative but because I do not deal there I am not paid any dividends. I do not deal there simply because this is a farmer's co-op and I do not have any reason to buy food for cattle or wire for fencing. I really have no reason to be dealing with that co-op and therefore do not receive any dividends. That is the way it should be. The people who deal in that co-op, and are members of it, have combined together to produce for themselves an amount of capital that will supply them with a service.

If co-operatives were competitive, and if over the years they had been given an advantage, why would Coldpac not have been able to deal with Canada Packers and Swifts as well as others. Coldpac was in Barrie for a number of years, but because of the structure it had and its inability to build up capital assets it went broke. This happens much too often in the co-operative movement. I know of no co-operative that has been able to amass a very large amount of money. If there are dividends in the operation, whether it be farming, a grocery store or whatever, those dividends in the hands of the person receiving them represent income on which he would pay a tax, because obviously he would have other income as well.

I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary why the government is picking on the co-ops which all his backbenchers will tell him are self-help organizations. Why has the government picked on them if it is not doing the same thing in respect of the churches, which in many cases are in the real estate business. We have churches in Ottawa having a congregation of 15 or 20 people which own property worth $2 million or $3 million. There must be a certain amount of return from that eventually. The municipality does not impose any taxes on these churches, and if it did such a small group of people would not be able to pay the taxes. They are not taxed municipally, they are not taxed provincially and they are not taxed federally. Another self-help organization, the co-operative movement, has been taxed over the years municipally, provincially and federally. What we are suggesting is that if one self-help organization is to be taxed the other agencies, as Carter would have suggested, should be taxed because a buck is a buck. Are the churches being subjected to the same type of taxes as the other self-help organization, such as the co-operative movement?

I intend to obtain an answer in this regard from the parliamentary secretary, so he might as well answer now. As you know, Mr. Chairman, as long as there is an intervening speaker we have the right to speak as often as we are recognized by the Chair, so if I do not receive an answer before this debate is over I shall probably participate a number of times because I would like an answer.

[Translation]

Mr. LeBlanc (Rimouski): Mr. Chairman, I welcome the opportunity of expressing my views and above all calling for clarification of the provisions of the bill to amend the Income Tax Act affecting credit unions and co-operatives.

The legislation deeply concerns my constituents in the riding of Rimouski, as indeed it concerns all other Canadians.

Far be it from me, Mr. Chairman, to claim I can deal with the subject as an expert. I must humbly confess that as a layman in this field I must rely on assumptions.

The provisions of the Income Tax Act now before us and, for that matter, many others, are rather complex in the view of the ordinary citizen. Only insiders, experts or bookkeepers in the department or in private enterprise or economists can with any authority deal with this matter. In any event, I am sure that on the whole, a great number of people need a lot of explanations.

The success of Caisses populaires and cooperatives is of great concern to me. I am wondering like many other hon. members where this legislation will lead us, although some amendments have recently been introduced to improve it in the area of co-operation.

One of my friends, a manager of a Caisse populaire, got in touch with me recently, and said: "I am happy to find that Bill C-259 has been somewhat improved, and I have no doubt that it is due to the information given to every Member of Parliament by the co-operative movement."

However, during a longer talk he gave me his views on the whole problem. As we all know, ever since the introduction of Bill C-259 in the House, general dissatisfaction has been shown by our friends in the Caisses populaires and co-operatives. The changes announced on October 28 by the minister met their wishes in part.

At the beginning, the co-operatives were apparently not happy because they feared they would have to pay too much taxes. Of course, as an hon. member stated yesterday, nobody is happy when it comes to paying taxes. We all agree that taxes are too high.

But if, because of too heavy taxes the disappearance of co-operatives or Caisses populaires can be anticipated, that is another story. It might be said that not only the Caisses populaires but also their members will be penalized. They feel that is not progress but rather a backward step.

When the amendments were announced some expressed their satisfaction. Improvements have been made. For example, I think of the period of 16 years instead of eight allowed to reach the $400,000 limit. Thus a lesser amount of money is required from the Caisses populaires than under the initial proposals and more heed is paid to the provincial legislation requiring a certain level of reserves, namely for Caisses populaires.

From what I have been able to conclude from this conversation there is still a certain amount of dissatisfaction and concern. The Caisses populaires are not against paying taxes but they want to keep on going. That is the reason for their concern. They are said to compete with large business and should bear a fair tax burden. I wonder whether this competition is so serious since it is said that the major Caisses populaires, at least in my single region, have assets of $20 million. On the other hand, as regards the assets of certain banks, we note that those of the Provincial Bank of Canada, for instance, would amount to $1 billion, which is a lot compared to $20 million and it seems there is no possible comparison between what could be called the Caisses' income, as it is said that, theoretically, they have no income, and that of the banks.

In a way one may say that the Caisses are not doing big business. The people they do business with are middle class people and also poor people, farmers, people we wish to help by every possible means. Indirectly, we should take care not to inconvenience the farmers or the poor by hampering the growth of the Caisses populaires and co-operatives.

For instance the big companies we need in Canada, like ALCAN and the CPR, do not do business with the Caisses populaires. On the other hand, one must admit that the deposits of the Caisses' members do not go to the banks.

One could also add that trusts are much more important than caisses populaires.

[Mr. LeBlanc (Rimouski).]

I am wondering if the question of competition is not debatable. I would add that in theory caisses populaires should operate on a cost basis to be logical since they are said to be non-profit organizations and I think that from a practical point of view that would be impossible because of the unforeseeable elements involved. The fact remains that banks operate to bring profits to their shareholders, and that is quite normal. I am not against profits.

Finally, I think the federal legislation should fully recognize the requirements of provincial legislation with regard to statutory reserves because it seems to me that those statutory reserves do not belong to the co-ops or the caisses populaires as would be the case for ordinary public corporations but rather to the shareholders who are themselves subject to taxation.

The problems which co-ops and caisses populaires are faced with are very similar. Theoretically, instead of having those tax measures applied immediately, according to what I was told recently by co-op members, they will be applied gradually in the course of a ten-year period. It is like storing the virus they fear for ten years and freeing it after that period of time. Will the evil that is being hidden today not come back in ten years?

Co-ops and caisses populaires are prepared to pay but they fear that the methods used could mean their destruction. They have no objection against paying taxes but just as to the methods used.

To a certain extent, as I said a while ago, the money in the hands of the co-ops belongs to the middle class, to the small people, to the poor and it is being fed back to them. And we want to protect the poor.

I can hardly understand, when comparing the non-profit corporations, that also have a non-taxable capital employed which, I do believe, should not be taxed, to the co-operatives and the caisses populaires, why the latter, being also non-profit organizations, should be taxed. For that matter, they should be treated with great consideration for income tax purposes. We must consider the help they have given to middle class people, and especially to the poor, as well as their contribution to the economic progress of Canada. For that reason, I join with the co-operative members, those who are active in the caisses populaires movement and hon. members who have pleaded their cause, to ask the government to listen carefully to our requests so that the caisses pooulaires and co-operatives will not be placed before insoluble problems, but allowed to pursue their development, for the good of their members and that of Canada as a whole.

• (12:40 p.m.)

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Chairman, this is my first intervention in this long debate on this bill. I have been reluctant to move into the discussion on this immense bill. I spent a good many years in the study of economics but no one ever assigned me a document so challenging, so confusing, and so overwhelming as this bill. Hence my trepidation in speaking about it. It also struck me that this was the ideal type of legislation for a standing committee rather than for the committee of the whole.

I thought the hon. member for Essex was a bit unworthy when he began his speech by suggesting that some people were making remarks because they thought it might be to their political advantage to talk about co-operatives. I thought that was a bit unworthy, but he improved towards the end of his speech when he called for the resignation of everybody from the Minister of Finance and the parliamentary secretary on down. Whether I can be so unkind as to go along totally with that, I do not know. I cannot speak too authoritatively on the question which the hon. member for Timiskaming raised so powerfully because I do not belong to one of those churches which is so well off. My usual communication from my church is a regular appeal for a little more help to keep them out of the sheriff's maw, so to speak.

I cannot refrain from saying a word about this particular section because I come from a part of the country in which the co-operative movement and the credit union movement have had a glorious history. Not long ago in South Rustico, Prince Edward Island, there was dedicated by the Historic Sites and Monuments Board the building which housed the first credit union in North America. That little community in South Rustico has had a wonderful history of co-operatives and credit unions. There are many of these all over the Atlantic provinces. One of the great men, I suppose, in the whole range of Canadian history would be Monseigneur Coady, the founder of the Coady Institute at St. Francis Xavier University in Antigonish, who initiated and inspired a series of community betterment programs which probably did more to improve the lives of people in the Maritime provinces, especially in Cape Breton, than any piece of legislation that any group of legislators ever passed.

The co-operative movement has done great things for the fishermen, for the farmers and for others. I was always impressed by what could properly be called the social value of the co-operatives, especially the many small co-operatives which have literally helped the little communities in the Maritime provinces pull themselves up by their boot straps.

As I was preparing for this debate I ran across a memorandum which I thought very succinctly set the co-operatives in their proper perspective, a part of which reads:

> Co-operatives are different forms of enterprise, primarily because of their objectives. They are "self-help" organizations (incidentally always Canadian and locally owned) that are generally found in primary production areas, viz grain, dairy, farm products, fishing industry and the merchandizing carried on largely serves these industries although some co-ops are found in urban centres that serve city people . . .
> Co-operatives usually serve members whose income level is below average. This should be sufficient reason to encourage their self-help efforts.

On that point of view, I note that others have a similar reaction.

The amendments that have been brought forward to this bill and on these sections—and it takes time to count them, let alone read them or understand them—have had some ameliorating effects and to that extent they are welcome. However, I cannot accept any changes in the taxation structure which will make it harder for the co-operatives and credit unions to function in those roles and in the manner in which they have been carrying on over these many years. I do not belong to any co-operative; I never did. I do not belong to a credit union, but I do not want to be a willing pallbearer for any type of funeral arranged for them through this legislation.

My colleagues have made some helpful and useful contributions. I do not believe in any debate, and certainly not in this kind of debate, in repeating what someone else has said just as well as I could have said it. The hon. member for Moncton made a most excellent speech yesterday as the first spokesman for our party on these sections. He is a very fine economist. His economics training showed extremely well yesterday. Something else showed, too, and that is that he knows the practical problems of practical people living out their daily lives in the Atlantic region and in the rest of Canada. I commend his speech, especially to all who are interested in this particular aspect of the bill.

I have always been impressed, apart from their social value, about the whole matter of Canadian content of co-operatives, and I think that requires more emphasis than it has been accorded so far. Here we are in paroxysms of uncertainty, if nothing worse, about foreign ownership, but here is a viable, useful segment of our economy which is excluded from this aspect of foreign ownership of our economy. I repeat that this is at a time of anxiety over that particular question, and yet there is no reason we should be concerned about it. I ask that the good suggestions that have been made by my colleagues, with their expertise in this field, be taken into consideration.

I want to commend the co-operatives. Someone said that we get pressure from the co-operatives and that they have become a pressure group. I have the highest regard for the manner in which co-operatives and credit unions have marshalled their arguments, and I may say that the arguments which I receive from the co-operative organizations of Canada, from the Maritimes, from Prince Edward Island, surpass in comprehension the bill itself and all the amendments introduced by the minister. I knew exactly what they meant. They made their case abundantly clear and I think they made a very good case. I believe that is what the public bodies should be doing, presenting their case clearly. It is not iniquitous lobbying and it is not unfair pressure. In my opinion, it is the very finest form of enlightenment on a difficult matter. These are the people who know the situation and they share their knowledge with the Members of Parliament. I cannot recall any argument which they put forward which looked as if they were seeking special treatment. I think co-ops have done a very fine job in presenting their case.

I congratulate my colleagues who have spoken so eloquently on this matter and I join with them. Since I am a laconic man of few words, I will rest my case at this moment.

[Translation]

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to have the opportunity of stating my party's views and of commenting on the kind of treatment we wish to be applied to Caisses populaires and credit unions. I would like to draw a picture of the exact situation of credit unions and large corporations and to prove, by means of supporting tables and statistics, that the large organizations and corporations accumulate huge profits by comparison with Caisses populaires.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to state my point of view on the precise aim of this legislation and its possible consequences in the years to come on the development of Caisses populaires in Canada, and particularly in Québec, where these organizations play a most important part for the benefit of a large section of the population.

Mr. Chairman, before taxing caisses populaires, which are considered non-profit institutions since their shareholders never enjoy the invested capital as compared with that invested in banks or other financial or industrial institutions, it has to be shown that it will not be done to prejudice their development or to punish them, because they can compete with banks and other financial institutions of a capitalistic nature whose aim is profit for itself.

The primary objective of caisses populaires is to provide service to their members, not earnings from invested capital. That is the basic distinction one must consider before imposing the same taxes on co-operatives and caisses populaires as on companies, banks and other institutions whose responsibility is limited but whose profits are limitless, whose capitalization is also limitless through numerous legal formulas that have become their exclusive privileges, which privileges are not accessible to co-operatives and caisses populaires which deal only with their members or in restricted areas, whether parochial or municipal, while the large capitalistic corporations can operate on a provincial, national and international basis.

Does that situation not warrant special consideration, special evaluation when time comes to take away the meagre profits required by caisses populaires and co-operatives to guarantee their proper and prosperous administration and forcing them to operate in the red through tax measures both annoying and detrimental?

I love Canada, my country. Far from me the idea of criticizing at random or without rhyme or reason. Throughout my lifetime, I have resorted to the services of banks and credit unions, services which both kinds of thriving organizations offer to all citizens at different levels of economic activity. I am proud of the good understanding between both co-operative and capitalistic institutions under the supreme authority of the governments and which are also conservative as regards certain utilitarian operations for various classes of society.

May I point out, Mr. Chairman, that it is one o'clock?

[English]

The Chairman: Would there be agreement in committee that we might call it one o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2 p.m.

[Mr. Latulippe.]

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Chairman, as I was saying before lunch, I grant that good will and guarantees of success and growth should be maintained as regards these two categories of institutions, but if this must be, tax reforms should not reduce profit opportunities for the caisses populaires. They are far from enjoying the same latitude as chartered banks concerning competition related to services which they provide to people.

In this regard, Mr. Chairman, one should see how the capitalization of chartered banks and caisses populaires has increased from 1900 to 1934 and from 1967 to 1971. If 1900 marks the beginning of this century and of the caisses populaires, 1934 marks that of the Bank of Canada at the top of the whole banking system. It was in 1967 that the latest changes were made to the chartered banks, the caisses populaires and the near banks, insofar as their relations with the federal government are concerned.

I do not want to be too long, but one should remember, Mr. Chairman, that the money supply increased from $24 billion to over $36 billion from 1968 to 1971. This is no joking matter, Mr. Chairman, an increase of $12 billion in the money supply, in our banking system, in the last four years; the increase was of $24 billion during the years that followed the establishment of our banking system and of $12 billion—that is over 50 per cent—from 1968 to 1971 inclusively. That is that as far as the money supply, bank deposits and money in circulation are concerned.

What was the small share of the caisses populaires in the last four years? Not even an increase of half a billion dollars. So that the caisses populaires may continue to be of service to the people, we must not tax them further nor must we reduce further their chances of making reasonable, appropriate and sufficient profits to at least remain in operation. Besides co-operatives we have large companies, big financial establishments and chartered banks which have a lot more opportunities to grow, to make profits and build reserves as well as to increase their capitalization while paying their taxes and making money for their shareholders. Whatever his position in society, the individual must learn to live with royal commissions of inquiry, with the famous white papers, with a 707-page bill like the one now before the House. And what about the 599 pages of amendments and supplementary explanations and the Carter report with its 2600 pages? If the Canadian citizen wishes for a just society in a united Canada I earnestly urge hon. members, before they complete the study on banks and Caisses populaires taxation, to read the tables shown on pages 1234 and 1239 of the 1970-71 Canada Yearbook, dealing with chartered banks and Caisses Populaires.

It contains the following figures. Caisses populaires have an equity capital of $1,328 million and chartered banks of $303,758,000. Caisses Populaires and chartered banks have reserves amounting respectively to $185 million and $1,189,126,000. Caisses Populaires have $4.64 billion in capital assets and chartered banks, $42,578,338,000.

Mr. Chairman, caisses populaires have accumulated $4 billion in capital assets and reserves of $185 million on $1,328 million invested capital. Banks have accumulated capital assets of $42,578 million and reserves of $1,189 million on $303 million invested capital. Banks assets increased 140 times while those of the caisses populaires increased only 3 times.

This is very important. It shows that our Caisses Populaires have not made as much money because they do not have the same organization. They do not enjoy the same advantages as the chartered banks do. Caisses Populaires shares are worth about $5, yield 6 per cent interest per year and retain their nominal value. Chartered banks shares are all worth $2, but they yield dividends of about 70 per cent a year while they are worth between $14 and $28 each on the Montreal, Toronto or Vancouver stock exchanges.

Therefore, we can see the difference that exists between Caisses Populaires and banks, between co-operatives and capitalist corporations. Should they be treated in the same manner for income tax purposes? We have noticed that banks are making greater and quicker progress as far as their total assets are concerned since the last review in 1967 of the Bank Act, following the Porter inquiry. Their assets now come close to $52 billion, which is an increase of some $10 billion over the past two years.

In one year only, bank assets increased by over $5 billion and that one annual increase absorbs at one fell swoop the whole $4 billion accumulated since 1900 by Caisses populaires and credit unions.

Even though Canada admittedly is a country which belongs in the capitalistic group, its duty is to protect the orthodox banking system. These few notes and remarks clearly show that the progress of caisses populaires does not and should not raise any fears among the defenders and protectors of the Canadian banking system. If we recognize that banks and caisses play a necessary and complementary role for the people of our prosperous country who benefit from both systems, it is up to us, as members of the House and ministers, to see that the caisses populaires are allowed to continue to play their meaningful role with the support of the federal government.

Since we have realized the difference between large and small financial interests, I think that it would be advisable for us to stop one moment before concluding too quickly the consideration of Bill C-259. It is necessary to examine the general situation of our Canadian economy which has widened since the last war the gap between the rich who become richer and the poor who become poorer.

If we are all conscious of the great lack of economic balance which prevails in Canada on account of inflation, unemployment, poverty, insecurity, continuing increases in taxation, debts and interests on capital borrowed to finance provincial governments, municipalities, Hydro-Quebec, Ontario-Hydro, or other Crown corporations, why not solve the tax problem by a complete restoration of the economic balance between all the constituent elements of our national heritage, between all capitalistic and co-operative institutions, between the industrial and commercial institutions of free enterprise and small industries, small businesses and small enterprise?

Every member knows that tax reform alone will not solve all the problems nor get our economy out of its present confused state. The more the government's revenues increase, the more the government's budget grows and the more the taxpayer's budget decreases. Therefore the result of the government's budget is to diminish that of the small taxpayers. Many of them have no more money; they depend on social welfare. This is the same as robbing Peter to pay Paul.

There is no practical solution to it. Overall taxation reforms like those before us now will not solve the problem. In order to solve it and give our economy a new logical and proper balance, we should reduce taxes, lighten the taxpayer's burden so as to give him more power through caisses populaires and those institutions serving the people.

I have shown that caisses populaires do not make any profit, but the banks do: 46.6 times more.

Mr. Chairman, it is therefore logical in these circomstances that our leaders step in and that all hon. members speak out. When public institutions have to be protected, nothing is neglected. Institutions such as our caisses populaires deserve our protection and all possible measures likely to help them, since they serve the poor people, the middle class, those unable to obtain chartered bank loans.

Mr. Chairman, the caisses populaires were created because the larger institutions would not serve ordinary people. Such people were refused the services they needed and the caisses populaires intervened to provide those services to them.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, without discussing in specific ways apples or plums today, this section of the income tax bill deals with co-operatives and provides some of the lemons the Minister of Finance is going to offer the whole co-operative movement if the sections of this bill pass unamended. Since we are talking about different varieties of fruit—co-operatives in my area of Nova Scotia have a lot to do with fruit—we have the opportunity to speak on the question of co-operatives.

I am not going to discuss in very much detail the problems of credit unions; other members have done this. Some of the amendments the minister has brought forward have softened the impact of the proposals affecting credit unions. The minister is also to be given some credit for having brought forward further amendments to soften even more the impact of the proposals relating to co-operatives. But the first amendments still do not come to grips with the basic problem these proposals create.

In the area of Nova Scotia where I come from co-operatives have contributed in a most constructive way to the life of the community, and it is all too easy to appreciate the concern of those directly engaged in the co-operative movement and those vicariously involved in or with co-operatives at the problems that may be created by these proposals. Many members in this chamber during the committee hearings these last days, when we have been talking about co-operatives have philosophized about the basis of the co-operative movement. Some have said it is a step on the road to socialism. Others have said it is like a business and should be taxed as such. That is what the minister's proposals are doing; co-operatives are being treated as a corporate entity.

Without getting into the semantics of political philosophy, I do believe the co-operative movement is a form of capitalism in the widest sense which allows average Canadians in their own communities to own something that ordinarily they could not afford, namely to own a share in a co-operative so the co-operative can provide a service to them and others, thus enhancing community life. It seems rather paradoxical to me that a minister should, with no stated justification or apparent reason, bring in fundamental changes to the operation of the co-operative movement, which has been flourishing in Canada since the forties, thus adversely affecting, in the minds of those in the co-operative movement, a segment of society which is perhaps the most bona fide, true-blue part of Canadian society that we have.

Many members of this House have been talking about economic nationalism. Newspaper editorials also put the case for and against economic nationalism. In the co-operative movement Canadians who own a significant part of Canada are working in the best interests of Canada, and they fear that these proposals are going, if not to completely suffocate, at least to stifle the operations of co-operatives. These Canadians in local communities are participating in a meaningful way, exercising some initiative, using the incentive of the patronage dividend, knowing they are part of an entity that they own, yet being faced with proposals that adversely affect the co-operative movement.

We have heard tales in other days during this debate about capital gains taxes. We have heard how the corporate tax field will be plugged up. We are going to discuss on Monday aspects of international income and the revison of arrangements in this tax field with other countries. On this matter there have been some explanations from the ministry. One can agree with them or disagree, but at least there have been some stated objectives and usually facts to back up the objectives. But as far as this section dealing with the co-operative movement in Canada is concerned, we have not had any cogent reasons given by the minister as to why he is upsetting a very large segment of what I say is likely the truest, bluest form of Canadian society from the entrepreneurial point of view that we have in Canada. Unless there is some justification from the minister on this matter, I do not see why members should give the minister what is almost a blank cheque to makes the changes proposed in this section.

Other members at other times have talked about the irrelevancy of parts of the bill that have gone through a ten year gestation period, from the days of the Carter commission, the studies, papers, briefs and documents that flooded therefrom, to their inclusion in Bill C-259 today. But if there is any part of the bill to which the argument of irrelevancy should apply, I suggest most sincerely it is to the co-operatives phase of the bill, in regard to which there have been no explanations, facts or figures of reasons given by the minister to justify the changes.

Some might infer that he is trying to plug up our tax laws because of the way co-operatives allegedly play around with patronage dividends or the capital they use, but there are those who feel apprehensive that the purpose of the change is to destroy the co-operative movement in Canada. If that is the case, then again I do not think members should accept without some further explanations such a fundamental disaster that will befall the co-operative movement in Canada.

If anyone has been misled into believing that co-operatives themselves are completely against taxation, this is not so. Obviously no one wants to be taxed. Everyone likes to avoid tax. In fact, avoidance of tax is quite permissible under the Income Tax Act regulations. It is when you try to evade taxes that you get into trouble. The co-operatives themselves know they have a social responsibility to be taxed and they are quite prepared to be taxed. This "mythology" that this is a privileged group that does want to be exposed to the pain of taxation I suggest is false and misleading, for they themselves have advanced a proposal under which they will be taxed. This proposal, I am informed, was advanced to the ministry by The Co-operative Union of Canada on October 29. The co-operatives proposed that their members receive the annual earnings resulting from business done with the members, with any earnings retained in the hands of the co-operatives taxed at the corporate rate. This proposal is a very definite and real form of taxation and was, as I say, advanced by the co-operative union to the ministry.

They also put forward some restrictions and conditions which were outlined in the proposal and which I propose to repeat here. The proposal was subject to the following restrictions and conditions:

1) That there be paid by the co-operative a withholding tax on all distributions made by way of a patronage refund.

2) That the withholding tax paid in respect to patronage refunds be creditable toward the recipient's personal tax. If the recipient is not taxable for some reason, the withholding tax will be refundable upon filing the usual tax return.

3) That the payment of patronage refunds be limited to the extent of income derived from member business and that any income derived from non-member business be taxed at the appropriate corporate rate, unless patronage refunds are paid to both members and non-members.

4) Any surplus remaining in the co-operative after making distributions by the co-operative, shall be taxed in the hands of the co-operative at an appropriate rate of corporate tax.

In their own submission to the minister, they were quite ready to advance a proposal through which they would be subject to a very meaningful tax. Certainly, if there is not a positive response to this proposal, and at the moment I gather there has not been such a response, then we, in the committee of the whole, should do nothing further than maintain the status quo. Basically we have a situation in which private business, the co-operative sector and the government have learned to live together and have worked out certain principles and terms of relationship in various areas. Without a reason being given by the minister, I do not think we should upset these relationships by these proposals presently in the tax bill.

I may receive some catcalls, I suppose, but regardless of political philosophy, I am all for change where necessity dictates change, but when the change is not indicated by necessity, fact or figure then there should not be change just for the sake of change. I believe very seriously that those who drafted these proposals did not understand the fundamental concept of the co-operative movement or what it is all about. That is one of the difficulties or dilemmas that confront us in debating this proposal, because in the words of the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton, we are comparing plums and grapefruit.

We can talk about a variety of different fruits including grapefruit, lemons, apples and plums, just as we can talk about many forms of entrepreneurial enterprises. A co-operative movement is one, a corporation is another and the C.N.R. and Air Canada are another form. However, when you try to apply the same philosophical principle to Air Canada that applies to a private enterprise or corporate structure, it is like trying to find some similarity between grapefruit and lemons or apples and plums. That is just what is happening here in sections of this bill. These proposals do not distinguish fundamentally between the co-operative movement and an ordinary corporate entity.

As I said earlier, in my area of the country just about every town has a viable local co-operative of one form or another. There are many credit unions in the Annapolis Valley and throughout Nova Scotia. The hon. member for Hillsborough said this morning, there was a man called Dr. Coady at St. Xavier University who is famous for his work in the co-operative movement. He was the initiator of the famous Coady Institute. The book that outlines his history is entitled, "The Man from Margaree." He was known as a man who contributed to areas far beyond the confines of the relatively small area in which he worked, lived and died. His contribution to the co-operative movement stretched not just from coast to coast but to the international scene as well. Thus, I feel perhaps a little more emotionally involved and concerned about what is happening and what may happen to the co-operative movement after these changes than I might otherwise. I had the privilege of meeting Dr. Coady. I know others who knew him better than I did, but in view of the fact that this great Canadian did so much for so many with so few chances to make a contribution, his contributions should have been recognized even more than I think it was at the time.

While I talk about Nova Scotia and the fact that the co-operative movement has a very real history in that Atlantic area, it obviously goes far beyond that. The statistics from the Department of Agriculture for 1969 show there were 2,373 co-operatives in Canada with 1,690,000 members. That is not a mean or small group of Canadians. I believe most of the members are from the so-called rural areas of Canada, certainly small towns, villages and other rural parts of our society, but that does not mean that co-operatives do not exist in urban centres. The contribution of these co-operatives has resulted in the distribution of many products, including a lot of fruit, grain and potatoes.

When we talk about the co-operative movement we are talking about something that perhaps does not directly affect people in the city, but does directly affect people in the rural areas. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance sits there swinging his little hearing aid. I am glad he is doing something to show some life, because there has not been much life shown or much interest in listening to some of the constructive suggestions from members of all parties, including his own.

The hon. member for Essex had the intestinal fortitude to stand in the House and say what he thought about this bill. He sits over in the government ranks, but I do not know how close he will be to the government following his speech this morning. There are other members in the House on both sides who have said what they thought about this bill. I will not embarrass those on the government side by mentioning them, but they have strongly condemned this theoretical, unworkable and impractical suggestion which affects co-operatives, particularly as there has been no stated reason for the change. The parliamentary secretary is showing some life, and perhaps I can stir him even more by suggesting we have had three series of amendments. On October 22 we were given 96 amendments, on October 29 we were given 28 more and on November 16 we had 8 more. We now have amendments to the amendments to the amendments.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I hope as the hon. member continues his remarks he will reconcile his statement that we have not paid any attention to the serious recommendations on the one hand with his criticism of the number of amendments which have been presented as a result on the other hand.

Mr. Nowlan: The parliamentary secretary has raised a point that is at least interesting, and which I will attempt to answer. He knows as well as I do that the first batch of amendments, numbering 96, were presented the first day we started to debate this bill, long before he heard some of the reasonable suggestions from this side.

Mr. Mahoney: They have been on the table all summer.

Mr. Nowlan: There has to be some credit given. Some of the amendments affecting credit unions did go a long way towards resolving some of the dilemmas which would be created if the original legislation had gone through unamended, but the parliamentary secretary tells us that these amendments were brought in as a result of the reasonable suggestions from members of the opposition. I would like him to point out, apart from the very technical amendments, one amendment that was the result of a suggestion by the opposition. These amendments were required because of the sloppy draftsmanship to be found in the original bill. The legislation could not possibly work without the amendments. I do not want to digress any further from that point.

Mr. Mahoney: I bet you don't.

Mr. Nowlan: There have not been any substantive or meaningful amendments to this bill since this debate started.

• (2:40 p.m.)

Mr. Mahoney: Wrong.

Mr. Nowlan: If there have been, let him stand in his place and tell me. Let us get away from this digression. I hope it is not taken from my time. I know I have only 20 minutes in which to speak and many members are excited and interested in participating in this debate because it concerns the fundamental matter of the kind of society in which we want to live. The minister, unfortunately, in drafting this bill has not—

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I could just finish this sentence.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The hon. member may continue only if he has the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nowlan: It would appear that in drafting Bill C-259 and the later amendments, the simple nature of the method of operation of a co-operative, and the essential difference in its position and capital structure from that of an ordinary corporation, has been given little or no attention or has not been understood. Considering the many objections to the government's treatment of the co-operatives, it would seem that the government has adopted an attitude in respect of the co-operatives which is almost an anti-business attitude. The government would appear to be adapting its anti-business attitude to the co-operatives. It has an anti-business and anti-co-operative attitude. This is the attitude of the government as shown by its stubborn refusal to adopt any other position in respect of the proposals in this bill. I do not want to trespass further upon the good nature of many members in this House, but I hope I shall have an opportunity to finish my speech later.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Gloucester.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I would like to put a question to the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) to get something straight in my mind.

Several hon. members have stated yesterday—

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member rose on a point of order and he cannot ask a question since the Chair has recognized the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau).

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. Things are happening and I think that there is—

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Richmond is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Chairman, I think someone said yesterday that the amendment would grant the co-operatives a ten-year period of progressive taxation before full taxation. Could the Secretary of State tell me if this is true?

Mr. Clermont: Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of State is not in attendance. The bill is presently seen through by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney).

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. This is not a point of order but only a question. The hon. member cannot ask his question since I have already recognized the hon. member for Gloucester.

[English]

Mr. Breau: Mr. Chairman, first of all I should like to respond to the remarks of my friend from Annapolis Valley. At times he is very constructive, but when he says the government has not paid any attention to the objections of the co-operative organizations I do not think he is quite accurate. As a matter of fact, with the capital employed concept, I believe the government has gone a long way—

Some hon. Members: Come on.

Mr. Breau: I should like the members who say "come on" to stand up and tell me what the government has done within the capital employed concept which does not go a long way towards meeting the suggestions of the co-operatives. If they say that, then they have not spoken to the co-operatives because the co-operatives accept the fact that the government has gone very far in staying within the capital employed concept.

An hon. Member: That is the objection.

Mr. Breau: Probably some members cannot understand this concept and the mechanics of the taxation system. I would appreciate it if they would listen to my remarks which might enlighten them a little. There are two questions here. First of all, if we accept the amendment of the hon. member for Regina East, I wonder if there would be a difference in the taxable revenue to the treasury, because if there is that is one matter. The second question is the long standing one, which is not necessarily changed in this bill, that is should we or should we not in the taxation system have a capital employed mechanism for co-operatives.

I should like to know from the parliamentary secretary or the Minister of Finance if there would be a difference in the taxation revenue to the treasury if the proposal of the co-operatives, which I believe is about the same thing as the amendment of the hon. member for Regina East, were adopted. I am sure there cannot be any administrative problem because the amount of patronage dividends that would go to taxpayers on which they would have to declare income tax would be minimal. Assuming, therefore, there is not a difference in the taxation revenue, or only a slight change, it would seem to me that this debate should be on the question of whether or not there should be a capital employed concept.

To tell the truth, I never really understood the rationale a capital employed concept. It would seem to me that if we had it, it would be for two reasons. First of all, it would be because private interests or people more oriented toward private business applied political pressure to see, in cases where they compete with private businesses, that co-operatives would pay taxes in an amount equivalent to those paid by private business. The second reason could be that we simply want the co-operative to pay more taxes. I believe this is a very complicated formula. It is one which many private citizens do not understand. If there is no loss of revenue, I think we should accept the proposals of the co-operatives because I do not believe we should retain at this time a formula as complicated as the capital employed concept simply because we want to appease big business which believes it has to compete with the co-operative movement.

Many members are involved with the problem, but we do not have the facts in front of us. I should like to know from the officials, through the parliamentary secretary, if they have calculated whether there would be a loss of revenue. It would seem to me, even with the safeguard of one third of the taxable income and the concession made concerning people who declare their patronage refunds at the end of the year, this would be quite a source of revenue to the treasury. So, if there is no difference in the taxation revenue to the treasury, there would seem to be no justifiable reason for retaining the capital employed concept. On the contrary, I think everything is against such a complicated formula because the people dealing with co-operatives are mainly private citizens who do not know very much about the taxation system. Why complicate it for them? I do not see any administrative problem, as I mentioned a while ago.

If you look at the number of taxpayers who receive patronage refunds on which they have to pay taxes, that is those who receive such refunds as a result of purchases, the number would be very small indeed. I am referring to those who receive refunds of under $100. If that is the case, all that would have to be done by national revenue would be to say to the co-operatives "you will withhold taxes. You send refunds to everybody, but only hold taxes after the patronage refunds have reached a certain limit". It must be possible to look at the statistics for the past few years and find out the percentage of taxpayers receiving patronage refunds and what amount they receive. It would be administratively simple to say "send them to everyone, but only withhold taxes after a certain amount of refunds has been reached".

I really cannot see that there will be a loss to the treasury. If there is a loss to the treasury by accepting the proposals of the co-operatives, I am ready to listen to that argument. That would change the picture. After all, somebody in this country has to pay taxes if we are to provide public services. If we went to a co-op oriented economy, co-ops would have to pay more taxes. However, I do not think that is the case. I do not think that anybody in a responsible position would say that co-ops compete unfairly with private business. I have seen how co-operatives operate. The type of competition they provide has brought about social justice as well as patronage dividends. In areas of the Maritime provinces, where there are co-ops, the price of fish is higher than in communities where there is only private business.

There is a social need for co-operatives. I do not think we should be concerned about the competition from co-ops. I believe that the competition co-ops give to business brings about more social consciousness in this country. I am a defender of the private enterprise system. As a matter of fact, I was in private business. I never had unfair competition from co-operatives. As a matter of fact, business people who support the concept of private business and not state intervention should be happy to see co-operatives because with co-operatives you also have social progress. The more progress you have, whether social, cultural or economic, the better for everyone.

I do not believe business people in this country or any member of this House would be such strong supporters of private enterprise to want private enterprise at the expense of competition. What good is society if we do not have as a basic philosophy the protection of the individual? The capital employed concept was introduced into the taxation system approximately 22 years ago. If this is the only pressure, I urge the parliamentary secretary and the Minister of Finance to change their minds on this.

Why complicate the system for co-operatives or, for that matter, for anybody? If there is a difference in revenue, that is a horse of a different colour. If there is not a difference in revenue, we should do away with the capital employed concept. We should then accept the proposals of the co-operatives and let them operate as they were intended to operate. Members who use the patronage refund as a business revenue, should pay the taxes. We should not complicate things just because big business people are afraid of competition from co-ops. Let there be no doubt about where I stand. I stand with the co-operatives.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, for the information of the hon. member for Richmond, the transitional provision covering the 10 year phase in does not appear in the amendments to sections 135, 136 and 137 that we are now considering. It is in part III of the bill. The hon. member will find the text of the amendment on page 9166 of the English edition of Hansard for October 29. I do not know what page it is in the French edition.

Mr. Harding: Mr. Chairman, I wish to take part in the discussion on the tax bill this afternoon, particularly on sections 135, 136 and 137 which deal with co-operatives and credit unions. I have a number of comments to make. I received a considerable amount of correspondence from my area on this matter. I am going to pass this information on to the parliamentary secretary because I feel that his views on this topic certainly need updating.

Yesterday and today, I listened with interest to the views of members of all parties. Almost without exception, the members are not happy with the legislation before the House. They have indicated that changes should be made. I am not thinking in terms of making some rather minor amendments. I suggest to the parliamentary secretary and the government that they should take another look at the whole approach to co-operatives and credit unions.

There is a very clear indication that large segments of the Canadian population are disturbed over the legislation currently before us. They are asking the government to make changes in it. That is the reason for the considerable amount of debate on these three sections. Frankly, I believe there will be more debate. After the debate ends today, the government would be wise to stand these sections for a day or two, take a good look at them and bring in some meaningful amendments which will not cripple either the co-operative movement or the credit union movement in the vital function they are playing in society today.

Quite frequently the government is not too happy when opposition members speak about these points. However, I would like to make this point in passing. The speaking out on the second reading of this bill, and the opposition from individuals in committee stage, have brought about some very substantial changes to the legislation as it was proposed initially.

All we have to do is go back and look at the original white paper and legislation introduced by the government. I admit that some substantial amendments have been introduced—and they are welcome—but they do not go far enough. It would be foolish for the House to cripple the co-operative and credit union movements by leaving some of these provisions in the legislation.

Another point bothers me. As the debate goes on it becomes clearer that those responsible for this outright attack on the co-operative movement do not really understand the basic principles upon which that movement works. Members on all sides of the chamber have pointed out this fact. It is like putting a fox in charge of a chicken-coop. There is no use putting someone in charge of drafting legislation for the co-op and credit union movements unless he understands the principles upon which they operate. If one has not been a member of these movements he cannot fully realize the benefits they confer and their effect on society.

Entrenched privilege organizations have launched a major campaign against co-operatives and credit unions. That campaign did not start this year; it has been in progress for a number of years. People in the co-op movement are well aware of it. What worries me is that at long last these entrenched privilege organizations have gained the ear of the government, and that is why we are now debating this legislation.

I am a member of a credit union and of a co-operative. I know the type of service they give to the communities which I represent. It is a vital service. I well remember the desperate need which these communities had for co-operatives and credit unions. I remember when times were a lot tougher than they are today, when the average working Joe could not get a loan from a bank, and had nowhere else to go for a loan. That was back in the thirties. It was at that stage the credit union movement expanded in my area. Through it people were able to obtain credit and do things which otherwise they would not have been able to do. But when that movement reached the stage of development that entrenched privilege organizations felt their toes being stepped on slightly, they launched an attack against it.

I am going to read into the record some of the principles underlying the co-operative movement. It is said that repetition is the mother of learning, and I hope that repetition of these principles will convince the government that more changes must be made to the bill. The co-operative movement is not dodging taxation. All members of this House will admit that fact. Recently we all received copies of a letter from Mr. E. K. Turner, president of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, in which he made several interesting points that have already been quoted in this debate. I shall quote his letter again because these are points which should not be lost sight of during discussion on this legislation. In his letter Mr. Turner wrote:

> Co-operatives are prepared to pay tax at the ordinary corporate rate on any earnings retained by the co-operative. Earnings returned to the member should become part of his income.

[Mr. Harding.]

> For a taxation act to force an imputed taxable corporate income on a co-operative is to interfere with the democratic right of members to run their own business. Such a treatment is not applied to co-operatives in any other country, to our knowledge.
> . . . the taxation proposals completely ignore the basic principle of a co-operative, which is that earnings are a result of surplus on operations and belong to members. Earnings are not a return on investment.

This is something that we still have not been able to get through to the parliamentary secretary and his advisers.

> The co-operative is nothing more than an extension of the members' personal business. Any saving he is able to make in dealing with his organization is an increase in his personal income.

These points constitute the basic philosophy of the co-operative movement and should be recognized by the government. The president of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool and the Co-operative Union of Canada, which is the voice of the co-operative unions collectively across this great country of ours, set out other fundamental distinctions in the nature of co-operatives. Again I would place these on the record because I believe they are useful to our debate. These distinctions are:

> 1. That co-operatives provide primarily a self-help service required by members.
> 2. That co-operatives distribute earnings to members in proportion to member business.
> 3. That co-operatives raise and service equity capital by revolving the same in relation to the use of the co-operative by its member.
> 4. That capital contributed by a member of the co-operative is to provide himself with service and not to produce a return on investment.

Somewhere behind the scenes are individuals who do not understand the functions of co-operatives and credit unions, because if they did understand, then legislation such as this would not have been introduced. Yesterday the hon. member for Regina East moved an amendment to section 135. Reading it in isolation makes it difficult to understand what he is getting at, but read in conjunction with the section it becomes crystal clear and certainly makes sense. This was his amendment:

> That the amendment to section 135 be amended by deleting all words after the words "page 356" and substituting the following:
> "and also by striking out lines 20 to 47 on page 357, lines 1 to 23 on page 358 and lines 33 to 40 on page 359."

This amendment, Mr. Chairman, points up the core of the whole problem. It is the key to the whole complaint which has been brought to all members in this House by co-operative groups all across Canada. The parliamentary secretary has not yet indicated whether he will accept the amendment, but I urge him to give it close scrutiny and, I trust, his full support. This could save much debate on this section of the bill.

The amendment deals with the "capital employed" concept and also with the option proposed in the government amendment. It will remove from the legislation one of the major objections of the co-operative movement. The "capital employed" concept as contained in the legislation will make it impossible for most co-ops to pay cash dividends. It involves the very existence and life of the co-op movement. Surely it is not the intention of the government to put into operation a plan which will slowly and surely strangle the movement over the years. Mr. Chairman, I contend that if the legislation as now drafted goes forward, this is exactly what will happen to co-ops from one end of Canada to the other. Members on the government side of the House should read and discuss this legislation. If they vote for legislation that will cripple the co-operative movement across Canada, they will be in serious trouble at election time.

I should like to speak briefly—we will have an opportunity later to deal with the co-operative amendments—on section 137 which deals with credit unions. I have received a number of representations from various credit unions in my riding of Kootenay West. I have received representations from the Arrow Credit Union of Edgewood and the lower Arrow Lakes, the Castlebar Savings Credit Union, the Kootenay Savings Credit Union, the Nelson and District Credit Union, the Nakusp and District Credit Union and credit unions from the Creston area, as well as from a large number of individuals in these credit unions. They are opposing one of the provisions in section 137. I do not think I can explain it any better than by reading one of the letters which I have received. Many are similar to the one I shall read, which outlines very distinctly the apprehension felt by credit union members in our area as far as section 137 is concerned. This letter is addressed to me and is generally the type of letter I have received. It reads:

In the tax provisions for credit unions contained in Bill C-259 the most important area is the taxation of reserves which must be set aside under the provisions of provincial legislation. No amendment has yet come forward to deal with this problem.

Not only are the transfers to reserves non-discretionary but there is a legislative bar to their distribution to the members even on the winding up of the credit union. Apart from this restriction in the legislation there is a basic principle that shares in a credit union may only be redeemed at par irrespective of the amount of reserves on hand. The fact that these reserves are beyond the reach of the shareholders, removes in effect shareholder's ownership, a very cardinal quality of income as contemplated in the Income Tax Act.

Commercial corporations are in an entirely different position. Retention of corporate income will increase the value of the shares and in this way give a benefit to the shareholder. Alternatively amounts reserved may be paid out as dividends. Again, benefiting the shareholder and earning for him a tax credit on his dividend—essentially representing a rebate of the corporate tax. The effect of the provincial legislation is to deny these benefits to credit unions.

Although there is a strong legal case for tax exemption, with supporting precedents, credit unions have interpreted the white paper and the tax act as pronouncements of government policy and have from the outset agreed to pay their fair share of taxation.

Because they lack the quality of income and because these non-discretionary reserves cannot be distributed to members, credit unions find themselves trapped by the provisions of section 125 of the tax act. These reserves will be considered income in the "business limit" of $50,000 per year and in the total "business limit" of $400,000. The very fact that the credit union is statute barred from distributing these reserves means that the "total business limit" will automatically be reached in a short period of time. Aggravating this situation is the fact that transfers to the reserve must be tax paid—no provision exists permitting income taxes to be charged against the reserves. The sum of these factors means that section 125 (which provides for a reduction of tax under certain conditions) will not apply to a medium sized credit union beyond five years, after which time a transfer of $50,000 to reserve will attract a tax of $50,000.

The solution we propose is that section 137 (credit union taxation provision) be amended to provide that amounts required to be transferred to statutory reserves be excluded from the calculation of the "business limit" and the "total business limit" in the application of section 125.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Deputy Chairman: The committee knows that this can be done only by unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Mahoney: I agree, Mr. Chairman, but there are many hon. members waiting to participate in the debate. I am sure the hon. member would not abuse the opportunity afforded by the committee giving its consent, because he is aware that other hon. members are waiting to speak.

Mr. Harding: Mr. Chairman, may I have the privilege of finishing the letter because there are only two paragraphs which I have not quoted?

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Harding: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The effect of such an amendment would be that tax paid transfers to reserve would attract a tax equal to 33 per cent of the reserve requirement as opposed to a tax equal to 100 per cent of the reserve requirement.

Reserves have no advantage to the member beyond securing the principal of their investments. They can never share in them. We regard a tax equal to the amount of the annual reserve requirement as unnecessarily punitive.

I urge the parliamentary secretary to read this section 137 again and to make the necessary amendment to rectify it.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words on this section of Bill C-259 dealing with credit unions and co-operatives. I am very appreciative of the amendments introduced by the Minister of Finance which are designed to reduce the basic tax rate contained in the bill. The history of credit unions can be summarized by the experience of one operating in my constituency. I am referring to the employees of the Abitibi Paper Company which formed a credit union some years ago. The motivation of the credit union was the principle "not for profit but for service", which I submit is the philosophy behind the movement established to encourage saving and, when in need, borrowing. It is this principle which dominates all credit unions as well as co-operatives.

The money that members put into the credit union is already taxed; every dividend they receive is taxed. Section 135 of the bill is simply designed to tax the profits that credit unions have accumulated through the use of their savings. I urge the minister to reconsider this whole question and scrap the idea behind this section of the bill.

• (3:20 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Badanai: The Prime Minister, in a recent message to credit unions stated, "Credit unions have experienced enormous success because they encourage both regular savings and the wise use of credit." I would also quote from his message on International Credit Union Day. The Prime Minister said:

It can also be said that credit unions encourage self-help and mutual assistance. I look upon them as more than saving banks; they are also a welcome social force in the community, and the same can be said about co-operatives which have similar objectives.

The amendment proposed by the minister on November 10, which proposes that co-operatives would leave one-third of profits as taxable, affects all the members of these organizations. In other words, the tax now falls upon the members. The crux of the whole question, Mr. Chairman, is that the credit unions and co-operatives are asking, not for exemption from taxation but for this House to consider the most equitable way of applying it so that taxation as between these organizations and their members will be just and fair.

Mr. John M. Halliman, general manager of the Ontario Credit Union League, in a letter to the Minister of Finance pointed out that credit unions are organized for service and that they are simply vehicles by which man helps his fellow man by bringing together those who have a little money to save with those needing temporary financial assistance. The credit union itself is not seeking profit but is merely an intermediary between the savers and the borrowers. To the extent that those who contribute their savings for this purpose earn dividends or interest from the loan operation, they already pay tax on such income. Taxing the interest paid on loans in the hands of the credit union and then again in the hands of its members would be, I believe, double taxation.

At page 52 of the report of the Royal Commission on Co-operatives, submitted to the House of Commons in 1945—which is known as the McDougall report—is the following description of the special assistance rendered by credit unions. This applies equally today:

(a) It provides a method whereby people in poor circumstances are encouraged to develop a habit of thrift, since by pooling their savings they can provide a source of credit for themselves in times of need;

(b) The bond of association, occupation or other community interest on which the membership of credit unions is based tends to minimize the element of risk which has to be considered by another type of lending institution when considering an application for a loan from an individual with little or no collateral security;

(c) Accordingly, it provides a service for those who are either not provided with credit services from other lending institutions at all, or only at much higher rates because of the risks involved.

(d) The tangible material and other benefits which can be derived through the credit union from of activity enable and encourage the members to solve their problems through self help rather than by relying on government aid in times of emergency or depressed conditions.

The report reads, at page 52:

Credit unions return to their members a very high proportion of their surplus earnings. In some cases, however, they are retaining amounts which appear to be larger than are required for reserves against bad loans and losses on the basis of past experience. If they were to be taxed by the methods we have recommended for co-operative associations, additions to these excess reserves would be made subject to tax. However, the individual amounts to be assessed would, in many cases, be very small. Moreover, we consider that it is not desirable to discourage the accumulation of reserves to protect the savings of members who, for the most part, receive small or very moderate incomes.

In that report, Mr. Chairman, the royal commission recommended that the income of credit unions should continue to be exempt from taxation. All this seems to indicate that the case for the credit union and co-operative is as strong today as it was in 1945. I therefore, with respect, repeat that this whole question ought to be reconsidered by the government.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Chairman, in speaking on the amendments dealing with co-operatives and credit unions I should first like to deal with co-operatives and discuss how they are being treated in the legislation, and then deal with credit unions very briefly near the end of my remarks. I say at the outset that the government has done with this legislation that which it has done with so many other pieces of legislation. It seems to have taken two giant steps forward and one step back and has told the people concerned that they have been given consideration so far as the Income Tax Act and other pieces of legislation are concerned. Nevertheless, the income tax legislation is still a step down the road to what he government considers to be tax reform. I think that this can be borne out if one reads the first draft of the bill and looks at the amendments pertaining to co-operatives and credit unions put forward by the government.

Co-operatives have for the most part their own special place within our society, having been formed mainly because groups of people felt the need to join together in order to work more efficiently. This need has been exemplified, I think, more in rural than in urban areas. The co-ops in the rural areas of Canada have become stronger, possibly because of the necessity of people having to band together and work together. The latest statistics on co-operatives published by the Department of Agriculture show that by the end of 1969 there were 2,373 co-operatives in Canada, with a membership of well over half a million. It appears that in drafting Bill C-259 and the later amendments little attention has been given to the essential nature and method of operation of a co-operative, and the essential difference between its purpose and that of an ordinary corporation has not been understood. I will not deal with the make-up of a co-operative because I believe most hon. members know how a co-operative works. Most hon. members are aware of the voting and capital structures of co-operatives.

There is no relationship between a member's investment in a co-operative and the returns to him. A member with $1 invested may receive a return of $100, or vice-versa, depending on the amount of business done with the co-operative during the period involved. Furthermore, the member with the $1 investment has the same voting right as the member with an investment of $100 or $1,000. It is an accepted principle that a member wishing to remove some or all of his investment from the co-operative, either while continuing to use its services or upon terminating his membership, will receive only the amount of his investment, with no capital gain.

In general, co-operatives are objecting to the provisions contained in section 135 of the bill which retain the requirement that prior to any payment of patronage payments, dividend income must be allocated to the capital of co-operatives on the basis of a fixed percentage of capital employed by the taxpayer at commencement of the taxation year. This, according to co-operatives, interferes with their freedom and ability to distribute earnings as patronage refunds.

In briefs I have received from across western Canada the co-ops maintain that although section 135 applies to all corporations wishing to pay patronage refunds, the imputation of income to capital in a co-operative is not only unreasonable and illogical but is discriminatory. Co-operatives, by nature, are different from corporations and should be treated as such. They contend that the "capital employed" concept creates a cash flow problem. In most co-operatives this is accomplished by having members of the co-operative reinvest patronage refunds in the co-operative.

Such reinvestment is used to retire the equity of members who no longer use the services of the co-operative and provide facilities for additional services to members. Co-operatives maintain that no matter what is the size of the organization, ownership of shares has no attraction for the public market since the return on shares is limited, so a public sale of co-operative shares to secure additional funds is not practical.

I believe that the proposed amendment to section 135 will assist co-operative in years of low earning. The taxable income which must be retained by the co-operatives before paying patronage refunds will be lower than that used under the proposed "capital employed" formula. Basically, section 135 of Bill C-259 gives co-operatives two choices. They can pay tax on the capital employed formula, or they can pay tax on the basis of one-third of their income. Either choice, according to the co-operative spokesmen with whom I have talked, will result in a forced imputation of taxable income. The assignment of income to a co-operative using a formula based on capital employed is unique in Canada; it is a form of tax treatment of co-operatives not utilized in any other country.

I would be inclined to recommend that all tax reforms relating to co-operatives be stuck from the bill. But my recommendation now is that this ought to be done on the basis of a study made to determine a more equitable basis for the taxation of co-operatives than the one now proposed. The sections of the bill are so interwoven, however, that action along these lines could delay the legislation for many weeks while the sections were being rewritten.

If the Minister of Finance had been thinking and had recognized that co-operatives are essentially different in nature from other corporations, he would have amended Bill C-259 to satisfy co-operatives and still provide taxation for their earnings. I believe co-operatives should be permitted to distribute to their members the annual earnings resulting from business done with their members, with any earnings retained in the hands of the co-operatives taxed at the corporate rate. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the way the government has handled this part of the legislation typifies their attitude toward co-operatives and credit unions.

I should like to read the following from a brief I have received from a co-operative in western Canada:

> —we have previously not felt it necessary to stress that capital employed in co-operatives must be serviced the same as capital in other investor-owned corporations. By imposing a form of double taxation which the capital-employed formula does, the co-operatives are being discriminated against in a manner which we believe is without justification.

We have heard this over and over again from members on all sides of the House during the debate. It seems to reflect my feelings as to co-operatives.

I should like to deal now with the amendments to the legislation affecting credit unions. I think it would be very hard to give an exact account of the good done to rural communities by credit unions. Credit unions have lent money in many instances when other organizations would not do so. They have played a vital role in the growth of Canada and in the expansion of our rural areas. The fact that they are another lending agency has in itself been significant for the Canadian population.

Under the proposed legislation a credit union will no longer be exempt from tax. It is proposed that it should pay tax in substantially the same manner as other private corporations. As such, it will be able to take advantage of the small business deductions to the extent permitted to private corporations. Credit unions will be taxed in a manner similar to co-operatives in that a deduction is to be allowed when computing income for payment to members pursuant to allocations in proportion to their borrowing.

I believe the government should recognize that credit unions are a form of financial partnership which receives deposits from members and provides financial services on behalf of members. The amendments which have been brought in by the government fail, in my opinion, to take into account the legitimate concern with respect to the application of section 189(b). Credit unions should be permitted to operate a full financial service for their members; the legislation should be amended to provide the right of credit unions to perform the services permitted under their incorporated status.

An example of the difficulty anticipated is that it is doubtful whether a credit union could invest in a housing development to improve the living conditions within a community. It is in these local fields that credit unions have served their most useful purpose within the past, and I for one am fearful that under the present legislation certain of their activities may be curtailed.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, as in the case of farmers, small family business, co-operatives and other sections of the proposed legislation there seems to be a fundamental inability to appreciate the consequences of tax legislation on society. This failure can be ascribed in part to the government's eagerness to rush headlong into any project which would be bureaucratically efficient and administratively tidy from their point of view. The government is insensitive to other considerations even when these are founded on very real human and social concerns.

Mr. Blair: Mr. Chairman, in the course of the debate yesterday afternoon the hon. member for Regina East made certain remarks which are reported at page 9681 of Hansard. My own observations in that connection are reported at page 9686. Questions were raised about the definition of "co-operatives" for the purpose of these sections. There have been some discussions, and I have an amendment which I believe meets with the general approval of all who are interested in this problem.

I might offer one or two words of explanation. Yesterday concern was expressed about the position of co-operatives whose operations are conducted on what is called a delegate system of voting. The consensus reached after further study was that the section now in the bill does not in any way affect the operation of that type of co-operative, which is covered by the present definition.

However, there are other important co-operatives that might be described as federations. Their members consist of other co-operative organizations. On close examination it was considered that this type of co-operative, the federated co-operative, is not covered by the existing definition in the bill. Accordingly, in order to eliminate any possibility of doubt and uncertainty, I move the following amendment to section 136:

That section 136 as set forth in clause 1 of the said bill be further amended by striking out lines 33 to 35 on page 360 and substituting the following:

"(b) none of its members (except other co-operative corporations) have more than one vote in the conduct of the affairs of the corporation, and"

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member who has moved the amendment be kind enough to explain what the effect of the amendment will be?

Mr. Blair: I would be glad to do that, Mr. Chairman. I am sorry my previous explanation was not clear. The amendment simply inserts four words into the previous section which have reference to co-operatives whose members are other co-operatives. In this way it is considered that any difficulty that might have existed under the previously stated section will be eliminated. The fear was that if co-operatives, in order to qualify under this statute, had to meet the literal test of one member, one vote, some federated type co-operatives might not be able to do so. They have different methods of voting and sometimes votes are weighted in accordance with the business that the different member co-operative do with them.

I think I can say with propriety, but without binding anyone, that the co-operative organizations most concerned that this statute be properly worded have been consulted and I believe the amendment that has been proposed meets their requirements.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order I should like to say that I understand that my colleague from Regina East was a party to the discussions that led to this amendment and that it is one that we would be prepared to accept. However, since we have already before us an amendment and a subamendment to section 135, perhaps this should stand until we have first dealt with the amendment to section 135.

Mr. Mahoney: Just to clarify the situation, Mr. Chairman, in suggesting that the amendment stand, the hon. member is referring to the vote on it. He is not suggesting that it has not been moved and accepted by the Chair.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, the parliamentary secretary is quite correct. The amendment has been moved and it is before us. However, I suggest that the voting on it be delayed till we have disposed of section 135, hopefully as amended.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee agree to the proposal made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Chairman, there is hardly any need for me to add my support for the statements already made by my colleagues who represent various parts of Canada. The parliamentary secretary must be convinced by now that there is almost unanimous consent in the committee at least to have the sections dealing with co-operatives amended, if not stricken altogether from the record, so we can get back to a discussion of other parts of the bill. I do not have a great deal of background in the co-operative movement, though I can claim to have been a member of the Gander Consumers Co-operative for a number of years while I was living in that beautiful town, the home of one of the biggest international airports in the world.

If I may give the parliamentary secretary, who I trust will bear with me, an indication of the kind of response that I have received from a riding where the co-operative movement has not fully blossomed but is in the process of blossoming, and in the interests of allowing some of my constituents to express their views, I should like to follow the example of other members and place on record the opinions of consumer co-operatives that have written to me about this bill. This is the kind of evidence that I hope will convince the parliamentary secretary and the government that they should accede to the demands of consumer co-operatives across Canada as well as of members on both sides of the House that the position of the co-operatives be restored to the status quo.

I have before me a letter from a Mr. Dan Roberts who is the secretary of the Fogo Island Shipbuilding Producers Co-operative Society Limited. Fogo Island is an island community of about 5,000 people and is situated approximately 12 miles off the east cost of Newfoundland. It is an island community that some four years ago was on the verge of economic collapse and was facing the prospect of having its population relocated in other parts of the province.

Mr. Roberts and other individuals in that area began to revitalize the island community, which is comprised of a number of scattered small communities. Some of the members of this House travelled with me 2½ years ago to the island to see the results of the efforts of the community to improve its economy. The consumers co-operative to which I refer has had a very substantial impact upon the economy of the island to the point where governments, both provincial and federal, have responded with programs offering certain types of assistance in the construction of marine facilities. This co-operative, which is the backbone of economic development on the island, writes to me as follows:

Dear John:

The white paper on tax reform will have an adverse effect on co-operatives.

1. The taxable income will be raised from 3 to 5 per cent of employed capital.

2. Withdrawal of the three-year tax holiday for new co-operatives.

3. The further limiting of patronage refunds because of number one above.

The letter goes on to give certain examples and implores the federal Members of Parliament to place their plea on the public record. From the same community I have received a letter from Mr. A. Cull, manager of the Snap Rock Consumers Co-operative Society Limited. He writes as follows:

• (3:50 p.m.)

I am writing to you on behalf of the board of directors of Snap Rock Cons. Co-Op Soc. Ltd. at Joe Batts Arm to ask you, as our representative, to protest sections 135 and 136 of Bill C-259 which is going to be considered this month in Parliament.

If this bill is allowed to pass it will have a very serious effect on co-operatives in Canada. The bill as it stands goes against the principles of co-operatives and if passed could very well mean the closing of co-operatives.

I have another letter from a Mr. Reginald Eveleigh, secretary of the Atlantic Credit Co-operative Society which reads:

The white paper on tax reform issued by the finance minister Benson during June of 1971 stating tax raise from 3 per cent to 5 per cent will definitely affect co-operatives across this province. The paper ignores the very principle of co-op and will limit patronage refund to members.

We the members of Atlantic Credit Co-op Society of Joe Batts Arm, do strongly recommend that you do everything in your power to try to get this legislation changed before it becomes law.

I have another letter from an adjacent riding, from Mr. Lloyd George, secretary of the Clarenville Area Consumers Co-operative Society Ltd. in which he points out in some detail the effect of this piece of legislation as it stands with regard to newly formed co-operatives. The letter reads:

Our co-operative (a supermarket) opened for business just over three years ago. At that time it was our hope that we would get approximately 200 members. However, the people throughout this area really accepted the idea and under the direction of a very competent and enthusiastic board of directors our registered membership has grown to over 500 active members. Our gross sales this year will exceed 3/4 million dollars which is ample proof that our co-operative is a most successful one.

This success has been due to a combination of a very hard working board of directors, management and staff and a dedicated membership. Our patronage dividends returned to our members (while operating on a competitive basis with other businesses) have been 6 per cent for the past three years! This tremendous savings to our members have been a Godsend in many cases.

Our board of directors at the last meeting were very much concerned with Bill C-259 which will have the effect of just about wiping out savings earned by members in the form of patronage dividends, destroy all incentive in co-operatives and result in the total collapse of the co-operative movement.

He goes to express in graphic terms the opinion of the membership. Let me read now from a letter from Mr. Robert Hellier of the Gander Consumers Co-operative Society Limited, Gander, Newfoundland. It reads:

The Gander Consumers Co-operative Society Limited earnestly requests your support in its efforts to change Bill C-259, (federal) which if allowed to pass in its present form threatens the very existence of co-operatives.

He goes on to make the following proposals:

1. Consumer patronage dividends remain exempt in so far as they can be distributed.

2. Patronage dividends for production goods remain as income.

3. Three year exemption for new co-operatives removed with no compensating provisions. Mining companies which had this exemption will have until 1973 before it is removed and then generous other concessions are given in lieu of it.

4. Capital employed principle drastically changed. The formula for calculating capital employed has been changed and now includes essentially only member equity, i.e. shares, loans and general reserves, and the rate has been increased to 5 per cent. The only deduction is the interest paid on on member loans.

Mr. Hillier represents several hundred members of this consumers co-operative and expresses as well his concern for the future of the co-operative movement. The parliamentary secretary seems somewhat amused by my presentation. I hope he recognizes that this is not my usual style of style of presentation to the House of Commons, but I want him and the government of this country to realize the extent of concern and frustration felt by average individuals. These are not wheat pools or organizations with thousands of members; these are small, individual organizations, associations and co-operative mouvements trying to do a worth-while job in a relatively small community.

I have a letter from the Eastport Consumers Co-op Society Limited. Mr. Edwin Moore, the president, writes about his concern for the co-operative movement and says that if Bill C-259 is allowed to apss he has fear for the future existence of the co-operative movement. He writes:

After study it appears that should this bill be allowed to pass in its present form co-operatives will definitely soon be things of the past.

I have another letter from Beaumont, an island community in the district of N.D. Bay on the east coast of Newfoundland. This is a relatively small island community. The letter is from Ford Paddock, secretary of the Long Island Consumers Society. He writes:

The Long Island Consumers Society Ltd. have recently asked me to contact you, expressing our concern regarding proposed changes in taxation of co-ops as proposed by sections 135-136 of Bill C-259. We are soliciting your support and would appreciate any advice you could offer us on this matter. As we are experiencing difficulties at the present and last fiscal years our little business though at times weak has been practically the only source of fishing supplies available on Long Island.

I have, as well, a letter from the Newfoundland Co-operative Services signed by Mr. W. E. Benedict who writes on behalf of that co-operative as well as those throughout the province. I have another letter from the Newfoundland Teachers Association Co-operative, and others I could read. Let me point out that we are not making a humble suggestion or request; we are demanding that these representatives of co-operatives from all parts of Canada in every province be considered. We demand that the changes we have recommended be brought about. These sections of the bill if passed as they stand, will destroy the co-operative movement in Canada, and they must be eliminated.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to call it four o'clock.

Progress reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): It being four o'clock p.m. the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills and private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SUGGESTED IMPROVEMENTS TO COMMITTEES SYSTEM

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, there should be further improvements made in the operation of the committee system in order to enhance the influence of the House of Commons upon the policy-making process and in order to reduce the information gap between private members and cabinet ministers and to that end that the following subject-matters be referred to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization for the purpose of study and the making of recommendations (a) the possibility of establishing a means whereby committees could take the initiative in recommending to the House matters which should be referred to them by the House; (b) adequate staff support for committees; (c) the advisability of making it mandatory for each committee to prepare at the end of each Session a running record of recommendations it has made to the government and government action taken on its recommendations; (d) making it mandatory for a motion of concurrence to be moved in connection with all committee reports and discovering a means by which debate on such motions could be kept to a reasonable level, specifically the possibility of increasing the number of assigned days, the increase in number to be allocated to the discussion of committee reports, the reports to be considered to be determined by opposition parties; (e) making it possible for minority reports to be tabled together with majority reports from committees; (f) allowing Standing Committees to be constituted as committees of inquiry.

He said: Mr. Speaker, traditionally Parliament serves three separate but related functions in discharging its ultimate responsibility to the elector. Those are, the formulation of policy, the implementation of policy through legislation, and the collection and allocation of funds necessary for the effective operation of legislation. Parliament, of course, performs many other functions but all, in theory at least, are ancillary to the three I have mentioned.

In Canada the right of Parliament to formulate policy and to legislate for the implementation of policy was established with the passage of the Rebellion Losses Bill and the according of responsible government in 1848. The principle of parliamentary control of finance was established at the same time. The only remaining practical exceptions to the full implementation of the principle were removed in 1849 and 1851 with the repeal of the English navigation laws by Westminster and the passage of Sir Francis Hinck's new tariff laws, respectively.

After a relatively brief period in which parliamentary control over policy, legislation and finance was consolidated there began a gradual erosion of that control which first became apparent after the turn of the century and which became a cause for active concern following World War II. Gradually Parliament came to exercise control over policy, legislation and finances in name only. The real power, the real control was in the hands of the cabinet and the bureaucracy which served it. In recent years there has been a further pyramiding of power in these three crucial areas with the full cabinet being eclipsed by an inner circle of ministers and, more recently, by the Prime Minister's office.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel).]

It is only slightly overdrawing the case to say that in 125 years we have gone full circle from legislatures being relatively weak advisers to and opposition for the government, to full legislative control and responsibility and back again to a situation in which the legislature is in fact of only peripheral importance in the governing of the nation. Parliament stands in danger of becoming, as has the monarchy, a largely honorific element in the constitution.

I make these remarks in no partisan sense. What has happened in Canada is happening throughout the world. The decline of the power of Parliament in relation to the cabinet and the first minister has been allowed to proceed as far as it has in part because the process was neither the result of stated policy nor, for the most part, of conscious effort. The change is, rather, the result of innumerable individual decisions made on a pragmatic basis over a long period of time and as a consequence of two major developments—the growth in the scope of responsibility of the modern state and the marked strengthening of party discipline which has taken place since confederation.

Whatever the reasons for the change, whatever the reasons for the phenomenon of the decline in power of the legislative arm of government in relation to the executive arm, it is absolutely necessary for us to use every means at our disposal to attempt to halt the trend, if not reverse it. I make this assertion not because of some antiquarian concern for the dignity of the House but, rather, because the more power becomes concentrated, the less responsive is the government to the felt needs of the people. I have no doubt that this very concentration of power is producing the current, entirely legitimate demands for "people power" in democratic states, if I may use that term to describe the phenomenon, and is producing as well some of the less savoury aspects of that movement.

It is within this context that I wish to discuss my suggestions for change in our current committee system, for I see the committee system as having the greatest immediate potential for beginning the process of re-establishing, in fact, the control of the executive by the legislature or, to put it another way, ensuring the responsibility and accountability of the cabinet to Parliament.

Our present committee system, which was first set up in 1965 on a trial basis and was given formal approval by the House in December, 1968, was designed to fulfil a number of functions most of which have relevance to the question of adequate controls on the executive. The committee system was designed, first to save the time of the House and to streamline its operation by reducing the amount of time spent in committee of the whole in clause by clause study of legislation and in examination of the estimates; second, to provide government backbenchers especially with a means of becoming involved in the work of government in a meaningful way; third, to provide for the careful scrutiny of legislation; fourth, to provide for detailed and more comprehensive examination of proposals for departmental expenditures through referral of the estimates; fifth, to provide forums for enquiry not only for existing or proposed government legislation but also with respect to possible new policy directions for government in important issue areas; sixth, to provide individuals and groups within the community with a more direct influence upon policy through the calling of witnesses; seventh, to provide for the development within Parliament of cadres of experts in each of the major areas of government concern.

I hope hon. members will forgive me if because of time limitation I simply state, without documenting the position, that the committee system has not worked quite as we had hoped it would. I believe most members could find many arguments to support this contention. In establishing the committee system, Parliament gave up a number of its more effective controls of executive powers, such as the study of estimates in committee of the whole at which time grievances could be raised with the government with some effect. We have lost that control and the committee system has not replaced it with another.

The last five functions which I mentioned of the committee system as established have particular relevance to the problem of controlling the executive. The seventh point I mentioned, the creation of cadres of experts in this House, has the greatest impact of all since it has the effect of reducing the information gap which exists between the private Member of Parliament and the cabinet minister. Parliament's power to supervise has declined because of the increasing demands being made on its time and because its members are representative men and women best equipped to deal with general principles, broad objectives and fundamental issues. It is not a technical body. In any given subject area in relation to the expertise of a civil servant, the average member is ill-equipped and ill-informed.

Moreover, the same is true of the average member in relation to the cabinet minister. Cabinet ministers can draw upon the talents and resources of the legions of public service experts, which the cabinet controls, for necessary information in any field. With rare exceptions, such as the audit office, Parliament can call upon no such able assistants. The result is that the debates in the House are rather unequal. The ability of Parliament to adequately assess and scrutinize every government action is severely reduced.

The committees would have the potential to remedy this situation if their membership were more stable—in other words, in Members of Parliament remained on a given committee for a longer period of time, were not shuffled about so frequently and if there were periodic adjournments of the House for the purpose of enabling committees to do their work. A number of different systems have been suggested with regard to the latter point. I will not go into them here but will content myself by saying that the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization should be instructed to seek the most satisfactory means of providing committees with the time they need to do their work properly without interference of duties in the house.

It is with the same end in view, that of enhancing the ability of committees to reduce the information gap between Parliament and the government, that I have recommended in my resolution that committees be provided with adequate staff support. I refer especially to research staff who would possess the expert knowledge necessary to assist Members of Parliament in preparing themselves adequately for their various committee duties. The value of such staff has been made manifestly obvious by the work Mr. Peter Dobel and the Parliamentary Research Centre have done in connection with the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence.

There is a problem in deciding whether such staff should be permanent or rotating, assigned to a single committee or moved from committee to committee as required. I tend to opt for a permanent staff, but the point that able research staffs of some description are urgently required by committees is what I want to establish at this time.

A related suggestion which I have made in the resolution is that the standing committee be permitted as a matter of course to act as a committee of inquiry. I regret that my wording of this recommendation and, more particularly, my failure to note that the words "Committees of Inquiry" were capitalized on the order paper may have led to some confusion on the part of hon. members about my intention. All I mean to suggest is that the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, for example, in the situation now confronting the nation should consider it to be a normal part of its duties to inquire into the relationship between inflation and unemployment or into the possible effects of the American DISC program upon our economy and, accordingly, make appropriate policy recommendations in these fields. Such a development would have the two major beneficial effects of better equipping Parliament to assess government policy decisions in these areas and perhaps even giving Parliament an important role in shaping eventual government policies.

Another group of recommendations contained in this resolution is designed to give committee recommendations more importance and to create a system in which it would be difficult for a government to ignore the recommendations of a committee. There has been no attempt to get away from the concept of cabinet responsibility or to give power to the committees to initiate legislation but, rather, simply to ensure that the cabinet would have to seriously examine committee proposals. Whether the government would act on the basis of committee recommendations would remain its decision. I want to ensure that the government would have to examine committee proposals seriously.

Hence I have suggested that it be made mandatory for a motion of concurrence to be moved in connection with all committee reports and that such a motion be deemed debatable. This would provide two salutary effects: first, the recommendations of the committee would be aired in public; second, if concurrence was granted the government would be forced to explain its reasons for failing to act upon a recommendation of the committee. It would have to pay more attention to what the committees did.

Obviously, this suggestion poses problems with regard to the time of the House. As I note in the resolution, a means would have to be discovered for limiting debate. Perhaps a Standing Order could provide that only a certain number of reports could be debated in a session or, more likely, an over-all time limit for such debates could be established and the opposition given the choice of which reports to debate within that time. Perhaps more allotted days could be granted with the express purpose of such debates in mind. Once again, the actual procedure decided upon does not concern me at this stage as much as the principle.

I have also suggested in the resolution, in an effort to strengthen the impact of committee reports, that committees be required to prepare at the end of each session a running record, covering previous sessions as well, of the recommendations it has made to the government and the action the government has taken on them. Such a report could be a powerful weapon in the hands of individual Members of Parliament determined to make the government take some account of the work done in committees.

If, for example, over a period a committee made 27 recommendations and the government did not do anything about them, this could be devastating ammunition in the hands of a member such as the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). The idea is not original. It is derived from the practice of the British public accounts committee which each year prepares an epitome of proposals. The suggestion is not exactly parallel to the British experience because our committees do not operate in the same way. It is an adaptation of a system that works successfully in another jurisdiction. It is one at which we should look.

I have also suggested that minority reports be allowed to be tabled along with majority reports. It seems to me that democracy not only means majority rule but also respect for minority opinions. It is simply not good enough to say that a member can always issue a press release or express his opinion in the House if he does not agree with a report that he has assisted in drawing up. Such ventures do not have equal weight with a formal written document and tend to be transitory rather than a part of the permanent written record.

Finally, I have suggested that committees be granted a greater degree of independence of government control and that they be allowed an initiative in matters referred to them by the House. I have in mind that committees be allowed to present a resolution to the House suggesting subject matter for them to examine rather than being forced to wait upon the government to take action, as is frequently the case. I think this procedure would overcome the argument that such initiative on the part of committees would tend to obscure the fact that they are and should be subordinate to the House because the House would determine the fate of their requests. The House could always turn down a committee. Moreover, a government need not be unduly worried about what action the committee would take if given this power, because the government would always have the majority on a committee.

The current committee system has been in operation, in roughly its present form, for almost six years. I think it is time its operations were assessed and evaluated by the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization and, ultimately, by this chamber. This resolution suggests a number of areas for examination. Many more could be mentioned, such as how committee chairmen are selected and assigned. Should we adopt the British system, where they areappointed from either the opposition or the government? Should we have a panel of chairmen who would move from committee to committee, members who are schooled in the rules so that committees operate more effectively and efficiently under trained chairmen? These are other considerations which should possibly be looked at by the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. I could mention many more.

The important thing is that the examination take place as quickly as possible. The issues involved are too important to be pushed under the rug.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, this is a very interesting notice of motion dealing with a subject that is very close to all hon. members. I know that several members are anxious to contribute to the debate and I know their contributions will be very valuable. I know that the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell) wants to participate in the debate.

This is a tribute to the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland) who drafted this motion very carefully. It is consistent with his excellent background in politics and his performance in this House. I know, as well, that no less a student of politics, one who has had considerable experience in the committee system as chairman and as member, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid), is anxious to contribute, so I propose not to keep the floor for any longer than necessary.

There are a number of things that should be said relevant to the functioning of the committee system and to specific recommendations put forward in the notice of motion. As background, reference has already been made to the changes in the rules in the functioning of the committee system that came into force in 1965. To me, Mr. Speaker, the whole story of the committee system is one of conflicts of interest or of tensions, as it were, between opposing points of view. It is no coincidence, I am sure, that one faction in the House of Commons was adamant that the changes made in 1965, and the further changes made in the rules in 1969, went a long way to increase the emphasis on committees and therefore received the encouragement of all those who would support this notice of motion put forward by the hon. member. On the other hand, there has been a considerable body of opinion in this House that the effect of those changes, while they increase the emphasis on the committee system, had a devastating effect in downgrading the importance of this chamber. So the whole story beings with a serious conflict of interest in that regard. There is a good deal of merit in both points of view.

You can carry the conflict further by looking at the point of view of the government of the day, on the one hand, and the point of view of the opposition of the day on the other hand. Indeed, the interest of the one in the functioning of the committee system is considerably different from the interest of the other, it being obviously in the interest of the government that the committee be as efficient and as functional as possible but that it keep its disruption of the government's program to a minimum.

Of course, while the opposition has no ingrained opposition to the idea of efficiency or to the functional nature of the committee system, it takes a much opposing point of view as to the disruptive nature or effect that it should have on the government's legislative program. If one wanted to take a lot of time, this argument leads us down the path to the whole question of time allocation, not only in the chamber itself but in the committees, which is another subject all of us would like to debate at some length and which will continually raise its head as we study the committee system, particularly in its legislative functioning.

One can carry on the conflict by examining the desires of the cabinet on the one hand and of the backbenchers on the other, even of the backbenchers within the government party. Indeed, there is the desire of the minister responsible for legislation that his legislation pass as smoothly as possible. That is well understood. And there is the desire, even of government backbenchers, that if they have not managed, as so frequently happens, to get a real piece of the action in the House they be entitled to become extremely active and aggressive in the committees. Accordingly, the committees provide an excellent opportunity for those who have not had an opportunity to contribute formally to House debates on legislation to get into action in the committees, and not only make recommendations but propose and make amendments. Again, there is a serious conflict over whether it is much more important for the government to accommodate the views of all those who want to participate in debate or to get on with the legislative program that it has introduced to serve the country.

However, perhaps the most interesting conflict of all is between theorists who endorse the parliamentary system as we know it and those who endorse the congressional system, or a more congressional system than we have here. In this context I do not want, as many people do, to see the word "congressional" used as a synonym for anything that is American because there is, of course, a great deal more to a congressional approach to our work here than simply an imitation of what takes place in the United States. But let us assume that which tends to compartmentalize the legislative function and that which tends to create the separate bodies of the legislative organization and set them up independently with statutory authority of their own, which is the more congressional of the two systems, as opposed to the parliamentary system as we know it, where cabinet responsibility extends throughout the system.

The cornerstone of the parliamentary system is that the cabinet, as the executive, must remain responsible to Parliament and to the country at all times for its decisions and actions. It can be accepted, therefore, as an ingrained attitude of the executive that it tends to guard, sometimes to ridiculous lengths, the sanctity of its legislation in committee, which is explained away by virtue of the fact that a defeat on a major issue in committee reflects badly on the cabinet.

Let us go to the extreme of indicating that committees should be able to take a totally independent position in this regard but this does not conform to the parliamentary system as we know it, this is a most interesting conflict and, hopefully, may be resolved by a continuing attitude that activities in committee which appear to be detrimental to features of legislation should not be considered by Parliament to be in the vein of a serious defeat that would prejudicially affect the stability of the government. How does one achieve that kind of spirit without changing the rules to constitute an independent system, which I do not think would be a better system on its own than the system we have now, when one takes into account all the features of the present system?

One can go on to deal with the view of the public as opposed to the view of political scientists. The public does not understand all the technical language that we use here, all the rules and regulations. The public senses that Parliament takes a long time to get things done. The public desires action and wants to know why it is that a bill, once drafted, has to be guarded against change by the cabinet. The public wonders why it is that changes cannot be made. And if independent members have views that they want to put forward, the public wants to know why amendments cannot be made without the result reflecting on the government, possibly leading to its defeat. The public has one interest, an interest in action, the kind of action that the hon. member is seeking through his notice of motion.

The political scientists, on the other hand, recognize that any departure from the rules that set up the parliamentary system, as we know it, can lead us into dangerous areas, can get us away from parliamentary democracy and into some new kind of system, into something requiring a new set of rules and regulations.

Mention was made of the possibility of moving toward the establishment of a panel of chairmen of committees, a feature that would be borrowed from the United Kingdom system. Indeed, much can be said against the current system of carrying a government majority and government chairman on almost all committees. Admittedly, it could be an improvement to see an independent panel of chairmen, perhaps assigned by the Speaker, representing the proportionate strengths in the House of Commons, with individual responsibilities assigned by the Speaker. But, again, how does one compensate for the fact that if the government majority does not carry on a committee, and if the chairman is an opposition chairman—which in many cases could be an excellent feature—a serious defeat of government legislation in committee reflects badly on the government itself and, under our traditional system, may cause its resignation?

These conflicts exist in every aspect of the committee system that one discusses. When one gets into discussion of the functions of the committee as we know it, doing the legislative function primarily and the examination of the estimates—a separate function, again—the question becomes: Can the committee carry on and take that independent step to become a committee of inquiry? I do not mean within the scope of the Inquiries Act, but inquiring into parliamentary business and affairs and, logically following from that, making recommendations that are not initiated by Parliament, that are not an order of reference from Parliament to the committee on a specific aspect but that are of independent origin within the committee itself.

It follows logically, if one supports that view, that the motion for concurrence of such committee reports becomes an automatic feature. Here again immediately we get into an automatic motion for concurrence; we are thrust right back into the House of Commons and the whole question of government majority. Indeed, if the committee's report contains minority features or in fact goes further and contains recommendations against government policy, then what is the position of the government in face of a motion for concurrence which, even if it is not debated, has to be voted upon?

The sum and substance is that whatever questions are set, if we are to have a parliamentary system the government majority pervades that system. If we were to attempt to remove that feature of government majority from the parliamentary system we would have something different that has to be constituted by a new set of rules for the Parliament pertaining to the life of the government—an element of defeat. I am not suggesting this is all bad. I have held to the view for a long time that the country would be better off with a complete parliamentary system if elections were held at fixed periods.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jerome: That is just one feature that could be introduced which I think would go a long way toward achieving the objective without going entirely to the congressional system.

Lastly, Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word about the facilities of the committees because this is very important. I say it in this vein: when we examine the questions before us, which has the greater priority—to enact further changes in the committee system, or to ensure that we have taken from the existing committee system all the benefits that are there? I think at the present time we have not derived all the benefits that exist in the committee system. To a great extent this is because of lack of proper facilities, lack of proper staff, lack of funds that might be looked at as research assistance, and staff for the committee system as such.

I can see that we could go to well established physical committee facilities where offices and a secretariat would be maintained to support that committee regardless of its chairman, whichever party he belonged to, and the chairman could occupy an office containing the files of the committee, continuing its work, giving it some longevity and continuity. I would consider that priority to be higher than further substantive changes, because we have come to live with the changes we made last time around. I would consider it a higher priority to try to improve the facilities we have at the present time and make the existing committee system more functional than it is before introducing further substantive changes.

It would be impossible, in my opinion, for any government worthy of the name to exist and to maintain that it was not examining and continuing a study of the committee system. I advocate, and will continue to advocate, that any Parliament must examine not only its committee system but must examine it on a constant basis, not intermittently or by special order of reference or the rules of the House. The mechanics for doing this, when we agree that it should be done, then raise the question of power.

I submit the Committee on Procedure and organization should have the continuing power to review any ruling or proceeding of this House, including the committee system, and it should have the right at any time to request that that committee review a specific rule or a group of rules pertaining to a particular practice or procedure of the House, and that the committee be required within a reasonable time to return to the House its recommendations and that machinery be developed to take action on them. As it is now, the Committee on Procedure and Organization cannot consider procedure or organization unless the House gives it a specific order of reference. That is not as it should be.

I wish to assure the hon. member at least of my personal interest, and I am sure I divulge no secrets when I say it is in the interest of the government as a whole to continue to examine the functioning of our committee system and all our practices and procedures. This government is doing that, and I am sure will continue to do it in an effort to make sure that we maximize the return from the committee system as it exists and endeavour to implement any sensible and intelligent recommendation for substantive change, however great it may be, if it would be an improvement which would make the role of the member more efficient in all his functions in this House.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): I will be brief, Mr. Speaker, in the hope that others who are active in committee work can speak on this matter. I think this is a good motion and it has my wholehearted support. It is the type of motion that could well be considered by committee in detail. The parliamentary secretary has outlined quite well the comparison between our system and the American system as far as committee work is concerned. Those of us who were in Washington last week noted the differences when we saw a joint committee in operation there.

As the parliamentary secretary said, we appreciate the everyday problems that we have if we follow their type of committee system and then have to superimpose on the results two entirely different systems of government. But we have nothing to be ashamed of, in my opinion, Mr. Speaker. I think we have made very great strides in the last six years, but this does not mean that we have not a long way to go.

There is one point that I want to mention which might come under section (b) of the motion, "adequate staff support for committees". I feel that in our facilities a tremendous duplication of research is growing. I am pleased that we have the research facilities available to different parties which are doing a good job and are increasingly becoming more efficient. We have a giant research staff in our library, which of course is non-political. Now everybody is in the process of acquiring a second secretary who may be used in the proper way for research in that sense.

I think we have overreacted to research. I am not saying it should be the end of research for everybody, but I suggest that we might take one of these bodies, probably the research facilities connected with the parliamentary library, and detail them in a particular way to the committee work. In this way we would use them to great advantage. We would take out any fears they might have of being partisan if they had direction from the committees. This would add something to the resolution before us.

There are many other suggestions one could make about our committee work, Mr. Speaker. I think we need to specialize more than ever. We should be sitting more regularly and a great deal of attention should be paid to the conflicts that occur in committee sittings. Sometimes committees get going, there is a good chairman and a good group of members—a good rapport—and then they start to look into everything. They should, in my opinion, provide a priority for their work from season to season.

Some ministers pay a great deal of attention to committee work and others do not even know where the committee rooms are. I think that if a minister goes regularly before committees for passage of his estimates and passage of legislation as well as other important matters, the importance of the committees will be enhanced. A minister should not send his parliamentary secretary to deal with these matters, since a parliamentary secretary, with all due respect, has no way of answering some of the political questions that come up.

I feel that there is one important matter that was referred to by the parliamentary secretary. The committee system developed fairly quickly, and the government held the line—I do not criticize them for this—on amendments proposed in committee. Very reluctant was the government to accept any amendments. I think our committee system would be improved if the government accepted amendments moved in committee by opposition as well as government members. That would avoid the sort of clashes we have seen in the House. The other night we saw a parliamentary secretary standing up and moving amendments in the House. Now that the government has assessed the work of the committees, that would be one way it could add to the strength of the committee system.

I hope that this notice of motion is given good attention. I hope it will not be talked out, because it is a good notice of motion and the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland) deserves credit for bringing it forward. We will work, keeping in mind what he has suggested, to make our committee system better. In this day of communication, involvement and credibility it is important for the committees to be a strong arm of government and to create the right impression with the people. It is important for us to produce results that will make this a better nation.

Mr. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I join other hon. members in congratulating the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland) for bringing forward this notice of motion. As the parliamentary secretary indicated, the government at the present moment is looking at the committee system with a view to discovering exactly how it has worked and what its successes and failures have been. We hope there will be an opportunity for the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization to discuss this question with the minister before any report or suggested changes are made to the House.

I think, when we examine the committee system, that it will be important to look, first, at the question of how it has affected the backbencher, the ordinary member of the House of Commons. I think that many of the high hopes the government and members of the opposition had for the committee system when it was first introduced in its present form back in 1964 have not been justified. The reason is quite simple. Basically, Members of Parliament have not participated in committee work to the extent possible. They have not prepared themselves for committee work to the extent that they might or for debate in the House of Commons. The reason is not hard to find. Members of the House of Commons are more accustomed to speaking in the House and their experience has ill-prepared them for the kind of work which must be done in committees.

According to our concepts, the House of Commons was to be the forum for policy debates and for the discussion of broad, general principles and great issues. Committees, on the other hand, would be the forum for discussion of details of legislation. The actual things to be done were to be discussed in committee. The discussion was on a different plane. Whereas Members of Parliament had found it easier to speak in the House of Commons without preparation, since they could get away with statements that were not entirely accurate, they found in committee, for the first time, that their facts and interpretations could be challenged by experts. Consequently, their lack of preparation was not found compatible with the needs of committee work. The committee system brought parliamentarians, for the first time face to face with civil servants and ministers in a way which enabled meaningful dialogue to be undertaken.

Unfortunately, it has struck me from personal observation that Members of Parliament have not yet met that challenge. They have not met it, not because research facilities are not available to them but because they have not utilized to the full research facilities such as the Library of Parliament and other facilities which are available to them through their parties. I had high hopes for the committee system when it was first brought in, and I speak as chairman of a committee. Those high hopes have not been realized. I submit that the members of the House of Commons will need to revise the way in which they go about their work in committee.

One thing bothers me, and this has been alluded to by the parliamentary secretary. The whole concept of what the House of Commons is and how it should operate needs to be clarified. Mr. Speaker, I am a fervent believer in responsible government. That is to say, I am a fervent believer in the system under which parties are responsible for their actions. Personally, I sympathize with some views brought forward from time to time which suggest that individual members should be given much more freedom to express their opinions. However, the point is that we operate under a responsible system of government and if in the eyes of the electorate the government does wrong, the electorate has the opportunity to kick the government out at the next election. Therefore, responsibility is clearly defined.

If the government extends its jurisdiction beyond the House of Commons, so to speak, to the committees, it will need to face its responsibilities in those other jurisdictions, in committees, in the same way as it faces its responsibilities in the House. Such matters then become a question of confidence and a matter of importance to the government. The country would not be well served by a system in which responsibility is diffused over a wide range of agencies of the House of Commons. Personally, I would be unhappy if such a system were introduced. It is bad enough now. We are proliferating independent, quasi-judicial agencies more quickly than our ability to keep track of them. Indeed, the responsibility of government is diffused, and responsibilities under the political part of our system are being diffused through this delegation of responsibility.

In considering any reform of the House of Commons I would be inclined to stick strictly to a system involving the government's being accountable and responsible for its activities. Here we come to the question of allocation of time in debates of the House of Commons. Speaking as a backbencher, I have been extremely frustrated in that I have not had the opportunity to speak in debates in the House, largely because the House has not been subject to an allocation of time rule. This applies to committee proceedings as well. Backbenchers, who are part of our responsible system of government, are always under pressure by government to co-operate and to ensure that legislation is passed. We are only given opportunities to speak when there is an allocation of time agreed to formally or informally.

If hon. members want proof of this they should look at the debate that has been going on today on the subject of co-operatives and credit unions. In this debate an allocation of time was agreed on. They should also look at budget debates, at the Throne Speech debate and at debates on opposition days. On those occasions the whip on the government side has to fight off members who want to speak, because they so seldom have an opportunity in the ordinary course of House business. This factor must be taken into consideration. We cannot consider the committee system and its reform without considering the entire operations of the House of Commons and the way in which the House operates.

May I now turn to the facilities which are made available to committees. I agree with the hon. member for Selkirk. A great deal more could be done to facilitate committee work if the facilities were available. One of our problems in the House of Commons is that we have run out of space. With the fantastic growth of the administration, with the increased number of cabinet ministers and parliamentary secretaries, the result has been that almost no space is available for backbenchers on all sides of the House. We require a substantial increase of space to bring us back to the position we occupied in 1963. This means that there soon must be initiatives taken by the government. Members cannot be effective in the House or in committee if they do not have adequate facilities, adequate space and adequate staff.

One of the duties I perform for caucus is as co-ordinator of the parliamentary intern program. Members have turned down the opportunity to take interns because of a lack of space in their offices. As the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell) pointed out, we are now taking on a second secretary. Many members do not even have enough room in their offices, according to federal civil service regulations, for one secretary and themselves.

This is an indication of how badly the government has bungled its responsibility of providing space on Parliament Hill for Members of Parliament. We attempted to get the government to move on this. They have so far been unwilling to do so. The only suggestion they made results in shoving backbenchers off to the Confederation Building and turning the centre block and the west block into a haven for ministers and their flunkeys. This solution is entirely unsatisfactory and would only go further to widen the gap between the government and the backbenchers of all parties. It seems to me that one of the things opposition members could do with their control over opposition days is to bring this very important matter up as a full two-day vote of confidence. If they did that, I can assure hon. members opposite there would be a large number of government members on this side who would be prepared to vote against the government on that subject.

Mr. Walker: Would the hon. member permit a question? Can he say whether he felt this way when he was the executive assistant to a minister?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Reid: In those days, Mr. Speaker, we only had two offices, one for the minister and one for the secretary. The executive assistant in those days was lodged somewhere in the departmental offices. But I must say that as a backbencher I have far less space available than I ever did as an executive assistant. If Members of Parliament were treated as well as executive assistants, there would be no criticisms and no difficulties from any backbenchers in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reid: The last point I want to make, Mr. Speaker, concerns the proposal made to bring committee reports to the floor of the House of Commons. I think, in general, this is a good idea. Committee reports do not yet get the attention they deserve in the House of Commons. However, to make time for this the opposition will have to give up something. This brings me again to questions of allocation of time. In a responsible system of government, it seems to me the government should have reasonable assurances from the opposition that a program laid out at the beginning of a session should have a reasonable chance of being implemented. At the present time, the government does not have that assurance and is faced with the problem of providing extra time for almost any motion. This is extremely difficult to find simply because there is no guarantee that its legislation will get through, and if there are allocation of time agreements they are always made after the end of a fairly substantial debate.

There are other alternatives available to opposition members—not, unfortunately, to government backbenchers. Opposition members have opposition days available to them. Such opportunities allow them, in a variety of motions, to pinpoint areas of public concern. Why not use these days for the discussion of committee reports? The opportunity is there. Why not use it? Surely the government could have no objection if an opposition member rose in his place and moved that, say, the report of the broadcasting committee of such and such a day be accepted. This would at least force a vote. If the government did not want to do this, and since those reports are generally a question of consensus between majority and minority it would be a very interesting exercise indeed if the opposition were to use it.

One more point I would like to make about the committee system is in terms of the time made available to it. At the present time we have a system where the estimates are brought down and guaranteed to remain for about 2½ or three months in committee. Unfortunately, this means that some 20 committees all receive their estimates at the same time and all rush to hold as many committee meetings as they can, leading to a great deal of congestion, inefficient use of time and competition among them. The result is that the committee structure in terms of the investigation of estimates, leaving out the inefficiency of the backbenchers themselves, leaves a great deal to be desired, although it is incomparably better than it ever was in the days when the estimates where brought before committee of the whole in the House of Commons.

The suggestion has been made many times by backbenchers that the government should to create a system in which so many committees would receive their estimates at varying times of the year. There are approximately 20 committees. Why not divide them into thirds and have a third of the committees take their estimates in the fall term, then the next could come in the spring term and the balance could be discussed in what is known as the summer term. In that way a great deal of the congestion would be reduced. The government, knowing what legislation it was likely to have and, hopefully, under some form of allocation of time formula, would have agreement with the opposition parties as to when they might expect legislation to be passed. It would be possible to work out a schedule that while still tentative would be a lot better than the ad hoc system under which we are operating.

Even though the government has attempted to put more planning into the presentation of its legislation, because there is no agreement on the disposition of such legislation there can therefore be no real planning for the activities of committees. I think this is another frustration which members develop, and which could be eased with a little co-operation across the floor of the House. As I say, if you accept the concept of a responsible government, of a responsible Parliament, then you must move into these new directions quickly.

The hon. member for Selkirk in his opening remarks made the point that many citizen groups are objecting to the concentration of power which is now found in the hands of governments at all levels. One of the reasons for this is that not only is there a centralizing tendency going on at all levels of government, each government stretching out to obtain as much authority and power as it can in order to enhance itself, to blow itself up into a greater whole than it was designed to be, but also that in the exercise of that power governments have not been exactly wholesome, not particularly well-advised and they have made a tremendous number of blunders.

One of the reasons this has come to pass is that Members of Parliament have failed to arm themselves with the weapons which are available to them, have not exploited them properly and have wasted too much of their time in what seems to be competition for political Brownie points and, unfortunately, have not made the committee system the effective, efficient weapon it might be in the hands of all backbenchers.

Mr. Lundrigan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, a number of hon. members, including the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Walker), the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Bigg) and myself wished to take part in this debate. I understand that according to discussions which have taken place in the last few minutes there is a general feeling that the motion might be permitted to stand in its present place of priority on the order paper. I believe the leader of the House is in agreement with that proposition.

Mr. Walker: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, this is probably one of the most most important subjects we have had before us for a long time. Many of us would like to have an opportunity to speak. There is precedent for a motion such as this to retain its position on the order paper with the consent of the House. I hope this debate can be carried on the next time notices of motion are before us.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Hon. members know, of course, that this can only be done by unanimous consent. Does the House consent to the motion of the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland) to retaining its present place on the order paper?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): It is so ordered.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. The hour assigned to the consideration of private members' business has now expired. It being five o'clock, this House stands adjourned till two o'clock Monday afternoon.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

YOUTH

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity.

In so far as there has been an announcement by the Quebec Minister of Education in the Quebec National Assembly to the effect that new criteria have been agreed to relative to Opportunity for Youth projects in that province, and as the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) has not informed the House of Commons of this agreement, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. McCutcheon):

That this House do direct the Secretary of State to appear before a special committee on youth established by this House for the purpose of discussing:

a) any agreements reached with the province of Quebec concerning the Opportunities for Youth Program;

b) the as yet unpublished evaluation of last year's Opportunities for Youth program;

c) the task force report on youth;

d) the planning that should be under way now for summer, 1972.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

METHOD OF COUNTING UNEMPLOYED—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 which provides that in cases of urgent and pressing necessity a motion may be made if unanimous consent is given by the House. The matter of urgent and pressing necessity is the report that the government intends to employ a new method of counting unemployed persons.

Mr. Speaker, if vigorous action is to be taken to find work for those unemployed, nothing should be done to obscure or minimize the total of those needing jobs at this critical time. Consequently I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration be asked to make a full study and report on any alternative proposals for totalling those out of work before the government sets about juggling the jobless.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

ALBERTA—PROPOSED CULTURAL-EDUCATIONAL CENTRE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I rise to request the unanimous consent of the House, under Standing Order 43, to propose a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. This matter is the confrontation that has developed between the government and the Indian Association of Alberta over the implementation of a cabinet policy to consider the pilot stage of a cultural-educational centre for the Indians of Alberta in order to partially relieve the grievous and distressful conditions, especially in education, that have existed for some time among the Indian peoples of Alberta. I would therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

That the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development inquire into the cabinet policy of the 29 July 1971 set out in a cabinet document titled "The Cabinet Committee on Social Policy—Record of Committee decision—Native Cultural-Educational Centres", and signed by D. J. Leach, Supervisor of Cabinet Documents, together with a letter to the president of the Indian Association of Alberta, signed by the Assistant Deputy Minister, Indian and Eskimo Affairs, and dated August 26, 1971; a telegram dated October 6, 1971, signed by the president of the Indian Association of Alberta and addressed to the secretary of the Prime Minister, among others; a telegram from the principal secretary of the Prime Minister to the said president dated 7 October 1971 and a telegram in reply from the president to the principal secretary of the same date: and that the committee report its findings to the House as quickly as possible together with its recommendations on the steps that must be taken to repair the breakdown in communications between the government and the Indians of Alberta.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Athabasca has anticipated my motion. Inasmuch as there was not unanimous consent for his motion, I see little purpose in attempting to move mine.

INTERPRETATION OF PROVISIONS CITIZENSHIP ACT BY JUDGES OF CITIZENSHIP COURT

Question No. 1,798—Mr. Coates:

1. Is a judge of a citizenship court allowed any discretion in interpreting the provisions of the Citizenship Act when processing citizenship applications from British subjects and aliens and, if so (a) to what extent (b) on what authority?

2. Is the government aware of any misinterpretation of any section of the Citizenship Act as it applies to British subjects and aliens by any judge of any citizenship court and, if so (a) what court misinterpreted the act (b) what judge rendered the decision (c) what action was taken by government to rectify the situation?

3. In conservation or briefings of judges by officials of the Citizenship Branch of the Department of the Secretary of State, has any judge challenged the act or any sections of the act pertaining to British subjects and aliens and, if so (a) which judge (b) from which citizenship court (c) what decision was rendered by the Department?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): 1. The minister may, in his discretion, grant citizenship to an alien who satisfies a citizenship court with respect to the statutory qualifications. The court is required to interpret and apply those portions of the Citizenship Act and Regulations which relate to this type of applicant. No jurisdiction arises in a Court in connection with an application for citizenship by a British subject unless, in the opinion of the minister, there is a doubt as to whether the applicant possesses the required qualifications and the minister refers the case to a Court. If a referral occurs, the application is then heard by a Court as in the case of an alien application.

2. So far as it is possible to determine, no.

3. Mr. O. J. Godin has alleged that certain sections of the Citizenship Act give preferential treatment to British subjects. The act does permit British subjects to make application for citizenship direct to the minister instead of through a Court. The act is being administered by the department according to its provisions.

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Motor Vehicle Safety Branch of the Department of Transport is now studying such proposals to determine whether they achieve the intended purpose of serving to inform purchasers of tires as to the characteristics of the various grades. MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

ALBERTA—PROPOSED CULTURAL-EDUCATIONAL CENTRE

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of proposing a motion under Standing Order 26. I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the decision by the Cabinet Committee on Social Policy, being a confidential document of cabinet which was leaked, confirmed on July 29, 1971, that since the Indian Association of Alberta in March, 1970, was the first to present a proposal for a cultural-educational centre, the pilot stage of that proposal be the first to be considered for approval by the standing subcommittee; and the subsequent decision to proceed with that pilot stage which was disapproved and cancelled by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, thus destroying the effectiveness of the organization of the Indian people in Alberta and their participation in ongoing programs.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Skeena has filed the notice required under Standing Order 26. The hon. member suggests that there should be a suspension of the scheduled work of the House for the purpose of considering a decision which he states was taken in July last and subsequently withdrawn by ministerial decision.

These decisions are said to relate to the establishment of cultural-educational facilities as proposed by the Indian Association of Alberta in 1970. All this may be of national importance and of national interest, but I am quite convinced that it is not a situation which should be considered by the House under the terms of Standing Order 26. It may well be that the matter should be discussed by the House, but I would think other opportunities should be available to hon. members to discuss the matter, as suggested by Standing Order 26. What I am suggesting to the hon. member and to hon. members who are interested in this very important matter, as indicated by the motion made under Standing Order 43 earlier this day, is that there should be other opportunities to debate this matter and that in any event it should not be considered at this time by way of an emergency debate. I therefore regret that the hon. member's motion cannot be put at this time.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

PROPOSED CULTURAL-EDUCATIONAL CENTRES—CABINET DECISION—RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF CO-OPERATION WITH INDIAN ASSOCIATION OF ALBERTA

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the Cabinet Committee on Social Policy did decide in the month of July in principle that the Department of the Secretary of State and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development be authorized to establish jointly a five-year renewable financing program for the support of native cultural-educational centres, as appears to be the content of what purports to be a copy of a record of the committee's decision? Was such a decision made and, if so, is there any particular reason why it has not been announced in the House?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I think the House will agree that it is not proper for any minister or for myself to refer to discussions in cabinet and decisions taken in cabinet until such time as the government wishes to make such an announcement.

Mr. Stanfield: Do I understand that the Prime Minister refuses to confirm or deny that what purports to be a record of the decision is in fact a record of such a decision?

Mr. Trudeau: Do I understand that the Leader of the Opposition disagrees with this stance under the constitutional law?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: When is a leak not a leak, Mr. Speaker?

• (2:20 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Heavy water leaks.

Mr. Nesbitt: You guys had better hire a plumber.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the Leader of the Opposition might be given an opportunity to ask his supplementary question.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, in view of the announced intention of the Indian Association of Alberta to discontinue involvement with the federal government in any programs in areas such as education and others in which it had been participating and the serious effect this may have on future progress in working out problems associated with the native peoples in that province, indeed in the whole of Canada, does the Prime Minister intend to propose any particular measures with a view to repairing this breakdown in co-operation and communication between the government and this important association of Indian people?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the minister responsible for Indian affairs has always indicated willingness to consult and co-operate with the Indian people to a degree which I believe is unequalled compared with any previous time. If an association wants to go out of existence there is, of course, nothing the government can do about it. But we stand ready at all times to discuss our Indian policies with the Indians, with the opposition, indeed with anyone at all.

EDUCATION—REQUEST FOR INQUIRY BY STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Not only because of the particular situation relating to the education of Indian children in Alberta but elsewhere as well, would the Prime Minister and the government be prepared to put a motion on the order paper to have this subject matter examined in public by the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is referring to a motion in this session he probably knows that the session is well advanced. The House is very busy meeting in committee of the whole, and it has been the policy of the government to avoid parliamentary committee meetings as much as possible when the House is in committee of the whole so that we may be able to make progress with the business before the House. However, this does not mean that the minister is not prepared to discuss his policies when they come before the House, or to answer questions. The minister will be in the House tomorrow, and I believe the next day also, and will be willing to answer any questions on this subject.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as there has been almost a complete breakdown in communication between the minister and the Indian people, in view of their reluctance to proceed any further in their dealings with him, and in view of the fact that there was a well established and fine relationship existing when the minister presently in charge of housing was responsible for Indian affairs, would the Prime Minister consider making some switches in portfolios to get things back on the track?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

ALBERTA—PROPOSED CULTURAL-EDUCATIONAL CENTRE—EFFECT OF STUDENTS' STRIKE ON PROVISION OF FUNDS

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister assure the House that action on the decision arrived at on July 29 will in no way be affected by the dispute over educational facilities in Alberta at this time?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): What decision is the hon. member referring to, Mr. Speaker? I did not understand his question.

Mr. Yewchuk: I will rephrase the question. Can the Prime minister assure the House that the decision by the government to grant funds for the purpose of establishing an Indian educational and cultural centre in Alberta will not be affected by the fact that there is a strike being staged by Indian students in northeastern Alberta?

Mr. Trudeau: There was no decision to hold a conference. I do not know what the hon. member is referring to.

Mr. Yewchuk: My reference was to the fact that the Indian Association has not received funds which were supposed to be forthcoming for this centre. As a supplementary question, have the RCMP been called in to investigate this new leak of July 29, and not last week's leak about a cabinet decision on foreign investment?

[Mr. Howard (Skeena).]

Mr. Trudeau: Now that I understand the previous question, Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that obviously the government cannot give funds to everyone in Canada who requests funds, but the record of the present government and of the minister in this regard is pretty good. I believe he doubled, during his mandate of three years, the amount of funds available to Indians over amounts that had been available to them before. So there is no lack of funds; there is a great deal of funds—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps we might return to this question in a moment. We will be running short of time. I see that the Leader of the Opposition wants to pursue the matter. He will be recognized after we have finished the first round of questions. The hon. member for Brant.

CORNWALL—LAY-OFF OF EMPLOYEES AT COURTAULD PLANT—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the hon. member for Stormont-Dundas is unable to ask a question in his capacity as Speaker during the question period—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member kindly resume his seat. If the hon. member has a question to ask he should ask it directly. As Speaker I take exception to the preamble to the hon. member's question. He should ask the question directly.

Mr. Blackburn: My question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Would the Minister of Finance inform the House whether the government has any plans for the 225 men to be laid off at the Courtauld plant in Cornwall on December 3?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think this question should be addressed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

An hon. Member: What good would that do?

