EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADA—U.S.S.R. GENERAL EXCHANGES AGREEMENT—PROVISION FOR FREE FLOW OF INFORMATION AND FREER ACCESS FOR CANADIAN WRITERS AND JOURNALISTS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister a question about the agreement he has just tabled. Did Canada press for a provision in that agreement relating to the free flow of information between Canada and the U.S.S.R. and freer access by Canadian writers and journalists to examine and report on life and developments in the U.S.S.R., because if we are talking about cultural exchange in a meaningful way this surely includes—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Stanfield: —life in its many facets in both our countries, despite all the static opposite.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the agreement which has just been signed pledges both countries to facilitate exchanges on a broad basis, scientific and cultural exchanges, exchanges of all kinds, between the peoples of the two countries. This is, of course, subject to the laws of the respective countries, but I would think this agreement does mark another step forward not only in relations between our two nations but also to the extent that it indicates that the Soviet Union itself is prepared to see greater exchanges of the kind which I know the Leader of the Opposition as well as myself would like to see happen.

Mr. Stanfield: Perhaps the Acting Prime Minister did not hear my question because of the noise coming from behind him. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman whether in relation to this agreement the government of Canada pressed for some provision regarding the free flow of information between the two countries and freer access by Canadian writers and journalists to examine and report upon affairs and developments in the U.S.S.R.?

Mr. Sharp: The purpose of this agreement is to facilitate exchanges. It is to enable authors, writers, artists and scientists to exchange views with their counterparts in the other country. We did not, of course, press to change the laws of the Soviet Union. That is a matter, as I am sure the hon. gentleman will agree, for the Soviet authorities to decide for themselves. What we are interested in and what this agreement does promote is exchanges of information between the two countries and it therefore contributes to the purpose the Leader of the Opposition has in mind.

CANADA-U.S.S.R. TRADE RELATIONS—RESULTS OF DISCUSSIONS WITH PREMIER KOSYGIN AND PARTY DURING VISIT TO CANADA

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): With regard to the visit of Premier Kosygin, can the Acting Prime Minister give us any indication whether any specific results have come out of the discussions between the representatives of the two governments in connection with trade relations between Canada and the Soviet Union and, if so, when the House may learn of those results?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): During the discussions an extensive exchange of views on trade matters took place. It seemed to us that both in Canada and in the Soviet Union there is a desire to promote greater trade. We talked about the renewal of the trade agreement which is due to expire shortly and agreed we would resume discussions on that agreement at the beginning of the year. I think all the discussions which took place indicated the desire of both countries to promote trade.

DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND PREMIER KOSYGIN ON EMIGRATION FROM RUSSIA AND RIGHTS OF ETHNIC GROUPS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether the government will shortly be in a position to make a statement to the House, for the information of the country, concerning the results of the discussions between the Prime Minister and Mr. Kosygin respecting persons in the Soviet Union who wish to emigrate to other countries, particularly those who desire to be united with their families, and also on the question of the rights of Jewish and other cultural and ethnic groups in the Soviet Union?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I am quite sure that the Prime Minister, when he comes to the House, will be happy to answer questions of that kind. As to the rights of Jews in the Soviet Union there has, of course, been an opportunity for Members of Parliament to ask Mr. Kosygin these questions directly in a committee of the House. So from both sources I think we shall learn a good deal.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In view of the fact that what we heard this morning in the committee room was off the record, it being understood that we are supposed to treat it in that way, may we have an early public statement by the Prime Minister?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the Prime Minister will be very happy, when he returns to the House—he is with Mr. Kosygin now—to answer such questions.

DISCUSSIONS WITH PREMIER KOSYGIN ON EXCHANGE OF CONSULAR REPRESENTATIVES BETWEEN CANADA AND UKRAINIAN REPUBLIC

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, since this matter comes under the direct jurisdiction of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I would ask him whether or not discussions took place with Premier Kosygin with reference to the exchange of consular representatives between Canada and the Ukrainian Republic so as to enable people of Ukrainian origin to visit the old land, without unnecessary and almost insurmountable delays, as well as people from the Ukraine to visit their relatives in Canada?

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we did not discuss specifically the question of exchanging consular representatives but the whole spirit of the discussions that took place encourages the visits that the right hon. gentleman and I both hope for.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to know the basis upon which the minister was encouraged by something which was not discussed.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I think I was quite specific. The right hon. gentleman asked me about consular representatives and I answered that that was not discussed. The general question of exchanges and visits of Canadians to the Soviet Union and of Soviet citizens to Canada was discussed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister, having now gone that far, elucidate what conclusions he came to in his optimistic state of mind in regard to what might take place in consequence of these discussions?

Mr. Sharp: An improved exchange of citizens of our two countries, visiting one another and helping to promote understanding on both sides.

RESPONSE OF PREMIER KOSYGIN TO CANADIAN REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING FISH CONSERVATION MEASURES

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Acting Prime Minister. Could the Acting Prime Minister advise the House what was the reply of the Soviet premier to Canada's plea for immediate conservation measures in regard to fish stocks on the east and west coasts of Canada, and did the Canadian government ask the Soviet Union to enter into a bilateral agreement in regard to establishing fishing quotas, especially in relation to fishing off the east coast?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the question of conservation of fish stocks off both our coasts was discussed.

REASON FOR REFUSAL OF SOVIET UNION TO SIGN AGREEMENT ON ARCTIC SOVEREIGNTY

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the failure of the government's stated objective to obtain a mutual agreement with the U.S.S.R. on Arctic sovereignty, could he advise the House as to the reason for the refusal of the Soviet Union to sign such an agreement?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is right to say that the Soviet and Canadian governments are not agreed on the objectives. The Soviet government, however, was concerned or had some misgivings or objections in regard to the signing of a treaty. They have not in any way refused to co-operate with us in promoting our mutual objectives in the Arctic; indeed, they offered to co-operate most closely.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I believe the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe wishes to rise on a point of order. I realize that he wants to ask a supplementary, and if that is his point of order I will return to him in a moment.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, my point of order is that the Minister of Fisheries did not answer my question. I asked him what the answer was to our plea and the minister replied that the matter was discussed. I know it was discussed. Could he answer my question?

Mr. Speaker: I think we are getting confused. We might allow the hon. member for the Yukon to ask a supplementary and then I will recognize the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether he is prepared to inform the House of the contents of the agreement that the government wished to obtain with the U.S.S.R. with respect to Arctic sovereignty? If so, would he do so on motions on another occasion when there is more time?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, before the Soviet delegation under Premier Kosygin leaves Canada a communiqué will be issued expressing the views of the two governments on the matters that have been discussed, and perhaps this might serve as the basis for further questions.

• (2:20 p.m.)

RESPONSE OF PREMIER KOSYGIN TO CANADIAN REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING FISH CONSERVATION MEASURES

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): May I pose my question to the Minister of Fisheries again and ask whether he would elaborate briefly on the discussions with the Soviet Premier on conservation of fish stocks? Is there anything definite to hope for?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, we endeavoured to describe the plight of the fishermen, particularly the Canadian inshore fishermen, and the Premier of the U.S.S.R. said that he would consider our representations carefully.

CRITICISM BY PREMIER KOSYGIN OF UNITED STATES ECONOMIC POLICY

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I have a supplementary question for the Acting Prime Minister. In light of the questions that have been put recently in reference to negotiations on the United States surtax and in light of the fact that the distinguished guest of this country criticized United States policy while visiting Canada, may I ask if that was done at the request of the Prime Minister—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: —or did our distinguished guest do that on his own?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, although I think the question is frivolous I want to say that Mr. Kosygin is quite well able to express his own views on anything.

Mr. Woolliams: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, if anybody is frivolous it is the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Skeena.

MANPOWER

AVAILABILITY OF JOB VACANCY SURVEY DATA

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): To come back home again, Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. With respect to the job vacancy survey conducted by the minister's department which took four years, employed 106 persons and cost more than $3 million, would the minister be prepared to explain why the data from that survey will not be available until the end of the year?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the work being done on the job vacancy survey is of a developmental nature and will be extremely important and valuable when the results are sufficiently firm to be the base for firm conclusions and planning. This is the whole point of it. The work is developmental; it is coming along very well and before long we will have regular reports as a result of it.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Inasmuch as the minister evaded the question completely I wonder if I could ask him whether there would be any connection between the job vacancy survey program and the incompetence with which it has been handled and the fact that his department's job placement program has declined more than 30 per cent in the last four years while his departmental staff has doubled and the cost has doubled?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that the question is argumentative and in the form of debate. It is hardly acceptable when put in those terms.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Could I rephrase the question and ask the hon. gentleman if he would be prepared, perhaps tomorrow because of the urgency of the matter, to take the opportunity on motions to explain the job placement program of his department and the fact that it has failed and that all he is doing is building a bureaucracy?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CULTURAL EXCHANGE WITH U.S.S.R.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs a supplementary question.

He told us earlier that there would be exchanges between the U.S.S.R. and Canada in the technical, scientific and cultural fields. With regard to cultural exchanges, can he say that there is no question of exchanging some of the freedom we enjoy here in Canada for the slavery that prevails over there?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Edmonton West.

NATURE OF DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL OFFICIALS—DATE OF MINISTERS' MEETING AND SUBJECTS ON AGENDA

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Would the minister advise the House precisely at what level the conference between representatives of his department and their counterparts in the provincial administrations will take place and what will be the agenda of the discussions this week? Do they tie in with the announcement made by the minister last week or do they have to do with further discussions on Bill C-259?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the discussions that are going on are dealing with the announcement I made last week on Thursday, basically, and are preparatory to a meeting of the Ministers of Finance which is to take place as soon as we can possibly arrange it, which will be early in November.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, could the minister indicate at what target date he is aiming for the conference of ministers and will the provisions of Bill C-259, particularly those elements involving co-operation between the federal and provincial governments, be a particular part of the agenda of that conference?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, the meeting is to take place as early in November as possible. Obviously it cannot take place before tomorrow because of certain other events which are taking place. The earliest dates we have had people indicate might be possible are in very early November. Of course Bill C-259, or the tax proposals, will be part of the discussions that take place with the Ministers of Finance of the provinces, as well as the economic outlook and the proposals I announced to the House last Thursday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN SPEAKER'S GALLERY OF CHAIRMAN OF COUNCIL OF MINISTERS OF UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS

Mr. Speaker: May I be allowed to call the attention of hon. members to the presence in the Speaker's gallery of the distinguished Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Mr. Alexei Kosygin.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: As hon. members know, this is the first official visit to Canada of the head of the government of the Soviet Union. For this reason and for many others, it is an occasion of considerable significance.

All members of this House are confident that the visit will prove to be a fruitful one. We hope that the discussions on matters of mutual interest will contribute to the growing friendly relationship between our two countries. Hon. members are particularly appreciative of the occasion they had this morning to submit representations directly to Mr. Kosygin, and to engage with him in a frank and open discussion of matters which preoccupy us all.

We hope, sir, that you and your colleagues, including the Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the Georgian Soviet Socialist Republic and the Soviet Minister of Maritime Shipping, will enjoy your stay in Canada, in Ottawa, as well as in the other cities which you will visit during the days ahead.

[Translation]

We trust that everywhere you will be cordially welcomed by Canadians of good will who seek co-operation between nations and peace throughout the world. Once again, Mr. Prime Minister, we wish you and your colleagues a most cordial welcome in Canada and more particularly in our country's Parliament.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON MEETING OF GROUP OF TEN OFFICIALS—POSSIBLE LIFTING OF UNITED STATES IMPORT SURTAX BEFORE CHRISTMAS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he would take the earliest opportunity to make a statement giving some indication to the House of the effect of the meeting held recently in Europe of officials of the ten countries and in particular whether there is any reason to believe that the United States surcharge may be lifted before Christmas?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Well, Mr. Speaker, we are of course represented at the officials' meeting. There has been some contact back and forth with the officials there. When they return to Canada I will take my hon. friend's suggestion under consideration.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—ASSESSMENT AND REVAMPING OF DEPARTMENTAL PROGRAMS IN LIGHT OF CRITICISMS—LONG-TERM TARGETS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion arising out of the meeting of the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council which is being held. In view of the criticisms of the DREE programs, describing them as crude, unsophisticated and unco-ordinated, and the statement by the minister's own former deputy that the results of the DREE programs have been disappointing, is the minister in the process of assessing the programs of his department and does he intend in the near future to announce any revamping of the programs in light of criticisms which have been levelled at them so far?

• (2:30 p.m.)

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I have followed fairly closely what has happened in the Atlantic provinces. It is true that the department has been criticized, with reason, I believe, in some cases. We shall remedy what is wrong.

Obviously, the hon. member has forgotten part of it, because even the chairman of APEC has stated that he supported the department and that, on the whole, he was satisfied, even if there were deficiencies.

At any rate, the report that was published includes some very serious errors, and we are considering all that. We shall, no doubt, correct what needs to be corrected. But to claim that, as a whole, the programs of the department have been inefficient is to make an altogether gratuitous statement based on prejudices.

[English]

Mr. Douglas: In view of the fact that the chairman and others indicated that their main criticism was levelled at the fact that the programs were ad hoc and were lacking in long-term planning and co-ordination, does the minister intend to make a statement to the House regarding any long-term targets which his department is establishing and, if so, when may we expect such a statement?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, we do a lot of planning with the Atlantic provinces and it would take too long to enumerate all the cases. I do not feel that I ought to do it now. I shall certainly have the opportunity of indicating to the House to what extent we have worked with the provinces in order to achieve long term objectives. This opportunity will no doubt be offered to us in the near future, and I shall seize it with pleasure.

[English]

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—REQUEST FOR INDICATION OF DEPARTMENTAL GOALS AND STRATEGY

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): In view of the fact that not only the recent APEC report but an earlier and much more direct report of the minister's own agency, the Atlantic Development Council, suggested a strategy and some specific goals with regard to the development and economic improvement of the Atlantic region, and as the latter report has been on the minister's desk for some months, I wonder when the minister will be in a position to indicate to the House and to the people in the Atlantic provinces what particular goals and strategy will be acceptable to his department and to the government?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, we have already accepted several recommendations made by the Atlantic Council, among others the establishment of a management institute as well as a labour institute. We have accepted several others, but it would take too long to list them. Some appear to us to be unacceptable and unrealistic. The APEC report contains gross errors. For example, it is mentioned that there is an extensive centralization in the department—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think that the minister now wishes to make a general statement. We should allow the hon. member for Malpèque—

[English]

The hon. member for Malpeque has a supplementary question, then I will return to the hon. member for Egmont.

RENEGOTIATION OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND DEVELOPMENT PLAN

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): In light of the fact that the development plan which is in force between the government of Canada and that of Quebec with regard to eastern Quebec has been amended and extended, I believe, and also that consideration is being given to doing the same with regard to the development plan in north-eastern New Brunswick, has there been any request from the government of Prince Edward Island to renegotiate or amend the comprehensive development plan which applies in that province to make it more effective?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker. The agreement with Prince Edward Island was renegotiated barely a year ago. Elections were held shortly after and the people seemed quite satisfied.

In any event, as soon as the government of that province makes a request, we will be happy to discuss the matter with the minister responsible, should he feel that there are weaknesses in the present program.

[English]

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—REQUEST FOR INDICATION OF DEPARTMENTAL GOALS AND STRATEGY

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Perhaps the minister did not hear me correctly. I was referring to the Atlantic Development Council, which is his own agency, not to the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council. In view of the fact he has indicated that some of these recommendations may have been implemented and some are not acceptable, and since there has been no clear statement from either him or his officials as to what the over-all view of the department is as to the effect of this strategy, could he indicate, not in detail now, when he might be in a position to make a clear statement and also whether, in view of the many questions raised about consultation with regions, any steps are going forward to consult adequately with the regions in order that a fully acceptable Atlantic development strategy can be evolved?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, if I start answering that question, you will stop me, undoubtedly with reason.

I am asked to give the opinion of the department on all the reports. As I said a few minutes ago, I hope to be able soon to give the opinion of the department on the bulk of the recommendations that were made.

FAMILY INCOME SECURITY

CO-ORDINATION OF FEDERAL AND QUEBEC PLANS—RESUMPTION OF DISCUSSIONS

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I put a question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare and he referred me to the minister. I would therefore like to direct my question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

The Quebec Minister of Social Affairs recently announced that negotiations with the federal government concerning the new family allowances program had come to a standstill, and had even been broken. Can the minister tell whether, after his discussions with the Quebec government, and more particularly with the Minister of Social Affairs, he intends to change the national family allowances program in order to reconcile it with the needs of the province of Quebec?

[English]

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): It is too early to say what changes there will be, if any. Discussions will be going on with the government of Quebec on this matter, and I can only advise the House as to what specifically will happen after those discussions have taken place.

[Translation]

Mr. Asselin: I should like to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Can the minister assure the House that the consideration of this important matter will be continued or does he feel that the doors are closed to any further discussion? Also, is the minister going to meet soon with his Quebec colleague to resume negotiations?

[English]

Mr. Munro: I do not believe at all that the discussions on this matter are over.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED CANADIAN INITIATIVE IN PRESENTING RESOLUTION AGAINST NUCLEAR TESTING AT UNITED NATIONS

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): My question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the resolution passed last Friday by this House calling on all nuclear powers to stop testing nuclear devices and, in particular, urging the cancellation of the test at Amchitka scheduled for later this month, would the minister be prepared to approach nations favourable to this resolution at the United Nations with a view to bringing its content before the General Assembly for discussion and decision this year?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): We expect that the issue of a comprehensive test ban will be brought before the first committee and in due course it may be brought before the General Assembly. We will be working with the other countries interested to prepare a suitable resolution.

Mrs. MacInnis: I think the minister missed the point of my question. I was asking if he would be prepared to take the initiative in approaching other countries to get them together with a view to preparing a draft resolution along those lines and bringing it before the United Nations?

Mr. Sharp: In these kinds of matters we have lots of friends and lots of allies. We will be working with them to prepare a suitable resolution which will, I hope, get the support of the world against any testing by any country in the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

DISCUSSION WITH PREMIER KOSYGIN OF POSSIBLE NUCLEAR TEST BAN

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs or the right hon. Prime Minister whether the subject of a nuclear test ban has been discussed with Premier Kosygin during his visit and whether the government of Canada has received any assurance that the government of the U.S.S.R. subscribes to the Canadian view in this regard?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): We have had some discussion, and in the communiqué that will be issued after the conclusion of this visit our two governments will go on record as being in favour of a complete test ban. Of course, we do differ in some respects as to the modalities. The Soviet Union and ourselves do not entirely agree as to how best to achieve that complete test ban.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In light of Canada's withdrawal from the United States economic environment and our acknowledged friendship with Russia, as expressed so well today, can it be expected that the missile bases at La Macaza, Quebec, and North Bay, Ontario, will be reactivated with Russian missiles in the near future?

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

YOUTH

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR CONTINUATION OF PRESENT POLICY

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the hon. Secretary of State. Considering the interest that young people are taking in the Opportunities for Youth Program and the fact that the government has probably discussed that question recently, could the minister give us the assurance that this policy will be continued and, if not, would he be able to make a statement on that matter?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, no final decision has been made yet on that matter, but it seems to me that before long I will be able to make a statement concerning this program.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

TREATMENT OF SEVERANCE PAY AS INCOME IN CALCULATING BENEFITS

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour. Is the minister giving consideration to removing the regulation which treats severance pay as income for the purpose of calculating unemployment insurance benefits in light of the fact that a number of inequities have arisen from that situation?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker. We have been reviewing the regulation in order to limit possibly the apportionment of severance pay over a maximum of 32 weeks, thus eliminating or preventing the danger of people being denied unemployment insurance as a result of having worked a full 20 weeks prior to the 32 weeks, but we certainly have no intention of withdrawing that feature of the act.

PUBLIC SERVICE

EXPEDITING OF PROVISION OF SEVERANCE PAY TO LAID-OFF EMPLOYEES

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the President of the Treasury Board. Has he taken any steps to ensure that severance pay owing to former employees of the federal government who have been laid off is being provided to them much more rapidly than has been the case in the past, in light of the fact they must live on severance pay for a number of weeks before they can get unemployment insurance? I mention in particular over 40 people from the Canadian Armed Forces base, Gimli.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the Minister of Supply and Services, has been conducting a review of pay operations in his department, and one of the objects of it is to speed up this process to which reference has been made.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—AUTHORITY OF MANPOWER CENTRES TO STUDY WORK PROJECTS

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to direct to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

A short while ago, he was dealing with long term programs for the Maritimes. Since the announcement of the new federal winter works program, are the Manpower Centres now empowered to hold talks with the municipalities of Canada—and not only of a part of the country—in order to launch immediately or as soon as possible projects which can be authorized?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, this question should rather be directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, who has jurisdiction over Manpower Centres. I submit that the present negotiations between the provinces and the federal government should continue before Manpower Centres are authorized to consider any application.

INCOME TAX ACT

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT TO INCLUDE AS EXPENSE ADVERTISING ON BROADCASTING STATIONS SERVING CANADIANS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Has the government considered the recommendation made by the CRTC in July that section 12(1)(a) of the Income Tax Act should be amended so as to include as a legitimate expense broadcast advertising on television and radio stations providing a service to Canadians?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): This has not been considered by the government to the present, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Murta: In view of conflicting statements made in Manitoba I would like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he has had any consultations with the chairman of the CRTC with respect to their call for amendment of section 12(1)(a) of the Income Tax Act and, if so, can he inform the House as to the nature of those consultations?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, there has been no consultation whatever. The matter has not been considered by my department in any way up to the present time.

Mr. Baldwin: That will be in the budget for November.

Mr. Benson: For next week. It's every Thursday.

Inquiries of the Ministry

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNITED STATES IMPORT SURTAX—CHANNEL OF CANADIAN REPRESENTATIONS TO U.S. GOVERNMENT

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In light of the recent statement by Senator Frank Church to the United States Congress, which was a rather accurate and useful outline of the heavy impact the American surcharge is having on the Canadian economy but is reported to have been made at the initiative of and—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should ask his question.

Mr. Thompson: I am coming to it—from information provided by two Canadian journalists because it was not available from other Canadian sources, would the minister inform the House whether the government is limiting its representations to the American government to diplomatic channels, through the State Department, or is it dealing with such power centres as the President's office or such prestigious centres as the House and Senate Foreign Relations Committees?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the government of Canada deals with the government of the United States, not with individual senators or congressmen. Our representations are made in that manner.

POST OFFICE

STEPS TO IMPROVE SERVICE AND AVOID EXORBITANT COST FOR MAILING LETTERS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): My question, Mr. Speaker, is for the Postmaster General. In light of the statement by a senior official of his department, as well as by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, that within nine years Canadians will be paying 26 cents to mail a letter in Canada, continuing the upward spiral that began in 1968, will the minister indicate what steps he is taking to improve the service so this exorbitant cost will be avoided?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member must recognize that he is dealing with a situation that may happen in nine years time and so the question should perhaps be placed on the order paper. In any event, he is asking for a general statement and I would think that kind of statement normally ought to be made on motions. The hon. member might like to rephrase his question along those lines.

Mr. Dinsdale: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your admonition. I deliberately included the phrase, "the upward spiral that began in 1968." In view of the fact that the postal service is the basic communications system in Canada, would the minister indicate what steps he is taking to avoid this continuation of exorbitant costs?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is simply repeating the question he asked in the first instance, and I told him that the question was not in order asked in those terms.

Mr. Dinsdale: On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Dinsdale: On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Brandon-Souris rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Dinsdale: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I thought I had rephrased the question in such a way as to make it a matter of urgency. Let me put it in these terms, Mr. Speaker. Is it the policy of the government to insist that the Post Office Department make a profit, and is the same policy applicable to the CBC.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows that the Chair indicated the question was not in order. The hon. member cannot rise on a point of order and ask a question which, in my view, is similar to the one that has been ruled out. If the hon. member thinks there is urgency, he has a right to come back at the time of adjournment. The hon. Leader of the Opposition.

MANPOWER

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON OPERATION RETRIEVAL

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration about Operation Retrieval, a matter about which there was considerable concern a couple of years ago and about which complaints have been renewed. Would the minister make a statement at an early date indicating what improvements have been made with regard to this operation during the last couple of years since it has been under criticism, and what results are being attained in light of the criticism to which the program is presently being subjected? Could the minister make a statement at an early date?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I shall certainly look into the question of making a statement at an early date about the tremendous benefits to Canada of retrieving back to it some of our—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are obviously getting into debate.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO DISCUSSIONS WITH PREMIER KOSYGIN ON JOINING OF TWO CONTINENTS BY CAUSEWAY ACROSS BERING STRAIT

Mr. Raymond Rock (Lachine): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Were there any talks with Premier Kosygin that would eventually lead to the joining of our two continents by a causeway across Bering Strait in order that North America can join its railway and highway systems to those of the Soviet Union?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think this is another of the questions that might be put on the order paper.

HEALTH

SHORTAGE OF CANADIAN TRAINED MEDICAL DOCTORS AND PERSONNEL—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON GOVERNMENT PROPOSALS

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. On October 6, in reply to a question, the minister told the House that he had been in consultation with the Association of Medical Colleges and the Canadian Medical Association concerning the shortage of Canadian trained medical doctors and medical personnel. Is the minister prepared to make a statement to the House in the very near future outlining his proposals to combat the shortage of doctors and Canadian trained medical personnel?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is aware of the various measures we have already implemented to deal with this shortage. We have the health resources fund of $500 million which is being gradually used up over the years in conjunction with the provinces for the building of many new medical schools, some of which are now under way and some of which have been completed. We are also meeting with the various health associations in order to develop paramedical personnel who will relieve our medical manpower to a very great extent.

Mr. Rynard: Is the minister prepared to act on the suggestion of the Canadian Medical Association and build more Canadian medical schools for Canadian medical students?

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, the health resources fund is there. It is being utilized to a very great extent by the provinces now in getting new medical schools under way. I expect that it will continue to be used by the provinces to expand this type of endeavour.

Mr. Rynard: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have almost reached the end of the question period. There are only a few minutes left. I wonder if we might recognize two or three other hon. members before the end of the question period and limit supplementaries.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION BY CONSTRUCTION COMPANY IN NOT HIRING ESKIMOS

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the recent protest by a spokesman for the Eskimo people of Igloolik in the eastern Arctic that a construction company was showing discrimination in its hiring practices against the Eskimo people in the area, has his department investigated this complaint and, if so, with what results?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, we are now investigating. The Northwest Territories commissioner, some officials, and the member for the Northwest Territories are to meet with representatives of the company in Edmonton on Friday to discuss this matter, and we hope that all errors will be rectified by next week.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

POSSIBLE DOWNGRADING OF FREIGHT SERVICE BETWEEN STRATFORD AND SARNIA

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, on September 22 I directed a question to the Minister of Transport concerning the possible deterioration of service and possible lay-off of CNR employees in the Stratford-Sarnia area. He said at that time he would be glad to take notice of the question and get an answer for me at a later date. Four weeks have gone by, and I understand that the timetables are to be changed at the end of October. May I have an answer soon?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I apologize. I did in fact send a letter of reply to some of the affected employees in the region and I ought to have sent a copy directly to the hon. member. I will see that he gets it today.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

INQUIRY AS TO SIGNING OF AGREEMENT WITH NOVA SCOTIA—PROVISION OF CROWN CORPORATION TO OVERSEE PROGRAMS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. The other day he undertook to reply to a question respecting the signing of an agreement with the province of Nova Scotia. I wonder whether, in replying to that question, he could undertake to say if it is now the policy of the government to create in Nova Scotia, particularly in the special areas, a Crown corporation or secretariat which would oversee the implementation of programs developed under DREE?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, we are discussing with the government of Nova Scotia all possible means of fostering economic growth in that province. We are also considering the possibility of establishing a Crown corporation. If, as will probably be the case, we come to an agreement with the Nova Scotia government on this matter, it will be done. However, for the time being, it is far too early even to call this a plan.

POST OFFICE

POSSIBILITY OF CONVERTING DEPARTMENT INTO CROWN CORPORATION—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General.

In a speech on June 2, 1971, the minister said that studies were under way on the conversion of the Post Office Department into a Crown corporation. Are the studies completed and can we expect an early statement?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): The studies are completed, Mr. Speaker, and the government has to make a decision on that matter.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT PROGRAM TO PROVIDE JOBS—EMPLOYMENT AND UNEMPLOYMENT TARGETS FOR BALANCE OF 1971 AND 1972

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. Since we now have the $1 billion employment support program and since he must approach the provinces soon with respect to targets regarding employment, can the Prime Minister now give some indication as to the projections or targets he has as a result of this program recently brought to light?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Is there time?

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could repeat the question directed to the Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. Trudeau: Is there time, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Alexander: In view of the fact that the government has recently brought down its $1 billion employment support program and in view of the fact that the Prime Minister will be meeting with the provinces soon to discuss this matter, and as it is necessary to have some projections or targets regarding employment and unemployment for the balance of the year and for 1972, could the Prime Minister now indicate whether he has any projections in mind in this regard?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I might say that it is a little late to ask me questions if the hon. member wants a very elaborate answer. I think the answer has been given by the Minister of Finance who, in answers to questions, has said that we want to have the lowest possible unemployment.

[Mr. Marchand (Langelier).]

Mr. Baldwin: Does the Prime Minister still believe the Minister of Finance?

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Labour has stated that, at best, governments have averaged about a 4.8 per cent level of unemployment. Are the government's policies now aimed at achieving at least that lower level of unemployment and, if so, is the government aiming for this target in 1972?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I really cannot give a figure. I have heard a member of the NDP in this House mention a figure of 4.5 per cent and I have heard some Conservatives mention that figure too. We are aiming for a really low figure.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, I must say that is different.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have gone beyond the end of the question period. I note there are some hon. members who did not have an opportunity to ask their questions. I feel particularly guilty about the hon. member for Kootenay West who was anxious to ask a supplementary. Perhaps he will be given priority tomorrow to pursue the matter which he initiated today. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed, from Tuesday, October 19, consideration in committee of Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act—Mr. Benson—Mr. Laniel in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Mazankowski: Prior to the adjournment hour last night, I was making reference to the impact which the measures outlined in Bill C-259 will have on the agricultural community and the benefits for the associated business community directly related to the industry of agriculture. I was referring specifically to the effect of the capital gains tax, the elimination of the straight line depreciation on farm machinery and the corresponding impact that it will have on the future sale of farm implements, which will, directly and indirectly, affect the rural business community. There are other individuals who feel likewise.

I wish to quote from a letter I received from a tax consultant in the town of Lloydminster, Saskatchewan. He acts as an income tax consultant and accountant for over 800 taxpayers, mainly farmers, small incorporated businesses and small corporations. I quote from the letter dated June 28, 1971:

> While it is early to assess the many, many ramifications etc., of the tax changes it does seem to us that another blow has been struck at agriculture and small business.

While the capital gains tax implications are of course obvious little has been said that a much greater tax disadvantage for the farm community will be effected by the changing over of farm depreciation from Part XVII straight line to Part XI diminishing balance. Indeed, we have found here over the years that the greater part of capital accretion by the farm community has been from capital gains, tax free, on sales and trades of farm equipment rather than the retention of earnings for capital purposes. This is despite the fact that often great self denial is required by the farm community, particularly the young, to get ahead and acquire the large amounts of capital necessary to operate economically.

It is strange too that small incorporated business is to face a tax increase while large public companies are going to enjoy a gradual reduction. As to big business many of the benefits, depletion, tax incentives through depreciation etc., are going to remain. Oil, mining, banking, finance and insurance groups are to be little affected.

I do not think there is any doubt that the majority of the small businesses are found in the western part of Canada. Of course, if an area still relies on much needed capital in order to develop and expand, the future expansion of small business is going to be drastically hindered as a result of the measures proposed. The over-all impact will put the farmer or small businessman, who is directly and solely dependent upon the agricultural industry, in a very tight squeeze.

Last night I referred to the hardships that will be imposed as a result of the treatment of co-operatives. In all sincerity, I do not believe that the matter of co-operatives has been given enough sympathy by the Minister of Finance and his advisers who are piloting this legislation through the House. This morning a number of the members of the party to which I have the honour to belong met with officers of the Alberta Wheat Pool. They reiterated the reservations they have with regard to Bill C-259, reservations which strike at the very heart and spirit of the co-operative movement. They told us that if the measures which appear in Bill C-259 are implemented, it will mean an increase in taxation by about 700 per cent. If this is so, the funds can only be acquired through additional revenues. A direct additional cost will have to be imposed on the farmer on the delivery of his grain.

With your permission, Mr. Chairman, I wish to read a portion of the brief submitted to our caucus this morning with regard to Bill C-259. I quote:

Co-operatives in Canada, despite being simply a form of business enterprise, have been singled out since 1948 for certain provisions for income tax purposes, which are both good and bad. The worst feature is being made worse by Bill C-259.

The existing Tax Act makes provision for the deduction from income of patronage dividends and Bill C-259 does likewise. This is a commendable provision which recognizes that earnings can be distributed according to patronage as well as a return on capital.

It turns out that to co-operatives, in which the users are also the owners, this is a desirable situation and in cases such as ours—entirely equity financed, it is highly desirable and essential for the continuanace of such a form of business enterprise.

Unfortunately, there is a limitation to the provision for deductibility. In the existing Tax Act this is found in Section 75(3):—

This formula, in the manner in which it has been applied, has not worked to any appreciable disadvantage to our Association in the past. The provision, which we believe wrong in principle, has not only been retained in Bill C-259, but it has been cleverly rearranged in such a manner as to make it, to some extent, an effective tax on capital rather than on earnings. The 3 per cent figure has been changed to 5 per cent and the deduction of interest on other than bank loans has been changed to interest only on borrowing from members.

Reference is made to a recent proposal offering amendments to the present bill contained in Votes and Proceedings No. 189. The observation of the officials of the wheat pool in this instance is that they will have very little effect on their operations. These amendments may help some of the smaller co-operatives, but they will have little effect on the operations in which such co-operatives are involved. I see that Your Honour is giving me the eye to indicate that my time has expired. I would like to complete the brief, Mr. Chairman, but I realize that requires the unanimous consent of the House.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. It does require the unanimous consent of the House. Does the House agree to allowing the hon. member to complete his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Mazankowski: I thank hon. members for their co-operation. I want to put this submission on the record because it is very important to the western grain economy and to co-operative movements which provide a service but are not necessarily in competition with private enterprise. I quote:

The only occasion a co-operative such as ours could use this provision—

Here they are referring to the amendment that is proposed.

—advantageously would occur when its earnings were relatively low and this would be a level too low to effectively service our capital. The ultimate result therefore, of these provisions would be to effectively institute a minimum tax on co-operative earnings which amounts to a tax on capital rather than on earnings. This is a discriminatory provision against a taxpayer wishing to distribute earnings based on patronage rather than on capital, which would effectively destroy this form of business enterprise.

Under Bill C-259 and the amendments proposed therein, it will be imperative to distribute some tax paid money to service our capital structure. In this regard, there is no provision to allow for any tax credits to a member-shareholder comparable to that for a recipient of dividends from a corporation. Rather than request such a provision, we feel it would be much simpler and more correct in principle, to delete the limitation imposed by the capital-employed formula.

No other western country imposes, so far as we are aware, such a penalty on the co-operative method of doing business.

• (3:10 p.m.)

I do not believe that in this day and age, having developed hand in hand with the co-operative movement, we should be instituting tax measures which would destroy the whole principle upon which co-operatives are founded. The proposal put forward in the bill strikes at the very principles of the movement and I appeal to the minister to take these submissions into consideration with a view to ensuring co-operators of the degree of equity which has been spoken of in so many of the documents put forward by the government in support of its tax proposals. If organizations such as the Alberta Wheat Pool, whose success or failure depends largely on the agricultural community, fail to survive, it will only mean a much greater cost in the distribution and handling of grain, an increase which will directly affect farmers. We know the government has proposed a policy by which it intends to reduce the amount of grain held in storage. This would only aggravate the situation, because the producers themselves will have to provide additional storage facilities at an extra cost to them.

With these words I urge the parliamentary secretary, who I know has some sympathy with the Alberta Wheat Pool and other pool operations, to take cognizance of the submissions which have been made in the hope that more equitable treatment may be given to these organizations.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Chairman, it is difficult to look at the totality of the tax bill before us without at the same time examining the budgetary revisions which were announced by the Minister of Finance the other evening in the light of what they mean both to the economy and to the taxation structure. The discussion upon which we are now engaged provides us with an opportunity to look backward a little and see what has occurred in the last number of years. I do not normally look back, re-read the record and quote from speeches I have made in the House in the past. I would not do so today, except to indicate that at this point in time we find ourselves in almost the same position economically as the position in which we found ourselves when I first had the privilege of taking my seat in this chamber.

In 1957, in the session which followed the election of that year which resulted in a change of government insofar as party labels were concerned, I indicated during the debate on the Speech from the Throne that I considered unemployment to be the most important question confronting Canada. That situation has continued with very little change for the last 14 years; it has not ceased to preoccupy me during my involvement in the affairs of this chamber. I do not particularly enjoy alluding to statistics because one tends to look at them as if they were theoretical items, not as representing human beings. None the less, statistics afford a quick and easy way of identifying a particular problem. The government examines such matters as unemployment on the basis of statistical analyses, altering and adjusting the basis upon which they are prepared from time to time. The following figures were given to the House by the Minister of Labour and I take them as being accurate and well researched. In the period from 1958 to 1962 the rate of unemployment was in excess of 6 per cent. In the period between 1962 and 1970 it was 4.8 per cent. In the final year or two of this period the figures showed a steady increase. At the moment, unemployment is running at about 6.4 per cent. The figures for this decade so far have been consistently above, or, rather, above the average of, the unemployment rate in the years between 1958 and 1962.

Over this length of time, in this 14 years, two political parties, one Liberal and the other Tory, have been in power. We have had three Prime Ministers, including the present one. Yet despite the change in prime ministers, the change of personalities in office, the change in ministers of finance, the change in government as far as political labels are concerned, the story has been the same during all that period, namely, that there is something badly wrong with the economy. In a land of great wealth, of great potential, of great natural resources and great human resources, we have witnessed the succession year after year of a level of unemployment in excess of 6 per cent during a large part of those 14 years. We have seen the level of unemployment high during the summer months when it was supposed to decline, taking into account the climatic situation in Canada.

In these circumstances I believe we are entitled to ask ourselves: Why is this so? The Canadian people should be asking themselves this question. Despite changes in government, changes in individual ministers, why does the same common thread of sickness prevail throughout the economy? I believe the answer is a simple one, and it indicates the direction in which government is oriented as far as economic philosophy and economic understanding is concerned. It indicates there is not one iota of difference between the Progressive Conservative party and the Liberal party. In this respect they are identical.

Mr. Woolliams: In Alberta they were saying there was no difference between the Liberals and the NDP.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Unofficially, none of them will disagree with that statement. They may quibble and disagree about small, insignificant points but when it comes to their basic, underlying attitude toward the economic system both the Liberals and the Conservatives are married, gleefully and happily, to the idea of this system; it is this preconception which has brought about the unemployment levels which exist today and which have existed every year for at least 14 years. Both the Liberals and the Conservatives believe their purpose in life, as they get to office, is to serve the economic system rather than serve the interests of the people. They say that their purpose in office is to create an atmosphere within which private enterprise and the capitalist system feel comfortable. They say that by doing that the benefits that flow from that system will come to the people, and that the people will thereby benefit.

I submit that that is the difficulty. It is not whether one party is in government and the other not, or that one is more incompetent than the other—I think they are equal in that regard. It is simply a question of the attitude they have as to what should be the prime force in the nation, and what should be the orientation of government toward the people and the economy.

Some years ago when Walter Harris was Minister of Finance and National Housing Act interest rates were pegged somewhere in the neighbourhood of 5 per cent or 5.25 per cent, I am not exactly sure which at the moment. At that time, Mr. Harris stood up in this House and said—this was before I was a member of the House but I subscribed to Hansard at that time and recall reading this—that it was the intention of the government to increase interest rates applicable on CMHC loans in order to attract into the homebuilding market more money from insurance, trust, mortgage and loan companies. This policy has successively been followed by every Minister of Finance since Mr. Harris, and interest rates have been increased, not for the purpose of providing housing for individuals and families in the nation but to make it more lucrative for money lenders, loan sharks and interest hounds to invest their money. In consequence, we have had a doubling of interest rates over this 16-year period since that time.

The purpose of increasing interest rates was not to serve the interests of the people, or to build better quality homes or lower cost homes; the purpose of government policy was to make it more profitable for the insurance and trust companies and those with money in their pockets to lend their money, since they refused to lend it unless the interest rate was increased.

Let me give a further indication that the orientation of government policy has not been directed toward helping farmers or workers but rather primarily toward assisting industry. When the Liberal government was in office not many years ago it imposed a special 5 per cent tax on industry. This was supposed to dampen pressures created by capital and construction projects undertaken by industry, to cool down that section of our economy. The 5 per cent tax that was levied on industry came into the coffers of the treasury and subsequently was repaid.

At the same time the Liberal government imposed another 3 per cent tax on industry and on workers up to a maximum amount, which meant that the heavy burden of this tax fell on the wage earners, farmers and so on, of this nation to enable the government to pay back industry. That, Mr. Chairman, was the political orientation of a party under the capitalist structure, including those who run industry, who obviously also run government.

Mr. Nielsen: Pretty sneaky.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): It was not sneaky at all; that is the way they do things. That is standard practice. There was not anything sneaky about it; this was done right out in the open. They told us that they were going to do it and we blithely went along with it. By "we" I mean the general public and the country at large, who probably did not give it that much attention.

What the Minister of Finance did the other night was another example of adjusting tax rates, not to assist the farmers or workers of the nation or to increase the purchasing power in the hands of the six or seven million people in the work force, but rather to assist industry. Otherwise, why is it that the farmers, workers and fishermen end up with a 3 per cent reduction in tax and industry ends up with a 7 per cent reduction? Is one twice as important as the other? Let us examine what this tax reduction means to a single man earning $8,000 a year. According to the tax tables, with the reduction in tax announced the other night by the finance minister, this individual will save the grand total sum of $19.26 over the whole year. Actually, he will save only half that sum this year because the new reduction applies only to the last half of the year.

I am glad at least one cabinet minister is paying attention to my remarks, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and he had better do so because most of the people under the jurisdiction of his department, namely the Indians, do not come this high in terms of income level and therefore will not be affected by the new tax reduction. They will remain at the bottom of the income ladder, at the same level of poverty. I hope that something will take place within the minister's department to elevate the income levels of the Indian people so that they will find some benefit from these tax reductions.

Now take the case of a married person with two children and an income of $8,000. He will save a grand total sum, next year not this year, of $13.44. Is that not a fantastic and generous gift on the part of "Santa Claus Benson"? Let me also examine the taxation statistics for the last year for which they are available, the 1971 edition which was released a few days ago. It is of interest to note that all employees classified here—and there are 6,312,000 of them—had an average annual income in 1969 of $6,047, and this income has not been increased much since then. A married person with two dependants, with an income of $6,000 a year would get a tax reduction, not this year but next year, of exactly $4.32. Such generosity, I know, is hard to accept.

Let us take the case of a farmer with an average annual income during that year of $5,106, or a fisherman with an income of $5,048. A farmer with two children, or for that matter a fisherman with two children, will benefit under this great and generous Liberal government to the extent of $4.32 next year. If they have a similar income this year, then they will benefit by only $2.16 since the tax reduction is effective for only the last half of this year.

By contrast let me show how one industry, in particular, using the corporation law of the nation, using loopholes in laws passed by successive governments of this country, is able to cheat the Canadian taxpayer and industry itself of $2,300,000 within the next two-year period. A decision is to be made on October 25, just a few days from now, when Atlantic Sugar Refineries Company Limited proposes to sell its business and assets—it does not propose to sell the company as such but just the business and assets—to a wholly owned subsidiary called Acadia Pulp and Paper Limited. Atlantic Sugar already owns Acadia Pulp and Paper Limited; it is the parent company and it proposes to sell its business and assets to that wholly owned subsidiary. It might be said that this is a normal corporate transaction, that it is done every day. I do not know how they propose to do it, probably by an exchange of shares or something of that sort.

The president of Atlantic Sugar, Mr. W. J. R. Paton, a gentleman who just the other day suggested we continue selling out this nation to the United States, made a speech in which he said:

That is, selling the business and assets of Atlantic Sugar to Acadia Pulp and Paper.

—is to increase the after-tax earnings of the company and its subsidiaries, considered as a unit.

Do you know what is happening? Atlantic Sugar Refineries Company Limited is making a profit and Acadia Pulp and Paper Limited is losing money but the same man owns both. As matters stand now, he cannot charge the losses of Acadia Pulp and Paper Limited against the income of Atlantic Sugar. He has to pay taxes on the income of Atlantic Sugar. However, if he sells the assets and business to Acadia Pulp and Paper he will be able to charge the losses of the pulp and paper company against the profits of the sugar operation as one unit. That way he will end up cheating you, Mr. Chairman, and me and every other Canadian citizen out of $2,300,000, the tax which Atlantic Sugar would otherwise have to pay.

This great, friendly Liberal government seems to say this is perfectly all right. While Atlantic Sugar Refineries Company Limited saves itself, and denies a tax revenue of $2,300,000 to the federal treasury over the next few years, Santa Claus Benson says to some of its employees, "We are going to give you a benefit of $4.32 in tax refund next year, if you are married with two children and earn $8,000 a year."

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Ho, ho, ho!

Mr. Howard (Skeena): I am sorry, I misread one line—if you are married with two children and earn $5,000 a year. When there is $8,000 in income he says the saving will be $13.44. But next year Atlantic Sugar Refineries Company Limited, that great Canadian group that wants to sell the rest of us out to the United States, will save $2,300,000 by the simple process of share transfers and stock transfer arrangements. Is that fair, Mr. Chairman? Do you consider that it is equitable, that it is decent? This is robbery, thievery from the treasury and I do not mind saying this outside the House, too. If those friends of Atlantic Sugar over there who are looking askance at me—

Mr. Mahoney: A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. parliamentary secretary rises on a point of order.

Mr. Mahoney: I wonder if the hon. member would identify the source of the tax tables he is using. Certainly, they seem to be monthly figures rather than annual figures in terms of the reduction of tax.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): The parliamentary secretary had some glowing statements to make about the state of the economy a little while ago and he was in error then. When he gets the opportunity, perhaps he would like to tell the country what the tax tables are likely to be.

Mr. Mahoney: A further point of order.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. parliamentary secretary on a point of order.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, do I take it that the hon. member admits they are so unauthentic that he cannot identify them or that he does not care to do so?

Mr. Howard (Skeena): No, the hon. gentleman need not take that at all. I simply said to him that in making statements about how well this government is handling the unemployment situation in this nation he has been wrong. He is not adverse to standing up, so perhaps he would like to take the opportunity of saying what the tax structure is likely to be. If these are erroneous computations which I am using I am afraid I have no other source than Canadian Press which says they were confirmed on Monday by the Finance Department. The department says that at this stage it does not intend to release sample tax levies as it usually does. So these figures are what Canadian Press says it gleaned from the tax department.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The Chair is being as lenient as possible because of the point of order, but the time of the hon. member expired a couple of minutes ago. Unless he gets unanimous consent, he will not be allowed to pursue and expand his remarks. The hon. member for Calgary North.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, in following the speech made by the hon. member who was one of the aspiring leaders of the New Democratic Party, I could not help but believe that speech was made today solely for the purpose of trying to win a few more votes in the province of Ontario.

There is one answer I should like to make to that kind of speech. When the hon. member talks about the amalgamation of assets of the sugar company and the pulp and paper company which are owned by the same people, this type of fiction must be exploded. I am sure the New Democratic Party would be the first to protest if the company that is losing money closed its doors and threw another thousand men and women out of work. So if management can operate with an initiative—

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Are you a shareholder?

Mr. Woolliams: No, I am not a shareholder nor am I a member of the union. Now, you fellows listen for a few moments because I want to make this point.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): I don't mind listening so long as it is the truth.

Mr. Woolliams: The primary purpose and objective of this initiative which brings companies together seems to me to be to keep men and women employed. You cannot have it both ways. The NDP says it is terrible when a business which cannot make money unites with another one which can. But by doing that about a thousand people may retain their employment and that is the purpose of the free enterprise system. In Saskatchewan, the old CCF party did that. The former treasurer, who graduated with me, seemed to be pretty enterprising and he left the province with several million dollars. This is all beautiful talk for the hustings, to excite people about big corporations uniting and stealing from the treasury. If corporations can organize their business to maintain a high degree of employment in this country, I am all for it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: Although we in this party disassociate ourselves from the NDP, we believe that taxes should have been cut. I suppose it would take an expert to say how far you can go in cutting personal income and corporate taxes. However, corporate taxes were not cut to give the corporations more profit but in order to create more employment, and to enable corporations to compete in the United States market, thus enabling us to keep that market, particularly at a time when we have this surcharge and trouble with the exchange.

This Fabian philosophy is trotted out every time there is an election. Unemployment is always the fault of the other party according to the Socialist movement, whether in Canada or Europe. During the last depression in Britain, Ramsay McDonald was the Labour leader and if my figures are correct six million people were unemployed. We saw the failure there. We also saw the failure of Harold Wilson and what happened to the United Kingdom under his regime.

I suggest—and I say this not without tongue-in-cheek—that it would be less than sanity for the heart of the industrial belt of this country to go NDP because then we would have more trouble so far as the economy of this country is concerned. Even now Saskatchewan investors are going to Alberta because they do not feel secure in that province, just as they did not feel secure under the other experiment. That is what determines whether there will be unemployment. The important factor is confidence. If there is not confidence there cannot be full employment. The reason I asked my question today was the headline which deals with the economy. Our distinguished guest, Mr. Kosygin, criticized United States policy and said it was killing jobs in Canada. There is nothing wrong with this headline, but I say it is not good for our negotiations with the United States. In order to get the surtax removed and get a better deal from the United States in so far as our trade relations with the purchasers of our commodities are concerned—and we are also their best purchasers—I would have hoped we could continue negotiations at a high level.

If Mr. Kosygin or the leader of any other nation comes into Canada and starts interfering with our negotiations with the United States, then we can only have more difficulty with the United States and more unemployment in Canada because such things just do not help our negotiations with our neighbour. I know one has to negotiate from strength. But I cannot believe that such statements would add strength to our negotiations. I would have thought the Prime Minister would have indicated that, although he appreciated the visit of a distinguished guest, he did not appreciate the premier of another sovereign state coming to Canada and interfering with our external relations with another nation. That is why I asked the question. If that question is frivolous, then the person who is frivolous is the Secretary of State for External Affairs because so long as we cannot negotiate with the United States we will have further unemployment and further economic problems. We may even have another budget if this government lasts.

Having said that, I want to make a few other comments. My good friend to the left always asks me if I am a shareholder. I understand that the corporations of Canada are owned by Canadians. I hope they are and if they are not I hope we can get greater Canadian participation. I have the right to go into the market and buy stocks. My friend receives the same salary I do and he can do the same thing. I want to deal with the subject with which I was dealing the last day on which I participated in the debate, the resource industries. I wish to place on the record some recommendations made by the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada. I want to do so because, as I said on the last occasion I spoke on this subject, not only does our resource industry provide employment to thousands of Canadians but there is also a reflection in the tertiary industries, particularly in the province of Ontario where the petroleum industry spends $4 million or $5 million on equipment. This is important to the economy of the whole country. Therefore, it is very important we make certain that our resource industries have an equal competitive position with the resource industries of other nations. That is why I wish for a few moments to discuss the question of depletion which is so important to the oil, gas and mining industries.

The Independent Petroleum Association of Canada continues to feel that the abandonment of the depletion concept, as it is generally understood in the world-wide oil industry, and its replacement with the concept of earned depletion will not attract the necessary capital to the Canadian petroleum industry. The Independent Petroleum Association believes that taxpayers with oil and gas income should be entitled to gross depletion similar to the situation in the United States. If the government is unalterably opposed to the gross depletion concept, then, the association states it is their belief that earned depletion must be made more meaningful than in the proposals in the tax reform legislation. It must be made more meaningful in two ways; more meaningful to the industry through assistance and encouragement and more meaningful to the industry through obtaining information so that they know what is really meant by the term "earned depletion".

The Independent Petroleum Association states:

> In this connection, our Association recommends that all 'Canadian exploration and development expenses' as defined in Section 66 (15) (b) of Bill C-259 should be included in determining the earned depletion base. To avoid any abuse in the sale of properties between companies it is suggested that the income from such sales should be credited to 'Canadian exploration and development expenses' and thus the total earned depletion base is unchanged. We also recommend that tangible equipment such as wellhead equipment and tubular goods for productive wells, battery equipment, processing plant costs and other equipment necessary to recover hydrocarbons be included in the earned depletion base.

It is interesting in passing to point out that most of the well equipment, battery equipment, processing and plant equipment is manufactured in eastern Canada. So we should keep a healthy base and give a proper depletion allowance to these companies so that they can build up a reserve and, in that way, carry on further exploration and development work because this will benefit the industrial base of Canada.

The submission of the association continues:

> Certainly the risks of the oil and gas business are of sufficient magnitude to warrant similar treatment in respect to depletion as that afforded the mining industry.
> It is illogical that depletion on future production income from producing properties at January 1, 1972 should have to be earned without recognition of the expenditures made in the exploration for and development of such properties prior to November 7, 1969. We recommend that the effective date for eligible expenditures be retroactive to January 1, 1949, after reduction for the amount of any depletion allowed since that date.

That is something for which the industry has been waiting for a long time, even before the amendments in the bill and even during the time we formed the government. The association has something to say about Canadian ownership. They say:

> Our Association is deeply concerned that Canadian individuals and corporations have sufficient incentive to make direct investments in the oil and gas business and, more particularly, that in Canada they be placed on an equal footing taxwise with foreign citizens and corporations in making such investments. Independent Petroleum Association of Canada is gratified that the principle of permitting 'non-qualifying' corporations and individuals to write-off expenditures in the oil and gas business against their ordinary income has been recognized in the tax legislation—

That is one thing they go along with.

—but we strongly urge your government to reconsider the limited write-offs, namely 20 per cent declining balance per annum, which are provided in the legislation and to allow Canadian individuals and corporations to write-off such expenditures immediately against income. We continue to believe that the inordinate risks of the oil and gas exploration business require immediate write-offs to attract the very large amount of capital required in the years to come. We do believe Canadian investment should be encouraged, and we are concerned that such investments will not be attractive to Canadians unless such write-offs are provided.

In the oil and gas industry, or in any of these industries, large pools of risk capital are required. To encourage people, to motivate them to put money in those resource industries, you have to make the investment attractive by allowing a fairly high return, because without a high return investors will not take a chance in a big risk venture. Otherwise, they would be better advised to buy bonds at 8 per cent or 9 per cent. That is why it is said that Canadians have the biggest savings accounts pro rata of any nation in the world. It may be that we should have legislation of the kind which would encourage people to take a risk, and when they take that risk they should get a return commensurate with it. That is the most important part. When we are competing, particularly with the United States because we live beside them, our depletion laws should be on all fours with those of the U.S. so that our corporations, in their development and exploration, are on an equal footing. My friend to the left of me will find that if we have an equal opportunity we will be able to have an equally low rate of unemployment.

The rate of unemployment in the U.S. is lower than in Canada and we will only achieve equality, at least with the U.S., with all the resources we have, by this method. In fact, we should be doing better. We should not have a 7 per cent unemployment rate when they have 5 per cent unemployment, in a country with resources that have not been touched. We are only going to achieve that if we encourage the investment of risk capital and if we have laws that are at least competitive with those of our competitors. Exploration is rather like the automobile business, although that business does not involve high risk. Those corporations that are exploring for gas and oil in Canada are also doing so in other areas, even in communist nations. When I was in Yugoslavia this summer I found American companies doing business there. How did this come about? The state makes a contract with, say, Shell Oil or Standard New Jersey under which the state puts up 50 per cent of the money and the company puts up 50 per cent. They have guarantees over a period of time which give those countries full employment. If the communists can do it, surely we can do it here in Canada.

This brings me to the matter of Canadian ownership. We will only achieve ownership of our resources or of any other industry when we create a tax climate which encourages risk capital and encourages Canadians to put their money into their own corporations. This brings me to the next point. I want to deal with stock options. We hear from the NDP suggestions that taxes for the little man should be lowered and taxes for corporations should be increased. I repeat that they are overlooking the fact that it is the corporations which hire these people. They pay them the wages that the unions demand and they meet union demands in negotiations. The idea is to give employment. I am sure that my friends must be against full employment in Canada, unless they thrive on adversity so that they can win polls.

An hon. Member: That is closer to the truth.

Mr. Woolliams: It is said that an effective method of increasing Canadian ownership is to encourage the formation and growth of Canadian companies. In the oil and gas industry, highly motivated technical personnel are an essential ingredient for success. The parliamentary secretary will appreciate the fact that when we developed our industries in western Canada, particularly in Alberta, it was not capital that came first but rather people from the U.S. with know-how who came to assist us with their knowledge and experience. They came from the U.S. and other places and assisted us in the development and exploration, which led to great success, particularly in Alberta where we had the findings of natural gas and crude petroleum in great quantities in the early 1940's. In order to encourage such personnel, in order to stop the brain drain and to give employment to those people who are unemployed today, it has been necessary to have some stock options. My good friends to the left will say that I am making a speech for the corporations. I am not making a speech for the corporations, I am making a speech for the people of Canada.

I know that when our corporations are healthy, when they show a profit, when they are developing, expanding and trading, we have fuller employment and we can give better working conditions and better wages to the workers. The unions then can negotiate with the corporations and obtain a higher standard of living by getting more income and better fringe benefits for their members. Surely that is the attitude we should take, unless my friends to the left want to adopt the other extreme position and say that we should abolish all free enterprise and let the state own everything. Then, one has to ask oneself how many strikes would be permitted. The right hon. member for Prince Albert once said in a debate some years ago that there were 93 strikes in Crown corporations in Saskatchewan and that 53 of them were settled by compulsory arbitration. When the state takes over completely, that is what happens to labour.

I see my time is just about up and I will complete my remarks in one sentence. When personnel are given stock options, with proper regulations, to encourage the expansion and development of corporations, there will be fuller employment.

Mr. Flemming: Mr. Chairman, one would assume from looking at Bill C-259, which is about three inches thick and contains about 700 pages, that it would furnish any speaker with sufficient ammunition for making a speech without any difficulty. However, I find I do have difficulty and the reason is that this bill is so ponderous and so complex that I submit an ordinary member who has some other interests to think of cannot possibly digest properly what is in it. As a consequence, he is working at a disad-vantage in talking about it item by item. I think, however, I will acknowledge that this is a most important bill. Presumably it is the condensation of all the measures relative to income tax that have been in existence since about 1917.

I believe that the hon. members opposite find just as much trouble in speaking on this bill as I do, because none of them have been speaking. No speeches have been made from that side in connection with the bill. The minister rises and says a few words, and from then on it is the opposition that carries on the debate. I believe the hon. member for Calgary South is the only member who has spoken.

An hon. Member: There were four yesterday.

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Chairman, I wish to rise on a point of order. I am sure the hon. gentleman would not want to leave on the record a statement that there have been no speeches from this side when the record clearly shows that there were. I am sure that is not the way in which he would wish to deal with the House. In all fairness he would want to correct that, I am sure.

Mr. Woolliams: There were so few that I would not mention them.

Mr. Flemming: The hon. gentleman is probably right. I would not want to deliberately misrepresent the situation, but I did not happen to hear them. If they made them apparently they were not important enough to cause anyone on our side to be sufficiently impressed to talk about them. It seems they may have spoken but they said very little of any consequence.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mahoney: It just means that you do not listen.

Mr. Flemming: I cannot answer both the Postmaster General and the hon. member for Calgary South at the same time. Good speeches have been made by members on this side of the House, and they have put forward constructive suggestions, but apparently very few cabinet ministers are interested in them. Generally speaking, there are very few ministers here to listen. Remember, Mr. Chairman, this is a bill which affects the livelihood, welfare and well-being of all Canadians, yet cabinet ministers do not think it important enough to sit and listen to the debate. I will make an exception of the Postmaster General who usually is here.

Unless the parliamentary secretary from Calgary South is making more notes than I think he is, the constructive suggestions made by hon. members on this side are falling on deaf ears and empty benches. That is not good enough. On something as important as a 700 page bill, involving the well-being of practically all Canadians of adult age, surely we are entitled to have cabinet ministers listen to our representations. With the exception of a handful of faithful supporters, very few government members are here to listen to what we have to say. I repeat, that is not good enough.

The interpretation to be drawn from this is that everything in the bill is cut and dried, and will be passed, with the exception of a few minor amendments which the Minister of Finance has described as being largely technical in character. So I submit that the changes could have been made, and should have been made, by amendment to existing legislation rather than through this unwieldy document. The changes could have been shown at every page as they were made, and as we went along we could see what was in the original act as well as the proposed changes. In that way, we would be able to compare them. It seems to me this would be the intelligent way to go about making changes in the Income Tax Act.

We Conservatives believe in retaining what is good of the old. We discard what has outlived its usefulness, but we retain what is good. I think hon. members opposite should learn that lesson from the philosophy of the Conservatives. They should consider deleting as required, and then adding on what they think is in the public interest. But because they have not done this, I believe they deserve criticism.

In simple language, the meaning of the word "conservative" is a person who is disposed to maintain existing institutions and views. I submit there is no need for a 700 page bill with all its difficulties and complexities. All that was required was a condensation of the old act, which has been in existence since 1917, with the appropriate deletions and additions. I am not the only one who feels this way. The Canadian Pulp and Paper Association, in a brief submitted in September, 1971, had this to say:

> We urge that, during the stage leading to adoption of the bill by Parliament, careful consideration be given to further suggestions that will be forthcoming from the public.
> In this connection, the time available for study of the bill before passage and implementation for January 1, 1972, is extremely short. The bill is a most complex one, with new concepts and definitions. It will take many months for tax specialists to be able to understand its full impact and determine all the ramifications of the many new proposals. It is difficult to see how members of Parliament, with their many other responsibilities, will be able to understand fully the effects of the proposed reforms in the few weeks that will be available for study of the bill.

So, Mr. Chairman, I submit that the government is wrong in the way it has gone about this. It would be much more to the advantage of all of us, and of the Canadian people in general, had it gone about the matter of changes by way of amendments.

But since we started to discuss the bill, a special announcement was made by the Minister of Finance last Thursday. I think some of the things he announced then should have been announced quite a while ago. He was urged to make those changes, but I am prepared to concede that it is better late than never. His announcement has been referred to as a budget. In it he outlined tax reductions and other changes in the fiscal policies of the government. He started out by saying:

> In terms of production, employment and prices, the Canadian economy is on . . . course . . .

That reminds me of what used to be said about the man who underwent surgery—the operation was a success but the patient died. The minister says that everything is on course. Mr. Chairman, everything is on a very bad course, a very serious course. The minister reports that unemployment has increased. That is a matter of real concern to every member here. It certainly is a matter of real concern to me. Nobody wants to see a lot of unemployment in Canada.

Then, on page 2 of his speech we find reference to what he was going to do about the situation. I am not going to review his decisions item by item. Hon. members are familiar with them to quite an extent, but I do believe that the conclusion he reached, that he will have a $1 billion deficit, is something which deserves serious thought by all members. Generally speaking, this will mean an inflationary situation. I am not going to criticize the need for a deficit at this time, with the unemployment figures the way they are, but I maintain that the government deserves to be censored because it ran deficits in the public accounts when times were good and the economy was bouyant. When times were good and the economy was bouyant the government should have been restricting its expenditures, and living within its budget, preparatory to the situation that has developed now. When times are hard I think that deficit financing is quite justified, but I object to it during good times. The government is guilty of gross mismanagement of the fiscal situation. My friend from Calgary South will have to take his share of the blame.

• (4:10 p.m.)

Mr. Mahoney: This is the first time we have been accused of having had good times.

Mr. Flemming: When was that said?

Mr. Mahoney: Just now.

Mr. Flemming: Our present inflation is the result of poor budgeting over a period when the economy was buoyant, and the parliamentary secretary cannot dispute that. When private enterprise was active and willing to carry the ball, it should have been allowed to do so. But the government was stupid enough not to allow private enterprise to do that. The parliamentary secretary can take his share of blame for that, too. Private enterprise needed labour, materials and money; but then the public sector moved in and became a competitor of private enterprise. It competed in those very areas in which private enterprise was willing to engage. So, the public sector went into competition with private enterprise and that is partly the reason for our present serious situation.

I am going to talk a bit about the adverse effect of the American import tax. I happen to be one who feels that anyone who is realistic and reasonably fair will understand the difficulties facing the government of the United States of America in its balance of payment position and in the situation that existed. I submit that when they imposed these import duties, Canada should have been automatically exempted from them. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this is where this government fell down. This government did not conduct itself in a way that would have brought about Canada's exemption from the effects of the 10 per cent import tax. Members of the government had said certain things. Apparently there was a breakdown in communications and, consequently, Canada was not exempt from the provisions of the import tax. Even as late as when the Prime Minister made his trip to Moscow, what did we find was being said? The Prime Minister said that Canada has increasingly found it important to diversify its channels of communication because of the overpowering presence of the United States of America and that this was reflected in the growing consciousness amongst Canadians of the danger to our national identity from the cultural, economic and perhaps even military point of view.

If I had a customer to whom I was selling 85 per cent of my exports, I do not think I would go out of my way, when in a strange country with which my customer was not too friendly, to make any statements about the channels of communication with that customer. It appears that the channels of communication are pretty nearly closed at present. There is an almost complete lack of communication between ourselves and Washington at present. And so, I ask, what are we to do about this? That is a good question. What is this government prepared to do? They have never told us. Telling us has never seemed important. They have never told us what they intend to do.

Mr. Woolliams: Let Mr. Kosygin make the statement.

Mr. Flemming: We know that when the United States imposed these extra import duties, Canada was not exempt, as it usually has been. So, I ask, what has brought this about, Mr. Chairman? Why is it evident to us today that there is this change in attitude? This government must take full responsibility for that change in attitude; there is no question about that, not a bit. There ought to be no question about their explaining this matter. The government's own supporters should see to it that the government explains why this situation has come about.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Flemming: I could go on and on—

An hon. Member: That's pretty weak.

Mr. Flemming: I wonder if everyone knows that we buy as much from the United States as Japan, Great Britain, the Common Market and Western Germany combined. Canada, with 20 million people, buys that much. Why, Mr. Chairman, we are very close to the Americans; we live on the same continent. Not only do we live on the same continent; we live here under conditions of great friendship.

Mr. Woolliams: That is right.

Mr. Flemming: That is the way it always was, and therefore something must have happened. I do not know what it is; but the government must know, and it is up to this government to explain to the Canadian people how this change came about and why it came about.

Mr. Reid: The Americans do not want to play it our way anymore.

Mr. Flemming: All right, they do not want to play it our way. What are we to do? The hon. gentleman says that they do not want to play it our way. Are we to say that we will not sell them our gas or oil? What shall we do with our oil? To whom can we sell it? We do not drink it. What can we do with it?

Mr. Mahoney: Ask the NDP, don't ask us. Keeping it is their idea.

Mr. Flemming: The point, Mr. Chairman, and I say this with great respect to the hon. member for Calgary south, is that the government has blundered hopelessly and mismanaged our affairs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Flemming: I am surprised that the government's own supporters sit there like a flock of sheep and stand for it.

An hon. Member: Come off it, now.

Mr. Mahoney: The hon. member does not really mean that.

Mr. Flemming: I am surprised at my hon. friend from Madawaska-Victoria.

Mr. Corbin: The hon. member can do better than that.

Mr. Flemming: I am surprised that my hon. friend for Madawaska-Victoria just sits there and does not say anything. I have great respect for him, of course—

Mr. Corbin: Mr. Chairman, I have a great spokesman in the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Woolliams: The hon. member had better not say that in his constituency, because he will never be returned to this House.

The Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt this exchange, but the time of the hon. member who has the floor has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Chairman: Is there unanimous consent for the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: The hon. member finished, and not a minute too soon.

Mr. Flemming: Mr. Chairman, I heard someone saying something about my finishing not a minute too soon. Apparently there is not unanimous agreement.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Corbin: The hon. member knows that we like listening to him.

Mr. Flemming: Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word or two about the pulp and paper industry. There is a large plant located in the constituency of the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria. It is one of the eight pulp and paper mills of New Brunswick. Speaking in general terms, I believe that that industry is having a difficult time at present. I will not go into the reasons. They stem, partly, from the imposition of the import duty, partly from losses connected with the premium on United States funds, and so on. I happen to be in the lumber business and know something about it. As I say, there are eight pulp and paper mills in New Brunswick which have made representations to the government on behalf of the pulp and paper industry concerning the tax bill. They ask for certain considerations, and I support their request. These mills, as I say, are located in New Brunswick at Edmundston, Atholville, Bathurst, Newcastle, Saint John—there are two mills in that city—St. George and Nackawick.

We have at present the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. This department is doing a good deal to stimulate industry all across the country. I give them credit for this. However, they are not in a position and I do not think the statute allows them to do that which would be helpful to the pulp and paper industry.

In the province of Quebec and to some extent in the province of New Brunswick, there are many pulp and paper mills that were established a good many years ago. Their machinery is obsolete and they are not able to compete. Yet, within a few miles of the location of one of these mills, the department is establishing a new mill. They make a large grant to pay for new machinery in the new mill, so at public expense, Mr. Chairman, this company is given the competitive advantage of up to date machinery and equipment. As a consequence, they are able to produce in a much more competitive way than other companies. Possibly the government might consider, and I ask the parliamentary secretary to take note of this, that obsolescence as well as expansion of pulp and paper plants justifies the investment of public funds. I belong to that group of people who feel it is just as important to maintain an industry already in existence as to establish a new one. It is also much less expensive.

I do not think the attention of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion should be directed entirely to expansion of an existing industry or creation of a new industry. Not too long ago I read an article in a Montreal newspaper about the pulp and paper mills in Quebec. According to this article, the machinery in many of these mills is obsolete. They are not able to compete with mills which have more modern machinery. I ask the Postmaster-General to keep this in mind. When sitting around the executive council table, he might make representations with regard to pulp and paper mills in his and other provinces which have obsolete equipment. I am not going to impose on the good nature of the House and go on at length. Although I have not completed all my remarks, I will not speak any longer. I appreciate the generosity of hon. members on both sides in allowing me to continue beyond my time. Perhaps I will complete my remarks some other time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Corbin: Will the hon. member permit a question? Does he agree that to a certain extent part of the problems that the pulp and paper industries in Canada have is a world glut situation, an overproduction problem, which they have lived with in recent years and, just as important, problems of mismanagement or lack of good management within the industry? Does the hon. member agree that to some extent that is part of their problem?