GRANTS TO GOLDEN EAGLE—ALLEGED PURCHASE OF MATERIALS IN ENGLAND

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

In view of the substantial federal grants the Golden Eagle Oil Company has received from the federal government for its Saint-Romuald plant, can the minister tell us whether he knows that no Canadian company or firm has been able to sell steel or paint to this company because it uses government grants to make all its purchases in England?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I seriously doubt whether the hon. member's question is in order. If the minister can reply briefly, I shall allow him to do so but it seems to me that such a question could normally be placed on the order paper.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply will be very brief, Mr. Speaker. The fact is that Golden Eagle obtained a grant under the former system, with no conditions attached. Under the new act, there is a fundamental requirement that materials be purchased in Canada, when available.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

ALBERTA—PROPOSED CULTURAL-EDUCATIONAL CENTRE—POSSIBLE DELAY IN IMPLEMENTATION BECAUSE OF SCHOOL DISPUTE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister arising out of his statement a moment ago with regard to the proposed educational centre in Alberta that the government does not have funds to support every proposition. May I ask the Prime Minister whether this is an appropriate answer in view of the confirmation by cabinet on July 29 of the assertion that "the first to present a proposal for a cultural-educational centre" was the Indian Association of Alberta and that a pilot stage of that proposal would be the first to be considered for approval by the standing subcommittee? Why has this matter not been proceeded with and is it a fact that a condition precedent to going forward with it is settlement of the school dispute in northeastern Alberta with the co-operation of the Indian Association? In other words, is the settlement of that dispute in fact holding up this proposal that the cabinet did in fact approve?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the question is based on what the Leader of the Opposition says is a cabinet document. I repeat that I will not discuss what went on in cabinet and what decisions may or may not have been taken there on the substance of an issue. Of course the government has money to assist Indians. I have just said that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development doubled the amount of assistance to Indians over the past two and a half or three years, so there is money available. I am just saying we cannot give it to everybody all the time right away, and if an association wants to will itself out of existence and do it on television it is perfectly free to do so. It will not exert pressure on the government in that way, however.

POST OFFICE

NEGOTIATIONS TO AVOID DISRUPTION OF CHRISTMAS MAIL DELIVERY—AGREEMENT ON HIRING OF CASUALS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): I have a question for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Postmaster General. In the absence of the Postmaster General can the parliamentary secretary report to the House on the current negotiations under way to avoid disruption of Christmas mail service, and in particular can he indicate whether agreement has been reached to resolve the problem of the hiring of casuals?

Mr. Gerald Richard Cobbe (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, to my knowledge the discussions are still taking place. When official decisions are made I am sure the House will be totally informed by the minister.

Mr. Dinsdale: In view of the urgency of the matter can the right hon. Prime Minister assure the House that the Postmaster General will make a statement on motions so that the growing anxiety in the country with respect to Christmas mail delivery may be allayed?

• (2:30 p.m.)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I certainly will communicate that request to the minister. I believe he is to be in the House tomorrow. I will ask him to give very urgent consideration to that request.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ATMOSPHERIC NUCLEAR EXPLOSION BY PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA—SOURCE OF GOVERNMENT INFORMATION

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is further to a question addressed to the Prime Minister on Friday. Can the minister advise whether the government has now learned of the Chinese nuclear explosion? If so, can he advise if such information came from the government of China, our own monitoring devices or from the governments of other countries?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have been getting information from a number of sources confirming that there was a nuclear explosion. Some of this information came from monitoring and seismic devices we have in Canada. Other information came from other countries. None of it came directly from the Chinese government.

LIFT PROGRAM—REQUESTS TO FARMERS FOR REPAYMENT—POSSIBLE COURT ACTION

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture. Is the government asking some 4,168 western farmers to refund some of the money they were paid under the Lift program, and is the minister going to publish exactly how much money is involved in total?

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as was said in reply to a question on the same subject the other day, we have information on how many refunds there have been up to now. We have given the figures regarding those who have already paid back the money. We have also given figures regarding those who have replied and explained what took place and we have settled those files. I suppose that within a few weeks more files will be settled to the satisfaction of all people.

Mr. Murta: With regard to the ones that are outstanding, is the government preparing any form of court action against the farmers concerned in this matter? If so, will a statement be made to the House to this effect?

Mr. Lessard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I suppose if moneys are owing to the government and those moneys are not repaid by the people involved, some action will have to be taken. I hope all hon. members will agree with us when we suggest that some action will have to be taken to recover those funds.

ENERGY

NATURAL GAS—GOVERNMENT INTERVENTION TO ASSURE FAIR PRICE TO WESTERN CANADA PRODUCERS AND TO CONSUMERS EAST OF ALBERTA

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Since Friday's gas export ruling of the National Energy Board confirms the near-monopoly position of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited as a wholesale purchaser of natural gas for consumption outside British Columbia and Alberta, can the Prime Minister indicate if the government is presently considering intervening in the pricing process of the industry to assure a fair return to western Canada's gas producers as well as a fair price to consumers east of Alberta?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will have to take notice of the question. I will be glad to refer it to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources for a reply.

Mr. Mahoney: In view of the circumstances already cited, will action by the government of Alberta to manipulate the price of natural gas in order to protect producers and provincial revenues from the Trans-Canada Pipe Line monopoly without regard to prices to be charged to consumers be acceptable to the government?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question sounds more like an argument than a question.

CONSULTATION WITH ALBERTA RESPECTING NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In light of statements made by the Premier of Alberta this weekend and in light of renewed energy negotiations with the United States, will the government agree to ongoing consultations with Alberta on the energy talks under way with the United States? If so, when will such consultations with Alberta begin?

[Mr. Lessard (Lac-Saint-Jean).]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I told the Premier of Alberta when I met him a week or two ago that we would welcome any input from the Alberta government into our information on our policies.

An hon. Member: You met him last week.

Mr. Trudeau: I had a meeting with him before last week but the hon. member was not aware of it.

RECONSIDERATION BY NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD OF REFUSAL OF NATURAL GAS EXPORT APPLICATIONS

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. As requested by the government of Alberta, will the government of Canada request the National Energy Board to reconsider its refusal to allow further exports of natural gas at this time?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my understanding of the law is that the government is not in a position to ask the National Energy Board to reconsider its refusal. The matter comes before the Governor in Council only when an order for export is approved. When it is denied the government, under the statute as set up, cannot intervene to exercise pressure on the board, which is independent.

INDUSTRY

INQUIRY AS TO ADDITIONAL FINANCIAL AID

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of reports that appeared during the weekend, may I ask if it is the government's intention to provide additional aid to private industry to the tune of $190 million? If so, will the details of such a plan be made known to the House this week?

An hon. Member: Raise your right hand!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Additional aid to what, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Additional to the $80 million already provided to private industry.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is referring to the GAAP program—I believe the story in the newspapers referred to that—the hon. member should consult the estimates and he will see that we have nothing in mind in that regard. The minister will be able to explain it when his estimates come before the House.

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. Has the government approved a further $158 million assistance plan for Canadian manufacturers who have been hurt by the U.S. import surcharge or other American protective measures? If so, when will an official announcement be made?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I believe this is the same question in another form and my answer is the same. The government has some intentions. They are expressed in the supplementary estimates which were tabled a few days ago. The minister will gladly explain their intent at greater length when he defends his estimates.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the Prime Minister's statement about the minister being prepared to answer questions when his estimates are before the House, will the Prime Minister assure us that those estimates will be before the House during the present session and that the minister concerned will answer questions in defending his estimates before the House during the present session?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if the Leader of the Opposition is anxious to have this particular subject discussed he could, of course, use one of the opposition days to do that.

Mr. Stanfield: The Prime Minister should read the rules again.

PUBLIC SERVICE

ALLEGED HIRING OF UNILINGUAL TRANSLATORS FROM FRANCE

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State.

In answer to a question that I asked him some time ago, the Secretary of State said that he would investigate and tell the House how many unilingual translators from France, hired by the Bureau for translations, were now taking intensive courses to improve their knowledge of English. Could he tell us now how many such persons are taking those courses?

Mr. Speaker: May I suggest to the hon. member that such a question should normally be put on the order paper. The hon. member is asking for strictly statistical information. In general, such questions should be put on the order paper. The hon. member states that the question has already been asked and that the minister has agreed to give the required information. Considering the circumstances and if the figures are immediately available, the minister may answer the question. Otherwise, it should be put on the order paper.

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, the hon. member was too long in coming back to his question. I have had the answer with precise figures in the folder in front of me for many weeks; but I note that it has now disappeared. I shall therefore answer the question if it is put on the order paper.

ALLEGED INEFFECTIVENESS OF POLICIES IN QUEBEC—MEETING WITH PREMIER—DISCUSSION OF CRITICISMS WITH ATLANTIC PROVINCES' PREMIERS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of statements made by the Prime Minister of Quebec to the effect that government policies have been ineffective in that province in ending regional disparities, does the minister intend to meet with the Prime Minister of Quebec to discuss this very important matter?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I called the Prime Minister of Quebec this morning and he told me he had never said that. He said he was referring to taxes and not to the regional program which he supports entirely.

Mr. McGrath: Does the minister intend to meet with or call the premiers of the four Atlantic provinces, as requested in the report of the Atlantic Development Council, to discuss criticisms aimed at his policies in the Atlantic provinces?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I met with them last week and all of them were very happy with what we were doing in Nova Scotia, in New Brunswick, in P.E.I. and in Newfoundland.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Témiscamingue wish to put a supplementary question?

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Yes, Mr. Speaker and I note that at least the Minister of Regional Expansion is pleased.

Can the minister say whether before earmaking any funds for economic expansion purposes—whether in Quebec or in the Maritimes—he communicates with the authorities of that province?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Yes, Mr. Speaker. We have set up offices in each province and every step is taken in co-operation with provincial authorities.

RE-EVALUATION OF POLICIES IN LIGHT OF CRITICISMS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Notwithstanding the answer given by the minister to the House, in light of the unanimous criticisms aimed at his policies by all the agencies involved, including agencies under his jurisdiction such as the Atlantic Development Council and the Canadian Council on Rural Development, does the minister intend to re-evaluate the effectiveness of the present DREE policies in ending regional disparity?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I absolutely refuse to answer a question the premises of which are false—

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF ZENITH TELEPHONE NUMBERS FOR INQUIRIES ABOUT NEW ACT

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): My question is for the Minister of Labour. It arises out of a full page advertisement in Weekend magazine glamourizing the provisions of the new Unemployment Insurance Act and asking citizens to drop in or telephone the nearest Unemployment Insurance Commission office. In light of this invitation, will the minister suggest or advise the commission to establish Zenith telephone numbers so that those people who may be 200, 300 or 400 miles away from the nearest office may be able to have the same facility of access as those living in urban centres?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): We have this type of operation in many parts of Canada, Mr. Speaker. Whether or not it should be expanded is another question. I will take notice of the hon. member's representation. If he can be more specific, we will see whether this would be useful in particular areas.

SUGGESTED RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF OFFICE IN YUKON

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Assuming that the advertisement is an invitation to all Canadians to avail themselves of the services of the unemployment insurance offices, I ask the minister whether he will consider re-establishing in the Yukon a functioning unemployment insurance office to which the citizens there could have access?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): I will inquire from the commission and see if such a suggestion is realistic. If it is, I will be glad to do it.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): I have a question for the Secretary of State. In view of the educational and historic value and the excellent quality of the CBC series, "The Tenth Decade", will the minister see that prints of this series are made available for distribution to schools across Canada?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I believe the distribution of magnetoscopic picture tapes poses a number of technical problems, as well as a number of problems with regard to labour contracts signed with the authors and artists. However, I have had the opportunity of discussing this matter with the management of the CBC but these talks are not yet completed.

Mr. Speaker: I believe the hon. member for Ontario has a supplementary to his previous question.

Mr. Cafik: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister satisfied with the legislation presently in effect with regard to the granting of pardons to persons who were formerly found guilty of indictable offences and, if not, does he plan to introduce legislation to amend the present law?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The second part of the question would be in order. The hon. member knows I have often taken exception to questions which simply invite a minister to state whether he is satisfied or dissatisfied with a situation. At that point the hon. member is asking for an opinion. The second part of the question is quite in order.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I will draw the second part of the question to the attention of the Solicitor General whose responsibility it would be to amend that law.

YOUTH

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—AGREEMENTS WITH QUEBEC AND OTHER PROVINCES—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON 1971 ACTIVITIES AND 1972 PLANS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): My question is for the Secretary of State. It concerns the announcement last week by the Minister of Education in the National Assembly of Quebec relative to a number of agreements concerning next year's Opportunities for Youth program. Can the minister indicate whether there has been a final or even an intermediate agreement with the government of Quebec and whether such consultations and agreements exist with other provinces? Also, in view of the late date when may we expect to hear some report on this year's program and some statement with regard to next year's plans?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is right in saying "agreement" since, in fact, there has not been any formal agreement with any of the provinces visited, that is, neither with Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, nor with Quebec. This is where we stand in our consultations. We propose to them a certain number of ideas; some of these seem interesting to them, and they accept them; others are rejected, and we do likewise on our side. We speak all the less firmly that the pursuit of the Opportunities for Youth program has not yet been the subject of any final decision.

As for the report, I apologize to the House for the delay in tabling it, but this is a matter of data processing and the task force responsible for producing the report is working very hard at this.

As for deadlines, we will be meeting them much better this year than we did last year, if it is decided that the program should be taken up again under the same form as last year.

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): The minister did not indicate whether three firm agreements had in fact been arrived at with the province of Quebec, nor did he indicate when there would be some statement with regard to the general criteria that would be applied. I understand there has been a special task force at work doing this evaluation. I wonder why it should take so long to make some statement, now a month or a month and a half overdue?

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member understood the last part of my reply, in which I said that I quite agreed with him, and was hoping to be able to table this report as soon as possible.

As far as the agreement is concerned, he also misunderstood the first part of my reply, which was that there obviously could not be an agreement with any province on a program whose continuation had not yet been definitely decided upon.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will look into this matter and see if the facts are as alleged. I know that the minister is in Vancouver today. It may be that while we are talking he is consulting such groups as have been referred to by the hon. member.

Have there been any definite objections raised by the Premier and, if so, what has the answer been in regard to this very important matter?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, at the federal-provincial conference last week the Premier of Quebec did tell me that he was sending me a letter on this matter to explain his position vis-à-vis the position of the federal government. I have not to this date studied his representations, but I hope to do so soon.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUPPLYING OF AUTO PACT INFORMATION BY EMBASSY OFFICIALS TO U.S. SENATORS PRIOR TO VOTE ON EXEMPTION OF CANADA FROM SURTAX

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Would the minister inform the House whether or not, prior to the debate that took place in the United States Senate a week ago Saturday which led to a vote that, if it had been resolved in the affirmative, would have exempted Canada from the imposition of the United States surcharge, officials of the Canadian embassy in the United States informed members of the U.S. Senate on the question of the auto pact and, more particularly, whether or not Canada had reneged on the auto pact?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I find that question very complicated. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would simplify it and I might be able to answer.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, my question is whether or not Canadian officials at our embassy in Washington took steps, prior to the vote a week ago Saturday in the U.S. Senate, to inform U.S. Senators about Canada's position on the Canada-U.S. automotive agreement?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, our position on the agreement is probably well known, but any negotiations that have taken place have been between embassy officials and members of the United States administration.

[Later:]

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, might I put a further question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs following the answer he gave me. Do I understand the minister to say that, in terms of important questions or problems that exist between Canada and the United States, the government of Canada has direct contact in regard to the provision of information and so on only with part of the executive branch of the United States government and does not deal with the legislative branch?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I think we take much the same view as would be taken of efforts by the administration of the United States to deal directly with Members of Parliament here. It would be permissible but sometimes does not produce the best results.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

At today's meeting with key Canadian business leaders is the Prime Minister going to outline the thinking of the government on the idea of a special screening mechanism, and canvass their views and suggestions regarding guidelines for such a mechanism?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the meeting has already taken place and this question did not arise.

INDICATION TO BUSINESS LEADERS OF WILLINGNESS TO AMEND COMPETITION AND LABOUR CODE BILLS—DISCUSSION OF PRICE AND WAGE CONTROLS

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether the right hon. gentleman indicated to the business leaders that the government was willing to make changes in the competition bill act and in the bill to amend the Canada Labour Code?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I did not.

COMPETITION BILL

SUGGESTED WITHDRAWAL FOR REDRAFTING

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the royal shafting the minister received during his speaking engagements across the country, and particularly last Wednesday when he addressed businessmen in Edmonton, would the minister now withdraw the contentious competition bill and before redrafting it contact the business sector of Canada so that businessmen too may bring in some recommendations?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I spoke at a luncheon given by the Edmonton Chamber of Commerce and I thought received a good reception from a very intelligent audience there. Certainly they went away with the clear understanding that this was a proposed piece of legislation and that, in so far as they could show that it had practical difficulties, we on the government side had a very open mind and would listen to any comments or suggestions.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, my question was: Is the minister going to withdraw the bill before the end of the session and redraft it?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is so keenly interested in this subject that I thought he would have read my speeches on the subject since June 29, all of which have—

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed, from Friday, November 19, consideration in committee of Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act—Mr. Benson—Mr. Honey in the chair.

The Chairman: Order. In accordance with the statement of the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council as recorded at page 9677 of Hansard for November 18, 1971, the committee will now proceed to sections 2, 17, 56 and 58 inclusive, 90 to 95 inclusive, 113 to 116 inclusive, 126, 133, 134, 212, 219 and 257 dealing with international income. I must bring to the attention of the committee that sections 56, 57, 58 and 126 have already been agreed to.

On Clause 1—Section 2: Tax payable by persons resident in Canada.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Chairman, the provisions relating to the taxation of foreign source income set out in the bill to amend the Income Tax Act introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) differ very little from the corresponding proposals set out in his 1969 white paper. In that document the governement put forward the following position:

> The over-all thrust of Canada's present provisions for taxing the Canadian income of non-residents is generally regarded as reasonable.

The changes envisaged in Bill C-259 involve a number of structural changes in the treatment of foreign source income of Canadian residents. The two broad concepts remain: taxing Canadians on their world-wide income and the granting of relief in respect of foreign taxes. What is the importance of this? I think it is self-evident because in 1970 Canada received $513 million in interest and dividends on foreign holdings which was a 74 per cent increase over the 1967 revenue of $295 million. In 1967, Canadian direct investments abroad represented a book value of $4 billion out of total long-term investments with a book value of $8 billion. Canadian direct investment abroad in 1970 was $215 million exclusive of undistributed profits. So, it can be seen that this is an extremely important part of the proposed tax changes.

In speaking on this section relating to international income, I think it would be an understatement to say that this aspect of external international income and this part of the tax reform have undergone radical alteration since the white paper and even since the drafting of this bill. The effect of the United States surtax of August 15 most radically altered our concept of what changes in taxation of international income should occur. Although financial authorities throughout the world, including our own Canadian experts, have been warning that the United States balance of payments position had to be corrected at some time, still our own drafters of tax law completely forgot about the possibilities of changes in the outside world, especially in respect of such a great trader as the United States.

The whole thrust of Bill C-259 has been that we could demand of capital in our own hands, as well as that invested in our country, complete acquiescence, in the hope that capital would come in and be operated in a manner which we expect, and in the hope that the tax structure would be so arranged that all enterprise would be directed for the public good—whatever interpretation the government may put on that phrase—with the profit factor being of secondary consideration. In the matter of international income, the action of the United States government brought home to us that we cannot always have it both ways. They have served notice on us that we cannot expect the United States market to be open to us always and open to our multi-national companies without regard to their own position.

The ill-fated Gray report that would have set up a so-called screening agency is just an extention of what has already been happening to a large extent in our foreign capital transactions which affect our international economy. Altogether we have been screening foreign investment for some time; we prevented the sale of Dennison Mines to United States interests and we prevented the sale of Home Oil also to United States interests, presumably on the basis that some part of the oil industry should be Canadian owned. We have to consider the taxation of international income in light of all the things that Canada must do in international affairs. The government has not prevented the take-over of Supertest by B.P. Canada presumably because it is an English company and not a United States company.

Canada has to re-assess its international relations in the matter of foreign capital and trade. There is no more obvious fact than that Canada is situated on the North American continent and the flow of trade will increasingly revert to north and south as opposed to east and west. The severing of our links with Great Britain has set us in a period of drift and has inevitably forced us in matters of trade to the recognition that we are becoming more and more continentalists. Especially in western Canada, the north and south pull is enormous and all Canadians, especially those who feel that Toronto and Montreal decide for the Canadian nation what course it will follow, will encounter severe controversy and objection. The whole new course that Canada must chart in the matter of foreign investment is inevitably bound up with international taxation. Canada will have to assess its trade relations with the United States, and this will encompass all manner of arrangements from free trade, in some single commodities, such as the auto pact, to a customs union, which has been advocated by the Premier of British Columbia.

The problem of international taxation is bound up with the fact that the most urgent needs of Canada for the future seem to be those in which this government has been the least successful, that is, economic growth and some sense of effective Canadian participation in the world at large. As to the latter and its relation to economic growth, this is important to Canada since it is the sixth largest trading nation in the world and exports one-third of everything produced. It is now far more generally recognized than it was a few years ago that there is no alternative for Canada but to seek wider and more diversified access to markets, not only for our primary products but for our manufactured products as well. This will involve the necessity of exposing Canadian markets in return. Bill C-259 is going to lessen the chance of our companies competing in foreign markets because of these taxation proposals. It is acknowledged that since international markets are involved, a maximum Canadian productive effort will be required. Canada needs not only the opportunity to participate in new markets, particularly now that 65 per cent of our exports are going to one place, the United States, but what is needed too is the "carrot" of being able to keep more of what we make. This is an essential element to the production of a positive climate for aggressive effort and risk taking.

I think in Bill C-259 we have an example of the omission of the "carrot" which would induce our multi-national companies to proceed overseas to get a portion of the action. If we extend the carrot, it would mean the elimination of taxation proposals to make it possible for Canadian companies to expand overseas. No one really believes there is much likelihood of an over-all reduction in the Canadian tax burden in the near future, although that must be an ultimate goal.

There should be little reliance on artificial support or other gimmicks of a legislative nature as a means of achieving greater Canadian control of our manufacturing industry and a requisite export effort. Too much reliance has recently been placed in talking up Canadian participation and talking for or against foreign investment. What is essential is that capital should flow on the basis of market decisions arrived at by considering their economic merits. The answer to non-resident control does not rest with legal devices which counter the natural economic forces, but rather with the encouragement of Canadian enterprise in positive ways and the discouragement of non-Canadian enterprise regardless of its parentage.

In any discussion of international taxation on income, one of the great considerations we have to look at is the multi-national companies. Whatever we may feel about them they are indeed here. They are looked at by many as being companies which do not necessarily have the national interest at heart. In fact, they are companies that may not always be responsive to the desires or aims of the country which is their home. A year or two ago when the discussion of the drug issue was being carried on in this House it could be shown that Canada was not willing to promote drug companies which would have established us in the international market. If Canada is to retain any place in the international trading arrangements of the world, it seems to me that we must have some Canadian based multinational corporations. Fortunately for us, I think Canada has some of these, such as Massey Harris, Alcan and a few others, a considerable number when the size of our population is taken into account.

• (3:10 p.m.)

On Thursday November 4, 1971 in a preliminary report of the banking, trade and commerce committee of the other place, there was discussed the impact of the continuing viability of Canadian multinational corporations, their domestic and foreign operations through foreign affiliates, their need for such foreign outlets to maintain higher levels of employment in Canada, their capital needs in Canada and abroad and their competitive position in world markets. That part of the report reads:

> Your committee is deeply concerned with the possible affect of the proposed legislation on the competitive position of Canada's international corporations in world markets. To the extent that Canada's world trading position is adversely affected, it follows that our economic growth as a whole must likewise suffer.

The white paper on taxation explicitly recognized the following four objectives:

> 1. The Canadian tax system should not encourage nor discourage foreign investment by Canadians.
> 2. Canadian companies competing in the foreign market should not be subject to more onerous taxes than their competition (particularly U.S. competition).
> 3. Canada should promote a climate hospitable to the unrestricted flow of capital across international boundaries.
> 4. Canadian tax laws should not permit the evasion of Canadian tax through artificial arrangements.

Even more important in view of the economic environment of the past few months, industry and government must share two basic desires. They are, to create jobs for Canadian citizens, to create profit for Canadian shareholders and, in achieving these purposes, to create revenue for the Canadian government.

In its final form, Bill C-259 seems to have concentrated on the anti-avoidance objective. Witnesses before the committee in the other place had this to say:

> The bill as it affects multi-national corporations was extremely complex and distracting from the present great difficulty of dealing with the United States actions on trade.

This refers to the recent surtax problems and recent DISC problems. The point that was brought out is that the taxation effect of the proposals on international income of Canadian based multi-national corporations will be substantial. There appears to be a possibility of a loss of international competitiveness or the departure of such corporations from Canada. Witnesses who appeared before the committee of the other place when dealing with this aspect cited Patino Mining Company and Hunter Corporation as two corporations which had departed from Canada, one of which was considered to be a Canadian-owned company. Whatever is the long term result of the new taxation policies, the point made now is that it does not appear that this is the time to be making major changes in the area of international trade and multi-national corporations, when other countries are attempting to adopt a stance to maintain and expand their trading positions.

For us to impair our own competitiveness in international trade seems to be almost incredible at this time. The international provisions assume and require external treaty negotiations to be workable. This is clearly no time for the opening up of provisions of existing treaties or attempting to work out new treaties with the many countries with whom they are needed if the new approach is not to have serious adverse effects on our international competitive position. Just consider the great reluctance the government has shown about the possibility of renegotiating the U.S. treaty, particularly when we are involved in negotiations in respect of the defence-sharing agreement and the auto pact.

There seems at this time very good reason to hold the international income provision for a year at least until the world economic position is clarified. In the Globe and Mail of Thursday, November 18, 1971, page B-1, there was a news item that the United States Senate had approved the DISC program. Although still not law, the Senate, the House of Representatives and the Nixon administration all favour DISC in one form or another. Some version is expected to gain final approval. When appearing before the committee on banking, trade and commerce of the other place, the Massey-Harris Company detailed how the DISC program could affect it. The DISC program will give the United States manufacturers of farm machinery a substantial financial advantage over Canadian manufacturers next spring because Massey-Ferguson has tended to keep its North American manufacturing facilities located in Canada rather than in the United States. The DISC program would work to the disadvantage of Massey-Ferguson because the domestic manufacturer and exporter in the United States would enjoy a lower corporate tax rate in the United States on that part of his earnings which resulted from foreign operations.

In fact, DISC is a means whereby United States manufacturers selling in a foreign market will not pay taxes. Their earnings will be subject to tax when the DISC organizations distributes them to their shareholders. It is likely that these taxes can be deferred indefinitely or up to 10 years. When it is considered that Canada had a known trading imbalance last year of $113 million in farm machinery—the excess of imports over exports—and that Massey-Ferguson exports 50 per cent of the farm machinery exported to the United States, or nearly $80 million, it is quite obvious how important these proposed tax changes for foreign subsidiaries of Canadian companies will be in the future.

At the present time United States exporting corporations have been able to defer profit by the use of off-shore subsidiaries, at least in large part, and at the present time under the Canadian Income Tax Act Canadian Corporations do not have to pay income tax on dividends from foreign subsidiaries; thus, U.S. and Canadian Corporations are roughly equivalent. Once Bill C-259 is enacted, then our foreign subsidiaries would be greatly disadvantaged as to a United States company operating under DISC. Even if the subsidiary of a Canadian international company in the United States could operate under DISC it would lose its advantage because the profit would be taxed as in Canada. And under the foreign accrual property regulations of Bill C-259, the DISC affiliate of the Massey Ferguson Company in the United States, if it lent money to the parent company, would then have no business income and would be subject to Canadian tax. During the testimony before the Senate committee, on page 42:8, October 20, one of the witnesses made what I think is a significant statement:

> If I could start by making a general answer to this question, it is this: Our belief is that the world is becoming rapidly more technology-oriented and that industry—national corporations and multi-national corporations—will rely on a high degree of technology for the base of their future growth. It seems to us that Canada has two choices for its future development. It can either encourage multi-national corporations, because a company operating solely in Canada, bearing in mind the population of Canada, is not large enough to support the technological base that is required to compete with other countries—

I think this is the most important aspect of international income in respect of the taxation of companies. Whether we like it or not, technology seems to demand that we have multinational companies and they must be based in Canada if we are to get a portion of the world's trade.

• (3:20 p.m.)

The Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I must do so to advise him that his time has expired. The hon. member may continue if there is unanimous consent of the committee. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Ritchie: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I should like to finish quickly with one or two thoughts.

There are as well other conditions under which Canadian multinational corporations must operate around the world. In the matter of cash flow, a Canadian corporation must pay its income tax much more quickly than a United States corporation. In fact, the whole of the DISC program is really concerned with cash flow. The Canadian corporation begins to pay at the beginning of the fiscal year; the U.S. corporation does so much later. For those who think that the United States economy is still not a highly significant economy, I think the events since August 14 have demonstrated otherwise.

I hope I have said a few things to demonstrate what I think is an extremely important aspect of this tax bill, and in my own personal opinion, next to capital gains, the taxation of international income takes precedence.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Chairman, this portion of the tax bill, the white paper and the brown paper leading up to it dealing with international income, has not received the same attention other portions of the government's proposed tax legislation have. But I do agree with the last remark of the hon. member for Dauphin that it is indeed an important part of our considerations in developing a taxation system. Therefore, there are two aspects of the taxation of international income with which we are concerned in this part of the bill: one is the taxation of income earned in foreign countries by Canadians, and the other is the taxation of income earned in Canada by foreigners. Both aspects of taxing international income have a great deal to do with the relative attractiveness of foreign countries as the place for Canadians to invest and, on the other hand, for Canada as a place for foreigners to invest in so far as this may be allowed within the framework of national economic policies.

The New Democratic Party, as has been made clear on many occasions, is concerned about the matter of foreign ownership. However, we have never considered that taxation is a particularly appropriate instrument either to discourage foreign ownership or to encourage Canadian investment. There may be occasions when steps are warranted and when particular actions may be justified, but as a general rule we feel that this is not the best instrument or the most effective instrument to use in this regard. In fact, it can result in distortions in the economy and in a misallocation of resources which can have detrimental effects on our economy. Also, invariably concessions given to encourage Canadian ownership through taxation do result in higher profits to the already well off in the country, and in some further undesirable changes with respect to the distribution of income and wealth in Canada. This was made clear at the time members of the NDP on the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs submitted a minority report dealing with the study of that committee on the white paper on taxation; the hon. member for Waterloo and I, on behalf of the NDP, submitted our report.

In the summary of the report, we stated that the tax system should not be used to limit foreign ownership since an inequitable tax structure would result, and legislation limiting foreign ownership similar to recent bills or other steps that have been proposed should be enacted or taken. Later on, in elaboration, we stated as follows:

> Foreign ownership must be dealt with since we believe it stands in the way of bringing about social justice in this country. However, it is our view that instruments other than the tax system are preferable, especially since an inequitable tax structure would result from the recommendations of the majority report proposed in the name of economic independence.

At this juncture, we depart in policy terms from the middle class nationalists whom we have in Canada and who seek to exclude foreign involvement in our economy in order to assure themselves a bigger place in a smaller sandbox. Of course, we have to keep in mind that some of these people, to whom we might refer as middle class nationalists, in many cases are the people who have sold out the Canadian economy to large American corporations. They have sold out Canadian interests, their own interests, for the sake of being a junior partner in a large American multinational corporation. The often favourable response of Canadian capitalists to economic nationalism must be generally regarded with some suspicion. The most recent example of this was the number of firms in the securities industry which appeared before an Ontario Royal Commission. Their agreement was clearly premised on maintaining a competitive position that would enable them to increase their profits.

In contrast, the NDP support for economic nationalism comes from the same root as our concern about the ownership of the means of production in the domestic economy. The possibility of working men and women influencing the productive process so that it responds to their needs, a process that is already difficult in dealing with Canadian managers, is even more difficult when the industry is foreign owned.

Tax concessions to encourage Canadian capitalists do not necessarily improve the position of the Canadian worker. Indeed, to the extent that government give aways end up in profits, the bargaining position of management in its dealings with the workers becomes relatively stronger. The encouragement of Canadian ownership through the tax system puts an unequal burden on Canadian taxpayers. Those receiving concessions gain at the expense of other taxpayers to whom concessions are not available.

I should like to say a few words dealing with the part of the bill which concerns foreign income of Canadians. The principle adopted by the bill, as we understand it, is that foreign income of Canadians should in general be taxed the same way it would have been taxed had it been domestic income. An exception to the general rule is that certain tax concessions are available to certain classes of Canadian taxpayers to encourage Canadian ownership.

Canadian taxation of the foreign income of our citizens takes into account tax paid to the country where the income was earned. If the tax is less than would have been paid had the income been earned in Canada, tax is payable to the Canadian government to bring the rate up to the Canadian level. If this approach were adopted, we would find no argument with it if we could accept the basic approach that is involved.

When we come to the question of the Canadian income of foreigners, we note that wage and salary income, to the extent that it is earned by foreigners in Canada, is subject to the normal tax provisions. Investment income, pensions and similar payments are subjected to a withholding tax. I understand that beginning in 1976 withholding tax will be increased from 15 per cent to 25 per cent in most cases. However, a particularly inappropriate provision reduces the withholding tax to 20 per cent for shareholders receiving dividends from corporations with a certain degree of Canadian ownership. To this we must take objection. In addition, I would also note that where reciprocal treaties are arranged with other countries, the withholding tax on Canadian source income of foreigners is often reduced as part of a bilateral arrangement. In this context it will take time to negotiate changes in taxation. I would hope that as a general rule the Department of Finance and the government would adopt the principle of minimizing concessions to the greatest extent possible.

I am not sure that I can go along entirely with the remarks of the hon. member for Dauphin who pointed out, as is so often pointed out by the Progressive Conservative party, that this is the wrong time to be making any such change. Without passing judgment on those changes which may be necessary, or which the government may try to negotiate, it seems to me that the Progressive Conservatives always declare that a particular proposal is being made at the wrong time. I presume the general rule would be that no change should be made unless, in the judgment of the government, it was to the advantage of Canada within the over-all framework of tax policy.

When we are dealing with the subject of Canadian income of non-residents there is one particular point I would like to take up with the parliamentary secretary. In this context I wish to quote from the Summary of 1971 Tax Reform Legislation presented to us on June 18. Under the heading "Non-resident-owned Investment Corporations" it reads:

> The special tax treatment for non-resident-owned investment corporations (NRO's) is continued in the new bill.
> Once the new system is fully operative in 1976, it will provide for:
> —a 25-per-cent tax on the income of the NRO, including capital gains that are taxable to non-residents, but excluding other gains; the tax paid (including only one-half of the tax on capital gains) will be refunded to the corporation when the earnings are distributed; and normal withholding tax on dividends paid;
> —a requirement that NRO's must be 100-per-cent owned by non-residents, compared with the existing 95 per cent ownership rule.
> Until 1976 the rate of tax on income will stay at 15 per cent and the new ownership rules will not apply.

This is a special concession in this area. I note that a very lengthy and complex amendment was submitted on October 13, and moved on October 22, dealing with this matter. I must confess that I have not waded through it sufficiently to understand its import fully, but I think it is necessary that we be given some explanation by the parliamentary secretary why special tax treatment is needed for non-resident-owned investment corporations. I would also like to have some further explanation concerning the amendment.

In dealing with this matter we must also concern ourselves with Canada's policy regarding foreign ownership. There has been considerable discussion of this subject in recent days. It has become apparent that the government took a decision in principle to establish an agency to act as a screening mechanism with regard to foreign takeovers. This is an entirely inadequate response to the problem. It is typical of the Liberal responses to so many problems connected with the Canadian economy. It does not come to grips with the basic question.

We have to deal with the problem of multinational corporations. This is a problem which is growing in importance on the world scene. Some observers have suggested that by the end of this century multinational corporations will be the effective power instruments on the world scene rather than the nation states, such as is the case today. The question comes up: should Canada get into this game and try to get its share of the multinational corporations, of the 300 or 400 such corporations that are paramount? I question whether Canada should get on the bandwagon and try to get a small piece of the action because I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, it would be only a small piece of the action. At the same time we must recognize that, regardless of what policy Canada adopts, there will be a continuation of the proliferation of multinational corporations, and a continuation of the growth of their influence. The only context in which we can hope to find an eventual solution for the problem is some form of international action.

In this regard I note that Canada has taken a halting, limited step at the United Nations in an effort to have a study undertaken on the influence of multinational corporations. This is only a timid step, and possibly it is all that could be accomplished in that forum at this stage. I maintain that Canada must be more aggressive at the United Nations in trying to get a greater degree of international action to deal with multinational corporations.

We must also consider what policies we are going to adopt in Canada, and how we are going to control the existing problem here. There may be a number of mechanisms proposed to try and exercise control over our economy. We will have to consider what we should do by way of policies involving economic goals, perhaps in some cases by buying back certain industries. I acknowledge the point that it would be an inappropriate use of resources to place over-emphasis on this area, simply trying to buy back the economy, but at the same time there may be instances when this will be the appropriate action to take.

More importantly, Mr. Chairman, dealing with the future we must take a look at the sources of Canadian capital, and here we have to be concerned with the development of our own sources of capital, and accumulating savings that can be invested in the economy. There is also the external problem. There is a good deal of argument about whether we still need foreign capital in order to achieve the degree of economic growth that we desire in Canada. I am not sure whether all of this debate is entirely useful. There may be times when we will want external capital, and other times when we will have no need for it. In any case, there are two basic points to be kept in mind.

Whenever it is considered appropriate to have an infusion of foreign capital one question that must be considered is how the capital is used, that is, whether it is invested in equity capital or results in an alienation of ownership of Canadian resources. The question of the extent to which the infusion of foreign capital is placed into equity is an important one, but it is not the only consideration. We must also be concerned with the question of how the money is spent, and just what sort of industry it is invested in, both in terms of the actual expenditure of the money and the type of growth brought about by that expenditure. This can have very important consequences for the Canadian economy.

At the same time I recognize that we have to maintain our links with the international community and we have to be concerned about markets for some of our products. Certainly, we want to have more finished products exported from Canada rather than simply raw materials. We all also have to be concerned with the area of technology because that is at the very core of our development policy today. We must have an adequate science policy, one that will enable us to undertake the type of research programs necessary if we are to excel in those areas of economic development upon which we decide to concentrate. We must take care however to maintain our links so that we do not exclude from this country technological development from other parts of the world.

In terms of the structure of the economy that we decide upon, we must select the areas of that economy upon which we will concentrate to bring about the economic growth necessary to do the best possible job. Two or three years ago, the then minister of communications, now the hon. member for Duvernay, pointed out that in the area of communications there was a golden opportunity for Canada to develop a first rate industry, Canadian-owned and Canadian-controlled, geared primarily to Canadian needs and conditions. He felt that we could excel in this field, first of all to take care of our own requirements and then expand to world markets.

Another area about which we must be concerned is that of outflow of capital from Canada. At the present time this is directed by some of our financial institutions and some of it is aimed toward production capacity in other countries rather than to Canadian development. However, I am afraid there are many cases where that development is not directed toward Canada's well-being but rather the corporate well-being of the particular institution involved. Of course, we have the development of various resort facilities in the Caribbean and so on. This type of investment may serve to develop that area, if that is the object, but in many cases it is of no particular benefit to Canada. Certainly, Canada's present actions—

The Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I must do so to advise him and the committee that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Chairman: Is there unanimous consent for the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Burton: Thank, you. I just have a few more remarks, but I think it is important to round out the discussion on this subject.

Another area to which we must give greater attention is the Canada Development Corporation. The stand of the New Democratic Party is very clear. We were unhappy about the type of Canada Development Corporation established by the government some months ago. We think that an entirely different type of structure is required which will enable the government to use it as a key instrument in directing Canadian development and giving some hope to Canadian development policy. I think we also have to keep in mind the effect of our actions on trade and trade policy in view of the upheaval we are facing at the present time. We must decide whether to go in with one or the other of the trading blocs of the world or whether to establish ourselves on a relatively independent basis, at the same time developing links with the various trading blocs being established in the rest of the world. It is very difficult to know what government policy is on this matter. We must decide what kind of economy we want in Canada. Do we want one which is self-sufficient in which we develop our own capacity, or do we want a policy inseparably linked with another part of the world and which would make us dependent on the economic well-being of that area. I do not think that is a desirable course of action for Canada.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, we must pay close attention to the manner in which the tax system is used in connection with our international economic relationships. We agree with some aspects of the government's approach, but it must be underlined that we need a greater development of policies in other areas in order to achieve a more adequate development of the Canadian economy than we have seen up to the present time.

Mr. Ryan: Mr. Chairman, this is the second opportunity that I have taken to speak upon some of the subject matters contained in Bill C-259. Today I am concerned about the taxation of international income as reflected in this bill—the Boeing bill. I call it the Boeing bill because it has 707 pages and the government is trying to "jet" it through.

Mr. Paproski: Very good.

Mr. Ryan: In this topic, international income, there are two quite separate subjects. One concerns the taxation by Canada of those portions of income derived from Canada by non-residents. The other concerns the taxation of Canadian residents on those portions of their incomes derived from foreign sources. It is with the latter of the two subjects that I wish to deal now. More specifically, I intend to concentrate upon those sections of Bill C-259 which affect Canadian multinational companies.

The Canadian multinational corporation is extremely important to us. By the term "Canadian multinational corporation" I mean a Canadian corporation, of which sufficient voting shares are owned by Canadians to control the corporation. This kind of corporation brings in foreign exchange to our country, develops our technology and aids in redressing our balance of payments. In 1970 Canadians received $513 million from foreign sources as interest payments and dividends alone as stated by the hon. member for Dauphin. But in the first two quarters of 1971, $270 million were received. Obviously, Mr. Chairman, a great part of this income of foreign exchange into Canada was the result of the activities of Canadian multinational companies.

As well, they aid in the generation of markets abroad for Canadian produced goods and generate jobs in Canada itself. For example, Massey-Ferguson Limited, one of Canada'a all too few great multinational companies, employs about 4,000 Canadians in Ontario directly, and thousands more indirectly in the industries that supply this farm machinery giant. This company is majority-owned and controlled by Canadians. Its head office and largest plant are in my riding of Spadina. There is a more general appreciation in the world today that home-based multinational companies are very important to the economy of any country. We need the ones we have and to seek more, thus ensuring their continuing ability to compete in world markets. Yet the government does not seem to wish to do this. It has introduced in Bill C-259 measures which will encourage Canadian multinational corporations to move their head offices out of Canada and merely continue branch plant operations in Canada.

Mr. Chairman, the President of Massey-Ferguson, Mr. Albert A. Thornborough, after studying the international income effects of Bill C-259 and consulting lawyers and tax advisors, came to the conclusion that the international tax law revisions proposed by this bill would make Massey-Ferguson a relatively less attractive investment to Canadians compared with an investment in a Canadian corporation operating only in Canada. He pointed out that the results would be that Canadians would sell their shares to American shareholders as the company will face higher taxes and stiffer competition because of the bill. So we ask, why is it that the government wishes to have our companies sold off to people of other countries?

This is inconsistent with the cabinet's "Midsummer Night's Dream" when it adopted the principle of a screening board as recommended by the Gray report. We should be trying to encourage Canadian ownership, not discourage it, as this section of the bill does. A company doing business solely in Canada is exposed to only one tax system. However, when Canada extends its tax system beyond its borders, the multinational corporation in many cases is subject to double taxation which must be borne in addition to the extraordinary cost of doing business abroad.

The Massey-Ferguson case is just one example; yet it applies equally to all exporting Canadian corporations that have subsidiaries or affiliates in other lands. It does not take a sage to predict that if this bill's international income provisions remain unaltered, companies like Massey-Ferguson will move their head offices and most of their prime level activities to another country. Now that the DISC proposal has passed the United States Senate and will very likely be brought into effect soon, this company must be looking at the advantages of a large transfer of its activities to that country. Although Mr. Thornborough did not say so, it follows that as his company's competitive position deteriorates, so will its profits and its view of its whole Canadian operation. Hence, the value of the company to the Canadian people will very likely soon deteriorate and may even disappear. After top management, research and development facilities have been moved, not only lawyers, accountants and engineers will be looking for work, but, Mr. Chairman, many if not all of the factory jobs involved are going to disappear. That is what I am primarily concerned about. I am worried about the people who are now working for Massey-Ferguson in the centre and west side of downtown Toronto. There are thousands of them, and their jobs may disappear.

The Standing Committee of the Senate on Banking, Trade and Commerce in its preliminary report on the Summary of 1971 Tax Reform Legislation has also noted that the competitive position of Canada's multinational corporations will deteriorate. May I read from page 5 of that committee's forty-seventh record of proceedings. I repeat what is said there for emphasis, even though the hon. member for Dauphin has already alluded to this matter. The report reads in part:

> Your committee is deeply concerned with the possible effect of the proposed legislation on the competitive position of Canada's international corporations in world markets. To the extent that Canada's world trading position is adversely affected, it follows that our economic growth as a whole must likewise suffer.

This government, Mr. Chairman, must face up to reality and admit the truth of this statement. Though the matter has been put gently by the other place, it is imperative for us to heed what has been said. In my opinion, the part of the tax reform bill we are now discussing constitutes a very serious government blunder. It must be remedied without delay. I would recommend that every hon. member of the House of Commons read the forty-second record of the proceedings of the Standing Committee of the Senate on Banking, Trade and Commerce. Hon. members will be considerably enlightened as to the predicament that not only Massey-Ferguson but also companies like Alcan find themselves in due to this Bill. Apparently, about 25,000 jobs are at stake within those two companies alone. Already, two smaller companies have decided to leave Canada or to fold up.

Also, the Senate committee, in the forty-seventh record of its proceedings, makes far reaching recommendations on page 7 with respect to foreign accrual property income and dividends received from foreign affiliates. Those recommendations would completely alter, if accepted, the character of the legislation before us. In placing these recommendations before us, the other place in my opinion has done an excellent job of giving sober second thought to legislation to which very little "first" thought was given.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ryan: If the bill passes in its present form, Mr. Chairman, Canada will be the only country in the world with such complex and intrusive laws governing the taxation of foreign affiliates.

In its usual fuzzy manner, Mr. Chairman, the government has introduced a number of fuzzy concepts and terms in this bill. In the area of the taxation of international incomes, the most outstanding of these vague concepts is that of FAPI, foreign accrual property income. As usual, the government has failed to define this term properly and, hence, a great deal of uncertainty has arisen. The alleged purpose behind the application of the FAPI concept is to prevent the undue deferment or avoidance of payment of Canadian tax on passive income. But the plug, Mr. Chairman, is far bigger than the hole and the result is tax regulations which are somewhat astonishing, to say the least.

Let us take as an example the case of three companies, A, B and C. Let us say that A is a wholly-owned Canadian corporation which is based in Canada and let us say that that company owns 30 per cent of B, a company in a non-tax treaty country. Company B, in turn, owns 100 per cent of the common shares of C, a company in another non-treaty country. Company A also owns 100 per cent of the preferred shares of C. Therefore, under the proposed tax legislation, A has a 130 per cent equity in C. Thus, if C receives $100 of passive income, A has $130 of passive income attributed to it and must pay tax on it, even though C may well choose not to pass on to A and B in the form of dividends or otherwise any part of its $100 passive income. This, Mr. Chairman, is clearly a nonsensical situation and it looks every much as if the government did not read this part of its proposed legislation very carefully before proposing it.

Another disquieting feature of FAPI, Mr. Chairman, relates to the fact that the treatment of dividends from foreign affiliates differs, depending upon whether or not the foreign affiliate's home country has a comprehensive tax treaty with Canada. This is inequitable. First, the Canadian government has no right to penalize a company simply because the country in which its foreign affiliate is located has no tax treaty with Canada. The lack of any tax treaty may be the government's own fault. Second, as the committee of the other place on banking, trade and commerce has noted with regard to countries which do not have tax treaties with Canada, "Many of these countries are developing nations which offer tax incentives to foreign corporations. Canada should not tax away these incentives and reduce their value to Canadian corporations." Third, there is absolutely no reason companies should not receive a tax credit for foreign withholding taxes paid on dividends from non-treaty countries.

Another aspect of FAPI which the government has failed to consider is that the information necessary for its application may be at times extremely difficult to gather, especially if a Canadian company does not have a controlling interest. The Alcan company made this clear to the committee of the other place. They said' "We are working with the Nippon Light Metal Company, the largest aluminum producer in Japan." Alcan has about 50 per cent of its shares but the Nippon company has about 150 subsidiaries. The Alcan company said, "We do not know much about a great many of these companies in Japan and we cannot ask too many questions because the Japanese may think we are interfering." Under this legislation, Alcan will have to go to all the trouble of filling out all the forms in order to find out what has happened to any passive income, if any. Furthermore, since they must deal in the Japanese language, there will be translation difficulties.

In addition, Mr. Chairman, the taxation theories of many countries are completely different from our own and what we may consider as passive income they may consider as active income. This is true of Great Britain. The question is, who is to sort out this mess? Surely, the government can find some simpler system than this one that it is trying to impose upon multinational corporations. In my opinion, Canada needs its multinational corporations. We must not drive them away. I hope the government will realize this and will provide sensible legislation in the area of international incomes. Let us have more common sense legislation, simpler and far more well defined than that which is now before us. Let the government concentrate on taxing truly tainted diverted income which it can do by enforcing existing laws and regulations.

Surely, it is more important to have more and not less multinational giants based in Canada. France found that out. She permitted the growth of multinational corporations and then moved to ease them out of France, claiming that there was too much American influence involved. They moved into Belgium, Holland, Luxembourg and West Germany. That happened just to please Mr. DeGaulle. With them went the jobs of thousands of French workers. Soon the French completely reversed their policy and welcomed the giants once more, but it was too late for most of the gravy because many opportunities were lost in the interim. Mr. J. J. Servan-Schreiber has told us all about that trouble in France and we in Canada ought to be warned by it. For the sake of an estimated $10 million or so for a hungry Department of National Revenue, we can very easily do great harm by winding down the control and operations of our exporting multinational corporations with the loss of thousands of jobs, economic growth and, eventually, the loss of tax revenue.

It is all too easy to strike from within at multinational corporations that are Canadian based. However, they have the worry of different tax laws in every country in which they operate. Naturally, they are attracted to the most favourable tax and economic climate. We must help to keep them competitive for they are our major hope for expanding secondary labour intensive industry in Canada. In short, Mr. Chairman, we are not happy with FAPI.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, throughout this debate the New Democratic Party has taken the position that the tax system should be one in which people in similar circumstances are treated alike. In general, we refer to it as a matter of equity. We think that equity is as important to the corporate sector as the private sector. We see no reason a corporation which is domiciled and does its business in Canada and pays the full rates of tax should be treated differently from a corporation that invests outside of Canada and receives its income there. It makes no sense in a country like ours, which is seeking internal development and is so reliant on foreign capital, to say you are going to disadvantage indigenous corporations, in effect those who invest inside Canada.

We took exception when the export insurance bill was before the House. We pointed out that the government was introducing measures to stimulate the export of capital. We are in favour of assisting other parts of the world that need our technology, skills and money, but we are not prepared to see the world civilized by international corporations, whether they be Canadian, American or anything else. We do not trust them. We do not believe they act in the best interests of the nationals of the country in which they are situated. They are there to make money; that is their term of reference. Sometimes making money may coincide with the best interests of the country in which they are located, but all too often it does not. We have only to look around the world today to see the conflict that is developing in every country of the world between the attitude and objectives of the international corporation and the national objectives of those countries.

We in Canada are familiar with the difficulties that we experienced because of an existing amount of foreign investment or, more properly, multinational investment in Canada. A lot of this investment comes from the United States. We tend to think that the people in the United States are keen as can be to have this investment in Canada. The international corporation may be keen on it, but not the ordinary citizens of the United States. That same concern that we have developed about the international corporation in Canada is being felt in what is essentially the home of the international corporation, the United States. Certainly, the greatest development of that form of corporate organization is in the United States. The ordinary working people in the United States are saying "We want your investment here. We need some of your investment here in order to provide jobs for our own people." The objectives of the international corporation are not the same as the objectives of the people of the United States, Canada, Liberia or any other country. Therefore, our position is that there should not be any difference in treatment between a corporation that derives its revenue from investment and operations in Canada and a corporation that gets its revenue from outside this country.

We think the government has weaselled and backtracked on what it started out to do. It started out to treat these organizations in a reasonably similar manner. However, it has backed off a lot of these proposals, thereby weakening its position. It has provided advantages to income derived outside of this country. I do not think it intended to do that originally. The original position, that of the white paper, was a considerable departure from what Carter recommended, namely complete equality. The white paper subsequently watered that down by amendments, additions and various interpretations. We do not support the government on this weaselling that they have carried out under pressure from the larger companies.

I wish to read an analysis of the present tax situation made by Mr. Samuel R. Baker when speaking to the Canadian Tax Foundation in Vancouver. This quotation appears in the Globe and Mail. Mr. Baker is referring to the behaviour or the kind of taxation to which the international corporation is subject and the results of that. I quote:

> "The result is to permit Canadian residents, through proper planning, to conduct their affairs outside of Canada through non-resident corporations and trusts substantially without reference to the Canadian system of taxation.
> The existing system is so open that it has not only allowed Canadian taxpayers the freedom to compete with businessmen from other countries through the use of various tax planning techniques, but has in effect provided loopholes whereby some taxpayers have adopted practices for the avoidance of tax on Canadian-source income which, in the Government's view would ordinarily be taxed in Canada, by diverting such income to tax-haven jurisdictions."

How does it feel to a Canadian manufacturer who is trying to make his living within the confines of Canada to see that people who invest outside the country, which is contrary to the national interest in most cases, are given far more favourable treatment? The member who just spoke referred to the fact that the revenue that would be obtained by taxing corporations on their out of country income would not amount to a great deal more than $10 million. For that amount of money we should not bother to erect barriers to investment outside this country. But even assuming that $10 million is reasonably accurate as a figure and that we are not going to get more than $10 million, the point is that loopholes do exist. Canadian companies see their competitors or other companies that invest escaping substantial taxation or being subject to ordinary taxation, as the case may be, by investing outside the country and building up tax havens elsewhere. As a result these companies wonder why they should be good citizens when they can do the same thing, and very quickly the $10 million becomes $100 million.

The greatest disservice anyone can provide to the development of indigenous Canadian industry is to grant special incentives and privileges to those who invest money outside the country from which they derive income. Over a period this will destroy the effectiveness of Canadian manufacturers and industries to compete and to continue their present mode of operation. I also ask, what is the point of developing and encouraging industrial activity outside the country. It does not provide employment in this country. Very often there may not even be use of materials produced by this country. If this sort of investment is encouraged and taxes are not collected on the income therefrom, then what is the point of it? What use is it to this country? Why should such investments receive special consideration? I would have thought that this was the worst kind of encouragement to offer a country that wants to develop and provide employment for its own people.

What is the rationale for this approach if no benefit is derived from it and its purpose is to provide a nice tax haven in Canada to conduct operations? I do not know how such a proposition can be defended, and I am rather surprised at the position that some of my friends in the Conservative party are taking on the issue. I can understand the government backtracking on the matter, but I would have thought that these hon. members would criticize the government for trying to weasel out of what should have been a firm position. The government now wants to weasel out even more, and I find the situation difficult to understand.

International corporations have created serious problems around the world as well as serious differences between the countries from which they originate and the national aspirations of the countries in which they invest. It is a new kind of imperialism which is very similar to 19th century imperialism, the sort of thing Professor Hobson talked about. They are not sending in gunboats this time; they are sending in international corporations instead. The theory is just the same. They say: "We are doing this for your good. We are going to civilize you. We are going to bring you the Coca-Cola civilization. Where would you be without our gunboats and our civilizing influence?" We have seen the results of 19th century British imperialism. Do we want to duplicate the same sort of principle by using this different approach? Furthermore, do we as Canadians want to be participants? Have we not suffered enough from imperialism that we want to go out and play the same sort of game ourselves?

This country does not have to live off international corporations; we are rich enough without that. The international corporations tell the public to look at all the good they are doing, that they are providing industrial benefits and so on. But they do not pay taxes. Often the poor countries have been forced on their hands and knees to invite international corporations, to invest and to play off one country against another to give tax relief and all kinds of concessions in return for investment. Then they develop and expand through the use of government money which they claim is helping the country concerned.

I would far rather international corporations be taxed either by the country of their origin or by the country in which they operate. You could then have government level discussion on how to develop the country with the use of this money. I do not want Massey Ferguson civilizing the world because I am not that impressed with its civilizing attitudes. Neither do I want any other large company civilizing the world on Canada's behalf. If we are going to contribute to foreign aid and assist other countries, then it is this Parliament that should make that decision. It should not be made indirectly by other people who are exempted from taxation. I cannot understand why it is not clear and obvious that we get no benefits from this sort of operation. For example, we had a number of briefs presented to the committee.

Mr. Ryan: One of the benefits was $113 million in foreign exchange.

Mr. Saltsman: But for whose good was it, and what was it used for? To raise our dollar still further? The hon. member was complaining that the value of the dollar was too high. I remember one case before the committee made by. I think it was, a Liberian ore company which pointed out that they did not put any strain on our school system and suchlike but were simply using Canada as a vehicle for passing through income. They pointed out they were providing Canada with two million dollars a year for the privilege of using Canada as a tax haven, that if we insisted on passing legislation to put a stop to this they would go elsewhere and we would be short a couple of million dollars. Why should Canada, with a gross national product of over $90 billion, prostrate itself as a tax haven for corporations of this kind for fear that they may move out of this country? Are we so poor and lacking in dignity that we must behave like a banana republic and provide a tax haven for companies that ought to pay taxation just as other companies do? I do not want my country to do that.

I think most Canadians would willingly pay a few cents ore on their tax bills—in order to retain their dignity and not sell themselves out for a few bucks.

Mr. Ryan: What will you do about all the jobs created?

Mr. Saltsman: They are not providing jobs. What sort of jobs are they providing?

Mr. Ryan: Union jobs.

Mr. Saltsman: They are not providing any jobs, whether they be union jobs or any other sort of job.

Mr. Horner: Don't forget the international unions.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, every time members of the Conservative party get hurt because someone throws their faulty logic back in their teeth they raise all kinds of irrelevancies. I respect hon. members on that side of the House very highly, but does it not discourage good debate in this House to drag in all these tired old saws?

Let me continue with what I was saying. One of the most important points to bear in mind, one which my colleagues and I have referred to before, on the subject of foreign ownership is that the difficulty in Canada arises not so much from foreign ownership itself but from the fact that it is associated with the multinational corporation, which usually has a different set of objectives from those of the country in which it resides. In other words, these companies very often do what is best for them. If it happens to suit the country in which they reside, then that is all right. If it does not, then that is too bad. The Canadian multinational corporation is just as destructive of national interests as is the United States or any other foreign corporation. At the head of the list of those who are the most vociferous in their opposition to any attempt to limit foreign ownership in Canada is the Canadian multinational corporations, the big companies of Canada. They do not want any restrictions on what they may or may not do because they are always afraid that if Canada places restrictions on them other countries will follow suit. This is what they fear, and so they should.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Under pressure from farmers of Canada, which I think was justifiable, we moved rapidly toward free trade of agricultural implements. By and large agricultural equipment now comes in free of tariff. The argument was that free trade would lower prices to the farmer, provide competition and that we would benefit industrially. We would have more work for the people in Canada as a result of removing the tariff. In fact, none of these things has happened. The price of farm machinery is atrocious in Canada and it is artificially maintained. The Barber report showed documented evidence of the high price of farm machinery in Canada in spite of free trade. As far as employment is concerned, one need only look at the Massey-Ferguson investment pattern. It left its labour intensive manufacturing here in Canada but all its technological developments took place in the United States. Its tractor factories are in the United States, not in Canada. When Canadian workers said to Massey-Ferguson a couple of years ago—

Mr. Horner: Where are the parts made?

An hon. Member: And the combines?

Mr. Saltsman: I will return to combines in a minute. I know a lot of my friends to the right are bristling for knowledge. If they will simply contain themselves for a few minutes, I will see if I can assist them.

A few years ago Massey-Ferguson was involved in a strike with its workers. In anticipation of the UAW taking strike action they hired Hedlen-Menzies, a very well known firm in Canada, to do a study, the purpose of which was to persuade the workers of Massey-Ferguson that if the company had to pay wages in Canada comparable to those in the United States it would not be worth while to operate in Canada. The union was not asking for higher wages than those paid in the United states. It was not asking that the workers do less work than those in the United States. The union simply said that if the men worked as hard and as well, they should be entitled to the same wages as their counterparts across the border. After all, there is this free trade without tariff and the goods are coming in competitively. The union felt the workers were entitled to wage parity.

The argument was that the workers were not entitled to parity because the company maintained its plants in Canada that were labour intensive, and that if the company had to pay Canadian workers the same wages being paid in the United states it might as well move the whole operation to the United States. This is a Canadian company, not a United States company. This is not a foreign company putting Canadians under muscle, but a Canadian company which got its start here. Its greatness originated from the market in Canada, but in fact it was saying that Canadian workers should be permanently condemned to lower standards of living than their United States counterparts across the border. This was not because Canadian workers were not as productive. This is what the study indicated, though the report tried to say this nicely. There is no way you can say this kind of thing nicely. Is this what we want in Canada?

An hon. Member: You are not accurate.

Mr. Saltsman: You better read the Hedlen-Menzies report which outlined the reasons the company could not pay the same wages in Canada. The experience so far as productivity is concerned in this country has been that if you give the Canadian worker the same kind of machines and opportunities he will produce as effectively as his United States counterpart, and sometimes even more effectively. There can be no argument that because the workers are not as productive as others they should not receive the same wages. The point is that even if parity had been granted at that time it would not have been true parity because the Canadian dollar was around 92.5 or 93 cents, so this would have meant the workers would still be receiving 7 per cent less in real income than their friends across the border.

This is the corporation about which some of us in this House are bleeding. They are afraid they will leave Canada. If that is the way they behave, then we are better off without them and should find a Canadian company which will operate in Canada's interests and be concerned about the workers of this country.

Mr. Horner: Suggest one that will take its place.

Mr. Saltsman: Let us be very clear that the company is not a charitable organization. It is set up to do business in Canada because there is a market here; Canadian farmers buy machinery for use in this country. If Massey-Ferguson does not want to make this machinery, then somebody else will.

Mr. Horner: Name one other manufacturer in Canada who will.

Mr. Saltsman: If other companies will not do it, the government can do it.

Mr. Horner: The government, that is what you want. You want government ownership. Now, we are hearing the truth.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Horner: Talk to Tommy, he will tell you the trouble.

Mr. Nowlan: Would the hon. member permit a question?

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Annapolis-Valley knows that he may ask a question only with the permission of the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Nowlan: This has been a very interesting dissertation, but does the hon. member for Brant believe everything the hon. member for Waterloo is saying? I am wondering whether he would like to see Massey-Ferguson move out of Brantford?

An hon. Member: He is listening to the financial spokesman of that party, but he has not said no.

Mr. Saltsman: I see that the hon. member is treating the remarks of the hon. member for Annapolis-Valley with the kind of contempt that such misinterpretations of my remarks deserve.

Mr. Horner: There is no misinterpretation.

Mr. Saltsman: If the hon. member wants to enter into this discussion, he should at least be very careful of what he says. I think my statement was very clear, but let me repeat it. As long as companies serve the interests of Canada that is fine, but when they stop serving the interests of Canada, whether the consumer, the worker, the farmer or somebody else, then the job should be done by somebody else. If "A" will not do it, "B" will, and if "B" will not do it—

Mr. Horner: Then "G" will.

Mr. Saltsman: —then "G" will.

Mr. Horner: Yes, the government will.

Mr. Saltsman: We do not have to be blackmailed and we do not have to be treated in the shameful manner we have been treated in this country because we have an alternative. As most hon. members know, I am not one who advocates nationalization or public ownership of any kind or to any large extent.

Mr. Horner: But you were one of the Waffles.

Mr. Saltsman: I am sure the Waffles would be very happy to hear that. My record is very clear on this matter.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Chairman: Order, please. Perhaps it is a matter of geography, but it does seem to the Chair that hon. members are located close enough to each other that they are carrying on a debate among themselves. I really feel the remarks should be made to the Chair.

Mr. Saltsman: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. You will know, of course, that I have not been one of the favourite Waffle heroes in Canada. We are not helpless, as my friends in the Conservative party seem to think we are. They gave away this country on every occasion they could.

Mr. Horner: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Saltsman: Of course.

Mr. Horner: Is the hon. member aware that his leader told Mr. Laxer of the Waffle group that he cannot say these things about nationalism and get elected?

An hon. Member: You obviously haven't listened, either.

The Chairman: Order, please. The question has been asked and the hon. member for Waterloo may want to respond. When he has done so, I think we should try to get back to the subject matter of the debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: We are getting a little bit of help from the modern socialists over there.

Mr. Saltsman: The question asked is very interesting, but I really do not know what relevance it has to the matter we are discussing. I would be very pleased to provide the hon. member for Crowfoot with a copy of this report if he is as interested as he seems to be. I would be pleased to straighten him out on the internal events of this party.

An hon. Member: Maybe we could find him a membership card.

Mr. Saltsman: I should hope not. We have been discussing this matter from a number of points of view and I should like to recapitulate for a moment.

• (4:30 p.m.)

I should like to recapitulate for a moment. The first point is that if these companies are not going to pay any taxes or provide any employment, what good are they to us. If they want to pack up and say that they do not want to be in Canada, they will not be of very much help to us anyway. Second, and perhaps this should be the first point, is the matter of equity. If we are to provide any advantage in the tax system to one group over another, surely it should be in respect of the companies which manufacture in Canada rather than those which just export raw materials out of Canada and ask for a tax exemption. The simple matter of equity demands that any advantage be given to those who manufacture in Canada. Certainly, our position is that they should be treated alike. Equity demands there should not be any special treatment for one over the other. Third, Canada does not need international complications. These multinational companies could get us involved in considerations in which we do not want to be involved. We do not want to be part of a twentieth century imperialism and do not want to become involved in having the international corporation determine international priorities. That should be a matter for decision by government and not the international corporation with the government itself being held up for ransom.

The other point which I was talking about when some questions arose from my friends on the right was that some companies, like the Liberian Ore Company, will leave Canada if we do not provide a tax haven for them here in Canada. The day of the tax haven is rapidly drawing to a close, and not only in Canada. Even the poorest nations have some sense of dignity and pride and, I am sure, do not want to be tax havens any longer. Many of those which have become tax havens have regretted this and have found that any small benefits they have received have created more problems and costs than benefits. Surely it would be ironic, if the small, poorer nations of the world are no longer willing to provide tax havens, for a country as prosperous as Canada to say it will. It is for these reasons I have spoken at length. I have some further things I should like to say as this debate continues. Certainly, there should be equity between corporations if there is to be equity between people. I do not think this government measure goes far enough to ensure this equity, and we think the government has backed off from doing what should have been done in this particular case.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, the tragedy in Canadian life today is that we have two socialist parties, one of them anti-American and the other stumbling around without a policy, national or otherwise, which is adequate to bring Canada out of the economic doldrums in which it finds itself. World trade, of course, is the most important thing in our economic life. The question, however, is how do we get that world trade. We must be realistic about this. It is no good bleating about what was wrong in the 18th century, in the 19th century or since the beginning of time. We are not faced with British imperialism anymore or with a trade war among people. We are faced with reality in the last quarter of the 20th century. We want to know what should be done about the situation now. Karl Marx is long out of date.

Mr. Nystrom: So is Jack Bigg.

Mr. Bigg: I might be, but we are not yet ready for the Nystrom era. Heaven defend us so that we will never get it. The gentleman who just interjected could tell us, if he wanted to be honest, as a result of his last journey to Sweden about the situation in that country today, one of the havens of socialism—perhaps we could say national socialism.

Sweden is not particularly worried about what is happening in the rest of the world because she has a nice little homemade economy of forest farming. What is the income tax situation in Sweden? The hon. member could tell us if he wanted to. It is something in the neighbourhood of 70 per cent and perhaps this accounts for the highest suicide rate in the world. This is well known and the hon. member is aware of it. So, we can learn very little from Sweden. If we in Canada want to go back to being nothing but farmers of trees, and if we could be satisfied with being nothing but a country which shares the wealth in trees like a snake with his tail in his mouth forever chewing until he is chewing his own ears, fine and dandy.

However, I suggest this is not the future of the great Canadian nation. We look outward. We should look outward and should not be talking about what is wrong in the United States. It is true there are things wrong in the United States but that is not our problem. Our problem is what is wrong here and why are we not getting together, planning together and legislating together to put the great Canadian economy on its two feet. This is not impossible; it is just difficult.

As I am very seldom negative in my remarks, I want to suggest one or two things we could do in a positive way. One is certainly not to take the Carter report as the law of the Medes and the Persians. The Carter report is a product of the Conservative government. We brought together on this matter the minds of the best economists of the time. They brought in a very voluminous report. Anyone reading the Carter report—which I have done although I doubt very much whether my friends on the left have read it as well as they pretend they have—would realize it is not a document which gives us all the answers. It is old fashioned, London School of Economics economic theory. It is Canadian in its basic philosophy, but in the latter quarter of the 20th century that is not quite good enough. Things have changed. We are not now simply in a quarrel between a big landowner and the poor downtrodden hedge clipper. We are in competition not only with international corporations—and I accept the fact that this is one of the facts with which we have to deal—but with great trading blocs in the world.

England has just been forced, through no fault of her own, into the European Common Market. Our great socialist leaders in England, Mr. Wilson for one, are hypocrites of the highest order. Now that Britain is on her knees through being forced to enter the European Economic Market to which she did not wish to belong, Mr. Wilson decries the fact that anyone wants to be co-operative. Now, he suddenly becomes an imperialist, British to the core. Any co-operation with the European Common Market is now treason. Mr. Heath, of course, a Conservative, is to be blamed for it all. Who is the great critic? The leader of the socialist party in Britain.

We owe to our friends to the south in this 20th century 90 per cent of all the wealth and affluence we have. We owe this to the ingenuity, business ability, friendship and co-operation of this great industrial giant to the south. However, now it is the cat somebody should bell. Apparently these socialists in both parties, the Liberals and the avowed socialists, say if we can only bell this great cat to the south of us everything will be well. Let us have none of that nonsense. Let us set our Canadian house in order, and let us look for a while at what we can do to expand our own economy. Where has the Roads to Resources Program gone? Down the drain. Where has the winter works program gone? Down the drain. Where has the vision of north gone? Down the drain. Why? Because it is the avowed policy of the present administration to keep us busy fighting among ourselves, and then we will never build a solid economy in the north. We will have to look elsewhere for leadership. I do not like this one bit. I, for one, am unwilling to trade any reliance we have upon the great republic to the south of us for reliance upon the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics or the great Republic of China. I say that if there is a future for Canada, it is in paddling our own canoe, rowing our own boat, to get our own economic house in order. It is about time we got down to some solid thinking about this.

I do not suggest in any way that a mere tax haven is the full answer, but it is one of them. I do not see very much of a tax haven in this document which would give any comfort to the people in Canada who want to save their hard earned wages, who want to put risk capital into the development of their own country, who want to buy Canada back, and who want to develop that part of Canada which is still untouched and which lies anywhere north of the 49th parallel. Let us have no more of this talk blaming the United States for the trouble in which we find ourselves.

Part of the trouble of the United States is due to the fact that it has been far too generous since World War II. Part of her trouble is that she has been fighting all the wars of the free world and we have been giving her little comfort and no financial or military help. The colossal figure of $145 billion was spent in Marshall aid by one nation in the last 25 years in international help for the downtrodden and hungry nations of the world, more than in all the history of this planet. I am sick and tired of hearing our friends to the south, the best friends we have ever had and the best friends we could ever have, being blamed for all the troubles we have, many of them self imposed. I do not think such statements should be made by any group of people who talk about Canadian sovereignty and who know perfectly well that most of their support comes from U.S. dominated unions.

Where is this sovereignty when there is a strike in the Massey-Ferguson Company? The orders come from south of the border. Probably that is one in which they have an excuse for the proper complaint that sometimes workers in Canada are on strike when they have nothing to gain from a strike except competition with the giant to the south. Our course is not to blame the United States of America for all of our faults, but to go back to work. Everybody in Canada knows that it is ridiculous nonsense for the workers of Canada to whine, to yelp and to strike for equal wages unless we have equal opportunities to sell our goods. As everybody knows, the Americans have a market at least ten times as great as ours. Those are the facts of life. If we demand equal pay for equal work, how are we going to account for the differences in transportation and in climate, for the fact that we do not have available to us the sophisticated tools which they have south of the border? It is perfectly true that if we had sophisticated tools, large factories and transportation, as well as the many advantages which American industry has, we could pay equal wages for equal work. You know it is impossible. If you get the right provisions written into an agreement so that you get equal wages, then you can expect companies—which as somebody said are not a religion but are in business for profit—to locate elsewhere.

When we are looking at Bill C-259 we have to look at its clauses which will give some hope to Canadian business and to Canadian investors and which will give us equality, at least taxwise, with the Americans. In the farm machinery industry, of which I have some knowledge, there has been some parity until the present time. But as I read Bill C-259, there are changes in it which will make it more difficult for Canadian manufacturers of farm machinery to compete with their American counterparts.

This is a retrograde step and the kind of thing at which we should be looking. Instead of looking for a scapegoat or for somebody else to blame, why do we not look at our own stupidity when we are not even capable of putting in a clause in a seven-pound document which would protect, for example, Brantford and other areas which are producing farm machinery?

Let us consider the Carter report, that socialistic document. I say that socialism for Canada is not only out of date but will not work. We now depend on international trade in manufactured goods, sophisticated machinery and even heavy water plants and atomic products, very sophisticated products indeed. There is international competition and we must make it possible for the taxpayer of Canada who wants to save his money and invest in mining and processing of Canadian materials to have equality so far as taxes are concerned with his American and international counterparts. That is something which we can do and over which we have control.

Is there anything we can do about the trading blocs? I suggest there is. As radical as this may sound, I say that if we are not capable of developing in North America a trading bloc of some kind which would act as a counterbalance to the European Common Market and to Soviet and Chinese influence in trade, we are in deep and serious trouble. Nothing could be more simple to my mind, and if we plan it properly it is not fraught with the dangers which have been paraded in this chamber today. We have been treated well by our American counterparts. Until now they have found Canada to be a rich and profitable place in which to invest their money. Our taxation laws have encouraged this. The United States, in their wisdom, have seen fit to make it profitable for American companies to invest in Canada.

I say that one of the first steps we should take is to make sure that when Canadians invest in their own industry, particularly the oil and gas industry, we should make it equally profitable for Canadians to invest risk capital in these areas. Then, you will find that Canadians are more interested in developing their own resources than in investing in such places as Brazil, Australia, South Africa, or the great United States. We have not done enough to encourage Canadian participation in our own country. The Carter recommendations not only do not give the proper encouragement but do not suggest proper means for developing our country. If you take them to their ultimate conclusion, they lead down the road to a complete take over by the state. If we get to this point, we know perfectly well that initiative would be killed and there would be workers only because they were driven by a gun. My experience with Canadians, and I know them pretty well, is that this would never work in Canada. It would take two men with guns to make me work, and they had better be good with the gun.

We need to take a good look at the question of state ownership of anything. In Saskatchewan they tried an experiment with state ownership involving some 17 companies established as Crown corporations, covering everything from box factories to shoe factories. They all went broke. None of them showed a profit. State ownership does not work. State ownership is all very well for a country which has experienced a thousands years of slavery. Anything is better than that, but surely nobody in this chamber can say Canada is in a situation where we have to accept anything in order to get out of our slavery. Our only slavery is slavery to stupidity, to laziness, in accepting a document like this and being so subservient as to allow it go through unamended. Amendments are needed, and we know what the amendments should be. Before it is too late we must write into this document protection for private industry, private enterprise, private wages and private profit, instead of rushing into a socialistic takeover.

We should be giving every Canadian an opportunity to become a shareholder in Canada. This can be achieved. We launched a small experiment in Alberta a few years ago, the Alberta Gas Trunk Pipeline. Shares in that enterprise were sold practically before the certificates were printed. Through you, Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the parliamentary secretary and to the minister that we should be seeking opportunities to expand Canada's economy, giving all Canadians an opportunity to invest in it. Look at the wonderful opportunity we missed after the discovery of oil and gas at Prudhoe Bay.

I am not a negative individual. Three years ago, when the first news came out of that discovery, I could hardly wait to get a chance to speak in this chamber to beg the government to undertake plans to build a pipeline, or series of pipelines, stretching from Prudhoe Bay down through Canada to the United States. What was the result? From all sides we had people whining about the ecology, about the loss of nesting places for the whooping cranes and grazing land for the caribou. People just did not know that caribou are quite capable of looking after themselves. We should have undertaken the necessary research at once. Our Prime Minister went over to Russia and saw how our Russian friends build pipelines in the north. I say that anything they can do we can do better. If we wanted to, we could build a pipeline from Prudhoe Bay and have Canadians invest in it. It would probably be the biggest single development in the history of the oil and gas industry in Canada.

But what have we done up until now? We have had nothing but wrangling, nothing but whining, nothing but criticism of things we know nothing about. A few years ago if we had placed experts to work, and backed them with a few millions of dollars, by now such a pipeline would be half completed, and we would not have to worry about oil being piped across Alaska and shipped down the west coast. A pipeline from Prudhoe Bay through the centre of North America, taking the shortest route between the wells and the market, is a project, of the type that can be undertaken by good, aggressive, free-thinking Canadians. We could hand the oil over at the border to good, strong, free-thinking Americans.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a brief point of order to bring hon. members up to date on the business of the House for the rest of the week. Further to our announcement on Friday about the possibility of holding an opposition day this week, it has now been agreed that Thursday will be an opposition day and that the subject matter for debate on that day will be determined by the Creditistes. That will have a distorting effect on the four days that had been allotted this week for the subject matters that were announced on Friday, and adjustments will have to be made to make sure that the full number of hours allotted to the four subjects mentioned on Friday will be available for discussion of them.

The first of those subjects was international income, to be debated today, and tomorrow; under mining and petroleum, we propose to deal with sections 21, 35, 46 to 48 inclusive, 59, 64 to 66 inclusive, 87 and 124. This will then leave, beginning on Wednesday, corporations and their shareholders, which will involve discussion on the following sections: 36 to 41 inclusive, 82 to 84 inclusive, 89, 112, 121 to 125 inclusive, 129, 143 and 181 to 197 inclusive. The fourth of the categories which will be dealt with this week is business and property income, which would be commenced on Friday and concluded on Monday, depending on the exact adjustment made to compensate for the fact that discussion on corporations and their shareholders will begin on Wednesday, because it was specifically undertaken that Wednesday would not be treated as a full day in the decision to give one day to each of those four categories. Therefore, discussion on business and property income will begin some time on Friday and will conclude on Monday. This will include sections 14 to 19 inclusive, 22 to 26 inclusive, 28, 32, 33, 34, 36, 37, 50 to 59 inclusive, 104 to 108 inclusive, 122, 130, 131, 132, 138 to 142 inclusive and 208 to 211 inclusive. Those sections are all contained in the list which I filed when I made the announcement of business last Friday.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie)—External Affairs; the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent)—External Affairs; the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis)—National Anthem.

Mr. Osler: Mr. Chairman, in considering this subject we must consider the real world in which we live, and try to make our legislation appropriate to that real world. So far this afternoon we have heard things which may have been at a bit of a tangent to the subject. I am sorry the hon. member for Pembina is not in the chamber because I do not like to speak about a member when he is not present. I hope he is behind the curtain and will return. He said that we were blaming the United States for all our troubles. I have never heard people blaming the United States for all our troubles.

• (5:00 p.m.)

Mr. Alexander: Not yet, wait until the elections.

Mr. Osler: I have heard a lot of people blame some parties for blaming the United States for all our troubles, but I have not heard the parties blaming the United States. We are not saying that anybody has offended. We are saying that we do not like the way they put on surcharges or discount programs against us when, even by their own criteria, we are not offending them.

The hon. member for Pembina said, "We must trade to live" and he somehow hooked that in with the idea that we were being offensive to the United States, that we should be trading with the United States to live. Of course, we should. His own former leader and the former outstanding prime minister, a genuine voice from my part of the country, was the first in modern times to see the danger that has materialized and to endeavour to divert 15 per cent of our trade from the United States to other parts of the world.

Mr. Peters: It is too bad the Liberals didn't do it.

Mr. Osler: Yes it is too bad that they did not manage to do it, but they have managed to do more than has ever been done before and they are still endeavouring to do it. My part of the country depends on trade more than any other, and when I go about it is pitiful to hear people in various mealy-mouthed opposition parties saying that our Prime Minister travels too much trying to drum up trade.

Mr. Dinsdale: Trade?

Mr. Osler: We need trade in order to sell our manufactured goods and farm products, yet when people go out to try to get it they get blamed for it.

The hon. member for Waterloo said that this country does not have to live off other people. I wish he had gone to Assiniboia to tell that to the people he was trying to persuade a couple of weeks ago. No other people in the world try more to live off other parts of the world than do Canadians, whether they are in Ontario or in the west. One thing we have in common is that Ontario and the west need to live off other people. Here we have this inward-looking orthodox, rigid thinking, mealy-mouthed—My God—

Mr. Peters: You people are just moving into that field now. Don't be too brave!

Mr. Osler: What field?

Mr. Lefebvre: Address the Chair.

Mr. Peters: International trade.

Mr. Osler: I did not realize that any so-called labour party knew anything about international trade. They have always been inward-looking, contemplating their own little umbilical cord. They do not think it is worth trying to live in the real world. However, they have nothing to fear because they will never have to live in the real world.

Mr. Skoberg: You have never lived in the real world yourself.

Mr. Osler: I would just ask the hon. member for Waterloo to repeat his statement that this country does not need to live off other people to the farmers or the industrial workers for whom he reputedly speaks. There is no country in the world where 20 million people depend on trade more than in this country.

Having said that, there is no use spending a lot of time talking about the great evil international corporation. Canada is a mature country and if it does not like the rules under which some international corporations play the game in this country it can change the rules. But to say that international trade is something to be suspicious about is being pre-19th century—probably a taste of the mercantilism which went out about the time the Stuarts went out.

Canada's domestic market is small. The thing that worries me about the treatment of international corporations is that, even more than tariffs today, the ability to locate work in various countries through international corporations is emerging as one of the fundamental keys to prosperity and job opportunities. They found this out in Europe and we are finding it out in Canada; it can be expected that some members will realize that it is happening. If that is the case, as I believe it to be, then Canadian companies wishing to establish operations in foreign lands in partnership with local nationals under the laws created by those countries, should not be discouraged from doing so. I think this legislation should perhaps be looked at because I believe it may be discouraging this possibility. By establishing in other countries, sometimes firms can protect and even create technical and non-technical jobs for Canadians. This could help protect tax revenue in Canada and even help our balance of payments position. Such companies could make friends in foreign lands that would give other aspects of Canada's endeavour an opportunity to obtain fresh markets, agricultural or industrial. It is very important that we remain an outward looking country and that we have friends in other countries who can help us generate and open up markets for industrial or agricultural products.

So, Mr. Chairman, there are many pluses pointing to encouragement for Canadian corporations to be on the ground in foreign countries. I am not talking about Canadian corporations unduly expanding a foreign company in a foreign land, and it is up to those countries to avoid this. But a lot of Canadian firms play by fair ground rules, Mr. Chairman, and are not out to diddle everybody as our NDP friends assume. It is short-sighted to negate tax incentives offered to Canadian companies by developing countries as this legislation will tend to do, except under certain conditions which will be beyond the control of those very companies.

By joining forces with the local manufacturers, Canadian companies can increase the demand for Canadian technology and, more important, for Canadian-made components. Most people know, and those who don't are beginning to realize, that in order to sell refrigerators in Europe it may be advisable to allow the doorhandles for those refrigerators to be manufactured there. A lot of Canadian components can be shipped to another country if there is agreement with that country to make some parts. This is very important in many of the opening markets, and we should encourage our companies to make deals with others that are on the ground so that this sort of rationalization of component parts can be made. It will keep people employed in Canada.

Multinational activity can be more useful in developing trade and Canadian jobs than tinkering with tariff adjustments. I am sure most people will agree. Tariffs are down and are going down further; in many ways, they have become irrelevant. It is the deals that can be made between companies and countries to provide adequate work for people in both countries that will often allow our product into those countries more readily than tariff adjustments.

It seems to me that we should look at this legislation once more with the idea of finding some way of directing legislation against those who offend, and leave the legitimate international Canadian companies unpenalized to get on with their job.

Mr. Dinsdale: Good sense!

Mr. Osler: How can we define active business income and what is the legitimate plowback that can be made in the company of a subsidiary in order to improve its functioning? It is true that tax treaties can provide for exemption from additional Canadian tax when dividends flow from other countries back to Canada. Yet when our government cannot or will not negotiate, for any number of reasons, such tax treaties why should Canadian companies be penalized? I hope the parliamentary secretary will advocate strongly that another look be taken at these sections in order that some way may be found to help legitimate Canadian companies doing business with affiliates or allied companies in other countries get on with the job and, at the same time, to protect jobs at home.

• (5:10 p.m.)

Mr. McCutcheon: Mr. Chairman, will the hon. member permit a question.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Is that agreed?

Mr. Osler: Agreed.

Mr. McCutcheon: Is the hon. member of the opinion, as I am, that the taxing habits of the government in Canada may have had an adverse effect on developments in Winnipeg, inasmuch as the Versatile manufacturing people, according to my understanding, are moving to Mexico?

Mr. Skoberg: Where did the hon. member hear about that?

Mr. Osler: Mr. Chairman, I am not enough of an expert to answer that question. I have not heard the particulars of the situation. I know that the particular individuals who have control of that company are singular men with singular attitudes, attitudes that are different from those of most businessmen. We cannot really believe that their move has been purely prompted by so-called tax rules, although they may have used those rules as an excuse. I know that they were pretty restless before anybody thought of tax changes.

An hon. Member: It must be the weather.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I listened with interest this afternoon to the remarks of various hon. members on this section of the tax bill relating to international income, both flowing in and flowing out of Canada. My remarks will be primarily directed to the position of the Canadian corporation doing business in a foreign jurisdiction and some of the problems that it may be exposed to if this bill goes through in its present form. Before developing my thoughts on this complex part of the bill, may I say that we have been given interesting and constructive contributions by the hon. member for Dauphin and the hon. member for Spadina. They both spoke earlier this afternoon, and both pointed out in cogent terms what Canadian companies doing business abroad fear. I was glad to hear the hon. member for Winnipeg South echo some of these concerns. He suggested how these provisions will adversely affect the operation of Canadian corporations doing business abroad.

Having said that, Mr. Chairman, may I digress partially from the trend of my remarks to say I was astounded at what the hon. member for Waterloo said. Although the hon. member is not now in the House, I want to comment on his remarks. If the trend of his thoughts were to be followed to their logical conclusion, one could assume that that hon. gentleman is not only against the provisions of the auto pact but would like to go back to the days of the horse and buggy. Before this debate ends, I hope the hon. member for Brant, who was in the chamber but who is not here now, will attempt to explain to us the remarks of the hon. member for Waterloo as they applied to Massey-Ferguson and that part of the Massey-Ferguson business which is located in Brantford. The hon. member for Waterloo threw out interesting thoughts; yet I find it inconceivable that the hon. member for Brant who represents Brantford could support what the hon. member for Waterloo said in total or in part. Be that as it may, I hope my remarks will be brought to the attention of the hon. member for Brant. No doubt the hon. member for Moose Jaw will be the purveyor of glad tidings and good advice and will invite the hon. member for Brant to contribute to this debate in order that he may rationalize the remarks of the hon. member for Waterloo for the benefit of the people who work for Massey-Ferguson.

Basically, the more we discuss the sections of the bill dealing with international incomes and international finance, the more it becomes apparent that Lewis Carroll's "Alice in Wonderland", when considered in terms of this debate, is more a work of fact than of fiction. We are told that that eminent classic is all fable; yet I submit that what the committee of the whole is attempting to do in dealing with the abstract ideas of international income and international finance makes Alice in Wonderland seem more like fact than fable. The determination of the Minister of Finance to proceed with the bill, regardless of changing circumstances, regardless of conditions which have changed since the Carter report came out and since this bill was first introduced, regardless of developments on the international scene which culminated on August 15 in Mr. Nixon's proposals for protectionist measures which show that America is looking inward, is enough to make one think that he might be a character in Lewis Carroll's famed fable of yesteryear. The decision of the President of the United States has brought difficulties to almost all communities of the world.

In pretending that Mr. Nixon has developed his proposals in a vacuum, so to speak, the minister has become a perpetrator of fable, because what he is doing cannot be based on fact. Basically, and I think this is most likely, the Minister of Finance supports these international income provisions because there is very little sex appeal, in a political way, to them. I suppose that most people will look on companies like Massey-Ferguson and Alcan as giant corporations doing business abroad. To the majority of hon. members as well as to Canadians, they are rather distant and their operations are rather far afield. I suggest nevertheless, Mr. Chairman, that these provisions regarding international income are about as fundamental to this tax reform bill as Mr. Nixon's DISC proposals are to his income incentive proposals relating to foreign investment by American companies. Although the President of the United States is trying to correct that country's imbalance in trade by encouraging, through legislative sanctions, multinational corporations to develop their activities abroad, we, in this country, seem to be going in the reverse direction. The sections of the legislation which stimulated Canadian multinational corporations in their development abroad are being removed or restricted in scope.

I submit that the future prospects of Canadian corporation doing business abroad will be adversely affected if these sections, in their present form, are passed. Yet I believe, Mr. Chairman, that these sections dealing with international income are as fundamentally important to us as Mr. Nixon's proposals, which are attempting to restore the balance of the American economy, are important to the United States. The proposals in this bill relate to the question of whether we shall enjoy a more diversified economy. They relate fundamentally to the question of whether these companies will provide jobs for Canadians, both abroad and here in Canada. Those companies which successfully do business abroad must be serviced. It is rather paradoxical to me to see that, regardless of our attempts to develop new policies in a vacuum, the United States, in attempting to correct its imbalance of trade and balance of trade difficulties, is moving outward. That it is moving outward is a sort of paradox in itself, because it is so doing through protectionist measures. They are moving outward in the sense that they want to help their international corporations doing business in Canada or elsewhere in the world to improve their profit margins.

Mr. Skoberg: But they are looking inward.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Mr. Nowlan: The hon. member for Moose Jaw did not listen to what I said. I said this is a paradox, because, in moving outward they are building trade barriers to protect industries inside that country. They are moving outward in the sense that they are giving financial, fiscal and tax incentives to a corporation doing business abroad and at the same time protecting their backyard with trade protectionists measures.

We watched this paradoxical movement by our best neighbour. The United States is still our best neighbour, even though we are finding their financial binds on taxation hurdles to overcome. While they do this to increase their multinational development and international income we in this country, the small partner in the whole trading scheme, are moving inwardly. We are withdrawing or restricting those tax provisions that help stimulate the Canadian corporation into doing business abroad. I do not understand how we can rationalize this counter-thrust with two economies that are next door to each other and that are integrated, or how we can help but expect that there will be fundamental problems on the economic scene for years to come.

There is another part that I find difficult to reconcile. Ministers of the crown, regardless of what government is in power, say we must diversify and expand our trade as well as create jobs. This is the great present under the Christmas tree. This will justify every type of proposal. It is a worthy one. It struck me as passing strange that within the past week, when the international income provisions were before the committee of the whole, according to a report in the November 18 issue of the Globe and Mail there was a seminar in Toronto on how government and industry could join together to participate even more in the development across the seas and, in particular, capital development across the seas. There were many proposals advanced at this conference. I will refer to a couple of them to illustrate the paradox of these provisions which are moving inwardly and adversely affecting our Canadian output abroad. Canadians who are trying to create jobs and diversify our economy want more stimuli and incentives to move abroad.

Among those who participated in this conference that was arranged by the Ontario Department of Trade and Development was Paul G. Opler, vice-president of Foundation Co. of Canada Ltd. which does a fair amount of business abroad. With regard to capital projects abroad, he said:

—that Canada has not earned its share of the world's bustling export business and has not taken full advantage of representing the only source of North American technology outside the United States,

This is a rather important contribution. We are in a unique position. We should have the determination and guts to develop it. Through geography and history, we are part of a North American complex. Unlike the hon. member for Waterloo, we cannot crawl into our shell or bury our head in the sand. This is not the United States. Yet we have been able to share in the joint development of technology, research and many hydroelectric projects. We have been able to inherit the bounty as a result of this fine relationship with our very large and powerful neighbour, which I think is still the industrial leader of the world. In many ways we have been able to share far beyond our economic capacity in the dollars and cents which have been generated in this country.

Countries outside the North American continent naturally look to us to provide an input in the capital projects abroad. We are in the unique position where we should be able to develop and diversify our trade potential and also to create more jobs. In terms of these provisions, that ability to develop this unique relationship in the most positive sense is going to be adversely affected. In the same article, Mr. Opler said:

The most salient factor enabling Canadian companies to displace domestic firms in the host country, and to edge out other competition, is a discernible lead in technical competence.

That is interrelated to the point I made earlier. Because of our unique situation, having shared in joint development either because of branch plant economies, the fact that our natural cousins or relatives have worked somewhere else or International Nickel may have a lot of copyrights of research registered in New York, there has been joint development. We have a technical competence to share in projects abroad. These tax provisions are going to help dilute or diminish any advantage we have in technical competence. Therefore, we are not going to receive our just share of this capital development in foreign countries which is going to be one of the tremendous fields of development in the 70's and 80's as the developing nations really begin to emerge.

Another gentleman who contributed to this conference was Charles I. Rathgeb, president of Canadian International Comstock Co. Ltd. of Toronto, another company that does a fair amount of business abroad. He said:

Canada could cure its unemployment problem by making more competitive bids on big foreign capital projects.

That is understandable. He then went on to echo the sentiments of others at the conference with regard to foreign aid. He developed an 11 point program on how Canada could share much more than it has shared up to now in the potential capital development of these developing nations. He admits that some of the proposals are rather controversial, but one is rather basic. This gentleman is known for his outspoken comments. His program is rather interesting. I quote one of the proposals:

Tax incentives should be offered on profits earned outside Canada and repatriated to Canada.

Later in the article we find this:

He concluded that Canada has great expertise in certain areas, on the world scene, but the Canadian engineering construction industry is faced with intense competition on foreign markets.

Canada must continue to expand into these markets as a trading nation; this can be accomplished with unselfish efforts by industry and flexible, continuing support from Canada's governments, he said.

I have the Alcan brief submitted to the Senate banking committee. I suggest the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance cannot deny, that in attempting to establish equity, regardless of the justifications, there has been no thought given as to how these provisions are going to affect the international operations of Canadian corporations. I want the parliamentary secretary to deny, if he can, that the provisions in total are going to affect the competitive position of Canadian companies working abroad.

My hon. friend from Waterloo South said that he did not care about giving special privileges or preferences to these corporations, that under the catchword "equity" everything should be the same. In Canada we have developed regional disparity programs to help the disadvantaged areas but these programs are not necessarily good for other countries. Different environments require different approaches. Not all tax situations are the same. Therefore, it is not reasonable to give them all the same label under the guise of equity.

My final contribution regarding the report of the conference held last week on how Canada can contribute to the international scene is to quote Mr. Ray Pillman, president of H. G. Acres Limited who do a fair amount of consulting work around the world. As reported in the Globe and Mail, he said:

> Even with removal of U.S. import surcharges, Canada will be in a new era for the next 25 years that will have no similarity to the past 25 years, and must develop new economic strategies to maintain a high standard of living, the capital-projects-abroad conference in Toronto was told yesterday—
> Since trade is fundamental to Canada's prosperity, and it is carried on by businessmen, not nations, ways must be found so business can compete efficiently and effectively. This need not require subsidy, but Canada should examine with top priority what other countries are doing on international trade.

I suggest that other countries are not pulling back in the field of international trade and developing tax laws that diminish the thrust or adversely affect the business of corporations abroad. Rather the reverse: they are giving stimulus to corporations that are developing abroad, just as President Nixon, in an extreme way, is overstimulating the economy of the United States so as to develop its full potential, creating trade outside the United States in order to provide jobs within that country. There are many other things I could say about this tax conference, but I think my time is almost up.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Hamilton West.

Mr. Nowlan: May I just finish my sentence, Mr. Chairman?

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. Does the committee give unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nowlan: I will just finish my sentence, with the indulgence of the committee. There are many other things I could say about "Nixonomics" and how they work one way, while the proposals of the Minister of Finance work the other way. But if there is any reason to doubt how the provisions of this tax bill apply to the international scene it is with regard to the repatriation of dividends and the emphasis placed on the bilateral negotiation of tax treaties.

I am informed that by 1975 or 1976 we will have to negotiate 50 new tax treaties and renegotiate 16 existing tax treaties. I suggest that in view of the economic climate in the world today such a prospect is unreal. We will be unable to carry the clout in these negotiations that will give us the full benefit of these tax provisions. Amongst other things, this is a form of hari-kari and I shall have something more to say about it at a later stage.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to have an opportunity of saying a few words in this debate. As we reflect in this age of Aquarius, we realize that one of the most important things to which we should turn our attention is the economic growth of Canada, which of course embraces the question of employment. The bill before the committee is complicated beyond the comprehension of—

An hon. Member: Of mortal man.

Mr. Alexander: I was going to say, of any tax accountant or lawyer who will be called upon to deal with it or, for that matter, beyond the comprehension of members of the bureaucracy. With all due respect, even the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance who, to give credit where credit is due, is doing an admirable job, is having trouble with this bill. The hon. gentleman is answering our questions—I must say that in all fairness—but of course we do not accept some of his answers.

In this time of economic stress, what concerns me is the direction taken by the government's policies. In view of the repercussions of the Carter commission report and the economic policies announced on August 15 by the President of the United States, this bill is a monstrosity, yet the government is stubbornly pushing it through. There was a headline in the Globe and Mail for November 20 which read: "Trudeau to discuss new laws with 44 business leaders". This was a significant meeting. Both business and industry are fearful of the obstacles that lie ahead in the form of the competition bill, the labour bill and particularly this tax bill. What was discussed at this meeting I do not know. Let us hope that by tomorrow we will be able to ascertain what are the government's intentions respecting the several problems that were raised.

I listened to the speeches of the hon. member for Dauphin, the hon. member for Spadina and the hon. member for Annapolis Valley. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, who sits on the government side, I think spoke for many of his colleagues in registering legitimate concern at the problems that these sections of the bill will create. At the same time, I am concerned about the attitudes taken by my hon. friends of the New Democratic Party, whose classic statement is that this bill does not go far enough. Then they go as far as accepting a policy of government ownership. As I understand the mood of this country which is projected through the hundreds of briefs Members of Parliament are receiving—and I presume the members of the New Democratic Party receive copies of the same briefs—such a policy as enunciated by that party is unacceptable.

What concerns me about that party is that, commendably, they say they are interested in the little man and the worker and assistance should be given to him. But lo and behold, the moment we start talking about industry, whether it is primary or secondary, they say whatever we are doing in this regard is reprehensible. I do not understand their thinking, because it seems to me if we are to be consistent in our concern—not for the little man, because I do not appreciate that term, but for Canadians as individuals—to the extent that we are prepared to give relief, whether tax deductions, incentives or otherwise, we should be concerned about primary or secondary industries which create jobs for our workers. I do not understand the thinking of the NDP and I do not intend to try, because I think it is ridiculous.

As I deal with the sections of this bill I should like to bring to the attention of this House and those who read Hansard what I would call a classic document. It is a report of the Senate Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, dated Thursday, November 4. I am sure the government is aware of this document, and I know that with the astuteness of the parliamentary secretary he is also aware of it. It is dated November 4 and today is November 22, so I am sure he knows of these recommendations.

Let me review some of the matters which were raised in this classic document because it seems to me the gentlemen in the other place had the opportunity of interviewing witnesses in a non-partisan way for the betterment of all Canadians. They have come up with a document I think should be a guideline in respect of questions we are now facing in terms of multinational corporations.

Having read this document, it seems to me I can properly conclude that the impact on the continuing viability of Canadian multinational corporations will be disastrously affected. If we proceed with the sections of this bill in terms of the matter we are now discussing, I can also conclude that these multinational corporations, their investment in foreign operations, their need for foreign outlets to maintain higher levels of employment, will be hampered. I can also conclude that their need for foreign investment to maintain these higher levels in Canada will be hampered. Their capital needs in Canada and abroad should unquestionably be of concern. Last but not least, their competitive position on the world market will be in jeopardy.

It is imperative that we as a nation should not lose sight of the fact that Canada is one of the major trading countries of the world. We should encourage Canadian international corporations in their efforts to expand world markets as of the greatest national importance and high priority. Any measures such as those contained in the proposed legislation which inhibit these efforts are to be deplored. We in our wisdom are here to give some guidance and leadership in this regard, and we must be concerned about these matters. One need not be a financial analyst to determine that cutting the net return on investment almost in half may make foreign operations untenable, especially when foreign competitors do not carry the same handicap. The situation is not improved when actions of other important countries are involved. I refer to United States fiscal and monetary policy, the surcharge and DISC.

The plain fact is that business operations abroad require an absolute ability to remain competitive by operating in a tax environment that is no less favourable than that of foreign competitors. For a significant number of Canadian companies the new rules will impose penalties that will restrict their foreign operations. For a larger number, foreign operations may remain competitive but will increase in complexity.

As I look at the report of the Senate Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce I wonder whether the parliamentary secretary is in a position to advise this House that there has been consideration by the government of amendments or recommendations submitted in the report. I read from page 47:5 of that report as follows:

> It is the hope that, upon the receipt by the Minister of Finance of these recommendations, the same will be accepted by him as being pertinent and relevant, and to the extent so regarded, that appropriate amendments will be submitted by him to the other House while the said proposed legislation is being considered in the committee stage.

I do not know whether what was said by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre is indicative of the thinking of the government in this regard, but it seems to me when he is concerned he speaks on behalf of a number of those on the other side who will not give vocal expression to their concern. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary will take it upon himself to advise the minister what the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre said on behalf of many of his colleagues who are concerned about the drastic effects of this bill.

In the event the parliamentary secretary has not had an opportunity to read these recommendations, I should like to put them on record. It seems to me they were made by a body we should appreciate, because they are giving this place some direction in respect of our economic climate and its effect on multinational corporations. I read from page 47:7 of this report as follows:

> That the government give renewed consideration to the "foreign accrual property income" (FAPI) rules with a view to making at least the following changes: (a) that the definition of the term "foreign accrual property income" be amended to exclude from the category of income which is subject to the foreign affiliate rules any income or capital gains from property that may reasonably be regarded as having been used for the purpose of gaining or producing income from an active business; or, that the term be redefined in such other manner as to ensure that the over-all thrust of the foreign accrual property income provisions will be restricted so that the income subject to these rules will include only diverted income; in the result, that income such as interest on short-term deposits, interest on trade receivables, gains on the disposition of capital property used in a bona fide business operation and other like items will not be classed as foreign accrual property income.

I know this committee was very concerned about passive and diverted income. Let me read from the report at page 47:5 regarding passive and diverted income. At the bottom of the page is to be found the following statement:

> This is particularly unfortunate in the light of the fact that the proposed legislation does not define what income is to be excluded from the diverted income rules as being "active business income". Because of this, there is a serious danger that income such as interest received by a foreign affiliate on short-term deposits or on trade receivables and royalties received by such an affiliate in respect of patents or know-how developed by it abroad in the course of its active business operations (to name but a few) may be taxed currently in the hands of the Canadian shareholder as diverted income even though such income is in fact directly attributable to the foreign affiliate's active business. Such income is not diverted income.

I move on to the second recommendation:

(b) that the de minimis rule contained in the proposed legislation be broadened to the effect that the passive income rules will not apply to any foreign affiliate whose passive income does not exceed a specified percentage of its total gross revenue (such as the 30 per cent rule in the United States); alternatively, the de minimis rule may be expressed as a percentage of the foreign affiliate's gross assets.

(c) that the term "foreign affiliate" be re-defined for purposes of the foreign accrual property income rules to include with respect to foreign corporations only those corporations which are controlled directly or indirectly in Canada.

I am positive the parliamentary secretary is aware of this recommendation. Let me quote again from this document. This is not my usual manner of speaking but I am at a loss for further elaboration, as I read this document, in attempting to place the case for the Canadian people before the government. In the conclusions the report reads:

In conclusion, your committee feels constrained to reiterate the views expressed by it in its report on the white paper proposals for tax reform condemning the implications inherent in the government's proposals that vast tax avoidance schemes exist through the use of foreign entities. As stated in its report the committee believes that tax avoidance of this kind can be effectively blocked under existing legislation and failure to block such abuses (if they exist) is due more to lack of enforcement of existing law than to lack of legislation.

Mr. Chairman, I could continue but let me just say that we are at the stage where we must be very much concerned about the direction in which we are going. If we do not take serious note of the actions of other countries in respect of their corporations or industries, and if we do not attempt to give the same type of assistance and exercise the same type of concern in respect of our industries, we must ask where we are going. I think this is why the Canadian people and our industries are very concerned. They do not know where this government is going.

When I continually receive these briefs, brochures and letters of concern from industry, the labour movement and the layman there is no wonder we have lack of confidence. Everyone is afraid of the future. I believe that the pursuit of the provisions relating to multinational corporations in this bill can have nothing but a disastrous effect upon Canada and its economy. We all talk about tax reform. Certainly we want tax reform. However, I question whether this is tax reform. If we are to have tax reform, I respectfully submit that we should not attempt to unduly stifle personal initiative and economic growth. It is based upon these two policies or philosophies, if you will, that we can arrive at full employment.

This bill in many instances smacks of the policy of discouragement rather than encouragement. We wonder what the United States surcharge will do to us in terms of moneys lost. I believe the amount has been put at $1 billion, if implemented for a year, plus the loss of 90,000 jobs. I should like to know right now what the future holds for us. We hear there is a possibility that the DISC program will go ahead. It probably will. I was one of the fortunate persons who had an opportunity to meet with our United States colleagues. They were equally concerned about what is happening to Canada.

As I understand it, there will be a move to make this program ineffective in the long run, because they are very much aware that so long as their policies create unemployment, obviously they can never reach a balance of trade, because if we do not have sufficient employment we do not have the money with which to buy goods. When the parliamentary secretary has a big t-bone steak for supper and comes back refreshed, I hope he will be able to give us some answers to the many problems and questions raised by hon. members on this very complicated subject.

Since the parliamentary secretary in the first instance brought in 95 amendments to this bill, it would seem that it was improperly drawn up or that the drafters were not competent. Then later a further 40 amendments were moved. I may be out by four or five amendments but I know the parliamentary secretary will correct me if I am wrong. This certainly is reason to question the competency of those behind the bill. Eight more amendments were recently brought in. Are we to have more?

Mr. Mahoney: Your party has asked for more.

Mr. Alexander: Your side has also asked for more. I know your side has had a great deal to say about co-operatives and credit unions. I am not becoming involved in that subject at this time, but I understand if that part of the bill is passed one of your members is likely to quit.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Alexander: I will call it six o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Chairman: When the committee rose at six o'clock it had under consideration clause 1, section 2. Shall the section carry?

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Chairman, as we reached the hour of six o'clock I had completed my remarks, but now I wish to rise on a question of privilege. In speaking on these most controversial sections I quoted at length at times, from the report of the committee on banking and finance of the other place. In my enthusiasm with respect to the inequities I have found in these sections dealing with multinational corporations, I was carried away. It has now been brought to my attention that in reference to documents or speeches, or anything that occurs in the other place one should not quote them at length and the most one can do, as I understand it, is to paraphrase.

I wanted to let you, Mr. Chairman, and members of the committee, know that I have been advised of this. I say this for the edification of those who do not know of this rule, and I hope my words will reach their ears. In any event, I find it makes things very difficult, when we find that such an important committee refers at length to this matter and arrives at important conclusions, that it is impossible for us to quote directly from their report. I find this confusing and perhaps in the future I will find the reason for it.

For instance, with regard to Bill S-9 which is presently before the justice committee, we are hamstrung in giving to members of the House and to the people of Canada the full benefit of all that has occurred in these surroundings. Perhaps in view of the importance of the conclusions that are reached and of the recommendations that are made in the other place, it is time for us to consider this matter in a critical and constructive way in order that without paraphrasing the whole proceedings we are to become aware of matters which occur in the other place and are of great importance to us. Thus, we could have some indication of what is going on there.

I hope that in raising my question of privilege I have not trespassed unduly on the time of the committee because, as I said, it is extremely difficult to make one's feelings known when we are not allowed to quote speeches or proceedings in the other place. I understand, also, that under the rules we are not allowed to refer to hon. senators by name. That is my question of privilege.

Mr. Horner: In rising to take part in the debate concerning international corporations and Canada's taxation policy, I cannot help but be drawn to the speech of the Minister of National Revenue delivered in Vancouver on November 16. He was quite right in the early part of the speech when he said, referring to the whole matter of taxation, that no subject has been so thoroughly discussed as tax reform—including weather—in Canada. He went on to say how thoroughly this whole matter has concerned the government. He said the following on page 2 of the speech:

> Suffice it to say that while the government does not claim to have presented legislation for a new tax system that pleases everyone, I submit that Bill C-259, to a greater extent than any tax legislation before it, is the result of careful consideration of the collective views of a great cross-section of the Canadian public, as well as of committees of the House and Senate. On no previous occasion have Canadians had such an opportunity to contribute to the construction of a new tax system.