Mr. Flemming: In the first instance, Mr. Chairman, I do not disagree. However, I do not feel capable of judging the management of the pulp and paper industry in Quebec and New Brunswick in particular. I do not know. I was under the impression that they were pretty well managed. When you try to sell them anything, they do an awful lot of chiselling in order to get the price down. If that is good management, I think they are pretty well managed.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Chairman, it is always a pleasure to follow the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte who, I am sure, is greatly respected by all members of this House. His sincerity has never been in question. He has had a tremendous amount of experience. We listened to his remarks with a great deal of interest.

There is no question about it, we are dealing with a very complex bill. When there are some 97 amendments to a bill, you know it is complex and complicated. No one has to tell you this. Lawyers and accountants find it impossible to interpret this bill. Outstanding tax authorities think it will take up to one year before interpretations can be validated. Lawyers are advising their clients to wait until this measure is passed before making any wills or changing any legal documents of consequence. Business has been uncertain and frightened, and has been afraid to move since the white paper on taxation reform was first introduced. There are now 97 amendments under scrutiny.

Many parts of the bill will be changed and rewritten. All of this discussion about tax reform took place before the 10 per cent American surtax on imports was applied. This makes the complexity of the problem far greater. It is almost impossible for anyone to speak in this House on this subject with any degree of authority. We must ask ourselves about American investment in Canada. Is the United States going to apply a 25 per cent surtax on dividends from investments in this country when we so desperately need capital investment? What will be done with pension funds? Will that apply to all with over a 10 per cent investment in the United States? How many people will be affected? How will it affect us economically? There have been no explanations in the House about that situation.

Even though we are a part of the problem, we wonder why, instead of blasting the Americans for the last year, we were not going about making trade arrangements similar to the auto pact which is so valuable. It started in a small way. I was in the House the day the bill regarding auto transmissions was introduced. That was the start of the auto pact. Why has this pattern not been pursued with more vigor for the past two or three years so that this 25 per cent of our export trade would not be affected now? The auto pact gives Canada a half billion dollar trading advantage. Why were other fields of trade not explored in order to open new markets in which we could be competitive?

Everyone is aware of the acute problems connected with United States trade. The Americans, in spite of inflation, followed the Marshall plan which set up Germany, Japan and Taiwan and many other countries as trading rivals. The other day I was told of a nationally known American firm which set up subsidiaries in two other countries. One company could ship into another country and undersell companies in that country. The other company, in turn, could ship back to the parent company and sell back to them at a lower price than they could manufacture it. It is quite apparent that the Americans, who have not done anything about their dollar since the Bretton Woods agreement, had to do something. They were literally financially bleeding to death as a result of their deficits. In spite of seeking freer trade in the field where we can best compete, it seems that for the past year we have been trying to annoy the Americans at every turn. I wonder why? We try to slight them by running to meet and cultivate new friends, people with philosophies entirely different from ours.

I believe Canadians should always get preferential treatment in their own country, whether they are manufacturers, professional men, business men or working men. But I do not believe we should castigate anyone else for our own faults or for the position in which we now find ourselves. I noted that the other day the Prime Minister had the courage to admit that the government had made a miscalculation. Oh, Mr. Chairman, it would fill a book. Then again, the cuts we have made in our NATO forces, the defence policies we have followed, our "one China" policy, are not such as to make friends of Japan or the United States or Europe. Why keep on insulting our Canadian friends in the United States? Mr. Chairman, there are more French Canadians in the United States than there are in the whole of Canada. There are more Canadians in the United States than there are in Canada itself. Yet through the press and the CBC we keep on insulting them.

We send our emissaries to the United States to bring back our trained professional people. We sent people down there on one occasion to my knowledge; they advertised and set up a cocktail party in an attempt to win back to this country scientists who had left Canada to go to the United States where they were able to find greater opportunities. No wonder the adventure was a failure. How did we treat them when they were here? I asked a question about this today. I asked why we had to turn down 640 Canadians who were fully qualified to enter our medical schools, while accepting over 1,000 students from foreign countries whose standards are lower than ours and who can ill-afford to give up the services of these people.

Consider, for a moment, the size of the deficit. Federally it will amount to more than a billion dollars. In Ontario, it will soon be more than half a billion dollars. Where will this money be found? These are a few of the questions which should be answered. And with what pangs of conscience shall we recognize the answers when we think of the plight of the 600,000 who are presently unemployed, and of the trading picture in the light of recent events?

I could go on to speak at length on this subject. I could talk about the difficulties we encounter in our efforts to compete with foreign countries where wages and costs are much lower. But I want to be fair to the Canadian labouring man and to Canadian industry. We must remember that a wage-earner in Canada pays around 40 per cent of his dollar in taxes as compared with 20 per cent in some of the countries with which we are competing. So the Canadian worker is bound to demand more money than his counterpart abroad. Industry is obliged to charge more for the same reason. There are only two ways of competing successfully in such a situation as this—one is to increase production and the other is to employ better machinery which would turn out products faster and more cheaply. I do not see the government moving in this direction at all.

I wish to speak now for a few minutes on the subject of credit unions. I have spoken on this issue before. I believe it is an important one for the Canadian people, particularly for those who live in the small country places. These are the people who work among themselves, the friendly people, the people who know one another. It is a great advantage for them to be able to do business among themselves. The basis upon which these credit unions are set up is that members who have a certain amount of money make it available for borrowing by people who need it, and the rate of interest is much lower than that which is commercially available on the finance market. We should assess the activities of these credit unions on the basis of answers to such questions as: How do they operate? How are they run? What do they do with any profits received? Do they accumulate reserves? Who administers them?

All the credit unions with which I have been familiar have been controlled by a board of directors. Most of them have set up committees to deal with loan applications, determine whether funds are available to meet any requests and whether a loan should be made. Neighbours and friends know the backgrounds of applicants better than anybody else. They are in a position to judge their ability to repay any sums advanced. Nine times out of ten, debtors will do a better job of repaying loans in these circumstances than they might had they borrowed from an outside source. About the only form of levy presently imposed on credit unions is paid to the credit union league. In Ontario this amounts to $1.50 and I assume the arrangement is similar in other provinces.

The credit union league is a body set up to keep credit unions healthy and give them advice. The federal government now advances a proposal to tax the reserves built up by the unions. But these are the very reserves which provincial governments have insisted should be set up. I have looked over the record, and I know of no case in which anyone has lost any money on investments in credit unions. Yet about 80 per cent of all the credit unions in Canada have assets amounting to less than $500,000. In Ontario, where some 1500 credit unions are operating, the amount in reserve is around $45 million. A guaranteed fund has been set up and is regulated by provincial legislation in the Province of Ontario—I expect there is similar legislation in effect in other provinces across Canada.

Many of those who are connected with the operation of small credit unions in rural communities are, by the nature of things, inexperienced in money management. Many of these people need advice. They are not professionals in the field of investment. It is a very good thing that the unions should have the benefit of this provincial supervision and of the reserve which has been established. It seems to me that federal tax legislation in this field would necessarily be in conflict with provincial thinking—that there would be direct conflict with regard to the determination of what might be regarded as excessive reserves by Federal authorities. It is not unlikely that many of the smaller credit unions would be scared of ever reaching the paws of government taxation, and prefer to close down their organization. If there were many such decisions it might be embarrassing. The situation might even be a difficult one for the stabilization fund of the Ontario Credit Union League to handle.

Bill C-259 proposes to tax credit unions in the same manner as other corporations are taxed. But corporations operate on the basis of a permanent capital system, as do most businesses. Capital in a credit union is share capital only; it does not include loans by members. Limits are placed on the amount which can be deducted from capital and it cannot be reduced below 5 per cent of the amount of members' capital employed. Credit unions do not require permanent capital in order to conduct their operations; they lend money as they get it when members' savings are made available to them. In effect, a credit union is just a big family, borrowing from those who have money and lending to those who need it. This is a simple explanation of the way in which a credit union works, as I see it. Let the federal government keep out of this.

Dividends paid on credit union shares represent the cost of doing business. The savings of members are called shares. They really amount to risk capital in the event of liquidation. The shares are savings deposits and they may be withdrawn on demand. They do not appreciate in value; you get the same amount back. Therefore, they do not yield a capital gain. The dividends on members' shares have always been treated as ordinary interest income and are taxable, and any member of the credit union pays tax on any dividends he receives. He pays personal tax as well, so therefore you have double taxation. The credit union disburses practically all of its income, generally speaking, and is taxed at whatever rate it is taxed at on personal income.

It is interesting to note that credit unions have today over $5 million in assets, and have just over that in numbers of members. In little communities across Canada they are performing a very useful service indeed. They make financing and credit available to look after the needs of the community at a low rate of interest compared to the finance companies. Therefore, it seems to me to be folly of the worst kind, and unjustified in the community life of Canadians, to subject any small credit union to taxation, when the government already tax interest or dividends that come into the hands of the fellow who has lent the money.

If I have time, Mr. Chairman, I should like to dwell for a moment or two on the subject of accounts receivable. I know that the general rule is that taxpayers who are in business must compute their taxable income on the billed basis. I realize that the government will say that this measure is bringing the situation up to date and putting the professional class in the same position as businessmen. I also know the government says that it is not contemplated that professionals will have to estimate the value of their work in progress at the end of the year unless they want to do so. But this recognizes the fact that work in progress is very difficult to evaluate until it has been completed and an account rendered.

I should like to know how this provision is going to affect OHSIP, which is national health insurance. Sometimes the government is two or three months behind with its accounts. Is the government going to levy a tax not only on accounts that have been paid but also on accounts that will not be paid until the new year? The same situation would prevail if the government introduced a denticare plan, because there too the payment of accounts would lag behind. If the government is going to levy tax on outstanding accounts, then it is getting the use of money that it should not have.

The government would probably argue that if these accounts are not collected they could be written off the next year. However, the government has brought in a national medicare plan so we hope that no calamity of that sort will occur. Although I am talking about my own profession, the same is true of other fields as well. I feel that this approach of the government is wrong. When this question comes up for further discussion, I should like to see some of these problems rectified. The switch from a cash basis to a billed basis for computing income requires special provisions to cover the amounts that have been billed and not collected at the start of the system. Special rules will have to be made in taxing deferred income, and this matter will require the attention of the committee and surely some amendment.

To recapitulate, tax will not be levied on bad debts or even those legitimately considered to be doubtful of collection, though these will be difficult to assess. In addition, according to what I have read the minister does not believe that any real hardship will be caused to the professionals to whom I have referred. However, I have pointed out that this is not so. After all, it is the government that runs medicare, and if they happen to be two or three months behind in making payment this will cause a problem. It will be taxation on money not received. There should be some amendment made to the bill to take care of this time lag.

The same situation prevails with the man who holds bonds that mature on November 30. If he pays his income tax quarterly, he would have to compute his interest on those bonds at quarterly intervals even though he had not yet received that interest. The government is doing a bit of monkey shining that it would not allow anybody else to do, and quite frankly I do not think the government could collect this money in any court of the land. The same can be said of Canada savings bonds and other bonds.

I could go on to talk about the field of dental care, but let me dwell for a moment on the provisions of this bill as they affect farmers, though I intend to say more about this at a later stage. The basic herd and straight line depreciation are going to be phased out. Livestock farmers will be able to establish a basic herd as at December 31, 1971, which I guess they will call "D Day". Any gain thereon will be tax free, but no additions to the basic herd may be made after that date. When livestock is sold after that date, the sale may be considered to be out of the basic herd or the other herd, subject to special rules and regulations. I suggest that this provision will need looking into.

Assets acquired after December 31, 1971 must be depreciated in accordance with the diminishing balance system. I am not entirely clear what is meant by that. If proceeds from the sale of assets depreciated on the straight line basis exceed the cost, this excess is a capital gain.

[Mr. Rynard.]

The Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I do so to advise him that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that the hon. member for Simcoe North shall continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Rynard: May I thank the committee for its courtesy, and I will be very brief. The present $5,000 limitation will continue so far as hobby farmers are concerned. In addition, any amounts of interest and property taxes not deducted because of this limitation may be applied to reduce any proceeds on the eventual sale of the farm. The treatment of the income gained from farming will be brought more into line with tax treatment of other businesses. Perhaps it would be embarrassing to you, Mr. Chairman, if I asked you how you felt about this. The result of reforms in this area will be that probably farmers will be taxed more heavily. The fact that no new additions can be made to the basic herd as established at December 31, 1971 and that sales must be deducted will obviously adversely affect the farmer; I cannot see how it will do otherwise.

The diminishing balance rate for assets acquired after December 31, 1971 will be at twice the straight line rate, the same as in other businesses. Some benefit does exist in so far as there is a faster write-off in the earlier years. However, the farmer is forced to calculate the undepreciated value of his assets each year. It is impossible to deduct more than the original cost of an asset. The measure is subtle and probably means that the farmer's taxable income will be greater.

A farmer may elect to claim either a complete exemption on his farm house and one surrounding acre—no capital gain will be calculated when he sells his farm or his house though farm machinery and barn will still be subject to capital gains—or to deduct $1,000 per year against the value of all his farm property including his house. For many farmers this will not mean much but farmers who sell to developers will face a large tax bill. Today, Mr. Chairman, many farmers are faced with this very thing.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Chairman, I have just a few words to put forward some ideas to this committee at this time. It seems to me that the government is not offering tax reform as much as a tax change. At the same time, according to the statement made in the House the other day, large amounts of money are being made available immediately in order to pull the economy out of a tailspin, so in essence two proposals are before the House. It would seem to me that it is rather important to this country that these proposals be co-ordinated. But this does not seem to be the case, Mr. Chairman.

Agriculture is facing difficult times as a result of the U.S. surcharge, and before that as a result of action in the European Common Market, and before that as a result of the pending decision of the United Kingdom to consider entering the Common Market. We have not developed policies for agriculture which will meet these circumstances. All the tax bill does for agriculture is devise new methods of imposing new taxes on the person who is trying to survive on the farm, as well as on the co-operatives which he has built and used as an extension of his farming and marketing power. The slowdown in agriculture and farming in significant parts of Canada gives rise to unemployment. The government is attempting to persuade us that this situation will be met with the money they will make available for loans or grants for crash programs this winter.

I fail to see, however, where the planned thrust to get the economy going emerges in this total program. Indeed, I think its real shortcoming is the fact that it is not a total program but a patchwork or an ad hoc program. The whole tax approach is patchwork and the program is a patchwork. The government does not say to us in clear terms that collectively these programs will correct the unemployment situation. In the last two or three days I have listened to questions put to the government asking what their objective is and what they think these programs will achieve by way of reducing unemployment. The answers do not come through clearly; rather, there is evasion. This is the thing that disturbs me about the whole approach of the government.

Last night I was reading the Country Guide, a magazine of some standing published in western Canada by one of the major grain companies. In an article entitled "Agriculture's Stake in the New U.S. Economic Policy" our position is examined. One would expect that when the government brings forth a policy for the coming winter or the longer term it would take agriculture's stake into account, but it does not. I am sure we are looking at the same thing on the employment side. When people in my city become unemployed and start looking for jobs they find themselves against a blank wall. When I ask them if they went to the manpower office they ask to what purpose. They will go to the Unemployment Insurance Commission or answer advertisements in the newspaper but when I ask if they look for training they ask, training for what? There are reports and charges that people become professionals at dodging from one training slot to another.

My main purpose this afternoon, Mr. Chairman, is to persuade this government to take an over-all look at the needs of the Canadian economy and to build the forward thrust and confidence we so badly need to enable ordinary business to invest with confidence and so that the co-operatives, which are an important part of the total business in my area, will know where they stand. At present they are wondering if they are going to have to change their structure in order to comply with these new tax proposals. They should have confidence that they can continue to meet the demands made upon them by the people who created and use them. We need a forward thrust and a real motive in the economy toward employing people and creating the things that we can use and the things that we want. If we could get this kind of co-ordination then, as we go through this tax package, hopefully we could bring in some amendments which would make it a worthwhile and workable document.

Income Tax Act

• (5:00 p.m.)

Mr. Skoreyko: Mr. Chairman, when I spoke on this measure the other day I dealt with a number of items, some of which I consider to be anomalies in the bill. I said I hoped the government would take into consideration some of the recommendations made by the opposition. Most of us on this side of the House are concerned about this massive 707 page bill which is before us because, not only is it complicated in its makeup, but it represents a danger to the Canadian taxpayer. There is an absence in this bill of provisions which we on this side of the House have been advocating. We are concerned about this.

I suppose I might place on the record some of the omissions about which we are concerned. We are concerned about the absence of provisions to stimulate the resource development industry. We are concerned about the absence of provisions to create funds for land acquisition, to guarantee low income homes in the country which every politician in Canada talks about but about which nobody does anything. We are concerned about the ramifications in Bill C-259 in respect of shifting the tax burden. When I talk about shifting the tax burden I should say I believe there is a good clause in this bill which would relieve thousands of taxpayers of the small amount of tax they have been paying in the past. I believe they will appreciate that.

I think it is disgraceful, however, that the very rich should, under this measure, have their taxes reduced. In order for the government to continue to bring in a given amount of money required to run the nation the tax load is shifting to the middle income groups. This no longer represents the petty larcency of which this government has been guilty on so many occasions. This, in my opinion, is grand larcency in its extreme. In respect of the high inflationary measures this government has undertaken in the recent past I was hoping something would be incorporated in Bill C-259 to correct some of these mistakes. What has the government done in terms of stimulating certain industries, particularly the resource development industry, and especially the mining industry? I am not too close to the industry itself although I know a number of people in it. The anti-inflationary measures adopted by this government a year ago have created chaos in the mining industry, particularly in the Vancouver area. A number of companies in that region of Canada today lie dormant awaiting some action on the part of the government so that at least they will be offered a little encouragement through having funds made available to them at reasonable interest rates for purposes of further expansion and development.

Speculative investment in the mining industry has been curtailed because of the government's action in slowing down the economy generally. I know of two or three well-known Canadian companies with holdings in Northern British Columbia, which also have holdings in Brazil and Chile, which have closed down their British Columbia operations and moved into other parts of the world in order to expand their operations, notwithstanding the fact that the political climate might not be as stable as it is on the North American continent. What then have the anti-inflationary measures of this government done? I suggest the resource industry is the heaviest loser, not only in terms of production but also in terms of lack of incentive to develop and expand. Employment opportunities, direct and indirect, have a great impact on the Canadian labour force. Surely, no one need remind the government that in that area much more could be done. The anti-inflationary measures have seriously reduced the level of investment not only in mining but also in the gas and oil industry. There has been a serious reduction in exploration, and Bill C-259 in the face of all the government has done in the past year will hinder the development of these industries still further.

No other industry in Canada can generate a chain reaction in respect of employment as quickly or as efficiently as the mining industry. The government's responsibility to that industry is to make the tax structure of this nation palatable to that industry. Oh yes, we have programs. We have the regional expansion and development program. Through that program, literally millions of dollars have been distributed into certain areas of the country. Where has this money gone? It is difficult to establish where it has gone and the reason. I believe it would be reasonable to ask the minister of that particular department to provide this House with figures concerning the number of jobs that have been provided under that specific program. This program discriminates against certain areas and regions of Canada. I should like to know what that program since its inception has generated in terms of putting people to work.

Yesterday I talked about one of the shortcomings in the bill. I referred to the $150 allowable as a deduction for tax purposes for an individual who in order to ply his trade must buy certain equipment. Most businesses are allowed all proven or certified expenses. Most businessmen drive a company car to work and charge a large portion of that expense against their taxes. The individual who, by reason of his trade or profession, must have certain tools or equipment in order to hold on to his job or to continue to work in that kind of employment is allowed to deduct $150 a year for the replacement or the purchase of additional equipment. If you allow a business, regardless of whether it is large or small, to charge against its income all legitimate expenses that are created by reason of the operation of that business, then is it unreasonable of me to ask the government to consider the plight of the individual who has $300, $400 or $500 worth of equipment. I am thinking, for example, of a plumber or a garage mechanic who must have $1,000 worth of equipment. It is not inconceivable to find many mechanics losing $300 or $400 worth of tools in a year. They leave tools in cars, some of them get stolen and some of them literally walk away. To allow $150 is, I suppose, a step in the right direction but I should like to point out that if you allow businesses, large or small, to charge against earned income all reasonable expenses necessary for the maintenance of those businesses, then I do not think it is at all unreasonable to suggest that the same should apply to the man who, by reason of his type of employment, has to incur expenses in connection with the tools of his trade.

How important are tax reductions, particularly if the tax deductions are in the right area? I think it would be fair to say that the government should take a quick look at the automobile industry in Canada and what can be done in that area. We know that recently, in the face of the 10 per cent surtax in the United States, the government has offered Canadian industry an $80 million assistance program. However, one of the things we have failed to examine—I am not against foreign car sales in Canada but I should like someone to examine the matter carefully—is the reason Toyota, Mazda or Volkswagen have increased their sales in the last two years by tremendous percentages over the Canadian or U.S. made automobiles. As a matter of fact, Canadian automobiles in certain areas have lost some of the Canadian market.

I have not checked but I believe there is a federal tax on Canadian automobiles which makes them higher in price than the same automobiles built and sold in the United States. Surely, if you want to stimulate an industry, the removal of that tax would have a tremendous chain reaction in so far as jobs are concerned. This might have been one of the areas to which Bill C-259 could have given some consideration. I have referred only to the automobile industry because I think that, in the light of the $80 million allocated by the government recently, this is a really good example where maintaining a tax on a Canadian built product and allowing massive shipments of imported automobiles into the country to replace Canadian made cars will put the Canadian manufacturer in the position of selling cars built in Canada at a higher price than the same cars built in the United States, which is unfair. This applies not only to the automobile industry, but I imagine it applies also to the television manufacturer, the refrigerator manufacturer and the stove manufacturer. The tax is there, and shortly some consideration should be given to this point.

I want to deal now with a number of the items in a bill which is so vast that it is virtually impossible to cover any portion of it in the time that is allowed us under the rules. I just want to put on the record some of the items of income that will now become taxable. For instance, one half of certain income becomes capital gain. I do not wish to deal with that again today because I dealt with it two or three weeks ago when I spoke. Then, there are payments under an income maintenance insurance plan to which the employer has made a contribution, the contribution paid by an individual in 1967 to be deductible from any payment he receives. Then, there are allowances paid under the adult educational training program, not including the portion of a person's living expenses while living away from home during his training, and allowances paid under the textile and clothing board. There are the scholarships and bursaries with the $500 exemption, and I dealt with those the other day. Consider the family that needs assistance, the smart lad who gets a $1,000 bursary and who is then charged a tax on 50 per cent of it. That is a generous contribution .

By putting together new personal exemptions, new tax rates and new items of income, figures will show that a man earning a certain salary today, allowing for increases over the next ten years, will be far worse off than had we stayed with the present tax system. Let me give an example. If an individual today earned $9,750 for a taxable income of $8,000, allowances of $1,500 plus $100 plus $150, and we assume that his wages increased by 8 per cent a year, promotional plus usual increase, then in 1978 his income will be $15,472, and his taxable income would be $13,722. In 1972, his tax on $9,750 will be $2,193.50, which combines federal and provincial, and in 1978 this individual will pay $4,327 in tax. In other words, Mr. Chairman, I am saying that in six years his income has increased by 60 per cent, and his taxes have increased by 97 per cent.

• (5.20 p.m.)

Mr. Mahoney: How much more does he get to keep?

Mr. Skoreyko: How much more will you get to keep when your tax bill goes from 50 per cent to 97 per cent? Do you get much more to keep? I repeat that in six years his income has increased by 60 per cent, and his taxes have increased by 97 per cent. I ask the parliamentary secretary to tell me how much more he has to keep.

Mr. Mahoney: They are your figures.

Mr. Skoreyko: They are researched figures. They do not lie. But if there is any doubt about the figures that I have put on record, I ask the parliamentary secretary to take pencil and paper tomorrow, if he is capable, and figure out if I am right or wrong.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, the last time I had the opportunity to take part in this debate was on the occasion when the members of the Official Opposition were endeavouring to get the government to postpone the long, tortuous process that has been involved in the discussion of fundamental tax reform. On that occasion it was felt that the Canadian economy, as a result of government mismanagement, had entered into a period of crisis that was aggravated by the fact that we had been living under the shadow of the threat of the white paper, and now under the ponderous weight of a piece of legislation that is almost as large as the family bible but, I can assure you, not as enlightening. Recent events, in fact events within the last week, have vindicated the members of the Official Opposition for the position they took on that occasion. At last the government recognized that we were living under the shadow of a major economic crisis and, as announced by the Minister of Finance on Thursday evening last, it took belated emergency action.

To illustrate the point that we have been making since the House resumed early in September, I want to deal with one or two specific parts of this bill which I hope will indicate that the government is not only confused in its approach to fundamental tax reform but also that within this ponderous volume itself there are measures that are contradictory. Other hon. members have dealt with vital and important matters with respect to the well-being of the Canadian economy, the impact that this bill will have, the deleterious effect it will have on the resource industries, the agricultural industry and so forth. In the short time at my disposal, I want to demonstrate that this bill will have a very detrimental impact on the charitable contributions that might become available to public organizations such as universities, museums, churches, or any other similar organization engaged in voluntary charitable activity.

It seems that the government has a penchant for moving in on voluntary initiative on the part of the citizens of Canada. Only recently, through changes to the Post Office regulations, privileges with respect to the use of the mails that encouraged important charitable activities of organizations such as the War Amps, the attack on tuberculosis and other organizations dealing with problems experienced by the disabled, were withdrawn from those organizations. Now, here is another example of the government intruding more and more on the initiative of the individual Canadian, moving forward with its big brother complex, and seemingly not aware of what it is doing. On the one hand, it is saying that it wants to encourage this sort of voluntary activity, but on the other hand specific clauses in this bill will have a severely discouraging effect on the amount of charitable contributions that will be available for institutions of higher learning and museums.

To get right to the heart of the matter, I point specifically to clause 70 in Part I of the bill, a Part which runs for some 200 pages in this 700 page volume. I doubt that even the parliamentary secretary has read the bill in detail in order to become aware of the contradictions that exist within it. Clause 70(5) reads:

> Where in a taxation year a taxpayer has died, the following rules apply:
> (a) the taxpayer shall be deemed to have disposed of each property owned by him immediately before his death that was a capital property of the taxpayer (other than depreciable property) and to have received proceeds of disposition therefor equal to the fair market value of the property at that time;
> (b) the taxpayer shall be deemed to have disposed of all depreciable property of a prescribed class owned by him immediately before his death and to have received proceeds of disposition therefor equal to,
> (i) where the fair market value of that property at that time exceeds the undepreciated capital cost thereof to the taxpayer at that time, the amount of that undepreciated capital cost plus ½ of the amount of the excess, and
> (ii) in any other case, the fair market value of that property at that time plus ½ of the amount, if any, by which the undepreciated capital cost thereof to the taxpayer at that time exceeds that fair market value;

I hope that when the parliamentary secretary makes a contribution to this discussion he will explain that in plain English. This bill goes on for page after page, hundreds of pages, with this kind of gobbledygook. No wonder the people of Canada are confused. No wonder the legislation is having a harmful effect on the buoyancy of the economy. Let me put this in plain English for the sake of the parliamentary secretary.

Clause 70(5) provides that a deceased taxpayer shall be deemed to have disposed of each of his capital properties, other than depreciable property, immediately before his death for its fair market value at that time. Clause 70(5)(b) provides in effect that depreciable property of a deceased taxpayer is deemed to have been disposed of at the average of its undepreciated capital cost and its fair market value at the date of death. Where property has been left by a taxpayer to his spouse or to a trust fund for the benefit of his spouse, these deemed dispositions may be deferred until the property is actually disposed of or until the spouse's death, but this in no way eliminates the tax liability; it merely postpones it.

Let me give the parliamentary secretary some specific examples of what will happen. If, under a will, an individual leaves to a university, religious organization or community charitable camp his summer property, including surrounding land, which cost him $10,000 in 1972 and which is worth $35,000 at the date of his death in 1980, he will be deemed to have disposed of his property immediately before his death for $35,000, resulting in the realization of a capital gain of $25,000, one half of which, or $12,500, will have to be included in computing his income for the year in which he died.

Mr. Nielsen: The only thing that is left to tax is the corpse.

Mr. Dinsdale: Also if, under his will, an individual leaves to a charitable organization a fully rented factory building or apartment building which might be used for a senior citizens home, for example, which cost him $400,000 in 1972 and which at the time of his death in 1980 had an undepreciated capital cost of $200,000 and a fair market value of $700,000, he will be deemed to have disposed of the property for $450,000 immediately before his death. This will result in the addition to his income of the whole $200,000 of capital cost allowances taken during his lifetime and, in addition, he will be treated as having realized a capital gain of $50,000, one half of which, or $25,000, will also be required to be included in his income. We are speaking about inanimate property.

I am afraid, Mr. Chairman, that my time is running out. If we were to use the legal terminology, namely, inter vivos—I think that is the proper legal term, as I think some of my lawyer colleagues will agree—and make charitable gifts by way of inter vivos, the position would be even more serious.

Mr. Nielsen: It would be reductio ad absurdum.

Mr. Dinsdale: I am sure the minister will appreciate this. Let me give another example quickly. Paragraph 69(1)(b) provides that where a taxpayer has disposed of anything to any person by way of gift inter vivos, he is deemed to have disposed of it at its fair market value at that time.

As will be seen briefly, Mr. Chairman, from the foregoing examples, the income tax amending bill has created entirely new and onerous tax liabilities in respect of charitable bequests. Even though the legislation in paragraph 110(1)(a) specifically mentions that there are new allowances for charitable organizations which are considerably more generous, the government is giving with the one hand and taking away with the other, which I suggest is fundamentally inconsistent and indicates the sort of confusion that has gone into the gobbledygook that constitutes a good part of this voluminous bill.

To bring evidence before the committee this afternoon in order to show that the government is acting contrary to some recommendations coming from the minority report of Commissioner A. Emile Beauvais of the Royal Commission on Taxation, contrary to recommendations which came from the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce and contrary to recommendations made by the Standing Committee of the House of Commons on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, may I quote briefly, beginning with a quotation from the minority report of Commissioner A. Emile Beauvais, to be found at page 55 of volume 1. He was critical of a similar proposal in the majority report of the commission and stated:

According to the Report, when a gift was made of an item of property that had appreciated in value, a capital gain would be deemed to be realized and would be taxable. This might prevent many taxpayers from making gifts to universities, museums, etc. of valuable property that was not readily saleable, for example, an art collection. In such cases, I would not support this recommendation.

In the report of the House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs with respect to the white paper on tax reform, the committee recommended as follows at page 19:

To encourage gifts of works of art, manuscripts, scientific collections and so on, to public institutions, we also recommend an extension of Section 27(1)(b) of the Income Tax Act (which provides for deductions of gifts to Her Majesty in the right of Canada or a province) to include gifts to other Canadian public institutions which normally hold such objects for exhibition, study or research. We also recommend that capital gains tax provisions not apply with respect to such gifts.

Again, the report of the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce reads as follows at page 61:

With respect to gifts of property to museums and other charitable organizations, the Committee wishes to retain to the extent possible incentives for the continuation of such gifts, while at the same time, not permitting taxpayers an unfair use of such donations for the purpose of realizing tax benefits not basically contemplated by the taxing statute. On balance, therefore, your Committee came to the conclusion that there should be no capital gains tax imposed on gifts of property to museums, universities or charitable organizations, but that a taxpayer not be permitted to deduct in the computation of his income a greater amount under Section 27(1)(a) of the present Income Tax Act than the cost (or value on Valuation Day) to him of the asset donated.

The legislation that I have referred to briefly, and unfortunately there is not time for me to pursue the matter further, flies in the face of the recommendations contained in the minority report of Commissioner Beauvais, of the recommendation of the Senate Committee and of the recommendation of the House of Commons Committee on these matters. I cannot believe, Mr. Chairman, that the government deliberately wants to discourage the greater participation of the people of Canada in the very necessary charitable activities of this kind. Any of us who are connected with universities today—I see we have the Chancellor of Brandon University with us; I happen to sit on the board of that university—are conscious of the rising costs of education, and these provisions are having a negative effect on the generosity of the public. In the United States, they make provision for generous assistance from the estates of people who have the wherewithal to make a worth-while contribution in money, property or some other assets which may be left in the will.

I hope I have convinced the parliamentary secretary, who has been listening most attentively while talking to his colleagues, that here the government is guilty. He represents the minister at this time. The government is guilty of confusion and contradiction within the very framework of the legislation itself, I could go on if there were time at my disposal, and give many, many other examples of the sort of confusion that exists in the legislation.

We have tried, those of us who are on this side of the House, to convince the government that this is not the time to be fiddling around while Rome burns. I think the Leader of the Opposition put it in these terms: you should not be shingling the roof when the house is burning down.

Obviously, what happened one week ago in this House indicates that the government has at long last recognized that, in economic terms, financial terms as well as in terms of unemployment and runaway inflation, the economic house of Canada is burning down. Why are we at this time, then, in such unseemingly haste to get through such a confused and discouraging piece of legislation? When we come to the clause by clause consideration, obviously we will have to take a fundamental stand on the contradictions that are represented in subsections 70(5)(a) and (b), which relate to matters I have discussed this afternoon.

The government has brought in over 100 amendments. This almost suggests a complete rewriting of the bill. While we are at this preliminary stage, I ask the parliamentary secretary to communicate to his superiors on the treasury benches that if they are really intent on making sense out of nonsense, they will have to go much further than 100 amendments. I do not think 1,000 amendments will straighten out confusion of the type I have pointed out this afternoon.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I have listened to some very great contributions in the debate on this bill. Very few have come from the other side.

Mr. Dinsdale: They simply have not read it.

Mr. Nielsen: As my friend from Brandon-Souris says, they simply have not read it.

Mr. Dinsdale: They talk of faith, hope and no charity. They are doing away with charity.

Mr. Nielsen: All that members opposite are capable of doing is making speeches by interjections which are just about as empty as their heads.

I knew we were in a time of very high inflation. I did not really appreciate just how serious the problem was until I picked up a copy of the Financial Times the other day. On the front page was a picture of the boss or master, the Prime Minister. The Minister of Finance was scowling at him. The caption on the picture reads "The Billion Dollar Brains". If that is an example of billion dollar brains, it must be the ultimate in inflation.

I was interrupted on the last occasion when I was talking about the contribution that the prospector makes to the mining industry. I intend to conclude those remarks at this time. I was saying that it is hard to exactly estimate what contribution the prospector has made. However, I have had some research done which indicates the following.

Prior to 1920, prospectors accounted for over 90 per cent of the mineral discoveries made. Those discoveries numbered 28. Second, by 1950, prospectors in competition with other methods of detection accounted for over 80 per cent of all other discoveries made to that time. They numbered some 75. Third, by 1960 prospectors as lone operators still accounted for 35 per cent of all metal discoveries made, some 59. By 1970, prospectors in competition with highly sophisticated remote sensing techniques, still accounted for almost 25 per cent of all metal discoveries made, some 30.

As hon. members know, the bill seeks to eliminate the incentives that heretofore existed to encourage prospectors to search for minerals in this country. As the figures which I have just disclosed to members suggest, remote sensing and other sophisticated geophysical and geochemical techniques have made significant contributions to metal discoveries in the past two decades. However, even today, in competition with the most modern tools of metal exploration, one out of every four new finds comes from a prospector. A prospector, with his pack on his back, braving the hardships of bush life and the relatively short season that is available to him, conducts his activities.

It may be interesting to note exactly how metal deposits are found. The large number of exploration companies now operating in Canada operate with essentially two methods. First, there are modern integrated programs using the best available combination of geological, geophysical, geochemical and other techniques. Second, and this is the one that interests the prospector, and the one clause 59 of the bill will hit hardest, there are invitations for submission of worthy mineral prospects for further development. Those invitations are made and the prospectors know it. This latter technique emphasizes property acquisition by a company from individuals or small time operators who are unable to meet the necessary expenditures required to further evaluate any given property. Usually, a mutually beneficial scheme is arranged between company and prospector when the mineral property is transferred to the company.

Under current legislation, income to the prospector from the sale of such properties is not taxable. Clause 59 (1) of Bill C-259 proposes to make the sale of such properties taxable. This taxation proposed by Bill C-259 will undoubtedly have the effect of slowing down prospecting activities to the point that they will no longer be attractive. Prospectors will feel that if the incentive has disappeared, what is the point of going out and searching for new mineral finds. It is going to slow down the new finds. Logically, it will slow down new mine production. It is going to have an effect on the over-all national economic pattern.

Mr. Dinsdale: No wonder the economy is slowing down.

Mr. Nielsen: Precisely. That is just one small example. The member for Brandon-Souris has given others. Other members on this side have also given reasons why the economy is slowing down. The fact that it will no longer be attractive for prospectors to look for minerals because of this clause will result in a fewer number of prospectors. Canada's metal industry and general economic well-being will be adversely affected. I ask hon. members to consider the following criteria.

First, not all metal discoveries made are economic to the point that extraction of the ore can immediately be profitably pursued. In fact, a large number of these occurrences are initially sub-economic. They are put away on the shelf until such times as economic conditions make extraction profitable. Many such shelved occurrences wait ten years or more between discovery and production.

The prospector has been instrumental in placing such occurrences on what I like to call company shelves. In fact, recent estimates suggest that four production initiations in any given year have depended on occurrences found in the past and put on the shelf to await improved market conditions. Take away the incentives for the prospector and soon Canadian companies will be using up their store of products on the shelf faster than they can be replenished. This is a fact that has escaped the engineers of this legislation.

The second criteria I ask members to consider is that prospecting is hard work. Many individuals have prospected for most of their lives and never found anything worth while. Relatively few have struck it rich, so to speak. In my submission, Canada needs prospectors and prospectors need incentives. By taxing income from the sale of mining properties we are eliminating incentive. I should like, therefore, to propose, backed up by the strong views of mining associations, chambers of mines, prospectors, chambers of commerce and others, that clause 59(1) on page 137, lines 8 to 37, be removed from the bill. This simple amendment would restore confidence to the prospector and leave him in the mining picture.

I wish to refer to a letter which was written to me last October by the Mining Association of British Columbia. Among other things, the Association dealt with the proposal to tax a prospector on his gains. I would remind you, Mr. Chairman, that after the White Paper had been published and submissions invited from interested parties, the Minister of Finance, I believe in August of that year, announced he would be making certain revisions in the bill. Some of them affected the mining industry. With respect to the minister's announcement in that regard, the Mining Association of British Columbia had this comment to make:

It is now obvious that the proposed revisions were announced on August 26 without the benefit of adequate prior consideration by the parliamentary committees—

That is a very sound observation. There was no consultation with the parliamentary committee on the part of the Minister of Finance before he made those announcements presenting revisions to the White Paper. The letter goes on:

—and without opportunity for consideration and representations by the mining industry.

We hear members opposite paying lip service and mouthing the principle of participatory democracy. Yet when they find themselves with an embarrassing bill on their hands, having rushed it into the House, they do not admit their mistakes, though it is evident that errors have been made. They find excuses. They excuse themselves by saying they only put the bill on the table in order that the public could participate by making submissions on the basis of which revisions could be carried out. Here is an instance of a situation in which all kinds of submissions were made by industry, following which the minister made changes without consulting the industry which would affected by those changes.

The letter goes on:

It is equally obvious that earlier recommendations by the industry had been ignored and that the new proposals were tailored to meet the special requirements of one area and are only a small sector of the industry.

The Mining Association of British Columbia, after careful consideration of the revisions proposed by Hon. Mr. Benson on August 26, finds these revisions to the white paper to be entirely inadequate and unrealistic. Our recommendations concerning the original white paper proposals have already been conveyed to you and our position is only reinforced by these new proposals.

Representations were also made directly to the Minister of Finance, after he had announced these revisions, by MacDonald Consultants of Vancouver, a firm which has long been engaged in the mining business. They had this to say in a letter dated June 11, 1970:

Our work has directly and indirectly contributed considerable amounts of revenue to taxation coffers, and, provided an incentive atmosphere continues, we will likely contribute increasing amounts.

In the foregoing statement lies the key to our success: the amount of money paid into the taxation coffers. And therein also lies the key to the future of our country. For if an incentive atmosphere does not exist, then persons such as myself will have either to reconcile themselves to the humdrum life or find some other place which does have an incentive atmosphere.

The most cogent paragraph of the letter is the last:

Perhaps, Mr. Benson, you will be kind enough to keep this letter on file and if you go ahead with your proposals as you apparently are determined to do, you will accept this letter as our application for employment with our government. Perhaps if you accept our application for employment we shall not have to move out of our country but will be able to live under the benevolent government shield on the fruits of the endeavours of whosoever may be fortunate enough or lucky enough to be able to continue their endeavours under the new set of rules proposed in your white paper on taxation.

These are just two illustrations of the point I have been making. I could produce several more, but in the time available to me I wanted to quote from an editorial which appeared in the Financial Times of October 18, 1971, the most recent issue. The subject matter of the editorial is Mr. Benson's fiscal policy:

If the government is serious . . . its next step must be to end the charade of the tax reform bill. The bill cannot and should not be rushed through parliament before Christmas. The government should accept the inevitable now. It should separate the parts relating to the personal income tax structure, which are acceptable. It should let the rest stand over. And it should announce its intentions immediately.

And that, Sir, is our position.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

CLEAN AIR ACT

TABLING OF PRESS RELEASE OUTLINING PROPOSED AIR QUALITY OBJECTIVES

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2) I wish to table a press release outlining the proposed national air quality objectives for which provision is made in the Clean Air Act.

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I want to repeat what I said on an earlier occasion. This press release may well contain information which ought first to have been given to the House in a statement on motions. I want to enter a covert that press releases are not the subject of filing under this particular order of business.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has raised this point before. I must say I cannot remember clearly what the disposition of the matter was. I thought at the time that the point was worth considering very seriously. It is difficult to interpret the exact wording of the Standing Order, which appears to be very wide. One might wonder whether the papers referred to in the Standing Order include a press release. The Chair will look into the matter further in view of the fact the hon. member has raised it by way of a point of order.

INDUSTRY

TABLING OF COMMUNIQUÉ ANNOUNCING APPOINTMENT OF EMPLOYMENT SUPPORT BOARD MEMBERS

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2), I want to file copies in both official languages of a release announcing the designation of Employment Support Board members. Information booklets on Board regulations will be distributed to hon. members this afternoon.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GOVERNMENT ASSESSMENTS PORTRAYED TO PREMIER KOSYGIN REGARDING SOVIET ACTIONS UNDER BREZHNEV DOCTRINE, MIDDLE EAST SITUATION AND CHINA-RUSSIA BORDER DISPUTE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. In view of the statement by Premier Kosygin at the conclusion of his talks here that "between the Soviet Union and Canada there exists a considerable degree of mutual understanding in the assessment of the situation in the parts of the world where peace is violated,", may I ask the Prime Minister to indicate what Canadian government assessment was portrayed to Premier Kosygin in relation to military actions or interventions which have been considered appropriate by the U.S.S.R. under what is commonly referred to as the Brezhnev doctrine?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The Leader of the Opposition is really asking me to restate in answer to a question the totality of Canada's foreign policy. We have made various statements at various times to the House of Commons and in our white papers on what we thought about the Middle East, Viet Nam, the situation in Pakistan, Berlin and so on, and these are matters that we repeated to Premier Kosygin. I will willingly answer more detailed questions if they are asked, but surely I cannot be expected to recite here the totality of Canadian foreign policy.

Mr. Stanfield: With all respect to the Prime Minister, I asked a specific question in relation to a specific doctrine relating to a specific part of Europe. I should like to ask the Prime Minister another quite specific question. In view of Premier Kosygin's remark, and also in view of his statement on October 19 about "the struggle of the peoples of the Arab countries for the liberation of Arab territories occupied by Israel", can the Prime Minister indicate what assessment the Canadian government portrayed to Premier Kosygin in regard to this matter, and would the Prime Minister briefly indicate what is the area of mutual understanding between the Soviet Union and Canada in the assessment of the Middle East situation?

Mr. Trudeau: Very briefly, Mr. Speaker, we both agreed that United Nations resolution 242 should have our wholehearted support.

Mr. Stanfield: In view of the general nature of Premier Kosygin's statement about the degree of mutual understanding in parts of the world where peace is violated, I wonder whether this is an indication that the government of Canada has informed Premier Kosygin that Canada shares Russia's view with regard to the border dispute between Russia and the People's Republic of China?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, this subject was not raised, either by ourselves or by the Soviet Union. Therefore I am not in a position to answer that question.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the government intend to express its regret to those people and organizations engaged in peaceful protest in Ottawa during the last few days who Premier Kosygin, the guest of the government, at a press conference described as "riff-raff"?

DISCUSSION WITH PREMIER KOSYGIN OF POSSIBLE EMIGRATION OF SOVIET JEWS TO CANADA

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister with reference to the comments of the Soviet premier concerning the emigration of Jews from the Soviet Union and the difficulties that he envisioned would be created for the Soviet government in regard to increasing the number of those who would bear arms in Israel. Did the Prime Minister or any member of his government express to the Soviet premier a willingness to increase emigration possibilities for Jewish people in the Soviet Union who might wish to come to Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): This point was not stressed, Mr. Speaker. I believe the Soviet Union knows Canada's immigration policy and there was no particular occasion to raise this matter. Nor have representations on that score been made to me. I think the representations that I received had more to do with emigration from the Soviet Union to Israel and also the question of the reunification of families, which is distinct from emigration.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): In view of the fact that the Soviet premier did express at least on one occasion, if not more, that difficulty did exist in regard to increasing Jewish emigration from the Soviet Union, would the Prime Minister or one of his ministers agree to look into this matter further so as to relieve the concern of many Canadian citizens about the inability of Jewish citizens in the Soviet Union to emigrate from that country?

Mr. Trudeau: I will consider that request.

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT ON FOREIGN INVOLVEMENT IN CANADIAN ECONOMY

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact the Brezhnev doctrine, or an adaptation thereof, has been adopted by Senator Kennedy, the front-running contender for the United States presidency, namely, that in view of close relations between the United States and another state the U.S. has the right to intervene in the internal affairs of another state, may I ask the Prime Minister whether or not we can expect an early report from the Minister of National Revenue on the subject of foreign involvement in the Canadian economy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we can expect an early statement on this subject, though its connection with the Brezhnev doctrine is fairly tenuous. But I do want to reassure the hon. member that we will be making a statement soon.

DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND PREMIER KOSYGIN ON EMIGRATION FROM RUSSIA AND RIGHTS OF ETHNIC GROUPS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister to return to the question of the discussions he had with Mr. Kosygin concerning the matter of emigration from the Soviet Union and also the question of the rights of Jews and other cultural groups in the Soviet Union. Is the Prime Minister in a position to make a public statement or tell the House anything in addition to what we learned in the meeting of the committee yesterday morning?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. The statements made by Mr. Kosygin in the committee, and, indeed, repeated in part at the press conference, were more or less in the same form as the statement he made to me, although he did not elaborate to me on statistics as he did, I believe, in the statement made to the committee of the House. However, it was generally couched in the same terms, namely, that he did not recognize that there were particular forms of discrimination against any of the Soviet people. He explained in what circumstances some Jews were not given the facilities to emigrate to Israel, but he stated that generally, and we concurred from the knowledge we have, there has been vastly increased emigration from the Soviet Union to Israel in the past little while, and I expressed the hope that this would continue.

On the problem of reunification of families, I pointed out very carefully to him that I was raising this matter merely on a humanitarian basis and that, as with other subjects, I was not trying to interfere in the internal affairs of their country but I was appealing to him on a humanitarian basis to further the cause of those who had made application for the reunification of families. I attempted somewhat to see if there were any reasons of policy or of doctrine as to why this subject had not met with more notable success and he assured me that there were not. It was essentially a matter of processing these names, of contacting the people and getting them through the bureaucracy and, in some cases, of discovering that those who had been applied for as subject, for reunification did not always want, when they were reached, to be reunited with the people on this side who wanted to be reunited with them. He said that there were some occasions when this happened. Generally, however, he expressed regret that the matter had taken some little time. He assured me that the names were in the works now, that he would see to it personally that substantial advance would be made on this subject.

UNITED STATES REACTION TO POSSIBLE AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND U.S.S.R. RESPECTING ARCTIC

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Témiscamingue have a supplementary?

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the right hon. Prime Minister.

It would appear that the United States are becoming somewhat touchy at the idea that agreements might be reached with the USSR concerning the north where our countries are next-door neighbours. Has the Prime Minister been officially informed of reactions of United States authorities who apprehend such agreements?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I cannot say, Mr. Speaker, that there have been reactions following my meetings with Mr. Kosygin or with Soviet authorities, but the hon. member knows that the United States ever since we ourselves have taken quite a strong stand on our rights in the Arctic, have made representations indicating that they were not always in agreement with our positions.

There have been reactions, as mentioned by the hon. member, but they were prior to my meetings with Mr. Kosygin.

CANADIAN RELATIONS WITH U.S.S.R. AND UNITED STATES

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, does the Prime Minister feel that in order to increase the friendliness of our relations with the U.S.S.R. it is necessary to cool our relations with the United States?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): That is not our position, Mr. Speaker. I hope it would not be that of hon. members opposite.

An hon. Member: That was juvenile.

CANADIAN POSITION RESPECTING ISRAELI-ARAB CONFLICT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, arising out of the answer given the Leader of the Opposition by the Prime Minister in connection with Canadian agreement with the U.S.S.R. to support the United Nations resolution respecting the boundaries and territorial areas of Israel, in view of the fact that most people do not know about the resolution in detail and to get it clearly before the people of Canada may I ask whether it is a fact that the Canadian government supports the need for the Israelis to give up the occupied territory, including that portion of Jerusalem which was in Jordan, as a condition to peace? Is that what the government of Canada is taking a stand on?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, since I have been speaking for Canada many times at the United Nations when the question of the Middle East has been raised, may I be permitted to say to the right hon. member for Prince Albert, through Your Honour, that Canada is strongly in support of resolution 242 of the Security Council which says that there should be a withdrawal of Israeli forces to secure and recognized boundaries.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister has demonstrated his capacity for evasive language not only in this House but in the United Nations. Nevertheless I ask him this very simple question: Does the Canadian government declare as its policy that the Israelis have to give up all the land they are occupying at the present time and have occupied since the war? It is as simple as that and there should not be all this equivocation.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, resolution 242 was worked out as a result of prolonged negotiations among the powers that were then members of the Security Council, including Canada, and we stand behind the resolution which calls for withdrawal to secure and recognized boundaries. That is the resolution and that is our policy.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is what I want. That is not what you have been telling the Jewish people in Canada.

POSSIBLE U.S.S.R.-CANADA TRADE EXPANSION RESULTING FROM DISCUSSIONS WITH PREMIER KOSYGIN—IMPORTATION OF RUSSIAN TRACTORS

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, as a result of the talks and discussions with the U.S.S.R. and Premier Kosygin is there any prospect of an increase in trade or wider talks toward expanding trade relations between our two countries?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister said yesterday, I believe, this was one of the results of the meeting, but I am not in a position today to say how this will take place. Views were expressed on both sides on wheat, for example, and on the export of manufactured products, too and results of this will become visible as the months go by.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce or the Minister of Agriculture whether the government has concerned itself about the fact that there is at present some difficulty in respect of the importation of Russian tractors and parts involving a legal action? Has either minister concerned himself with the matter of the importer in Oakville, Ontario?

Mr. Pepin: I have looked into that matter and we consider this to be a problem between the Soviet Union and the Canadian importer of these tractors. It is a private affair and it is being dealt with in that way by the authorities of the U.S.S.R.

Inquiries of the Ministry

DISCUSSION WITH PREMIER KOSYGIN OF POSSIBILITY OF OPENING CANADIAN IMMIGRATION OFFICES IN COMMUNIST COUNTRIES

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether in his discussions with the Premier of the Soviet Union the possibility of Canada opening immigration offices in certain of the communist countries was discussed?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, it was not discussed.

TRADE

POSSIBLE AGREEMENT BY U.S.S.R. TO BUY CANADIAN WHEAT OVER NEXT FIVE YEARS

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Could he tell the House if it is true that Soviet Premier Kosygin undertook to supply Canadian wheat to the USSR for the next five years?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, I did not attend the press conference where Mr. Kosygin might have suggested that. I am not in a position to confirm or deny what has been said.

However, I know, first, that the USSR has taken the good habit of coming to Canada first when it needs grain; second, that relations are extremely friendly between the Canadian Wheat Board and the Export Kleb; and third, that the USSR now receives Canadian wheat deliveries under the terms of a contract for the sale of 3,500,000 tons, and that these deliveries will continue until April 1972.

FINANCE

REPORTED GROUP OF TEN CONSENSUS ON DEVALUATION OF U.S. DOLLAR—CANADIAN POSITION

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): My question is for the Minister of Finance. In light of the report that a general consensus has been reached among the Big Ten with regard to the devaluation of the United States dollar to the extent of 10 per cent as against the leading currencies, does Canada share in this consensus, and if that is the case does this mean that there will be a further devaluation of the U.S. dollar relative to the Canadian dollar?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): The first I heard of any consensus was on reading the same press report that my hon. friend read. I am waiting for our delegate to return from Paris when I will have information.

Mr. Stanfield: How long will we have to wait?

Mr. Benson: The meeting finished just last night.

[Mr. Pepin.]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Since Canada had a delegate at this conference, can the minister say what his instructions were in this regard? Was Canada pressing for a downward revision of the value of the American dollar relative to the Canadian dollar?

Mr. Benson: No, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Was the Canadian delegate at that conference authorized to agree to any devaluation of the Canadian dollar in relation to the U.S. dollar as part of a general accord among the Group of Ten?

Mr. Benson: This conference was not supposed to reach decisions but merely to sense the feeling of other countries prior to a ministerial meeting.

Mr. Stanfield: Was the Canadian delegate authorized to give an impression that such a tentative accord might meet the approval of the government of Canada, and if not, why was this view not conveyed to the members of the Group of Ten who, according to the report, seemed to feel that there was in fact such an accord?

Mr. Benson: I have seen no evidence that there was such an accord, and this meeting was not qualified to reach accords.

Mr. Stanfield: You don't seem to be in touch at all.

POSSIBLE IMPOSITION BY UNITED STATES OF COUNTERVAILING DUTIES BECAUSE OF CANADIAN PROGRAM TO ASSIST INDUSTRY

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce arising out of a report from Washington which credits certain United States officials as saying that they have informed the Canadian government of the possibility of that government imposing countervailing duties as a result of the $80 million program for assisting Canadian industry should American companies lodge a complaint. Has that information been conveyed to him or to his colleague, the Minister of Finance, and, if so, what representations is the Canadian government making to the U.S. government regarding this matter?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): It has not been conveyed to me and the Minister of Finance says it has not been conveyed to him either. If the U.S. government, after studying the issue, decides that it deserves countervailing duties, I am sure they will find the proper way to convey the message to us.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for South Shore.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

INDEPENDENT PUBLIC INQUIRY INTO DEPARTMENTAL STRATEGIES AND PRACTICES

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): I wish to direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In light of the fact—

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has recognized the hon. member for South Shore who has already started asking his question. I will return to the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands for his supplementary question thereafter.

• (2:30 p.m.)

Mr. Crouse: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. In light of the fact that the former deputy minister of DREE, Tom Kent, conceded yesterday that DREE has been a disappointment, is the government going to appoint an independent public inquiry into the strategies and practices of DREE?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Crouse: In view of Mr. Kent's agreement that it would be desirable that DREE bring the administration of its programs closer to the Atlantic region, is DREE going to take steps to decentralize some of the administration and decision-making of the department?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I have not seen any such report of Mr. Kent's remarks. I would want to see if indeed he was correctly reported before commenting.

POSSIBLE USE OF COUNTERVAILING DUTIES UNDER PROPOSED UNITED STATES DISC PROGRAM—CANADIAN REPRESENTATIONS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that the DISC program now before the United States Senate would seem to imply the need for countervailing duties if it is passed much more than the assistance which the Canadian government has been giving to Canadian industry, has the Canadian government conveyed to the American government what might be the probable results of proceeding with the DISC program?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): This is very hypothetical but it seems to me I have to assume that one of the reasons why the United States government would not countervail against Bill C-262 would be the fact indicated by the hon. member as to their own deficiencies in other areas.

POSSIBLE LIFTING OF UNITED STATES IMPORT SURTAX IN CASE OF WEST GERMANY—CANADIAN REPRESENTATIONS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Finance. While there has been no agreement between Washington and West Germany, last Sunday the United States Secretary of the Treasury was reported as having said he was prepared to consider the selective lifting of the import surcharge in the case of West German imports because they had allowed their mark to float to a reasonable level with the U.S. dollar. In view of the fact that the Canadian government allowed its dollar to float 14 months before the surcharge was imposed—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should try to ask the question a little more briefly. We are running short of time. We are still only on the second or third question in the first 25 minutes of the question period. I would hope that the hon. member would ask his question a little more briefly.

Mr. Douglas: I am asking the minister whether in view of this concession which Mr. Connally is prepared to make the Canadian government is making any representations to the U.S. government for similar consideration and, if not, why not?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this again is a very hypothetical question. No such concession has been made.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, in light of the apparent breakdown between Ottawa and Washington, will the Minister of Finance consider asking Premier Kosygin to make the government's case to President Nixon?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again I have to bring to the attention of hon. members that we will soon be running short of time. There are only 15 minutes left until the end of the question period, and there are four rows of members who have not had a chance to ask questions.

Further, are they to take an oath of secrecy as well? Is that correct? If the minister does not know, will he have the matter investigated?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this meeting is to explore ways and means of improving bilateral relations between Canada and Mexico. Mexico is one of our most important trading partners, and many of us visit there from time to time. We have a big tourist business. I regret that until now we have not had this meeting. The visiting ministers, who are watching us, know that in 1969 we were engaged in trying to decide our policy on Latin America, and in 1970 they were having an election in Mexico. ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ASSAULT ON PREMIER KOSYGIN—INVESTIGATION OF SECURITY ARRANGEMENTS TO DETERMINE WHETHER THERE WAS NEGLIGENCE—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. No one expects a security cordon to be impregnable, but nonetheless the circumstances connected with the assault committed on Mr. Kosygin the other day were of such a nature as to demand investigation and the placing of responsibility, if there was negligence, on those who were negligent. I ask him whether an investigation is taking place and, in particular, if an investigation has taken place is it not a fact that the responsibility has been taken away from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police—and I am very glad to hear that—and placed in other quarters?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have had a long discussion with the heads of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police regarding security measures to be taken on the occasion of Mr. Kosygin's visit. We have had all possible co-operation from the authorities that we have contacted. I was satisfied with the security measures taken and it is unfortunate that an incident should have taken place. I apologize to this House for this. I have discussed this incident with the RCMP Commissioner; he has given me a complete report on it. I have moreover reported to the Prime Minister regarding this. In my opinion, there has been no negligence as such but we shall certainly endeavour to develop still better methods for protecting those who visit our country. This means, of course, that we may perhaps restrain access by the public to distinguished visitors in the future. I think that it must be recognized that security measures are becoming more and more necessary in this country just as in all others.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: As this is a matter that affects Parliament Hill and parliamentarians generally and as the security of Canada is naturally one of the elements, will this report be made available so that a study may be made and incidents of this kind prevented to the greatest possible degree in the future? This is one report that should be made available to the Canadian people.

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, were I convinced that there was some oversight, it would perhaps be advisable, but I doubt so. I do not think that it is proper to discuss publicly police methods for protecting distinguished visitors in Canada.

May I ask the minister what powers he has in mind that the government would reduce?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the rest of the remarks would indicate, my intent was to say that through lack of a policy framework in the past I am afraid that in the exercise of programs clearly within federal jurisdiction we have from time to time inadvertently invaded provincial jurisdiction but that with the policy framework possible through the urban affairs ministry that was less likely to happen.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to seek again the co-operation of hon. members. There are just about four minutes left in the question period. Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, most of that meeting centered around a proposal with regard to a large export order which lacked detail in so far as our ability to accept it is concerned. The deeper we got into finding the detail, the more discouraging it became.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has any consideration been given to a proposal not to have any duty on potatoes moving in either direction between Canada and the United States as Canada is a net importer of potatoes?

Mr. Olson: I and my predecessors in this department, as well as other Ministers of Industry, Trade and Commerce and External Affairs, have proposed to the United States many times that we should change the rate on potatoes either to nil both ways or at least the same going both ways. GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—ELIGIBILITY TO OLD AGE SECURITY OF PERSONS 60 TO 65 YEARS OF AGE

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval) moved:

—This House regrets that the government has not deemed advisable to provide old age security pensions to persons between the ages of 60 and 65, or to the wife of a retired person, whatever the age. Any pension so awarded should be such as to enable anyone to live as decently as the physical, material and human resources of Canada would allow.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the days allotted to the opposition are a unique opportunity for us of the Social Credit Party of Canada to draw the attention of the government on ticklish matters with which the government does not dare deal in order to reach a rational solution.

This motion, which could be entitled "Adjustment of pensions for older Canadians", reads as follows:

—This House regrets that the government has not deemed advisable to provide old age security pensions to persons between the ages of 60 and 65, or to the wife of a retired person, whatever the age. Any pension so awarded should be such as to enable anyone to live as decently as the physical, material and human resources of Canada would allow.

But if we accept the principle that Canada is one of the wealthiest countries in the world, I fail to see why we should trail far behind those same countries with regard to the social security of those who built our country.

In the past, it was difficult enough to set, according to accepted standards, the minimum age entitling one to a pension. If we refer to the Internation Labour Conference of 1932, the minimum age was not to exceed 65, but it took Canada 35 years to recognize the recommendation of the International Labour Office. Indeed, it was only in 1952 that universal old age security pensions provided for a uniform payment of $40 a month to everyone 70 or over. That was a very timid start considering the fact that in 1937, 30 years before Canada, Denmark lowered pensionable age to 60.

Since January 1, 1971, a 65 year old person gets a pension of $80 per month and if that person has no other source of income, he may be entitled to a $55 monthly supplement. We lost in terms of universality what we gained in terms of social assistance. In other words, the old age pension is no longer strictly a pension, but is partly social welfare. And that is precisely what people do not accept any more. I shall come back to this subject a little later.

It is absolutely essential for us to base our social reforms on economic requirements. In these days of unemployment, the public opinion calls for the lowering of the retirement age, so that a greater number of people withdraw from the labour market, thus enabling younger people to find employment. Besides, that is the main reason why the government of Denmark reduced the eligible age for pension to 60 years in 1937.

In 1911, New Zealand set the pensionable age at 60. They even set eligibility at 55 for women.

In Australia, as early as 1910, the minimum eligible age for a pension was also lowered to 60.

In Canada, we had to wait until 1927 before persons 70 years and over were guaranteed payment of a miserable pittance of $20. It is so ridiculous that I am ashamed of stating the amount of the pension. Could not Canada which ranks among the ten richest countries in the world at least follow the example of the countries I have just mentioned?

Today, we urge the present government to give all older Canadians a pension based on the cost of living. I did say a pension, not the semblance of one such as the scheme that now exists. Pensions are dues, not social welfare. I am convinced that our country is rich enough to give good protection to those who spent the best years of their lives making their country progress. A pension that will re-establish social distributive justice, because it will not allow any patronage and will not result in any discrimination since all people will get the guaranteed minimum regardless of their social or monetary status.

How much would such a pension cost the Canadian treasury? Not more than we are spending today for bureaucracy and patronage of all kinds. Think of the millions the Canadian treasury is now spending to fight unemployment, for instance, for training, second training, third training, to support all the young people who, having finished their studies or their training, can still find no jobs.

Transferring funds allocated to workers 60 to 65 years old to government pensions will increase old age pension disbursements but at the same time and perhaps to a greater extent it will reduce funds allocated to support these unemployed persons or train them. It must be recognized that a family of unemployed individuals costs the government much more than a married couple receiving a pension.

I can, Mr. Speaker, give a simple example to illustrate what I have in mind. What happens to a factory worker who has reached retirement age? This factory worker, who is a breadwinner, will leave a fairly remunerative job to make room for whom? For another breadwinner who was unemployed. That is to say, the state was providing a living to this breadwinner who had perhaps three, four, five or six children, therefore costing the welfare bureau or the unemployment insurance—mostly the welfare bureau—$250, $300 or perhaps $350 a month. The latter will replace the other breadwinner, the retired one, in the last case and in the present situation the government would pay $255 a month.

That is why I said a moment ago that by giving a pension to those who reach age 60, the government will be called upon to spend more money, but in a number of cases, it would make a saving. On the other hand, in granting this pension to all and without investigation, as is done now in the case of family allowances, the various provincial inquiries would be eliminated; these cost to the treasury as much as the income supplement which 35 per cent of pensioners receive on account of their poverty. In considering these two points only, we see that our case is justified.

We finally ask that the wife receive the same pension as her husband when the latter reaches retiring age and we base our request on the most elementary sense of justice. Let us consider the family as it exists in our Canadian society. The salary of the breadwinner is still that of the father. When he was at work, he was supporting the family economy and when he paid his taxes, he was doing so as the head of the family. Is it not true that when he ceases to receive his salary, it is the head of the family who loses his income? If a pension is to replace this salary, is it not logical that such pension be granted to a breadwinner? Otherwise, how can the father continue to carry out his role of head of the household without the financial means required for this?

I was going to suggest, as a solution to the problem, that the legislation be amended with regard to the family head. But there is a much simpler way: give the same pension to his spouse, whatever her age. In this way we would reach our objective, that is a guaranteed family income, and to all couples without exception.

Some may object to this, arguing that the rich do not need the old age pension. I would answer that they may not need it but that they are entitled to it, like all other citizens, because this is a pension and not social assistance.

That is why, at the beginning of my speech I established a distinction between a pension and assistance. One does have the right to a pension when perhaps one does not need it, but one is not entitled to any aid which one does not need. That should be quite clear. And I say that the pension should be universal because I consider that the worker has a right to it when he reaches 60. As for the money that one not needing it will receive, you can rest assured that it will quickly go back to where it came from, that is the national treasury, through income tax.

Since the old age security pension is taxable, all the inspectors in every Canadian income tax office will see to it to collect what is due. One must choose the lesser of two evils.

It would be better to have only one collection office, since the present financial system requires it. The cases of all taxpayers will have to be settled instead of the thousands of offices being maintained, which give rise to so many complaints and injustices and where the worst patronage since the heyday of the Taschereau regime is often rampant.

If time allowed me, I would quote hundreds of cases that I had to deal with in my riding, due to on the one hand, this guaranteed income supplement and, on the other hand, because the wife was too young when her husband reached retirement age.

Furthermore, there are conflicts of jurisdiction about the sharing of responsibilities in certain social fields. In Quebec, the situation is further complicated by a rather vague legislation in the field of social affairs, and mainly with regards to shared cost programs, to which the federal government contributes 50 per cent without having a say in the matter. It must also be said that provincial and federal regulations made by officials often supersede the law. Finally, all mothers have seen their cheque reduced to nil with the introduction of the guaranteed income supplement. That is the limit! The finest social mess in the world! Those are the situations that a member must face in his constituency.

The last part of our motion reads as follows: "Any pension so awarded should be such as to enable anyone to live as decently . . .". We still say according to the cost of living index, which would mean about $150 per month at the present time.

I know that all the officials associated with our rotten financial system will say that we are putting it on, since they are the ones who conceive, draw up and complicate the legislation introduced in this House. But do they remember sometimes their yearly salary of $24,000, $25,000, $30,000 or more, while the government states that when it gives $1 to a citizen, it must collect $3 in taxes? I know why.

It is well understood that they will never appreciate the sorry plight of pensioners, when they spend their lifetime in the unequalled luxury of their office, surrounded by secretaries who even fetch them a glass of water.

How can popular social legislation be expected from such bureaucrats? All these high officials should have to live for three years on the older people allowance and share their living quarters, I am sure that we would then get much better social legislation.

I am always surprised, when a bill is tabled in the House, to see all Liberal members without exception endorse the bill without having even read it. I am doubly surprised when the opposition dares to point out the shortcomings of the measure, to see these same Liberals howling against the opposition, charging it with filibustering in the House. However, like all of us, these same Liberal members must receive letters of protest from their constituents. Just like us, they must go through their riding to check the effects that legislation adopted by the House has on their constituents. It is not enough to adopt laws, it is more important to go in the field and see how they are accepted by the people, what are their good and ill effects and to come back here to move the appropriate amendments. And that is what all Social Credit members do in their riding every weekend.

It is just too easy to excuse oneself by blaming the local employees who do everything possible but who are very often overwhelmed by all those laws one would often believe had been invented to make things more difficult for them and to confuse people more. The employees who work close to the people always get the kicks the top men would have well deserved. At times, I have felt that might be the purpose of new social laws: to make people quarrel, that they might no longer have the time or opportunity to notice the administrative blunders of the governments.

Old Age Security Pensions

I shall now deal with the pensioners. I still have a few moments left, which I should like to use to pinpoint real cases, and the problems facing those people.

I have here files on some ten cases, but I could have brought along hundreds of them concerning people who are having problems with the Old Age Pensions Act. I apologize for not giving any names, because it could hurt those people. But that will help me point out the deficiencies of the present law and the problems that can plague a member seeking to solve all those difficulties with which he is confronted day in and day out.

First we have the latest device of the government: the guaranteed income supplement. I think that most of the correspondence we have received these last few months deals mainly with the guaranteed income from the 1st of January, when the pension was first raised by the incredible amount of 58 cents per month.

How many headaches this guaranteed income has given pensioners, who had always been under the impression that they were going to receive $135 a month—which turned out not to be the case at all. It seems as if great pains are taken to mislead the population in order to throw even more confusion and to create quarrels between members and their constituents—who presumably elected this member because they trusted him, and, quite naturally, turn to him when they have problems.

I think that all acts nowadays are meant to make the members' task harder and cause them even more problems. Let us take, for instance, the guaranteed income in the case of a couple in which the wife is not yet eligible to a pension. Before the supplement was introduced, the aged head of a household used to receive $79.42, while his wife received social security payments of—and I have the papers here to show it—between $1 and $75. In most cases, the wife receives $69, $70 or $72. As soon as the government introduced the garanteed income supplement, the father, who had no income as his wife was drawing social security benefits from Quebec, got $135. In Quebec the wife is no longer eligible to anything in that province from the moment when that father gets $135. Indeed I wrote several times to Mr. Castongay and he answered me that this was not possible, because it was absolutely necessary that he should get about the same amount he was getting before the increase.

Finally the government of Quebec acknowledged that that married couple needed $150, $155 or $160 to live and, since the government gave $135 to the husband, it immediately withdrew any assistance given to the wife.

There were dozens of such cases, Mr. Speaker, and that situation was called "the scythe" by the women who were too young to get the federal pension. And all those women believed and hoped that they would get the same pension so that they would at least come under the same government plan. And they were right. In fact they said: If my husband belongs to the federal government plan, I should at least belong to it too. We have jobs and it happens that I come under the provincial government plan whereas my husband belongs to the federal government plan.

That is absurd. That is why I said just now, Mr. Speaker, that there must absolutely be some justice and logic in government plans. When a husband reaches the federal pension age, the wife should also come under the federal pension plan in order to avoid conflict and above all so that Quebec should not be able to pocket whatever increases might be granted to elderly people, which would go into the Quebec treasury instead of to the citizens involved.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I must tell him that his time has expired. He may however continue his remarks with unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: There seems to be unanimous consent and the hon. member may therefore proceed with his remarks.

Mr. Gauthier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I shall not overdo it. I thought I had 45 minutes at my disposal. I realize you were right. Anyway, you are always right.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg-North Centre): Thirty minutes.

Mr. Gauthier: I am told thirty minutes. I was wrong.

I shall have to be brief if I don't want to take too much time of the House. I very much thank my colleagues for giving me the opportunity of not ending my remarks too suddenly.

A moment ago, I quoted the case of young mothers. All hon. members of this House will understand this problem.

As to the guaranteed income supplement, we must determine the reception date or the means test. The guaranteed income supplement is paid on the basis of income for the preceding year. We can imagine the conflicts that can arise from that. There are some cases in my own riding.

To provide for a pensioner today, we take into account his revenues of the previous year when he was receiving unemployment insurance benefits because he was still entitled to them. Therefore, it means he will have to live on $80 a month. That is what happens. An older married couple must live on $80 a month because there has been an increase which prompted Quebec to withdraw the $30 or $35 the spouse was getting. The couple must go through twelve months on $80 a month. As some would put it, it is no sinecure.

That is why I call the attention of the House on that matter. Once the husband is no longer eligible for unemployment insurance benefits, it is possible to determine his yearly budget two or three months in advance. This can be done and we would not be condemning couples to eke out a living with $80, $100 or $110 a month.

Mr. Speaker, I would have many other things to say but I must abide by my promise not to speak more than two or three minutes. However, I invite hon. members to study the motion. We did not move it as a joke or to help pass the time. It is serious and most of the people approve of such measures. We ask the government to look into that matter and to finally help elderly people. We will be able to do so if the eligible age for pension is lowered to 60. Unemployment will thus be reduced in Canada since new pensioners will make room for the unemployed.

[English]

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) upon bringing before the House the motion we are discussing and for the very human way he talked about the subject it covers. We think far too little about the older people of this country. Many people say, "Why, there are lots of old people around. There are more older people than ever before in this country." There have been many scientific changes during the century and many scientific advances. Each basic discovery has led to many other basic discoveries. More scientists are alive today than the combined total of all the other scientists who have lived since the world began. Never before in history, however, has there been such an awareness of the needs and attributes of youth, and never before has any society done so much to assess the needs of youth and to give them a free hand on the rudder of democracy. Yet, in all regions of the country it is the old who multiply more quickly than the rest of the population. Their numbers are increasing at break-neck speed.

For instance, when the Mayflower landed in Massachusetts in 1620, the population of the whole world stood at around 500 million. Today that is the population of one nation, India. Let us take a look back in time. Approximately 25,000 years ago there were 3 million people in the whole world. Ten thousand years ago there were 5 million people in the world. In other words, in over 15,000 years the human population had not even doubled. At the beginning of the Christian era the world population was only 150 million, much less than the population of the United States today. At the beginning of this century, the world population was just over one billion. In 1950 it approached three billion and by the year 2,000 the statisticians tell us it will be well over five billion. As a consequence of overcrowding, pollution, economics and insufficient space in which to stand, the problem is that these people will be aging fast, although the life expectancy is increasing. From 1940 to 1960 the world population grew by just over 1.5 per cent per year, but in the older age group, those over 60, it grew by 2.5 per cent. Statisticians tell us we are getting close to, if we are not already there, a population of 300 million people in the 60 year age group and over, more than the total population of the North American continent today.

The increase in the population of the aged is due to the containment of diseases by scientific medicine. The acute diseases have been brought under control so that the common cause of death in respect of people up to age 40 is accidental. There are many more people who reach age 40 only to find then that the aging and chronic diseases set in. These are the diseases that we have been unable to treat as successfully as those of the acute kind. These diseases which take their toll are heart disease, strokes, cancer, nephritis, respiratory diseases and arthritis. Many of the people who are suffering from these diseases are working today or trying to until they reach the calendar age of 65. Many people reach this age in good mental and physical health. The cruelest thing in the world is to stop them contributing to their own physical well-being and to the economics of this country. I am sure all of us in this House know of the contribution being made by people of 65 years of age and over. However, thousands of people suffering from chronic disease go to work daily simply so that they might obtain a larger pension at 65. They work under stress and strain.

I think it is about time that we assessed the physical and mental condition of people rather than considered their calendar age. They feel they must work because they know that every day their pension is being eroded. They know it will have less purchasing power. They know hidden taxes will take more of it. They are afraid to quit. They have strokes and coronaries at age 40 and at age 50. Provision should be made so that they would have a pension not at the calendar age of 60 or 65 but at the physical and mental age they represent. There is no question but that there was discrimination when the government brought in the old age supplement of $55 per month for a single person and $95 a month for a married couple with no other cash income. There certainly is discrimination and it is this I should like to see cured. I am in agreement with what the hon. member for Roberval said, but I also realize that, considering our economic position, we probably first want to correct the injustices that already exist in some areas and modernize the system.

But what about, say, John Brown who is partially disabled and owns a little house? He has a small pension of $80 per month from other sources, but he does not qualify for a disability pension or even for medicare. His wife is gone. He will receive only $80 a month, the purchasing power of which will diminish month by month because of inflation. There is nothing to compensate him. We stopped that, so actually we give the old age pensioner less every month. There are hundreds of John Browns who cannot make ends meet. They have been discriminated against. This particular man also has a heart condition and requires medication costing around $10 per month. The discriminating action of this government will not be forgotten. This magnanimous government, in a just society, increases the old age pension by 42 cents per month and then freezes it. These people will not forget that. Then, the pension is eroded by inflation caused largely by the poor management of this government.

Many widows are in the same position. They have a little home and a small pension. The pensions were smaller in the early days, but from 1948 to the present time the value of the dollar has decreased by 50 per cent. This is an indication of how the pension has been cut. I believe this Parliament has a responsibility in this regard. The old people should not be the forgotten people. There are very few elderly affluent people in the age bracket of 60 to 65 and over. They will remember the magnanimity of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in the next federal election. The rich old age pensioner really is non-existent, and the Prime Minister must remember that those people of 65 years of age represent 17 per cent or 18 per cent of the voting power of this country.

It is really the second part of the motion presented to the House that is the most interesting. It reads:

> Any pension so awarded should be such as to enable anyone to live as decently as the physical, material and human resources of Canada would allow.

I believe all of us—and I suggest this applies to all parties in the House—should wholeheartedly endorse that proposal. If any member of this House does not endorse it, I should like him to take part in this debate and explain his reason. There is a constant concern on this side of the House that the Liberal government has continually eroded the status and well-being of Canadian pensioners and has repeatedly ignored the plea for more adequate and meaningful assistance. Consequently, it is really the second part of the motion to which I wish to direct most of my attention.

Before I do so, however, I should like to comment on the part of this motion which calls for a reduction in the age level now required for eligibility for old age pensions. The motion calls for the inclusion of persons aged 60 to 64, and persons of any age who are spouses of pensioners. Again I say this is a noble gesture and one for which I have a great deal of sympathy. When medicare was discussed in this House reference was made to supplementary payments for drugs. This proposal was contained in the Hall Commission Report which was tabled in this House some four years ago, but that recommendation has never been carried out.

Let me say that once a person reaches 60 years of age his drug bill increases by four or five times, so that some of these people require up to $30 a month for drugs. However, this government does nothing to help those people who have difficulty meeting their drug bills. There are so many areas of unfairness that have been left in this scheme that I should like to see it modernized and brought up to date. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) has spoken from time to time about the guaranteed income, but then he shied away from that. Later, he told us of another plan which would bring the income of the old age pensioner close to that of a guaranteed income. I do not believe he knows what he means at all. This government just does not have any feeling or humanity, although I am sure they have these qualities individually. Why do they not get together over there and do a little thinking about such things as drug bills?

I will tell you something about the cost of drugs. Last year Canadians paid $271 million for drugs. If you take 17 per cent of 23 million people which is the percentage of the population over 60, you realize there is one person in 12 or one person in 13, in that category. Since these elderly people use drugs four times oftener than those under 60, you can see how much money those older people require. The federal government should establish a scheme to cover drug costs, similar to the national medicare scheme so the provinces could follow suit. This is not just my own idea. There is an election in Ontario today. Perhaps I should not mention that, but it is expected that the cost of drugs will be covered in the province of Ontario. Of course, we all know that election promises do not always become law, but I hope that such a bill will be introduced.

Another piece of legislation that was introduced—we have moved in this direction but we are moving so slowly—is one that would cover the cost of patients in nursing homes, with the exception of $3 per day. This is a big thing. We have done something in this direction but there are still many pockets of people who have been forgotten. Over 500,000 Canadians over 65 are in this category. This is why I plead with the government to get off its seat. I know that on many occasions, Mr. Speaker, you have been lenient with me when I was asking the Minister of National Health and Wefare questions, but I also know that you have realized his answers were neither up to date nor very helpful in assisting us to ascertain the real situation.

In pleading for the older people I want to say that boredom, alienation, poor health and reduced incomes are their main problems. The problems of the older people receive very little attention in the press. How many stories do you hear concerning them compared to those about younger people? They get no notice on the CBC, and this is amazing. How many times, Mr. Speaker, have you seen a program about older people and how they live? Reference was made to this point by the hon. member for Roberval when he cited case histories. How many times have we heard about these people? If the views of older people are rarely heard on the CBC, on radio or television, it is because most of the performers, and indeed the programs, are slanted towards sports, culture and styles in the arts. The older people are just not mentioned. This is not just my observation. A member of this House who had the honour of being the postmaster general appeared before the Senate Committee and stated that there were no programs aimed specifically at representing the plight of the older people in Canada. When one considers that over 500,000 old age pensioners are on incomes between $1,320 and $4,500, which is below the poverty line, one realizes the gravity of the problem.

Again I compliment the hon. member for Roberval who so thoughtfully brought in this motion and thus brought these problems to the attention of the government. In my own way, I have brought to the attention of the government the plight of older people. The world is getting older by the day. When I look around me, and at hon. members opposite, I realize that most of us are approaching the age of cardiovascular disease, diabetes, arthritis and respiratory diseases.

An hon. Member: Senility.

Mr. Bell: There is another thing wrong with them, also.

Mr. Rynard: Without getting too funny about it, let me point out that all this is true. We have seen many members of the House, many of them noted members, who have suffered from coronaries and cardiovascular disease and passed on. I am sure all hon. members know what this means and I am sure it has affected some of their families. All of us have or had fathers and mothers. I am sure it only needs some thought about what we are doing to our old people to make us straighten out our values and to become fair with respect to them. We have that power in Parliament. Let us use it to protect, honour and respect those people among our old age pensioners who are living below the poverty level.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Rynard.]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to commend the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) on the introduction of the motion that is now before the House. We shall be pleased to give it our full support. As I see it, the motion is in two parts. In the first half of it the hon. member requests that consideration be given to the lowering of the age at which the old age pension is paid so that it would be payable to all at the age of 60. He couples with that the very commendable suggestion that where the breadwinner is on pension the spouse should also receive the pension, even if that spouse has not yet reached the required age. In the second part of the motion the suggestion is made that the level of the pension should be sufficient to enable people to live as decently as is possible in this country.

I suspect that when we hear from the government side of the House in this debate there will be some who will give their support to this motion, their support to moving in the direction suggested by it, but I have no doubt that we will also be given a history of old age pensions. We will be told of the many improvements that have been made since 1926 when the first Old Age Pension Act was enacted. If one compares the original Old Age Pension Act with the present situation, there is no doubt in the world that a tremendous improvement has been made. That first act provided for $20 a month payable only at the age of 70, with a means test so rigorous that very few people were able to qualify for it. We now have a pension that is universal at age 65 to the extent of $80 per month for an individual, and we have the guaranteed income supplement which makes it possible for an individual without means to get an additional $55 for a total of $135 a month. It also makes it possible for a married couple without means to receive a total pension of $255 a month. A number of other improvements have been made, and I have no hesitation in welcoming the fact that we have come a long way since 1926 and 1927.

Mr. Whelan: No other nation has done as much.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I was not here when the first act was brought in, but I have been here through all of the years in which the improvements have been won.

Mr. Mackasey: Was it in 1912?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No, but it was in this century, the early part of it.

I have no hesitation in saying that the improvements are welcome. But, Mr. Speaker, let us not get carried away with what we have done when, by comparison with what is needed, we are so far behind. If one compares the amount of the pension today with the total wealth we are producing in Canada, with the affluence many people enjoy, we just are not doing enough. We leave the old people in a position where they are entitled to say they are forgotten by the government and by Parliament. This notion that we can rest on our laurels because we passed an amendment to the Old Age Security Act in this session is not good enough for the Parliament of Canada.

The first proposal in this motion is one that we have to take seriously, namely, the lowering of the eligible age. I was interested in the very significant remarks made by the hon. member who preceded me, concerning the difference between chronological age and actual age. He has suggested ideas that should be given very serious consideration. However, what we have before us is a proposal that the eligible age be reduced from 65 to 60. I know that when this suggestion is made during the question period, there are some around who gasp and tell us how much it will cost. But we seem to find it possible to dig up $80 million for this, $90 million for that, and $1 billion for something else, and I think that if we were really aware of the importance of this problem we would find the money.

The point I should like to make is that we have to get away from the idea that an old age pension is merely something one gets when he is old and decrepit. We are in a society that is not finding it possible to provide full employment. This worries us. But it is also a fact of our age that we are moving into a time when there may be a lot less employment, a lot less actual physical work that has to be done. I hope the day will come in the lifetime of those of us here when great numbers of our people just will not be required to do physical work, or work in the actual production of goods and services, but will be free to enjoy life in various kinds of pursuits, and that society will make it possible for them to do so.

Instead of waiting until this type of life is forced on us, instead of bungling into it, why do we not decide now that age 60 is a good age for people to be permitted to leave the labour market. If one is forced to wait until 70, or even 65, in many cases one is not able to make the necessary adjustments or necessary shifts. But if we can say to people that they can retire from physical, manual or other labour at 60, and follow other pursuits, there is a chance for them to make that shift into the later part of life which, after all, is the best of all, for which the first is made—if my poetry isn't too mixed up.

Instead of thinking of pensions as a form of charity, of welfare, of something given to people because they are old and decrepit, there should be a firm decision on a time when we say, "You have done your share of the kind of drudgery that work demands. It is time for you to enjoy a guaranteed annual income. You have reached that age, now go out and show what you can do as human beings."

I suggest that we could think in terms of phasing into this situation. I suggest two ways, in case some are scandalized by the amount of money this would cost to do it all at once. When we reduced the eligible age from 70 to 65 years we faced this problem. Some people thought it would be too much to do it all at once, so we did it year by year, from 70 to 69, from 69 to 68, 68 to 67, 67 to 66, and finally from 66 to 65. We can do the same now. We can start next year to make it 64, the year after that 63, and so on until we get down to 60. This is something that will have to be considered.

Another way we could make this kind of transition is suggested to us in the way we treat the benefits under the Canada Pension Plan. We now provide that a person at age 70 gets the full benefits under the Canada Pension Plan to which he is entitled because of his contributions, no matter what he is doing, whether he is working or not, or has other income. Between 65 and 70, we permit persons to draw the benefits they have earned under the Canada Pension Plan on one condition only, namely, that they leave the labour market, that they do not have income from employment. It is no barrier to their full Canada Pension Plan benefits that persons may have income from investments and other sources. The only requirement is that they leave the labour market.

That might be a way for us to get started on the payment of old age pensions at age 60, simply by saying to people that it is optional—"if you leave the labour market you can get the full amount without regard to a means test, or other sources of income that you may have." Just as I have pleaded in this House over several decades for the various other improvements we have had to make in pensions, I think this question has to be taken seriously. That is why I commend my hon. friend from Roberval for placing it before us today.

Sometimes my hon. friends to my left are characterized as having strange ideas. It is also said that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) has some strange ideas, but he has been able to sell some of his strange ideas. I wish him luck with others. But the point of the matter is that strange or not, I think this is a serious proposition that society will have to face. I urge that this House today discuss it seriously, and try its best to make it known to the government that the issue of what we are doing about old age pensions is not over just because we passed an amending bill last December.

• Part of the motion that is before us, part of the first sentence as it were, relates to the desirability of the pension being available to the spouse where that spouse is under the pension age if the breadwinner is on the pension. I hope that this, too, will be given serious consideration. I hope that we will not go through the routine that we usually go through when this comes up, that it is possible for some old codger to marry a young girl and then have her on the pension when she is 35, or even less. This could be taken care of by a simple regulation that the difference must be not more than five years, or that the couple must have been married for a certain number of years, or there could be the possibility of an employment test. I hope the House sees clearly that I do not under any circumstances suggest a means test. Ever since I came into this House the idea of a means test has been an anathema to me. I think there are other things in the labour market that are reasonable tests that could be applied. Let us not have the kind of nonsense that we sometimes have when this suggestion is made. It is a sound suggestion, and I think it should receive the attention and consideration of the House.

I have dealt thus far with what I regard as the first part of the motion, the first half, namely, the half that has to do with the lowering of the eligible age. As I say, I think that is the new thing that is before us in this motion. I do not mean that the suggestion is new because it has been made by some of us a good many times, but this is one of the few times that it has been before us as a motion, and I stress the seriousness and importance of it.

As I have already said there are times when people assert, and it has been asserted today, that one way to provide jobs for younger people is to get some of the older people out of the labour market. That may be oversimplifying it a bit, although there may be validity to that suggestion. But as I tried to say earlier this should be looked at in the context of the kind of over-all change which is taking place in society. I am as sure as I am that I am standing here that in the year 2,000 work will not have the important place in life that it has today. There will be millions of our people who will live for something else. Why don't we start now, deliberately choosing those groups of people who should not have to be in the labour market. I know of no better group to choose than our older people.

My friend from Simcoe North looked across the way a minute ago and, as a doctor, saw all sorts of medical conditions that he could attend to if he had time. I think one of the sad things about our retirement policy is that we have this tradition that you can work until you cannot do anything more, and then you are put out to pasture until you die. Why not accept the proposition that it is good at a reasonable time of life to retire from what one has been doing and to start over again? Now don't let anyone throw that at me—I have been here so long there is no other place for me to go. I intend to stay here arguing for this kind of thing and it may be of benefit to some of my friends across the way. There is my friend, the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Whelan). He has done a good job here and one thing I know, he will not be going to the other place. However, it might be a good idea if he were retired early so that he could make a contribution in some other way of life. And there are others across the way who might do the same thing.

I must not get sidetracked, Mr. Speaker, even if I am doing it myself because I want to say something about the second part of the motion. In fact, I want to move an amendment to it. I have shown my amendment to some of my friends to my left and have indicated to them that although it seeks to change a part of their wording, it is a friendly amendment that seeks to underline a certain aspect of this motion. The second part of the motion reads:

> Any pension so awarded should be such as to enable anyone to live as decently as the physical, material and human resources of Canada would allow.

I agree. I just want to make the point and to underline it, that this means there must be a substantial increase in the amount of the pension now being paid. People cannot live and meet those conditions on $80 a month or $160 a month for man and wife. As for the people who qualify for $135 a month single or $255 a month married, they qualify only because they have practically nothing else. I think the circumstances that we have had since the guaranteed income supplement was brought in, and since these higher figures were set, prove the unfairness of a pension that has a means test attached to any portion of it.

While I think that we have been right on this side of the House over the years, and that the government was right when it accepted the principle of paying the pension universally, I think what we should now be doing is getting back to that principle and paying a pension of at least $150 across the board without any means test whatsoever.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

We can take care of the few wealthy people in the old age pension group by means of the income tax. That income tax is going to take care of all kinds of things if the bill ever gets through! The fact of the matter is that statistics prove that my hon. friend from Simcoe North was right. The number of wealthy people in the older age brackets is very low. Most are in need of every dollar they can get. Then, there is the whole problem of inflation which wipes out any increase. I think the minimum amount needed now is $150 a month across the board. To put it in precise terms, I think that is what my friend is asking for when he uses that rhetorical phrase that "any pension so awarded should be such as to enable anyone" to do such and such.

I have already got a motion on the order paper, Mr. Speaker, calling for pensions to be $150 a month, so I am afraid if I move that one at this point it might be looked upon by the Chair as repeating an argument taking place in another debate and therefore out of order. However, I think if I put my words in general terms they will meet the requirements of the rules, and therefore I want to propose that the amount paid as old age security should be substantially increased and by "substantially" I mean that it should be not less than $150 a month and that it should be payable across the board.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I should like to move an amendment to the motion now before the House. I do so seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) and my motion is as follows:

> That the motion be amended by deleting therefrom the words "Any pension so awarded should be such as", and by substituting therefor the words: "The amount of the pension now provided as old age security should be increased substantially".

If my motion were accepted, the total motion as amended would then read:

> This House regrets that the government has not deemed advisable to provide old age security pensions to persons between the ages of 60 and 65, or to the wife of a retired person, whatever the age. The amount of the pension now provided as old age security should be increased substantially to enable anyone to live as decently as the physical, material and human resources of Canada would allow.

It was a good motion that the hon. member for Roberval brought in. I think it is a better motion with the change I have made in it, and I hope the House, throughout the day, will indicate its support.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before I recognize the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Tétrault), I might put the motion. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre indicated that it was a friendly motion in so far as hon. members to his left who are sponsoring the motion today are concerned, and it would be the view of the Chair that the motion is in order. It seems to me it does not go outside the scope of the motion moved by the hon. member for Roberval. I am prepared to put it to the House unless there is procedural objection.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Tétrault).

[Translation]

Mr. Oza Tétrault (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I have supported the motion moved by my colleague the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier), requesting the government to provide the old age security pension all those between 60 and 65, as well as to the wife, whatever her age may be.

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Parliament, in 1965, passed a law to bring the pension age down from 70 to 65 and today anyone aged 65 is entitled to this pension. Until 1967, the pension was established at $75 per month, but since 1968, the amount can be increased according to the rise in the cost of living, and it now stands at $79.58. And in January 1971, the maximum was increased by 42 cents, so as to become a monthly payment of $80.

Mr. Speaker, this government is presently incapable of finding jobs for the unemployed. During periods of unemployment, as is now the case, public opinion calls for a lower retirement age, so that more old people can withdraw from the labour market thus making room for younger people.

Mr. Speaker, legislation passed in Denmark in 1891 set at 60 the retirement age, but it was amended in 1932 to raise it to 65. Even if this was a backward step with respect to the 1891 legislation, it provided some compensation. For example, under special circumstances, local authorities could, with the approval of the responsible minister, grant the pensions at 60.

Mr. Speaker, the legislation passed in New Zealand in 1898 provided a pension to the citizens of 65 and over. An amendment passed in 1911 reduced it to 60 and to 55 for women, when the applicants had two young dependents of 15 or under. Another amendment passed in 1913 granted a retirement pension to all women of 60 or over.

Mr. Speaker, the law that was passed in Australia in 1908 granted old age pension to men and women of 65 and over. That minimum age was lowered to 60 in 1910.

In China a few years ago, older people starved to death in the streets. Nowadays, people of 50 and 55 in that immense and over-populated country receive the old age pension. Canada cannot be left behind in this vital question of age.

Mr. Speaker, the government seems to think we are asking for something impossible, yet considering Canada's physical possibilities to produce, we all agree that we could produce for a population twice the size of ours. Indeed, we are 50 years behind as concerns the application of this old age pension to cover people at 60. Mr. Speaker, Canada must face stronger and stronger foreign competition. It should endeavour to increase its manufacturing efficiency. In other words, it should increase productivity. Now, account should be taken of the development of new techniques older workers, 60 years and over, find it hard to get used to.

According to a study conducted by the Economy and Research Branch of the federal Department of Labor in 1960 and published under the title "Age and Efficiency", maximum efficiency obtains at 55 and tends to decrease thereafter.

Old Age Security Pensions

Mr. Speaker, in my constituency, there are many cases of married couples where the husband receives a pension, whereas the wife, being younger, has to be satisfied with a small welfare allowance. This is an unfortunate situation. After having brought up a fairly large family, one should not have to live under inhuman conditions, although that is often the case. The reason is that there is no money to buy the necessities of life while we are living in affluence and that department stores in all our cities are bursting with those goods which could make our families so happy.

During summer adjournment, I convassed from door to door in my riding to make on the spot enquiries. I believe that if the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his cabinet members, in charge of the laws on old age pensions, could do the same they would see the deplorable living conditions of many aged couples and this would prompt the cabinet to make a faster decision. But the Prime Minister and his cabinet are satisfied with travelling around the world to try and sell our products of which many Canadian families are in great need but the almighty dollar does not work for people's needs but for those who control our economic blood; even more important, the election fund must be replenished.

[English]

In a pre-election speech in the fall of 1935, the late Right Hon. Mackenzie King declared at the opening of the electoral campaign and I quote:

> Until the control of currency and credit is restored to Parliament and recognized as its most evident and most sacred responsibility all talk of democracy is idle and futile. A truly national bank, properly constituted, should control the issue of money in terms of public need.
> The flow of money must be in relation with the domestic, social and industrial needs of the Canadian people.

I think this was a very true statement, but just like all the other Liberal promises, it was never respected. It was just another trap to get voters to vote for the party. Since 1930, Canadian people have been asking questions about our Canadian monetary policy. Canadians wonder why we have so much in time of war and so little in time of peace, so much for underdeveloped countries and so little to develop Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would ask the government to set up a royal commission to find out if we have enough products to pay our older people a pension as soon as they reach age 60.

Mr. Speaker, we make all sorts of studies but it would be important to know if our country has enough products to pay our older people a pension as soon as they reach age 60. I think our country has the necessary products to help those people.

There is a particular case I would like to single out. Two older people from Malartic came to see me, one is 71 and the other 74 years old. These two persons have a joint bank account where each deposited $1,000. The father was telling me, we do not want to touch it, it is for our burial. At the end of each year, the bank files a report indicating that they received a small amount of interest. So the federal government takes away part of the interest they receive. Instead of getting the maximum $255 a month, they get roughly $248 a month because they each have $1,000.

I think that this should not be tolerated in a country as rich as Canada.

I have recently seen a family in Val d'Or, where the father is 74 years of age and the mother 57, and they have a totally incapacitated son of 27 and an ailing daughter. The father draws the $135 maximum pension, the son $75, the daughter $80 and the mother nought. This is a situation which happens in Canada. Four people must live on $290. How can they manage?

The hon. member for Roberval stated a few moments ago that an employee is forced to leave his job at the age of 65 and is eligible to only three weeks of unemployment insurance benefits and the maximum he can receive is $80 a month. a year earlier, if the same person aged 65 who left his work by reason of his age was available for work, he could draw unemployment insurance benefits together with his monthly pension of $80, $79 or $58. Here is a person who could live with a measure of decency for at least a year. But the investigating officers realized that there was some money to be gotten out of these families and this is how people are penalized.

Mr. Speaker, I will say no more on the subject, but ask once again the government to fall in with the request that old age security pensions be provided to persons aged 60. The government of Canada would be well deserving of the ratefulness of the Canadian people by instituting forthwith an integral scheme whereby pensions would be provided to persons aged 60 and to the wife of a retired person, whatever the age.

• (4:20 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): It was good of the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) to put forward his motion today. It gives us an opportunity to pause for a while and give some thought to the question of the retirement in dignity of people in Canada, considering the fact that they have contributed to our society in a productive manner all their lives and that they therefore have the right to a pension which will permit them to live in dignity.

The thrust of the motion put forward by the hon. member for Roberval is concentrated around the approach that is made available by means of the old age security pension. This is the measure he has emphasized and which he would like to expand further to include people whose age is 60 and over. In discussing the manner whereby he would finance this proposal, if I am interpreting him correctly, he said the necessary funds could be found by reducing or eliminating payments to recipients of unemployment insurance benefits, by reducing or eliminating payments to trainees under manpower auspices and by reducing the number of people employed as civil servants to administer certain programs.

It seems to me this is an awkward way in which to go about providing benefits of the kind envisaged. It is perhaps outdated in the sense that it looks only at one social benefit measure without taking into account that with every year that goes by we are closer to the fruition of another social insurance measure of great importance to Canadians, namely, the Canada Pension Plan which was introduced in the House in 1965, I believe. It seems to me that if we are to achieve the objective outlined by the hon. member, namely, the extension of pension benefits to other segments in our community, we could do so more effectively and more generously by paying attention to the Canada Pension Plan and to some of the provisions it contains. There are provisions in the plan which would permit us to achieve this objective earlier if it were possible to accelerate the year in which full rates are to be made available, namely, to introduce full rates earlier than 1976. This would only be possible, of course, if Canadians were willing to increase their premiums to this contributory plan thus enabling the year of maturity of the plan itself to be advanced.

Another step which might go a long way to meeting the hon. member's objective would be to raise the ceiling on pensioners' earnings. This would increase the number of people who would benefit. Rather than by means of increasing taxes in a manner the hon. member for Roberval did not really specifically outline, except by indicating that certain useful programs which exist at present should be eliminated, the Canada Pension Plan offers a vehicle of self-imposed taxation and contributions which makes much more sense.

This discussion also provides us with an opportunity to consider a question which has been raised, I suppose, by other hon. members on other occasions, that is to say, whether we should continue to regard the age of 60 as the age at which people have reached a stage in life at which they should retire from the productive labour force. It seems to me there is another way to go about it. We could revise this concept of a fixed retirement age and substitute a flexible retirement clause. This would tie in with some of the ideas expressed by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard) when he spoke of two different ages, the calendar age and the physical age. Rather than be tied down by a calendar age, it seems to me we could achieve greater social benefits by thinking in terms of a flexible retirement age. This would permit an individual to retire from active productive life at the age at which he or she wished to do so. In some cases it would be well above the age of 65; in others it might be well below.

It is this concept which might be considered by the minister and the officials in charge of the Canada Pension Plan when embarking upon consultations with provincial governments as they are scheduled to do in years to come. It makes sense that a flexible retirement clause should be part and parcel of a social security scheme. Canadians would then be able to retire when they wished to do so and become entitled to certain benefits on their own terms, rather than in accordance with a rigid concept which is difficult to apply in day to day life. May I add that this concept is not only not new but has already been incorporated in the legislation of some other countries. For instance, I understand that the pension plan operated by the Federal Republic of Germany, as recently amended, introduces this same concept of flexible retirement. That country has also introduced at the same time the one-year credit concept for mothers who have to withdraw from the labour force. This kind of pioneering in the field of social measures would, if adapted to our own needs, considerably benefit pensioners in Canada.

In examining the approach developed by the hon. member for Roberval, who suggested we could achieve a similar objective if not a better one, through the Canada pension plan, I would suggest that in doing so it would be desirable to co-ordinate social measures with other federal programs. For instance, it would be desirable to co-ordinate the Canada Pension Plan with the unemployment insurance plan, thereby offering flexible retirement when workers decide to withdraw. Perhaps we might even introduce incentives to withdraw that are even more attractive than the present incentives.

Let me give the House an example, Mr. Speaker. If I recall correctly, under the unemployment insurance legislation approved by this House, if a person aged 65 or over decides to retire and take a pension under the Canada Pension Plan he receives a lump sum payment amounting to three weeks' salary. However, should this person decide not to retire but to continue to make himself available for employment—this person is assumed to be unemployed—he can continue to receive unemployment insurance benefits for almost one year. There is a considerable difference in the amount that this person will receive, depending upon which approach he decides to adopt. It seems to me that the incentive offered by the lump sum payment is much less than the benefit that this person would receive were he to decide to remain available for employment. I just give this example to underline the importance, as already indicated by others before me, of co-ordinating the Canada Pension Plan with other social measures, such as unemployment insurance, in order to offer the maximum benefit.

Before concluding may I make reference to one aspect of our old age security legislation which has not been debated today. I refer to immigrants who wish to retire in their native land. Under the present provisions, an immigrant is permitted to receive his old age security pension should he decide to return to his native land only when he has been resident in Canada for 25 years. This opportunity has been taken by some who felt that, for health or sentimental reasons, it was necessary for them to retire in their country of origin. This measure has also been made use of by others who felt that the sum made available by old age security would go further in their native land where the cost of living was lower. In recent years a number of representations have been made to the government by different groups who have stressed the desirability of reducing the number of years residence from 25 so as to permit individuals, who perhaps have reached the age of retirement but have been resident in Canada only 20 or 23 years, to retire to their native country.

It seems to me this is a matter about which arguments can be made either way. At the same time, I should like to take this opportunity of drawing this question to the attention of the minister. I urge him to consider requests made over the years to reduce the residence requirement. If this is possible I am sure it would be most appreciated by those who wish to take advantage of such a provision.

Mr. Charles H. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take this opportunity to say a few words on behalf of the older citizens of Canada. No section of the Canadian populace has suffered more under this government's outmoded approach to the economy than our senior citizens. No section of our populace has suffered more from the deliberate and cold-blooded effort by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to fight inflation by creating unemployment.

It has often been said that the war against inflation is fought on the backs of the poor. I know that our senior citizens will agree with that statement. After working all their lives to try to accumulate enough to live on in decency for the balance of their lives, these people now find their pensions and savings chopped away by inflation. They are denied any satisfactory measure of relief by a government which can find hundreds of millions of dollars to squander on unnecessary projects, but little if any assistance to offer the old age pensioners.

I would be the first to agree that the conditions for the old age pensioner have improved over the last 20 or 30 years. May I also say formally that we cannot rest on our laurels. Much needs to be done for these people. If I need to support that statement, I can do no better than refer to statements made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro). I was interested to note, in glancing through some remarks that the minister made at the federal-provincial conference of welfare ministers last January, that he recognized that unemployment was higher than ever before in this country, that many, many more human lives were in jeopardy in this country and that those people were depending on social welfare assistance. After referring to the various programs the government has in mind, he went on to say:

> The main thrust of the federal policy in this field—

Meaning the whole field of social assistance.

> —for the future will be:
> 1. to develop the guaranteed income technique as a major anti-poverty policy;
> 2. to reduce emphasis on universal programs like old age security and family allowances and place greater emphasis on selective programs providing income-related benefits under Guaranteed Income Supplement and Family Income Security Plan;

Today, we are concerned only about the guaranteed income supplement part of the statement. I think the minister's remarks are enlightening and show that he recognizes that much more must be done for our older citizens if they are to live in any sort of decent retirement.

The minister also discussed the question of assistance as a right, something that has been argued over the years. I was pleased to see his statement to the effect that governments must now recognize that the provision of this type of assistance constitutes a right and that this is what the government intends to provide. That, to me, demonstrates clearly the wisdom of a motion of the type we are considering. The necessity is there. In the few minutes I shall talk, I want to point out some of the weaknesses of the present system and make suggestions for betterment.

Canada's senior citizens make up a large proportion of those affected by poverty. They had high hopes as a result of the white paper on income security; yet, since being introduced in November, 1970, the white paper has been subject to a heavy barrage of criticism from all sectors of Canadian society. Its critics include social welfare workers, journalists and economists. They come from all sections of the population. The white paper, prepared under the direction of Deputy Minister Joseph Willard, took two years to research. Canadians expected the white paper to include the announcement of a broad, new social policy for this country. Yet, when the programs were announced, it became evident that the Minister of National Health and Welfare had lost in his fight for a comprehensive social program. After 18 months of cabinet in-fighting, a very feeble document was introduced on November 30, 1970.

The proposals in this document advocated three main changes. The first related to family allowances; the second, to old age payments and the income supplement, and the third, to the Canada Pension Plan. At this time, in this debate, I am concerned only about proposals or suggestions relating to old age pensions and the guaranteed income supplement. My criticism of these proposals and of our present system falls under two headings: the first is the old age security plan itself and the second, the guaranteed income supplement.

It is amazing that the criticism of these two plans has been so widespread and uniform, although the critics have come from a diversity of backgrounds. One of the things that has surprised critics is the speed with which the government enacted into law those parts of the white paper dealing with old age security and the guaranteed income supplement. The speed with which they brought those programs in was unusual for this government. Up to the present, the government has brought out white papers, with the avowed intention of giving people lots of time to study them, make proposals and suggestions and, hopefully, bring about improvements. In this instance, no opportunity was given to anyone to study the proposals in the white paper. There was no opportunity for organizations and people to suggest amendments.

The old age security and guaranteed income supplement benefits, even with the increases provided in the spring of this year, still fall short of the minimum required for a satisfactory standard of living for the aged. Few of our old people will be removed from poverty as a result of the increase. Furthermore, as critics have pointed out, income tax at present rates reduces the payments in many instances, particularly for single people; and, even if the proposals for tax amendments are adopted, single people and some couples under 70 will suffer an income reduction through taxation.

There has also been a criticism of the fact that the universal program, that is, the old age security plan, was not "beefed up". Why was there such a meagre increase? It was about 40 cents a month, as I recall. Here is a payment that is given to all people who are over 65. If you want to see how great the need is for an increased basic amount, you only need to look at the figures. About 50 per cent of our people on old age security are receiving the guaranteed income supplement; more than half of these people get the full supplement. Clearly, the need is there. These older people just do not have the necessary income on which to exist.

The flat rate of $80 for old age security, even with the cost of living escalation of 2 per cent for the guaranteed income supplement, is not realistic when we consider that the cost of living index has been rising by 4 or 5 per cent annually. If the past performance of the economy is repeated in the future, and there is nothing to indicate that the increase in the cost of living index will be lower—indications are that it will continue to rise by at least 4 or 5 per cent—the result will be that in 25 years today's $80 will buy something less than $40 worth of goods and services. At the end of 50 years it will not buy anything. The sad part is that pensioners are at the mercy of the system. They have no way of bargaining for wage increases, as everybody else does. This action by the government is even more unfair when we realize that old age pensions were directly paid for, in part, by the pensioners themselves. They have contribute dto thes epensions through automatic tax deductions and have taken into considerations pension payments in figuring out how much will be available to them at retirement.

Another serious criticism of the present legislation is that old age pensioners are still taxed on income they earn on top of the government allowances. For each $2 of income in excess of the pension, $1 will be taken away in taxes. There are many ways in which this practice of deducting $1 for every $2 can be shown to be both undesirable and unfair. For example, many older people have substantial savings but low income and are receiving the supplement. Other people with no savings but with incomes only slightly above the present maximum receive nothing. When the working corps becomes the retired corps and eligible for the guaranteed income supplement, they find their Canada Pension Plan payments are cut because they are taxable. Can we blame them if they feel they are effectively paying a 50 per cent rate of income tax on their Canada Pension Plan pensions, even though their retirement income may be below the poverty level? As a result of this, many old age pensioners, even though they are healthy and well enough to take outside jobs, feel it would not be to their advantage to accept these jobs. Such a penalty is not consistent with the allegations in the white paper of last year that the major reason for not adopting the guaranteed annual income centres around a need to develop a suitable work incentive for such a plan.

There are many glaring examples. I have received many letters as I am sure have other members. One letter I received deals with the case of an old age pensioner who is not able to work and whose wife is under the age at which she would be eligible for the pension. She has to go to work, probably to help pay the drug bills for the pensioner. When she goes to work she immediately finds the guaranteed income supplement is reduced or taken away entirely. This is a ridiculous situation and is one which is not fair to the older citizen. Every time we suggest changes, the government asks where the money is to come from. These are changes perhaps of a minor nature, but they are of very great importance to the pensioners who are involved. I do not think the cost in dollars would be so great that it should be met with a reply to the effect that this is fine but where is the money to come from.

There are many other anomalies and hardships which our present system works on the old age pensioner. For example, even at a time when the government is trying to encourage savings and to encourage people to take part in the financing of the country, the older person is discouraged from purchasing government bonds because the interest on those bonds would be considered income so his guaranteed income supplement could be lowered. Because of these laws people are encouraged to remain in dwellings which probably are too big for their requirements. Because the dwelling is paid for, these people feel they have no alternative but to live there rather than rent smaller premises which would be more suitable for them in their old age.

These are some of the criticisms I wanted to bring forward in this short space of time. As I remarked, they are not of such a far reaching nature as to represent a great drain on the treasury and yet are very important to these people involved. I have been very encouraged by the fact that the minister has recognized the needs of our older people. The quotation from his remarks to which I referred at the start of my speech indicates that the minister is aware of these problems. The question now is not whether these people should be helped, but how. I am encouraged by the fact that the minister has indicated his willingness to accept suggestions. I hope he will accept some of the suggestions made here today and push ahead with plans to develop a rational and reasonable social assistance welfare services program.

[Translation]

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I first want to express my appreciation and that of the hon. members of my party and of all parties in the House for the good service rendered by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) in moving this motion, because he has drawn the attention of the whole House to the very serious problems of all the older people in our great country. I am sure that we are all happy that he has moved this motion this afternoon, and I want to congratulate him.

[English]

As the first spokesman for our party, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has said we heartily support the motion introduced by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier). Our only suggestion in the form of an amendment has been that we would like to see something a little more definite. We would like to see the amount of the benefit now provided as old age security substantially increased. I believe our concern in introducing this amendment arises from the fact that, as outlined by the hon. member who spoke on behalf of the government party, there are many other things which could be introduced to help the elderly people who need income at the present time. He expounded at great length on the various alternative ways and means by which this could be done. Yet, at no stage do I believe he said this motion was not a good one, except of course he implied it would be a very expensive one, at least in respect of those people who would be pensionable at 60 years of age.

The fact is that the elderly people in this country suffer more and more as the months and years go by. They suffer for a great variety of reasons. I do not think little bits of patches here and there and yonder will be sufficient to help in this case. Obviously, as the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard) said, there are pockets of injustice here and there which need eliminating. The elimination of pockets of injustice, however, will not deal with the very great difficulty which exists now in respect of the older people. The overriding problem of the older people is that they do not have enough money on which to live. Their pensions are not adequate. As time goes on and as living costs increase in a whole variety of directions, and as their little bits of revenue decrease, the problem becomes more and more acute. No amount of patching up in respect of the abuses and injustices will solve the main problem of how to get enough income into the hands of the thousands and thousands of elderly people which they require in order to live decently.

I wish to point out to members opposite, particularly the hon. member who just spoke, that there is nothing in this motion or in the minds of any of us on this side, that would prevent a flexible approach in respect of the old age pension. That does not mean a means test. We have been told about the situation in Germany and I would add Britain and other places where the application of the old age pension is flexible depending on the age, vitality and will of the person to continue working. We in no way would interfere with that. I think it would be a very bad thing indeed to lower the boom on people at the age of 60 by simply saying that everybody who reaches the age of 60 must stop gainful employment. There are a great many people who, having gone beyond the age of 60, still have sufficient strength, vitality, intelligence and devotion to make great contributions.

On looking at this motion, one sees that it is very simple and logical. It suggests the lowering of the pensionable age to the age of 60 for all people. In my view, it does one very good thing right away. It brings back the principle of universality to a place from which it should never have been taken. I have never been able to understand why the government cannot bear to use the income tax as a means of getting back from people who do not need it the full amount of the old age pension that is paid to them, and a great deal more, in order to help the other people. Why is it not simpler, easier and more fair to make the pension available as a matter of right, and then use the income tax in a fair way to get the pension back from all those who do not need it?

One thing I want to point out is that ever since the inception of the old age pension it has never been set at a level which covered the actual cost of living. Since no attempt has ever been made to find out what it actually costs to live, pensions have not been based on it. As a matter of fact, a few years ago the Senate Committee on Aging pointed out clearly that one of the things that was required in connection with the old age pension was the establishment of a technically competent body to study the income needs of older people and the development of a socially acceptable minimum budget for single persons as well as for couples, which would be adjusted automatically each year on the basis of a suitable index of consumer spending or of earnings. This minimum budget would be reviewed every five years to reflect changes in the relative circumstances of the working population and of the retired population.

So far as I am aware, and I know what has happened with old age pensions since the beginning, there has never been any competent body told to find out what it costs older people to live so that pensions could be set in accordance with it. Pension increases have always been set on the basis of the least possible amount that could be given which would keep the government viable politically. In my view, this is not the way to approach this matter. We should take to heart the recommendation of the Senate Committee on Aging, and before anything else is done to old age pensions we should find out right now how much it costs pensioners to live and then set the pensions at that level, with an escalator clause. We should also ensure there are sufficiently frequent reviews to keep the old age pensions moving in accordance with the cost of living.

Old age pensioners should no longer be divided into well-off and less well-off pensioners, since none of them is well off. There should not be such discrimination on the basis of whether one group has a few dollars available for their emergency needs or for their funerals. They should be considered as one group of retired people who should have a fair pension and who should be able to enjoy it. If some of them are able to earn more money after they retire, so what? Surely, they should be allowed to earn that money without a means test, and the computer can find out how much should be returned in income tax at the end of the year.

This motion has one or two very interesting features in it. One of them is that when a pension is paid at the age of 60 instead of 65, the spouse of the pensioner should also receive a pension, regardless of her age. We have heard people say that this is an incentive for elderly men to marry very young girls so that they will get a double income in the form of pension. I remember some years ago when a former cabinet minister, whom I shall not name because he is still living although he is no longer in the cabinet, during a discussion of the medicare scheme said he was very much opposed to it because he thought this would be an incentive for people to throw themselves under trains or to have industrial accidents in order to qualify for benefits. This is the same sort of logic as is being used in this argument. I believe that this aspect of the motion takes account of a very real need. In most cases the wife of the pensioner is only a few years younger. When the husband retires, his pay cheque is cut off and they both have to live on his pension. I am in sympathy with the idea of a pension being paid to the spouse of a pensioner who has no other source of income. If she is in the labour force, there may be regulations to provide for that contingency, but the intent of this resolution is to ensure that the spouse has enough on which to live.

There is another group about which I would like to say a few words. I am referring to women who, with all respect to what was said on the other side of the House about what could be done under the Canada Pension Plan to help elderly people, are not covered by the Canada Pension Plan so far as I can see. These are women who are spinsters or those who were casually employed when they were young, or those whose husbands have died, or those who have separated. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) said that most women over the age of 40 cannot get a job these days. I do not consider baby sitting and housework as being a job. This just provides pin money. Today, any woman over the age of 40, unless she is really lucky, cannot get a job. There is a great gap between the age of 40 and the age of 65. I have received many letters from women in this group who have no income and have to rely on social assistance. It tears them apart to have to go on social assistance for all those years, with the resultant lowering of living standards as well as the indignity.

I would like to make a special plea for those women and emphasize the need to lower the pensionable age. If we can lower it to the age of 60, it will help to look after women who cannot earn a living before they reach the present pensionable age of 65. This will cover many widows and women who are separated or divorced. It will not cover all of them, but it would help. I would like to urge that we consider them. There are many women who are alone and without a job and who have to rely on social assistance. They do not qualify for low income housing for families and they do not qualify for housing for older people. They are at the mercy of the landlords. They are in a bad way, indeed.

In supporting this motion we should take account of the fact that today elderly people are in a very different situation from that which existed several generations ago. The reason young people today regard old age with such unqualified horror is that for so many people old age is becoming a time of penury and poverty. The younger people think it is pretty awful to have your teeth falling out, your hair falling out, your insides being taken because of various diseases, with all kinds of disabilities setting in, and being regarded as a supernumerary. To them, it is just too much. They consider that there is nothing worse than old age.

Old age used to be considered more dignified because then there was the family circle. There was housing for that family circle. There was attention, and there was affection within the family circle. Elderly people had a part to play. But today, people have moved into the big cities, into tiny little houses where there is no room for elderly people. More and more elderly people have nothing to live on except what the government gives them in the form of pensions and relief. Today, they are in a very bad way. Today, they do not even have a true old age pension. It was pointed out by one hon. member to my left that what they have is part pension and part social welfare. This is true for those who are not fortunate enough to qualify for the $80, and those who do not consider themselves fortunate because no matter how the cost of living goes up their pension does not go up.

Elderly people's needs for health care and drugs are not covered. The hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard), who is a member of the medical profession, pointed out that last year the drug bill in Canada was $271 million. This is not covered by medicare. Old people who are not on social assistance have to go short of food and other necessities in order to try and get the drugs which are essential to treat the ailments associated with old age. Today elderly people are in a vastly different position from that which they used to occupy. An increasing number of them is dependent completely on what the community can do for them, through government services and through the pension. When we think of economizing the last place we should economize is the pensions for the elderly which would provide them with a decent living.

I urge that the House support the motion presented by the hon. member for Roberval. The eligible age should be reduced to 60 years, and there should be some flexibility provided to allow people to continue earning. There should be a substantial increase in old age pensions. We should determine the amount after finding out what it costs to live today. There should be an escalator provision in all pensions, and everybody should get the pension at age 60. Let us put our computers to work to determine the necessary amounts, to retrieve pension payments from millionaires, and make sure that those who arrive at age 60 have a chance to live out their days in a dignified, worth-while manner.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. Before recognizing the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Rodrigue), it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows:

[English]

The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding)—National Parks—Kluane Game Sanctuary—possible site of new park; the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave)—Veterans Affairs—Canadian Pension Commission—possible appointment of extra bodies to clear backlog of cases; the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard)—Manpower—availability of job vacancy survey data.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ELIGIBILITY OF PERSONS AGED 60 TO 65 FOR OLD AGE SECURITY PENSION

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Gauthier:

This House regrets that the government has not deemed advisable to provide old age security pensions to persons between the ages of 60 and 65, or to the wife of a retired person, whatever the age. Any pension so awarded should be such as to enable anyone to live as decently as the physical, material and human resources of Canada would allow.

Old Age Security Pensions

[Translation]

Mr. Romuald Rodrigue (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to have this opportunity of speaking in favour of the motion moved by my colleague, the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier).

This motion, to my mind very important, deals with a problem that is getting more serious everyday, that of the people of 60 to 65.

We are now going through a very difficult period as far as employment is concerned. The latest reports on unemployment published by Statistics Canada and the Department of Manpower and Immigration on October 14, showed that 434,000 people were unemployed in Canada at the end of the week ending September 18 1971.

Statistics also indicated a marked increase in the number of unemployed in the 14 to 24 age group. The situation is certainly serious because the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) tabled supplementary estimates including many programs to create more jobs in the next months.

I am sorry to find that young people have a hard time finding employment; I think this should not be at the present time. These are our best workers, our best brains, and they are ready to participate in the economy of the country. In view of this situation, many people and groups now demand that the pension age be lowered to 60 years.

It is useless to try and find out what those who have reached 60 think when the matter of asking them to retire comes up. Some would be prepared to retire after 40 or 45 years of work, but the loss of their only income does not allow them to consider an early retirement at 60.

As to those who have reached that age, when they apply for a job, they are sometimes asked how old they are. After a cursory look, they are told there is nothing for them on account of their age.

Such an answer is disheartening for those who have worked hard all their lives but who are still willing to contribute to the economic life of the country through their work, while receiving at the same time a salary which would allow them as well as their family to live decently.

Things are even harder for families in which one or two children are still in school, and the father's is the only income. Then there are those men who are sick or exhausted, and just do not have the physical strength to compete with younger, fitter workers. The labour market has become increasingly demanding. Machines which have taken the place of man run at very high speed and demand more energy from the people who operate them, so that in many cases, when he reaches an advanced age, the same man cannot keep up with production requirements because of his physical condition.

I could quote many similar examples. The problem which affects all of us is this: the number of unemployed is increasing all the time. More and more young people join the labour force every year. People who have reached 60 find it increasingly difficult to remain on the labour market, for the reasons I have just mentioned. Are we going to leave them and their families without an income? I do not think this would be worthy of a country which calls itself wealthy and even claims that it is one of the richest in the world. We must quite urgently have a look at this and find a just solution for those people who certainly are entitled to a decent life after all the years they have served their families and their country.

To put the matter off is not a solution, Mr. Speaker. That would amount to ignoring the situation. That problem has been throughly investigated in several countries. A document published in 1932 by the International Labour Conference says that the minimum retirement age should not be beyond 65. As I said, that report was published in 1932. In Canada it took 35 years to take into account that recommendation of the International Labour Organization.

Indeed there may be different views according to economic needs. When there is unemployment, as it is the case today, public opinion wants the retirement age to be reduced so that more old people will quit the labour market to make way for young people who are entering that labour market. We must also stress the fact that the difficulty older people have in getting a job confirms that it is necessary to lower the retirement age.

That is what happened in Denmark in 1932 when labour unions requested that retirement age be brought down from 65 to 60, which was in fact done in 1937.

The same reactions prompted British unions to demand retirement at an earlier age and an increase in the age of compulsory school attendance, in order to reduce the number of people on the labour market.

In New Zealand, as early as 1898, retirement pensions were paid at age 65 and an amendment passed in 1911 brought this down to age 60.

In 1908, Australia passed a similar legislation for persons aged 65 and the minimum age was reduced to 60 in 1910.

In Canada, only in 1927 was legislation passed granting payment of a $20 a month pension to people aged 70 and over. Among the industrialized countries, we were one of the last to pass legislation providing a retirement pension and it is only two years ago that those who have reached age 65 have been entitled to draw this pension. We certainly don't hold the speed record when it comes to producing legislation to help the retired. Mind you, I don't intend to blame the various governments we have had since 1900, nor can one government take the credit for passing this legislation or for amending it during the last 15 years. The only ones I could address congratulations to for this law are the Canadian citizens who have agreed to support its costs.

At election time, there have been some mischievous people who took pleasure in intimidating those who were in receipt of a federal government retirement pension, by saying that if they did not support this or that candidate, they would lose their pension. Those who intimidated our retired people in this manner were dishonest. I say that if we are behind some countries as far as improving our pensions program is concerned, it is likely attributable to people of this caliber.

I would like to deal with another matter which surely deserves serious consideration, that is the excessive number of social assistance programs, which duplicate one another. At the present time, I believe there is need in Canada to reconsider social programs in order to eliminate bureaucracy which is becoming more and more rampant. In some fields, programs seem to have expanded inordinately, considering the aid that the people can receive from them.

Some persons receive the old age pension, a small amount under the Quebec or the Canada Pension Plan and, sometimes, an allowance from the Department of Health, Family and Social Welfare. They receive money from three different sources and all this is not enough to enable them to live decently. This example shows that we are overadministered. There is uneasiness and lack of coordination concerning the application of all assistance programs in Canada, whether at the federal, provincial or municipal level. All administrative levels demand exclusiveness and priority, without ever coming to an understanding. This is sheer pandemonium. And those who really need help must sometimes deal with several offices before managing to get a meagre allowance which barely keeps starvation away.

Those who pay for this fancy are, first, the people in need of assistance, second, "Bateeste" the taxpayer who, every week, sees the amount of his pay cheque decrease, whereas the deductions on his cheque stub keep on increasing, third, the employer who, at the end of every month, is never done with sending reports to various governments and this under the threat that if the reports do not reach the departments on a specified date, a surcharge will be levied. Employers have also become a cog in the bureaucratic system.

As a result there are a loss of time, a decrease in production and an increase in prices.

It is time to put an end to similar programs which are a waste of public funds. If we sincerely want to alleviate destitution and obtain a minimum of efficiency, the federal government must first—followed by the provincial governments—take the necessary steps to remove in certain cases that cumbersome and useless redtape and this as soon as possible, if we do not want to crush those who through their taxes contribute to the administration of the country.

In 1968, when it came into office, the government stated that it would use all possible means to attain the highest degree of efficiency and this at less cost. Where are the changes?

The Prime Minister himself dealt with the matter with so much assurance that even those who did not share his views really believed what he said and hoped for a change.

In that regard, I would like to quote the words of the Prime Minister himself, as reported in a commercial advertisement published by the Liberal Party of Canada in June 15, 1968 issue of the magazine La terre de chez nous, and I quote:

I believe in progress. I believe in evolution. I believe we have the duty of not trying to stick to everything from the past. I believe we must make experiments, risk solutions that are necessary if we want to enter tomorrow's world and not linger in yesterday's.

Canada offers many signs of bad wealth distribution. For instance, in the whole rural population, including fishermen, farmers and forest workers, there are people who live in intolerable economic conditions. Now, that is unacceptable. But what is also unacceptable is that many politicians seem to consider this situation only as a secondary problem.

He who seeks to please everybody by lessening his positions or making a compromise with his convictions eventually ends up with neither position nor convictions. What one really believes he must say simply, clearly and without guile.

It was fine to establish priorities and to generate hope in the minds of the people; it was indeed necessary. After three years, nothing warrants that those objectives will be reached. I even wonder whether they are still pursued. I would rather think that all those programs have been shelved together with the other election promises.

Mr. Speaker, in all fairness for the have-not groups, the time has now come to work seriously, by brushing off all the impediments which build up an impassable barrier to the real wealth of this country, which is available has has been accumulated by men to meet the needs of one and all.

What prevents production from meeting consumption and reaching the population is that impassable barrier erected between production and distribution; it is too high indeed and to protect some private interests, no opening has been provided.

What is this obstacle in front of us? It is the financial system assisted by its best device bureaucracy.

Each time people request improvements, new structures which more and more difficult to reach, are created; when they can be reached, some extremely complicated regulations are made. Sometime, even public servants contradict each other and understand nothing.

In the meantime, people suffer, are deprived of necessities and the whole economy of the country is slowed down by that bureaucracy.

If democracy still exists, if it is not a topic discussed in living rooms only, if it is not an empty word, it is up to this government to eliminate the obstacles it has created. If the government is really sovereign and responsible to the people, it must and can take action, otherwise we will have to believe the Right Honourable Mackenzie King was right when he said in 1935, and I quote:

As soon as a nation gives up control of its credit, it matters little who makes the laws. As long as the control of money and credit are not given back to the government and recognized as its most important responsibility, one cannot speak of the sovereignty of parliament and democracy.

Mr. Gerry McGeer, former mayor of Vancouver, who sat in the House of Commons as member for the liberal party in 1935, speaking to an audience, stated as follows:

If the Canadian government could delegate to the banks through an act, the privilege of creating the credit of the nation, surely it could claim back, on behalf of the nation, the same privilege by introducing another legislation.

Mr. McGeer added, addressing the reporters who had asked him questions:

My answer is that the government could pass an act to regain control of its credit; that would be constitutional and it could be done simply by amending the bank act and the financial administration act.

To my mind, as long as the government does not remove those artificial stumbling blocks, the nation will go from bad to worse. We must remove them.

It is time we had a single program to provide a guaranteed social income to all Canadians.

Since the beginning of my term of office in the House of Commons in 1968, I have received many letters from my constituents and even from other Canadians whose age vary between 60 and 65. They tell me that their physical condition does not allow them to work or that they are unemployed and they ask me to help them find a new job.

This is why a motion, which I support, was proposed by my colleague the member for Roberval.

Those who reach age 60 are demanding the passage of such legislation. A bill granting a pension to those persons would be well received by the other classes of society.

Now, I urge the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) as well as the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) and their advisors to consider thoroughly the matter and I hope that we will soon have a legislation reducing the retirement age at 60 and that it will not merely be a promise.

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me to take part in this debate, in view of the importance of the motion moved by members of the Social Credit. I think that this motion is a great idea as it is very important for the country, and I feel that it concerns the majority of members, if not all.

I have had the pleasure of making some remarks on the necessity of a pension at 60. There were at that time two reasons for such a policy, and I believe that after about one and a half years, I have had the opportunity, four or five times, of advocating the passing of such a measure. In fact, I find today that this idea seems more and more in agreement with the view of several hon. members, and I think that in the present context, such a solution would allow us to improve in no small way the present situation of employment.

I may have to repeat some comments that I have already made in this House. As a matter of fact, there are many reasons why the government should give serious consideration to this policy in the interest of the aged in the whole Canadian economy.

We take the opportunity that this allotted day affords us to make hon. members sensitive to this motion. I also believe that, because of hon. members' participation, the government will be inclined to give more attention to the matter than it has done so far.

Of course, one must admit at the start that there will be a price to pay. I believe that any social measure calls for some sacrifice, but, if they assess the effect of such a measure, most hon. members will not hesitate to vote the required funds, considering the way in which such a measure will help give new stability to the economy of the world in which we are now living.

We can link it of course, with the current social climate, but I think the measure cannot be more justified and the figures I could quote were already given in this House. One thing is sure, however; through such a measure we could reduce the unemployment rate by about 60 or 70 per cent. And if we calculate the costs to the state of maintaining 600,000 or 700,000 unemployed, we should all the more reconsider this possibility and I can well imagine that a drop of 50 p. cent in the number of unemployed would enable the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) to sleep soundly. It would equally enable the hon. Minister of National Healh and Welfare (Mr. Munro) to be happier. We should appreciate their efforts to improve the present situation, but, being realistic, we should at the same time recognize that their achievements have not met our expectations and due to the unavailability of the cure-all which we are always seeking, I think that the policy of providing old age security pensions at the age of 60 would offer a far easier solution than we have been hitherto contemplating.

I think that we have neglected to seriously consider this policy which appears too simple at first glance, but in the end, it would contribute to the greater happiness of a specific category of citizens as it would rekindle hope in the younger generation now awaiting the openings that the government has been unable to provide. Should we blame only the government? I do not think so because the situation is difficult everywhere.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that if they undertook a little investigation in various regions, all hon. members would realize that those who are pushing "60" or who are already in their 60's, would be most favourable to such pensions, considering the difficulties encountered by workers. Machines are constantly encroaching on the activities of man who normally, at that age, wishes to be provided with an adequate pension.

I believe it would be most convenient to consider the passing of a bill which would bring about that old age security. It might be better perhaps to introduce such a measure on a voluntary basis for the first six months, so as to enable people with a sufficient income—I mean by that, an amount of $150 as suggested by an hon. member of the NDP, amount which would surely not be too much, considering the fact that a pensioned couple would receive $300 per month, and that unemployed people receive more than $300 per month—to make a decision.

I believe we should consider that seriously so as to enable those older people to remain an asset in our society, to live a happier life under the present circumstances, recognizing at the same time all the benefits such a measure would provide, thus creating a much more valid social context than the one we know at the present time.

I shall limit myself to those few comments as I have been aware for a long time of the benefit of such measure and I hope the hon. members here will make an enquiry in their constituency and will all unhesitatingly claim from the people responsible in the department concerned, from the cabinet and from Parliament, the establishment of such a measure, to put the world back on its feet, by giving holidays to people who deserve them, creating employment for young people who have been longing for it for such a long time, which would make them much more optimistic as to the future, considering the comparisons we could make and the present difficulties they must face.

[Mr. La Salle.]

I will limit myself to those few remarks, but I cannot help denying the comments made a while ago to the effect that such a policy could be established over a five-year period.

I believe the present economic difficulties are much more urgent than the introduction of a legislation to cover the people who would be 60 years of age only in five years from now.

I think we will have to move at a faster pace than we did when we lowered the pensionable age from 70 to 65 years of age, and keeping in mind once again the present economic difficulties, I think the 12-month or perhaps six-month period could be left to the discretion of any worker wanting to take advantage of an adequate pension and quit working. He would still have a six-month period to make room for younger people who are costing the government plenty and at the same time, it would allow those who deserve holidays after working for 25, 30 or 40 years to be assured of a security the younger generation is already thinking about. I think that those who are now nearing the sixty mark have well deserved this treatment which would be the most human one the government would have ever given.

Together with the other hon. members of this House, I suggest that the government seriously consider implementing this policy as soon as possible in the best interests of all those who deserve it.

Mr. Guy LeBlanc (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I think the subject matter of the motion moved by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) is of great concern to all of us, as it is to me.

The subject matter of that motion, old age security pensions, is undoubtedly a very important issue respecting which we all feel highly concerned. So I am very pleased to have this opportunity to make my views known in the House this afternoon and to express my opinion on that motion, to say what I think of it, and how we should deal with this problem.

The proposed motion consists of two parts. What strikes me in the first one is that it sets out to blame the government. As a matter of fact, it reads:

—that the government has not deemed advisable to provide old age security pensions to persons between the ages of 60 and 65,—

As it was pointed out to us a moment ago by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), we are going to be told that so much has been done in the past, and I do agree with that.

I feel I can assert that those governments which extended social security to cover not just older people but also the weak, the sick, the widowed, in short, all the underprivileged, have always been Liberal governments.

I extend my congratulations to the hon. member for Roberval for having introduced this motion, for we cannot but support any suggestion aimed at improving our pension system for older people.

However, there is one aspect of this I should like to emphasize and which I find quite sensible, and that is the way we should provide for the wife of a pensioned older citizen. We all have in our respective constituencies—at least I have met many in mine—older couples who have always done their utmost to earn a living, who have lived with pride and dignity. Two or three weeks ago, I had such a couple in my office on a visit: the husband, 65 years old, is a pensionner. Although he would like to keep on working just like before, he is no longer able to do so because of a recent illness. Therefore, his only income is his pension.

His wife who is 59 has always lived on her husband's income, looking after the household and her family. Because of her age, she can expect very little assistance from her provincial Department of Health, Family and Social welfare. This couple have barely enough to live on and both of them are disheartened and saddened by what is happening to them. And in spite of all their efforts and all the requests they make to improve their lot, because of the existing laws and regulations, they get nowhere.

This is why we should urge the government that this specific point of the motion be given our consideration or be efficiently studied by the department involved and the officials who usually take care of such requests.

As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said, this system should obviously be regulated. An older man may have a much younger wife. I know this is unusual. Sometimes, this woman works to make a living and some unbalance would result if this comparatively young working woman received the old age security pension. The same reasoning applies to opposite situations.

As regards pension eligibility at 60, which would enable older people to lead a more human life in security, with the same living standards as the others, we all agree that we should keep on doing something in that direction.

Besides, our democratic institutions remind us of those principles in the Bill of Rights. May I read section 25 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights of 1948, and I quote:

> Everyone has the right to a standard of living adequate for the health and well-being of himself and of his family, including food, clothing, housing and medical care and necessary social services, and the right to security in the event of unemployment, sickness, disability, widowhood, old age or other lack of livelihood in circumstances beyond his control.

All those philosophical principles concerning social security, guaranteed income, assistance to the sick, are shared by everyone. However, opinions are divided, even among the people, at least in my region. I have met people who criticize—and sometimes rightly—certain social security measures, saying that in certain cases they might encourage some of the welfare recipients to commit a capital sin which I will not mention, since everybody here knows about it.

However, others who are really in need, who would really want to live in dignity as proud citizens, cannot get enough.

In any event, it would be desirable, as other members have said, to give immediately a very large amount, either $150 a month or more, to older people. But I think that all responsible citizens, even the older ones who want these amounts to better their lot, realize that a government cannot pay out so much money overnight, because it would throw our economy out of balance.

Those projects that we all consider with much eagerness and sincerity can nevertheless be developed within a certain period. At the present time, people say that even if the government has not been able to give the aged everything some require, it has found money to encourage, in other fields, other active and productive citizens. Of course, it had to be done. I have in mind the unemployed who are able to work and who are looking for a job.

In conclusion, I would like to stress the following point: Whatever may be said, it is always easier to find solutions which are sometimes over-simple to problems that are rather complicated, as everybody admits. If it were that easy, the problem of the old age security pension would have been solved like all the other increasingly complicated problems which exist in our technical and modern society.

Thus, in spite of our sincerity and emotion about this, because we all have older people in our families, we can nevertheless ask the government to give special attention to this motion, although we know that the only way we can find practical answers in as short a time as possible is by putting this problem in the hands of scientists and technicians, so that it may be solved by experts with modern, scientific methods. Thus, if we forget about demagogy, if we stop thinking only of elections and start giving some thought to the aged, we will certainly be able to solve this problem.

We are sure, given this government's sincerity and competence, that the problem is going to be solved—as it already is to a great extent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the Chair to resume same at eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to say a few words on the motion before us. This is a motion accepted by all hon. members and to which there was almost no opposition. In view of the fact that, generally all members are in favour of this motion, I would now like to suggest new ways and means of implementing its proposals. It is well and fine to talk about them but problems must be solved and funds must be found. In our present system, one must know where to find the necessary funds and how much the financing of such a project may cost.

We already know, Mr. Speaker, that our country can afford to pay to our older people as soon as they reach 60, a reasonable pension to allow them to retire from the work force in order to give others an opportunity to work and, after that, to live as men must live in a wealthy country.

Economic growth must be an economic right which is, first of all, to meet the needs of each Canadian citizen. By his labour and his genius, man has always tried to give a larger development to his life. But today, thanks to science and technology, he has become master of practically all nature and is extending his domination increasingly.

Thanks to the proliferation of communication between nations, the human family has become aware of itself as a unique community in the midst of the universe and is gradually so organising itself. As a result, Mr. Speaker, man now owes to his own industry many goods which he formerly awaited from superior forces.

Facing these alternatives and the huge enterprise extending to the whole Mankind, many questions have arisen among men as to the meaning and the value of this diligent activity, what use is to be made of all these new resources, what is the purpose of individual and collective effort, the intensification and the awareness of the needs for development and the personal renascence of a generation liberated by science, Progress and unprecedented wealth, and exceptional national economic growth in

One must admit that manpower needs are dwindling all the time, people being more and more replaced by the machine. Having to face this dilemma, young people remain without employment and older people are forced to cling to their jobs because they have no other source of income.

Another motion is officially put to the House asking that the old age security pension be granted to our citizens when they reach 60 years of age and that it be high enough to enable all citizens over 60, as well as their wives, to lead a decent life in line with their needs and the national production.

We are therefore requesting an increase in the basic pensions, that is more than $80 a month, and a lowering of the age of eligibility from 65 to 60. We also feel indirectly entitled to indicate to the government the means to provide the amounts required for the monthly payment of these pensions.

Within the frame of our economic system and of the present policy, we know that we of the Social Credit will not have our demands met because we are promoting a specific financing technique. Since we do not have the financing power, we are compelled to comply and to suggest means of payment consistent with the present system.

Although we are on the opposition side, although we are a party, that does not prevent us from thinking, from paying taxes, from living and from advising the government according to the custom of the capitalistic system.