I am not disputing that statement: it is correct. But where does that bring us to today? About a month ago, after presentation of the bill, the minister tabled 148 amendments. Let us be honest about it, Mr. Chairman. Let us lay the cards on the table. The whole question before the country is: shall this bill pass before December? Can those who oppose the bill hold it up and still win public favour?

According to the Minister of National Revenue, the bill has been exhaustively studied. He thinks the Canadian people have made a contribution to it. In his terms the question is: how can a bill so good be held up by any responsible opposition? If the opposition holds it up then, automatically, it must be facing complete ruination at the polls. No opposition party, so close to a federal election, would dare to hold up the bill. According to the Minister of National Revenue, everybody wants the bill passed. Yet the parliamentary secretary who has responsibility for piloting the legislation through the House leaves this chamber every day, shaking his head pessimistically and saying, "I cannot see any hope for it. I cannot see it going through at all. There is just too much opposition to it.

Mr. Mahoney: I have never said that.

Mr. Horner: The parliamentary secretary says that I am misinterpreting his remarks. That is fine; I stand corrected. I hope he places his exact words on the record before the evening is over. But I do not think I paraphrased him so incorrectly; I was nearly right, Mr. Chairman. The opposition is confronted with the question of whether or not the legislation is good or bad. Does it help one segment of our economy, or does it hinder it? Does it help one segment and hinder another? We have to analyse it.

The Minister of National Revenue at page 2 of his speech said:

> —I am told that there are those who claim that the bill is complex and even some who claim that it is unworkable. Is the bill complex? Yes—

What did the minister say about the complexity of the bill as it applies to Canadian international corporations, Canadian corporations and Canadian taxpayers? At page 2 of his speech he said:

> Once tax reform comes into effect, the increased need by taxpayers for rulings and interpretations will make greater demands on the limited numbers of staff engaged in this work. I am concerned about the problem involved in finding the additional staff that will be needed. The people required must be, or be capable of becoming, tax experts and, as you know, they are not easy to find. We are counting on many of those who worked on our task force in planning the introduction of the new law to transfer to this area. Already we have supplemented our staff with three lawyers and three chartered accountants for whose services we contracted with their firms. This has been most successful and in all cases we have been supplied with young, enthusiastic and most competent people.

I could read the whole paragraph. In his speech in Vancouver he posed the question: is the legislation complex? He answered yes. Then at page 7 of his speech he outlined the complexity which the ordinary taxpayer would face. He said we would need more tax experts, more chartered accountants and more tax lawyers. He said there would be more litigation. Where does all this leave the taxpayer? It leaves him frightened and scurrying for cover. That applies to individual Canadian taxpayers, Canadian corporations and Canadian international corporations.

What is the major problem facing Canadian international corporations? It is the uncertainty over tax reform. They are concerned about the question of Canadian policy with regard to foreign investment. This tax bill slaps their wrists. It will place increased taxation on them. These corporations also face the problem that arises from Britain entering the European Common Market. They face the problem of fluctuating international monetary rates and problems posed by phase two of President Nixon's economic program. It has often been said that Canadian business should reach out and make its mark in international markets. But, as I say, Canadian international corporations are concerned about this legislation. The Prime Minister and previous Prime Ministers have asked how long should Canadians continue to be hewers of water—

Mr. Mahoney: Quit chopping that water, Jack.

Mr. Horner: I stand corrected—hewers of wood and drawers of water. How long should Canadians remain producers of raw materials and semi-finished products without entering the intensive employment field associated with the production of finished products? Will this tax legislation, with its severe tax penalties, be beneficial to Canadian international corporations? All members of this House are rightfully concerned about Canadian ownership. Should we slap a penalty on international Canadian corporations today, when we are striking out for greater Canadian ownership and greater employment within the Canadian economy?

• (8:20 p.m.)

I listened to the speech of the hon. member for Waterloo this afternoon when he condemned Massey-Ferguson and said that if they do not like living in Canada they should get out. It is all very well to say that when you do not have to answer to the people who are unemployed. There may be many workers within Massey-Ferguson at Brantford who are dissatisfied with the corporation and say it should be told to get out. But where are we to find employment for those people? Will the workers be asked to move with the company if it leaves Canada?

We want to maintain our place as a world trader, and world trade is becoming complex. We are slowly gobbling up areas of trade with raw materials. But if a country is buying raw materials its object is to become more industrialized; it is trying to become an exporter of manufactured goods. The country that is buying unfinished products is saying, "We must produce our own raw materials and be a supplier for our industrial complex". If we analyse world trade today we will find that countries are exporting more and more finished products.

If we want to go as far as the financial critic of the New Democratic Party did this afternoon, we can say if the international corporation does not abide by our rules, let us nationalize it and become the producers of that product. But let us consider the consequences, Mr. Chairman. First of all, we confine ourselves to our home market and thus we exclude importation from other markets. Retaliation sets in and we have very little room to export finished products to needy countries. That is the problem. If we are prepared to go as far as the NDP suggests and nationalize industry, we eventually become absorbed in our own market and exclude ourselves from international competition except with a few countries. I see the hon. member for Waterloo is listening. I am glad he is back in the House. This is where we fall out, at the end of his speech which advocated nationalization of the farm implements industry. I shall deal with that at greater length.

We have to recognize, Mr. Chairman, that this is one of the most important aspects of this bill. Are we to be a world trader? Are we to be the eighth or the seventh trader in the world? Canada now ranks seventh. Will we hold that position or slide back to being suppliers of our own market only? This is what we have to assess. If we say that we will maintain No. 7 or No. 6 position and crawl up to No. 5, where we once were, we have to assess our ability to compete with international giants.

How can a country confined to a small market of 20 million people compete with an international giant which has a market of "X" million people before it? It is pretty nearly impossible when you consider the complexity and mass production involved. The country that is confined by the rigidity of its tax structure to a market of 20 million people has great difficulty in competing with an international corporation that is allowed to produce for the whole world—two billion people or more.

We are at the crossroads, Mr. Chairman. We must decide whether to remain No. 7 or whether to go up to No. 6 or No. 5 in world trade. To maintain our present position we must recognize within our tax structure that Canadian international corporations are necessary in order to compete in world markets. It may be said that they are not the answer. Governments can take over business and make unilateral agreements with other governments, thus obtaining more of the market. But where does that leave us in the conflict confronting the world today? We have the east and west. You know that as well as I do, Mr. Chairman. The Canadian population is becoming more aware of it. If we are to move into unilateral agreements and Crown corporations get into that sphere, then we are going into the eastern world. That is the grave situation facing Canada today. In which direction are we going?

It will be a sad and sorry world if we in Canada find ourselves directed slowly by this insidious socialism of the present government. You may say that I am going too far, Mr. Chairman, that you do not see it as insidious socialism. But more and more Canadian corporations and international corporations are becoming dependent on government—government rules, government regulations, government subsidies. When this situation has existed for five or ten years, then international corporations will be even more dependent upon government. They will become hooked and will obey the wishes of government as if government owned them. They cannot rebel because government owns them. They go bankrupt and government buys them in order to keep people employed. This is the situation we are facing in Canada, Mr. Chairman—an insidious, seeping, creeping socialism, and this tax measure against international corporations is part of it.

We have an employment problem and this should be our immediate concern. A year or so ago in his annual report the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion said he had found that it took $16,000 of subsidies to increase employment by one person. And that was only the subsidy—the corporation itself put in a great deal of money. I think it would be fair to say that today it takes an investment of about $46,000 to create employment for one more person in the industrial world, and many more people are entering the labour force every year.

The Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member. I must do so to advise him that his time has expired.

• (8:30 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Chairman: The hon. member may continue only if the committee unanimously agrees. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the generosity of the committee and will try to limit my remarks. In talking on such a complex subject I had not realized that my time had gone so quickly.

An hon. Member: But we had.

Mr. Alexander: Hon. members over there have not been listening.

Mr. Horner: I hope the committee is not so set in its ideas as to be unprepared to listen to new ideas. It is unfortunate that the hon. member for Rocky Mountain made a remark like that. Fortunately for him, I do not judge the whole committee as being so stubborn in clinging to old ideas.

An hon. Member: We want to listen to your ideas.

Mr. Horner: The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion pointed out that it costs $16,000 for every new job that is created under programs of his department. I suggest that it is safer to say that in the past couple of years it has taken about $46,000 of new capital investment to create one new job in Canadian industry. Since our labour force is increasing by approximately 350,000 people a year—that being the increase in population—one can readily see, by multiplying the increase in the labour force by 46,000, that providing all these additional jobs will cost many millions of dollars of capital investment.

We must find this money at a time when we are in keen competition with Japan and West Germany, with the European Common Market countries and with the United States. We must compete with manufactured goods coming from Russia. Russia has been trying to break into the North American market for industrial goods. China has recently become interested in this market. Although at present they are not really in the business of selling manufactured goods here, they will be in that business within the next ten years.

Before closing I want to say a word or two in defence of Massey-Ferguson, the corporation which the hon. member for Waterloo, speaking for the whole NDP, suggested should be nationalized. I am not surprised at this, Mr. Chairman. In 1961, when the Standing Committee on Agriculture was studying the cost of farm machinery, the then NDP government of Saskatchewan, by its representations before that committee told us that the farm machinery industry should be nationalized. That suggestion came from Mr. Nollet, the minister, as will be evident to anyone who examines the committee proceedings. That was the position of the NDP government of Saskatchewan of that day, and the party has not changed; that still remains the NDP position.

Mr. Nielsen: There is one capitalist among their ranks at present.

Mr. Horner: Will their position help the competitive situation of the farm machinery industry which must operate on a world-wide basis? That is the question we must examine. That is the question we must ask ourselves, because we as farmers are concerned about free trade in farm machinery markets.

Mr. Rose: That is your problem.

Mr. Horner: I wish members of the NDP would make serious remarks on this subject in committee. What did Massey-Ferguson say about the proposed tax changes?

Mr. Rose: They are against them. They are against any taxes at any time.

Mr. Horner: The hon. member says they are against them. Speaking before the banking, trade and commerce committee of the Senate, an official of Massey-Ferguson Limited said, as reported at page 42:5 of the October 20, 1971, proceedings of the committee:

> We have found the bill, as it affects multinational corporations, to be extremely complex and, quite frankly, a frustrating diversion from the serious business—

Mr. Rose: They did not understand the bill.

An hon. Member: Do you?

Mr. Horner: I think the Canadian people will judge whether or not they understood the bill. The official went on to say:

> —questions which we face—questions which have been so obviously accelerated by the recent United States' action.

I will not take time to list the four points the company brought forward before the committee on October 20, 1971. They listed all the objectionable parts of this legislation. Let me just comment on the attitude the hon. member for Waterloo this afternoon displayed to Massey-Ferguson. He gave that company two options: they could either obey our tax laws or get out of Canada. The company should be nationalized, he suggested. If the company does not like our tax laws, it can get out; or if it stays he suggested we should nationalize it.

Mr. Saltsman: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I am sure the hon. member for Crowfoot would not wish deliberately to mislead the committee. If he had listened carefully to my words this afternoon he would know that he has not quoted me or even paraphrased me accurately, as Hansard will bear out.

Mr. Nielsen: Capitalist.

Mr. Horner: I deliberately asked the hon. member a couple of questions while he was speaking and he did not deny that that was the direction he was suggesting should be taken. He suggested that if the company will not obey the tax laws of Canada, it should get out or be nationalized. That is what he suggested and he made no bones about it. I am a student of NDP philosophy and of long-range NDP policy. That is the attitude of Laxer and the Waffle group. I have long said that they are the only honest socialists in Canada today. I commend the hon. member for joining that group and for saying exactly what it says. That group says, "Nationalization if necessary, but not necessarily necessary"—if I may paraphrase somewhat loosely what a former Prime Minister of Canada said on another occasion. That is what the hon. member meant and that is what he suggested.

Massey-Ferguson went on to list their four points of objection, the third of which reads as follows:

Quite apart from this long-term result and in addition to it, we are convinced that now is the wrong time for Canada to establish its long-term policies in the area of international trade and the multinational corporation. Each of the major trading companies of the world is now engaged in adopting a stance for negotiations to maintain or expand its trading position. For Canada at this time to drastically impair its own competitiveness in international trade appears to us to be almost an incredible course of action.

They are not mincing words, Mr. Chairman. That is strong language. Why is this course so bad for Canada at this time? I go back to what I said a few minutes ago. At present we face serious international complications. We are confronted by a situation the outcome of which will determine whether or not we shall be hewers of wood and drawers of water the rest of our days. We suffer from high unemployment. For all these reasons I cannot help but agree with Massey-Ferguson. If one looks at the 1961 proceedings of the Standing Committee on Agriculture one will see that when the committee dealt with the question of farm machinery nobody gave Massey-Ferguson a rougher time than I did.

Mr. Rose: What changed you?

Mr. Horner: Nobody gave them a rougher time in the 1961 committee when we dealt with farm machinery, and nothing has changed me. Nevertheless, I recognize that now is not the time for Canada to take a retrograde step with regard to international corporations and, particularly, Canadian international corporations.

Mr. Rose: And just what are Canadian international corporations?

Mr. Horner: And what about the trade position, Mr. Chairman—

• (8:40 p.m.)

Mr. Saltsman: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I wonder if the hon. member would accept a question.

Mr. Horner: Certainly.

Mr. Saltsman: As the hon. member is making considerable play of the fact that now is not the time to do this, can he indicate when would be a better time to bring in this tax on international corporations?

Mr. Horner: I hesitate to do so, Mr. Chairman, because I am on borrowed time. A better time would be when we are less dependent on foreign investment and when we do not have 7.1 per cent of the population unemployed. That would be a better time. I believe that time is in the future.

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Fraser Valley West is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Rose: The hon. member for Crowfoot spoke about a better time for Canada in respect of the unemployment situation. I wonder if he would enlarge on that and tell us when would be a better time in respect of the unemployment situation than at the moment.

Mr. Horner: I am glad the hon. member asked that question. If I was uncertain, which I apparently was, I am glad he brought it to my attention. I intended to say that a better time would be when Canada has less unemployment, not when Canada is overly concerned about the number unemployed. The proper time would be when we have 3 per cent or 2 per cent unemployment, or effectual full employment. Then we could become concerned about the tax structure for our manufacturing industries, because our manufacturing and service industries are the biggest employers in Canada. That is the time, not now. I am glad the hon. member asked that question.

Let me go a little further with regard to the international farm implement manufacturing corporations. The hon. member for Waterloo suggested that Massey-Ferguson objected to paying the same wage rates as the United States and said it is manufacturing high wage component machinery within Canada. However, automation comes into the question. This assembly line production of farm machinery is all done in the United States. They are trying to balance off the two. I will not get into an argument on that matter.

An hon. Member: Why not?

Mr. Horner: No tractor manufactured in Canada today does not basically consist of component parts that are imported. The only tractor manufactured in Canada today is the Versatile tractor which is manufactured in Winnipeg. The engine is imported from Great Britain. The tractors which Massey-Ferguson manufacture in their Detroit plant are assembled with component parts, most of which are imported from Europe and Great Britain. They are not manufacturing tractors. Because of our tax structure and our whole unemployment situation, Versatile is seriously considering moving their manufacturing plant to Mexico.

We in this House must come to grips with the whole complex situation of employing Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: Why should we come to grips with the question of employing Canadians? Unless the Canadian people are given an opportunity to play a part in our society, they will not be satisfied. Do I have to search for unsatisfied Canadians? There are hundreds of thousands of such people in Canada.

Mr. Bigg: Everywhere.

Mr. Horner: As the hon. member for Pembina suggested, they are everywhere. Why? Because they fail to see from within the game. Everybody wants to play Monopoly. Everybody wants to be part of the game. This tax structure excludes Canadians. It attempts to wipe them out of the international field. Why should we be so complacent and smug as to say we do not have to involve ourselves in the international manufacturing field? I do not think the facts substantiate such a position. What does Massey-Ferguson do? They will have an opportunity. This brief continues:

In 1970 the trade balance against Canada was $113 million in farm machinery. It consisted of $274 million imports by Canada and $160 million exports from Canada to the United States.

In other words, we have a deficit on farm machinery of $113 million. What percentage of these exports does Massey-Ferguson represent? It represents 50 per cent. They are going to get rid of it; they want to remove it. For every $2 that we export, Massey-Ferguson represents $1. The hon. member for Waterloo suggested they have a plant in the United States and that we are now becoming a subsidiary plant because the plant in the United States manufacturers tractors. They do not manufacture tractors in the United States; they assemble tractors. The component parts are imported into the United States. What advantage do they have in manufacturing and assembling them in the United States? The basic fact is that their United States plant is closer to the market.

One of the major factors in manufactured goods is transportation of the finished product. The Massey-Ferguson manufacturing plant in the United States is closer to the market. Therefore, the cost of delivering the finished product is less. Where is the Massey-Ferguson manufacturing plant in Canada? It is located at Brantford. I have not heard the hon. member for Brantford speak on this issue. Brantford is a long way from the Canadian market. It is no wonder they want a tax advantage in Canada. If they do not get it, they are better off to move their manufacturing of farm implements to Detroit which is closer to the market.

What benefits does Versatile have in Winnipeg? It benefits because of its proximity to the market. If we are not prepared to ensure that Canadian international corporations can survive in Canada, they will move elsewhere. I close with these remarks, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Rose: Hear, hear!

Mr. Saltsman: Let them move.

Mr. Horner: The hon. member for Fraser Valley West can clap his hands and the hon. member for Waterloo can say, "Let them move". But the question is this: will Canadians also have to move? If we force Versatile in Winnipeg to open a plant in Mexico, will the 700 workers in Winnipeg have to move to Mexico? Will they be allowed to go to Mexico? Will they enjoy the same standard of living in Mexico that they enjoy in Winnipeg? I doubt it. Will this really be contributing to the growth of the consumer market in Canada? I doubt it.

It is time Canadians faced the fact that we are involved in a tremendous trade war. We must recognize this. Never before, even in the late thirties, have we been involved in such a trade war. Now is not the time to pass legislation which is regressive and which will impair the Canadian international corporations which we have fostered. We should not be prepared to cast them out and let them move elsewhere, because in doing so we will cast out opportunities for Canadians.

We have 7.1 per cent of the labour force unemployed. In addition, many of our employed are not satisfied with their jobs. We should be making every effort to create opportunity so that those who are employed can seek satisfaction in their work and those who are unemployed can find opportunity in jobs. I urge the House to reject this tax bill because now is not the time to bring in retrogressive legislation involving international corporations, Canadian corporations, family farms, small businesses and a complex employment situation.

[Mr. Horner.]

• (8:50 p.m.)

Mr. Gundlock: Don't forget the oil men from Calgary.

Mr. Horner: I am glad the hon. member for Lethbridge has reminded me that I should not forget that Canada is rich in resources, with one-third of the world's fresh water supply, a vast amount of minerals and the second largest land area in the world. This tax bill is a retrogressive step in the development of our natural resources which will, if proper tax legislation is presented to the country, be the foundation of a wider employment base in the country. I realize I am speaking on borrowed time, but I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, that I shall speak again on this very serious matter.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Chairman, I was very impressed by the speech of the hon. member for Crowfoot.

Mr. Alexander: That is the best part of your speech.

Mr. Rose: He referred to a lot of firsts for Canada, and since he comes from Alberta he did neglect to mention another first, that of the production of hot air. I would ask the hon. member for Crowfoot, who is looking at me balefully and wriggling his eyebrows, whether or not he does not find it inconsistent—

Mr. Gundlock: What do you want, the whole bucket?

Mr. Rose: Perhaps the hon. member for Lethbridge will sit in his seat. I do not recognize him behind the curtains since he is really a frontbencher. I would ask the hon. member for Crowfoot whether he would comment on this. I sat with him for a long time on the agriculture committee and I think he was one of the protagonists of the position that the west had to sell in an open market yet was forced to buy most things, including tractors and farm machinery, in a tariff-protected market in the east. I should like to ask him why he is suddenly switching his position and protecting the same kind of market that my hon. friends across the way have been responsible for perhaps for the last 50 years.

The Chairman: Before the hon. member for Crowfoot responds, I wonder whether the hon. member for Fraser Valley West would assist by advising the Chair whether he is taking part in the debate or is asking the hon. member for Crowfoot a question.

Mr. Gundlock: A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Gundlock: The hon. member who has the floor did not understand me because I was not sitting in my seat.

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Crowfoot was, as hon. members will recall, on extended time and it is important for the Chair to know if the hon. member for Fraser Valley West is intervening to make a speech. If he is, that is one thing. If he is asking the hon. member for Crowfoot a question, that is another thing. The Chair would like to know which it is.

Mr. Nielsen: What difference does it make?

Mr. Rose: I do not know whether or not the Chair is prepared to respond to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Lethbridge.

Mr. Gundlock: I only wanted an opportunity to raise a further point of order.

The Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Mahoney: Just explain what you are doing here.

The Chairman: To assist the Chair, would the hon. member for Fraser Valley West indicate if he has the floor for the purpose of intervening in the debate. Otherwise the hon. member for Crowfoot will answer the question but I would like that information first. I think that would be fair.

Mr. Gundlock: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Gundlock: —the hon. member who has the floor suggested that I could not be recognized over there. You know full well, Mr. Chairman, under the rules—

The Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Gundlock: —that I can come down here or go up there. During this point of order I will resume my seat.

The Chairman: I will recognize the hon. member for Lethbridge on his point of order immediately the other matter is cleared up.

Mr. Nielsen: On the point of order that has been raised, Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: I only wish to assist the Chair, as I always do. In committee, Mr. Chairman, regardless of the number of times a member speaks, whether on a question that occupies one minute of the committee's time or for the purpose of taking his full time, he may speak as often as he pleases so long as the Chair recognizes him. Whether the hon. member for Fraser Valley West is asking a question or participating, however briefly, in the debate makes no difference. If the hon. member for Crowfoot wishes to rise to answer a question, he can do so on that basis or to take part in the debate.

The Chairman: I agree partially with the hon. member for Yukon, but I think he will agree that it is within the discretion of the Chair to recognize another speaker once an hon. member has concluded his remarks. If the hon. member for Crowfoot still has the floor, that is one thing. If he has yielded it to the hon. member for Fraser Valley West for the purpose of making an intervention in this debate, that is another thing. That is all the Chair is trying to get clear. The hon. member for Fraser Valley West.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Chairman, I think I can assist the Chair to a certain extent by saying that the hon. member for Crowfoot reiterated several times during his speech that he was living on borrowed time. In this I agree with him. But in terms of my intervention, may I merely say that I would invite the hon. member to answer my question and I sit here in anticipation of his answer.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the hon. member would mind asking his question again. During the long exchange and the points of order I missed the pertinent point that he was attempting to make.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Chairman, I was reviewing past months on the agriculture committee when the hon. member for Crowfoot was complaining bitterly that people engaged in the agricultural industry in the west were often victimized because they had to sell everything they produced in an open market, a futures market if you like, at world prices which meant their return was determined by a kind of auction process, whereas what they had to purchase to produce their products, which they sometimes sold and sometimes stored, was bought from a protected market.

They have to buy their equipment from the industry in Canada, in a protected market. Frequently this industry is foreign-owned or dominated, contrary to what the hon. member said. He discussed Massey-Ferguson as a Canadian international corporation. I ask whether there is not a conflict in the fact that he was very critical of the farm machinery industry in terms of costs to farmers, and the fact that he is protecting the industry during this part of the debate.

Mr. Horner: I thank the hon. member for asking that question because it gives me an opportunity to say something which I have not said before in this House of Commons. Few people in the House are aware of this fact. First let me correct the impression the hon. member has left. He said I was living on borrowed time.

Mr. Rose: You said that.

Mr. Horner: The hon. member was referring to my speech. I was speaking on borrowed time and I acknowledge the generosity of the committee in allowing me more time. I am not living on borrowed time, and I would be glad to accept the challenge of any hon. member who suggests that I am. Let me deal with the question of western Canada and free trade.

Mr. Rose: Yes, do that.

Mr. Horner: I am not a believer in free trade as an absolute thing, because of the complexities involved. Free trade is a utopia in which only the NDP believe.

Mr. Rose: Who said that?

Mr. Horner: Free trade is something in which the NDP believe.

Mr. Rose: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Horner: Let me deal with that aspect of the matter.

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Fraser Valley West rises on a point of order.

Mr. Rose: The hon. member for Crowfoot suggested that some segment of the NDP has put forward the concept of free trade as a postulate or a point of dogma. I ask the hon. member which hon. member has done this, and to assist the House by pointing to the particular group that brought this idea to the House of Commons.

Mr. Horner: The hon. member asked me one question and I am trying to answer. There was no point of order in his last remark. Free trade is a phrase used by many people. I am not a believer of absolute free trade because there are too many complexities and factors involved in trading. There are subsidies, tax concessions and discriminatory measures used by countries and provinces. We all know that certain materials and products have to meet health standards and one thing and another. There may be no tariffs, and you may believe that there is free trade, but certain commodities are subject to health standards which in essence is a partial barrier. There is also a difference in the value of money, which creates another complexity in respect of trade.

I refer to the Barber commission report. When I began my remarks I said there was something I intended to tell the House that few members are aware of, and I shall do so now. I know of no other member of this House who presented a brief to the Barber commission on farm machinery costs. I submitted a brief to that commission outlining how I felt we could bring about lower farm machinery prices. I do not know of any other Member of Parliament who took the trouble to advise the commission on certain aspects of the farm machinery industry.

I have not been an advocate or a great promoter of Massey-Ferguson. If one studies the farm machinery inquiry carried out by the agricultural committee of the House of Commons he will discover that I was one of the worst interrogators of representatives of Massey-Ferguson.

Mr. Rose: You were always one of the worst.

Mr. Horner: The vice-president of Massey-Ferguson was beside himself because of the annoying questions I asked about their pricing set-up. That company charges all the market can bear, and there should be measures to bring about a realistic situation in respect of farm machinery prices. But we must allow the company to survive within Canada. It is one thing to bring about a realistic price mechanism within a company selling goods to Canadians but it is another thing to force an existing Canadian company out of Canada. It would still be selling at the same high prices in Canada.

Apparently the NDP wants to force Massey-Ferguson out of Canada and into the United States, and then let the company continue to sell at the high prices that now exist within Canada. That is not the solution to Canada's farm machinery problem. That is not a solution to the problem of unemployment within Canada.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Horner: There is an opportunity for Canadian investment in the corporation in Canada, and it is a rather idealistic and foolish approach—

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Fraser Valley West seeks the floor on a point of order.

Mr. Rose: Are these strident exhortations an answer to my question, or is the hon. member launching a speech?

The Chairman: The hon. member asked the question and I think, with respect, he should not comment on the answer he gets.

[Mr. Rose.]

Mr. Horner: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member doth protest too much. My answer was too telling and he attempted to cut me off. The NDP wants to force through greater tax measures than those now proposed. In this way Massey-Ferguson will be forced out of Canada, with the hope that this will meet some NDP idealistic position. This company will still sell in Canada at the same high prices. This will not help our unemployment picture.

I would much rather encourage a Canadian international corporation such as Massey-Ferguson to remain in Canada, hiring Canadians and creating job opportunities. Then through corrective measures other than taxation we could encourage companies to sell their products at an acceptable rate, one that has some relationship to the value of the goods the machinery will be used to produce. This is what I would encourage Massey-Ferguson to do. The NDP is completely wrong if it believes in nationalization. If hon. members believe in nationalization, I wish they would all be like the hon. member for Waterloo who came out in favour of nationalization. They could then be judged on what they really believe, rather than on the camouflage they so often espouse.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I hope the hon. member for Crowfoot will forgive me if I do not follow in the vein in which he has been speaking this evening. I have listened to several hon. members of the Official Opposition take on my colleague, the hon. member for Waterloo. So far as I am concerned they have not touched him, so I should like to discuss briefly a completely different phase of the general question of taxation of international income. Indeed, I hope the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance will respond to the statement I wish to make and give the kind of assurance I am seeking on behalf of a large number of people.

• (9:10 p.m.)

While technically we are discussing section 2 of clause 1 of the bill, we are also discussing 18 or 20 other sections some of which have to do with the tax which must be paid by non-residents of Canada on income derived in Canada. Let me say quite clearly that we in this party welcome these provisions, particularly in so far as they endeavour to catch up with people who have taken their wealth to various tax havens around the world in order to avoid the payment of income tax either in Canada or anywhere else. It is no surprise, of course, to the parliamentary secretary when I say we agree with this aim as it is to be implemented in the bill before us.

However, in the attempt to make sure that all income earned in Canada is properly taxed, there are some specific provisions in this bill, and indeed in the sections under discussion now, about the taxation of pensions, superannuation benefits, annuities and other income of that kind. If I have read the bill correctly there is a provision that there should be a 25 per cent tax on most income of this kind. It is clear that old age security payments are exempt from any such 25 per cent tax, and there are a number of other pension benefits that are listed as not subject to this tax. However, it is also very clear that superannuation payments generally, payments from the Canada Pension Plan, annuities, and so on, are subject to a 25 per cent tax.

I believe this is to be in the nature of a withholding tax so that before these payments are sent from Canada to persons living abroad the 25 per cent is to be deducted. The parliamentary secretary knows very well the kind of people I am thinking about, namely, pensioners who have gone to a more southern clime or to other parts of the world and are concerned when they learn of this 25 per cent withholding tax. Some of them say to me that the amount of income they have is such that they would not reach the 25 per cent level. But the bald way in which this is stated seems to fail to take that into account, and it also seems to ignore the exemption levels which apply to taxation in Canada.

I want to say quite clearly I have made inquiries. I have studied the various documents before us and I am satisfied that these people will not lose. In the first place, old age security pensions are not taxable in this way and in the final analysis the tax treaties which apply between Canada and other countries will come into play and in the end, even though there may have been a deduction at the source, no one who is retired and away from Canada living on a pension will pay any more income tax than he would have paid had he continued to live in Canada. Nevertheless, there is the bald and stark provision in this bill that there is a 25 per cent withholding tax on the total amount of certain kinds of pensions.

The parliamentary secretary realizes what I would like him to do. If he is able to get the floor now, I should like him to give a categorical assurance to public servants who retire, to people on annuities and to pensioners generally, that they need have no fear that by taking advantage of certain rights they have to go to another country that because of this 25 per cent withholding tax they will be in a worse position vis-à-vis their taxation than would have been the case had they remained in Canada.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, first may I say it is most refreshing to return to something completely relevant and germane to the particular block of sections under discussion. Since the hon. member for Regina East asked me a question about NRO's earlier this afternoon, which I have not yet had an opportunity to answer, this is the first specific comment we have had on the sections before us.

I can give the hon. member the assurance he requests. The situation generally speaking is this: we do have treaties with certain countries. A proposal to impose a 15 per cent withholding tax, for example, in the case of a country like the United States does not override the existing treaty. Until and unless that treaty is changed, the provisions of the treaty will preclude that withholding tax being exacted. However, it is thought fair and equitable that in the circumstances Canada should have a right to withhold a tax. The hon. member will appreciate that the United States—since this is the example I have used—does tax income fully in the hands of the recipient resident of the United States.

The 25 per cent withholding tax is proposed in respect of other countries with which we do not have tax treaties at the moment. The legislation does give the Canadian taxpayer, the person from whom the 25 per cent is withheld, the option of filing a Canadian income tax return and if as a result of filing that tax return the 25 per cent tax withheld in Canada means that he or she has paid more tax in total in Canada and in the foreign jurisdiction than would have been the case otherwise in either country, there would be a refund or credit against the tax allowed in Canada as a result of the taxpayer electing to file a Canadian income tax return.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, in listening to the hon. member for Fraser Valley West and the hon. member for Waterloo I was struck by the phoniness of the position customarily taken by hon. members to my left.

Mr. Rose: You said the same thing last year.

Mr. Nielsen: I did not say anything of the kind last year, but I am calling it phoniness now and I am calling it hypocrisy. It is out and out hypocrisy for an hon. member like the hon. member for Waterloo to spout socialistic concepts when he does not for a moment believe in them; and for the hon. member for Fraser Valley West to adopt the same spurious stance is just beyond comprehension.

Mr. Rose: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I should like to correct the hon. member's pronunciation of the word "spurious".

• (9:20 p.m.)

Mr. Nielsen: The members of that party clutch taxes to their bosom like a suckling child. One would think that this offends the motherhood syndrome which they would have us believe the people of Canada believe they espouse. They want to appear to the people of the country—to the little man as they call him and as the Minister of Labour calls him—as champions of the little man. They think the more they put down the big corporations, the more votes they can get. This is absolutely shameful. I can understand why their noses are out of joint. In the last 3½ years, at every turn they have been outmanoeuvered by the government. The hon. member for Crowfoot referred to creeping socialism. It is not creeping socialism at all; it is galloping completely out of control.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: What are we to expect when we have at the helm the three horsemen of the Apocalypse sitting in the House, one upstairs in the Prime Minister's office, the Prime Minister, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, and the Secretary of State, all ex-members of the NDP? What are we to expect but galloping socialism?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: We see the Leader of the NDP now, and before him the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands when he was leading that party, every time a government spokesman rises in his seat to announce some new measures, such as the Canada Development Corporation Act, the competition act or the investment incentives act, getting red in the face. They are burned up by their anger and by their indignation at being outmanoeuvered and pushed further out of the socialist spectrum. That is why they are angry. They cannot call themselves true socialists any more because they have been displaced. Nor can those across the way call themselves Liberals.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: That is a pretty hollow claim. If they were to tell the truth and if they would banish this constant charade of parading themselves as Liberals, if they would banish hypocrisy and admit where this country is going with this list of legislation with which I will not bore the House, then we could have some truth in this place.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. member for St. Boniface interjects over and over again with his loud mouth and loose tongue. If he would get up and participate in the debate he might give us the advantage of some of his views.

Mr. Guay: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Guay: It would be very easy for one of us on the government side to rise and discuss matters sensibly with the opposition. But you will have noticed, Mr. Chairman, that the last speaker has not said one word pertaining to what we are discussing at present. All he has done is to criticize the NDP and the Liberals. So I suggest that if they—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. First, I will point out to the hon. member that the point he raised is not a question of privilege. However, I will also take this opportunity to tell the hon. member for Yukon that he should address himself to the Chair and should make his remarks relevant to section 2.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I have never heard a larger pot than the hon. member for St. Boniface calling the kettle black. I hear him interjecting day after day. At least when I speak I have something to say, and that is more than I can say for the hon. member for St. Boniface.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. member for Crowfoot—

Mr. Guay: Let us talk about St. Boniface for a while.

Mr. Nielsen: I do not think hon. members would agree to that. Unless the hon. member starts talking about it, the country will forget about St. Boniface.

Mr. Guay: Speak louder so I can hear you.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. It is difficult for the Chair to understand what is going on—I ask hon. members to help me keep order.

An hon. Member: Eric, you are on.

Mr. Nielsen: For a moment I did not know whether the hon. member for St. Boniface had the floor or whether I had.

Mr. Guay: You do not know the difference. You are not here half the time.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

Mr. Nielsen: One of these days he will have the courage to rise and tell us about his riding and his constituents, because we certainly have not heard anything yet.

Mr. Guay: It would make a hell of a lot more sense.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I will ask hon. members once more to give the Chair a chance to hear what is going on and to hear the speaker who has the floor. With their co-operation, I give the floor back to the hon. member for Yukon.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member for Crowfoot referred to timing. Indeed, this legislation is ill-timed. My urgings to the government have already been expressed by the hon. member for Crowfoot. Why are we in the difficulties that we face now with respect to the matters before us? This is a problem of the government's own making. How in the world can we expect the kind of economic climate to exist between ourselves and the United States when we have actions of the government such as we witnessed over the past few months, starting with the statement made in Russia by the Prime Minister referring to the U.S. military threat to Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: I hear groans from the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance. What I am saying is the truth, and the parliamentary secretary knows it.

Mr. Mahoney: It is the contrary.

Mr. Nielsen: It is not, and the parliamentary secretary knows it when he challenges my statement and says it is not correct. I am not the one who is lying. This was followed by the Premier of the Soviet Union, who came here and used Canada as a platform from which to make anti-American statements. That did not help. This followed on the heels of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources making a statement with respect to the investment of foreign money in this country for the purpose of constructing pipelines, and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development travelling to the United States and making a statement diametrically opposed to that. No wonder the United States feels so confused.

Then, after cataloguing all these things, the Prime Minister says something is wrong and we have to mend the situation or at least give the appearance of mending it. So he calls together the offensive team, the Minister of Justice, the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and he shoves them across the country and instructs them to get the government out of the mess. What do they do? We find the Minister of Justice, whose portfolio has no concern with economics, saying in a speech to the Empire Club in Toronto last Thursday:

> If there has been any straining in our friendship with the United States, that surely has resulted from Americans initiatives.

• (9:30 p.m.)

Having regard to statements of that nature from senior ministers of the Crown, how in the world are we going to smooth over the deterioration in our relations with the United States which have never been so low in Canada's history.

Mr. Rose: Since Diefenbaker.

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. member for Fraser Valley West has interjected, "Since Diefenbaker."

Mr. Rose: Right.

Mr. Nielsen: That is an untrue, an uncalled for remark and it is beneath the dignity of the hon. member who uttered it. That former Prime Minister of this country was and is a great Canadian.

Mr. Rose: That is right. Mr. Chairman, I was accused of an untruth in regard to relationships between Canada and the United States. In response to the suggestion of the hon. member for Yukon that our relations were at a very low ebb, I suggested that they had not been at such a low ebb since the time of Right Hon. Prime Minister Diefenbaker. I do not retract that statement. I am suggesting that if they are not below that point now, that they are at least equal to it. It is not my problem; it is the problem of the hon. member for Yukon that this is so.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member knows that this is not a point of order. It is a matter of debate.

Mr. Nielsen: Does the hon. member wish to raise a point of privilege?

Mr. Rose: If you like.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Does the hon. member have a point of order again?

Mr. Rose: Mr. Chairman, you suggested that my intervention was not a true point of order. If it would please Your Honour, I would change it to a point of privilege.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. I said it was a matter of debate.

Mr. Nielsen: In all good conscience, if the hon. member for Fraser Valley West were called upon to answer he would have to admit he knew it was not a question of privilege but just another abuse of the rules to get an interjection on the record. In reply to the hon. member I say that it is not my problem. The situation in which we find ourselves today, with our relations with the United States being at the lowest ebb in our history, is the government's problem. If hon. members to my left were honest with themselves they would admit that.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): You missed that debate.

Mr. Nielsen: I think I hear the hon. member for St. Boniface again.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): You were away when that subject was discussed.

Mr. Nielsen: I wish the hon. member would speak up.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I just want to bring to the attention of the hon. member for Yukon that the matter he is discussing was fully discussed in a debate when he was absent a couple of weeks ago.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Yukon.

Mr. Nielsen: I cannot understand how the hon. member for St. Boniface knows what was discussed in the House, because all he can hear is himself. In Toronto, the Minister of Justice—one of the offensive team—was followed by the Minister of Finance who, to put it mildly, has taken much buffeting in the last few months. In a speech there that minister said: "As it stands now the U.S. program contains elements that are prejudicial to the development of world trade." His whole speech was along that line. How on earth are we to improve rapidly deteriorating relations with a country that is so vital to our existence by sending out ministers to say that kind of thing?

On top of these harsh, blunt, undiplomatic statements made by ministers of the Crown—and the Prime Minister is no exception—we have things like the leakage of the Gray report advising of the setting up of some kind of screening mechanism, staffed by a board with broad, sweeping powers to exercise political discretion over what foreign capital can come into this country, how much of it, for where, and for what purpose. Members of the NDP would dearly love to see that happen. I point out that the so-called pseudo Liberals have been stealing the stuff of the NDP for as long as I can recall. That is why members of the NDP are now redundant. The true NDP are all over there opposite me. Why don't you go over there? That is where you belong. Conversely, the government should move over to this side.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. I ask the hon. member to address himself to the Chair.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I have been careful about addressing my remarks through the Chair, but because I may have been facing in another direction this does not mean that I have forgotten about Your Honour's existence. Then one must read some of the editorial comment on this subject.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): More questions.

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. member for St. Boniface is disgruntled again.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): All you can do is read quotations from newspapers.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. The Chair is having a very difficult time tonight. This is my worst experience so far in the chair. I am trying to follow everything that is said. I wish hon. members would allow the hon. member for Yukon to speak without interruption so that I may follow what he is saying.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I am greatly interested in the interjections of the hon. member for St. Boniface. They merely point out the great unrest that exists in the backbenches on the opposite side. This is one way for the hon. member to blow off a little steam. I don't begrudge it to him because he needs it, if only to maintain good health.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I just want to say that I agree with the hon. member that there is unrest here, but it is because we are getting tired of listening to nothing.

Mr. Nielsen: I think the hon. member will agree with me that for 3½ years we have been listening to nothing from the government backbenches. In an editorial last Saturday the Globe and Mail said:

> Even the hesitation of business to invest deplored by Mr. Benson has its Canadian causes—the long doubt of the tax bill, the dangerous and arbitrary elements of the competition act, and now the foreshadowing of another arbitrary tribunal in the Gray report.

There, Sir, is the nub of the question. The problems the government is facing today are problems of its own creation, because of its blind, stubborn, stupid ineptness in managing the country, as a result of which it now finds itself deep in the proverbial mire. The editorial added:

> Verbal assaults on the United States will not solve our problems. Even U.S. concessions would not solve them all. Our economic disease has its Canadian causes, which can only be removed by new Canadian initiatives.

We are not going to see any initiatives coming from the government or coming from the NDP, because all they are concerned about is one great superstructure of the state having control over virtually every aspect of our freedoms, our freedoms of commerce, of industry, of business, and in that respect members of the NDP are beaten hollow by those who sit on the government benches.

• (9:40 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: They can cry in their soup until doomsday because until the government goes they will be outlefted every time—and heaven help us if the government doesn't go soon.

Mr. Flemming: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a few remarks in connection with Bill C-259 and the portion which we are supposed to be discussing. Perhaps I should say that we are talking about the taxation policy on income, as it applies to Canadian individuals and Canadian corporations, from foreign sources. I happen to belong to a group of people which I hope is not in the minority, people who are pleased and proud of the fact that in Canada we do have corporations large enough to compete in all the markets of the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Flemming: This business of trying to point the finger at corporations that have their head office in Canada, as though it were a crime, does not stand up in my opinion and should be frowned upon by every member of this assembly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Flemming: We are discussing a complex phase of a complex portion of the tax reform bill. When I say tax reform I want to say that I do not subscribe to the words whatsoever, because tax reform suggests tax improvement. This is not tax improvement by any stretch of the imagination. If people were honest with themselves they would not call this monstrosity tax improvement, because it is not.

When the bill is referred to committee of the whole then I suggest it is the business of the minister sponsoring it to be in his place to explain the bill for the illumination of all members. In this case, that responsibility has been delegated to the parliamentary secretary to the minister, the hon. member for Calgary South, and I find no fault with that. But when the parliamentary secretary fails to rise in his place at the beginning of any series of sections of a complex bill to explain to the committee what the government expects to accomplish by these new portions of this bill, then I do find fault.

Mr. Benjamin: They don't know yet.

Mr. Flemming: If you will examine the bill you will see that in every case it is written that these are new sections. I submit it was the duty of the parliamentary secretary to rise in his place and explain why the changes are being made and what gain is expected in comparison to the old act. As I said a few moments ago, while I do not agree with the principle of delegation because people are elected for a specific purpose, since it had to be done I am sure it could not be on more capable shoulders—except that he did not do it. He has not given the committee any explanation of why this is done and what the government expects to gain by it.

I shall give a bit of information on what we are gaining under the present act. Let us examine the record, Mr. Chairman, and see what it shows. We find that in 1970 Canada received $513 million in interest and dividends on foreign holdings, a 74 per cent increase over the 1967 revenue of $295 million. In 1967, Canadian direct investment abroad represented a book value of $4 million out of total long-term investments with a book value of a little over $8 million. Canadian direct investment abroad in 1970 was $215 million exclusive of undistributed profits.

With that in mind, Mr. Chairman, it becomes the duty of the parliamentary secretary to tell this House what improvement the government is going to make. I know what has been said by some members. They have raised this particular phase of the new bill and emphasized that portion of it which would interfere with people who are wealthy and move their place of residence to another country. I agree with that. I do not, however, agree with the idea of saying to Canadian corporations which are doing business throughout the world that you are going to make it as hard as you can for them because there are ways in which they could be made to pay taxes.

In my opinion, the people who are contributing to taxation in this country, which last year amounted to something in the area of $6 billion or $7 billion, are a most important class because they contribute to the expense of various social services and the expense of government in general. Why should the government try to make it hard for the taxpayer? It seems to me that what they are doing is discouraging him or the corporation to the extent that he loses his incentive to go ahead and make a profit. I happen to believe in profit because, in the first place, I believe it makes for good times and, in the second place, government gets about 50 per cent of it anyway. I see that you agree, Mr. Chairman, because you smile. Why should the taxpayer be held up almost as a public enemy of Canada when he is almost the greatest benefactor that the country could possibly have?

I think we have to look at all these phases, but it seems to me that the government has not considered them. They seem determined to make change, but unless you can make an improvement you should not make change. The power to tax is surely the power to destroy, and the power to change taxes and make them more onerous surely has the same connotation. I think the parliamentary secretary should have been on his feet a long time ago telling this House what the government had in mind and why they were doing it.

Mr. Nielsen: He doesn't know.

Mr. Flemming: Mr. Chairman, I believe that the remark of my hon. friend from the Yukon is correct; I do not think they know. They do not seem to know, but they seem to have the idea that they must of necessity make changes. It really amounts to this. The government thinks it must make changes for the sake of change. That is all we have here.

• (9:50 p.m.)

Mr. Chairman, I make this assertion: income from foreign affiliates is not at present taxed by Canada when it is earned or remitted as dividends; only when that income is distributed by the Canadian parent company to the shareholders will it become taxable, presumably. In other words, the government is making it impossible for a company with an affiliate in another country to bring funds from that affiliate into Canada without paying tax. It cannot bring money into its own treasury even. That seems to be a step in the wrong direction. We must look at possible government objectives for clues to indicate why the government is thinking this way. I have referred to the question of tax havens.

An hon. Member: Are you for or against them?

Mr. Flemming: The government's objective may be to allow Canadian businesses operating abroad to remain competitive and viable. Mr. Chairman, you cannot make them competitive and viable if you impose on them provisions like these so that they cannot live. That, to me, does not seem sensible. There has been talk of bilateral tax treaties. These treaties are not easily made. They take a great deal of time. Why, for goodness sake, is it necessary to enter into additional tax treaties when under the present law $513 million in cash flowed into the treasury of this country in 1970? In 1971 it is quite possible that the amount will be much greater. The international aspects of Bill C-259, Mr. Chairman, might be described as a nightmare of overkill, subverting international equity and confronting Canada's international interests with grim prospects.

I think the parliamentary secretary should explain what the government has in mind. Why did 44 top businessmen come to Ottawa today, if not to express concern about the new tax legislation?

Mr. Mahoney: They came because they were invited by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Flemming: So the Prime Minister invited them. Let us accept that as a proper statement. But why are they here, if not to object? I submit that business in Canada today is in a state of tremendous confusion and uncertainty resulting largely from the government's actions on taxation. The government seems determined to make change for the sake of change. It has not been demonstrated to me that things needed to be improved.

I said a moment ago that about $6 billion of our total revenue, or about 50 per cent, comes from the taxation of individuals and corporations. However, I did not give the whole story and now I want to do so. In the three years for which I am about to give figures—that is, 1968, 1969 and 1970—the revenue from taxation under the headings I referred to was $4.5 billion, $5.3 billion and $6.7 billion respectively. The point is that here we have tax laws which apparently without disturbing the business community resulted in increased revenues every year of about $1 billion. The government is not satisfied with that; apparently it wants more.

The plain fact is that if business in Canada and abroad is to remain competitive, it must operate in a tax environment that is at least as favourable as that applying to its foreign competitors. I should like the parliamentary secretary to listen to me. If businesses are to remain competitive, Mr. Chairman, it is necessary for them to operate in a tax environment that is no less favourable than that in which their foreign competitors operate. That seems like ordinary, common sense. Apparently this government is not conscious of that fact or, if it is, it is absolutely indifferent. They go merrily on their way chasing after the last dollar and trying to portray the businesses of this country as public enemy No. 1. That is what the government is doing by this legislation.

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Flemming: I will take only a minute, Mr. Chairman. We have no assurance from the government that the restrictive measures which have been included in this bill will have any beneficial effect. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary would like to convince me that they will. I would be glad to be convinced. So far, however, I remain unconvinced. The government seems to be absolutely unconscious of the effects of high taxation. It is time it woke up and considered what action it ought to take in the interests of all the people of Canada.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte was the first member of the official opposition who displayed any interest in the contents of this particular block of sections. I only regret that he took up all the time available and that I cannot respond to him.

Mr. MacInnis: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I wish to draw your attention to the fact that some electronic equipment has been used in the committee. I should like the Chair to rule on whether that is a proper procedure for the hon. member for Davenport to follow.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: I do not see any equipment.

Mr. MacInnis: Look. It is in his hand.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: If it is, it is not supposed to be there. I will note the matter and report to Mr. Speaker.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—INDIA—REQUEST TO SEND DRIED POTATOES TO AID IN FOOD SHORTAGE

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, when I raised this issue some time ago it was because of my hope that something additional might be found to add to the assistance this country and its people are providing for the unfortunate refugees in the Indian subcontinent. While there are events, political problems and grave dangers of serious international consultations, the human problem is urgent, pressing and compelling.

I do not hesitate, and I never have hesitated, to endorse enthusiastically the efforts of this country to assist developing countries and, more particularly, to assist the nationals of other countries in time of unique and special need. Certainly, the last requirement is met in the tragedy which has befallen the millions of people who have fled East Pakistan for India. The world must know that the Indian burden is immense and must be taxing the capacity of that country, and thus we cannot overlook any avenue of assistance.

It is one of the sad anomalies of our world that some parts are in abundance and others are in grave deficiency, even confining ourselves to foodstuffs. It passes the understanding of most people that we find some areas of the world with food that is wasted and other parts of the world where people literally starve. This was a perplexing problem in the thirties in the Canadian prairies, and I suppose the American prairies too. Wheat was burned or roasted to make a form of coffee, while in Brazil coffee was destroyed because there was no sale. Canadians could have used the coffee and the Brazilians could have used the wheat, but never could we get the proper correlation between surplus and deficiency.

It would seem that in our highly sophisticated age when we can literally land on the moon and send with precision the most sophisticated instruments to the planet Mars, there must be something wrong in our universal patterns of life if we cannot relate the terrible needs of some human beings to the overproduction of others.

I know that respect must be had for the life styles and taste preferences of people, and I understand that we have in the past made mistakes and sent food to areas where the people either could not or would not make use of it. However, it is my understanding that dried, instant potatoes can be usefully added to the diet of the East Pakistan refugees. As I understand it, a mixture of these potatoes with spices, combined with some leafy vegetables which are found in the area, add considerably to the rations of these people.

One of the great problems which faced the sector of the agricultural industry devoted to potatoes is the fact that this crop was perishable and, unlike wheat, could not be stored from year to year. The advent of the potato flake, instant potatoes—a most wonderful product—has helped to make this problem a little less acute.

My main concern in this question is not to criticize but to inquire as to what has been done by the Department of External Affairs, by CIDA, what advice has been received from the Department of Agriculture on the possibility of making use of the ample supplies of potatoes in an instant form to assist in providing sustenance for the unfortunates in India. I hope the parliamentary secretary will be able to indicate that considerable research has been done and that the omens are good for this further development of Canada's external aid program.

I still believe that the best possible contribution is cash—cold, hard and generously delivered cash—but foodstuffs that are light and therefore reasonably easy to transport should be utilized wherever possible. I call upon the government to make every effort toward the utilization of these items. I note with immense concern and profound sorrow what was said by our representative at the United Nations the other day, reporting what the UNHCR man had reported to the United Nations assembly, namely, that it would require $700 million to provide for the basic needs of these refugees for the year ending March, 1972.

I profoundly hope, with a great feeling that we must all unite on this matter, that something can be done in this particular area in order to provide some amelioration of the terrible need of so many of our fellow human beings who are experiencing great distress and unique suffering.

[Translation]

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we fully share the sympathy of the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) on the question presently under study.

His opinion is also shared by the government but I must tell him, on that matter, that the Canadian International Development Agency has been approached and encouraged to provide Pakistan refugees in India with instant dehydrated potatoes.

Senior officials of the agency have consulted representatives of the FAO and the League of Red Cross Societies and both inquiries have clearly demonstrated that dehydrated potatoes do not meet the dietetic needs of this population and that this moreover implied serious difficulties due to the rudimentary implements available in that country. However, CIDA officials are still seeking the best way of utilizing the stocks that have already been shipped by various private organizations.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—SUPPLY OF AUTO PACT INFORMATION BY EMBASSY OFFICIALS TO U.S. SENATORS PRIOR TO VOTE ON EXEMPTION OF CANADA FROM SURTAX

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the issue I wish to speak about briefly this evening is concerned with the degree of effort this government is making to provide our trading partners, more particularly the United States of America, with information directly relevant to current issues that exist between our two countries. The question is by no means an abstract one; quite the contrary. I was in Washington last week to speak with representatives of both the legislative and executive branch of that government in connection with the Canada-United States automotive agreement. To my dismay I discovered that those at the legislative level were simply uninformed of Canada's position and the facts—I emphasize "the facts"—concerning the Canada-U.S. automotive agreement.

I spoke with Senators Buckley and Gravel, the former from New York city and the latter from Alaska, concerning an amendment that they had put before the U.S. Senate a week ago Saturday. The substance of the amendment was extremely important to this country. If passed, it would have recommended to the President of the United States that that government exempt both Canada and Mexico from the current surcharge. The vote failed by seven votes only. In other words, if four Senators had voted the other way, that amendment would have passed.

The central argument used against the exemption of Canada came from Senator Long, chairman of the important finance committee, and it stressed almost exclusively the so-called reneging by Canada on the Canada-U.S. automotive agreement. The Senators present who were supporting the amendment simply did not have at their disposal, so I am informed and have had partially confirmed, contrary facts, facts that could and should have been provided to them by our embassy in the United States.

I am not arguing or suggesting strong tactics or anything of that kind, but simple, straightforward provision of information to important and powerful politicians should have been carried out. The minister in his reply to my question in the House this afternoon as to the degree of action we took in this area, suggested this was perhaps inappropriate. He said it was perhaps permitted both by our government and others but it might cause more harm than good. It seems to me that anyone who knows anything at all about the operation of modern government could not accept this answer at face value. Virtually all active governments are busy providing us as Members of Parliament on a regular and daily basis with all kinds of information concerning themselves. We are ordinary Members of Parliament and, indeed, almost half of us are members of the opposition. It seems to me that in the United States system of government the legislative branch is in many basic ways much more powerful compared with Members of Parliament.

This is all the more reason for saying it is an essential function of our embassy abroad and the foreign policy of this government to keep people at that legislative level in the United States government informed of Canadian positions, and particularly informed of basic factual information that could be used in a positive way when votes are taken in the Senate or in Congress which could have a good or detrimental effect on this country.

To repeat the point, the vote last Saturday could well have been different and could well have come out in Canada's favour if members of our embassy and members of this government had been doing the job they ought to have been doing.

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): It is of course one of the responsibilities of our embassy in Washington to establish contact with all sectors of the United States government. Officers are expected to be acquainted with not only their opposite numbers in the administration but also with Senators and Congressmen who are interested in Canadian-American relations.

Several Senators supported the unsuccessful amendment to the tax bill, advocating withdrawal of the 10 per cent surcharge from Canada and Mexico. Many of them may have been made aware of the general Canadian position, including the auto pact, and of the effects of the surcharge on our economy, through the efforts of our Washington embassy staff. Such contact between diplomats and legislators within the country to which diplomats are accredited is normal and natural. Indeed, officers might be subject to criticism if they did not develop and maintain these contacts.

NATIONAL ANTHEM—ASSURANCE THAT ROYALTY NOT CHARGED FOR PLAYING OF "O CANADA"

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on Friday, November 19, as reported at page 9713 of Hansard, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked the following question:

> Mr. Speaker, I ask the Prime Minister to give consideration to a problem that has arisen as a result of the royalties being collected by the Authors, Publishers and Composers Association of Canada for the use of "O Canada" when played at any time by any organization which charges admission. Up to the present time "God Save the Queen" and "O Canada" have been accepted as national anthems. This organization, this all-powerful behemoth of art, have a copyright on "O Canada". Will the Prime Minister give consideration to bringing before Parliament the necessary legislation to cancel the copyright as such a preposterous anachronism whereby Canadians have to pay for the privilege of having "O Canada" played?

In reply, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stated that it was the intention of the government to bring in legislation on this matter but that it will not be possible at this session. In fact, Mr. Speaker, the right hon. member for Prince Albert is badly mistaken in his facts. The copyright for "O Canada" was turned over to the Crown in October, 1969, for the sum of $1. I am in possession of photostat copies of letters indicating that this offer was made on a number of previous occasions by Gordon V. Thompson Limited, who held the copyright.

Mr. Forrestall: Your leader, then, is a liar.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, I believe I have the floor. The hon. member has the right to make his own representation at another time. What he is saying now is totally false.

Mr. Forrestall: It is not false at all. Why do we not have the legislation?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. I would ask for co-operation with the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Francis: I will ignore the remarks. As I say, I have photostatic documents, and I trust the hon. member making the objection is in possession of material to back up the very false statement he made in his interjection. I am in possession of photostats of letters indicating that the offer was made on a number of previous occasions by Gordon V. Thompson Limited, who held the copyright. While this firm is a member of the Authors, Publishers and Composers Association of Canada, such nominal royalties as were collected were actually collected by Gordon V. Thompson Limited.

My purpose in raising the matter at this time is to clear the name of Mr. Gordon V. Thompson, in the interests of his family some of whom reside in Ottawa. While a student at the University of Toronto before the First World War, the late Mr. Thompson became interested in the lyrics of "O Canada" in English. Some 40 versions were current at that time. After much research and consultation with many authorities, he finally came to the conclusion that the version by Judge Robert Stanley Weir of Montreal was the most generally accepted.

The problem of how to protect the lyrics of a song which had no official status but which many hoped would become the national anthem was a difficult one. Mr. Thompson negotiated with the heirs of Judge Weir and took out a copyright. By means of the copyright he and his firm were able to protect the dignity of the lyrics and the music as something which they could pass on to future generations.

In the course of administering the copyright a number of difficult decisions arose. In one case a parody of the song was prepared and, of course, this was forbidden. In another case a firm wanted to make a singing commercial to sell deodorants, using the music of "O Canada", which was again refused. While these cases were obviously offensive to public taste, other decisions were much harder to make. In general, permission to use the copyright was granted freely for any public or non-profit purpose.

As far as royalties were concerned, I am informed that these amounted to approximately $150 per year, of which 50 per cent was turned over to the estate of Judge Weir. A royalty of 10 cents per sheet for sheet music produced negligible returns, but all the money from this source was turned over to Judge Weir's estate. The costs of administering the copyright, of preventing abuse and maintaining uniformity of the version across Canada, indeed for international purposes, far exceeded the nominal royalties received. Indeed, the firm of Gordon V. Thompson Limited became specialists in this kind of work. They were given responsibility for administering the copyright of Canada's centennial song written by Bobby Gimbey, and also I believe they have a similar arrangement with the "Ontario" song promoted by the province of Ontario.

A review of correspondence in my hands indicates that Mr. Thompson offered on a number of occasions to turn over his copyright to the Crown, which was finally done in 1969. The task of working out a fair set of rules to guide those responsible for administration of the copyright, however, has not yet been completed by the Secretary of State's department. No doubt in the near future we can expect, as the Prime Minister indicated, legislation and possibly regulations to deal with this complex and difficult subject.

Those interested in the subject might refer to the 1967 report of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on the National and Royal Anthems, and the Minutes of Proceedings of November 30, 1967, pages 55-58. It is to the credit of the late Gordon V. Thompson that he undertook to copyright the Weir version of "O Canada" in order to protect it as a public service. Through the device of the copyright, a standard version was promoted from coast to coast and the other versions have fallen into disuse. The fact that the Weir version has received the recognition it enjoys today is in no small part due to Mr. Thompson's efforts and it is out of a sense of obligation to set the record straight that I have taken the opportunity of raising this matter tonight.

Mr. Barnett J. Danson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): The statement made by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the press article on which it was based were both inaccurate. The Composers, Authors and Publishers Association of Canada requires royalties for their repertory, and "O Canada" is not included in this repertory.

So far as the English version is concerned, "O Canada" copyrights have been Crown property since October 12, 1970, at which time the heirs of Judge Weir, I am given to understand, through selfless effort and the co-operation of Gordon Thompson turned over to the government the copyrights. The French version, both the words and the music, have been public property for a number of years.

Mr. Forrestall: Nonsense.

Mr. Danson: The hon. member has an instinct for a joke. Therefore, no company or society can require fees for royalties in the case of "O Canada".

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.24 p.m.

HARBOURS

VANCOUVER FACILITIES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I wish to present a motion on a question of urgent and pressing necessity. The urgency and necessity of consideration and action now flow from the calamitous and scandalous inadequacy of facilities and confusion surrounding the operation of the port of Vancouver by the National Harbours Board. The unprecedented volume of both exports and imports so vital to the survival of the Canadian economy has been seriously impeded by a lack of dock capacity, by delays of many months by the government in naming directors to the National Harbours Board, and in the constituting of the Port of Vancouver Authority, and other factors within control of government. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Ryan):

That the whole question of the administration and facilities of the ports of Canada, the administration of the National Harbours Board and the direction thereof by the government, particularly the Minister of Transport and his officials, be now referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications for examination and report, including recommendations to this House.

Mr. Speaker: The motion proposed by the hon. member for Edmonton West comes under the terms of Standing Order 43 and requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The motion cannot be put.

POST OFFICE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF INTEGRATION OF MAIL TRANSPORTATION SERVICES

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce that the Post Office Department intends to implement a major change in its transportation services in a number of urban centres across Canada.

The intent of the Post Office is to integrate urban mail transportation services in major areas of Canada in order to help stabilize mail transportation in these centres whose continued operation is essential to the maintenance of a national postal network.

The proposed integration means that the Post Office will undertake the intra-urban mail transportation previously carried out by private contractors.

In announcing this major change, Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that among the major postal administrations of the world, Canada is the only country which does not now have integrated transportation services in its urban centres.

The decision to implement an integration of urban mail transportation services comes after a series of studies by the Post Office Department. As a result of these studies, integration was successfully undertaken in sections of Montreal and Vancouver as early as 1967.

As a further consideration, Mr. Speaker, in 1968 section 31 of the Post Office Act was revised. This revision provided that following the invitation to tender, no contract should be entered into for a term of more than five years. At that time the department knew it would eventually integrate all its major urban transportation services. The Vancouver and Montreal experiments of 1967 were undertaken to test the feasibility of this course of action.

In order to carry out integration of these services, the Post Office will require personnel, vehicles and support equipment. All those full-time contractors' employees who are working in functions related to postal work will be offered positions with the Post Office. The Post Office is conscious of its obligation to these men and is most desirous that they will elect to enter the Public Service. Many of these workers, after providing service to the Post Office for so many years, already regard the Post Office as their real employer. The Canadian public, too, has come to regard them as Post Office employees.

The unions representing these employees have been consulted and they are co-operating with the department in implementing this program.

As far as vehicles and equipment are conerned, the Post Office will offer to buy the material that the contractor now uses to provide his services.

Mail Transportation Services

• (2:10 p.m.)

[English]

Two criteria were used to define the centres that would qualify for inclusion in the program. Both criteria are based on mail volumes and are:

1. Those centres which account for 1 per cent or more of the national total of originating first class mail, or

2. Those centres which account for 10 per cent or more of the total of a postal region's originating volume.

These criteria define the cities and areas that are vital to the postal system in national terms. Not only are they important in their own right as major centres, but many of them are main in-transit or transfer points for the movement of mail originating elsewhere.

Application of the national and regional criteria result in the inclusion of the following metropolitan cities in the program: Vancouver, Victoria, Edmonton, Calgary, Regina, Saskatoon, Winnipeg, London, Metro Toronto, Hamilton, Windsor, Kitchener-Waterloo, Ottawa-Hull, Metro Montreal, Quebec City, Saint John, New Brunswick, Moncton, Halifax-Dartmouth, St. John's Newfoundland. Of these 19 cities, four—Montreal, Quebec City, Windsor and part of Vancouver—are already wholly or partially integrated. The 15 new centres include satellite postal operations in urban communities adjacent to metropolitan areas. The total number of urban centres to be brought into the program, therefore, will be 42.

The integration program is planned to be completed by the end of 1972. Discussions with the contractors concerned regarding the dates of integration of individual services are starting immediately.

As the integration program is mainly aimed at the stabilization of key centres of the national mail network, it is not the intention of the Post Office to integrate those mail transportation services provided to rural or semi-rural areas, or between cities.

I believe that this move will help to bring a greater degree of stability to a most important element of Canada's mail system and as such constitutes a major step forward in the development of an increasingly reliable mail service.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, this is one of a series of announcements that have been made by the Post Office Department since 1968. I listened very carefully to the Postmaster General (Mr. Côté), and once again I find that this proposed change is being made in the interests of efficiency and better mail service in Canada. The minister was kind enough to supply me with a copy of his statement, and I note that the change is designed to stabilize mail transportation within the major centres of Canada.

It goes without saying that the sort of stability we want with respect to intracity mail transportation matters—I am sure the Postmaster General will agree with me—is not the sort of situation portrayed by the Lapalme drivers parading daily on Parliament Hill. I have followed the changes made by the Post Office Department in recent years, and the difficulty has been that with every change costs have gone up and services have gone down. The result is that the public are unhappy, the employees are unhappy, and I am sure the Postmaster General is also very unhappy.

[Mr. Côté (Longueuil).]

Those who listened to the noon broadcast of the CBC news today once again heard an expression of unhappiness and discontent from the public in the form of a protest by an advertising executive who is so unhappy about the postal service that he is going to take action against the department to recover the costs he has incurred in getting the sort of service he used to have before the announcement of assured mail delivery which the Postmaster General informed us was going to expedite the mails and which this gentleman, speaking through the CBC news, has referred to as a fraud and a disaster. I was also interested to note that he also urged the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) to investigate the Post Office Department to see if it is guilty of misleading advertising. Every time these changes are made there is a great spate of publicity and propaganda indicating an upward and onward trend whereas following the implementation of the changes we find that the quality of service spirals downward and only the costs of the service are onward and upward.

I think it is not a prejudiced viewpoint to express the opinion that every change announced by the Postmaster General and his predecessor, who was more of a disaster than the present incumbent of that post, has created confusion in postal services. This means that every change is not necessarily progress. I suggest to the Postmaster General that if he is really going to restore the confidence of the public in the postal service he must restore the morale of the postal employees. They make daily contact with the public and it is largely through the esprit de corps manifested by the postman on the walk, the postal employee at the wicket, the private contractor who in the past carried out the function that is now going to be handed over to direct postal employees, that the public's confidence in the Post Office Department is going to be restored. I was pleased to note on page two of the announcement that the Postmaster General emphasizes the fact that all full-time contractor employees engaged in functions related to postal work will be offered positions in the Post Office.

I think the hon. gentleman will agree that before the current labour difficulties which are harassing the postal service are resolved, before the morale of the employees is restored, before the confidence of the public is restored, there must be engendered in the postal employees—and there is now going to be a larger number directly involved—that spirit that used to be described in this poetic language: "Neither sleet, nor hail, nor rain, nor other vicissitude will deter them from their appointed task."

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the suggestion made by the Post Office Department is an important one and that theoretically at least it is an important advance that should assist in making the Post Office much more efficient. We all know in this House that the present Postmaster General (Mr. Côté) is making a very earnest attempt to improve the situation in his department.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: But I say without any intention of offending the Postmaster General that so far the evidence of that improvement is not overwhelming.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: The proposal which is made is obviously a necessary one but whether it will be a good one will depend entirely on the way it is brought into effect. The experience we have had in the Post Office so far is that labour relations in that department have been a shambles for some years and that the Post Office has not yet got rid of the paternalism, indeed, the patronage, from which it has suffered for so many years.

The Postmaster General says that the department consulted the unions representing the employees of private contractors. May I say to him with all the kindness I can that an assurance like that does not reassure me at all. I should like to know exactly what kind of consultation took place, when it took place, whether the unions concerned were in fact given an opportunity to express their opinions as to how the proposal might be implemented, or whether the consultation in this case has been the same as in every other case, namely, that they were informed that something was going to be done. I emphasize that, Mr. Speaker, not out of any desire to be critical but out of a vivid memory of what happened in Montreal and out of the fact that we are still plagued with the results of incompetence and lack of simple human decency in the way in which the Lapalme situation in that city was handled. If better relations are not established, if the unions now concerned in this work having been given real consultation instead of phony consultation, then we may well have some difficulties in the future.

May I finally say to the Postmaster General that I was astonished, indeed, outraged this morning when I learned from officers of the Canadian Union of Postal Employees, a union that now represents some of the people involved in working for private contractors, that it was not even informed that this change was coming, let alone consulted, and that they are meeting with his deputy or someone in his department at 2.30 this afternoon when for the first time they will be told of this program that the minister has announced. That not only astounds me, Mr. Speaker, but makes me fearful about the way in which this thing is being handled, because not only is this union already in negotiation with the department or with the Treasury Board but it represents some of these people. Therefore, when the minister said that all the unions representing these people have been consulted, obviously he was not right. One of the unions, and perhaps the most important so far as the Post Office Department is concerned, was not even informed, let alone consulted. They are particularly worried about the matter because this announcement comes only weeks before negotiations are to begin in January between the Canadian Union of Postal Workers and the Post Office Department. They are concerned as to whom they will be negotiating for in this area and about the kind of confusion that may result in the negotiations.

In short, obviously the scheme announced is desirable, but we in our party will wait to see whether this Postmaster General will, unlike his predecessor, handle relations with the employees concerned in a human and decent way, in a modern labour relations way, and not in the oldfashioned way in which his department so far has functioned. I hope he succeeds. If he does, we will be glad to congratulate him. However, if he carries on as his predecessor carried on, not only every member of the House but every Canadian will be sure to condemn him and his department for inefficient, incompetent and, indeed, inhuman relationships.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, the Postmaster General (Mr. Côté) has just announced that in the most important parts of the country, the department intends to integrate urban mail transportation services into the public service. He added that the measure would stabilize mail transportation.

If the new policy is implemented, I am convinced it will improve mail transportation services throughout Canada because they now present weaknesses. For instance, I noticed yesterday that the dailies from western provinces such as Alberta, and particularly those from Calgary, were not yet in the reading room of the House of Commons.

Mail from British Columbia often takes from 10 to 12 days to reach us in Ottawa. I hope the new policy of the Post Office Department will improve mail service by speeding it a little.

As a result of the new policy announced by the minister who tells us that he has consulted the unions interested in the transport of Canadian mail, I wonder like the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) if the minister did indeed meet with all the unions concerned.

I also wonder whether that new policy was brought about by the Lapalme boys who are still demonstrating on Parliament Hill.

They have not yet been integrated into the Civil Service because there is a conflict between the government and the CNTU. Has the minister met with CNTU officials to solve the problem of the Lapalme boys? The department should find gainful employment for those who will thus be dismissed from private enterprise.

Mr. Speaker, we all hope that the Postmaster General will come to an agreement with the representatives of the workers, and even with the former employees of G. Lapalme Inc. I would not want us, for instance, to attach greater importance to the CNTU than to the workers.

If the object of this new policy is to increase the standard of living, the security of the individual who works or will work for the Post Office Department, regardless of what union he belongs to, I welcome it. Indeed, I hope the government will adopt measures to favour the individual and not some of the Canadian unions. Let that be understood.

I hope this new policy will encourage greater respect for the human being rather than favour the abstract organization we see at work across Canada.

At any rate, I am satisfied that the Postmaster General is anxious to improve the postal service in Canada. He is also eager that the employees involved get all the necessary consideration from the Post Office Department so that they have gainful employment which will guarantee their security.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

ALBERTA—RESOLUTION OF PROBLEMS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O.43

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity involving the widening gulf between the Indian people in Alberta and the government, the solution to which will require statesmanship on the part of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) and not intransigence. I therefore ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett):

That this House hereby gives its leave, pursuant to Standing Order 5, to the hon. member for Saint-Maurice in his capacity as Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in order that he may proceed to Alberta to meet with the Indian people there, and we express the hope that such meetings will result in a favourable resolution of the problems confronting the Indian people.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The motion cannot be put.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

INDIAN AFFAIRS

LACK OF FINANCING PROGRAM FOR PROPOSED CULTURAL-EDUCATIONAL CENTRES—CANCELLATION OF INTERDEPARTMENTAL MEETING TO CONSIDER ALBERTA PROPOSALS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development who I understand has promised to tell all today. Will the minister inform the House why the government has not proceeded with its intention to establish jointly a five-year renewable financing program for the support of native cultural and educational centres, particularly in view of the fact that the Indian Association of Alberta has spent approximately $160,000 on such a project since April 1, 1970, and also in view of the fact the Alberta project was number one on the government's list?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, we have been studying that problem for years. We have tried to grant more money to the Indian associations of Canada; that new program referred to by the hon. Leader of the Opposition is presently under study. When government policy has been decided on, I will be happy to announce it to the House.

[Mr. Caouette.]

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Now answer the question.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, the minister has not answered the question. I specifically ask why a meeting of the interdepartmental committee on Indian and Eskimo affairs, called to consider the recommendations of the standing subcommittee on the Alberta proposal, was cancelled? It was designed to deal specifically with the question of cultural and educational centres. Why was the meeting cancelled? Why is it not now being held?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I do not sit on that committee, so I do not know if the sittings have been cancelled. I can tell the hon. member that we have been discussing this subject for months with the officials of the Department of the Secretary of State and with the representatives of various Indian organizations in Canada but no conclusion has been reached yet.

[English]

INDIAN ASSOCIATION OF ALBERTA PROPOSALS FOR RECREATION PROGRAM—LACK OF APPROVAL BY TREASURY BOARD

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I have a question for either the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development or the President of the Treasury Board. It relates to the program submitted by the Indian Association of Alberta concerning funds for recreational programs, particularly the Indian sports Olympics program—

An hon. Member: Come on!

Mr. Stanfield: I am imitating the Prime Minister when I stumble.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I ask either minister why the proposals submitted by the association as long ago as January have not yet been approved by Treasury Board?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, obviously we receive, every day, hundreds of requests for more funds, from all sorts of people. The House may be interested to know that, at the time of my appointment as minister, no funds were available for the Indian Association of Alberta. Now, in 1969-70 we allotted $176,000 to those Indians and in 1970-71 we granted them $795,000. I am proud of that accomplishment, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order please. The Chair will recognize the Leader of the Opposition on a further supplementary and then the hon. member for Skeena.

An hon. Member: Make it good.

Mr. Stanfield: It is hard to make it better with the answers I am getting, Mr. Speaker. If the minister is so earnest in his efforts to co-operate with the Indian Association of Alberta, why has he not proceeded with the programs, particularly in the area of native educational institutions? Why has he not proceeded with the program that was authorized by the government? The minister has yet to give the House any explanation of why he has not proceeded with this program.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I have stated that we are constantly striving to put new programs into effect. That is a very worthwhile idea and we shall consider it. Furthermore, we want to promote the development of cultural centres for the Indians, as we do for other Canadians. But I must say that the said program is not yet ready.

[English]

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I have a supplementary question. Is the minister aware of a telegram that was sent to the President of the Treasury Board, the Minister of National Health and Welfare and Mr. M. Lalonde, Secretary to the Prime Minister, in October of this year in which the Indian Association of Alberta expressed concern about the delay in approving their recreational budget and their inability to take part in the National Health and Welfare fitness and amateur sport program? Is the minister aware of that and is he aware of the response by Mr. Lalonde which was inflammatory, offensive and added to the gulf of communication between these people and the department?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the communication to which the hon. member is referring. The program involved comes under my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the application, indeed like any application, is now being processed by the government. If an announcement is warranted, it will be made in due course.

[English]

Mr. Howard (Skeena): I have one supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Skeena. Hon. members will notice that there are now five, six or more members wishing to ask supplementaries. I ask the co-operation of the House to go on with another subject in a few moments. For the time being, the hon. member for Skeena has the floor.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Can the minister explain why in August he and his department completely abandoned and pulled back from all programs involving Indian people with the exception of those relating to community development?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would think that question is debate. Is the minister rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Chrétien: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Skeena is not being fair. I point out that $29 million is being spent in Alberta, including what is being spent by other departments—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. When the question was asked I suggested that it was debate and not in order. There is certainly no question of privilege. That is further debate.

[Later:]

SETTLEMENT OF ALBERTA SCHOOL DISPUTE AS PREREQUISITE FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF CULTURAL-EDUCATIONAL CENTRES

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): My supplementary is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Has the co-operation of the Indian Association of Alberta in settling the school dispute in northeastern Alberta become a necessary requirement for the initiation of the July decision to establish Indian cultural-educational centres and, if not, what is holding up this program?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the two parts of this question are totally unrelated, and I already indicated earlier today why the program is not ready yet.

[English]

ALBERTA—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF PROBLEMS BY MISCELLANEOUS ESTIMATES COMMITTEE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I wish to ask the hon. member for Laurier, the chairman of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, which is now dealing with supplementary estimates covering this particular subject matter, whether he will bring before the committee at once a motion calling upon the minister, Mr. Marc Lalonde and Mr. Harold Cardinal to appear before the committee so that a full examination and discussion can be held on this matter to see where the truth lies?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): If I may direct myself to this question, Mr. Speaker, I personally would be very happy if the members of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development would care to look into the matter. I have nothing at all to hide.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have to seek the co-operation of hon. members. We have expended about ten minutes on this one subject. If hon. members think the whole question period should be spent on this one subject, then some of our colleagues will be disappointed. For the moment the hon. member for Peace River rises on a point of order.

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, in the hope that we might get rid of this contentious matter I would ask unanimous consent to revert to motions in order that I might make a request for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Trudeau: Use one of the opposition days.

CULTURAL-EDUCATIONAL CENTRES—INVESTIGATION OF LEAKING OF CABINET DOCUMENT

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): May I ask the Prime Minister whether the RCMP have been called in to investigate the leakage of the cabinet document dealing with the subject of Indian cultural-educational centres and which was produced on national television?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I said yesterday that this matter was being looked into. That is all I intend to say at this time.

Mr. Nielsen: My question was specific. Have the RCMP been called in to investigate this particular leak?

Mr. Trudeau: At this stage I am asking the departmental people to look into the leak. We are more concerned with the moral implications of people taking into their own hands a decision to make public documents which it is their duty to protect.

TRADE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PROMOTION AND SALE OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS IN EXPORT MARKETS

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): May I direct a question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce as the minister is not in the chamber today. Having regard to the statement by the provincial Ministers of Agriculture calling for the formation of a national agricultural export development corporation, will the minister respond to the implied criticism of the government's export marketing policy make a statement on motions in the near future concerning the program his department is prepared to undertake for the promotion and sale of Canadian agricultural products in export markets?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I would be glad to take notice of the hon. member's suggestion and draw it to the attention of the minister when he returns.

Mr. Gleave: Is the parliamentary secretary also prepared to find out whether the minister would agree to appear before the Standing Committee on Agriculture to outline the programs and objectives of his department in relation to the export marketing of Canadian agricultural products?

GRAIN

REVISED STABILIZATION POLICY—ACCEPTANCE OF PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENT PROPOSALS

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Assiniboia.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. William Knight (Assiniboia): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Since the minister in charge of the Wheat Board has announced that a revised grain stabilization policy will be introduced into the House, can the Prime Minister or the Minister of Agriculture tell us whether it is the intention of the federal government to accept in principle the proposals of the ten provincial governments as presented to the outlook conference on November 22?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the proposal contained in that document was brought to our attention only yesterday. As the hon. member knows, the minister responsible for the Wheat Board is out of the country on important business and it seems to me he should at least have an opportunity to look at it before making comment.

Mr. Caouette: They will ask the minister not to come back.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Later:]

DESIGNATION OF PLACE FOR NEWFOUNDLAND AT AGRICULTURAL OUTLOOK CONFERENCE

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the one to which the Minister of Agriculture replied a few moments ago. It has to do with the outlook for agriculture conference presently being held. At the beginning of yesterday's meetings was there a place set out for Newfoundland clearly designated in the same way as places were designated for the other provinces? If not, why not?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): I think it was. I can recollect seeing the Deputy Minister of Agriculture occupying one of those seats.

Mr. Lundrigan: I asked the minister whether the province of Newfoundland was designated formally, as were the other nine provinces, by proper designation at the table at yesterday's meetings?

Mr. Olson: I cannot recall off the top of my head. If it was not, it ought to have been and I will check into it.

POST OFFICE

INTEGRATION OF TRANSPORTATION SERVICES—CONSULTATION WITH CNTU—REHIRING OF FORMER EMPLOYEES OF G. LAPALME INCORPORATED

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Postmaster General.

Further to the department's announcement of new policies today, can the minister tell us whether the CNTU has been consulted and also whether the ex-employees of G. Lapalme Inc. will be guaranteed employment with the Post Office in Montreal under the new policy?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the CNTU was not consulted since it represents none of the groups of employees to be involved in the program.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Postmaster General.

Is he considering a review of the situation of the "Lapalme boys" in order to make jobs available to them with the department in the city of Montreal?

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, that offer was made to them as far back as last April, and they rejected it. Since then, we have invited the former employees of G. Lapalme Inc. to join the Public Service, and if our offer is accepted, we will give the matter new consideration.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

INVESTIGATION OF LEAKING OF GRAY REPORT FROM CABINET

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the investigation into the leakage of the Gray report has yet produced any results, and whether the RCMP have been called in to investigate the leakage of that document?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): We will let the House know in due course, if we have found any results.

Mr. Nielsen: The second part of the question asked whether the RCMP had been called in to investigate not only the leakage of the draft but also of the cabinet document.

Mr. Trudeau: We are conducting the investigation in the best way possible.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, surely the House is entitled to know whether the RCMP have been called in to investigate this serious leak. The question was answered previously with respect to the leakage of another document.

• (2:50 p.m.)

INVESTIGATION OF LEAKING OF GRAY REPORT FROM CABINET—PUBLICATION OF RESULTS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I am getting into this a little late. Most of my questions have been answered, but I wonder whether the Prime Minister can give the House the assurance that the investigation being carried on now regarding the leakage of the Gray report will at least be publicized?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Maybe the investigation will be leaked, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Alexander: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is rising on a point of order. Hon. members will appreciate that we have had a number of supplementary questions on the same subject and we will be running short of time. The hon. member for Hamilton West is rising on a point of order, I believe.

Mr. Alexander: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps I was a little confused in asking the Prime Minister the question, but because of the seriousness of the matter I had hoped that he would give a credible answer. All I am asking him is whether the results of the investigation will be made public and, if not, why not?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member wants a serious answer to this he should reflect that the government's position is one of having hundreds of thousands of documents every year which are circulated among various people in the government service, and we cannot possibly have a policeman on each document or on each person who has access to a document. We take a serious view of these leaks not so much because of the harm they can do the government—I do not think anything has happened or will happen to the government because of them—but because, as I said a moment ago, of the moral aspect of the question involved. If individuals in the Public Service, egged on by the opposition in many cases—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: How do you know it is the Public Service?

Mr. Bell: Whom are you trying to protect?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: Carry on, Mr. Prime Minister.

Mr. Trudeau: Thank you very much.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order.

Mr. Ricard: That is a very low insinuation.

Mr. Trudeau: If individuals throughout the Public Service decide to take justice into their own hands and set themselves above those elected to represent the people, I think this is a very serious thing for the country, not for the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: How do you like that?

Mr. Ricard: St. Boniface, shut your big, tin mouth.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Leader of the Opposition has the floor.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, a moment ago the Prime Minister used the expression "egged on by the opposition" in relation to the misuse, improper release or leakage of public documents. I ask him through you, Mr. Speaker, either to qualify that statement or withdraw it. As it now stands, it constitutes an imputation that myself or other members of the opposition have egged on members of the Public Service to do a highly improper and illegal act. I do not think, with all respect, sir, that is the kind of imputation the Prime Minister of this country, even when he is trying to be a clown, should make in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond wishes to rise on a point of order.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Here we go again.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, my point of order arises from the statement made by the Prime Minister which would indicate that the leak has been traced to the Public Service in that he has reported that the opposition egged on civil servants to release such a document. If he has reached the point in his inquiry where the leak has been traced to the Public Service, he owes it to the House to explain who that public servant is. I suspect it was someone in his own department.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Alexander: I have a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to hon. members that perhaps we should try again to continue with the question period. The Chair might recognize the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Trudeau: I rise on the point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I understand the right hon. Prime Minister is rising on the point of order.

Mr. Trudeau: I apologize, Mr. Speaker, but I understood the Leader of the Opposition to have gained the floor on a point of order.

Mr. Baldwin: It was a question of privilege.

Mr. Trudeau: If it is a question of privilege may I comment on that same question?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. My understanding was that the Leader of the Opposition had gained the floor for the purpose of asking a question. It might have been a question of privilege or a point of order and that is why I allowed the Leader of the Opposition to make his point, which I believe he has made.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the point of order Your Honour has raised. The Leader of the Opposition rose on a question of privilege and asekd the Prime Minister either to qualify his statement, which was a direct implication against members of the opposition, which could mean this party or the parties to my left, or withdraw it. I think he should either do one or the other, and Your Honour, with great deference, should request him either to qualify it or withdraw it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member cannot be serious in that suggestion. I suggest to him that he is asking another member of the House to withdraw an accusation or a charge. Charges are made by hon. members every day in the course of debate. Those charges are not always well-founded. Charges are made by one hon. member against another hon. member which are not always supported. It is not within the competence of the Chair to ask an hon. member to withdraw a charge he has made, whether or not it is right, whether or not it is founded on fact. This has nothing to do with procedure and, with respect, I suggest it is not for the Chair to invite or force an hon. member to withdraw a charge he has made against other members.

I appreciate that this is a valid point of order and I allowed the Leader of the Opposition to make this point. If the right hon. Prime Minister wishes to speak to the point of order in response to the Leader of the Opposition, or to the question of privilege, certainly he will be recognized for that purpose.

Mr. Trudeau: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Baldwin: This constitutes a criminal act under the Official Secrets Act. It constitutes a criminal conspiracy allegation against members of the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has recognized the right hon. Prime Minister.

Mr. Trudeau: I am very happy to hear the Leader of the Opposition applauded by his whole party.

Mr. Bell: Order!

Some hon Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bell: What has that got to do with it?

Mr. Trudeau: I am very happy—

Mr. Muir: Some of your party are not applauding you, fellow.

Mr. Trudeau: I am glad to hear him express—

Mr. Muir: Some of your members are not applauding you, especially Hellyer and some others.

Mr. Trudeau: Have you had a drink?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Ricard: Be a man!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. With great respect I suggest to hon. members on both sides of the House that this is not appropriate and proper behaviour for the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I really think hon. members should perhaps try for the moment to move on to another subject.

Mr. Ricard: Are you proud of that remark?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I recognize the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys is rising on a question of privilege. I apologize to him.

Mr. Muir: I apologize to you, Sir.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Muir: You are not shouting me down today. As I have said on other occasions, the right hon. member who is supposedly the Prime Minister of this country reached this chamber in the same manner as the rest of us. If he is not man enough to take heckling in this House—

An hon. Member: You can't take it yourself.

Mr. Muir: —and becomes childish and petulant and then sits down and sulks, throwing insults across the way, making the suggestion, sir, that someone has been drinking—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Muir: —or something along those lines, I think he should be brought to order and brought to task in the same way as any other member of this House of Commons. He has no right to cast reflections on the activity or conduct of any member of this House of Commons. If he is trying to destroy me as a member of this House—

• (3:00 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You are doing it to yourself.

Mr. Muir: I have plenty of time, Mr. Speaker, and I refuse to be howled down by the jackals opposite. I suggest, sir, honourable sir—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Muir: —that you—

An hon. Member: Sit down while you are ahead.

Mr. Muir: I have a right, sir—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has the floor. I suggest to hon. members that the hon. member who has the floor should be given an opportunity to state his point. Hon. members have a duty to co-operate with one another and with the Chair to try to make this place a reasonable place for debate. For the moment, the hon. member has the floor and he should be allowed to state his point.

Mr. Muir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am glad you are able to bring members to your right into line. I should like, sir, to ask you, in all common decency, to ask this member to withdraw the statement he made. I am completely serious and honest about this, Mr. Speaker. I am not going to have my character besmirched by that over there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Muir: I am not going to. My people in Cape Breton-The Sydneys know my record and my background. I do not have to be slurred by something said over there by someone who is supposed to lead this country with decency and respect. I ask for withdrawal, Sir.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has very forcefully, and I think with reason, made his point on a question of privilege. I am not too sure whether I heard the words pronounced of which he complains, but certainly no hon. member in this House has the right to make a suggestion about another hon. member which would tend to affect his character. I am quite sure no hon. member or no right hon. member would want to do this. I certainly will hear the explanation by the right hon. Prime Minister if he has said words to the effect suggested by the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys. Certainly, I am sure the Prime Minister would want to indicate that he did not want in any way to affect the character of the hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am in your hands on this. After I was trying to gain the floor to answer the question of the Leader of the Opposition, I was met by constant heckling from the hon. member in particular and rather than do as he suggested, sit down and sulk, I asked him if he had had a drink. If this is something which offends him, and if he is known as a drinking man, I wish to withdraw this.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Withdraw!

Mr. Speaker: Order. The right hon. gentleman has said he is in the hands of the Chair. Of course, all hon. members have in this regard to follow the advice and guidance of the Chair. I would think it would be much simpler if the right hon. gentleman, having given his explanation, would simply indicate that he withdraws any imputation in relation to the hon. member, and then we will try to continue.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman is a teetotaler and therefore in anything I might have said along those lines I certainly wish to say there was no implication of bad conduct on his part. I will sit down, Mr. Speaker. Is that not sufficient?

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, I thank the right hon. gentleman for his reply and for his apology. It is a serious matter. I have talked to him privately and he knows the situation. I thank him for his apology.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I suggest the incident be closed on a note of charity. I think this is very becoming. The hon. member for Skeena.

PENITENTIARIES

KINGSTON RIOT—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF COMMISSION

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might direct a question to the Solicitor General. Has he yet received the report of the commission of inquiry headed by Mr. Swackhamer in respect of the riot and other events at Kingston earlier in the year? If so, can he tell us when he will be making it public? If he has not received it, can he give us any indication when he expects to receive it?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not received this report yet, and unfortunately I do not know when it will be handed to me.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

DISAGREEMENT BETWEEN OTTAWA AND QUEBEC RESPECTING FINANCIAL ARRANGEMENTS—REQUEST FOR JOINT COMMUNIQUÉ

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

In view of the obviously contradictory attitudes of the Quebec Premier and the Prime Minister of Canada concerning the course that they want to set for various administrations, from the social and economic points of view, does the Prime Minister intend to prepare a joint communiqué with his colleague—I was going to say his pupil—Mr. Bourassa so as to inform the House and the people on the actual situation which exists now between Quebec and Ottawa?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did understand the question, except for the essential part of it. This would be a communiqué on what? The hon. member might perhaps repeat his question. I did not understand too well. What is the point in litigation?

Mr. Matte: In order to clarify my question directed to the Prime Minister, I would merely like to add, Mr. Speaker, that it has to do with the different positions taken by the Premier of Quebec and the Prime Minister of Canada with respect to tax arrangements, from the points of view of social affairs administration and the Regional Economic Expansion Department, since different interpretations have been given by the Premier of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has now given an explanation and time is running out.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I really cannot do what the hon. member suggests, that is write a joint communiqué. Premier Bourassa is opting for regional expansion. Apparently, he did not say what the press has attributed to him. The matter is settled. He has been misquoted, he did not say what the opposition suggests he said on the grounds of some reports.

If he now wants to say something else, it should be made clear.

[Mr. Howard (Skeena).]

HOUSING

TORONTO—EFFECT ON SCHOOLS AND PLANNING OF MAIN SQUARE COMPLEX—NECESSITY FOR CONSULTATION BY CMHC BEFORE EMBARKING ON SIMILAR VENTURES

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs who is responsible for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation I put this question to the Prime Minister. As Main Square, a 1,078 suite, high-rise complex in Toronto was altered from a private development to a CMHC innovative housing development with disastrous effects on planning and schooling in two metro boroughs, will the Prime Minister assure the House that he will insist upon proper CMHC consultation and planning before it embarks on similar ventures?

• (3:10 p.m.)

Mr. David Weatherhead (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Main Square in Toronto is a project of over 1,000 housing units under the innovative housing program, over 500 of which will be low rental income units. The dispute at present appears to be between the Board of Education of Toronto and the Toronto City Council as to whether the board has made enough input into their planning procedures. But I think there are only about 72 schoolchildren involved in this project, and the allegation that a new school is required for these 72 children is somewhat ridiculous.

MAIN SQUARE, TORONTO—CMHC POLICY REGARDING GRANTS TO AMERICAN DEVELOPERS

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): I would ask the parliamentary secretary whether it continues to be government policy to permit CMHC to give a capital handout of almost $14 million to American developers, such as Victoria Wood Development Corporation Limited in the Main Square case, without any capital contribution from such American developers?

Mr. David Weatherhead (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): There was a $1 million contribution by the developers in question, namely, in holding the 75-year lease. But I would say to the hon. member that we would be happy to discuss this at the time of adjournment if he wishes to do so.

MAIN SQUARE, TORONTO—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): In view of the various problems that have arisen in respect of the Main Square development, will the parliamentary secretary suggest to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs that he make a statement in the House about the development of this project?

Mr. David Weatherhead (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I will be happy to answer any further questions at this time, but I will certainly relay the request to the Minister.

GRAIN

LIFT PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION OF ERRORS REQUIRING REPAYMENTS BY FARMERS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): My question is for the Minister of Agriculture and is in connection with the payments under the Lift program. Will the government give a full explanation to the western farmers of the mistakes which occurred that require the government to request such extensive adjustments of the Lift payments?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): I do not believe that we will reveal the contents of individual files to the public. It is standard practice in all departments that confidential or personal information respecting the operation of an individual farm is not made public. But I will certainly give the hon. member an undertaking that we will give some explanation of the nature of the disagreements. As I said in the House some time ago, most of it is caused by the fact that the figures in the application do not correspond with either the photographs or other evidence as to what the actual acreage was.

PROPOSAL BY PROVINCIAL MEMBERS OF AGRICULTURE RESPECTING ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMITTEE ON FEED GRAIN MARKETING

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture a supplementary question regarding the agricultural policy that has been discussed by the provinces in the last few days. Since the provincial ministers have asked for the immediate establishment of a committee composed of representatives of the federal government, the Wheat Board, the Livestock Feed Board and the provincial governments on a national feed grain marketing board—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member ask the question? We are running short of time and the question seems to be rather long.

Mr. Murta: I am coming to the end of my question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the recommendation that these various groups be represented on the board and should report back to the government within three months, is the government going to consider this recommendation from the provinces?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): We had a meeting yesterday afternoon with all the ministers, we had another meeting from 8.30 to 1 p.m. today and we are meeting again at 4.30. I can advise the hon. member that there are a number of matters under consideration, but we have not yet reached a detailed discussion of that particular proposal.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR REPRESENTATIONS CONCERNING REMARK BY PROVINCIAL JUDGE

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development arising out of a serious and shameful statement made the other day by a provincial judge in Ontario, Judge Collins of Sudbury, with regard to the Indian people of this province and country. I appreciate the fact that Judge Collins is under provincial jurisdiction. I want to ask the minister whether he has made representations to the Attorney General of Ontario critical of this shameful remark by the judge and perhaps requesting that the judge be fired for treating citizens coming before him in that way?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member in saying that if the remarks imputed to the judge are those he made they are totally unacceptable, and I shall inquire to find out what steps I must take under such circumstances. Only, I would not want to ascribe to him—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Lambton-Kent.

Mr. Lewis: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: We are running short of time. Perhaps the hon. member for Lambton-Kent might allow the Chair to recognize the hon. member for York South on a supplementary question, following which the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Lambton-Kent.

Mr. Lewis: In view of the fact that the statement by Judge Collins was made a few days ago, may I ask the minister whether the department has started an investigation, or is the matter just being considered now? Will the minister inform the House eventually what steps he is taking, if any?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to inform the House and the hon. member of the steps we will take in this case.

GRAIN

ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMITTEE ON FEED GRAIN MARKETING

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): My question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Is it the government's intention to establish a committee composed of representatives of the federal government, the Wheat Board, the Livestock Feed Board and the provincial governments regarding national feed grain marketing?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): That is essentially the same question as was asked by the hon. member for Lisgar a minute ago. I think the same answer is applicable.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

NUMBER OF GRANTS APPROVED BY EMPLOYMENT SUPPORT BOARD—LENGTH OF TIME NECESSARY TO APPROVE APPLICATIONS

Mr. Maurice Foster(Algoma): My question is directed to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Have any grants been approved yet by the Employment Support Board for companies adversely affected by the U.S. 10 per cent surcharge, and can the parliamentary secretary say what time span companies can expect to elapse for the processing of applications from the day an application is received until a decision is made by the board?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): About 186 applications have been received thus far involving some 9,000 or more employees. The normal time span varies from a few days to two or three weeks.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

GRANTING OF PAROLE TO NELLES KIDNAPPERS—REFUSAL TO RETURN LICENCE TO PERSON CONVICTED OF IMPAIRED DRIVING

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): My question is directed to the Solicitor General who I believe has some authority over the National Parole Board. It pertains to the permissive society now flourishing in Canada. Can the Solicitor General explain to me and to the House why the parole board is granting parole to the convicted criminal kidnappers in the notorious Nelles case in 1969, after only one-sixth of their sentences have been served, while the same parole board will not grant the return of a driving licence to a penitent constituent of mine?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alkenbrack: They laugh on the government benches, but this is a serious matter. The same parole board will not grant the return of a driving licence to a penitent constituent of mine who has served more than half his licence deprival sentence for impaired driving. Could he answer that question?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to comment on the points raised by the hon. member, but he knows very well that the National Parole Board is an independent body, according to Parliament's decision. On the other hand, the hon. member should know that the Senate has decided to examine the policy and procedures of the National Parole Board. We shall co-operate with the Senate and we shall also—

[English]

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Speaker—

[Mr. Olson.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that perhaps we might go on to the next question. From a procedural standpoint, it seems to me that the hon. member's question is objectionable. I appreciate the fact that he is submitting an argument in support of a proposition. In this respect, perhaps he might consider that the representation has been made.

Mr. Alkenbrack: I want to put justice in perspective in this case. May we debate this at ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

GRANTS TO QUEBEC COMPARED WITH OTHER AREAS

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): My question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. It refers to a document which, I hasten to add, is not secret. It is called "Maintenant Québec". The document states that the federal government has spent or allocated some $270 million in Quebec City and the immediate area. I am not saying the money is not needed, but I want to ask the Prime Minister if he will give his assurance to the House that similar amounts per capita are being spent in other designated areas of Quebec and the rest of Canada which are not directly represented by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Much more, Mr. Speaker.

QUEBEC—MEASURES TO COMPENSATE CERTAIN POTATO GROWERS FOR LOSSES SUSTAINED

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Has he examined the representations made by potato growers from Portneuf, Montmorency and Champlain who, as a result of excessive humidity last autumn, lost 50 to 60 per cent of their crop? If so, could the minister tell me what steps he intends to take in order to help those producers solve their financial problems?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have had some representation in a general way. I have not had specific complaints or requests for assistance from the producers involved.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to hon. members who have not been called today but they have been noted. I have taken into account that there were questions of privilege and points of order and to that extent I have extended the question period to try to allow as many hon. members as possible to ask questions. I have tried to note those who have not been successful today, and I will try to give them priority tomorrow. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed, from Monday, November 22, consideration in committee of Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act—Mr. Benson—Mr. Laniel in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: In accordance with the statement of the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council, as recorded at page 9777 of Hansard of November 22, 1971, the committee will now proceed to consideration of Sections 21, 25, 46 to 48 inclusive, 59, 64 to 66 inclusive, 87 and 124, all dealing with mining and petroleum.

On clause 1—section 21: Cost of borrowed money.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall section 21 carry?

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I have already set down some of the views I have with respect to the mining industry in the debate on the general provisions of Bill C-259. I have spoken of the harmful effects of the legislation on prospectors, who will virtually be put out of business. I have also spoken of the restrictions that are being imposed, not only by Bill C-259 but by other restrictive legislation before the House, and of the disastrous effect that these restrictions will have on the growth of this industry. I want to approach an analysis of those sections of the bill in a general way, from the point of view of what is desirable in this country, and how we should be treating this industry, indeed any industry.

However, I intend to confine my remarks to the mining industry. Others on this side of the chamber will be speaking on the measure as it affects coal and timber resources, and yet others will be speaking of the manner in which the oil and gas industries will be affected. As I say, I want to confine my remarks generally to the hardrock mining industry. I want to approach the subject by suggesting at the outset to the government that what it should be doing, instead of applying suffocating restrictions, is providing incentives for the industrial growth of the country, and in particular of the mining industry.

Under existing legislation, tax treatment of the mining industry is contained essentially in the income tax regulations, and it now appears that this concept is to be carried forward in Bill C-259. This is one of the major criticisms that the industry has of this manner of dealing with its taxation. There is no way that the industry, dependant essentially upon large amounts of risk capital, can plan sufficiently far ahead—in some cases it has to plan five to seven years ahead—with any accuracy if the rules of the game are going to be changed half way through the planning period, or indeed month by month as is possible if this whole operation is going to be covered by regulations made by Governor in Council.

I make specific reference to section 65 of the bill, which is found on page 155, where the following is set forth between lines 22 and 27:

> There may be deducted in computing a taxpayer's income for a taxation year such amount as an allowance in respect of an oil or gas well, mineral resource or timber limit, if any, as is allowed to the taxpayer by regulation.

There is the power to tax. Another criticism can be made with respect to that kind of regulation, namely, that the power to tax is the power of Parliament, and that is where it should reside. But this section of the bill would give that power to the Governor in Council. It seems to me that that is the ultimate in the weakening of the power of this place, passing the power to tax over to the Governor in Council.

In order to achieve a new tax treatment quite similar to the old one, namely, that tax treatment of the mining industry is to be contained in subsequently prescribed regulations, the government has seen fit to issue occasionally its general intentions. These intentions have been released in the form of vague, poorly phrased proposed regulations. Furthermore, it may be shown that the spirit and intent of certain of these proposed regulations seem to change with each new issue of them.

Specific reference is made here to proposals made by the Minister of Finance in August, 1970, on the subject of eligible expenditures to earn depletion. At that time it was proposed to expand these eligible expenditures to include, first, the cost of new facilities located in Canada to process mineral ores to the prime metal stage and, second, certain expenditures in connection with a major expansion of an existing Canadian mine.

On July 6 of this year the Department of Finance issued further proposed regulations to apply to the mining and petroleum industries. Included in these new regulations were a series of proposals that, as they now stand, are not only ambiguous but contradictory to those of August, 1970. This is another example of the changes proposed for the act introduced by the Minister of Finance, followed by a second batch of proposed changes and a third batch of proposed changes. The same thing is happening with the proposed regulations that are being issued, all of which is causing extreme difficulty, if not making it impossible for the mining industry to make any plans at all based on the so-called proposed regulations.

Such changing attitudes by the government in its proposed tax regulations have contributed in no small measure to an unsettled business climate in Canada's mining community. Specific reference is made here to a submission by Noranda Mines Ltd. to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I am sorry I do not have the page number, but the committee report reads:

> Noranda has undertaken a $120 million program of expansion in the province of Quebec, relying on our understanding of the Minister of Finance's announcement of August, 1970 that all of these expenditures would be eligible to earn depletion. Based on the spirit and intent of that announcement, there is no conceivable reason why all of these expenditures should not earn depletion. Now we find that $40 million of these expenditures will not qualify.

This submission by Noranda Mines continues:

> We were led to believe that the announcement of August, 1970 was specifically designed to encourage developments of this type. Had we not believed that all of the expenditures involved would have earned depletion, the project would probably not have proceeded, at least on its present scale. Changes in the intent of the August, 1970 announcement at this stage are clearly inequitable, to put it mildly.

Not only are the changing attitudes of government toward certain sectors of the economy inequitable, but it is becoming more apparent that the government is also becoming increasingly restrictive. Specific reference is made here to the restrictive attitude of the government toward the natural resource industry in general, and toward the mining industry in particular. Subject to further clarification it now appears that the proposed tax regulations will have the effect of withdrawing exemptions for prospectors, and I have mentioned that; replacing the three-year tax-free period for new mines after 1973 by accelerated depreciation rates on some assets of that new mine; earning a depletion allowance of $1 for every $3 of certain expenditures. This elimination of the three-year tax exemption period for new mines, particularly in the northern regions of the country, is going to have an absolutely devastating effect, not only on the exploration and search for new mineral deposits but also on the bringing into production of new mines. In addition, the regulations will discontinue shareholders' depletion allowances. Obviously, such measures are restrictive and if implemented, could seriously hinder the orderly expansion of one of our most important industries, the mining industry.

At a time when the government is showing more manifestations of its restrictive policies, as in the field of foreign ownership, serious consideration must be given to the effect such restrictive policies will have on the ability of the individual Canadian to invest and participate in the growth of our domestic natural resources. Specific reference is made here to the existence of drilling funds. I have mentioned this on a prior occasion in debate as an example of how the United States policy toward investment funds is actually hindering the development of Canadian resources, because Canadian investment dollars find it a good deal more attractive to find their way into the United States and come back here by way of investment capital rather than being put directly into investments at home.

American tax laws favour the use of essentially private capital for these drilling funds in a risk-taking venture, such as oil or gas exploration, by granting certain incentives to individuals willing to take such risks. These drilling funds were discussed in some detail by me in this House on October 18 of this year. How much better it would be to gain more control over our own resources by attracting more Canadian investment dollars in our resource development industries, and by providing incentives at home at least equivalent to those being provided by the United States government to their investors, than to take restrictive measures in the hope that those measures will be the be-all and end-all of repatriating our resource industries.

The point to be made at this time is that rather than adopt a restrictive policy toward ownership and development of resources in this country, much more consideration must be given to policies that further individual initiative and reduce state interference and control to a minimum. Quite obviously, one means of achieving such a policy of individual initiative is to establish tax incentives comparable to those in the United States that encourage an individual to invest more private risk capital in Canada's natural resources. The influx of large amounts of such domestic capital into Canada's resource industries will provide an opportunity that will allow concerned Canadians to express their feelings about foreign control of these resources in a more positive manner than could ever be achieved by the main recommendation of the Gray report, that is, the setting up some sort of screening process to direct the inflow of investment capital in this country.

The principles of tax incentives as against tax restrictions can be applied to a wide field. It has already been indicated that tax incentives for individuals to invest in Canada's natural resources are a suitable means of providing an avenue for greater individual participation in the growth and development of our economy. One further area that relates to tax incentives and the mining industry must be mentioned. This area is the field of environmental control and pollution abatement by the mining industry.

The latest Department of Finance news release on tax reform proposals for the mining industry referred to certain allowable assets eligible for accelerated depletion under regulations not yet published. Although the list of eligible expenditures included buildings, mining machinery, social capital and such items, no mention was made of the cost of pollution abatement equipment necessary to meet industry emission standards. Surely, this is one incentive that the government should be holding out to this industry in order to meet the increasing threat of pollution.

In summary, it may be said that although the principle of tax treatment by regulations prescribed subsequent to enactment of Bill C-259 allows some flexibility, particular caution must be exercised at this time that these proposed new regulations remain consistent and in the best interest of the country. If indeed the government intends to proceed in this fashion on the matter of writing the requirements into acts so that the mining industry knows where it stands and we must have regulations, then I submit these must be consistent and in the best interests of Canada. It has already been shown that since the first public appearance of the proposed new tax regulations both the spirit and intent of certain of these regulations have changed. How many more regulations are there to come and how will these differ from those presently proposed?

Of equal or perhaps greater importance is to assess the new tax proposals and to evaluate their potential contribution to the socio-economic interests of Canada. It is apparent that the present government intentions are to further restrict development and ownership at a time when serious consideration must be given to an incentive tax program. To this end, it is now proposed that rather than adopt restrictive measures, tax incentives be made available to achieve the following objectives. We must first strengthen the domestic mining industry to the extent that it is able to compete with international concerns. It is not so important to look at any tax advantages the domestic mining industry may have relative to other domestic industries, but to see what disadvantages the domestic industry has relative to international concerns. If the government does not think that is important, let us analyse for a moment the burgeoning development of mineral industries in countries like Australia.