We are perfectly aware that we live in Canada in 1971 within the capitalistic system which was generated and has evolved for 100 years under the guidance of the main political parties, the liberal and the progressive conservative parties. We are perfectly aware that we cannot administer nor can we advise the Canadian government as if it were already thinking in terms of social credit. Nevertheless, even under our present system, it is possible to provide better care for human beings, for the citizen, from his birth to his death, from the cradle to the grave, from his first breath to his last.

[Mr. Latulippe.]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): How poetic!

Mr. Latulippe: That is, Mr. Speaker, what must be brought home in Parliament to the 30 ministers and all the elected representatives of the people, in order to provide a fair and efficient administration to 22 million Canadians.

Let us rejoice that our potential production is worth several billion dollars more each year. However, it pains us all to see our best citizens deprived of their fair share of this wonderful production and this, because of our unconcern, our carelessness, our improvidence or incompetence.

Under our present system, we have been able to produce goods worth $90 billion up to 1971. I say $90 billion, but I think that the amount will exceed $92 billion, that is more than $4,200 per capita or $21,000 per household of five.

It is also under our present system that we must be able to organize the distribution, the consumption and the purchasing power of all our citizens, that all might have a fair share of the tremendous national production to which they are entitled.

Let us remember the years 1930-39, the years of the depression. Can we remember the war years, from 1939 to 1945? Can we recall the splendid period of the after-war, when money was plentiful until 1958, when the people started to speak of inflation, of unemployment and poverty, and this, in times of peace and overproduction?

We see clearly that the problems of unemployment, poverty and inflation are not a mere problem of production, but one of distribution. We produce more and more, and consume less and less. This is what is paradoxical about the management of Canada in 1971. We produce a lot, we capitalize too much, and we do not consume enough. There is a nationwide economic imbalance between production, consumption and capitalization. So, we must restore some balance in all this, within the framework of our monetary, economic and political, Canadian and capitalist system of free enterprise.

Here is a very simple table which will make us clearly understand how our national economy is planned by all the leaders, known or unknown, who control our economy. In 1945, 90 per cent of a $12 billion production was consumed and 10 per cent was capitalized. Everybody was happy. In 1958, that is 13 years later, $32 billion were produced, 75 per cent consumed and 25 per cent capitalized. People were still rather satisfied. Today, 13 years later, after the war, $90 billion are produced, but only 60 per cent are consumed and 40 per cent capitalized, mainly in the large companies, private or public institutions and corporations. By keeping the same pace in 1975, we will produce over $140 billion, but we will consume less than 50 per cent and capitalize over 50 per cent. Such a situation is ridiculous.

Still a little later, we will produce $200 billion but the companies will keep 90 per cent of the capitalization and leave only 10 per cent for consumption.

That is where we should intervene, Mr. Speaker. So, in 1971, we face a very well known and definite situation in which the great wealth of Canada and its main banking, business, financial, and industrial institutions is obvious. Apart from those encouraging facts, we notice many deficits in the budgets of several governments, many companies and numerous families which get more and more into debt each year although they still are short of the things necessary to lead a normal life in a country as prosperous as Canada.

These are not joking matters. We are at a loss to understand anything. The entire Canadian population is only able to consume $54 billion of a national product valued at $90 billion, whilst a few corporations and individuals accumulate capital to the tune of more than $36 billion for the years to come, as reserves to guard against risks and guarantee their business security.

Before allowing our firms to set aside surpluses of $36 billion, could we not earmark $12 billion to increase the purchasing power or to guarantee a minimum income to citizens who are deprived of the bare necessities of life as are our 60-year-old senior citizens and others and when such a marvelous national product exists side by side with a highly ambitious capitalization on the part of large corporations.

I am neither against profits and surpluses nor against necessary reserves aimed at guaranteeing business security. I know that this is good. But the evil lies in the abnormal increase in these famous reserves, year after year, on a scale authorized by the ministers and hon. members who have been elected by the people to administer justice and equity for the benefit of consumers who are all entitled to live in Canada, in 1971, in accordance with the national product and before exorbitant reserves have been accumulated for the years to come.

Even when the Bank of Canada was established in 1934, and oftentimes since then, the government has been requested to scrutinize those famous reserves accumulated by banks and corporations and to restrict them or bring them down to a level more in line with reality.

It should be realized that these enormous reserves derive from exaggerated profits obtained through high prices paid by the people. They even constitute the main source of inflation. The statistics published these last years on the secret, discreet and concrete reserves of large companies show that the price increases equal the increased reserves of those companies.

It would take too long to prove this here but the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) is aware of it and so are the accountants, economists and directors of major institutions. All the price increases the population had to put up with from 1960 to 1970 are equal to the accumulation of exorbitant reserves as shown in the report of private and public companies, banks and major institutions.

For the time being and for the purposes of the motion moved today, since better pensions must be paid to those older people of 60 and over, let us not try to determine where the money will be coming from. Money we have plenty. Production is there but it is the purchasing power that is inadequate. The money that is lacking is precisely the money that is needlessly accumulated in the large hidden reserves of major private and public institutions, with the permission or connivance of our government, which is not dishonest, but too unconsciously devoted to old administrative methods of protection, capital or productivity promotion.

Why produce 10 times more if the population does not have more money to buy that increased production? Can anybody answer me? If we produce $90 billion in 1971, we can only consume $54 billion, and other individuals and companies can capitalize $36 billion. If we were to produce $10 billion more, the citizens without purchasing power could not buy this additional production. The trouble is not lack of production but lack of purchasing power to meet the needs of the citizens of all levels and ages, including the children, the students, the unemployed, the crippled, the sick, the mothers with a family, the old, the citizens 60 years old or over who cannot find work and must live in 1971.

As can be seen, the entire economy of this country is off balance: some lack the essentials of life while others enjoy exorbitant surpluses, personally or through their millionaire companies.

People comment on inflation, unemployment, poverty, boosted taxes and prices. Nobody is satisfied. Nonetheless, Canada not enjoys prosperity but ranks among the wealthiest countries in the world. Only an over-all revision is required to restore the economic balance between the various sectors of our population, but we balk at the necessary decision.

The United States again will take the lead. They are now taking steps so that conflicts between employers and employees will be settled before the consumers, who at last will have their say and an opportunity to take exception to the price increases due to the increases in wages and interests rates.

Production is intended for consumption. Without consumers, there would be no need for production. But if consumers have no purchasing power, no money to buy production, it is not much better. Our lopsided system is not comfortable with those dependent consumers requesting pension, allowances or grants that they manage to have productive citizens pay through their income derived from wages or interests.

The solution would simply be to have the huge reserves capitalized yearly by big companies converted into purchasing power for dependent citizens. There would be no need then to increase personal income taxes, the cost of living, the price of products or services. This will have to be done sooner or later. It is not a matter of overtaxing corporations but of taxing their tremendous reserves and their reported profits. That is the important thing.

Today when individuals pay $5 in taxes, corporations pay only $1. We shall have to set this straight some day if we want a fair tax system. After ten years of studies and a royal commission on taxation, this point perhaps the only important one, was overlooked.

On page 113 of the bulky report of the Carter Commission on taxation, Mr. Carter took exception to the "practices" used in computing the depreciation reserves of the corporations. but no one wants to mention this dissenting opinion of the chief commissioner himself—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

[English]

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I agree that there should be improvements in the old age pension program, but I do not agree with this motion. The motion suggests, among other things, that the basic pension is the old age security pension. This is not true. At the present time the foundation, the core of our old age pension program is the Canada Pension Plan plus the old age security pension.

The motion also suggests an extension of the flat rate, universal old age security payment, in other words an extension of the basic $80 a month which is not related to other income and is not related to contributions. I totally reject a flat increase in the universal old age security of $80 a month. I think there is no justification for paying government pensions to all individuals without consideration of their other income, their other pensions, their rents, their dividends, their profits, and so on.

During the debate today the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) stated that if we increased the old age security pension for everyone we could get back all this money from the rich through income taxes. As a matter of fact, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway asked why the government cannot get it all back from recipients who are wealthy, through the income tax system. A few years ago when we introduced the guaranteed income supplement the minister produced statistics to show that you do not get it all back through the income tax system.

I cannot agree to the payment of a flat rate to everyone, hoping to get it back in some cases through the income tax system when through the very simple procedure of the guaranteed income supplement we can pay out money to the people who need it most. I think we should take the money that is available and divide it among those who have none or very little private income so that they can have a decent pension.

This year we are spending $2.2 billion on old age security and guaranteed income supplements. If we divided this among all our pensioners, rich and poor, the guaranteed minimum of $135 a month would not be available. In other words, if we divided that $2.2 billion among all the pensioners, the average pension would be below $135. We can only pay the $135 minimum because we are being selective.

I said that the Canada Pension Plan is the core of our old age pension program. When it comes fully into effect in 1976 under the present legislation we will be paying $121 per month to persons who have annual earnings of $5,200 a year. That $121 a month, plus the basic old age security of $80, would provide a pension of $201 a month. I said that this would be the case under the present legislation, Mr. Speaker, because in its white paper the government proposes changes in the Canada Pension Plan. For example, it proposes that by 1976 we would have a pension of $162 per month for those with average annual earnings of approximately $7,000, and if we add the basic $80 old age security pension to that it will give a pension of $242 a month.

When he introduced the white paper the minister said the changes proposed to the Canada Pension Plan were subject to negotiation with the provinces, especially with the province of Quebec because the Quebec Pension Plan is very closely tied in with the Canada Pension Plan. I hope the minister will proceed quickly with these negotiations and that very soon he will get acceptance for his proposals.

These figures I have given are for the Canada Pension Plan when it comes fully into effect in 1976. In this coming year, however, 1972, a person whose average annual earnings are $5,200, which is the maximum, will receive $65 a month from the Canada Pension Plan, plus $80 a month from old age security and $22.50 from the guaranteed income supplement. He will receive part of the income supplement because his income other than the old age pension will be less than $110 a month, so that the total he will receive in 1972 will be $171.50 a month, which is more than the $150 suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on a flat, universal basis.

I also wish to point out that the estimate with respect to the Canada Pension Plan is that it will cover 92 per cent of all employees and self-employed persons. The Canada Pension Plan also has a 2 per cent cost of living escalation clause. As I say, this is the core of our pension program. For those who will not have a sufficient number of working years, or who could not work at all, we have the guaranteed income supplement and the Canada Assistance Plan. The guaranteed income supplement at the present time provides $55 a month for those who have no other income.

The number of persons who are now receiving the guaranteed income supplement will become less as time goes by because more and more people will be covered by the Canada Pension Plan. Then as more people become covered by the Canada Pension Plan they will receive that plus the old age security and they will be getting the type of pension I referred to a few minutes ago which, for the vast majority of Canadians, if the proposals of the minister go through, would be approximately $242 a month in 1976.

The present old age security, guaranteed income supplement and the Canada Pension Plan are payable at age 65. Those who retire before 65 must rely on the Canada Assistance Plan and the programs that are related to it. I would favour reducing the qualifying age for the Canada Pension Plan, but not for the old age security as suggested in this motion. I suggest that one could take advantage of the Canada Pension Plan at age 60 in the same way that persons can now take advantage of it at age 65, that is if they leave the work force and retire. Under the present Canada Pension Plan, between ages 65 and 70 you do not get the pension, or you may get only part of it if you work between those ages, but at age 70 you get it in full whether you work or not. I would make that plan applicable at age 60. But the important difference between my proposal and that in the motion is that I would apply it to the Canada Pension Plan because, as I have said, it is the core of our pension program. It is based on contributions and the benefits are much higher than they are under the flat rate, universal old age security pension.

The motion proposes that wives at any age should receive old age security if their husbands have retired. I cannot accept that proposal. In many cases wives work and earn good incomes. There are cases where the wife wants to work. I can see no reason for paying a pension to a wife who is under 60, say 50 or 45, if she is working, just because her husband is retired. I would suggest, in its place, that she have the right as of age 60 to receive the old age pension if her husband is retired. Of course, if she had worked in her lifetime she would be eligible for the Canada Pension Plan and could receive those benefits at age 60, just as her husband could. If she had not worked at all, the only thing she could rely on would be the old age security pension. I would agree that if she is not working at age 60 she should have the right to the old age security pension.

I want to raise two matters with which I am not satisfied in the present program. One is the 2 per cent cost of living escalation clause. On several occasions in the House I have said that I do not think it is reasonable to limit the cost of living escalation clause to 2 per cent. I believe it should be the same as the percentage increase in the cost of living. The 2 per cent figure was picked when we introduced the Canada Pension Plan. At that time the minister said we would fix it at 2 per cent because in some years the cost of living rose and in others it went down. That might be true if we look at statistics over the last 50 years, but if we look at statistics since the last war I do not think there was any occasion when the cost of living dropped below that of the previous year. So if the 2 per cent was based on the fact that we will have reductions in the cost of living, I think it is unreasonable.

We should be prepared to increase pensions automatically in accordance with the total increase in the cost of living. This would be paid for by the increase in income tax collected due to increased wages. I think we should able to pay for a total increase in the cost of living under the guaranteed income supplement and under the Canada Pension Plan. If we are to do that and we want a reasonable pension for the small group of people not eligible for the Canada Pension Plan, then I think the guaranteed income supplement should also be increased to $70 a month.

That would mean a guaranteed minimum pension of $150 a month instead of $135. It would not be, as suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the basic, universal old age security which is paid to everyone but, rather, it would be as a result of the guaranteed income supplement. As I said before, this would be a better use of the money available for old age security.

I realize that to have a total increase in the pension fixed to the cost of living, and to increase the supplement to $70 a month would be costly. I also realize that in this fiscal year we are spending $2.2 billion on old age security. That is a lot of money. I understand the difficulty of the government in raising money for programs at this time. However, I put forward these proposals because I think they are goals that we have to achieve and I think they can be achieved if we put our minds to it.

Mr. Speaker, I have referred to the Canada Pension Plan, the old age security and the guaranteed income supplement but I have not mentioned private pensions. In Canada, most companies now have private pension programs and the great majority of them do not have a cost of living escalation clause. Some of them have accepted such clauses. As a matter of fact, this House made a report last year or the year before with respect to the Canadian National Railways and when they revised their pension plan our proposal to include a cost of living escalation clause was accepted. The public service of Canada also has an escalation clause in its pension plan. I think it would help to reduce social tensions and bring about a much happier generation of elderly people if more private companies included a cost of living escalation clause in their pension programs. Several have done it and I see no reason why more should not.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to repeat my points. First, I do not think we should increase the basic universal pension of $80 a month; I think that should remain fixed. Second, I think that the core of our pension program should continue to be the Canada Pension Plan, and I hope the government will get agreement for the changes proposed in its white paper as soon as possible. Third, I suggest that the age of eligibility under the Canada Pension Plan should be 60 years, but only if the person was not working, or in the same manner in which it is now available between the ages of 65 and 70 years.

Fourth, women over 60 years of age should be eligible for the old age security pension if the husband is retired. I do not think they should be eligible for a pension if they are under 60 years of age and working. Fifth, if women are under 60 years of age I think they should be eligible if they are not working and their husband is on the guaranteed income supplement. That would give some reason for paying the pension to a woman under 60 years of age because it would mean that the family income was not high and there could be a situation where the woman could not obtain work.

Six, I think if we want to make the guaranteed income supplement more in tune with today's cost of living, it should be $70 a month. This would mean that the guaranteed minimum pension would be $150 instead of $135. If we had that as well as an escalation clause which would increase with the cost of living, then I think we would have a first-class pension package. By that I mean one basically founded on the Canada Pension Plan and which would provide a guaranteed income supplement for the small percentage of people not eligible for the Canada Pension Plan.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Allmand: Yes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In view of the very welcome suggestion of the hon. member that if persons leave the labour market at age 60 they should qualify for benefits under the Canada Pension Plan, would he consider coupling with that a suggestion that such persons also qualify for the old age security pension? I am accepting his proposition—I suggested it myself this afternoon—that the condition be one of leaving the labour market. With that condition, and in view of the fact that the hon. member groups the two as a desirable combination, would he not agree that such persons, at age 60, ought to draw both pensions?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, when I was preparing my remarks this afternoon I considered that matter and I could not come to that conclusion. I agree that in some of the proposals I have made there are arguments that suggest it, but on the other hand I have an inclination which is opposed to the basic pension of $80 a month. What I would like to see is a complete guaranteed income supplement for all pensioners. However, we have the $80 a month now and we have to keep it. I would not reject what the hon. member proposes. I think it may be the only course, but I must say I did not come to a firm conclusion that it was the best way to proceed.

• (8:50 p.m.)

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): The hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria.

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment): I thank you Mr. Speaker. I did not expect to speak so early, but I am pleased to welcome this opportunity.

I do not very often have the opportunity to speak in the House for the simple reason that the opposition members have so much to say that there is scarcely any time left for the government members. In spite of all that, we are criticized.

I must also add that if certain opposition members feel unable to communicate with the government, they are the only ones to blame. As for me, I have good relationships I should even say fruitful ones and generally satisfactory.

Since the government is also made up of men and therefore can make mistakes at times, sin through omission, accomplish too little or not enough,—depending of course on which side of the House the members are,—it is easy, much too easy, for a member of the opposition to blame the administration, to blame the government for not looking after the older people as it should. Politically speaking, this may seem profitable, but I must confess that I can do without this kind of politicians who quite irresponsibly, make use of the conditions or circumstances of older people in order to get political support. I have not accused anyone, Mr. Speaker. The truth is that there is not a single member in this House who is uninterested in the old people's lot. On the contrary, I am sure we are all endeavouring to find the means to provide our old people with a happy and peaceful retirement.

The hon. members, Mr. Speaker, are not the only ones to tackle this problem. Let us not forget the many agencies, associations and religious orders that were active in this field before governments even thought of acting.

Every one of us has in his family, among his friends and acquaintances some aged persons. We cannot forget even for a moment the needs of those persons. Many of them were able to provide for themselves during their years of retirement an adequate income from their earnings during their best years of activity. Many live very well, but it goes without saying that there are many in our country who do not have the bare minimum, others who, having saved all through their life, find that, with the cost of living, their savings are not enough. And the saddest thing is to see an older person, an aged couple afflicted by illness.

We must ask ourselves very seriously if our senior citizens, our present pensioners, whoever they are, whatever area of this country that they live in, have all they need to live decently. Being realistic I feel that we could do more for the aged, before thinking of forcing into retirement people who have not reached the required age and who are still productive.

I have often discussed this question with my constituents. Some tell me that the problem of unemployment can be solved by retiring 60 year-old people. I am not aware of all the consequences that such a measure might have on our economy, but I have a distinct feeling that our economy and productivity, and consequently the revenues of governments, would suffer from it. People between 60 and 65 have reached the top of the salary scale. They have quite often acquired an experience difficult to replace, and I fear that it would be disastrous for our economy if these Canadians were to prematurely leave the labour force for an early retirement.

However, I do not reject completely the concept of people being pensioned at 60. In every sector of commercial, industrial, professional and even parliamentary activity—for we have here relatively aged members who should have retired a long time ago, people who often say they are marking time—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Some of us will be here after you are gone.

Mr. Corbin: Mr. Speaker, others should retire honourably in that repository called the Senate.

Mr. Knowles: That isn't honourable.

Mr. Corbin: Long before they reach retirement age, some people mark time, that is they keep count of how many years, months, weeks and even days there are before they retire. Consequently, they gradually lose interest in their profession and their work. They become less productive and have a tendency to be more critical of their employers, to get on their colleagues' nerves at work without rhyme or reason, finally to become a nuisance to everybody. They mark time and occupy positions that would be more properly filled by young people entering the labour market. Those people whose only concern is an early retirement could be encouraged. I think that would be profitable to the Canadian economy. However, it should be done gradually and systematically and with great discretion. I would suggest that governments and large corporations first make a limited experiment the results of which should be assessed.

A great number of Canadians are fed up helping those who could work but are too lazy to do so when jobs are available. The payment of welfare allowances to young people able to work is beginning to exasperate the taxpayers. We will soon reach the revolt level, if governments fail to solve this problem. And I do not have that solution, Mr. Speaker. Frankly, I do not believe that the solution proposed today by the Social Credit is entirely acceptable. In any event, not now. It might be practicable in a rich province, like Ontario, but certainly not in New Brunswick where less and less salaried people are called upon to support more welfare recipients.

We are faced with serious problems in the social field. We all recognize it. However, all men of good will, all well intentioned governments must pool their resources to find solutions that will be satisfactory to the majority of Canadian taxpayers. Study groups, committees and white papers must be included in the exercise. But in the final analysis, each government must take realistic decisions. Motions such as the one introduced today are not the solution. I feel that the proposal is too oversimplified and therefore, I cannot support it.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Ouellet) will be closing the debate. I have much confidence in the young member for Papineau and I am eager to hear him. But before resuming my seat, I would ask him to discuss with the minister the possibility of extending the coverage of the old age security system to those individuals who, having not yet reached the conventional age of retirement, have become unable to earn their living, due to illness, disability or any other valid reason. There are plenty of such cases in these days of heart attacks, nervous breakdowns, accidents of all kinds and incurable diseases.

However, I would like to tell the Parliamentary Secretary that in my view it would be premature to set up a universal pension plan at age 60. Let us first of all look after the really old people and then we can think of spending additional sums of money for people 60 or over.

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I was afraid that after all the speakers to whom you gave the floor I could not get a few words in, at least, on the motion I was pleased to support this afternoon.

The motion is extremely simple and important. It purports to make all those who are 60 or over eligible for the old age security pension.

Mr. Speaker, I should now like to draw a parallel. A few days ago, the Solicitor General (Mr. Goyer) announced his department's policy concerning rehabilitation of inmates. He said here in the House that such rehabilitation was most important. Thus the Solicitor General apparently wanted to make available to inmates the promises of the just society, whereas the majority of our old people in Canada will unfortunately have to wait too long, particularly those in whose behalf we presented this motion today.

If we are going to be so considerate towards prisoners in Canada, it seems to me that we should be even more so towards people 60 years of age or over. It is with this purpose in mind that tonight I gladly second the motion proposed by my colleague, the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier).

Old Age Security Pensions

Mr. Speaker, we in Canada—as everyone knows—live in affluence: we are constantly being told that we have too much wheat, too many dairy products, too many agricultural products, too much fuel, too many textile products, too many building materials, too many slums, too many farmers, too many workmen, too many teachers. On the other hand, we also have 650,000 unemployed too many—including educated ones—too many illiterate people, too many retrained people, too many poor, too many industries which do not run to their full potential, too many empty pockets, too many bankruptcies, too many debts and too many taxes, as well as too many old people who live in poverty.

When a man turns 50, it is true today that he cannot find employment in Canada. Nor does he like to beg the mere pittances of social welfare. He wants to work and not to live off public charity. If our economy cannot give him a job, it seems to me we could pay him a pension at 60, especially when we know that, in most cases, those people brought up seven or eight children.

The government should revise its social policy along those lines. They would thus give opportunities to the young who in turn want to have a family and have the privilege of doing what others had a chance to do before them.

Today, Mr. Speaker, a young person who is unemployed is a candidate for protestation and also, perhaps, unfortunately, a candidate for revolution.

Mr. Speaker, the 60 year old man and woman are cast aside. Thus we take away from them their privilege as respected human beings in our society by imposing upon them a social life pattern where often and unfortunately they are rudely treated. They must suffer the humiliation of being rejected as useless by a selfish and unfair society while, during the electoral campaign in 1968, we had them dream of a just society which is yet to come.

Often, we unfortunately blame the elderly people for their age. If the pension begins at 65, old age begins however at hiring, that is at 40, because at 50 no job is available anywhere. According to reports of the Department of Manpower and Immigration, we must let the young work but, unfortunately, today the place of 40 year old people in our society is often in the welfare office.

Mr. Speaker, that motion proposes that pensions be paid from the age of 60 for many reasons, because after having worked for over 40 years, those same people often feel tired and are no longer able to do their job properly. And others can no longer work due to poor health. They also would like to enjoy some comfort, to live it up, to travel before the end of their lives.

Mr. Speaker, in these days of unemployment, young people should be allowed to replace their elders in the labour force.

If we gave the old age pension to the 60-year olds, we would automatically reduce the number of unemployed who, unfortunately, include too many young people. We would be surprised at the number of young people who would work. It would not cost the government more to give pensions to those citizens 60 years of age.

Moreover, with the implementation of the recommendations contained in the motion, many people would be pleased to keep their aged parents with them. According to the stupid social welfare legislation we know, particularly in the province of Quebec, those who would like to keep and maintain their parents would be no longer eligible to any social welfare allowance. If welfare services agree to help them, the amount allowed is reduced to the bare minimum.

If the aged are living with strangers, or alone in a small apartment, welfare services grant them the full pension and pay all drugs and care.

These laws are stupid, they force children to neglect their aged parents. I personally know of married children who are working and living without any luxury, but who would welcome their aged parents in their home. But the fear of drugs and care costs forces them to be prudent and prevents them from keeping their parents under their own roof.

In 1971, Canada could, I think, pay a pension to the 60-year olds and they could end their days in serenity with the members of their own family instead of living in solitude.

Today, in our society, children are unfortunately in the same position as older people. They do not have their place in our so-called modern society. They seem to embarrass everybody, and this scandal should not be tolerated in our country.

I have with me very interesting data on showing the aging pattern of the population.

In 1951, there was 126,000 people aged 65 or more. In 1961, 306,000. In 1971, 411,000. In 1981, they will be 600,000. And the June, 1970, figures show that in Canada, there are close to 750,000 people aged 60 to 65 who now receive no old age pension at 60.

Senior citizens deserve better than having to worry about tomorrow, worries, financial difficulties, moral hardships and insecurity. They deserve better than having to live on others, all the more as at this age illness and worries about their children are often their major concern.

If we are to have a modern society, we should do better for our old people than the so-called primitive tribes which show more concern about their aged people than we do. At present, certain under-developped countries do more for their people aged 60 and even 50 than we do here in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, it is also quite normal for people aged 60, in the last ten years of their life, that they may enjoy recreational activities in this century of leisure, at a time when automation increasingly reduces working hours, when unemployment is affecting thousands of homes; we should be able in our modern society to enable our senior citizens to enjoy recreational activities.

The motion before us is most simple. The government will probably again use the pretext of expenses, while Canadians can certainly provide the aged people with food, accommodation and comfort, in short, anything we can possibly give them.

[Mr. Rondeau.]

But there again we are up against backwards, obsolete and archaïc financial conditions. Therefore the members of the Ralliement créditiste are right in saying that Canada is bursting with all sort of riches while our citizens between 40 and 60 years of age cannot find jobs nowhere in Canada. It is high time that this government, the self-declared government of the just society, would at least provide our older citizens with an opportunity to live decently.

This is why I urge the government to study the matter earnestly, because the Creditistes are not alone in asking for the pension to be paid at 60 years of age. For several years, various public bodies and organizations have asked for it. We often read in the newspapers open letters with requests for the payment of the pension at 60 years of age.

Prior to the next federal election, we should be able to say to our 60 year-old people that they are not a privileged group and that we recognize what they have done, for we must not forget that if we can enjoy the comforts and the standard of living we now have, if our society has been developed we owe it mainly to our older citizens.

It is on account of such facts and because we can achieve that physically that the government should not stumble against a mere financial difficulty, that it should get off the beaten track so as to put money at the service of production, production at the service of old people in order that our 60 year-old citizens may be regarded as full-fledged citizens in our economy, benefit from this country's great production and enjoy the last years of their life, especially since they have given so much for this country and for their fellow-citizens.

Mr. André Ouellet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, this week the Social Credit party has taken its "money-printing machine" out of mothballs. Last Monday evening, the leader of the Social Credit party, the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) talked about a guaranteed income plan for all Canadians of 18 and over, regardless of whether they were working or not, had money or not, were millionaires or unemployed. That plan would cost roughly $18 billion, four times more than what is now being spent in the field of social security. With that plan, the annual budget expenditures of the federal government would automatically double.

Now, the Social Credit party is putting forward new proposals for older people in Canada. This new formula would cost over $1.1 billion to the public treasury. As you can see, the Creditiste "money-printing machine" is going at full blast this week.

If we were to grant an old age pension of $80 a month to all older people between 60 and 65, it would cost an additional amount of $740 million in 1972, an increase of nearly 45 per cent over present expenditures.

Furthermore, if we were to extend the guaranteed income supplement to that age group, the combined additional cost of guaranteed income and old age pensions would be roughly $850 million, for a total amount of $3.4 billion in 1972, and that would be for all persons of 60 and over.

The present government is undoubtedly concerned with older people. The record of all Liberal governments in the past has more than proved it, and I think it would be useful to recall the part it has played in the old age security pension plan. The first attempt in Canada to make any kind of government provision for older persons was the passage in 1908 of the Canadian Government Annuities Act.

In 1927 the Old Age Pension Act went into effect. This provided financial assistance to persons 70 years of age or over who could meet a means test. This act was administered by the provinces with a federal sharing of the costs of the pension. At first the federal government contribution was 50 per cent but this was later increased to 75 per cent. In the years that followed after 1927, there were a number of amendments to the Old Age Pensions Act liberalizing the amount of the benefit which originally had been $20 a month to $40 a month and there were changes in the means test requirements as well. Nevertheless it became apparent that there was some dissatisfaction with this method of meeting the needs of older people.

In 1950 there was established a joint parliamentary committee of the House of Commons and the Senate. This committee made an exhaustive study of the various pension schemes then in existence throughout the world and they heard briefs from various organizations and individuals to get any opinions possible as to the best course to be followed in Canada. It is interesting now to read the committee reports of that date and to notice that there was some discussion of the introduction of an insurance plan similar to the Old Age and Survivors Insurance of the United States which had gone into effect in the mid-30's. Coming out of this committee were recommendations to the effect that there should be established a system of universal pensions for persons 70 and over coupled with a program to be called Old-Age Assistance paid on a means test basis for persons 65 to 69 years of age. The federal government would administer and pay for the universal pension while the provinces would administer the Old Age Assistance Act—with the federal government paying 50 per cent of the assistance payment.

The government of the day decided to implement the committee recommendations, but before this could be done it was ncessary to obtain a constitutional amendment which would permit the federal government to legislate concurrently with the provincial governments. This was obtained and the Old Age Security Act of 1951 was passed to become effective January 1952.

The amount which was to be paid under the Old Age Security Act when it was first established in January 1952 was $40 a month. This was changed over the years so that, in July 1957, under a Liberal government, the pension became $46 a month, in November 1957 $55 a month, in February 1962 $65 a month and since October 1963 has been at the rate of $75 a month.

The main premise of the old age security scheme is to pay a pension on a universal basis with no means test and with no direct connection with the financing of the plan. The application for pension does not have any question concerning income or resources. In order to qualify for the pension, the individual needs only to establish that he is of the proper age and that he has met certain residence requirements. In other words, any person who meets the age and residence requirements is eligible for the pension and there is no reference to his income or to any contribution he may have made to the Old Age Security fund in the past, present, or future. It is obvious that the principle of the Old Age Security Act follows more closely the schemes in effect in New Zealand and Sweden, rather than the social insurance approach of the United States and Great Britain. It can be noted, besides, that at present the Canada Pension Plan is based on the social insurance principle.

The plan is operated on a pay-as-you-go basis. The Old Age Security fund receives money through a sales tax, a corporation income tax and a personal income tax. Originally, the formula was 2 per cent for each of these items, subject to a limit of $60 a year for the personal income tax contribution. This is the formula 2-2-2, and those who were concerned with the operation of the program could only hope that the coincidence that this formula sounded like a headache tablet would not bear any omen of difficulties ahead. The financing at present is through a 3 per cent sales tax, a 3 per cent corporation tax and a 4 per cent personal income tax, subject to a limit of $120, thus a 3-3-4 formula.

Since the passing of the Old Age Security Act, there have been years where the financial resources obtained through these taxes have turned out to be insufficient to meet the costs of pensions. Where this has happened temporary loans have been advanced to the fund and these loans have, in turn, been paid off through grants from general revenue. The current situation is that the income is greater than the outgo.

As can be seen, the evolution of old age security through the years is tremendous. One may be interested to learn that old age security pensioners received $1,730,000,000 during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1970, out of a national budget of approximately $14,000,000,000. There are now approximately 1,670,000 old age security pensioners in Canada. From these figures, one can appreciate that the decisions which are reached must be equitable not only to recipients of social security benefits but also to the taxpayers who must pay for all services provided by the government. Unless, of course, we use the money-making machine of the Créditistes. As a matter of fact, that is why we must tackle the question with the utmost caution even if, spontaneously, the members of all parties would like to do much more for the aged.

I think that it is important to deal more particularly with the new guaranteed income supplement program. I would like to say a word about it.

Five years ago, in December 1966, the guaranteed income supplement program for old age security recipients was approved by the members of this House. In January 1967, people who were 68 or older and who had no other source of income became eligible for a 40 per cent supplement to their old age security pension—that is, an extra $30 a month. In the three succeeding years the amount of this supplement rose slightly as the cost of living rose, and the whole benefit—old age security and guaranteed income supplement combined—became payable earlier. Presently, people who are 65 or older can receive as much as $135, consisting of $80.00 in old age security pension and $55.00 in guaranteed income supplement. This guaranteed income supplement program has proven very effective. Almost half all old age security recipients are drawing some supplement. The figure had now reached more than 830,000. These people submit application forms each January stating what their family income has been in the previous calendar year. In this way we can be sure that the benefits are being paid to those who need them most, the aged people who have little or no other source of income. This program cost $263 million in 1969-1970, and during the current fiscal year it is expected to cost nearly $300 million.

There are two major features of this program which have made it so effective. One is the income test I have just mentioned. This is an impersonal test that does not involve any private investigation of one's living habits or spending habits. It is no more degrading than the income test that all taxpayers must undergo when they file their income tax returns.

The second is the built-in incentive feature. The supplement is not cut back by a dollar for every dollar of income a person has from other sources. It is only cut back by $1 a month for each $2 a month one has from other sources. This leaves an incentive for older people who can supplement their pensions by doing some work to do so. It leaves an incentive for younger people contemplating retirement to save toward that day.

There are those who argue that the OAS pension itself should have been increased. To raise it by $10 a month to $90 in 1971 would have cost us an extra $206 million. We considered it a far better use of resources to concentrate this sum on improving the supplement for low-income old age pensioners. We have therefore suggested raising the supplement for single pensioners by $22 and for married couples by $29 a month, at a net cost of $194 million.

By so doing we have been able to ensure that all persons over 65 will have incomes of at least $1,600 if single, or of $3,000 if married pensioners. We estimate that about 970,000 pensioners are drawing the supplement, including about 470,000 who are getting full supplement.

Mr. Speaker, there appears to be a growing interest in matters relating to retirement at ages below the traditional retirement age of 65. It is advisable, we feel, to know what the Canadian experience with early retirement has been and whether or not any trends toward early retirement can be detected. For this reason, various data sources have to be examined.

There is no apparent trend towards decreased participation in the combined labour force for the age group 55-64. In fact, there has been a general increase in participation since 1951 for that age group. In the case of males only, however, for the age group 55-64, participation has dropped fairly regularly since 1951 and each year since 1966. Female labour force participation, on the other hand, has increased substantially every year except in 1953 and 1970.

For Canadians in the age group 65 to 69, there is a definite trend towards lesser participation in employment. The participation rate for males, in particular, has declined rapidly in the period 1966 to 1970. This likely is a reflection of the increasing availability of pension income through OAS and CPP for that age group. The Economics and Research Branch of the federal Department of Labour routinely undertakes a number of studies of developments within the field of collective agreements. In the course of this work some attention is given to the provisions relating to pension plans, which, unfortunately could be given only cursory examination. A detailed study in this area is scheduled for the fall of 1972.

The Department of Labour reports that they have recently conducted an examination of 341 collective agreements negotiated during the period July 1st, 1970, to June 30, 1971. Examination of these collective agreements indicates that 70 contracts had negotiated new provisions with respect to pensions and 26 of these contained clauses for early retirement.

The Department of Labour cannot provide information on the nature of the clauses relating to early retirement nor their effect on retirement age experience. Nevertheless, it seems clear that the private pension field is more and more turning its attention to changes which would allow retirement at ages prior to normal retirement ages.

Many Canadian pension plans permit members to retire early provided certain conditions, based on age or service or a combination of both, are met. The most recent survey of pension plans available for public scrutiny was conducted by The National Trust Company in 1969.

The National Trust survey involved 113 employers which had 136 different pension plans in operation covering more than 1 million employees. There were 24 plans (18 per cent of plans surveyed) which permitted an employee to take his pension prior to normal retirement age without the consent or approval of the employer.

It may be, Mr. Speaker, that a trend will become clear in the next few years.

However, I would like to say in closing that if the Canadian government considers it advisable to look after the aged in order to provide them with decent living conditions, it absolutely does not feel, like the Social Credit, that it is timely to retire persons between 60 and 65 years who can still be very useful in the labour force.

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak at length tonight for various reasons, the first being the celebration we are having tonight on the occasion of the great victory achieved in Ontario by the Conservative party, and also because I would like to allow time for my hon. friend of the Social Credit party who has been attacked by the Parliamentary Secretary.

Without subscribing outright to the motion submitted by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier), I would like from the start to state that I share his view that our senior citizens deserve a closer attention than is presently accorded them.

The meaning of the words "physical, material, and human resources of Canada" should however be specified. I am sure there are all sorts of words to be clarified in this respect and the information we could obtain would enable an easier debate of the motion now before the House.

The purpose which the hon. member for Roberval had in mind in introducing his motion goes to show that he keeps close to the people, unlike the members on the government side. Because he is aware of the needs of the humbler classes, and of the grievances of those who became unemployed at the age of 55 or 60, and who were unable to find other jobs that could afford them a living, he thought unto himself: "Well, I believe it is my duty to introduce a motion that will call the attention of the House to that matter".

He is to be commended for it and should be encouraged to keep on working for the benefit of our humbler classes because if we leave it to the government members, we may be sure that the conditions of our people will only deteriorate from one year to another.

Some hon. Members: What about the $135?

Hon. Mr. Ricard: I will come to it later on, Mr. Speaker.

I was extremely interested and amused with the history lesson delivered to us by the parliamentary secretary. He described the Liberal Party as one great party, that had done everything or almost everything, in the social field—

• (9:40 p.m.)

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, no great knowledge of history is needed to start applauding as the hon. members on the other side of the House are doing at the present time, since we could not expect the Progressivé Conservative party or the Railliement créditiste to take such measures while the Liberal party was in office.

The Liberal party has been in office for many years, and it is because it has been in office so long that the Canadian people, especially our older citizens, suffer such hardships today.

At the time of the 1957 elections, the government members were prepared to grant pensions equivalent to the cost of a daily cup of coffee. This the parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Ouellet) forgot to tell us, as he forgot to state that a prominent Quebec Liberal premier, Mr. Taschereau, who was in office from 1927 to 1936, rejected the idea of old age pensions for senior citizens in Quebec. While that province contributed to the pensions being paid to the remainder of this country's citizens, that eminent Liberal politician, with whom the government members claim some association, from year to year refused to have the older men and women in Quebec receive the pension to which they were entitled—

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. Is the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister ofJustice rising on a point of order?

Mr. Ricard: He probably has more nonsense to utter.

Mr. Béchard: I should like to ask a question to the hon. member.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. If there is no point of order, I would suggest that the Parliamentary Secretary may ask a question with the consent of the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Ricard).

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I would like the House not to hear an idiotic question from the Parliamentary Secretary.

Mr. Caouette: That is true!

Mr. Ricard: I would simply like to continue—

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The honourable Parliamentary Secretary rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Speaker, before saying my question is idiotic, I would like the hon. member to reply in a sensible way to a sensible question.

Can he tell the House why Mr. Taschereau rejected old age pensions and family allowances? Can he tell us why?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. The Parliamentary Secretary will admit that the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe did not give his consent. The Chair has therfore no other alternative than to recognize the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe.

Mr. Ricard: This proves how silly is the parliamentary secretary who cannot even follow our rules—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. In spite of this late hour and of the interest of the hon. members in this debate, it is most advisable that we keep our decorum and avoid strong words. The member for Saint-Hyacinthe has the floor. Is the parliamentary secretary rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Speaker, I would like the hon. member to reply. It is no trifling matter. He said that Mr. Taschereau had refused—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. The parliamentary secretary is aware that he may put his question only with the consent of the member who has the floor. The hon. member of Saint-Hyacinthe has the floor.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I would like you to do a favour to the parliamentary secretary. Would you please send him a copy of the Standing Orders and urge him to study them closely. Perhaps the House would benefit from this.

Mr. Béchard: This is no answer to the question.

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

An hon. Member: We want an answer.

Mr. Ricard: It is always surprising, Mr. Speaker, when a member from the province of Quebec, whether a Conservative or a Social Crediter, speaks in the House, to see those who were called donkeys by their present leader open their mouth to bray and try to prevent us from speaking.

An hon. Member: We have an example presently.

Mr. Ricard: They should simply prevail themselves of their right to speak, participate in the debates and prove to the House they have something between the ears besides servility to their leader. Let them make the country benefit from their studies and teach us what they know.

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Speaker, I beg the Chair to remind the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe that he is out of order. He is straying far from the subject now before us.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, if I am out of order, it is because I followed the Parliamentary Secretary's path, he was the first one to broach this subject.

Mr. Béchard: Let the hon. member answer my question.

Mr. Ricard: If he had let me make my speech quietly, as I religiously listened to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Ouellet) who, in turn, is listening to me, I would have likely finished my speech by now, and we would not have witnessed the disgraceful scene that the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Maleleine—

Mr. Béchard: That's a lot of rubbish.

Mr. Ricard: It is easy to see he is not even able to listen. What a superman! With a superiority complex at that! Let us then leave him to this business of his and try to proceed just the same.

I was saying that if ever there was a segment of society that deserved the attention of this House and this government, it is these older people who have earned a secure retirement.

Was it not last week that we heard the Solicitor General (Mr. Goyer) forsake the security of the entire population to assist the criminals? He said it was more important to protect and try to re-train criminals than to look after the security of the people.

That is what the government means by security. That is the kind of security they intend to provide for our people. I shall make no further comments because I want to give my hon. friend of the Social Credit the opportunity of saying a few things to the hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I welcome my very good friend from Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Ricard) among the Créditistes. He has—

An hon. Member: Some recruit!

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe raises the question of privilege.

Mr. Ricard: I raise the question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Ricard.]

I just wanted to say that I would like to remain a Progressive Conservative.

Mr. Caouette: The hon. member is perfectly right in saying that we must give more consideration to the elderly people in Canada. The motion now before us asks that pensions be paid to both husband and wife, provided that one of them has reached the age of 60.

A while ago the hon. member for Papineau (Mr. Ouellet) was accusing the Créditistes of wanting to play around with the money press. I will remind him that in 1962 when I publicly asked for a pension of $100 a month for the elderly, it was then only $55 a month. The hon. member should get that into his head. But I was then called a fool because I asked for $100. Today this Liberal government is boasting that it pays $135 a month. This means that the Liberals have become "$80 a month more foolish" than I was in 1962.

Mr. Ouellet What was the cost of living at that time?

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, some mention the cost of living at that time. The hon. member for Papineau was saying: "The Creditistes will start operating their money-making machine because the cost would be four times as high with their social security program."

The hon. member who travels throughout the province of Quebec, said in Sherbrooke: "The Creditistes are opposed to our helping the underdeveloped countries." The hon. member knows very well that he is lying through his teeth, because we say that we should help underdeveloped countries, but that there is no reason in the world for not helping our provinces, our municipalities, our school boards in the same way, without depriving anyone of anything.

When the hon. member said a few moments ago that it costs $4 billion for social welfare, social security, unemployment insurance, etc., if he wants to take notes, I shall give him statistics. At the present time, $8,735,400,000 are being paid in social assistance, social welfare. The administrative costs are not included in this amount. I am referring to the Ramsay Committee report on social welfare, dated December 22, 1969. These are the most recent figures. This is a submission from the Canadian Association of Tax Studies.

As regards provincial authorities which make a contribution, the figures for 1969 are reported in the DBS Bulletin 68-205 under Provincial Government Finance.

As for the municipalities, their latest contributions date from 1967.

But, from 1967 to 1971, they have increased, and if we add to $8,735,000,000 the administrative costs of all welfare and unemployment insurance offices, the hon. member will realize that we are now getting close to 12 billion dollars!

The plan which I suggested the other day, under which all others would be abolished, would include pensions, unemployment insurance, social welfare which at the present time create countless abuses. For a population of 21,337,000 inhabitants, this program would cost $19,580,-945,000. It is therefore not four times more. If the hon.

member knows how to count, instead of referring to a money press to show how smart he is, he should use his common sense to establish facts. We are basing ourselves, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Ouellet: I raise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare on a question of privilege.

Mr. Ouellet: The hon. member seems to distort the figures I gave in the House. When he refers to $19 billion, that is even $1.5 billion more than my estimate of the cost of the program. I stated that it would cost $18 billion, but he himself admits that it would cost $19.5 billion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I must point out to the hon. member—

Mr. Ouellet: The hon. member recognizes then that his program would cost four times as much as what the federal government spends—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. Would the hon. member kindly resume his seat. I must point out to him that his argument proves that his question of privilege is really a point of debate. His speech being over, I must recognize the hon. member for Témiscamingue.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, his was neither a point of order nor even a question of privilege. Instead, it is proof that the hon. member cannot count. We counted though. That program would cost $19 billion and not $18 billion. This is neither four times as much as what it costs now, nor even twice as much. Taking for granted the fact that the provinces and municipalities contribute to the present overall social welfare program, in all honesty, outside of political considerations, on what do we base ourselves?

We know—and the hon. member is aware of it—that we are producing this year $90 billion worth of consumer goods and services. That is the total production and the total national revenue, including the parliamentary secretary's increase, comes to $65 billion. The figures are not mine but those of government statisticians. Therefore there is a $25 billion gap between our production and our revenue. That production exists but we cannot have it because there are no corresponding credits.

When the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) announced a credit of $1,070 billion to provide employment, he did not tell us where it would come from. Did he use a money press? No. He merely said: We are going to have $1,070 billion of new credit. Prior to the last war, our national debt was $3 billion; after the war, it was $17 billion. The $14 billion did not come out in thin air. It did not come out of our pockets because we did not have any money. The government came up with sums of money, appropriations. We made war.

We are presently in conflict with the younger generation and we are wondering what to do about it. And the hon. member knows it because when he went to Sherbrooke he could easily see that it was so. The younger generation nowadays is boiling. They have a grudge against us. They have a grudge against the establishment. Why? Because last summer, 900,000 of them could not find a summer job. The hon. member also knows that if a war was to break out tomorrow we would have a job for each and everyone of them. They are the ones who do not accept the government's position.

Mr. Speaker, it is not by talking the way the hon. member for Papineau was a while ago that we are going to solve our problems. Mr. Speaker, the "money-printing machine" is becoming outmoded. To the extent that the Canadian people produce goods and services—to that same extent, no more but no less—we suggest that the Department of Finance should use the Bank of Canada to obtain equivalent funds and create new sources of credit.

I have been hearing those people speak of a "money-printing machine" for the last 32 years. I can hear them bawling. A lot of bawlers! They understand nothing and yet they denounce everything without any reason. What the hon. member said a few moments ago did not prove anything. He got even mixed up in his statistics. He said: "Four times more". My proposal would promote the sale of Canadian goods. We would not less dependent on the United States with regard to exports and the 10 per cent surtax, because our major market, the domestic market, could still be supplied with goods. Industries would then operate normally and new jobs would be created. That would be a solution to unemployment.

We would no longer see abuses like those now rampant throughout Canada: in Quebec, in Ontario and in all the other provinces. And with the new programs which will be implemented, we will be confronted this coming winter with an unbearable economic situation. So let us have solutions. On our part, we are prepared to support logical solutions. I do not have the time this evening to give further details on the cost of a social security plan, but I have the figures. If any hon. member wants a copy of them, I can send him one. They are true figures. If the hon. member for Bonaventure-îles de la Madeleine wants figures, I will give them when I am in his constituency early in November to make sure that the hon. member knows that his constituents are more interested and more informed than he himself has kept them informed since he has been here.

Mr. Speaker, I call it 10 o'clock. So I will close my remarks, and I will come back to them at the next opportunity.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. It being ten o'clock, it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to section (11) of Standing Order 58 proceedings on the motion have expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): I have the honour of informing the House that the Senate has sent a message saying that it has agreed to meet with the House in a joint committee of both houses for the purpose of studying and reviewing statutory instruments which are, under Section 26 of the Statutory Instruments Act, referred to that committee on an ongoing basis, and that honourable senators who are to sit on that committee will be designated at a later date.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

NATIONAL PARKS—KLUANE GAME SANCTUARY—POSSIBLE SITE OF NEW PARK

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, on October 15, I directed the following question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien):

Can the minister inform the House if the entire Kluane game sanctuary in the Yukon is actively being considered as a site for a national park?

My supplementary question was:

When may we expect a decision from the minister on the setting aside of this outstanding area for national park purposes?

Mr. Speaker suggested that these questions be placed on the order paper, but I felt that in view of their national importance and the need for an early decision to be made I should raise the issue on our so-called ten o'clock show. May I first point out that there is some urgency in the need for establishing additional national parks throughout Canada. An increasing number of Canadians and interested organizations are actively pressing the government for action on the establishing of more national parks. I will not detail the immense value which accrues to Canadians through the establishment of parks but perhaps I should mention the basic purposes of Canada's national parks as defined in the government's 1964 parks policy statement. It is:

To preserve for all time areas which contain significant geographical, geological, biological or historic features as a national heritage for the benefit, education and enjoyment of the people of Canada.

Canada's national parks system began with the establishment of Banff national park in 1885. Since that time we have added 27 national parks to our parks system. There is urgent need for other areas to be set aside as national parks in an effort to round out the system so that it truly represents all the major regions of our country and includes major geographical and ecological features of national significance. There is increasing urgency for the need to complete our parks system while there is still time. The minister several years ago at a conference in Calgary made the following statement:

The national park system in Canada originated here in the west but it has taken too long to extend the system to other parts of Canada, where there is just as great a need and just as exciting opportunities to establish such parks so that all parts of Canada can share in the benefits of what must become a truly national policy. I would like to impress upon you my sense of urgency on this question of establishing additional national parks. It is estimated that to achieve adequate representation of Canada's heritage at a suitable scale we shall require 40 to 60 new national parks by 1985.

Wheat creates this sense of urgency are two factors. First, the increased cost of acquiring land for park use is reaching prohibitive levels. Second, past experience has shown that areas of natural beauty can quickly be spoiled for potential park use by different problems of economic and social development. Failure to recognize the urgent need for additional parks will mean that one day we will risk reaching the point of no return.

The very principle of conservation demands that we have the foresight and determination to take action needed today so that tomorrow will not be a time for regretting lost opportunities.

I fully endorse this statement made by the minister, but it is becoming obvious that he is ducking the parks issue as it affects several areas of Canada. One of the most important is the need for a national park in the Yukon which will set aside for all time the Kluane game sanctuary. I point out there are national parks in every province of Canada but none in either the Yukon or the Northwest Territories.

I understand that 28 years ago almost all of the newly created 10,000 square mile Kluane game sanctuary in the Yukon was reserved for national park purposes. I ask the minister why there has been such a lengthy delay in establishing this area as a national park. Are the lobbies of the powerful mining industry to take precedence over what could and should be a national reserve for all time? I point out that mineral resources are non-renewable but the resources of an area preserved in a national park are there for all time and will provide a far more stable economic base over the long-run.

The Kluane game sanctuary is one of the unique areas in Canada. It has terrific potential as a national park. It is located in the extreme southwestern tip of the Yukon and on its eastern boundary is parallelled by the Alaska highway for 200 miles. It is one of the most beautiful areas in the north and contains the Saint Elias mountains which are the highest in Canada. Here we find Mount Logan, our highest peak which towers 19,850 feet.

The game sanctuary contains an outstanding number of wild animals and bird species. It contains a vast ice field, the largest in the world outside of the polar regions. This area is easily accessible and can be reached by automobile from Edmonton and by the Alaska ferry system and car from Vancouver and Prince Rupert. A daily jet service to Whitehorse brings this area only a few hours flying time away from the most populated areas of North America.

The Kluane game sanctuary was reserved 28 years ago for national park purpose. To date no action has been taken by this government or past governments in having it set aside as a national park. At the present time the mining industry has been free to operate in sanctuary virtually without restraint. This is in direct violation of national parks principles and objectives. There is no doubt that the mining industry is extremely important in Canada's economy, but I again refer the minister to the statement which he made at the Calgary conference several years ago:

We must have the foresight and determination to take action needed today so that tomorrow will not be a time for regretting lost opportunities.

Mr. Chrétien: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harding: I suggest to the minister that the time to set the Kluane game sanctuary aside for a national park is now. We cannot afford to lose any more of these choice areas through economic exploiters. Already procrastination on the part of this government and other governments has seen some of the most outstanding park areas in Canada lost for all time to future generations. I point out to the minister that we must look to the future and legislate for the future in the wise disposition of our natural resources.

Our national parks system must be extended to the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. The Kluane game sanctuary should be the first step in our national parks program for the north. This park could become one of the major economic assets of the north and, unlike nonrenewable resources such as minerals, we can expect its value and economic return to sharply increase as time goes on. Here, too, we have an asset which can provide employment for a large number of native people who call northern Canada their home. Their natural talents and skills can be utilized in such projects to a far greater degree than in industrial and economic activities which are for the most part foreign to their way of life.

I urge the minister and the government to move without delay on this very important matter. I trust we shall soon see the entire Kluane game sanctuary set aside as another national park to serve the interests of all Canadians both at the present and in the future.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for raising this question. I have already stated in my speeches, especially in the Yukon, that it is my goal to have the Kluane reserve set aside for a national park. There is one problem which prevents the possibility of doing that right away. We are not in a position to do so because of the legislative time required to have the Yukon Mineral Act adopted. I have already stated that the government plans to make this a national park as soon as the legal possibility exists.

At this time I say to the hon. member who subscribes to my policies that we have overcome something very important by speaking. As I have said, we do not only say things. In the 40 years prior to 1968, only four new national parks were created in Canada. In a little more than three years we have succeeded in creating six new national parks in Canada. We have created the first two national parks in the province of Quebec. Different governments tried to do this for many years. This government has succeeded in creating two national parks in the province of Quebec, one in Newfoundland, one in New Brunswick and one in British Columbia on the west coast of Vancouver Island, an outstanding area for a national park. For the first time we have succeeded in getting a big chunk of land to make a national park in Ontario. This will be a large area at Lake Superior between Sault Ste. Marie and Port Arthur. In three years we have succeeded in creating six new national parks.

I intend to maintain the goal I referred to in my speech in Calgary in 1968. This is the speech with which the hon. member agreed. I would like to create four additional national parks before the end of the fiscal year, or next summer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: When the time comes for us to go to the people, we will be able to prove to them that this government is not only talking; it is acting and it is acting with the support of the opposition parties.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—CANADIAN PENSION COMMISSION—POSSIBLE APPOINTMENT OF EXTRA BODIES TO CLEAR BACKLOG OF CASES

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I should point out to hon. members, and especially to our distinguished clutch of visitors in the galleries, that a great show is taking place outside. It has undoubtedly cut down on our attendance. No doubt the attendance is completely to the satisfaction of the party that I represent. I will now move to non-partisan matters.

I bow to nobody as a parliamentarian in paying respect to those of this Parliament who have concerned themselves with veterans affairs and with the treatment of those who did so much for Canada. It is on their behalf, that is to say on behalf of the veterans of Canada, that I make this pitch tonight. I hope nobody will misconstrue it in any way as being sour or partisan or bitter.

I wish to try to do something about what I believe to be an injustice to Canadian veterans, believing that while good legislation has been passed by all parties in this House there are simply not enough people to carry it out and see that those who are entitled to benefits will receive them quickly. I think that if you have to stand in a queue one mile long and shuffle forward awaiting your turn, even if you will receive justice at the head of the queue, justice delayed is justice denied.

The chairman of the Canadian Pension Commission, Mr. Allan O'Solomon, according to a report in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of Wednesday points out that applications under the new act are coming in at the rate of 1,000 a month. In other words, some 7,000 cases have been piled on the doorstep of the Commission since the new legislation came into effect. There are many reasons for this situation. First, any claim which has been denied in the past can be reopened because of the provision made for a shift in the balance of the preponderance of evidence rules which guided the commission in the past. We all fought for that. We are glad to see it in effect, but it means that many claims are being put forward which are unlikely to be dealt with expeditiously in the present circumstances.

Other factors can now be taken into consideration, too. There is the effect of a war disability upon a second disability incurred since war service; there is the special position of those who were prisoners of the Japanese; there is the effect of the new clauses dealing with disability claims and widows claims. So in effect we are dealing with a wholly new situation when it comes to claims which can be presented to the commission, thanks to the generous action of this House. I do not make any claim that I had anything to do with that. Perhaps I did with regard to the evidentiary balance, but otherwise no.

I can see around me hon. members who were engaged in this work and I am proud of the decisions they reached. But if a man is at the back of a queue of 7,000 people he is at the back of a queue which is very long indeed. I therefore make two suggestions for speeding up this whole process so that those affected can obtain their rights. First, there should be consultation between the Department of Veterans Affairs and Bar Associations in various parts of Canada, particularly in areas where large numbers of claims have been filed in order that lawyers may be retained even on a temporary basis to provide what is in effect a free legal counsel which is available to everyone who uses the veterans bureau to present claims.

The other suggestion is this. There must be a method of apppointing special panels even on a temporary basis until we can clear up this overwhelming backlog of cases. This need not be done in all areas; it can be done where the need is most pressing. In some provinces sufficient resources are already available, but if we take a sensible attitude even the 7,000 cases which have arisen since the new legislation became effective could be processed with some kind of expedition. People would not then feel that they were caught forever in the back end of an alley and could not see their way to the front. I make that suggestion to the government and I hope it will be considered.

Mr. Allen B. Sulatycky (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Dubé) I thank the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) for his question. I am sure that no member of the House doubts the sincerity or impartiality of his concern, which indeed is shared by all members of this House including members of the government.

I should like to point out that the present backlog is 5,348 cases. Although it is a substantial number, it is somewhat less than the number suggested by the hon. member. The present rate of entitlement decision completion is 23.88 files per working day over the period September 25 to date. An accurate forecast concerning elimination of the backlog is difficult, if not impossible, and will be influenced by a number of factors. The present rate of application input is variable but, as stated on October 18, it is hoped the peak will be reached by the end of the calendar year. While at our present rate it will take a year to deal only with the 5,348 cases pending, increasing familiarity with the amended act and more experience with the work by new people on the commission should permit increased output during each succeeding month.

The statute permits the appointment of not more than 12 regular members of the commission plus a maximum of five ad hoc members appointed for one year. This maximum complement of commissioners has already been appointed. I might add that in any case a new appointee to this work needs at least a year's experience before he could make a worth-while contribution. The current backlog of work represents a temporary peakload resulting from recent amendments to the Pension Act, and the present membership of the commission is already eating into the backlog.

MANPOWER—AVAILABILITY OF JOB VACANCY SURVEY DATA

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) for an explanation of some of the many inefficiencies in his department. Specifically, I asked him why it has taken four years, the employment of 106 bureaucrats and the spending of more than $3 million to produce a report about job vacancies, and the data is not available and probably will not be available until the end of the year.

Additionally, as far as another survey is concerned the minister told the House a few days ago that he is spending I do not know how many dollars on it, this time collecting data on occupational shortages. I do not know what is the difference between job vacancies and occupational shortages but I suppose that some sophisticated bureaucrat in the department, even the minister himself, being a former law professor, may be able to argue the difference between the two. The fact of the matter is, however, that the difference does not really matter to the man who is out of work, which should be the key purpose of the department to remedy.

Another statistical analysis undertaken by the department relates to job orders. Here again, I do not know how much money is involved because the amount has not yet been determined. Looking at some statistics in this regard, in the fiscal year 1966-67 employers placed 850,000 job orders with Canada Manpower. By the last fiscal year, 1970-71, it had dropped to fewer than 600,000.

There is another statistical series which has emanated from the minister's department, namely, job placements by Canada Manpower. Not surprisingly, the statistical figures for this operation are equally disastrous. In the period 1965-66, when we still had the National Employment Service in operation and a much smaller labour force than we have today, the number of placements by the department was 961,000. In the last fiscal, 1970-71, the number of placements by the new department working under extended operations had fallen to below 650,000, a drop of some 32 per cent in job placements.

I think more pertinent than that is the fact that in 1965-66 the cost of placing a person in a job was $23. Today, taking into account manpower training and all the other programs of the department, the cost of placing one person in a job has escalated to $647. If we exclude the training program, it still costs about $268 to place a person in a job. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and all the other ministers, obsessed as they are with destroying and defeating inflation, cannot be accused of losing the battle at such a clip as to account for the 2,700 per cent increase in placement costs over only five years.

In the field of the operations of the Department of Manpower and Immigration three things only are growing: one, the amount of money being spent; two, the number of bureaucrats being employed by the department and, three, the number of people who are unemployed in the nation. These three factors do not make up any equation at all. The growth in these areas seems to be the only accomplishment of the department. I think the statistic—and the minister seems to be obsessed with statistics—which the minister should be giving to the public is how many of the people who actually go through manpower training end up getting jobs afterwards. How many are successful? The manpower training program is currently costing over $300 million a year, and another $35 million was added to that figure the other day.

What is it for? Primarily, to train people for jobs that simply do not exist. I think the main objective, therefore, in the eyes of the government is to hide away, to cover up in any given month some 80,000 unemployed people so that the forecasts and prognostications of the Minister of Finance about the level of unemployment will look slightly less ludicrous and damaging than they otherwise would. I personally, members of this House and people across the country object strongly to that sort of government trickery and I resent very much the cruelty of the hoax which is being perpetrated on the unemployed. Quite a number of them hope that after the training is over there will be a job waiting for them. Regretfully, that does not seem to be the case.

The minister has made a mess in his handling of the grain situation. It appears that he is bent on making an equal mess of the manpower aspect that is under his jurisdiction.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the hon. member and, in my reply, I shall try to disregard the partisan side of his remarks—

[English]

Mr. Speaker, may I deal with the matter the hon. member has raised. With respect to that part of the hon. member's question relating to the job vacancy survey, I would point out that this survey is being conducted among employers throughout Canada in the expectation that the results will give a more constant picture of the state of the labour market at the national level. Particular attention is being paid to those job vacancies which have been open for a month or more, and the survey will produce a three-month moving average of these vacancies.

However, as was pointed out to the hon. member, the survey is still in the developmental stage. As this job vacancy survey is being developed by Statistics Canada under contract to the Department of Manpower and Immigration, I would suggest that if more technical information is required relating to the timing of completion of this developmental work such a request should be directed to the minister responsible for Statistics Canada. The development of this survey is but one aspect of a continuing effort to improve the quality of labour market knowledge available to assist in the planning and implementation of manpower programs and placement activities.

With specific reference to the hon. member's remarks concerning the job placement activities of the department, I would point out that the main reason there has been a decline in the number of placements in employment by Canada Manpower centres since 1965 and 1966 is that Canada Manpower centres have been heavily involved in several new programs and services which have been added to the functions performed by the Canada Manpower centres, including the Canada Manpower training program and the Canada Manpower mobility program. When the placements in these programs are taken into account, the total output of the Canada Manpower centres compares favourably with previous years. I say that because I believe it is the answer the hon. member is looking for. For example, in 1970-71 the Canada Manpower centres placed 344,846 people in training and made 648,966 placements in jobs, excluding casual jobs, for a total of 993,812. This total exceeds the 960,995 placements made in 1965-66.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order.

Mr. Prud'homme: With the indulgence of the House perhaps I could finish the paragraph.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): I would be quite agreeable to the hon. gentleman concluding the paragraph. After all, it was written for him by someone in the department and I want to make sure it is on the record.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): We have agreed we should be specific in respect of time. The hon. gentleman's time has elapsed and I doubt whether the Chair has the power to allow him to continue.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Would the hon. member please resume his seat? According to the rules I must be firm about this. I am sorry, but that is my answer.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

PRESENCE IN SPEAKER'S GALLERY OF PRIME MINISTER OF CEYLON, MADAME BANDARANAIKE

Mr. Speaker: It gives me much pleasure to bring to the attention of hon. members the presence in the Speaker's gallery of a very distinguished visitor to our country, Madame Bandaranaike, Prime Minister of Ceylon.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Mrs. Bandaranaike heads the government of a country with which, over a long period of years, we have had very close ties. We welcome you, Madame Prime Minister, as the enlightened leader of a country with which we are associated as partners in the Commonwealth of Nations and we welcome you as a friend of Canada.

On behalf of hon. members I thank you for the hospitality which your parliament, your government and you personally have extended to Canadian parliamentarians who have visited Ceylon through the Inter-Parliamentary Union and the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association.

[Translation]

We are therefore very happy to welcome you to Canada. On behalf of hon. members and all Canadians, I want to wish you and those who came with you a useful as well as a pleasant visit in Canada.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE FOR DEALING WITH INCOME TAX BILL IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a brief statement to the House with respect to the method of dealing with Bill C-259 in committee of the whole. The House leaders met on this bill several times this week, and this morning we agreed that on Monday the committee of the whole should turn to the question of income exemption levels and certain deductions, as dealt with in the proposed new sections 109 and 110 found on pages 277 to 289 of the bill. Our understanding is that when these two proposed new sections are called on Monday discussion in committee of the whole will be directed to the subject matter of those provisions.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, we agree that this method should be adopted. In light of the problems posed by this bill we think that the suggestion that has been outlined and discussed deserves the support of all members in an effort to have a relevant debate. The simple fact is that, having been confronted with this Frankenstein, we are now going to try to housebreak it.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we too are prepared to agree to this proposal for Monday, namely, that we focus our discussion on those aspects of the bill that are covered by the proposed new sections 109 and 110. It is also our hope that after this discussion has been concluded we may find other areas that we can similarly pinpoint and discuss under specific headings.

TABLING OF REPORT OF TEXTILE AND CLOTHING BOARD ON SHIRT MANUFACTURING

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 41(2), I would like to table, in both official languages, the Textile and Clothing Board report on men's and boys' shirts as well as a press release outlining the measures taken by the government in that matter.

MANPOWER

JOB VACANCY SURVEY—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO HAVE MOTION UNDER S.O.43

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I desire to seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity occasioned by the admission of the ineffectiveness of the Canadian job vacancy survey program currently being conducted. If I get unanimous consent I will move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

The subject matter of the Canadian job vacancy survey be referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration for an evaluation of the purposes and potential of the said survey.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: The motion proposed by the hon. member under the terms of Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The motion cannot be put.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DISCUSSIONS WITH PREMIER KOSYGIN—ADDITIONAL SALES OF CANADIAN PRODUCTS—FUTURE GRAIN CONTRACTS—JOINT PROJECTS INVOLVING CANADIAN INDUSTRY

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bell: Newfoundland next.

Mr. Horner: Then Assiniboia.

Mr. Ricard: There is another one coming.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what that is all about, but I am sure the Ontario Conservatives could never have done so well without the help of the federal Liberals.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: I wish to direct my question to the Prime Minister. Earlier in the week the Prime Minister told me he did not anticipate that the visit of Premier Kosygin and his party would result in the signing of any trade agreement between the two countries. I now wish to ask him whether as a result of this visit any additional sales of Canadian products to the U.S.S.R. have been arranged or consummated or whether he anticipates that any will be arranged and announced prior to the departure of Premier Kosygin from the country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Don't you sit down between questions?

Mr. Stanfield: Only when the answers are long enough to give me a chance to sit down. I wish to ask the Prime Minister a question with regard to our relations with the U.S.S.R. on the subject of grains. Have we received any firm commitment that Canada will continue to be a preferred supplier of grain for the U.S.S.R. market and has there been some general understanding or agreement reached with regard to prices and terms of future sales?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I will try to answer this question, Mr. Speaker. The communiqué coming at the end of Mr. Kosygin's visit will be issued in due course. There will be something in it on trade. Yesterday I answered an hon. member's question by saying that the Russians have adopted the good habit of coming to Canada first when they are in need of wheat. This has taken place. I said also yesterday that the contacts between the Canadian Wheat Board and Exportkhleb were as intimate as could be, trade-wise, and that talks are taking place now on the possibility of adding further to the present contract under which deliveries are made to the Soviet Union, which anticipates export of 3.5 million tons of grains from Canada to the Soviet Union and comes to an end by April, 1972. On the general trade picture it was decided that the trade agreement between Canada and the U.S.S.R. which comes to an end next year will be renegotiated and discussions to that effect will begin early next year.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I hope the minister does not mind my asking this question so quickly after the one put yesterday, because we find that government policy changes from month to month and I thought it might change from day to day. I should like to ask the Prime Minister or the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce whether in the discussions with Premier Kosygin and his party any definite arrangements were made with regard to the consummation of any joint projects involving Canadian industry in association with the U.S.S.R. working in partnership in some areas where Canadian industry is regarded as having some special expertise?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I will have to refrain on this subject. I think we should wait for the communiqué. I will expand on the communiqué if there is need to do so after it has been issued.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS

POSITION OF STUDY OF CONFLICT OF INTEREST AND POSSIBLE LEGISLATION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, if the President of the Privy Council were still here I would put this question to him, but since he has departed perhaps I might put it to the Prime Minister. Some time ago, under the direction of the former President of the Privy Council, now the Minister of National Defence, the government had given some attention to the question of legislation respecting conflict of interest, having in mind particularly Senators, Members of Parliament and high-placed government officials. Can the Prime Minister say what has happened to that study and whether there is any present plan to bring in legislation in this area?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the study was pursued so far as we could within government circles. We discussed it among ministers for our own guidance, but we see no possibility of bringing in legislation in the immediate future.

CONSIDERATION BY GOVERNMENT OF RECOMMENDATION ON OWNERSHIP OF COMPANIES OPERATING IN CANADA

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of National Revenue. Since the Gray report recommended, as we have seen in some newspapers, that 50 per cent or 51 per cent Canadian ownership should be required in all major companies operating in Canada, is the government considering this recommendation at this time?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, as the House is aware, the cabinet is presently considering work I have been supervising in this area of policy. I cannot comment further on the hon. member's question because cabinet documents in their very nature are always confidential, but the Prime Minister has confirmed that when cabinet discussions are complete there will be a statement of policy.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a second question to the Minister of National Revenue. Is the government considering any such suggestion at this time, regardless of its origin, along the lines of my first question?