Second, we must provide a climate that encourages individual initiative and risk capital investment in domestic natural resources. A comparable scheme to the American drilling funds must be actively considered in the broader context of Canada's mining industry. Third, we must provide tax incentives for environmentally conscious industry. Serious consideration should be given to including costs of pollution abatement equipment in the list of expenditures eligible for accelerated depreciation.

Others on this side will deal with the specifics of these and other proposals, with specific parts of the resource industries of the country and the effect that this tax reform bill will have on them. In a very general way, I have tried to point out to the government that what we require for the development of this country is an incentive approach rather than a restrictive approach.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, there has been much discussion in this country about incentives for mining industries. At the moment, it appears that all the representations made to the government about removing the great advantages that have been given to the resource industries of Canada have met with little success. The government has ducked its responsibilities. It has backed away from its original position, and has backed away from recommendations in the Carter commission report to the effect that the resource industries should be treated in relatively the same way as our other industries are treated, and that special concessions given to those resource industries over the years have been inequitable and unfair. I submit that those advantages have been positively damaging to the economic future of this country. We have paid out money to destroy our own economy. We have given tax concessions and received little in return.

I realize that the provinces of this country which almost totally depend on resource development will find the proposition I am putting before Your Honour difficult to accept. I can imagine hon. members saying, "It is fine for the hon. member for Waterloo to say that. He comes from an industrialized area of Canada. It is fine for him to be an advocate of the manufacturing industries, but where does his position leave, say, British Columbia, Alberta or the Yukon? I admit that there are difficulties connected with the position I am adopting.

On the other hand, I think we should discuss these matters frankly. Quite often debates in this House on the merits of resource industries as against those of manufacturing industries take on the appearance of a civil war. Often those debates transcend party lines, support for one or other of the propositions being put forward being divided along provincial lines rather than along party lines. That is understandable. However, the position we face is serious. Unless we can resolve this problem and stop seeing ourselves as a country of fractious segments, there will not be a country called Canada. We shall not be able to develop effective trade policies, and we shall not be able to develop an effective tax system. We must find some way to resolve this particular difficulty.

I hope hon. members listening to me will give me the benefit of the doubt when I say that I am speaking not only for Ontario and for the highly industrialized parts of the country, but I am speaking for all Canada. I am very much concerned about what is taking place. Canada is being excluded from virtually every major market for manufactured goods in the world. The same applies in many cases to our agricultural products. The United Kingdom, which has long been a traditional market for us, will adopt many of the restrictive measures of the European Economic Community. Many difficulties are in store there for our grain farmers. The United States is becoming increasingly protectionist. I feel that this United States sentiment will not disappear quickly. Notwithstanding the possible removal of the 10 per cent surcharge in the near future, the protectionist sentiment of the United States will increase. That country is looking inward. I do not think that the United States has embarked on these measures merely because the Prime Minister of Canada invited the premier of Russia and president of Yugoslavia to this country. That is what some hon. members have suggested, and I do not believe it. These United States moves were on the books long before these visits took place.

Surely, hon. members are not suggesting that Canada should not try to maintain relations with other countries of the world and that we should not make an effort to resolve many international difficulties that we, a member of the world community, face. When we look at Japan, what do we see? There is a market in Japan for our raw materials and some of our foodstuffs, but there is no market for our manufactured goods. When we look at the American position, what do we see? It has become clear, I think, that the United States wants from Canada raw materials and energy supplies, and no more than that. I am sure that some people in Alberta will applaud that. They will say, "This is great for Alberta." No doubt some people in British Columbia say, "We are shipping coal to Japan, and that is great for British Columbia." There is only one problem connected with this, Mr. Chairman. If we pursue a policy of exporting only raw materials and of encouraging, through our tax system, this kind of export, we shall in the end have opted out of nationhood. There will be no future for us as a country and we might as well realize it.

We could argue that in terms of coal, iron ore and oil, we have at the moment a position of considerable advantage so far as the United States is concerned. As I say, we could argue that and say that simply by increasing exports from primary industries we would increase the per capita income of Canadians. There is only one big "if" in all this. If we do that, we will not be able to maintain a population of 22 million people. We will have to cut back on our population sharply and export our people, as Ireland did many years ago. There is no way that we can sustain the present population in Canada and accommodate in employment the number of people presently in the labour force if, in future, we emphasize the export of our raw materials. The raw material industries are capital intensive industries. They are not large employers of labour. According to figures I have seen, the raw material industries employ about 150,000 people. They provide about 150,000 jobs out of a total of more than 3,500,000 jobs in the country as a whole. That shows how serious the problem is. We must decide whether we are to be exporters of raw materials or the manufacturers of goods and providers of services.

When we were starting out as a new country and did not have our present population or infrastructure, we had to depend on what was traditionally called a fish and fur economy. What else could we do but export our resources, resources such as timber and minerals? Today, however, the choices open to us are different. Actually, we do not have a choice if we wish to maintain our population. The idea of depopulating Canada is—well, it is unthinkable. It is not acceptable and I do not know how it could be done. That is to say, I do not know how one could say to the young people of this country, "There is no future for you here; all we are doing is exporting raw materials. That is what we are encouraging through our tax system. You had better find yourself another country in which to live." I say this with the utmost seriousness. At the same time I say to those hon. members who come from resource rich provinces, "I understand your position; yet you must also understand the awful dilemma facing this country."

I would never suggest for a moment that we should cut back on the present rate of production in the mineral industry. That is not what I am suggesting, nor is any member of my party, I think, suggesting that. We are suggesting that we should look to the future and not encourage the export of raw materials from Canada either directly or indirectly through the tax system, as at present. We should instead find a way of saying to the resource provinces "We will meet your grievances. We understand your needs. We understand that this will have some effect on your future development, therefore, we will have an overall industrial policy for Canada that will compensate you for some of the development that may be forgone by you. Where that is not possible, we will at least have a provision for sharing the rewards of industry and resource development equally on a per capita basis to stop this constant civil war, this schizophrenia that exists within the boundaries of this country and which will ultimately destroy this country unless we find a way of resolving it."

I realize that some of what I say sounds a little dramatic. I do not wish to sound dramatic. This is something about which I feel very strongly and something which has been too long neglected. The kind of debate we are having today has often been turned into one of the east versus the west, as though we were enemies and not part of the same community and commonwealth. Therefore, in my remarks today I propose to examine some of the mythology—perhaps I should not say "mythology" because some members may take exception to that. I wish to examine some of the things—we have always believed about the resource industry and its value to Canada as a whole. I want to see to what extent that concept really bears examination and to what extent it really has validity for a country that has a choice of becoming a manufacturing nation or continuing to be what is often called the greatest underdeveloped country in the world.

[Mr. Saltsman.]

I wish to quote some words of Mr. Ralph Nader who is visiting Canada. This statement is reported in the Ottawa Citizen for Saturday, November 20, and is a direct quote:

"As long as you are an extractive super-colony, and as long as decisions affecting U.S. investment in Canada swirl around U.S. considerations, the Canadian interest will come out second best."

Those remarks were made by an American. He said other things along the same line. A few weeks ago another American visited Canada on a mission for a group of businessmen in the United States. He made the following remark which was reported in the November 17 edition of the Globe and Mail:

"If I were a Canadian—which I sometimes wish I were—I would be less concerned over the temporary surcharge and more concerned over your exports of raw materials to the United States. It is not fair for Americans to use up Canadian resources faster than Canadians use their own."

This statement in the Globe and Mail is attributed to Mr. C. F. Hachmeister. We have a lot of resources in this country. I am not trying to denigrate for a moment the scope of our resources. However, regardless of that scope, they are still finite. There is a limit. In a number of years, we could remove them all. We could go further afield into more expensive and more difficult extractive areas, but what happens when the resources give out? What are we left with? What does this country do for an encore when it has exhausted its resources? We must not forget that as vast as the resources of Canada are, the insatiable appetite of Japan and the United States will consume them at such a clip as to leave us aghast.

In the early days, we thought that pollution was no problem. We said "Look at our beautiful rivers and waterways. Look how fast they flow to the oceans and lakes. What are a few bits of dirt?" We learned to regret that position. The smokestack in the city was a sign of progress and satisfaction. We are now in danger of destroying ourselves because of the close proximity of those smokestacks. The dye, slag and chemicals pouring into our rivers were considered signs of progress. We were wrong. We were wrong when we cut down certain areas of our forests and did not replace these areas with tree cover. Who thought it would be a mistake to take trees out of a country like Canada that had so many trees? As rich in resources as we appear to be, and as infinite as these resources may appear at the moment, they have a limit. If we do not husband them carefully and decide on their allocation, we will not have any resources. We will not survive, except perhaps as some northern slum of the United States.

An interesting item appeared in the October 29 edition of the Globe and Mail. It is an example of the kettle calling the pot black. The item deals with the Canadian Petroleum Association and reads:

—the mining industry will carry a 21 per cent collective tax burden while the petroleum industry will shoulder a levy of 36 per cent after 1976 when the legislation comes into force.

This is absolutely shocking. Imagine the mining industry getting away with paying only a 21 per cent tax while the dear old petroleum industry has to pay 36 per cent. It is shocking to both sides. At the moment, some estimates indicate that the oil industry is only paying a 6 per cent tax on its profits and the mining industry is only paying 13 per cent. It can be seen how seriously we are disadvantaging those industries and how unfair we are vis-à-vis the mining industry versus the oil industry. Nevertheless, I wonder how much sympathy we should allow ourselves to have when we consider that every other industry in Canada is paying the full tax, around 50 per cent, and in many instances providing far more employment than either the mining or oil industry.

It is not fair to those industries that are paying their full share of taxes to continue that practice, while the resource industries receive special privileges. Any kind of special privilege in society, whether it be a special privilege for one individual in contrast to another or one industry in comparison to another, arouses resentment. It does not increase the feeling of co-operation in society or the sense of belonging to the same society. There is a cause for grievance and division. So it should be. We like to think of ourselves as a fair society and a fair country. However, as long as we have tax laws on the books that treat one group of investors more favourably, for no good reason, than another group of investors, it is going to be difficult to maintain any kind of pride in the degree of equity that exists in Canada.

Another argument that is often used is that because other countries grant concessions to mining industries, most of the capital that goes into the mining industry, or for that matter the oil industry, is specific capital. I grant that the people in the mining business are in the mining business. They are not likely to go into the foam rubber business. If you do not provide the same kind of opportunities and the same kind of concessions in Canada they might get in Nigeria or Chile they will go elsewhere in the world, although they may have some reason to regret a decision to go to Chile as they may if they decided to develop mines in Ireland. Of course, these companies are helping to bring about this kind of talk. The distinguished hon. member for Yukon made that argument in his remarks a few minutes ago.

Unless we are prepared to give them the same benefits here in Canada they will go elsewhere, but this presupposes a number of things; that resources in Canada are equivalent to resources elsewhere, and therefore we have to give exactly the same concessions. In many cases our resources are richer and by giving the same concessions we are augmenting the profits of the companies. If they do not get what they want in the way of decent taxes and concessions they may not act in the national interest, perhaps not deliberately but because the activity of the company does not conform with our long-term outlook and planning. That being the case, why would we want them anyway?

There is considerable evidence to indicate that because we have been so generous in our tax system in respect of resource development, we have attracted much more money into these industries than even the market system would justify. The kind of argument advanced by the hon. member a moment ago cannot be justified in a free enterprise system or even in a social democratic system. A social democrat is more inclined to believe in planning and looking ahead to the future. He believes the people should have a greater say in determining their own destiny instead of leaving this to impersonal market forces. The social democrat is appalled at the idea that concessions should be given which frustrate the long-term objectives of the nation.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I must do so in order to inform him that his time has expired.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Carry on.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee consent to the hon. member continuing?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McBride: For one minute.

Mr. Saltsman: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I note the generosity extended to me has been somewhat tempered by a time limit of one minute, and I shall try to respect that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He didn't mean it.

Mr. McBride: I did so.

Mr. Saltsman: My concluding point is that in no philosophical system could we really justify a distortion of our tax system in order to bring more mining activity to Canada. After all, the people working on the Barber commission were not social democrats. Those people believe in a free enterprise system and their argument is that by providing these exaggerated benefits we have hurt ourselves and distorted the proper functioning of our economic system.

I hope to have an opportunity to say a few words later on in this debate. Let me conclude with those arguments and by expressing my appreciation to hon. members for the extended time they have permitted me.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman, at the outset I should like to say that my remarks will be confined to section 65. I should like to say a few words with specific emphasis on the timber industry and coal mining. At the outset, I should like to comment briefly on the remarks of the hon. member for Waterloo. I found much in his very fine address with which I can agree. I should like to say, however, that with regard to the natural resource industries it is a fair comment that perhaps one should remember when one is tampering with industries of this magnitude, and accusing them of having special privileges, at least by reference, that it is upon this very important sector of the economy that we must depend to receive the impetus this country needs for its continued progress and development. Certainly, academics cannot provide it nor, with respect, can civil servants or politicians. There is a question as to whether those in the service industries can provide the necessary expertise to generate wealth and create prosperity. When one considers this country has always been primarily dependent on the success of these primary industries, I think perhaps in some cases at least, there is a case to be made for making sure that if they do not have any special privileges, these resource industries are handled with great care.

As far as the timber industry is concerned, I do not intend to say very much but, for the record, I think in considering the effects of section 65 on the timber industry the government has already recognized to some extent that other natural resource industries such as mining, oil and gas, require certain earned depletion allowances and expenses. If they made those concessions, as rightly they should, on a comparable basis for the pulp and paper industry this would have an equal effect. It would then be equitable and logical to consider giving this industry a system of earned depletion comparable to some of the depletion allowances which exist in respect of other natural resource industries.

For example, I think a depreciation allowance on anti-pollution equipment necessary to meet new emission standards would be worth while. It would make good sense, as well as good ecological practice, for pulp companies to improve their facilities with the very latest equipment. I think significant mill expansions at this time might be questioned. However, in so far as market conditions permit, there should be some concessions made there. As anyone knows who has worked on certain logging projects, there are some primitive conditions. Among the expenditures eligible for allowances would be social costs relating to the installation of roads, camps and other facilities for the employees.

It is with the coal mining industry that my thoughts are this afternoon. This is a very important industry, not only to Canada but to my province and to my constituency. It would appear that the national coal industry is fairly healthy. It may even be said to be in a "turnabout" position, and it might even be said it will expand rapidly during this decade. In 1969, for example, domestic coal production from all provinces was something over 10 million tons, and at the present time it is greater than that. In 1970 it was 16.6 million tons, up about 55 per cent. I see the parliamentary secretary smiling. Perhaps he doubts the efficacy of our research department, but according to the information I have this year's production will be over 20 million tons.

As far as the eastern coal industry is concerned, we do not have the benefits of long-term contracts with Japanese purchasers. As everyone knows, our coal industry is in serious trouble. This is because the government in its wisdom has decided to permit United States coal, from states like Pennsylvania and Kentucky, to come into the largest domestic market in this country, namely Ontario. This is possible now because, as a result of the Kennedy Round, the duty is off this coal. At the same time the government has seen fit to drop, to a large extent if not in fact entirely, the subsidy payments which permit transportation costs to be kept within reasonable limits in order that the maritime coal industry can compete in Ontario. As an example, the latest figures show that the production of coal in the Maritimes is down sharply. It would appear this is a result of a deliberate federal policy to stabilize maritime coal production at what could be said to be the subsistence level.

For example, New Brunswick coal production declined by 43 per cent in 1970. In Nova Scotia, coal production declined by 19 per cent as compared with 1969, from 2,621,000 tons to 2,122,000 tons. In the west, British Columbia's production increased by 280 per cent; the increase amounted to 132 per cent in Alberta, and in Saskatchewan it was 89 per cent. There are certainly reasons for this. With all deference to western coal, it is of a much lower quality than the coal of Nova Scotia and eastern Canada generally. It is sub-bituminous. In fact, the so-called red coal of Saskatchewan is not much better than peat in terms of thermal efficiency. By contrast, Nova Scotian coal is almost up to the anthracite level in qualify and is in great demand when it is available. The drastic decline in our coal production came about, as I understand it, because of the removal of the subvention payment made by the federal government in respect of transportation costs.

Returning to the specific difficulties which the mining industry will encounter and relating them to section 65, it seems to me the key to this situation is that we cannot treat coal in the same way as other minerals are treated. For example, when we talk about exploration costs we must realize that most of the areas in Canada where coal exists have been known for many years, and there is really not much by way of exploration costs that the mines can write off. This is not, of course, the situation in which the nickel and copper mining industries find themselves. Again, the provisions with respect to earned depletion allowances are impracticable for maritime coal producers, simply because, as I understand it, in order to qualify they are obliged to increase their production, or increase their capacity to produce. But under present conditions it is hardly likely, as statistics show, that they will be able to do so. In fact, instead of production increasing by the necessary 25 per cent in order to qualify, in all likelihood production will decline still further unless drastic steps are taken.

At the present time coal producers enjoy certain advantages in the same way as do gold producers. Under the regulations now in force, gold producers benefit from a depletion rate amounting to 40 per cent of production profits or $4 an ounce, whichever is greater. The comparable figure with regard to coal is 10 cents a ton. Under the new tax proposals, as I understand them, effective January 1, 1972 these special rates will be replaced by earned depletion allowances identical to those available to other producers of minerals. I suggest this is a wrong approach because it is unrealistic as far as coal is concerned. It would seem to me that the intention of the federal government toward coal mining in Nova Scotia is to allow the smaller mines to operate without assistance until they are forced to shut down. I would point out that the unemployment resulting from such a course would affect about 5,000 miners at least, not to mention their families.

I have recent correspondence from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources concerning the McBean coal mine in Thorburn. From this correspondence it is clearly evident that the government has no interest in modernizing this mine or taking constructive steps to increase its productivity by starting a new working level. In fact, it appears that the government is content merely to phase this mine out. This is a serious matter. Where there used to be literally thousands of miners working in Pictou County, for example, there are now only a few hundred, and when the McBean Colliery is closed, as now it appears certain to be, and the Drummond Mine in Westville, the only other existing mine, ceases production, there will not be one place in Pictou County where coal is obtained, though millions of tons are available. A day will come, Mr. Chairman, when Canada will need the coal which is available in the East River Valley of Pictou County, as it will need the coal which is available in the rest of Nova Scotia. It will then be a case of starting from scratch, working with untrained personnel, very likely under emergency conditions.

One of the major provincial problems facing the operators of coalfields, at least in Nova Scotia, is that though the reserves are abundant, mining techniques are antiquated. In the west, on the other hand, coal is being produced by using the most modern machinery in conjunction with open pit mining. Leaving aside the question of the ecological damage which is done by strip mining, productivity and efficiency are certainly greater than can be expected from underground mining, even though, as I say, the quality of the coal produced in the west is not as good. Unless the government realizes that the mining industry does require special attention, particularly in Nova Scotia, we shall lose this industry completely. This may well result in another Glace Bay dilemma such as arises when one supports a marginal operation without attempting to improve it.

At a time when Canada's domestic market is using increasing quantities of imported coal, some initiative must be shown by the government so as to de-emphasize dependence on countries abroad and encourage domestic production and the development of mines, for the enrichment of the nation as a whole. I do not wish to get into a discussion about the merits of what Devco is doing in Cape Breton. It is not my field. However, it seems to me that the operation has not been a resounding success and that unless more attention is paid to the real needs of the coal industry conditions will soon be so bad that we might as well forget about it in eastern Canada. In western Canada there have at least been interesting concepts, such as the unit train. I suppose this development has been the result of a co-ordinated effort between provincial and federal government departments. I know of no such concepts having been introduced in eastern Canada, although one might think from the superior quality of coal in eastern Canada that a scheme of this kind would be particularly worth implementing.

In conclusion, it appears to me that coal, as I said before, should not be treated as just another mineral. It has special problems arising from its location, the difficulty of obtaining trained labour and the cost of transporting it to market, not to mention the effect of foreign competition, mostly from the United States. Any stable industrial economy needs an industrial base. Coal will be essential in the future if we are to make the best use of our primary resources. If we are to have cheap hydro-power available in Nova Scotia, coal will still be needed to help operate thermal generating plants. Coal is required in connection with our steel industry in eastern Canada.

The federal government should make immediate efforts to modernize our mines so that they can ultimately become viable. If we do not single out the coal mining industry as requiring some help, particularly in certain regions, we shall lose the industry, though the time will come when the demand for coal will justify the moneys which would, could and should be spent at this point, quite apart from the benefits in employment and resulting social benefits. You will never find a better group of men than the coalminers. They work hard. They risk their lives and all they want is a chance to earn an honest living and produce benefits for this country. So far, they have done so with notable success. It should be a shame to lose this vital part of our economic life through unwillingness to make concessions to this industry, particularly in Nova Scotia.

Mr. Barnett: My hon. friend from Waterloo was unduly sensitive, it appeared to me, because he happens to represent a constituency in a manufacturing area in a part of the country which members from the far west sometimes refer to as the wicked east. As a member who spent all his life in the two westernmost provinces of Canada, who spent at least ten years of his life in a mining community and who has developing mines in his own constituency, I thought it might be useful if I participated for a few minutes in this debate to indicate my complete support for the approach to this whole matter as presented by the hon. member for Waterloo. Anyone who has lived in the atmosphere of a mining town and anyone who understands how completely dependent on a mining economy a particular area is—and the Yukon territory is a particular example—readily understands the concern of an hon. member such as the hon. member for Yukon, and indeed all of the members who have a high level of activity in their part of the country for the income tax law as it relates to that industry.

I should like to make clear, however, that it is a matter of regret to me that in this bill the government has rejected the approach suggested by the Carter commission. The Carter commission, as I recall its recommendations in summary, suggested, in thinking of the long-term situation in this country and of the future in particular, as well as its wealth in the form of non-renewable resources, that we should consider the timing and degree of our exploration and exploitation rather than have that exploration and exploitation left to the whims and fancies of the people actually engaged in the mining industry, or to the short term world market conditions which might prevail in respect of the salability of any particular metal at any given time. As the hon. member for Waterloo suggested, I feel it is important that we think in the longer term. Some of us from time to time have had an opportunity to travel within the boundaries of our great neighbour to the south. We have seen rather vivid examples of what has resulted within the boundaries of that country because of the traditional method of exploitation of non-renewable resources. Some of us suggest that while we still have time in Canada we should begin to think about the whole question of the manner in which these precious substances are drawn from the ground and our approach to that operation.

The lure of wealth, of course, has been at the root of the whole philosophy of mining as it has developed on this continent, stemming I suppose primarily so far as the whole western part of the continent is concerned, from the days of the great gold rushes. At that time men from all corners of the globe, some of the keenest, most adventurous, strong-minded and able bodied men, were drawn to the search for a precious metal. As a result of this situation, there emerged a whole pattern of attitudes and law. This, I believe, has been carried forward to this day and is fostered by the application of the kind of income tax laws we have had and will continue to have if the proposals in this bill pass in their present form.

We are all well aware of the fact that the mining industry, its associations and organizations, continually over the years have bombarded us with argumentation concerning the necessity for the special spurs that are needed to enable them to go out and find new mines. I suggest that even from the most practical point of view that argumentation becomes less valid as time goes on, partly because of the development of new technology, partly because the approach to the development of a new mine becomes increasingly a matter of scientific appraisal of the natural resources and their potential. As a result, when a decision is made to commit money for the development of a mine there is much more likelehood that the mine will, in fact, bring returns to the investors. I am speaking now about the serious type of mining, the type of mining that is carried on to draw wealth from the ground rather than the type of mining in which promoters are more interested in mining the more gullible members of the general public through the stock exchanges of the country.

I have a very basic disquiet about the way in which we are moving in this whole process. I feel this is something which requires a considered approach at the national level. Unless and until a new philosophy is enunciated in Parliament which would change our approach to tax laws, I believe it is virtually impossible for any particular area of the country to do anything but go along with the process of developing resources from a purely local point of view, even though that development may result in rather limited benefits. There is the example of a large mining corporation in my constituency which is just getting into production. In fact in the next month I believe they expect the first shipment of ore to leave the mine. This is a tremendous mining enterprise. The concentrators are designed to mill something like 33,000 tons of ore a day. With the already established reserves, there is a life expectancy for that mine of 25 years at that rate of mining. In the particular area in which it is located it will have a real impact upon the viability of the community. The particular community affected will probably double in size. Many of the amenities which can be had only in a community of reasonable size will result because this mine is coming into production.

As the member representing that area I certainly have not objected to the development of that particular mine in that particular location. It would be foolish for me to do so. It would be silly of me to suggest that this mine not be developed at that particular place when I know the general policy of the country is that such mines are to be developed wherever any particular mining company might decide it has the opportunity to do so. The fact remains that 25 years is not a very long time in the history of a country. The children of the people who will be working that mine will be reaching the point at which they will be presumably looking for productive work at about the time when the projected life of the mine expires.

[Mr. Barnett.]

This, of course, raises the kind of question that was raised by the hon. member for Waterloo, namely, what happens to the children of the current generation of miners at that mine? At the end of 25 years there will be a big hole in the ground and, under the current mining laws of the province of B.C., that kind of open mining operation will have to be completed in such a way that there will be at least some degree of restoration of the landscape. One proposal was that there be a new lake there, about half a mile wide and two or more miles long, that it be landscaped around the edge, and that a new recreation area be created. As it happens, on Vancouver Island there are a number of lakes already in existence. Of course, the same is true of many parts of Canada. Recreation areas are very nice, but even though one may be able to enjoy an inexpensive holiday in a recreation area of that kind, it is rather necessary that there be an economic base for the people who may want to use the recreation facilities from time to time. So the ore from that hole goes across the Pacific Ocean, the profits from the operation go across the border to the south, and in 25 years we will have a nice new lake in Canada. In the meantime, of course, incomes will have been provided for 400 or 500 people for 25 years. I suppose that this is not something to be sneezed at.

Those of us who live in the midst of this sort of thing have perhaps more cause to be concerned about it than have members who live in manufacturing centres, such as the hon. member for Waterloo. In the national interest we may or may not need the development and export of the ore from that particular mine at this time. But the result of the approach we are taking in our income tax law is to continue to encourage this helter-skelter, haphazard development of the extractive industries. This type of development I suggest—and I would like to emphasize this point because I do not think the hon. member for Waterloo made this quite clear in his speech when he spoke about resource industries—is in an entirely different category from that of renewable resources, whether that relates to products from the farms or the products of the forest. This latter type of activity will go on without any special or direct kind of encouragement such as, for example, has been provided for the extractive industries like the mining and petroleum industries.

All we are saying—and, as I understand, all that Mr. Carter said in his report—is that these extractive industries should be treated for income tax purposes on the same basis as all other industrial enterprises. If it was deemed to be in the national interest to accelerate the extraction of petroleum, of copper or of iron ore at any given time, we should do it directly above the table so that we know how much it is costing us. In this way we could tell whether this kind of expenditure was or was not in the national interest. As matters stand, the only way we can really come to grips with this matter is to discuss it indirectly when the Income Tax Act is opened up from time to time. I suggest that this is not the best way to approach this matter. I suggest that despite the kind of briefs we sometimes get—and they certainly come from organizations in my province, and the B.C.-Yukon Chamber of Mines makes the position clear to us from time to time—I am convinced that if these special provisions were to be abolished it would not mean the end of the mining industry in Canada.

I am convinced that where there is a viable market for a mining commodity, that commodity will be produced because we know we have the natural resources to enable us to do so. Let the market be the yardstick as to whether or not we are going to have an increase in copper exports, just as it is in connection with the development of the pulp and paper industry in this country. If we find that the economic situation in that particular field is in a state of decline, if there is tangible evidence that it is necessary to accelerate the exploration for new sources of this kind of raw material, then let this Parliament decide that it is in the national interest to do it at a particular time and let Parliament appropriate the money for it to be done.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Barnett: This, among other things, would bring a new rationale into the kind of thinking which prevails in the mining industry in this country. It would put an end to the everlasting beseeching and begging for more and more special concessions with which we are assailed by the mining interests today, and have been yesterday and the day before that. They would know that they could produce the minerals that were needed. They would know that if there was a real need, and it was in the national interest to open up new resources in new areas or to start more intensive exploration in already known mineral zones, they could present a straightforward case to the government, and that Parliament would be prepared to give it the kind of consideration it deserved. But as long as we continue this basic approach that is still being carried forward in this so-called tax reform law we will be besieged, and so will the Minister of Finance, for a little more and a little more. Frankly, I am very disappointed that the Minister of Finance and the government were not able to see the logic of the position that was put before the people of Canada and this parliament by the Royal Commission on Taxation.

Mr. Dinsdale: The subject matter that is before the House today in this long continuing debate on Bill C-259 will, I am sure, have a sympathetic ear from the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance who has been guiding the debate for most of its period in the House. Recently he was very disturbed in this House at the impact of the latest decision by the National Energy Board with respect to the curtailment of the export of oil and gas resources, and of gas in particular. I do not think it is necessary to belabour the point to convince the hon. gentleman that what is contemplated in the sections of this bill with respect to the resource industry in terms of tax reform is not in the best interests of that industry.

This afternoon I would like to point out that the sections of the bill which we are debating have the same basic weakness that we found in other parts of the bill. I think the assessment of this debate given in editorial comment by the Financial Times of November 22 is worth quoting to underscore the basic objection that members of the Official Opposition have raised to most of the sections of the bill. Certainly it applies to the sections covering the resource development industry. The editorial reads in part:

> In one way, Mr. Benson has a point. It really does not matter whether the MPs debate every clause of the bill. As delegates to the Canadian Tax Foundation conference sadly noted, the MPs are completely out of their depth in trying to debate or to understand the bill.
> After several months of intensive effort, the most expert of the tax experts are only slightly less baffled than they were at the beginning.
>
> The attitude of the Tax Foundation members . . .is one of fatalism and resignation. The tax changes are coming. Let them come. Somehow, we will muddle through.
> The immediate result will be something akin to chaos. As it stands, the bill is a no man's land of ambiguities, obfuscations, and ill-defined intentions, entirely surrounded by uncertainty. It is going to take months and years of working experience to find out how the new system actually works, and what inequities it embodies.

I do not want to be too specific with reference to the bill, but I do want to spend a few moments pointing out to the government that obviously it is not aware of what it is doing to certain important segments of Canada's resource industry in the reforms contemplated by the bill. As I have also already indicated, the protests by the parliamentary secretary with reference to the petroleum industry are indicative that he is in sympathy with this viewpoint.

I want to discuss the impact that the bill will have on the continuing development of the Canadian north. The Canadian north includes, in particular, the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories. It also includes the northern parts of the prairie provinces, of Ontario and Quebec, all of which form part of the Great Canadian Shield. The immediate effect of this bill will be to slow down the encouraging development that has been taking place in this whole area.

Even at this stage of anticipation when the shadow of implementation is hovering over the business community, when the threat of implementation becomes more real with each passing day, there is a hesitancy, and uncertainty in the market, all of which is reflected in the daily stock market reports. If the government proceeds to implement the bill in its present terms the impact on the north will be devastating. I make this point because the minister in charge of northern development has already revealed the thinking of the government on these matters through his action on Bill C-187 which was designed to bring about certain reforms, as he called them, in mineral development in the Yukon Territory.

The hon. member for Yukon, and other members on this side of the House who have been closely associated with northern development, took a strong stand against Bill C-187, with the result that the minister made a statement recently in the Yukon saying he will not be proceeding with the bill. He realizes he did not consult closely enough on it, and was not fully aware of the serious impact it would have on the development of minerals in the Yukon. Bill C-187 now lies in a state of limbo. In the light of the minister's comments, I imagine that it will remain there, or that if it re-appears it will be in greatly amended form along the lines recommended by spokesmen for the Official Opposition.

In this regard, I do not understand the attitude of members to my left concerning the impact that this bill will have on northern development. Recently the leader of the NDP said that the best solution for northern minerals was to freeze development and keep them in reserve. I have listened to the two spokesmen for that party who have spoken in this debate thus far, and while they did not go to quite that extent, the implication is that we should preserve, reserve and conserve non-renewable resources of the north for the benefit of future generations. Imagine what would happen if that were applied in the case of Thompson, Manitoba, which is represented by the former minister of highways of the province of Manitoba. Resource development by the International Nickel Company of Canada at Thompson has had a tremendous impact on the whole economy of Manitoba.

When I was minister of northern affairs, we used to have a slogan that I think is apropos at this juncture of our discussion. It went something like this, "Woe unto them who sit on their frozen assets." This is the policy that NDP spokesmen have been recommending this afternoon, and it is not only the NDP group who have made this statement. The government party has been what might be termed "Johnnies come lately" in the whole process of northern development. This can be illustrated by the reservations they had with respect to development of the Pine Point railway. This made possible the development of the lead-zinc mine at Pine Point and has largely been the basis of the great upsurge in resource development in the Great Slave lake area of the Northwest Territories. Yellowknife, the capital of the Northwest Territories, has become a modern metropolis through the impact of this one resource development. It would never have taken place had not the government of the hon. member for Prince Albert taken the risk which has always been typical of great development on the Canadian frontier, a risk taken over strong protestations of the then Liberal opposition, against the completion of the railway into the Pine Point community.

The same applies to oil exploration in the Canadian north. It was a small group of domestic minors—and I might add that is m-i-n-o-r-s as opposed to the foreign majors in the oil industry—who in 1960-61 gathered together sufficient capital to make it possible for Canadians to carry out the first oil exploration in the high Arctic at Winter Harbour on Melville Island in 1961. That was entirely a Canadian effort and is one of the great epics in Canadian resource and frontier development. This group was headed by Dome Petroleum under the leadership of Jack Gallagher, a Canadian active in the oil industry in Calgary who I am sure the parliamentary secretary knows intimately, and made possible by the vision and skill and pioneering spirit of another Calgarian, a comparatively young man named Peter Bawden who took in his drilling crew and drilled the initial well. I think the hon. parliamentary secretary will have good reason to become more familiar with Mr. Bawden as we move forward into the inevitable confrontation of democratic politics in the forthcoming election.

Nothing should be done to discourage this type of initiative, Mr. Chairman, and this is precisely the point made by the hon. member for the Yukon. He wants incentives for Canadian participation in resource development to be expanded so that by getting more Canadians involved in the process we can repatriate ownership of our resource industry by positive means rather than the negative means of a screening process or some such measure. It was because the Canadian government of 1957-63 introduced regulations which gave some preference to Canadian exploration companies in operations in the high Arctic that we got that first pioneering oil venture. It was a very simple process. If a discovery was made the regulations ensured that Canadians had a chance to participate and to manage the enterprise.

Mr. Chairman, the parliamentary secretary is thoroughly conversant with these matters and is just as concerned as hon. members on this side of the House about their harmful effect on resource development in Canada, so why does he not take the necessary initiative and amend the act? We have had hundreds of amendments already. The tax reform bill could be amended in such a way that it would encourage rather than discourage Canadian participation in the development of our northern resources in particular but our resources in all parts of Canada.

The hon. member for Galt went to great pains to point out that he was not speaking against the best interests of the western provinces—

Mr. Orlikow: He was not?

Mr. Dinsdale: —with reference to the policy that he was enunciating. As I listened I was persuaded that Shakespeare had some relevancy here—"Thou dost protest too much"—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He is the member for Waterloo.

Mr. Dinsdale: Waterloo—that is very appropriate. He was protesting too much because he went on to enunciate precisely the thesis he was repudiating.

Mr. Gilbert: You did not understand.

Mr. Dinsdale: I hope the hon. member for Broadview will listen carefully, because obviously he does not understand either. He was enunciating the thesis that the so-called underdeveloped parts of Canada, the parts that are underpopulated and lack political impact in Ottawa because of that very fact, are being governed through Ottawa as if they were a colony of Ontario or Quebec. This is exactly the thesis propounded by the hon. member for Waterloo this afternoon. He even quoted that great American defender of the consumer, Ralph Nader. I am surprised that someone from his party would quote an American source because of their attitude toward our friends to the south, but Mr. Nader was quoted by the hon. member for Waterloo as saying—

Mr. Nielsen: Capital is from Waterloo.

Mr. Dinsdale: —that Canada must not become the extractive colony of the United States. I would paraphrase that statement and say that the west and the north must not become extractive colonies of Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. Barnett: That is what we are now. That is the problem. That is what we are trying to get away from.

Mr. Dinsdale: That is the thesis that my friend from Waterloo was supporting. He also made a great deal of the fact that we are exporting most of our resources to the United States. I should like to point out to him that recently Japan has become a great market for the minerals of the Yukon territory. Were it not for the opening of this market in the early part of the sixties there would be no new Imperial Mine operating just outside Whitehorse, nor would there be the Anvil Mine which has been of great benefit to the Yukon Territory and has given employment to the Indian population by bringing the mineral from the mine to the railhead and trans-shipping it across to the open port and on to Japan.

The Chairman: I regret to interrupt the hon. member. I must do so to advise him and the committee that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Chairman: The hon. member may carry on if there is unanimous consent of the committee. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Dinsdale: Thank you for your courtesy, Mr. Chairman. I shall be very brief because I was just coming to a conclusion. We are concerned about what will happen to the Canadian resource industry when these resources have become exhausted. By the same token, Mr. Chairman—and the hon. member for Waterloo made much about this point—we are part of a world economy and of a world market. We must consider our international responsibilities. What will happen to Japan and its teeming millions if these resources are not available to the people of Japan? The hon. member was contradictory in his argument in that sense, in one breath preaching international brotherhood and in the other supporting the thesis that we must sit on our frozen resources until such time as we can use them for the maximum benefit of Canada exclusively.

• (5:00 p.m.)

Mr. Nielsen: Frozen assets?

Mr. Dinsdale: I mentioned frozen resources. I have already made that point.

An hon. Member: Is that the Salvation Army position? Shame.

Mr. Dinsdale: I think that is a very good position for someone in that category to espouse; namely, that we should take seriously our responsibilities for brotherhood internationally as well as domestically.

Mr. Gilbert: Who said anything about frozen assets?

Mr. Nielsen: At least the hon. member was not being hypocritical.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, I say, now that these interjections have concluded, that I will leave this in the hands of the parliamentary secretary. He is fully conversant with the subject. I trust he will take the necessary action to bring about equity and fair treatment for all parts of Canada, and that not only the central part of Canada will be so treated.

The Chairman: Order, please. Before recognizing the hon. member for Winnipeg North it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the Committee that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—Pensions—Old age security—Inquiry as to increase and lowering of eligible age; the hon. member for St. John's East—Regional Economic Expansion—Re-evaluation of policies in light of criticisms; the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway—Health—Family planning conference—Request for publicity campaign because of increase in illegitimate births.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, this afternoon we heard a number of speeches by hon. members of the official opposition. The hon. member for Yukon spoke, as did the hon. member for Brandon-Souris. They were critical of the government's income tax bill, arguing that it will reduce or eliminate incentives which have been given in the past to the mining, oil and gas industries and that this will lead to a cutback in the development of those industries with consequent, deleterious effects for this country. The proposals in this tax reform bill affecting the mining, oil and gas industries do not in any real way do what members of the Official Opposition have charged. Actually, if there is one thing that is obvious, it is that these proposals continue the special tax concessions which in the last 25 years have been available to the mining and petroleum industries. These concessions were unjustified because the industries in question are, for the most part, foreign owned and capital intensive. They make use of a relatively small amount of labour. By asking for further concessions for these industries the Conservative party, in my mind, is betraying the real interests of the Canadian people. It seemed to me that the Conservative opposition wanted the government to make further concessions in this area. It has proposed that present concessions be continued.

The hon. member for Brandon-Souris chided my colleague, the hon. member for Waterloo. Although the hon. member for Waterloo had said that he did not want to see any conflict between our provinces, between the west and the east, his position, according to the hon. member for Brandon-Souris, was essential pro-Ontario, a position which is inimical to the western provinces. I say to the hon. member for Brandon-Souris that, in adopting our position, we do so in the full knowledge of what we are doing. We are adopting the same position which the NDP government of Manitoba has adopted since being elected. Let me put on record, for the benefit of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris, what the Minister of Finance of the province of Manitoba said in his budget speech on April 30, 1970. Talking about the white paper which this government had produced on tax reform, the white paper which, in a watered down version, is being implemented in the tax proposals before this committee, that Minister of Finance said:

Our main objection is that—contrary to the Carter Commission recommendations—the federal proposals are more concerned to tax according to how money is earned rather than according to how much. This is contrary to "ability to pay" as a basis for taxation—

The proposals do not meaningfully redistribute income beyond the present structure. The biggest saving for a low-income person—$127 for a married man with two children and $4,000 a year. But if you were to earn over $50,000—there are actually provisions for reduction in tax. At $100,000 the reduction is $5,423—

Then the minister went on to say this about depletion allowances:

Depletion allowances and other resource industry incentives, etc., are still going to operate—these may well be wrong in principle—whatever the basis for computing them.

Then, he went on to say:

we—

Meaning the government of Manitoba,

—support the objective of making resource development in Canada more responsive to the particular needs of Canadian communities and citizens. This is not a passing comment. We seek tax proposals aimed to achieve greater responsibility to the community for enterprise deriving its main profits from the resources which belong to the people. The first major resource taxation concept to be questioned is that involved in depletion allowances. Why, for example, should only the private investor be compensated for depletion of resources and not the people and communities to whom the resources belong? Far greater concern should be given to the workers and communities who come to depend on the resource industries for their opportunities. It is they who will be the real losers through the depletion of natural resources. If firms continue to receive depletion allowances in any form, it is essential that such compensation be shared with workers and dependent communities.

I ask the hon. member for Brandon-Souris to remember who took the losses when the uranium mines at Elliot Lake closed down because there was no longer a market for uranium. It was not the companies, which had earlier written off their investment. It was the workers who purchased homes at Elliot Lake. It was the government of Canada which, through Central Mortgage and Housing, had invested money in homes and it was the provincial government of Ontario which had built schools, roads and provided all the other services. The industry got off scot-free; the people paid through the nose. That is what the hon. member for Brandon-Souris wants to continue and to extend.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Orlikow: We are not alone in our position on this matter. Before the present Minister of Finance ever became a cabinet minister he made some useful and interesting speeches in the House. I wish he would take part of an evening off to read some of the speeches he made while he was still a leading member of the opposition. I am talking about 1962, the year of which this afternoon's question period reminded me. It had that kind of spirit. I wish to quote two paragraphs from a speech which the present Minister of Finance made on November 9, 1962. He dealt with the policy of the then Conservative government as it affected the oil and gas companies. He said:

• (5:10 p.m.)

I can think of no other industry (oil and gas) in Canada in this favourable position.

I would think the next thing to consider is, who is going to benefit from these tax concessions contained in resolutions 6 to 10? Foreign control and ownership of this industry has been increasing and this legislation, I submit, will do nothing to discourage foreign ownership and encourage Canadian ownership.

An hon. Member: He was right.

Mr. Orlikow: In the same speech, he said:

We must, Mr. Chairman, find ways—and the next Liberal government will find ways—of returning the control of our natural wealth to Canadians while, at the same time, assuring foreign investors that they will be fairly treated by our government.

That speech could have been made by the hon. member for Waterloo. In fact, it has been made by him. The only difference is that when the present Minister of Finance moved from this side of the chamber to the other, he forgot everything he said before he became a member of the government. He immediately proceeded to continue the policies which had been implemented, not by the Conservative government which he helped to replace, but by former Liberal governments in 1947, 1948 and 1949.

To show that the position we are taking is not based purely on political partisanship, I wish to quote briefly from a couple of editorials which appeared in a newspaper which is not far removed from the Liberal party and its policies. This editorial, entitled "Oil men don't need tax gifts from Canada", appeared in the March 1, 1967 edition of the Toronto Star. I quote:

The commission—

That is the Carter commission.

—proposes to take away two cosy privileges enjoyed by these industries at the expense of the ordinary taxpayer—depletion allowances and the three-year tax exemption for new mines.—

The three-year tax exemption applies also to mines. A mining company enjoys an exemption for the first three years on income earned from a mine newly brought into production.—

The special favors enjoyed by the two industries are extremely expensive. In 1964, it is estimated, they cost the federal treasury more than $150 million. This is about the equivalent of the government's combined spending in 1965-66 on the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation, and grants to universities.

Does this government propose to change that situation through this legislation? Not really. They changed the format of the concessions, but the concessions remain essentially the same.

I wish to quote from an editorial which appeared in the December 11, 1967, edition of the Toronto Star. It is entitled "Mines should pay fair tax share". I quote:

How can Finance Minister Mitchell Sharp justify his decision to dig new tax revenue out of the ordinary wage earner while continuing to provide special tax privileges to big business—notably the mining industry?

The Carter Royal Commission on Taxation found that mining, along with the insurance and petroleum industries, was a potentially rich source of tax revenue that had long been enjoying unnecessary exemptions.—

The Carter Commission considered these exemptions unjustifiable. It recommended that the depletion allowances be eliminated immediately, and that the other privileges be phased out over a period of five years.

That seems to be squarely in line with what the Minister of Finance said in 1962 before he became the Minister of Finance. However, we have had no action by the government. Without a doubt, the most important speech made on taxation in recent years, and I believe in giving credit where credit is due, was the speech made by the hon. member for Duvernay. This is the speech which led to his resignation. He did not just put on the record a theoretical argument. This is the same argument I am trying to make, but he did it much better than I.

Mr. Mahoney: Why don't you just file it at this time instead of reading it again?

Mr. Orlikow: I suppose the reason the parliamentary secretary makes that stupid interjection whenever I quote from this speech is that he is embarrassed. When I make this kind of speech, I can be written off as a radical, a socialist and a person who never had to meet a payroll. All those things are true. However, when the hon. member for Duvernay makes that speech, he speaks as a professor of economics, a very successful businessman, the former president of the Montreal Stock Exchange, a former and one of the most effective ministers of revenue that any government in the province of Quebec ever had. The only difficulties the hon. member for Duvernay ever had were those which followed the terrible mistake he made when he decided to enter federal politics as a Liberal. From that time until he quit the cabinet, he made mistakes. The reason the parliamentary secretary always makes that idiotic interjection when I quote from this speech is that it embarrasses him. He knows that a lot of people who are still afraid and still worry about the New Democratic Party, will pay attention to an argument put forward by a man with the stature of the hon. member for Duvernay.

I remind the parliamentary secretary that when the member for Duvernay made that speech to the 300 academic, government, business and labour economists attending the meeting of the Canadian Economics Association, he was greeted with a standing ovation which the newspaper people who reported the proceedings said had never happened in the history of that organization. It may be that the hon. member for Duvernay was wrong, and that his argument could be shot full of holes. If this is so, I would like someone who knows a little more about economics than the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, and that is not very difficult, to reply to that speech. I am sure the Canadian Economics Association would be more than happy to invite the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance to their next annual meeting. While they may not be economists, they can get the assistance of the best economic advisors in Canada. They can get some help in writing their speeches.

I am sure the Canadian Economics Association would be happy to have one of those exalted gentlemen appear before them and rebut the speech made by the hon. member for Duvernay. That has not been done here or anywhere else in this country. The reason is that essentially the government has no answer. The best defence then is silence, except, of course, for the stupid interjections by the parliamentary secretary. The tables produced by the hon. member for Duvernay in his speech were taken from government reports. If they are wrong, I am sure the officials will quickly pass a note to the hon. member for Calgary South telling him they are incorrect. They go to the heart of the question we are discussing today.

• (5:20 p.m.)

In his speech, the hon. member for Duvernay used the table which is entitled "A Comparison of Book Profit Before Taxes and Taxable Income by Selected Industries". It covers the years 1965 to 1968, the latter being the last year for which figures are available. The table is arranged in three columns showing, respectively, the type of industry concerned, the taxable income received by that industry and the percentage of profits which were really taxed. For example, the retail trade earned book profits of $1,620 million. Its taxable income was $1,445 million. It paid tax, therefore, on 90 per cent of its profits. The wholesale trade earned profits of $2,066 million Taxable income amounted to $1,802 million. It paid taxes on 87 per cent of its taxable income. The construction industry earned book profits of $993 million, on $643 million of which it paid taxes, that is to say, on 65 per cent. The manufacturing industry showed profits of $12,745 million and paid taxes on $8,052 million; in other words, on 63 per cent of its profits.

Now, let us consider the industries we are discussing today. The metal mining industry showed profits of $1,707 million. Its taxable income was $222 million. In other words, it paid taxes on 13 per cent of its profits.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Orlikow: The mineral fuel industry showed book profits of $795 million and paid taxes on $45 million, or 5.7 per cent of its book profits. Other mining enterprises showed profits of $374 million and paid taxes on $120 million, that is, at a rate of 32 per cent.

Members of the official opposition have been telling us this afternoon that these industries should continue to receive the concessions they have so far enjoyed. Indeed, they argue they should be given even greater concessions. Mr. Chairman, I do not care whether the government of Canada or the government of any of the provinces is a Liberal government or a Conservative government or a Social Credit government or an NDP government, it would still be obliged to collect taxes to meet the cost of the services it provides to its citizens. This is a simple matter. If one industry or another does not pay its fair share of the taxes, then other industries will be called upon to pay more than their fair share. When the hon. member for Yukon says we should continue to make concessions provided to the metal mines, which pay tax on only 13 per cent of their profits, or to the mineral fuels industry which pays tax on only 5.7 per cent of its profits, he is telling us, in effect, that the taxes which the construction industry, the manufacturing industry and the retail trade must pay ought to be increased, or that the personal income tax of those who live in Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, Vancouver, and, indeed, the Yukon, must be increased to pay the taxes which those industries were permitted to escape paying. This may suit the hon. member for Yukon, Mr. Chairman, but it does not suit the members of the New Democratic Party. What he is suggesting is that we continue a system of taxing the poor to benefit the rich. He is advocating socialism for the rich, capitalism for the poor. That certainly does not suit me or members of my party.

I wish there were time in which to continue to put on record in detail the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Duvernay in his speech. I shall end by stressing once again the major points he raised. We can adopt a system of taxation which is mutual, which treats all industry equally, which collects the same rate of tax from every business, allows the same concession and opportunities to write off depreciation and other expenses or we can establish a system which, because we wish to achieve certain objectives, favours one type of industry as against another. The point which the hon. member made so effectively was that in a country such as Canada, where the rate of unemployment is the highest in the western world, a country where unemployment has run at a seasonally adjusted rate of more than 6 per cent in every month for the last 17 months, we should surely be encouraging those industries which employ people.

Mr. Gilbert: Incentives.

Mr. Orlikow: Precisely. Incentives for industries which employ people. And those are the manufacturing industries.

Mr. Nielsen: What about the ripple effect?

The Chairman: Order. I must interrupt the hon. member to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Rose: Continue.

The Chairman: The hon. member may continue if there is unanimous consent.

There is no such consent.

Mr. Nielsen: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I did not hear any hon. member say no. It has been the practice during this debate to permit members to continue speaking if they wish to do so.

An hon. Member: I thought it was one of his own hon. friends.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Yukon has raised a point of order. The Chair asked whether there was unanimous consent. With respect, it is not for the hon. member to hear. It is for the Chair to hear and I can tell the hon. member I heard the word "No" quite distinctly. Thus, under the rules, I cannot permit the hon. member to continue.

• (5:30 p.m.)

Mr. Peddle: Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact I am following the hon. member I want to make it clear that I did not say "No." I will have difficulty using up my allotted time.

I agree with the editorial referred to by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris. Very few Members of Parliament are really qualified to discuss this tax measure. Most hon. members are out of their depth when they attempt to discuss this 5½-pound bill. I doubt if any other country in the civilized world has ever put forward a measure which weighs so much or was so complicated. I want to deal with it very superficially; I am not going into detail because I feel if I did so I would not know what I was talking about, as suggested in the editorial. The parliamentary secretary must be given credit for doing an excellent job. At least he pretends he knows what is going on and looks as if he knows. There is an award given in Hollywood for which I have no doubt the hon. member will be nominated next year. I believe it is called the Emmy award.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

For all practical purposes the majority of mining activity in the province of Newfoundland is located in my constituency of Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador. I use the federal name rather than the federal-provincial nomenclature. I refer to it as Newfoundland rather than the province of Newfoundland and Labrador. Federally it is the province of Newfoundland, which includes Labrador. We have in my riding the iron ore operations at Buchans which has been going on for several decades, providing a decent living for several thousand people. Close by we have the mining operation at Gullbridge, the mining operation in the Green Bay area, the tremendous Iron Ore Company of Canada operation and Wabush Mines in Labrador west.

The Iron Ore Company of Canada is going ahead with a big development. Present expansion plans at Labrador city, which is the location of the Iron Ore Company's operations, will double the present capacity of about 15 million tons. This will amount to 16 million tons of pellets, 10 million tons of concentrates and 5 million tons of raw ore.

Three or four miles away we have Wabush Mines Limited. In February of this year the company put the damper on an expansion plan amounting to some $140 million because of, to quote Mr. Griffith, chairman of Stelco, the unfavourable tax climate and other things. It seems to me very strange that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has embarked on a program of pouring millions of dollars into various industries, some of which in my opinion are so harebrained that they do not have a chance in the world of succeeding.

The government has put up 20 per cent or 30 per cent of the capital cost of some of these ventures in the hope they will provide jobs at a cost of $1,000, $2,000, $3,000, $4,000 or $5,000 each. On the other hand, we have a situation like Wabush Mines where the company has poured hundreds of millions of dollars into the operation and is now contemplating a big expansion but cannot go ahead with it because of the general tax climate. When this postponement became public knowledge the Minister of Finance very glibly said the company had not come to him for assistance. He said if they did so, he would be glad to talk to them but they had not made representations so we would have to wait.

I do not think that is good enough. The Iron Ore Company of Canada is operating largely with United States capital, and a good deal of the capital of Wabush Mines is U.S., but I cannot go along with this attitude of the government. I cannot go along with the idea that we can afford the luxury of telling the United States, Germany, France or other countries that we are masters of our own destiny and do not want their money. I feel so strongly about it that I would call this attitude irresponsible. Every time I hear this suggestion it reminds me of the story about the flea crawling up the elephant's back, intent on rape.

Mr. Baldwin: You mean the mouse.

Mr. Peddle: Perhaps it was a mouse, but with a flea it would be more dramatic and even more difficult. Seriously, I cannot go along with that suggestion because I have seen the conditions which exist in certain parts of the country. While Ontario may have reached its apex, along with parts of the west, in Newfoundland we have not reached the luxurious position of being able to turn down capital or take it only on our own terms. I think it was the president of Industrial Acceptance who said some months ago that a dollar knows no nationality or, if you want, a buck is a buck. I find it hard to sit quietly and listen to these suggestions of irresponsible people who think we can control our own destiny.

I wonder how much foreign investment these people have already discouraged as a result of such irresponsible remarks. How many firms, groups and consortiums have wanted to invest in Canada but because of this kind of talk and fears as to the crazy laws this crazy government might pass have not taken a chance? This can be compared to the situation which still exists in Quebec because of the threat of separation. This threat has discouraged all kinds of investment in that province; no one there will deny that. Such idle, irresponsible talk has created this problem in Quebec.

The Department of Regional Economic Expansion has had to use funds designed for less affluent areas of the country to entice back to Quebec some of the industries the province has lost. They have used these funds throughout the province, but also in the city of Montreal. This is a very serious situation. I cannot buy the suggestion that this country of 20 million people does not want U.S. or other foreign investment.

At this point I am speaking specifically about the area of Labrador, in the province of Newfoundland, and my riding of Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador. Here we have an area of some 110,000 square miles. Common sense tells us that Labrador City, Wabush and other areas were developed because of United States investment in projects such as the air force base which we are thankful is in our province.

Then there is a swing of people along the coast of Labrador who live in semi-primitive conditions. When I go into this area I see the difference between the conditions on the coast of Labrador and those in the ultra-modern towns of Wabush and Labrador City, where they have every amenity apart from a road to get out. They have a good airline, golf courses, curling rinks and decent, well heated homes.

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): And good bars.

Mr. Peddle: And good bars, if you like. I do not care where the investment comes from. People in Ontario, part of the west and parts of Quebec may say they do not want any foreign investment, but I can say from experience that we want this investment and we do not give a damn where it comes from. A buck is a buck. We have a huge territory in Labrador. As I have said, I cannot go into the specifics of this bill because I would not know what I was talking about. However, with this huge territory and its riches in ores, common sense indicates that this government owes it to the people of Canada and to people of our province to provide every possible incentive to see that the territory is developed and not discouraged.

As I mentioned earlier, there is the example of Wabush Mines which abandoned its development plans involving some $140 million, which would have meant so much to the area. They were hung up on the government's indecision and on the threat of this terrible white paper. The parliamentary secretary is yawning.

Mr. Mahoney: Believe me, it is cumulative.

Mr. Peddle: I can appreciate that. The problem as I and the majority of people of Canada see it is that this has been a government of confrontation. It seems the government has wanted to confront everybody with a white paper which staggers them so that they do not know whether they are coming or going. There would seem to be an attitude of hit the Catholics, hit the Protestants, hit the French, hit the English and everybody with the threat of the white paper.

Mr. Mahoney: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member care to clarify his "hit the Catholics, hit the Protestants" statement?

Mr. Peddle: I do not think the parliamentary secretary should be so sensitive. It is a figure of speech. I could have said hit the Russians and every other organized group with a white paper that would stun them. I say this is a cowardly way to govern, and the parliamentary secretary knows this. A government that is elected by the people should have the intestinal fortitude to govern without trying to cover every track they make politically. The government should be prepared to introduce tax changes which would encourage investment. It should do this on its own initiative and not after meetings with labour and businessmen of the country, and other types of cowardly actions.

Cowardice is what this is, and the signs are that the Canadian people are catching on to this. I think the parliamentary secretary knows this, despite my belief that he is doing a good job of bearing up under the pressure of this debate, although I doubt whether he knows very much more about the tax bill than I do.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I concur with the last remarks of my hon. friend. Never did one poor, lone parliamentary secretary do such a reasonable job with so little to work on. I think he should be congratulated for that, especially when he has to push back-benchers to one side as they raise unruly heads of revolt against this bill. I think the parliamentary secretary is not doing a bad job under the circumstances.

I have a particular interest in this issue. I agree with what has been said on this side of the House, with a sharp distinction between my colleagues and any hon. friends to the left, including the hon. member for Winnipeg North when he spoke about poverty on one hand and wealth and industry on the other. Of course, that is the result of a mixed economy. We have a mixed economy, part of which is represented by individual incentive. Obviously, the part which is poverty stricken is that which is represented by the socialist aspect of the economy.

This is borne out by the fact that when we were dealing in this House a number of years ago with the question of developing the mining areas of the north and were seeking a policy, members of the government party—who were then members of the Official Opposition—strengthened by members of the New Democratic Party struggled desperately against the attempt by the government to successfully develop these mining areas. When we attempted to bring wealth into the north it was the Liberal Party, aided by their kissing cousins, the New Democratic Party, which did all it could to stop the construction of the Pine Point railway which led not only to the development of the mining area but to incidental progress.

This is the point I want to make. I went into the north country well over 42 years ago. After seeing what the government is doing here, I sometimes think I should have stayed there. In any event, we knew there were resources. We talk about gas and oil. In 1920, 1921 and 1922 an attempt was made, using the tax laws as they then were, to develop the oil and gas resources which were within 40 or 50 miles of the town of Peace River. A few years before I arrived there a program had been launched by Imperial Oil and other local companies. There was no interest and no possibility of securing from eastern Canada the kind of capital that was required at that time. There was some local capital and know-how but it was completely inadequate because the people who had the capital in the central part of Canada said they would have nothing to do with the program. This stands as mute testimony of the abortive attempt to develop 50 years ago the gas and oil resources of that area—wells which had been capped and wells which had been running in tar for some time.

Going up and down the river, as I did for many years, travelling 300 or 400 miles into the north, I saw evidence that there must be an attractive policy with regard to our tax laws in order to maintain the steady flow of capital required to promote these resources. If we had waited for the Liberal government and the money which they were able to mobilize, nothing would have happened in the development of the mineral, gas and oil resources of northern Canada.

Not only what happens there, but the incidental effects are important. I spoke about the Pine Point mine which was opened up under a very acceptable agreement reached between the government of the right hon. member for Prince Albert, the mining companies, the railroads and other people who were interested in developing the north and seeking out resources. People were prepared, when they saw evidence that a suitable climate was to be provided by the government under the tax laws and the agreements which were entered into—transportation agreements and those involving the construction of the railroad—to undertake this development.

This brings me to what the hon. member for Duvernay said, namely, let us cut out all expenditures for the development of our natural resources and concentrate on manufacturing and on what he calls the labour-intensive industries. I do not dismiss this, but I say to members of the committee that we no longer have the labour-intensive industries which we had some years ago. If this country is to remain competitive with regard to its manufacturing and industrial resources, it must do so on the basis of automation, economy through scientific improvement and the means we use to develop our manufacturing industries.

One need only examine the statistics of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion to note the millions of dollars which have been spent. I will not go into the question of where they were spent—I would not be allowed to do so even if I wanted to—but it obviously takes a tremendous amount of money today compared with 20 or 30 years ago to develop jobs in the manufacturing industry, which apparently the hon. member for Duvernay is contemplating. That situation no longer applies. When you develop a natural resource such as gas, oil or minerals, there are incidental and ancillary effects which have a great impact upon our economy.

There is a farm just across the river from the town of Peace River. There is a hill there. When I first went to that country over 40 years ago I could stand on top of this hill, and look down and see no development. Just a few years before I arrived there, people were crossing the river by ferry. There was no highway to Edmonton. There was a railroad but only one train a week. There was no means of transportation to go north except boat to Hudson Bay. There were boats which went north during the brief navigation period in the summer. But after the benevolent policies of the Conservative government of the right hon. member for Prince Albert—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: —with the tax benefits which were available and the first-class agreements which were entered into—the hon. member for Brandon-Souris was then minister of northern affairs and did a great deal of work in this connection—immediately we saw not only the development of the mine at Pine Point but other incidental growth. Logging camps were established, mills developed, highways were built, bridges were built. Today I can go to the same hill, look down, and six miles away I see a modern airport at which jets can land. Because of the development of the gas and oil industry in the north, more planes are landing and taking off than at any other comparable place on the North American continent.

I see bridges built and highways going north. I see highways travelling into the north, and I see a railroad. From this hill I see where the railroad branches off and trains go into the Northwest Territories. These are things which lead to growth and to the employment of people as well as to the development of the great northern parts of our country.

I can hear the parliamentary secretary sighing. He may have heard all this before but it is about time someone on that side of the House listened and believed, because are the things which lead to the development and growth of the north, which is required—not the stultifying, limited sort of development-arising from the tax proposals which this bill envisages with relation to the gas and oil industry; not the kind of policies which this government envisages with regard to the development and flow of capital into this country.

I say to you, Mr. Chairman, and to members of the committee that there is no one simple, magic formula which effectively deals with this problem. It needs a continuing influx of capital under conditions which must be acceptable to the people of Canada. It needs tax laws and a tax climate which will persuade people to invest in development. Too often in our tax laws we punish the worthy, those whose efforts lead to growth, and we reward unduly the unworthy. These are matters which we must consider if we are to have tax laws and a tax climate which will lead to the development of the country, in particular that part of the country which I know well.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair, to resume the same at 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Chairman: Shall section 21 carry?

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I think I should put on record that the proposals affecting resource industries as they appear in Bill C-259 are substantially similar to those outlined in the white paper and as modified by the letter sent by the Minister of Finance on August 26, 1970, to the provincial ministers of finance.

The bill does go somewhat further in that it provides for the deduction of foreign exploration and development expenditures on a limited basis, an expanded qualification of mining assets eligible for a tax write-off and an extension of the 25 per cent depreciation allowance until 1976. Although these modifications of the white paper proposals may not appear to be very significant, they should be considered in light of the over-all fundamental changes proposed for the treatment of corporations and shareholders generally. As in the case of international taxation, the bill relies heavily on regulations which cannot be issued formally until the bill is enacted.

One of the great criticisms with respect to the resource industry is that most of the tax law governing it is imposed by regulation. In Parliament we have enacted statutes with provisions for the establishment of regulations. Parliament gives a wide ranging stamp of approval to certain principles and then cabinet writes the regulations. Therefore, so far as this debate is concerned it is difficult to determine what the law will be affecting resource industries because most of it is unwritten law and unwritten law is the most dangerous because such law can be changed at any time without Parliament's approval or knowledge.

Having said that I would like to point out that resource industries mean a lot to western Canada. The expansion of those industries, whether they be petroleum, coal or other mines, depends on the system of taxation governing them. By way of introduction, it is rather interesting to look at some of the history of the philosophy that prevails in western Canada. The Calgary Herald is the main newspaper in Calgary. It has the biggest circulation, along with the The Albertan.

Mr. Nielsen: It is the organ of truth.

Mr. Woolliams: That may well be so. It had this to say in 1867, and it is as true today as it was then:

The fisheries are a valuable property.

Then it went on to deal with trade with the United States, as follows:

Anything consistent with reason we are willing to grant to our neighbours; but it is rather hard to threaten to cut us off from the American continent simply because we are not prepared to yield them equal rights in a source of wealth which, on their own admission, belongs exclusively to us.

That may be too narrow a regional position, but it seems to me as I listen to debates in this House that we in Parliament are divided not so much by parties as by regions. I think that is quite true. If you listen to somebody from western Canada, they speak as a westerner and about the resources they have. The following appears at page 98:

• (8:10 p.m.)

In 1896 the Calgary Herald noted with approval that a candidate had said "let a man be either a Liberal or a Conservative, he must be a northwest man first"—

They use the term "northwest" when they mean a westerner.

—"and for party afterwards." . . . "Country before party."

This country is still divided basically by regions rather than political parties. We must have an amalgamation of interests across the board and such union creates political parties. Those interests, representing various regions, form the national purpose which makes this Parliament function.

As I said earlier, the health and growth of the economy of western Canada depends on the tax picture. The first anomaly that I notice in all the rules and regulations that have been and will be laid down is that some people think we can cut off foreign investment, that we can have a screening system. I have here a copy of the Herbert Gray report, whether legitimate or illegitimate—though nobody denied it during the question period.

Mr. Nielsen: It is a bastard.

Mr. Woolliams: The selective approach of this screening process determines how control of investment will be exercised—where it is going, to whom it is going, how it is going and when it is going to be made. A screening method, of course, is totally inadequate and irresponsible as far as western Canada is concerned.

The decision made a few days ago by the National Energy Board of Canada with reference to the export of natural gas to the United States has to be mentioned in this debate. It is rather interesting to read what the president of an oil company had to say on this matter. I know some who look with scepticism at presidents of oil companies—

An hon. Member: Right.

Mr. Woolliams: You say "Right", but I do not want to get into an argument with you. I do not look with scepticism at any organization, whether union or corporate. As I have said before, corporations are healthy, and when they operate in a tax climate that gives them help we can have some degree of full development and full employment. That should be the aim. The president of Imperial Oil Limited, Mr. J. A. Armstrong, is quoted in an article in the Winnipeg Free Press of Tuesday, November 23, 1971, as follows:

—warned Monday of serious political and economic effects if Canadians submit to the "myth" that Canada's oil and natural gas should not be exported to the United States, but preserved for domestic use.

J. A. Armstrong called the revenue effects of a decision not to export "disastrous". He plegged the immediate revenue loss at over $1¼ billion a year and said it would hit both the Canadian petroleum industry and the governments which are the royalty owners.

Naturally, in the west we are interested in royalties. When Mr. Douglas, the former leader of the NDP, was Premier of Saskatchewan he realized then, as Premier Schreyer realizes now, that foreign capital is needed for the development of resources and for full employment. Mr. Douglas said that, and Mr. Schreyer made it very clear on television the other night. But I do not want to digress, Mr. Chairman. The article continues:

The political effects would arise from a reminder that the United States supplied Canada with petroleum until the mid-fifties and on an emergency basis after the closure of the Suez Canal.

The worst consequence of a decision not to export Canadian resources would be the effect on investment spending. Mr. Armstrong said. "The investment spending by private industry would dry up completely and there is no conceivable set of conditions or incentives that government could provide that would prevent this from happening."

Mr. Armstrong said that Canada has two options—to develop or to stagnate its petroleum industry. He called a decision to sit back and refuse to export resources and concentrate on production for the domestic market a vote for stagnation.

"With the world's largest growing market for petroleum energy at our doorstep and with the great potential for crude and natural gas development in the frontiers, it would be a catastrophe if Canada does not capitalize on this unique opportunity not only to strengthen its economy but to assure itself of a plentiful and secure supply of oil and gas in a very uncertain world," he said.

The National Energy Board Friday turned down applications to export some 2.66 trillion cubic feet of natural gas to the United States.

I pause there, Mr. Chairman. Prior to these applications coming before the National Energy Board they were examined by the Alberta Conservation Board. The decision of the National Energy Board questions whether we have enough natural gas to meet Canada's domestic and industrial needs forseeable for the future. In the Borden report our proven reserves were estimated at 23 trillion cubic feet. According to the National Energy Board we do not have that kind of reserve, and if this is so then the way to get the reserve is through development. The way to encourage development is by an attractive tax climate. The reserves are there in the ground.

That leads me to a few more quotations from the remarks of the president of Imperial Oil. Commenting on the board's decision, Mr. Armstrong said:

—there is a difference of opinion in Canada as to the surplus of natural gas in the immediate future.

I agree with the Prime Minister on a point of law. If the National Energy Board makes an affirmative decision, the cabinet can approve or negate it. That is sound law, and in that regard the Prime Minister stands on all fours with the National Energy Board Act. However, if the decision is negative, the cabinet may not be able to change it. The only recourse is appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada under section 18 of the National Energy Board Act on a question of law or a question of jurisdiction, which does not help us in this field.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

At the moment we are debating the tax bill, whether we are going to get development and what kind of tax climate we will have in light of the fact that the National Energy Board turned down applications to export natural gas worth $1½ billion each year. That is half a billion dollars more than the new budget for the whole of Canada.

Having, in my opinion, quoted the law correctly the Prime Minister should now take two decisions. First, the government should ask the National Energy Board to review its decision. In the event that the board maintains its decision, the government should review the tax climate of this nation, because it is stagnating development in our country and that is why we have unemployment to the degree that now exists. I want to be very positive and that is why I make these suggestions.

Second, since the act does not permit the cabinet to review decisions which negative or turn down applications, I hope the government will bring the members of that board before the Standing Committee on Energy, Mines and Resources so that parliamentarians may examine them. Their decision came as a shock to western Canada and should be shocking to all Canadians. We want to determine on what basis they estimated reserves and if they think that, given the tax climate which is being discussed in this debate, reserves will increase.

I hope the members of the board will be called before the committee. I should like the privilege of cross-examining the chairman of the board and its members. If anyone says that would be an unusual procedure, I say hogwash. On previous occasions when the standing committee has asked for it, those gentlemen have appeared before the committee. I have often recommended in committee and to the government that the staff of the board be increased to a level that is commensurate with the board's responsibilities under the National Energy Board Act.

In light of the tax climate being created today and the resulting uncertainty, I recommend, first, that the government ask the National Energy Board to review its decision. It should bear in mind the revenue that can be generated in Canada as a result of developments within the industry. I am speaking of benefits which will come from tertiary industries and from exports.

I recommend, second, that the gentlemen of the board be called before the standing committee so the committee may examine them and find out exactly why they decided to veto the decision of the Conservation Board of Alberta. When we have heard the evidence we can say whether that decision should stand or fall. To me, coming from western Canada, the board's decision is shocking. The royalties from this industry which flow to provincial governments of western Canada, and the revenues that indirectly flow into the coffers of the federal government, are substantial. Therefore, when legislating new tax laws we must be very careful.

I now continue quoting what Mr. Armstrong is reported to have said, according to the Winnipeg Free Press:

"The United States only takes our reserves for security because we're close. One or two more tankers from the Persian Gulf to the U.S. market and we're out," he answered.

By 1980, he estimated that Canada would be supplying about 4 to 5 per cent of U.S. demand for oil and gas.

We went to bed, so to speak with one-eighth of the world's supply of coal in Alberta. All the arguments that my friends to the left raised in this debate were raised years ago. They sound wonderful on the hustings, but they are no good for employment. They are beautiful for winning votes, but no good for the economy of the country or the economic well-being of the average man. We went to bed in the twenties and the thirties with our coal; and who in Alberta or anywhere else in Canada now wants to go to bed with our natural gas? I continue quoting:

Mr. Armstrong estimated capital requirements of the developing Canadian petroleum resources in the next decade at $25 to $30 billion.

The article refers to $25 to $30 billion. That sounds like a lot of money. A capital gains tax is to be introduced through this bill and, while it sounds good on paper, it will rob the average Canadian of any incentive to invest in resources. That is the anomaly of it. It may be funny; my expression of going to bed with our gas. I think it is funny and I said some time ago that it was funny. One sometimes has to show how funny a thing is in order to demonstrate how tragic it is.

Having said in my opening remarks that the regulations I am talking about are similar in nature to those contemplated in the white paper, let me show what the great experts said in committee. I am about to read excerpts taken from official report No. 33 of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. These proceedings took place on April 16, 1970, at 3.40 in the afternoon. I should like to put some questions and answers on the record because my hon. friend opposite from Calgary felt that the answers were not as suggested in another debate. Actually, we were debating another section of the bill. I directed my first question to Mr. Bryce, the economic adviser to the Prime Minister. I asked, "Did you assist in the drafting of the proposals." Mr. Bryce answered:

Normally the government does not reveal who did what within it, but it is well known that Mr. Brown and I did assist in drafting these proposals.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee agree unanimously to the hon. member continuing?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Woolliams: I appreciate the committee's courtesy, Mr. Chairman. I will not be unduly lengthy. I can speak again after an interval. My party has asked me to place on record a few facts which are important to western Canada and to Canada as a whole. My next question was:

Does the white paper proposal on taxation abolish the distinction between capital gains and income, and treat capital gains as ordinary taxable income?

Let me digress for a moment. The United States and Great Britain have capital gains taxes. Farmers I was talking to the other night in Manitoba were shocked to hear that any capital gains they made would be added to their income and that half those gains would be taxed at ordinary income tax rates. Yet here we are dealing with the resource industry. Surely we want to encourage economic development. How will that development come about if you say to investors in resource industries, "We will take the cream off the top of the milk in the can and all you will have left "is skim milk". And then you are asked to make butter. Out of what?

That is how ridiculous this law is and that is what it will do to our resource industries. I know that my friends to the left say that the white paper did not go far enough. They found out exactly how far the white paper went only when its proposals affected the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool. They did not think they would lose any rural seats in Saskatchewan.

An hon. Member: But we have just won a seat.

Mr. Woolliams: Sometimes it takes a little time for the correct facts to be known. The rest of my question was as follows:

For example; if a person has a taxable income of earned $10,000 from wages, and earns $10,000 on the stock market, what is the rate of tax on $10,000 capital gains?

Mr. Brown answered:

Half of it will bear the progressive rate as if that gain was a taxable income today.

In other words, one half of the capital gain will be taxed at progressive income tax rates. The provisions of the white paper basically have been incorporated in Bill C-259, so that when you talk about the white paper you are talking about Bill C-259. I then asked whether the capital gain would not be added to taxable income in that year. Mr. Brown answered, "Yes, sir." Actually, I asked the following:

An ordinary landholder who bought some land, then sold it and in that taxable year, whatever year it might be, he made $10,000. I am asking you, under the ordinary rules, would not that capital gain be added to his taxable income in that one year?

Mr. Brown answered, "Yes, sir." I then asked:

Yes, so basically, although you have mentioned some exceptions and I am prepared to determine those in a few moments, what the chartered accountant of one of the national firms said is true, that the distinction between capital gains and income will be virtually abolished because in many cases—I have given you two or three illustrations, but I am sure you could give me more than I have given you because you are far more knowledgeable in this field—it will merely be added to the taxable income and become taxable in that year. Is that correct?

Mr. Brown answered, "Yes, it is." Mr. Chairman, I want to drive this point home because it is important to farmers and to those investing in the resource industries. Half of any capital gain is to be included in income and will be taxed at progressive income tax rates. What are those progressive rates? They are not 25 per cent or less, as in the United States or Great Britain. They run as high as 61 per cent in Canada, a new country. And then some Members of Parliament say we do not need foreign investment! That is the anomaly I see under this tax bill.

How can hon. members, no matter on which side of the House they sit, believe that we do not need foreign investment? We are going to ask Canadians to invest in their industry and at the same time tax them on capital gains at the rate of 61 per cent for those in the top tax bracket. If that is not an anomaly we have never had one in politics. That is why there is stagnation today in the development of our mines and resources and it will stagnate even more.

The National Energy Board has taken the position that we do not have the reserves. I want to read the report about reserves. That is a matter of opinion, not evidence. Opinion evidence must be given different weight than real evidence. How can you encourage further development of the natural gas and petroleum industries if you do not have a tax climate whereby people will invest their money? I quote:

> Is the difference then between the United States and Great Britain's capital gains tax that they, the United States, have special rates on capital gains and rates on taxable income in the ordinary way. Is that not correct?

I asked further questions as follows:

> MR. BROWN: In his answer he agreed with me pointing out that the tax in some cases is 25 per cent and some cases would be 27.5 per cent with a surtax. He also added that some of the states also have an additional tax in addition to the federal tax.
> MR. WOOLLIAMS: I will deal with the exception in a moment, because I am well aware that it could go up to 80 per cent under certain circumstances for a period of years. But, forgetting that exception, the maximum Canadian rate could be as high as 50 per cent.
>
> MR. BROWN: Yes, sir.
>
> MR. WOOLLIAMS: And that is considerably higher than the United States and Great Britain at the present time.
> MR. BROWN: I think that as a rate that is true, sir.

I put this to the parliamentary secretary. With a new country, a country developing its mines, petroleum, natural gas and all its industries—which is the very foundation of our economic growth and the growth of employment possibilities which will take people off the breadlines and get them working—you need investment in those resources. Without it, you have stagnation. With stagnation, you have unemployment. With high taxation like this you will continue to have unemployment until it becomes something you must learn to live with. There is no solution to this kind of problem.

An hon. Member: The NDP have it.

Mr. Woolliams: I read what the Premier of Manitoba said, as follows:

> If I cannot get investment from any other source, I will get it from the United States.

It depends on where you are sitting and whether you are wooing votes or have the responsibility of running a province or country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mahoney: I'll buy that.

Mr. Saltsman: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Woolliams: Certainly. I always like questions.

Mr. Saltsman: I would like to ask a question related to investment and unemployment. The hon. member said that one of the reasons we have such a high level of unemployment is that we are not encouraging investment. My recollection is that in 1960, 1961 and 1962, when the hon. member's party had some responsibility for governing this country, we had a rate of unemployment of something over 10 per cent. At that time we had far greater incentives to investment in Canada: we had a dollar that was rising rapidly. How does the hon. member relate that to unemployment?

Mr. Woolliams: We took office in 1956. I do not want to get into a side issue. I am not here to defend, but I shall answer. I am not here to defend what happened to Mackenzie King, Bennett, Diefenbaker, or anybody else. I am debating a tax bill and what in my opinion is sound economics. But I can answer the question. The hon. member knows as well as I do that when we took office in 1956 there was unemployment.

An hon. Member: 1957.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, 1957. But 1956 was the beginning. There was unemployment in the United States as well as in Canada. Mr. Sharp and Mr. Winters both admitted on the election platform that unemployment had dropped to lower than 6 per cent by 1962 because of the programs put into effect by the Diefenbaker government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: I am not going to get into side issues. That is when the boom started. If the hon. member for Waterloo wants to go back 20 or 30 years I would ask him, why did Clarence Fines, the CCF provincial treasurer, leave Saskatchewan with approximately $3 million? I do not know. Answer that one. Why did some become very rich? They were socialists and were preaching that religion across the land. I could ask other questions but nobody has a monopoly on political morality in this House. I again quote:

> Mr. Bryce, thinking of the questions that I have put and the answers Mr. Brown had made to those questions, it is possible under the white paper that for a period Canadians could pay as high as 80 per cent capital gains tax under certain circumstances. I will give you an example, if there is any question about that.

I gave him an example. Mr. Bryce replied:

> Oh, on certain transactions, in the first year of the new system as proposed, yes.

For two years we debated the white paper. For two years investment and business in this country were threatened. They were threatened until this bill was introduced. Now the rate is up to 61 per cent. We were threatened with a tax on capital gains, on investment of possibly 80 per cent. In light of the atmosphere since this government took office, scaring away development, investment and exploration, how can our economy not be stagnated at this time?

If the National Energy Board says we do not have enough resources, I do not agree with them. But they have the jurisdiction. As a parliamentarian, I have only the right to criticize. I want them to appear before the committee so I can hear their evidence. If there are not the reserves, the answer is to put capital and men to work. You cannot have prosperity and economic development when you are stagnating industry by taking away Canadian capital. The government says it can do things better. It says it will handle the money. That is the record of what took place in committee.

Under our tax law, much of the tax treatment of the oil industry is contained in regulations. It appears that this concept is carried forward in Bill C-259. The concept that I have read from the white paper has been carried into the resource industry, although the government has seen fit to issue a series of vague proposed regulations since the white paper of November 7, 1969. Most of the regulations proposed by the oil industry were included in a news release by the Department of Finance on July 6 of this year. These regulations are permissible—this is referred to in sections 65 and 66 of Bill C-259—but they are not included in the bill. It is the intention to evaluate these proposed regulations with full understanding; however, they are likely to be changed. Obviously, anticipation of such changing regulations has contributed in some measure to the present instability in our business community.

Before making an assessment of the proposed tax regulations it may be appropriate at this point to discuss some aspects of Canada's present energy position—I have already discussed certain of these aspects—and consider the manner in which a restrictive tax treatment can greatly influence Canada's future position. At a time when more and more Canadians are concerned with the future of Canadian independence, little is being done by the government to encourage the investment of private risk capital to develop our resource frontiers. That, basically, is the weakness of the tax policy presented to us. Particular reference is made to the existence of drilling funds which under United States tax laws favour the use of essentially private capital in a risk-taking venture, such as oil or gas explorations, by granting certain incentives to individuals willing to take such risks.

My next recommendation is this: Our tax laws in relation to the resource industries should offer far more incentives that the United States system because we are competing against the United States capital. If we can create a better atmosphere we could hope to attract Canadian investment in Canadian industry on a larger scale. The end would be achieved not by regulation but by the individual initiative. This is one of the factors which should have been considered when this bill was in preparation, particularly with regard to competition in the resource industry. Remember, when we are dealing with a resource industry we are dealing with an international industry. I have heard people say it is a terrible thing that it should be international. But of course it is international. It is international because oil, natural gas and minerals are found almost everywhere in the world. The companies concerned must operate in various countries in order to remain in a competitive position and be able to pay a fair wage to their employees and provide a fair standard of working conditions.

Through a fair system of tax write-offs and depletion allowances, United States tax laws have created a means by which individual Americans can participate not only in the development of domestic resource frontiers but also in the development of Canadian resources. If Canadians are concerned about the influence of foreign control over some of our industries, then establishment of Canadian tax laws providing parity incentives for private risk capital is a necessary prerequisite to give Canadians the opportunity to invest in their own resources.

We should make Canadian industry fully competitive. We talk about foreign investment but we refuse to give the same competitive shake to Canadians. What kind of law is this? What kind of economic system is that? When you read just one side of the story it sounds good. Thank goodness that in justice, whether it is economic or judicial justice, there are two sides to every story. Quite obviously, a fair competitive basis with comparable tax incentives for Canadians is a much better means of giving Canadians the opportunity to gain or preserve control of their resource industries than the presently proposed screening mechanism of the government.

Let us look at this proposed screening mechanism, a description of which is to be found at page 21 of "The Canadian Forum"—the leak! This is a government of many leaks. In my submission it is one big leak after another. The Secretary of State for External Affairs should be called the chief of many leaks. The following is what it said about the screening process:

> A screening process could be the least protectionist and hence the least costly of the possible policy alternatives because of its flexibility. It could, in fact, contribute to the efficiency of the Canadian economy. It could seek to reverse procurement decisions which were based on arbitrary and non-economic factors which contribute neither to the welfare of the particular Canadian firm nor to the country as a whole.

I pause here. Would any provincial or federal government in existence in the forties, before Leduc No. 1 was brought in by Imperial Oil to give us the first major oilfield in Alberta, have agreed to put money into that project? Here I agree with the Prime Minister. I have already quoted the Prime Minister twice tonight with approval, something which is rare for me. The right hon. gentleman said this country was run by a group of experts and not by parliamentarians elected by the Canadian people. Well, I do not want a bunch of bureaucrats determining whether a well should be drilled for natural gas or petroleum, because I do not trust their judgment. In the field of incentive, people take risks, sink mines, drill shafts and create economic growth which brings jobs for men and women. That is what incentive is about.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: At a time when we are talking about unemployment every day, the government is considering setting up a system of selection to determine through a government agency or somebody in the public service where, when and in what manner funds should be invested. I think the history of western Canada might have shown very little development if policies of this kind had been decided in some office in an ivory tower. I think the parliamentary secretary would agree with me, because I read some remarks he made recently relative to the export of gas. This is why I say we are divided in this House by regions, on occasion, rather than by narrow, party politics. I read further:

> In those cases where procurement from the parent is in the best interests of the firm but not necessarily in the best interests of the long-term economic development of Canada, a screening process could bargain for the location of the next expansion in Canada in cases where this is economic.

Does any hon. member believe for one moment that the Sudbury mines would have been found by bureaucrats sitting in an ivory tower? Do they really believe there would today be an oil and gas industry in Alberta if decisions had been left to some bureaucrat? I do not believe so. It was only in the field of competition, through the interplay of action, knowledge and investment that the growth of this country took place right from the Maritimes to Victoria. Development has gone on in this country on such a scale in the last hundred years as to be unrivalled anywhere except perhaps in the United States.

An hon. Member: And where did it get us?

Mr. Woolliams: I don't know where it got you. But I do not want to get off target. I shall not listen to a lot of nonsense.

An hon. Member: We are having to.

Mr. Woolliams: Everybody has a right to take part in this debate. I have only spoken once, and I felt I should enter into the discussion at this point. If hon. members disagree with me, I shall be happy to listen to them carefully.

An hon. Member: We shall do that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We just don't believe it.

Mr. Woolliams: It continues:

The new production facilities in Canada could serve, for example, the Canadian and European markets with the MNE acting as a channel for Canadian exports to European subsidiaries. The extent to which the screening process can secure this type of investment for Canada will depend upon many factors including the costs of production, access to foreign markets, transportation costs, etc.

All the factors will be put through a computer. But the information fed into a computer is only as good as the knowledge that goes with it. Does anyone imagine we could have achieved our present economic growth had the suggested screening method been in operation? I recall the days when Mr. Pearson criticized my right hon. friend from Prince Albert during the years he was Prime Minister for taking initiative in the development of the north. Let us suppose Mr. Pearson had still been in the public service and had been given the job of deciding whether or not any development in the north should take place. All we would ever have up there would be igloos. And if we had taken that kind of advice, the CPR would never have been built. The Grits said it would never pay for the cost of the axle grease.

Whenever we get rules and regulations and people interpreting them, we should look out because expansion is likely to be nil. That is what is wrong with this tax bill. That is why I refer to the tax bill and its link with screening and regulation. We have reached a point in this country where we have an NDP government, because the Prime Minister and two of his henchmen sitting over there walked out of that party because of a deal, went over to the government party and took office as NDP members under the name of Liberals. That is what we have.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Mr. Woolliams: It does not make any economic sense to have this screening process that apparently seeks to ensure, for the Canadian supplier, an opportunity to compete for supply contracts. But that is what we are linked with in the tax bill. This bill is an unwritten book of regulations. When the regulations are written, unless they are leaked to us they are hidden laws. That is the only way we find out about them, because we cannot pry answers from the government.

A glance at the proposed tax amendments and regulations of Bill C-259 immediately raises the question, what are these measures intended to achieve in the energy sector of our economy? Let me deal with Canadian energy policy as it fits into taxation. Predictions for the remainder of this decade are that the demand for minerals and energy resources will accelerate at an unprecedented rate. By 1980 the United States will consume over 80 per cent of the world's mineral and energy resources. That figure is based on what an economist says. Canada, through its proximity and close affiliation to United States markets, must formulate a Canadian resource policy. Perhaps it is time we had a national resource policy, but such policy must attract Canadian companies to develop our own resources for Canadians.

I do not know what is meant by a continental energy policy but I have always maintained that this was dangerous. Deals have been worked out, like the national oil policy, whereby we permit the eastern market, divided by the Ottawa Valley, to obtain crude oil from other countries provided we can serve the northwestern United States market. We started off by supplying that market with 250,000 barrels of crude per day, with a target of 800,000 barrels per day. We managed to achieve the goal of 800,000 barrels per day, and even the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources admits that. If a decision arrived at is such that in the near future central Canada needs more natural gas and energy than was estimated, then let us get on the job and build pipelines to bring it here. Let us survey central Canada to find out whether more energy is needed. If more energy is needed, let us obtain signed purchase contracts so that western Canada can then properly assess the need. The need could properly be assessed by the National Energy Board and the Alberta Conservation Board. In any event, let us make an assessment now of our energy requirements.

An hon. Member: You can take gas to the Maritimes.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, we could take gas to the Maritimes. In order to have the kind of vitality we need in the industry, we must have a tax atmosphere which encourages investment, and we must have markets. I say, let us build the pipelines to the eastern market. If we are to be nationalists in respect of one area, we must be nationalists across the board. We have pools of natural gas and petroleum in Alberta and it may be that policies can be worked out to supply eastern markets. This is a field for the experts, not for parliamentarians. But if we are to have a national policy we must work out some deals. If we are to keep our gas in the ground waiting for something to happen somewhere else, then surely we have a right to build a pipeline and market crude petroleum and crude natural gas in the Montreal area. In this way we could keep the western economy healthy.

I have made several recommendations not only in respect of taxation but in respect of markets. In relation to this question it is interesting to read what was written recently in a Winnipeg paper:

> Government economists as soothsayers have a very mixed reputation. We have been, throughout our history, a capital-short nation. It was rather generally assumed, until recently, that for purposes of development—which is very important to national unity—we needed all the savings we could get, both domestic and foreign. The revised view evidently is that, in the domestic sense, we are much stronger than we assumed and that foreign capital, although it should not necessarily be excluded, is something to be feared and screened and regulated. It is at Canada's door pressing to get in and the role of a protective government must be to admit it only on prescribed conditions. In similar fashion, we screen immigrants lest subversives or insufficiently close relatives gain access to the country.
> But the the economists may be at fault in their readings of the signs and portents. In a brief submitted last week to the Ontario securities commission, two brokerage firms made two points rather forcefully. The first was that Canadian demand for both debt and equity capital will increase significantly in the next decade. The second was that the United States, far from attempting to force investment upon us, may be more disposed to end the privileged exemption from the interest equalization tax which Canadian issues have enjoyed since 1963 and from other restrictions on direct foreign investment imposed in 1968 on U.S. firms. If these propositions are sound, the government has brought itself to the present somewhat embarrassing situation by tackling the wrong problem in the wrong way at the wrong time.

I will deal with another subject later, but those are my final words at this time. We are tackling the bill at the wrong time, and we are doing so at the expense of development, when we have high unemployment and a high cost of living. We have economic stagnation and a problem with the United States in respect of the surtax. We have a floating dollar which is just about at par with the U.S. dollar. We are putting our industry at a great disadvantage.

If we are to have full employment in this country we must have expansion. It does not take an economist to figure that out. To get expansion we must have investment in the resource industry. This industry needs large amounts of capital in order to find the resources and get them to the market. You can only obtain the capital with which to find the resources if you have a tax climate which encourages Canadians to invest in their own resources.

In addition, Canadians should have a better deal in the tax world than foreign investors in Canada. Under this bill they are put at a great disadvantage. This is shown by the questions and answers I read. This bill should go back to the drafting board. I have seen fights in caucus. I have never been in cabinet, but I assume the same fights go on there. This may be a fight between interests in one region and those in others, or interests in one group. But if we can succeed in what we must do we will attain expansion and full employment.

• (9:00 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, I listened very attentively to the remarks of the hon. member who has just resumed his seat, the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), to the effect that Bill C-259 certainly does not promote individual initiative nor private enterprise. This bill results naturally from the white paper tabled several months ago already and which did not seem to please the Canadian taxpayers as a whole. Whether the matter under consideration be section 21 or any other provision of this bill, we are faced with a tax reform which consists of taking away from those who have in order to try to give a little to those who have less. And by applying that policy, I suggest that we will surely come to a situation whereby more and more will have nothing and fewer and fewer will have something.

And if the government wonders why Canadians are hesitant to invest in new industries or in secondary industries, or to increase their production, it is simply because they are not interested in wasting their time for the pleasure of paying taxes.

We are complaining that, in the mining sector, for example, companies have to shut down because they are taxed too heavily. We have typical examples of this situation in northwestern Quebec. There are other examples in northeastern Ontario and in the Sudbury area.

Everywhere, in every area, people are disgusted, discouraged, and they cannot be blamed indeed.

We, of the Social Credit, have asked for many years that the income tax be reduced, and the ensuing decrease in income compensated by new credits created by the Bank of Canada. Of course, some find this amusing, and we keep on asking the Americans to come and invest here. We are surprised to see that they are increasingly embarrassed to invest in Canada because taxes are too high. In fact, some American companies now say they are willing to go back to the United States, and to sell from there their products to Canada, for it will cost them less to produce over there.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe any of us can work miracles. One thing is sure, though: we hear more and more people say that we should take over the control of our national economy; more and more members of the NDP, of the Progressive Conservative party, and even of the Liberal party say: Let us take back the control of our economy. At the same time, the Prime Minister of Canada (M. Trudeau) says that 60 or 70 per cent of our economy is in the hands of Americans. Why? Because such a system was set up. The saints in Heaven or Brother André did not suggest that we ask the Americans for permission to develop our natural resources. And let us make no bones about it, because our Canadian companies, the Quebec, Ottawa or Manitoba governments go and beg in the United States for funds to develop hydro-electric projects. Manitoba and Quebec, for example, have borrowed $50 and $75 million respectively. The premiers of those two provinces do not come back from the United States with a bag full of American dollars. They come back with figures and promissory notes for the reimbursement to the United States of $75 million by Quebec and $50 million by Manitoba.

Mr. Chairman, the Americans do not base their $75 million on their wealth, but on the development of our resources. This is why, we say: Why are those figures written by Americans when they could have been written by the Bank of Canada? Those then would be figures that belonged to us and not to others, and that is the only way to regain control of our economy.

Yesterday, I heard the Quebec Premier, Mr. Bourassa, state that the James Bay development, which will cost $6 billion, will permit us to finally become masters of our economic destiny. Where shall we find those $6 billion? Mr. Bourassa gives the answer: In the United States. If the Americans finance the James Bay development, to whom will it belong? To us or to American financiers? We will still be in the same hole!

So, I ask those who have drafted Bill C-259: If the Americans can write those figures for the development of James Bay which belongs to us, why is Mr. Rasminsky not able to write some? Does he lack knowledge? Can he not add? Can he not state clearly that we can make the figures agree with the development of our natural resources? It is not a question of writing any figures, as the hon. member for Papineau (Mr. Ouellet) takes pleasure in repeating throughout the province of Quebec, but figures based on something real, that is the development of our natural resources.

Mr. Chairman, we have been discussing this famous tax bill for months. We consider it by groups of clauses, in order to take a little money from some to try and give it to others. About 80 per cent of everything that will be collected will be used to pay a larger bureaucracy, one that will keep us still more ignorant, and this, because we do not want to tackle the root of the problem. We stagnate, we procrastinate in the present system, and here in this House, members spend their time repeating speeches, quoting figures, when the legislation aims simply at confiscating private property and destroying personal initiative.

Mr. Chairman, with regard to personal income tax, the government said it could not afford to set the exemption at $5,000 for married people and at $3,000 for single persons.

Recently, the Senate Committee on Poverty published a report which may be related to Bill C-259, since its aim is to eradicate poverty in Canada and to provide a guaranteed annual income. For 35 years we have been calling this the vital minimum. Senator Croll just found out that we must come to that. The Prime Minister believes that a guaranteed annual income makes sense but that we cannot afford it. The hon. member for Papineau and the Minister of National Health and Welfare repeat the same thing: We cannot afford to do it, it would cost too much!

Mr. Chairman, should a war break out tomorrow, the question of millions or billions of dollars would be put aside. We would get into it to the limit of our physical capabilities. Financing would be available to the extent of our possibilities. We would not ask ourselves: Can we afford it? We would be told instead: This is an emergency!

Mr. Chairman, the present situation is one of emergency since terrorism is closing in and revolutionaries are disrupting the country. In fact, when we witness complete dissatisfaction at all levels of society, I say we are in a situation of national emergency.

We say that, in this country, everything that is physically feasible should be financially possible through the use of our financial institution par excellence, the Bank of Canada. That does not mean we should nationalize the chartered banks. Not at all! Let them operate with private enterprise. But the government should take its responsibilities with regard to the public sector of our national economy.

What did the provinces, municipalities and school boards talk about when they met with the Prime Minister last week? What matters were discussed? Did they talk about the constitution? No! The Constitution is something like moving fine amendments, like talking literature to a poor chap who is dying of hunger! He does not listen too carefully, because he is not interested in literature or sweet nothings. When he is hungry, he wants to work and to earn a decent living.

What were the provinces talking about? Bill C-259. Even if they do not say it too often, all provinces face the same problem: lack of money. And the federal government shows up with a bill of some 725 pages to inform us that it has no more money than the provinces.

Thus, as the conference came to an end after three days, the representatives of the provinces went home, thinking: We had three days of discussions and we will meet again in three or six months. What for? In order to say: we still have no money. Let Ottawa give us some. Let them tax Canadians and give us what the money collected. All the provinces are asking for a better distribution of public funds in every field.

Mr. Chairman, we have have those federal-provincial conferences for ten or twelve years, but they did not solve anything because the federal government has the last word when it comes to credit and currency. The Constitution gives the federal government complete jurisdiction—through Parliament, of course—over matters of currency and credit, and this is why we say to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), to the Prime Minister, to the government and to its members that the public sector of our economy—provinces, municipalities, school boards, and so on—should be financed through interest-free loans granted by the Bank of Canada. Provinces, municipalities and school boards would then have a chance to be more creative and to promote private enterprise and individual initiative.

I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that the bill will solve anything, even if it is carried unanimously. It does not contain any solution. We have to prevent this outdated system from exploiting us as it is doing at present.

A while ago, I mentioned a $75 million loan obtained by the Quebec government from the United States only a few weeks ago at the interest rate of 9¼ per cent over 25 years. Over 25 years, we shall have paid $225 million in interest only and still owe $75 million.

Now, on exactly the same day the Quebec government borrowed in the United States, Mr. Paul Gérin-Lajoie, representing the federal government in the underdeveloped countries assistance program, was in India and granted that country a $40 million interest-free loan, refundable after 60 years. However, 60 years hence, the Prime Minister will be 113 years old, which means that he will no longer be here.

Mr. Chairman, again I am in favour of assistance to foreign countries, but if we are in a position to provide interest-free loans to India, why can we not also provide interest-free loans to the city of Hull or to the provinces of Manitoba, Quebec and Saskatchewan?

More recently, we granted Yugoslavia a $140 million loan I believe, for a hydroelectric project or for setting up a TV broadcasting system. Apparently we can afford that. In fact, a foreign visitor to Canada never goes back home without a generous loan from the federal government.

As for the provinces, they have to go back empty-handed, not richer than they were before. And we call this a Canadian government for the Canadian people.

Mr. Chairman, I am not surprised to see the government's popularity going down in western Canada, where I was last week. I am not surprised to see the government loosing seats in by-elections as we have seen recently. I am not surprised either to find the people thoroughly disgusted, because there is nothing to offer except taxation bills to take away from those who have very little to give to those who have nothing.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Mr. Chairman, we will not go very far this way. I said earlier that we are in a national emergency situation and this is true. Nobody is happy. The students, the fathers and mothers, the handicapped, the pensioners, the senior citizens, the private businessmen are not happy. I am receiving many letters from business executives who complain that the government is eroding their profits and is compelling them to borrow money at exceedingly high interest rates to keep on operating. I said earlier that the province of Quebec is paying an interest rate of 9¼ per cent to the United States; the Bank of Canada has just cut its rate down to 4¾ per cent. I recently asked the Minister of Finance why the provinces should not be allowed to borrow from the Bank of Canada at 4¾ per cent instead of having to borrow from the United States at 9¼ per cent. The minister replied that such was the consensus. We must accept things as they are. Under the law the Bank of Canada has the right to make loans to the provinces, but only for a period not exceeding six months whereas New York financiers may make loans for 25, 40 or 50 years. All we would have to do would be to replace the words "six months" in the Bank of Canada Act by 25, 30, 35 or 40 years. That is the only thing to do. The Minister of Finance knows that but he has not got the courage to take his responsibilities, to so instruct the Bank of Canada. He knows the government has the power to instruct the Bank of Canada. Mr. Rasminsky also knows it quite well.

Mr. Chairman I am nearly through on the subject. Instead of introducing a bill of that nature and saying that we cannot afford to establish a social security system in Canada, let us try to see if Canada can produce enough to meet the needs of its population. This year the national output will total $90 billion and the national income will total $65 billion. How can we logically buy a production of $90 billion with an income of $65 billion? Ask the Minister of Finance or any economist in Canada. There is a difference of $25 billion between the production of Canada and its income when the stores, the factories and the warehouses are overflowing with all sorts of products. There is overproduction and we still hear people talking about increasing our production when we do not even have time to deal with the problem of distributing our wealth. The only way of achieving better distribution of our wealth in Canada is to increase the purchasing power of the consumer by distributing a national dividend, as advocated by the Créditistes, and through a guaranteed minimum income, as was recently suggested by Senator Croll who only touched on the problem now facing Canada. When we are in a position to guarantee economic security, social security to the population as a whole then we will have fewer terrorists, revolutionaries, bomb blasts and disputes.

We have a solution, Mr. Chairman. In concluding my comments on Bill C-259, I would state that even if we were to spend six months debating this legislation, it would not improve the economic situation of Canada nor would it generate a single new industry. On the contrary, existing industries are being driven out and prevented from expanding because people are being discouraged. And when someone is discouraged, nothing could entice him to take risks. It is precisely because nobody wants to take risks anymore that the government is taking away from us whatever we have. By avoiding risks, industries remain stagnant thus creating unemployment.

The unemployed are complaining. Even if new legislation provides increased unemployment benefits, the problem will not be solved. One or two years hence, we will still be facing the same situation because we will not have really come to grips with the problem.

The Créditistes have a suggestisn to offer. It matters very little whether the government considers it or not. One thing is certain which is that the Canadiin people are about to accept that solution to their greater advantage.

[English]

Mr. Burton: Mr. Chairman, I think members of this committee should be fully cognizant of the fact that when we are dealing with matters such as those presently before us we are dealing with national policy. We are determining what will happen to Canada and what kind of nation we will be in the future. Make no mistake about that, Mr. Chairman. I think no member of this House should be under any illusion in that respect. The policies we adopt as a result of this tax bill will influence the future of Canada. They will have a distinct effect upon what Canadians and other people do in Canada.

Earlier this evening the hon. member for Calgary North referred to action taken by governments in Saskatchewan and Manitoba, governments of the same political persuasion as my party. He pointed out that a former Premier of Saskatchewan, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, had to take action to encourage oil development in that province. That is quite correct, Mr. Chairman. His government had to encourage oil development in Saskatchewan because of the framework within which national policies were operating. Under those national policies, agriculture—the basic industry of western Canada—was being ignored. Provincial services were being pinched and squeezed at every twist and turn. The cost of transportation in the west was constantly rising. All this was putting Saskatchewan and other prairie provinces in a real economic bind.

Under those national policies, secondary industry development was encouraged to remain away from western Canada. Those policies were structured in such a way that western Canada did not benefit from the development of secondary industry. The government of Saskatchewan had to move to secure a piece of the action, to bring about the type of development that was so badly needed. I think it did a much better job than was being done at that time in other parts of Canada. It protected the people's interests. It devised new means of ensuring that the people of the province would get a fair return on their resources.

In particular the CCF government introduced the feature of the net royalty lease which resulted in oil companies large and small having an opportunity to get into the development picture. This also helped Canadian companies such as Co-op Refineries to take part in the oil game; and I may say that Canadian companies have not been able to play the same sort of role in other provinces. Here I refer to Alberta.

This is the type of policy we must follow in order to ensure that our people get a fair shake. But that policy was promptly cancelled by the Liberal government which took office in Saskatchewan in 1964. That government was more interested in getting a quick buck from the sale of leases or of particular parcels of land. Now I am happy to see that the new NDP government in the province of Saskatchewan is once again bringing into effect the net oil royalty lease program.

The hon. member for Calgary North also referred to statements made by the Premier of Manitoba. I listened to those statements when watching television. I point out that the Premier made it quite clear that if he had a choice between no development, between no investment and foreign investment, then in carrying out his responsibilities as Premier of the province he had no alternative but to ensure that there would be some degree of development by encouraging whatever foreign investment was necessary.

I think the hon. member for Calgary North and others who take a similar line of argument have missed the basic point—that responsibility rests here in Ottawa, in this Parliament, to ensure that there is an adequate national policy that will bring about the degree of development that we need and in a way that will work in the best interests of the Canadian people. We have a responsibility to ensure that that kind of development policy is carried out. We have never had an adequate development policy from either Liberal or Conservative governments.

When we look at the proposals placed before us in this bill concerning the basic resource industries of mining and petroleum, what do we find? We find special concessions. We find special deals that are available to no other sector of the Canadian economy. I ask the government, Mr. Chairman, to give me one example of how the proposals contained in this bill serve the principle of equity. Is there any degree of equity in the proposals concerning mining and petroleum? I suggest there is not. I predict that the Liberal government will rue the day they allow this bill to pass with the type of concessions contained in it. The people of Canada will realize what a sham this so-called tax reform legislation is.

• (9:30 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Burton: The fact is, Mr. Chairman, that this bill is a gigantic giveaway, a sellout, handout of Canadian resources and Canadian wealth. Let us compare what is being done for the giant oil companies and giant mining companies on the one hand, while on the other people interested in co-operatives and credit unions have to scramble in order to maintain any semblance of justice in their treatment under the proposed legislation. We debated this matter last week and I do not intend to go into it again now.

We have here a good example of the priorities of the Liberal government. They are prepared to give concessions and handouts to large corporations and cartels, but when it comes to an organization that is attempting to help people and where people are attempting to help themselves we find the government putting the squeeze on. What sort of justice is this? It will not produce the new, just society we heard so much about. Furthermore, when discussing the concessions contained in Bill C-259 as they affect basic resource industry, we must see how they influence economic development in Canada. I suggest they produce very serious and bad distortions of our economic development. I think we should keep this in mind.

In his remarks the hon. member for Calgary North said that if we ensure that there is good deal for the mining and petroleum companies, that will bring new jobs and new development and help to produce full employment. I believe I quote the sense of his statement correctly. But, Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the committee through you that more people in Canada are affected by the well-being and welfare of the co-operative and credit union movements in this country than are affected by the activities of the mining and petroleum industries.

Just where are the government's priorities going at the present time? We need to use some sense when discussing these points. When this type of development is encouraged, jobs will be created and there will be some economic activity—but this is really not the rationale. The question we must consider is whether it is the best type of development, whether it is the best use of the resources, whether it is the best investment and whether it is doing the best possible job for Canada. I suggest that the type of priorities the Liberal government will give to those industries in this legislation will not produce the best possible results for Canadians.

If I understand some statements correctly, there are people who would like to see an even better bill as it affects the mining and petroleum industries. Mr. Chairman, they have had certain concessions made to them as embodied in this legislation and in statements made from time to time by the Minister of Finance which extend the present situation until 1976. At the same time, there are suggestions that the tax system is stifling development in the basic resource industries in Canada. What more do they want? The only thing I can suggest is that they want the entire country. I am not prepared to see that happen.

When deciding on our tax policy and our development policy we will have to decide on certain priorities. We will have to decide if the structure of our tax system and development policy will be carried out in a way that will produce the best possible development for Canada. The Carter report which was tabled in 1966 came out in favour of the principle of tax neutrality; in other words, that the tax system should be structured in such a way as not to encourage or favour one type of development against another. That is really a classic capitalistic approach to taxation, but obviously the government has rejected it, particularly with regard to the treatment of the mining and petroleum industries.

We must decide whether this is the best type of priority to give Canadian development and if it is the best way to serve the interests of the Canadian people. I have yet to hear a defence from the government to the effect that this is the best way to serve our interests.

We also need to look at the nature of the industries benefiting from some of the concessions allowed in this legislation. Most industries are foreign-owned; I think this is recognized and acknowledged. As a matter of fact, the hon. member for Calgary North earlier this evening made reference to the fact that the petroleum industry is largely international in nature. That is known to all of us. What makes me rather sad is that people seem to be prepared to accept this type of structure and even further distortion of that structure. They are prepared to accept this international structure and the fact that people outside Canada will determine what is best for us and what sort of development will be carried out in this country.