Mr. Gray: I regret there is nothing I can properly add to the answer I gave to the hon. member's first question.

FOREIGN OWNERSHIP—POSSIBLE EFFECT OF REPORT TO CABINET ON RELATIONS WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue whether the serious deterioration in relations between this government and the government of the United States is the reason for the delay in the Gray report or for the change in policy of this government?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will recognize that a question asked in those terms is not in order. It is obviously in the form of an argument. I suggest that the hon. member might wish to rephrase the question.

• (11:20 a.m.)

Mr. Woolliams: It was not my intention to start an argument.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: That is the last thing I would think of this morning. I will try to reword the question because I do not intend to start an argument. I think this is a question of fact. Is the apparent serious deterioration in the relations between this government and the government of the United States one of the reasons or the reason that the Gray report and its recommendations have not been brought forward?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): I do not agree with the hon. member's premise indicating that there has been any delay in this matter. It is a complicated and comprehensive matter and as soon as cabinet discussions are completed, as the Prime Minister has said, it is the government's intention to make an appropriate statement.

Mr. Woolliams: Can the Minister of National Revenue tell the House whether there has been any discussion with officials of the United States government regarding the contents of this report and what effect it might have on the relationships between this government and that of the United States?

Mr. Gray: No, Mr. Speaker.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

COMPLAINT RESPECTING UNILINGUAL TELEPHONE SERVICE

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

Could he tell the House the nature of and the reasons for the conflict which prevents French-speaking members of Parliament to have French telephone service today?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did not catch the last words but if the hon. member is referring to the conflict at Bell Canada, I understand that it involves all employees, whether their language or their extraction.

Mr. Matte: May I put a supplementary question?

Has the Prime Minister, who seems never to place a call in French, not notice that we have no telephone operator on duty—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Unless the Prime Minister rises on a question of privilege, I believe that the question, as asked, is not in order. The hon. member has not really asked a supplementary question.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

POLYMER—LAY-OFF OF EMPLOYEES—INQUIRY AS TO PROFIT THIS YEAR

Mr. Charles H. Thomas (Moncton): My question is for the Minister of Supply and Services. On Tuesday the minister stated that the Polymer lay-off was a management decision based on difficult markets. I note that last year Polymer made a $7 million profit. Has Polymer been making a profit this year?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question should normally be placed on the order paper. The hon. member asks whether a Crown corporation has made a profit. To my way of thinking, that question should be placed on the order paper .

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): May I rephrase the question, Mr. Speaker, and ask the minister whether, after Polymer announced the lay-off decision he checked the profit picture of the company with Polymer officials?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Polymer has shown some profit at this point but the final figures, of course, will not be known until the end of the year.

TRADE

SUGGESTED USE BY CANADA OF UNITED KINGDOM AS SPRINGBOARD TO DIVERSIFY TRADE WITH EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Has the government any plans to respond to the invitation of the British High Commissioner speaking to the Canadian Export Association, that Canada use the United Kingdom as a springboard in order to diversify our trade with the European Common Market?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The idea is a familiar one to me. The High Commissioner is a very intelligent and sympathetic man. He has expressed these views before at the Canada-U.K. meetings which took place a few weeks ago. We are aware of those ideas and hoping that Canadian businessmen will take advantage of the offer.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

DIRECTIVE THAT WOMEN MARRYING NON-INDIANS REMAIN ON BAND REGISTRY—POSSIBLE APPEAL OF LAVELL CASE TO SUPREME COURT

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): May I direct my question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Has a directive been issued from his department by Mr. Chapman, who I understand is the registrar, to the effect that Indian women who marry non-Indians no longer will be removed from the band register? If this is so, does it indicate the government has concluded that it will not appeal the decision of the Federal Court with respect to that matter?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): If I understand the situation correctly, Mr. Speaker, the registrar has decided to suspend proceedings until the matter is clarified.

The Minister of Justice and myself are presently considering the possibility of appealing this ruling of the Federal Court to the Supreme Court and as soon as a decision has been reached, I shall be pleased to inform the House.

[English]

Mr. Howard (Skeena): If the decision is made to proceed by way of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, would the government also take the occasion at that time to refer the whole Indian Act to the Supreme Court for analysis in terms of its offensiveness against the Bill of Rights?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether that procedure would be advisable, but I will consider it.

TRADE

NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED KINGDOM TO OFFSET DIFFICULTIES FOR CANADIAN AGRICULTURAL EXPORTS IF BRITAIN ENTERS COMMON MARKET

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce whether negotiations or consultations are still being carried on between officials of his department and their counterparts in the United Kingdom so that we can offset some of the difficulties that Canadian agricultural exports may encounter if and when the United Kingdom enters the Common Market?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this was done a few months ago with some results which were reported to the House by the minister responsible for the Wheat Board at that time. The whole question of the position of Canadian exports of grains to the United Kingdom will be the subject of further discussion when an adjustment is made between Canada and the United Kingdom on all matters pertaining to entry. I am afraid the answer is not very clear, but I will meet the hon. gentleman later if he wants me to elaborate further.

TRANSPORT

RETURN OF «JOHN HAMILTON GRAY» TO BORDEN-TORMENTINE FERRY SERVICE

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Since October 21, an otherwise auspicous day too, was the day the John Hamilton Gray was to return to the Borden-Tormentine ferry service, can the minister now confirm that that ship is in fact on the strait service where it of course belongs?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to be able to say that I have met my commitment not only to the day but to the hour and that this fine ship is now plying the route as I said she would.

HARBOURS

DEVELOPMENT OF ADDITIONAL DEEP WATER PORTS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. G.W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, while the Minister of Transport is in such a good mood I would like to ask him whether, in light of the very substantial increases in the production and export of coal from western Canada and the consequent need for additional ports, he is giving consideration to the development of one or two additional deep water ports in British Columbia?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. In answer to questions from the hon. member for Skeena and also the hon. member for Peace River on previous occasions I have in fact indicated first of all in principle our willingness to establish a national harbour at Prince Rupert. What is being done now is that the confines that will come within that national harbour are being determined. As soon as that is done a formal declaration of its status will be made known. I hope that will be in a matter of a few weeks.

TRADE

ACTION TO EXPAND EXPORT MARKETS FOR CANADIAN CATTLE

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In light of the recent release by Statistics Canada indicating that the Canadian cattle population has reached an all-time high, what steps is the government taking to expand export markets for cattle and thus maintain the cattle population and assist in expanding it to a still higher level?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is a very general question. I suggest to the hon. member that this type of question ought to be replied to by way of a statement. If the minister can reply in three words, or perhaps four, he might be allowed to do so, but I suggest that the question is wide in scope and should be placed on the order paper or should invite a statement on motions.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the export of cattle is one of the department's great preoccupations and also mine. If the hon. member wants to put down a written question I will give him the performance achieved in that field in the last two years.

DISCUSSION OF ESTABLISHMENT OF PARK IN TÉMISCAMINGUE AREA

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development who is responsible for national parks.

Is the minister in a position to tell us whether he has come to an agreement with the Quebec authorities concerning the development of a national park in the Témiscamingue area, a matter long under consideration?

• (11:30 a.m.)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to report in this connection. I know that studies have been made at several locations in Quebec during the summer, but the provincial government has made no concrete proposal.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

Is the department making joint investigations with provincial authorities in Témiscamingue about the establishment of a national park in that area?

Mr. Chrétien: Not only the department, Mr. Speaker, but the minister himself has been involved.

TREATMENT TO BE ACCORDED PRESIDENT TITO ON FORTHCOMING VISIT TO CANADA—POSSIBILITY OF AGREEMENTS BEING SIGNED

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Is the Canadian government going to accord to President Tito the same level of honour and acclaim during his forthcoming visit as it did to Premier Kosygin, and does the government hope to sign cultural and trade agreements?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on the matter of level of honour the hon. member should know that one is a head of state and the other is only the head of the government and therefore the treatment may vary in terms of protocol.I am not an expert on that, Mr. Speaker. As far as signatures are concerned, I am afraid we will have to wait until we sit down and discuss to ascertain whether any agreement is going to be signed.

NATIONAL REVENUE

ACTION TO PREVENT DUMPING OF APPLE CONCENTRATES—IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF NATIONAL APPLE CONFERENCE

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue. Would the minister tell the House, if he can, whether the government intends to take any different action on the question of importation of apple concentrates from foreign countries prior to the meeting of the anti-dumping tribunal which I gather is scheduled for November 25?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member has confirmed, the Department of National Revenue has found dumping with respect to the importation of apple concentrates from certain countries. If I am not mistaken, this means that provisional duty is being applied subject to the final determination of injury by the injury tribunal. I am glad he has confirmed the greater degree of activity of the department in the matter of anti-dumping investigations over the past year.

Mr. Nowlan: I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate that he may not be able to give an answer today but I hope he will take the matter up with the Minister of Agriculture. Since the question of importation of apple concentrates and apple products from offshore countries into Canada has been before the government in one form or another through briefs, in particular the brief from the national apple conference of January, 1971, and different types of action have been taken but no national apple policy has been enunciated, is the government prepared to implement the other recommendations from the first national apple conference of 1971 so the apple growers of the country will know just how to fit into the government's national plan?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I shall take notice of the question on behalf of the Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

AIRCRAFT PURCHASED FOR TESTING FLYING POTENTIAL OF PILOT TRAINEES

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): My question is addressed to the Minister of National Defence and relates to the purchase of aircraft for testing the flying potential of pilots, Mr. Speaker. Does the Musketeer aircraft which has been purchased have aerobatic capabilities and, if so, why? Do those capabilities result in an additional cost of $3,500 per unit over similar aircraft used for similar purposes by the United States Air Force?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would think a question such as this should be placed on the order paper. If there is some urgency which is not apparent, perhaps the minister might be allowed to reply briefly.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for asking this question. The CBC report last night by Mr. Cleverley was erroneous in six major respects. The government acquired the aircraft in 1970 not for $1,500 above list price but for $1,500 below. The air force trainers have always been painted yellow, rather than only during World War II. The immediate predecessor of this aircraft, for example, was painted yellow. The aircraft, as used as part of the air force training, is used for aerobatic training in the sense of doing crisis control, stalls, spins and so on. It is for that reason that the aircraft whose manufacturer I take it was probably the source of the CBC reporter's information was not accepted and this aircraft was. The aerobatic procedures which are used are not the same as those in the United States air force. The Americans follow a different and more expensive system. We think ours is the better. The aircraft are not used for 12 hours flying as asserted but for 20 hours. As I have already indicated, we follow a different system in order to bring our pilots at an earlier point to a more advanced stage. I think it will be recognized that the CBC was again spreading false news.

[Mr. Gray.]

Mr. Rowland: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. With regard to the urgency of the question, I thought the Liberals required some aid and comfort this morning!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

INCOME TAX

OBJECTION BY MASSEY-FERGUSON PRESIDENT TO CERTAIN PROPOSALS IN BILL

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): My question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. The president of Massey-Ferguson Limited has stated that certain tax proposals will make Massey-Ferguson less attractive to Canadian investors than Canadian corporations operating only in Canada and will result in Massey-Ferguson coming under the control of foreign investors—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would invite the hon. member to ask the question directly. I think it is not quite in order to quote in detail the statement on which the question is based.

Mr. Ryan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was just coming to the question. Is the government going to make a statement about this matter which is of major concern to the thousands employed by Massey-Ferguson in metro Toronto?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I have not seen the remarks of the president of Massey-Ferguson, Mr. Speaker. Obviously the hon. member has and I would invite him to raise the matter with the Minister of Finance when the tax reform bill is discussed at that stage.

Mr. Ryan: As I consider it most urgent, would the Prime Minister ask the Department of Finance officials to review this serious matter immediately?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville.

An hon. Member: Let him answer.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, we consider it most urgent too. That is why the bill is before the House now and that is why I invite the hon. member on an urgent basis to express his concern to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville.

SUPPLEMENTARY FUNDS FOR NEW SCHOOL CONSTRUCTION ON RESERVATIONS—IMPLEMENTATION OF COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATIONS ON EDUCATION

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. [Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member refers to the situation prevailing in northern Alberta, we have already taken steps in order to make three mobile schools available to Indian communities, and urgently needed repairs to the water system have been made. We are still prepared to have talks with the Indian chiefs, if they are willing to meet with us here, but it is most urgent that the children go back to school immediately.

[English]

Mr. Yewchuk: Can the minister indicate whether he intends to implement any of the recommendations contained in the fifth report of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development which deals with Indian education?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we are now in the progress of studying the recommendations of the committee. I am making a review of the federal government policy on the education of the Indians. INDUSTRY

POSITION OF DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON AUTO PACT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce a question. A speech made recently by the Minister of National Revenue suggested that discussions on the auto pact between Canada and the United States are in abeyance. Are these discussions in fact in abeyance at present?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, these discussions have been in first, second or third gear at different times in the last 18 months, although I must say that at present they are in abeyance if one means by that that no active discussion is taking place. That is so today. I want to remind the hon. member that quite a number of meetings were held in the past at which Canadian negotiators tried to demonstrate to their United States counterparts that some of the suggestions they were making were in effect that the elimination of the safeguards might lead to greater difficulties than they had suspected and would result in freer entry into Canada for overseas produced cars.

Mr. Stanfield: Can the minister indicate briefly why these talks are in abeyance, particularly in view of the importance we have been led to believe the United States authorities attach to these talks? Are they deadlocked or is there some other explanation.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, the only explanation is the one that the Prime Minister and I have offered on a number of occasions. When we met with the Americans after the August 15 announcement they informed us that they had a number of irritants they would like—

Mr. Woolliams: One of which is the Prime Minister.

Mr. Pepin: —to discuss with us. We said at the time that we would gladly do so and that we too had a number of irritants to discuss. The only interpretation I can make, as to why the discussions have not yet begun, is that the U.S. authorities had other things to do which were more important in their minds, for example, international conferences, IMF talks, discussions with the Japanese on textiles, and so on. In due course, when they have done their homework, I am sure they will be in touch with us, and as we have done our homework we will be ready to start discussions.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. As the Prime Minister is aware, there is grave concern in Atlantic Canada about the decline in our fishing resources on our offshore banks as the result of overfishing by the Russians. I understand this matter was discussed with Premier Kosygin when he was in Ottawa. What response did the Prime Minister receive from Premier Kosygin to his representations? Was any agreement reached that would be helpful, and when may we expect an announcement concerning any arrangements or agreements that were reached between our two countries?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the matter was discussed mainly between the Minister of Fisheries or Minister of the Environment and Mr. Kosygin, and the hon. member may wish to direct his question to that minister.

Has Canada received an acknowledgement of this request and, if so, can the Prime Minister indicate what the form of the acknowledgement was?

QUEBEC—REPORTED PROPOSAL TO HIRE SPECIAL INVESTIGATORS

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer a question that was put to me yesterday by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams).

The Public Service Commission has announced a competition for the hiring by my department of three regional analysts who will be assigned to the Security Planning and Research Group. The salaries range between $13,400 and $15,200 and the applicants are subject to the normal security clearance process.

However, the journalist mentioned in his article that he had obtained this false information from an informer. This newspaperman should revise his knowledge about hiring methods.

[English]

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Solicitor General. Since we at last have this admission, am I to take it that investigation in reference to security is being taken out of the hands of the RCMP and the provincial police of Quebec and is being handed over to these new recruits who will investigate and infiltrate the various strata of society in that province?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I think that I have been very clear in my reply. They are not investigators but analysts.

[English]

Mr. Fairweather: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Calgary North may ask one last supplementary. The hon. member for Fundy-Royal has a supplementary to the previous question. He will be recognized immediately after the hon. member.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General used an unusual word. Can he tell us what the duties are of these analysts? What will they do?

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I was interested in my colleague's question about the Amchitka blast and the resolution of this House. May I ask the Prime Minister this question. Exactly what form did the government use to transmit the resolution of this Parliament to the President of the United States? Did we mail a copy of Hansard to him or what did we do?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot say exactly what form was followed or what steps were taken; certainly the Secretary of State for External Affairs could. I know that the opinion of the House was transmitted not only to the United States government but also to the governments of the other three countries mentioned and discussed at that time. Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether this type of question ought to be asked. Normally it should be placed on the order paper. REVIEW OF CENTRALIZATION OF RESERVATIONS SERVICE FOR OTTAWA PASSENGERS IN MONTREAL—EDMONTON FLIGHTS

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. In light of reports that since Air Canada reservation operations have been centralized in Montreal arrangements for Ottawa passengers have seriously deteriorated, is the government reviewing its decision to remove reservation services out of Ottawa. If so, when will a statement be made?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not capable of assessing the correctness of the first part of the statement. As for the decision it was not, of course, a government decision; it was one taken by Air Canada independently. I have made representation to them on behalf of those who do not like the idea, but they are entirely free to make that decision if they wish.

Mr. Paproski: Would the minister check into the next Air Canada flight schedule for flights to and from Edmonton and see that Edmonton receives a few extra flights, or at least as many as go to and from the city of Calgary?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Of course that can be considered to be a representation rather than as a question.

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF TOLL-FREE TELEPHONE SERVICE FOR PERSONS OUTSIDE HALIFAX WISHING TO MAKE RESERVATIONS

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is related more to the first question asked by my hon. friend than to the second. When the Minister of Transport is checking with whoever he checks with at Air Canada from time to time, would he also check on service in the Atlantic area, particularly in Nova Scotia, and find out if it is possible to establish Zenith toll-free numbers for those Canadian citizens living outside Metropolitan Halifax who, through their taxes, help to support Air Canada so they can phone directly for reservations inasmuch as aircraft, because of fog and other reasons, sometimes do not fly?

An hon. Member: Here he is.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): I wish to ask the minister about the proposal of Atlantic Sugar Refineries Company Limited to sell its business and assets to Acadia Pulp and Paper, a wholly owned subsidiary of Atlantic Sugar, and thereby cheat the federal government of $2,300,000 in otherwise legitimate taxes over the next two years. Would the minister cause an inquiry to be made and see that this tax revenue is not lost?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's question contains a number of allegations and to that extent it is not in order. Perhaps the minister will overlook the allegations and answer that part of the question which is in order.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): I shall simply say I will have the matter thoroughly looked into.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Would the minister be prepared to state that Atlantic Sugar Refineries, an important employer in New Brunswick, is only carrying out a normal corporate action such as companies all over Canada have been doing for years?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that his question amounts to debate or a representation. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed, from Wednesday, October 20, consideration in committee of Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make cert ain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act—Mr. Benson—Mr. Boulanger in the chair.

On Clause 1:—

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, there seems to be agreement among the parties opposite and ourselves that in order to deal with the amendments to clause one, which I have tabled in the House, we might ask my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, to move them all at one time so that they might be considered as the various aspects of the matter are dealt with. This would in no way preclude the moving of further amendments, either by the opposition or by ourselves. It is simply a method of getting the amendments before the committee in proper form.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Is there unanimous consent to that proposal?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): May I inquire as to the nature of the amendments to be moved? Will the minister be moving the amendments which appeared as an appendix to Votes and Proceedings on October 13?

Mr. Benson: He would be moving the amendments as tabled on that day. There is a slight difference between the two. There was one section as printed in Votes and Proceedings which got into the wrong place, and the underlining was omitted.

Some hon. Members: Resign.

Mr. Benson: It had nothing to do with the government. It was simply a printing error. Therefore, my colleague will move the amendments as tabled on October 13.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Mr. Chairman, this was understood. I might make the point that the batch of amendments to clause one now being presented will, of course, appear in Hansard at this point, so any confusion between what has been tabled and what has been printed will be cleared up, if the minister does it correctly.

Mr. Benson: Yes, Mr. Chairman, that is understood. They will appear in Hansard properly with the underlining included.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Do some of the amendments tabled on October 13 refer to clauses other than clause 1?

Mr. Benson: No, they were all amendments to clause 1.

Income Tax Act

'Meaning of expression "unit trust" (2) For the purposes of this Act, a trust is a unit trust at any particular time if, at that time, it was an inter vivos trust the interest of each beneficiary under which was described by reference to units of the trust, and

(a) the issued units of the trust included

(i) units having conditions attached thereto that included conditions requiring the trust to accept, at the demand of the holder thereof and at prices determined and payable in accordance with the conditions, the surrender of the units, or fractions or parts thereof, that are fully paid, or

(ii) units qualified in accordance with prescribed conditions relating to the redemption of the units by the trust, and the fair market value of such of the units as had conditions attached thereto that included such conditions or as were so qualified, as the case may be, was not less than 95% of the fair market value of all the issued units of the trust (such fair market values being determined without regard to any voting rights attaching to units of the trust), or

(b) throughout the taxation year in which the particular time occurred it complied with the following conditions:

(i) it was resident in Canada,

(ii) its only undertaking was the investing of funds of the trust,

(iii) at least 80% of its property throughout the year consisted of shares, bonds, mortgages, marketable securities, or cash, or of rights to or interests in any rental or royalty computed by reference to the amount or value of production from an oil or gas well, or from a mineral resource, situated in Canada,

(iv) not less than 95% of its income for the year was derived from, or from dispositions of, investments described in subparagraph (iii),

(v) at no time in the year did more than 10% of its property consist of shares, bonds or securities of any one corporation or debtor other than Her Majesty in right of Canada or a province or a Canadian municipality, and

(vi) all holdings of and transactions, if any, in its units accorded with prescribed conditions relating to the number of its

(8) In this section

"Allowable refund"

(a) "allowable refund" of a non-resident-owned investment corporation for a taxation year means the aggregate of amounts each of which is an amount in respect of a taxable dividend paid by the corporation in the year on a share of its capital stock, equal to that proportion of the dividend that

(i) the corporation's allowable refundable tax on hand immediately before the dividend was paid

(ii) the greater of the amount of the dividend so paid and the corporation's cumulative taxable income immediately before the dividend was paid;

"Canadian property"

(b) "Canadian property" means property other than foreign property within the meaning assigned by section 206;

"Capital gains dividend account"

(c) "capital gains dividend account" of a non-resident-owned investment corporation at any particular time means the amount, if any, by which the aggregate of the following amounts in respect of the period commencing January 1, 1972 and ending immediately after its last taxation year ending before the particular time, namely:

(i) the corporation's capital gains for taxation years ending in the period from dispositions in the period of Canadian property or shares of another non-resident-owned investment corporation, and

(ii) amounts received by the corporation in the period as, on account or in lieu of payment of, or in satisfaction of capital gains dividends from other non-resident-owned investment corporations,

exceeds the aggregate of

(iii) the corporation's capital losses for taxation years ending in the period from dispositions in the period of Canadian property or shares of another non-resident-owned investment corporation,

(iv) 25% of the amount, if any, by which the aggregate of the corporation's capital gains for taxation years ending in the period from dispositions in the period of taxable Canadian property or property that would be taxable Canadian property if at no time in the period the corporation had been resident in Canada, exceeds the aggregate of its capital losses for those years from dispositions in the period of such property, and

(v) all capital gains dividends that became payable by the corporation before the particular time;

"Non-resident-owned investment corporation"

(d) "non-resident-owned investment corporation" means a corporation incorporated in Canada that, throughout the whole of the period commencing on the later of June 18, 1971 and the day on which it was incorporated and ending on the last day of the taxation year in respect of which the expression is being applied, complied with the following conditions:

(i) all of its issued shares and all of its bonds, debentures and other funded indebtedness were

(A) beneficially owned by non-resident persons (other than any foreign affiliate of a taxpayer resident in Canada),

(B) owned by trustees for the benefit of non-resident persons or their unborn issue, or

Mr. Ritchie: I presume, Mr. Chairman, we are now continuing the debate. Speaking of mining and petroleum, we have to remind ourselves of the statement made by the Minister of Finance stated in his budget speech on June 18 while bringing in Bill C-259. He said:

In devising a tax system for the mining and petroleum industries which will best serve the national interest it is essential to reach a balanced judgment on their role in the development of slow-growth regions, present and prospective world-wide demand and supply, the risk involved in these industries, the international competition for capital and the levels of incentives available in other countries.

Then, he went on to say:

The three-year exemption for new mines will be withdrawn at the end of 1973. In place of this incentive, assets related to a new mine will be eligible for accelerated depreciation. The cost of these assets may be written off against income from a new mine as quickly as the income will permit. Social capital related to a new mine, such as houses, townsite facilities, schools and hospitals, will all be eligible for this fast write-off. The next major change for mining and petroleum income is that the present automatic depletion deduction will end in 1976. After that, depletion will be earned. Every $3 of eligible expenditure will earn $1 of depletion. Eligible expenditures will be exploration and development costs, the cost of most new mine assets which qualify for fast write-off and certain new processing facilities and expenditures connected with major expansion of the mine. Eligible expenditures made between November 7, 1969, and December 31, 1976, will earn depletion for 1977 and subsequent years.

I should like to discuss this under three main headings: First, the revoking of the three-year tax holiday and its replacement by accelerated depletion; second, the change in depletion allowance from 33-1/3 percent to a so-called earned depletion of $3 spent on earning $1 exemption; third, the position of the mining industry in relation to the province.

The three-year tax holiday is a device widely used throughout the world to deal with the taxation of mines. It has been justified on the basis that investment in mining is a high risk venture and that it will appeal to investment dollars whose owners like to gamble. Profits from the mining dollar are like hitting the jackpot at the Bingo or the daily double at the parimutuals. The tax holiday arrangement is followed by 67 major mining countries round the world; Ireland allows up to a 20-year tax holiday. There has been criticism on the ground that provision for a three-year tax holiday leads to so-called high-grading, but there seems no doubt that the revoking of this arrangement will discourage investment in the mining industry.

I should like to read a comment on this aspect by the Canadian Potash Producers Association. The Association had this to say:

As regards the three-year tax exemption for a new mine, it is proposed that this be abolished after December 31, 1973, and that, instead, a new mine be permitted a fast write-off of its exploration and development expenditures and the cost of mining machinery and equipment. Taxpayers can be pretty well assured that they would not be taxed on mining ventures until after they recover their investment.

While this proposal may look reasonable enough on paper, it is, in effect, a drastic reduction of the incentive currently afforded. It offers nothing except a quicker write-off of certain capital expenditures which would in any event be recaptured through depreciation. The three year tax exemption of a new mine is not in itself a matter of great concern to potash producers; they have all received it or are eligible to do so. But it was a factor of some importance in their original feasibility studies.

The accelerated form of depreciation in place of the three year tax holiday seems to have been drawn narrowly and needs to be broadened in the light of certain implications. One of the requirements that appears to be unreasonable is that assets be new. It has been pointed out that there are substantial markets in Canada for used equipment, and it is common practice for mining companies to buy this equipment if they are satisfied that it can do the job.

In order to provide non-arms length purchases that might lead to abuse, the government could qualify such purchases. As well, the government have a recapture provision for accelerated depreciation if the same asset was used otherwise. The requirement for assets to be acquired before the mine comes into production is also restrictive because assets, particularly in integrated processing where there is extensive downstream processing and infrastructure facilities, are often not operative before the mine itself goes into commercial production. Often, the processing facilities are not completed until many months after the mine is ready to start operation. There perhaps should be a time limit on acquisition from the commencement of production.

As well, the definition of social and industrial infrastructure should be broadened so that the wider definition embraces those that will qualify. Finally, the exclusion of infrastructure expenditures from any major expansion does not seem entirely logical. Apparently, it is considered that this expenditure does not carry the same risk as an expenditure on mining assets. However, all these expenditures bear the same degree of risk, which is contingent upon whether the mine has the ability to produce profitably. In my opinion, these points should be taken into consideration when amending the bill. In dropping the three-year exemption in favour of an accelerated depreciation, the government has definitely reduced the incentive to risk money in mining and presumably feels that risk capital, as in the past, has been getting off too lightly in the tax structure.

Turning now to the wiping out of depreciation allowances of 33-1/3 per cent by substituting $1 credit for every $3 worth of exploration, the government has again departed from the standard type of tax incentives that are offered around the world. The United States has continued to offer percentage depletion at varying rates based on the gross revenue from mining, with a maximum deduction of 50 per cent of the net income before depletion. In the United States, for example, after exhaustive hearings on the subject, Congress substantially maintained the existing levels for hard minerals.

Around the world, most countries are not reducing tax incentives to promote mining exploration and development. The depletion allowance of 33-1/3 per cent was allowed on the presumption that mining was a wasting resource and that allowance should be made for this in order to encourage new discoveries and development. While there may be considerable argument over the best way to give incentive to the mining industry, depletion allowances of fixed percentages seem to have worked well in Canada.

Under Bill C-259, companies not engaged on off-property mineral rights exploration will receive no depletion allowance at all. While superficially this may seem to encourage mineral exploration, on closer analysis it is highly discriminatory and fails to meet the condition for which the depletion allowance was instituted. Some mining companies are by nature better organized and committed to broad and continuing mineral exploration. Others are concerned only with metals, such as gold, asbestos, potash and iron ore, of which abundant supplies and reserves are known to exist.

For some minerals there may be no point in continuing exploration programs. It seems a fundamental error and wholly unwarranted to make the depletion allowance completely dependent on future exploration expenditures. The justification for depletion allowance is the wasting asset nature of mining and ore bodies. There is no doubt that at the present time the depletion allowance has been an important factor in enabling Canadian companies to sell their products on the world market.

In the matter of earned depletion, the bill seems to need broadening so as to include the cost of any exploration and development in the vicinity of an existing mine, the development of permanent underground fixtures and development costs related to a major expansion of an open pit mine.

[Mr. Ritchie.]

In the area of new processing facilities that have to do with the processing of Canadian ores beyond the stage to which they were previously processed in Canada, it would seem logical that all new facilities should qualify if it is our intention to increase the processing of ores in Canada. This would seem to be a desirable role for Canada, one that would meet with wide approval.

The announcement by the Minister of Finance that there would be an abatement of 15 per cent for the provinces has clarified the situation to some extent. However, the provinces will not necessarily pass on these abatements and are under no obligation to do so. Until a more definite position on the part of the provinces is known, the mining companies will be in some confusion. The proposals in Bill C-259 definitely reduce the incentive to invest money in mining and will relatively reduce the amount of risk capital that will go to the mining industry.

In a recent speech Mr. A. G. Goodeve, president of McIntyre, Porcupine Mines, said:

> The most basic uncertainty regarding new provisions relates to exploration, because the investment decisions that must be made now are concerned not with short term but with the eventual rates of return from discoveries not yet made, which must compare favourably with investment opportunities elsewhere.

In revising the tax on the mining industry the government has made the decision that more capital should be directed away from the mining industry and—hopefully—channelled into the manufacturing sector of the economy.

Because of the mining industry's wide dispersion across the country, and its value as often the only industry in large areas of Canada, I think we must look at this tax very closely. Mining is carried on in many of the regions that have been designated under the regional economic expansion program. Under the proposed program, the government is making massive grants to the so-called underdeveloped areas of Canada and grants are being given to many firms that have little hope of becoming viable entities once these grants are discontinued. I think that the restrictions proposed by the federal government just do not make sense. Indeed, the government seems to be reversing its policy in its attempt to rehabilitate these regions by means of grants under the regional economic expansion program. Particularly is this true in western Canada, where mining, oil and gas industries are of extreme value to the economy of the four western provinces. Indeed, in the Yukon these industries are virtually the mainstay of the economy. In Manitoba towns like Thompson, Flin Flon and Lynn Lake are almost wholly dependent in economic terms upon the mining industry. The government has made a calculated effort to discriminate against communities on the periphery of the country in order to build up a central manufacturing industry.

It is generally accepted that there is adequate replacement of minerals from sources in the world other than Canada and at prices that are quite competitive. Cutbacks in the mining industry will only compound the problem of job creation and favourable trade balances that are so necessary for the 1970's. The unsettled international economic and monetary situation holds such serious potential consequences for Canada that we must view this aspect of the bill which relates to mining with some grave misgivings.

A recent report by the Science Council of Canada entitled "Innovation in a Cold Climate" illustrates why it is so dangerous to tamper with the taxation structure for Canadian mining at this time. The mining and petroleum industries are two outstanding Canadian sectors which have shown the capacity over the years to successfully compete in world markets. With regard to manufacturing, pages 20 and 21 of the Council's report read:

Growth, competitive ability, and profits go hand in hand. All three appear to be lacking in the Canadian Manufacturing Industry at the moment.—

Together, however, these trends represent a threat of unusual severity and duration. Additional complications have also begun to appear: the United States import surcharge, the rising exchange rate, and the possible recurrence of inflation, for example.—

—if these trends continue and there are no signs in the last four years of their improvement or even of their arrest —Canada's economy in this decade will increasingly become dependent on the resource and service industries.

If the council's views are correct, they surely add further support to the contention which the mining industry has repeatedly made; namely that with so many other industries in Canada in difficulty, it makes no sense, especially in these anxious times, to tamper with the taxation structure which has enabled the mining industry to develop successfully and thereby contribute so importantly to the over-all economic growth of this country.

I feel that the government has made major changes in the taxation structure of the mining industry. We do not know where this will lead. All indications are that there will be a dampening of mining activity in view of the heavy increase in the work force that is necessary in Canada and will occur in the 1970's. This indicates that the government has not acted wisely in its handling of the mining industry in Bill C-259.

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Chairman, the most remarkable characteristic of this government, apart from its incompetence of course, is its amazing faith in its own infallibility. The members of this government believe they are right and the world is wrong. One would think that their dismal record to date, the funny forecasts of the Minister of Finance, the withdrawal of the grain stabilization bill, the about-face of the October 14 mini-budget, would cause some misgivings of their infallibility, but evidently not. Apparently the Minister of Finance is determined to bull these amendments through the House, despite the growing criticism the amendments belong in the minister's own Alice in Wonderland world and not in the cold reality of today's trading world. These criticisms are becoming so prevalent and diverse that surely the minister must be having some doubts.

I wish to refer to a few of the criticisms that have been made. Mr. Gerard Filion, the president of the Canadian Manufacturers Association, pointed out in a letter to the Prime Minister that the imposition of additional costs on industry in today's trading world is making it extremely difficult for Canadian industry to compete with foreign manufacturers in the export markets. These extra government costs, according to public opinion, cannot always be passed on to the consumer. In many cases they have to be added directly to the cost of the product. This makes it very difficult to compete in the trading world. He also preferred to the fact that while many of the government's social programs are nice to have, in many cases they are beyond the ability of Canadians to pay. Here again, additional charges are placed on industry. Mr. Filion went on to say, as reported in the Globe and Mail:

The letter says rules for the treatment of international income in the proposed changes to Income Tax Act would discriminate against the development of Canadian-based multi-national companies.

He called upon the government to withdraw from the order paper the Competition Act, the technological change provisions of the proposed amendments to the Canada Labour Code and other proposed changes which will cripple industry more than it is crippled at present.

Dr. Friedland, director of the Capital Markets Research program at York University, commented on the tax changes in the mini-budget. While he admitted they could have some effect as a crash program, they certainly would have little or no long-term effect. He suggested that the government should have made some concessions in excise taxes and in other types of sales taxes. I quote from the October 16 issue of the Globe and Mail:

As for tax reform measures, Dr. Friedland feels Ottawa would now like to delay their enactment until it sees more clearly what is going to happen in the economy, but that political pressures to enact the legislation on schedule may be unavoidable.

The president of the Canadian Real Estate Association recently commented on the effects on real estate business of the tax proposals. He stated that the tax reforms pose a serious threat to real estate companies and that possibly many of them may well be forced out of existence.

I quote from a newspaper article published yesterday:

A spokesman for Massey-Ferguson Limited says the government should postpone action on new tax laws for a year because of the damage they might do to Canadian business—

Peter N. Breyfogle, Massey-Ferguson comptroller, said that because of the current economic climate there is a greater need than normal for more jobs, more company profits, and—resulting from them—more government revenue.

This is what the government does not seem to be able to grasp.

But the tax revision introduced last June by Finance Minister Benson will increase the tax burden on multinational operations based in Canada and other companies depending on income from abroad, he added.

This is the disturbing feature of this whole exercise. Every day in this House questions are asked about lay-offs by various national firms. More of them will occur in the days to come, yet the government insists on going ahead with measures to place more restrictions on these firms. These will inevitably lead to further lay-offs.

I wish to refer to an editorial in the October 21 edition of the Toronto Telegram by Mr. Fraser Robertson. He commented on the Science Council report which has been referred to more than once in this debate. Mr. Robertson points out that the whole thrust of the report is that the government has not yet developed any long range policy. For three and a half years the government has gone along with stop-and-go programs. The private sector of the economy is completely confused about the intentions of the government. Each week we see further about-faces and further changes in the thrust of the economy. Mr. Robertson also referred to several pieces of legislation which this goverment has proposed and which are apparently on the order paper. It is apparently the deliberate intention, through this legislation, to cripple the private sector of the economy and give more and more control to the public sector. He mentions a few of these pieces of legislation. He starts off with the tax reform proposals, the Competition Act and unfair labour laws. Mr. Robertson says:

Each casts a chill across the business community. Each was conceived with the belief that business activity is, somehow, detrimental to Canada's interests. Each is designed to substitute bureaucratic control for business enterprise. If these measures are indicative of government policy, and not merely examples of mistaken expediency, then it may be said that government policy is to suppress business innovation of every sort, to persuade alike those who now have jobs and those who do not have jobs that business is their enemy.

I know I will probably be accused of being a spokesman for business and the CMA. I would be quite happy to be accused of taking such a position because I believe it is high time someone in this House spoke out on behalf of the whipping boys of the government, the business community of this country. On Friday, October 15 I was interested in reading the leading editorial in the Globe and Mail. It reads:

As a general rule, a carpenter does not continue to remodel a house while the roof burns.

Yet this is approximately what the federal government is about, as it continues to process its gigantic tax bill while the world into which the legislation will eventually emerge changes drastically.

This illustrates what I mentioned earlier. We are living in a new world, in a new economic climate. Yet, this government is living in the 19th century. It is time it came out of the Alice in Wonderland dreamworld it is in and took some measures to cope with the changing economic conditions of the day. The editorial goes on to point out:

The opposition leaders have been complaining that the tax bill is irrelevant—

It just does not apply in today's industrial world. It is not productive. There is nothing in the tax measure which would increase the gross national product or the number of jobs for Canadians. The article states that there is also quite a bit of evidence that in the post-August 15 world, since the announcement of the Nixon economic measures, some of the proposed tax measures could be absolutely the wrong type.

What is there in this tax bill to cope with DISC? The tax bill will do nothing to strengthen the Canadian economy and meet the pressures created by Mr. Nixon. The editorial continues:

Mr. Benson should withdraw that tax bill and concentrate all his energies on our real problems.

I have just one further quotation. There are dozens of them and I have picked out a few at random. Mr. John Meyer, writing in the Montreal Gazette of October 14, referred to the fact that the tax bill is now undergoing clause by clause study in committee and points out that many of the provisions in the tax bill are not relevant to today's changing conditions. He concludes by saying:

Mr. Benson should make clear now that he'll settle for passage of the generally non-controversial sections of the bill while holding over, for continuing discussion and amendment, the controversial sections. That would be the first step. The second step would be to withdraw those portions of the bill which drag on business activity.

[Mr. Thomas (Moncton).]

As I say, those are a few criticisms I have selected at random. There are many others. I could go on for hours citing criticisms of this tax bill. Even though all these criticisms are mounting, they impress everyone except this government and the Minister of Finance. I have little hope now that we can make any impression on the government or on the minister, because after all how many mistakes can the minister admit without losing all credibility. So, I accept the fact that the tax bill will not be withdrawn. We in the opposition can only concentrate on the most repugnant clauses of the bill and hope, through our pleas and interventions, the minister may be persuaded to make some necessary amendments.

One proposal which will have the most serious effect on the greatest number of Canadians is that dealing with the change in the method of taxation of co-operatives and credit unions. I know this subject has been brought up many times in this debate. Many speakers on both sides of the House have stood in their place and have affirmed their strong support for the co-operative. Many government members have made these statements. However, I have yet to see any concrete evidence that this government intends to accept any of the suggestions or proposals put forward either from the government side of the House or from our side. I know there is an amendment which I shall not discuss now other than to say it does not satisfy the criticism that these tax changes will be very damaging to the co-operatives. After all, co-operatives are a special type of business. Certainly, they have been treated differently.

The criticism has been made often that co-operatives have received tax advantages at the expense of other businesses. I cannot agree with that statement because the co-operatives are subject to a type of taxation that is unique in this country to co-operatives and is unique in the world. I refer of course to the arbitrary method of taxing on the capital employed concept. This is a discriminatory method of collecting taxes and to the best of my knowledge it is not found in any other tax system in the world. Why should there be a difference? What is the logic of taxing on the capital employed in a business. I have been in business all my life and have never seen such a concept in private business. The amount of capital employed in a business has nothing to do with its income and should not be the basis for levying income tax.

Co-operatives are different from other enterprises primarily because of their objectives. They are self-help organizations. Incidentally, with all the criticism in respect of United States ownership I would point out that co-operatives are always Canadian and locally owned. These self-help organizations are generally found in primary production areas, namely, grain, dairying, farm products and fishing. The merchandising they carry on actually is a service to the people in the small centres which in many cases is not supplied by private enterprise because it is not profitable. The question I should like to ask is, should city people be denied the right to self-help organization recognition because their attempts to cut living costs cause some profit oriented corporations to lose some business? Co-operatives usually serve members whose income level is below average. This should be sufficient reason to encourage their self-help efforts.

Despite the efforts to tax co-operatives as a business, they have grown, and largely in the poorer areas of the country where their services are so much in demand. All co-operatives are willing to accept taxation practices that are in every day use for thousands of Canadian taxpayers. Thousands of Canadian entrepreneurs, be they shopkeepers, farmers, fishermen, doctors, some lawyers, some accountants, are in business. They prepare income statements and are taxed at the graduated individual rates. There is no special business tax. There is no tax on capital employed. Thousands of these Canadian businessmen are in business in the areas which I have outlined, but they operate partnerships. Partners in accountancy enterprises sometimes number in the hundreds. Partnerships in law forms are very common and numbers of partners can be quite substantial. I suggest that these are not underprivileged citizens, yet partnerships may apportion their total income as they see fit and are taxed at the individual level. There is no special business tax, I repeat. Trusts are sometimes created and in addition, in cases of estates, income allocated is taxed at individual rates. There is no special business tax.

I also submit that co-operatives are partnerships in self-help efforts and the members are bound together by a common cause that is comparable to that of any of the partnerships I have named. Cannot farmers combine to form a partnership to sell their grain? Does it matter if there are 10 farmers or 10,000? Is not the principle the same? I submit that co-operatives compete with individual entrepreneurs, partnerships as well as corporations. Their objectives in forming a co-operative are practically the same as the partnership which I described, that is self-help. The patronage returns method of disposing of earnings, if unrestricted by capital employed capital tax, results in taxation at individual level of owners of partnership co-operatives. This was the method of taxation recommended in the Carter report. Therefore, I submit that it is equitable and reasonable that the income of co-operatives allocated to members be taxed at individual levels and reserves retained be taxed at appropriate corporate rates.

I admit that there is nothing new in these proposals, but I am trying to throw a little new light on the matter and to point out to the officials as well as to the minister that co-operatives are basically partnerships. Many types of partnerships exist in business. Why are the co-operatives singled out for special discriminatory tax on the capital employed basis? If the minister or his officials can satisfy me or can point out to me any similar cases of partnerships being taxed in this way, then possibly I would be able to accept their arguments. However, until such time as they can give us on this side of the House a satisfactory explanation why co-operatives are being singled out for discriminatory treatment, we will continue to fight these clauses when they come before the committee. We will continue to hope that somehow or other we can persuade this government that co-operatives in this country render too vital a service to be taxed out of existence.

Income Tax Act

Mr. Paproski: I rise to take part in this debate on Bill C-259, an act to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to the act. If this bill does nothing else, it will provide an opportunity to debate the government's economic failures, and for that we must be grateful. However, the country is not grateful for the mess in which the government has left the nation's finances. On all sides we see the total failure of anti-poverty programs which never got off the paper on which they were written, the increasing menace of unemployment, the fear and uncertainty of industry and the worsening climate of confidence. That is the government's record, a record of failure and fear.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: The bill before the House represents the obituary of the hopes with which this government came to power less than four years ago. The amendments which our party put forward, and which were defeated, highlighted the government's failure in the economic field, the unacceptable level of unemployment, inflation, the crisis condition of industry, the lack of confidence in the government, and the fact that the proposed bill does nothing to remedy these serious conditions. The bill is a shadow and a fraud. It contains 700 pages of imcomprehensible amendments to an act that has already been subjected to repeated amendments over the years. You call that reform, but it is only piling confusion on top of confusion and confounding even the lawyers of this country who frankly confess that the entire tax law, with the addition of the present bill, is not only meaningless but impossible to understand.

I refer in passing to the arrival in this country of a young Russian seaman who jumped from a ship, swam for two hours through the icy coastal waters of British Columbia, and climbed a high cliff just to be in Canada. If he had seen this legislation, he would have turned around and swum back. I hope that the government will allow this young man to stay in Canada. Anything else would be unthinkable. This is the kind of immigrant we need in this country.

Mr. Whelan: One that can swim.

Mr. Paproski: A week or two ago, the income figures were released and they showed which cities in Canada had the highest income level. It will be interesting for my Waffle friends in the NDP to note that Oakville, where there is a Ford automobile plant led all the rest, including Toronto and Edmonton. I wonder what the NDP solution would be once they got rid of all the U.S. industry? Would they put everyone on the federal government payroll? There would be total regimentation.

The present legislation is a fraud because in reality it does not represent tax reform. What it represents is an attempt by the government to carry out the principle of taxing Canadians to the fullest extent that the traffic will bear. The government has been spending money like a drunken sailor. They are running huge deficits and are now at the point, as we have seen recently, where they no longer pay the Wheat Board what belongs to the Wheat Board by statute. Maybe they cannot afford to keep up the payments to the Wheat Board. But apparently they are able to find $15 million for an experiment to see whether people will lose the incentive to work if they are placed on welfare. Do we need any further experiments in that direction? I can assure the government that if they want to supply me with the necessary income to maintain a standard of living to which I would like to become accustomed, something on a par with the Prime Minister, for example, then I will guarantee to lose the incentive to work. There was $15 million for experiments in sociology, but nothing for the western farmer. There was $40 million for the Opportunities for Youth program, but nothing for the poor and aged.

The government can always find unlimited funds for the kookie ideas but no money to take care of the essential business. This is a government which goes out and buys a new hat when there is no food on the table. I hope the Prime Minister does better on his housekeeping accounts than he has been doing at balancing the nation's business. We have asked for tax cuts, industry has asked for tax cuts, the poor bloody taxpayers always ask for tax cuts. The only thing the government is cutting is the taxpayer's windpipe. Tax cuts would increase consumer demand, stimulate industry, increase employment and put Canada back in competition. The government will not listen because they are obsessed with the old Liberal philosophy of tax and tax, spend and spend, and waste and waste. They call that redistribution. The Minister of Finance regards himself as a kind of pipe-smoking Robin Hood, taking from the poor to give to the rich. The only problem is that he does not have Friar Tuck and Little John to guide him.

Mr. Bell: How about the man from Georgia?

Mr. Paproski: The present bill is a gigantic monument to the government's inability to come to terms with reality. It represents the final stage of a long process which began under the Diefenbaker government with the setting up of the Carter Royal Commission on taxation. That commission brought forward a number of new principles, most of which have been thrown by the wayside in this legislation. The Carter Commission inaugurated the policy of taxation based on equity. There is no shadow of equity anywhere in these amendments.

Then, we had the white paper on taxation. Perhaps the present bill could be called the black paper. The white paper made the House and the country aware of the theorizing and speculative conjectures of the minister and his officials. It was a kind of almanac of taxation possibilities, none of which were ever realized. Then came the present legislation, if I can use that term in relation to the hodge-podge before us, which betrayed and discarded both the white paper and the Carter Commission. In the bill before the House there is no trace of Carter and very little of the white paper. What we have here is a vise to squeeze the taxpayer, the farmer, the householder, business and industry.

This legislation will have an inflationary impact such as we have not yet seen in this country. It will push up prices, stifle industry, and reduce the standard of living of 30 per cent of the people of this country. The reason it is needed is that the government has wasted so much that it must now extract every last cent from the taxpayer. The bill is the government's attempt to prove that you can squeeze blood from a stone if you squeeze hard enough.

This bill should not be allowed to pass because it is a bad bill. It introduces a new principle in Canadian politics, the principle of legal confiscation. Everyone can understand taxing a dollar. But when the same dollar is taxed over and over, that is no longer taxation, that is confiscation. A dollar is taxed when an individual receives it as income. It is further taxed as a return on investment. It is taxed once again as profit. It is taxed when he dies, and passes it on to his heirs. We used to complain about double taxation. This bill brings in triple and quadruple taxation, and gives the government the right to go as far as it likes.

This legislation carries on a process which has been growing more and more destructive, taking capital out of productive purposes and diverting it to non-productive experimentation. When money is spent on social theorizing there is no return on the investment. It is removed from the economy. That means that people who are interested in producing and contributing have to work harder to find more money elsewhere in order to produce, to build, to create, to explore and develop. The government is not concerned about these things, but non-productive distribution has resulted in slowing down the wheels of industry, putting a stop to development, and giving us the highest unemployment in history.

So far, we have been able to get by on our resources. As the hon. member for Duvernay pointed out the other day—and he is one of the greatest philosophers in the Liberal hierarchy—living on our resources is like living on capital. We all know how far that goes. I want to commend his speech on the economic situation, and his grasp of the essentials of Canada's position when we are being asked by the government to surrender our heritage for a mess of American pottage.

The hon. member for Duvernay, who should have been the Minister of Finance, gave a realistic appraisal of the present situation, one the government could study with profit. The present illogical and theoretical approach cannot go on without destroying the economy entirely. What level of unemployment, what level of inflation is the government prepared to tolerate before it will act? How long is it going to try to deal with problems through seminars, task forces and position papers? Canadians are suffering all across this land, and the government is playing tiddleywinks with taxation reform that is not reform but simply a tightening of the screw on the taxpayer.

The hon. member for Duvernay said, "Cut taxes on lower income and middle income groups." Instead of that the government is raising them. Is it not curious indeed that some of the brighter minds in the Liberal hierarchy have had enough of this shilly-shallying and tinkering? The hon. member for Duvernay is one. The former minister of defence, the hon. member for Trinity, is one. The former member for York West has parted company with the little group at the top, presumably because there was no room at the top. They are all honourable and honest men who decided that the fate of Canada concerned them more than the fate of the government. That is what we are asking the government to do. Think about Canada, about the unemployed, about inflation, about the western farmer, about the housewife who, as a result of this legislation if it passes, will have to pay even more than she now does to put food on the table and educate her children.

The government is taking more and more from the private sector and frittering it away in a series of socialist experiments. Money frittered away by the government does not produce economic activity, does not produce jobs, does not help production and development. It keeps a lot of people working in the high echelons of government think-tanks, but that does not help unemployment. This legislation should not be allowed to pass this House for the simple reason that it does not approach the problem of tax reform on a basis of equity or economic development. It is just another move in imposing on the Canadian people a new set of theories emanating from the government.

When you consistently avoid the problems and deal with those things which exist only in your own mind, then you are creating serious and long-lasting trouble in the economy. That is what the government is doing. It is simply tilting at strawmen while Canadians are suffering. The economy is running downhill because of indifference and neglect. There is no reason for this policy except ineptness and stupidity on the part of the government. A little incentive, and a little leadership in the form of widespread tax cuts might mean cutting back on some of the programs which the government's advisers love to dream up. At the same time, it would mean that many more Canadians would be working, many more Canadians would be eating better, dressing better, and paying less, and we would be in a position to take up the slack in the economy caused by the Nixon measures.

I just want to make one point on the Nixon measures. Personally, I have respect for President Nixon's integrity and his qualities as a human being. There is no doubt he is growing into his job. But I cannot accept the fact that Canada should be penalized for the Americans' failure to stay competitive. Nor can I, along with many other Canadians, accept the sheep-like attitude of the present government. The Minister of Finance went to Washington and, while he was blowing smoke in their eyes, they pulled the wool over his. Is it not time the government stood up and told Washington that we are their best customer? I am not advocating a trade war with the United States. That would be suicide. I am advocating that the government take a firm position for once—

Mr. Whelan: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Paproski: There are only a few minutes to go. If I have time at the end, I would be glad to allow the hon. senator to ask a question.

Mr. Bell: Explain!

Mr. Paproski: I am advocating that the government take a firm position for once, instead of the traditional posture of the Liberal party which has always been to roll over and play dead whenever Uncle Sam snapped his fingers. They did it when they brought nuclear weapons into this country. They did it when they let the Americans stake a claim to Canada's Arctic waters. They are doing it now on the Nixon measures which are a clear breach of the GATT agreement.

If it will not stand up to Washington, let the government at least ease the burden on producers in this country by a sizeable tax cut right along the line, so that Canada can once more get back into production with more jobs and lower prices. I suggest to the government that it scrap this pile of garbage and bring in some realistic tax policies for the benefit of Canadians. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the hon. gentleman would like to ask a question and it has anything to do with the bill I will accept it, but if it has anything to do with the Amchitka bomb blast I will not.

Mr. Whelan: It has a lot to do with what the hon. member said in his speech. I should like to ask if he is aware of a certain gentleman in Ontario who said that the federal government took the right position regarding the surcharge and the income tax cuts? Is the hon. member aware that the people of Ontario yesterday gave this gentleman the biggest majority any Conservative government has had in Ontario?

An hon. Member: That is because he supported the federal Liberals.

An hon. Member: Would you repeat that last part?

Mr. Paproski: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but I didn't get that. Would the hon. member repeat it please?

Mr. Whelan: I said that the Ontario Conservatives won by following federal policy.

Mr. Paproski: They did everything that the federal Conservatives asked them to do. You can see that we were very conservative yesterday. The next time there is a federal election you people will be on this side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, order. The hon. member for Lethbridge.

Mr. Gundlock: Mr. Chairman, I welcome the remarks of the hon. member over there who called our attention to a new mandate in the province of Ontario, the greatest ever in that province. This resulted from the fact that they went along with this government in one aspect, they did not appear unfriendly to the United States. This is why we are in so much trouble at the moment. We blame everything on our association with the United States. I should like to repeat, Mr. Chairman, that the mandate the government of Ontario now has is an entirely different sort of mandate from that which the party opposite will have when they face up to what they have been doing in this House in the last few years.

Mr. Paproski: That's right. It is shameful, intolerable and shameful.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. Order. I cannot hear the hon. member, please.

Mr. Gundlock: I was not saying anything. I liked the by-play.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. If the hon. member was not saying anything, perhaps he should not have the floor.

Mr. Gundlock: Well, Mr. Chairman, I like to listen to what is said in this House and I will have more to say about that.

Mr. Bell: Call it one o'clock.

Mr. Gundlock: I hardly know where to begin when speaking on Bill C-259. Admittedly, I do not understand it and as you remarked just a moment ago, maybe I am speechless. However, I have learned to carry a scale along with me and I can weigh the damn thing. It weighs over four pounds!

Mr. Paproski: That is a lot of paper.

Mr. Bell: May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Is it the pleasure of the committee to call it one o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: It is not agreed.

Mr. Gundlock: It was reported in the press the other day, Mr. Chairman, that the chartered banks have reduced their interest rates. About a week ago in this House the Minister of Finance, in a sense, reduced the interest rates to the Canadian public. But I think the banks were a little bit late. The government thought it was doing something when it turned the interest rates loose, just as it thought it was doing something in bringing forth the white paper and the present bill. People are not going to forget, however, what the banks did before they reduced the interest rate and they are not going to forget what the Liberal government did before and after producing this white paper.

This bill is just too much for the Canadian people to absorb. I would point out to the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister that the Canadian people are not going to take it. When the government brings in a tax bill that no one can understand—I doubt if the minister himself understands it—the people are not going to accept it. We receive letters from all over the country, personal letters, letters from associations such as co-operatives, credit unions and others, rejecting this measure.

Mr. Bell: One o'clock.

Mr. Gundlock: Credit unions, co-operatives, senior citizen groups, even the young people, are disappointed in this bill because they cannot understand it. Mr. Chairman, I have much more respect for hon. members opposite than this bill would demonstrate. I wonder where it emanated? From a practical viewpoint, I cannot imagine the Minister of Finance, personally, or even the Prime Minister, allowing such a bill to reach this House. Eventually, it will have to make its way through the other place and I simply cannot imagine that.

I should like to ask the question of anyone who can give the answer, where did such a bill emanate?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): One o'clock.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The Committee resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Gundlock: Mr. Chairman, before I resume the debate, I should like to call your attention to something. I do not want, Mr. Chairman, to bring this point up as a question of privilege. However, before lunch, during the course of my remarks, the Chair had called, "Order, order." The occupant of the chair then went on to say, "I cannot hear the speaker, please." I rose after that and said, "I was not saying anything. I like the by-play." The occupant of the chair called order again and said, "If the hon. member was not saying anything perhaps he should not have the floor."

I feel strongly about this, Mr. Chairman. The Chairman of the Committee could not hear what was being said and an hon. member had to resume his seat for that purpose. The occupant of the chair called order, and the person who had the floor had to remind the Chair that he was not saying anything. Then, the hon. member was called to order a second time. I take exception to that. I have looked through some of the rules pertaining to procedures of committees of this House, and I find no rule saying that any member of the committee who has the floor has to continue speaking when not even the Chair can hear him. Certainly, when the person occupying the chair cannot hear what is being said the matter is very serious, because there may be difficulty in recording the hon. member's remarks. There are many things in the proceedings of the committee which I think should be heard as well as recorded. I hope, Mr. Chairman, I have put this in a proper form.

The Deputy Chairman: The Chair finds it difficult to understand exactly the point raised by the hon. member, and is wondering whether he is talking about a technical difficulty which occurred in translation or whether, the intolerance of other members prevented the Chair from hearing. I was not the occupant of the chair at that time. The hon. member should be advised, though, that he cannot, at any time, quote from the blues in the House. He can refer to Hansard once it is printed. Perhaps the best way to examine the situation to which he has referred would be to look at Hansard on Monday. This would, perhaps, give us a better idea of exactly what happened. If there is anything to be corrected, I am sure this can be done. In addition to looking after the application of the rules, the Chair does its best to ensure the good operation of the House.

Mr. Gundlock: I thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. Perhaps I neglected to mention that I was quoting from memory. I appreciate your explanation.

As I was saying earlier, it is hard for me to understand that a bill such as the one before us could emanate from practical politicians. My memory does not serve me too well. I think I had reached a point at which I was wondering where such a bill as this, seven inches thick and four pounds in weight, could have come from. I have reached the conclusion that it must have originated among the advisers to the government. I am gratified to note that some of them are present here today. These advisers are obviously not listening to the people of Canada or to the submissions they have made through representatives of the co-operatives, the credit unions, the senior citizens, the young people and so on. Obviously, too, they are not listening to members of this House. This is why it is necessary to be somewhat repetitious, to put things on record time after time. Then, those who put the bill forward will at least have to face the fact that it is old and somewhat useless at the present time. I support hon. members who have made submissions, put quotations on record and, in some cases, been repetitious. It seems to me that the government only pays attention after points have been made over and over again.

I should like to quote from a speech by the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grâce, a very honourable member of this House, as reported in Hansard at page 8335. He had this to say:

> There are a great many departments of government which do produce economic effects. For example, there is the Department of Finance, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Department of Transport, the Department of Agriculture, the Department of the Environment, the Department of Manpower and Immigration—

I almost called it «Manpower and Irritation». And lastly, there is the Treasury Board. The hon. member went on to say:

> I suggest we should have a minister whose primary concern would be the co-ordination of the economic policies of all these departments and the development of general economic policies. I suggest we should have a minister of state for economic policy who would undertake this task. I understand that at the present time the job is being done by a committee of ministers the principal member of which is the Minister of Finance who is assisted by other ministers with responsibilities in the area of our economy. I believe these ministers have other administrative concerns to occupy their time to the extent that they cannot concentrate primarily on developing economic policies both for the long run and the short run.

Certainly, I am not being unkind to government members when I quote what one of their own members has been saying. This is what organizations across the country have been saying. Finally, perhaps as a result of more repetition, the Minister of Finance is beginning to listen. If it is a member of the opposition who has to be heard, I am very glad; if it is a member of a bureaucracy who is finally listening to what has been said and placed on record in this House and in the committee, I am happy about that, too. It is about time.

The old tax legislation is, indeed, old. It has lasted from 1917 to the present time. What the people of this country will make of the new measure which the government has proposed, plus the hundred or so amendments which the government has presented, is another matter. It leads one to ask: how will this country accept such a thing? The other place is shuddering, and wondering how to deal with it. The only way to comprehend the thing is to weigh it. The bill has yet to receive the approval of the other place. Possibly they will consider the legislation in the same manner as we are considering it, repetitiously perhaps, and putting quotations on the record.

My time is short, Mr. Chairman. I recall what the Alberta Wheat Pool had to say about co-operatives, the taxation of dividends and all the rest. They say very simply that there is no country in the western world which treats co-operatives and credit unions in the manner Canada does. I might add that there is no country in the western world where interest rates are so high. As a matter of fact, there is no country in the whole world where rates are so high, because these things do not apply in all parts of the world. This being the case, how can Canadians possibly compete with anyone in their financing? Again I emphasize that in no other country in the western world is the number of people out of work as high as it is in Canada.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Mr. Gillespie: A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The minister is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Gillespie: I would challenge the hon. member to give evidence for his statement. If he will look at the record he will find that short-term interest rates in Canada are in fact lower than interest rates in a number of important industrialized countries.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I would remind the minister that that is not a point of order. The hon. member of Lethbridge.

Mr. Gundlock: If I may talk across the floor, through you, Mr. Chairman, some of the figures that I have are the most reliable we have in this country and come from the bureau of Martin statistics.

Mr. Gillespie: Page?

Mr. Gundlock: I have mentioned co-ops, credit unions and our senior citizens and, in the few moments left to me, I want to emphasize what this tax bill has not done for Canadian taxpayers. As a result of the provisions in its 750 pages, the government has gathered in a few more taxes, or will do so if and when the bill ever becomes law. I cannot see why this measure should take all the time of this House. If you follow its lineage, even just back to the white paper, you will find that this new tax bill has not done anything for us.

There has been some attempt lately to lower the corporate tax by 7 per cent and personal income tax by 3 per cent, but what is the minister trying to do? As I said earlier, our unemployment figures are the highest in the world. This has forced, and I emphasize that word, the Minister of Finance to revise his policies and bring in yet a third budget this session. I do not know Canadian history all that well, but I think that three budgets in one session is a precedent. However, I commend the minister for trying to do his best.

I observe you are getting restless, Mr. Chairman, so I will finish on this note. I find it very hard to equate this 7 per cent and 3 per cent tax reduction with jobs, especially in view of the way the minister seeks to implement those cuts. How many jobs is a 7 per cent cut in corporate tax going to provide and how long will it take to provide them? Similarly, how many jobs is a 3 per cent cut in personal tax going to provide, and how long will it take to provide them?

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words on the oil and gas industry as it relates to Bill C-259. The most important feature of oil and gas exploration is the cash flow of money in order to control land for exploration and development. After 25 years of extremely active exploration and development in western Canada, the hunt for oil is spreading to the far north, offshore areas and Hudson Bay. What concerns the oil and gas industry most is the attitude of governments to the extractive industries, particularly as exemplified in Bill C-259.

Mr. W. O. Twaits of Imperial Oil forecast a sum of $25 billion will be required for the Canadian petroleum industry over the next ten years. Others have suggested that this may be too high by $10 billion, but in any case the figure is enormous. What is the basic source of funds for this industry? In the statistics comparing the operations of a group of companies in the years 1960 to 1969 that control just under 50 per cent of all oil and gas production and 90 per cent of all refining and sales capacity, it was revealed that in 1960 usage of funds for capital stock was 31.5 per cent of the total; retained earnings amounted to 30.5 per cent for a total equity base of 62 per cent; short term debt was 22.1 per cent; and long term debt was 15.9 per cent. In 1969 capital stock had gone down to 22 per cent, retained earnings had risen to 36 per cent. In other words, capital stock declined by 25 per cent while retained earnings went up by 20 per cent.

This really means a greatly reduced injection of private capital into the equity base of the Canadian petroleum industry during the past ten years. Long term debt increased by one-third, which means that the large companies were able to procure more capital than smaller companies.

There are three basic sources of capital for this industry. First of all, there is the self-generated cash flow. Second, there is public participation, which can be had on an equity base for common or preferred shares and sold to the public, to pension funds, mutual funds, life insurance and trust funds within the limitation of govenment statutes. All the funds I have mentioned so far must come from the private investor, either from his savings or from his earnings on his savings. In recent years, the issuing of debentures has generally involved a substantially increased return to the lender. The third source of funds is money provided through government sources, such as by the Canada Development Corporation, though it seems doubtful that this source would be very profitable.

All of this adds up to a tremendous demand for capital in Canada by this industry over the next decade. However, all levels of government as well as industry are being asked to look for their investment money to the domestic market. In 1969 the oil industry generated 36 per cent of its needs internally, the other 63 per cent having to come from sources outside the industry. The Canadian public contributed less than 5 per cent of this capital need on an equity basis. The oil and gas industry in the eight years between 1962 and 1969 earned 8 per cent on invested capital, compared with other industries such as mining which earned 10 per cent. Not many industries were this low. Where is the oil and gas industry getting its funds today? More and more it is going to United States sources, tapping individuals and offering participatory units or drilling units for as little as $5,000. These investments can enter this country on a preferential after-tax basis in competition with Canadian money.

What does Bill C-259 provide to remedy this situation? A United States taxpayer can reduce his income by the amount of the loss if his oil well drilling turned out to be a "bust". As far as the Canadian taxpayer is concerned, for a long time no such relief was offered him. In this bill the government is providing for only a 20 per cent write-off per year. I am not sure whether this write-off is on a diminishing basis or on a straight-line basis, as suggested in the white paper, and I hope the Minister of Finance will enlighten me in this regard. If it is on a diminishing basis, it will take about 26 years before it is completely written off, and I therefore suggest this is no way to offer incentives to Canadians to buy into their own oil and gas industry. If we want our Canadian citizens to be involved in the oil and gas industry, we will have to do something with this. It will be much better to have Canadians buy into their own oil and gas industry rather than to have the government attempt to use vast sums of the taxpayers' money through the Canada Development Corporation to give Canadians control of this industry.

I now turn to the depletion allowance. The Independent Petroleum Association appeared before the other place yesterday. It feels that the abatement of the depletion concept, as it is generally understood in the world-wide oil industry, and its replacement with the concept of earned depletion will not generate the necessary capital for the Canadian petroleum industry. We believe that taxpayers with oil and gas income should be entitled to gross depletion. If the government does not accept our recommendation of the gross depletion concept, then we consider that the earned depletion as proposed in the legislation would be more meaningful.

Failing an acceptance of the gross depreciation concept, the Independent Petroleum Association suggests that all Canadian exploration and development expenses, as defined in clause 66 (15) (b), should be included in determining the earned depletion base, but to avoid any abuse in the sale of properties between companies, it is suggested that income from such sales should be credited to Canadian companies' development and exploration expenses and thus the total earned depletion base does not change. The new changes have caused considerable unease and lack of direction about how they will be effective. It is hoped they will not be as bad as some feel. Apparently the government is departing from the present concept of depletion into an unknown field, a field in which other countries have very little experience.

I now turn to the Canadian pulp and paper industry. I wish to say a few words about this industry because it is one of our large employers, but it seems to have deteriorated in the last decade. At this time there are numerous announcements of lay-offs which indicate that the pulp and paper industry is in some difficulty. A brief was prepared by the Canadian pulp and paper industry and submitted to the Minister of Finance in October, 1970. It contained a general set of proposals. The pulp and paper industry seems to have made a case for a study of a new basis of taxation for that industry. Since the pulp and paper industry is dealing with a renewable resource, it cannot advance the same argument as the mining, oil and gas industries which deal with a nonrenewable resource. Therefore, we have to make a decision as to whether or not we can accept their argument.

If the Canadian pulp and paper industry can maintain a growth rate of 6 per cent a year, which is approximately the world growth rate, it will mean about one million tons of pulp. This would provide an estimated 5,000 jobs in the mills and woodlands with considerable multiplier effects. Although Canadian production of pulp and paper has increased in recent years, the industry has lost its position in a number of its markets. Canada's share of the United States newsprint market dropped from 77 per cent in 1955 to 64 per cent in 1970. In 1955, Canada produced 54 per cent of the free world supply of newsprint. In 1970, the share was down to 41 per cent. There has been a corresponding decline in all the statistics relevant to world trade in pulp and paper. The main competitors of the Canadian pulp and paper industry are located in the United States and Scandinavia. Canada has vast forest resources with a skilled labour force, but this is offset by higher transportation costs, machinery costs, corporation taxes and other factors.

In a brief presented to the federal government in 1971, the pulp and paper industry stated that corporation taxes in Canada are considerably higher than those applying to their counterparts in the United States and Sweden. In the United States, the value of timber may be classed as a capital gain and taxed at a lower rate. A compilation of the corporate tax rate in Canada and the United States shows rates in the United States to be from 43 to 49 per cent of income while in Canada rates vary from 51 to 54 per cent. More important, the weighted average of taxes paid as a percentage of income, comparing United States companies with Canadian companies, shows the average rate of the United States company to be 34 per cent while that of the Canadian company is 49 per cent.

Corporations in Sweden have tax advantages resulting from liberal depreciation allowances, a lower over-all rate of taxation, the use of value-added taxes in place of sales taxes and the provision of tax-free investment reserves. It is estimated that the corporation tax rate in Sweden is 40 per cent as compared to 51 to 54 per cent in Canada. I wish to quote from The Tax System in Sweden published by Stockholm's Enskilda Bank, November, 1969:

> Swedish tax rules "have contributed to the efficiency of Swedish industry as a competitor in world markets . . . These Swedish tax devices constitute an arsenal of tax weapons, probably unmatched elsewhere in the world, which may serve as a fertile source of ideas for the business man, government official, tax practioneer, or economist seeking ways to use taxation to strengthen corporate liquidity and offset business cycle fluctuations."

In Finland, the 31 per cent devaluation of the Finmark in 1967, and the related fiscal policies, placed the industry in that country in a particularly advantageous position to improve its place as a world supplier of forest products. The sharp increase in capacity in the period 1970-71 has resulted from government policies fostering the export industries. The Canadian pulp and paper industry has made its case that it needs incentives and a revamping of the tax structure. It is well known that the pulp and paper industry is not as profitable as it has been in the past. An account in a Montreal newspaper approximately one month ago indicated that many plants in Quebec were approaching obsolescence and that very few new ones had been built.

Bill C-259 does not seem to provide any improvements in the tax structure, although dropping the corporation tax by 7 per cent as announced last Thursday will be helpful, but this provision will expire at the end of 1972. It seems unlikely that the industry will respond without future encouragement. The pulp and paper industry is dealing with a renewable resource. It provides jobs in many so-called underdeveloped areas that are receiving grants under the regional economic expansion program. In many cases the government would be well advised to consider the tax structure of industries indigent to the area rather than the elaborate subventions granted by members of the civil service. I feel that Bill C-259 has created uncertainty in the mining, oil and gas industry. It does not seem to have much to offer for the pulp and paper industry in the future, either.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Chairman, in rising to speak again on Bill C-259, I want to continue with the general theme that I find the government in error. I refer to the failure of the government to reinstate confidence in the business community. It will be very difficult for the 7 per cent reduction in corporates taxes announced by the minister in his budgetary statement of a week ago to really have the beneficial effect the government expected it to have and which I believe all Canadians wish it would have in creating more employment. Bill C-259 brings about changes in the corporate tax structure and many significant changes in what one might call foreign investment within Canada. I think now it has become pretty clear that a great deal of our economic policy will hinge upon our foreign policy. It once was said by a number of people that a country's defence policy should be in tune with its foreign policy. I think it is now true that the government is attempting to tie its corporate policy to its foreign policy. In order to instil confidence within the nation and within the business community we must take a look at our foreign policy. I do not intend to do that at this time, but I think one really has to draw that parallel. Surely, we are divorcing ourselves from the economic atmosphere and environment of the United States through a number of measures.

Bill C-259 deals with foreign investment in two or three subtle ways and perhaps, as the editorial in the Toronto Star of October 20 suggests, Canada should emphasize that 50 per cent or 51 per cent of a corporation should be owned by Canadians and, second, that all new foreign investment that is proposed should be screened by a government board or body. Actually, this will happen under

Bill C-256 when it passes, at least the competitive aspect. Then again, the question of foreign investment and the size of corporations that will be allowed to sell out to United States or foreign concerns is dealt with very fully in this particular piece of legislation. They will have to pay the difference between the 50 per cent rate of taxation and the 25 per cent rate of taxation.

This lack of confidence in the business community, of course, is compounded by the difficulty arising out of the United States surtax and the attitude of that country. It is now commonly believed by many Canadians that the United States government is not going to be overly anxious to please Canada by removing the surtax or to give Canada the special status we have enjoyed in the past because of our continental position with the United States. The United States is not prepared to do this now, at least partly because of our foreign policy, our policy of supporting the Albanian resolution at the United Nations. Let us accept the situation as it is. Perhaps we are now shifting toward the Russian economic sphere. One might wonder where that will lead us and whether or not we are encouraging Russian investment within our corporate structure and whether this will bring about renewed confidence within the Canadian economy. I might refer to Time magazine of March 29 which deals at length with the Russian economy and states:

> For the first time in history, the new Soviet five-year plan, which will be approved at the present Congress, assigns a fractionally higher growth rate to the consumer-oriented industries . . .

I think this is very important because it has been said often we do not want to appear to be solely drawers of water and hewers of wood in respect of the United States but want to become an industrial economy. In some parts of Canada we are well on the way to becoming an industrial country and want to continue this. If we are to shift our trade to Russia, then we want to become an industrial country and not merely be hewers of wood and carriers of water for Russia.

It is helpful to note that Russia is shifting its position to a higher growth rate in consumer oriented industries than in respect of the "metal eaters" of heavy industry. Even so, the metal eaters will continue to receive the great bulk of Soviet industrial investment, the article states. Then further the article suggests that under the present leadership the Russian economy has done fairly well but not well enough. In fact Soviet agriculture, which employs about 26 per cent of the work force versus less than 2 per cent in the United States, has picked up considerably and the Soviets have not had to buy wheat abroad for two years. However, there are still shortages of meat, fruit and fresh vegetables. Industry is lagging badly. Technological advance is falling even farther behind that of the west. The consumer remains ill cared for. So perhaps we have a role as an industrial country in trading with the U.S.S.R. if we would be permitted through some system to supply our industrial goods to that country. Perhaps this would bring about some renewed confidence in Canada.

But what would all this do in respect to our trading partner to the south, the United States. It is interesting to note that even if they should remove the surcharge and other retaliatory acts, we are to some extent quite vulnerable. I should like to quote from the Toronto Telegram of September 7, 1971:

> Total Canadian investment in the U.S.—direct and portfolio—is $11,773 million while American investment in Canada totals $34,323 million.
> Perhaps equally significant from the Canadian viewpoint is the fact that a much greater proportion of U.S. investment is direct—in 'productive facilities' including plants and factories and such fields as petroleum and natural gas and others . . .

As the hon. member for Dauphin pointed out in his speech a few minutes ago more of that investment is entering what is commonly referred to as the extractive industry, resources. The article continues:

> Many Canadian ventures are formidable. Carling Brewing Co., a subsidiary of Canadian Breweries, the world's largest beer producer, has seven plants in the U.S. with sales of more than $200 million, greater than those of the Canadian parent.
> Massey-Ferguson Ltd., world's largest producer of farm machinery, has eight plants employing 10,000 Americans. The American subsidiary of Distillers Corp.-Seagrams Ltd. controls more than one-fifth of the U.S. liquor market. Hiram Walker and Sons Inc., another Canadian-owned subsidiary, has vast plant and bottling facilities scattered throughout the U.S.

It goes on to suggest that Garfield Weston, the food, bakery and groceteria tycoon, has major outlets in the United States as has the Thomson chain of newspapers which owns 44 dailies and 12 weekly newspapers in the United States. It suggests that much of the present Canadian corporate structure of which Canadians hold majority Canadian ownership also has a dual role in the United States economy so we must be very careful that we do not bring about retaliatory action after the surtax is lifted in order to restore the confidence in the business community within Canada. The attitude that Canada is taking toward the United States at present, which is one of preference for a closer trade and economic alignment with the United States, may well turn out to be very costly to the industrial growth of Canada because much of the industrial investment in Canada is also invested in the U.S.

One interesting point which I think has not been made in this debate, and perhaps should be made, is that much of this loss of confidence stems from the feeling that the United States believed they were getting the short end of the stick in the auto pact and that some changes should be made in order to bring about a greater degree of fairness between the two countries.

Mr. Pepin: Explain.

Mr. Horner: Yes, I will explain. Canada said that the auto pact is not negotiable, that we are going to carry on and that we will pay no attention to the wishes of the United States in that regard. This did not bring about any degree of confidence in the business community in Canada. Does the minister wish to ask me a question?

Mr. Pepin: I was wondering who said that because I certainly did not.

Mr. Horner: I did not hear the minister's remark, Mr. Chairman.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Boulanger): Does the minister wish to ask a question?

Mr. Pepin: This is a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I asked who had said that because it certainly cannot be attributed to me. As a matter of fact, our negotiations with the United States on the automobile agreement had been going on for quite a while before we suffered the interruption of the U.S. surcharge.

Mr. Horner: I appreciate the minister's interruption because I do not want to misinterpret his remarks. If the auto pact is negotiable, that is a very good thing for Canadian industry because it may instil confidence in the industry and it may prevent any retaliatory action by the U.S. Let us assume, however, that we have to adjust our automobile production. I think the auto pact has built up in Canada a tremendous capacity to produce trucks and automobiles. Let us take a look at the Toronto Telegram issue of April 25, 1967, which says the following about the automobile industry:

> The capacity of the auto industry has been substantially expanded in order to meet the growing demands of the Canadian market plus the new requirements for the U.S. market. At Ford of Canada, for example, we added a new $25 million truck plant which now operates on a two shift basis— We carried out a $14 million expansion of our Oakville passenger plant— A new passenger plant has been constructed at St. Thomas at a cost of $65 million.

The article goes on to speak about the number of people employed. The point I want to make here is that now that we have built up this capacity it would be shameful if, through some negotiations with the U.S., we failed to employ the capitalization that has been poured into that industrial complex.

I notice in today's Gazette an article which says that after Mr. Kosygin's visit to Canada the Soviets will want a super deal for wheat and prefabs. The Prime Minister said today during the question period that no new wheat sales would be forthcoming and the communiqué did not deal with wheat. The Soviets are going to take the three and a half million tons under the present contract, which would take up until April of next year, but they are interested in prefabs. If we are attempting to divorce ourselves from the U.S. economic sphere, perhaps we should look for some way in which to use the capitalization in the auto industry.

I have here a book called "Soviet Transport Experience" which describes the recent troubles in the U.S.S.R. in transportation. The book was published as late as 1969 and it suggests that the production of trucks in the U.S.S.R. is not keeping up with the demand in that country. At page 177 of the book we find the following statement:

> Recent scrappage rates in Soviet agriculture imply that a truck would be on hand for 30 years, not necessarily always in operable condition.

The book gives statistics regarding the number of trucks produced and it suggests that, with the growth in transportation and the increased number of roads built, hard surfaced and unsurfaced, what might be called a switch from railways to truck transportation is taking place in that country. The book goes on to suggest that the production of trucks in the U.S.S.R. is not keeping up with the demand. After studying that book, perhaps we should consider whether we in Canada, with our expanded truck industry, could make a major breakthrough in the sale of trucks to Russia. This is no particular secret. I remember some time ago when Ford went over to study a truck production plant in the U.S.S.R. but because of U.S. regulations he was prohibited from building a truck plant in that country. Perhaps negotiations could be carried out with the U.S., which wants us to bring about greater fairness toward their country with regard to automotive production, to find out whether they would permit part of Canada's production to be directed to the U.S.S.R.

The book which I mentioned which deals with the Russian transportation experience deals also with the growth and the potential growth in passenger cars. It seems to me that it is difficult to compare roads for passenger travel in Russia with those on the North American continent because, even taking into account their increased road construction, they are far behind this continent. There is a section in the book dealing with growth in passenger travel in the U.S.S.R. Here also agreements could be worked out between our two countries which would allow Canada to sell a limited number of cars which would be produced in our expanded auto production complex.

I throw out these thoughts in the hope that the minister will consider them and see what could be done because my aim is to restore confidence in the business community in Canada so that Canadians will no longer remain on the unemployment list in such large numbers and so that the business community will readily re-invest the 7 per cent which the Minister of Finance suggests in his budgetary statement he is giving back to them. Thus, confidence will be renewed within our industrial complex and Canadians can once again be gainfully employed.

All economic indicators point toward a very dismal winter, but if we are going to switch our production and our economy from the U.S. to Russia, I think we should perhaps explore this automotive concept very closely because automobiles is one of the commodities, in addition to wheat, which perhaps could be sold to the U.S.S.R. I do not want us ending up as hewers of wood and drawers of water for Russia, any more than I want us being that for the United States.

Mr. Downey: Mr. Chairman, in taking a general, over-all view of the tax bill we have to assess what it will do in terms of improving the position of Canadians. When we look at those portions of the bill dealing with personal taxation I think we must all agree that there are some good points. We can disagree on whether the government has gone far enough or has gone too far in increasing exemptions, but nevertheless the exemptions are welcome. Expenses for child care will now be taken into consideration, and there will be an exemption of up to $150 to workers, mechanics and the like who have to purchase their own tools. All this is a step in the right direction and we are happy that the government finally has acted upon the suggestions made by the Leader of the Opposition. Certainly his constructive suggestions have been most helpful to the Minister of Finance when deciding these matters.

The main problems in Canada today are unemployment, an uncertain business climate and lack of the faith in the economy by the manufacturing, agricultural and resource industries. The increased exemptions in the personal tax area may mean an extra $50 or $60 a year for a family, but in terms of creating real employment what will the tax bill do? Will it help the resource industries? Will it help the mining and petroleum industries? Will they be able to expand?

Mr. Paproski: The waste paper industry; that is all it helps.

Mr. Downey: It doesn't do much for the paper industry. Let us see what the Canadian Manufacturers Association has to say with regard to improving the tax bill as it applies to resource industries. Speaking about depreciation, the association says:

> The tax reform bill permits resource industries to deduct $1 of depletion for every $3 of defined expenditures up to a maximum of 33 1/3 per cent of production profits. The association is concerned that, apart from the possibility that the new incentive system may prove seriously ineffective, the definition of eligible expenditures is too narrow.

Then they cite a few items which in their opinion have been unreasonably excluded from the eligible expenditure base. The following is one:

> Cost of acquiring Crown mineral rights.

Both parliamentary committees thought that this should be included but the minister chose not to heed them.

> All capital costs directly associated with the development of oil or gas for market, including field equipment and gas plants.
> Exploration and development costs incurred in the "vicinity" of an existing mine.

These are not included and their exclusion will discourage expansion of our major industries.

What will the bill do for the agricultural industry? It certainly will not do much for farmers. If they have a small personal income it will provide them with an extra $50, $60, or $70 a year. On the other hand, it will bring their recaptured depreciation into income, which will mean that they will be taxed on an extra $3,000 or $4,000. We will give them a little on the one hand, and on the other take away three or four times as much.

The proposed capital gains tax will be difficult to live with, and certainly many people in agriculture will not be able to do much to protect themselves from extra tax in this area. This tax will be mainly applied against the small and middle-income earners, those who cannot protect themselves against it because of the great expense involved in hiring experts to advise them.

The United States has had a capital gains tax in effect for some time. It does not affect the most wealthy people. They have title-holding companies which theoretically, so far as the tax department is concerned, provide them with exemptions. There is nothing in this tax bill that will take care of such a situation. People who are wealthy enough will be able to discover the loopholes and escape the provisions of the legislation. Regarding the provisions with respect to international competitiveness, the Canadian Manufactures Association has this to say:

> The proposals with respect to international income are more onerous than those applied elsewhere and would inhibit Canadian companies' efforts to sell and expand abroad. In addition, we think the over-all impact of the bill would add somewhat to a corporation's costs. Recent developments in the United States increase our concern on these two points.

This is a reference to the U.S. surcharge and DISC proposal. In light of new developments with the United States we need to reassess the tax bill and the tax structure as it applies to the international situation.

Every few days in this House the Prime Minister tries to reassure us that business is picking up and that there will be a renewal of confidence. But what are the manufacturers doing, Mr. Chairman? We have one example of our only domestic manufacturer of tractors—the remainder being imported from the United States, Sweden, Russia and Roumania—who is now residing in Mexico and is reported to be contemplating taking out citizenship in that country. We can assume that he is also contemplating moving his headquarters to that country, so his confidence in what the future holds for Canada cannot be very great. If this happens, then of course we will have another foreign-owned company. This indicates what business thinks of the economic climate in Canada.

I suggest that these reassurances given in the House by the Prime Minister are futile and a waste of time, considering the reaction of business leaders and manufacturers. Of late the Prime Minister has been assuming the role of the great internationalist developing relations around the globe. In some ways this is commendable, but I do not think Canadians want to jeopardize their standard of living for the sake of the Prime Minister presenting himself as a great internationalist or mediator.

It must be remembered that about 80 per cent of our manufactured production goes to the United States, especially that of U.S.-controlled firms. We cannot overlook the realities of life. Even those who talk about economic nationalism in this House want a nice comfortable house to go home to; they want to know that the pay cheque is coming at the end of the month and that their standard of living at least remains stable or possibly improves a little. If our relationships with the United States are destroyed, we will suffer.

The hon. member for Crowfoot referred to the role of this country as hewers of wood and drawers of water. What are our chief exports to China and Russia at the present time? Do we export to them the same type of goods that we send to the United States in large quantities? Is it likely, considering their supply of cheap labour, that the Chinese will accept the same quantity of manufactured goods as the United States will? It would be unrealistic to expect this. The imposition of the 10 per cent surcharge on manufactured goods by the United States may give us an opportunity to develop our own manufacturing industry.

An hon. Member: I hear a child crying in our public gallery.

Mr. Downey: He is listening to what I am saying; he is responding.

Mr. Bell: It is quiet despair.

Mr. Downey: Even before he can read this 707-page document, he is crying.

Mr. Osler: That child will tell his grandchildren not to vote for you.

Mr. Gundlock: He will tell them he heard.

Mr. Downey: The majority of Canadians will understand the tax bill just about as well as the child that is crying in the gallery right now. This 707-page is as thick as four Eaton's catalogues. The child's understanding of that document is about as great as that of hon. members on the other side of the House.

Mr. Gundlock: And he is crying about it!

Mr. Downey: Mr. Chairman, we may very well be worse off being regarded as hewers of wood and drawers of water if we do not heed the cries of necessity from below the border and continue to imperil our relations with the United States. The Prime Minister is often asked what he is doing to improve this relationship, but he does not have very much to say about it. During the past six months he should have visited Washington in an effort to reach greater understanding. Instead, he goes skiing or takes trips to countries that are interested only in our great natural resources. It is this indifference to the realities of international diplomacy and the real needs of the Canadian people that has put us in the catastrophic position in which we find ourselves today.

Mr. Schumacher: Mr. Chairman, Bill C-259 which was introduced last June under very different circumstances from those we face today, has taken up some time of the House. I have not participated in the debate so far and I hope I will not intrude too long on the committee's time this afternoon.

I suggest, for the sake of argument, that even if this bill was a masterpiece at the time it was introduced—and I doubt that; I do not believe it a—it is not what we require for our country at this stage of its progress, particularly in view of the United States policy introduced on August 15. I would like to use the analogy of a wartime aircraft. We might develop an aircraft which would have been suitable for the last war but which will not be good enough for any war of the future. This bill is like that: the whole picture has changed.

I think the government's policy in preparing Bill C-259 was designed to some extent to discourage the flow of foreign capital to Canada and to increase the investment in Canadian industries by Canadians. Although that aim is laudable, I do not believe the legislation goes far enough in that regard. I do not believe that this income tax revision will in the end result in Canadians being on an even footing with foreigners so far as investing in the resources of this country is concerned. However, at least a small, faltering step has been taken. Under the present situation our capital requirements are substantially different. Actually, I suggest that we depend more than ever on foreign capital and that there is a greater need for it now than there was prior to August 15.

The new economic policies adopted by the United States have resulted in encouraging a retrenchment of their foreign operations. Whereas the United States might have encouraged its corporations and other enterprises to invest in businesses or other undertakings in Canada, West Germany and elsewhere, before the new policies were announced, the interest of the United States is now focused in centres such as Pittsburgh and Cleveland. There will be an increase in the rate of the withdrawal of capital from Canada, or at least there will be a marked slowdown at the rate in which capital comes into this country. Although it may not be so apparent to the people of Ontario, people living in the part of the country I have the honour to represent, or in the province of Quebec across the river, realize that capital is required to create opportunities for Canadians so that they may make the best of their lives as well as strengthen the country in the long run.

I believe it is a matter of record, Mr. Chairman, that Canadians make substantial capital investment. I believe the figures indicate that on a per capita basis Canadians invest more in the United States than the people of the United States invest in Canada. On a per capita basis we invest three times as much. In my view, proper tax legislation at this time ought to be aimed at encouraging the return of that Canadian capital for use in this country. Yet we find that the tax systems of other countries are such that Canadians prefer to invest in those countries rather than in the enterprises in this country.

I suggest that the new economic policies of the United States have been caused by the current economic crisis, the greatest since the depression of the 1930s. Here, again, I should like to use an analogy to illustrate my meaning. During the late 1930s the government of Canada established a royal commission to study dominion-provincial relations. It was known as the Rowell-Sirois commission. That commission did its work late in the 1930s and issued its report, I believe, in 1940. Of course, since the commission had done most of its work during peacetime, when its report came out did not reflect the situation then existing. It was realized, therefore, when the commission reported that the government could not adopt its recommendations because circumstances had changed so greatly. The country was then involved in the war effort, and common sense prevailed.

I do not know what name one could give to our present situation. I think we are witnessing a love affair with systems analyses, or something of that kind. This government seems to feel that everything must happen by a certain time, and that if something does not happen by a certain time it should not happen at all. There seems to be undue concern about January 1, 1972. The government's attitude leads me to conclude that by January 1, 1972, we shall be pretty close to "1984".

The government wanted to produce a grain stabilization program for this country. Because the bill did not proceed in the manner the government thought it ought to proceed, the bill was withdrawn. That is to say, because the government could not get it through in the time allotted, it decided not to go ahead with it at all. The same suggestions are being made with regard to this legislation. We are told that consideration must be finished before January 1, 1972. On the other hand, this tax legislation, in my view, is obsolete and should not be proceeded with.

Our taxation system is not that bad. I think if we look at it on an international basis we will find that Canada is considered as having a relatively good tax system. Yet we are not satisfied with it. We are to do away with the system we have and replace it with a system nobody understands. I suppose it is too much to hope that the government will postpone the operation of this law for one year. If that cannot be done, there should be an undertaking by the government that it will not proclaim the great bulk of the bill until the taxpayers and provinces who will be greatly affected by it understand the legislation. We must understand it before it is fully implemented.

Mr. Pepin: If our taxation system is so good, why did the right hon. member for Prince Albert ask Carter to look into it?

Mr. Schumacher: That is something I have wondered about. I do not think he asked Mr. Carter to produce a brand new system. I think he asked Carter to simplify the existing system. Surely the name of Carter must conjure up nightmares for the right hon. member for Prince Albert, because Carter did not follow the instructions that were given to him. I do not think this country owes a debt of any nature to the late Kenneth Carter, because he did not do what he was supposed to do.

Mr. Reid: Is the hon. member talking about instructions Carter was given in private or in writing?

Mr. Schumacher: Who said anything about private instructions?

An hon. Member: Who is speaking from behind the curtains?

Mr. Schumacher: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River wishes to say something, perhaps he would say it from his seat.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. member a question?

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River may ask the question only if the hon. member for Palliser agrees.

Mr. Schumacher: Agreed, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the hon. member if it is not true that the terms of reference relating to the Carter report asked Mr. Carter and his colleagues to look into all aspects of our tax system and did not preclude the possibility of bringing in a new system.

Mr. Woolliams: He was not asked to write a socialist bible.

Mr. Schumacher: As my hon. friend from Calgary North suggests, he was not asked to write a socialist bible. He was asked to look into all aspects of the existing tax system with a view to simplyfing it, not to making it more complicated.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. Reid: Why bother, if it was such a perfect tax law?

Mr. Schumacher: I did not say it was a perfect tax law. I said it was generally recognized in the international community as being a good tax law. The effects of these proposals are unknown to the ordinary taxpayer. Moreover, they are unknown to the provinces. The Minister of Finance tells us there is to be a guarantee that provincial income will be maintained, but no one can understand the formula which he has proposed to make good this assurance. Gift tax and estate tax are to be dropped and replaced by a capital gains tax, but the federal government has given no undertaking to share the proceeds of that tax with the provinces in the way in which the gift tax and estate tax were formerly shared.

Mr. Clermont: We give them all.

Mr. Schumacher: I beg you pardon.

Mr. Woolliams: He does not know.

Mr. Clermont: It is not hard to know as much as the hon. member for Calgary North.

Mr. Schumacher: The government's attitude is that once it has received a mandate from the people it can do anything it pleases until the next election. If the people do not like it, then in the phrase of the Prime Minister they can lump it. In my view that is not a proper way in which to manage this country. The government is forcing the taxpayers to acquiesce in its aims and this places a very high responsibility upon the government for the damage which is likely to result from the legislation before us.

The government is forcing most provinces—all of them, I suppose, with the exception of Quebec which has its own tax machinery—to accept this system. The provinces have no choice, because they lack the facilities to collect taxes on their own behalf. The Minister of Finance says to the provinces, "If you do not like the deal we are offering, then raise your own taxes." But the facilities do not exist. The government is making use of this situation in order to coerce the provinces into agreeing to its proposals. I do not think it can be denied that this measure will have the effect of raising more money for the treasury. The tax base is substantially broadened. It is just a question of making collection by the federal government easier.

I should like to say a word about the mines and minerals provision in the bill. My hon. friend from Battle River has already referred to it and I believe my hon. friend from Dauphin has also done so. I should like to lend my support to their pleas for amendments to the legislation with respect to depletion allowances. I feel the provisions in the bill as it stands are not adequate. Reference has been made to the cost of acquiring land, to the restriction on depletion allowances in that connection. There is also the question of the further facilities which are required in order to carry on an efficient operation once the company has been established.

These mines are often situated in remote areas and developers are required to build houses, construct streets, put in power lines and all the other utilities which go to making up a viable community. I know that at the present time in Alberta the MacIntyre Porcupine Company is finding difficulty in meeting its commitment in connection with the export of coal to Japan under contracts already signed, because the circumstances in which its miners are required to live are not satisfactory to those miners.

Situations of this kind will certainly not be corrected by the prospect offered in Bill C-259. In addition, there are exploration and development expenses which are normally incurred in the vicinity of a mine after it comes into operation—expenses which are required in order to keep a company operating efficiently. Items of this kind should be classified as qualifying for earned depletion allowance. I have been advised that land costs can sometimes amount to 40 per cent of the cost of an oil well. If such costs do not qualify for depletion it can easily be seen that the net tax which is to be paid by these companies will be substantially increased. Indeed, it may no longer be possible for companies to locate and develop these resources.

People in Ontario, particularly in southern Ontario, as well as in other metropolitan areas have a peculiar view about the development of this country. They seem to think we can build up a great number of labour-intensive undertakings overnight. They do not realize that many parts of this country possess only raw materials and that you cannot make labour-intensive employment out of resources of that kind. We must develop these resources because in many areas there is nothing else to develop. It will bear repetition to point out that over the next short period there will be a requirement of $25 billion for the development of the petroleum and natural gas industries to meet the demands presently foreseen, of which only $17 billion will be available from internal sources.

The Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I must remind him that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Chairman: The hon. member may continue if he has the unanimous consent of the committee. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Mr. Schumacher: I thank the committee for its indulgence in allowing me to conclude my remarks.

In summary, may I say this legislation is not applicable to the problem we are facing today. It appears to me to be part of a grand design to narrow our association with the United States, which will only be to the detriment of both countries. This measure at this particular time will cause untold hardships to the people of Canada, and I urge the government to change its view. Instead of taking the time of the House with this legislation, I urge the government to deal with something that will give new confidence to the people of Canada and put them back to work. That is what is required today.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, my intervention at this point will be very brief.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I learned the very first year I was here that that is the only way to get applause.

An hon. Member: It still works.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, it still works. There has been no change in that respect in the last 100 years.

Mr. Cafik: The trouble is that you always go on to make a long speech, just to mislead us.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member is tempting me to do what is often done, namely, to say that one will be brief and then to go on for the full time allowed by the rules, but I refuse to be tempted. The reason we of this party have not been in this debate today is the fact that an agreement has been made under which, starting Monday, we shall deal with specific areas and subject matters of the bill. My understanding is that at four o'clock today it is to be agreed that the general discussion is over and that from here on we shall deal with specific matters.

Therefore, since the Minister of Finance gave notice today of the omnibus amendment that he is moving to clause 1, and since on Monday we shall be dealing with the proposed section 109 I should like to give notice that during the course of that discussion we should like to see a change made respecting the main phase of this new, proposed section.

What this section does in the main is to set the new exemption levels of $1,500 for a single taxpayer and $2,850 for a married taxpayer. We have pointed out time and time again that 22 years have elapsed since the present levels of $1,000 and $2,000 were set. We do not thing that the change that has been proposed is at all sufficient.

We also think that consideration should be given to a system of tax credits as perhaps an even better way to provide exemptions for those in the lower income brackets, and we shall be making proposals along this line on Monday. We hope that the government will give consideration to this matter over the weekend. The government knows the arguments that can be made in favour of this proposal and it knows how weak is the case for this $1,500 and $2,850 set-up. On Monday we hope we can make a real improvement to this section of the bill.

If we also get to the proposed new section 110, when we have finished our discussion on section 109, this section will deal with a number of matters that are allowed as deductions and we think amendments should be made to it too, particularly to the benefit of those in the lower tax brackets.

I hope those hon. members across the way will agree with me that my remarks have been brief. In fact, I have not made a speech; I have simply given notice that on Monday we want some real action by way of changing the proposed exemption levels in this bill.

Mr. Gundlock: Mr. Chairman, I enjoyed the remarks of the previous speaker. I took him literally and did not think he meant exactly what he said. For my part, I do not look forward to Monday because when we come to deal with this bill clause by clause, in view of the number of clauses I see no end to it. Quite frankly, I do not think there will be an end to this bill even if the government makes substantial amendments.

Having listened to the discussion so far on clause 1, it seems to me that as Canadians, not only as Members of Parliament, we are being confronted with something that we have not encountered at least within the memories of those of us who are debating this bill. Quite frankly, we are confronted with a new relationship between Canada and the United States and I do not think the Canadian people recognize this. We are hearing more about it every day in the papers of the nation, on radio and television, and we are even hearing about it from the people we represent.

I hope hon. members opposite will take this question seriously. As Canadians we have been proud, as have the citizens of the United States, to have the longest undefended border in the world. Suddenly we are made aware of the fact that the United States is now defending that border, at least in economic terms. I am very glad to see that finally some of the minister's advisers are listening to what is said.

What has brought about this sudden confrontation between Canada and the United States? Are we to blame the Minister of Finance? I do not think so. Perhaps the blame lies with the minister's advisers who are advising him to bring forward this bill. In the first place, its provisions are now out of date and, secondly, it does not meet present-day needs. I could detail other deficiencies but time is short. It may be these deficiencies stem from the fact the leader of the government is confronting the United States, first in our relationship with NATO and second in our relationship with NORAD. I see that the Minister of National Defence is paying no attention. The United States has suddenly begun to defend its economic border. I urge the advisers of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance to realize that something is wrong.

If you look at the record of the past few weeks, and indeed of the past few years, you will see that there is every evidence that something has gone wrong with regard to Bill C-259. There is a great deal of evidence to show that the bill should be withdrawn. It is not only doing wrong to Canadian taxpayers and the country as a whole; it is creating a wrong impression for the best friend that Canada ever had. It takes two to have that sort of friendship. I am very disturbed at what is apparent today in Canada-U.S. relations and about the effects of Bill C-259. The cause of this trouble may lie with government advisers, the Prime Minister or the leadership of this country. I am not too sure.

When we attempt to deal with this bill clause by clause we will be lost in a real fog; therefore, I urge the leader of this country and his advisers to withdraw the bill and bring forward a new one without delay.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Chairman, I understand there is agreement to finish in an orderly way within a few minutes and demonstrate a slight degree of progress. I want to deal with a matter that was raised in this debate the other night by the hon. member for Skeena. As reported at page 8865 of Hansard, he referred to the Atlantic Sugar Refineries Company, Limited. I will paraphrase his words. He said they were bilking, or cheating the Canadian taxpayers out of $2,300,000 because of certain action that would be taken in a few days at a shareholders' meeting. I am not taking up the hon. member in too serious a way. I just want to take this opportunity to put forward the other side of the story.

I thought the hon. member was just using a newspaper clipping to make a point in the debate. In the question period today he pressed the matter further; therefore, I feel I have to go further. Today he asked if one of the ministers of the Crown was investigating this bilking, or cheating of Canadian taxpayers out of the sum of money I have stated. In a supplementary question I asked if the minister would report and give assurance that this action was nothing more than an ordinary corporate arrangement that would go forward with the full approval of the shareholders.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You mean they all do it?

Mr. Bell: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, of course, is of the same socialist ilk. I do not mind standing here and defending a company that employs thousands of people in a very honourable and legitimate way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bell: I say to the hon. member and those in his party that if this company is not allowed to go forward in the proper way and amalgamate its losses, thousands of jobs will be lost. The members of that party will be the first to irresponsibly get up and holler and yell because something was not done about it. This company has been a very good citizen of New Brunswick, through its president, W. J. R. Paton. It has always taken part in community activities in Saint John and, in a larger sphere, in the province of New Brunswick. As everyone knows, it is in difficulty with Acadia Pulp and Paper Limited because of international actions and actions of this government with regard to the dollar. I will not even get into an argument about confidence in the pulp and paper industry. This company also had bad luck with its tuna company which it established anew. It did a very honourable job in this industry in New Brunswick until the difficulties with mercury.

I merely wish to state, on this Friday afternoon, that as far as I am concerned this company is going ahead in the proper way, a way in which it is entitled to go under the law. It has called shareholders' meetings. I suppose they will amalgamate the various companies and in this way consolidate their losses. I hope they will be able to continue their business in New Brunswick. It means thousands of jobs in that province.

An hon. Member: Four o'clock.

The Chairman: Before I call it four o'clock, having in mind the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is it the understanding of the Chair that the general discussion is now concluded and that on Monday the committee will move to discussion of the details of clauses 109 and 110?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Does the committee so order?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: It is so ordered.

Progress reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being 4 o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business.

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Speaker, I understand there is disposition among hon. members to forgo the private members' hour today.

Mr. Bell: We are agreeable, Mr. Speaker. I trust these bills will hold their normal place on the order paper.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Income Tax Act

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that private members' hour shall be dispensed with and the bills shall retain their normal place on the order paper?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At four o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, October 25, 1971

The House met at 2 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

CANADA BOAT SAFETY BILL

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH ADVISORY COUNCIL AND MINIMUM STANDARDS FOR CONSTRUCTION AND OPERATION

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-271, respecting boating safety.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member shall have leave to introduce the said bill?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Explain.

Mr. Mather: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to promote recreational boating safety and reduce the growing number of casualties from recreational boating. It seeks to do this by the establishment of a boating safety council having on it a representative of the Public Service and others from boating safety organizations. It would enable the making of regulations respecting safety standards of boats and licensing and efficiency standards for pleasure boat operators.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT, 1949

PETITION FOR AMENDMENT BY UNITED KINGDOM PARLIAMENT OF TERM 17, EDUCATION, OF TERMS OF UNION OF NEWFOUNDLAND WITH CANADA

On the order: Government Notices of Motions.

October 22, 1971—The Minister of Transport: That a humble Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen in the following words:

To the Queen's most Excellent Majesty:

Most Gracious Sovereign:

We Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty praying that You may graciously be pleased to cause a measure to be laid before the Parliament of the United Kingdom to be expressed as follows:

An Act to amend the British North America Act, 1949

Whereas Canada has requested, and consented to, the enactment of the following provisions, and the Senate and House of Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled have submitted an Address to Her Majesty praying that Her Majesty may graciously be pleased to cause a measure to be laid before the Parliament of the United Kingdom for that purpose:

Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada amended

1. Term 17 of the Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada set out in the Schedule to the British North America Act, 1949 is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"17. (1) In lieu of section ninety-three of the British North America Act, 1867, the following Term shall apply in respect of the Province of Newfoundland:

In and for the Province of Newfoundland the Legislature shall have exclusive authority to make laws in relation to education, but the Legislature will not have authority to make laws prejudicially affecting any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools, common (amalgamated) schools, or denominational colleges, that any class or classes of persons had by law in Newfoundland at the date of Union, or any like right or privilege with respect to such schools or colleges that any other class or classes of persons have had by law in Newfoundland after the date of Union as members of a religious denomination or one of a group of religious denominations that, by or under the Schools Act of Newfoundland, is or at any time has been recognized as being organized for educational purposes, and out of public funds of the province of Newfoundland provided for education.

(a) all such schools shall receive their share of such funds in accordance with scales determined on a non-discriminatory basis from time to time by the Legislature for all schools then being conducted under authority of the Legislature; and

(b) all such colleges shall receive their share of any grant from time to time voted for all colleges then being conducted under authority of the Legislature, such grant being distributed on a non-discriminatory basis.

(2) In this Term, "Schools Act of Newfoundland" means The Schools Act, 1969, being the Act No. 68 of 1969 (Statutes of Newfoundland), as amended from time to time, or any Act substituted therefor as amended from time to time."

Coming into force of amendment

2. For greater certainty, the provision of Term of the Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada set out in the Schedule to the British North America Act, 1949, in so far as those provisions relate to the aproval and coming into force of the said Terms, do not apply to or in respect of the amendment set out in section 1 of this Act.

Questions

Short title and citation

3. This Act may be cited as the British North America Act, 1972; and the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1965, and this Act may be cited together as the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1972.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to section 2 of Standing Order 21 this notice of motion is transferred to and ordered for consideration under government orders at the next sitting of the House.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

BELLECHASSE CONSTITUENCY—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO HOUSE FOR AGED AT SAINT-FABIEN

Question No. 1,711—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

Did the government contribute financially to the construction of the home for the aged in Saint-Fabien in the constituency of Bellechasse and, if so (a) was the contribution made through the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation (b) what was the amount contributed (c) if the form of a loan (i) what was the rate of interest (ii) what will be the duration of the loan (iii) what are the reimbursement terms?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): (a) (b) (c) Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation approved a loan in August, 1969, through the Quebec Housing Corporation, to assist in the financing of a home for the aged in Saint-Fabien-de-Panet, in the Constituency of Bellechasse, in the amount of $350,000. The loan was made at an interest rate of 6-7/8 percent repayable over a term of 50 years.

JOB VACANCY SURVEY

Question No. 1,719—Mr. Blackburn:—Supplementary

1. What was the total expenditure associated with the development and the operation of the Job Vacancy Survey in each of the fiscal years since 1966-67?

2. How many full-time employees associated with the Job Vacancy Survey were on the payroll of Statistics Canada and the Department of Manpower and Immigration at the end of the fiscal years 1966-67, 1967-68, 1968-69, 1969-70, 1970-71?

3. What is the operational definition of a vacancy in the survey?

4. What is the first month in which results from the Survey were prepared?

5. How many vacancies were found in Canada and in the five regions in this first month and in subsequent months to date?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): In so far as the Department of Manpower and Immigration is concerned, the following applies:

Fiscal Years	Department of Manpower and Immigration Payments to Statistics Canada (Under Contract)	Department of Manpower and Immigration Operations and Administrative Costs	Total Expenditures
		Dollars
1966-67	—	—	—
1967-68	289,254	—	289,254
1968-69	661,894	22,702	684,596
1969-70	1,010,501	54,036	1,064,537

Fiscal Years	Personnel Employed by Statistics Canada	Department of Manpower and Immigration Employees	Total Full Time Employees
1967-68	66	—	66
1968-69	88	2	90
1970-71	99	7	106

3. The difinition of job vacancies used in the present Canadian Job Vacancy Survey is a job: (1) That was vacant for the full reference day. (2) For which some specific recruiting action was undertaken during a specified time period. (3) That was open to workers from outside the establishment and (4) Was either immediately available or available at a specified future starting date.

4. June, 1970.

5. The data from the Job Vacancy Survey was being evaluated and prepared for publication. In the initial publication, monthly data for the period commencing June 1970 forward will be reported. Thereafter, the data will be reported monthly. Publication is scheduled to begin before the end of 1971.

NEWFOUNDLAND—FEDERAL GRANTS IN 1971

Question No. 1,722—Mr. Marshall:

How many loans have been granted in Newfoundland in 1971 under the following headings (a) Small Business Loans (b) Farm Improvement Loans (c) Fisheries Improvement Loans (d) Industrial Development Bank Loans?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): For the period January 1 to June 30, 1971: (a) two; (b) four; (c) ten. For the period October 1, 1970 to 31 August, 1971: (d) 79.

MONTMAGNY, QUEBEC—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO HOTEL-DIEU HOSPITAL

Question No, 1,735—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

Did the government contribute financially to the enlargement of the Hôtel-Dieu Hospital in Montmagny, during the years 1969-70 and 1970-71 and, if so, what was the amount of the contribution?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Under the Hospital Construction Grant Program, based on projects submitted by the province of Quebec, federal contributions of $258,419.37 were made to the province of Quebec for the Hôtel-Dieu Hospital of Montmagny towards major renovations and addition of 18 new active treatment beds and additional floor areas for community health centre facilities. No grants by the federal government were provided during fiscal year 1970-71 since the Hospital Construction Grant Program was terminated on March 31st, 1970. However, a terminal Federal Hospital Construction Grant payment of $17,071,925.00 was paid to the Province of Quebec. The Province has not yet reported on the breakdown of the construction grants it has made to individual hospitals with this allocation.

CNR—REGISTRATION OF SHIPS

Question No. 1,741—Mr. Skoberg:

Are there any ships belonging to the CNR registered outside of Canada and, if so, in what countries are these ships registered?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: No.

EVALUATION OF DRIVER EDUCATION PROGRAMS

Question No. 1,743—Mr. Mather:

Is consideration being given to evaluating, in conjunction with the provinces, the standards and values of driver-education programs, with particular reference to studying the need for an increased period of supervision or monitoring of the behaviour of newly licensed young drivers?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Road and Motor Vehicle Traffic Safety Branch of the Department of Transport is planning an evaluation of Canadian driver education programs to determine their effectiveness in reducing motor vehicle accidents. This study will be carried out in cooperation with the provinces and will include an examination of the contents of driver education courses as well as an assessment of their effectiveness. As responsibility for the licensing of drivers is that of the provinces, a detailed study of the performance of newly-licensed young drivers, or of any other group of drivers, will have to be developed in cooperation with one or more of the provincial government departments having authority for such matters.

TRAFFIC ACCIDENTS AS A RESULT OF DRUG USAGE

Question No. 1,744—Mr. Mather:

Is a record kept of traffic accidents resulting from the consumption of hypnotic and psychotropic substances by drivers and, if so, does the record indicate (a) that such accidents are on the increase (b) the age groups that are most involved?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): While it is understood that some provinces are attempting to identify and record traffic collisions in which drug usage may have been a contributing factor, reliable statistics are not available nor are any such data reported to Statistics Canada at present.

USE OF PHOSPHATE DETERGENTS

Question No. 1,749—Mr. Aiken:

1. Has the recent announcement by the Surgeon General of the United States concerning the use of phosphate detergents come to the attention of the government and, if so, does the government intend to confirm its determination to reduce and eliminate the use of phosphate detergents in Canada?

2. Does the government intend to proceed as planned with regulations for the cutting back of the phosphate content in detergents in 1972?

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): 1. Yes, the Government intends to follow the previously announced program to reduce the phosphate content of laundry detergents to not more than 5 pour cent (calculated as P2 O5) by the end of 1972.

2. Yes.

LOSS AS A RESULT OF FIRES

Question No. 1,756—Mr. Mather:

1. How many Canadians died in fires during 1970?

2. How many of these were children?

3. What was the estimated property loss from such fires?

4. What was the estimated loss to the economy including lost production and employment?

5. What were the chief causes of fires?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): According to reports received from the Provincial Fire Marshals and Fire Commissioners: 1. Six hundred and thirty-six.

2. Two hundred and twenty-four.

3. Throughout Canada, 68,435 fires reported for a total loss of $202,007,561. No information available on loss from fires in which fatalities were involved.

4. It is estimated that the indirect losses of fire—stoppage of production and consequent unemployment—are five times the direct loss.

5. The three leading causes were: Smokers carelessness, 30 per cent; electrical causes, 14 per cent; heating equipment, 10 per cent.

NATIONAL PARKS AND HISTORIC SITES SERVICE—EMPLOYMENT OF JEAN BERGER

Question No. 1,787—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

Is the former Member for Montmagny, Mr. Jean Berger, with the National Parks and Historic Sites Service of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and, if so (a) since what date (b) what are his duties (c) what is his annual salary?

Mr. Judd Buchanan (Parliamentary on Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): No. (a) Not applicable; (b) not applicable; (c) not applicable.

THIRD REPORT OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON ENVIRONMENTAL POLLUTION

Question No. 1,788—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. On what date was the Third Report of the Special Committee on Environmental Pollution transmitted to the Secretary of State of the United States?

2. On what date was receipt of the document acknowledged by the Secretary of State?

3. Was a copy of the report sent to the Secretary General of the United Nations and, if so, on what date?

4. What was the date and nature of the reply of the Secretary General?

Questions

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. A copy of the Report was handed personally by a senior officer of the Department of External Affairs to the Director, Office of Canadian Affairs of the Department of State in the course of meetings between Canadian and United States officials in Washington at the end of June, 1971.

2. Receipt of the Report was acknowledged orally by the Director, Office of Canadian Affairs in the Department of State.

3. No.

4. See reply to foregoing question.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK—APPROVAL OF APPLICATIONS FOR FUNDS

Question No. 1,794—Mr. Schumacher:

1. What basis is used for determining approval of application for funds from the Industrial Development Bank?

2. What form of investigation is used to determine the location of parent companies of successful applicants?

3. What form of investigation is used to determine the controlling administration of successful applicants?

4. What are the residency requirements of successful applicants?

5. What are the citizenship requirements of successful applicants?

6. What priorities are given to strictly Canadian applicants?

7. What investigation is made to determine whether projects and applicants are strictly Canadian?

8. What applications have been approved to date, where ultimate control lies outside Canada?

9. In each case who are the controlling authorities and where are they located?

10. In each case, how much money was loaned by the Industrial Development Bank?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): The Industrial Development Bank is empowered to make loans to any person engaged or about to engage in an industrial enterprise in Canada (defined as an enterprise in which is carried on any industrial, trade or other business of any kind) provided that it can satisfy itself that credit or other financial resources would not otherwise be available on reasonable terms and conditions, that the amount invested or to be invested in the enterprise by persons other than the Bank and the character of that investment, are such as to afford the IDB reasonable protection and that the enterprise may reasonably be expected to prove successful and able to repay its loan. The statute does not distinguish between enterprises in Canada which are domestically-owned or foreign-owned. The IDB does not maintain records in a form which would provide information concerning either the number or amount of loans to foreign-owned or foreign-controlled businesses in Canada. Notwithstanding the absence of statistical date, the proportion of loans to foreign-owned or foreign-controlled businesses is very small. The IDB's customer's are, primarily, small business enterprises, many of which are proprietorships or partnerships and the average size of loan in fiscal 1971 was about $41,000.

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL

Question No. 1,802—Mr. Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley):

1. Has the National Research Council been put under the authority of the Minister of State for Science and Technology and, if not, for what reason?

2. Will the Minister give direction to projects or research carried on under the National Research Council?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of State for Science and Technology): 1. No. The National Research Council continues to report to Mr. Drury, who is the Minister designated for that purpose under the Act.

2. No.

TECHNOLOGICAL AND SCIENTIFIC RESEARCH

Question No. 1,807—Mr. Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley):

1. In regard to foreign owned subsidiaries in Canada, will the Minister of State for Science and Technology insist on more technological and scientific research by these companies in Canada?

2. Does the Minister intend to approve government grants for scientific and technological research to foreign owned subsidiaries in Canada?

3. In which specific scientific or technological areas would the Minister recommend this country rent or hire technology?

4. What method does the Minister intend to use to avoid the duplication of the efforts made by other countries in scientific or technological research?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of State for Science and Technology): 1. The Ministry will be assisting in the development of policy in regard to research carried out in Canada by foreign owned companies.

2. That is not a function of the Ministry.

3. The Ministry will be examining such questions in depth.

4. The Ministry already has a close working relationship with many other countries engaged in Scientific and Technological research and will foster and develop those relationships.

UNITED NATIONS—U.S. AND ALBANIAN RESOLUTION FOR SEATING OF CHINA

Question No. 1,841—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. What member states are co-sponsors of the United States' resolution urging the seating of both China and Taiwan in the United Nations?

2. What member states are co-sponsors of the Albanian resolution number 93 which calls for the expulsion of the Taipei Government from the UN and all its related organizations?

3. What is the attitude of the Canadian delegation to these resolutions?

[Translation]

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Australia, Bolivia, Chad, Costa Rica, Dominican Republic, Fiji, Gambia, Haiti, Hondurus, Japan, Lesotho, Liberia, Mauritius, New Zealand, Philippines, Swaziland, Thailand and Uruguay.

2. Algeria, Burma, Ceylon, Cuba, Equatorial Guinea, Guinea, Iraq, Mali, Mauritania, Nepal, Pakistan, People's Democratic Republic of Yemen, People's Republic of the Congo, Romania, Somalia, Syrian Arab Republic, Sudan, United Republic of Tanzania, Yemen, Yugoslavia and Zambia.

3. The Canadian delegation will vote for the draft resolution sponsored by Albania and other countries; last year it voted in favour of a similar resolution.

The Canadian delegation will vote against the draft resolution sponsored by the United States and other countries if it is put to a vote.

COST OF PEACE-KEEPING FORCES

Question No. 1,855—Mr. MacQuarrie:

1. Since its establishment what has been the annual cost to Canada of the UN peace-keeping forces in Cyprus?

2. To what other peace-keeping forces is Canada contributing and what is the cost in each case?

3. How many Canadian personnel are currently involved in UN peace-keeping forces or missions?

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. From inception to June 15, 1971, Canada has absorbdd the following out-of-pocket costs in respect of the Contingent to the United Nations Force in Cyprus (UNFICYP):

1966	2,948,000
1967	2,907,000
1968	1,836,000
1969	1,476,000
1970	1,768,000
1st half 1971	985,000
Total	$18,922,000

United Nations Truce Supervisory Organization, Palestine (UNTSO)—Nil over normal pay and allowances. United Nations Military Observer Group, India-Pakistan (UNMOGIP)—$71,500 recoverable from UN. United Nations Command, Military Armistice Commission, Korea (UNCMAC)—$4,700 non recoverable. (These figures represent annual estimated costs.)

3. 619.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—COST OF SCHOOL SUPPLIES TO DEPENDANTS OF PERSONNEL

Question No. 1,900—Mr. Coates:

1. Does the government provide school supplies for children of military personnel and, if so, how long has this policy been in effect and is it in effect for personnel within Canada and those serving outside Canada?

2. What is the total annual cost for school supplies to children of military personnel?

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. It has been policy for many years to provide school supplies at public expense to children of Canadian Forces' personnel attending DND dependants' schools in Canada or overseas. The term "school supplies" refers only to the provision of consumable items such as scribblers, notebooks, pencils, paper, etc. and does not include text books. The provision of text books at DND dependants' schools is governed by the applicable provincial regulation.

The departmental accounting system does not make provision for isolating the annual cost of school supplies. To attempt to do so would entail a large amount of work for which the necessary staff is not available.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—DEFENCE PROPERTIES

Question No. 1,917—Mr. Noble:

1. Has the Department of National Defence any definite plans to make any vacated defence properties available to Crown Assets Disposal Corporation or the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development?

2. Has the Minister of National Defence made a date available to meet with the planning and development committee of the Grey County Council for the purpose of making a decision in respect to the future of the Meaford Tank Range?

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. It is presumed this refers to defence properties at Meaford. If such is the case, the answer is 'No'.

2. A meeting has been arranged for the purpose of discussing the future of the Meaford Tank Range.

FINANCE

POSSIBLE GROUP OF TEN AGREEMENT ON PROPOSED DEVALUATION OF UNITED STATES DOLLAR—GOVERNMENT POSITION RESPECTING CANADIAN DOLLAR

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, since the Minister of Finance, I assume, has now been filled in by Canada's representatives at the meeting of the Group of Ten in Paris I should like to ask him if there was general agreement reached at that meeting of the Group of Ten in respect of a proposed average devaluation of something like 10 per cent for the United States dollar in relation to other currencies and, if so, was any specific percentage change or revaluation suggested for the Canadian dollar.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker. What the deputies were doing was trying to arrive at the quantum of the United States balance of payments problem which the United States has indicated is in the area of $13 billion, which other people thought was about $8 billion and which some thought was less than that. The IMF indicated that if there was a balance of payments problem of $8 billion it would require a change in valuation moving back a long period of time in the area of 10 per cent on average. Nothing like that was agreed upon. It was simply a matter of looking at the problem, considering what it was and referring it to the ministers for future consideration.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Stanfield: Have the representatives of Canada taken any position with regard to the value of the Canadian dollar vis-à-vis the United States dollar, or is it the position of the government of Canada that the Canadian dollar is floating freely?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, generally it is the position of the Canadian government that the Canadian dollar has been floating freely for a period of some 18 months and that it reflects the market demand for the dollar vis-à-vis other currencies.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, does the reply of the minister that the Canadian dollar has been floating freely during the past 18 months mean that the reported massive intervention of the Bank of Canada toward the end of last week constitutes a change in Canada's position with regard to the free floating of the Canadian dollar or does it mean that the Bank of Canada is pursuing an independent policy to protect us in spite of what happens in respect of government policies?

Mr. Benson: First of all, the intervention through the exchange fund was a decision of the Minister of Finance and not of the Bank of Canada which acts as our agent in this matter. Our policy has not changed.

Mr. Stanfield: Am I to understand that the Minister of Finance is refuting the report that there was a massive intervention on the part of Canadian authorities toward the end of last week?

Mr. Benson: I am merely following the well established policy of not commenting on activities in the exchange market except at the end of the month when the reserve figures are issued.

Mr. Baldwin: You are floating back there.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York South. Order, please. Because of the noise the Chair might indicate to the hon. member for York South that the hon. member for Témiscamingue has a supplementary question.

[Translation]

LOWERING OF INTEREST RATES BY CHARTERED BANKS

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the hon. Minister of Finance.

The reason give by the Bank of Canada to justify lowering of its interest rates from 5¼ to 4 3/4 per cent is that this makes it easier for borrowers to obtain loans. Is the minister in a position to tell us whether chartered banks in Canada have also reduced their rates by ½ per cent as the Bank of Canada is now doing?

[English]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think that the chartered banks in Canada reduced their rates before the Bank of Canada did in this instance, and our move was simply to indicate that we support low interest rates in Canada.

Mr. Stanfield: You are directing the Bank of Canada now. It is the first time you have admitted it.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYMENT PROGRAM—AGREEMENT WITH PROVINCES ON WORKS TO BE UNDERTAKEN—NUMBER OF JOBS TO BE CREATED

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I want to ask the Minister of Finance a question on another subject. I should like to ask him whether the meeting of federal and provincial officials in Montreal at the end of last week arrived at any program for creating jobs this winter on the basis of the program which the minister announced some days ago, whether that program refers to specific works to be undertaken by the provinces and municipalities and, if so, would he undertake to make a statement to the House outlining what that program may be?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): The meeting last week was a preparatory meeting with the officials of the various provinces. The federal-provincial conference, I believe, is going to go forward on November 1 and 2. At the conclusion of that meeting I will, of course, have a statement to make.

Mr. Lewis: In view of the estimate released by the Minister of Agriculture that the $10 million assigned for the building of exhibition buildings would probably provide 1,000 jobs for construction workers on site this winter, were any estimates discussed at the meeting of officials or has any other department of government made estimates as to what number of jobs is involved in the government's program?

Mr. Benson: First of all, I understand the Minister of Agriculture said "at least 1,000 jobs" and, as my hon. friend knows, this program which has been approved by the government of Canada is a long-range program and I think it will be very important to the agricultural community in Canada in the future.

EARLIER DATES FOR FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Mr. David Lewis (York South): May I ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the information he gave earlier about seeking an earlier meeting of the heads of governments to discuss the Canadian economy, dates earlier than December have now been agreed on and, if so, what those dates are for the meeting of first ministers?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. After all the consultations, of which the House is aware, dates were agreed upon by all the provinces and those dates are November 15, 16 and 17.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—INVOLVEMENT OF CITIES IN PLANNING WORKS—CRITERIA FOR FUND DISTRIBUTION—INCLUSION OF INDIAN RESERVES

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): May I ask the right hon. Prime Minister whether or not it is the intention of the government to respond to the request of the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities and involve the cities in the planning, co-ordination and selection processes with regard to local initiative programs?

• (2:20 p.m.)

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, discussions have begun with the provinces in connection with this program. The exact role of the municipalities very often depends on the wishes of the provinces in this regard.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. When does the government intend to indicate precisely the criteria for the distribution among the provinces of the $100 million under the LIP program and whether or not Indian reserves qualify in much the same way as municipalities?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, certainly Indian reserves are eligible to apply under the local initiatives program. I expect to be able to make a statement on Wednesday about the criteria in regard to the program and the exact application form.

TRADE

UNITED STATES DISC PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATIONS FOR WITHDRAWAL AS PART OF MULTILATERAL AGREEMENT

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. As there is no evidence that the DISC program has been discussed by the Group of Ten as part of a package agreement on trade and currency reform, has the government brought any pressure to bear to have the withdrawal of this program included as part of a multilateral agreement?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to indicate that objections to the DISC program were raised at the meeting of deputies of the Group of Ten and, furthermore, we have made submissions to the United States with respect to our disagreeing with the principles of the DISC program.

Mr. Hees: Is it the opinion of the minister from the talks he has had and the information he has that there is a good chance the DISC program may be withdrawn as part of a multilateral agreement?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have some doubt whether the question is in order in those terms. The hon. member is inviting the minister to express an opinion. Perhaps the question might be rephrased.

Mr. Hees: Has there been any indication from the discussions that have taken place in the Group of Ten that the DISC program may be withdrawn as part of a multilateral agreement?

Mr. Benson: There has not even been an indication that the DISC program will be approved by the U.S. Senate.

Inquiries of the Ministry

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

DEVELOPMENT OF INCOMES POLICY—INQUIRY AS TO DISCUSSIONS WITH BUSINESS AND LABOUR LEADERS—PROVINCIAL PARTICIPATION

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs or any reasonable facsimile I will ask the Prime Minister whether the government is holding talks with business and labour leaders with regard to the development of an incomes policy and, if so, will any such proposals involve, include, or require provincial participation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Not at this time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Baldwin: Can the Prime Minister indicate whether the Prices and Incomes Commission will shortly be making a statement with regard to the development of an incomes policy in Canada in light of the United States experience and, if so, at that time will the commission be publishing its research into the causes of inflation in Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We will now go from Peace River to Battle River.

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYMENT PROGRAM—PARTICIPATION OF MUNICIPALITIES IN DISCUSSION OF SPECIFIC WINTER WORKS PROJECTS

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration is supplementary to the other questions concerning winter works. Will the municipalities be invited to participate in any meetings to discuss specific winter works projects and, if so, has this been made clear to the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think my earlier answer covered this. The nature of the eventual participation may vary from province to province depending upon our discussions with the provinces.

Mr. Downey: Mr. Speaker, my question was more direct than that. Has correspondence been sent to the federation to give them any direction in this regard?

Mr. Lang: I believe that to this point our main contacts have been with the provinces, but I will be glad to check whether there has been anything in addition.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—NUMBER OF JOBS TO BE CREATED

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. How many jobs are intended to be created this winter by the local initiatives program known as LIP?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure whether this question is in order. Perhaps the minister might reply to the extent that the rules allow him to do so. As the hon.

member knows, he is asking for what I consider to be statistical information, and asked in those terms the question should not be allowed. Perhaps the hon. member might like to phrase it in some other way.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Mr. Ryan: Would the minister advise the House whether the provinces will be participating in the administration of LIP and can he state the number of anticipated jobs that the government has in mind?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): The objective, Mr. Speaker, is to create as many jobs as possible and the criteria will be so directed. In the case of those parts of the program relating to municipalities, of course the provinces have a role to play.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Since the Opportunity for Youth program was a fiasco and considering the numerous complaints coming from all parts of Canada—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question cannot be put in those terms. It is based on premises that might not be acceptable. In any event, it should be asked in a direct manner and not in the form of an argument.

Mr. Rondeau: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Would it be the Prime Minister's intention to appoint another Secretary of State soon?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED AMCHITKA NUCLEAR TEST—DISTRIBUTION OF HOUSE OF COMMONS RESOLUTION AT UNITED NATIONS

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister tell the House whether Canada's ambassador at the United Nations had distributed copies of the resolution which was endorsed recently by all parties in this House urging a cessation of underground nuclear testing and particularly the cancellation of the Amchitka blast?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have seen that the United States administration is being made aware of the action of this House. We also know that the representatives of the various countries accredited to Canada have access to this document and will be transmitting it to their governments. I do not think it would be appropriate at this time for the representative of Canada at the United Nations to take the action suggested by the hon. member. It may be, however, that we will have an opportunity during the debate on this matter to draw attention to what was a very welcome action on the part of the House of Commons.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR REFERENCE OF ANNUAL REPORT OF COMMISSION TO STANDING COMMITTEE ON LABOUR, MANPOWER AND IMMIGRATION

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I have a question for the Minister of Labour, Mr. Speaker. In view of the complaints regarding the processing of unemployment insurance claims, would the minister refer the annual report of the Unemployment Insurance Commission to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration so that members of all parties in the House may question members of the commission regarding its administrative practices? Perhaps the commission might also get some information from members of the House in this regard.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, there will be ample opportunity to question the officers of the Unemployment Insurance Commission when my estimates come before the House. In the meantime, if the hon. gentleman has any specific complaint we will be glad to look at it in the usual prompt fashion.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that there seems to be some doubt as to when the next session of Parliament will commence, would the minister not reconsider the question I put before him? Otherwise we will be into the estimates next spring when it is all over.

TRADE

UNITED STATES IMPORT SURTAX—REMOVAL THROUGH BARGAINING BY CANADA

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs arising out of his remarks on an NBC program in which he is reported to have said:

—what we have been asked to do—bargain our way out of this surcharge—is an inadmissible situation.

Does this mean that the Secretary of State for External Affairs or the Prime Minister or some member of the government has received direct word from the United States administration that Canada must bargain its way out of the surcharge?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the direct question is no, we have not received any such request—

An hon. Member: You are not even communicating.

Mr. Sharp: —from the United States. The question was put to me in the course of the interview as to whether we would be prepared to bargain our way out and I think I gave an answer that the hon. gentleman would agree with.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

AUTHORIZATION FOR MARIJUANA EXPERIMENT—MORATORIUM ON PROSECUTIONS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I have a question for the Minister of Justice, Mr. Speaker. Was an Order in Council passed authorizing payment to students for experimentation in the non-medical use of drugs and, if so, would the minister give the date of that Order in Council and be prepared to file it?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, this question was brought up last week by the hon. member and by the hon. member for the Yukon. With respect to both the growing of marijuana at the experimental farm in Ottawa and the experiments being conducted at the University of Calgary, it is my information that both of these matters are being carried out under the authority of regulations made pursuant to section 12 of the Narcotic Control Act and licences issued by the Department of National Health and Welfare.

An hon. Member: Eldon wants to take a trip.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I am interested in finding out when that Order in Council was passed and whether or not it was passed as a second thought. Since we are now paying young people to experiment in the non-medical use of drugs, is the Minister of Justice now anticipating, so that there will not be discrimination between one class of young people and another, introducing a moratorium on prosecutions for the possession or use of marijuana?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, there will be no moratorium. These licences were issued for purposes of research and are valid within the terms of the regulations. The licence to the University of Calgary was issued on September 21 and the licence to the Central Experimental Farm was issued on May 19.

Mr. Woolliams: Would the Attorney General of Canada advise the House and the people whether he does not consider it rather discriminatory to permit those who are covered by an Order in Council freedom to break the law whereas those who are not covered will be prosecuted?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is asking the Minister of Justice to express an opinion. In those terms the question is hardly in order.

Mr. Baldwin: The minister is an expert in selective lawbreaking.

Mr. Stanfield: In licensed lawbreaking.

LABOUR RELATIONS

BELL CANADA DISPUTE—PERSONAL INTERVENTION BY MINISTER—PRESENT SITUATION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of

Inquiries of the Ministry

Labour. Is the minister prepared to give his personal attention to the labour dispute between Bell Canada and its employees or is he in a position to make a hopeful statement to the House at this time?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the dispute in question is at the conciliation board stage and therefore the walkout of the members of the Traffic Employees Association is completely illegal. It would be in their best interests and in the best interests of industrial relations in general if they were to return to work. I would imagine that unless something unexpected happens over the next few hours, the efforts to arrive at a settlement which are presently going on will be fruitless. I am anticipating that the conciliation board will report some time this week, after which seven days must elapse for a strike to be legal.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister if he is prepared to take steps to speed up the work of the conciliation board?

Mr. Mackasey: I think, Mr. Speaker, that the conciliation board at the present moment is composed of very experienced people. It is headed by Mr. O'Connor. I anticipate, without actually knowing, that if they have not resolved the dispute by this evening they will be making a report within the next day or two.

HEALTH

MEDICARE—REFORMING OF FEDERAL PLAN TO FACILITATE DEVELOPMENT OF COMMUNITY HEALTH SERVICES—IMPROVEMENT OF PREVENTIVE TREATMENT

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The Dean of Medicine of the University of British Columbia has stated that the fee for service payment of doctors developed under medicare is the greatest single obstacle to the development of community health centres. Is the government considering reforming the federal medicare plan in order to facilitate rather than discourage the development of community health services?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the minister can reply to that question briefly he might be given the floor, but it seems to me that the question is in part debate. I doubt whether the question in those terms is in order and I suggest to the hon. member that it is not.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Paproski: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member cannot ask a question about which procedural reservations have been expressed. However, he may put another question or a different question on the same subject.

Mr. Paproski: In light of the fact that Canada spends more than any other country on acute hospital care as opposed to preventive medical treatment, is the government prepared to review with the provinces present programs and spending priorities with a view to correcting this neglect in preventive medical treatment?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker—pardon my voice.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: Cut out that smoking, John.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You had better cut it out, John.

Mr. Munro: That type of review is under way at the present time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: We can hardly hear the minister.

Mr. Crouse: A pack a day takes the voice away.

If so, is there anything the minister can tell the House, because all this silence seems to me to indicate a situation that is far from satisfactory?

Could he tell the House whether his department has taken any action to ensure an adequate supply of feed grains to Quebec farmers this winter in order to avoid not only a scarcity of this commodity but also a possible rise in the cost of feed grains in the east?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there are supplies of feed grain available that could be shipped or at least booked for shipment prior to the freezing of the seaway. Those supplies are at Thunder Bay and there are some supplies of corn in Ontario. I am not sure that we are taking any special measures at this time to make sure that there are large supplies in store.

[Mr. Paproski.]

One of the reasons is that we now have an alternative way of shipping, by rail, the cost of which is very close to the competitive water rate.

FEED GRAINS—PRICES PAID BY EASTERN FARMERS

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I should like to put a supplementary Mr. Speaker.

Could the minister tell this House whether the prices now paid by eastern producers for feed grains are approximately the same as those currently levied at the Lakehead for feed grains of equivalent quality for export, if export there is?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not have the statistics with me, but grain is available at the Great Lakes, of course, to anyone who wants to put it in the storage system for distribution later during the winter season.

FOREIGN OWNERSHIP—INQUIRY AS TO POLICY STATEMENT—REQUEST FOR PUBLICATION OF OFFICIAL STATISTICS

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. How soon is it expected that cabinet consideration of the Gray report will be completed, and when will the right hon. gentleman or someone else in the ministry be making a statement on foreign ownership and investment policy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): As soon as we can, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fairweather: In light of somewhat dramatic indications regarding foreign ownership of Canadian industry, will the government publish at least the official statistics about foreign ownership to assist policy consideration by bodies other than the government?

Mr. Trudeau: We will consider that, Mr. Speaker. If there is anything that can be usefully published we will take it under consideration.

FARM MACHINERY—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO PRAIRIE PROVINCES IN TESTING PROGRAM

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that the three prairie governments are co-operating on a farm machinery testing program, as recommended by Professor Barber, have those three provinces approached the Minister of Agriculture for assistance in this regard? If not, what will his answer be if they do approach him?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we have had a number of discussions about this.

HURRICANES

NOVA SCOTIA—REQUEST BY PROVINCE FOR FINANCIAL AID

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday I directed a question to the Prime Minister respecting the receipt of formal advice from Nova Scotia—I see that the Prime Minister is up to his ears in something else. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. Last Thursday I asked the Prime Minister if he had received any formal request for aid from the province of Nova Scotia to help defray the cost of repairing hurricane damage caused in that province last August. The Prime Minister said he would take the question as notice. I wonder if he has a reply?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I asked for information on this problem and I understand that a group of federal and provincial officials worked together to assess the damage. My information, after getting the hon. member's question, was that at that time there had been no formal request by Nova Scotia for any payment of damage. Whether there has been any request in the last day I cannot say.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, has any request been received from Mr. Robert Nixon of Ontario for assistance to repair the damage that was done to his party on Thursday last?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—CONSULTATION WITH MEMBERS ABOUT PROJECTS IN THEIR RIDINGS

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, I wish to return to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. My question is whether under the Local Initiatives Program members will be actively consulted about projects in their ridings? I ask this, Mr. Speaker, because I understand that some of the same people who ran the Opportunities for Youth program are also going to run this program.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that the hon. member's question is argumentative.

[Later:]

Mr. Penner: Mr. Speaker, I wish to try again with the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and be a little less provocative this time. I ask the minister whether he expects Members of Parliament to be active in finding projects under the Local Initiatives Program and presenting them to him—where there is an evident need in our constituencies?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we will be seeking the advice and assistance of all responsible citizens and leaders in the community, including such people as Members of Parliament, to see that good applications are brought forward. Of course we will be seeking sensible advice from any quarter about the quality of the projects on which we have applications.

FIRST EVIDENCE OF NEWCASTLE DISEASE IN POULTRY

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): Some days ago I directed a question to the Minister of Agriculture relative to the outbreak of Newcastle disease in poultry flocks in southern Ontario. Is the investigation that he promised at that time now complete and, if so, can he make a report to the House?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy that the hon. member asked this question because I understand there is some confusion. If Your Honour will allow me just slightly longer than usual to clear up this confusion, I will try to do so. In June, 1971, Newcastle disease was diagnosed in a flock of chickens in quarantine in Lambton county. This was not reported in the answer that was given the hon. member to question No. 1700, I believe, on the order paper. The reason for that is that it is not the practice to consider animals that are in quarantine to be in the Canadian flock.

Mr. Woolliams: Where the hell are they then?

Mr. Olson: They are not regarded as having entered the Canadian livestock herd or poultry flock until after they are released from quarantine. The flock in question was never released from quarantine and was, in fact, destroyed. This is a common practice not only in Canada but in many other countries. When such birds or animals are destroyed during quarantine, no compensation is paid. The health of animals branch have assured me they are confident there was no spread of this disease from these birds that were in quarantine.

Mr. McCutcheon: Can the minister tell us who in the world would set up a quarantine station right in the heart of the poultry industry in southern Ontario?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—PRIORITY FOR HEADS OF FAMILIES AND HARD-CORE UNEMPLOYED

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): I have a further question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In light of the admission by the government that too much of the Opportunities for Youth program funds went to upper income young people, will heads of families and hard-core unemployed be given highest priority in LIP?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in the development of the criteria for applications we are hoping to ensure that projects which are approved are particularly those which are designed to employ persons presently seeking employment in Canada.

REASONS FOR EXCLUSION OF RESERVE INDIANS FROM LABOUR FORCE SURVEY—INCLUSION IN LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): In view of the fact that the labour force survey, for which the Minister of Manpower and Immigration is responsible jointly with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, excludes Indians living on reserves, will the Minister of Manpower and Immigration explain the reasons for this exclusion?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the tradition of this exclusion from the statistics of Statistics Canada is of very long standing and would take a more detailed explanation than I could give at this time. In our current programs we are attempting to take into consideration the fact of this exclusion in determining the manner in which applications for the local initiatives program are considered.