This is what our national debate is about at the present time. Are we going to allow this situation to continue? Is this the type of Canada we want? I suggest that in the area of basic resource industries we must come to grips with the question. Recognizing what the situation is on an international scale, there are some things that Canada can do. Why is the Canadian government not setting up some form of consortium to deal with the entire complex of energy resources and the development of those resources from the production of the raw material to the finished products?

I think we have some of the necessary elements within the structure of government that would enable the government, through a properly established Canada Development Corporation, to take a lead in this field. Why is it not possible through Panarctic Oils, through Northern Transportation Company, through the Northern Power Commission and industrial complexes such as Polymer to set up an energy complex that could serve the industries of Canada and be a model for the world? It would put us in the forefront of industrial development.

There are other things we can do. We can work with the co-operative movement. It has a well established oil refinery in the city of Regina which is a source of pride to the people of my riding and to Saskatchewan. We have some oil activity by the co-operative movement in western Canada. There are many groups in many areas with whom the government could initiate and encourage effort in development. There are other groups which could take part in national development. I suggest that is the type of thing we should encourage if we are to see a rational development of resources in this country and change the direction of development so that it serves the interests of the Canadian people first, rather than the interests of foreign shareholders.

We must also recognize that some of the industries which benefit from these concessions create only a low level of employment; the ratio of employment to investment is very low. This fact must be kept in mind when deciding our priorities in respect of development policy. It is clear that tax policies as embodied in Bill C-259 encouraged this type of development in Canada rather than other types of development which would be of greater benefit to the Canadian people. Therefore, there must be some change in emphasis.

We must bear in mind that the international companies to which I referred earlier operate only from self-interest. We have such companies in western Canada. Companies like Imperial Oil have carried on exploration and development activities in Alberta, Saskatchewan and, to a degree, in Manitoba. What happened with regard to these companies? They employed different crews for different jobs. They employed management people, office people, service people, and so on, in each of those provinces.

Then the companies decided to centralize their operations. First, they were going to centralize their operations in Edmonton or Calgary. Of course, certain people in western Canada said they were doing this because of the socialist government of Saskatchewan, or for any number of different reasons of that sort. Yet when the change of government took place in Saskatchewan in 1964, when a Liberal government took office and embraced the philosophy of private enterprise in all its forms, the exodus continued: the oil companies kept pulling out of Saskatchewan and moving their offices to Edmonton and Calgary.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): That was because of the NDP government.

Mr. Burton: If my hon. friend had been listening he would have heard me say that this happened during the regime of the Liberal government in Saskatchewan. The hon. member should take note of what happened after the Liberal government took office. Apparently everything was fine; yet, some of these companies moved, as I say, to Edmonton and Calgary, the homeland of free, private enterprise. But what is happening now? In many cases they are moving from Edmonton and Calgary to Toronto. They are moving some of their facilities out of the west altogether. They are serving their own corporate interests first, second and last. It does not matter to them whether they are helping or hurting the areas from which they have taken their resources as long as they get their profit from the enterprise.

We see another example of this when we examine the actions of Imperial Oil in western Canada in centralizing its refining operation entirely in Edmonton and closing down operations in Calgary, Regina and Winnipeg. In each of the three prairie provinces refineries will be closed. That company does not think of the welfare and well-being of the community or province in which it enjoyed privileges and benefits over the years. It is thinking solely of its own corporate interest. I suggest that the day is long past when we can allow this sort of situation to continue.

The Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member. I do so to advise him and the committee that his time has expired.

An hon. Member: Continue.

The Chairman: The hon. member may continue only if he has the unanimous consent of the committee. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

The Chairman: There is not consent.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I agree, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Burton: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I have a few more remarks to make.

The Chairman: Order, please. The Chair asked if there was unanimous consent for the hon. member to continue and determined that there was not consent.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member concerned changed his mind.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Churchill.

An hon. Member: Who said "No"?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I did not say "No".

Mr. Simpson: Mr. Chairman, we have heard diverse views this evening on the type of consideration that should be given under the Canadian tax structure to developers of our resource industries. I was interested to hear the views of the hon. member for Regina East who tried to compare the benefits accruing to Canadians from the mining industry with the benefits accruing to them from co-operatives and credit unions.

Many members of the committee, myself included, spoke the other evening when the committee was considering the tax structure and proposals affecting co-operatives and credit unions. Those who spoke were justified in defending credit unions and co-operatives and in opposing the measures affecting those organizations which the government wishes to incorporate in this tax bill. I point out to the hon. member for Regina East that when he talks about people deriving benefits from credit unions and co-operatives he is referring to a great number of people, but the benefits which credit unions and co-operatives make available are comparatively small. On the other hand, he ought to take note of the fact that the mining industry of Canada employs directly about 150,000 people.

Of course, we must bear in mind that that is not the total extent of tht industry's impact on employment in Canada since for every employee in the mining industry there are seven or eight who work in other parts of Canada in industries associated with that industry. Their employment is assured because of the operation of our mines. So we are really talking about 150,000 people who are directly employed in the mining industry of Canada, and when we consider the over-all effect of that industry on the economy we are talking of approximately one million people employed in industries which depend directly on mining.

Before I deal further with how the tax structure affects the mining industry I should like to show briefly how some of the tax changes proposed by the government affect directly one of the most important elements of the Canadian mining industry's economy. I am talking about the person who is responsible for the establishment of mines in Canada, the original prospector. The Canadian mining industry is our most important industry, accounting for more than 40 per cent of our export dollars, with well over 25 Canadian communities being entirely dependent upon it.

It would be hard to conceive a Canadian economy without the financial contribution of mining companies such as Bay Mining and Smelting Company, International Nickel Company of Canada, Sherritt Gordon Mines, Consolidated Mining and Smelting, Noranda, Falconbridge, etc. In trying to assess the effects of the proposed tax changes upon this industry one may well start at the very beginning of it all, the prospector. Who among us, except the present government, would begrudge the original prospector and his courageous grubstakers the tax free earnings for which they may very seldom, if ever, qualify?

As has been mentioned during this debate, the prospector's work is arduous and demanding. Although the prospector can take full credit for the original discovery of all our operating mines, very seldom does he experience a big strike. It is a retrograde step to take incentive from the prospector. I suggest to the government that the prospector and his grubstakers need more incentive, not less.

It is safe to say that if it had not been for the prospector and the willingness of such concerns as the mining companies which I have mentioned, the Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company, Sherritt Gordon and International Nickel, to invest hundreds of millions of dollars in their findings, northern Manitoba would still be a sleeping wilderness. I might add that a substantial amount of the capital invested in this area was from foreign sources which some people in this House so roundly castigate.

The mining industry presents quite special characteristics and risks, many of which are unlike those encountered in other industries. Mining is concerned with a non-renewable resource and the success or failure of mining operations depends entirely on the inherent unpredictability of ore bodies. Furthermore, the establishment of a producing mine frequently entails the complete build-up of new infrastructures, particularly in the more remote areas. Thompson, Manitoba, is a good example. In the year 1961 the population of Thompson was about 1,300. In 1963, just two years later, the population of this rapidly growing town had increased to approximately 7,000. The present population of Thompson is estimated at 23,000.

It is expected, justifiably, that the population will surpass 25,000 within the next few years. Here we see the development of an area which 11 years ago was nothing but forest, bush and rock. It is now one of the most modern cities in Canada. In a period of 11 years, the population has increased to 23,000. Can we imagine the number of families who have been dependent upon the mine for their livelihood?

I can also speak of the city of Flin Flon, Manitoba, where I have resided for a number of years. Tens of thousands of wage earners have raised their families in this town and have made it their home. They have found that it has a very fine atmosphere in which to raise a family. All this has come about through private investment and, to a large extent, foreign investment in Canada.

I am sure all members agree it would be a very fine situation if Canadians could come up with a system whereby most of our resource industries could be financed through Canadian investment. This government has come forward with a number of suggestions which have proven to be of no avail. No one has yet come up with the answer for which Canadians are looking. I am sure that everyone will agree that it would be a wonderful situation if we could arrive at that. However, we must face reality. If we are to have development in Canada, particularly of the resource industries, we must look for investment from wherever we can get it.

As the hon. member for Calgary South said, we hear a great deal of criticism from members of the NDP. They are continually saying that this is not the thing for Canadian industry. However, where do they go to get capital when it is necessary to float loans for the province of Manitoba, and I suppose, now, the province of Saskatchewan? The first place they go is across the border, the United States. This again proves that if the money that is needed is not available in Canada, we must face reality and turn to where it is available and people are ready and willing to invest in our country. As I said before, if we can come up with satisfactory measures whereby Canadian capital assumes far greater control over our industries, particularly our resource industries, we will all be very happy to see that day.

With regard to the development of our country, I am sure we all agree that if it had not been for private enterprise and initiative our resource industries would not have been developed. Canada would have been much more backward than it is today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

PENSIONS—OLD AGE SECURITY—INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE AND LOWERING OF ELIGIBLE AGE.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Monday, November 8, during the question period I addressed a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) concerning the Old Age Security Act. In particular, I reminded the minister that during the debate on that act last December he made the statement several times that the basic amount of the pension was not necessarily frozen at $80 a month but could be increased by Parliament at any time. On the basis of that assertion, as recorded at page 9409, of Hansard, I put my question to the minister in these words:

—is the minister, in view of the needs of our pensioners, now considering an increase in that basic amount?

• (10:00 p.m.)

The reply of the Minister of National Health and Welfare was at least clear and direct. It was in these words: "Not at this time, Mr. Speaker." So I put to the minister a supplementary question in these terms:

Then is the minister considering the lowering of the eligible age for those who are prepared to retire from the labour market?

And the reply was as follows:

Mr. Speaker, as we indicated, I believe in our white paper on income security, we see this as a future trend. In terms of immediate action the government does not have any plans at this time.

My question was thus in two parts. On the one hand it asked for action to increase the basic amount of the pension paid under the Old Age Security Act, which at the moment is $80 a month; on the other hand, it asked for a new departure, namely, the lowering of the age at which a person might receive old age security benefits on the understanding that such a person would withdraw from the labour market.

I posted this two-part question for a "late show," Mr. Speaker, because it seemed to me that both parts of it are extremely important. Although we may not get finality by way of an answer in a "late show" period I believe this is one of the areas we ought to keep alive until we win. I assert as strongly as I can that the amount of the old age pension must not be left at $80. One of the reasons I feel pensions should be increased at this time is to offset a suggestion made in a report from the other place to the effect that old age security benefits might be wiped out and replaced by another program suggested in that report. It seems to me that the universal nature of old age security provisions is still one of the best things we have established in this Parliament and I believe the government should underwrite that good piece of legislation by increasing the amount, and that it should do so very soon.

The other part of the question is, I submit, of equal importance. The minister referred to future trends. The day will come when retirement at an earlier age will be a fact in our society. In light of today's unemployment among young people I believe we should start that day now. I suggest, therefore, as clearly as I can, that both old age security and benefits under the Canada Pension Plan should be made available at age 60 to those who are prepared to withdraw from the labour market. This is a test which we apply in certain other instances. In other words, other income which people receive should not interfere with getting these pensions earlier. I suggest it makes sound common sense to establish the principle that people who are prepared to withdraw from the labour market at 60 should get both their old age security benefits and their Canada Pension Plan payments, for both of which individual Canadians are now paying under our tax laws and under the terms of the Canada Pension Plan.

So I present these two ideas in the form of this two-part question again tonight, hoping there will be some ray of hope forthcoming from the government side—that the day will soon come when the amount of the old age security pension will be increased and when the eligible age will be lowered at least on the terms I have suggested.

Mr. John Roberts (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, there is certainly one statement of the hon. member with which we can agree wholeheartedly. It is that there is generally no finality to questions on the "late show." The answer to this question will be no exception to the general principle.

Sometimes the hon. member reminds me of one of the characters from Dickens—I think it was Oliver Twist—who when asked what he wanted kept saying, "More".

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Mr. Roberts: We all admire the tenacity, irritating as it sometimes may be to those on government benches, with which the hon. member pursues his interest in old age pensioners. I wish to assure him—perhaps this is the ray of hope for which he asks—that many of us on this side of the House share his concern for the plight of these people. Many of us here are working hard both before and behind the scenes to increase the benefits to which we believe they are legitimately entitled. It is for that reason, no doubt, that the level of payments under Canadian old age pension arrangements is extremely high. Indeed, I believe I am correct in saying it is the highest in the world. We are concerned about protection of our senior citizens.

The hon. member raised questions about the application of universal demogrants. The question here always relates to the necessary costs of these very desirable benefits. I am sure we all in our hearts would like to see these implemented but, of course, governments must always weigh the benefits in relation to costs. I assure the hon. member that the government will continue to consider, as I am sure all hon. members of the House will, the very complex questions he has raised with sympathy and interest.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You are better than the minister.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—RE-EVALUATION OF POLICIES IN LIGHT OF CRITICISMS.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, on November 22 I directed a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) in respect of a statement reported in the press to have been made by the Prime Minister of Quebec to the effect that the government's regional economic expansion policies were having no effect in that province.

The answer I received from the minister was that he had checked with the Prime Minister of Quebec that very day and he had denied having made such a statement. My question was prompted by a story which appeared in the Globe and Mail of Friday, November 19. I quote from it as follows:

> Noting that Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau had campaigned on the platform of combating regional inequalities, the premier said: "Regional disparities . . . have not yet been affected by federal policies after 3½ years of power."

The question originally arose from a story which came from the Quebec City bureau of Canadian Press. It was a consequence of a story which appeared in the French newspaper Le Soleil, a Quebec City daily. There is no question in my mind that the government of Quebec is unhappy with the policies of this government in respect of regional development, or that this story was carried by Canadian Press in the Globe and Mail, in the Saturday edition of the Montreal Gazette and the Quebec City daily Le Soleil.

There is no doubt in my mind that the Premier made such a statement, because I have checked my sources and the story is on electronic tape and was covered by Canadian Press and Le Soleil. My question was not directly as a result of what the Premier of Quebec is reported to have said, although it would be warranted on the basis of that fact alone. This is merely another of a series of criticisms levelled at this government's regional economic expansion policies.

The Prime Minister of Quebec was merely echoing statements which had been made by the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council at a general meeting in the city of Fredericton last October and levelled similar criticisms at the regional economic expansion policies of the government. The first report of the Atlantic Development Council stated, in effect, that the government was lacking an effective strategy on regional development for the Atlantic provinces.

This, I might add, is one of the agencies charged by statute with advising the minister on regional economic policies for the Atlantic provinces. There were also reports by the Canadian Council of Rural Development, which is another agency charged by law with advising the minister on regional economic policies. In addition, there was evidence presented to the Standing Committee on Regional Economic Expansion.

All this evidence indicates that there is general dissatisfaction in the country, not with the principle of regional economic expansion but with the way in which this government is going about it. The policy is overly centralized; it lacks an over-all strategy and does not pay any regard to regional peculiarities or regional differences. For example, the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council in its fifth annual report suggested that the department was overly centralized and that there should be, in fact, an assistant deputy minister and staff stationed in the Atlantic provinces to pay attention to the peculiar interests of the Atlantic provinces.

But overriding all these criticisms is the fact that regional development policies within the government's framework are ineffective because government fiscal and monetary policies render them ineffective and they are at cross-purposes with one another. Consequently, today we have a situation developing in this country where there is unanimous disapproval of the policies of the government in attempting to combat regional disparities. This, I believe, is the main problem facing this country.

The program established by the government is overly centralized and does not pay any attention to the advice of the agencies which are charged by statute with the responsibility of rendering advice to the government. The department does not consult regional bodies or municipalities. In my view it does not consult the provinces in conceiving and executing its policies. The result is we have substantial sums from the federal budget going into a program to combat regional disparities which is not very effective.

When we consider that the Prime Minister of Quebec did make the charge—his comments are on record with Canadian Press and Le Soleil on electronic tape—that the policies of the government in the last 3½ years have had no effect in the province of Quebec, and that over 50 per cent of federal funds allocated by Parliament for regional development has gone into that province, we have some idea of the seriousness of these charges. That is what prompted my question.

Mr. John Roberts (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I welcome the remarks of the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), particularly that part which, as he said at the beginning, was essentially intended to be constructive. He raised two questions. The first is the question as to what in fact the premier of Quebec did say.

There appears to be a certain conflict between the newspaper evidence which he cited and what the minister reported the Premier of Quebec said. I suggest, however, that that is not the important question. Upon occasion journalists make slips of the pen and on occasion politicians make slips of the tongue. I myself have even been known on occasion to make a slip of the tongue. But really the issue is not what the Premier said but whether in fact the programs are working effectively in the province of Quebec and in the Maritimes.

I submit that if one visits Quebec and sees some of the work that has been done under the programs of the department, one can see that there has been a successful resolution to many of the efforts of the department. I would say that that is true also in the Atlantic provinces, although in my new position I have not yet had the opportunity to visit that area. However, I hope to visit it tomorrow if it becomes sufficiently free from fog so that the plane can land.

Mr. McGrath: Shame.

Mr. Roberts: Since the hon. member is here, there is hope it would not be as fogbound as it might have been.

Mr. McGrath: Only Ottawa is fogbound.

Mr. Roberts: According to my telephone conversations, St. John's is fogbound as well. I find it difficult to understand, the hon. member being here.

There have been criticisms of the department and we welcome them. It gives us a chance to reassess the program which is now in its third year. As the minister has often said, the time spent on this program in terms of successful efforts can only be judged over a 15-year period. No one has ever contended that the efforts of the department will solve problems overnight, like a magic wand, or even in the space of two or three years resolve the problems of regional disparity which have faced this country for over a century. But I am convinced that the various reports which we have received from the Atlantic Development Council and from APEC have been helpful.

We certainly do not agree with all the criticisms levelled against the government. Nor, I would suggest, have these bodies, as the hon. member contends, always unanimously opposed the government's program. For instance, interesting statements have been made in support of the program by representatives of the city of St. John's at the APEC conference. There has been some support and some opposition to what the department is doing. We hope to take into account those criticisms which are constructive, which will enable us to improve programs which we offer, and to continue what has already proved successful in the area of regional development.

HEALTH—FAMILY PLANNING CONFERENCE—REQUEST FOR PUBLICITY CAMPAIGNS BECAUSE OF INCREASE IN ILLEGITIMATE BIRTHS

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): As I indicated the other day, I welcome the minister's announcement that a National Family Planning Conference is to be held in February of next year. Also, I was glad to hear his answer to my question asking which organizations would be invited to participate. I understand that just about every organization of a voluntary nature, in the private area, of which we are aware has in the past shown interest in this subject. The Minister's speech in Halifax last Friday to the annual meeting of the Family Planning Federation of Canada gives further hope of government action, promising as it did to ask Parliament, probably next month, for additional manpower and money for family planning purposes. It is indeed welcome news.

However, I am pursuing the matter further tonight because I am deeply concerned about the need for swift and far reaching action in the matter of family planning. Figures issued by the minister's department last September are a frightening forecast of the future we can expect if we fail to initiate vigorous action without delay. In the 20 years before 1959 the illegitimate birth rate in Canada fluctuated between 3.8 per cent and 4 per cent of live births, except for the war years when it rose fractionally. But in 1959 it started a steady climb year by year until it reached 9.2 per cent of live births in 1969. Almost one-tenth of Canadian babies born in 1969 were illegitimate. To whom were they born? More then three-quarters of them were born to girls and women between the ages of 15 and 24.

One thinks of the effect on these mothers, many of them teenagers. One thinks of the effect on these unwanted babies, some handed over to institutions, some battered in common law marriages, some developing into delinquents and criminals and, of course, some finding good foster homes. One thinks of the cost to the community, not only in taxes but in the tragic lowering of security and citizenship standards. One thinks of all these things and agrees with the sober words of the report that this illegitimacy figure "indicates the great need for an educational program in family planning that would begin at the elementary school level."

Who is to initiate such a program? Obviously its implementation will require the co-operation of all levels of government as well as voluntary associations. But the responsibility for initiating the program is clearly that of the federal government. The report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women has a number of excellent recommendations, including the one "that birth control information be available to everyone." Further, it recommends that "the Department of National Health and Welfare (a) prepare and offer birth control information free of charge to provincial and territorial authorities, associations, organizations and individuals and (b) give financial assistance through national health grants and national welfare grants to train health and welfare workers in family planning techniques."

As far as I am aware the department has thus far given financial assistance to only two family planning organizations, in the total amount of $125,000. Such an amount is only a start. Of course, it will be costly to bring birth control information and help to the people of Canada. We are getting a late start. After all, birth control was a criminal offence in this country between 1892 and 1969—three-quarters of a fast changing century. We must make up for a lot of lost time.

A government that could find $9 million to finance the B and B Commission and nearly $3½ million to finance the Prices and Incomes Commission could surely manage to find comparable revenues to help women avoid compulsory pregnancy, to prevent the arrival in the world of unwanted babies and to cut down the great numbers of abortions. legal and illegal, that will continue to swell until people get the information and the contraceptives that will enable them to plan, space and limit their families.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport): Mr. Chairman, for the third time in a few weeks the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) has brought up family planning. We know her deep concern with that issue. However, it seems quite strange to us that the hon. member should seem unaware of the activities of the Department of National Health and Welfare in that field, since she is constantly bringing up the matter. The government has a family planning program which has been described many times right here in the House.

The conference to which the hon. member referred in her question of November 17 is to group close to 250 delegates here in Ottawa next February. These delegates will be representing provincial groups, health and welfare groups, volunteer organizations and citizens' groups, all dedicated to the cause of family planning. This national conference—the first of its kind—will afford an excellent opportunity for delegates to exchange their experiences. Among other things, the conference will deal with the training of personnel in that field, the needs for research as well as information. It will review the various existing programs so as to better direct the development of future programs.

On November 19, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) made an important speech at the annual meeting of the Canadian Federation of Family Planning, in Halifax. He said, among other things, that this conference would be an excellent opportunity for participants to consider the place that family planning should occupy in a broader context of training for family life. The report that the Vanier Institute of the Family published in April 1971 indicated that only 31 per cent of schools being surveyed proposed some kind of training for family life. However, a survey made by the Canadian Press and published in October 1971 points to constant progress in this field over the past three or four years. The method and content vary considerably from one school to the next; courses, seldom compulsory, are often optional or extra-curricular. The subject is generally part of a course on hygiene, integrated into lessons on domestic orientation. They give outlines of the biology of reproduction and a complete course on the growth and maturation process, family relationships and responsibilities, and tensions which are felt inside the family and the community. According to the report by the Vanier Institute of the Family, educators are mainly concerned with training teachers and inserting free time periods in the programs. This raises the question of the responsibility for the education for family life in our schools, and that of the practice of this education.

School boards, conscious of the importance of this matter, develop at an ever increasing rate these programs which are now part of the curriculum. It is to be hoped that these programs of training for family life will become more and more popular and constitute at least a partial solution to the tragic problem of illegitimate births.

PRIVILEGE

MR. KNOWLES (WINNIPEG NORTH CENTRE)—ALLEGED DEROGATORY REFERENCE TO PUBLIC SERVICE BY PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege, notice of which I sent to Your Honour. In Hansard of yesterday, which reached us this morning, a statement is recorded that was made yesterday which I am afraid got lost in the chaos but which in my view constitutes a question of privilege, at least for many of us in this House of Commons. I raise this matter not in any desire to enter into a confrontation but in the hope that it might be resolved quickly. As recorded on page 9805 of Hansard for yesterday, the Prime Minister, in the course of answering a question, said:

If individuals in the Public Service, egged on by the opposition in many cases—

Then there follow about a dozen lines of various interjections, after which the Prime Minister again got the floor and said:

If individuals throughout the Public Service decide to take justice into their own hands and set themselves above those elected to represent the people, I think this is a very serious thing for the country, not for the government.

My point of privilege, sir, is that many of us in this House have been here for many years and if there is one thing that we have learned in Ottawa it is that we have a Public Service than which there is none better. To my knowledge, individuals throughout the Public Service are as loyal as they can be to their ultimate employers, the people of Canada, and in particular to their immediate employer, the government.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member. He has to indicate for the benefit of the Chair in what way what he is saying now can be a breach of parliamentary privilege. He has indicated that perhaps someone else's privileges might have been breached, but I should like the hon. member to indicate why he feels there is a breach of either his own privileges or those of hon. members generally.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Since we in this House have many dealings with the Public Service and since they cannot speak for themselves I think it is a matter of privilege on our part when those in whom we have confidence are maligned in this way. I feel that at the earliest opportunity this statement by the Prime Minister, which was so broad in that he referred to individuals throughout the Public Service, should be corrected. I do not move a motion that it be referred to committee for investigation. I simply make an earnest plea to the Prime Minister that he now correct the statement he made yesterday.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have a very easy ruling to make. I suggest to the hon. member that there is no relationship at all between the suggestion he has made now for the consideration of the Chair and a question of parliamentary privilege. I suggest to the hon. member that the matter might be a question of debate, but it cannot possibly be considered by way of breach of parliamentary privilege. That is the ruling I have to make.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN FIFTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena) moved:

That the Fifth Report of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, presented to the House, Wednesday, June 30, 1971, be concurred in.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I think what I should probably do at the outset is to make the suggestion that, because the report to which this motion refers is one of great fundamental importance and of great concern not only to the Indian people but to the country generally, Parliament might consider voting on it today. During the course of the debate, if it is not adjourned, perhaps the House leaders might meet and come to some conclusion about a time allocation order so that Parliament can express an opinion with respect to this unanimous report by one of its committees on this subject matter inasmuch as I am sure none of the members of the government would disagree with the opinions expressed in the report.

Within the last few days the subject of educational opportunities and facilities for our native Indian people has been brought into pretty sharp focus. True, it has been a matter of concern to the parliamentary committee that made the report for some two or three years, during which it held extensive hearings, listened to numerous representations and obviously, from the tenor of the content of the report, considered the subject in even greater depth than many committees consider the subject matters that are referred to them. It is also a matter that has been inquired about in the House from time to time since the report was tabled.

Perhaps I might refer to one specific point which helped to bring the question noticeably and pointedly to public attention. I refer to the publicity in which the Indian Association of Alberta has been involved within the last few days relating to an earlier presentation the association made to the government of Canada, to all parties represented in the House, I believe, and to members of the standing committee. The members of this association made a very worth-while, well thought-out, well documented presentation in March, 1970, seeking to have established an Indian educational and cultural complex in the province of Alberta, operated by and for the benefit of the Indian people in that province. The plan for that complex was a very impressive one and very imaginative.

No member who sat in on any of the meetings or made any examination of the plan had anything but the highest of praise for the concepts behind it. It reflected the concern and the depth of feeling that only a group of people can have about themselves. It reflected a depth of feeling that only a group of people can show when they are intimately concerned about their own well-being and their own future. I think we all know, Mr. Speaker, that in order to try to develop, stimulate and promote any pride in a group of people or in their culture we must have a preliminary step such as the educational-cultural concept contained within this plan, with the hope that it will provide greater opportunity for the individuals who take part in the educational system to absorb a larger measure of knowledge than otherwise might be the case, and to have a greater degree of self-respect.

The government response to this plan was one of relative silence except the general cliché retort that the matter was "under study" and that in due course, or whenever a conclusion was reached, a public announcement would be made. I understand that on the 29th day of July this year the cabinet made a generally favourable determination with regard to educational-cultural institutions and programs for Indian people operated by and for themselves and for their own advancement. Apropos of that decision they concluded that since the Indian Association of Alberta, in March, 1970, was the first to present a proposal for a cultural-educational centre the pilot stage of that proposal should be the first to be considered for approval by a particular standing subcommittee of the cabinet.

The concept within that cabinet decision was that in the fiscal year 1971-72 $2 million would be available. We are now two-thirds of the way through that fiscal year. Some supplementary estimates were tabled a few days ago, and one would assume that, if the government intended to put money behind the concept, behind its decision, some provision would have been contained in those estimates for the first stage of the proposal by the Indian Association of Alberta. I have not been able to find any such amount in looking through the supplementary estimates. We all realize the supplementary estimates are phrased in such a way that it is often difficult to extract full knowledge of what is contained therein, but as I can read the proposals in those estimates there is nothing pertaining to this matter.

The cabinet decision of July also determined that $10 million would be available over the next five years funded equally between the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Department of the Secretary of State. Involved in that decision was the necessity of a decision on the mechanics necessary to implement the plan. In other words, to carry forward into actual accomplishment the decision that the cabinet made on July 29 a decision had to be made on the putting into effect and administration of the plan, not for the purpose of denying what cabinet had decided but for putting into effect what cabinet had decided, by the interdepartmental committee on Indian and Eskimo policy.

I should like to direct the House to yesterday's Hansard where this question was dealt with in what I think was a rather shallow approach on the part of the government and the minister in particular. As found on page 9802 of Hansard the Leader of the Opposition asked this question:

I specifically ask why a meeting of the interdepartmental committee on Indian and Eskimo affairs—

I assume he was talking about the interdepartmental committee on Indian and Eskimo policy which would presumably be one and the same thing.

—called to consider the recommendation of the standing subcommittee on the Alberta proposal, was cancelled?

The minister replied as follows, and perhaps for fear of being accused of only presenting that part which supports a particular position, I should read it all.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, I do not sit on that committee, so I do not know if the sittings have been cancelled. I can tell the hon. member that we have been discussing this subject for months with the officials of the Department of the Secretary of State and with the representatives of various Indian organizations in Canada but no conclusion has been reached yet.

I think it is well known that the minister does not sit on interdepartmental committees. These committees normally operate within the Public Service structure. I point out to the House and the minister the simple fact that the chairman of that interdepartmental committee on Indian and Eskimo affairs is the minister's own deputy minister, Mr. Robinson. He is the chairman of that interdepartmental committee on Indian and Eskimo affairs. Yet the minister had the effrontery to stand up in the House yesterday and say what he did. Technically, in replying to the question, he told the truth. But how does he know if what he said is right? He does not sit on the committee. What is going on, Mr. Speaker? Does the deputy minister operate in a vacuum? Does the minister now know what his deputy is doing in attempting to put into effect government policy?

The cabinet made a decision on July 29 and said, "Yes, we endorse the concept of educational-cultural centres for Indian people; yes, we think the Indian Association of Alberta's first stage of such a proposal should be endorsed and accepted; yes, we think we should put up $2 million in 1971-72 and $10 million in certain subsequent years." I would think that a minister who is at all concerned about what goes on in his department would know what his deputy minister is doing, especially if that deputy is the chairman of an interdepartmental committee that is supposed to put into effect a government program. Perhaps the minister is ignorant of what is happening in his department. Perhaps he is not all that concerned about what goes on. Perhaps somebody in his department is trying to subvert the decision of cabinet and deny to these people the opportunities that would be available to them as a result of the cabinet decision.

I think the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has indulged in a sort of specious covering-up. He should not have done that. He is a nice gentleman, a kind gentleman, a decent sort of chap, Mr. Speaker, and really he should have known better. He should have told us what the interdepartmental committee was doing and what the deputy minister was doing with respect to cabinet policy in that area. Were they putting it into effect or were they denying cabinet the right to put that proposal into effect?

One could make allowances for what happened if this were a relatively minor, insignificant matter, but it is not. It involves a very fundamental and important question, namely, the educational opportunities of a few hundred thousand people in this country, the educational opportunities for a whole growing generation of Indian people. Education is the fundamental base which must be provided before the Indian people can fully advance, make progress and develop some self-respect. It is only in this way that they can be given the chance to make a go of it by themselves and for themselves.

In view of the importance of the subject, surely the minister ought to have some knowledge as to what the deputy minister is or is not doing in this area. He should know, especially, if the deputy minister is operating in such a way as to obstruct government policy or put obstacles in the way of its implementation. It is either that, or the minister is somewhat dumb about what is happening within his department.

There has been deliberate delay, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps there is some real reason why cabinet can make a decision on July 29, set out within the cabinet minute relating to that decision the full details regarding funding, the concepts and extension of this program over a four or five year period, and then delay the implementation of that program. Having spent years considering the matter, having spent months, as the minister said, in talking about it with the Secretary of State and with the Indian people, and having got to the point of making a decision to put the plan into effect, perhaps there is some reason why they do not want to do so at this time.

Knowing the way this government operates, and the precision of mind it has about events that are likely to happen next year, I am inclined to think they are more concerned about the impact such a program will have upon the Indian people at election time than now. Is that what this is? Election bait? It would not surprise me one bit. For the minister to operate in that way would be quite in keeping with the activities of a number of his colleagues who are more concerned about politics and political support than they are about benefits to the general public. I cannot see any other reason for it except incompetence, and the minister is not incompetent. We all know that. That sort of reasoning is a pretty big insult to the intelligence of the native Indian people. How can you expect them to fall for that?

I do not want to get too far into the area dealt with by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I am referring to cabinet documents and the disclosure of what they contain or the leakage of them to the general public. I would not do this at all except Your Honour said this might more appropriately be a subject matter for debate than a question of privilege. There is something revealing in the attitude of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who we know is the head of the government. I will not read the quotation again. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre did that when he raised the question of privilege. It is true that the comment was made with regard to a query relating to the Gray report and not about this cabinet document of July 29, although they both fall in the same class. In other words, they are so-called confidential documents or documents which the government classed as confidential but which subsequently became public.

The remarks of the Prime Minister, which possibly are reflected in a decision of the government to put off dealing with this very important educational-cultural project, were both offensive and derogatory to a great many people in the Public Service. They indicate that the Prime Minister is very ambidextrous. He is able to use the tar brush and the whitewash brush with equal dexterity.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. My understanding is that the hon. member's motion relates to the fifth report of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I have read that report. I have it before me. I consider it a very important matter and I am sure the hon. member does also. Perhaps he might like to limit his remarks to the subject matter of the motion which, as I have said, relates to a very specific report of the standing committee dealing with very specific problems.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Yes, indeed, Mr. Speaker. I am well aware of that, as is every member of the House. The document to which I referred, namely, the cabinet committee minute on social policy, a record of the committee decision regarding native cultural-educational centres, has a direct relationship to the report that Your Honour mentioned and which Your Honour has read. Your Honour may not have read the cabinet document in relation thereto but that document, which was classified as confidential, sought to put into effect one of the aspects mentioned in the committee report. Admittedly I am referring to a matter that was raised yesterday. Nevertheless, I wonder whether the Prime Minister has similar views about the leakage of this document and whether he wants to indicate what a small-statured man he is by casting the same reflection on those people in the Public Service and absolving and whitewashing the cabinet, all the executive assistants and all the staff within the ministers' offices, none of whom are exempted from the concept that they might have leaked this particular document.

This is somewhat connected to the report of the committee in light of the fact that there has been what may be classified as a school strike in northern Alberta. In other words, a group of citizens, parents belonging to the three bands in question, decided to keep their children from attending school. Your Honour might wonder why this was done. It was not an ordinary action. It was an extraordinary action which I believe was predicated upon an extraordinary situation. The decision to keep the children out of school was taken in consequence of serious objections about living conditions, sanitary conditions and school facilities on those reserves. My hon. friend from Comox-Alberni was there. He attended meetings of the people and took a close look at the situation which had resulted in the decision of those parents to keep their children out of school.

• (2:30 p.m.)

The parents took that decision because they saw in it the only possible hope they had to bring pressure upon the minister to carry out his duties and responsibilities which up until that time he had abdicated and refused to carry out.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gibson: He had not.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Somebody on the backbenches over there who has regaled us with his ignorance before has done it again. I tell the House this, Mr. Speaker: the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development as a representative of the Crown has certain duties and responsibilities to discharge with respect to these three bands. He did not carry them out and that is why the parents took their children out of school. I say to the minister: you are responsible for Indian affairs, how about accepting that responsibility? That is what these people are saying.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gibson: Look in the mirror.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): There is another question involved here. It is a fundamental one, aside from the aspect I have raised. It is the question of treaty rights. Let those howling jackals in the background remember that this is fundamental before they start crying about responsibilities. The Indians in these three bands looked at the treaties which we signed and concluded that there is contained in them a responsibility to build schools on the reserves and to pay for the services of teachers. They are not talking about the type of schools which might have been built in the days when those treaties were signed. They are talking about modern-day schools. That is what the committee report talked about too, Mr. Speaker. It talked about a modern educational system, about the responsibility of the federal government, and said this matter should remain the responsibility of the federal government. Moreover, the committee recommended unanimously that the government should cease and desist from its attempts to slough off these educational responsibilities on the provinces.

This is why the people belonging to these bands decided to take their children out of school. It was in an effort to get a fair shake. The minister has classified their action as blackmail. He said he was being blackmailed and that as a consequence he did not intend to do anything further. Mr. Speaker, since when has it been blackmail to ask someone to live up to his honour, to respect treaties which are in existence, to carry out his responsibilities and discharge the high duties of ministerial office in an effective manner? But the minister howled "blackmail" and shut his door and stayed in Ottawa while saying on the floor of the House, as I gather he said elsewhere: "My door is open any time". I mentioned this to one of the members of the Indian Association of Alberta yesterday and he said:

"You bet the minister's door is open. And it opens from the inside."

The minister did not care enough about his responsibilities to go to the communities involved and see the situation at first hand or to talk to the Indians concerned and find out what was happening and whether he could do something directly. The cry of blackmail is simply the refuge of a person found delinquent in his duties. Oh, they had a meeting. They had a meeting in Winnipeg on mutual ground. I understand it was promoted by people who were neither in the government nor in the Indian Association of Alberta nor in any of the three bands involved in an attempt to find some area of neutrality within which an attempt could be made to resolve the problem. I understand that the minister attended but that he did not engage in any meaningful conversation with the people there. Rather, he repeated the declaration he had made earlier: You send the children back to school and I will then come and attend to you; when you alter the manner in which you are presenting your legitimate demands and let me carry out my duties and responsibilities, then I will come.

Certain allegations were made in the House yesterday. Whether those allegations had been made or not, whether or not there is any connection between the decision of the parents in those three bands to keep their children out of school in an attempt to force the minister to meet his obligations and the decision taken by the government not to put into effect the first stage of the Indian educational centre complex to which it had agreed on July 29—

An hon. Member: Get to the point.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): The minister denied there was any connection. As reported at page 9803 he said in response to a question by the hon. member for Athabasca about this very matter, whether or not there was a connection between the two:

> Mr. Speaker, the two parts of this question are totally unrelated and I have already indicated why the program is not ready yet.

The second part of the answer is not true to fact. If you go back in Hansard you will find the minister gave no reason for the program not being ready. He said he had been discussing it for months but had not made a decision. It was not ready because the minister had failed to reach a decision. He wanted to hold it off for the sake of one political advantage or another.

The point is this. The minister said there was no connection. But something very revealing happened. Hansard does not record this because Hansard does not contain pictures. Yesterday I sought to obtain the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion to give the minister authority to leave the chamber so he could proceed to Alberta to meet with the Indian people there, and expressing the hope that such meeting would result in a favourable solution to the problems confronting the Indian people. I did not succeed in obtaining unanimous consent to move that motion, but the revealing part, the part which Hansard did not and could not record, was that while I was presenting that motion the minister, with a wave of the hand up to the gallery, indicated that they were here. And do you know who was in the gallery, Mr. Speaker? I am told it was executive officers of the Indian Association of Alberta. My motion dealt with the possibility of the minister going to Alberta to talk to the people in those three bands whose children were out of school. The minister said that there was no connection between one subject and the other, but the moment I raised it there was a connection. The officials of the Indian Association of Alberta were here. So there is a connection in the mind of the minister. There is a connection in the mind of the princely secretary to the Prime Minister. What is his name?

An hon. Member: Lalonde.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): A secretarial prince, I am told. So let me repeat that there is a connection in the mind of the government between one situation and the other, and one was used in retaliation for action taken in the other, if it was not for political purposes.

• (2:40 p.m.)

On October 6 the president of the Indian Association of Alberta, Harold Cardinal, sent a telegram to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) and to M. Lalonde, secretary to the Prime Minister. So that it is on the record and I am not accused of extracting something that I distort—

Mr. Osler: Is that your own copy?

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Certainly. It is in my hand; and if I may enlighten the hon. gentleman, who appears to have such a lack of knowledge of these matters, it was given to me yesterday. We in this party take an interest in the education of Indian children even though Liberal members apparently do not.

Mr. Osler: Your halo is off centre a little.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): If hon. members opposite would open their ears and close their mouths, perhaps they would learn something.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) has the floor and is addressing the House on a motion that is legitimately before the House. The hon. member should be given the opportunity of making his presentation. There are so many conversations going on at the present time, even as I am trying to bring order to the House, that it is difficult for the Chair to follow the hon. member's speech.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): I had noticed that fact myself, Mr. Speaker. I did not want to comment on it or to do anything embarrassing, because the great bulk of these conversations come from gentlemen in the Liberal benches opposite, which is an indication that they are not interested in the subject matter under debate.

Mr. Prud'homme: What is the subject under debate?

Mr. Howard (Skeena): If my hon. friend will listen to the telegram, I will read it. To the parliamentary secretary let me say that, unlike him, I have not stood in this House, as he did the other night, and told a deliberate falsehood about manpower figures. However, I do not want to digress.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Obviously, even Your Honour is held in great disrespect by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Howard (Skeena): They are even applauding that remark Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration rises on a point of order. However, before recognizing him, I should like to remind hon. members that it would be preferable that the conversations I now hear on both sides of the House be carried on behind the curtains. It is extremely difficult to follow the debate when the members are busy talking.

The hon. parliamentary secretary now has the floor.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

I can understand why the hon. member wants to have as many falsehoods as possible appear in Hansard, but I should like him very much to tell the House where, when and how I have misled the House in answering a question?

[English]

Mr. Howard (Skeena): That degree of sensitivity indicates guilt to me, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, I understand that my arrogance will never equal that of the hon. member and I simply wish to point out that he is deliberately making an untrue statement when he says that I have attempted to mislead the House the other day by quoting some figures. I think that the hon. member—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Skeena is suggesting that the parliamentary secretary has deliberately misled the House. He has, of course, no right to say that. It is unparliamentary. The parliamentary secretary has said that the hon. member has deliberately misled him and the House. I wonder where this kind of exchange is leading. I suggest to the hon. member who has the floor that he should try as much as possible to concentrate on the motion.

It was my impression that this was an important matter and that the hon. member might want to deal with the report that he has moved. I suggest that he has no right to suggest that the parliamentary secretary or any other member has deliberately misled the House. I repeat, that is entirely unparliamentary and the hon. member has no right to say it. In the same way, the parliamentary secretary has no right to say what he said. I would invite both hon. members to keep that in mind, and I suggest that at this point we should return to the motion before the House, which some time ago I thought had to do with an important report about which I have not heard very much during the last few minutes.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): The first part of your remarks, Mr. Speaker, was quite correct and I withdraw my reference to its being deliberate. It has been drawn to my attention that I have only a few minutes left, so I will not bother reading the telegram. I was interrupted many times in my attempt to read it. Let me simply say that the response that the principal secretary, or whatever he is called, to the Prime Minister gave to the president of the Indian Association of Alberta was both offensive to and derogatory of the president of the association and contributed to the gulf of misunderstanding, which is a point I also made yesterday.

Let me refer to what the report of the committee is attempting to do, what it is trying to correct, and to put this in general, historic perspective. Indian children have for many years gone through an educational program in which they have been treated to a second or even third-class education since the qualifications of their teachers were of much lower standard than those of the teachers available to the province. Any teacher who could not fit into the provincial scheme by reason of not being qualified, however incompetent they might be as teachers, could always find a haven in the education branch of Indian affairs. That was the situation some years ago.

In many respects the Indian people were punished for using their own language in certain schools that were operated by the federal government. They were given the feeling that as a group of individuals they were inferior. Their needs now probably require a much greater degree of education than the needs of the rest of society in order to counterbalance this inferiority feeling and to assist them to develop self-respect. We must try to establish for them a pride in their inheritance and reverse the damage done by teaching them trades and skills and by giving them the qualifications necessary to take their part in the economic activities of this nation.

The report of the committee also recognized that we must try to depart from the so-called general, white, middle-class standards and values of teachers generally who teach in Indian schools, that we should try to attempt to teach Indian standards to Indian children rather than ignoring them. We should try to teach skills and trades that will reverse and correct a situation where the drop-out rate among Indian school children is now four times the national average. We must try to correct a situation where 50 per cent, to use a general, rounded figure, of the adult Indian population is unemployed and unable to find work.

I do not want to go through the committee's report point by point, but it does have a number of very worth-while and valuable sections. One recommends that over a phased period of five years we start pre-school instruction to children in the three-year age group, recognizing the necessity for bending over backward to ensure that the younger children are fully prepared to enter the educational system proper. It also recommends that language instruction at the pre-school level and in the first and second years of primary school should be in their native tongue initially, with either English or French as the secondary language, and that the curriculum in the federal program should include and emphasize more the question of Indian history, the question of Indian culture, its music, its art and its value system in order to instil the degree of pride which is necessary. Another section of the report relates directly to the decision of parents who keep their children out of school. It reads:

[Mr. Speaker.]

—the government must immediately and in full consultation and partnership with the Indian and Eskimo people of Canada develop a federal education system as free from the deficiencies afflicting our present program as is humanly possible, and to this end your committee recommends—

Then they make certain recommendations which are contained in the report. People in a free society—this is what Indian people are in theory—can advance and be free only if their institutions are free. They can develop self-respect only if they are shown self-respect; for example, if the educational system in which they work and learn promotes the concept of self-respect. The Indian people have been the group most disadvantaged and discriminated against in Canada's history. The government, with its preoccupation about other matters, refuses to recognize the cultural and aboriginal rights of the Indian people and attempts to fit everyone into a slide-rule school. As I have said, the minister is a decent guy—but why doesn't he try to do some decent things?

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, it gives me a good deal of pleasure to rise in support of the motion of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard). The report in question was studied by the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development. After the hearing of many witnesses it was unanimously agreed to by the committee. I am anxious to hear the comments of members on the other side of the House on this question.

I believe it is fair to say that in a few areas this government's notion of a just society is a shambles and a farce in respect of the native people of Canada. In its insensitivity and basic intention, the government has attempted to impose upon the native people policies which do not meet their real needs or their legitimate aspirations. This approach and lack of action has been confirmed by the failure of the government to engage in genuine consultation with representatives of the native people and to develop a substantive program to help overcome their many difficulties.

I think it is fair to say that 15 or 20 years ago it was thought that integration of Indian students with students in our urban or large centres was perhaps the answer and would produce a significant number of Indian graduates. I think 15 years ago the Indian people themselves thought this might be the solution to an educational program which previously had not been successful. However, after a trial period—and I believe 15 years is a reasonable period—of attempting to integrate Indian students with other students in our schools this program has proven to be a disaster. We need only consider the number of drop-outs of Indian students. When we see a drop-out rate of 94 per cent this is in no way an indication of a successful educational system. I think we can also say with some degree of assurance that the present policy of the government in no way promises to relieve this problem.

Mr. Speaker, I have met hundreds of Indian people. I have been in their homes, in their community halls and other places. Some of the meetings were attended by 100, 200 or 300 people. On these occasions one could look around and ask oneself how many teachers, engineers, lawyers and doctors were in the group. One might ask oneself how many of these people got past grade 12 or even grade 5.

Then one must ask the reasons for this. The reasons are, obviously, that the solutions so far put forward have been an absolute failure from the point of view of graduating Indian students into the professions I have mentioned. Some people in the past have expressed their discrimination against Indians by suggesting that the fault lies with the Indians themselves. They suggest, also, that perhaps Indians do not have the intelligence, that maybe they do not have the desire or the ambition. I think this kind of answer is too easy and too slick and it is not true.

Mr. Alexander: You are right.

Mr. Yewchuk: I think it has been shown by many research people that the intelligence of the average Indian is no different from that of the average person. Given the fact that their intelligence is the same, we must accept the fact that the Indian people are interested in sending their children to school in order that they may obtain the education necessary for them to enter the professions and trades in order to look after themselves and their families. Given that situation, we must come back to the question of why they are not getting through school.

The answer, obviously, is that there must be something wrong with the system to which they are exposed. What is wrong with the system? It could be that these people have never been meaningfully involved in the system of education. We might consider the fact, for example, that in some parts of the country the Indian people cannot sit on school boards. This means that they have no influence over the kind of teachers hired or the kind of curriculum to which students are exposed. In general they have nothing to say about the subject matters which might be of interest to students.

As a result, the Indian people over the past few years have said, "This is enough," since they have suffered this kind of injustice for 200 years or more. They say it is time they took things into their own hands. I think that is fair enough. They say to us that we have been running their educational system for 100, 200 or 300 years and it has been a complete failure in respect of Indian students graduating from school.

They also say they want a chance to do it their own way. They want to have a say in who the teachers are. They want to screen the teachers in order to see whether there is the kind of prejudice which would make them unsuitable for teaching their children. They want to know whether the teachers have an understanding of the Indian way of life, so that they may be effective in an Indian community. The Indian people want to have an influence on the kind of curriculum their children are exposed to. They want to ensure that there are none of the old prejudices against Indians such as we read of in textbooks which portray the Indian as a savage, lurking around in a loincloth with feathers on his head. This is still the kind of image that many of our books depict about the Indian population. Just imagine your child, Mr. Speaker, seeing portrayed in his school this image of his father and grandfather. I think it is very easy to understand that it is a degrading experience for a child to have this kind of image wrongly and constantly portrayed.

We had some success a year ago in the area of giving Indian people a little more say in their educational system. The school at Blue Quills, northeastern Alberta, was turned over to Indian control on an experimental basis. An education council was set up by the Indian people which is the equivalent of the school board and has had complete control over this school for the past year. They are now in their second year of teaching and I think I can say with assurance, after talking to some of the teachers, to some students and to some members of the education council, that it shows great promise. Innovations brought in by the people who are directly involved have already, in such a short time, shown evidence of tremendous progress in the education of the students who are attending the school.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yewchuk: Let me turn for a moment to the strike which is now going on in northeastern Alberta, at least technically if not in fact. I think this is one of the greatest blots on the performance of this minister.

Mr. McCleave: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yewchuk: The signs of discontent were there a year ago because the Frog Lake Indians pulled their children out of school for a week or two as an indication that they were serious about wanting better facilities with which to educate their children. They wanted the things which I have been discussing. But the minister paid no attention to them. The strike was ended but the situation brewed for another year.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Yewchuk: They wanted to give the minister another year to negotiate, to try to communicate with him and to make him understand the problem. They wanted him to agree sincerely to try to do something about the problem. No progress was made. I think this is unfortunate.

The chiefs and the people of the three reserves involved feel that it is most unfortunate that before this government listens one has to resort to civil disobedience. Civil disobedience is the only thing which made this minister notice that there were Indians in northeastern Alberta. I think this is a shameful record.

In raising in the House the matter of education in northeastern Alberta on many occasions we tried to point out to the minister that settling this question at the beginning of the strike would have been a simple matter. All the Indians wanted at that time was for the minister to go down and say to them sincerely, "I see that you have a serious problem and I will try to do something about it".

Mr. Chrétien: Not true.

Mr. Yewchuk: That is what they wanted him to do. But he refused even to talk to them. He refused to acknowledge the fact that there was a problem.

Mr. Chrétien: Don't mislead the House.

Mr. Yewchuk: He simply said, "You are a bunch of blackmailers". That was his response and I think it is shameful. To get a little closer to what has been happening in the last two days with regard to blackmail, I say that if anybody has been guilty of blackmail it is the minister, because he has given his assurance to the Indian Association of Alberta of participation in certain projects such as the educational cultural centre which was constructed 40 miles west of Edmonton. This was approved by the cabinet. The Indian Association of Alberta spent approximately $160,000 in research and development for this project and then they waited for the rest of the funds. They hired academics, consultants, and so on, and when the time came to pay them there was no money to do so because the minister had changed his mind. He said that the government had not yet decided whether they were going to go ahead with this project.

I point out, Mr. Speaker, that the $160,000 spent on this project was money allocated by the department. So there seems to be a discrepancy there. In view of the telegram sent by the Prime Minister's secretary, to which the hon. member for Skeena referred, there is no doubt in my mind that what the minister was saying to the Indian people was, "If you want to get your money you had better send your children back to school". If that is not blackmail I do not know what is.

There were a couple of other programs for which money was not forthcoming as promised. I am referring to the sports program which was designed to develop athletes among the Indian population for competition in the Canada Games and even possibly in the Olympic Games. The funds for these programs were withheld. There was a joint program between the government and the Indian Association, namely, the community development program. Funds for that were withheld. I should like the minister to explain the reasons for withholding these funds.

Mr. Alexander: The minister is not listening.

Mr. Yewchuk: To take the matter a little further, the Indian people were at all times willing to negotiate with the minister and to prove this point they appointed two mediators, one from Ontario and one from Manitoba. These mediators succeeded in arranging a meeting between the chiefs from northeastern Alberta and the minister. The meeting took place. The purpose of the meeting was to have a preliminary discussion on how the problems could be resolved. The chiefs came to the meeting keeping in mind that it was to be a preliminary discussion. What did the minister do? He went there with seven or eight of his advisers and made a settlement with one of the chiefs from the smallest reserve, the one with the smallest demands. By this method he managed to drive a wedge into the strike. He sent the children of one reserve back to school and on the heels of that action the strike quickly broke down.

I was glad to see the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) sitting with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) a few minutes ago because the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern development referred to the strike as being blackmail. I hope that he had a chance to consult with the Minister of Labour on his view that the strike was blackmail, because how does this strike differ from any other strike?

The minister said he would not talk to the Indian people because if he did, all the Indian people in the country would go on strike and make all sorts of demands. This is possible and it might be a good idea. What is wrong with a strike by the Indian people to achieve that which they feel is necessary for themselves and their families? I cannot see how that can be more wrong than a strike by the postal union, by the farmers union or by any other union. This is simply one of the methods used in our society to help achieve settlement in areas where one is not forthcoming by any other method. It is a democratic method and I support it wholeheartedly.

I want to make a few more references to the fifth report of the Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development. What does it actually say? It reads in part:

• (3:10 p.m.)

—that something was drastically and basically deficient in an education system or systems with a school drop-out rate of more than four times the national average serving a population of which 40 per cent to 50 per cent of the adult males were unemployed or underemployed—

In the last couple of months, Mr. Speaker, there has been a great fuss in this House about a national unemployment rate of 7 per cent. The Indian people have been living with an unemployment rate of 40 per cent to 50 per cent, and in some communities it is 90 per cent or 100 per cent. Nothing is being done by the minister to solve this problem. He simply says, "We are doing what we can and some day we will solve it." That is not good enough.

Over the past three years the government verbally has indicated some good intentions. Members of the government told the Indian people that they wanted to talk to them, that they wanted the Indian people to tell them what they desired in order that the government could develop appropriate policies. Consultations were held with the Indian people and the government brought out a white paper—but it bore no resemblance to what the Indian people had requested during the consultative meetings.

Mr. Chrétien: You supported it in this House.

Mr. Yewchuk: One of the policies brought out by the minister was that the education of native peoples should be turned over to the provinces. I want to point out to the minister that this was not one of the demands of the Indian people. The committee studying this matter heard hundreds of witnesses from all interested organizations, Indian and non-Indian, teachers, students, parents, chiefs and braves. Anybody who wanted to say something had an opportunity to speak to the committee, and the committee in its report said:

The policy of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to drive towards the transfer of the educational program to the provinces was encouraged by the policy paper issued by the government, on Indian affairs, in June of 1969. The committee has noted both in testimony received by the committee and during visits to Indian and Eskimo communities a unanimity of Indian opinion that no transfer of Indian children into integrated schools or into provincial schools take place except with the consent and at the request of the majority of Indian parents in the communities concerned.

It also said:

In those schools remaining under the control of the education branch—

Which is in the vicinity of 35 per cent of the schools.

—the committee believes that the objectives of the federal schools should be the creation of models of excellence which will furnish to Indian and Eskimo young people an education which will provide to them equality of opportunity and the ability to be employed at every level of the economy of the regions in which they live.

Just to touch on some other points, I think it is fair to say that the crux of the whole report is contained in the following phrase:

That the government should continue its policy—

I do not believe it is the policy at the present time: unfortunately, this wording is not exactly right.

—that no transfers of education programs from the federal level of provincial systems take place without the express and clear approval of the majority of the parents in each community concerned.

I must take issue with the report in this respect because it says that the government should continue its policy that no transfers be made. This is not the government's policy. If it were, there would be no strike in northeastern Alberta. I remind the hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Sulatycky) that the strike there is because the Indian people refuse to have their children transferred to schools situated in larger towns off the reserves. The strike started because the government would not co-operate with the Indian people in achieving their desire to have the schools on the reserves improved and updated. So, Mr. Speaker, this is an inaccuracy in the report. The report also makes reference to cultural and language instruction. It recommends:

That all curriculums within the federal program be revised to include:

(a) Substantially more Indian history including Indian contributions to the economy, science, medicine, agriculture, exploration, etc.,

(b) Special courses in Indian culture, music, art, handicrafts, etc. and that pressure be brought upon the respective provincial systems to inaugurate similar reforms wherever Indian children are being taught.

The report recommends that language instruction policies should be reviewed. It says:

That the language of instruction at the pre-school level and up to the first or second year of primary school should be in the language of the local Indian or Eskimo community with secondary and tertiary languages English and/or French being introduced gradually through the pre-school and primary period and that courses linked to the local Indian or Eskimo culture continue to be taught in the local language throughout the primary level of school.

This is a very important matter because in many cases Indian communities are isolated; the children have not been taught either English or French. When they go to school their entire day is spent in learning English or French and as a result they lose a year or two because the first couple of years are taken up in their attempts to pick up the language of instruction. The children become discouraged because listening to a language they do not understand does not stimulate their interest sufficiently to create the proper motivation for them to stay in school as long as they should. I would refer hon. members who wish to know about the rest of the recommendations of the committee, to Votes and Proceedings of June 30, 1971.

I want to conclude by saying that because of poor planning, insensitive programming and severely limited opportunities, the standard of education available to most of the native peoples of Canada is abominable. Ninety-four per cent of the Indian and Eskimo children drop out of school before they reach grade 12, and the federal government is apparently attempting to phase out its program of support for Indian and Eskimo students who reach university. This is a disgraceful situation. It is in large part the result of the imposition on the native peoples of an educational system which is foreign to their culture and which does little more than cultivate alienation, frustration and resentment.

I would strongly recommend the establishment of a special task force, under the direction of qualified native people, which would develop teaching programs, curricula, text books and teaching aids which are relevant to the needs of and sensitive to the way of life of the native peoples. I would also support the establishment, wherever appropriate, of school boards composed entirely, or in large part, of the native peoples themselves with the power to hire teachers, design curricula and make similar decisions. Such school boards for the first time would involve the native peoples in their own educational programs and would greatly contribute to making their education more relevant and attractive to them.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make one or two comments about the minister, who seems to be losing interest in my remarks. I feel that he is not responding to the needs of the native peoples. He will not talk to the people whose affairs he is supposed to administer. It would be an understatement to say he has lost credibility with the native people. Therefore, I think he should be replaced. I think that the minister should be replaced by the minister responsible for housing. I have spoken to Indian people and they tell me they have had dealings with that minister, that he is a minister they can trust and that he understands their problems with more sympathy than the present minister. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I recommend that to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) before he loses more credibility than he is at present.

• (3:20 p.m.)

In conclusion, government policy which seeks to achieve a healthy, productive and economically secure life for the native people of Canada must respect their cultural heritage and aspirations. The Canadian Indian must be free to choose to live in or away from his native community without prejudicing the opportunities available to him to enjoy the standard of living and quality of life of other Canadians. In the formulation and operation of such policy our native people must be fully consulted and involved. The obligations of history must be met in a new approach to the problems of the native people of Canada, an approach which is sensitive, fair, constructive and is developed in active partnership with them.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, for the past one and a half hour, we have been hearing discussions on Indian affairs in Canada.

I have been listening carefully to the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) who has raised the matter of the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, as well as to the hon. member who has just resumed his seat.

I sincerely believe that the Indian problem is one of the most serious. I would even say that it is too serious to be made the subject of a political game in this House, and that we should not use the Indians as a political balloon. It is nice to say, for the record and for newspapers, how much we are concerned with Indians and Eskimos, but we should still keep a certain sense of honesty.

Last year I had the opportunity of going to Yellowknife where some Indians met the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien). I am not here to commend or flatter the minister when there is no reason for it. But last year when I went there, I noticed that the minister was seriously looking into problems met by Indians in northern Alberta and elsewhere in Canada. And I must say it publicly.

In the House reference is made to Indians in order to prove that the government has done nothing for them. Some members even attack the government, blaming federal officials and claiming that only one political party is on their side, etc.

Mr. Speaker, we have had enough of this political clowning. Indians deserve much better treatment than what they are getting nowadays in the House of Commons.

Last week while in Edmonton I was invited to appear on the Dave Ward show. Mr. Dave Ward, coming from an Eskimo family, discussed the Indian-Eskimo issue in Canada. These people are not asking us for our culture but rather want us to help them keep their own. They ask us permission to be themselves.

People say that Indians do not go to university, do not become lawyers, doctors or chartered accountants. However, those who want to become lawyers or go to university can do so. They are not forced to do it. It would not be a good thing to make it compulsory.

Eskimos and Indians in my area travel from the northern reaches of Hudson Bay by plane at the government's expense, to study in Rouyn-Noranda. They have no obligation but they are told: If you want, come. Those who are willing to study can do so. As for those who do not wish to study, let us help them remain where they are and keep on fishing and hunting.

I was listening recently to a program televised from Winnipeg during which I heard an Indian from northern Manitoba who was working in a plant in Winnipeg say that he was not interested in working there. He wanted to be able to live at home, in the woods and close to a lake, fishing and hunting because he has been brought up this way, this is his culture, what he has been trained for.

I understand that thousands of dollars are granted every year to Indians to help them live in suitable dwellings in northern Canada. There are certainly shortcomings. Nothing is perfect. If the progressive Conservatives are so kind to Indians, why did they not settle the Indian problem when they were in power?

When the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) who is sitting over there, was Prime Minister, people wearing feathers on their head sat in the galleries to protest against the government not taking action in the area of Indian affairs. Nothing could be done at the time but today they want to blame the whole thing on the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development saying that he is inefficient and should be replaced by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Andras), or by the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis). While we are about it we could replace him by just any one at all. It would not improve matters one whit.

Let us at least be objective. Let us make suggestions. We are dealing with education. There is an education problem. Are any of our teachers, whether from Ontario, Alberta, prepared to go and teach in the north of Manitoba or Quebec or wherever? It is a problem of teachers.

• (3:30 p.m.)

I think that instead of interfering to such a degree in the field of Indian education, the government should have left that to the Protestant and Catholic missionaries who looked after almost all Indians a few years ago and gave a better education than any government could give. Moreover, the missionaries were on the spot the year round. But they were left out. It would have cost much less to the government to help those missionaries—either Catholic or Protestant—who were ready to serve all Indian and Eskimo families. But we discouraged them, forced them to leave and replaced them by bureaucrats whose work is unsatisfactory most of the time because of their inefficiency.

I should like to repeat what Mr. Dave Ward said last week in Edmonton: "We do not ask you to give us your white culture. We do not want to become white people; we want to stay as we are. We do not want anything to be forced upon us. We want to be free; that is all we ask."

But in the House of Commons, for God's sake let us stop fooling with the Indian or Esquimo people and using them as a political stepping-stone to serve the political interests of some people. When a member rises in the House to say he is the only protector of Indian and Esquimo people, the only one to know the Esquimo problems, I feel disgusted. Truth still has its rights as well as honesty.

It is a good thing to make suggestions to the hon. minister. Should the hon. minister blunder, let us tell him. But let us not use the Indians in order to say: Listen, the Progressive Conservatives are better than you Liberals. The New Democratic Party members are superior because most of them are Indians.

The Indians can be used to serve one's petty political interest. In my opinion, the debate should be upgraded and not downgraded. We should offer logical suggestions. I repeat that I think the most logical suggestion was made last week by Mr. Dave Ward when he said that we should enable Indians who want it to further their education and those willing to remain as they are to keep on being hunters, fishermen, trappers and craftsmen. We should help them be themselves and not force them to be like us. This is what they want.

I therefore invite the hon. minister to consider not only the economic aspect, but also the social and cultural aspects of the Indian and the Eskimo situation, so that they feel more at home in Canada since, after all, they are similar to us and are living in the same country. Let us treat them as they want to be treated and let us stop blindly blaming those people who at least have the decency of doing their utmost to improve the plight not only of the Indians and the Eskimos but of the whole Canadian population.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I would like first of all—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I think the minister should be allowed to make his speeches.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I would like first of all to congratulate the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) for the courage he displayed in conveying his opinion whilst endeavouring this afternoon to raise the debate above petty politics.

I think it is most unfortunate that people would use this most difficult social problem in Canada for partisan politicking.

Since 1968, we have had hundreds of meetings and consultations with Indians. I have not taken the initiative of inviting members of the opposition to attend them.

When I was in the constituency of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) I invited him to accompany me to the meeting even if he is a member of the opposition so he could discuss with the Indian population.

When I was in the northern part of Alberta I invited the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) to come and discuss with the Indians.

It is a shame today to see those people stand up and try to—

[English]

Mr. Yewchuk: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: He can't take it.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I did not hear the minister correctly. He says he invited me to a meeting somewhere. I deny that I received any invitation from him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the problem of the hon. member for Athabasca is that he is always late. Last week he came in the House and asked a question relating to a problem in his own riding. The kids were already back at school and he was not even aware of it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr, Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Chrétien: This is debate.

Mr. Yewchuk: After the minister made that comment in the House the other day I went to my office, made a phone call to the reserves involved and learned that the kids were not at school.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danforth: The minister should get his facts straight.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I think the minister should be allowed to complete his remarks.

Mr. Woolliams: He should stick to the facts.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The point the hon. member for Athabasca raised was a point of debate. I do not think it was a question of privilege. If hon. members raise points of order or questions of privilege every time there is a difference of opinion, the House will not make any progress in its debates. Different interpretations might be put on statements of fact by various members of the House. If an hon. member is not satisfied with something another hon. member has said then, as long as the original remarks do not reflect personally on the hon. member, the hon. member who is not satisfied should seek the floor on another occasion and express his opinion.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, of course not all the kids were back to school. Yet 92 per cent of the kids at Saddle Lake are back at school, and all the Keeheewin kids are back at school. The kids at Cold Lake are not back in school. That means that 1,000 out of 1,275 are back. From the beginning I wanted to settle the strike and I want to tell the House today that the kids were on strike before I received any news or any demands by the Indians. I myself sent, in September, with the agreement of the Indian Association of Alberta, a representative there. He was supposed to be there in good faith. That is how it was accepted in my office by the parties. This representative, one of my assistants, went there to visit the northern reserve. When he arrived in Edmonton the same people who had agreed to have him go there and investigate facts had a demonstration against him at the airport. This is purely and simply politics of the worst type. This man had gone in good faith. He went to the reserve and when he came back he made a report to me. Within three hours of getting that report I gave orders to do what had to be done at that moment.

I said to the people of the Keeheewin reserve, "It is true; you need a new kindergarten and you will get it." Three hours after I received the report I said that. I sent them a telegram and told them that they will have up to grade 3 schooling on the reserve. That is what I decided three hours after I received the report. But the same people from the Indian Association of Alberta told them not to accept what we were doing because it was purely piecemeal. When I met the chief of the Keeheewin, Chief Gordon Young Chief, a good chief, he asked of me, at the meeting in Winnipeg that hon. members referred to, exactly what I had offered him on October 5. However, people were using the chief to play politics, and that is why I shall go before the committee tomorrow and give all the facts. We should nt play politics with this problem. It is too important a problem.

I have visited Indians in all the provinces and in all the different parts of Canada. I have visited all the Eskimo and Indian settlements in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon never before visited by a minister.

Mr. Woolliams: Surely that is not correct.

Mr. Chrétien: I sat with the Indians for hours and hours and listened to them. But the problem is very difficult; the problem of education is the most difficult problem. It is the government that has asked the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development to look into the question of education. They prepared a report which we received on June 30. An order of the House was given to the committee to look into this matter. We received the report a few months ago. We are studying it. There are many good things in the report. The members of the committee have done a hell of a good job. They did not act in a partisan way. I congratulate them for the good work they have done.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: I have said many times, as the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) said, that what the Indians want is to be socially and economically equal in Canada and culturally different. The government is not shy when it comes to admitting that it is trying to find more money for cultural centres for the Indians. We want to do something. However, we cannot spend millions of dollars without developing some criteria and rules for the administration of those moneys.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: Most of the Indian associations in Canada are very responsible. They are doing a good job. They try to do something good for their people. However, rather than negotiate with me in my office or elsewhere, some prefer to state their case over television. If they want to do it that way, that is their problem. However, that is not the way to do it. They say they are unable to meet the minister. They say they appeared over television because they did not receive a phone call to attend a meeting. They say they were not involved in the strike.

I stopped in Winnipeg. I am not shy. I said I would not meet the chiefs of the reserves because in conscience I was not satisfied that the purpose was to solve the problem. They only wanted to use these poor Indians of northern Alberta to serve their own purposes.

I hope that members will not only question me in committee tomorrow but will question the operations on the other side of the coin. I think some people are trying to develop some sort of bureaucracy of their own.

I talked to the chief of the Keeheewin reserve. I told him that I recognized there were many problems on his reserve. I asked him to tell me how many times the community development officers, who are paid by the Indian Association of Alberta, visited his reserve to help him. He replied that they had never been there. We have negotiated these agreements with the Indians in that province in order to give them an opportunity to run some programs. This was not to help them sit around in offices in Edmonton dreaming up strikes but to go into the field and do the work for their people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: This is the point that must be clarified. There are people who play politics and try to leak documents. I have nothing to hide. I said that yesterday. I volunteered to appear before the committee to explain the policies because I want this House to understand that this is the most difficult social problem that we have in Canada. We should not play politics with it. I am willing to open all the books.

Some people complain because committee meetings have been cancelled. I agree that one committee meeting was cancelled but another subcommittee was working during that time. The work was proceeding. Some people play politics, but we have not stopped working. I am responsible to all the Indians of Canada and all the Indian associations of Canada. I will not give premium to irresponsibility. I will not put grease on the squeaking wheel. In carrying out my duty I hope to treat all the Indian associations of Canada on the same basis.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: Over the years we have done a lot to try to solve the problems of the Canadian Indians. We have tried to solve some of the problems. What makes me angry is that a member such as the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) should stand in his place and accuse me of forcing the Indians to attend a provincial school in Alberta when I know that agreements were signed in 1961 when the hon. member's party was in power.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Not in British Columbia.

Mr. Chrétien: I am talking about Alberta. I will come to British Columbia later. When we introduced our policy in the House on June 25, 1969, all the members of the opposition said that it was a hell of a good policy. Speaking for his party, the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) said there was only one thing wrong with it; it was 25 years too late.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): That is not true.

Mr. Chrétien: Take the heat a bit.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): You know that what you are saying is not true. Check the record. Tell the truth.

Mr. Chrétien: We are trying to solve the problem but it is difficult. Less than three weeks ago I was in New Brunswick. I met with two different bands. One chief wanted his own school on his very small reserve. The other band wanted to go into an integrated system. I looked into the problem of the band that wanted its own school. The chief was not satisfied because the provincial government was not doing a fair job but that can be corrected. I think the fact that the children in northern Alberta are attending a provincial school is not the problem. It is because they are not welcome in the provincial school. The hon. member for Athabasca should speak to his own provincial government to get them to do something about this.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: I have tried to keep the debate above politics. I will keep it that way.

Mr. Nesbitt: It is good that you have a little humour in your speech.

Mr. Chrétien: I want to state the facts. Some people try to create the impression over the CBC that they will not accept any more money. I know these same people were in the offices of other ministers trying to get some money not later than yesterday. They would like to have money for which they will not be accountable. As a minister of the Crown I cannot accept that concept. We should sign agreements with the Indians but they should be treated like other people. They should provide us with the accounts we require after they have received the money.

I am unhappy because many of these problems have built up over a long period of time. I kept quiet about them. However, people living in glass houses should not throw stones. I think it was a shame that those who appeared on the program last Sunday tried to create the impression that they would not accept money from us. They were referring to money for which they are accountable, not money for which they are not accountable.

I think that when we are contracting with any organization in the land we should apply the same financial rules as to all other organizations. One of my fears is that in a controversy of this sort, when some are playing too much politics, it may harm a lot of other Indian associations in Canada who are doing a damned good job, associations which try to accelerate improvements in their educational facilities through consultation with the provinces and the federal government. I hope that because some people are trying to play politics with this subject we shall not harm the work of those engaged in these organizations, people who have acted very responsibly. What I see at the moment is this: there are some who are finding a new way of building their own little empires without taking into account the best interests of their own people.

When it is said that I used these Indian centres as a carrot on a stick in the Alberta situation, I disagree. Let me tell the House the facts. They said they had that document in their possession in September. In September there were only 250 children, more or less, on strike. The bulk of them were on strike in October. The Saddle Lake people, 1,000 of them, went on strike on or about October 15. So probably a month earlier they had this document which was alleged to have been leaked to them. The strike took place after they had this document, according to their own story. It is a pure lie that we tried to use these centres as a carrot on a stick.

I had occasion to meet with the association at the end of September when we discussed the situation in Alberta. Nobody talked to me at that time about the cultural centres situation. Nobody from there since that time has talked to me about it. I heard that from the Indian Association of Alberta over television. When I met them in Winnipeg they did not raise that question.

It is said I went there to impose my own solution. That is not the case. I listened to them, and what Chief Gordon Young Chief asked me at that meeting was exactly what I had offered him on October 5. But there were some who for political purposes told him not to accept it at that time. That is a shame, because the children have lost one month of schooling.

I have said I will never accept the practice of putting pressure upon the government by using their children in an effort to achieve their goal. Everyone in the House should support that position.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: If you let that happen one never knows what will be the result. I well know that Indian children in our society are sufficiently handicapped as things are at present and that they should not lose even one day of schooling. Even though we may think our behaviour is very good I know well that the Indian children are often not welcomed in our society. Rather than play politics with this subject the hon. member for Athabasca should talk to the people of his province to make them aware of the problem and make sure that the children are all welcome in the schools and elsewhere.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: Members opposite thrust out great ideas. The hon. member for Athabasca said we should set up Indian school boards. Mr. Speaker, I have already started that process even in his own area; the Blue Quill School is administered by the Indians, and it is the first time in the history of Canada that such a thing has happened. Now I am working on a similar program in northern Saskatchewan.

An hon. Member: It was after another strike.

Mr. Chrétien: That is the kind of mistake the Indians made too. I did not agree because of the strike but because the proposal was a good one. I was not impressed for a minute by the strike. I looked at the suggested solution and I accepted it because it was a good solution, not because of the strike.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: But some of the Indians thought the strike was a good tool and they tried it this year once again. But this time the solution was not the right one. I do not think we should keep the Indians on the reserves and not permit them at an earlier age to be with the other students of Canada. I do not want to force the Indians to stay on the reserves as was the old policy. I want to open Canada to them. I want them to have the advantage of attending the best schools available in the area in which they are living, whether federal or provincial. I am working on a scheme right now under which the white people adjacent to a reserve in one part of Canada will go to school on the reserve—a reversal of previous integration.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker I think we have done much up to date. I could venture to give figures establishing that we have more than doubled our expenditures with regard to Indians. We went from zero to $1 million to help the Indian Association of Alberta but I do not think this would really bring anything to this debate.

I think the House has lost precious time because we accepted yesterday to appear before the Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development tomorrow morning at eleven o'clock. As I said, I have absolutely nothing to hide. We must continue to work and try to improve the condition of the Indians and I hope we will do it in a non partisan way.

We hope that the progress already made will not slow down our efforts. No doubt there exist problems with the education of the Indian population, but as the hon. member for Témiscamingue said a while ago some of them are not ready to accept our education system. Some of them are not too interested in becoming university graduates. We must however continue to try and give to those who want it the possibility of becoming university graduates.

[English]

We should look at this problem in perspective. Do not forget that 12 or 13 years ago only 15 per cent of the Indian children were going past grade five. Now they all go beyond grade five. The drop-out problem is in grade 12. Of course it is a bad situation, but we have made a hell of a lot of progress. Thirteen years ago there were virtually no Indians attending universities. This year there are 800 Indians in universities.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: When we compare this figure with the 400 who attended universities last year, we find the number has doubled in one year.

There is much more I could say along the same lines but I do not feel it would be helpful to do so now. I appeal to Members of Parliament not to play politics with this issue. I am very happy to be Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It is a tough job. I realize that the Indians had seven ministers in seven years before I became minister. At least I have offered a certain continuity in thinking. But I am not the kind of man who will allow himself to get cornered and who will bow under pressure. It is too bad, but I am not a yes-man. I look at proposals which are made and if they make sense I will approve them. But if they make no sense I shall say no.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: I have heard people say there is a lack of communication with the Indians. Mr. Speaker, never has there been so much consultation with the Indians as in the last four years. I have attended annual meetings of Indian associations across the land. Sometimes I could not accept because of other commitments—as it happened, one such occasion arose last fall. But we are willing to listen. We are willing to discuss. At some point, though, I think the Indians will have to come up with some solutions and propositions. For example, when the Indian Association of Alberta came here in June, 1970 with their red paper and they made the suggestion that there should be a joint committee of ministers and Indians to discuss all these problems, I agreed. Then they said no, they were not interested any more. So what the hell could I do in a situation like that?

• (4:00 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: I do not think I have been arrogant. I think I am pretty well down to earth and do not fly in the sky too much. But we have to ask people to be reasonable, to make some propositions to us instead of just asking us to give them all the money. If we were sure that the money would be spent well, that would be fine. But what is going to happen if we create a monster as far as the Indians at the reserve level and the administration are concerned? What is going to happen if we have no control? I am not responsible to some of these self-appointed leaders; I am responsible to the Indians at the band level.

I want to decentralize by giving more authority to the bands. Many housing and welfare programs are administered at the band level by Indians in the band, and this does help solve their problems. But we should not be boxed into a situation where we create a bureaucracy between the Indians at the band level and the federal government. We need the Indian associations very badly so we will know what the problems are, and the provincial governments need them too. There should be these pressure groups, not establishments of the kind that they complain we have here. This is why my aim is to decentralize at the band level, because in this way more responsibility is given to the Indians to solve their problems.

I suggest we should not become too excited about those who try to make political mileage out of the situation, who try to create for themselves a good image on television. It is very seldom that the media in Canada report any progress on Indian problems, which does an injustice to the Indians themselves because on many reserves in Canada much progress has been made. Housing programs have been implemented in British Columbia and in Alberta on the Blood Reserve where a prefabricated housing project is under way. In Quebec at Loretteville not one Indian is on welfare. Other Indian reserves are making similar progress. But no mention is made of this; all we hear about is what remains to be done.

I recognize that we have a long way to go, but nevertheless we have made progress. I think this progress has been made by the government and by the House without partisanship so far, and it is too bad that some people have decided to be partisan at this particular moment.

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to rise at this point in the debate in support of the motion of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) that the fifth report of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development presented to the House on June 30, 1971 be concurred in.

I have a number of reasons for wanting to speak on this occasion. First of all, may I say we have listened to quite a lecture from the minister—

Mr. Nielsen: A diatribe.

Mr. Simpson: A diatribe, it is suggested—about people not getting political over problems confronting our Indian people. I do not think that any member of this House has deliberately tried to get political on this matter, but the minister for one should not take that attitude. Neither do I intend to enter into the situation surrounding the school strike in northern Alberta nor to comment on the minister's assertion that he felt he was more responsible to the Indian Association of Alberta than to the people of this particular tribe.

My feeling is that when this strike took place and the minister was invited to meet the people on the reserve, the parents of the school children affected, he had every obligation to do so. The minister said that he felt otherwise, that he had no obligation or responsibility to meet that request. He went on to say he should not meet these people until the strike had been settled. I fully realize that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) is not responsible for the actions of his colleagues in cabinet, but it is a little difficult to understand why he feels he should not put in an appearance before a group of people who feel aggrieved until they settle their differences themselves.

As far as the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) is concerned, there have been many instances of strikes being called and he has decided not to take any action. Similarly, there have been instances where it appears the minister felt that a solution to the strike could be assisted by his appearance, and thus he has taken part in the issue.

How many times have we seen delegations come to Ottawa, line up in their hundreds in front of the Parliament Buildings, and when the television cameras and microphones are ready minister after minister basks in the glory of television coverage as he addresses the assembly? I do not think the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development should attempt to tell the House that he feels ministers should not take part in these confrontations unless the disputants settle their troubles themselves.

The minister went on to say that the government was quite willing to put up money for certain projects that benefit the Indian people but that the government was also concerned about accounting for the money. The government wanted to be sure that all accounts duly authorized were turned in to the government before any expenditure was approved. I would ask the minister and some of his colleagues on the front benches whether they saw fit to do this in some of the fiascos of the Opportunities for Youth program last summer. If a question should be placed on the order paper asking for accountability for all the money spent on the Opportunities for Youth Program, I wonder whether the government could come forward with justifiable vouchers for all those expenditures.

• (4:10 p.m.)

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Sure it can.

Mr. Simpson: The hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) says, "Sure it can". I would be very pleased to confer with him one of these days to see whether he can give me—I have been waiting for it for some time—information on that subject. The government has not yet been able to come up with an answer.

I am very interested in this motion. I am sure all members of this House who over the years have repeatedly spoken on behalf of our native people fully realize how difficult it is to obtain action in respect of representations which the Indian people of Canada make to their representatives.

The fifth report of the Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development deals entirely with the subject of Indian education. In this report we have, I believe, one of the first real breakthroughs to solving most of the problems confronting our native people. On many occasions I have spoken to groups in all the Indian communities in northern Manitoba. As I am sure other members who represent areas in which Indian people live will know, the first thing the elderly people bring to our attention is the necessity for a good education for their children. Immediately I say this I am sure some members who are not involved with these problems day in and day out will ask why, if these people are so interested in the education of their children, we have such a high drop-out rate. This is a good question and it should be answered.

One reason we have such a high drop-out rate is the absolute frustration of Indian children over the years in endeavouring to get an education. All of us know about the system which was in vogue for many years, that of residential schools whereby children were taken away from their parents for periods of up to nine months or more in the year. These children were completely disassociated from their families. I am sure we are all aware of the tremendous frustrations those children faced in being away from their families. Many of them were sent to school at the age of five or six. They left their homes for the first time and in many cases were not even able to understand the English language. In those years this system was not given very much consideration. In fact, as was mentioned earlier in this debate, on many occasions these children were chastised for speaking their own language.

The fifth report of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development tries very seriously to deal with many of the problems which for years have confronted the Indian people. I shall not go over all the sections of the report. However, I feel it is my duty to point out very clearly to the House, although it has been mentioned before, that one of the important aspects of the report is that which relates to pre-school teaching and recommends that children have a year or two of instruction in their mother tongue, and when they grow older that they not only be allowed but be encouraged to continue in an educational program which deals with their own culture and background.

During his remarks the minister referred to the number of students of Indian origin who are now at university compared to the few who were in that category a number of year ago. He pointed out that this is a great improvement. It is an improvement, but it is not enough. Unfortunately I was called out of the House for the first minute or two of the minister's address and perhaps I missed something. However, I listened to practically all of his speech and heard no assurance that the government plans to implement any of these recommendations in the near future.

Mr. Nielsen: You could have said, "that they would support concurrence".

Mr. Simpson: It has been mentioned that I should have said something about the government supporting concurrence. Mr. Speaker, I think it is a very good conclusion that they will support concurrence, with the minister's recommendation, because the minister said he is not difficult to deal with and is very sympathetic to the problems of the Indians and their suggestions. I hope he is just as sympathetic to the unanimous recommendation of the Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

A few days ago in the newspapers—these reports have emanated from the front benches and the back benches of the government side of the House—we read the suggestions put forward by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman) in an effort to project to the people of Canada just how the House of Commons could be made much more effective. His suggestions were based solely on the idea, which as I say has been voiced by many people supporting the government, that the House of Commons should be closed from time to time and that more and more work should be given to committees so that the time of the House of Commons would not be wasted in just listening to debate.

Mr. Drury: Hear, hear!

Mr. Simpson: The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) says, "Hear, hear". I say to him, through you, Mr. Speaker, that if the government feels it cannot give concurrence to this unanimous report, then on what basis does it feel that more and more work should be passed on to the committees? For the last three years I have said that the committee system in this House is in many ways a farce. The people of Canada are told that we have committees. Many members, representing all parties of this House, put in many hours on committee work. They do a lot of research and attend many meetings. However, this is not the first occasion on which concurrence has not been given by the government to a committee report. In this instance, after doing all this work the committee comes up with a unanimous report to the government and the government refuses concurrence. Therefore I say the committee system of the House of Commons has fallen into very evil days.

• (4:20 p.m.)

I said that I was particularly interested in speaking at this time because the subject dealt with in the fifth report of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development can be a real breakthrough for the Indian people. Education is the basis for solving their problems. Many of the items mentioned in this report, such as the establishment of day schools in reserves, doing away with residential schools, the establishment of pre-school instruction, allowing the children to be taught in their own language until a certain grade, and the continuation of a well thought-out program taking into account the history of these people and their culture, are so important that I cannot see any reason why the government should not only give concurrence to the report but act on it immediately.

I would like to refer to a copy of a letter which is addressed, I understand, to all or most of the Indian chiefs in Canada. I am not criticizing the letter; I am very pleased that it has been written. It is signed by the Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson). In one paragraph the chairman writes as follows:

> Although the government is free, under parliamentary rules to accept or reject in whole or in part the committee's report, the fact that the report was unanimously approved by committee members from all political parties obliges the government to give it serious attention.

All he asks for in that letter is that the government give this report serious attention. But it is frustrating and disappointing to all members of the House to listen to what was in my opinion a fairly headstrong lecture by the minister, which took about 20 to 25 minutes, in which the minister failed to indicate to the House the intentions of the government with regard to the report.

The minister said that people should not get political over problems of our native peoples. I think it is good that on their behalf we can get political at times, because if it were not for a great number of people bringing this matter into the political arena I suggest that little or nothing would have been done in the past nine or ten years.

The minister also said that he does not feel he should go out and meet groups of Indian people who have a complaint, unless they can settle differences among themselves prior to his meeting with them. Not many years ago the government produced what was reported to be the government's policy on Indian people. Granted, they said that nothing in that policy would be introduced without full consultation with the Indian people, but they stated very firmly to anyone who cared to listen that those were their proposals and they would not change them. If the minister or anyone else wishes to dispute this with me I would refer, after what has happened in the last week or two when we have seen a number of leaks of government documents, to what was perhaps one of the first leaks of government information pertaining to our Indian people. It happened just months after the issuance of the government's policy regarding Indians.

I raised the matter in the House, as others did. At that time we were in possession of a copy of a contract which the Liberal government had entered into with an Indian person in Calgary. He was under contract with the government to assist the government in finding ways and means whereby the Indian people of Canada would accept the policies of the government. When we brought out these points in the House, at first it was indicated that there was no knowledge of this; but when the government was confronted with a copy of the contract which they entered into with this person, they admitted that this had been so. If memory serves me correctly, we endeavoured to find out how many other people had been under the same type of contract but were not successful in obtaining an answer.

When the minister stands before the House and says that he has nothing to hide, I am not arguing with that. But when he says he is willing to do whatever he can for the Indian people, and the government offers the guarantee that they will not put the proposed policy for the Indian people into effect without full consultation with the Indian people while at the same time they hire undercover people to try to assist them in finding ways and means of convincing the Indian people to accept their programs, then I say that the government is certainly not being fair to our Indian people.

In conclusion I would like to say that the fifth report of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development deals with a serious matter regarding our native people. Among other things concerning educational matters in the report there is mention of the requirements on television. Again I come back to the words of the minister who spoke before me in this debate and indicated that the government is willing to do whatever it can for the Indian people. The other day I raised this matter in the House. For two successive days I tried to put the question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and on both days he was in his seat. I was recognized on the third day but the minister was not in the House. Therefore I directed the question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

I asked if the government had any plans to provide financial assistance for the provision of television service to Indian communities with large populations, such as Cross Lake and Norway House in northern Manitoba. I can easily understand that the Prime Minister could not be expected to give an answer offhand at that time and I recall that the suggestion was made that I raise the matter on the "late show." But the least I expected the Prime Minister to do was assure me that he would pass my question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien). I received no such assurance from him. Now that the minister is here, I suggest that he and his cabinet colleagues should combine on many of these matters and try to understand the problems that face them.

I suppose we will have to wait to see if the government will concur in the adoption of this report, but while the minister is in the chamber I would like to point out to him that there are many centres in Canada where Indian people reside in large numbers, and that are not served by television. I am certain that if equal populations of non-Indian origin were living in those centres, some television service would be provided for them. I defy any member of this House to point out other areas of Canada with populations around the 10,000 mark which have no access to television. Although many people complain about the type and quality of television programming, the provision of television service for these centres would be of great benefit, particularly for Indian children.

I have nothing more to say at this time. Mr. Speaker, but I repeat that having listened to the minister's statement I think it is a foregone conclusion that the government will concur in the adoption of this report.

Mr. R. J. Orange (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker as a member of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development which unanimously approved this report, I can honestly say that it is an important document in terms of defining the limitations and strengths of the educational program to be developed in the future for the Indian and Eskimo peoples.

I was taken aback by the approach of the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) who attempted to turn the tables on the minister by indicating that school strikes called by Indian parents in northeastern Alberta were somehow related to the problems that the Indian Association of Alberta has with the federal government concerning two particular grants. I do not intend to go into that particular matter but I would like to look back over the few years that I have been in Parliament and point out the dramatic change which has taken place in the education of native peoples north of the sixtieth parallel.

In 1965, when I first became associated with the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, statistics indicated that approximately only 25 per cent of the kids in the Territories were attending school. Today, virtually all children in the Territories have an opportunity to attend educational facilities right through from kindergarten to primary school, secondary school and, under the programs of the local governments and federal government, to attend university or post-secondary vocational institutions.

I acknowledge that governments started on these educational programs too late. I acknowledge that initially many mistakes were made. We still have a long way to go, but I would like to underline some of the improvements that have been made in the north. The first schools were of only one or two classrooms, located in small communities stretched across the Arctic and down the Mackenzie, and after the first few grades children were airlifted to larger communities where they lived for eight or nine months of the year in school hostels. This created a breakdown in the pattern of family life.

Many native families continued to trap and hunt and to live outside settlements for the greater part of the year. Now virtually every community in northern Canada has schools that educate up to grade 8, after which students are moved to the larger centres to attend high school. We have also seen the establishment of seasonal-type school hostels which permit parents to continue their traditional way of life, hunting, trapping and sealing, leaving their children in their home community to attend school without a break and returning to live with their families after the hunting season is over.

This committee report is a hardnosed document. All of us who served on the committee tried as best we could, within the limitation of our abilities, to identify the problems and suggest solutions. We know that in the past educational facilities were not adequate in the northern parts of some of the provinces. We know that in northern communities housing, sanitation systems and economic opportunities were lacking to a great degree. What we are honestly trying to find is some balance whereby the native peoples will be able to participate in the Canadian way of life, socially and economically, while still retaining their own culture.

In the last four years I have observed the actions of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien). Ever since the day he was appointed to that position he has tried to improve conditions for the native peoples. Three and a half years ago he started a consultation program and either he or one of his colleagues visited Indian communities across Canada and told the people, "Tell us what you want so that we as a government will be able to put some ideas down on paper." We then saw the white paper. This was greeted almost unanimously by members of the House as being a major move forward.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Mr. Yewchuk: Nonsense.

Mr. Orange: Then we saw the reaction of the Indian people. Very quickly the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said to them, "Come and tell us what you want". The Indian Association of Alberta came to Ottawa and presented their red paper, a well thought-out, well worded and positive document. We have seen the funding of the various Indian-Eskimo associations so that they could take upon themselves some of the responsibilities formerly carried out by government. All that is well recognized. In this process of change there are bound to be problems and confrontations. This is part of the purpose of the funding program—so that the Indian people can finally tell the rest of the country what they want, what they have in mind and how they want to do it.

I can speak only of the various associations in the Northwest Territories, but at one site the only serious contact the Indian people had with the administration was through the local representative or at the treaty parties which took place once a year. These were very minimal situations that I personally have always been ashamed to participate in as a white person. This situation has changed. The Indian people are now putting forward their ideas. Sometimes they shock the white community, and maybe this is not a bad thing. Sometimes they come forward with ideas that government cannot accept because of lack of funds or other reasons. However, in other cases it is possible for the government to work out some form of agreement or arrangement whereby the desires and ambitions of the Indian people, through their associations, can be recognized and adjustments made.

In the educational process, Mr. Speaker, we see some rapid developments. I should like to mention what is happening in a native community called Rae which is 70 miles northwest of Yellowknife. For many years the Indian children of that community either went into the bush with their parents during the school year or were moved to hostels at Fort Smith or Fort Simpson where they were away from their parents for approximately ten months of the year. The government suggested that a new school should be built in the vicinity of the community. The site of the community itself was unsatisfactory because of its location. For three, four or five years negotiations took place between the chief of the band council, other members of the Indian community and the administration, not only to determine where the school should be located but what form it should take once it was agreed that it should be constructed.

A decision on location was reached very quickly by the Indian people. The area was named after one of the great chiefs of the Dogrib band and in order to ensure complete participation by the community, arrangements were made to establish an education committee. This committee visited a number of educational institutions in the United States and Canada. It brought in its own advisers who were funded by the government. It was agreed that a school designed on the open-school concept would be proceeded with and that the hostels would be of a design best suited to small groups of children; and, more important, that the administration of the curriculum would be the responsibility of the people of the community. Subsequently, the Edzo-Rae school board was established. The school is now in operation, teachers have been hired by the community, hostel supervisors and even the cooks for the kitchen have been hired.

This is the type of forward thinking that can take place and is taking place. As I said earlier, we know it is not going far enough, fast enough. But as Members of Parliament and representatives of our constituents we can continue to encourage the minister, the representatives of his department and provincial governments and show that there is a great need for participation. Participation is necessary so that the benefits will return to our Indian youngsters who have so much to offer to this country and to their own people.

Again, I should like to say publicly that I believe the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has taken tremendous strides in the last 3½ years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yewchuk: Strides backward.

Mr. Orange: He has worked day and night in order to understand the problem. He has tried to identify with Indian people. He has tried to say to them, "My door is open". There were a few smart remarks from the other side about the minister's open-door policy, but I have yet to hear of his refusing to see in his office or anywhere else under conditions satisfactory to him—

An hon. Member: Yes, that is the key.

Mr. Orange: —any Indian person or any Indian group. He has gone out of his way to meet all the Indian people. I think the minister explained his side of the story in a way that the people of Canada will acknowledge. He recognizes, as he said, that we have a long way to go and that there is much to be done. There is no way that any of us want to see the various associations of Indian people held back because of the problems of two or three groups.

I am encouraged that a committee of this House can produce positive reports with all sorts of ideas for teacher training, hostels, university education, experiments in teacher training, co-operation with the provinces and the design of curricula to meet the requirements of the cultures involved. All this can be done and we are working toward it with the co-operation and assistance of all concerned on a basis which takes it beyond the field of partisanship. All this can and will be achieved.

Mr. Speaker, I say to the minister that we will continue to have our battles. We have had them before. I have won some and lost some. However, if he continues to show this kind of positive approach to resolving the problems of the Indian and Eskimo peoples of Canada and to working with them, I think we shall very shortly see the results of these programs and his work.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, the chamber seems very quiet at the moment although I think I can still hear some faint reverberations of the remarks made a short time ago by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien). I think many of us rather enjoyed hearing the minister blow his stack, so to speak.

Mr. Gibson: It is the plain truth.

An hon. Member: Hoot!

Mr. Barnett: The speech he made, Mr. Speaker, if I may paraphrase some of his words, was quite a hell of a speech.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He learned his English here.

Mr. Barnett: I think this speech will create some reverberations. As the minister was speaking I had before me a book which has recently been published, called "Touch of Earth," by a young woman named T. C. McLuhan. I should explain to the House that this is a compilation of speeches and statements made by leaders of the Indian peoples covering a span of time from the late 1700s until 1971. I read the following:

• (4:50 p.m.)

Our people no longer believe. It is that simple and it is that sad. The Canadian government can promise involvement, consultation, progressive human and economic development programs. We will no longer believe them—

After generations of endless frustration with the Canadian government, our people are tired and impatient. Before the Canadian government tries to feed us hypocritical policy statements, more empty promises, more forked tonguistics, our people want, our people, the Indians, demand just settlement of all our treaty and aboriginal rights. Fulfillment of Indian rights by the Queen's government must come before there can be any further co-operation between the Indians and the government. We demand nothing more. We expect nothing less.

Those words may be somewhat familiar to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I have a strange feeling that although the minister was ostensibly addressing Your Honour, and through Your Honour the other members of the House, he was actually addressing many of his remarks to somebody who does not have a seat in the House at present. That is why I put on the record some of the words contained in this book. If the minister has not already identified their originator, let me tell him that they were written by a Cree Indian named Harold Cardinal who was born in 1945 in High Prairie, Alberta.

The year 1945 happens to be the year when I was first a candidate for election to Parliament. One of the things I vividly recollect hearing during that election campaign in one of the places I visited was that families whose girls were prepared to sleep with the representative of the Minister of Indian Affairs would get welfare, whereas families whose girls would not do that would not get welfare. At that time I resolved that if I were elected to Parliament, and even if I were not, I would do all I could to end that kind of gross human indignity. That year was not long ago. I freely concede that the attitude of many Canadians toward Indians who dwell within our borders has changed considerably since then. Perhaps the situation reported to me then can no longer be found within the length and breadth of our land: I certainly hope so.

If the minister is sincere, as I hope he is and as he certainly sounded this afternoon, he will recognize the import of the words saying that these things cannot be settled until there has been a just settlement of "our treaty and aboriginal rights". Those words tend to put in focus the report of the committee which is before us for discussion. It should be apparent to all members—and as a member of the committee who had some part in the drafting of the report I favour its adoption by the House—that the report ought to stimulate discussion. I hope the document will stimulate discussion and that it will lead people to search out new ideas. In my view that is all the committee basically intended with regard to the initial impact of the report.

The introduction to the statement in the book from which I have just quoted says that in the last several years he, Harold Cardinal, has become a skilful politician speaking out for Indian rights in Canada. The minister talked about politics. If the minister is suggesting that this subject is far too important for what is commonly described as narrow partisan politics, I agree with him. Certainly, all the members of the Indian affairs committee felt in approaching this report that narrow partisan politics had no place in their deliberations. In drawing up the report partisan politics was not a consideration. However, if the minister is discussing politics in a broader sense then I, for one, consider this to be one of the most important and vital political issues within our country today.

Mr. Alexander: Right.

Mr. Barnett: It should be dealt with in this chamber in that light. In considering this report we are trying to come to grips with a fundamental question. I agree with the minister when he says that much still needs to be done to change the attitude and outlook of many non-Indian Canadians. As he suggested in his speech, there is a great need for this to happen in the province of Alberta. To judge from my brief exposure to the situation in the northeastern part of that province, the minister has put his finger on one of the facets of the problem there.

However, since the minister tried to imply in his speech today, as another hon. member on the other side of the House did, that there was virtually unanimous agreement in the House on the white paper, let me say again that the disagreement in this House was not so much about what was in the white paper as about what was not in it. That is why many Indian leaders of this country continue to distrust the government.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has said—and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has underlined what he said—that aboriginal rights per se do not exist in this country. That I challenge. Their existence is implicit if there is to be any successful outcome with regard to actions that may be taken to improve educational opportunities for the Indian people of Canada. Let us come to grips with the issue on that plane. Seen in that perspective, the recommendations in the committee report, or any discussion as to what was or was not in the white paper, become relatively unimportant, although I admit that these recommendations and discussions are important. I say that because we live in an ongoing society. Young people are growing up and reaching the age when they want to enter into the fullness of our society as adults.

It is no light thing for young Indian people or for other young people of this country to lose one year's schooling. Let me say in this chamber, as I said in a memorandum I sent to members of the House shortly after visiting northeastern Alberta, that I listened to an earnest discussion taking place among a group of teenage children from that area. They discussed their personal situations and the struggle that was going on there. They said they would gladly sacrifice one year of their schooling if it would increase the chance of their younger brothers and sisters obtaining a better education. I admire those children for taking that position: I think they were right.

In his reference to that situation the minister overlooked the depth of understanding that young Indian people have of just what is involved in this whole question. Maybe they have some of the impatience of youth, perhaps a little of the kind of impatience of youth displayed by the minister in his speech this afternoon, even though they are a few years his junior. However, there does come that old cry that has been echoed throughout the ages, "How long, O Lord, how long?"

One should talk to the older Indian people who know what it was like 50, 60 or 75 years ago. He would then understand that in an age when there is a reawakening of understanding among Indian people of what they are and the way of life they enjoy, they become impatient. They are prepared to make sacrifices to see things happen. One member who participated in this debate referred to sections of the report. I agree with him that this is one of the key parts of the report. He quoted the following words:

> In those schools remaining under the control of the educational branch, the committee believes that the objectives of the federal schools should be the creation of models of excellence which will furnish to Indian and Eskimo young people, an education which will provide to them equality of opportunity and the ability to be employed at every level of the economy of the regions in which they live.

That report was tabled in the House on June 30. Members will recall that the House recessed at the end of that sitting day and there was no opportunity for discussion of the report until the House returned in the fall. There was no opportunity for any immediate response from the government to the proposals of the report. I think all members of the committee will agree that we did not expect from the government a full-fledged reply or assessment of the proposals the next day or within the next week. The minister said in his speech—this was probably a slip—that only a couple of months have gone by. We are getting on toward the end of November. The report has been on the table since June 30. That is more than two months ago. Until today, the first response of the minister that apparently relates to the content of the report can be found in a speech that he made in Thunder Bay on September 17, when he said:

> Is it not more sensible to make the provincial systems excellent for Indian, Metis and non-Indian students alike? Can we create an additional structure of expertise in a federal school system scattered across Canada?

[Mr. Barnett.]

That appears to be a response by the minister to the committee's recommendation. If I am wrong, the minister has the opportunity of correcting me. If one examines the phraseology, "Is it not more sensible to make the provincial systems excellent for Indians and Metis," perhaps one could retort that the obvious answer is that they should probably both become systems of excellence. If the text which I have is correct, the minister later said:

> With the participation of the Indian community we are influencing the provincial systems. We fund the education and, as buyers of service, we can speak effectively to the provinces.

I suggest that statement requires considerable examination in light of the recommendations of the committee report and in light of some of the facts of the situation that some of us know. From time to time the minister has given us various statistics about the percentage of Indian people who are in the general school system, those remaining within the federal Indian school system and how this has been increasing.

I think I am correct when I say that the earliest move which brought Indian children in numbers into the general school system of a province took place in British Columbia. In the 1950s an agreement was made between the Indian affairs branch and one of the school boards in my constituency. This set up the formula, which still basically applies, of a pro rata, per capita grant and a pro rata allowance per pupil for Indian children attending school in a system run by a provincial school board. In that particular instance I think it was done with the knowledge and desire of the Indian people in the area. The tempo of that development increased rather rapidly in the province of British Columbia, as far as I know largely with the consent and in some cases at the request of the Indian people.

I suggest the basic reason for that happening in British Columbia in the way it did is that the Indian people had become fed up with the poor quality and ineptitude of the educational system administered by the Indian affairs branch. They were prepared to try any other possible alternative in order to help their children get a meaningful education. A great many Indian people in British Columbia today still feel that is probably the best arrangement in many localities, particularly where there are small Indian bands living fairly close to a non-Indian community.

I suggest that many of the Indians of British Columbia are now starting to question the desirability of that kind of arrangement. They are beginning to be concerned. This is partly because they are becoming aware of the value of their cultural heritage. They are becoming increasingly concerned that their children will be lost in the shuffle and that they will become little white men.

Concern was expressed to the committee by representatives from many parts of Canada. Many witnesses appeared before the committee. This report resulted from that accumulation of evidence. Despite the fact that the minister said we fund education and as buyers of service we can speak effectively to the provinces, I see very little tangible evidence that this is so in the province of British Columbia. There are some rather weak and fumbling moves being developed within the province which may, hopefully, bring about some enrichment of the provincial school curriculum so that it will include an opportunity for both Indian and non-Indian children to acquire a true picture of the history of the Indian people and some knowledge of their culture and art. Such moves as are being made are pitifully few and increasingly difficult to equate with the real needs of Canadian society today and the growth and aspirations of the Indian people.

In British Columbia as well as in other parts of the country it is being argued that the white community is using this new education policy as a gimmick to divert federal funds into provincial schools for the benefit of non-Indian children. I was approached a year or two ago by a knowledgeable and sincere teacher employed in one of the schools in my constituency. He was concerned that money coming from the Department of Indian Affairs was not being used for the benefit of Indians but to provide fancier school facilities for non-Indian pupils. This question is being raised by many Indians in various parts of Canada, as the minister will find if he cares to listen—whether once again the white man with his ingenuity is not getting the benefit of funds made available by the department to provide better education for Indians.

Mr. Chrétien: If such a situation is developing, would it not be wise for the Indians to force the hands of provincial authorities to do things right, with the help of the federal government? If these funds are not being allocated in the best way possible, would it not be right for the Indians, together with us, to try to correct this by putting pressure on the provincial governments? Should we throw the whole system away because there may be some such shortcoming as the one to which the hon. member has referred?

Mr. Barnett: That is a perfectly reasonable question. I agree efforts should be made to ensure that these funds are spent in the way in which they should be spent. But I had a recent report on a situation which arose in the province of New Brunswick, and the minister can check this out if he wishes. When demands are made by the Indian people in this area they are either ignored or foiled. The minister has referred to the fact that certain provinces allow representatives of the Indian people to sit on school boards. But as far as I know, they are in a minority, possibly with only one representative, and the Indians have no power as a minority of one on a school board. This is why, among other things, many of the Indian people are saying it would be much better, given all the circumstances of today, to have their own schools and their own school boards to operate them.

Mr. Chrétien: There are some.

Mr. Barnett: The minister talks about putting pressure on provincial school systems. The committee in its consideration of this question felt that because of the realities of the situation in the various provinces one of the most effective ways of putting pressure on provincial school systems as far as excellence of programs is concerned would be to provide schools which would be models of excellence in certain appropriate locations—federal schools built and operated in the way the Indian people feel they should be and in the way in which the minister says he wants them to be—so that the Indian people may be equal economically while still being free to remain Indians.

Mr. Chrétien: A question for clarification. Would it not be advisable to seek to get provincial laws amended to enable the Indians to appoint representatives to school board in proportion to their population? We can work in that direction. I do not think that because there is a problem we should turn back the clock.

Mr. Barnett: That, of course, is one of the fundamental questions raised in the committee report. Would we be turning back the clock if the Indian people feel this is what they need, if they feel that instead of fading out of the picture the minister's department should set an example for the rest of the country? This is the question which was raised in the report and it is one which has to be answered.

Mr. Chrétien: That is exactly what I am doing.

Mr. Barnett: The committee report recommends—and perhaps it is in error:

1. That the government should continue its policy that no transfers of education programs from the federal level to provincial systems take place without the express and clear approval of the majority of the parents in each community concerned.

Mr. Chrétien: That is exactly the policy we are following now. There is no transfer without the agreement of the Indians.

Mr. Barnett: This was the assumption in the mind of members of the committee when they drafted this report. But let us consider what has happened since this report was laid on the table of the House on June 30. On September 17 the minister, in effect, challenged the assumption of the report. In the first instance, when the Indians clearly indicated that they did not want to go into the provincial school system, preferring to have their own school on their own reserves, the minister told the House, "It is physically impossible to build six schools in one year." Those are his own words. How much sense does that make in a country which possesses all the materials we could hope for? And the people who are not now working could build those schools.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Barnett: The minister says we cannot build six schools in one year. When the minister says we would be turning back the clock, this question arises in my mind—

Mr. Chrétien: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I should like to correct the impression the hon. member has given. I said I was not interested in building the schools because that was not the solution. The Indians of the Keecheewin are not asking me to build a high school there, nor is that what the others are asking really. They want a better system, and I think this can be achieved in the school they are attending right now.

An hon. Member: Give it to them.

Mr. Barnett: We come right back again to the fundamental question. The minister says, "I think", and so on. The question is what do the Indian people think? They are saying that they have minds, just as the minister or I or any other member of this House has a mind. This is what we should recognize and it is why, in my view, emphasis is placed in this report on the express and clear approval of a majority of the parents. Let us listen to them for a change; we have not done so for the last 100 years.

• (5:20 p.m.)

May I return to the point I want to emphasize, which is that the real stumbling block here, apart perhaps from the fact that Treasury Board will not give the minister all the money he asks for—

Mr. Chrétien: Not Treasury Board, the House.

Mr. Barnett: In the memorandum that I sent to members of the House a while ago I said I hoped the government would request and that the House would quickly appropriate the funds necessary. Has the government so requested? Do they know whether the House will act quickly to appropriate those funds? I think the answer is obvious from the record. Supplementary estimates (A) were tabled the other day. Is there a request to Parliament in those supplementary estimates for funds to build those schools and the schools that are needed in a lot of other places across the country?

Mr. Chrétien: That is not the solution.

Mr. Barnett: The answer is no. The supplementary estimates themselves prove that. That is one side of the question, but the other and more fundamental part of the question is this. The minister is falling over the stumbling block of the refusal of his government to recognize aboriginal rights, to recognize that it is not a matter of a hand-out being made by Parliament, to recognize that we have been paying very cheap rent for this country for a long time and that it is about time we did something to rectify the situation.

I do not know whether to blame the minister or not. I am not privy to what goes on in cabinet and this has not yet been leaked. All I can go by is the statement made by the head of the government, who time and again has said "Perhaps we will have a look at treaty rights, but aboriginal rights, no".

Mr. Howard (Skeena): He also said that treaties should not be made forever. He intends to wipe those out too.

Mr. Chrétien: He said we would recognize treaty rights as well.

Mr. Barnett: Yes, he said that, but that anything not down on paper is too vague. We are the only so-called civilized country in the western world, certainly the only country that is the inheritor of the British tradition—

Mr. Chrétien: The Supreme Court is looking into that, too, at the present time.

Mr. Barnett: And it is a crying shame for this Parliament that that question is before the Supreme Court. No matter what the Supreme Court says or does not say, we still come back to the basic political question for decision by this Parliament.

[Mr. Barnett.]

Mr. Howard (Skeena): The Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) was asked to intervene on their behalf and he refused.

Mr. Chrétien: A question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Chrétien: The hon. member for Skeena—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Will the minister resume his seat. If the minister wishes to ask a question, raise a point of order or question of privilege, then the Chair will recognize him. But I would point out that he has intervened several times and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) has the floor. If the minister wishes to ask a question, he may do so with the consent of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

Mr. Chrétien: If the hon. member would be kind enough, I should like to correct what was said by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have some doubt that the minister has the right to do that since the hon. member for Skeena does not have the floor. If an interjection was made by the hon. member for Skeena, that is something that can be debated at a later date. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni now has the floor.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I will gladly make my interjection at the appropriate point so the minister can reply.

Mr. Barnett: The hon. member for Skeena and I sit fairly close to each other in the House, but I am sure the minister will appreciate that I am not prepared to answer for any question that the hon. member for Skeena might have put, though I am, of course, prepared to answer for anything that I say.

Mr. Chrétien: The better for you, or you will be in trouble.

Mr. Barnett: We are discussing the report of a committee on education and, hopefully, it will receive favourable consideration by the House as a whole. I have tried to answer all the questions that the minister has wanted to ask me, and in conclusion I would like to make a quick reference to the book to which I referred earlier. I think it is fundamental to the growth of the understanding that is required to recognize just what it is that we owe the Indian people. I am not now talking, as I was a moment ago, about what we may owe them for the use of the land that once was all theirs, but about something more important perhaps than even that. There is an introduction in this book entitled "The Spirit of the Earth". While it contains speeches from Indian people from various parts of North America, the book is written by a citizen of the United States. The introduction has this to say, among other things:

> It is well understood that the only decent future for us who live in America now is through a rediscovery of our environment. We need to establish a right relationship with the land and its resources; otherwise, the destruction of the Indian will be followed by the destruction of nature; and in the destruction of nature will follow the destruction of ourselves.

The Indians, in a sense, knew this all along. For many generations they learned how to live in America, in a state of balance; or, as a Christian would say, in a state of grace. Perhaps now, after hundreds of years of ignoring their wisdom, we may learn from the Indians.

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of State): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to go over the ground so eloquently covered by my colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien), earlier this afternoon. I was glad to hear him congratulate the members of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development for its report on education. All of us will have an opportunity to hear from him again tomorrow and to put questions concerning the general situation that is being debated in the House this afternoon, as well as questions concerning education and grants that are in some dispute.

For my part, I have been a very interested and active observer of and participant in native affairs for a number of years, and in my view more solid progress has been achieved in three years than has been realized in the past several decades. This progress is evident not only in education. I am not one of those who sees education as the panacea for all problems, but when the minister is able to say, for example, that there has been a doubling of students at university level this year over last year and that there is increasing improvement throughout the educational system, then I think progress becomes evident.

No one would expect me to stand up in this House and say all is well, rosy and satisfactory. It is not. There is far too much still to be done. However, I believe if we are to be fair to the people of Canada we should try to keep in perspective that which is being done and that which has been done. I think it is only fair to say that more is being done with the help of this minister than in any previous period in our dealings with the native people. He is not a "yes" man, as he told us this afternoon. I believe he is a fair man and is energetic as no one else before him. He is direct, intensely human, and a dedicated minister. I wished to stand up and say this in the House of Commons because I have not always agreed with governments in the past and with ministers who have been handling this most complicated and exciting portfolio.

I think we should admit to ourselves—and I am not saying this is in a partisan manner—that this has been the first government in Canadian history to place such large resources, financial, technical and other, directly into the hands of the native people. This is the first government to have gone that route. Of course, this will lead to difficulties. It will lead to irritations and to many frictions. That is what we must expect.

Of course, controversial incidents will arise. They will arise because this very process of putting resources into the hands of people accelerates their social and economic development, accelerates the whole process that it sharpens everyone's visibility of the inequalities which exist and the injustices which remain. We all see this and we all experience it. In this accelerated process people are confronted with these things as never before. Nonetheless, the most useful thing this government has been able to do has been to hand these resources over to these people and to express its general confidence that they can administer them well and that they will bring about the development which decades of programs and decades of good intentions have not been able to achieve.

As I say, we must expect that we will run into difficulties. I do not want to see this process slowed down. I do not believe it is being slowed down. We must iron out the difficulties as they arise in financial and administrative programs. If they arise in political activities we must iron them out. Certainly, for three years we have launched ourselves as a Parliament and as a government in a process of mutual confidence with the native people. But the government itself cannot complete this process without the full, equal and willing participation of the native people.

The development going on now is rapid enough that I believe we could describe it as explosive when seen in the longer perspective of history and in the longer perspective of the preceding years in the lives of people of native ancestry. However, the method which is being followed is the only sure way. The government has followed this path and I am confident it will stay on that path. It is the only sure way. The native people themselves have told us it is the only way and have sought it as the path to their self-fulfillment, that is, by having resources placed in their own hands.

I should like to pursue that thought a little further and say again that this will present grave difficulties from time to time. This is what we will have to learn to live with while correcting them. The sure way to self-fulfillment, to equality, to justice is through social development, through economic development and through cultural development programs by having resources oneself. This is true because the people then become involved in unfolding their own destiny. They become involved not only in the sense of personal commitment—this is important in itself to release energies—but also as communities and as groups with a very strong communal sense of identity and with a long history and heritage.

It is the sure way because having resources in one's own hands gives people the confidence that the change they are negotiating will not bring about cultural disappearance and will not be the end of the road for the long human history of native culture and experience in North America. In my view, many of the weaknesses in the past in programs, in projects, in expenditures and in respect of high hopes have arisen because programs were delivered to a relatively passive group of people who sheltered sometimes from them for fear that involvement would mean the end of their heritage and that they would go into a stream and disappear. No people in history ever willingly do that.

We would not want to feel, and no cultural group of any origin in Canada would want to feel, that its future was one of disappearance. They want to feel there is a secure place for persons of all heritages to work out a destiny here in this free land. That assurance, in the case of the Indian people, and because of the long history of distrust and because of the long route they have had to travel, can be given only by turning over to them major financial resources and responsibilities. This can be done with confidence provided that between us we can and will work out the procedures that will enable us as a responsible Parliament to evaluate programs and to be accountable for the funds and to enable responsible organizations to develop programs which the native people feel will succeed.

This can be accomplished only through a course of consultation and mutual trust. Consultation has taken place between the native organizations, the native communities, the native people and this government in a degree never before realized. I think if we want to keep things in perspective and be fair, we will all admit this. Consultations began on the Indian Act. They came to an end with the publication of a policy paper containing features the Indian people did not like. Too much emphasis, perhaps, was placed on legal equality and too little on social and economic development without which legalisms mean nothing. So that paper was set aside by the government as well as by the native people and a new process of consultation and the transfer of major resources to them began to take place.

• (5:40 p.m.)

What are some of the transferred resources about which I am speaking? I should like to mention just a few. There is a funding program known as core funding. I will come back to that later. There is the discussion that has taken place on educational cultural centres, and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has indicated in his speech on multiculturalism that the government is taking steps to make funds available to assist native organizations to establish these cultural educational centres. This is one of the soundest and most hopeful concepts that has arisen over the past few years and I for one am satisfied and confident that we will see a major social, cultural and economic transformation take place through the medium of these educational cultural centres.

Another area is the economic development grants from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. Most of us know that the first major grant happened to have been made in Alberta to the Blood reserve. It was in the order of $650,000 to $700,000, to assist a native company on that reserve to develop a major manufacturing facility for sectional and mobile homes.

It was a very hard struggle to put all the pieces together. They were put together with the maximum amount of effort on the part of this government, on the part of the Alberta Indian Association and on the part of the reserve people. It was made to work and, if my memory is correct, the project is working. There is a completely new spirit on that reserve and new urban developments are taking place. The first couple of years' production has been sold in advance. This is a piece of evidence that when native people themselves have the resources and the opportunity, they seize it as well as any other group in this country and they can administer and bring about significant economic, social and community developments of which they can be proud and we too can be proud with them.

I will not go into the economic side any further, although one could quote many examples. There are many new opportunities through revised five-year federal-provincial ARDA agreements specifically designed for the opportunities they can give to people of native ancestry.

[Mr. O'Connell.]

Before coming back to core funding I should mention the funds which this government has made available to native organizations so that they can engage their own professional counsel to consider the matter of treaty rights with the understanding that the federal government will consider these questions jointly and will negotiate, through some joint mechanism, this long and troubled matter in our common history.

Now I should like to say a few words about core funding since I think it is fairly basic to the point I am trying to make about the transfer of governmental resources to non-governmental bodies to enable them to engage in important activities in social and cultural development. Core funding is a program agreed to by the government some months ago to rationalize a system that had been developing for two or three years of making grants to native organizations.

Currently, I believe between 20 and 26 native organizations are receiving substantial sums of money which in their total come to several million dollars so that they can maintain their organizations through which they can then seek project or program funds from other departments of the federal government or from provincial funding departments and agencies or from private sources. These core funding arrangements are on a formula basis. They enable these Indian, Metis and Eskimo associations to have full-time staff, depending on certain variables between the provinces and territories, ranging between six to twelve persons for each association—permanent staff without which they cannot be expected to maintain the developmental process on which they are so keen. For the first time, through the decision of this government, they can have an assured ongoing permanent staff. This is a major transfer of resources. It goes further. They can have not only staff but they are provided with funds for office expenses so that a central office can be maintained with secretaries and equipment.

Also, additional funds are provided for travel expenses for those workers on the core staff, together with additional funds for executive meetings so that persons in their constituency around the province can come to consult. Additional funds are also provided for an annual meeting. Funds are made available to enable these associations to obtain professional and technical advice from persons chosen by themselves. The core funding program of this federal government covers these expenditure items on an ongoing basis so that these organizations can have an assured existence while they do their work.

The concept goes to the next step and recognizes that the communities in the field scattered around the province need to relate to their associations just as the central bodies need to have their grass-roots communications and support. Hence, the core funding includes additional funds for up to 12 persons depending on the variables in the provinces. We could call these additional staff persons communications workers or field workers, if that is a more understandable phrase. So there is the staff in the central office and there are communications workers to keep in touch with the field so that those communities can have a voice in the programs that their associations develop.

These associations are democratically elected. They represent those people and they have facilities to go back and forth from the field to the organizations to develop their programs in their own best interest. I think this is a most important development in the relationship between the government, this Parliament and the people of Canada in general and our native people. Assistance goes not only to Indians as defined under the Indian Act; this assistance is available to non-status Indians and to Metis and Eskimos in Canada, so that today some 26 or so associations are receiving this kind of support on an assured basis, one that they have never had before which enables them to participate and consult.

Few weeks go by without an airplane bringing to Ottawa delegations of these native organizations to continue this consultative process. Few weeks go by in which officials of various departments of the government are not on other airplanes going into the field in the provinces to carry on this consultative process.

The basic concept of core funding goes yet a further step and I would like to describe it. It puts those organizations which are representing the native peoples into a position where they can seek program funds from various departments and no longer are confined to a single department of the government. It puts them in a position to go on to another department, or another or another, like any other citizen of Canada. It opens up the whole range of government services to native people in a way that has not been opened before.

That is one of the most important and heartening developments of the last three years, since it confirms the conviction of this government that the native people want to be on a footing of equality with all other citizens in this country and wish to have opened to them the whole range of services, not only of this government but of all other levels of government and have access equally to the private sector.

I want to conclude with just a brief reference to the importance the government sees in what for lack of a better phrase I am going to call the question of culture. There is no secure social development without recognition that it takes place through a process that we have to call a cultural process. We know this now and all over the world it is known. If there is any experience that has become common to all of us through the United Nations in the social and economic field, it is surely the knowledge that development is a cultural process. If people do not feel secure on the cultural front, they hang back and will not go into the kind of social change that is taking place all over the world today, and into the economic process that brings such rapid social change in its train.

The point that I am coming to, Mr. Speaker, is that the cultural educational centre is a recognition of the cultural dimension. The developments that the minister has already pointed to in self-administration in the field of education also confirm that interest in the cultural process, so that native people will feel that the educational process also gives room for those cultural concerns without which they do not want to go down that path of development.

The final point I want to make on the cultural side is that the core funding, if it does anything at all, says to the native people through their organizations, "Here are resources with which you yourselves can develop the kind of programs, social, economic and educational that you feel will allow this development to take place without threatening, without challenging, without undermining the cultural continuity which you, and we too, want to see assured."

What in effect is happening in a short period of time is that the native peoples of Canada—I include the Metis people and the Eskimos in this summary statement—are making the greatest turning point in their history, and we too are part of that turning point. If I could use a metaphor, it is as if we are all standing together on a shoreline where we are negotiating social, cultural and economic changes. And I am convinced that the generations that follow ours, looking at these changes that are taking place today, will find many footprints on that shoreline and among them, well in the forefront, they will find the footprints of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. Paproski: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, could we have unanimous consent of the House to continue this debate? There are other members on this side of the House who would like to speak on this motion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has made a request, but he cannot gain the floor on a point of order to make that request.

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, I was coming to the end of my remarks. I want to reiterate that on that shoreline, as I am putting it, among all the people who have been interested in this field, one of the footprints that will be found in an advanced position—well in advance—will be the footprint of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development who has presided over more fruitful change in the three years of this Parliament than has taken place over preceding decades.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being six o'clock p.m., this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

CONSERVATION OF MARINE RESOURCES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent importance to the whole of Canada. The motion has to do with the conservation and protection of our marine resources and, because of the importance of the question, I sincerely trust it will receive the unanimous consent of the House. I might say that should it receive unanimous consent we would be prepared to have it dealt with without debate.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan):

That the House commends the reference to the Fisheries Committee and the External Affairs Committee of the matter of conservation and protection of our marine resources and that the said committees be empowered to call witnesses and hear briefs pertaining thereto and, further, that the committees in question investigate the positive implications for Canada of the recent legislative move by the State of Massachusetts in extending its fish conservation and pollution boundaries 200 miles seaward.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador has proposed this motion under the terms of Standing Order 43. It requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the motion cannot be put.

Mr. Lundrigan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, in responding to Your Honour's inquiry concerning unanimous consent I respectfully submit that the members who said no did not hear the contents of that urgent and very important motion which does not place anyone in the House in an embarrassing position by accepting it without debate.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that that is debate. The very purpose of the Standing Order is that, without debate, a member may seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion. I am sure the hon. member is not suggesting that the Chair should inquire whether all hon. members heard the motion and appreciate the contents thereof. I have to inquire whether there is unanimous consent. There is no unanimity. I am sure the hon. member has heard what I have heard, and therefore the motion cannot be put.

CRIMINAL RECORDS ACT

GRANTING OF PARDONS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I wish to present a motion on a question of urgent importance. The urgency of the matter relates to the fact that the granting of pardons under the Criminal Records Act is a sham and a farce, and that it is imperative that amendments be effected to the Criminal Records Act at the earliest possible moment in order that the situation be rectified.

The present situation does not allow the elimination or eradication of a person's past criminal record. It does not remove his file from police files, and is no more than a general statement of the government's view which can be revoked at any time. In view of the fact that this was not the intention of the committee or of the House, I move:

That the Criminal Records Act be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs in order that amendments can be proposed that will carry out the intention of the House with regard to the granting of pardons.

The motion is seconded by the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales).

• (2:10 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

LEAKING OF CABINET DOCUMENTS—REQUEST FOR WITHDRAWAL OF ALLEGED STATEMENT IMPLICATING MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT AND PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, in reply to a question put on Tuesday by my hon. friend from Hamilton West the Prime Minister gave an answer involving serious accusations against Members of Parliament and members of the Public Service. Will the Prime Minister now tell the House if the investigations carried on with respect to the theft and/or leaks of cabinet and other confidential documents have progressed to the stage where it has been established that members of the Public Service and Members of Parliament are guilty as charged?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if we have such evidence it will not be put forth in a hypothetical manner as I did in my answer on Tuesday. If the hon. member wishes to look at the record he will see that I was saying that if such and such a thing happens—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: —such and such consequences might follow. That is not an accusation, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Baldwin: In light of the fact that I did look at the record very carefully, and in light of the Prime Minister's answer today and in view of his high position and, more important, his position as a member of this House, will he now withdraw the statement and the charges he made in the House on Tuesday last?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if there had been charges which I could not substantiate I would certainly withdraw them, but there were no charges.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: That is what I call mudslinging.

SPECIAL DEVELOPMENT LOAN PROGRAM—SUGGESTED INCREASE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA ALLOCATION—AMENDMENT OF FORMULA

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance regarding the $160 million special development loan program. In view of the fact that in the province of British Columbia the entire allocation of $21.7 million has already been applied for and there is still a long list of municipalities and, in addition, the two largest cities, Vancouver and Victoria, have not yet applied, and in view of the fact this would indicate there will not be sufficient money allocated to the province of British Columbia to meet the demands by the municipalities for capital works programs, is any consideration being given to increasing the amount of money, either the total amount of the fund or the amount allocated to British Columbia?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Not at this point, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Douglas: The minister will recall that the original amount last year was $150 million and the government changed the formula slightly and increased the amount to $160 million. Has any consideration been given to changing the formula so that provinces like British Columbia would not have their allocation reduced as theirs has been from $39.8 million to $21.7 million?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I have indicated that I shall table the method of calculation. This occurred in British Columbia because relatively the employment position there improved vis-à-vis other provinces. Last year there was a technical adjustment at the end in order to bring the figures up to date. At this point we have not considered making any such adjustment but we will take a look at the figures.

Mr. Douglas: It is some weeks since the minister promised to table those figures and it is difficult to be satisfied with the allocation until one sees the working papers. May I ask the minister when he intends to table the working papers?

Mr. Benson: Very soon, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

SPECIAL DEVELOPMENT LOAN PROGRAM—PROVINCIAL USE OF FUNDS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the previous question and is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that all the money allocated to British Columbia under the special loan development fund has now been used up, is the minister in a position to report to the House what the situation is for the other provinces?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker, but I will seek the information and inform the House and my hon. friend.

SPECIAL LOANS TO EXHIBITIONS—AMENDMENT OF REQUIREMENTS TO INCLUDE CLASS C FAIRS

Mr. Craig Stewart (Marquette): My question arises out of a similar program announced at the same time and is addressed to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the recent announcement by his department that 30-year loans are available to exhibition boards for buildings and improvements and as the criteria for these loans cover only A and B class fairs—as an example, only six communities in the entire province of Manitoba qualify—is it the intention of the government to change the requirements so that class C fairs qualify and thus make this program available to more Canadians?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in dealings with the fairs and exhibitions across the country the federal Department of Agriculture only deals with class A and B fairs. The provinces themselves deal with prize money and other grants to fairs from class C down. It seems to me that in the first instance we should be looking at least only at those with which we already have established relationships.

Mr. Hales: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure whether the question asked was supplementary to the question asked previously.

[Later:]

JOINT FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO CLASS C FAIRS

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is addressed to the Minister of Agriculture. So far as class C fairs are concerned, would he consider approaching the provincial authorities with a bilateral arrangement under which federal and provincial authorities could contribute together to assist class C fairs?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): I could do that, Mr. Speaker, but of course the Minister of Finance has already, under many other programs, provided a great deal of money to the provinces, and I think most of it could be used for the fairs with which they have working relations now.

An hon. Member: That is nothing but windowdressing.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

GOLDEN EAGLE PLANT AT ST. ROMUALD—INQUIRY RESPECTING QUEBEC CONTRIBUTION TO COST OF CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Last Monday, I asked him a question about the Golden Eagle Company to which the federal government had apparently granted some $10 million to build a plant in St.Romuald.

Would the minister tell the House if, according to a federal-provincial agreement, the Quebec government has paid part of the cost of this plant?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the amount granted was not $10 million but $5 million and there is also a $5 million tax abatement under the former program.

As far as I know, the Province of Quebec has not paid part of the construction cost of this plant.

CLOSING OF CHEMCELL LIMITED—POSSIBILITY OF ESTABLISHING NEW INDUSTRIES IN MONTMAGNY

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Regional Economic Expansion a supplementary question on the same subject of the establishment of new industries.

Last week, I asked him a question about the development of new industries in Montmagny and he then implied that he would soon have good news to announce.

Could the minister say today whether new industries will be established in Montmagny in the near future in order to find jobs for the workers of the Chemcell soon to be laid off?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I have good news. I don't know whether it is good news for the hon. member, but it is at least for the people of Montmagny. In fact, Consolidated Textile Ltd. have accepted the offer of a grant and will be establishing a plant at Montmagny, thus creating 150 jobs there and probably 300 after a few months of operation.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

FOREIGN INVESTMENT—REQUEST FOR PUBLICATION OF OFFICIAL REPORT TO CABINET—POLICY ON USE OF SCREENING MECHANISM

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the unparalleled public interest in one of the drafts of the Gray report recently published and the comments of the Prime Minister and others to the effect that this would not in any way represent a total statement of the matter to the cabinet, has the Prime Minister had an opportunity to consult with the Minister of National Revenue and others with a view to publishing fairly quickly an official draft of this important document so that Canadians may have all the facts before them in considering this very important question?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have discussed the matter, not the draft of the Gray report, as the hon. member calls it, but the question of publishing certain materials which in the form of facts and analysis were useful to the cabinet in studying this whole question. The minister has told me that he is giving very urgent consideration to a recommendation to cabinet to publish these as soon as possible.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I wonder as well, since there was some acknowledgment recently that a decision in principle had been taken in the latter part of July with reference to the mechanism of a screening agency, whether any further decision was taken since then, possibly after August 15, which would have reversed that earlier decision in principle?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, without wanting to reveal in advance in any way the nature of the decision, it would be our hope to announce the government's position on this matter when we publish the material to which I just referred. We are working on a timetable now. As I say, I hope that within perhaps a week or ten days the minister will be able to give a date on which the whole thing will be forthcoming.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I know the Prime Minister does not want to be put in the position of disclosing decisions taken by the cabinet. It was indicated that a decision in principle had been taken. Is it fair to say that this decision taken in principle still stands and has not been subsequently reversed or over-ruled?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question as asked is not in order. The hon. member wants to know whether it is fair to say something. I do not think a question asked in those terms is in order. I bring to the attention of hon. members that many members are seeking the opportunity to ask questions and there should be a limitation on supplementaries. Perhaps we might have the co-operation of all hon. members in this regard.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EXTENSION BY MASSACHUSETTS OF FISH PROTECTION AND POLLUTION BOUNDARY 200 MILES SEAWARD—IMPLICATIONS FOR CANADA

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): My question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the minister been apprised of the recent legislative move by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts whereby that state extended its fish protection and pollution boundaries 200 miles seaward, and has he had an opportunity to assess the positive implications of this move for Canada?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of it. I will certainly make inquiries to see what has really happened and look at the implications for Canada.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): In view of the fact this bill was passed by the Massachusetts legislature more than a week ago and has been the subject of consultation between the state department and the government of Massachusetts, may I ask the minister if he has had any discussions with the American state department with regard to their reaction to our taking similar action on our continental shelf to that taken by the sovereign state of Massachusetts?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I would first like to find out the attitude of the state department toward the action of the legislature of Massachusetts.

AGREEMENT BETWEEN BRITAIN AND RHODESIA SETTLING DIFFERENCES—FAIR TEST OF OPINION OF ALL RHODESIANS

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): My question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is with regard to Rhodesia. Will the minister state whether Canada, before any change in her policy or in that of the United Nations with regard to non-recognition of an independent Rhodesia before majority rule, will seek a genuine and fair test of the opinion of all Rhodesians?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet had an opportunity of perusing the agreement that has been reached between the Rhodesian government and the British government. It was just given to my office a relatively few minutes ago. However, it is my understanding that the agreement does provide for what the two sides hope will be an adequate means of testing the views of the Rhodesian people. Whether it is adequate is, of course, a question that will be open for discussion in many parts of the world.

Mr. Brewin: Will the Canadian government retain economic sanctions against Rhodesia until the United Nations has had an opportunity to review the situation and decide whether the sanctions should be continued notwithstanding any unilateral action by the government of the United Kingdom?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that the British government will seek international acquiescence in whatever action is found to be desirable by that government. We, of course, will take our own view of the situation in light of all the facts. At the present time, I do not think anyone has any intention of lifting the sanctions against Rhodesia.

REASON FOR CANADIAN ABSTENTION FROM GENERAL ASSEMBLY VOTE ON PROTECTION OF RIGHTS OF MAJORITY OF RHODESIANS

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): What is the basis for Canada having abstained on a vote in the General Assembly on Monday of this week on the issue of ensuring that the rights of the majority of the people of Rhodesia will be protected in any settlement with the United Kingdom?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, one of the principal reasons was that we did not want to prejudge any agreement that had been reached between the British and Rhodesian governments and that, after all, the test as to whether the provisions are acceptable does not really reside with us. It resides with the people of Rhodesia.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Fundy-Royal for the third or fourth supplementary on this subject, not on the part of the hon. member. He is being recognized, but we will then go on to the next subject.

Mr. Fairweather: Can we be assured that in connection with any settlement the wishes of the majority of the people will include those of the five and a half million black people of Rhodesia?

Mr. Sharp: As I said in answer to a previous question, there is provision in the agreement between Rhodesia and the British government for the appointment of a commission that would be instructed to determine the views of the Rhodesian people.

REPORTED INVASION OF EAST PAKISTAN BY INDIAN TROOPS

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the Canadian government received any information from our High Commissioners in India and Pakistan confirming or otherwise a reported invasion of East Pakistan by Indian army troops?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): All that I can confirm, and I need hardly do it, is that there are hostilities going on in the border areas between India and Pakistan. The government of Pakistan has informed us that an invasion has taken place. This has been denied by the Indian government.

Mr. Harkness: Has Canada taken any initiative in the United Nations in an attempt to bring the present outbreak of hostilities to an end and prevent it spreading more widely?

Mr. Sharp: I think it is significant that neither India nor Pakistan wishes to bring this matter before the Security Council at the present time.

ENERGY

RECONSIDERATION BY NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD OF REFUSAL OF NATURAL GAS EXPORT APPLICATIONS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. It is reported by Reuters News Agency that the United States Secretary of Commerce, Maurice Stans, is presently discussing a trade pact with Premier Kosygin of the U.S.S.R. I quote:

> The two foreign trade chiefs are expected to examine the possibilities of selling Soviet natural gas and oil to the United States and eventually, also copper from the vast untapped reserves of eastern Russia.

In other words, they will liquify natural gas and there will be a trade agreement between the U.S.S.R. and the United States for the delivery of this natural gas and crude petroleum. In light of this information, would the Prime Minister agree to have the National Energy Board review its decision with reference to the export of natural gas from Canada to the United States?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Subject to verification in law, I do not believe the federal government has any power to ask the National Energy Board to review a decision. I will look into the matter. I just hope that this rapprochement between the United States and the Soviet Union will not be interpreted by obscurantist Americans as an anti-Canadian move.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: I do not have any comment to make on the last sentence of the Prime Minister. Would the government be prepared to recommend that the members of the National Energy Board appear before the Standing Committee on Energy, Mines and Resources so that they could be examined by parliamentarians as to the reserves of natural gas in Canada and the need for natural gas for domestic and industrial use in Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: I am sure the hon. member would not want the government to tell people what their duty is. If they are convened by a parliamentary committee it is the policy of the government to stand outside and not interfere with decisions made by parliamentary committees.

Mr. Woolliams: May I ask one further supplementary?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member might do so, but again I would point out that we shall be running out of time soon and if there are many supplementaries on each question a number of hon. members will be disappointed.

Mr. Woolliams: I should like to put this question to the Prime Minister. Would the government be interested in evidence relating to the decision made by the National Energy Board, evidence which would be placed before the standing committee through examination of the members of that Board to determine the reasons for their judgment?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, of course. If the standing committee comes up with some conclusions and a report we would be very interested in looking at them.

POSSIBLE SALE OF LA PRÉVOYANCE TO UNITED STATES INTERESTS—REPRESENTATIONS BY GOVERNMENT

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

[Mr. Caouette.]

It was reported yesterday that La Prévoyance, a company with assets of some $46 million, would eventually pass into American hands. I am told that no provincial or federal act can prevent that transaction. Since the question is important, particularly for French Canadians, does the Prime Minister intend to put pressure on or to make representations to the high officials of that company in order to prevent that transaction? If not, does the Prime Minister not believe that the time is ripe to put into effect the recommendations of the Gray report?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think that for the time being this news is still a rumour. I understand the importance of the point raised by the hon. member and I have asked for further information. If this rumour is well-founded, we will have to answer the question but, in the meantime, perhaps the hon. member could specify what he means when he says that we should apply pressure on the company? Pressure for what purpose?

Mr. Asselin: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

I think I should answer the right hon. Prime Minister that it is not pressures but representations that should be made to the company in order that they understand that assets of $46 million should remain in the hands of French Canadians. I think we need these assets in Quebec.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR REPRESENTATIONS CONCERNING REMARK BY PROVINCIAL JUDGE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker may I ask the Minister of Justice whether his attention has been brought to an alleged blanket condemnation of the Indian people by County Court Judge Collins, who allegedly referred to "the stupid Indians of whom we have so many"? Has the minister's attention been brought to this statement and, if so, what is he going to do about it? It is a kind of vocal genocide when a fine body of people such as the Canadian Indians receive this type of condemnation in regard to their citizenship.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that this question was asked the other day, but at the same time I do not think an answer was given to the question so perhaps the minister or someone on his behalf might reply.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, at the moment I have no information other than the story in the Toronto Globe and Mail. I did discuss the matter last week when in Toronto with the Attorney General of Ontario, Mr. Lawrence, and I have asked the chief judge of the County Courts of Ontario, Colin Bennett, to let me have a report.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Has the minister received a telegram from Chief George Manuel, president of the National Indian Brotherhood? Would the minister also let the House know whether or not this judge will be communicated with to ascertain what possible justification there would be for a statement that, to say the least, is an outrageous slander of the Indian people?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman did begin his question by saying that this was an alleged statement. I do not want to assume anything until I have had a chance to get a report from the chief judge of the County Courts. As for the telegram from the brotherhood, it may well have reached my office and I will make sure that I read it personally.

Will the minister also inform the House which grain company is acting as agent at the government elevator at Moose Jaw, and whether the elevator has been leased, is under contract, or under what terms it operates?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. gentleman that this kind of question should be placed on the order paper. If there is urgency the hon. member might like to give notice to the Chair and it will be given priority for consideration at the time of adjournment.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, may I rephrase my question?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member might rephrase his question and I will determine whether the rephrased question should be put on the order paper or not.

Mr. Gleave: Will the minister make a statement on motions in the near future informing the House what the policy of his department is, and indeed of the federal government, in regard to the use and leasing of interior terminal grain facilities in western Canada, and explaining the basis upon which grain will be handled in these facilities?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker, I do not think so, but I would be very happy to answer the hon. member's question if it is put on the order paper, and perhaps to expand on it a little.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the review that I announced some time ago of the Paravert Construction Company project is under way. It is a two-pronged investigation. First of all, a special group from CMHC head office is taking a look at all of the procedures followed in this case. Independently of that, two separate engineering consultant firms are examining the project from an engineering point of view. I inquired as recently as this morning where the engineering consultants' report stands, and I was told that it should be available to me in complete detail very shortly. When it is I shall examine it and advise the House whether there is any indication that further problems have developed.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the minister.

Can he give the House the assurance that no loan will be granted the promoters of the project "Abeille" by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation until the report on the enquiry has been made known to the House?

• (2:40 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, a loan was made some time ago and the company that received the loan went into an arrangement for the benefit of creditors in June. Legal proceedings have taken place since that time, so the project is now owned by CMHC which totally changes the arrangements. Consequently repairs are being effected now. A guarantee has been extended to the purchasers of record as of that time and we are taking all reasonable measures to assure the people involved that they will not be hurt in the process.

INCOME TAX

POSSIBLE WITHDRAWAL OF PROVISIONS OF BILL AFFECTING CREDIT UNIONS

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In light of the apparent concern and interest shown to the Nova Scotia credit unions last weekend at Halifax by the President of the Privy Council regarding Bill C-259, may I ask the hon. gentleman whether the more iniquitous sections of the bill affecting credit unions will be removed?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I disagree that there are iniquitous sections. However, we have been receiving representations from credit unions and from co-operative organizations and at the present time the government is considering them.

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the President of the Privy Council stated the government was "listening to the recommendations of the provincial credit unions", may I ask whether the minister is listening and will remedial action be taken as a result of such listening?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I would say I always listen to the President of the Privy Council.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You listen but you don't act.

Mr. Muir: Do you act on his advice?

POLLUTION

DUMPING OF EFFLUENT BY ATLANTIC RICHFIELD OIL INTO WATERS ADJACENT TO CHERRY POINT, WASHINGTON—CANADIAN REPRESENTATIONS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether the government has made any representations to the government of the United States objecting to the proposal and subsequent fact that Atlantic Richfield Oil Company at its refinery at Cherry Point, Washington, is dumping and is permitted to dump 3.7 million gallons of refinery effluent into the waters adjacent to Cherry Point?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, now that I have these facts before me I will certainly inquire and make appropriate representations, because I agree with the hon. member that this would affect the Canadian as well as the United States environment.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as it does do that in respect of Canadian waters in the Strait of Juan de Fuca and the Gulf of Georgia, an important migration route for salmon, can the minister say whether he has had any discussions with the Minister of the Environment to develop a policy on this matter?

FINANCE

CANADIAN INITIATIVE AT FORTHCOMING GROUP OF TEN MEETING TO REGULARIZE INTERNATIONAL MONETARY SITUATION

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance to advise the House whether Canada is going to take any initiatives at the forthcoming meeting of the Group of Ten with a view to bringing about some regularization of the world international monetary situation, or are we just going to slide along and hope for someone else to come up with the prize?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker. We have been carrying on discussions with various countries and we intend to continue these at the meeting of the Group of Ten and to take every initiative possible to help solve this very important problem.

[Mr. Muir.]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF PAYMENT BY RUSSIA FOR DAMAGE TO CANADIAN FISHING GEAR

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated to the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate that he would look into the circumstances surrounding the pollution bill passed by the state of Massachussetts, has he been made aware of the fact that the Russians are paying $100,000 for damage to fishing gear off the same coast and does he think we could apply for payment for such damage off our coasts?

[Later:]

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, I should like to restate my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact the U.S.S.R. has paid compensation to the United States government for the destruction of fishing gear off the coast of the state of Massachussetts, will the minister make representations to the U.S.S.R. in our dealings with them so we can collect for damage off the Atlantic coast?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it would be my expectation that if we could make a claim for damage of this kind the Soviet Union would pay it.

BROADCASTING

QUEBEC CABLEVISION LEGISLATION—FEDERAL JURISDICTION—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, now that the Quebec government is proceeding with legislation to set up its own licensing system for cablevision, thereby obviating the need for CRTC licences, will the Secretary of State make a statement in the House as to the meaning of this legislation in relation to federal jurisdiction as determined by the recent series of meetings he has had with the Quebec Minister of Communications to which he referred in the House last Thursday?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I find it hard to accept the allegations of the hon. member who seems to understand the whole situation clearly while in fact it is ambiguous for a very simple reason: all the bills he refers to fall within Quebec jurisdiction, as mentioned in the bill.

It does not rest with me to determine what the jurisdiction of Quebec is; so, for the time being, I find this bill very ambiguous.

[English]

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, will the Secretary of State comment on the report that the Quebec government will not recognize any ruling by the Supreme Court of Canada which would challenge its plans to—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is asking the minister to comment on a statement he says appeared in the newspapers. I would not think that a question asked in those terms is in order.

AGRICULTURE

PROTECTION AGAINST IMPORTATION OF SUBSIDIZED PRODUCTS FROM UNITED STATES

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Has he received representations from the Ontario Federation of Agriculture as a result of their meeting in Hamilton, and is he prepared to consider their request for protection against the importation of subsidized farm products from the United States?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker, but I have read the press report.

AGREEMENT BETWEEN BRITAIN AND RHODESIA SETTLING DIFFERENCES—MEETING WITH BRITISH MINISTER—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CANADIAN POSITION

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he is meeting with the British Minister of State, Mr. Joseph Godber, on Saturday with regard to the proposed Rhodesian settlement which was announced in the British House of Commons today and, if so, will he make a statement in the House early next week, if possible, on the attitude the government of Canada takes on this matter?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is yes, I will be meeting with Mr. Godber in Toronto on Saturday morning. It would be my expectation that I will make a statement probably early in the week.

PROVISIONS IN BILL RESPECTING CAPITAL GAINS TAX ON BASIC HERDS—OPPORTUNITY FOR REPRESENTATIONS BEFORE FURTHER CONSIDERATION BY HOUSE

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance in respect of the application of capital gains tax on basic herds. Are the minister and the government reconsidering their position on that aspect and are they prepared to hear briefs and listen to interested parties before the subject comes up again in the House of Commons?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I read the Senate report on the study it carried out in respect of this matter. I also listened with great interest to my hon. friend in the House for a couple of days when he explained his view in relation to basic herds. I would be pleased to receive representations from other parties in this regard.

NUCLEAR EXPLOSION BY PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA—CANADIAN PROTEST

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

When the United States went ahead recently with nuclear tests at Amchitka, the government voiced strong opposition. Besides, the minister received a number of protests from various Canadian organizations. Would the minister tell the House whether his department and Canadian organizations made similar representations to China when the latter conducted a similar test a few days later.

Mr. Speaker: Order, I believe this question has been asked previously, but the minister may answer it briefly if he wants to.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, our ambassador in Peking has been instructed to present a note to the Chinese government.

AMCHITKA NUCLEAR TEST—STUDY OF SUBSEQUENT EARTHQUAKES

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question on the subject of the Amchitka test. It concerns a press report about three major earthquakes that have occurred in the general area since November 6. I should like to ask the minister whether Canadian researchers have studied these three earthquakes in this area and is the government currently in possession of the results of their research?

REACTIVATION OF INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT IN LIGHT OF DECLINING PRICES

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration who answers to the House for the Wheat Board, but in his absence I will direct it to the acting minister who may wish to take it as notice. In light of the deep concern expressed by farm representatives at the agricultural outlook conference held in Ottawa on Monday and Tuesday with respect to sagging farm income caused by seriously declining wheat prices, what action, if any, has the government taken in recent weeks to encourage the reactivation of the international wheat agreement?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): No specific action has been taken along that line, but I should like to advise the hon. member that a great deal of action has been taken and we are probably going to have another record-breaking year for grain sales.

AGRICULTURE

PROGRAMS TO ENABLE FARMERS TO ACQUIRE LAND AND CAPITAL RESOURCES AND FOR FAMILY-TYPE FARMS

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): My question is for the Minister of Agriculture. It has to do with the communiqué on the agricultural conference tabled today in which the minister states that provisions will be forthcoming to enable farmers to more readily acquire land and capital resources essential to improve their income, and also that programs will be directed to family-type farms. What will these programs be?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the minister and to the hon. member who has asked the question that this kind of information should be given by way of a general statement.

Mr. Horner: Farmers will be forced off the land.

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The decision you have just made focuses attention on many recent events that have occurred here which involve the Minister of Agriculture. Statements such as the communiqué concerning a major conference that the minister tabled today should not be tabled. Such statements should be made on motions so that opposition members may have the opportunity to look at them and express their opinions on them. Recently other statements have been made outside the House and outside Ottawa entirely. For instance, the statement on the fowl buying program was made on the east coast after questions had been asked in the House and after I had sent to the chairman of the Farm Products Marketing Board plans to carry out such a program. If the minister chooses to do it this way, he has that privilege, but it should be known that he is afraid to face the representatives of the people and make a statement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The point raised by the hon. member might have been raised by way of a point of order. I do not think it is a question of privilege. In fairness, I think the minister might want to reply, but I suggest there is no question of privilege before the House.

Mr. Olson: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, the communiqué I tabled was not mine; it was the collective agreement of all the ministers at the conference. If the hon. member will read his mail, he will see he has had all the proposals—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is evidence of how we can get involved in difficulties. Certainly the hon. member's point was not a question of privilege. The minister rose on a point of order. This could go on all afternoon. I wonder whether that is what hon. members want to do. I have to rule that there is no question of privilege and no point of order.

Mr. McKinley: I have another point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I will listen to the hon. member and then rule on whether he has a legitimate point of order. But I suggest that when hon. members raise points of debate by way of a point of order they are not helping the efficient progress of the work of the House.

Mr. McKinley: The minister is quite correct. I did receive this in the mail yesterday—I will say that—but at the same time a statement should have been made in the House regarding this important agricultural conference held here in Ottawa and the state in which agriculture finds itself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order which arises out of the statement made just now by the Minister of Agriculture to the effect that the communiqué which he tabled was not a federal government document. If that is the case, he had no right to table it under Standing Order 41(2).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I should apologize to the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East who had been recognized before, but we got involved in a question of privilege. Perhaps the hon. member might be allowed to ask his question quickly.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

POSSIBLE SALE OF CF-5 AIRCRAFT TO VENEZUELA

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): My question is for the Minister of National Defence. I wonder if the minister can give us any indication on the present status of arrangements to sell CF-5's to Venezuela?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): I am sorry that I cannot give a report on the deal, but we are hopeful that it will be consummated shortly.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order arising out of a reply of the Secretary of State for External Affairs earlier this afternoon. May I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to lay on the table of the House a copy of a bill passed by the Massachussetts legislature on November 8 extending territorial jurisdiction seaward for 200 miles.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Of course anything can be done by unanimous consent, but the hon. member knows that is not the regular practice.

Mr. McGrath: My reason for asking for unanimous consent was the fact that the minister disclaimed any knowledge of this important bill affecting, as it does, a very important industry. So that the government can be advised of the contents of the bill and can react on behalf of the people of Canada, I should like to ask the unanimous consent of the House to table the bill.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Orders of the day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baldwin: I should like to ask the government House leader about the business for the rest of this week and for next week. Has the government any idea of when it intends to conclude this part of the session and what items it has on the legislative table?

Mr. MacEachen: Tomorrow we will continue with the tax bill and then on Monday, and on and on. My hon. friend could help me in determining the future prospects for the House if he could tell me when I can get the bill passed.

Mr. Nowlan: How many more amendments will you be bringing in?

Mr. MacEachen: As I said, in addition to the tax bill and related tax bills that we have considered we have some items standing at the report stage which we would like to finish in this session. I think I have stated that already.

Mr. Benson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, earlier today I promised the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands that I would table something very soon. "Very soon" is now if I have the permission of the House to do so.

Mr. Baldwin: Under what Standing Order?

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There is a further point of order. It seems to me that for the last ten minutes we have not made much progress because of points of order and questions of privilege.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, my point of order is that I want to thank the minister for tabling the document and ask him—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member resume his seat. The minister sought permission to revert to motions to table the document. That was not granted and the document is not tabled. The matter can be reviewed tomorrow. The Chair has called orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO ESTABLISH A SOCIAL AND ECONOMIC SECURITY PLAN

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue) moved:

That this House condemns the government for its failure to propose legislation establishing a social and economic security plan placing all Canadians above the poverty level.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in view of the flagrant abuses of the welfare system now in force in Canada, we had to introduce this motion which does not reflect any narrowness of mind, but certainly a desire to enable all members to clearly express their views, to make useful suggestions so as to give the Canadian people, not a welfare pittance as is the case now, but a genuine social and economic security plan placing all Canadians above the poverty level.

Recently, the Senate Committee on Poverty Published its famous report establishing the poverty level and suggesting correctives in order to provide all Canadian citizens with a standard of living exceeding at least that famous poverty level widely known in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to quote an economist who is a professor at the London School of Economics—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member for Témiscamingue—

[English]

The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) rises on a point of order.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to intervene while the hon. member was attempting to make his point on the motion that is before the House, but I am finding it extremely difficult to follow him. I have questioned hon. members sitting around me and none of us seem to be getting the interpretation of his speech. In view of the fact that we are trying to follow the thoughts of the hon. member, in order to refute or support them, I wonder if Your Honour in the very near future would look into the matter of this new apparatus through which we get the interpretation.

With a great deal of respect to Your Honour, I have to say that it is not as good as the previous system. We are having continuous difficulties with the translation of members' speeches, and when this continues we are at a loss to know what is actually going on. As a result, we have to refer to Hansard the next day. It appears to me the volume of amplification is distorting the words, as a result of which we do not hear very much at all.

Mr. Speaker: The matter raised by the hon. member has been looked into previously. There have been difficulties with the new system, and we will continue to try to impove it. I might say that as the hon. member was speaking I listened to him directly with one ear and to the interpretation with the other ear, and did not miss a single word of what he was saying, either in French or in English. Perhaps there may be something wrong with the apparatus in that part of the chamber. We will, of course, look into the matter without delay.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I am much obliged to the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) for his words. We too have noticed rather often that the new sound system is really poorer than the previous one, and when some members are whispering it is twice as difficult to follow those who are just addressing themselves to the House. I do not blame in any way the hon. member for Hamilton West for cutting in. He is absolutely right. When some member speaks in English we like to hear the simultaneous translation. We would be pleased if the sound system would work adequately.

I was just saying that everybody has his economists; the Liberals have theirs, the Progressive Conservatives too and even the New Democrats! Strangely enough, all these economists cannot agree.

The Liberals give a different interpretation to the theories of Progressive-Conservative and New Democratic economists as well as to those of the founder of Social Credit, Major C. H. Douglas. I believe what is needed in the first place is some agreement among economists so that laymen like us may better understand economic, political and social matters.

At any rate, I would like to quote, as this point, Professor A. A. Waters of the London School of Economics, the exclusive institution where most of our economists were trained and received their degree. According to an editorial, Professor Waters had this to say:

"In Great Britain as well as in the United States (he could have added in most industrialized countries of the world),— —the same problem exists in all developed countries—

—we have noted the simultaneous development of a runaway inflation and of high rates of unemployment—Stagflation appears as a new phenomenon which needs to be explained.

On last July 25, the economist made a speech at the University of Monash, Victoria. On that occasion professor Waters stated his new findings. I continue quoting:

Professor Waters added:

"The association of uncontrolled inflation and a record unemployment rate has been a—

—that is exactly the situation we are facing in Canada—

—puzzling phenomenon for economists and the authorities ... Theories on inflation-unemployment have been strongly challenged by the last two year's experience."

Referring to John Maynard Keynes—

—the most eminent economist whose theories our governments have been trying to follow or have been following for about 25 or 30 years—

[Mr. Alexander.]

—the economist Waters said that he asserted that if there is full employment, an increase in total demand should result in rising prices. Consequently, many Keynesians—

—adepts of Keynes—

—like Professor Paish, foresee that a high level of unemployment is linked to price stability and a low unemployment level to increased prices. Alas, neither conventional economists nor disciples of Keynes are able to make predictions even remotely related to what we are witnessing today.

They are completely out-of-date. They no longer know where they stand with their theories.

Conventional economists can perhaps find readier justification since theirs are long-term predictions.

Let us take action today to obtain results in 50 years. Not short- but long-term results.

• (3:10 p.m.)

Keynes disciples have no excuse whatever. They claim that such a theory is based on short-term forecasts and policies.

Let us settle this right now. Let us build an expressway to hire as many people as possible in order to fight unemployment. Such a project will last six months but let us not think about what will happen after. This is a short-term policy.

"Moreover, Keynesians have also failed to explain cohabitation of these two strange bedfellows: inflation and unemployment."

Professor Waters admits also:

"Unfortunately the economists' inability to explain stagnation and inflation is not a simple and isolated case. I think it is symptomatic of a general endemic uneasiness ... Numerous treatises on economics maintain that tighter money together with greater budget surpluses will first reduce the excess demand, then block rising prices and after a certain time decrease employment and production. However facts are quite different. The facts seriously contradict texts taken out of treatise on economics."

—The lessons of the last twenty years are clear. Events are far different, in fact almost the opposite, of what books tell us.

Books are read and studied. Then, twenty years later, we find out that reality is totally different from what the books say. It must be noted that the one who said that was not the leader of the Social Credit, but an economist, a professor at the London School of Economics.

Now, to go back to the quotation:

Let us admit simply that we have no worthwhile theory on the short-term monetary adjustment dynamics in the cost/price process. This is an honest admission, but not a desperate one.

In fact, he seeks a solution himself:

I feel that in the last few years, economics failed, humiliatingly so.

This is the confession of an economist.

Mr. Speaker, this is why, in the present situation, in industrialized countries which do not know what to do with their products, we offer a solution. My colleagues and myself are moving today a motion and we ask all members, Liberals, Progressive Conservatives or New Democrats, to study our proposal. It is in that sense that some cabinet ministers have already talked. They have even recognized their failure and the fact that their promises could not be realized in the present system. I read in the November 21, 1968 issue of L'Action of Quebec City, a statement by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) who said, and I quote:

The "just society" will probably never exist.

The minister said that and he now indicates he is convinced of that. If he would accept our help, that just society could be established throughout Canada. We offer to the minister suggestions which he should discuss seriously, which he should try to understand instead of laughing at them. He knows there is no solution under the present system.

He may drain his department of all the funds possible in order to help industries barely survive, but after six months, this has not yet created jobs or settled the problem. And this government has been in power for three years. I believe that the minister is sincere when he seeks solutions, but he is working in a context where solutions are practically impossible, in a context of indebtedness, in a context where we are not the masters of our credit but the slaves of a financial system controlled by a handful of individuals who order us, most of the time from the United States, what to do in Canada. And we call our Parliament a sovereign Parliament.

I said the day before yesterday, for instance, that nothing prevents Parliament from allowing the Bank of Canada to grant loans. Besides, the law provides that the Bank of Canada can grant loans to the provinces, but the latter do not borrow due to the terms of repayment. The Bank of Canada has the authority to make loans to the provinces and municipalities for a period not exceeding six months, pursuant to section 20 of the Bank of Canada Act. All we have to do is to change the term "six months" for "60 years." Moreover, it is the period of time which we set for Indians and some underdeveloped countries. Let us allow the provinces to borrow through the Bank of Canada for six-month periods. The government takes nearly six months to set up its winter work program. When it comes to make expenditures, it is already time to reimburse; then the works are suspended. Nothing can be done.

Mr. Speaker, the minister stated on April 9, 1969 in an article entitled "The six imperatives of social justice" the following:

> The first imperative of social justice is that there must be a sufficient number of jobs.

It is true. Two or three years later, the minister says: I do as much as I can, but there are no jobs, it is merely an objective which we set. Now we are trying to achieve that objective. They are not taking the necessary means to do so. For example, they have been merely endeavouring to achieve that objective for 25 years, but to no avail.

I keep on quoting:

> —This is a basic economic question, but also an essential social matter.

Mr. Speaker, I say to the minister—and, by the way, I am happy to see him sitting in his place—that, having been directly engaged in labour and union business and having held for several years the position of president of the CNTU, he is very much aware of the fact that the purpose of economics is not merely to provide jobs but to satisfy the needs of the human being. Employment or unemployment do not matter much; we must make sure that the needs of the people are satisfied, if production allows it. And the minister certainly has little doubt that the Canadian production is sufficient to guarantee to all people the essential economy of security with freedom.

I shall now state the second imperative, that is working conditions. We do want that people be treated as human beings and not like dogs. We all know that.

I continue the quotation:

> The third imperative requires that services be available to people who need them in order to benefit from job opportunities.

Everyone agrees on that.

I continue the quotation:

> The fifth imperative implies that people will get help in order to satisfy the basic needs. This is the first goal of family allowances and subsidized housing and one of the objectives of assistance programs.
>
> The sixth imperative is that people who are absolutely unable to earn their living should nevertheless receive an adequate income. This is the purpose of the disabled aid programs and others of this type; it is also the basic object of general assistance programs.

• (3:20 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, that situation exists throughout Canada, especially in the province of Quebec.

This morning I received a letter from the Saguenay region. In fact it came from Les Buissons. A mother with eight children, whose husband died some time ago, in 1970, describes to me in that letter how she collected some insurance and used it to build a house in order to shelter herself and her eight children, one of whom is four years old. At present she gets a monthly welfare payment of some $230. With that amount she must support a family of nine, meet the ordinary expenses, pay for the heating, the electricity, the telephone and the upkeep of the children.

This mother now has to live on $230 a month, in a rich country like ours, although one of the government's priorities is to help reach the basic objective of welfare programs so as to give needy people a chance to lead a better life.

Is the government going to maintain that a mother with eight children can live on $230 a month? That woman keeps going to her district welfare bureau, in the Saguenay area, only to be told by the chief officer: The criteria prevent us from giving you assistance. So, because the criteria forbid their receiving assistance, a mother and her eight children, who have to attend school, are left to live in abject poverty.

Mr. Speaker, there are thousands of similar cases in Canada, and yet the government still hesitates to introduce legislation which will provide assistance to Canadians with low incomes or no income at all.

I have with me another declaration made by the hon. member for Papineau (Mr. Ouellet), entitled: "Towards a just society."

The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion seems to indicate that there will never be a "just society". His colleague, the hon. member for Papineau, says: "Towards a just society." As far as he is concerned, he is going there, but the minister says: You are not going. But he says he is going anyway!

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Papineau declared and I quote:

> Instead of having a guaranteed annual income plan which we are presently unable to afford,—

I become incensed against such brainless people who maintain that we cannot afford a guaranteed annual income. We cannot afford it, but if war should break out tomorrow, the hon. member who is presently absent, would be the first to vote several billion dollars to set up the Canadian armed forces, war industries, youth enrolment and so on. He would be the first one to vote for it. Even if it cost $10 billion they would find the money. They would tell us, it is because we are facing an emergency situation. It is urgent.

Is the situation not urgent nowadays when we go down to Montreal and we are afraid to walk down the street, to encounter terrorists, to hear a bomb explosion?

The minister was recently on station CKVL to answer questions that were being phoned in on the Frenchie Jaraud program. When he came out he could have been ill-treated by the Lapalme employees. We are in a situation when we have a bomb here, terrorists there, bloody demonstrations. Is that not urgent? Does emergency simply mean going to fight on other continents and leaving oppression go its way here at home before we wake up, take action and introduce legislation acceptable to the population?

Is this not an emergency? Why are those people protesting? Why do the young no longer respect family, school, provincial or federal authority? It is no longer wanted. They do not realize that even after they have done away with our society, they will have to abide by some kind of authority. Montreal's Michel Chartrand would take over and enforce his authority with the help of his clique, put the people in a strait-jacket as Castro does in Cuba or as the leaders in communist or socialist countries do to their population.

Would Canada stand for this? Is it not high time that we wake up the silent majority which would rather wait for the bombs to explode instead of making changes?

Mr. Speaker, we cannot afford to help the Canadian people to live. Was there ever a more stupid argument? And to think that it comes from an hon. member who deems himself responsible. I would say he is feather-brained; he does not understand anything, he does not want to understand, he is impervious to understanding. Unfortunately he is absent today but I shall repeat that to him at the earliest opportunity, when he will be back in the House.

Mr. Speaker, I will keep on with the quotation:

—we want to develop furthermore an income protection system—

Imagine! The citizens have no income and we are going to protect them. As to the establishment of a guaranteed annual income, it is impossible; we cannot afford it. As for the people without an income, we shall guarantee them that they have no income. That is exactly what it means. I should say the argument is quite bright and comes from a fairly learned economist. I keep on:

—we want to develop further an income protection system in favour of classes of Canadian citizens who deserve to get assistance:

older people in need, large families with a low income, retired people, disabled and handicapped people and all those who can and are willing to work, but who on account of the present economic conditions are unable to find employment.

There is a glaring inconsistency in what the hon. member for Papineau said. In another article, under the heading "Elimination of poverty—Collective responsibility" it is reported that the president of the Quebec Caisses populaires, Mr. Rouleau, directly blames the system. I quote:

In Canada, says he, following a substantial increase in family allowances and especially in allowances according to the number and age of the children, two thirds of the poor would be eliminated, according to professor Henripin.

In Quebec, we spend large sums of money for welfare institutions of all kinds, but we are always reluctant when it comes to really helping the basic institution of our society, namely the family. We pay for instance from $75 to $200 per month for a child in an institution—

Therefore, it is true. When the child lives with his family, nothing or almost nothing is allowed. People have to draw the child from his home in order to get a decent pension. If the mother requests custody of her 5 or 6 children, social welfare officials refuse. They tell her: Madam, let your children leave home and then we shall pay up to $200 per month for their maintenance. If you keep them at home, we shall give you $10 per month. Can you imagine such a legislation! All the more power to Mr. Rouleau for pinpointing the weaknesses of the system.

Mr. Speaker, I have only a few minutes left. A while ago an interruption cost me 4 or 5 minutes. Therefore, I should be able to express my suggestion. I am not allowed to speak over 30 minutes. I was so advised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) not long ago.

We are suggesting the establishment of a social security plan as advocated by the Social Credit Party of Canada. I do not wish to take the time of the House to read a document, but if my colleagues allowed me to do so, I would have it recorded in Hansard. The figures would be shown in the official record and I would not need reading them. May I have the permission—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In all respect, I would suggest to the hon. member that this procedure is not at all in order. In so doing, we would be adopting a new procedure, and it would not be profitable for the House if hon. members, in the course of their remarks, were to request that some documents be recorded in Hansard and be considered as part of their speeches. For the information of his colleagues, the hon. member should try to summarize the document. Then, it would be part of his speech. Besides, I have no doubt that his colleagues will grant him the extra time he needs.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I have enough time, I think, to read the whole piece rather quickly. Here it is:

Since every Canadian with an income of $15,000 or more a year is already assured of his social security it is therefore proper to suggest to following:

Tax exemption on any income under $3,000 for all single persons

Tax exemption on any income under $5,000 for all married people

Exemption of $500 for each child

Allocation of a vital minimum to all those earning less than $15,000 a year according to the following standards and without any condition.

If the fellow is working and earns $5,000, this amount is added to his social security.

Here, we help directly all the students in Canada, and I quote:

> Single, 18 and over, $1,500; married, without children, $2,500; married, with one (1) child, $2,750; married, with two (2) children, $3,000; married, with three (3) children, $3,250; married, with four (4) children, $3,500; married, with five (5) children, $3,750; married, with six (6) children, $4,000; pension for all persons 60 and over earning less than $15,000 a year, $200 per month; the spouse, of any age, $150 per month.

That means that if a man retires at 60, and his wife is 48, she will not be caught in this crazy system we now have. Madam, she is told, you are 48, you are not entitled to a single penny. Go and work, wash floors, windows, or offices, but you have no right to your pension because you are not 60. Yet, the spouse gets $150 a month, exactly as the pensioner receives $200. This would mean that a couple would receive $350 a month, which is not too much. They could get an additional income of $2,000, $3,000 $5,000 or $6,000 a year while going about their business. The government would not withdraw their pension because they would have chosen to work. That would be an incentive to personal initiative instead of encouraging people to cheat under the present welfare legislation. People will hide the fact they earn a few dollars so that they will not be caught and be deprived of their welfare payments.

Well, with this kind of program, people would not cheat. They could go about their business, earn $5,000, $6,000 or $7,000 a year, and at the same time receive social assistance, that would be an additional income that would enable them to purchase the goods they want. The fact that people would be encouraged to work would result in increased national production.

Mr. Speaker, that social security system will allow every Canadian to work and earn an annual income of $15,000 or less. If a person earns $9,000 a year and is married, the first $5,000 are not taxable. The amount of $4,000 is taxable if the couple has no children. With two children, $3,000 will be taxable, and so on. That is the restriction. One is not entitled to work if he is to be on welfare. That is what we do away with. It would mean replacing the whole welfare system by a social security system which would put the huge resources of Canada at the service of the Canadian people who build this country.

Then we could say: We have again become masters in our own home, masters of our economy, of our production, of our distribution and of our consumption.

[English]

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I am naturally pleased to be able to make some comments on the Creditiste motion before us today. I feel they should be commended for introducing this motion, which is so timely and important in view of the conditions which exist in our country today, especially that part of it which concerns the approach of the government to the alleviation of poverty. However, I must disagree with the members of that party when they state that the government has failed to propose any economic and social measures. The government has introduced measures, but they have certainly not achieved the desired results. We are hearing enough about economic measures these days, but we are not hearing anything meaningful about social security measures to fight the blemish of poverty which is so prevalent across this nation.

When the new regime took over in 1968, it was good to hear the pledge in the Speech from the Throne that the first priority was going to be the fight against poverty, and the assurance to the people of Canada that there would be equality of opportunity for all Canadians wherever they may live. This was followed by statements to the same effect, but in different words, made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his cabinet colleagues right across the country. Somewhere along the way the problem of poverty fell further and further down the list of priorities. Over the past four years, it has been relegated to an exercise in delaying tactics. Now, every time there is a problem in the country, we set up some kind of organization to study it. More study groups, councils, commissions, task forces and associations are set up and sponsored by this government. It is now one of the biggest industries we have in this country today. I am not entirely against this type of approach to some problems. However, it would be most interesting to know how much time and money has been spent on studying the problem of poverty in Canada, with no action.

After four years, Mr. Speaker, I still cannot reconcile to my satisfaction just what is the purpose. In 1968, when I made my maiden speech in the House, I referred to the mountainous studies on poverty that had been completed at that time. I was amazed that the results of the study by the Economic Council of Canada brought about the startling conclusion that poverty was real. It is worthwhile mentioning the study made at that time by the Economic Council of Canada. They said that poverty had become a major social problem in Canada. This was four years ago. The Economic Council of Canada described it as "a national disgrace". I quote from this study.

> We believe that serious poverty should be eliminated in Canada, and that this should be designated as a major national goal. We believe this for two reasons. The first is that one of the wealthiest societies in world history, if it also aspires to be a just society, cannot avoid setting itself such a goal. Secondly, poverty is costly (in terms of lost jobs, lost incomes, lost taxes).

We then started all over again, first with whirlwind trips across the country by the minister then responsible for housing. This only resulted in embarrassing situations. Next, we had studies on nourishment. We even gave grants to associations to study their own problems. Where are we today, Mr. Speaker, almost four years later? All we have now is a new definition of poverty. If anyone cares to read the Senate Committee Report on Poverty, he will find that almost the whole first section is directed to the different meanings of poverty as defined by the Economic Council of Canada, the Social Development Council and some distinguished gentlemen who have given their versions in books and statements.

While on the subject of the Senate committee report, I must say we have now reached the end of another phase of studying the poor. We have again made the complete circle. The result of the study shows that the welfare system is no good and the government has not been dealing with poverty adequately. We are back where we started. I wish to make it clear that I do not intend any criticism of the hon. Senators who comprised the committee. They deserve commendation for the time and effort spent travelling across the nation to involve themselves in this serious problem. It is obvious from their report they did their job well.

I wonder what the purpose of their mission was. The main recommendation arising out of the report is that the government implement a guaranteed annual income program using the negative income tax method on a national basis, and that the program be financed and administered by the government of Canada. I do not know what liaison there was between the government and the committee, but before the report was even published, the government announced a program to spend $15 million over the next three years to carry out pilot projects in the various provinces using the guaranteed annual income. We have had first reading of Bill C-264 which will provide a family income security plan. What do we have that is new, Mr. Speaker?

The Canadian Council on Social Development agrees with this type of program for Canada. Evidently the government agrees or it would not be spending $15 million on pilot projects, at least I hope not. Our party indicates support of such a program which is reflected in a recently released policy paper. Many other responsible organizations also agree. Everyone agrees on the implementation of such a program, but perhpas in varying degrees, such as what figure should be used as the poverty line.

Even the four mavericks who left the Senate committee in disgust for various reasons agree with the principle of a guaranteed annual income. With the greatest respect to the committee, what is so new about some of the other recommendations? I am sure everyone in this House agrees with their recommendations with regard to economic policies, consumers, education, health care, housing, law, manpower systems and day care centres. We have been tossing these around for days, months and even years, but we are not much farther ahead.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the problem is very simple. The facts are very basic. There are almost 4.5 million poverty stricken Canadians. They are human beings, Mr. Speaker, men, women and children. They need help and it is our duty to recognize their needs as human beings. They elected us to govern because they had confidence and trust in us, and we must show them humane consideration. We must stop treating people as statistics on computer cards. Surely to God, most of us here have seen the suffering of the poor in every one of our constituencies. Surely, we must all be aware of children who are undernourished and who do not have enough to eat. Surely, we have all known of the sick who cannot afford to go to a doctor—even if there is a doctor or a hospital within reach in some of our more remote areas.

Certainly, some of us who are concerned have seen citizens become blind because they could not afford a pair of glasses. Certainly, we have seen people's minds and bodies deteriorate because of lack of medical attention, even to the extent of losing their initiative and will to exist. And they have lost faith in us who govern. We have all witnessed the hovels in which some people are forced to live. When are we going to realize what our priorities are in this country, Mr. Speaker? I agree that pollution is a most serious matter, the pollution of our land, sea and air. But is it not true that the bodies of poverty-stricken people are being polluted through lack of nourishment and the atmosphere under which they have to live, which can also affect the future generations?

Certainly, it is important to foster bilingualism in Canada, but does it hold priority over the necessity to alleviate poverty? Is it necessary that the poor be able to ask for help in more than one language? It is true that we have a duty to stand in this House and condemn hostile countries for torturing human beings, but are we not just as guilty right here at home for allowing many thousands of our children to grow up undernourished? Yes, Mr. Speaker, we must have national unity, but how are we to accomplish this in our great nation when 20 per cent of our population continue to suffer in poverty and lose faith in our government? It is long past time to put politics aside and start using some statesmanship. It is time we meditated a little on our purpose here. It is time we took stock of our duty to the people we represent. It is long past time we stopped studying and started to act.

I was interested yesterday in hearing the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) say, with sincere feeling I believe, that we should approach the problems of the Indians in a non-partisan manner. I endorse that idea, Mr. Speaker, and I challenge him to get his Prime Minister to agree to an all-party conference to eradicate poverty. As the minister said yesterday, he has nothing to hide and his books are wide open. So, let us get all the books open. Let us find out why the family income security program was delayed and why it cannot be put into effect right away. Let us find out from the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) just why it is we cannot afford a guaranteed income plan, why it is there is so much delay in coming to agreement with the provinces who need increased funds under the Canada Assistance Plan to pass on to the blind, the disabled and other indigents. Let us open up the books of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Andras) and find out why it is that we cannot provide enough homes for the poor, especially for those who live outside urban centres.

We are often criticized for wasting time in the House, Mr. Speaker, so why do we not have an open debate on poverty in the House of Commons during which we could receive straight answers and have an exchange of ideas? Or let the leaders of the various parties select some of their members to meet in an effort to solve this embarrassing and serious problems as a priority mission. If we cannot afford the cost, then let us tell the people why. I am sure the leader of our party would give the government good ideas in addition to the one on tax changes which they accepted. I am sure he would not mind advising them on such subjects as full employment, incentives to work under the GAI Plan, ideas for job opportunities and retraining programs.

One of the statements I should like to quote comes from a book by Walter Stewart which is called "Shrug". I am not usually critical, but I think since the statement comes from an outside source it is worth putting on record. He says:

When I think of these people, and all the others I have seen, whose stories I have teased out of them in my line of work, when I think of the hundreds of thousands of Canadians mired in poverty, brutality, squalor and despair, I find it hard to accept the claim that the Trudeau government has hurled itself at the task of creating a Just Society, for I can find no trace in its legislative record of anything that touches the lives of these people in a meaningful way. Their numbers have, in fact, been swollen, first by the anti-inflation drive that froze new housing construction, then by the tight money policies which threw more and more people from the submerged third of society out of work. We have had welfare legislation that tinkers and fiddles and adjusts old, out-moded legislation so as to turn it into new out-moded legislation, we have had amendments and sub-amendments and regulations and directives, but we have not had, not once, not anywhere, any impatience or urgency or thrust toward social or economic reform.

No one expected the government to solve poverty in Canada—not with a fifth of our people and nearly half our rural families below the poverty line laid down by the Economic Council of Canada. What we did expect, what we had a right to expect, what we were led to expect, was a real, concerted, concerned attack on poverty and inequality. We have not had that. An examination of this government's legislative record shows it to be almost barren of meaningful social legislation. You needn't take my word for it. The Liberal party, always well-organized, puts out a mimeographed memorandum called "Liberal Government Achievements", which includes a list of all the legislation passed since the brave words of the first Trudeau Throne Speech rolled into the somnolent hush of the Senate Chamber in September, 1968. It is, to the casual reader, an impressive list, all the way from an act to amend the Judges Act, through such nuggets as the Dominion Coal Board Dissolution Act, the Saltfish Act down to an act to repeal the Leprosy Act.

There have been some sensible, worthwhile measures, which I'll discuss in a moment, but despite all the fanfare for a Just Society that preceded the Trudeau climb to the throne, despite the dashing to and fro of phalanxes of Trudeau aides, despite the disciplined muscularity of the Trudeau machine in the House of Commons, there has been precious little in the way of real government achievement.

It is as if the Prime Minister embraced Michael Oakeshott's description of the ruling role which is 'to restrain, to deflate, to pacify and reconcile, not to stoke the fires of desire but to damp them down'. It isn't so much that the Liberals since 1968 have succeeded in damping down the fires of desire, as that they have tried earnestly to do that, and apparently to do little else—

But together with the relief of poverty, we must not forget the pledge of the government in 1968 to afford opportunity for all Canadians, including opportunity for those who are employed but who are still living below the poverty line. Every Canadian, even those who are poor, is proud to be Canadian. And they want to work. They do not want to be on welfare rolls. It is to this end that we must strive to show the leadership which all Canadians need and for which responsibility we are charged.

Mr. Speaker, my colleagues will be dealing with particular segments of the motion which I hope will make some impression on the government. Finally, I repeat, in a non-partisan manner. We have delayed too long to bring about meaningful programs to combat poverty in our country. I hope that the Minister of National Health and Welfare or the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) will offer us some words of wisdom as to the government's intentions in the area of economic and social policy to bring some hope to the poverty stricken of our country.

[Translation]

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I am sure there are among us many members who are deeply grateful to the Social Credit party for having put this motion today.

The leader of that party clearly outlined the situation of poverty in Canada and he duly reminded the government that the purpose of the country's economy should be above all the welfare of the population as a whole. He referred to many facts illustrating the complete failure of government policy in this regard.

[English]

The hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall), who has just spoken, made at least one point which in my opinion was outstanding, and which should be in the forefront of the minds of all of us as we discuss this subject today: At the present time more than 4.5 million Canadians are living in poverty. More than one third of these poor people are children under the age of 16. I suggest this fact alone should cause the government to decide that it should begin now to grapple seriously with the human problems in the economy, just as it has been grappling for a long time with the economic ones. It seems to me we have spent a long time dealing with the cement and concrete of the industries of this country; it is high time we began to consider what is happening to our people, our homes, families and children.

• (3:50 p.m.)

This has been brought vividly to the attention of all of us by the recent publication of the Senate committee report "Poverty in Canada". I was rather struck with the initiative that the Senate committee had taken. According to the report, in May 1970 it conducted a public opinion survey, through the Canadian Institute of Public Opinion, the results of which indicated that most Canadians considered $6,500 to be the minimum acceptable annual income per family of four as at the date of the survey.

Following this the Senate committee on poverty promptly set a figure that was $1,500 lower than the Canadian people believed was the acceptable minimum income, which I think is a very revealing indication that the Senate is completely out of touch with the needs of the people of this country, at least the needs of those living in poverty. I suggest its statement "That the Senate committee poverty-line incomes are not generous is demonstrated by this public opinion survey" is a masterpiece of understatement. I believe that the Senate committee on poverty, the Croll committee, has one fatal flaw: Instead of attempting to set a guaranteed income at the poverty line, it decided it could go one better and set a guaranteed income 30 per cent below the poverty line.

This proposal has been properly described by some authorities as a glorified welfare program, and by others, such as Dr. Baetz of the Canadian Council on Social Development, as guaranteed poverty. This is something like putting a band-aid over a serious cancer. You are hiding the sore from view and believing you have effected a cure. To solve the problem of poverty in this country by suggesting a minimum income that is 30 per cent below the poverty line is, in my view, nothing more nor less than an insult to those who already are suffering more than enough.

Thousands of people in poverty are asking the government for help, and a Senate committee produces a report recommending that these people have an annual income 30 per cent below the poverty line. No wonder the four staff members quit. No wonder they recommended an income that would provide sufficient for people to live on, rather than to merely exist. And no wonder, in final desperation, they pointed to sources where the required money could be found, which included $5 million a year by abolishing the Senate. We have been describing to the government for days and weeks ways and means to raise this money. We have pointed out that if the big corporations of this country paid their fair share of taxation as other people do, the extra revenue would go a long way towards meeting the needs of people in poverty. Yet this government has turned a deaf ear to our pleas, paying no attention to what we say.

I do not deny, and neither does any other member of this party, the need for building up the economy. As a matter of fact, none of us wants to see the introduction of a guaranteed income without at the same time giving those who are able bodied the opportunity to work and earn an income. What we are objecting to is the absence both of income and of work, and the silence of the government on this issue. I should have liked to see some of the government leaders give their opinion that the Senate committee report on poverty was unworthy of those who are supposed to be the senior statesmen of this country. I suggest that any body of people that calls for a guaranteed annual minimum income that is 30 per cent below the poverty line deserves to be removed from its position as the lawmakers in this country.

I was pleased to see a report in yesterday's Ottawa Citizen concerning a statement made by the Secretary of the Central Committee of the Canadian Council of Churches, the Reverend Floyd Honey, who had this to say about poverty:

> Maybe we should demonstrate in the streets. Whatever we do, let us make no mistake about it, it is going to cost money if we are going to take this seriously as an objective.

Then, he went on to criticize the Senate committee report on poverty by saying it did not deal with conditions that create poverty. Instead, he said, the report deals only with measures to relieve the worst misery of those who suffer from it most acutely. Reverend Honey called on delegates to work "toward turning the church into an effective lobby for the poor instead of a chaplaincy service for the comfortable". I suggest that for the church that is strong language. I trust Reverend Honey will be acclaimed a worthy secretary of the Canadian Council of Churches and that he was reflecting the views of that body.

I was very much impressed with something the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro), who is now in his seat, said not very long ago when dealing with a criticism that is made of people who are poverty stricken, and particularly of those on welfare. In a speech he made in Toronto on September 30 last he had this to say:

> But the opinion that the average welfare recipient is a healthy loafer cannot be supported in fact, and we know it. Let us look at the figures assembled for the Task Force on Alienation in the summer and fall of 1970. Breaking down the welfare population, the permanently disabled represent 41 per cent of the total. Mothers raising families on their own are 26 per cent. The older age group constitutes 9 per cent of the total. Those with a temporary disability or illness are 8 per cent of the total. Those who are employed but are being supplemented because of insufficient income represent 3 per cent of the total. Together, these amount to 87 per cent of the welfare population. Only 13 per cent of the population is made up of the unemployed employables.

Even if only 13 per cent of the population in receipt of social assistance is made up of unemployed employables, what is the government doing to provide work for them? I know all about the DREE program. The government says it will provide work, but I have been checking the names of the firms which have been receiving money and have found great discrepancies between the amounts of money being provided and the number of jobs expected to result. This is not the government's money, it is the taxpayers' money. We should make a very thorough investigation as to whether this money is being well spent. Even if it were being well spent in every way, the private sector of this country could not provide anything like the number of jobs required to give people work, or even to do pioneer work which must be done in respect of the new service jobs we require. Little groups are doing some pioneering in this field. Most of them are private or voluntary groups. In my own city such a group is trying to pioneer jobs for women as social work aides, teacher aides and child care workers. I hope the government will pioneer jobs along this line for these women when they are trained.

Why is the government not providing the lead in getting jobs started on a large scale? This is the way to handle poverty. Apparently only 13 per cent of the people now receiving social assistance are unemployed employables. If we are content to keep that great number of people on social assistance, there is no way poverty will disappear. When you keep people on social assistance year after year you might as well cut off their wind-pipes because you are cutting off their access to work, their self-expression, their communication with other people and the opportunity of growing and developing. You are cutting off all these things, and practically shutting them up in jail with a diet that is not much above bread and water.

We have to deal with poverty on a two-pronged approach. We must provide a minimum income which must certainly not be set below the poverty line and enough work for the people who can work full or part-time. I think of that poetess who wrote some years ago the best of all God's gifts is work, and the second is rest. We are giving these people far too much rest, and rest and rust are very closely allied when it comes to human beings. Some of you saw the program on television last Sunday night about a young executive who was highly placed in his firm but was told that because of business conditions he would have to be let out. He was let out and the rest of the film showed the terrible heartbreak and struggle he had. He had to let his car and his house go; his family lost its access to good things such as vacations, amenities and so on. He travelled around to all the employment agencies and asked among his friends but could not get a job. He became bitter and his confidence left bit by bit. In the final shot, we saw him looking over a bridge down at the railroad track wondering whether he had reached the last stage and should commit suicide. Finally, he decided to keep his options open a little longer in the hope that something would turn up. I am sure that everyone who saw it was horrified and upset by this film.

Yet this is the kind of thing that is happening daily in thousands of homes across this country. It involves not only those who are caught in the trap of poverty, but those a cut above it as well who are afraid of being dragged down by the general effects of so many people already unemployed. Poverty is a terrible cancer which is eating away at the body politic and if we do not deal with it we will all be affected in the form of a steady deterioration of our citizenship and the quality of living in Canada. The time is coming when people will not put uo with this any longer. We found out yesterday that one of the poor sectors of Canada, the native Indians, certainly mean business in definite way. Incidentally, they were at the Council of Churches meeting as were representatives of the National Black Coalition of Canada. These are people who are not going to be kept within the artificial boundaries of being Indian, black, poor or female. These boundaries are no longer effective. I wish this government would do something about this problem of poverty before there is more suffering.

Those are the things I wanted to say. I will draw my remarks to a conclusion by saying that we in this country have to come to grips with the situation quickly. If we do not, we can see a preview of what will happen by looking at some of the great cities in the United States, where they did not act soon enough and where even the affluent dare not go out of doors after dark. There is fear, guilt and terror beginning to stalk the land in a big way. Let us prevent Canada from developing along those lines. There is time to act, but only if this government sets now as its top priority the creation of an environment with opportunities for suitable and useful work which will allow our citizens to participate in a meaningful way in the life of this country and enjoy the good things their own efforts and those of our forefathers have made possible.

Mr. Walter Deakon (High Park): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate, and in doing so I shall endeavour to confine my remarks to the measures implemented and those to be implemented by the present government in the field of social security. Canada's nationwide social security system is recognized as one of the better ones in the world. It has achieved this status largely since the Second World War by extending programs to cover different contingencies and by improving the coverage and benefits under these programs to form a comprehensive system. Under the system, the federal government provides basic income support common to all residents of Canada. A partnership between the federal and provincial governments provides flexibility in social services according to individual provincial needs.

While it is recognized that there is room for marginal differences in income support measures between provinces or within provincial areas, basic measures to provide a Canadian minimum must be country-wide if interprovincial migration to employment is to be facilitated. The development of Canada's income security measures within the past decade has been dramatic. Cardinal among the provisions by the federal government to give people new security have been the introduction of the Canada Pension Plan with its many types of benefits—the Quebec Pension Plan is its counterpart in that province—and the Guaranteed Income Supplement to the Old Age Security pension, under which next year a married couple can receive a maximum of $260.10 a month, and a single person as much as $137.70.

The Canada Assistance Plan, an important companion measure, is a federal-provincial program through which the federal government supports the provision of adequate financial assistance, welfare and health services to persons who have no other income or whose income is insufficient to meet their needs. The individual provinces design their own welfare programs and administer them, sometimes in conjunction with municipalities. The federal government meets half the cost of financial assistance and of welfare services provided to persons in need. The provision of assistance and services at the provincial level enables the provinces to tailor their welfare programs to meet different regional needs. In November 1970, the federal government tabled the white paper on income security for Canadians, some proposals of which parliament has already put into effect.

The white paper proposed to shift the weight of federal government direct payments more in favour of people in need, as evidenced in the considerable increase in payments under the guaranteed income supplement to the old age security pension. It also provided a major rationalization of income security programs to contribute substantially to the prevention and alleviation of poverty in Canada by redistributing to the best effect the money already in the system.

The white paper proposed improvements in the conditions of millions of low income people, the saving of hundreds of thousands more from falling into poverty, and the improvement of basic income protection for most people. Under its proposals, available resources would be concentrated more upon the people in the greatest need; the improvement of programs and making them poverty oriented would reduce the dependence of people on social assistance and assist low income families with children. A major anti-poverty measure to assist greatly low income families with children proposed in the white paper was the family income security plan, familiarly known as FISP, which would replace the familiar family allowance program.

This program of federal payments would concentrate national resources upon families with the lowest resources, as measured by income, through a new extension of the guaranteed income concept. Representations by interested organizations and individuals and discussions between the federal government and provincial governments resulted in revisions of the program proposals. These were announced in a statement to Parliament by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) shortly before the summer recess.

While the new proposals retain the anti-poverty concept of selectivity by placing substantially larger sums in the hands of low income families, they embody significant changes. They extend the program to children aged 16 and 17, improve benefits, introduce a formula based upon family size, adjust the income floor of $4,500 by an additional $500 a year for each additional child, smooth out the rate of reduction and, of particular importance, make FISP nontaxable. The revised FISP will benefit an estimated 2.14 million families, with about 1.25 million receiving maximum benefits as compared to the 640,000 previously expected to be eligible. This will distribute an estimated $800 million annually as against present payments of $650 million.

During the five years preceding 1971 the basic old age security pension was altered significantly. The eligibility age was reduced gradually from 70 to 65 and the basic benefit was increased from $75 to the present rate of $80 a month. In 1967, the special needs of low income older people were recognized by introduction of the guaranteed income supplement to the old age security pension. It provided an additional benefit of up to $30 a month on the basis of an income test.

The shift in weight of federal government direct payments more in favour of people in need proposed in the white paper on income security has already been demonstrated by major increases in payments this year under the guaranteed income supplement. These increases have been in effect since last April. Recipients of the guaranteed income supplement are entitled to a maximum 2 per cent annual escalation of the combined total of their old age security and their guaranteed income supplement to reflect price increases. As of April next, a married couple receiving the guaranteed income supplement could get as much as $270.10 a month in lieu of $255; a single person, $137.70 in place of $135. In 1971 approximately a million people have benefited fully or partially from changes in the guaranteed income supplement by having substantial additional purchasing power placed in their hands through direct federal government payments. Through the old age security pension and the guaranteed income supplement, the federal government will distribute an estimated $2.2 billion in 1971-72 directly to Canadian pensioners.

Since its introduction in 1965, the Canada Pension Plan has become familiar to most employed people in Canada as a keystone of social insurance. It not only provides contributors with retirement pensions in addition to the old age security pension, but protects their dependants if they die, just as it protects contributors if they become disabled. Unlike the old age security pension, the guaranteed income supplement and FISP, however, the Canada Pension Plan is a contributory program into which the self employed, employees and employers pay on the basis of pensionable earnings. Its counterpart in the province of Quebec is the Quebec Pension Plan, and there is portability between the two plans just as there is with the Canada Pension Plan throughout all other provinces in Canada.

While the white paper on income security proposed technical changes to increase benefits under the Canada Pension Plan, these cannot be effective before January, 1973. There is a statutory requirement that three years notice of major changes be provided to permit consultation with the provinces. There is also the continuing need to maintain comparability between the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans so that this insurance system maintains national standards. The proposed changes, however, would have a profound future effect on the income levels of almost all Canadians. Higher pensions would reduce greatly the chances of individuals and families falling into poverty. Extra protection for widows, disabled workers and their dependants would provide assistance to people who have often been forced to fall back on welfare.

Social assistance, an important component of income security, is under the jurisdiction of the provincial governments which design and administer programs to suit their particular circumstances. The Canada Assistance Plan enables the federal government to meet half the cost of social assistance and health care services provided or supported by the provinces and municipalities to persons who have no income or whose income is insufficient to meet their needs. It also makes it possible for the federal government to share in up to 50 per cent of costs incurred by provinces and municipalities to improve and extend welfare services.

The Canada Assistance Plan provides federal sharing for costs of benefits for persons who require financial support; supplementation, where needed, of benefits paid under other programs; supplementation, where needed, of earned income; child welfare, including adoption services, foster home care and institutional care; health care services which are not covered by federal-provincial hospital or medical care insurance programs; care in homes for special cases; preventative and rehabilitative welfare services; and programs to improve the work capacity of persons who have particular difficulty in securing or retaining employment. It is estimated that the federal government will contribute more than $686 million to the provinces under the Canada Assistance Plan in 1971-72. This, together with a comparable expenditure by the provinces, will help some 1.4 million persons through social assistance payments, including over 100,000 children who are in the care of child welfare authorities. Most of these children live in foster homes.

The White Paper on Income Security points out that although improvements in federal income security programs will make many people independent of social assistance, or less dependent on such aid, there will be a continuing need for social assistance. For this reason, the federal government is collaborating with the provinces to secure needed improvements in these essential welfare programs. Major changes in unemployment insurance which go into full effect next January will greatly improve income protection for people in the labour force, reduce dependence on social assistance and improve unemployment benefits substantially. One of the significant improvements is the introduction of sickness and maternity programs.

The vast sums paid to Canadian residents in unemployment insurance represent an additional element of great magnitude in the federal government's involvement in income security and in evolving measures to improve the economic well-being of people in need, to reduce the hazard of personal economic disaster, and to provide income security for millions whose ability to achieve it individually is extremely limited.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to assure all my hon. colleagues that the government is genuinely concerned with the welfare of the citizens of Canada, and one only needs to travel abroad to realize this.

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to support the motion put by my leader, the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette).

The notice of motion reads as follows:

That this House condemns the government for its failure to propose legislation establishing a social and economic security plan placing all Canadians above the poverty line.

Mr. Speaker, I sincerely believe the non-confidence motion comes at the right time. For the last few months, the government, the opposition parties and inquiry commissions of all kinds, even Senate committees, have been considering the problem, or rather the solution, of an economic and social security plan for all Canadians.

Today, I would like to draw the attention of the House on a much debated aspect of establishing such a program, that is the determination of standards to define the poverty level.

The Economic Council of Canada states that more than 700,000 Canadians, among the aged, live below the poverty level. And how does the Economic Council of Canada define poverty?

At pages 104 and 105 of the Fifth Annual Review of the Economic Council of Canada, published in September, 1968, it is stated, and I quote:

To feel poverty is, among other things, to feel oneself an unwilling outsider—a virtual nonparticipant in the society in which one lives. The problem of poverty in developed industrial societies is increasingly viewed not as a sheer lack of essentials to sustain life, but as an insufficient access to certain goods, services, and conditions of life which are available to everyone else and have come to be accepted as basic to a decent, minimum standard of living.

Mr. Speaker, the Economic Council of Canada believes that poverty is not determined by the size of one's income, but rather by a state of mind. I could say that being poor is feeling that one's rights are not recognized and that one does not have the minimum required to survive.

The Western Quebec Social Service in a special bulletin dated December 1966 reported as follows:

Poverty appears to us mainly as material destitution, lack of wages, low incomes, etc. We seldom pause to consider the moral aspect of poverty and it is perhaps there that poverty shows itself more extensively and painfully.

A socio-economic study alone could determine the extent of poverty, but it is not difficult to see poverty and find in each city and village families with an inadequate income suffering from illness or unemployment, families deeply in debt, families with poor accommodations, families that are ill-fed and undernourished. There is also a social and moral aspect of poverty which is not less frequently found: broken families, irresponsible parents, neglected and abandoned children, delinquents, penniless old people.

Mr. Speaker, the Social Service which has made several investigations in Montreal and elsewhere recognizes that it is difficult to determine who is poor or destitute.

• (4:30 p.m.)

Poverty exists in Canada, that is certain, but we must first find out, through all these investigations, who are the poor. Thus, in the report of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty, at page 175, one can read the following:

A PROPOSAL FOR A GUARANTEED ANNUAL INCOME

The United Nations' Universal Declaration of Human Rights, to which Canada is a signatory nation, states, in Article 25:

Everyone has the right to a standard of living adequate for the health and well-being of himself and of his family including food, clothing, housing, and medical care and necessary social services, and the right to security in the event of unemployment, sickness, disability, widowhood, old age, or other lack of livelihood in circumstances beyond his control.

The Senate Committee is firmly convinced that the time has now come for Canada to incorporate the right to an adequate standard of living for all Canadians into the Canadian Bill of Rights. It is also clear that an adequate standard of living in the Canadian context is dependent on the security provided by an adequate income. The acceptance by Canada of an adequate minimum income as a matter of right for all citizens is the principal recommendation of this report.

The provision of a Guaranteed Annual Income to all Canadians is more than an anti-poverty measure: it is an idea whose time has come. If properly designed, implemented, and operated, such a plan will restore to decency and dignity those Canadians who, through no fault of their own, have been stigmatized and demeaned because they are unable to earn an income adequate for themselves and their families. It will also protect all Canadians from loss of income through accident, illness, technological progress, and the many events that can deprive any of us of our income and make us poor.

Here I draw the attention of the House to the fact that this report refers to technological progress in Canada. In the last few years, technical progress has created and improved the machine, replaced many human workers and created for ever I think, in Canada an almost permanent poverty, that is unemployment. To palliate this unemployment which will exist, a guaranteed income will have to be established.

Mr. Speaker, the Senate committee has highlighted the problem we are concerned with. Poverty must be considered very seriously and it is up to the government to take remedial measures, not for political reasons but with a real concern to help all Canadians.

Every day, Mr. Speaker, I receive scores of letters from my constituents who are in untenable situations. Poverty does exist and it is very easy for us as members of the House of Commons to come into contact with these sad cases.

As far as I am concerned, I must say that every Saturday when I receive my constituents at home, I have to witness some very sad scenes. Sometimes they are aged people or wage earners who for some reason are unable to provide for their families and come to me for help.

The present system is such that the people who are asking for what is due to them must humble themselves and, psychologically, that is deplorable. It is high time for the government to consider this problem and to carry on what we are proposing today, that is a system of economic and social security placing all Canadians above the poverty level.

Mr. Speaker, Le Petit Journal of July 8, 1971 featured the following article, and I quote:

One third of the people of Montreal are poverty stricken.

To day, in 1971, a Montreal family whose total annual income is below $6,000 is considered as a "low income family," poor that is.

To establish the poverty level at $6,000 a year, sociologists started from the fact that families with an annual income of $6,000 or less have to spend 76.5 per cent of their income on their basic needs—food, clothing, and housing. This figure is higher than the 70 per cent standard established by the Economic Council of Canada.

On the other hand, the Montreal Diet Dispensary established at $3,990 the cost of meeting certain minimum basic needs for a family of two adults and two children. This amount is only enough to keep a family from starving altogether. We can add another $2,000 if all minimum basic needs are to be met, which sets the poverty—or deprivation—level at approximately $6,000.

This amount only allows a family to make both ends meet, without enabling them to make any plans or to meet urgent needs such as illness, and so on.

Now, in Montreal 33.1 per cent of families earn less than $6,000 a year.

Which means, to put it bluntly, that one third of Montreal's population lives in a state of poverty.

These 33.1 per cent of poor people are divided into several categories. There are poor people, poorer people and very poor people. The "poorer people" would include, for example, the bachelor earning $40 or $50 a week or the family man earning $70 or $75 a week.

In my riding, there are family heads who work every day for a weekly salary of $65 to $70. This means that these families are deprived of the bare necessities and that they live in dire poverty.

I proceed with my quotation from Le Petit Journal:

The "very poor people" are those whose sole income consists of social welfare benefits. In Montreal and within the municipal boundaries only, there are 85,000 persons who can be labelled "very poor"; they include 40,000 ongoing cases in the social welfare files to which should be added 45,000 dependants.

Such a situation, Mr. Speaker, indicates beyond any shadow of doubt that there are among us typical instances of extreme poverty and it is about time that the government should set their minds on correcting this state of affairs. This situation actually exists and I think that it is most important that federal members who are sitting comfortably in the House, well-heated and well-paid, should become aware of the situation.

If I may be allowed to do so, I would call the attention of the House on an article published by Le Petit Journal and which, in a nutshell, would be summed up thus: the geographical distribution of poverty requires that one should know which region of Canada is involved.

In concluding my remarks, I hope that I have convinced hon. members that poverty does exist and that it is urgent to solve the problem.

The Social Credit Party of Canada has a solution to offer which I think would be ideal in helping to solve this problem. In my opinion, this solution is precisely that mentioned by my leader, the hon. member for Témiscamingue, and namely to guarantee to each and every Canadian, whatever his situation, provided his income is under $15,000, a guaranteed income, depending on his personal commitments and the size of his familly.

Mr. Rosaire Gendron (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, first I wish to commend my colleagues from the Social Credit party for presenting this motion to the House and drawing the attention of hon. members to the serious problem of poverty and want.

However, I think this problem should be considered under two aspects, namely that of local poverty and that of unequal opportunities in certain areas and for certain individuals.

[Mr. Beaudoin.]

Not enough can ever be said about the need to adopt measures that will correct these social inequalities. We agree on the diagnostic stated by the movers of this motion even though we sometimes find it difficult to agree on the required remedies.

It would be dangerous to increase the frustration of the poor by deceiving them with inefficient remedies. There is a tendency sometimes to propose quite simplistic solutions which do not truly take into account the complexity of the problem. I mean, if solving this problem were only a question of financial measures and advances from the Bank of Canada it would be really too simple and we could very easily cure our local problems.

We could then have export products for the underdeveloped countries which would be happy to accept our proposal to solve their problems. But everyone can see that it is much more complicated and even those who put a strong emphasis on those problems are often opposed to taxation.

One must agree that if we are to declare war on poverty the participation of each and everyone is necessary, and so are sacrifices. To say that we have found money to wage war and that we have not found any to solve the urgent problem of poverty would be simplifying the problem. It is a demagogic way of bringing about a solution.

One must remember that during the war the national debt was multiplied by five and the income tax increased in the same proportion. If the Canadian population wanted to go through the same sacrifices we might have part of the solution to those problems. But it is obvious that the emergency of the times of war, just like fire burning a property, calls for solutions that are not in time of peace acceptable to the population as a whole.

Does that mean that the program is not urgent, that we will not have to pay the price and make sacrifices to find the right solution? We must really want it but it must also be recognized that the problem is very complicated and very difficult to solve and that there will be no magic formula. It will be the end result of the co-operation of the entire Canadian population.

To level out regional disparities it will be necessary to give a new dimension to the problem, and that is participation. I believe we are going the wrong way sometimes about that problem because we do not give enough consideration to the solutions brought forward by people who are the first concerned in that matter, namely the poor people of the underdeveloped areas. We try too hard perhaps to design solutions conceived only at the higher government levels instead of pooling the desires of the people concerned and the means, for the poor people, of considering a solution to their own problems as well as the solutions advocated by high authorities.

I am thinking here of the problems faced by the Eastern Quebec Planning Bureau as to the pilot area, and let us not forget that only $70 million out of the $271 million voted for the five-year plan were spent while so many needs existed.

The big problem that was faced there was that it was difficult to secure the local participation and it consisted also perhaps in the special way technocrats and senior officials advocated solutions without giving enough consideration to the desires of the people concerned.

And in that field, I believe that instead of considering the establishment of new structures we should improve the existing ones and provide municipal councils, which know better about those problems, with modern solutions and structures, in short regroup them into local governments with the same social ambitions where one would have a feeling of belonging, in order that these area governments may take the responsibility of area planning and of implementing the programs needed to cope with the situation.

Had we had such a regional government in the Lower St-Lawrence and Gaspé, the Grand Portage, the Metis and the Magdalen Islands areas, had we, with the help of experts, those I call architects, and that of the local owners and citizens, looked for solutions to all problems, we would have obtained better results; indeed, the amounts voted for that purpose not only would have been entirely spent but would have proved insufficient.

Now, remedies to the problem of poverty at the individual level are harder to find. Whereas the mover of the motion proposes a universal social security plan, the government, through its legislation, is bent instead on studying selective solutions. The governments want to study the question of income under two main aspects: the protection it should get and the support it needs.

Some income programs are being more and more criticized for their being universal, that is that most Canadians, if not all, are eligible, whatever their income may be. In some cases, payments are being made even to people already largely provided for. Family allowances, and in particular those granted to young people, belong to that category.

Now, the new government plan is designed to correct that situation and to channel the tax dollar through to the families most in need, in order that all the able-bodied recipients be encouraged to find a job. Moreover, some flexible aid is available to those who need it only on a temporary basis.

While trying to remedy the income deficiencies and to reduce poverty, the new plan will help stabilize employment, wages and prices. The protective aspect of social insurance is emphasized instead of the universality or the automatic right to benefits.

The family allowance plan has failed to channel funds where the need was the most urgent. It is estimated, for example, that in 1971, 24 per cent of family allowances will be paid out to families with an income under $5,000, while 76 per cent will be paid out to families with a higher income.

Under the present Family allowance plan, which provides for the payment of allowances on a universal basis without any means or needs test, it would cost $80 million a year to increase the benefits by only $1 per child, there being 7 million children in Canada. Doubling the rate would account for additional expenditures of $560 million a year.

The need for a family income security plan is quite obvious. It accomplishes an equitable distribution of the taxpayer's dollar, allocating it to those who need it most, without however depriving of any motivation those able to be part of the active labour force.

Besides, the white paper was intended to co-ordinate all the elements of social security, in order to allow Canada to develop a completely integrated welfare program, a program which will undoubtedly set an example to the rest of the world.

The plan is a step in this direction. This Family Income Security Plan, as its name very aptly puts it, will complement the old age pension, the guaranteed income supplement, the unemployment insurance and the Canada Assistance Plan.

Consultations with groups, individuals and provincial governments have led to an agreement under which benefits from this new plan will be based on three fundamental criteria: The number of children, their age, and the family income.

More than two million families, it is expected, will draw benefits under this new plan and about one and a quarter million will receive maximum benefits, that is children of poor workers and welfare cases as well as most mothers who are the sole supports of 300,000 children.

The highest monthly benefits in the plan will amount, as perhaps hon. members wish, to $15 for each child under the age of 12 and to $20 for children aged 12 to 17 inclusively. However, in order to ensure an equitable distribution of the taxpayer's money, the monthly benefits for each child will decrease as the family income increases.

It has been decided to set the minimum income of a family with one child at $4,500. Thus, the family whose annual income is $4,500 and which includes only one child will receive the $15 maximum benefit if the child is less than 12 years old.

With each additional child, a family will be entitled to receive a minimum of $500 more, while being paid the maximum benefits. In other words, a family including two children will be paid the maximum benefits as long as its income does not exceed $5,000. In the same way, a family including three children will be entitled to the maximum benefits as long as its income does not exceed $5,500. The minimum income of a family may increase by $500 per year for each child after the first one.

During the discussions which preceded the drafting of the white paper, it was suggested that benefits should cease when the family income reached $10,000 annually. But it was later decided not to impose this ceiling. The maximum income that a family may receive will depend on the number of children and on the rate of decrease.

Not only will this plan replace the old one, it will extend coverage to the young people of 16 and 17. It will also replace the former youth allowances program. It is the result of the wishes and requests made by various groups and the provincial governments.

This plan gives the provinces enough leaway to set up their own priorities with regard to additional programs and family assistance. In fact, higher payments, based on selection, will provide the provinces with a basis from which they can develop the kind of family assistance they prefer. Similarly, the income scale adopted by the new plan can serve as a criterion for the provinces, thus sparing the citizens the compulsory means test at both federal and provincial levels.

It is quite important to remember that those benefits will be tax-free.

I pointed out earlier how important the integration of that program into a comprehensive income security scheme would be for all Canadians, a scheme taking into account the need for both protection and welfare.

An important aspect of that integration is how the plan will complement the federal unemployment insurance program. While continuing to draw unemployment insurance, the unemployed who have a large family will be encouraged to find a job. In addition, the plan fits equally well with the provincial as well as the federal welfare programs.

What are the basic factors of that total income security program? We have already explained the special role that will be played by the Family Income Security Program.

We have also shown that it will be closely related to unemployment insurance. Major changes will be effected within the unemployment insurance plan as from January 1972. Such changes will protect to a greater extent the income of those people in the labour force. In fact, there will be less dependent on social assistance or welfare and the unemployed will be in a better position. A considerable improvement will be the introduction within the framework of unemployment insurance of sickness and maternity benefits.

The large amounts of money which the Unemployment Insurance Commission is paying to Canadian citizens represent another contribution of the federal government to income security. Unemployment insurance is meant to improve the economic situation of the needy.

Old age pension and its guaranteed income supplement are another way for the federal government to help Canadians. In the five years preceding 1971 , the old age pension was considerably changed. The eligible age was gradually lowered from 70 to 65 and the basic benefit was raised from $75 to the current rate of $80 a month.

In 1967, there was recognition of the particular needs of older people with low income through the introduction of the guaranteed income supplement linked to the old age pension. The supplementary benefit could reach $30 a month according to the established income.

In accordance with the intention of the federal government of changing direct payments for the benefit of those who needed them most, the guaranteed income supplement has now been increased. The higher allowances have been effective since last April.

From April 1972, a married couple who receives a guaranteed income supplement could get as much as $260.10 a month instead of $255, and a single person could receive $137.70 instead of $135.

In 1971, about a million people benefitted, in part or in full, from changes to the guaranteed income supplement.

The recipients of this supplement are also entitled to a maximum increase of 2 per cent a year of the combined amount of their old age pension and their guaranteed income supplement. This measure is intended to fight the cost of living increase.

[Mr. Gendron.]

The federal government will have paid, in 1971-72, in old age pensions and guaranteed income supplement, about $2.2 billion. This money will directly fall into the pockets of retired Canadians.

Since its implementation in 1965, the Canada or Quebec Pension Plans are viewed by labour as the corner-stone of social security. They not only supply contributors with a retirement pension over and above the old age pension, but they are also conceived to protect dependents in case of death or disability.

However, the Canada Pension Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan differ from the old age pension and the guaranteed income supplement and the new Family Income Security Plan in that they are contributory and extend to self-employed persons as well as to employees and employers who contribute to it.

Although the Minister of National Health and Welfare recommended technical changes in his white paper in order to increase Canada Pension Plan benefits, these changes will only be implemented in January 1973.

The reason for this is that a three-year delay is required by law in the case of major changes in order to allow for consultation with the provinces.

The additional protection provided by these changes for widows, the disabled and their dependents will help those who very often have to turn to welfare. Finally, of course, the Canada Assistance Plan allows the federal government to support provincial programs in this area. The federal government assumes half the cost of welfare which the provinces provide for people with no income, or whose income does not allow them to meet their most basic needs. Ottawa also assumes half the cost of provincial prevention and rehabilitation services.

Old age pension and the guaranteed income supplement, the Canada Pension Plan, unemployment insurance, the Canada Assistance Plan and, now, the Family Income Security Plan are altogether essential steps on the road leading towards a comprehensive income security plan in Canada.

We realize that it does not mean the end of all social issues in Canada, that failing a miraculous cure all legislators and all the people should try by every possible means to find a solution to the serious poverty problem.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O.58—INABILITY OF GOVERNMENT TO INSTITUTE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL SECURITY PROGRAMS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Caouette:

That this House condemns the government for its failure to propose legislation establishing a social and economic security plan placing all Canadians above the poverty level.

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to congratulate the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) who brought this subject to the attention of the House. The reduction and elimination or poverty in Canada involves many facets of our society. First, we have to improve and make more effective all of our welfare programs. Second, and one of the most important, we have to expand our economy to provide jobs for the people. We must train those who have been unemployed for long periods, so that they will be able to enter the labour market. We must also reduce taxes. This involves the lowering of taxes both from a personal standpoint and a corporation standpoint. The elimination of poverty must involve a drive for adequate health services, and this is what I propose to speak about this afternoon, to help improve the deplorable, physical and psychological conditions which characterize many of Canada's poor.

The Canadian Medical Association points out that even in the most affluent nations like Canada and the United States, 20 per cent of the population or one-fifth of the people are poor, but it is this 20 per cent that suffers 75 per cent of all the major illnesses. There is talk of escalating costs in the health field. This is where we must start; this is the key to the solution.

Statistics on the health of Canada's poor are indeed appalling. A report published by Montreal City Health Services indicates that the health of privileged children is five times better than that of poor children. Many of the poor children suffer infectious disease on a ratio seven times higher than that of privileged children. Nine out of ten of the poor children eventually need hospital treatment, while only two out of ten of the privileged children enter hospitals. In other words, the cost of hospitalization for the poor is almost four times as great as it is for the affluent. This constitutes an economic problem which must be borne in mind when dealing with the cost of health care in medical terms.

How shall we meet this challenge? Obviously, we must try to prevent illness in the poorer children, and in order to do this we must see them before they become ill. A method must be devised of having these children checked in a preventive medical clinic rather than sending them to a treatment clinic or to an emergency unit in a hospital where they wind up in a bed costing $50 or more per day. The economic aspect of this approach is graphically illustrated when one considers that hospitalization costs comprise 60 per cent of the total amount spent on health, whereas the hospitals meet only 15 per cent of the total demand for health services. This was emphasized by none other than Dr. LeClair, deputy minister of health, when he stated that too much money was being spent on cure and too little on prevention. He went on further to say that governments had been taking the coward's way out in their approach to health problems. I do not know whether the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) agrees with him, but it does not appear that he is influencing the minister much. Incidentally, Dr. LeClair was the dean of the new medical school at Sherbrooke. According to him, it has been forecast that at the present rate of escalation health and education costs will use up all the projected gross national product by the year 2,000. So, something must be done.

In spite of the mounting expenditure in this field, very few concerned people are happy about the state of medical care today. They are unhappy about the lack of preventive medicine, about the dismal effects of inadequate nutrition. It is estimated that 40 per cent of the poor live on unbalanced diets. A better system of preventive medicine would not in itself cure all the evils. Diet has a direct effect on health. So do consumer buying patterns. Some of the labour unions in the State of New York have recognized this fact and have concerned themselves both with diet and with consumer buying. Indeed, they will provide a shopping service which takes into account cost to the consumer and dietary sufficiency. They will also ensure that adequate diets will be provided for pregnant women. Statistics show that metabolic toxemia in later pregnancy causes, among other things, one-third of all infant deaths up to the age of one year.

This leads us to one conclusion. If preventive medicine is to be practiced correctly, we must have more doctors. This is the key to the situation. It may cost $50 for a complete check-up to prevent hospital treatment later, but if we can prevent hospitalization we shall save $50 a day and more, depending on the length of time for which a patient is hospitalized. If a patient were in hospital for seven days, for example, he would pay $350 or more depending upon where the hospital is located, in addition to the cost of the doctor's care and laboratory expenses. Early diagnosis, the discovery and prevention of long illnesses, would keep down hospital expenses. Many diseases, for example, cardiovascular complaints, arthritis and respiratory ailments, can be dealt with effectively if they are seen early enough. Then, there is cancer, which kills about one in seven, and which is nearly always curable if it is removed early enough. If it is not, the patient is subjected to a long period of hospitalization, suffering and death. The stakes are high.