Mr. Gleave: If the minister is considering this, Mr. Speaker, will he also consider whether the Yukon and Northwest Territories should also be included?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, that this will be as was made clear to the House last week.

ESTABLISHMENT OF POLICY TO STABILIZE COMMERCIAL CORN PRICES

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. I know the minister is aware of the problem and is concerned. Can the minister state if any progress is being made by the government in establishing a policy to stabilize Canadian commercial corn prices and what such a policy might include?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we are prepared, and have been not only for months but for several years, to provide the facilities of the Co-operative Marketing Act to the corn producers. It is essential, of course, that a significant number of those producers representing or having a significant amount of the corn make application.

Mr. Danforth: Has the eastern feed grain agency been advised or instructed or has there been discussion with them to place Ontario corn on the same basis as western grains in regard to movement into the eastern provinces during the winter months?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, there is, I think, a comparable level in relation to the actual cost of transport from Ontario to the Maritime provinces as there is from western Canada to the areas where that feed grain is used.

ACHIEVEMENT OF GREATER UNIFORMITY IN SENTENCES FOR IMPAIRED DRIVING

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): My question is for the Minister of Justice. In view of the fact that penalties for impaired driving vary greatly across the nation, does the minister have any immediate intention to consult with the provincial Attorneys General to see whether more uniformity in sentencing can be achieved?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we are reviewing the question of sentencing as to whether amendments ought to be introduced in the Criminal Code, but entire uniformity will never be achieved as sentencing reflects community attitudes toward various crimes.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

AMENDMENT OF PROVISIONS IN BILL RESPECTING TECHNOLOGICAL CHANGE IN LIGHT OF CONCERN OF BUSINESS AND INDUSTRY

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I have a question for the Prime Minister. Both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour have indicated that changes will be accepted in the labour bill which has now received first reading. However, the Minister of Labour indicated there will be no changes in the technological aspect of the bill and the Prime Minister stated there will be changes in the bill. Is the Prime Minister now prepared to accept changes to the technological aspect in order to give some confidence to the economy as a result of the American surtax and economic policies which have perhaps placed business in jeopardy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe the Minister of Labour made it clear when we introduced the bill for first reading that it was the intention to give all sections of the community an occasion to discuss the pros and cons of the various clauses. The most we can say at this time is that we will study these representations seriously. If some of them call for change, we will consider those clauses and, if they are serious, we will make changes. Otherwise we will not.

Mr. Alexander: In light of the fact that business, industry and manufacturing institutions across the country have certainly shown great fear with regard to the clauses involving technological change, have these pleas been studied by the Prime Minister and the front bench in order to arrive at a definite answer now on whether in fact amendments to these particular clauses will be accepted?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to the Chair that the hon. member is essentially reiterating the question asked in the first instance. The hon. member for Fraser Valley West.

Mr. Alexander: I rise on a point of order. With all due respect, the question is in light of the same type of situation but I am now attempting to find out from the Prime Minister whether as a result of the several hundred submissions the government have had an opportunity to study the impact of these submissions and whether in fact they have now made up their minds in order that the country can be advised as to the government's decision.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has made a ruling on the point made by the the hon. member. If he thinks that there is urgency in his supplementary, he knows an appeal is provided under the rules. He can raise the matter at the time of adjournment.

REQUEST FOR PUBLICATION OF REPORT OF STAFF RELATIONS COMMITTEE—IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Since problems of morale in the Public Service are of long standing, many of them associated with the Public Service Staff Relations Act, and since the minister has had on his desk the report of the Public Service staff relations committee of three since June 15, when does the minister intend to make this report public?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the report referred to by the hon. member is part of work done in connection with cabinet planning of possible proposals in regard to this whole area. Any decisions about the changes that will follow in consequence thereof will be announced when the decisions are known.

Mr. Rose: Since the report is reported to contain recommendations that include the extension of the bargaining process along lines somewhat equivalent to that in the private sector, and also the right to strike under certain circumstances, when does the minister feel that these recommendations, if accepted by the government, are going to be translated into legislation?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to comment on what may or may not be in recommendations, nor try to predict the date upon which a decision will be made.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed, from Friday, October 22, consideration in committee of Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act—Mr. Benson—Mr. Honey in the chair.

The Chairman: Order. House again in committee of the whole on Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act. During Friday's sitting, as the Chair understands it, the committee agreed to consider section 109 at this sitting. Shall section 109 carry?

On clause 1—section 109: Deductions permitted by Individuals.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I suppose one could be pardoned for being a little nervous at this stage, but this is now a brand new part of the ball game. When the ball is actually handed to you and you start up field with it, you do the best you can. I hope that those words are on the record and that they might get back to the people in the riding of Halifax-East Hants in a newsletter or something.

May I first raise for the consideration of the minister at some time early in our discussion two matters. First of all, may I ask him what we will do if he has kindly second thoughts and decides to bring in further amendments. Second, since our scope is limited when it comes to making proposals to the ministry—we can lead them to water but not necessarily make them drink therefrom—would the minister on occasion be good enough to entertain the thought of adjourning the debate on a particular section so that he can have some discussion with his advisers and perhaps listen to some of the good points that are being made from, no doubt, both sides of the House.

Now I have the preliminaries out of the way, I should like to deal with two specific aspects of what, to most Canadians, is the most important part of the new Income Tax Act. I refer to those magic exemptions that taxpayers claim when they sit down quivering and quaking to make their peace with the Minister of National Revenue, usually as close to April 30 as they can possibly get. If there is anything that the Prime Minister and his party will be able to point to, and for which to thump themselves on the back and stick out their chests, I suspect it will be one of two measures. One is increased exemptions and the other, long delayed, will be the changes brought about in the family allowance structure.

I am sure the government will wax as lyrical as one of its members who described this as just about the ultimate in the way that taxation can wage a successful war against poverty. One then is entitled to ask, as I ask now, whether this does represent a major victory in the war on poverty and whether there is any ammunition being fired, or is the government simply making loud noises with blank cartridges? It is true that compared to the present exemptions the ones proposed by this section are higher, and from that standpoint one can say that the burden on those on lower incomes is reduced. But it is also true—and I think we have to ask ourselves what is a more appropriate figure—that the proposed figures do not even restore those with lower incomes to the position in which they were in 1949. Reflect on that, Mr. Chairman. We can regard 1949 as perhaps the last vintage Liberal year in Canada. There was a high rate of employment. Mr. King had gone off to seek solace in the shadows at Kingsmere and Mr. St. Laurent was in charge. All was well in the best of all possible Canadian worlds.

If one were to translate the happy tranquility of 1949, following the Liberal's return to power with a good number of supporters and the economy in good shape, in terms of today, one would find that the personal exemptions should be at least $1,700 for a single person and $3,400 for a married couple, slightly above the levels we are considering here. There is a further aspect to this. I hope one does not look upon tax reform simply as a matter of trying to adjust from one year to the next in order to take care of any cost of living increase, inflation or suchlike. We have a number of reports which indicate that the poor pay up to 50 per cent of their income in taxes, directly or indirectly, whereas people higher up the scale earning over $10,000 per year pay roughly a third or about 37 per cent to 38 per cent. In other words, more than half of the dollar a poor man receives goes to some government in some form of taxation. At the more affluent level, only 37 cents of the dollar is paid in taxes.

We have missed the boat in respect of exemptions. We have made some effort to take into account the increased cost of living and inflation, but we have not reached a point of equity. We can consider the rich and the poor and say they are paying 20 per cent, 30 per cent or 40 per cent, whatever it is, and therefore carry their share of the weight, but they do not pay one tittle more. I hope when we attempt to reform our tax system the next time, it will be done by a Conservative administration and, therefore, with some heart. That is one of the things we are after.

A report was received today from the National Pensioners and Senior Citizens Federation at Fort Macleod, Alberta, and I think I should put on the record one of its resolutions. It is:

> Resolved, that we petition the federal government to increase the amount of income tax exemption for senior citizens to $3,000 for single people and $4,500 for married couples.

The amount we are to give a single person as a basic exemption, with the additional $650, is $2,150.

When looking at tax reform we should consider exemptions from the point of view of fairness. The rich should pay the same percentage as the poor instead of the poor having to pay a disproportionate amount. The exemptions should also be tied to the cost of living and, perhaps some day, to the poverty level. The figures presented to us do not represent an official poverty level of the Department of National Health and Welfare, or an official level as indicated two or three years ago by the Economic Council of Canada.

A tax credit system might have been a much more equitable way of solving this problem. It would have been more flexible and could take into account those factors to which I have referred. We are faced with a number of anomalies. The Minister of National Health and Welfare indicated in announcing his family income security plan that he feels it costs as much to raise a child of 12 years of age, but the Minister of Finance has indicated that he feels the exemption should be related to age 16. There is a lack of consistency on the part of government in this matter of exemptions, just as there is in respect of the poverty level in Canada. There are many advantages to a tax credit system but in my opening 20 minute statement I cannot go into all the details.

A committee of the House of Commons dealing with this matter noted that while the tax credit approach has a great deal to commend it in terms of being adjustable from time to time without a restructuring of the rate schedule, the exemption procedure does have the advantage of retaining a method to which individual taxpayers are now accustomed. I suppose the best that can be said for that argument is that one is better off with the punches of Cassius Clay, knowing how hard they are, than with the punches of someone else about which you know nothing.

My second point relates to another class of people scattered throughout Canada. This group is not represented and has not presented any petition regarding their tax position. I think their position is worse under the so-called reform bill than it was under the old law. I refer to those involved in common-law marriages. The law does nothing for these people. Let me quote from the Canadian Master Tax Guide, 1970, as prepared by the C C H Canadian Limited, at page 219:

A common-law wife is not considered a spouse and no marital exemption may be claimed on her account. However, if the taxpayer supports a child in a self-contained domestic establishment and the common-law wife acts as a housekeeper, he could claim a $2,000 exemption on account of the child—

An additional deduction can be claimed by reason of the fact that the common-law wife is a full-time servant. Apparently that is her classification. If you think that is puritanical you should consider the plight of the poor lady under this new legislation. For a time I thought she would be covered by clause 109(1)(b) which deals with individuals not entitled to deductions because of an unmarried status, or being married but not supporting or living with a spouse. However, as I read the clause I found that it really did not refer to a common-law spouse but rather is an encouragement to people to live in communes. Apparently you can live in this way and have the advantage of the higher exemption as well as the value of a lady's company. After reading it again I became totally confused, until I finally looked at the three magic words in the marginal note which are "Wholly dependant persons". I knew then we were attempting to do something for the people whose parents are living with them.

I suggest we should have made a step in the direction of helping these people who live in common-law relationships. I see the minister has left and we are to be blessed with his parliamentary secretary and the Liberal whip. I hope they will give some thought to an amendment giving a common-law spouse some protection. I suppose I have just about used my time at this stage, but I felt I should say something in respect of these people who are not represented by any organization. It may sound strange for a Conservative to stand up and argue in favour of those who have not favoured the sanctity of marriage, but we do have an obligation to present their cause when no one else does it for them.

The only hope I see can be found in clause 63 in respect of child care deductions. Perhaps this can be construed in such a way that a woman with a child in a common-law union could in some way charge a baby sitting fee. If a figure could be set, perhaps an exemption would be allowed; but I am not sure the law is that generous. Perhaps a woman in this situation should set up a day nursery in the back yard to look after her own children and other children in the neighbourhood. She might be better off doing this than she is now under the present tax laws. Apart from a very technical approach such as I have taken, I do not think any help is offered these people.

So I do strike a note for these people. I do not know how many there are. I do not know whether there are thousands in society, but sometimes the common law relationship is the easy way out for many people who may not look upon the sanctity of marriage as you, Mr. Chairman, I and others in this Chamber do. I hope something can be done for these people, and that the parliamentary secretary will be attentive to the point I make so that another look may be given at this particular matter.

As you probably have gathered, Mr. Chairman, one can range over the gamut in speaking of the particularities of the income tax system and whether the formula we use is correct,—I say it is incorrect—whether all the classes are covered in a comprehensive manner or whether other people should be covered. I know that, as a result of the strictures upon us concerning what we can or cannot do, one is somewhat tied down, but at least one can speak up where there are injustices. I hope the parliamentary secretary will take those I have mentioned into account.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, this proposed new section 109 we are now discussing is the one which provides a new level of personal exemptions with regard to income tax. It is the section that would raise the level for single taxpayers from $1,000 to $1,500 and for married taxpayers from $2,000 to $2,850. The section also deals with the matter of exemptions for children, nieces, nephews, aunts, uncles and other dependents. In addition it increases the exemption that is allowed to persons 65 years of age and over from $500 to $650. In that respect it not only provides the increase I have just indicated but provides that this will apply to all persons 65 years and over, whereas this has not been the case since old age security got down to the point where it was paid at age 65. Therefore, this is a pretty important section with which we are dealing. I think it is all the more important when one realizes there have been no changes in the exemption levels since 1949, 22 years ago. As we said repeatedly during the debate on second reading and during the general debate on clause 1, we do not think it is good enough to raise the exemption levels by such small amounts after 22 years in view of what has happened to the cost of living during that period of time.

We feel that at the very least these exemption levels should be $2,000 single and $4,000 married. There are a number of instances in which the exemption levels might even be higher. However, before I get into a plea to raise the exemption levels, I wish we could engage either the minister or the parliamentary secretary in a discussion about tax credits rather than exemption levels, as a way of dealing with this matter. The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants made reference to this in the remarks he just made. The other day the hon. member for Cardigan proposed a rather ingenious device, which if I may say so struck me as comparable to the concept of tax credits. I do not think I am being unfair to the hon. member for Cardigan when I say he feels these fixed exemption levels, arbitrary as they are, do not take into account the cost of living needs of the people in the lower bracket, people with large families, older people and so on. As I say, rather than our having a long list of set speeches, in view of the fact that we are in committee of the whole where we can speak as often as we want and have back and forth discussions, I wish the parliamentary secretary, since he is here on behalf of the minister at this time, would get into this discussion.

I know this matter has been discussed at length before the standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. I know that the committee considered all the arguments and that the majority report of that committee came down for exemption levels rather than a system of tax credits. Surely, however, it is clear that any system of tax exemptions tends to give the greater benefit to those in the upper and higher brackets. Any system of tax exemptions makes it impossible to meet the kind of special need the hon. member for Cardigan spoke about the other day. One can see this in the effect of the figures that are before us at the present time. I have before me a table that has been worked out showing what the adjusted rates do to people of various income levels. A single person whose gross income was $2,000 when the exemption level was $1,000 had to pay a tax of $109. When the exemption level becomes $1,500 he will pay only $75. This is fine. It is a reduction, but it is a reduction of only $34. On the other hand, a single person with an income of $25,000 under the $1,000 exemption paid $8,945 whereas with the $1,500 exemption level he will pay only $8,468 which is a saving of $297.

I submit that is a very good example of what the exemption level method of dealing with this matter does. It provides a few dollars to those in the lower brackets and provides ever so much more for those in the upper brackets. The table I have in front of me gives the figures for various other income levels, but I need not put them all on the record. The higher the income the more one saves under the exemption method level. On the other hand, by a tax credit system it is possible, as Carter shows, to treat all income from the first dollar as taxable, and to then set a figure such that persons below that figure get a credit that offsets the tax charged against them and therefore pay no tax at all. If in order to bring this thing to a head later on we have to move an amendment to raise the exemption levels to $2,000 and $4,000, I am prepared to do so. I can see procedural troubles, but we will worry about them when they arise. But I would rather not move that kind of amendment because it would only exaggerate the very thing about which I am complaining.

Therefore, I wish that instead we could persuade the government to accept a system of tax credits. The government argued before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and that committee contended in its report that you can achieve the same thing if at the time you raise your exemption levels you adjust the rates. It does not work out that way. The figures that I have given show that it is just about impossible to adjust the rates in a manner that will not be of tremendous benefit to those at the top. But if we can get started with a tax credit system, we could then provide that single persons below a $2,000 income and married persons below a $4,000 income pay no tax regardless of what the calculations might charge against them.

In the same way, this could be applied with respect to children, especially children who make up a large family. You cannot really be fair under this exemption system because the wealthy get more exemptions when they have more children, although I have been told that the wealthy do not have more children. At any rate, they do get quite a bit more in this way and the poorer families that may have more children get precious little out of the exemption system. The same thing applies to the extra exemption for person 65 years of age and over. I welcome the fact that the level has been raised to $650. As a matter of fact, I still think the government should make it retroactive to January 1, 1971, and I welcome the fact that it will now apply to all persons 65 years of age or over whether or not they are drawing old age security. But here again, you introduce the same element of unfairness because the very wealthy person who gets old age security at the age of 65 will receive an additional $960 a year, $650 of that being non taxable, which is quite a bonanza to that person but it is not much of a bonanza to older people on lower incomes.

Again, this could be taken care of quite easily by having a system of tax credits as I suggested, one system of tax credits for single persons and families who are of working age, a system of tax credits for children, and a special system of tax credits for older people. I agree with the plea that has been made by the pensioners organization as reported a moment ago by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants. I put on the record myself that $3,000 for a single person and $4,500 for a married couple is a reasonable figure for senior citizens, but you do not need that for the very wealthy person. What you need is to guarantee that no older person who has an income of $3,000 a year will have any of that taken away in tax. Go ahead and tax the wealthy, whether they are 65, 70 or 75. There are not many up there but there are some. But with respect to those who really need some consideration, the best way to give it is by a system of tax credits.

I have already said, but perhaps I might repeat it, that we would have to have different sets of credits for different categories—one credit for single and married working people, another credit for children, and a special credit for people of a certain age. I suggest that this is a way that would be much more fair than the exemption level system. I know that one of the replies from the government side of the House is that people do not understand the tax credit system, that people like the idea of knowing that there is $1,000 or $2,000 or whatever you have that is tax free, but they would very soon understand it once the system came into effect.

So, Mr. Chairman, I welcome the contribution made in this area the other day by the hon. member for Cardigan and I welcome the contribution made just now by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants. Now, I should like to hear from the government side on this issue. Later on if we get nowhere, I am prepared to move that the exemption levels be raised to $2,000 and $4,000, but if we do that without adjusting the rates we will provide more for those in the upper income brackets. I hope that fairly soon we will hear from the government side with respect to the whole question of tax credits which I think is a better way of establishing equity in a tax system than the exemption level system that is being perpetuated in this bill.

Mr. Baldwin: I rise on a question of privilege. I think it is a matter which I have to bring to the attention of this House as soon as I can. I will raise it again tomorrow probably when Mr. Speaker is in the Chair. There is a Canadian Press story in today's Citizen which is headed "Tax Bill Delays Close of Session". Included in the story is this sentence:

Informants said the government has offered the opposition a week or two extra Christmas holidays if there is a fast completion of the tax legislation.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The reporter must have been smoking government marijuana.

Mr. Baldwin: Government members appear to be on a perpetual holiday. However, I will not deal with that. But I want to say that this is an unmitigated lie if it is, in fact, a statement made by an informant in the government. I am sure my friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will bear me out when I say that at the various House leaders' meetings which we have had with regard to this matter, the House leaders were interested in working out an orderly way of dealing with this bill. As usual, the government got itself in a mess in its legislative program, and we came up with a series of proposals which would permit us to contest the repugnant parts of the bill and deal with the others in due course. It was a suggestion for the orderly treatment of the bill which formed the basis of discussion. This is the kind of thing which makes it exceedingly difficult to work out programs. We offer our help to get the government out of the mess and then we are faced with a situation of this kind. I am raising the matter now because it is the first opportunity. I may have an opportunity to raise it again with Mr. Speaker in the chair tomorrow.

The Chairman: I take it the hon. member for Peace River, as he indicated, was giving advance notice of a question of privilege he may or may not wish to raise when His Honour is in the chair. Of course, that is recorded.

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Chairman, I listened very attentively to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, whose diligence and sincerity everyone in this Parliament appreciates, but one wonders whether, in his keen desire to help, he does not get mixed up and is unable to tell us from what source that help will come. From the remarks to which I listened I gathered that, first, he was criticising the government for not bringing in a system of tax credits, particularly for those Canadians in the lower income brackets. Through you, Mr. Chairman, may I respectfully point out to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that the reason for the omission of the tax credit system is obvious. A large number of the members of this House sat for many months, not just two or three months, studying the white paper and the tax bill presented by the government, then brought in a recommendation that tax credits were not appropriate to our Canadian tax system. The Committee recommended that, instead of using tax credits, we should use tax exemptions, which is what the government has done in this bill.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Really, Mr. Chairman, I think that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre should be a bit more fair. He should tell the people of Canada that the reason the government is not bringing in tax credits is that specialists in the field, who have examined this question very closely, have recommended that tax credits not be used but that tax exemptions be used instead.

Mr. McCutcheon: Do you only do what your specialists tell you to do?

Mr. Whicher: In fact, in this particular instance, the government has done what the specialists of the Conservative party recommended, because every one of them recommended that there be tax exemptions and not tax credits. So I say to the hon. member, next time don't put your foot in your mouth quite so far.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said he would introduce some sort of amendment to raise the tax exemptions to $2,000 for single people and $4,000 for married couples. As you know, Mr. Chairman, the existing exemption for a single person is $1,000. I do not always agree with the government, but in this instance I believe that the government quite rightly proposes that the exemption be raised from $1,000 to $1,500. If the hon. member were fair, he would tell the people of Canada that this change is going to cost the Minister of National Revenue exactly $500 million in tax revenues, because every $100 of exemption costs the government $100 million. This exemption, within a matter of a few dollars, will cost half a billion dollars.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre could quite rightly ask the government, "Where are you going to get this half billion dollars"? A responsible government has a duty to reply, and I assume the Minister of Finance or his parliamentary secretary would say, "We are going to get the money by initiating a capital gains tax in Canada." I point out that a capital gains tax has been recommended by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and by many other people, including the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs which considered this matter for many months. But what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre does not tell us is where the money would be obtained to make up the loss in revenue if his recommendation were implemented to increase the exemption for single people from $1,500 to $2,000. Mr. Chairman, you do not have to take my word for this. You do not have to take the word of any member of this House. Just look up the facts and figures that can be obtained from any library in Canada and you will find that raising the exemption from $1,500 to $2,000 will cost a further half billion dollars.

Mr. McCutcheon: That isn't correct.

Mr. Whicher: That is absolutely true. Are you doubting my word?

Mr. McCutcheon: I think your figure is too high.

Mr. Whicher: Are you doubting my word? I understand that in this House you either put up or shut up.

Mr. Hees: Oh, come off it.

Mr. Whicher: Don't you open that mouth of yours, George. I shut it one night, you may remember.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Whicher: I don't mind professionals, Mr. Chairman, but these amateurs!

The Deputy Chairman: I think the discussion is very interesting, but I make a plea to all hon. members to direct their contributions to the Chair.

Mr. Whicher: In any event, from the figures I have read, increasing the exemption from $1,500 to $2,000 for single people, and from $2,000 to $4,000 for married couples, will cost in the general area of half a billion dollars, and I believe that that figure is too low, if anything. We all know how sincere is the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. As I told him the other day, if he had happened to live at the same time as our Lord was on earth there would have been 13 disciples instead of 12, because he wants to give things away. If he is absolutely sincere, then he will tell this House where he would get the extra half billion dollars.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whicher: Of course, he does say, "We will tax the rich." If he carries his sincerity as far as I hope he does, then he will tell us how many rich people there are in Canada. I tell you, Mr. Chairman, there are very few rich persons in Canada. Every year several hundred of them are leaving Canada because they are being taxed too much now. If you don't believe me ask some of our honourable friends from Alberta, and they will explain the situation to those who do not understand. When the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre suggests that a single person making $25,000 a year will get more through a tax exemption than he will through a tax credit, again if he is fair he will tell us how many single people there are in Canada making $25,000 a year. I would say there are very few indeed. So, so far as the exemption situation is concerned, I think the government has brought forward a very fair bill.

I suggest that the government, in proposing an exemption of $650 for those who are 65, can be very proud because we know that no country in the world has given such exemptions to people of that age. We are giving higher exemptions to, and taking less taxes from, people at age 65 who are getting the old age pension, than any other country in the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whicher: Of course, we would like to be able to establish higher exemptions, perhaps up to $10,000. Why stop at $2,000 for single people and $4,000 for married people? The fact is that somebody has to pay taxes to provide the benefits that we enjoy. Therefore, without prolonging my remarks further, I simply say that while all of us wish the exemption could be more than $1,500, we must consider the facts in this day and age when more benefits are coming from governments, whether federal or provincial, when governments are producing more costly programs, such as medicare, hospital services, higher old age pensions and higher children's allowances. Taking all this into account, I would say an exemption of $1,500 is a good start and will benefit many people in Canada.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Mr. Downey: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Bruce who just spoke made some very interesting comments on the tax bill and the amount of revenue that the exemptions are going to cost the federal treasury. However, I think it is difficult to enter into this type of calculation without reference to the fiscal dividends which accrue to governments as a result of inflation. A number of hon. members were members of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs which studied the bill. It became evident at these hearings that it was possible to reduce the tax rate and still increase the total revenue of the government as a result of inflation. I say that is possibly what is happening at the present time.

[The Deputy Chairman.]

If there are any attractive features in this 707-page bill, they lie in the fields of personal income tax and personal exemptions. I think we can safely say that the increase in personal exemptions and the increased limits on contributions to pension plans do little more than reflect the erosion in the value of the dollar over the years. The last time the tax exemptions were raised was in 1949, so this change is long overdue. The reduction in the top combined rates to 61.1 per cent affects few people. Perhaps it is unrealistic to accept the stated rates when several provinces already levy taxes at rates above the standard 30 per cent used in arriving at the combined level of provincial and federal rates referred to in the tax summary.

To return to the matter of the fiscal dividends, we know that in past years Canada's rate of inflation has been as high as 6 per cent and rarely lower than 3 per cent.

Mr. Mahoney: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: The hon. parliamentary secretary rises on a point of order.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, it was my understanding that the arrangements made between party leaders, and announced in the House by the President of the Privy Council on Friday, were to the effect that remarks would be strictly relevant to the proposed sections of the act under consideration, sections 109 and 110. The general economy, trends in inflation, and rates schedules are not mentioned, so I was wondering when the hon. member was going to relate his remarks to the particular section under consideration.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): They are all tied in.

Mr. Downey: Mr. Chairman, that is a very interesting comment made by the parliamentary secretary. Was he not sitting here a few minutes ago when the hon. member for Bruce made his remarks? Why was he not on his feet then? He was too busy applauding, but the relevance of those remarks was very difficult to understand indeed.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It will take that much longer, Pat. Just be quiet.

Mr. Downey: If I may refer to the matter of fiscal dividends that accrue to governments by allowing the inflation rate to continue—

The Chairman: Order, please. With all respect to the hon. member for Battle River, I did wonder if he was not going a bit beyond section 109 which is presently before the committee. If I am in error I know he will point out where I err, but I think we are essentially dealing, as the heading indicates, with the computation of taxable income. The section sets out the various exemptions of people who qualify and so on. I would invite the hon. member to confine his remarks within the four corners of section 109.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): With the greatest respect, Mr. Chairman, may I point out that when we are discussing personal income, certain exemptions are set out and the balance of income is subject to tax on the basis of rates. If the hon. member wishes to comment on the adequacy or inadequacy of the exemption, surely he is within his rights to refer perhaps to the attitude of the government in wanting to continue, as it does, the system of a general flat rate. The flat exemption results in an inflationary bonus for the government; it is as simple as that and surely reference can be made to it. I agree that we are somewhat more limited but not as strictly as suggested by the parliamentary secretary. If we are to proceed in this way, it will be a long haul to complete the discussion of these sections.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, perhaps there is a disposition on the part of members of the opposition, since they cannot deal with exemptions without dealing with rates, to extend the purview of the current debate to include section 117 which does cover rates. Perhaps we cannot deal with one without the other. Is that the disposition?

The Chairman: I want to be as helpful as possible, and certainly do not want to restrict hon. members. I agree in essence with the hon. member for Edmonton West, although it is a matter of degree. I think the hon. member will recognize that, although his remarks may be relative, they might be considered to be a bit outside the four corners of the section; they must be relevant. The hon. member for Battle River.

Mr. Downey: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I am happy that you bore with me through the preamble. As the hon. member for Edmonton West pointed out, there is a very close association between the rates and the personal income tax section of the bill.

I wanted to comment on the surtax which has been repealed. I do not think anyone can quarrel with that, but when we look at it we see that the surtax was really not a tax on income but a tax on a tax. This affects income retention for only a very few people who were, in practical terms, paying a maximum of 1½ per cent. Very few Canadian Taxpayers will find their income increased as a result of this change because the tax amounted to only about one-third of one per cent or about $3 for every $1,000 of earned income. Bearing in mind the present rate of inflation, if individuals do not have an increase in earnings in the next three weeks, they will be back where they started before the surtax was removed. This is quite an accurate calculation of what this means to the economy in terms of real dollars.

Elasticity is a word which becomes familiar when we speak of the tax structure and personal income tax rates. I suggest that the new tax rates have been geared to an even greater extent to the concept of progressive income tax rates. This results in an increase and not a decrease in the tax payable.

Let me take an example from the lower income brackets. A single person earning $1,700 a year would, under the present tax system, claim exemptions of $1,100 and pay $70 tax on his taxable income of $600. If his income rises to $1,800, his taxable income is $700 and he pays $81 in tax. Thus, although his income has risen by 6 per cent, his tax has increased by 17 per cent. It will be seen that under the new tax legislation, every 10 per cent increase in income in similar circumstances is accompanied by an 18 per cent increase in taxes. The tax increase under the new bill represents a higher ratio with respect to the proportion of take-home pay than was the case under the old legislation.

I do not wish to go much further at this point than merely point out these anomalies in connection with tax rates. The hon. member for Lambton-Kent, in directing a question during the question period to the Minister of Agriculture, referred to the fact that a poultry quarantine station had been set up in the middle of the poultry district of southern Ontario. It seems to me that the type of mentality that was responsible for that has manifested itself in the ministry that is responsible for taxation.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Chairman, my intervention will be brief and, I hope, specific in form. I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre who argues, and has argued for years, that exemptions are too low and that we are taxing people at the poverty level. He says that by so doing we compound the problem of poverty, something that Economic Council reports have pointed out over and over again. As I say, we compound the problem of poverty by adding an additional burden of tax on those who are poor. We realize that the government has difficulty in raising money. Nevertheless, we on this side of the House have suggested how the government might accomplish its aim of greater revenues for the treasury which are necessary in order to provide those benefits which we feel must be provided for an enlightened and progressive country.

The hon. member for Bruce is an interesting and able speaker and likes to keep an argument going. He asked pointedly from what source the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre thinks all this extra money will come. Instead of answering, may I ask this: From what source did the $1 billion that the Minister of Finance is to make available in connection with winter works, and so on, come? His program calls for $1 billion in benefits. Without going into any great preamble, may I say that we know the source of this money which is to be used for winter works relief. It will come from the people who are paying taxes now; that is where the money will come from, even though the government may borrow the money in the beginning. You see, with taxes being paid on incomes of $5,000 a year and even less, there is little difference between the working poor who are taxed and welfare recipients who receive those taxes. So, by depriving one group of society we are encouraging those who receive low incomes and those who receive welfare to argue about their respective situations, because both groups are in deprived circumstances. I had not intended speaking on this point and have raised it only by way of preamble.

I had intended referring to an anomaly in the former tax law which encouraged the administrators of the act, so to speak, to take a moral position. My remarks will be in a similar vein to those that were made a few moments ago by the hon. member for Halifax East-Hants. Perhaps I could most efficiently deal with my concern by reading a series of letters exchanged between the Minister of Finance and myself. They concern the fact that a person who has been ordered by the court to support an illegitimate child not domiciled with him received no recognition under the previous act of the amount spent. This matter may or may not have been corrected in the new legislation. I am referring to subsection (5) of section 109, the "partial dependency" subsection.

May I be permitted to quote from a series of three letters, the first one being dated December 3, 1968. I should say, before I begin, that I am not speaking in favour of illegitimacy. I feel that the law itself should take a neutral position on this matter. At the moment it does not. May I quote from my letter to the Minister of Finance of December 3, 1968? It reads in part:

This concerns the payment of support and maintenance of a child not domiciled under the same roof as the person who is required to supply this support and maintenance. My constituent has written me stating that these payments have been disallowed as a deduction for income tax purposes.

I would appreciate it if you would tell me if the Income Tax Act has been fairly imposed in this case. If the Income Tax Act makes no provision for such a deduction it appears to me that some amendment should be considered so that anomalies such as this might be overcome. Certainly the man who is required to pay this type of support and is doing so is fulfilling the obligations the Court placed upon him and does not have the use of this money for his own living expenses. It seems unfair to me that anyone should be additionally punished by the failure of the Income Tax Act to recognize the partial dependency of the child in question.

I asked the minister to write and provide me with some information. Actually, my letter was preceded by a letter dated September 8 which the minister wrote to my constituent. The second paragraph reads:

Under the present laws, a taxpayer may deduct from his income for the year only those amounts expended for a child who, during that year, was wholly dependent upon him for support. A request such as yours would require an amendment to the Income Tax Act—

I might add that the preceding paragraph related to deductions for tax purposes with respect to payments made by the putative father of an illegitimate child.

Following the letter I wrote and the information I received, I again wrote to the Minister of Finance. My letter said in part that the minister had directed me to look at a certain section of the act, and I suggested that we ought to delete the phrase "of the marriage" where it appears twice in the section, since this wording seems to work against the particular individual concerned. I went on to say in the letter I wrote to the Minister of Finance, dated January 20, 1969, as follows:

This, then, would place my constituent in a position equivalent to married couples not living together who are making payments for child maintenance, or payments required by the court under conditions of separation and divorce.

My constituent . . . has been ordered by the court to pay out for the maintenance of an illegitimate child the sum of $3,840 over a period of 16 years. Because of present tax regulations and rates, he is additionally assessed $1,099.20 for his indiscretion. This seems markedly punitive to me and I would be pleased if you would consider this regulation during the current tax review.

We are now considering the tax review legislation in committee of the whole. I think the argument is quite clear. In this instance, the drafters of the law are taking a moral stand. The person who is required to pay for the support is really, except in the legal and spiritual obligations of marriage, in the same position as any other parent supporting or partially supporting a child. He is entitled to deduct this amount. I do not see any reason, in the light of the situation of the constituent I have just described, why this deduction privilege should not also apply in the case of an illegitimate child or a court order payment for support of an illegitimate child. There may be thousands of cases like this across Canada.

I am not suggesting that the court has no right to make an order for support. If the support is given, the money is not for the use of the father or mother, depending on which way it works. I would appreciate it if the experts of the tax department and the parliamentary secretary would consider this matter carefully. It may not be a great thing, but the fact that the tax law should be blind as far as this moral or ethical question is concerned, is a valid point. Because they are reasonable men, I hope they will look into this.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I am delighted to have the opportunity to accept the invitation extended earlier from across the way to comment at least on some of the points raised. Perhaps I should deal first with the point raised by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West.

The proposed section 109(5) of the new act is very much the same as section 26(6) of the present act. It is quite possible that the parent of an illegitimate child who does not have direct care or custody of that child could qualify for all or part of the exemption that is attributable to that child, depending on establishing the relative degree of support which he affords it. I think on reflection the hon. member will agree that the amount of money which a parent pays for the care and support of his own child in his own household, one who is acknowledged and legitimate, is not available to spend for other purposes. That parent is in precisely the same position as the parent of an illegitimate child.

As I understand the hon. member's argument, he thinks that moneys paid under a court order in this situation should be a form of deduction in taxable income. I suppose if one afforded that privilege to the parent of an illegitimate child, one could not discriminate or make a moral judgment by denying it to the parent of a legitimate child. It would be a very worth-while tax avoidance ploy for parents to get maintenance orders from judges so that they could deduct the amounts paid under those maintenance orders rather than accept the exemption granted under the act. The parent of an illegitimate child in the present circumstances is entitled to claim an exemption or partial exemption, depending on the extent to which he is supporting the child. I refer the hon. member to section 109(5).

I now wish to deal with the main thrust of the arguments raised by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre regarding the adequacy in the increase in exemptions. We must acknowledge that if the $1,000 exemption was adequate in 1949, then certainly it is not adequate in 1971 and will not be adequate in 1972. However, the arithmetic application of the cost of living index to those exemptions is an oversimplification. It fails to take into account many social programs such as medicare, hospitalization and family allowances which have been established and/or improved over the years. They have relieved all Canadians, including low income Canadians, of some of the demands on their personal resources that existed in 1949.

Frankly, I do not think the simple application of the cost of living index is a persuasive argument to support any specific exemption that you may decide upon. We have higher exemptions. This will remove about one million Canadians from the tax rolls and reduce taxes for five million others. While I am sure nothing would make the government happier than to be able to offer the tax paying public even more generous exemptions than those contained in Bill C-259, these were settled upon after a great deal of thought had been given to all the implications, both from the point of view of revenue as well as the taxpayers. They are certainly not inadequate exemptions.

The tax credit system is certainly something that has some merit. However, if there is a country in the world that has tried it and has made it work, I am not aware of it. Certainly, the exemption and graduated rate system that the government has opted for in Bill C-259 is not nearly as inflexible as the more outspoken advocates of the tax credit system indicate. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was most honest when he indicated, at the close of his remarks, that a tax credit system would probably have to involve a different tax credit depending on whether you were married, had children and how many children you had. If the tax credit system were to be fair, it would not be nearly as simple and straight forward as many of its advocates would have us believe.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It is the same thing as a flat rate.

Mr. Mahoney: The fundamental fact is that there is no magic in it. Revenue conceded to low income Canadians by increasing tax credits would have to be made up some place else. This is a very simple fact. You do not avoid it by accepting a system of tax credits.

Mr. Rose: Take it from the oil industry.

Mr. Mahoney: The progressive tax system we have in Canada does, of course, levy a much heavier tax on higher income Canadians than lower. Higher income Canadians have come to expect to pay taxes to take care of this fact. However, the increase in exemptions, combined with the progressive rate of tax, does, in the view of the government, achieve the objects that we desire.

I refer hon. members to the schedule for single status taxpayers in Canada as compared to other countries of the world. Under the new bill, single status taxpayers, assuming that they are employed in business, will pay taxes when their income reaches $1,650. That compares to $1,773 in the United States, $1,011 in the United Kingdom and $470 in Australia. The married situation in Canada is such that married taxpayers will pay taxes after their income has reached $3,041. This compares to $2,533 in the United States, $1,445 in the United Kingdom and $470 in Australia. I do not think we have to apologize to anyone for the net effect and benefits that the increased exemption schedule proposed in Bill C-259 affords to our lower income tax payers.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the parliamentary secretary to give me the courtesy of a reply to my question about common-law spouses?

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary is having difficulty replying to the question. I would invite hon. members who want to ask questions to co-operate as much as possible with the Chair so the Chair can recognize them and the questions can be properly answered. Does the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants wish to pose his question again?

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I think there are others who wish to take part in the debate, but I guess I have given notice and I will be raising it again if I do not get an answer.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I was interested in the comments made by the hon. member for Bruce and in the so-called reply by the parliamentary secretary who said, in part, when there was an interjection about taxing the oil industry, that the progressive taxation system we have in Canada takes care of the oil industry. I would refer the parliamentary secretary to a speech made by the former minister of communications, the hon. member for Duvernay, to the Canadian Economics Association in which he put on the record figures that the parliamentary secretary should study—if he can read, which I sometimes doubt. These figures show very conclusively that the oil industry is not taxed in any kind of equitable or progressive fashion.

The table used by the hon. member for Duvernay was one prepared for the Calura report in 1968. If one compares the book profit of various business enterprises in Canada during the years 1965-68, one sees that the retail trade paid taxes on 90 per cent of its taxable income; that the wholesale trade paid taxes on 87 per cent of its taxable income; that the manufacturing industry paid taxes on 63 per cent of its taxable income; that—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member but the matter of relevancy has been discussed before. I would ask him how he relates his present remarks to section 109, which is directly related to the computation of taxable income for individuals.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I would be delighted to do so. I can relate my remarks to this section very simply. Obviously, if the taxation system does not collect sufficient taxes from sources other than the present ones, then the rates at which basic exemptions are set must be much lower than would otherwise be the case. In his remarks, the hon. member for Bruce said that to do what my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had suggested, namely raise the basic exemption to $2,000 for a single person and to $4,000 for a married couple, would cost $500 million, and he asked where we would get that sort of money. The parliamentary secretary said that the government was already taxing the oil industry quite equitably. I see he shakes his head.

Mr. Mahoney: I did not mention the oil industry. Did you get permission from Schreyer to say that?

Mr. Orlikow: I will come to what the government of Manitoba says about the taxation system, but what I am trying to point out at the moment is that there are large, untapped sources of income in Canada that could be taxed, which would mean that the government could easily raise basic exemptions or institute the system of tax credits that we have been proposing.

I know the parliamentary secretary comes from Calgary, which is the headquarters of the oil industry in the province, and that he has a special interest in protecting the oil industry. However, let me put on the record a few more figures. For example, the mining industry was taxed on only 32 per cent of its taxable income; the metal mining industry paid taxes on only 13 per cent of its taxable income. Then, in the minerals field, which I presume includes oil, tax was paid on only 5.7 per cent of taxable income. In other words, we are talking about hundreds of millions of dollars.

The parliamentary secretary, in one of his usual, stupid interjections, asked me whether I had the permission of the Premier of Manitoba to say the things I was saying. Let me summarize for the edification of the parliamentary secretary—if that is possible—a statement made by the Minister of Finance of the province of Manitoba on July 16, 1971.

Mr. Mahoney: The gospel according to St. Paul.

Mr. Orlikow: I would sooner take the gospel according to St. Paul than the gospel according to St. Pat. The Minister of Finance of the province of Manitoba, commenting on these proposals that we are discussing today, suggested that we replace the tax exemptions that this government is putting forward with a system of tax credits. He suggested that all income, regardless how it is earned, be included as income for purposes of taxation. That cannot be a very radical proposal since it is precisely the proposal that was made by the Carter commission, which was headed by a man appointed by a Conservative government. He suggested that the natural resources industry be taxed on the same basis as other industry.

He then went on to spell out in detail what these changes would mean in terms of dollars. Even using the then tax structure, raising personal exemption to $1,500 from $1,000, as proposed by the government, would mean nothing to people who have no income. This is precisely why we are proposing tax credits, because it is these people who need assistance but who will not get one red cent from the proposal made by this government.

The Minister of Finance of the province of Manitoba also pointed out that for those people whose income matches the exemption level, the new increase to $1,500 will mean a saving of $250, or $463 for those with an income of $10,000, or $1,236 for those people with an income in excess of $400,000 a year. So that those who have will get, as is usual with this government. The proposed exemption of $2,850 for a married couple will result in no saving to those with an income of less than $2,850. It will mean a saving of $551 for those with an income of $250 and who are now receiving an exemption of $2,000. It will mean a saving of $845 for people with an income of $10,000, or $2,348 for people with an income in excess of $400,000. As I said before, those who have will get more.

From the revenue point of view, the Minister of Finance of Manitoba pointed out that, if a system of tax credits were adopted rather than the system of exemptions, an additional $1,140 million would be brought in because the government would begin to tax people on everything they have and be able to give relief to those people who need it the most. Using tax credits in place of exemptions would bring in $250 million. Full inclusion of capital gains in income rather than the proposed system of half rates on capital gains would bring in another $100 million. The elimination of dividend tax credits would bring in another $139 million, and the elimination of depletion allowances for natural resource industries and the three-year exemption with no offsetting provision, which the government is continuing, would together account for another $224 million. If you limited the capital cost allowances to actual wear and tear, as the hon. member for Duvernay proposed in his speech to the Canadian Economics Association, you would bring in another $360 million. We must add to that the $65 million which would be brought in as a result of the retention of the estate and gift tax legislation which this government is so easily giving up. All in all, the proposals which the Minister of Finance of Manitoba made would bring in not the $500 million odd, which the hon. member for Bruce is worrying about, but $3,282 million. It is obvious that the money is available if you want to find it. If you want to tax those who have money instead of those who have not, as we have done so frequently in the past, this amount of money can be raised.

Let me say a few words about the question of a tax credit system as compared to the tax exemption system. The hon. member for Bruce said the committee which dealt with the question listened to all the experts who all came out for a system of tax exemption rather than a tax credit system. If that is true the committee must have looked carefully for the experts they wanted, those who would give them the kind of answers that suited the government. These people must be doing very well as a result of our inadequate and inequitable tax system. The most thorough and fair study of our tax system was carried out by the Carter Commission. It recommended that we institute a system of tax credits. We also propose that the present tax exemption system should be eliminated and replaced by a system of tax credits.

A tax credit and exemption system are both intended to recognize that a certain amount of an individual's income must be free of tax. We are appalled by the fact that a large number of people who, according to the Economic Council of Canada, are living in a state of poverty will be paying income tax, even after we increase the basic exemptions as proposed by this government to $1,500 for a single person and $2,850 for a married couple. The members of the Economic Council of Canada, appointed by the present government, are not noted as being wild-eyed radicals. According to their calculations in respect of the status of poverty, a large number of people will still be paying income tax.

The present legislation specifically states that the exemption will be $1,500 for a single person. The tax credit system does not state the amount of income which should be exempt, but does state the amount of tax that should not be paid in the form of a deduction. The tax credit comes off in the form of a tax credit equivalent to the monthly tax payment. The tax exemption system provides a greater amount of tax benefit to the upper income tax payers than the lower income tax payers. I have already indicated examples of that, and how the tax exemptions proposed by the government will give a greater advantage to the higher income group than to the group at the bottom of the taxable income level. It is for that reason we have proposed a system of tax credits rather than a tax exemption system.

The parliament secretary suggests that the matter is not as simple as we have suggested. No tax system is simple. He suggested a tax credit system would have to be varied for different groups, depending on whether the people are single or married. Certainly the parliamentary secretary knows, if he knows anything at all, that the tax exemptions system does precisely that. It says a person who is single will not pay, according to the present proposal, on his first $1,500 of income, and that a married couple will not pay on the first $2,850 of income. A family of three or more will have a further exemption. In that respect, the tax credit system we propose is in no different from the tax exemption system.

What we have said, and will continue to say, is that the present system of taxation and the present exemption levels as proposed by the government are not equitable. They place an undue burden on those with lower incomes. For the benefit of the hon. member for Bruce who said, among other very interesting things, there are fewer millionaires and wealthy people than there used to be because we are taxing them so heavily, let me refer to an article which appeared in the Toronto Daily Star of April 21, 1969. It is written by Mr. D. H. Fullerton who is well-known to members of this House. He has held a number of positions with the federal government and is an economist and an expert on taxation. After pointing out that a survey in the United States indicated there were 21 people there with incomes of over $1 million per year who paid no taxes at all, Mr. Fullerton went on to state:

> Precisely similar data for Canada is not available, but experts in the field agree that the Canadian rich have been just as successful as their American counterparts in finding ways to cut their tax bill. One of the wealthiest men in Canada, in fact, is known to pay no income tax at all. The Canadian tax avoidance methods, however, tend to differ a bit from the American.

The fact that they differ will not be of much comfort to those taxpayers at the bottom end of the taxable scale who know that these people are avoiding taxes. Mr. Fullerton went on to state:

> Wealthy Canadians do not have the same benefits on oil depletion but are adept at using others. The favourite Canadian devices appear to be cost chargeable to real estate operations, and various methods for converting current income into tax-free or almost tax-free capital gains, such as setting up a holding company in West Indian tax havens.

Put this on the record because I want my friends on the other side not to feel so sorry for those who have done very well in this country. Mr. Fullerton, in this article, makes a very clear distinction between tax evasion, which is illegal, and tax avoidance, which is quite proper and legal as long as we are stupid enough not to plug the holes.

Mr. Gilbert: But very immoral.

Mr. Orlikow: My colleague says it is immoral, but one cannot blame these people for trying to live within the limits of the law. One cannot blame them for hiring qualified tax lawyers who specialize in tax matters in order to get the advice they need. One might wish that the ordinary citizen could afford the same kind of highly technical advice which is available to the wealthy of this country.

As Mr. Fullerton said so clearly, the fact is that the wealthy in this country have done well up until now and they will continue to do well when we give effect to the tax bill the government proposes. Those in the lower income brackets in this country who do not earn enough to pay any income tax, as is the case in respect of so many farmers and so many people in the maritime provinces, will receive no benefit from these proposed changes. Those in the lower income brackets who have a taxable income will continue, as they have for so many years with the approval of the parliamentary secretary obviously, to pay a much higher percentage of their income in the form of taxes—income taxes, sales taxes and real estate taxes—than those in the upper brackets who will continue to get off very lightly as they have for so many years.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, I am sorry if I sound a little like a Canada goose this afternoon, but the cold I picked up last week has not gone away. The minister of health and I must have the same physician because what has been prescribed for us has not been very successful. In any event, I shall do my best to get through this. At the outset may I say the way in which we are dealing with these sections is somewhat of an experiment as a result of consultations between the government House leader, myself and others, concerning how this bill should be handled. It is purely an experiment in some ways and I would hope, in dealing with the general sections on personal income, and having considered shall we say these two sections which group themselves very nicely, that perhaps when the time comes—I do not know when it will be because it depends entirely on the House—we would go to those sections, for instance sections 3 to 8, which involve the computation of income. We are now looking at certain deductions. There are further deductions more minor in nature which lead us further astray in section 111.

Having outlined the plan, I may say that sections 117 and 118 involve the rates, but this is an incidental reference. If we look at this bill we will note that some of the sections and subsections on pages 277 and 289 are merely carrying forward the provisions of the old act. There is some modification in certain areas, changes of a few words, which we hope will be an improvement. There is no guarantee about this and, as a matter of fact, there are some commentaries which suggest these changes are merely more confusing. Then, there are new principles of taxation. Therefore, I believe we must look at what is new. Some portions of the bill which merely carry forward provisions that have been in existence for many years may prove to be wrong. I believe the hon. member for Fraser Valley had something to say about that and I believe we will have something to say about other sections. Certainly, mention must be made of the relationship between husband and wife and the income the wife may earn from a firm in which her husband may be a partner.

The basic thrust I want to make is that which I made back at the time of the committee hearings on the white paper in respect of personal exemptions. Notwithstanding what was said by the hon. member for Bruce, I was not one whit impressed by the arguments of those who insisted that this is a better system than the tax credit system. For one thing, the amount of exemption applies to every category of taxpayer. Be he low income, middle income or the highest income individual in the country, he will still come under this provision of $1,500 per taxpayer. This is a tax system which is predicated upon the principle of ability to pay. The total tax system of this country provides no recognition of the fact that the low income taxpayer pays an equal shot with the high income tax payer under customs, sales tax and the many other types of tax in this country. So, it seems to me that for this reason it would be easier to differentiate between the categories of taxpayers in the broad sense by using a tax credit system, were it desired in the future to make these changes.

Certain cabinet ministers talk about guaranteed annual income and all sorts of similar programs. With a fixed basic exemption, it becomes all the more difficult to introduce that type of system. For that reason, it would seem to me it would have been preferable to move toward something that is more flexible, and that is a tax credit system. Second, the change of exemption has proven to be an exceedingly difficult proposition. Ever since I have been in this House I have heard propositions about change in the level of personal exemption for taxpayers under the Income Tax Act. It has taken 22 years—as a matter of fact 23 years because we are dealing with the Income Tax Act of 1948—to make those changes. I suppose, going on the premise of past experience, it may take another 20 years before a further change is introduced. We are introducing a further degree of inflexibility in the income tax system which I think we could well eliminate. Therefore, I feel that the tax credit system again would be of advantage. Third, there is no doubt that the basic exemption is of greater value at marginal rates to the higher revenue earner than it is to the lower income earner. That is all there is to it.

To me there would seem to be a lack of logic in insisting upon this level of $1,500 and $1,350 per annum. I think the parliamentary secretary was frankly trying to engage in a useless comparison in talking about Great Britain, France, the United States and others in respect of the basic rate. It is the same as making a comparison of assessments or taxes in various Canadian cities because you can have high assessments and low tax rates or you can have low assessemnts and very high mill rates. The same thing applies here. We could have a very low exemption allowance but much higher rates initiating tax, yielding roughly the same thing and, so far as the taxpayer is concerned, with about the same effect. So, what the parliamentary secretary had to say does not in any way contribute to a comparison of the two systems.

One thing that I noted also was that the parliamentary secretary had perhaps slipped into the pitfall of trying to compare the position of the single status taxpayer at his best possible position in Canada. I admit that the exemption is the same, but the tax rates are certainly not and if, inadvertently, he was trying to give the impression that the single status taxpayer in Canada was better off than he was in other countries, then I think he is wrong because one has to remember that in Canada the provinces have the right to levy income tax, and many of them do. The same is true of several states in the United States which levy income taxes, and to compare individuals you must put them in the same relevant position. Unfortunately, the white paper engaged in some real flim-flam when it was comparing high rate individuals in the U.S. with low rate individuals in Canada.

With regard to the amounts, I would say that $1,500 is an arbitrary figure; $1,800 can be an arbitrary figure, just as $1,400 was an arbitrary figure. They bear no relationship at all to the cost of living. But then, when we consider the $2,850 and take a couple who are receiving their old age security, the taxpayer of the two gets an additional allowance of $650, which puts him in at $3,500, and with $100 general deduction, it means about $3,600 of income which would be completely tax exempt. To relate that to various poverty levels is also a very relevant question because $3,600 in Toronto or in Ottawa is certainly not $3,600 in some small centre in rural Ontario, rural Quebec or elsewhere in the country. These are all relative levels, and it does mean that a person with $3,600 in certain areas could be much better off than one living, say, in the centre of Toronto where I think his position would be absolutely impossible.

I think the parliamentary secretary might want to answer this question. In the light of the fact that three of the provinces, and there may be a fourth one, have lowered the age of majority to 18—and we know that this is going to be the trend in the next three or four years—why does the Income Tax Act make that break at the age of 21, as it does for children at page 278? At page 278, section 109 (1)(d) we find the following:

> For each child or grandchild of the individual who, during the year, was wholly dependent upon him for support and was
> (i) under 21 years of age,
> (ii) 21 years of age or over and dependent by reason of mental or physical infirmity,

Why should the division not be now at the age of 18 in the case of mental or physical infirmity? This is more in conformity with the status of an adult. I assume the status of an adult is at the age of 21 in this statute because that was the dividing line between minority and majority. It seems to me that we will have to look into this in order to conform because provincial statutes relating to income tax, and other statutes under provincial jurisdiction will have some effect upon the status of a person as a taxpayer. Yet there remains this question of 21. The act makes another break at the age of 16. This is presumably the age of entry into high school, and yet so many children go to high school at a younger age than 16. I do not know why the age of 16 is used, but it seems to me that we could make the situation so much simpler by having one break at the age of 18. There are very few people who go into post secondary education who are younger than 18. The great majority of them do so after they have reached that age, and yet the break is at 16.

Perhaps there is an explanation that escapes me outside that of pure inertia and of not thinking about this particular point. However, it seems to me that there should be a straight break now at the age of 18, and that a person over the age of 18 should be considered as an adult because almost half of the population of the country are considered as adults at that age.

Now, I should like to move to some comments with regard to section 110 dealing with some of the deductions that are permitted. First of all, let us take the case of medical expenses. One change that has been made which has not been noticed too much is that, whereas under the present act if an individual has a private health plan, any medical expenses paid by that health plan as a result of illness of the taxpayer or of the taxpayer's dependents in excess of 3 per cent of the taxpayer's income qualify him for the benefit of the medical expense allowance, the present act under section 110 does not do that. It restricts very severely the amount that may now be claimed. One cannot now claim that expenses that are paid under a private medical insurance plan. You can only claim the amount of the premium under the 3 per cent provision for medical expenses which might allow the taxpayer to qualify for the allowance. Frankly, this change provides no real relief whatsoever; in fact quite the contrary.

Of course, it is also known that in those provinces where the employer makes a contribution to an annual premium, say, in British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario, the contribution of the employer is added to the income of the individual, but because that is for medicare the individual cannot claim any of the medical expenses paid at so-called public cost to arrive at the 3 per cent allowance. I am not arguing whether there should or should not be a deduction for medical expenses that are paid by a public plan. But what I am saying is that I think it is highly inequitable if the employer makes any contribution whatsoever to all or part of the cost of a medical plan, that should not also, on the basis of the provisions relating to contributions to a private plan, be deemed to be an expense. Why add it if you are going to charge it to him as income? It should also be allowed as an expense in arriving at the 3 per cent allowance. As usual, the Crown is taking it both ways and I fail to see the justification for it. It is completely unfair.

The individual's own contributions do not entitle him to anything. If he pays half of the fee for medicare he gets nothing for that, no allowance. If his employer pays part of his medicare fee it is added to his income, and if he participates, as many people do, in supplementary medical care schemes, the only thing he can draw benefit from here is the premium, not the medical expenses, and that is a complete repudiation of the principle of medical expense allowances. Of course, it is bitterly criticized by a number of the organizations that have made representations to the government.

The Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I do so to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Then, I will come back to this later.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Chairman: Is there unanimous consent for the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Thank you, Mr. Chairman, but I am prepared to let someone else intervene, and I shall return later. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton has been anxiously waiting to speak. So, I will yield to him.

The Chairman: Order. This might be an appropriate time to read to the committee the questions for the adjournment motion tonight. They are: the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow)—The Canadian Economy; the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert)—Atomic Energy; the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland)—Regional Economic Expansion.

Mr. Blair: Mr. Chairman, I would like to address myself to the question of medical expenses. There are people in this country who now find themselves discriminated against. These are people who live in Ontario, or Alberta, or other provinces where the provincial governments have determined that they will make none or only a minimal contribution to the medical premium which is payable by the citizens in those provinces. The result is that people in those provinces are now faced with what appears to them to be a condition of hardship and injustice. If they are fortunate enough to be employed by someone who, under a collective agreement or voluntarily, pays a part of their medical care premium, then that contribution made by their employer is added to their income. On the other hand, any payment they make themselves in respect of all or part of the premium is in no way deductible at any stage in the computation of income tax.

It is not deductible in the basic computation of income, nor is it included as an element of medical expenses, as is the case with premiums that are paid for private coverage. I would hope that the spokesmen for the government can comment on the difficult and somewhat unfair position in which residents of this province are placed as compared with residents of other provinces in regard to the operation of medical plans in Canada, bearing in mind that all these plans are supported by all people as taxpayers, and that the differential positions which Canadians experience under the plans are not the result of anything they have done, but rather a result of decisions by provincial governments over which they apparently have no control.

The second point I would like to raise about medical expenses has been put to me very forcefully by a family in my constituency. These people have the experience of having children who suffer from what are called, broadly speaking, learning disabilities. The word dyslexia applies as a description of this particular ailment, which is a very serious one. At the present time in this province whatever public institutions there may be for the treatment of this type of disability, they are not really adequate to cope with the demands on this family, nor I am informed with the demands on other families in my constituency that have the same type of problem.

These children are under doctors' care. Whatever is done with them is done as a result of medical advice and medical direction. But, because of some odd quirk in the interpretation of our laws, both provincial and federal, this particular family finds itself in a position which I think is as absurd as it is unjust. The parents are compelled to pay what to them is an enormous amount of money each month, something like $400 to $500, to maintain their children in a special institution so that they can receive the kind of treatment, plus training, which will enable them to become useful citizens. The health authorities of the province of Ontario have determined that this is not an expense which is covered under health insurance, and the tax authorities of the federal government have stated that this is not an expense which is deductible as a medical expense.

I am not going to attempt to go through the jurisprudence on this matter except to say that the citations contained in CCH and other tax texts are somewhat contradictory. I do not think we can leave a matter of this kind in any position where there is doubt as to the taxpayer's rights, or any doubt as to the taxpayer's capacity to do all that he may to improve the health of his family and to overcome what any reasonable person would consider to be a severe medical disability. I notice that there is some textual change, and I will not go into detail at this time, between the existing law and the law as proposed. I think it would be a wise thing for the government to give an assurance to this House and to people, whose children suffer from these special types of disabilities, that there will be recognition of these special circumstances and the treatment will be properly recognized as a medical expense.

The third point I wish to make about medical expenses is in regard to the restrictive wording of the present section 27 (1) (c) which as far as I can see is substantially carried forward in the proposed section 110 (1) (c). Again I have in mind a specific case which seems to indicate absurdity in the administration of the law.

Shortly after the last election, one of my constituents brought to my attention a difficulty which he encountered in his family. His wife had experienced a nervous breakdown, had been confined for some time to a mental institution and had finally been released. The conditions of release were that she should continue to receive outpatient psychiatric care and have proper provision for the maintenance of herself and her home by a competent person. The arrangements were made by her husband under the direction of her doctor. A great deal of expense was incurred in providing for what used to be called a practical nurse to look after this lady. When the time came to account for income tax—

The Chairman: Order, please. I do not want to interfere with the work of the committee, but I think there may be some responsibility on the Chair to draw the committee's attention to the fact that it seems the hon. member is dealing with section 110, whereas the committee now has before it section 109.

An hon. Member: Oh, no; they are together.

The Chairman: If there was an order or understanding that they were to be dealt with together that was not clear to the Chair. If that is the understanding the Chair is very happy to have that advice. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton.

Mr. Blair: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I shall conclude in a minute.

This man found, in the end, that his expenses were disallowed because he had not employed a registered nurse or a certified nurse's aid. As I said, this seems to me to be an absurd administration of our laws. By following the doctor's advice he had been able to return his wife to reasonably good health, and a great deal of public money had been saved because she was not forced to remain in a hospital yet because of the technical wording of the statute, which would be the same if this act were passed as it is now, this type of beneficial medical expense was not allowed.

Mr. Chairman, I have raised these rather technical questions without notice to the parliamentary secretary because I thought if they were raised now some consideration could be given to a response. I am happy to yield now to my friend, the hon. member for Edmonton West.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Bellechasse.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Chairman, the House now has before it one of the most interesting clauses concerning personal income tax and exemptions prescribed by the act to allow people to keep as much as possible of their income to support their family decently.

The bill, particularly geared to personal income tax, has been attentively considered by labour organizations whose responsibility it is to defend the interests of their members. They have made their recommendations known to us and I believe it is our duty, at the present stage of consideration of the bill, to speak on behalf of those organizations and request, suggest that the government amend some clauses of the bill in order to take more specially into account the rights of individuals, primarily of those workers who do not receive high salaries and who therefore have to do some extra belt-tightening to keep within their budgets.

For example, I am thinking of a labourer who is single and who up to the passage of the new legislation was entitled to a basic exemption of $1,100, while this bill provides that it will be raised to $1,600. Now I consider the basic exemption of $1,600 as clearly insufficient due to the cost of living which keeps going up. In my opinion, a single person, whatever his age, should be granted a much higher basic exemption. I am also thinking of a 21 or 22-year old man who must earn his living and is also considering the possibility of establishing himself. If he is not given the opportunity of saving enough to fulfil his ambitions, he will be discouraged.

The same thing applies to married couples. The new provisions of clause 109 provide for a tax exemption of $2,850. This is obviously not enough if one takes into account the increase in the cost of living.

To come back to the basic exemption, either for married couples or for single people, representations are often made to us by mechanics, for example, who are working in garages and must necessarily buy tools and maintain them. The company which employs them can usually deduct the purchase of these tools as expenses and depreciate them according to a scale recognized by the department. This is not the case for workers. However, the act provides for deductions of employment expenses up to $150 a year. Mechanics are not rare who work in garages and own up to $2,000, $3,000 or $4,000 worth of tools that must be renewed periodically in order for them to accomplish their work in a suitable way.

It would be absolutely normal that those classes of workers be granted a basic exemption much greater in order to put them on a par with companies.

Thus it happens that many lumbermen have to replace frequently their equipment for their work and can deduct only the operating cost at the present time. Indeed it would be absolutely logical to allow them a greater basic exemption because it is with those tools that they earn their living.

In view of that situation, I would urge the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and the government to consider particularly the two cases I have just mentioned, and I hope that Parliament will accept to amend some parts of clause 109, especially sub-clause (1) (a)(i).

Further to the representations I have just made, I shall move an amendment—if the Chair authorizes me to do so—which reads as follows:

That Bill C-259 be amended by deleting from subparagraph (i) of paragraph (a) of subclause (2) of clause 109 the figures "$1,500" and substituting therefor the figures "$2,500".

The Deputy Chairman: The Chair must point out to the hon. member for Bellechasse that it finds it difficult to accept the amendment as moved. When a member moves an amendment he must naturally respect certain rules of which the main one is that of pertinence. The second one forbids an hon. member to move an amendment intended to increase a tax.

In fact, the amendment that must now be decided upon does not infringe either of those rules, on the contrary. Still, the Chair feels uneasy in that the amendment of the hon. member goes beyond the scope of the motion now before the House.

There is an important principle whereby only a minister of the Crown can introduce tax measures. In this case, it seems the hon. member is seeking to do indirectly by means of an amendment what he cannot do by means of the motion or a bill. Unless the hon. member has more specific arguments to submit in order to connvince the Chair or unless other hon. members would be interested in submitting opinions respecting the proposed amendment it will be difficult to accept it.

Nevertheless, for the guidance of this House I could read over the hon. member's amendment and invite comments from colleagues of the hon. member for Bellechasse as to the receivability of the amendment. So wihthout submitting it to this House I will simply read the motion:

That Bill C-259 be amended by deleting from subparagraph (i) of paragraph (a) of subclause (2) of clause 109 the figures "$1,500" and substituting therefore the figures "$2,500".

Hon. members who wish to make whatever comments they deem releyant are invited to do so before I reach a decision on this amendment.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): With due respect, Mr. Chairman, I realize that the amendment before us alters the nature of the bill in terms of the allowable basic deductions. I did not then and I still do not understand now how the proposed amendment would increase government expenses. Actually, I wish to abide by the Standing Orders. I realize that only a minister of the Crown is entitled, according to the Standing Orders, to submit legislation entailing public expenditures, but in this instance the amendment only aims at avoiding too many expenses to taxpayers, which would of course deprive the government of some revenue. This is exactly the wording of the amendment I have submitted, that is to protect the taxpayer against exaggerated taxation. If the Standing Orders do not provide us with an opportunity of submitting amendments at this stage, I wonder how we will be able to consider the present bill.

We are going to scrutinize it, make comments, suggestions and so on, without however going any farther. The process which has been going on since the inception of the debate on this bill is somewhat unusual, but after consultations with authoritative agencies, we have concluded that it was in order to submit amendments without running counter to the Standing Orders.

This is why I still submit that the proposed amendment is not contrary to the Standing Orders.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Before I rule on the amendment now before the House, I might read Citation 265 from Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, page 221. Subsection 1 reads as follows:

No member other than a minister of the Crown may introduce a Bill for the reduction of duties. The government must take full responsibility for the taxation levied to provide the revenue. But the House enjoys complete freedom to make every representation possible to the Government with regard to the manner in which the ministers discharge this responsibility.

The important sentence is the following:

This duty the members may perform by moving amendments to reduce the taxes proposed by the Administration.

• (5:20 p.m.)

The Chair is led to believe that the hon. member, on the basis of this last sentence, may conclude that his amendment tends to reduce taxes. But if he considers his proposal carefully, he will see that there lies the difficulty, since his amendment does not reduce taxes for some taxpayers but proposes over and above to eliminate of a given number of taxpayers from the rolls. It is precisely this aspect of the amendment that the Chair cannot accept and that cannot be accepted in its present form according to our rules.

The hon. member may wonder how to amend this clause but the Chair must stick to the rules and, in my mind, there is no misunderstanding.

As for the extension of this amendment which, in my opinion, is tantamount to a substantive proposal which, besides possibly reducing the taxes, and certainly reducing them for a number of taxpayers by eliminating a great many of them from the tax rolls only the government can do that.

Therefore, in my opinion, the amendment before us is out of order.

Does the hon. member for Champlain rise to take part in the debate or to discuss the ruling?

Mr. René Matte: I simply wish to discuss your comments, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: I should like to point out to the hon. member, if he wishes to comment the Chair's ruling, that he cannot do so at this stage. The only alternative for him would be to challenge the ruling.

Mr. Matte: Mr. Chairman, I believe the committee could get an explanation as to this assertion, namely that the removal from the tax rolls of a class of workers who would pay less tax goes against the standing order you just read. That is not very clear to me, and I wonder whether the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Bellechasse is not totally consistent with the standing order you read out to us.

[English]

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, in my contribution earlier today, I raised a point concerning the matter of tax reform for those individuals who live together but are not in the category of married persons as defined by the present legislation, as contemplated by the new legislation or dealt with in the taxation courts. I did not receive a response, either reasoned or otherwise, from the parliamentary secretary. Somebody has to speak for them and somebody has to get an answer. I am going back to the subject again.

There are two such categories of people involved. These may be people who are quite free to marry, both having single status, but who have decided they are not going to marry and simply live together. That is called a common-law marriage. The other category is comprised of men and women who decide to live together because either one or both are not free to marry. In the eyes of the law they are really a concubine and paramour, but the parlance of the times that applies to them is the phrase living together common-law. I think we should recognize the status of these people. I do not think our Income Tax Act is a statute of morality. If anyone thinks it is, he should examine the actions of the income tax collector. When he finds that someone is plying the trade or profession of prostitution, that woman's earnings are quickly taxed, despite the fact she earns them in an immoral way.

We are not enacting a statute of morality. What we are trying to do is bring tax reform, tax justice and tax equity to all Canadians. A man and woman who have not entered into the bonds of matrimony may be living together in a community. Perhaps they have come from some other part of the country where, either or both have had an unhappy marriage. It is unjust unless we accord to them the same tax exemptions as we do to those who have gone through orthodox marriage ceremonies. I do not see where there would be any great harm in adopting a position such as that. I do not think it would cause the income tax people any great difficulties. Heaven knows, they find out about these things. I have had people come to me after the income tax people established that they were not in fact married, and all hell broke loose on their heads and shoulders. It always burned me up when something like that happened.

I ask the parliamentary secretary to now give me an answer. Perhaps he is taking it up with his advisers. If I do not get an answer now, I shall be asking the parliamentary secretary the same question a good number of times. The question is simply this. Why is it not possible, and I cannot do it, for some draftsman to take section A and enlarge the definition of a married person because we are dealing with the equivalence of married people in the two categories I mentioned. I refer to those people who are free to marry but who, for some reason choose not to do so, but live together as man and wife. The relationship is that of concubine and paramour and, although not properly, is usually called common-law, marriage. The other situation is that in which one or the other cannot marry, but they live together as man and wife. Why cannot the exemption be extended to both these categories?