They key to the solution is more doctors. If there is any question about this, the report of the World Health Organization shows that Canada, one of the affluent nations, is among the worst of the lot. Russia, for example, has twice as many medical doctors on a per capita basis as we have in Canada. That is shocking. The Canadian people deserve better than that. But Russia also has partly-trained doctors called feldshers who practice factory medicine and work in outlying areas. Russia is aiming for a ratio of 3.6 doctors per 1,000 people. Canada, in the next decade, will be hard put to it to provide one practicing doctor, a general practitioner, for every 1,500 people. How can a doctor in Canada today carry the load he is expected to bear? He is drastically overworked, and anyone who visits a doctor's office or an emergency unit at a hospital can confirm this. Many of us, I suggest, should do this from time to time to find out what is going on. Because of overwork and consequent fatigue, a doctor in Canada today simply cannot deliver top medical services. Little Israel has the same number of doctors per capita as has Russia. France, United Kingdom, West Germany and the United States are all ahead of Canada.

If further proof of our neglect in providing the necessary number of doctors is needed, the World Health Organization estimated that the desirable ratio is one physician per 1,000 people. In these circumstances, is it not shameful that more than 600 students with the correct qualifications could not be admitted to our medical schools? If I were Minister of Health I would be taking a long look at that situation, because he and the government are failing to provide the number of doctors that the nation requires. But the government refuses to listen. Wailing and moaning about escalating health care costs, they are like the little boy who put his finger in the hole in the dyke. He tried to stop the leak, and this is what the government is doing. I wish the minister was in the House today. I know he has other duties. Time after time I have asked him to see what could be done. For the last four years I have asked that medical schools be run on a year-round basis, cutting the cost and increasing the number of doctors produced by shortening the course from six years to four years. The buildings are there, we have the teachers, we have everything required. Why is this not done?

Let me say this as a final plea. In the war against poverty, it must never be forgotten that preventive medicine has a very large part to play. If disease and illness are to be prevented, indispositions must be spotted at an early stage. It follows there must be sufficient doctors engaged in the practice of preventive medicine to check these people and prevent illnesses of long duration.

I have put the figures on the record. I hope the minister will read what has been said this afternoon by many of my colleagues and will take some action. Let him get his head out of the sand and remember that while he has been doing nothing people have been suffering and dying because of the inadequacy of our facilities for the practice of preventive medicine. This is a question that appeals to all hon. members because it is not a partisan one. It is a matter that affects people all across Canada. We must take some action to deal with the situation and the government has a part to play.

I well remember, as Your Honour does because you were here at the time, the cutbacks made in the health resources fund set up to build medical schools and centres to train doctors. To me this was a deplorable mistake, after the government had deceived the people by bringing in what it said was a full medicare plan. This the government has to answer for, as it must answer for the current shortage of doctors. I do not put the blame for this on the federal government alone but on governments of all levels. Not only are we unable to provide sufficient doctors for the Canadian people; we steal and import them from other areas in the world where there are even less doctors than in Canada. This, in itself, is deplorable.

As a result of this debate this afternoon, I hope the minister and his government will examine what can be done. They have been considering the situation for a long time; let us hope the government now treats it as an emergency and does something.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, the motion presented in the House today by the Social Credit Party of Canada is extremely important because it brings forward solutions which would partially, if not totally, solve the social and economic issues that plague so many people and give responsible Canadians serious cause for worry.

Last year, on November 24—exactly a year ago yesterday—I spoke during the debate on Bill C-181 to provide temporary emergency powers in order to check terrorism in Canada and I said the following:

> For many years, we have been warned by competent persons that if we did not reform our economic system, we would suffer from very serious social troubles. Only three years ago, American economists and sociologists, in a letter addressed to the President of the United States—

He is not just a nobody.

> —stated that the first condition to avoid an unprecedented economic and social disorder would be to secure for each individual a guaranteed minimum income.

This cannot be a myth because those are the words of an economist warning the President of the United States that we must come to such a state of affairs, since the physical possibilities are there. In order to avoid disorder, he told the President:

> Since our country is close to the United States, obviously the warning served to Americans applies also to Canadians. Monopolies, trusts, economic dictatorship, all these keep on ruling the roost—

What I said in 1970 applies also to 1971, and I resume the quotation:

> under the benevolent eye of this government. Financiers keep on controlling this country's money supply and credit and thus, they distribute the lifeblood through the economic system whose life is in their hands.
> There, Mr. Speaker, is the main cause of the disorders that we live through and which also create misery and unemployment, as well as a lack of confidence from the younger elements of our present society.

We must at least be realistic and listen carefully to what young people are saying. I have a dozen young people at home. I listen to their remarks and I worry for them since our large and beautiful Canada offers them no challenging future, a country where one should be able to breathe more freely. Also young people should be able to set up a home and look to the future with confidence. If young people want children, that is their business, but let them enjoy security and the prospect of a decent living.

Last year, again, I stated:

> So far, government authorities have met this disorder by displaying police machinery. Certainly it is the duty of the state to protect its citizens against aggression by those who threaten its legitimacy. However, it is also its duty to control the greediness of those who squeeze the people, of the big financiers who have abusively increased interest rates, one of the main causes of inflation and unemployment.

A social and economic situation cannot be remedied the way a bomb is defused. In a certain sense, when democratic governments have to rely on police forces to restore the prosperity and security of the country, it means they are gradually losing the game.

When groups of citizens, even if they are a minority, come to contest the legitimacy of government and to doubt the ability of public institutions to govern properly, when they resort to violence and disorder, it is a sign that something is wrong with the system.

This is an indication that it is most urgent that we should pass from the mere denunciation of the effects of violence to the consideration of its causes.

• (5:20 p.m.)

When solutions are proffered, serious minded people will sometimes say that this is demagogy, that the proposals are naive, that we must keep on beating around the bush and keep our imperfect system even though some older parts are worn out, in the hope that they can be adapted to the machinery and end up operating in a normal way.

Referring to violence, one notes that the situation is almost unchanged since last year. We have witnesses, this year, a number of demonstrations here and there.

Some situations have actually arisen that were of concern to every Canadian who wishes to live in peace and security whilst going about under normal conditions.

The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) travels across Canada surrounded by police forces as was recently the case in Quebec City. I am not making up that story which was published by the newspaper Le Soleil on November 13, and I quote:

Police forces steal the show from politicians.

When I was a little boy and used to read in the papers that Hitler, Mussolini, Stalin, and the great politicians of that time were going about—

An hon. Member: Ah, ah!

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Whatever hon. members might say, I am referring to a situation that has happened and which is now menacing our own country.

When the Prime Minister cannot travel without such protection, something disturbing is happening. It is up to hon. members to talk about those things in Parliament to try and improve the situation. Let us wake up while there is still time! Some people are sleeping over a volcano and do not know it!

There was a very interesting caricature published in the newspaper Le Soleil. The caption was short but it spoke for itself. There was a man saying, "I inherited a small factory—". He was very happy, very radiant. "I make a little $75,000 a year—". I am very glad for him. "I spend my winters in the South!" How lucky can you get! "I might say I am perfectly happy—but—". But there is a question mark. The man says, "I wonder why people are demonstrating in the streets?" Everything is going well for him. Everything is perfect so he asks himself why people are demonstrating in the streets. That is what he is asking himself. But he does not want to look any further. He does not try to find out. He is just wondering.

So the government appointed a commission to analyze the economic conditions and determine if there were really poor people in Canada and if their lot could be improved. The Croll report on poverty talks about income security but the Prime Minister commented the report by saying it was impossible to realize. Here are comments published in the newspaper Le Soleil on November 13, 1971, under the heading: "Trudeau thinks nothing more can be done in the field of welfare and unemployment without jeopardizing other priorities". He was answering questions put to him by a newspaper man who asked him this:

Are your income programs adequate at this time?

The Prime Minister answered:

—I wish there was more money for everyone in Canada—

—More could be spent, but then there would be less money left to build bridges, highways, public buildings ... If money is shifted, as you say, if our priorities are changed, naturally it would be possible for instance to eliminate the police, the army, the firemen and the mail carriers. People would then come to the post office to pick up their mail and they would put out fires with their own hoses.

I was amazed when I read that. Frankly that upsets me. I hope the Prime Minister was misquoted, because I am convinced that he is much more clever than that. Besides he has often proved it. I will quote shortly some of his remarks at a press conference.

I do not understand why the Canadian government, particularly the Prime Minister, thinks it is impossible economically to provide income security for all. That is similar to what takes place in a family. That is what fathers and mothers are doing when raising children. As far as the youngest of the family is concerned, he is insured security at the table, in his bed, in the kitchen, in order that his basic needs are satisfied and when that duty has been accomplished, the others are forgotten, even if they have more, even if we must spend more for them because we have fulfilled our mission to insure the youngest one of the family security and the satisfaction of his basic needs.

That is our aim. We do not want to make all Canadians millionaires, but we want to provide the working class, the weak and the needy with the necessary revenue to satisfy their basic needs, that is income security.

Is the gross national product sufficient to provide the necessary goods to meet the demands of consumers provided with a guaranteed minimum income as suggested by the Social Credit? The Prime Minister is supposed to answer that question. About a month ago, the Prime Minister stated, during a press conference, that in 1971 the gross national product will reach some $95 billion. He also said that in 1961 it was in the vicinity of $40 billion. He spoke the truth when he gave those figures. It means therefore that over a period of ten years, the gross national product jumped from $40 to $95 billion. It also means that Canadians are industrious workers, that our economic system, where productivity is concerned, is truly efficient and that we must continue to develop it that it might become even more so.

In 1970, the gross national product in Canada amounted to $48 billion and according to the Prime Minister it will reach $95 million in 1971. This means that during a year the rise of the GNP will be $11 billion, while there will be fewer active workers. Indeed, several thousand Canadians able to work will not have contributed to increase the gross national product. This means that machines kept on producing. But who did this? Canadians. Let us read the statistics released by the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce in its September 1971 bulletin. Production in man-hours is given. In agriculture, it went up from 100, as the basic figure, to 177, in ten years. That is almost double. In industry, it went up from 100 to 140. In business, it went up from 100 to 141.

If we can increase our gross national production at such a rate, and if Canadians have contributed to that production, I submit this: Just as in a family, when together we managed to have a good crop and draw a good income, the whole family must benefit from it. Not the neighbours. One may sometimes help the neighbours in need, but first of all, one must help the members of one's own family. So, considering present conditions and the efficiency and output of the workers, we should allow the latter to enjoy the benefits of their work by increasing their purchasing power.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know if I will finally become convinced that the opposite is true, but I feel that it is impossible, in a country such as ours, to attempt to establish a balance between the volume of production and the money supply by way of wages. In our system, because of inventions of all kinds, that is impossible. If we stick to the old saying: If you want a share of the production, you must contribute to it through your work in order to receive a salary which will enable you to buy the goods that are produced, we are in error. I believe that we should change our way of seeing things and try to understand that this system, in the field of production, is truly efficient, and that the necessary steps should be taken to ensure a minimum income, a minimum of well-being, something which will enable anyone with guts to live a normal life.

And as explained this afternoon by the leader of the Social Credit party, the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette), if some workers are able to get a large income, in the order of $15,000, so much the better for them since the country will be none the worse for it. Instead of getting discouraged people will be given incentive to work. And in 1972, if such a system were applied, the gross national production might rise to $120 billion.

There, Mr. Speaker, are the effects of a sound economy which would permit a normal life.

A while ago my colleague the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Gendron) was talking about complex problems. Now and then he would deliberately make them more complicated. I get along well with the hon. member for Témiscouata. I respect him and I think he respects me as well. I once had evidence of this. We differ on the means to take to solve problems. However, I shall not tolerate his saying that Créditiste proposals are simplistic and demagogic. I shall not accept that. Why? Because, in my opinion, hon. members sitting on this side of the House are as serious as those sitting to the right of the Speaker. We have a role to fulfill in this place: stating problems as they exist in Canada, in our areas, and trying sincerely to put forward solutions to make them disappear or at least to improve the situation.

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

I hesitate to say this as I bear malice towards none, but it would be hypocrisy to seek to defend a system which keeps two Canadians out of five in undeserved poverty. I am not the one who says so, Mr. Speaker, it appears in the Fifth Annual Review of the Economic Council and in the report of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty in Canada, two government agencies, paid for by Canadians to seek out the causes of discontent in this country.

Any attempt to persuade the people that more cannot be done, that there is no other way, that it is quite normal for poverty to exist in the midst of affluence is a disservice to the people and if we pursue such a course we must necessarily build more prisons. We built one in Sainte-Anne-des-Plaines in 1969 at a cost of $32,450 per inmate. I heard a news report this week to the effect that the upkeep of one inmate costs $10,000 per year. Would it not be more realistic to decide on ensuring a minimum guaranteed income to people 18 years old and over, which would cost much less than maintaining inmates in prisons? They would thus be guaranteed freedom and would work towards building up the country.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member, but his time is up.

[English]

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, the motion before us is of extreme importance. However, I am reminded of the Niagara Falls conference in 1969 at which my party brought the question of poverty and all its implications to the public attention. At that time, when words such as "guaranteed minimum income" were mentioned, it appeared to me that the whole country became excited.

We are now facing a most important social problem and it seems to me that we need a program for an income development plan. In other words, we have to create incentives to keep people working. Let me take the example of a businessman in Hamilton who employs someone at $100 a week. The man whom he employs wishes a raise of $20 and the businessman says he cannot afford it: he says, "If you want to look at my books, here they are. As a result of expenses, and so forth, I cannot give you that raise". The employee says, "That's fine. If you can't afford it, I'll quit", and he goes on welfare and receives approximately $80 a week. There is a significant point to be made here. It means that rather than a source being available to the employee which would provide the extra $20, all he can do, because of the complexities and archaic set-up of the system, is to go on welfare and receive $80.

We must try to develop an incentive to get people to work—particularly the unemployed, because most of them want to work. Only about 3 per cent of the unemployed will not work. Therefore, we must give them some incentive which will make them realize that it is much better to work, because when they are on social assistance they cannot improve their lot. In other words, when you make a dollar while on social assistance it is not automatically deductible. This is extremely important when you are trying to assess a particular program to eliminate one of our great social evils.

One of the important statements which appeared in the report of the poverty committee reads as follows:

> The elimination of the scourge of poverty from the land is a vital national goal. It cannot be achieved without the compassion, the understanding, and the co-operation of the Canadian people.

When I think of that statement I am reminded of the blind, the working poor, the handicapped, the widows with children, the undertrained and the aged. I know that we are all concerned about them and the Canadian people are prepared to become involved. In my view, the aged should receive the highest priority. I receive from senior citizen constituents many letters which make me extremely despondent because it seems to me that with the $80 that is fixed and the $55 which is on a sliding scale—the $80 not being subject to any particular cost of living bonus—they cannot make it. I do not have to tell you of the frustrations and anxieties that they experience. Surely our aged people are deserving of more consideration than the government has given them.

When we talk about poverty in Canada, Mr. Speaker, we are talking about approximately five million people who are living at or below the poverty line. What does this really mean? It means that we have people who are deprived. On the other hand, it means that we are impoverishing the economy. We are losing $1.5 billion to $2 billion that could go into the development of the economy. All this means lost productivity. Then we must mention health services, welfare services and legal aid services. All of these added together spell a tremendous problem.

I would like to concentrate for a minute or two on the working poor, those who should be receiving our sympathy—those who, as I said before, have the frustrating experience of contributing to our society but who are not getting any benefit from it. They continue to punch a clock in order to remain a productive part of the mainstream of our economy. We expect them to have faith in our political and economic systems to which they give so much and from which they receive so little.

We have to face realities when we consider any program designed to provide a guaranteed annual income, whether it be through a negative income tax or other means. Over and above everything there is what I consider to be the most important policy, that of full employment. In order to end poverty we must first be prepared to transfer substantial funds from the middle and upper income classes to the lower income classes. This is a prerequisite; without it there is no sense in talking about ending poverty. We will have to convince the upper and middle income classes that a fairly substantial transfer of funds to the lower income classes is necessary in order to assist the poor—unless, of course, we call for a drastic reduction in living standards all around.

The second thing we must be concerned about in this area is that if we intend to abolish poverty, our whole thinking must be reassessed in terms of spending our tax dollar. We have been spending much of that dollar on low priority programs. Here I mention the money that we have spent on the B and B Commission. I am not saying that it is wrong to implement its recommendations, but I wonder if it should be one of our main priorities when we have five million people living at or below the poverty line.

Foreign aid is another matter that must be considered. I believe the target is to spend 1 per cent of our gross national product on aid for undeveloped countries. I think this is a fantastic assessment of man's interest in mankind when we have in Canada five million people living at or below the poverty line. Then there is all the money that was spent on the Bonaventure and the hydrofoil craft. We shall have to re-assess where our tax dollar goes if we are to treat the problem of poverty seriously.

Mr. Danforth: We have to establish priorities.

Mr. Alexander: We have to establish priorities, as my hon. friend from Kent-Essex (Mr. Danforth) has suggested. Canadians are generous but they are also extremely practical. They want to know what the results may be and where their money is going. In other words, they want a comprehensive study undertaken of all programs before running blindly off into the realm of a guaranteed annual income, because they know that someone has to pay the shot. There has been considerable debate on the question of elimination of poverty through the adoption of one scheme or another. We should not rush headlong into a guaranteed annual income scheme until we have made a comprehensive study of the entire problem.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) has indicated that a guaranteed annual income scheme would cost us $3 billion. The Croll Committee, without taking into account a guaranteed annual income for those at the upper level of income of the poverty line, estimates that such a scheme would cost about $1 billion. I maintain that the Canadian people will not stand for such a scheme unless they know it is adequate and has low administrative costs. We must find a system of transferring adequate funds to the lower income classes at relatively low administrative cost.

As indicated by the report of the Senate Committee on Poverty in Canada, something like $4,364,000,000 was spent on federal and provincial income security programs in 1969-70. This covered the whole gamut of social insurance programs such as the Canada Pension Plan, the Quebec Pension Plan, unemployment insurance, workmen's compensation, veterans pensions, old age security, guaranteed income supplement, family allowances, youth allowances, social assistance programs for special groups such as the aged, the blind, the disabled, veterans, Indians and Eskimos, mothers allowances, unemployment assistance and the Canada Assistance Plan.

What concerns a lot of people is that many generalities have been expressed with respect to those who are on welfare. A vocal minority of Canadians are concerned because they believe that the vast majority of those on welfare are what can be called perpetual welfare cases. The Minister of National Health and Welfare has done many things for which he can be commended, and on the other hand he has done things for which he cannot be praised. But one thing he has done is to break down the figures in this respect. His figures—and we should keep them in mind—show that only 2 per cent or 3 per cent of those on welfare are what could be called types who are prepared to beat the game. If we are to maintain our credibility when we talk about these programs, one point that must be stressed is that only 2 per cent or 3 per cent of those on welfare attempt to beat the system.

What bothers many people is that there are employable individuals who refuse to work. So far as I am concerned, a minimum of assistance should be given to that type of person. A lot of people are very concerned about this problem. It seems to me that we are giving assistance to people who do not need it. We should reassess our priorities in this regard.

The motion before us reads:

That this House condemns the government for its failure to propose legislation establishing a social and economic security plan placing all Canadians above the poverty level.

The motion is not quite correct. The hon. member for High Park (Mr. Deakon) gave a list of programs that the government has introduced. He told us how much money is being spent, how the programs are working and said that Canada is a great country in which to live. I do not think anyone would question the last statement—but there are so many programs that it is a real fiasco. The policy has no long-term goals. The federal and provincial governments are involved in administering and financing income security programs. Under social insurance we have the federal government dealing with unemployment insurance, veterans pensions and the Canada Pension Plan, while the provincial governments deal with workmen's compensation and the Quebec Pension Plan, comparable to and co-ordinated with the Canada Pension Plan.

Under demogrants the federal government deals with old age security, family allowances and supplementary family allowance programs in Quebec and Newfoundland; provincial governments deal with Quebec schooling allowances. The guaranteed income is administered by the federal government. We have social assistance administered by the federal government, dealing with war veterans allowances and social assistance for Indians on reserves, and Eskimos. Then we have—

An hon. Member: Slow down, Linc.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I read that too quickly, and I extend my apologies. What I am trying to say is that we have an extremely complex plan with no long-term goals.

There is a booklet called "Canadian Business" which tells what is wrong with the present system. Reprint No. 7009 is entitled "Guaranteed minimum income: there's more than one answer". I was very impressed with this little reprint by James L. Clare because he talks about the "existing social welfare income maintenance schemes" and then asks several questions. The answers to every question except the second one is "No," and the answer to the second question is "Often none".

The questions and answers are: eliminates poverty, no; incentive for poor to work, often none; breaks "poverty-cycle" and removes need for public housing and other subsidies to the poor, no; readily and fully understandable to poor, no; visible and open for comprehension by non-poor, no; takes care of sporadic and seasonal unemployment most readily, no; eliminates testing, no; eliminates "snooping", no; minimizes administrative overheads, no. It appears to me that the structure that has been set up is meant to maintain poverty. This is what a lot of people find disturbing.

I am running out of time, Mr. Speaker, but let me say that no matter what type of program we have, we still must have a policy of full employment. This is the key.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) indicated that approximately 13 per cent of the people within the five million I mentioned are employable unemployed. So it does not matter what we are talking about in terms of full employment, whether it is 3 per cent or 4 per cent—but certainly is is not 7.1 per cent seasonally adjusted. I think that is scandalous when we think of what the results actually mean. Here we are really perpetuating poverty by creating unemployment.

We do not have time now to go into all the ramifications of this problem. When you do not give the people of Canada purchasing power through development of our economy it is not difficult to see that the butcher, the baker and the candlestick-maker are deprived of income. That is why I am concerned about the attitude of the government and about this tax bill which affects vital institutions in our country.

I think of our multinational corporations and how the government is not willing to throw a little "shaft" into them and thereby get more money from them. At this time, too, the United States is bringing in the DISC program. Then there is the recent surcharge which, as things get rough, will probably go as high as 15 per cent. This government brings in capital gains and a labour bill that certainly had the business community—I am not saying "up in arms" but they are questioning the attitude of the government. If we are talking about increased productivity which leads to increased employment, how can we accept the competition bill that was brought in? It would upset the whole nation.

I see the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) laughing. I do not want to get to him because—

Mr. Marchand: Increased productivity does not create employment; that is the problem.

Mr. Alexander: His program is creating unemployment in some areas in order to create employment in other areas. I do not think we have heard the last of that.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Name one case.

Mr. Alexander: We need incentives, and as long as the government proceeds—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired. It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until eight o'clock tonight.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, we heard this afternoon several speakers of the opposition parties—

Mr. Lundrigan: How do you know that, John?

Mr. Munro: I was here and heard some of them. I heard all I could stand. As I say, we heard several speakers of the opposition parties talk about the question of poverty. I must say that many of the comments I have heard before. Some of them have some validity, others do not. Some of them were pretty empty of any real, suggested remedies to correct the situation. I often suspect that is the case because some of the remedies invoked are rather unpalatable, politically, for some of the parties to embrace and therefore it is safe to adopt a critical posture but say little about them.

The constant refrain some hon. members indulged in was that all our welfare, income and social policies are fragmented and overlapping and that the resources made available under these programs are inadequate for the job. We have all heard that before. Really, what is implicit in remarks of that kind is the suggestion that it would be nice if we could introduce one over-all policy—I think it has been referred to as a better policy—under which we could rationalize the many policies into one piece of legislation covering this whole area.

I think hon. members were really referring to a guaranteed annual income, although to judge from the notes I have of remarks made when I was absent no representative of any party really embraced the guaranteed annual income as the philosophy on which his party was prepared to stand or which it would advocate in the next election. I will be interested to learn this evening whether any opposition party is prepared to embrace, as part of its philosophy, the guaranteed annual income. If any party is prepared to endorse it, at what level will it endorse it? Will its members be talking about the poverty lines mentioned by the Economic Council? They are well known. Or will they talk about income that is a fraction of the poverty line income?

Also, will the members of such a party talk about costs, and where they will find the money necessary? Even if they do not want to go into the cost implications of the program, are they advocating or will they advocate a guaranteed annual income? With the possible exception of the Créditiste party, the parties in this House have failed to adopt the position of unequivocally embracing this concept.

Mr. Lundrigan: The minister is speaking and I would ask, what is his position? Never mind what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) thinks.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. Will the hon. member kindly resume his seat. The minister has the floor.

An hon. Member: Oh, come on!

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, on a point of something or other—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please.

Mr. Lundrigan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the minister, in common with his cabinet colleagues, has been coached about some kind of common attitude to the effect that the opposition must provide the answers. We want him to spell out the answers to this problem and to indicate if there is a change of position on his part.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. Will the hon. member please resume his seat. The hon. member's question is a matter of debate. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) has the floor.

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, perhaps during the remainder of this debate the opposition will have a chance to clarify its position. It can make clear what it means when it talks about the "fragmented" approach to welfare. Perhaps the opposition will tell us what policies they would advocate in order to correct this situation.

I hope to lay out this evening the government's position with regard to the guaranteed annual income and some of the difficulties we have encountered with regard to it. It is often said that if you have a guaranteed annual income, you can phase out many programs—in fact, discontinue them—and the funds expended on some of the programs will be offset against the cost of a guaranteed annual income. That is partially true, but only partially true.

I would be interested to hear those who advocate a guaranteed annual income tell us just what programs we should phase out or discontinue. For example, would they discontinue the unemployment insurance program or the Canada Pension Plan, both of which are social insurance schemes? Considerable moneys go into both these programs from the private sector. Individuals make contributions. It costs the individual money. Not many members in the opposition would suggest that these programs be discontinued.

Opposition members refer to "a great multiplicity of programs" and how they should all be rationalized. However, when you start to identify them one by one, not many people stand up and say they should be discontinued. Certainly, I am not advocating that we should discontinue these programs. I think they are good. I can think of people from both sides of this House who worked hard for them. They have been of real benefit.

Unemployment insurance provides income for an individual who has experienced an unfortunate occurrence in his life. He finds it necessary to turn to unemployment insurance. The principal unfortunate occurrence is unemployment and immediate cessation of income. There are sickness and maternity benefits, but let us talk about the unemployment aspect. The benefits received from unemployment insurance are preventative. If a person has little savings it prevents him from immediately falling into welfare and into the poverty cycle. It gives him an income which he earns through his contributions. It is social insurance. It is preventative. It tides him over the transitional period until, hopefully, he can find employment. There are not too many people who would say we should discontinue that program.

There are not too many people who would say we should discontinue the Canada Pension Plan. It provides benefits for people who are experiencing a multitude of unfortunate occurrences such as premature death of the breadwinner. It provides benefits for the widow and the children. I do not think anyone would suggest that this plan should be discontinued.

The principal protection under the Canada Pension Plan for the contributor is his retirement benefit and that of his wife. He has earned those benefits through his contributions. It provides an opportunity for him to maintain a standard of life analogous to that of his working days. It is supplemental to the guaranteed income supplement and old age security. I have not heard any members opposite suggest that this program be discontinued, nor will I make this suggestion. It, too, is preventative.

On the happening of these occurrences, whether it be attaining retirement or on the death of the breadwinner, there is an income that is guaranteed. That income has been earned. It often prevents the beneficiary from falling into the poverty trap. With both unemployment insurance and the Canada Pension Plan we have a net that prevents these people, on the occurrence of any of these unfortunate happenings, immediately falling into welfare and poverty. They may have some savings, although they may not be great. On the occurrence of any of these unfortunate events it is not necessary for them to use all their savings and then fall into the poverty cycle.

What are some of the other programs these people talk about in our "fragmented" approach to income security? I touched on unemployment insurance and the Canada Pension Plan. No one is standing up and cheering about discontinuing those plans. Let us talk about old age security. It is a universal program, a demogrant program.

Mr. McKinley: You are cutting off the people who save their money.

Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): It is our right.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. The Chair would like to hear the hon. member who is speaking.

Mr. Munro: I see a great deal of validity in the comments, "It is a right, "They should have it, "They paid for it through their taxes." Many of the things this country affords people to a greater or lesser degree are done through taxes. I do not see any hilarity about discontinuing the universal part of the old age security payment that goes to all Canadians and, incidentally, costs hundreds of millions of dollars.

We have social insurance programs that we are going to keep, such as unemployment insurance, the Canada Pension Plan and, with a high degree of unanimity, agree we are going to keep the old age security. What other program does the opposition suggest we should discontinue? Is it family allowance? The family allowance program is universal; it goes to all families in this country, irrespective of their income, in the same way as old age security. Families of millionaires receive family allowances just as any senior citizen receives the old age security. Perhaps there are some who would discontinue this program in terms of its universal connotation.

Will these people support the government now in what we are suggesting? We are suggesting that the family allowance become selective, income-tested and go to those in need. We have to discontinue some of these programs if we are to reallocate our resources in order to get more of our money through the public sector to those who really need it. We have suggested that FISP be made selective, income-tested and redirected to families in real need. We are also suggesting that it goes a long way to build in incentives in our society.

I do not agree with some of the excessive statements that are made, but we have all heard it said that far too many people are receiving welfare who do not deserve it and should not be getting it. In fact, I have heard people say that the benefit levels for welfare are so high that there is no longer any incentive to work. I find those statements incredible in most circumstances; however, that is what we hear. The family income security plan offers incremental income to the working poor. There is an incentive to keep working. A person will receive incremental income to maintain himself and his family in better fashion.

I hope it is apparent that in terms of moving to a guaranteed income approach the government is prepared to take certain tangible action. We have taken it in the guaranteed income supplement for the aged. That is now an income-tested program. It has allowed us to most advantageously use our resources for over one million Canadians who need it. They prove they need it by filing applications stating why they need more than $80. This has allowed us to set income floors at realistic levels, certainly far more realistic than was the case a few years ago. We can now start to pay $260 to a couple and $137 to a single person. Inadequate as that may be, a few years ago we were at the level of around $80.

I repeat that one million Canadians are now receiving all or part of the guaranteed income supplement. That is the philosophy of this party: we are going to tailor some of these programs and shift them over to an income-tested approach. We are going to start to move toward a guaranteed annual income in this way. However, we are not going to be deceitful to the degree where we will say, "Let's discontinue or rationalize all these programs and get into one over-all program" and, when faced with the necessity of making a decision as to whether some of them should be discontinued, not have anything to offer except silence.

We have stated clearly that these social insurance schemes should be continued and we have indicated the manner in which we believe the resources going into university programs should be changed so as to reallocate those resources to areas of greatest need.

I move, now, to consider another program and I suggest this is really the program some people are talking about when they talk in terms of a guaranteed annual income. I refer to the traditional relief arrangements. "Let us not pay them welfare any more," they say, "let us pay them a guaranteed annual income."

Mr. Forrestall: Get them jobs.

Mr. Munro: First, let us talk about the people on relief or welfare. I think a high percentage of these, almost 90 per cent—one study established the figure was 87 per cent—are totally outside the work force, incapable of ever entering the work force. They are the sick, the disabled, deserted or divorced wives with children to support, with children to raise, and so on—people who through physical or mental incapacity could not in any case enter the work force. Is it suggested that with respect to this component of those on welfare we should replace welfare payments by a guaranteed annual income?

Perhaps that would not be a bad idea. We don't have to worry about incentives there, about what effect it would have on the desire of people to be involved in constructive work. But what levels are they talking about? Do they suggest we should pay these people a guaranteed annual income at the poverty line? If they do, I should like to hear it. This is one area in which in all conscience we should be ready to move as soon as possible. But I have not heard many specifics from the other side; from the opposition I have heard mostly rhetoric.

Mr. Forrestall: Give us access to your information.

Mr. Munro: I have read in the Croll report that if it be considered too costly to move to a guaranteed annual income immediately then it suggests we should pay 70 per cent of the poverty line. Many of us have heard that suggestion. But if we pay 70 per cent of the poverty line to hundreds of thousands who are completely out of the work force and who cannot re-enter it, what do we accomplish? All we have done is replace one welfare scheme for another. We have institutionalized poverty and, in fact, disconnected these people from certain services which are valuable to them.

Very few people talk about how a link-up will be accomplished. Some say that when people who are now on welfare wish to work, we should find work for them to do. I agree with that and I believe we are moving in that direction. The time has come when we are prepared to admit that the private sector, in days of advancing technology, cannot hold out much prospect of making jobs available for all Canadians who want them. This being the case, the public sector will have to move in increasingly to create job opportunities in the public service and through the help of voluntary associations.

Some of the programs we have adopted acknowledge this proposition, although I have not heard them extolled with any degree of enthusiasm by hon. members opposite. However, I would draw attention to the Opportunities for Youth program through which the government intervened directly this summer to provide job opportunities for our youth. Moreover, there are the policies recently announced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), under which local initiative has assisted in providing job opportunities, the subsidies offered to industry for training workers, creating jobs which will be of tangible benefit not only to those directly concerned but to the country as a whole. So we are moving to provide job opportunities for some of the individuals who are now on welfare and perhaps we shall move further in that direction.

But while we talk about a guaranteed annual income for those who are permanently out of the work force, I certainly hope we are also thinking about a guaranteed annual income for those who are already engaged in the work force at lower rates of remuneration. Otherwise we are building in serious disincentives. Suppose a married man who is not working is paid a guaranteed annual income of $4,000 a year. Is somebody who works and earns $4,000 to be given nothing? What is the incentive there? They have to receive something. Our cost projections indicate that here alone we are talking literally about hundreds of millions of dollars. So when we talk about these programs and about those which should be discontinued, taking account of the offset through the discontinuance of certain benefits, we are contemplating new expenditures which would amount to perhaps $2 billion a year.

This brings us to the next question. Where is the money coming from in the short term? We are being asked to move in with additional resources in this particular area while being confronted with legitimate demands to create job opportunities through a number of different programs. I do not think it is possible to do both these things at one time and do either well.

I should like to review briefly the record of the government in this field. I do not think the government has anything about which to be apologetic. I believe our Canada Assistance Plan, the plan we agreed upon with the provinces in 1966, is providing valuable assistance to those in need, albeit at levels which are often inadequate. We are moving into new areas by asking the provinces to take advantage of other aspects of the assistance plan, costs of which can be shared between the federal government and the provinces. I think that is progressive legislation.

Recent legislation to provide an adequate income to senior citizens through a marked increase, the second biggest increase in Canada, under the guaranteed income supplement is a step that is of tangible benefit to roughly one million Canadians. The Canada Pension Plan, which was brought in with the help of some members of the opposition but under the authorship of the government, has been and will continue to be of real benefit to hundreds of thousands of Canadians. I think the new benefit structure under unemployment insurance brought in by my colleague, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey), will be of real assistance to people in our work force who may be temporarily unemployed for a short time. Policies of this kind, together with the one we are now advocating in terms of FISP, doubling and in some cases almost tripling the benefit structure for families in the lower income groups, will provide the supplemental income necessary in many cases to put the poor above the poverty line and to give them some sense of adequacy and decency.

With our record of concern and accomplishment in the field of income security, and if the House acts on some of the recommendations that we have made, we will be able to make tangible, worth-while and constructive proposals that will lead to the alleviation of poverty.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, may I put a brief question to the minister? I have listened for the last 20 minutes to his apologizing for the government's stand on the guaranteed annual income. But why is the minister prepared to offer the provinces $15 million of the Canadian taxpayers' money in an effort to assess the value of a guaranteed annual income through pilot projects? Is that not a waste of money, in view of what he has now said?

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, I did indicate to the House—I suppose the hon. member was not listening—that the guaranteed annual income poses, to me at least, some very serious questions that have to be answered. I am not as sure as I once was that it is the panacea that many have claimed it is, and I think another look should be taken at it. One of the things we should look at is the effect it has on incentive. We should also look at the level at which the guaranteed annual income should be paid and whether or not we are just institutionalizing poverty.

The advantages of such a proposal must be closely examined. One of the best ways to find out the answers to some of these questions is to undertake experimental projects. Many of the provinces agree with this. Provinces of all political complexions, think that we should have experimental demonstration projects in the guaranteed annual income field which over the course of the next year or so that we might find concrete answers to some of these questions.

Mr. Lundrigan: May I ask the minister whether the experiences in New Jersey and in numerous parts of the world which have carried on this sort of experiment have been fruitful? Do we have to go on spending $15 million in order to find out the answers to the four or five questions that the minister has raised? Is our poverty so unique that we have to spend so much money to find answers to the problem?

Mr. Munro: The experiment in New Jersey is hardly sufficient on which to base an answer, especially since it has not yet completely concluded. The New Jersey experiment may provide some answers, though it was a very limited experiment involving relatively few people.

My next comment in relation to some of the things the hon. member has just said is that I do not feel a guaranteed annual income project carried on in another country is much of a guide to us in Canada. The circumstances might be entirely different, as might be the environment in which the projects are conducted. In addition, the sense of values might be quite different. I do not think we would get many accurate answers from an experiment conducted under those circumstances. In view of the fact that we are talking about spending billions of dollars on a new system of income guarantees that is thought by many to offer concrete hope for many people, I do not think that spending $15 million on a few experiments of our own is at all wasteful.

[Translation]

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I am glad of this opportunity to give my opinion on the present situation and especially on the motion under discussion, which reads as follows:

> That this House condemns the government for its failure to propose legislation establishing a social and economic security plan placing all Canadians above the poverty level.

Mr. Speaker, why do we have poor people in Canada? Can the present system have been any good, considering it led one third of the population to stagnation and poverty?

[Mr. Lundrigan.]

Mr. Speaker, that is the result of our planned economy where a certain amount of steering is noticeable. Otherwise the results would be different. But that planned economy has brought poverty to some of our fellow citizens and has made it possible for others to become rich.

Mr. Speaker, we do not want equality for all people, but we say that Canada has surplus products which should be distributed to the needy. In fact there are surpluses a plenty as shown by official statistics in recent years. And we do not know what to do with those surpluses. There are surpluses, but there is also poverty.

Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with those who say that poverty exists in Canada. We do not have poverty in Canada but abundance, and I ask the minister to find a way to distribute this abundance.

We live in abundance and we don't know what to do with the surplus production. We seek all kinds of ways to export the goods we produce because we want to sell our surpluses. There are some Canadian citizens who are undernourished; they would need some of that surplus production and through appropriate means we could distribute it in order to meet the needs of our people, those we call the "poor", who have nothing to eat.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) was saying a short while ago that the present system does not provide the means to solve the problem. In his opinion, jobs should be secured for all citizens. But the only way to create jobs is to borrow and invest. In order to invest, it is necessary to borrow and to repay the loan together with interests. So more is taken from society than what is actually invested.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, we are increasingly vulnerable to the shortcomings of the system. One hand gives while the other takes more away, thus aggravating the economic situation and increasing the number of poor people.

In order to understand well the present trend of the Canadian economy, under the direction of its financial, economic and political élite, it is only necessary to take a look at the past from 1934 until now. The results of our national economic system cannot be due to chance but are the consequence of haphazard management by qualified Canadians to whom we entrust the administration of our public and social affairs.

Every Canadian is interested in a fair distribution of the national product destined to consumption and to capitalization for future years.

We produce first to meet the needs of the citizens and then to provide for the security and the development of Canada in years to come.

Thus the purpose of production is twofold: consumption and capitalization. This is what the minister fails to study.

The Bank of Canada was established in 1934 in order to balance the management of our economy. Let us see, in the light of the figures I will quote the orientation given by financial and political authorities to the production in relation to consumption and capitalization.

In 1934, the gross national product was $4 billion, consumption $3,600 million and capitalization $400 million. Consequently, 10 per cent of the GNP was capitalized.

In 1945, production amounted to $12 billion and consumption to $10.8 billion. Capitalization totalled $1.2 billion, that is another 10 per cent of consumption. The mean capitalization was kept at 10 per cent.

In 1960, production amounted to $36 billion and consumption to $27 billion, that is a level of consumption of 75 per cent. Capitalization stood at $9 billion. The latter went up therefore from 10 per cent to 25 per cent in 15 years.

In 1971, production amounted to $90 billion, consumption to $54 billion and capitalization to $36 billion equivalent to 40 per cent of consumption.

A balance was struck in 1944 when capitalization stood at 10 per cent. In 1971, it jumped to 40 per cent. We are over capitalizing and this is where the minister should intervene. As can be seen, the more we produce, the more we capitalize and the less we consume. Consumption, as a result, is tremendously reduced.

All efforts are directed toward production, capitalization and productivity to the prejudice of consumers.

From 1934 to 1971, we have been through depression, war, prosperity and inflation, and we have now returned to depression, unemployment and increasing poverty. In the face of an ever increasing and potentially unlimited production as evidenced by the experience of the last 40 years, it becomes urgent to pause, to stop and even to reverse the trend immediately to avoid the catastrophe which becomes imminent day after day.

Let us focus our attention on the 1971 statistics and see how the abundant production of this year is divided between consumption and capitalization. Once again, the gross national production amounts to $90 billion. That is wonderful. The consumption stands at $54 billion. We consume 60 per cent of our production. There is therefore a deficit in consumption. We capitalize $36 billion, namely 40 per cent of our consumption. That is too much. A breakdown of capitalization gives the following: $6 billion comes from individuals and $30 billion from corporations.

Before capitalizing too much, we should consume enough. That is what the minister never understood, that is what he should learn because it is possible to balance our economy, to capitalize less and to make more products available to consumers, so that consumers may benefit by the national production and the production surplus.

A study of national accounts shows clearly the pattern of national economic activity, under the supreme authority of the government, that has the overall control of production, distribution of production in consumption and capitalization between individuals and corporations.

After all the economic operations for the year 1971 are in one can see that individuals capitalize only $6 billion after paying their expenses and taxes. Corporations capitalize $30 billion annually after paying their administration and operating costs and their taxes.

Those results are not accidental. They are forecast and calculated in advance according to methods known to experts but often unknown to the population, the underprivileged and working classes which are more and more deprived of the benefits of increased national production.

To illustrate this, may I say that the production in 1926 stood at $5.15 billion and that the basic tax exemption was $1,500. May I also point out that in 1971 when production totals $90 billion, or $4,200 per capita, the tax exemption compared to the production is $1,000. Since 1926, the tax exemption went down from $1,500 to $1,000 and there are some who say that we are doing much for the population of Canada when the cost of living has perhaps increased by 200 per cent compared to the gross national production. So the working man in increasingly deprived of the product of his income as he sees his tax exemption being steadily reduced compared to the national production per capita.

From 1929 to 1933 the tax exemption was equal to three times the national production per capita. In 1970-71, it is only one quarter of the national production per capita. During that period the situation has deteriorated to the extent that the tax exemption decreased from three times more to four times less than the national production per capita. That is the reason for unemployment and poverty.

Accountants, economists, administrators, and ministers are all in a position to appraise these computation methods and the prejudicial impact they have on our national economic balance while the people's buying power is steadily eroded and production is forever increasing, at least as far as production costs are concerned.

With the same national production per capita since 1944, that is to say when the family allowances were established, they have always been set at $6 and $8 per month for children from 6 to 14.

From 1944 to 1971, the national production increased from $11 to $91 billion and no way has been found to have the 7 million children under 16 enjoy it although they make up one third of Canada's population.

I am blaming not only the minister but also the government and all hon. members for failing to see this problem clearly and for not distributing the surplus production in proportion to the consumers' needs.

Whether the per capita production be $1,000 or $4,200, family allowances are set at $6 and $8. And now, in connection with the family allowances, the government is wrangling with the provincial governments; there is talk of taking from those who already do not have enough so as to give to others. In fact, no solution has been found to this problem. Again it's utter nonsense while our poverty level and our troubles are increasing and when we can but forecast an even more serious situation in the future.

The 1971 national accounts therefore show that public and private companies have capitalized $30 billion for the future, that is one third of the current year's national production after paying their administration costs and taxes. The time has come to open our eyes and realize that the best things, even in moderation, can become dangerous. Indeed, a $30 billion capitalization on a $90 billion production is obviously exaggerated, especially when consumption is lacking on the part of the dependent citizens short of personal purchasing power and having to rely on the productive citizen or on society in general to keep alive.

Thank God, these are not haphazard results. They derive from a well planned orientation, from a scientific technology devised and directed by experts and university graduates specializing in money matters, economics, politics, or the social, industrial and administrative sciences.

There is no question of entirely spoiling a system which does so well in planning production, capitalization and even to a great extent consumption for the 8,700,000 Canadian producers contributing to production and earning wages for their work as well as interest on their principal.

Mr. Speaker, there remains only to plan a guaranteed personal income for the $13 million dependent Canadian citizens in order that every Canadian without any income from work or capital can be sure of a guaranteed vital minimum, large enough and planned according to his needs and the production capacity.

Such is the situation in which we find ourselves, Mr. Speaker. That is where we should focus our efforts. We should ask our great experts, politicians, economists and others to see to it that the surplus production is distributed—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

[English]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, like others who have spoken in this debate today, I should like to commend the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) for placing on the order paper the motion that we are now discussing. I think I can also say that the debate has been a very interesting one. All of those who have taken part have been obviously sincere and earnest in their desire to get rid of poverty. I think that all of us realize, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) put it, that poverty is a cancer that can destroy our society.

Although I have paid tribute to those who have taken part in this debate for the sincerity and earnestness of their approach, I must say that I disagree with many things that have been said. It does seem to me that many of the ideas and proposals that have been made fly in the face of one basic, fundamental fact. That fact is that you do not get rid of poverty simply by paying people money because they are poor. When that is done, no matter what title may be given to the payments, the result is that the poor are kept in their poverty.

If I may use the words of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, there are many measures that have the effect of institutionalizing poverty, and that goes for any scheme that gives money to people simply because they are poor. We have to find a much better way, and I hope that even this day's debate will result in some new thinking about this important issue.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare was quite right in asking that spokesmen for the various parties in this House should make clear where they stand with respect to the guaranteed annual income. I am afraid that is a phrase which a few years ago was capable of at least two different definitions, but the developments which have taken place have narrowed the field. It used to be that one could say he stood for a guaranteed annual income when what he really meant, as I did, was that he stood for universal programs, for demogrants. I still think that that is a good connotation to put upon the phrase "guaranteed annual income". However, because of developments that have taken place in other jurisdictions, and because of the use of the title "guaranteed income supplement" with respect to the attachment to old age security, and because of the way in which the Croll report uses the phrase "guaranteed annual income," it has now come to mean something in the nature of the negative income tax. It has now come to mean a program under which, by use of an income test, people are given money to bring them up to a certain level.

I have to say that if the guaranteed annual income means that, if it means what is set out in the Croll report, I am not for it any more than is the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro). But I am for a guaranteed annual income as I see it. I am for universal programs. I am for demogrants to designated groups in our society.

I said earlier that the fundamental fact that all of us who want to get rid of poverty must face up to is that we will never get rid of it by programs that institutionalize poverty, by programs under which money is given to people simply because they are poor. Programs like that keep them poor, start their children off poor, and as a result we will go on having a society in which not just 25 per cent by perhaps even a larger percentage of our people are poor throughout their years, despite the potential affluence of a country like this.

What bothers me most of all about the recommendations in the Croll report—and many people use the kind of language that is in that document—is that it generously criticizes all of our present welfare programs, saying they are a hodge-podge, saying they are no good, saying they do damage to the poor, and then it suggests another one. The Croll report proposes just one big welfare scheme that would be much easier to administer because it is on a one-shot basis, but I suggest it is far removed from the realities of the situation.

That applies not only to the Croll report. I submit it applies to much of the thinking of the present government. I was with the Minister of National Health and Welfare when he was criticizing those who are prepared to drop a number of our programs—he specified some of them—in favour of one over-all scheme. But I am not with him when in the administration of this phase of this government's activities he moves away from the universal principle and moves into more and more income-tested programs.

I hope the minister is not going to say, "Oh, there is Stanley again, still preaching the same old thing he has preached for the last 30 years."

An hon. Member: Thirty-five years.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Thirty-five, 40 years, or whatever it is. I submit that in advocating universal programs and demogrants I am not advocating anything that is old-fashioned. It is welfare; it is the means test that is old-fashioned. I am advocating what is going to come, the day of universal allowances, of economic equality. Let us move in that direction, not backward as so many want to do.

I submit that the minister, because he is well versed in this, is aware that the programs under government jurisdiction that do the most for the morale and the spirit of our people are the universal programs. Old age security does it. Granted, the minister has spoiled it a bit by the income test he has attached to a portion of it, but the basic $80 is still there as a universal right that is earned simply by age and residence; and compared with what the old, means test pension did to the souls of older people, that pension is a godsend, not only in terms of dollars but in terms of what it does for their morale.

The same thing is true of the Canada Pension Plan. It has not been around very many years yet but it is having its effect, not only on those retired who are drawing the small pensions already available but widows and those suffering illness or accident get the benefits of the Canada Pension Plan, and they get those benefits as of right. They paid for them with the contributions they made.

The same is true of unemployment insurance and family allowances. For all of the light criticism that there is about family allowances because some people get them who may not need them, the fact is that that payment has meant a great deal to millions of parents, mothers in particular, and I say it has been a good program across the years—good mainly because it was a program based on a universal right.

Mr. Munro: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Certainly.

Mr. Munro: If the hon. member is advocating emphasis in terms of universal payments and, getting away from the selective income test approach that he has identified, that we take in some of our programs, I would ask him if we are to guarantee income floors—and for the sake of this particular argument we will take the poverty levels spoken of by the Economic Council—and if we are to guarantee income floors to everyone in Canada, and here I am talking about young married couples and couples with children—I am not talking about just those people who are out of the work force—would he make payments of this nature to everyone in Canada?

Let us say that here we are talking about roughly $4,000 for a man with a wife and two children. Would he pay that $4,000 to virtually everyone in Canada and somehow recover it back through the tax system? Is that the way he would approach an income floor?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is precisely the direction in which I think we ought to move, and I think that is precisely the direction we shall move, given time. I think the minister should take the first steps in that direction now, instead of taking the reverse steps that I believe he is taking despite the enunciation of the good principles and intentions that we heard from him tonight, just as we have heard from him on other occasions.

The minister talked about what we are going to do for the working poor. For heaven's sake, let us stop using that language. When we use that language and treat them accordingly, we are condemning them to be working poor for the rest of their lives—and that goes for their children and their children's children. We have to move in the direction of equality in our society that will establish the kind of floor the minister has mentioned, or perhaps even a higher floor, and this as a matter of right to all Canadians.

I have heard the question asked today and previously: Who will pay for the cost? What will we tax the upper and middle income people in order to do this? That is a problem. I know that very well, but I submit that is nothing compared with the cost we are imposing on 25 per cent of our people by keeping them in poverty, the human cost, the cost in morale, and the cost in spirit. If we believe Canada is the kind of country where human beings count, we ought to see this as a top priority, getting our income so distributed that we do something for the souls and the morale of our people. And we do not do that the Croll way or by the backward steps the minister has taken, steps which I think are contrary to the views he holds.

The minister looked at me a few minutes ago when he talked about some of the help that the government got from this side of the House with a certain program a few years back. During that time I got to know the minister well. It was before he became minister—and I think he agrees with me on this. I urge him, from his place in the cabinet, to say "No" every time he can to any of these retrogressive steps, and to say "Yes" to forward steps in terms of universal programs and demogrants.

Instead of saying that we cannot do it because we cannot immediately pay $4,000 to every family in Canada, I say let us start with certain defined groups. I still think we can improve the pensions we pay to our older people, but I must not spend too much time on that subject because whenever I get started on it the first thing I know is that my allotted time is up. However, I still think there should be a substantial increase in that basic $80 a month.

I think the time has come to provide for pensions at age 60. I have said this a number of times and the government will hear from me many times until we get it. I advocate pensions at 60, both old age security pensions and Canada Pension Plan benefits, on a voluntary basis, in other words for those who are prepared to leave the labour market. I would not make any other restrictions so far as drawing these two pensions are concerned, but I do say that people who leave the labour market should get these two pensions at age 60.

I believe that the federal government should have quite a bit to say about its action in providing superannuation for civil servants at age 55 after they have 30 years' service. This sort of lead should be given to industry and society generally. A pension after 30 years of service to an employer, public or private, is fully justified, and it is time such a practice became general. These steps also have the effect of creating employment for those who are younger, but I shall not get off into that tonight as I want to make precise suggestions of what I think the government should pursue. One is in the area of the old age security, increasing the amount which is now $80 to a higher figure and making it possible to pay both old age security and the Canada Pension Plan benefit at age 60.

Another area in which the government should move ahead on the kind of basis I am advocating is with respect to family allowance or FISP, as the minister wants to call it. I wish the minister would not establish that cut-off line above which people do not get any family allowance at all. If he wants to make a difference—he is in power and I am not—he could make it the way he has with the old age security, establish a basic amount for each child that everyone gets on a universal basis and, if you will, have something more for those whose incomes are lower.

Another place where the demogrant or universal principle could be applied would be for mothers in the homes. I trust my colleague for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) is applauding this. I know she is—

Mrs. MacInnis: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —for it is her idea and mine too. This is one area where we should now establish a demogrant, a universal program of payment as of right which would take care of many of the relief and welfare difficulties that face our people. It would do this on a basis that will be good for the morale of those homes, for it would be a matter of right. I would give it not just to the mothers who are part of the minister's working poor; I would give it to every mother who is at home raising her children in addition to what is paid to the children themselves. It would cost money, say some of my Conservative friends. Of course it would, but nothing in terms of the costs to the souls and spirits of our people because they live their lives in poverty and their children and grandchildren have to do the same.

There is a precise program. Put your family allowance, if you will, on at least a partly universal basis and pay it across the board and add to that a demogrant to the mothers who are at home or, for that matter, women who are at home, whether mothers or not. These are areas where we can start. The minister, I know, is thinking in the right direction because of the question he asked me. He would like to move in the direction of a universal grant to all the people of Canada. He is young enough; he will see that day. So shall I, for that matter, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Alexander: That is questionable.

Mr. Forrestall: You have undermined your credibility—it is a question of 40 years.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): When I came here they told me we would never get the means test off the old age pension and that we would never get the amount of the pension up to $40 a month. If you have seen these battles won as I have, you know you are on the right track; and if you stay at it you will see still further victories.

Mr. Deachman: And the Liberals have done all of it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The Croll way is all wrong. He would wipe out old age security. He lost my support when he proposed that—but apart from the fact, he puts the whole of the solution to the problem of the poor on the basis that makes them all recipients of one big, grand welfare scheme. The Munro approach—at least the one he is implementing, not the one he really believes in—is to go for selectivity, to go for income tests and means tests. This has the effect of saying that we give money to people—why? Because they are mothers, because they are wives, because they are a certain age, because they have lived in the country a certain length of time? No. Because they are poor. So they stay poor.

I suggest, therefore, that what we should do is extend the principle that has worked the best, the universal principle. My friend in the back row over there likes to boast of what the Liberals have done. They have done a lot through the pressure from this side of the House over the last 50 years, Mr. Speaker, but they know from their experience that the programs that have worked best are those that have been universal, those that have followed a demogrant principle. I say, for God's sake, for the sake of the people of this country and for our future, let us move still further in that direction.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I must advise the minister that if he wants to ask a question at this time, because of the fact that the time allotted to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has expired he may only ask a question with the unanimous consent of the House. Would the House give the minister permission to ask a question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: He needs to ask a lot of them.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I should like to thank hon. members for allowing me time to ask this question. I asked the hon. member whether this universal benefit would be paid out at levels we have not yet attained—far from it—to everyone in Canada, and recover the money through taxes. This is putting an awful lot of money through the system. Once it is paid out we have to try to recover moneys of a nature we have never put through the tax system in Canada. There would be great problems inherent in implementing the recovery rates necessary at the high income levels for the benefits paid out. I imagine the hon. member has given some thought to the problems inherent in that type of approach, and I should like to hear his views.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, first of all may I say that the minister is quite right in his description of how I think the matter ought to work, namely, that the grants be paid universally and that the income tax be used to collect back from those who do not need it. The minister says that this involves a huge operation in terms of dollars. I hope I do not appear too much of a person out of the past if I say that I remember reading in Hansard that the late Hon. Charles Dunning said more or less the same thing to the late J. S. Woodsworth when he asked for a pension of $20 a month—it was a good idea but the dollars involved would break the country. Yes, it is a big operation, this kind of money being paid out and coming back. I submit, however, that what it would do for the morale and spirit of our people and the vitality of our economy is worth it.

An hon. Member: Recycle it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My hon. friend says it is a form of recycling. If recycling works in other fields, it will work in this area too, as indeed it already has.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy LeBlanc (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I am glad of this opportunity to express my opinion on as serious and important a matter as that of poverty—which could be eliminated through the establishment of a social and economic system, as was suggested by the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) in the motion under discussion. However, it seems to me that blaming the government for failing to propose legislation establishing a system designed to fight poverty is an exaggeration and is far from the truth.

Unfortunately, we in Canada keep considering the problem of poverty in different ways. We should find solutions and, above all, implement them. The hon. member for Témiscamingue blames the government for failing to propose legislation. Like many other members, I cannot agree with him.

On the contrary, the liberal government has neglected nothing to date. Although it has probably been unable to correct the situation, it has left no stone unturned in the present circumstances.

The minister spoke to the House a moment ago, summarizing the attitude of the government by saying, I believe, that the government had nothing to apologize for. On the contrary, the government and the Liberals should be proud of their efforts, of their achievements to date and also of their program for the future. He also recalled that many have responsibilities in this field. The federal government has great responsibilities because of the action it must take at the level of the national economy, but the provinces also have theirs, all the more so since some of the legislation related to poverty comes under their jurisdiction. Moreover, all citizens should unite to fight poverty, one of the heaviest burdens the country has to carry during this period.

No need to try to sum up all the measures this government has adopted recently. Nevertheless, let us recall those dealing with unemployment insurance. The tax bill is not all bad. On the contrary, there are many improvements that will help better the lot of the middle class and of the poor. The government has also deployed great efforts to find housing for the poor, notably in cities.

The government has taken steps to improve the living conditions of needy veterans, not to mention the proposals mentioned by the minister with respect to income security.

Estimates concerning federal funds to be spent on the income security plan and on social programs for 1969-70 were around $5.328 billion whereas the provincial share amounted to $2.845 billion for a total of $8.173 billion. Something has obviously been done. We cannot rest on our laurels and we are confident that more will be done if all of us work together in order to solve that problem.

But from what I have learned it also seems to me that, after all, the liberal party has been the first to introduce social measures and to urge other governments to continue that socialization program. As far as the present government is concerned, it does everything to strike at the very roots of poverty.

We recognize there are still several things to do. I think the minister admits it. Every possible effort is made. If the problem is difficult to solve, it is perhaps due to the rapid change in technological and scientific fields, which creates difficulties for a majority of the people preventing some to integrate with those who had the opportunity of going further.

However, we hope Canadians will take their responsibilities in that area. It might also be—and I think the government is considering that hypothesis—that we are now dealing with the symptoms. It may be too difficult or impossible to reach the root of the problem, if we examine the last report of the Senate Special Committee on Poverty. Indeed, the committee was constituted within the framework of our institutions and it helps the government consider the question seriously. In its report the Senate Special Committee deals with the symptom of the poverty problem in the following terms:

The system has failed because it has treated the symptoms of poverty and left the disease itself untouched.

It is probably a little like a person having a headache because he has stomach trouble. He is given aspirins instead of being treated for his digestive ailment. Yet it is first necessary to know the cause of the disorder and then to remove it. It might be a real cause, difficult to find out because of the complex problem.

Political "simplifiers" always come up with easy solutions, solutions seldom applied. It is easy to criticize those on the front line by holding up to ridicule some of their slogans like the "just society". When the liberal party, following its leader, voiced its aims and its ideal by speaking of a "just society" we were aware, as was our leader, that such a "just society" could not be achieved by one single man or by a small group of men. It requires the help of all Canadians, of all governments. The state ship must be pulled in the same direction.

However, one must not be so naive as to believe that the ideally just society will be achieved today or tomorrow. As we are working towards a "just society", we should not destroy what we have already but strive more and more after that end.

• (9:30 p.m.)

In my view, we should endeavour to determine the true facts with regard to poverty. There are poor people among the young, the sick, the disabled and the older people. There are poor people in the underprivileged regions, especially in the rural areas. Some people are only temporarily poor because of illness or accidents. There are also the poor who are in a chronic state of dependence, those in the cities who have their own characteristics.

If the poor appear to be increasing in our society, it is probably because of technological progress which, in my view, is developing at a truly fantastic rate.

I remember the example give nearlier by the hon. member for Témiscamingue, and I agree with him, because I also meet such people in my riding. I cannot understand that at present a husband over 65 only draws a $135 monthly allowance, while his wife, because she is not yet 65, nor 60, gets nothing. A few months ago, she might have received $50 or $60, but because of the new provincial legislation, she no longer gets anything. In fact, the two of them only receive $135, which, in my view, is quite inadequate to allow them to live decently.

There are also unemployment insurance benefits for certain provincial employees as, for instance, those of the Department of Highways. Sometime ago, at least, they were not eligible for unemployment insurance.

Even among the poor, there are complaints at times about irregularities. We can presume that this happens, but we can not prove it. Some way should be found to put an end to those irregularities. Responsible people tell us that some are drawing welfare cheques and could apparently do without them, while their neighbors who can hardly make both ends meet, are not entitled to the same benefits.

I read the report of the Senate committee on poverty to which I referred a while ago. We can hardly understand the deep causes of poverty and its destructive effects on the whole community.

Several members have suggested solutions earlier. The Liberal government has implemented several in the past, especially since 1968. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) intends to continue to do so, but he needs time as well as physical and financial opportunities.

If we go by the testimony of some of our electors, we can see they want to work. Means should be found to get people back into production, to make them work as they want to. Although long term programs may seem wiser, we should perhaps endeavour to set up progressive programs which would be applied by extremely competent and experienced people.

As some have suggested, namely the members of the special Senate committee on poverty, we must aim towards a guaranteed annual income which, it would seem, could not be set up easily overnight, in spite of what some may say.

And this solution, as suggested by some people, could easily be applied through the negative income tax method combined with an incentive to work, as many Canadians wish. The federal government, constituted by the Liberal Party, tends to realize these objectives as fast as possible.

Together, with the help of the federal government and of all governments of Canada and also, if possible, with the help of all those who are affected by poverty, we should try to develop a system to have those needy Canadians participate in the political decision, making process, in order to eradicate poverty some day.

I am with those who have confidence in this government, who can congratulate the government for the action it has taken and the realizations it authored, especially since 1968. We are hopeful that the government will continue to take action and to consider the problem as it is in order to study the best solutions and apply them.

[English]

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, this evening, at 20 minutes to 10, I have the distinct honour of speaking on behalf of the Official Opposition on the serious problem of poverty. I have listened to speakers from all four parties. There has been a lot of sound and fury which signifies very little, to say the least.

[Mr. LeBlanc (Rimouski).]

Tonight I feel a little of the frustration of the people involved—the unemployed, poverty-stricken and helpless Canadians across this country. This afternoon the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) was present in this chamber. Tonight the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) is in the chamber for a while. He did not show up during the afternoon or, at the very least, the beginning of the debate. Neither the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) nor the acting minister have been in the chamber.

Mr. Munro: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Lundrigan: I know the minister is in Japan. I am talking about the acting minister.

Mr. Munro: Will the hon. member clarify his remarks about my presence in the House this afternoon? Was he inferring that I was just here at the beginning of the debate?

Mr. Lundrigan: I did not see the minister here for the whole debate. I have been here since the debate started. I have not seen the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, the acting minister or the parliamentary secretary. I have not seen the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) here today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please.

Mr. Lundrigan: What for?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): I do not think the House will gain anything by having a roll-call of hon. members. The hon. member should speak to the motion.

Mr. Lundrigan: I am speaking to the motion. Today, in the House of Commons, we are talking about the most important problem facing this nation—the unemployment of half a million Canadians and the fact that there are over four million Canadians living below the poverty line. We are talking to an empty House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lundrigan: Two cabinet ministers have been in the House today. The members of the opposition are trying to state their points of view. We have been referring to the Economic Council's report, the Senate committee report on poverty and the economic development report.

An hon. Member: There are only seven of your members here.

Mr. Lundrigan: I do not see any advantage in members of the House of Commons standing in their place and speaking about poverty when the front bench, decision-makers of this country are not present. That is folly and it should be recorded. I would like to see the proceedings of this House being televised today so that the people of Canada could see the response of this elected government to poverty-stricken Canadians.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare had the gumption to come here tonight to speak politically and very beautifully about the guaranteed annual income and the pilot project which is costing $15 million, while at the same time being married to it politically. He said to the members of this House and the Canadian people, "We think it might be the political thing to do because we might have to withdraw other programs not politically palatable to the Canadian people. We are willing to spend $15 million because we are married to that kind of concept." That was beautiful figureskating; the minister should be complimented on his presentation.

I expected the minister, having heard the criticisms contained in the Senate committee poverty report, to at least comment on the fact that it did not concentrate on ways in which we can improve our economy and put people to work. I expected the minister to make some reference to the ways in which the economy of this nation can be improved in order to take people off the welfare rolls. That is what I expected. That is what the Canadian people expected. Instead, he came in with his coached approach to the problem. He asked what the opposition believed should be done. He asked what the members of the Official Opposition, the Créditiste party and the New Democratic Party believe should be done. This is the approach of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Those in the front benches of the Liberal party have been well coached.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lundrigan: I intend to say only a few words. I firmly believe it is a waste of time to state my point of view but I will do so anyway. When I rose to my feet this evening I was tempted to speak for only two or three minutes ane then resume my seat. I was going to make the simple point that this debate was a waste of time because of the absence of the decision-making group of this country. I want to make two or three points which I hope will be communicated to those in the Department of Manpower who are responsible for dealing with the problem of poverty in Canada.

There is in operation in Canada a manpower training program. I believe every Canadian realizes that there is a positive correlation between the level of education, the level of training, the level of technical or professional competency in a country and the degree of its economic development. The government appropriately repeated programs which had been instituted by previous governments by passing the Adult Occupational Training Act in 1967 and introducing a manpower training program. Since that time, 1,134,000 Canadians have received instruction under this program. The cost in 1970-71 was $460 million. A few weeks ago, on October 14, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration announced that a further $35 million would be set aside for training adult Canadians who are unemployed, that $20 million would be allocated with respect to on the job training, and $15 million to upgrading skills so as to best qualify Canadians to find employment on the Canadian labour market.

I do not agree with all the observations made by the Senate committee on poverty or by the Economic Council, to the effect that these programs are of no value. I believe that this kind of training is an essential characteristic of a human resource development program. It does take people off the unemployment rolls, although it might be said to constitute a form of hidden unemployment. It does put money into the economy. Moreover, when a trained labour force exists there is a greater opportunity for development to take place.

In Nova Scotia, for example, we do have the capability of training people, so there is a better chance that industry will locate in the province. These are benefits which are derived from the manpower training program. I do not believe that a training program can create jobs; and, of course, neither does any Canadian. I do not believe the Prime Minister's statement that unemployment is a structural problem, that a great many opportunities are wide open but that people are either too lazy to work or do not fit into the openings which exist. I do not believe that, because from the research we have done the facts are to the contrary. In Canada today there are many tens of thousands of professionally trained and highly-skilled people who are unable to find work because there is broad and massive unemployment.

I believe we should reassess the manpower retraining programs because very often they are not able to take unskilled Canadian workers and expose them to training sufficiently to bring them up to the standards of skill required to enable them to fit into the labour market. People who are being trained either at upgrading centres or adult education classes are often not as competent, even after several years, as a young person who has just graduated from high school and who is also unemployed. We are spending money to educate people who find themselves, at the end, in the same boat as a young person who is unemployed.

Despite the large sums spent on these programs—$460 million in 1970-71—we have only been able to influence, on the average, 5 per cent of the unemployed in the country. Last year approximately 100,000 people were affected by upgrading schools, basic training schools and other aspects of the program. There has been a terrible lack of co-ordination between these programs and the needs of the economic community. We have trained people in all kinds of basic skills, but they find they have no opportunity to use them because it turned out there was a flux of persons of that kind before the program even began.

I now wish to make two or three recommendations. I know it is a waste of time. I know it is a lost cause. I know they will never be heard of again. It will be written up in Hansard and a waste of the taxpayers' dollars even to print it.

An hon. Member: Agreed.

Mr. Lundrigan: First, I think we have to identify the components of the labour force in Canada. In one province there are 5,000 adult Canadians who have never been to school. Of what value is any kind of upgrading training to that kind of Canadian? Does this not suggest that we ought to look at other methods of bringing such people into the labour force? Again, there has to be a way of relating present programs to social institutions, to welfare programs and to unemployment insurance benefits.

Today—and this is hard to believe—if a young person is qualified to receive unemployment insurance benefits and finds himself out of work and decides he will enter a technical school or a university to improve his qualifications, he is denied unemployment insurance benefits because of the fact that he is not available for work if called upon, under the narrow definition in the regulations. But if he has been on welfare and has not worked for five years, he can qualify for as much as $100 a week if he goes to an upgrading school. A young fellow called on me at my office today, a strapping Canadian willing to do a day's work. We went to Carleton University to improve his qualifications after drawing unemployment insurance benefits for a couple of weeks. While he was there he got a bill demanding a refund of what he had drawn. If I were that young Canadian I doubt whether my reaction would be as mild as his was.

There has to be a better system of ascertaining real labour needs in Canada. Is it necessary to turn people out in scores as electricians or plumbers to find that the labour market is already glutted with that type of person? I believe the three-year labour requirement should be revised. At present, before a person can enter an upgrading school he must show that he has been on the labour market for three years. That requirement should be eliminated. A move was made in this direction by the Minister of Manpower when he announced a $15 million on the job program. He said, with respect to training of this type, there was no need for the requirement that the trainee should have spent three years in the labour force. The present provision discriminates against a young person who is willing to enter an upgrading school. Then there is the requirement that anyone taking part in this type of training cannot continue for longer than 52 weeks. How absurd that is, when one considers that there are probably thousands of disadvantaged Canadians who might well be required to attend for two years before being able to moving into a technical training institution to better themselves. They probably include many who have 30 or 40 years of productive activity before them. This requirement should be eliminated.

I believe there should be some mechanism by which new apprentices can more easily find their way into industry. How often have hon. members received letters from young people saying they have just finished their trade training, with an "A" certificate in mechanics, boiler maintenance or some other craft, only to be told at the Manpower office that they must have experience?

In most European countries there are schemes whereby governments encourage industry, through the use of incentives of various kinds, to subsidize initial employment opportunities for young apprentices for a year or so. This is something the Canadian government should consider. It is absolutely frustrating for our young people to walk out of training institutions at the age of 18 up to 25, full of vim and vigour, having listened to their teachers from kindergarden talking of the virtues of education, only to find that after all their formal education they cannot find their way into the labour force of Canada.

I am sure you are eager, Mr. Speaker, to announce that my time is up, so I shall end on the point made by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) who had something to say about owning property. There is one fundamental aspect in this regard of which the government seems to be unaware. The best way to assist the people of Canada today who are poverty-stricken—I am not talking about the lame, the incapacitated, the blind or the elderly who need a better social system, but about able-bodied Canadians, 447,000 of whom are out of work—is to get the economy rolling again.

This government has been in power for 3½ years and has been espousing a just society and the elimination of regional disparity. There must be some way to get the unemployed back to work. There is no substitute for the way of life in which a man gets up in the morning, climbs into his vehicle, whether it be a dump truck, a half-ton pick-up or a 1947 model, who has a little home and back yard, who does a full day's work, and at the end of the week brings home his pay cheque. That is the essence of living.

It is not good for Canada, or for any other country for that matter, to have to pay its people with a government pay cheque. The essence of living is for the government to provide opportunities for people to work and to make some contribution to their family, to the community, to the country, to mankind and society. This is what my hon. friends to my left do not understand. One hon. member to my left, who is a big spender, qualified two years ago for the old age pension, yet I have never heard him or any of his colleagues talk about how to get the economy rolling in order that our people can obtain a better living.

This is why I become excited about the half million Canadians who are unemployed. They should be taking part day after day in some constructive employment activity so that they can go home in the evening feeling proud of themselves. I hear nothing from the government about this. They seem unaware that Canadians across this country, from little old Newfoundland to west of Vancouver, need jobs. This half million is crying out for jobs. They are not interested in somebody giving them $5 extra during the winter months for welfare or to buy some extra oil. They are interested in their homes, their jobs. The opportunity to work is the right of all Canadians across the whole dominion.

The sooner we elect people to positions of political authority who are willing to work toward such a goal, the sooner the Canadian people will put aside their frustrations, anxieties and fears and play their rightful part in an active economy. This is the attitude that members on this side of the House display and the kind of policy that we promote. I am confident that the Canadian people will buy this policy in the not too distant future.

[Translation]

Mr. Yves Forest (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, the motion brought forward by the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) gives us today an opportunity to discuss a major problem in any society, namely the best way to fight the poverty which unfortunately is the lot of too many people, in an era when technological advances have led to the solution of so many problems and facilitated the progress of humanity in so many ways.

I regret that the few remaining minutes will not allow me to complete my remarks in this respect and I hope to have another opportunity to express my views on this important problem of poverty in Canada.

Of course, it is not easy to determine a poverty line. Poverty has been described as lack of money, which is a relative definition, as inadequate access to some of the goods, services and living conditions to which others have access and which are considered to be indispensable for an acceptable standard of living. That applies also to other blanket definitions based on the existence of disparities.

Of course, poverty also depends on circumstances of time and place—and somebody could be poor in Canada and yet be considered as almost rich in an underdeveloped country—although I am quite aware that this comparison is not of much comfort to those who are considered poor in Canada.

It would be preferable to turn to the definition of the basic rights of the individual as it appears in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. It states that everyone has the right to a standard of living adequate for the health and well-being of himself and of his family, including food, clothing, housing and medical care and necessary social services.

Everyone has the right to security in the event of unemployment, sickness, disability, widowhood, old age or other lack of livelihood in circumstances beyond his control.

Alas, after a quarter of a century, we are unfortunately still far from that goal, in the world, and it is strange that such a motion should be moved in a country whose standard of living is one of the highest, a country which has a system of social security quite properly considered the best and the most comprehensive as compared with those in effect in the other free countries of the world.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It being 10 o'clock, it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 58(11), the time allotted for the consideration of the motion is expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—SOUTH AFRICA—GOVERNMENT POLICY RESPECTING POSITION OF NON-WHITES

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, on November 4 I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) whether Lieutenant-Colonel W. Kenneth Robinson, a Member of Parliament, was expressing government policy when he stated on a short summer visit to South Africa that—and then I was called to order. I continued my question as follows:

> Is it government policy to suggest that South African non-whites should realize they are not yet ready for full political independence, as was indicated by Lieutenant-Colonel W. Kenneth Robinson?

Again I was called to order. The question I asked on November 4 stemmed from an article in the Durban Mercury of South Africa, dated August 8, 1971, and headlined "Canadian MPs impressed by practicality". It read:

• (10:00 p.m.)

> This is the general opinion of four Canadian MPs who arrived in Durban yesterday for a short visit as part of their itinerary arranged by the South Africa Foundation.
>
> The four men, including three members of the ruling Liberal Party under Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau, are: Lt.-Col. W. Kenneth Robinson (Toronto-Lakeshore), Mr. Harold Stafford (Elgin), Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval) and Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford). Mr. Rondeau is a member of the Social Credit Party.

The article continues:

> The South African non-whites were anxious to avoid "the mistakes made by Zambia and some other black African states" and were prepared to advance slowly towards the development of their own country within a country.
> The four MPs said they would report back on their visit and agreed that South Africa's image in Canada had been tarnished by "bigots".
>
> All the information we get over there is hopelessly biased. We don't get the full picture at all and some of the facts that we do get are badly distorted," Col. Robinson said.
> Col. Robinson said that there was a feeling in Canada that freedom was more important than anything else—regardless of standards of education and conditions of living.

In my opinion, freedom of speech, freedom of religion, freedom from hunger and freedom from fear are the fundamental rights of all people in this world. I repeat, everybody living in a democratic nation of our world should subscribe to that philosophy. It is fact that these MPs went to South Africa to see for themselves what apartheid and racism was all about. I imagine they stayed in an integrated hotel when they were there. It is also a fact that three members were recognized as members of the ruling Liberal party under Prime Minister Trudeau and one of them used the real scare tactic of the domineering military mind, with the handle "Lieutenant-Colonel W. Kenneth Robinson". It is strange, indeed, that the same member is shown in the "Parliamentary Guide" of 1971 simply as, "Robinson, William Kenneth (Lakeshore), first elected to House of Commons 1968, party politics: Liberal," and then his address. His attitude is certainly striking so far as our country is concerned.

The real issue before us is indicated in a statement made by Lester Pearson speaking about the Commonwealth, in South Africa. He stated:

> If the Commonwealth does not condemn racialism in any form and wherever it shows itself; if it does not reject and fight discrimination in race and color, in any form; if any of its members base their politics on such discrimination; then the Commonwealth is not going to survive in its present—or indeed in any acceptable—form.

That was a speech by Lester Pearson to the Royal Commonwealth Society in November of 1968, which is not very long ago. Now that these Canadian Members of Parliament have associated themselves with the Trudeau Liberals, I wonder if what they had to say in South Africa is really government policy. This is what I am wondering, because we have to decide when Members of Parliament go on trips such as this whether they are speaking as government people when associated with the Prime Minister of this country. This is the real issue and the question I should like to ask tonight.

One must ask questions already asked of these Members of Parliament visiting South Africa, and one must also ask the latest group of two Conservatives and one Liberal who visited South Africa at the invitation and expense of the South Africa Foundation, which is a foundation established in South Africa—supported by big business—to protect commercial interests and to improve the public image. It is my information that one, Jimmy Sinclair of Vancouver, has visited South Africa at the invitation of this foundation. But one must say in all sincerity that so far as these people are concerned, they have not made any pronouncements whatsoever in so far as that country is concerned.

Surely Canadians can at least recognize the fact that we must do everything possible in opposing apartheid and racism. We cannot be proud of our Indian and Eskimo situation, but at the same time if we want to remain within the world of nations we must stand up and be counted. When we look at a recent copy of the Globe and Mail we see that South Africa is referred to as a police state. We find that an Anglican dean has been confined to prison. Of course, it becomes an issue as to whether or not we are prepared to stand up for the right of individuals to express their opinion against apartheid and racism.

I would sincerely ask that the government indicate to the House tonight whether in fact, when visiting Members of Parliament go to other countries, they are really speaking for the government of this country when they associate themselves with the Prime Minister.

Mr. Paul St. Pierre (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): I must say it is rather interesting to hear the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg) quote a newspaper in Durban, South Africa, with such authority. I wonder whether on other occasions he would bring forward the statements of a newspaper in that country as substantiation for the facts which he is putting before the House. He has mentioned the names of three members of this Parliament. I would be curious to know whether he has approached them and asked whether that report was correct or incorrect.

Mr. Skoberg: I am asking you.

Mr. St. Pierre: It is quite possible for the member to go to the Members of Parliament and ask, "Are the facts correct as presented, or are they not?" I cannot ask him this question in the course of my answer tonight, but since he has not gone to them I must assume—

Mr. Skoberg: How do you know?

Mr. St. Pierre: —he has accepted the statement of a newspaper in Durban, South Africa, as being official and accurate. I hope he will remember this on other occasions.

Mr. Skoberg: How do you know I have not gone to them?

Mr. St. Pierre: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The parliamentary secretary has the floor and I suggest that the hon. member should give the representative of the government his three minutes.

Mr. St. Pierre: I would be delighted if the hon. member would answer this question, but I am sure he would not care to do so. Have you asked the Members of Parliament concerned whether or not these statements are correct?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the parliamentary secretary that he has only three minutes, and he has already used up two minutes of his time. He has about 50 seconds left.

Mr. St. Pierre: The position of the Canadian government is very clear. The position represented in the South African newspaper is entirely contrary to this government's policy. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) has on many occasions reaffirmed this government's and the Canadian people's abhorrence of South Africa's apartheid policy. The South African government is well aware of our views with regard to racial discrimination in any form. I should like to quote the following remark made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on November 3:

> The sooner apartheid ends in South Africa the better the world will be.

INDIAN AFFAIRS—FUTURE OF MOHAWK INSTITUTE

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to address the House on a very important matter concerning the constituency of Brant which I have the honour to represent. The area along the banks of the Grand River has always been synonymous with Indian history and tradition since the eighteenth century when Joseph Brant and the Iroquois loyalists came from New York state to settle the region. Over the years the Iroquois have established for themselves one of the most progressive reserves in Canada, although there is still a great deal to be done in the area of economic development.

One very important area that still needs greater development is in the sphere of Indian culture. If the native people of this country are to maintain their great cultural legacy to pass on to future generations, I would like to suggest that the federal government should in every way possible provide sufficient funds for their needs.

In the report of June 30, 1971, the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, of which I am now a member, recommended that the federal government promote the development of Indian culture. I quote briefly from that report as follows:

• (10:10 p.m.)

> That all curriculums within the federal program be revised to include:
>
> (a) substantially more Indian history, including Indian contributions to the economy, science, medicine, agriculture, explorations, etc.
> (b) special courses in Indian culture, music, art handicrafts, etc., and that pressure be brought upon the respective provincial systems to inaugurate similar reforms wherever Indian children are being taught.

The report continues:

> The committee is convinced that the stimulation of pride in one's culture and background is an essential ingredient of the reform which is required in our schools.

The report went on to outline the determination to promote native language instruction, pre-school instruction, vocational training in native crafts, as well as the setting up of additional teacher training and teacher assistant training programs.

In the city of Brantford there is located the Mohawk Institute, formerly an Indian residential school. In its time it served its purpose, but today the trend is away from such institutions and the institute was closed well over a year ago. For the past year the Six Nations band council has been negotiating with the federal government for possession of the premises for the purpose of establishing a cultural and educational centre. It is also anticipated that part of the premises will be used as headquarters for the Association of Iroquois and Allied Indians.

Earlier this month the Six Nations band council won their battle for possession of the building. The Six Nations band council has obtained $25,000 toward the cost of operating the institute. Some $5,000 of this was contributed by the Association of Iroquois and Allied Indians; $10,000 came from the Indian affairs local office and another $10,000 came from the Indian Department headquarters. A spokesman on the reserve has said that this sum of money would likely carry the institute through until the new fiscal year which begins April 1, 1972.

In view of the fact that it is costing $60,000 a year just to maintain it as a vacant building, and that it costs approximately $250,000 a year to operate the institute as a residential school, it is quite obvious that a great deal more money will be needed for the many objectives which the Indians in my riding are seeking to achieve.

I now come to a very important point in my support of the establishment of an Indian cultural and educational complex within the old Mohawk Institute. Last Sunday evening on a national television program, Harold Cardinal, president of the Indian Association of Alberta, produced a document which he alleged was a copy of a confidential cabinet statement, part of which I will now quote:

(c) The departments of the Secretary of State and of Indian Affairs and Northern Development be authorized to establish jointly a five-year renewable financing program for the support of native cultural and educational centres. This program should provide up to two million dollars in the fiscal year 1970-71, one million of which must be provided to the Secretary of State in supplementary estimates. In each of the subsequent four years, up to ten million dollars would be included for the program in financial estimates.

For the purpose of my address this evening I am not concerned about the alleged leakage of this document. If section (c) which I have just quoted is correct and authentic, then I congratulate the cabinet, and in particular the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien), for providing this money for the purpose of the promotion, development and maintenance of centres for Indian cultural and educational activities.

What I would particularly like to emphasize are the obvious advantages of establishing such a centre in the old Mohawk Institute in Brantford. To begin with, the Indian people already have the building. The building is in good shape. It has historical ties in the community. The Six Nations band council now has possession of the building. Some funds have already been granted.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the government to act as soon as possible to accede to the request made by the Indians of the Six Nations reserve to establish the Mohawk Institute as an Indian cultural and educational centre. I do not wish to sound patronizing or emotional, but we do owe a great deal to the native peoples of our country. When the first white settlers arrived, the Indian gave to them his best skills, without which they could not have survived. Our forefathers, to a substantial degree, gave the native North American their worst characteristics and qualities. I submit to you that the day is long overdue for us to rectify this situation.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote from a document entitled "Statement of the government of Canada on Indian policy, 1969"—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize, but I must interrupt the hon. member. Perhaps the quotation might be used in a subsequent representation by the hon. member. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister (Mr. Danson).

Mr. Barnett J. Danson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I hope that if I cannot have equal time I can at least have equivalent overtime so that I can read the statement prepared in response to the statement prepared by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn) who made a very touching appeal and, I think, a very genuine one.

The Mohawk Institute was Canada's oldest Indian residential school, organized in 1831. For many years it was operated under the able direction of the Anglican Church of Canada. In more recent times, operation of the Mohawk Institute was the direct responsibility of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, with the continuation of a co-operative relationship with the Anglican church.

The Mohawk Institute ceased to be used as a residence or day school in June, 1970. Other arrangements had been made for the education of children from the Six Nations reserve. At that time the Six Nations band council was asked to consider alternate uses of the buildings and property of the Mohawk Institute in order to be of maximum benefit to the residents of the reserve. The band council referred this question to its lands committee.

An officer of the department of land, and a band member of the Six Nations reserve, was loaned to the lands committee to carry out some preliminary studies. I am told that Mr. Hill's studies led to an interim report which was presented to the band council in late July. This preliminary report indicated a plan of possible involvement, along with the band, of educational and cultural agencies of the province of Ontario, and similar federal government agencies. The minister has been informed that Mr. Hill's report was taken under advisement by the Six Nations band council and its lands committee.

In October of this year the minister was approached by the Six Nations band council requesting that the council should immediately take over buildings and property of the Mohawk Institute and that the department should assist further in developing a detailed and final plan for the use of the facility. At the minister's direction, the property was made available to the band, along with funds for maintenance until the end of this fiscal year. Also, a teacher from the minister's staff on the Six Nations reserve was loaned to the band to administer the property and to finalize planning for the use of the site.

The minister expects to receive a copy of the final plan for the use of the Mohawk Institute property, after the Six Nations band council has considered and approved the plans. Hopefully, this will occur before the end of this fiscal year. In the interim, the band may decide to use the buildings occasionally for certain programs and events.

While saying that the Mohawk Institute was Canada's oldest Indian residential school, I do not wish to imply that the buildings and property are less than valuable. The main building—built in 1904—containing residence facilities and some classrooms is a sound, brick building which has been extremely well maintained. As well, there is a much more modern classroom complex which was built quite recently. There are several other buildings such as garages, barns, etc. The total land involved is approximately ten acres which are immediately adjacent to the boundary of the city of Brantford, which I am sure the hon. member knows. As such it has significant value as a property for sale, leasing or commercial development. I hope this answers the hon. member's question.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10:21 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

INDUSTRY

CANADA-U.S. AUTO PACT—ONTARIO PARTICIPATION IN NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON DISCUSSIONS

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): I should like to address a question to the Acting Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Because of the tremendous importance of the automobile industry to the economy and job opportunities, especially in Ontario, and because Premier Davis has indicated that his government would strenuously oppose any negotiated changes in the pact that would or could result in loss of Canadian employment, will the Acting Prime Minister assure the House that representatives of the Ontario government will be invited to participate in these negotiations?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. I cannot, of course, give that undertaking but we would be very happy to have representations from the Ontario government at any time.

Mr. Danforth: Because of the public concern about this very serious problem, will the government not consider an early statement to the House dealing specifically with the manner in which these negotiations will be carried on as far as the provinces are concerned, whether or not there is now a relationship between the negotiations and the removal of the American surcharge against Canadian imports, and dealing specifically with the areas in the auto pact on which the United States seeks renegotiation?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I think I have made it plain on a number of occasions that the Canadian government is not negotiating the removal of the surcharge. The surcharge was imposed unilaterally by the United States. We are prepared to co-operate with the United States in dealing with common problems, but I can assure the hon. member that the auto pact is not a means of negotiation to get rid of the surcharge. The decision about the surcharge is one to be made by the United States in light of their whole balance of payments problem.

CANADA-U.S. AUTO PACT—STAGE OF DISCUSSIONS—ANNOUNCEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, is the Acting Prime Minister in a position to inform the House at what stage the negotiations are now on the auto pact, forgetting the surcharge question? The auto pact discussions have been going on for some time. Can the Acting Prime Minister advise when the government will be in a position to announce its position on the auto pact?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): We have had a number of discussions recently with the United States at the official level, Mr. Speaker. There has not been an occasion recently for ministers to meet on the question, but it has been discussed at some length and in some depth by officials of the two governments. I cannot say when the question will be settled.

Mr. Broadbent: In view of the fact that Canada has had a net deficit in balance of trade figures in the automotive industry of approximately $1,716.4 million during the auto pact years that is, from 1965 to 1971, would the Acting Prime Minister take steps to correct the profoundly erroneous impression left by the CBC National News last night at eleven o'clock when the auto pact was described as being "heavily weighted in Canada's favour"?

• (11:10 a.m.)

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, if it helps at all to say things in this House that become known in the United States, I thank the hon. gentleman for his comment which will help to correct that impression and I should like to endorse it.

ENERGY

RECONSIDERATION BY NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD OF REFUSAL OF NATURAL GAS EXPORT APPLICATIONS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Since trade negotiations are going on or should be going on with the United States, can he assure the House now that the decision made in reference to the export of natural gas, which forms part of the trade discussions or should be part of the trade discussions with the United States, was not brought about with any idea of retaliation? If not, will the government ask the National Energy Board to review its decision?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman knows—I think he was in the House when the relevant legislation was approved—the government cannot interfere in the discussions that go on or in the decisions made by the National Energy Board. If the National Energy Board had approved the export of gas, the Canadian government would then have been asked whether it approved. However, when the National Energy Board decides that there is not sufficient gas to permit export to the United States, that is a final decision of the National Energy Board.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, may I follow that up. I am not asking the cabinet to veto the decision. That is a question of law. What I am asking involves a simple question of fact and not a question of law. Will the government ask the board to review its decision? There is nothing in the legislation to prevent the government saying to the National Energy Board, will you review your decision, will you review the evidence and see if you cannot go farther inasmuch as the United States has approached the U.S.S.R. and may take from that country part of its natural gas and crude petroleum requirements, thus cutting Canada off? It is important.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, it is not the intention of the Canadian government to ask the National Energy Board to review its decision. That would seem to us to be a kind of interference with what Parliament intended should be a purely objective finding.

Mr. Baldwin: Come now. Don't be so coy.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member for Hamilton West a supplementary?

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, it is not a supplementary to the question just asked.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If it is not a supplementary to that question, perhaps the hon. member will allow the Chair to recognize the hon. member for York South and then return to the hon. member for Hamilton West.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—NUMBER OF JOBLESS EXPECTED BECAUSE OF U.S. IMPORT SURTAX—RESULTS OF NEW SURVEY

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, in view of the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce who would have been here if he were not out of the country, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister a question arising out of a report that the number of jobless expected as a result of the American surtax is much lower than the number indicated by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce when the $80 million assistance legislation was introduced. Has a new survey been made and what is the result of that survey with regard to the extent of the impact of the American surtax on Canadian manufacturing?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the Acting Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce will be prepared to answer that question.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Acting Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have been informed that a working paper was prepared which reviewed the figures from the point of view of the effects of the surtax on Canadian employment and that this working paper indicated that the effect might be considerably smaller than the first figures had indicated. That is all I can say at this time. This question is under continuing review on the part of the government.

[Mr. Sharp.]

Mr. Baldwin: On what date will the information be leaked?

Mr. Lewis: Obviously the first figures cited by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce in September—I do not recall the exact date—were exaggerated figures suggested by the companies involved. May I ask the acting minister what the figure is in the latest working paper as to the effect of the surtax and whether the figure of 44,000 is correct? May I also ask the acting minister whether or not the $80 million has already been committed to various companies in this country?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, on the first point, I believe that the figure of 44,000 is close, although not precise. With respect to the commitment of the $80 million, as of November 25 there were approximately 250 applications received of which 60 had been approved. The total grants with respect to the applications received were in the order of $8 million of which $1,285,000 has been approved. The total number of persons involved in these applications is 10,000 with respect to those received, and 3,700 with respect to those approved.

Mr. Lewis: In view of the figure just given by the minister that only some 3,000 are involved in the grants approved and only about 10,000 in the applications, where does the $80 million come in and what about the remainder of the 44,000-odd employees who are supposed to be affected by the surtax? Where exactly are we in the program?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will appreciate that applications are being received every day. We are hopeful, as I am sure the hon. member is, that it will not be necessary to commit the whole $80 million. The $80 million is a standby, if needed. We hope it will not all be needed.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe the hon. member for Hamilton West wanted to ask a related question a moment ago.

INDUSTRY

AUTO PARTS MANUFACTURERS' REQUEST FOR SPECIAL TOOLING ASSISTANCE GRANTS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Has the government considered the request of the Auto Parts Manufacturer's Association that the government provide special tooling assistance grants to help meet this industry's present difficulties and, if so, when will a statement be made in this regard?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have heard the hon. member's representations and I will take them into account.

TRANSPORT

SHORTAGE OF BOXCARS FOR MOVEMENT OF GRAIN—REPAIRING OF UNSERVICEABLE CARS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): My question is directed to the Minister of Transport. It concerns the chronic and critical situation respecting boxcars, particularly on the prairies where there are insufficient boxcars to meet the needs for export of wheat and, indeed, lumber industries are also finding that they cannot ship the products they have available. I know the minister has no authority over the CPR, but will he call together both railway companies in order to see what can be done in this connection? At the same time, I ask the minister about the closure of the CNR car repair shops at Winnipeg and Pointe St. Charles recently. All over western Canada there are cars stored in various yards in a state of disrepair and non-repair and therefore unuseable. The situation is of such serious importance that I ask the minister to give immediate attention to doing something to jack up these railway companies to the realization that action is necessary.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure whether that was a question, a series of questions or an address, but the minister might reply to the question asked by the right hon. member.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They are all part and parcel of the same thing.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I compliment the right hon. member on his fine speech.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: I suspect he is not aware that as a result of his earlier representations some 18 Members of Parliament chose yesterday to meet with spokesmen for the two railways here in Ottawa. I arranged that meeting in Ottawa on the very subject he has raised. Last night I met with the president of Canadian National Railways and received from him a new paper, which I have not yet had a chance to read, about what they are proposing to do with regard to the grain situation. His judgment was that there has been an improvement this year compared with previous years and they are hopeful this improvement will continue.

• (11:20 a.m.)

Mr. Diefenbaker: I suggest the minister go out west to the various yards in smaller towns away from the main yards and see for himself the number of cars piled up there. With regard to this report of the CNR, has that been leaked yet?

DEVELOPMENT OF NEW SYSTEMS APPROACH FOR MOVEMENT OF GRAIN

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Would the minister also take into account the statement made by a vice-president of one of the major railways at a meeting of Wheat Pool delegates in Saskatchewan that it is essential to develop a new systems approach if we are to move the volume of grain which it appears we shall be called upon to move in the future?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. If the hon. member is supporting that idea, I do as well. I believe a new systems approach is necessary, but I think the hon. member will also agree that the block system, which is itself something of a new approach, has already improved the situation to some degree.

IMMIGRATION

ALLEGED ILLICIT TRAFFIC IN ALIENS ENTERING UNITED STATES THROUGH CANADA

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. Is the government aware that Canada is being used as a depot or staging point in connection with large-scale illicit traffic in smuggling aliens into the United States through Canada, and is any action being taken in this regard?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I cannot accept the statement made by the hon. member but I will make inquiries to find out whether there is any substance whatever to his charge.

Mr. Baldwin: Since there seems to be some problem within the cabinet at the highest level about bringing in amendments to the Immigration Act, will the government make a statement on motions at the first opportunity indicating its position in this regard, and will it also take the initiative in referring this whole matter to the appropriate standing committee so it can investigate it and make a report to the House and to the government?

Mr. Sharp: As I say, I cannot accept the initial statement made by the hon. member, but I will make inquiries to see whether there is any substance whatever to the charge.

SUGGESTED RAPID PASSAGE OF NATIONAL MARKETING LEGISLATION

Mr. Murray McBride (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question concerns a subject of urgency to the agricultural industry. I address it to the Minister of Agriculture or, in his absence, to the parliamentary secretary. Having regard to the almost unanimous request by the provinces, including the Minister of Agriculture for Alberta, Mr. Horner, for the rapid passage of national agricultural marketing legislation, will the minister now recommend that Bill C-176 be called for swift passage through this House?

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for having asked that question. I can assure him that the Minister of Agriculture took note of the representations of the provincial ministers of agriculture.

When the opportunity arises—and we hope it will be soon—we can discuss this bill which we trust will be passed quickly.

[English]

Mr. McIntosh: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member who asked that last question misinformed the House and the people of Canada in the preamble to his question. The national marketing board proposal was only accepted by the ministers of the prairie provinces with respect to chickens.

AIR CANADA

DIFFICULTY IN MAKING RESERVATIONS BY TELEPHONE

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): In view of the statement in Air Canada's manual to the effect that the aim of customer service is to provide the highest possible standard of service at any time and in all conditions, will the Minister of Transport tell us whether he is prepared to explain to the House why telephone calls to Air Canada requesting reservations are invariably answered by a recording indicating that all reservation lines are busy?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will appreciate that this kind of question should normally be asked in some other way. I would not think that in those terms the question is in order. If the hon. member thinks he can rephrase it or put it in another way, he will be allowed a supplementary.

Mr. Skoberg: I will rephrase the question, Mr. Speaker. Will the Minister of Transport initiate an investigation into why it is that all Air Canada reservation lines to Montreal are invariably answered by a busy signal?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): My first answer, Mr. Speaker, is that I regret this inconvenience to Air Canada customers. Second, I am delighted that so many people are recognizing that this is the way to fly. I will be glad to look into the matter for the hon. member.

Mr. E. B. Osler (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Transport why it is easier to get information about Air Canada movements by using the members' line to Winnipeg and asking the Winnipeg office than by using the office in Ottawa?

FISHERIES

EXTENSION BY MASSACHUSETTS OF FISH PROTECTION BOUNDARY 200 MILES SEAWARD—SIMILAR ACTION BY CANADA

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Has the minister examined the bill passed by the Massachusetts legislature on November 8 which extends the boundary of that state for purposes of fisheries and environmental protection to a point 200 miles offshore, and is the minister prepared to advocate similar action on the part of Canada since this seems to indicate a change of attitude on the part of the United States?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): I have made inquiries, Mr. Speaker, but I have not yet seen this legislation. It would seem to me to be ridiculous. There could be no possible parallel in Canada. If the hon. member is suggesting that Newfoundland alone declare a 200-mile limit, then I think he should talk to the government of that province.

Mr. McGrath: In view of the abysmal ignorance of the Minister of Fisheries and the Secretary of State for External Affairs because of not having seen the bill, I am going to send a copy to them for their education and edification.

AGREEMENT BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND 14 ICNAF NATIONS IMPOSING QUOTA ON YELLOWTAIL FLOUNDER—CANADIAN ACTION RESPECTING CONTINENTAL SHELF

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, has the Minister of Fisheries been apprised of the recent agreement between the United States and the 14 nations of ICNAF in zone 5, the southern zone of the northwest Atlantic fisheries, to impose quotas on certain species of fish, especially yellowtail flounder, and are similar moves being planned by Canada to curtail the present overfishing of that species on our own continental shelf?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, since Canada has taken the initiative with respect to the establishment of quotas I think we can take some credit for that agreement as well.

Mr. Lundrigan: Has the minister's office been informed of the presence of 40 to 50 Russian and Polish trawlers on the Grand Banks which are overfishing this particular species to the extent that Canadian fishing vessels have had to leave the area, and what action is the minister taking?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, we are kept aware daily of the presence of foreign fishing fleets off our shores. As to whether these fleets are overfishing a particular species in a particular area, I would have to make further inquiries.

Mr. McGrath: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for St. John's East on a final supplementary but we will move on to the next question immediately thereafter.

SUGGESTED TALKS WITH OTHER COUNTRIES TO DETERMINE REACTION TO POSSIBLE CANADIAN EXTENSION OF JURISDICTION TO COVER CONTINENTAL SHELF

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr, Speaker, I address my supplementary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in view of the importance of this matter to Canada, and to the Atlantic provinces in particular, is the minister prepared to initiate bilateral talks with countries fishing on our continental shelf with a view to determining their attitude toward any action we may take to extend our fishing jurisdiction to cover our continental shelf?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this is a very hypothetical question. As the hon. member knows, we have probably been more active than any other country, as well as more successful, in dealing in a practical way with the problems both of the territorial seas and the fisheries, and I give all credit to my colleague the Minister of Fisheries—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I give notice that I shall discuss this matter at ten o'clock.

PENSIONS

LOWERING OF AGE FOR ESCALATION OF PENSIONS OF RETIRED ARMED FORCES AND RCMP PERSONNEL

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is of concern to three ministers, the Minister of National Defence, the Solicitor General in his capacity as the minister responsible for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and the President of the Treasury Board, but I shall direct it to the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the commitment made some time ago that something would be done about the matter, can the President of the Treasury Board say what progress is being made in making the necessary arrangements so that retired members of the armed forces and RCMP personnel will get their pensions escalated without having to wait until age 60?

• (11:30 a.m.)

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I cannot report any positive conclusions as yet. I think the hon. gentleman well appreciates that the scale of benefits and timing of both the police and national defence pensions are based on a rather different career concept than those for the ordinary public servants, and the application of all the rules which are appropriate to public service superannuation do not equally apply to the armed forces. This is the reconciliation we are trying to work out now.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, would the minister like to speak further on this matter some night next week at ten o'clock?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

UNITED STATES HYDROFOIL PROJECT—RELATIONSHIP TO MOTHBALLING OF "BRAS D'OR" AND PRODUCTION-SHARING NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. It arises from reports that when the basic defence production-sharing agreements with the United States were signed in June of 1963 there was a private agreement that a balance would be maintained over the long haul. My question flows from that and has to do with the award to Boeing recently by the United States government of a contract for $5.6 million for the development of a hydrofoil for use by the U.S. navy and other NATO forces. Will the minister explain to the House whether there is any connection between this and the fact that we have now mothballed our own hydrofoil, the Bras d'Or, and whether it had anything to do with current negotiations in respect of defence production-sharing arrangements?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I can say that it has nothing to do with the defence production-sharing agreement. No doubt the fact that the United States wanted to proceed with the development of a hydrofoil with retractable foils may have motivated them in not wishing to participate in the development of our hydrofoil, but this, of course, was a decision taken by them. I do not think there is a direct connection here in so far as the defence production-sharing agreement is concerned.

Mr. Forrestall: So that the record will be clear on this matter, is the minister aware or can he confirm that when the initial agreement was signed in June of 1963 there was appended to it a further document in which Canada agreed to keep a balance over the total period?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the hon. member that, as I pointed out in the House last week, the administration of this agreement and, indeed, its negotiation are not the responsibility of the Minister of National Defence. I will, however, draw the hon. member's question to the attention of my colleague who might like to advise the House on this point.

[Later:]

CANADA-U.S. PRODUCTION-SHARING—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF ANCILLARY AGREEMENT ON MAINTENANCE OF BALANCE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question arises out of the question of the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East. Will the minister table in the House the ancillary agreement in connection with joint defence expenditures which was made on June 7, 1963? It has never been tabled. It has been spoken of on a number of occasions, and it would be very helpful if it could be tabled now.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the right hon. gentleman, as I pointed out to the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East, that the administration of this agreement is not within the administrative responsibility of the Minister of National Defence. I will, however, bring the suggestion to the attention of my colleague who is responsible for this.

Inquiries of the Ministry

AIRPORTS

TORONTO—SELECTION OF NEW SITE

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether he is in a position to give any information to the House as to what, if anything, is happening regarding the new airport location for the metropolitan Toronto area?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Not a great deal more than when I answered a question a few days ago, Mr. Speaker. Proposals have been made to the province of Ontario. The last word I had from them was about two days ago, indicating that they needed a week or ten days to complete their review of them. I am ready to meet them whenever they so indicate.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask whether any target date has been set within the department for making an announcement on this important subject in order that both levels of government can work toward meeting that deadline?

Mr. Woolliams: It will leak out, don't worry.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I cannot give a date because it would be my hope the decision would be one made jointly by the province and ourselves. That is our intention, and everything will depend on just how quickly our negotiations with them can be completed.

POST OFFICE

INTEGRATION OF URBAN TRANSPORTATION SERVICES—COMPENSATION TO CONTRACTORS FOR LOSS OF REVENUE

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General, and I might say I leaked this question to him just before 11 o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bell: Further to the plan to integrate urban transportation services, and further to the assurances that have been given that there will be compensation for the salaries of employees and for equipment, would the government also consider extras for dislocations that the contractors personally might suffer in view of the three-year term of the contracts they are going to lose?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the only information I can leak now is that I do not know if there will be compensation, although assurance was given in respect to the purchase of their trucks and their equipment. Some of them will even be asked to be integrated into the Post Office Department. In addition they have the assurance that we have to give them at least three months' notice before cancellation of the contract. If the hon. member is talking about other compensation on top of that because of the loss of business that might have been had over the years, I do not know what the final criteria will be.

NEGOTIATIONS WITH LETTER CARRIERS UNION ON HIRING OF CASUALS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, may I say by way of preface that we are pleased to see that the Postmaster General has agreed to meet with the letter carriers union to negotiate—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should ask his question. I must bring to the attention of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris and others that there are less than ten minutes left before the end of the question period.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, my comments were related to the question I am going to ask.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has been here long enough to know that he should not make comments before asking a question. The hon. member should ask his question.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, may I put it in these terms. Now that the Postmaster General has agreed to meet with the letter carriers union to negotiate an agreement on the casual hiring issue pending an appeal to the Public Service Staff Relations Board, will he inform the House when this very important meeting will take place?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, that very important meeting has taken place. I received a letter from the president of the letter carriers union at 12 o'clock noon yesterday and we met at two o'clock in my office. The decision we took at that time was that we would have further meetings between officials of my department and officials of the union all next week.

SCIENCE

PROPOSED INSTITUTE TO STUDY PROBLEMS OF POPULATION GROWTH—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Science and Technology. In light of his statement at the time of his appointment last August that one of his first tasks would be to examine the recommendation of the Science Council for the creation of an institute to study the problems of population growth, is he prepared to give an early report on the results of his examination?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I am sure hon. members will appreciate that on occasion one is misquoted. I was answering a question at that time as to the relationship of the Science Council to the ministry and the recommendation in their report on population control on a world-wide basis. I indicated that that and other recommendations of the Science Council would be taken under study by my ministry.

Mrs. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, can the minister give us an indication of the gestation period required for the birth of this forthcoming report?

FISHERIES

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON STUDIES AND RECOMMENDATIONS FOR PRESERVATION OF HERRING

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the serious decline in herring resources off the Atlantic coast of Canada, will the minister make a report to the House at an early date on the results obtained through his departmental studies of this matter along with any recommendations which may be made for the preservation and retention of this important species at the national as well as the international level?

• (11:40 a.m.)

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, this matter has been receiving serious study for several years. We are not absolutely sure of the size of our herring resource. Nor have we been convinced there has been a serious decline in the resource. Still our department moved, two years ago, to limit the tonnage of our herring fishing fleet and, more recently, to limit the capacity of new plants being built to process herring.

Mr. Crouse: Since there are a large number of herring seiners presently tied up in Atlantic Canada, which indicates there are no herring to be caught, is the minister giving any consideration to limiting the processing of the fish caught to processing only for human food inasmuch as continuation of processing for fishmeal may decimate the stocks still further?

Mr. Davis: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The policy has been to shift as much as possible of the catch to herring for food purposes since this produces the highest income for fishermen. I must also point out that, while some vessels are being tied up as the hon. member suggests, we are in our second highest producing year in history.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I suggest to hon. members that we should try in the last four minutes of the question period to have shorter questions, shorter answers and fewer supplementaries. The hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys.

POST OFFICE

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON SALARY INCREASE FOR POSTMASTERS

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the hon. and gentlemanly Postmaster General. Some weeks ago I raised the question of the existing anomaly whereby assistant postmasters in staff post offices were receiving a higher salary than the postmasters who have the major responsibility. At that time the hon. gentleman stated that a new contract was being negotiated and he felt that a settlement was imminent. I wonder whether the hon. gentleman can give us either a progress report or a final report on this very important subject?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I have yet to receive a final report on the matter, but I shall try to give an answer in this regard as early as possible next week.

AIRPORTS

TORONTO—STUDY OF POSSIBLE WATERFRONT FACILITY

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister tell the House to what extent the federal government is participating in studies of the need for a waterfront airport in Toronto, and is a particular study being made of the problems of servicing such an airport?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we have no current plans—I have made this statement in the House on several previous occasions—for a waterfront airport in Toronto. This is not included in any of the planning we have at the present time. I made this statement a year or more ago and have repeated it several times since.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SUGGESTED DISCUSSION WITH PROVINCES OF PROGRAM TO PROVIDE TREATMENT AND DIAGNOSTIC CENTRES FOR YOUNG OFFENDERS

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. In view of the intention of the government not to proceed with Bill C-192, the Young Offenders Act, at this session, and as one of the major criticisms is that there is a lack of diagnostic and treatment centres across the country, will the Solicitor General meet with his counterparts in the provinces to develop a program to solve the shortage of treatment and diagnostic centres?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the standing committee considered the whole matter and I should prefer straight off that hon. members agree on a report so that I can make the improvements to the bill which, as I said, we are prepared to improve.

QUEBEC CABLEVISION LEGISLATION—FEDERAL GOVERNMENT POLICY RESPECTING GRANTING OF LICENCES

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the continuing reports from Quebec that the province intends to grant broadcasting licences, I wonder whether the Acting Prime Minister can tell us if it is still the policy of the federal government that the CRTC is the sole agency to grant broadcasting licences in Canada?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. That is right.

TRANSPORT

SNOWMOBILE DEFICIENCIES—INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION—CONSULTATION WITH MANUFACTURERS TO EFFECT IMPROVEMENTS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the MInister of Transport. With reference to the recent report of the Canadian Safety Council that there has been a 26.9 per cent increase in the number of deaths through the use of snowmobiles and in view of the minister's own report of November 19 suggesting that there should be legislation enacted in respect of the noise level, lighting, shielding of moving parts, brake lights and so on, I wonder whether the minister has moved forward to provide legislation in this area and whether or not there has been any consultation with the various snowmobile producers in order to effect some of these changes in this year's models?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): There are several parts to that question, Mr. Speaker. There is no need for additional legislation. What is now on the books gives the authority to make further regulations. We propose to do this in the areas the hon. member has mentioned. There is ongoing consultation with the manufacturers. In fact, the report I tabled had to do with last year's models and some of the improvements we suggested have been implemented in this year's models.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Egmont might be allowed to ask a supplementary and then I will recognize the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Could the minister give an indication to the House in the next few days concerning the kind of regulations that will be brought forward as well as agreements on the part of the manufacturers in respect of model changes necessary for this year?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, I would be glad to do that. I already have in fact, and the report itself suggests the areas where regulations would be desirable.

AIR TRANSPORT

USE BY ROYAL AIR FORCE OF UNITED STATES FACILITIES AT GOOSE BAY BECAUSE OF DETERIORATION OF DEPARTMENT RAMPS AND HANGARS

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport while he is already warmed up. Is the minister prepared now to reply to my question of November 4 with regard to the transfer of Royal Air Force maintenance activities to the United States Air Force base at Goose Bay?

[Mr. Nowlan.]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have an answer and indeed I apologize to the hon. member for not having given it before. The reason for the transfer is purely and simply the deterioration in the condition of the ramp used previously by the RAF. This is being repaired. When these repairs are completed matters will revert to what they were before. They will go back to using the ramp in the normal fashion. I believe it is anticipated that the repairs will take something like six months.

PUBLIC SERVICE

DISPLAYING OF POLITICAL POSTERS BY EMPLOYEES AT HOME OR ON PERSONAL PROPERTY

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Is the government contemplating any changes to the Public Service Employment Act which would make clear that a public servant is not contravening the act when he displays a political poster at his own home or on his own personal property. I ask this question in view of an answer to a question which I received earlier this week.

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, this is obviously a question which cannot be answered in one word. I would be glad if the hon. gentleman would give me some of the circumstances.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

NORTHEASTERN ALBERTA—ACTION BY MINISTER TO SOLVE SCHOOL DISPUTE—DISCUSSION OF LONG-RANGE EDUCATIONAL PROGRAM

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. As a result of the discussions which are taking place with the Indian Association of Alberta and representatives of the Cold Lake Band and the evidence being presented before the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, can the minister indicate to the House whether he now intends to take any initiatives toward satisfactorily resolving the school crisis in northeastern Alberta?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, my position has always been the same, and the children must return to school before I consider changing it. As to discussion of the action to follow, I am prepared to consider any representations submitted.

[English]

Mr. Mazankowski: A supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have gone beyond the question period. Perhaps the hon. member might be allowed a supplementary. I understand the hon. member for Ontario is exercised by the fact that he has not had a supplementary. I will first recognize the hon. member for Vegreville.

Mr. Mazankowski: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, for your indulgence. I should like to ask the minister one more supplementary question. Is he disposed to undertake discussions with the Indian people of northeastern Alberta on a long-term educational program, in a consultative way, in order that they may have a say in the self-determination of their educational rights?

• (11:50 a.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am willing to start discussions with the Indians of northern Alberta as soon as the children return to school.

I have already discussed this matter with the chief of Keeheewin and I am to confer Tuesday with the chief of Saddle Lake about the future policy. As far as Cold Lake is concerned, we require, before any settlement is considered, that the children first return to school.

INDUSTRY

GALVANIZED SHEET STEEL PRICE INCREASE BY DOFASCO AND STELCO—SUGGESTED ACTION TO ACHIEVE ROLLBACK

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I am exercised, but a little exercise will not do any harm, considering my weight.

I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and in his absence would like to direct it to the acting minister. In light of Dofasco's and Stelco's announcement of a 4½per cent to 5½per cent price increase on galvanized sheet steel to take effect this Sunday at midnight, and with a view to preventing damage to Canadian firms which are trying to export manufactured goods to the United States, would the minister investigate the possibility of a voluntary rollback in these price increases by Dofasco and Stelco?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Acting Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we are all impressed by the energy of the hon. member for Ontario. He has galvanized the House on more than one occasion.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillespie: I think I should point out that ours is a market economy and that these sort of relationships are normally those which are determined between suppliers and customers. However, having said that, I will undertake to make inquiries and see if there are any implications for Canada's export trade.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must point out that I was under the impression that the hon. member for Ontario was rising for the purpose of asking a supplementary question. A number of other members were seeking the floor who were not recognized because they had already had an opportunity to ask one question, and I was trying to give an opportunity to as many members as possible to ask questions. As a result I think an injustice has been done to some members but I will try to make up for that when we meet on Monday. Orders of the day.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Bellechasse on a point of order.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, while I respect the authority and competence of the Chair, I regret that no member of our party has had any opportunity to put one single question today. This makes me better understand to what extent certain minorities can sometimes suffer—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that when I looked in that corner of the House, none of his colleagues tried to put a question. If, during the next question period, either the hon. member or any of his colleagues have questions they wish to ask, I shall recognize them as I always do.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Bellechasse on a question of privilege.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I must mention that I rose several times. I deeply regret that the Chair did not see me. I understand that I sit at the other end of the House but in all justice, I must say that I rose several times.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed, from Tuesday, November 23, consideration in committee of Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act—Mr. Benson—Mr. Honey in the chair.

The Chairman: In accordance with the statement of the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council, as recorded at page 9777 of Hansard for November 22, 1971, the committee will now proceed to consideration of sections 14 to 19 inclusive, 22 to 26 inclusive, 28, 32, 33, 34, 36, 37, 50 to 59 inclusive, 104 to 108 inclusive, 122, 130, 131, 132, 138 to 142 inclusive, and 208 to 211 inclusive, dealing with business and property income. I must bring to the attention of the committee that sections 15, 16, 18, 56, 57 and 58 have already been agreed to. Shall section 14 carry?

On clause 1—section 14: Sale of goodwill and other "nothings".

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, this general heading covers a great number of things. There are some items that may have been discussed, although the schedule that Your Honour has read out does not in any way correspond with the list I had because I have no reference, under business and property income, to sections 55, 56, and what have you. But that matters little, because I agree that section 14 is the one which should be the lead section. This section deals with "nothings" and goodwill. So far as the taxpayer is concerned there are many things in this bill that are nothings. They do not do him any good. And for the rest of it, the goodwill being generated by the bill for the government is almost down to a nothing level.

If I may have the attention of government members, divorced from some of the major conversations that are going on, I would like to make some points in connection with the section. I know that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre likes to make noises while sitting in his seat, showing his lack of knowledge of the bill.

Mr. Osler: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman; some hon. members may have been speaking, but I was one of the few who had not said a word until the subject was mentioned. Then, I said quite loudly, "Say something interesting and we will listen."

The Chairman: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The hon. member's contribution is an indication of his knowledge of what goes on in this House, both with reference to bills and otherwise.

On Wednesday, the Leader of the Opposition made a proposal to the government that certain sections of the bill which were acceptable to the Official Opposition should be proclaimed, and that a number of other sections should stand deferred, not to take effect as law until a day to be fixed by proclamation by the Governor in Council. This proclamation would be subject to an affirmative resolution of the House of Commons. I want to reiterate that proposal because it is absolutely germane to the group of sections we are discussing today, for within this group we have things as diverse as the basic herd, straightline depreciation, co-ops and credit unions, and trusts—whether they are affected by international income, whether they are foreign trusts, or purely domestic trusts. The sections dealing with those matters have been the subject of very great concern and controversy in the country. The government has indicated that it may bring in some future amendments.

There is also a great deal of confusion in the minds of the public, reinforced by the majority of the provinces and reinforced by the professional associations most concerned, the lawyers and the accountants, the chambers of commerce and the manufacturers associations, with regard to proposals concerning corporate taxation. I am not going to go into detail, but those proposals are so complex and their effects are going to be so wide-sweeping that not even the government fully understands their impact. It would be better to take more time to study the proposals and defer the date of their implementation. We know what they are. The government has indicated that it would be prepared to consider these matters and bring in further amendments. But why start people off on the wrong foot when it is fundamentally unsound to do so. I just cannot see that, Mr. Speaker.

[TER ALThe Chairman.]

I am going to put on record what was indicated and why this deferral should take place. The Leader of the Opposition, and I repeat it today, says that sections 6, 8, 20(12), 62, 63, 109, 110 and 117 could be brought in now because we have long advocated tax cuts, as well as other provisions, and these are the ones that apply now. Certainly, I do not think anyone would disagree that there are complexities in the working allowance provision, in the child care expense provision, as there are some rather illogical situations in that field. Then, there is the increase in the basic exemptions to $1,500 and $2,850, as well as all the other details, including the revised rates schedules under section 117. All those matters are within the proposal to the government. I understand that the cabinet is now considering the matter, and I hope by Monday we will have a satisfactory answer.

Why do we say that? First of all, let us look at the preliminary report from the other place, No. 47, as published by the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. This is a very interesting and a very studious document prepared primarily by supporters of the government. I put it to the hon. parliamentary secretary that it is not a document that can be lightly dismissed. I add a word of caution to the government. I understand that the committee in the other place has taken quite a determined stand with regard to a number of these proposals and that, notwithstanding the attitude of the government, amendments are going to be put and carried which conform to the wishes and recommendations of the other place. I can see some difficulties for the progress of this bill if that should be the case. Certainly, it will take more than the extremely short period of time that this government normally allows the other place to consider legislation.

From what I hear there are a number of the government supporters in the other place who are most unhappy with certain provisions in this bill, those dealing with international income, for instance. However, I understand that the government does intend to introduce some amendments to those sections. What are they to be? At one minute before midnight are we going to see those amendments, when the professions and all concerned will not have a chance to examine them? May I commend to hon. members the Senate committee report, because the answers of witnesses certainly clarify a great deal more of this bill than has been clarified in this House where we have a more restricted discussion than if we were in a standing committee and could directly examine the officials from the Department of Finance and the Department of National Revenue involved in the preparation of this bill.

The government has shown a very cavalier attitude with respect to major changes in the Income Tax Act by dismissing or putting aside the views of the provincial governments. After all, the provincial governments have equal jurisdiction with the federal government in the income tax field, both corporate and personal, but one would think that they were in this field on sufferance. There is at the present time merely an agreement as to the sharing proportions and the collectability of income tax. We know there are divergent views. For instance, the province of Quebec says that it collects its own income tax and other provinces are making threatening noises because of the insensitivity of the federal government to their views.

This document was produced by the federal government which only has a 50 per cent interest in the income tax field, yet it insists that this will be the law. As I said, this is a cavalier attitude and not in keeping with the principle of partnership between the provincial administrations and the federal government administration of this country. It is a complete rejection of that. Last week the provinces made their views known and the majority of provinces, both in number and population, told the federal government that Bill C-259 should be deferred. But the Minister of Finance said, no, that it would go into effect on January 1, 1972. What right does he have to say that? Merely because he is the sponsor of the bill? Constitutionally, it is wrong to say that. It is a "take it or leave it" attitude.

Let me refer to paragraph 12 of the communiqué put out following the federal-provincial conference. It refers to a number of matters arising out of Bill C-259. This is the great paragraph showing the laconic way in which the government treats this. It reads:

> The federal and provincial governments expressed their views on the above matters and related aspects. A diversity of views exists.

According to paragraph 13, the federal government explained the need to implement tax reform on January 1, 1972 and to continue certain undertakings as to levels of revenue to the provinces. How good of it to do so, Mr. Chairman. How downright condescending the federal government was to the provinces which, in income tax matters, have as great an interest as the federal government has. The federal government has laid down a number of conditions. It has said that provincial tax statutes must conform to the federal statute. The provincial administrations have told the federal government that they cannot do this in many instances.

Let me single out the province of Ontario, the province with the largest provincial government in the country. Ontario is the source from which by far the greatest proportion of income tax comes. It is the province that harbours by far the greatest number, if not the majority, of corporate organizations in this country. That province says that it cannot alter its corporation tax act in such a way that it will be effective on January 1, 1972 and conform to the federal statute. The net result will be that businesses operating in the province of Ontario must deal with two separate corporate taxation acts. I appeal to hon. members who have a knowledge of business and who are accountants or lawyers to say how they would care to operate a business firm in the province of Ontario in 1972 under two separate corporate taxation acts. The federal government cares a fat lot about that.

It would appear, unless I hear to the contrary, that members on the government side care not a tittle about that; not even those who come from the province of Ontario care. I suppose their attitude will be, "Tough luck." Well, I hope they see every officer of a corporation in the province of Ontario who will be affected by this and explain their attitude on this bill. Let them say why they support it. I see that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister, who is a businessman in Ontario, has just entered the chamber. I should like to see him telling his business associates in Ontario that two corporate tax acts will operate in 1972, if this bill goes through. Whether he likes it or not, his own business interests will be affected. Let him explain if he is prepared to accept that, and why he is prepared to accept that. He was a member of the finance committee when the white paper was being examined. Certainly, there have been changes, and he advocated some changes. They have been introduced into the bill. I give him credit for that. I will ask him, however, just as I would ask others like him, if he is prepared to tell his business associates in the province of Ontario that the federal government has the right to call the tune with regard to the taxation of corporations in Ontario and that the province of Ontario, which has equal jurisdiction, has nothing to say on this subject.

Think of the confusion that will arise in 1972 in the handling of transactions, with the federal government handling them one way and the provincial tax statute saying they must be handled another way. And remember, Mr. Chairman, this is the law. This is not the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act that the government can try to set aside at will. You know, other governments act differently in these matters. This government cannot say that the law of the province of Ontario with regard to corporation taxes can be set aside by the administrative officials of the Department of National Revenue, by the officials or authors of this bill in the Department of Finance or by the government of Canada. This government does not have the right to say that. It is that simple. There has to be accord. That accord is not there.

In my own province, which has an equal right, there is no accord. Yet the federal government says, "Tough luck; we are going ahead. Conform." Is that the way to maintain confederation? I do not think so—unless some people place greater emphasis on certain cultural aspects. If they do, that is their choice. However, from an economic, financial and fiscal standpoint, this sort of attitude does more than almost anything else to alienate people in various sectors of the country. I want to warn hon. members.

The Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member. I do so to advise him and the committee that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Chairman: Does the committee consent unanimously?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, I thank the members of the committee for their courtesy. I hope I can maintain the continuity of my remarks. I want to warn hon. members. If there is a feeling of alienation, it is not limited to the province of Quebec. I do not support that movement, yet it exists in western Canada. Oh, the government should know this, especially if it ever thought that it understood western Canada. That same feeling exists right within the province of Ontario. The Premier of Ontario and several of his ministers last week made strong statements with regard to fiscal and economic matters in Canada. They insisted that there shall be partnership between the Federal government and those of the provinces and that international trade accords shall not be concluded unilaterally with the federal government, that there should be close consultation with the provinces involved.

The auto pact is a case in point. As recently as yesterday Premier Davis said that there should not be any changes in that pact without the full accord of the province of Ontario. The province of Alberta says that there shall be no change in national energy policies affecting the export of oil and gas without prior consultation with, and the agreement of, the province of Alberta among others. The provinces have their interests and surely to goodness the federal government, in the spirit of confederation and in the spirit of partnership that is basic to confederation, must listen. It is for that reason, Mr. Chairman, that I say that most of this bill should stand deferred, except those parts relating to tax cuts.

There is one further point that I want to make on this aspect. I want to read an excerpt from an editorial in a publication that is well known to the hon. member for Outremont. The editorial was taken from the Canadian Chartered Accountant of November, 1971. I think some colleagues on the finance committee are conversant with that publication, which may be considered as the professional bible of that body. The editorial is headed "Taxmanship Brinksmanship".

Paragraph 3 reads:

> If every chartered accountant who has responsibility for giving tax advice, whether in industry or in public practice, were to drop everything and devote the remaining time to an in-depth study of the new legislation and its accompanying regulations, it is still doubtful whether this would be sufficient to provide all taxpayers with pre-implementation advice.

• (12:20 p.m.)

How true that is. Those lawyers who are also concerned with tax matters could be included as well. There are further observations. I wonder how many members of this House availed themselves of an opportunity that was offered a few weeks ago under the sponsorship of the finance committee. A team of experts from the Institute of Chartered Accountants produced a highly informative, and as uncomplicated as possible, audio-visual presentation of the major provisions of Bill C-259 in this very building. At no time did more than a dozen members attend, although every member of this House received prior notice. By arrangement with the government House leader, the sittings of this House were so arranged that those interested in fiscal matters could attend those demonstrations which lasted all day. I now quote the final paragraph of this editorial:

> Without being the slightest bit cynical, we offer as a final suggestion that all Members of Parliament take the CICA Tax Reform Course before they presume to pass the legislation into the law of the land!

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

About 10 or 12 members of this chamber attended that course. I had an exchange with the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre a minute ago. We hear many members who have not even cracked the covers of this book, say "agreed". It could be written in Urdu, Hindustani, or Swahili or in any other language. They would still say "agreed". They do not have the slightest idea of what is in this bill or the implications of it.

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): Oh!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo says that he knows. I suppose he knows that the bill increases the exemption to $1,500 and that sort of thing. Those are the saleable items. Will he tell me how the government proposes to handle trusts, international income, small businesses, minerals, petroleum and natural gas? Will he tell me how the mines in his constituency, as well as other parts of his province, are going to be handled and what they are saying about it? He says "agreed". He dismisses the representations from the mining associations in his province against the provisions of this bill as they affect the major industries in his province. The hon. member is one of those who regularly says "agreed" and wants to pass on to something else. I will come back to section 14 later.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Chairman, the discussion today on business and property income includes quite a number of areas of interest. Some of the areas included in the scope of business and property in the summaries of the legislation which have been published and made available to members have already been dealt with to some extent in this debate. There may be some overlapping of discussion on some of the items that have already been considered by the committee. I would like to deal with a number of points concerning business and property income because those items include a number of very important points that deserve consideration by the committee.

The first point I would like to raise concerns the change that is being proposed which will allow corporations in the future to deduct from their taxable income interest on money borrowed to buy shares in other corporations. This is quite an important point. I am very interested in some of the rationale that has been presented by the government on this point.

I wish to quote from the Summary of 1971 Tax Reform Legislation which was tabled on June 18 along with the other budget papers. It has been referred to by some members, including myself, as the "brown paper". I understand in the accounting world they occasionally refer to it as the "blood paper". I quote what that paper has to say about this particular matter:

> The present tax system does not permit a corporation to deduct interest on money borrowed to buy shares of other corporations because the dividends on these shares are normally tax-exempt. To encourage Canadian ownership and investment, the bill provides a full deduction for interest on money borrowed by a corporation to buy shares in any other corporation. The present system allows a deduction for individual taxpayers and this is retained.
> This deduction for interest provides a substantial incentive for Canadian corporations to invest in other corporations and permits them to compete on an even footing with foreign corporations. Assuming a tax rate of 50 per cent, the cost of borrowing money for share purchases will be cut in half.

I acknowledge there is undoubtely some change vis-à-vis the position of a Canadian corporation compared to a foreign corporation. How the Canadian corporation is covered is another matter. As I understand the situation, this provision will be available to any corporation which is properly set up in Canada, whether that corporation is controlled domestically or by foreign interests of one sort or another.

It is highly ludicrous for the government to suggest that this is going to encourage Canadian ownership and will help to reverse the tide, especially in light of the present situation. Some of the most recently available figures show that today some 63 per cent of Canadian industry is controlled from outside Canada. Because all of these companies are properly incorporated within the law in Canada, those companies controlled by foreign interests are able to take advantage of this new provision. How this is going to secure a great degree of Canadian ownership in our economy is very difficult to see. It really indicates the ludicrous lengths to which the government is willing to go in order to try to justify some of the rather dubious proposals in the white paper.

Another area which is being treated under business and property income in some of the summaries is the matter of entertainment and related expenses. This has been dealt with already in the debate on some of these sections. I only refer to this matter because it is generally considered as coming within the scope of business and property income. Here again, we have an example of the type of discrimination that exists in terms of the way different Canadians are treated in determining their taxation. Entertainment expenses are allowed on a very wide basis. In fact, the government very markedly backed off from the restrictions that were proposed in the white paper in 1969. They have now restored the status quo in many respects, the only added restriction being that there is some limitation with respect to the location at which conventions and so on may be held if expenses are to qualify as deductible. I suppose some companies will not be able to hold conventions in Miami, the Bahamas and other such places in future. The government backed off when it came to allowing expenses for yachts, camps, lodges and golf course facilities. I do not think the minister could have left these things in the legislation within the area of deductible expenses and still presented a credible picture.

But what has been done with respect to employees? Strict ceilings and severe restrictions have been imposed with regard to what an employee may claim as a tax deductible expense. It is a clear case of treating one class of taxpayer in a different manner from another. Once this law is put into effect I believe the people will recognize just how phony are some of the claims the government is making for it.

I turn now for a moment to the question of depreciation on rental buildings. This comes within the area of business and property income. The so-called "red paper" of June 18 states in this regard:

> The legislation provides that in future each rental building costing $50,000 or more will be placed in a separate capital cost allowance class. As each building is sold the taxpayer will bring into income recaptured depreciation or deduct a terminal loss. Under the present system all buildings of a particular construction are pooled and the day of reckoning can be indefinitely postponed by adding new buildings to the pool.

This is a welcome change. Under the present act, some landlords and owners of real estate were getting away with murder. We agree with this change.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The tenants will just pay higher rents.

Mr. Burton: The only drawback is that there will be a tendency on the part of some landlords to recover at least part of the loss of benefits by increasing the rents of those who are occupying these buildings. This is a question which deserves further consideration. We should look for means of ensuring that landlords will not be able to do this.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No federal authority there.

Mr. Burton: I now turn briefly to consider the proposal for changing the accounting system used by professional people. They will now be required to adopt an accrual accounting system rather than report income on a cash basis. This will do away with a good deal of the monkeying with the works that goes on at present, and to this extent we believe the provision is worth supporting. I note that transitional rules are set out for the taxpayers who are being required to switch over from the cash basis to an accrual basis. It is reasonable to do this, and we have no objection.

However, there is no such provision for transitional rules in the case of others who may wish to change over to an accrual accounting system. I have in mind farmers and fishermen who are given an option; they can remain on a cash basis or they can change to an accrual basis. Some hon. members may feel there is no need for transitional rules in these cases, since these people have an option. However, it should be borne in mind that in the light of other proposed changes, fishermen and farmers may in effect be forced to change from one system to the other. It seems to me that this requires further consideration.

As I read section 19 which is before us I note that it appears to deal with the provision by virtue of which some publications, such as Time and Readers' Digest, qualify to be treated differently from other taxpayers. Well, Mr. Chairman, we have made our stand on this matter clear on many occasions and we hope it will be given consideration by the government. Other provisions include the discretionary authority given to the Minister of Finance with respect to such matters as bank reserves—he is allowed to approve or, perhaps, to determine, what reserves shall be required. At the same time, with respect to other institutions such as credit unions, a different situation might arise.

In all, a number of important considerations are involved in this area of the bill. We hope the government will give consideration to making changes in response to some of the points which have been raised. I believe it is in the best interests of the government itself to make some of these changes if they hope to be in a position to present a credible picture to the public whenever this legislation may be passed into law.

Mr. Aiken: I wish to make one comment, Mr. Chairman. I intended to put a question to the hon. member who has just spoken. I have heard one or two members make the assertion which he has just made, namely, that taking professional people off a cash accounting basis and putting them on an accrual basis will do away with some of the monkey work which is going on.

For the life of me I cannot understand where that idea comes from. A cash receipt basis for a professional man or anybody else means that when he receives money he pays tax on it, and if he does not receive money he does not pay tax on it. The new method means that a businessman will estimate during the year what he might receive and then, at the end of the year, estimate what he might not receive. And between the two, somewhere or other, he guesses what his income amounts to. I cannot see how anybody could feel there is any improvement in the system by placing professional people on an accrual basis. To my mind the accrual basis is the one which is full of opportunities for finagling, double entries, write-offs of estimated losses and so on. The accrual basis opens the door wide for a businessman who can afford an accountant to take advantage of all the write-offs and concessions in such a way as to do the government in. On the other hand, the person who pays tax on money he receives is entering into a straightforward and honest arrangement.

I do not see this new system lasting forever. Farmers and others are entitled to retain the cash receipts system. I have yet to hear from the government why it is that it feels anybody will benefit from placing professionals on an accrual basis, which will leave the door open wide to what is an excellent opportunity to chisel the government through the manipulation of such tools as write-offs, estimates of revenue, delaying the submission of accounts and so on. To my mind, the situation would be nonsensical.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Chairman, I should first like to speak, as did the two previous members, about the lack of an option among taxpayers in the professions to choose to use either the cash or the accrual basis. I have had some personal experience of this, and I should like to detail it.

I think the figures given by the hon. member for Regina East must be wrong. When I first started my practice I was advised by my accountant to adopt the accrual basis. He told me it would be a little hard at first but in the long run I would be much better off. I could not agree more with the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka who said that the accrual basis does offer the professional, particularly if he operates his own business, many ways to avoid paying tax in his later years when his earnings are higher. This can be done by not writing off his losses in the early years but writing off very large amounts, as he is able to do, in his later years.

In my profession at the moment this question of adopting either the accrual or cash basis is of no great significance. Under medical plans today payments are usually made within about two months, so it does not matter which system you choose. However, I went into a dentist's office the other day and saw a sign indicating that all work had now to be paid for in cash, that no one was to ask for any credit, and that patients were not to contemplate contracting for more dental work than they could afford to pay for within a week or so. This notice was given because of the new income tax regulations that were to come into force on January 1, under which the dentist would be prohibited from extending credit. The optimistic assumption, of course, was that the bill would be passed by that time.

The important consideration for a professional man, of course, is not how much work he has on his books but how much money he has in his pocket when his work is finished. I think the lack of an option in the change-over from a cash to an accrual basis is a serious mistake. I do not think any of the witnesses for the government who appeared before the committee when it discussed the white paper on taxation made any claim that tax revenue would be increased.

Let me read what the Canadian Dental Association had to say about the accrual in its brief to the finance committee when the white paper on taxation was being considered. As reported at page 43:129 of the committee report for May 14, 1970, they said:

> In the White Paper the Government proposes that dentists be required to report their income on the accrual basis of accounting rather than the cash basis which is now permitted and that receivables and work in process at implementation date be brought into income in accordance with a specified formula. The government believes that the tax postponement permitted by (the cash basis of accounting) has given professionals an unwarranted advantage by comparison to the rest of Canadians.

I think the assumption of the government that the professionals had an unwarranted advantage may have caused them to over-react. I do not think that that is borne out. Certainly, as far as dentists are concerned, who are still largely paid out of the patient's own pocket, the accrual basis is detrimental.

The brief continues:

> The dentist would be loath to provide services if he knew that the account would not be paid for some period of time. The view has been expressed by a number of dentists that if a dentist is required to pay tax on his accounts receivable, the natural tendency would be for him to reduce his accounts receivable to a minimum with the result that a dentist would carry on his practice on a cash basis. Any restriction of credit policy would deny dental services to persons until they had sufficient funds to pay for the services.

This does become a social problem. If the patient cannot pay, the dentist must decide whether he will make no charge for his services or put the amount in his books. Then, not only does he not receive payment, he will also have to pay a penalty to the government by way of income tax. As I say, it is too bad that the option is not extended in this new tax bill.

An accrual basis may be a more tidy way of doing things, but from the practical point of view it means a tightening up of accounts, and to some extent services will not be as good as they were previously. It may be a good thing for everyone concerned from a financial point of view, but as I say professional services will suffer to some extent.

I cannot see how the accrual system is going to bring in more money. Over the life span of a professional, less money will be paid into the federal government's coffers. If a professional has to pay a large amount of tax on money that he did not receive in his early years, the chances of his establishing himself are diminished. This will in turn increase his desire to join a group through which he is paid a salary, and as a result he will be reluctant to go to the smaller communities where he would have to buy equipment that would otherwise be available to him at a clinic. These rural areas will find increasing difficulty in attracting dentists. To this extent the absence of an option will be detrimental to rural communities, since they do not have resources of their own to establish members of the profession in the area and to place them on a salary for their first few years.

I should like to make a few remarks about building depreciation. This provision is badly drawn. The rural communities in particular will feel the effect of the new rules governing building depreciation under which depreciation, interest and property taxes will not be deductible from income derived other than from the premises. This provision was designed, as I understand it, to catch the very large professional income groups using a building or an apartment block in order to delay indefinitely payment of tax. However, I should like to point out that tax will be recoverable at death, and that provision also includes depreciation. Therefore, in my opinion under these rules the full amount will be recovered no matter how much is outstanding. It is likely to be formidable, and the taxpayer may find himself owing more to the Income Tax Department than the building is worth. I think putting the limit at $50,000 is putting it too low in this modern day and age. One can hardly build a chicken coop for $50,000 today. I should not like to say what the limit should be, but I think $50,000 is too low.

In a small community of the type from which I come, there is practically no mortgage money available from large institutions as there is in cities. For this reason, this clause becomes particularly important. The construction of buildings for rental as stores, factories and plants must take place as a result of an individual in a community being willing to put up the money and carry the mortgage. In most small communities, rentals tend to be too low to carry the mortgage. At present time this measure will be detrimental to the building of new enterprises in small communities.

A good portion of new construction is carried on by one individual who builds the building and another who rents it as a retail outlet, factory or something similar. As a result of this regulation that every building valued at $50,000 or more must stand on its own, higher rents will have to be charged. A survey in my town indicates that rents are lower than the cost of carrying a building, that is depreciation, paying the mortgage and property taxes, at least for the first ten years. This means there will have to be longer term financing and that there will be less activity.

It seems to be particularly advantageous to professional people to build apartment blocks. They can be managed by the professional individual who owns them. This type of investment was useful to that type of taxpayer. Some studies indicate that 45 per cent to 50 per cent of apartments have been built by this type of taxpayer. With this new measure there will be a massive rearrangement of investment in order to carry an apartment building. There will have to be the continuation of private funds for investment in real estate, and almost certainly higher rents will have to be charged. The hon. member for Regina East suggested that this increased cost should not be passed on to the tenant, but I do not see how the landlords can help but pass it on, certainly in respect of new apartment buildings. The result will be that commercial rents will increase in the immediate future.

Having decided to look after one loophole in the tax structure to prevent the acquisition of apartments with the deferment of tax indefinitely, I think the government has overstepped the mark. I do not suggest these people should be allowed to do this indefinitely. There should be some limit. However, this particular proposal will mean that those who have property in small rural communities will pay taxes at a higher rate. Investment dollars can only be spent once, and I think this measure will have the tendency of increasing the transfer of investment dollars away from rural communities. There is extremely little investment in rural communities today because large companies will not locate in these areas. In light of the economics of the situation one cannot blame them, but to that extent I think this provision will cause a reduction in the financial base of small communities, and I am not sure the government will have accomplished very much.

One might suggest that these taxpayers will invest in something else, such as annuities or retirement funds. I do not think that is right. The individual who invests in real estate is of a special type. If he is not allowed to invest in real estate he is not likely to buy annuities, life insurance or become involved in some other form of investment he does not understand.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Calgary North.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words this afternoon with reference to the tax legislation before us as it affects professional people. I have the feeling that when this provision was drafted whoever did the drafting had never met a payroll and did not understand the situation in respect of a private practice, be it as a chartered accountant, a doctor or a lawyer.

Mr. Benson: Nonsense.

Mr. Woolliams: This may sound like nonsense, but I think the biggest nonsense is the minister and the whole bill, which should have been withdrawn. I know something about the background of the minister and I do not think he ever had it better financially than he has now. However, I am prepared to stay on the subject of the tax bill.

I was saying that I do not believe any of those fellows who drafted this section had ever met a payroll. Somebody asked me if I have. If my good friend across the way would like to pay the salaries of the employees in my office, I would very much appreciate it. I am saying basically that lawyers who have big corporate clients for whom they have a bill on the books are usually paid. However, lawyers who have a general practice deal with all kinds of cases, and in many instances it may take several years for a client to pay his account. This may be the situation even in respect of a small account, because often these people do not have the money and must pay it by instalments. Sometimes an account may be on the books for a period of two or three years because of the financial position of the client. Now, lawyers will have to pay tax on that account.

Previously, these people were on a cash basis. The 99.9 per cent of lawyers and accountants who were on the cash basis now are to be asked to pay income tax on the accounts receivable. This means, if they pay tax at the rate of 37 per cent or 40 per cent, they will be paying that rate on the accounts receivable which are on the books and which may or may not be collected. I suggest this will create a situation in offices where people will try to avoid the tax legislation by setting up files and not, of course, billing out those files.

To me this whole proposal is preposterous, and I would have thought the minister would have withdrawn this section, especially after what had been said when the white paper was being studied by the committee. This means that the young lawyer or doctor who starts up would have to go to the bank in the first year to borrow money on which to live and with which to pay the tax before the money comes in from the accounts receivable. In other words, this will kill the initiative and ambition of young people in starting out on their own, whether they are in the legal profession, the profession of accountancy or in any other profession. The provision in the bill is a little better than the white paper proposal. At one time, the government wanted to put a tax on work in progress. Hon. members will recall that during committee study of the white paper, I wondered how a gynaecologist would bill on his work in progress. If the foetus were two months old would he bill for one sixth of his fee? The same thing applies in a law office to work in progress.

I know something about the management of a small law office, of how difficult it is to meet the payroll, pay the rent and meet all other costs. In recent times office rents have gone up 200 per cent to 300 per cent. A lawyer might start off an account by writing one letter. Would he have to pay tax on the fee received for that? It might be the first step in the administration of an estate, yet he would be expected to pay tax on that work in progress. Such tax laws create situations that encourage fraud. Lawyers in small offices will not be able to afford to put accounts receivable on their books. I would like to hear the minister explain why he wants this provision in the bill. There was no loss of taxation when the system involved payment on a cash basis. If a case began in 1968, was billed a year later, and the account paid in 1969, then the tax was paid in 1969 when the fee was received. Now, a lawyer may have to pay tax on an account which he may never collect.

This will create an impossible situation for lawyers, accountants, and medical general practitioners.

Mr. Benson: Nonsense.

Mr. Woolliams: The minister says this is nonsense. I do not know. I know something about his background, and I doubt if he has ever operated a small accountant's office. If he has, then I am surprised that he favours this proposal. The situation is different when an accountant belongs to a big national firm dealing with large corporations. If the firm charges the CPR or the National Trust, it knows its account will be paid. But the lawyer who defends John Blow on a small criminal charge, a quasi criminal charge, or in a civil case may not receive his fee for two or three years. Before the introduction of legal aid, many lawyers involved in divorce work carried clients for four or five years before finally writing off those accounts. Under the proposed system, a lawyer will have to pay 40 cents on the dollar on an account that he has not even collected.

This is all part of the Liberal philosophy. The Liberals want big farms, big law firms, big accounting firms. It is only the big man who will be able to afford this system, not the little man. I am shocked at this kind of legislation. I say it came down the legislative pipe because whoever devised it never practised either as an accountant or as a lawyer in a small office, and had the experience of meeting wages, rent and other expenses. Whoever devised this section must have joined a big firm at the start of his career. Mr. Speaker, I believe Canada is still a young country, and I think it is good for young lawyers to start off by opening their own offices, putting in telephones and hiring their own secretaries. This shows they have ambition and initiative. Those are the qualities that built this country. The lawyer, the accountant and the doctor are men who serve society.

I am not talking about the fellow who does corporate work. Once a law firm gets the account for, say, the Bank of Montreal, that account stays with the firm year after year. The firm may hire a young lawyer on salary, and after 20 years he may join the partnership. Such firms can afford this legislation, but the little firms cannot. Again, it is all a question of big government and big business. Under this legislation, including sections of it other than the ones under discussion now, the little Canadian's initiative will be killed and stifled.

Mr. Osler: The little fellows are going to get a lot or reductions.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, there is that member from Winnipeg who speaks very little but, when he does, always speaks sitting down. I have always said he should say, "Thank goodness my grandfather was born before me."

Mr. Osler: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Woolliams: Certainly, and I hope the hon. member makes the front page of the Winnipeg Free Press with his question.

Mr. Osler: In view of the hon. member's allegation that nobody does anything for the middle man, I wish to ask him if he has read those portions of the tax bill which indicate that millions of people are going to benefit from tax reductions?

Mr. Woolliams: That is really a very intelligent interjection. I appreciate the exemptions that the bill provides. We on this side of the House have asked for them. Twice over the last three years I voted to have exemptions increased. Certainly, there are some good things in the bill. The government could not draft a bill this big, with 190 amendments, without hitting something good. But the over-all effect of the bill must be considered. Lawyers and accountants say that this document is so complex that nobody knows what the tax law will be. Certainly, some people will have higher exemptions, but by the time they get those exemptions, with the cost of living constantly rising as a result of the government's policies, the exemptions will look pretty small.

Further, Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member's question I would point out that the government has extended the unemployment insurance scheme to include a large number of people who will never benefit from it. The result is a new tax against those Canadians, and that will eat up the exemptions they get through this bill. When Liberals talk about the candy in the bill, I reply that there isn't much candy in it. When the bill is enacted Canadians will find out this too late.

The government is trying to ram the bill through by offering to cut personal taxes by 3 per cent and corporate tax by 7 per cent. It says that Canadians will not get these tax cuts unless we put the bill through.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That isn't in this bill.

Mr. Woolliams: I know, but that is the attitude of the government; it says that whatever happens, the provisions of the bill can be made retroactive. The other night I pointed out that the capital gains tax could be as high as 61 per cent. If such a tax had been in effect when the grandfather and the father of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre were living, it would have had a terrible effect on them. Knowing the record of his father and his grandfather in western Canada, I say that they would have opposed such a tax.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, in my intervention this morning I indicated reasons for supporting the stand of the Leader of the Opposition in proposing deferral of the proclamation of a major portion of the bill. I want to add one further observation in regard to that. Of course, such deferral would involve a change of the effective date of January 1, 1972, for a major portion of the bill. As a result of the deferral, the date for its coming into effect could be postponed until April 30 or June 1 next. However, then we could have the nonsense of the estate tax continuing as law and, on April 30 this act coming into force with the provision that effective January 1 the estate tax would be replaced by the capital gains tax. In addition, there would be the nonsense of the uncertainty with regard to capital gains tax during the interval. However, there is no problem with accepting the principle of the effective date of the law being the date fixed for the proclamation. It could be July 1, for example or later.

As an added reason for a deferral I am going to repeat the argument I have made on previous occasions, that it is absolutely essential that the federal government and the provinces somehow sort out the jungle being created as a result of the withdrawal of the federal estate tax and the continuation of the provincial succession duties, with some provinces wanting to go in on an estate or succession duty that now do not have them, but without there being any mutual credits as between succession duties and the capital gains tax. I have not heard one member from the government benches say that they have even considered the matter. Elimination of the federal estate tax with the continuation of the provincial succession duties and the imposition of a capital gains tax will mean an increase in taxation for the Canadian public. There is no provision for mutual credits as there are now between succession duty and estate tax when one is federal and the other is provincial. There are mutual credits but not under this act, and none have been negotiated.

Not everybody will be taxed for estate or succession duties but there will be a large number across the land. In case some people believe that only the rich will be taxed, let us look at values of farm lands across the country. In Ontario, corn land may be worth $600 or $800 an acre. In the west, in what used to be my constituency, farm land can be worth $350 an acre. In the west 1,000 acres is not an extraordinarily large farm, although it may be in Ontario. At $600 or $800 an acre it does not take long to get a value of about $300,000 for only the farm land and, in addition, there is the value of the buildings and the livestock. These are the people who will be hit by this multiplicity of succession duties and capital gains taxes. Those who are envious are strong advocates of estate taxes and want to destroy what hard work has built. In other words, there are people who want to say to Canadians and others in every generation that we must go back to square one—everybody out of the starting gates at the same time in every generation.

Mr. Brewin: Very sound!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The hon. gentleman says "Very sound". That is a great way to run the country, a great way to build the country! That is the most patent economic nonsense that could ever be put forward. It arises from the 19th century philosophy that was meant to try to break up estates. It is not justice, it is injustice.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is an attempt to build the country, not private fortunes.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): By so-called redistribution to those who have not earned it and do not deserve it.

I want now to turn to particular points raised by the hon. member for Regina East, and to continue some arguments advanced by my colleague from Calgary North with regard to conventions and expenses. These now are a long way from the white paper proposals. However, there is a rather odd philosophy abroad that because a person derives benefit from some expenses that are allowed for the purpose of earning his living, say business expenses whether it is sole ownership or an incorporated company, that there is something inherently wrong in this. It is tabbed "lush expense account living". No one talks about the multitudes of public servants who go to local, national and international conferences on an expense account paid by the government, although they derive benefit from that. No one talks about union officials who go to local national and international conferences or conventions and do rather well by them. They derive the personal benefit but the union is not taxed. The union is not taxable, so what difference is there? Mining companies are entitled to send delegates to mining conferences and pay their expenses, but these are deductible because they contribute to earning the income of the company. Some mine workers are sent by their union, on an expense account. The union does not worry, however, because it does not pay income tax. Yet we are told it is wrong for the company to be allowed the expense of sending its representatives. If one is going to be logical then let us insist that some change be made with regard to union delegate's expenses in this example.

The same applies to professional associations. If the Canadian Bar Association or the Canadian Medical Association sends delegates to international conferences, they pay the expenses. Admittedly the individual renders certain services but a trip to Europe is not hard to take nor, by the same token, is a trip to the ILO at Geneva, but nobody pays income tax on that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is paid for by the government.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It is paid for by the association or by the government, but it is the individual who is the beneficiary and is tabbed with "expense account living". It was said that it is between individuals that equity must exist. I know some government officials in Ottawa who spend up to 150 or 170 working days of the year attending conferences and meetings outside the city on behalf of their department. They continue to draw salary and all allowances, but hotel bills are paid. They enjoy the higher scale of living at these conventions and meetings and this is alleged to be that "lush expense account living". Let us be fair and look at all the facts related to expense account living as it affects everyone.

It is proposed to disallow memberships in certain types of clubs. It is an undeniable fact of life that a great deal of business is transacted over the luncheon table, or over a drink,—

• (2:30 p.m.)

An hon. Member: Or at the golf course.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Or at the golf course, of course. You know, businessmen will continue taking public servants and prospective clients they want to influence to a hotel or a club for a meal. They will get a receipt for their lunch or dinner. Oh, yes, that will continue. But they will not be able to go to the club at which you must pay a membership fee in order to attend. It seems to me that these provisions were written by some people who were jealous because they could not belong to certain clubs without paying the necessary fees, and deduct such fees while others could. I do not know. This is all open to question. It seems to me that there is discrimination, absolute discrimination, in regard to this and that an attempt is being made to pick out certain groups and certain institutions in order to discriminate against them. I see the hon. member for Chambly shaking his head. What is the difference between membership in a club and—

An hon. Member: It is the hon. member for Labelle.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

ro[Translation]

An hon. Member: Nor for Chambly but for Labelle.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I beg your pardon, I meant Labelle. The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Dupras) did not seem to believe me at that time.

[English]

I will ask this. What is the difference between privileges flowing from a membership in a club and the privilege of being able to buy hockey tickets for games of Les Canadiens. These season ticket holders are a club of a kind, and you are privileged if you can buy those tickets. A business concern can deduct the cost of those tickets as an expense. Therefore, the membership cost connected with belonging to a club in which one can entertain clients should be in the same category. Let us be logical about this. Either you take all such clubs and permit deductions, or you throw them all out.

I agree that there can be abuses. There is no way you can hold a bar mitzvah for your son and invite 500 or 600 prospective clients and write off the expense as a business expense. When I was attached to the Department of National Revenue that actually happened. Someone actually attempted this. Or, you could not write off the cost of, say, a 135-foot launch, or of one of those rather fancy yachts that larger businesses may use, or of some types of hunting or fishing lodge. However, amounts reasonably expended for the promotion of business should be allowed. I think, myself, that the proposed provisions go too far in that regard. There is a lack of logic in their presentation. The position adopted by the government has deviated more than somewhat from the position the government took in its white paper. It is the taxpayer who must be considered, Mr. Chairman. It is not government administration or the convenience of that administration. It is the taxpayer. Some people seem to think that the taxpayer is someone who exists in isolation, that he is a rather fat bird whose feathers may be plucked and, in some cases, whose throat may be slit. The taxpayer does not exist for the benefit of government bureaucracy. The government bureaucracy exists because of the taxpayer.

May I now mention professional expenses? The hon. member for Calgary North indicated that too often people have thought that, "Oh, well, in the past professionals enjoyed an advantage." Strangely enough, if one looks at the history of taxation one will see that in 1917, when the Income Tax Act was introduced, everybody was assessed on a cash basis. People were assessed when income was earned and received. It was earned then on a cash basis. Changes were made with regard to business practices. For instance, accounts receivable might be used at the bank to establish a line of credit. The government, seeking ever more revenues, decided that business must include accounts receivable; in other words the tax would apply on a sales basis not merely cash. In order to determine its income for taxation purposes, a business had to include sales. The change was made in regard to business. Over the years there have been continuing erosions. They have now reached the point that professionals have to prepay part of their taxes.

Incorporated business now has to pay tax more or less on a monthly basis, one month pretty well after the income is earned. Actually, there is no repayment for business now. So, those supporters of the government on the finance committee and others who said that this was merely restoring the balance between business and the professional are wrong. They do not understand the law. The Income Tax Act does not insist on the prepayment of income taxes in any other type of operation. That is right, Mr. Chairman. Actually, at the beginning of the fiscal year you must estimate your income and then pay on a quarterly basis in advance. That tax must be paid in advance. If there is a short fall at the end of the year, you pay interest on that short fall. No other type of occupation in this country has to do that, Mr. Chairman. None. Yet, in some sort of spirit of getting even, or of so-called equity as between taxpayers, the government, in reaching a half-way station as between its original position and the position in the white paper, has said that professionals will have to pay their income tax on an accrual basis.

The lack of logic in the white paper proposals is just as bad as the lack of logic in this proposal. If you want to do justice to professionals and bring about equity, remove the prepayment provisions and the provisions requiring interest to be paid on short falls in tax payments. If you do that you will bring about justice as between the two groups. Now, it is said that the professionals will be assessed on an accrual basis that is based on billings. But nothing has been said about removing the prepayment provision. I do not think the hon. member for Calgary North mentioned that. Not only must you estimate your billings, 50 per cent of which you may not ever touch or collect, but you must prepay tax on the basis of estimated income. We hope that the accruals in billings will be subject to adequate write-off provisions. I think the man who devised this system has not the slightest idea of how professions conduct business and what is involved in the relationship between the doctor, the lawyer or the dentist and the client.

My colleague, the hon. member for Dauphin, told me this morning that in his home town in Manitoba a notice has been posted in a dentist's waiting room which states "Because of tax changes all work from here on in shall be on a cash basis. No billings." That is now being done in Ontario in anticipation of the passage of this bill. They will not go to the expense of issuing accounts and all the paper work that is involved.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Chairman, I am not sure if the hon. member wanted to continue.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is all right.

Mr. Crouse: I wish to make a few comments on this bill. Ever since its introduction, Bill C-259 has been a nightmare for large and small businessmen and Canadians generally. We are faced with a massive bill which is incomprehensible to laymen as well as to tax specialists. Some idea of the concern among Canadians was evident only this week when some 38 of the leading businessmen, representing the wealthiest and most influential enterprises in this country, came to Ottawa for private talks with the Prime Minister and the leading members of his cabinet. When we see this turn of events, we must ask ourselves just what is going on and why our business leaders are disturbed. The answer is that the legislation prepared by the government is unacceptable to the vast majority of Canadians who are concerned about the turn of events and the direction in which they are being led by the present government.

Today, we are dealing with the business and property income section of what is commonly referred to as the "Benson bungle". This section covers a wide field. The summary provided by the minister lists no less than 13 headings covering taxation on business, property, business goodwill, membership fees in recreational and social clubs, entertainment and convention expenses, rental property and vacant land, taxation of the professions, farmers and fishermen, co-operatives, credit unions, mutual funds and investment corporations, estates and trusts and special rules for valuing trust property, trust interests and partnership interests for capital gains tax purposes. This is quite a plateful, Mr. Chairman, and it is only one section of this massive bill. This is why I claim it is a nightmare for Canadian businessmen and Canadian accountants.

All of these new demands for increasing amounts of funds from Canadian corporations and individuals cannot help but cause us to wonder why the government needs to increase its tax levels. We cannot help but wonder if these new tax levels are necessary to provide Canadians with better services or if this new power is sought in order to change our entire Canadian way of life. After all, the power to tax is the power to control. Unless this power is used wisely, we may well lose many of our basic freedoms under a paternalistic government which keeps saying "Have no fear, big brother will look after you."

I happen to be one of those who questions the present course being followed by this government for it is now evident that excessive socialism has killed business expansion in Canada. This was made evident to us only this week. It is now evident that socialism has destroyed initiative and it has placed a premium on individual incentive. My constituents continually ask me why the government requires more taxes and what it is doing with all the money. In my opinion, the scope of government operations and responsibilities has been expanded beyond the financing of essential and desirable services at the national, provincial and municipal levels. For example, with regard to this business and property income section, we read that farmers and fishermen may continue to calculate income on a cash basis and retain the special averaging provisions. The basic herd and straightline provisions are phased out. The explanation of these provisions reads:

> The new legislation continues to permit farmers and fishermen to compute their income on a cash basis and to average their income every five years.

That is a very interesting rule, Mr. Chairman. Many who live on the east coast of Canada are vitally concerned that within the next five years we will not have a fishing industry. The averaging of income over that period will not present any real concern for our fishermen. In a recent article, Mr. W. E. Moffatt, president of the Nova Scotia Fish Packers Association, stated that the industry will collapse within the next four or five years unless the Canadian government acts on its own to extend fishing zones in the Atlantic.

This is an example of what little thought has been given by the government when preparing this tax law. They lump everyone together. They assume that everyone is making money, but unfortunately such is not the case. It has also become clear that the government's increasing influence over the economic climate in which business, labour and all active participants in the economy function, is having a serious effect on business expansion. Therefore, it has become of paramount importance that these participants and governments improve and make effective communications and working relationships with each other.

In addition to establishing working Canadian financial policies, the government must consider its international financial and trading relationships. We are faced with a startling fact at present. We must realize that the total expenditures by governments, including transfer payments, now represent more than one third of the country's total outlay on goods and services. They require levels of taxation which place a heavy burden on individuals and corporations and, in fact, upon all the productive resources of the country.

It is suggested that the degree of participation in the economy by the three levels of government, federal, provincial and municipal, may well have reached the saturation point and the complex relations between the various levels of government should not be allowed to obscure the fact that all tax revenue is collected from one and the same source, namely the individual taxpayer. Much of the government outlay is for essential services and much needed capital facilities, but in a rapidly growing and increasingly urbanized economy, there is a continuous demand for additional facilities and services. This poses a real need for evaluating those proposals put forth by any sector of the economy and for establishing some system of priorities.

A substantial share of the government's expenditures now go for social welfare purposes or simply represent transfers of income. I believe it is important that the federal government assign proper priorities to the activities of its various departments. The increase in the population and a more developed economy have resulted in the expansion of government operations. New welfare programs have been undertaken for the alleviation of unacceptably low living standards. While many of these programs are obviously socially desirable it should be recognized that the inflation which faces us today is due in no small measure to the expanded social welfare programs which have been instituted during the past decade. Furthermore, the resulting high tax level is having an adverse effect on our ability to remain competitive in world markets.

I believe there is urgent need for greater discipline and restraint on the part of all three levels of government when authorizing expenditures. Taxpayers can reasonably demand that their elected representatives should exercise the same care when spending tax dollars as they themselves must use when spending their own money. Government expenditures should be restrained so that on the average, over the business cycle, they do not grow faster than the gross national product. Efforts must be made to reduce the tendency of departments to engage in costly projects because they have unused funds in their budgets. I say this as a result of my years of experience on the Public Accounts Committee. Many times, when examining expenditures, we were told by the Auditor General that certain projects were continued for a further year simply because an amount had been voted for these programs but had not been used. Notwithstanding the fact that circumstances had changed and that it would have been better for the country had those developments been halted, decisions were taken to continue them. I believe this method of spending public funds should be thoroughly reviewed by the cabinet. If need be, bonuses could be offered to departments which did not use all their funds. In any case, something ought to be done to alter the present system.

I also believe that taxpayers should, as far as possible, be made aware of the extent to which they contribute to revenue through multiple taxation. Demand for the continuation of existing programs or for the establishment of new ones might be more restrained if a policy of full disclosure were applied so as to represent clearly to the taxpayer the impact such measures would have upon him and upon other productive elements in our society which already carry such a heavy tax burden. The complex relations between the various levels of government should not be allowed to obscure the fact that whether raised by one government or another, tax revenues all come from the same source, ultimately. The tax burden on the Canadian economy has become so heavy that it cannot fail to have serious and adverse effects. I believe it is vital to the well-being of this nation that there should be constant liaison through appropriate structures to bring the various taxing authorities together to the end that optimum results might be achieved at minimum expense to the public.

On the subject of budgetary procedure, I believe present arrangements are in need of revision, so as to permit the Minister of Finance, after making the necessary provision for security, to supplement the undoubted resources of the public service by seeking advice from outside quarters. It is now evident that despite the claim by those who now sit on the front benches opposite that they would practice what they call participatory democracy, no effort is being made to put this principle into practice. It would seem to me and to many Canadians that this promise has become a hollow phrase. It is evident from the number of briefs submitted to members of all political stripes that the Canadian business community is vitally concerned and very much confused. Quite frankly, it is showing a lack of confidence in itself, in Canada, and, certainly, in the government. This is a consequence of the many changes which have been made or proposed to the bill we are discussing today. When we see before us the proposals for changes in the various sections, amendments to those proposals and still further amendments to those amendments we cannot but recognize that the government is operating in a fog of uncertainty.

It is for this reason that I suggest the Minister of Finance should consider bringing in outside experts when putting his budget together. I realize this was tried in the days of Walter Gordon, and that it was received then with some dissent in the House.

An hon. Member: Some dissent, indeed.

Mr. Crouse: It met with dissent, not because of the principle involved, but because of the manner in which the minister proceeded to carry out that policy. He carried it out in secrecy. There was a behind-closed-doors cloak and dagger quality about it which gave rise to the dissent to which I have referred. Had the minister clearly made known to the House his intention to hire a group of experts from outside, I believe hon. members would have approved the action. Such a course would give whoever adopted it an insight into thinking at the grass roots level, which is what the government claimed to have in mind when it sought a mandate in 1968, though, of course, nothing was ever done about it. Had the Minister of Finance followed such a course on this occasion, it is not likely he would have brought in a tax bill which is not acceptable to individuals, not acceptable to the business community and whose results can only be harmful to the future progressive development of this country.

I will not be facetious and say I have read the bill; I doubt whether there are many members in this chamber who have read this voluminous list of proposals put forward by the Minister of Finance. As I scan the bill I am concerned that in the formulation of tax policies primary emphasis has been placed on raising income, while little or no emphasis has been placed on the almost numbing effects of taxation of Canadian enterprise, business and initiative.

I submit that the need is for tax policies that will not discourage development or economic growth. I cannot help but wonder, as a concerned Canadian, just how many dollars worth of business expansion has been lost to this country since the Minister of Finance brought in his white paper on taxation. The confusion and frustration began at that point and without any clearcut objective or knowledge of where we were going, the business community, the investor and entrepreneur, sat still.

Where I come from in Atlantic Canada we know that a ship that embarks on a voyage must first be prepared. We know that the captain must take his chart and his compass and sit down and study the course on which he will sail or steam. Obviously, as a rule of thumb this is the practical way to do anything. I have not yet seen the Minister of Finance do this, and I commend it to him as a good course to follow. People like to know where they are going. Then, when the captain plans the voyage he does not tell the crew to show up on the Monday, Tuesday or perhaps Wednesday; he tells them which day he will sail and there is a definite time within which they can prepare for the voyage. This is all I am asking the Minister of Finance to do. He should stop waffling around, making amendments to amendments to amendments to a 707-page bill, because this can only produce confusion compounded for the Canadian people.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I intervene this afternoon for a few minutes because I should like to comment on some of the remarks made by my close neighbour, the hon. member for Edmonton West. In his speeches today he covered a good many subjects but he seemed to be in fullest flight when he was talking of expense account living.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The logicality of it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I agree with him that equity is called for. If we are going to be critical of expense account living, we must apply that criticism across the board. Persons should not get a hidden addition to their standard of living in that way, whether they be employed by private industry, the public service, trade unions, professional associations or other non-profit organizations. So perhaps I can start by saying that we agree that concern in this area should be expressed across the board.

However, it seems to me that what we have before us in this tax bill is the question of expense account living in so far as the taxpayers are called upon to pay 50 per cent of it. The hon. member talked about the expenses of trade union officials, public servants of various governments and representatives of various professional associations. When those people go to conventions or incur expenses that they charge back to their employer, organization or association, it is the association that checks those expenses and is responsible for seeing that its treasury is not being exploited.

Let me tell the hon. member that trade union officials do not get away with unnecessary expense account living; their expenses are checked and examined by union delegates. I can also tell him, having had the experience on three occasions of being a delegate to the International Labour Organization at Geneva, the expenses being paid by the federal government of Canada, that when one goes on a trip like that and submits an expense account to the government, that account is checked very carefully.

I remember once having an account corrected because, owing to weather conditions, we were not able to leave Geneva as planned early in the morning but had to stay until mid-morning or later, with the result that I had an extra breakfast in Geneva that had not been originally planned. So I charged for this breakfast on my account. My colleagues around the House know that I am not a lavish eater.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yet my expense account was corrected and the amount of that one breakfast deducted because it was not provided for under the arrangements that had been made. I did not object to paying for that one breakfast; the few Swiss francs it cost did not amount to much. However, the point I am making is that when employees of the public service are on expense accounts, those accounts are checked very carefully by the treasury, and later by the Auditor General. And that is as it should be. I suggest the same practice is adopted by other associations. I can only assume it is adopted by the Canadian Bar Association, the Canadian Medical Association, and so on. Nevertheless, the people who pay the shot should make sure they are not being exploited.

In the case of businesses that are subject to income taxation, the taxpayers are called upon to pay 50 per cent of the expense accounts. This is why it is the responsibility of the tax collector to see to it that the people of Canada are not being overcharged.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): And you know they are not.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My hon. friend says that they are not.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): If the business is in a loss position, the taxpayer pays nothing.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am thinking of the general position of corporations that pay 50 per cent. My hon. friend says they do not pay if a company is in a loss position. If the expense accounts help to create that loss, I submit that in one way or the other it is a case of the taxpayers having to pay part of the expense. This is why I think the government is justified in putting in this bill provisions to curb expense account living. My only quarrel with this—and this was stated quite clearly by our two members on the committee when they issued their minority report—is that the government has soft-pedalled and backed away from the very sharp position that was taken on expense account living, firstly in the Carter report and later in the government's own white paper.

May I come back to the point of my hon. friend who sits to my right and say that we are agreed that the philosophy should be applied across the board that people should not get away with lavish expense account living, which can amount to a hidden increase in the standard of living. I also suggest that in all cases those who pay the shot are the ones who should see to it that there is no abuse. The private associations that are not taxable have a responsibility to see that there is no abuse in their case, but the taxpayers have a responsibility to see to it that they are not exploited in the case of businesses that are taxable. That is why I think this provision should be in the bill—and if we had our way its terms would be even stronger.

• (3:10 p.m.)

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say just a few words about what has been said by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I have had some experience in respect of what he says, that taxpayers are paying 50 per cent. I attended three conventions of 75 I might have attended and found that the income tax regulations did not allow me to deduct any expense unless the bill was receipted—and it is usually impossible to get receipts for everything. There is not much leeway in the law in respect of expense accounts. If you want to live a lavish, expense account life you have to work at it. You would have to drop some of your other activities in order to accomplish this sort of living.

Let me say a little about the treatment of goodwill and "nothings". I think this is important in relation to this tax bill. The Minister of Finance said certain business expenditures have come to be known as "nothings" because taxpayers could not deduct them in the year incurred as they were capital in nature, or over a number of years by way of depreciation as no assets were acquired on which this depreciation could be claimed.

Goodwill has been defined as an asset of this kind. If a taxpayer purchased a business, he could not deduct or depreciate the portion of his purchase price that related to the goodwill of the business. Other examples of "nothings" have been costs of incorporation and costs of acquiring rights of an indefinite duration. "Nothings" under the old law are not deductible in the year incurred because they are capital in nature, and they are not depreciable because they do not give rise to an asset which is listed in one of the capital cost allowance classes.

Under Bill C-259 a new 10 per cent capital cost allowance class is created for "nothings". One-half of the cost of these assets will be depreciable, in line with the one-half rule for taxing capital gains and deducting capital losses. This new class would apply only to costs incurred after the new system commences.

The sale of goodwill under the old law means the proceeds on the sale of goodwill are generally tax exempt. Under the new bill, proceeds on the sale of goodwill owned at the commencement of the new system will be included in income to the extent of 20 per cent if sold in the first year, 22.5 per cent if sold in the second year, 25 per cent if sold in the third year, and so on until the thirteenth and subsequent years when 50 per cent of the proceeds will be included in income. One-half of the proceeds of the sale of goodwill connected with a business acquired or commenced after the start of the new system is credited to the "nothings" class.

What is the analysis of this? It sounds fairly simple but it is not. First of all, most of the key definitions with regard to the treatment of goodwill and "nothings" are found in section 14 of the bill. However, one key definition is found in section 54 and other very important provisions are found in section 24. In other words, the Minister of Finance's new treatment of goodwill and "nothings" is not only complicated in terms of new terminology, which I will refer to later, but the provisions of the bill itself are spread out, creating even more confusion. It would be preferable and certainly beneficial to everyone concerned if all the relevant provisions were more closely set out in the bill.

Speaking of the new terminology, in order for the Minister of Finance to create a new treatment of goodwill and "nothings" he had to create new terminology. For purposes of the new system, goodwill and "nothings" or similar intangible assets are referred to as eligible capital expenditures, or ECE. Here I refer to section 14(5)(b). There are certain requirements that eligible capital expenditures must fulfil. They are as follows. Eligible capital expenditure applies only to a business and not to investment property, which I think is difficult to define; eligible capital expenditure is the part of any capital outlay made after 1971 to gain or produce business income that is not otherwise deductible or depreciable; the cost or value of goodwill or other intangibles owned by the taxpayer at the end of 1971 are not eligible capital expenditures, and certainly the intangible assets with a fixed life are depreciable as class 14 property and are not eligible capital expenditures. Eligible capital expenditure does not include non-deductible current expenses, payments to persons as shareholders, outlays or options to acquire depreciable property, the cost of interest in a trust or partnership, payments or cancellation or repayment of debt, or any outlay for the purchase of shares of a company.

Capital property is defined to exclude eligible capital expenditures as in section 54(b). This is just the definition of eligible capital expenditures. Depreciation of eligible capital expenditures is another matter. Here we get into something called CEC, or cumulative eligible capital. Cumulative eligible capital is defined to be 50 per cent of eligible capital expenditure incurred, minus cumulative eligible capital previously claimed as a deduction and cumulative eligible capital recovered as proceeds of disposition. This is to be found in section 14(5)(a). Taxpayers may deduct 10 per cent of their cumulative eligible capital, or CEC, on hand at the end of a taxation year.

The operation of the culmulative eligible capital pool is similar to that of a particular class of assets under the capital cost allowance system. CEC is on a pool basis by business so that the recapture and terminal loss provisions operate on a business basis. However, the 10 per cent deduction of CEC is provided by statute as opposed to regulation. When a taxpayer ceases to carry on a business there are terminal loss provisions for his CEC. However, if a spouse or controlled corporation continues the business, the terminal loss is denied and the CEC is assumed by the spouse or corporation. If the taxpayer sells the business after 1971 and part of the proceeds would be ECE to the purchaser, one-half of such part of the proceeds minus the CEC applicable to the business is included in the vendor's income.

Transitional rules reduce the 50 per cent taxation of proceeds of ECE to 20 per cent in 1972. This 20 per cent rate is increased by 2.5 percentage points per year until 1984, when the 50 per cent level is reached. Transitional rules also prevent the ECE of a non-arm's length purchaser to exceed the taxable proceeds of the vendor.

What about the analysis? In completing his income tax return the taxpayer must attempt to discover in this maze of new rulings whether he is in fact subject to the rules regarding eligible capital expenditures and attempt to discover how much cumulative eligible capital he has on hand at the end of a taxation year, whereupon he may deduct 10 per cent; and if he has sold the business he must attempt to discover whether part of the proceeds would be eligible capital expenditures to the purchaser and work out his taxation rates based on the formula contained in section 14(1).

In his summary of 1971 tax reform legislation the Minister of Finance says the government, in the first year of the new system based on 1968 incomes, will experience a $25 million loss of revenue due to the new deduction for "nothings" and for interest on money borrowed to buy shares. It is difficult to imagine how much revenue business will lose in its attempt to plow through the Minister of Finance's new rulings to find the deductions it has been promised under the new system. The Minister of Finance has made the new rulings in this area so complicated that is hardly worth the effort. Although this is another good example of the finance minister's determination to cause total confusion, one wonders why he has even made the effort since it results in a revenue loss for the government.

• (3:20 p.m.)

In its August 20 brief on tax reform, the Canadian Bar Association recommended that the minister at least tighten up the bill with regard to the placement of provisions concerning goodwill and "nothings". The brief goes on to say:

—also the new terminology is bound to confuse when one considers that "eligible capital property" is excluded from the definition of both "capital property" and "depreciable capital property". We think a change of terminology is essential.

One would think that the Minister of Finance with all his intricate new phrases and concepts would at least be thorough. Unfortunately, here too he has failed. And the incredible aspect of his failure is that in dealing with the treatment of goodwill and "nothings" in the area of business and property income the minister has neglected to adequately define "business." Section 14(1), which deals with taxation of the proceeds of eligible capital expenditures, if a business is sold after 1971, is one of the main provisions in the area of treatment of goodwill and "nothings". Section 14(1), when applied, results in the creation of separate pools of cumulative eligible capital for each business carried on by the taxpayer. Yet, says the Canadian Bar Association:

—no assistance is given in the determination of what constitutes a business, the definition in section 248 being completely inappropriate for this purpose. Where a business is carried on in several divisions it would seem preferable to pool all property into one group for the purpose of section 14 and section 20(1)(b).

The Minister of Finance has also failed to include provisions for the valuation of "nothings" and goodwill on valuation day and to consider such property as non-depreciable capital property. The Canadian Bar Association calls this inequitable and goes on to say:

—we are cognizant of the difficulty involved in obtaining acceptable valuation. If it is unacceptable to treat such property as ordinary capital property then we strongly recommend that it should simply be classified as a separate class of depreciable property eligible for a 5 per cent capital cost allowance on a diminishing balance basis, with normal tax on half of any gain over capital cost allowances claimed. Such property could be deemed to have a zero cost on valuation day. It would be necessary to provide transitional rates for phasing in the capital gains tax and we would suggest that the appropriate figure is one-half of the percentages now provided for in transitional rules section 21.

In his treatment of goodwill and "nothings" the Minister of Finance has failed to set out relevant provisions more closely in the bill to avoid confusion. He should change the terminology in order to clarify the new provisions. He should define adequately the term "business" as it applies to section 14(1) and section 20(1)(b) and he should treat goodwill and "nothings" as non-depreciable property and provide for the valuation of "nothings" and goodwill on valuation day.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall section 14 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No, Mr. Chairman. There is no question of section 14 carrying.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. I asked if section 14 carried, and this was agreed.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, I beg to differ. I was occupied in negotiations concerning the passage of a number of sections. There is a good deal more to be said concerning section 14. I would prefer if someone else would take the floor, because I wish to discuss certain matters with the parliamentary secretary.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It is with regard to the passage of certain sections. If hon. members want to be awkward, I can be more awkward. I was negotiationg with my colleagues various points and sections on which we could agree and which could be passed before the expiry of the debate this afternoon. I want to communicate with the parliamentary secretary. Perhaps one of my colleagues might take the floor at this time; if not, I shall carry on and make the necessary observations with regard to this section.

I could raise the matter of section 19 and talk about the recommendations of the CRTC in respect of Reader's Digest and Time magazine, if it is the desire of hon. members.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): This is not in there.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): If the hon. member for St. Boniface will consult the record he will see that section 19 has to do with the Canadianization of Reader's Digest and Time magazine and the restriction in respect of advertising. Does the hon. member wish more detail?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): No, but I can tell you—

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): This section is within the group which can be discussed.

[Translation]

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Chairman, I would like to direct a question to the hon. member for Edmonton West.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Very well.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): As for the section dealing with the one relating to the CRTC, I understand that it has nothing to do with this commission's recommendation regarding television. I agree with the hon. member in saying that this section applies to publications but not to television. I respectfully ask the hon. member for Edmonton West what comments he can possibly make in that regard?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I can reply to the hon. member for St. Boniface that we are going to study section 19. It was recommended to extend this section so that it would apply not only to publications but also to radio and television.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I would like to put a supplementary to the hon. member for Edmonton West, Mr. Chairman.

[English]

In that case I would say that at the moment the bill does not take into consideration the recommendations of the CRTC in respect of television. You are saying it would require an amendment?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Yes, it would require an amendment. First, however, I want to examine section 19 to see whether it should continue. A number of people in this country feel section 19 should not continue. That is a point I could raise. If someone wants to do that, I shall carry on my negotiations. Perhaps the hon. member wishes me to continue. I have here a number of examples to show that section 14 is also a bad section. This could take me until after four o'clock; therefore, perhaps I should yield to my colleague from Parry Sound-Muskoka, who wishes to speak on section 19, and I can continue my negotiations.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall section 14 carry?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, ever since the commencement of the debate on the question of professional income, speaker after speaker on this side of the House has endeavoured to obtain an answer from the government concerning the reason the government has chosen at this time to change the rules of the game for professional people.

• (3:30 p.m.)

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance is doing his best to pilot the bill through the House, and the parliamentary secretary who is taking his place today is doing his best to answer questions, with the assistance of the officials sitting before him. But he has not yet answered the question in which I am interested. Why has there been a change with regard to professional income? Until we get an answer to that question, section 14 will be stalled.

No change was made with regard to farmers and fishermen. I have no complaint about that. A change was made only for one group. I hope the parliamentary secretary will explain the reason behind the government's changing the method of collecting income tax from professional people. Many reasons have been advanced against such a change. I am one of those affected and I know the problem. I suspect the government's reason is extremely simple but unfair. I suspect the reason is that the government knows it will be able to collect a lot more tax from professional people in 1972. Professional people will start, in 1972, on an accumulation basis and they will have to pay tax as they bill. Assuming a normal business year, they will pay a full year's tax in 1972 and in addition they will pay tax on the outstanding accounts of 1971 which have not been collected and which, under the old system, were not written off.

Under the old system the operation was on a cash receipt basis and it was not necessary to go through an imaginary writing-off of imaginary receipts. If a professional person had bills that were not paid, he did not pay tax on them. I am not certain whether the adjustment period has been fixed at five years, but during the adjustment period every professional person in Canada will be paying an additional 20 per cent income tax to the federal government.

This was the same type of reasoning given a few years ago for setting forward the payment of corporation taxes. People asked how it would benefit the government to have corporation taxes paid two or three months earlier. The fact is that the taxpayer never catches up on those two or three months' payments until he dies or goes out of business. This is what is now proposed with respect to professional income. The professional will be paying 20 per cent more income tax for five years, if it is a five-year write-off period. We should be told if that is the reason.

Under the old system a dentist, doctor, lawyer, accountant or professional person of any kind kept a reasonably simple set of books. He totalled up what he received in fees, wrote off what it cost him to operate his business and paid tax on the remainder. Now these people will need to hire bookkeepers to keep track of all their billings and their bad debts. We should be told the reason for the proposed change.

[Translation]

Mr. Clermont: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken), who just resumed his seat, mentioned in the course of his first remarks today on the sections under debate the changes brought about by Bill C-259 regarding professional income and he was wondering whether the purpose of those changes was not simply to increase government revenue.

I think the hon. member also mentioned in his speech this afternoon that small or big businessmen could also opt for the accountancy system of their choice. I think that two groups are entitled to this option under the current law: professionals and farmers.

The hon. member also had some misgivings in respect of accounts receivable. Let me give you an example. Supposing the accounts receivable of a professional amounted, as at December 31, 1971, to $5,000 and that these same accounts increase to $6,000 by December 31, 1972, only the increase of $1,000 would be considered for tax purposes and not the accumulated accounts receivable for the last 10 or 15 years.

Even the method suggested in Bill C-259, regarding professional income, would allow certain advantages, some of which I will detail, with your permission, at a later stage.

The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka is not the only one who spoke on the income of professionals. The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) and the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) have also commented on the subject. As to the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton), he has taken a completely different stand.

• (3:40 p.m.)

[English]

Several members have expressed concern about the government's proposal for a professional taxpayer to report income on the accrual basis. I should like to make a few comments to place the proposal in proper perspective. In the first place, this proposal affects only professional business; all other types of business except farming and fishing already report income on the usual basis.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It is the old excuse.

Mr. Clermont: Furthermore, their businesses have greater capital needs for inventory and other assets than does a professional business. Accordingly, I see no reason why a professional business will have difficulty in complying with this change in the method of reporting income. It should be pointed out that the professional will still have more flexibility than the wage earner in the time of reporting income. By choosing a fiscal year end early in the calendar year, the payment of tax may be delayed for one year.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is nonsense.

Mr. Clermont: Furthermore, the professional may have several months of work-in-process which does not have to be recorded. The wage earner has no choice but to pay his tax as he receives his income.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Edmonton West has repeatedly referred to the work the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs did last year on the white paper. He is aware that various professional associations have made representations. The white paper proposal was of far more general than the proposal contained in Bill C-259. The white paper actually referred to the preparation of income returns based on an accounting system covering accounts receivable and work in progress.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That was sheer nonsense.

Mr. Clermont: I believe that people are not frank when suggesting that the government has not carefully listened to some representations. As concerns entertainment costs and convention expenses, according to the white paper, bill C-259 allows deductions for some expenses.

Concerning extra revenues that the government could get in 1972 following the new methods proposed for completion of income tax returns, I may say that whether a professional makes his computation on a cash basis or on an accrual basis, I doubt very much that the government will get a much larger revenue.

[English]

Mr. Aiken: I have one question that was not answered, Mr. Chairman. I should like to take the example of a professional person, let us say a medical doctor, who when the new act comes into force has outstanding, unpaid accounts of $15,000. He has not paid tax on those because he has been on a cash received basis. Under the new system he cannot be charged for this $15,000 because it was not earned in 1972. In what way is he taxed on that, or does he get away without paying tax on his outstanding, unpaid accounts?

[Translation]

Mr. Clermont: Mr. Chairman, according to the illustration furnished by the hon. member, if a medical doctor's accounts receivable amount to $15,000 in 1971 and to $12,000 in 1975, he will pay taxes on the difference of $3,000 between the two incomes.

[English]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, following consultations with my colleagues and representatives of the other parties, I would ask that Your Honour call the sections which I shall enumerate. There has been general agreement that they be passed. First of all I would move the suspension of debate on section 14 so that we can deal with this matter.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that debate on section 14 be adjourned for the purpose of proceeding with other sections?

[Translation]

Mr. Clermont: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Jerome), the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council, announced that the same sections would be discussed on Monday. On November 22, 1971, as recorded at page 9777 of Hansard, the hon. member for Sudbury said the following:

—business and property income, which would be commenced on Friday and concluded on Monday—

So, if such is the case, I am not against section 14 being considered later.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, I think a false interpretation is given of the agreements between the leaders of the different parties since Monday we are going to discuss those sections grouped under the heading "Corporations" because the debate scheduled for last Wednesday has been postponed to Monday.

We are now dealing with business and property income. Since section 14 is the first one I asked that the debate on that section be postponed only because I wanted the House to carry certain sections.

Mr. Clermont: I have no objection, Mr. Chairman.

[English]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, if you would call sections 26, 36, 37, 138, 139, 140, 208, 209, 210, and 211 I think there would be disposition to agree to them.

[Translation]

Mr. Clermont: Mr. Chairman, I think I should suggest to the hon. member for Edmonton West that before sections 138 and 208 are carried we should pass the amendments moved by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray).

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is right. We shall pass them.

[English]

The Chairman: The Chair agrees with the parliamentary secretary that with regard to the two sections he has mentioned amendments have been proposed by the Minister of National Revenue. Is the committee ready for the question on section 26?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Clause 1, section 26, agreed to.

Clause 1, sections 36 and 37 agreed to.

The Chairman: The Minister of National Revenue has moved an amendment to section 138, as recorded at page 8954 of Hansard for October 22. Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment (Mr. Gray) agreed to.

Clause 1, section 138, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 1, sections 139 and 140, agreed to.

The Chairman: The Minister of National Revenue has moved an amendment to section 208, as recorded at page 8958 of Hansard for October 22. Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment (Mr. Gray) agreed to.

Clause 1, section 208, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 1, sections 209 and 211 inclusive agreed to.

The Chairman: Does the committee wish to revert to section 14?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On clause 1—section 14: Sale of goodwill and other "nothings".

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, section 14 deals with the sale of goodwill and other "nothings," or intangibles. The argument about this is old. Although officials of the department are fully cognizant of business arguments in this regard, they have failed to heed the representations of accountants and tax lawyers and have not listened to reasonable arguments. There are difficulties in certain areas. I am told that the whole concept of goodwill, as proposed by the government in this section, is unreasonable.

The taxation of the proceeds of the sale of goodwill without recognition of the cost can be a very serious problem. Let me give an example. We will assume that two companies which purchased goodwill for $1 million in 1971 resold it in 1974, and that in the first case the goodwill was resold for $2 million and in the second for $500,000. In one case, therefore, there has been an accretion of 100 per cent, and in the second case there has been a 50 per cent loss. In the case of the company that bought goodwill for $1 million and sold it for $2 million, the real gain is $1 million and the portion that is to be included in income, according to section 259, is $500,000 or 25 per cent. The portion that is taxable—deductible—or that may be treated as a capital asset is $500,000.

In the second case, where the proceeds of the sale represent half the original cost, or $500,000, there is still to be included in income 25 per cent or a total of $125,000. The real loss has been $500,000, yet the deductible portion, or that portion that is treated as a capital asset, is $250,000. Thus, the tax is appropriate to case A, but only in 1974, and is totally inappropriate in case B.

I am told that this results from the transitional rules that do not recognize the opening cost or value of goodwill. The provision should be modified to permit the valuation and amortization of existing goodwill at valuation day value and the deduction of this goodwill against subsequent sale proceeds and a capital gain or loss. The treatment of goodwill in this way would overcome many problems and would be much fairer.

It seems to me that goodwill is acquired in the way any other asset is acquired. On the acquisition of a business, an amount is paid for goodwill, which is recorded. It is possible that it has been overvalued. If that happens, difficulties will follow. However, if the business has been well managed, if its reputation and the reputation of its officers has increased, there will be a profit when the business is sold and there will be a capital gain, if you accept that gain as a capital gain in principle. There is some question there. That gain is taxable. Yet if there should be a loss, it is only proper that allowances be made.

If $1 million was paid for goodwill when the business was acquired, and the business turns out to be what is commonly known as a turkey, or if the people who bought it cannot operate it and they sell it at the end of five years and the goodwill must be written down to $300,000, there is a capital loss. Surely, appropriate changes should be made to allow for this in the same way as allowances are made for tangible property that is acquired. I do not know why this provision is being perpetuated in this section.

May I call it four o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

Progress reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, notices of motions, private bills.

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Speaker, I understand there is disposition to consider item No. 137, on page 17 of Routine Proceedings and Orders of the Day. That item stands in the name of the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath).

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

BROADCASTING ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROHIBIT ADVERTISING ON CHILDREN'S TELEVISION PROGRAMS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East) moved that Bill C-237, to amend the Broadcasting Act (advertising on children's programs) be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I thank the House for being disposed to give unanimous consent to bring this bill forward. This is a timely subject for discussion since we are now entering the season when television advertising will reach its greatest proportions. Perhaps to explain my principal reason for bringing this bill forward I can do no better than read the explanatory note which is as follows:

Children's programs have a captive audience. Although many of these programs are excellent and serve a useful purpose, they usually contain commercial messages directed at a highly impressionable and very susceptible audience.

The object of the bill is to prohibit advertising during the broadcasting of children's programs. More particularly, Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House is an ideal opportunity to discuss the whole topic of advertising directed toward children. It is particularly relevant at this time of year with Christmas and the advertising associated with this season.

The bill, as stated in the text, is to ban the broadcasting of advertising on children's programs. The principal objective of the bill—here I am being very realistic—is to focus public attention on this important issue and, consequently, to encourage public debate on what steps the federal government should be taking in this area. I will be dealing with my own views on this matter in a few moments, but before doing so I would like to state what I consider the problem to be. What prompted me to move this bill was the fact that as a parent I have become increasingly aware of the effect that television advertising is having on our children.

Television advertising is a refined and sophisticated way of selling a product. At times it runs the risk of crudely manipulating the needs and tastes of its viewing audience. In the case of children, it runs the risk of sadly misleading them. In fact, it is so common a part of our daily lives that few of us stop to look at the effect it is having on our children. Surely we as concerned legislators should begin to wonder if that effect is good or bad. I do not want to imply that television advertising is inherently evil or that it is an unnecessary part of our free enterprise system. I do want to stress that I personally feel it is in the best interests of a free market system that advertising be done on a fair and responsible basis with government providing general guidelines for the presentation of advertisements.

We have all seen the barrage of faddish gimmicks, tinsel toys and fantasy lands to which our children are subjected. We know the aura of fantasy which is created. The motivation in some cases is far from helping our children's normal development. Rather, the object is to spark and influence their imagination, indeed bringing pressure to bear on the parents through the children to buy a particular product. As a parent, I object to that.

I think there is growing concern throughout the country. Many people share my objection. For example, which one of us would permit a salesman to come to our door and ask to see our five, six or seven year-old child? Who in their right mind would permit their child to go to the door and be subjected to the high-pressured sales pitch which one normally gets from a door to door salesman? We would not have to think twice about this. However, we allow it to happen every day because every day we allow our children to be subjected to such high pressured salesmanship over television, perhaps even higher pressure than one would be subjected to by a door to door salesman. From the age of three, I firmly believe that our children should not be conditioned to programming their wants and desires on the basis of whatever television ad happens to be the most seductive at a given time.

It might be well to reflect for a minute on the situation in the United States because that is probably the greatest source of television programs that we view in Canada. Certainly it greatly influences the content of our commercial television programming. In December, 1970, two powerful U.S. federal regulatory agencies were sufficiently impressed with the importance of proper advertising for children that they decided to hold an unprecedented joint hearing into the issue. Both the federal trade commission and the federal communications commission, which are respectively responsible for unfair business practices and broadcast licensing, were very concerned.

In the early part of this month the federal trade commission held a week of hearings exclusively on children's advertising. They did so because, I think it is fair to say, there is an escalating war over children's commercials taking place in the United States between concerned parent groups, broadcasting networks and the television industry. I hope that we in this country can look to this example and prevent its occurrence hereby taking quick steps to prevent a similar situation from developing on our own airwaves.

I would like, briefly, to pass along some of the comments made at the FTC hearing earlier this month. For example, one witness suggested that in the midst of a drug culture crisis, ads on television make taking a pill or vitamins no more serious than eating candy. This is the kind of thing to which our children are being subjected. Another said that in most food commercials, children are encouraged regularly to gobble up foodstuffs that contain almost nothing but syrup and sugar. Nutritionists in the states have expressed concern over this and have even labelled it "sugarition". For another example, we have all seen ads which deal with instant transfiguration on television where an individual takes something and suddenly life is beautiful or at least substantially improved. This transfiguration occurs right before our eyes.

I could go on for some time with examples of this kind which can be seen daily over our two television networks. However, suffice it to say we all agree we should start improving these forms of advertising wherever possible. I believe we as legislators, and certainly the government of Canada, have a real responsibility in this area. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, we have a golden opportunity in this country to learn from the experience in the United States and what is happening there. We would be remiss if we did not seize this opportunity and take advantage of it.

There are some frightening statistics which underline the persuasiveness of television for children. For example, our research indicates that a great deal of work has been done in this area by Ralph Nader's centre for the study of responsive law. This demonstrates that in the United States the normal pre-school child watches an average of 54 hours of television a week. I think the same applies to Canada, although statistics are not available.

On April 6 a sample was taken. It would probably be misleading to take a sample during the Christmas season when television advertising reaches its peak. But the result of that sample showed that the CBC ran 54 advertisements between 11 a.m. and 11.51 p.m. Assuming that a child watches, on average, between three and four hours of television a day, in that period he would have to absorb some 26 commercials ranging from those dealing with personal hygienic problems to the advantages of consuming or buying certain types of cereals.

There is no question that television in Canada, as in the United States, has become saturated with this kind of commercial message aimed at influencing parents through the children. What do we know about the psychological effects of this form of advertising upon our children? We know very little about it though it is an area of research which requires immediate attention. It has been calculated that children are subjected to some 350,000 television commercials by the time they leave high school. Is it not natural that they should grow to be deeply suspicious of a society which apparently lies systematically for profit? This is what happens many times in the course of the exaggeration and overselling we find on television today. Who knows, this may be one of the causes of the rebellion among youth which we are witnessing in our society.

I realize that both our public and private television networks have shown commendable initiative in preparing voluntary guides to govern their acceptance of advertisements aimed at children. One of these initiatives was taken quite recently—as a matter of fact within the past two months. The Canadian Association of Broadcasters, for example, has prepared and released a code of ethics to govern advertising on children's programs. It is an impressive code. It is a step in the right direction. The CBC has initiated a similar code.

Although these documents reflect what I feel to be a sincere effort on the part of television networks to ensure that fair and well motivated advertising becomes the norm, I have one major reservation to make, commendable though these codes are. In explanation of my misgivings perhaps it might be worth while to quote from a press release of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) who has some responsibility in this matter. On October 13 he issued a statement and a press release quotes him as follows—he is referring to the code of conduct for advertisers devised by the Canadian Association of Broadcasters:

> This is a voluntary code, and its usefulness will be reflected far more in how well it is observed in letter and in spirit than in its actual wording. Adherence to its principles on radio and television will eliminate many of the cases for the frequent complaints which we have received about advertising directed at children. I hope that all advertisers will make a real effort to bring their messages into line with the code just as quickly as possible. We shall be watching with great interest.

The key word here is "voluntary". Regardless of all the good intentions in the world, advertising remains and will remain one of the basic sources of revenue for commercial television. I believe difficulty will arise if networks and local station managers refuse any part of this important source of income or place restrictions on it. I think it is a little too much to expect that they will do so.

The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has a great deal of responsibility in this area. He has many times, and justifiably so, boasted of the tremendous strides we have made in this country in the area of consumer protection. We are well ahead of the United States in many important respects. I would suggest to him that one of the ways of staying ahead would be to take the voluntary codes which have been promulgated by the CBC and CAB and have them enacted into law—incorporate them into the Broadcasting Act so that there may be no doubt as to the responsibility of broadcasters in this important area. They would know, then, exactly what their responsibilites were and would be in a better position to appreciate what was expected of them. I do not think we shall be able to take the action which is needed in respect of children's advertising if we rely upon controls operated by the industry itself. I think it is necessary to make these regulations part of the law of the land.

I do not wish to be rash or arbitrary in imposing an unfair burden on business or advertising or the networks. All I am suggesting is that the codes which they themselves have provided be incorporated in the law. Surely this is not too much to ask. Further, I suggest that this bill be referred to one of the standing committees of the House, the committee on broadcasting, the committee on health, welfare and social affairs or the committee which usually handles consumer affairs questions.

It might be more realistic to suggest that the government make the appropriate reference. The committee would then have an opportunity to hear witnesses from consumer groups, from the industry, advertising agencies, government and the broadcasting networks. It would be able to evaluate the evidence and propose to the government a specific set of regulations to be included in the Broadcasting Act. With all these different sectors of society represented and placing their points of view before the committee, we could surely work toward an effective solution. I think it is important we should do so and that we should take the initiative in this regard, because I believe there is a serious crisis facing us in this area. After all, what could be more important than the welfare of our children?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to be able to rise in my place today and support the resolution in the name of the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). This matter is of far more general concern than most people realize. It goes back a long way. I am sorry the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) is not able to be here today. We understood he would be here in order to listen to this side of the story.

When he and I were members of the joint committee of the Commons and the Senate which investigated prices a few years ago we had a great deal of work to do in connection with advertising, and the subject of advertising as it affected children arose on a number of occasions. As the hon. member for St. John's East has observed, it came up in connection with such products as cereals, toys, and so on, where commercial advertisers were, to put it plainly, brainwashing babies into bludgeoning their parents into buying goods which their parents did not want to buy in many cases, or could not afford to buy. I noticed that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs was very impressed at the time by the need for control in this direction.

The hon. member who has just spoken gave a good deal of the background behind television advertising for children. Increasingly, television is becoming a sort of built-in baby sitter in a great many homes. This is one reason why I think day centres and child-care centres are a far more acceptable alternative.

The minister seems to be preparing to settle for a voluntary code such as that put forward by the Canadian Association of Broadcasters. While voluntary efforts made by certain organizations to police themselves might be useful, we are becoming more and more aware that where self-interest is involved voluntary policing does not do a satisfactory job. Even the minister has been driven to that conclusion. Earlier this year he brought in a bill dealing with packaging and labelling and there were very loud cries from merchandising interests that they were perfectly well able to police their own industry in this regard. But the minister had reached a position where he realized that that sort of policing had some very wide loopholes and left a great deal to be desired; consequently he brought in his packaging and labelling bill.

Almost every piece of legislation that the minister has brought in has evoked shrieks of anguish from some commercial interests. Nevertheless, the minister proceeded with the legislation because he had been persuaded that, while voluntary codes might be useful to a certain extent, they are not satisfactory from the standpoint of the consumer.

There are some rather odd situations in connection with the labelling of textiles. The minister has introduced a bill to make the labelling of the fibre content of textiles compulsory, but he did not go further than the voluntary code in the matter of care labelling. In other words, although labelling of the fibre content was made compulsory, once the fabric has been purchased women are on their own in regard to washing it, ironing it, dry cleaning it, and so on. I am convinced that within a year or so the minister will be forced to take the second step and make care labelling compulsory. Certainly I am getting many complaints about inadequate care labelling under the present voluntary code.

An examination of the code issued by the Canadian Association of Broadcasters reveals cause for discontent. It does not propose to do away with commercial advertising on children's programs. It provides that advertisements should respect the power of a child's imagination and should not exaggerate service, product or premium characteristics or stimulate unreasonable expectations by children of their performance. Just what is meant by "exaggerate service" and by "stimulate unreasonable expectations" on the part of children? I find those words very interesting.

It goes on to refer to "avoiding undue pressure upon parents". Just what is undue pressure? Is undue pressure having a child nag his parents in a toy store to buy some expensive toy because he has been brainwashed by a television ad to do so? The code is full of tendentious language of this sort that is very hard to pin down.

I think the minister will be forced to deal with this advertising code in the same manner as he has dealt with similar voluntary situations. He will have to recognize that groups interested in profit from merchandising cannot be trusted to enforce regulations that they make against themselves. A good example of what I mean will be seen shortly. The minister is going to introduce legislation to prohibit use of flammable material for children's clothing, since a child could be enveloped in a sheet of flame if he got too close to an open fire, a candle or something of that sort. Jequirty beans have already been withdrawn from the market since it was discovered that half a bean can take the life of a child. People say that war is too important to be left entirely to generals. I think that commercial war is far too important to be left to those who are engaged in commerce. In both cases the victims should have something to say.

I want now to say something about the people on the other side of the fence, the victims of commercial advertising. I will say no more about the children at this point; the hon. member for St. John's East covered that subject very adequately. I have two pieces of evidence from parents groups, one of which is located in the city of Ottawa. The Citizen's Committee on Children sent a brief to all members on January 28 of this year on the subject of television advertising that was directed to children. Their brief pointed out that most advertisements directed to children are not only socially useless but are positively destructive of the values that many parents want to encourage. That is a reference to values other than material things such as toys or food that are commercially advertised on television.

The brief goes on to say that television advertisers, through attractive audio-visual techniques and continual repetition, create real desire in the child, thereby calculatingly utilizing children to bring pressure on their parents to buy the products advertised. For example, I may say they use Yogi Bear to tell the children that since the children are pals of Yogi Bear they should go along with him and get after their parents to buy cornflakes or some other kind of breakfast food that the advertisers want to sell. The brief goes on to point out that the television networks and local station managers are unlikely to refuse voluntarily this important source of revenue. I think that to expect them to do so would be rather like inviting one to give up one's lifeblood. To expect television stations to sacrifice this revenue and to consider the well-being of the community is just too much. The brief puts forward this resolution:

> Be it resolved, that the Citizens' Committee on Children request the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to introduce legislation; and the Canadian Radio-Television Commission to amend existing regulations—
> (1) to eliminate commercialism, but allow underwriting of children's television programmes.
> (2) to prohibit all advertising material from programmes, or blocks of programmes, specifically designed for the pre-schooler.
>
> (3) to remove spot commercial advertisements and
> (4) to restrict public service announcements and programme promotion trailers to those topics pertaining to children's needs and interests, when the majority of the viewing audience is under 12 years of age.

This brief was submitted last January. Since the voluntary code is now out, I think we should go to the lengths proposed by the hon. member for St. John's East and provide, in the words of this bill, that no advertisements shall be permitted during the broadcasting of a program devoted to children. The other piece of evidence from parents is from Montreal in the form of a newspaper article of October 15 last. It reads as follows:

> Guidelines controlling advertisements aimed at children have received a lukewarm reaction from a group of citizens dedicated to abolishing such advertisements.
> "The guidelines leasen the evil, but we want the evil to disappear completely," said Marie Vallée spokesman for the Mouvement pour l'Abolition de la Publicité aux Enfants—Movement to Abolish Advertisements Aimed at Children.
> "Our aim is nothing short of the abolition of publicity aimed at children," she added.
>
> The code of advertising to children announced on Wedesday by the Canadian Association of Broadcasters, was adopted voluntarily by CAB members.
> Praised by consumers affairs minister Ronald Basford, the code requires radio and television advertising for children not to exaggerate the quality of products or service and to avoid undue pressure on parents.

As I say, I do not think that goes far enough. The hon. member for St. John's East made a further important point when he indicated that advertising commercials may well be responsible for a great deal of the dissatisfaction and turning away from the continual preoccupation with material interests that we see in so many of the younger people today. This television advertising may also be responsible for the extreme cynicism of children today. If you have known a child who had seen a toy advertised and then saw one in a store or got one for Christmas, and had it break down, indicating it was far less in quality than indicated during the advertisement on TV, you would appreciate the depth of cynicism that can be inculcated in children today.

A woman said to me the other day that she had noticed another thing in advertisements which is of importance. She said her little child came home and asked about the toy that she had on television and that had been bought for her. She said another little girl had told her that the toy cost only $1.95 but that her mother got one for $3.95 which was a far better toy. This is the sort of emphasis on competition and antisocial values imparted to children by television. This is the result, very largely, of television advertisements.

One further thing which has not been mentioned regarding television is the amount of violence inculcated in children when they see these weird animals running around, doing each other in, throwing each other off mountain tops and shooting at each other with guns. This all seems unrealistic and fairy tale-like. But this is only one step from watching cowboys running around, shooting up the town, or people dropping bombs and doing other things to each other which is beginning to be expected today as a regular occurrence. If a child is unable to get anything but that on television, he is unable to distinguish in his early years between fact and fantasy. When he grows up he is still unable to distinguish fact from fantasy. I would warrant that the man who recently hijacked an aircraft near Calgary was not very far from being unable to distinguish between fact and fantasy. He acted like a schizophrenic child.

I think commercial advertisements on television are thoroughly bad for children. I think they are bad for grown-ups too, but we can deal with that another day. In the meantime, I hope the House will give serious consideration to sending the subject matter of this bill to a committee. I should like to see it sent to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, on which committee both the hon. member for St. John's East and I sit and at into which the minister can be drawn in order that we may brainwash him a little more thoroughly in this regard. Perhaps at such a committee session we could go over these things thoroughly to make sure we not only get good packaging and labelling in respect of the food products we eat but to make sure we have proper regulations and laws to ensure that the products which feed the minds of our children are pure, unadulterated and not dictated by the self-interest of some manufacturer who wants to sell as much as possible regardless of the consequences.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there was a bill standing in my name on the order paper today but I was very pleased to let it stand and give precedence to the bill we are now discussing, in view of its timeliness during the Christmas season and its importance in terms of policy which must be developed in this area.

I congratulate the mover of the bill, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), and the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) with whose remarks I find myself in substantial agreement. Unfortunately, I will have to restrict my remarks because of the limitation of time and because I know the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) is anxious to speak in this debate.

The hon. member who introduced the bill has on previous occasions raised this matter. He had a very interesting exchange with the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) before the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs on March 16, 1971. The minister at that time recognized that a good deal of concern had been expressed by consumer groups, parent-teacher associations, committees for the welfare of children and other organizations concerning food and toy advertising which is directed not only at the adult, who will presumably make the purchase, but at the child himself.

The minister admitted that in a modern society this is a matter of very deep concern and one which was quite rightly receiving the attention of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and of the Canadian Radio-Television Commission. He said on that occasion that it seemed desirable some attempt should be made to draw up acceptable rules according to which the television salesman, so to speak, should be able to bring his message into our homes and speak to our children.

The minister went on to point out that his department already has considerable jurisdiction over advertising. Under the Combines Investigation Act it has jurisdiction over misleading advertising generally, including, of course, television advertising. If there were in any advertising directed at children something which could be presented in court as materially misleading, that would be a basis on which to consider launching a prosecution under the Combines Investigation Act. As hon. members know, there has been greatly stepped-up activity over the last couple of years by the Combines people in investigating and prosecuting cases of misleading advertising.

Furthermore, the department has the responsibility, on behalf of the Canadian Radio-Television Commission, to review and approve food advertising on radio and television to ensure that it contains no element of fraud or misrepresentation within the meaning of the Food and Drugs Act and regulations. Such supervision is designed to ensure the truthfulness of advertising with respect to food products whether directed at adults or children. The responsibilities of the department, as the minister said, are quite precise, whereas the Canadian Radio-Television Commission has a much more general responsibility under its regulatory powers to determine the nature and kind of advertising that is carried on the electronic media.

The hon. member for St. John's East urged before the House committee that there be even closer liaison between the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the CRTC to see what jointly could be done to deal with the question of advertising directed at children. He agreed with the minister that it was necessary that there be greater in-depth studies as to what would be the best way of regulating such advertising on radio and television. The member suggested that any such study should include the advice of child psychologists and psychiatrists who would be able to assess the effect on a child of the constant barrage of high-pressure sales messages to which children watching television are subjected every day.

I understand that the complaints section of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has received a limited number of complaints about TV advertising directed at children and that most of these were received toward the end of 1970 during the Christmas toy buying season. That is why our debate is particularly appropriate at this time. One type of complaint which evidently related to toys—this was referred to by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway—was that the commercials were likely to mislead children, through trick photography and the like, about the actual dimensions, the speed at which the toy ran or the parts that came with it, thus giving the impression that the toy being advertised was something other than what it really was.

Another type of complaint was that TV advertising of this kind could cause parents of very modest means to spend beyond their incomes and go into debt to buy advertised toys so as not to appear stingy or careless of their children's happiness. Feelings ran so high about the alleged malpractices or unethical or undesirable practices in the field of advertising directed at children that there emerged in the province of Quebec at least one organization specifically and exclusively concerned with the subject, calling itself the Movement for the Abolition of Advertising Aimed at Children.

It seems to me that while there are some special concerns related to advertising directed at children, the attention being paid to it is but one part of the proper questioning which is going on concerning the role of advertising in our society. Leaving aside the question of false or misleading advertising which everyone agrees should be eliminated from the market, there is a feeling in some quarters that there is an excess of advertising as such. We feel that we are being bombarded with demands to buy, and often in terms which bear little relationship to the actual merits of the product concerned and little attention to why we ought to buy.

I want to make it clear that I am not attempting to knock the role of advertising as such. Clearly, it seems to me, advertising plays a very important and necessary role in our type of society and economy. It helps to bring to the attention of the buying public the great variety of goods available to us in our relative affluence, and to let us know about the new products which the ingenuity of our system is constantly bringing forward. I none the less think it is a good thing that we should all be asking ourselves, consumers, manufacturers, retailers and advertisers alike, whether we have not gone overboard in this direction, whether we are not engaging in what someone described as advertising overkill and have pushed the amount of advertising to the point where it starts to become self-defeating. Some people have started to "turn off" on advertising in general because of their dislike of the quantity of it or the poor quality or poor taste of some of it.

In these circumstances, I find it a very encouraging sign, if I read the indications correctly, that some of the more thoughtful members of the advertising profession itself are now asking themselves the same questions and are re-examining in their minds the basic principles which should govern the use of advertising in our society. Both speakers who preceded me referred to the amount of cynicism generated in respect of advertising and the great dangers of the kind of cynicism which is inculcated in young minds. I think there should be a great deal more study in depth in respect of this question. If all of us should be examining our consciences as to how we think advertising fits into the kind of society which we want to have, we should be doing so even more with respect to advertising directed at children—for here we are dealing with less discriminating, more impressionable minds, the minds of those who are less able, perhaps, to distinguish between fact and fancy; less able to distinguish between reality and puffery.

I do not think I would go along with the proposition, however, that we ban all advertising directed at children. Advertising is a fact of contemporary society and it seems to me that it is unwise to attempt to insulate the child completely from such a fact. He will have to come to grips with it some day and it is well that he should start to come to grips with it, within the limits of his capacity, at a comparatively early age.

For that matter, neither the bill itself nor the hon. member who proposed it dealt with the question of who is a child and at what age a person ceases to be a child. Neither are the guiding principles to be incorporated in the legislation set out. Someone else would have to work out these. Someone will have to come to grips with the problem of what is a children's program. Some advertisements in respect of cereals have a plausible direction toward an adult audience. There would have to be an administrative decision concerning what age group a program is aimed at and what age group should or should not be exposed to certain advertising. There is a great deal which has not been brought out so far in this debate.

Because of the limited powers of discrimination which a young child has, far greater care must be taken with respect to advertising directed at children than is necessarily applicable to advertising directed at adults, lest the child acquire a totally distorted view as to what is reality. I think it is wrong, for instance, in any advertising directed at children that the impression should be given that a toy is much larger or faster than it actually is, that it will perform certain functions which in fact it will not perform, and that in normal purchase it comes complete with all sorts of additional parts which in fact must be bought separately. I also find particularly objectionable the so-called hard sell when directed at children.

Mr. Speaker, I hope you will excuse this philosophizing but I feel it is necessary for us to look at some of the fundamentals in order to come to the best understanding of this bill. I think the purpose of private members' hour is very well served by the introduction of bills of this nature in order to explore an area in which regulatory difficulties may be involved. We must ask ourselves what we are trying to do, what is our aim.

To revert to the discussion which took place in a committee of this House, I understand that there were further meetings between the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the Canadian Radio-Television Commission, and as a result of what took place voluntary codes emerged and discussions resulted between the department, the producers involved and the regulatory agencies.

Mr. Speaker, time does not permit me to develop some of the other themes I had hoped to develop. In deference to other hon. members who are anxious to speak in this debate, I shall conclude by saying I agree with the purpose of the bill and the views of the two previous speakers. However, I believe it would be wise and proper to have a full and complete debate, which I hope will take place in this House and in the other place. I look forward to the development of appropriate measures by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs as well as the other regulatory agencies involved.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I shall take only a few minutes to discuss one aspect of advertising and the type of product sold to households and young people. I am referring particularly to popular breakfast cereals. A survey has been made in connection with breakfast cereals served to young people in the standard, well known boxes. The result of the survey is shocking, to say the least. It indicates that many of the breakfast cereals that are well known through television and newspaper advertising—particularly television advertising—are almost completely lacking in nutritional value.

There has been a good deal of comment on this. One of the comments referred to a notice on a cereal box. I do not have the exact wording but it said something to the effect that with milk and sugar "this cereal provides a balanced nutritional snack." When it was analysed it was found that the only value in the cereal bowl was the milk and sugar, and that the cereal itself contained no nutritional value.

What bothers me so much about this problem is that here we are in a land of plenty where we have goods on the shelves which housewives can buy in quantity, with great boxes apparently bursting with foods which provide energy, and yet we find that many of our children suffer from malnutrition. Experiments have been conducted in connection with some of these cereals. I do not want to single out any of them because the results were published long ago, just as the results of cigarette testing were published. However, it was shown that even the well-known breakfast cereals are almost completely lacking in nutritional value. Most of the best substances have been taken out of them. In fact, I understand that most breakfast cereals are now reconstituted. They appear to be in their original form but in fact were reduced to flour or mush and later reconstituted, the end product being mostly air.

• (4:50 p.m.)

We make cigarette manufacturers put a notice on packages of cigarettes stating that the product can be dangerous to health. I do not think we can expect cereal manufacturers to advertise their product over the air and say they are no good, but I do say that cereal foods require a great deal more honest promotion. For this reason I support the purposes of the bill and hope it can be adopted in principle so that further study can be given to it and the many aspects of advertising that it covers, including the one with which I am particularly concerned.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-237, sponsored by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), refers to the effects of television advertising on young children. The hon. member has done a commendable job of reviewing the history of this problem in our society. He outlined some of the steps taken in the United States of America with respect to it and he mentioned the hearings that have been held in that country. I was impressed by the figures the hon. member quoted which indicate that a pre-school child spends 54 hours per week watching television. I know that he has several children, as I have, and that they probably had this number of hours of televiewing during their pre-school days.

I think it is important that we have an opportunity to discuss the bill this afternoon. I am sure the hon. member would want to see it thoroughly discussed. But I believe we should attempt to clarify in our minds what we are trying to achieve and the best way of achieving it. With respect to the bill which is before us, its operative proposal is that no advertising should be permitted during the broadcasting of a program devoted to children. I know that the sponsor of the bill is not a man of extreme views, but I wonder whether he has thought through the full implications of his proposals.

A number of children's programs are presently put out over radio and television. Some of them are good and some of them are bad. In saying this I, of course, tend to put in some subjective judgments. I believe that some of the programs are carried by the CBC without sponsorship, but I think I am correct in saying that the great majority of children's programs, both good and bad, are sponsored—that is to say, paid for by advertisers.

The adoption of the bill could well mean that a large number of even good children's programs would disappear from the airways because of lack of sponsorship, unless the CBC or CTV were willing to accept the full cost of putting on those programs. This would require a pretty drastic re-examination of the budgets of both the public and private networks. I think it would be wrong for us to approve this bill, however much we may sympathize with its purposes, without knowing what the implications would be for those budgets.

It may be that the sponsor of the bill only intended that advertisements should not interrupt children's programs but should be grouped together at the beginning or at the end of a program, and did not mean that children's programs should not have advertising sponsorship. If this is the case, then I suggest that the proposal is one that might well be discussed by the CRTC with the sponsors of the programs in question, to see what effect this arrangement would have on their willingness to sponsor those programs. Until we know more about what the results would be, I think we should hesitate in granting approval to the bill.

In sounding this cautionary note I should like to refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis), who so thoughtfull put forward the case for having rather special rules to govern the kind of advertising which should and should not be addressed to the impressionable minds of young children. He mentioned the broadcast code for advertising to children which was developed under the aegis of the Canadian Advertising Advisory Board and which has been agreed to by the Association of Canadian Advertisers, Incorporated, the Canadian Association of Broadcasters, the Canadian Toy Manufacturing Association, the CTV network, the Institute of Canadian Advertising, the Radio Sales Bureau and the Television Bureau of Canada. That code has also been endorsed in principle by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

The code is very thoughtful and comprehensive and I should like to quote a few sections of it which, if strictly adhered to, should do away with a number of the practices which many of us have found objectionable with respect to advertising directed at young children.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hour set aside for the consideration of private members' business has now expired. It being five o'clock, this House stands adjourned until two o'clock Monday afternoon.

At five o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.