[The Deputy Chairman.]

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I apologize to the hon. member. I did not intentionally omit responding to his question the last time. I covered a number of points. I ommitted reference to it accidentally.

The problem is one of administration, not in any strict sense of the word, but rather in the establishment of the common-law relationship to which the hon. member referred. I am sure the government agrees the taxing statute is not a place where moral sanctions are applied or moral rewards are handed out. In his comments, the hon. member at least intruded an element of morality to bring out the point. He referred to paramour and concubine. This presupposes that the couple are at least of the same sex, yet today that is not necessarily the situation that prevails. What are we to do about these things? How do you prove what is a common-law relationship? What is a common-law relationship that the tax assessor should take into account in deciding whether the marriage exemption should be granted? Is it a transitional relationship of a day or two or a week or two? What precisely is a common-law relationship to which the hon. member referred?

The hon. member distinguished two categories in this particular unchurched or unendorsed situation. One is where the couple are not, because of some other legal impediment, able to get married. In the other case he cited, the couple is free to marry, but do not do so. My reaction to that is very much like the reaction which we encountered in attempting to extend the small business incentive to unincorporated businesses. I am sorry we did not find a way to do it. On the other hand, the option of incorporation is open to most small businesses. Similarly, in this case, the option of matrimony is open to most taxpayers.

Mr. Gilbert: What an option.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, I want to resume my earlier remarks with regard to sections 109 and 110. There is one point I missed in section 109 that I would like to cover. If we look at the section dealing with dependents under personal exemptions, we find that some people are going to have an awful shock. For example, the old age supplement is no longer included for purposes of taxation. May I refer to the deductions that are permitted under section 110 at the top of page 286 of the bill:

• (5:30 p.m.)

(f) the amount of any supplement under the Old Age Security Act or of any similar payment under a law of a province, in respect of which any amount has been included in computing the taxpayer's income for the year by virtue of clause 56(1)(a)(i)(A).

I may say that the Institute of Chartered Accountants of Canada have made the point that instead of using this alpha-numeric system it would have been far better to adopt the metric or decimal system of numbering paragraphs. I think that point is a good one and would have left the bill in far better shape. I am sure many people who have been trained as chartered accountants would adopt that suggestion of their professional society.

In any event, all of the income limitations of dependants operate to eliminate the allowance entirely when income reaches $1,600. Because the old age pension supplement is now included in a dependant's income, even though it is not taxable, a recipient on maximum supplement will not qualify as a dependant. Even though this money is not taxable but is deemed to be put in a special category, a dependant within the category prescribed by section 109—who is not a wife, that is—will not qualify as a dependant because the old age supplement will take him beyond the allowable amount. I think the parliamentary secretary should furnish an answer as to why this provision was made.

Reverting to section 110, under charitable donations we see a change in that the amount that has been allowed has gone from 10 per cent to 20 per cent of income. I think this is a very good move and will be generally applauded throughout the country. The organizations to which deductible donations may be made have been broadened in scope to include registered Canadian amateur athletic associations, though these must be of a national character. I think this will also bring us up against difficulties in interpretation; or, shall I say, some people will be terribly disappointed.

Although there has been an extension of charitable donations and individuals can benefit to the extent that the allowance has been increased from 10 per cent to 20 per cent of income, and although the gift tax is being eliminated, there is still one gate that has to be passed through that does not let off the gift scot free. I refer to the proposed capital gains tax. Even though a gift to a charitable organization may come within the 20 per cent level of income, if it falls within a category on which would be levied a capital gains tax then either the donor or even the recipient charitable organization would be liable for capital gains tax.

I think we should see to it that there is a general awareness of this provision. It has been represented directly to the government on behalf of charitable organizations that the provision will work to their detriment because under the capital gains tax provision a gift is deemed to be a sale and if there is an accretion in value it may be caught under that provision. I just want to make sure that that is understood.

There is one advantage of which I would have hoped the draftsmen of Bill C-259 would have availed themselves, and that is the elimination of subparagraphs (iii) to (xv) of section 110(1)(c). This was the old paragraph 27(1)(c) and some of its provisions. These provisions have become very awkward in that they are difficult to define and cause a great deal of difficulty in interpretation. It would have been preferable had the draftsmen followed the recommendation of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants and simply substituted for subparagraphs (iii) to (xv) inclusive the following provision: "(iii) For such expenses as may be prescribed by regulation". For example, subparagraph (xii) of section 110(1)(c) provides:

for any device or equipment, not described in any other subparagraph of this paragraph, of a prescribed kind—

In other words, the provision allows for discretion if the device or equipment is prescribed by a physician, and it seems to me it would have been far better to take all the provisions detailed between pages 282 and the middle of page 284 into the regulatory field.

Having said that, within the same section I should like to turn to subparagraph (iv) which appears on page 282. It provides:

as remuneration for one full-time attendant upon, or for the full-time care in a nursing home of, the taxpayer, his spouse or any such dependant who was throughout the whole of a 12 months' period ending in the taxation year necessarily confined by reason of illness, injury or affliction to a bed or a wheel chair—

At the present time there is difficulty in interpreting those words. Some assessment officers indicate that a taxpayer or a dependant must be confined to bed for a period of 12 months prior to entry into a nursing home if any nursing home expenses during that twelve months in the taxation year are to be claimed or allowed. I have heard another version in this regard, to the effect that there must be one entire 12-month period of confinement in the nursing home. Of course, I think that is wrong. I should like the parliamentary secretary to confirm what is meant by the language of this provision we are being asked to pass.

It seems to me that the logical interpretation of these words is that if a person is confined to bed or a wheel chair for a period of time and has spent some time in a nursing home, the total of which two periods is 12 months, that represents the 12-month period in a taxation year and is sufficient to qualify that person for an exemption of the expenses incurred.

Before I sit down I should like the parliamentary secretary to tell us whether there is a possibility of the government introducing further amendments after we pass these two sections. As the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants has asked, are there any changes to be made in addition to those forecast by the minister a week ago Thursday? If there are, I suggest we should leave these sections open. There is a strong possibility that we may be able to move to something else later this day, but I do not want to abandon these sections if there is to be an amendment.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I think I can assure the hon. member that we have no further amendments which have not already been indicated or moved to sections 109 and 110. There are no further amendments of which notice has not been given.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): If there are no further amendments, any changes will come by way of another bill just as those introduced on the night of October 14?

Mr. Mahoney: I think any further amendments of that nature would be the subject of a further budgetary statement and other legislation involved.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I find the last remark of the parliamentary secretary a little disconcerting. If the government has no further amendments, then the representations of hon. members are of no avail and we are just spitting into the wind. I had hoped we could persuade the government to make certain changes, some editorial but perhaps some in respect of the status of spouses and some in respect of child care expenses, because a certain category of spouse will be completely denied the benefits of the child care expense provisions. It is our hope that we might convince the government of the justice of that cause.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, in the first place it would be rather presumptuous of the government to assume that we have now heard all the representations of hon. members on the other side and are able to say we have in mind what additional amendments are to be proposed. Certainly the representations of hon. members opposite are being considered. I simply reiterate that at the present time the government has no further amendments it proposes to offer in respect of sections 109 and 110.

Mr. Rowland: Mr. Chairman, in dealing with sections 109 and 110, which concern personal exemptions for income tax purposes, I wish to make two points. My first point relates to the general level of exemptions provided by the proposed legislation, in that they are not high enough, and the second is that the government in proposing this legislation should have gone to a tax credit system rather than continuing a tax exemptions system.

In keeping with the customary logic of this House, perhaps I should deal with the first point first, that is, the general levels of exemptions proposed in this bill. It will not take much time to go over this point because it was dealt with extensively by a number of members on second reading of the bill and during the general discussion on clause 1.

Perhaps at the outset I should say that section 109 (1) (h) is generally acceptable to us in the NDP. The section proposes that the deduction from income for elderly taxpayers 65 years of age and over be $650, with the guaranteed income supplement being exempt, whereas formerly the $500 additional exemption was available if the taxpayer was aged 70 or over. We consider that to be an improvement and we are especially pleased to note that it ends the anomaly of taxing pensioners on their income from the guaranteed income supplement, knowing they had to go through a means test to get it in the first place. This situation would have been laughable if it had not been so tragic in its consequences. The government said, on the one hand, that a pensioner could not live on less than $135 per month but, on the other hand, taxed a portion of that amount. We welcome the end of this situation when the legislation passes.

Section 109 (1) (d) deals with exemptions for wholly or partly dependent children. That section proposes that for each dependent child under 16, and children up to 21 years of age who are totally dependent by reason of infirmity or attending school or university, a deduction of $300 can be made. This deduction is reduced $1 for every $2 of a child's income over $1,000. Formerly the provision was that if the income was over $950, the excess could be added to the parents' tax. Section 109 (1) (d) (v) proposes that for dependent children over 16 the deduction from income be $550, which is reduced by $1 for every $1 of the child's income over $1,050. The former provision was that a parent could deduct $550, and if the child's income was over $950 the excess might be added to the parents' tax.

The changes have not altered the exemptions in any substantial fashion. There is an air of unreality surrounding them. They bear no more relationship to the costs of rearing and educating a child than they did formerly. The new regulations may bring marginal relief to some families, but it is so marginal that one wonders why the government even bothered to undertake this somewhat more elaborate formula. As I said at the outset, I do not intend to go into the arguments extensively because it has been done time and time again. The point to be made is simply that the exemption provided for wholly or partially dependent children bears no relationship to the actual cost of maintaining these children.

Turning to personal exemptions, section 109 (1) (a) proposes that the deduction from income for a married couple be $2,850, increased from $2,000, and section 109 (1) (c) proposes that the deduction from income for a single person be $1,500, increased from $1,000. Personal exemptions should not be figures which are simply picked out of the air. They must relate to something, and surely that something is the amount of money it takes a Canadian to live on at a level which does not entail poverty.

The Economic Council of Canada has suggested that a single person in Canada earning less than approximately $2,000 a year is living below the poverty line, and that a married couple earning less than approximately $4,000 a year is living below the poverty line. Surely, then, $2,000 and $4,000 are the logical levels at which to fix personal exemptions so as to ensure that no one is forced to contribute to the general well-being of the community through taxes at the cost of being forced to live in poverty. I wish the government had given this factor more consideration in computing the level at which they would fix personal exemptions.

Another means of considering the adequacy of personal exemption levels is to compare them to increases in the cost of living. We find that between September, 1949, the last time personal exemptions were increased, and September of this year the cost of living for Canadians, in constant dollars, has risen by approximately 125 per cent, whereas the proposed increase in personal exemption is only approximately 42 per cent. There is an obvious disparity here.

Another way to look at it is to consider the annual average income of Canadians. In 1949 the personal exemption was fixed at $1,000 for a single person, and the average income was about $900. The personal exemption was considerably above the average income. Now the average income far exceeds the exemption. The other point to be made with regard to the proposed exemptions and the new rate schedules is that they result in greater savings in dollars for those with larger incomes. I might illustrate that by comparing the tax saving from the increased exemption which would be realized by people at different income levels.

With a gross income of $2,000, the tax saving from the increased exemption with the new rate schedule to a single taxpayer with no dependants would be $33. With a gross income of $4,000, it would be $160. At $6,000 the saving would be $177; at $8,000 it would be $195; at $15,000 it would be $258; at $50,000 it would be $364; and at $100,000 it would be $397. So the annual tax saving increases as a person's income increases. That is why we say we should have gone to a tax credit system. The parliamentary secretary said it would not be simple to implement. No one denies that. All that need be said in rebuttal, I submit, is that neither is a system of exemptions simple to implement and that the effort required to overcome difficulties in a system of tax credits, if greater, also has much greater pay-offs in terms of equity, in terms of the flexibility introduced into the tax system and in terms of offsetting the effects of somewhat regressive forms of taxation such as customs duties and sales taxes which bear almost equally on all Canadians.

Both the tax credit and the tax exemption are designed to recognize that a certain portion of an individual's income should be free of tax. The exemption specifically states the amount of income which should not be subject to tax. Under the present system it is $1,000 for a single taxpayer and in the proposed legislation it would be $1,500. But because we have in Canada what is technically called a progressive rate schedule, increases in exemptions generally benefit higher income earners, as the figures I cited a few moments ago illustrate.

The tax credit system does not state the amount of income that should be exempt but states an amount of tax that need not be paid, a set sum which can be deducted from a citizen's total tax bill, and thus gives each citizen the same monetary benefit. Thus, the tax credit would give greater relief to lower income groups, which surely is what a tax system should attempt to accomplish. The fact that the government has not gone to a system of tax credits in this legislation is but one more piece of evidence that this country is run in the interest of the upper income levels of the middle-class to the exclusion of benefits for the lower income groups.

To illustrate that point further, the same is true of the recently proposed 3 per cent reduction in income tax and the earlier removal of the 3 per cent surcharge. Both these measures have the effect of giving the greatest dollar relief to upper income earners and not lower income earners. By this process the government is attempting to generate greater activity in the economy. If greater benefit were given to the low income workers, the effect on the economy would be greatest because due to their income position they would spend virtually all their income. In the upper income groups, because they would save a portion of their money the immediate effect on the economy would probably be less.

Faced with difficulties in respect of the economy, the government came up with what amounts to a $1 billion bonanza for the upper income groups and corporations and at the same time argues that it is not able to implement a system of guaranteed annual income because such a system would cost $2 billion or $2.6 billion a year to operate, if the figures of the Economic Council of Canada are to be accepted.

I venture to say that recent tax cuts together with the removal of the surcharge represent the largest portion of revenue necessary to implement a guaranteed annual income, if we accept the figures of the Economic Council of Canada, and that a guaranteed annual income would provide greater stimulation to the economy than would the tax cuts, despite that being their ostensible purpose. Similarly, a system of tax credits would generally benefit most greatly the lower income groups. That is the major reason we in the New Democratic Party argue the need for the implementation of such a system. Meaningful tax reform means meaningful redistribution of income, and the proposed changes in exemption levels simply will not accomplish that end. Redistribution of income is something to which government in this country must address itself in the very near future.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. It being six o'clock, I now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Chairman: Shall section 109 (1) carry?

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, one is at a disadvantage when the only person one can preach to is out of the chamber. The parliamentary secretary is now returning, so I will make my point.

I have been pleading throughout the day for justice for a sizeable number of people who live together but are not married to each other. Each of these couples consists of two persons, and one is invariably a man and the other one is invariably a woman, despite some misunderstanding on the other side. Perhaps they do not tell things with the niceties of distinction that we do on this side. In any event, I suggested, and the parliamentary secretary agreed with me, that our taxing statute should not be a moral statute, that we are really not concerned with that here; we are concerned with fairness toward all. The parliamentary secretary, having agreed with me, said that people living together who are free to get married should get married. Who points the moral finger there and wags it about?

Regarding the other category of those who live together but are not free to marry each other, the parliamentary secretary said they would be few in number. There are estimates presented by welfare councils in Canada that up to 200,000 people are in that category, a group that would populate a city larger the Halifax and one a little smaller than that from which the parliamentary secretary comes. So we are dealing with sizeable numbers of Canadians. I suggest, again, that a formula could be reached so that they would receive exactly the same benefits, no more no less, than those of us who have gone through the marriage ceremony.

The parliamentary secretary also made the point that there might be some young Lothario who would take unto himself a different girl every year for purposes of income tax exemptions and relief. I thought that probably there would not be people so bold, but perhaps there are. But then I said to myself: So what? What difference does it make if he supports a different woman every year of his life? If he is that kind of optimist, let him do it so long as he is not claiming two or more women for exemptions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McCleave: I can hear the hooting and hollering starting, Mr. Chairman, because one tries to fight for a minority that cannot possibly represent itself in this chamber. It is then that the baying hounds over there must yap and have their fun. That will keep the debate going longer, gentlemen, because I will stay with this point until hell freezes over and until we get some kind of satisfactory answer from the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCleave: What they are saying is that it would be a lot of work to check on some of these people, therefore let us not do it, let us see to it that they pay a disproportionate share of income tax because otherwise it would interfere with that great god that the Liberals worship—administrative efficiency. I say that that is also a weakness in their argument. But this whole exercise has also raised in the first few hours of the debate something that is very wrong with the section. We are being asked to pass one of the most important measures that any Parliament can pass and certainly the most important measure that this Parliament is being asked to pass, and that is a new Income Tax Act.

One would think that for that sort of occasion we would have someone here who is responsible to the House of Commons. But we have the parliamentary secretary. He is an estimable chap, but any suggestions that we make to him here and that we make to his officials—they are not the government, they are not the cabinet—they can slough off with a yes or a no, generally a no. That has been the performance so far today.

I say that is irresponsible. Because of the importance of this legislation the Minister of Finance should be in his seat for every moment of the debate, listening if possible but at least present so that we may ask questions and get proper answers instead of what we have received so far, a series of remarkably inept answers. I say this with all deference to the parliamentary secretary. I have respect for him, but after some of this stuff all I can say is that if he is passing on what his advisers tell him, he had better get new advisers; or if he is passing on what he himself knows, he had better get out and find out something about the domestic law of Canada.

I put the question again. I am asking as seriously and as responsibly as I can, on behalf of people not able to ask it themselves, that the definition of "married person" be broadened in section 109(a), line 2, so that the people I have mentioned, who are not married but who live together as man and wife, may have the benefit of the income tax legislation we are being asked to enact.

[Translation]

Mr. Godin: Mr. Chairman, the following appeared in Le Devoir of December 27, 1968:

[Mr. McCleave.]

The Canadian Prime Minister, Mr. Pierre Elliott Trudeau, in his Christmas message to the people, asks them to co-operate with the government, during the coming year, in its efforts to reduce social inequalities.

"Our country," the Prime Minister stated, "is one of the most beautiful in the world, one of the most peaceful and one of the most affluent."

"But it has its problems and its difficulties. Some of our citizens do not partake as much as they should of the general welfare of the country. Some others do not enjoy the same freedoms and privileges as the majority of Canadians."

"It is therefore imperative," the message goes on, "to reduce those inequalities, and it is our intention to work relentlessly towards this end during the coming year."

"But to achieve those objectives," he added, "we need the co-operation of all citizens, we need their goodwill, which must always be stronger than any ill will, so that, together, we may ensure in a peaceful manner, the welfare of everyone and the progress of the whole country."

Mr. Chairman, those were very pious wishes expressed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). In fact, he intended to reform and to cure what he thought was the cause of a certain uneasiness.

Judging from various reports and studies, we may wonder what was the result of the appeal launched by the Prime Minister with a view to levelling social inequalities and determining the extent of the co-operation of welfare recipients, of lower income groups, of businessmen, of industrialists who must close down their factories, of tradesmen who go bankrupt.

The call for co-operation from all Canadians went too far, in my opinion, since the unbalance we experience actually and which is labelled by experts under the terrifying name of inflation is in fact nothing but the unreasonable shifting of purchasing power in the hands of the various sectors of society. Indeed there is inflation in the upper echelons of society and deflation in the less favored ones.

From the Prime Minister down to the latest newborn this year, we are all governed by money requirements in order to meet our personal, familial and social needs.

We need just as much money to live as we need the air we breathe. Clause 109 of Bill C-259 now under study is somewhat disturbing, since it does not fully recognize human needs. In fact, clause 109 on page 277 of the bill reads:

(1) For the purpose of computing the taxable income of an individual for a taxation year, there may be deducted from his income for the year such of the following amounts as are applicable:

(a) in the case of an individual who, during the year, was a married person who supported his spouse, an amount equal to the aggregate of

(i) $1,500, and

(ii) $1,350 less the amount, if any, by which the spouse's income for the year while married exceeds $250;

Mr. Chairman, at first sight, these proposals seem quite interesting, but they are clearly inadequate when we look at the consumer index for September 1971, for instance, which has reached 134.5 related to the basic year 1961.

If we take the year 1949 as the basic year, that is the year basic tax exemptions had been fixed, this index has now reached 174. As a matter of fact, the basic exemptions whose amount had been fixed in 1949 have never been reviewed, which leads us to believe that the workers have really been forgotten by the governments that have succeeded one another until now, and we find that the proposed increase provided in clause 109 of Bill C-259 is much below the increase in consumer prices.

Indeed, in the case where single people are concerned the exemption will be increased from $1,000 to $1,500 and in the case of married people without children it will be increased from $2,000 to $2,850. Thus we have recuperated 24 per cent in the first case and 31 per cent in the second case.

Simultaneously, our national production has increased fourfold. The assets of our chartered banks have increased sixfold. The stocks and shares of the 800 largest Canadian corporations have increased seventeenfold. And the salaries of the members of this House have been multiplied by 4.

In view of such inequities it seems to me that we must find solutions in order to correct this situation. We must not only bring the exemptions up to a level which will allow total recovery, but go beyond that level if we really want to alleviate the tax burden of the small and average taxpayers.

We must keep in mind that so far the increase in the cost of living has affected taxpayers in the low income bracket more, since the items for which prices have increased most are essentials—that is, food, clothing, and housing.

Above all, we must remember, in reference to this bill—and particularly to clause 109—that the revenues of all levels of government from personal income tax have increased from 20.6 per cent in 1961 to 31.5 per cent in 1971, which represents an 11 per cent increase.

The Economic Council of Canada stated in its 1968 report that the poverty line was situated at $2,000 for single people, and $3,500 for married couples without children.

Now, those figures are all higher than the basic exemptions suggested by the Minister of Finance. So, to remedy the situation, and because I want to respond to the right hon. Prime Minister who said that they needed the co-operation of all the citizens, I bring in my contribution this evening by moving the following amendment:

That Bill C-259 be amended by deleting from subparagraph (ii) of paragraph (a) of subclause (1) of clause 109 the figure "$1,350" and substituting therefor the figure "$2,500".

The Chairman: Order. Before I deal with the amendment I would observe that I understand the Chairman this afternoon had a similar amendment before him, although to a different part of the section, and he ruled it out of order. I would be pleased to hear argument from hon. members if they wish, although I have had an opportunity to discuss it with the occupant of the chair at that time. At this point, prima facie I would agree with his ruling, but I would not want to deprive hon. members of the opportunity to make submissions.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a few comments.

During the recess, I perused certain documents which lead me to believe that, according to the way the Standing Orders are interpreted in connection with moving of the amendment, there would not be any additional expenses entailed by the government nor any new taxes for the taxpayers.

Citation 265 of the 4th edition of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms has been quoted. It reads as follows:

No member other than a minister of the Crown may introduce a Bill for the reduction of duties. The government must take full responsibility for the taxation levied to provide the revenue. But the House enjoys complete freedom to make every representation possible to the Government with regard to the manner in which the ministers discharge this responsibility.

And it is added

This duty the members may perform by moving amendments to reduce the taxes proposed by the Administration.

Now, later the following can be read in comment 269:

—nor would any amendment to extend the imposition of a tax to persons enjoying an exemption therefrom be now permitted.

The objective here is not to extend taxes to another group, but to exempt certain people from a tax under Bill C-259.

I believe that the legislator sought, by way of that rule, to retain for the government the power to introduce fiscal legislation in Parliament.

Indeed, the matter was debated right here in the House of Commons on May 22, 1941 and the then Speaker delivered a ruling on an amendment brought forward on the occasion of the introduction of a bill seeking to increase the tax on gazoline to 3 cents. An hon. member had then presented an amendment tending to increase the tax to 4 cents. That was therefore a tax increase resulting from a private member's motion. The Speaker's ruling was put to the vote and upheld by the House, which is quite understandable to me.

Now, though I have made some quick research during recess, I could not find in our Standing Orders anything which forbids a member to expresse himself concretely in this House while introducing an amendment which would be such as to protect the taxpayers from an excessive tax burden.

In view of these circumstances, since we are considering the productive capacity of our vast country, and based on logical reasoning, it is possible for Canada to decrease the tax burden of certain categories of Canadians who, in our opinion, are overtaxed. So, we assume that we have the privilege to introduce an amendment for this purpose so as to urge this government to increase the basic exemption.

There, Mr. Chairman, are the few remarks that I wanted to bring to your attention before you make your decision.

[English]

The Chairman: Order, please. If no other hon. members would like to assist the Chair, if hon. members would bear with me I think it might be helpful if I were to outline as briefly as I can the principles applicable to the procedural acceptability of this motion. I think I might be justified in doing that because of the remarks just made by the hon. member for Bellechasse. I appreciate that there is in his mind and in the minds of other hon. members some question about the basis for the procedural acceptability of this motion.

The first consideration might be the rule of relevancy, and I would be of the opinion that the proposed amendment does not offend that rule. Second, there is the principle that no member may propose an amendment to increase taxation or extend its incidence. Again, I am of the opinion that the amendment now before the committee does not offend either aspect of the principle I have just stated. Indeed, the proposal before the Chair goes in the opposite direction in that it would have the effect not only of reducing that aspect of taxation, as the hon. member pointed out in his argument, but it would also restrict the incidence of the tax by eliminating taxation for a substantial number of persons who would be taxpayers under the proposal now found in the bill. On those first two principles I have no disagreement with hon. members who have argued that this motion is procedurally acceptable.

The third principle, however, that of the financial initiative of the Crown in relation to money and taxation proposals, gives the Chair some difficulty. I might, for example, ask hon. members who have argued either this afternoon or this evening whether this sort of motion is procedurally acceptable and whether they would suggest that as private members they could do something indirectly by means of an amendment such as this which they could not do directly by way of a bill. I would think the answer would be in the negative. I do not think it would be argued that a private member could amend, for example, the Income Tax Act by way of a bill.

It seems to me that it would matter little that the financial initiative of the government permits it to initiate a taxation proposal if it were then open to any member to propose, by way of amendment, a different substantive scheme of his own, and I think that is the situation the Chair has before it.

It seems to me that the proposition put forward by the hon. member for Portneuf does not amend the proposal put forward by the government it would, I suggest, supplant, rather than amend, the government's proposal. In effect, he would suspend the initiative of the Crown in taxation measures and thereby bring about a fundamental change in the financial procedures of this House. In his argument the hon. member referred to Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, citation 265. He made a very strong argument. However, it is important to distinguish between the matters which have been raised. Citation 265(1) of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition reads:

No member other than a minister of the Crown may introduce a bill for the reduction of duties. The government must take full responsibility for the taxation levied to provide the revenue. But the House enjoys complete freedom to make every representation possible to the government with regard to the manner in which the ministers discharge this responsibility. This duty the members may perform by moving amendments to reduce the taxes proposed by the administration.

As I understand the hon. member's argument, he is relying strongly on the words: "This duty the members may perform by moving amendments to reduce the taxes proposed by the administration." I would accept that citation as being binding upon the Chair and agree with that part of the hon. member's argument. If I may use an example, the hon. member would be free to move an amendment to reduce the rate of taxation from 10 per cent, say, to 9 per cent, if that would affect all taxpayers across the board.

If the hon. member could fit his proposal within that citation, the Chair, being bound by the citation, would have to accept it. However, I have to distinguish that situation from the motion. According to the motion, the hon. member is proposing that some taxpayers be relieved of the payment of taxes and this is where the fundamental difference comes in. According to the citation to which hon. members have referred and I have just read, it would be permissible for hon. members to reduce taxation across the board. That is what the citation says. By his motion the hon. member is proposing to reduce taxes for some Canadians, undoubtedly, and to eliminate taxation for others.

It seems to me that is the crux of the matter and on this distinction I have to base my decision. It would matter little that the government could initiate a taxation proposal if it were then open to any member to propose, by way of amendment, a substantive and overriding scheme of his own. With respect, I think that is what the hon. member has proposed. He is substituting a substantively different scheme for the scheme which is in the bill before the committee. I thank the hon. member for his very valuable argument; however, for the reasons I have given I must rule that the motion is not procedurally admissible.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Chairman, the provisions increasing exemptions from $1,000 to $1,500 for single people and from $2,000 to $2,850 for married couples are among the most mean, niggardly, unfair, unjust and inequitable parts of this bill.

An hon. Member: What about scandalous? That's a good word.

Mr. Gilbert: There are other sections which could be described in the same way, Mr. Chairman. However, the section referred to applies to so many Canadians of the lower income brackets that I feel impelled to speak on their behalf. When one considers that the basic, single person exemption was set at $1,000 in 1949 and that 22 years later it is to be increased to $1,500, and when one takes into account the tremendous increase in the cost of living since 1949, is it any wonder that I call this provision mean, niggardly, unfair, unjust and inequitable?

An hon. Member: Don't repeat all that again.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Chairman, when I remember what Mr. Carter said about tax exemptions—he preferred tax credits to replace them—I submit that if Mr. Carter were present this evening he would ask us strongly and forcefully to implement his ideas. An exemption of $1,500 for a single person means that any person earning over $30 a week will be taxed. An exemption of $2,850 means that any married couple earning over $55 a week will be taxed. Any married man earning more than that will pay tax.

Mr. Chairman, we tested the Minister of Finance a few months ago after he said during a radio broadcast that a single man could live on $30 a week. The hon. member for Winnipeg North brought forward a motion asking the minister to live on that amount of money for a time and then report back to the House. Of course, the idea was rejected because the minister and members on the Liberal side knew it was totally impossible for a single person to live on $30 a week. Yet when it comes to exemptions, that is what we do. As a result of these proposed changes, a single person earning over $30 a week will be taxed and a married person earning over $55 a week will be taxed.

One of the shortcomings of a democracy is that members on the government side must vote in support of government legislation. Try to picture the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton, a minister of the church, attempting to sell the principle in his riding of a $1,500 exemption for single persons. He would not succeed, Mr. Chairman. However, as a member of the Liberal party he is bound to support the government, to accept the proposal and to vote against any amendment which would increase the exemption.

Picture the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville, who represents a workingman's riding, attempting to persuade the people of his area that the $1,500 single persons' exemption is acceptable. He could not do it. Yet because we live under a democratic system the hon. member, if he supports his party, will vote for that exemption. There ought to be a free vote on this section because there are on the Liberal side many members whose hearts must ache and who must cringe when they consider that the government is increasing personal exemptions from $1,000 to $1,500 for single people, and so on. I cannot imagine even the worst Liberal, so to speak, supporting this type of increased exemption.

I notice the hon. member for Scarborough West, who is now a parliamentary secretary, pointing his finger at me and probably saying, "No, John, you are wrong." I ask him to take this bill to his riding and ask his people whether an exemption level which was set at $1,000 in 1949 is acceptable at $1,500 in 1971. Is that exemption level acceptable to the people who voted for him in 1968? I am sure, knowing his honesty and fairness, that he would say, "Of course it is not." Yet he is bound by his party to vote for this provision.

The very least we should do is increase the personal exemption from $1,000 to $2,000 for single people and from $2,850 to $4,000 for married couples. What does this mean, Mr. Chairman? If we increase the exemption to $2,000 for a single person he will then have to pay income tax on income over $40 a week. A married person will have to pay tax on income over $80 a week. I ask Your Honour and the members of this House how a single person can live on $40 a week and a married couple can live on $80 a week in today's world. It just is not realistic when one takes into account the high rents and cost of living that we have today.

The Economic Council of Canada underlined to this government what it means to live below the poverty line. They said the minimum amount required for a single person in 1968 was $1,850. They would now say the minimum should be $2,000 for a single person. They said at that time a married couple would require at least $3,200. Now they would say they require $4,000. Yet this government wants a segment of Canada to live below the poverty line. They want to impose tax on a single person who earns more than $1,500, and $2,850 for a married couple.

The member for Sault Ste. Marie comes from a workingman's family. He has done quite well in his profession. He was elected by the ordinary folk in that city. I am sure he feels ashamed this evening when discussing the exemptions the government has proposed. If he went back to his constituency and conducted a poll with regard to these exemptions, I am sure his people would object to them. I am surprised that the member for Sault Ste. Marie, who is a workingman's son and has worked himself, sits idly by, lets this section ride and will support the government on it.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Gilbert: The Minister of National Health and Welfare has made speeches in the past few weeks with regard to the guaranteed annual income. At times he has attempted to protect the unemployed. I admire him for his courage because at this time in our welfare state, which in many ways has been created by the Liberal government and has caused much heartache and divisiveness in the country, he is trying to protect the unemployed. The minister comes from the city of Hamilton where many people are unemployed and many are earning very low incomes. How can he justify these miserably low exemptions of $1,500 for single people and $2,850 for married couples?

I hear a voice from the west, the member for St. Boniface. I am sure there are many French speaking people in his constituency. The province of Quebec also has high unemployment, poverty and many other problems. We are now attempting to straighten out those problems by giving this miserable, mean, despicable increase from $1,000 to $1,500 for single people and $2,000 to $2,850 for married couples. I am sure he is not very proud that he is not speaking for the French people in St. Boniface and the French people in the province of Quebec who have suffered unemployment and poverty as a result of this government's policies.

[Translation]

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for St. Boniface on a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I wish to bring to Your Honour's attention that I speak with a great deal of pride for all the people in my constituency.

An hon. Member: You never speak.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): They are well represented.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gilbert: I am sure the hon. member for St. Boniface does not speak with any pride. He knows that in his constituency there is a tremendous amount of unemployment and poverty, yet he has the nerve to say that he speaks with pride.

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for St. Boniface is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. This only shows that because we have an NDP government in Manitoba we have a lot of trouble; we do not get the policies that the people in my constituency would like.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Chairman, I really feel sorry for the member for St. Boniface. I suppose he is taking it hard that the New Democratic Party won in Manitoba and are bringing forth good policies.

The Chairman: Order, please. I invite the member for Broadview to return to the section under discussion.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Chairman, may I return to the exemptions and point out that as a result of the increase from $1,000 to $1,500 for single people, a person who earns $2,000 will pay $75 income tax. With an exemption of $1,000, he would have paid $109. The tax saving as a result of this increase is $34 a year, or 65 cents a week. When the government brought forth the June budget that was so magnanimous it said it was prepared to go to the country on these changes. When the people of Canada studied the proposals and realized that a person earning $2,000 a year would receive a saving of $34 a year, or 65 cents a week—hardly the price of a package of cigarettes—the government quietened down with regard to the exemptions.

I was really disturbed this afternoon when the hon. member for Bruce spoke.

An hon. Member: You are always disturbed.

Mr. Gilbert: He said if we increased the exemptions to $2,000 for single people and $4,000 for married couples, it would cost $500 million. The hon. member for Winnipeg North answered that argument with strength. I shall read the facts with regard to ways and means of obtaining moneys to take care of any increase in exemptions. If we changed over to a tax credit rather than a tax exemption system, we would have a saving of $1,140 million. The use of tax credits in place of dependency deductions would bring in another $250 million. Full inclusion of capital gains and income, rather than the proposed system of computing one half of net capital gains, would account for another $100 million. The elimination of dividend tax credits would net another $139.3 million, while the elimination of depletion allowances for natural resource industries—

The Chairman: Order, please. The parliamentary secretary is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Mahoney: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member identify the authority from which he is reading with such certainty?

Mr. Gilbert: I cannot help but smile at the parliamentary secretary. This afternoon the member for Winnipeg North read it. He read it as evidence given by the Minister of Finance of Manitoba, which is backed up by research experts. He said he would prefer to accept the message from St. Paul than to accept the message from St. Pat. How true that is, because the message from St. Pat would certainly be coveted by those in his own city in view of the love he has for the oil companies. Certainly the message would be very twisted and turned if we accepted his.

[Mr. Guay (St. Boniface).]

I know it is very hard for the parliamentary secretary to accept this because he totally rejects the arguments put forward by the hon. member for Bruce. He probably gave the hon. member for Bruce the material regarding the $500 million, but we know what are the results of our own research and also the research done by the finance minister of Manitoba. The truth hurts, Mr. Chairman, and it certainly hurts the Liberals in mid-section.

If we were to eliminate depletion allowances for natural resource industries and the three-year exemption with no offsetting provisions, we would add another $224.6 million. If we were to limit capital cost allowances to actual wear and tear, revenues would be increased by $364.3 million. If we retained estate and gift taxes this would add another $65 million; and denial of convention and entertainment deductions would add another $5 million. Retaining maximum tax rates and increasing the progressivity of the tax system would yield another $1,000 million. In total, Mr. Chairman, we would net $3,282.2 million.

The argument of the hon. member for Bruce is that we cannot increase the personal exemption for a single person from $1,500 to $2,000 and for a married couple from $2,850 to $4,000 because it will cost $500 million. According to the argument of the Minister of Finance of Manitoba, by taking certain steps we can increase revenue by $3,000 million. So is it any wonder that the poor parliamentary secretary attempts to laugh off the argument and to shake his head and say that it cannot be done? Is it any wonder that I am striking this evening at some of the Liberals who come from ridings heavily populated by the working people? If they were to go back to their ridings and ask these people whether they are satisfied with the increase from $1,000 to $1,500 and from $2,000 to $2,850 at a time of high unemployment and high cost of living, there would be a total rejection of these exemptions.

I say that exemptions of $2,000 for a single person and of $4,000 for a married couple are the very minimum that this government should bring forward. I am sure some members will shake off their lethargy and when the times comes to vote on the section they will be men of courage, men of concern, men of compassion and will vote for the ordinary folk in the community rather than for the rich, fat-cats that support their party.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Chairman, I have the pleasure of saying a few words on clause 109 of the bill which concerns the vast majority of Canadian workers.

I am particularly concerned while studying this clause to note that the federal government always seems to be in agreement with the advice of those economists who are in favour of tax increases only. For example, when leading Canadian economists advocate tax cuts for all taxpayers, they are not listened to. Their recommendations seem not to be taken into account. The government apparently listens only to those who favour a continuous increase in taxes.

In Le Devoir of May 2, 1971, Canadian economists stated that:

Ottawa should reduce personal income tax and sales tax.

The government should reduce the personal income tax and the federal sales tax in order to stimulate productivity and slow down salary inflation, said economist Grant L. Reuber, Director of the Economics Department of Western University in London.

So, Mr. Chairman, here is an economist who demands tax reductions, but to whom the government, apparently, does not listen.

I continue with my quotation:

According to Mr. Reuber, the Bank of Canada has made Canada's economic problems more serious by going from one extreme to the other and by alternating between credit restrictions and capital flow into the banking system.

Further, Canadian taxes are traditionally high and American tax reductions could be used as a basis for radical changes in the tax system.

Here is an economist who is in favour of continued economic progress while at the same time asking for tax reductions. One tends to believe, when one is speaking to the government, when tax reductions are in question, that automatically they will entail a reduction in revenue for the government.

At this point, I should like to refer to a speech made on American television by a former president of the United States, and which was published in the "United States News Annual Report" of September 30, 1963. I quote:

[English]

President Kennedy's address to the nation by radio and television, September 18, 1963—

President's reasons for tax cuts—

[Translation]

If the then President of United States felt a tax cut in his country would be favourable to the Canadian as well as to the American economy as a whole, the same reasons prevail in 1971. These reasons which were put forward in the United States in 1963 might well be the same that would justify the Canadian government to cut taxes in 1971.

[English]

First: A tax cut means more jobs for American workers. More after-tax money means more buying power for consumers and investors—and this means more production and the jobs our nation needs. Merely to reduce unemployment to a more acceptable level in the next two and a half years, we must create more than 10,000 new jobs every day. We cannot effectively attack the problem of teenage crime and deliquency as long as so many of our young people are out of work. We cannot effectively solve the problem of racial injustice as long as unemployment is high. We cannot tackle the problem of automation when we are losing one million jobs every year to machines.

Second: A tax cut means new protection against another tragic recession. I do not say that a recession is inevitable without a tax cut, or impossible with one. But, excluding war years, we have had a recession on the average every 42 months since World War II—or every 44 months since World War I. And by next January, it will be 44 months since the last recession began. Recessions mean high unemployment and high budget deficits.

• (9:00 p.m.)

Mr. Chairman, when the federal government is on the point of showing a very high deficit, this points, as the President of United States stated in 1963, to an economic recession.

[English]

Of all kinds of waste, they are the worst. We need a tax cut to keep this present drive from running out of gas.

And third: A tax cut means new markets for American business. American citizens will spend, as history shows us, an overwhelming percentage of the extra after-tax dollars left in their pockets; and this spending will broaden markets for businessmen, put idle machines to work, and require new machines and new factories to be built—

Fourth: A tax cut means higher family income and higher business profit and a balanced federal budget.

[Translation]

That is inconsistent with what the hon. members opposite have seemingly believed for generations, namely, that a tax cut means less income for the federal government.

[English]

A tax cut means higher family income and higher business profit and a balanced federal budget. Every taxpayer and his family will have more money left over after taxes for a new car, a new home, new conveniences, education and investments. Every businessman can keep a higher percentage of his profits in his cash register, or put it to work expanding or improving his business. And as the national income grows, the federal government will ultimately end up with more revenues.

[Translation]

This, Mr. Chairman, once more has not been understood by the government, I think.

I go on quoting:

[English]

Prosperity is the real way to balance our budget—

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, prosperity is the only solution if we are to balance the budget.

I go on with the quotation:

[English]

Fifth and finally: A tax cut means new strength around the world for the American dollar and for freedom. A tax cut can help us balance our international accounts and end the outflow of gold by helping make the American economy more efficient and more productive and more competitive, by enabling our goods to compete with those who are developing foreign factories, and by making investments in America more attractive than investments abroad—

This nation needs a tax cut now—not a tax cut "if" and "when" but a tax cut now and for the future.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, those are the five reasons given by the president of the United States in 1963 to outline the economic policy to be followed in that country.

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Louis-Hébert): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order.

An hon. Member: The hon. member for Louis-Hébert wishes to be recognized.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Cantin: I would like to direct a question to the hon. member who is speaking, Mr. Chairman.

An hon. Member: Then it is not a point of order.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member knows that he cannot ask a question on the ground that it is a point of order. In any case he must previously ask the permission of the hon. member who has the floor.

Does the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Rondeau: Certainly, Mr. Chairman, as long as it will not affect the time allotted to me.

Mr. Cantin: The hon. member has quoted the views of an economist which apparently have been published in Canadian newspapers in May 1971 and in American newspapers in 1963. I would have preferred him to quote editorials published after the introduction of Bill C-259, that is after June 18, 1971, because that would be more enlightening for us. Indeed what has been said before that date may be quite different from what has been said afterwards.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Chairman, if I wanted to answer that question, I would have to ask the hon. member several others because his question is so impenetrable that it is difficult to understand it.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the data quoted in 1963 are quite the same as those that the economists have been quoting every day since the budget speech.

In fact, if we are to have a balanced budget, if we want our economy to remain alive, we need to have prosperity in Canada. Any intelligent man, any logical economist, favours prosperity in order to boost the economy and to allow the federal government to have a balanced budget—a great cause of worry for hon. members on the other side when we ask for tax reductions. This is precisely what the speaker before me did when he asked for a basic exemption of $3,000 for single people, and $5,000 for married couples. They think that the federal government would lose considerable revenues by granting such exemptions.

Considering we have thousands of unemployed in Canada and the economy is not progressing, the national treasury is losing very substantial revenues anyway.

Mr. Chairman, as the previous speaker said, today single Canadians will have to pay federal taxes the moment they earn a salary equivalent to $30 a week. For married people, the amount will be $57 a week. I am convinced those figures are totally illogical and unrealistic.

This is why we ask that the basic exemption be set at $3,000 for any single person and $5,000 for married persons.

Mr. Chairman, if we want to get our economy moving again, we must put an end to the inefficient administration of the country: we should avoid travelling the same financial and economic paths that have been trodden for more than 100 years in Canada. If we do not change our attitude in regard to the financial measures and the financial doctrine which the government, through the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), seems to apply and according to which those who are well off should be gradually dispossessed, we will end up with a society of dispossessed people.

If we want to eradicate unemployment, we should create prosperity. We must provide incentives to those who wish to invest in Canada. The only reason for investing is capital gain. With the current budget or the tax reform of the Minister of Finance, we are about to eliminate private initiative in Canada, and this is no way to improve our competitiveness since one of our present problems is being unable to sell our production on world markets. Our production has become too costly, taxes are too high and when the private sector adds up its production costs retail prices are too high. We cannot compete with foreign countries.

The Deputy Chairman.]

If we want to keep our present share of both domestic and foreign markets, it is an absolute necessity for us to leave the beaten track of present orthodox finance so as to enable the Canadian economy to expand, to produce what we can produce, as we have the needed skill, manpower, equipment, raw materials and natural resources. This country is extraordinarily rich but our economic system is outdated. The taxation system no longer meets the needs of private enterprise.

Should we wish to establish an economic system by means of which the government would own everything, should we wish to establish a socialist system, we need only to keep on smothering those who would like to see this country become great and prosperous.

I am always dismayed to see our hon. friends opposite ready to tax further private enterprise in Canada, to tax further the small wage earner, the worker by limiting the basic exemption to $30 a week for single persons and to $57 a week for married people.

Not more than six months ago, we had the opportunity in this House to vote on salary increases for members of Parliament. We did not bother then to determine whether or not those increases would create a deficit in the budget of the hon. Minister of Finance, nor where the Minister of Finance would find the money. There was no discussion, apart from the opposition coming from this corner of the House.

It seems to me that when we speak on behalf of the population as a whole, of the majority of workers who have to work hard to feed their families, it is absurd in 1971 to talk about a basic exemption of $1,500 for single persons and $2,850 for married couples.

Mr. Chairman, I therefore support what my hon. colleagues submitted by way of amendments, and I hope that the government—not before the next elections but very soon—will reconsider these facts and listen to economists who do not always advocate tax increases but increased prosperity for Canada, which might perhaps mean the same revenues for the federal Treasury.

[English]

Mrs. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, this government reminds me of the farmer who had a horse. He had an idea one day that he could save money by taking away a handful of hay from the manger and that this would not make any difference to the horse. He decided the following day that if he took away two handfuls he would save more money in feeding the horse. He did this day after day, taking away one more handful each day. He was getting on very well. He was saving a nice pile of money. Unfortunately, the horse died.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mrs. MacInnis: This farmer was so busy looking at the savings he could make in scraping off a little bit of hay every day from his horse that he did not look at the horse, and as a result ended up penny wise and pound foolish: he lost the horse at the end of the process. I do not consider the farmer was a particularly wise person, and I think this government is exceedingly unwise to do what it is doing with the low-income people of this country.

Evidently this government does not worry if someone says it is heartless and does not care. What worries the government is if it is told it is inefficient and not up on modern ways of technology and monetary success. I suggest that by going ahead and scraping and scraping away the livelihood of the low-income people who earn the wages and do the work in this country, the government is following a very foolish procedure indeed. Do not forget: the difference between the farmer's horse and the people on low income in this country is that the low wage earners are learning very slowly but surely that they are simply being robbed a little more, a little more and a little more.

I know people in my riding, and I am sure hon. members opposite know people in their constituencies, who are working for small wages, who are very self-respecting, who are very independent in their jobs, whose problems are increasing just as steadily as the burdens the government is placing on them in the way of increased taxation, who have children to feed and clothe and who must pay high rents. Remember, when the cost of food, clothing and rent steadily increases over a period, a few points here and a few points there, and the cost of living is going up steadily in this country, the low wage earners know this very well and feel it.

These people must have food and clothing. They have to pay as much for their bread, meat and other food items as do people like ourselves who took occasion to raise our own income because it was felt it was no longer adequate to buy food and clothing and to pay for the shelter and other things which Members of Parliament need. People who are earning low salaries and incomes have to pay the same amount for groceries as the rest of us. They have no way to prevent the landlord from continually raising the rent bit by bit by bit.

These are the people who see the opportunities they thought they had to send their young folk to school and college whittled away because the cost of living has not left them enough to carry on the education of their children. This is what is happening across the country. The people are beginning slowly, but very surely, to understand what is happening. I think this government received a nasty shock over the last few weeks when it discovered that the farmers in western Canada were not going to accept something they did not want and that the government could not tell them in fancy language that it knew far better what the farmers and farm organizations wanted. The people on the Prairies said they did not want it and were not going to take it. They were not going to be told it was better for them than what they wanted.

I warn the government that across the country there are thousands and thousands of families who know what they want and they are gradually reaching the point where they will completely reject this government. What for? For complete unfairness and discrimination. They know very well that the government has allowed the higher wage and salary earners and large corporations in this country to get away with far less than their share of the tax burden, and that a far greater share has been loaded on the low wage earner and people with small incomes.

That gentleman of the cloth over there can smile all he likes. If he were following the teaching he was raised on he would know it is very bad to grind the faces of the poor and get after the poor widows, fatherless children, and so on. But since he has been on that side of the House he has forgotten all the teachings he had in his early youth.

I have just returned from my riding where I saw once again how hard people are trying to have faith in this Parliament and how much they are hoping it will give them an opportunity to make their own way in decency. I become angry because it seems so hopeless to get Members of Parliament on the other side to realize what they are doing to the wage earners in this country. Heaven alone knowws why they are doing it, because they have had enough warnings to realize that they cannot get away with it. There is no use their using the old excuse that they have to put these imposts on—

• (9:20 p.m.)

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Gibson: May I say, with the greatest respect, Mr. Chairman, that the remarks of the hon. member are very interesting but I submit they are irrelevant. The type of address she is making would be relevant to the Throne Speech but not to the section under debate.

An hon. Member: Get your foot out of your mouth and sit down.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The Chair appreciates the remarks of the hon. member, but I was following closely the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway and I have the impression that the hon. member intended to reach a conclusion relating to the exemption or to some other aspect of the section before the committee.

Is the hon. member for Peace River rising on a point of order?

Mr. Baldwin: May I suggest that the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth might be next to give us his idea of a speech which is relevant?

Mrs. MacInnis: If anything were needed to prove the relevance of what I have just said, it is the point of order just raised over there. The very fact that the hon. member thinks that what I am saying is irrelevant proves why they are unwilling over there to raise the exemptions, and shows exactly the arrogance that goes before a fall. When the fall comes it will be mighty.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member should address herself to the Chair and then it might be easier for other hon. members to follow the debate.

Mrs. MacInnis: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I will speak to what is relevant whether or not these people think it is. My colleague, the hon. member for Broadview, has demolished the excuse that they cannot give higher exemptions, by quoting the Carter report which states where these extra amounts could be found. If the taxation system of this government had been based on ability to pay, we would not have to ask the government to raise the exemptions to $2,000 for single people and $4,000 for married persons. The government would have done so, not out of compassion but because the economists who wrote the Carter report told them that that was the thing to do and that that was the way in which to run a sound economy.

I want to point out that with the cost of living rising as it is, it is perfectly ridiculous for us to be stuck with exemptions which have improved so little since the famous first exemption of $1,000, 22 years ago. Surely it is ridiculous that there is no relationship between the rising cost of living and the way in which the exemptions have been increased. I do not believe any study has been carried out or any correlation made between the exemptions and the rise in the cost of living. If so, we have certainly not heard about it from the government.

In my opinion, if this government had been doing the right thing we would not now have to plead for these exemptions. We would have had the government carrying the study to fruition, that is to a guaranteed income, and thus all Canadians would have an income on which they could live. An escalator clause could have been added to raise income in accordance with the cost of living and we would not be having to ask for these exemptions today.

I say to the government that the very least they can do now is try to make up for their glaring neglect in ensuring that people have an income on which they can exist, an income which should rise in accordance with the cost of living. The least they can do is to raise these exemptions to $2,000 for single people and $4,000 for married people, and even that is far from what is required today.

A scientific survey should be carried out as to how much it costs to live, and the taxation rates should be set in accordance with it. Those of us who are in this House sometimes feel that the big danger when people get into government is that they become so insulated and so remote that they do not know any more what people on lower incomes are thinking and how they are feeling. There are no people as blind as those who do not want to see, nor as deaf as those who do not want to hear.

I wish I could bring the collective voice of people on low incomes to sound out here in the House. Then hon. members on the other side could hear the opinion of the great majority of low income people across this country. Sometimes one has a great sense of frustration in trying to get this government to hear and to react in time. No doubt in time they will be brought to make changes, but it may be too late then for many families.

Remember this, Mr. Chairman, when we urge that exemptions be raised we urge for something else along with it. I know a great many families who are practically giving up hope because they have to exist on their present income. They feel they are being taxed to death, taxed to keep people on social assistance, taxed for roads, taxed for schools, taxed for everything. If these exemptions could be raised even to the amounts we are suggesting, it would put heart into a great many people who today feel they simply cannot carry on because the burden is too crushing. I am not exaggerating; I am repeating what I am hearing and what you people would hear if you were not tied so tightly to the party discipline which makes you put wax in your ears and blinkers on your eyes.

[Mrs. MacInnis.]

I appeal to the backbench members, if there are some of you who do not have parliamentary secretaryships and who are not yet tainted with the virus of ambition. I urge you to listen to the people in your ridings. If you are afraid of speaking out in the House, do it behind the scenes. I appeal to you not to break down the will of people who are wage earners and who contribute to the taxation of this country in the measure they can. Do not make them bear burdens that do not belong to them. I wish that even at this late stage the parliamentary secretary would reconsider this section and try to achieve a little more fairness in it. Let him do so even from a selfish point of view. It would do far more to recoup the fortunes of the Liberal party than almost anything else.

I should not be giving him that kind of advice, and his party would have to do a great deal more to save themselves. But at least they should work in that direction. If they will not listen to reason, let them raise the exemptions for reasons of simple self-preservation because, believe me, if they go on acting in this way with regard to the low income people they will need all the self-preservation measures they can take.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre earlier today cited the Carter commission report as his authority for saying that a tax credit system was desirable in Canada. He said that the report recommended a tax credit system. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, who has just spoken, cited the Carter commission report as her authority for saying that it advocated greatly increased exemptions. I think it would be useful at this point to remind the committee of just what the Carter commission did say in terms of the areas relevant to the provisions proposed in sections 109 and 110 of the bill before us.

In the first place, the Carter commission report did not entirely recommend a system of tax credits. As usual, the hon. member for Winnipeg North was about half right—

Mr. Orlikow: That is half more than you are ever right.

Mr. Mahoney: —and that, of course, has an obverse side to it, which is rather typical. The Carter report did recommend a system of basic exemptions for single and married persons and for dependent children. The single rate that exists and is proposed under the current bill, according to the Carter recommendations would be replaced by two personal rate schedules, one for families, in accordance with the family unit concept of the commission, and the other for individuals. The basic exemption Carter proposed for individuals was $1,000, exactly as it is today, and not the increase to $1,500 that is proposed in this bill. The basic exemption for the family unit that Carter proposed was $2,100, not the $2,850 that is proposed in this bill.

Carter did not deal with exemptions for dependent children, moving instead to a tax credit system. He recommended that the tax credit for the first child be $100 and for each additional child $60. He further recommended tax credits for working mothers, in the sum of $80 for a working mother with school age children and $200 for a working mother with pre-school children.

The present system of exemptions for close relatives other than dependent children or spouses was also to be replaced with a tax credit which was related to the expenditures made in support of such dependents. An individual or family unit would have a tax credit of $100 for each close relative to whom more than $1,000 had been given during the year for the support of that close relative. That tax credit would be scaled down depending on the degree of support given to the close relative.

Also, the Carter commission recommended, in respect of the areas dealt with in sections 109 and 110, that the special deduction from income of $500 for a taxpayer who has reached age 70 be terminated. Of course, the government in the current bill recommends that that special exemption be increased to $650 and be extended to taxpayers aged 65 and over. The commission also recommended that the special deduction of $500 for taxpayers who are blind, or confined to bed or a wheel-chair and who do not claim certain defined medical expenses. should be withdrawn. The government, in the present bill proposes that that $500 exemption be increased to $650.

There have been numerous other points raised during the debate today that I am sure I will have an opportunity later to deal with specifically. But in view of the increasing frequency of citations of the Carter commission report by spokesmen for the NDP, all of whom seem to be more than a little confused as to what the report actually recommended, I thought it would be worth while at this point to place on record those recommendations which are relevant to the sections under consideration.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Chairman, I raise a small point on which I would like clarification from the parliamentary secretary. It concerns section 110 and payment for full-time care of a taxpayer in a nursing home. The definition of a nursing home seems to be in doubt. My attention was directed to the case of a person over 100 years of age, who had a small pension from a son who had died, plus her old age pension. Apparently she was required to pay tax on this income even though at that advanced age she was pretty well receiving full-time attention in a nursing home.

I believe there may be a difficulty in connection with the definition of a nursing home due to the fact that provincial authorities, under which nursing homes are licensed, differ in their definitions with respect to nursing homes, boarding homes and hostels. Perhaps a proper definition will be easier to arrive at as time goes on and provincial authorities enforce stricter licensing procedures. I should like the parliamentary secretary to comment on this point.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I also wish to raise a point with the parliamentary secretary. It is technical one. Before I get into it perhaps I could add to the story that has been related to us by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway about the farmer who kept putting less hay into the horse's manger until he suddenly found himself with a dead horse and, I suppose, some uneaten hay. Perhaps the moral of the story is that it does save a lot of wear and tear on mangers.

The parliamentary secretary listed the Carter commission recommendations, but I think hon. members should be reminded that there has been a considerable amount of inflation since those recommendations were made. The technical question I have arises out of section 109(1)(b)(ii)(B). This concerns the exemptions to be given for support of those who are "connected by blood relationship, marriage or adoption." I wonder if the parliamentary secretary's advisers could tell us what interpretation is intended to be made of this wording. The first part of my question deals with people who are connected by marriage. Does this include all step-relations, and does it include in-law relationships?

I would also point out to him that with a change of heart on the part of the government and the use of a phrase in this section about maintaining a self-contained domestic establishment, one could fit in all those unmarried couples living together in Canada and give them the benefit of the income tax reform. However, I do not expect the parliamentary secretary to answer that question tonight. I believe the minister will have to re-examine it. But I do ask the technical question about whether those connected by marriage include step-relations and in-laws, or just one and, if so, which one?

Mr. Baldwin: May I add to the point made by my hon. friend and raise the question of adoption. I have had occasion to raise this matter once or twice earlier. I recognize that most provinces have adoption legislation, but I think it is still recognized that adoption by fact is a common-law means by which there can be established a relationship between a child and an adult. Are there any circumstances under which adoption by fact, within the meaning of this subsection, may be acceptable?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I acknowledge to the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants that there has been considerable inflation since the Carter report was published. However, I seriously question whether this would have affected the recommendations that certain extended and increased exemptions be abolished. If they were to be reduced to zero for people aged 70 and over or, say, people confined to a wheel-chair, I cannot see how intervening inflation would affect that type of reduction.

On the specific recommendation, I refer the hon. member to section 251 (6) of the act which defines persons related by blood relationship, etc., for the purpose of the act. When he has examined that section, if he has further questions I shall endeavour to answer them.

I would refer the hon. member for Peace River to section 252 (1) (b) where it states that in the act words referring to the child of a taxpayer include:

> a person who is wholly dependent on the taxpayer for support and of whom the taxpayer has, or immediately before such person attained the age of 21 years did have, in law or in fact, the custody and control,

I think that covers the de facto adoption to which he referred.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make some remarks in reply to those of the parliamentary secretary who appears to have been stunned by the point made by my colleague, the hon. member for Broadview, about the oil companies.

Mr. Mahoney: Did he say something about that?

Mr. Saltsman: I am absolutely amazed at the position he took when he pointed out what the Carter commission recommended and what his government is doing. The assumption seems to be that this government has been generous to a fault in comparison with the Carter commission recommendations. That is about as dishonest an argument as I have ever heard in this House.

The central point of the Carter commission report was that equity between taxpayers be established, and the parliamentary secretary trots out the facts of the old age pension to show how much more generous his government is than Carter might have been. It is a totally misleading picture that he draws. He says nothing about the $225 million worth of taxes that we should be receiving from the resource industries, as recommended by Carter, and which we are not receiving. That would have gone a long way toward relieving old age pensioners of their burdens.

The exemption brought in by this government, which amounts to a few dollars for the old age pensioner, is not going to help them greatly. What is needed, and what was suggested in many of Carter's recommendations, is an increase in the old age pension. This is of more significance to the senior citizen than an exemption of a couple of dollars a year in the taxation system. The proposals attempt to make an essentially unfair system look better with the kind of cosmetic arrangement that the parliamentary secretary has suggested.

When discussing the Carter commission report it is grossly unfair to point to some of these areas without drawing the major conclusion made by the commission, that all taxpayers, all wage and salary earners including those in the middle-income bracket, would have their positions substantially improved and their tax substantially lowered if all the people who had been getting away without paying their fair share were included in the tax picture. There was not a word about that from the parliamentary secretary, and I think in all fairness to the debate he should have pointed that out.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Mahoney: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I must decline the hon. member's invitation to apologize for dealing with matters relative to sections 109 and 110.

An hon. Member: What a contribution. How gracious.

An hon. Member: That brings you back to the facts.

Mr. Saltsman: The parliamentary secretary's gracious attempt to decline from engaging in this debate on the basis of relevance is new. I have never known him to be concerned about relevance before and I do not know what his great concern is tonight. He certainly was not very relevant in the remarks he made a short while ago.

[Mr. Saltsman.]

Mr. Mahoney: It is supposed to be relevant; it is in the headlines.

Mr. Reid: You do not give him the opportunity to be relevant.

Mr. Saltsman: You are not very relevant in the backbenches either. Well, you probably are. It seems to be a very appropriate position for the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River.

Mr. Chairman, one of the advantages of a system of tax credits rather than of exemptions is that it would indicate the true level of taxation in this country. One of the difficulties of our present system of using the exemption basis rather than the tax credit is that it makes our tax system look far more progressive than it is. Our tax system is not progressive. When you try to increase revenues, those who have the money cry about how heavily they are being taxed when in fact they are not.

My colleagues have done a good job of pointing out that the person in the upper income bracket receives far more advantage from a system of exemptions than the person in the lower income bracket. Yet the person in the upper bracket complains about his steep taxes and does not mention the advantages he receives. If we had tax credits we could in fact obtain the revenue which we are getting now. I am confining my remarks to this particular section, but it is necessary to point out, Mr. Chairman, that the whole tax system is riddled with this kind of inconsistency.

The marginal rate does not reflect the depletion allowances that people in the higher income brackets receive. It doees not reflect their after-tax income because of the advantage they get under the dividend tax rate. It does not reflect their after-tax income because capital gains are not included, and under the proposed bill will only be half included. There is a misleading picture when those with higher incomes can say they are being heavily taxed and in fact many of them are not paying as high a rate as the ordinary person with an income below $10,000.

The Carter commission pointed out that the lower and middle income groups of this country were bearing the chief burden of the cost of government and the cost of social services in this country, and that it was unfair because everyone should pay according to their ability. The parliamentary secretary prefers to ignore this fact and to point out the little things in the report that are pot-boilers, that would arouse some emotion. Admittedly, there are some things in that report about which we do not feel too happy. But Carter was suggesting, in the context of equity, the inclusion of all forms of income. We feel that should have been done.

On numerous occasions, Mr. Chairman, we have pointed out the importance of everyone paying their fair share because in a system such as ours there is no such thing as tax avoidance. One man's tax avoidance is the next man's tax burden. To the extent that people in the upper income bracket receive special benefits, whether from resource industries or capital gains, wage and salary earners are paying higher taxes than they should.

My colleagues have advocated an increase in the basic exemptions to $2,000 for a single person and $4,000 for a married man, and have indicated they would prefer a tax credit system. However, it seems that the government is adamant on that point, so we are prepared to argue that at the very least we ought to increase these exemptions in order to be fairer to people in the lower income brackets. This argument is particularly cogent at this time when we are desperately trying to reduce the level of unemployment in Canada. The government itself acknowledges that we must take steps to increase consumer purchasing power. What better way of increasing consumer purchasing power is there than increasing the exemption levels of single and married people who are in the lower income brackets?

An hon. member said that it would cost half a billion dollars to grant these exemptions. The Minister of Finance, in his announcement of two weeks ago, indicated he was prepared to grant corporations tax reductions which would cost the treasury between $160 million and $175 million. Since there is no indication that any savings made at that level will filter down and stimulate the economy, would it not have been better if the Minister of Finance had granted increased income tax exemptions in order to stimulate the economy? I think most people will agree that that method would have stimulated the economy far more effectively at this time. That method of stimulation, I submit, is preferable to the method under which corporate taxes have been reduced.

I do not think we ought to be concerned so much about the government's being deprived of vast sums of revenue if exemptions are increased to the levels we suggest. We ought to be more concerned about transferring benefits that the government has given to certain sectors of industry to people who pay income tax and, particularly, to those at the lower end of the income scale.

I hope that those with thick heads on the government side of the House are listening to the points we are making. I hope hon. members over there feel some degree of sympathy for suggestions that we on this side of the House are making. I hope some people over there who may know what is going on will support the position the opposition is taking on increased exemption levels for Canadians. I hope they consider this matter both from the viewpoint of their party and of the taxpayer. Let them show fairness to those who have been denied fairness for too long. Let us move to stimulate the economy at this time when it so desperately needs stimulation.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Chairman, in debating sections 109 and 110 of this bill we really have had to contend and grapple with two basic issues. One is the extent of relief from taxation which is to be afforded people through a variety of methods and how the division of that relief from taxation is to be brought about; in other words, how the dollars of exemption or credit, or whatever it is, are to be divided up. Second, we have had to deal with the establishment of a tax system that is capable of being adjusted and changed to take into account new economic circumstances and developments in our economy and society as a whole. Mr. Chairman, I think that this is at the heart of the debate because we are now discussing tax credits and tax exemptions.

I was surprised at the intervention of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance. He seemed to suggest that Carter was not that hot on the idea of the tax credit system and that he came forward with it only in a half-baked way, so to speak. For the benefit of the parliamentary secretary and members of the committee, may I quote some of the comments made by the Carter commission on this particular subject. I intend to continue my remarks tomorrow, Mr. Chairman, and therefore I shall deal now with only one point. Dealing with the purpose of tax credits as against exemptions, Carter had this to say:

> We believe that the primary purpose of the additional allowances for dependants, working wives, educational support, and so forth, is to reduce the tax burden on low income families whose ability to pay is most heavily affected by the additional non-discretionary expenses resulting from each of these circumstances. We therefore regard the use of tax credits as a more efficient means of achieving this objective. Accordingly, we have recommended the adoption of tax credits in place of exemptions to reflect the effect of family responsibilities upon ability to pay, and have used the tax revenue gained from this substitution both to increase the effective allowances to low income families and to reduce marginal tax rates below what they would otherwise be.

It seems to me that in this paragraph Mr. Carter set forth the principle clearly that you need a tax credit system if you are to bring about the type of relief that is envisaged when you bring in any form of exemption, credit or whatever it may be. On page 180 of volume 3 of the report which was published in 1966, some five years ago, Mr. Carter pointed out the differences between tax credits and exemptions. He said that the difference between tax credits and exemptions is simple. Of course, members of the other side of the House seem to have failed to grasp this fact. Mr. Carter went on to say:

> A tax credit involves a reduction in taxes of a given amount, while an exemption grants a reduction in taxable income. The latter results in a tax reduction that increases with income. Because an exemption excludes from tax the last dollars of income received by a taxpayer, the value of an exemption depends upon the marginal rate applicable to the taxpayer. A tax credit, on the other hand, in effect exempts a given amount of the first dollars of a taxpayer's income. A tax credit thus affects all taxpayers in the same amount, while an exemption provides an allowance which increases in value as income increases ... To put this in other terms, the revenue loss resulting from the use of exemptions is higher than from the use of credits, where credits and deductions achieve the same result for low income families.

The government failed to recognize or grasp that principle put forward by the Carter commission, and for that they should hang their heads in shame.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY—REQUEST FOR ESTIMATE OF NUMBER OF JOBS PROVIDED BY NEW GOVERNMENT PROGRAM

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, on October 15 I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) whether he would table an estimate as to the number of people who would be employed this coming winter as the result of the proposals made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) two weeks ago for dealing with the very heavy unemployment which we are facing. The Prime Minister, in his characteristic way, answered with one word, "No." I was not the least satisfied with that answer.

One cannot help realizing how serious the situation will be this coming winter. In September of this year, the last month for which figures are available, there were 434,000 people unemployed. That represents 7.1 per cent of the labour force, calculated on a seasonally adjusted rate. In September, 1967, the last September before this Prime Minister and the government were elected to run the country, there were 219,000 people unemployed. The seasonally adjusted rate was 4.1 per cent.

Ever since the Prime Minister and this government were elected, the rate of unemployment has risen sharply. This year, month by month the rate of unemployment is running approximately 10 per cent higher than the same period last year. In February, 1971, the worst month for unemployment, there were 675,000 people unemployed. A rough calculation of adding 10 per cent, which is a very conservative estimate because it does not take into account the American economic measures announced and instituted by President Nixon, indicates that approximately 750,000 people will be unemployed. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) estimated that the effects of the Nixon economics, if implemented for a full year, will add 90,000 to the number of unemployed in Canada. If one takes half of that for February of this year, you get another 50,000 people unemployed. As I said on another occasion, the estimate I give is not one which I calculated; it is an estimate prepared by one of the most eminent economists in this country. We have a potential unemployment this February of 800,000 people.

The government announced a program of public works at the federal level through the provinces, municipalities and volunteer organizations. It announced it will spend between $450 million and $500 million. A few days ago the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) pointed out that $10 million is to be spent on upgrading agricultural exhibition buildings. He estimated that 1,000 jobs will be provided through the expenditure of that $10 million. In other words, the Minister of Agriculture estimated it will cost $10,000 to produce one job. By using the same calculation for the $450 million to $500 million which the government proposes to spend this winter, 45,000 to 50,000 jobs will be created. That is not good enough. We will still be left with 700,000 or more people unemployed this coming winter.

The Prime Minister has said on many occasions that the situation is getting better, the economy is improving and the rate of unemployment will be following, if not today, tomorrow, next week or next month. The people of Canada have a right to demand that the Prime Minister and the government say how many jobs will be produced this winter as a result of the program announced by the Minister of Finance, and how many unemployed there will be next winter. I know that economists in the Department of Manpower and Immigration, the Department of Labour and the Department of Finance have made these calculations. The Prime Minister and the government not only have a responsibility but a duty to tell the people of Canada what kind of winter they face this year with regard to unemployment.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member well knows, predictions in any precise terms of the number of jobs created by a given program cannot be made with any degree of certainty. It is always possible, of course, to predict a certain rise or fall in employment in very general terms. Indeed, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) in his presentation on October 14 indicated that, as he had forecast, there are now some 200,000 more jobs in the economy than there were a year ago.

The design of the current program is to stimulate employment opportunities for the great many new entrants into the labour force and, wherever possible, to protect from lay-offs those who are currently at work. Much of the current program involves tax cuts which are designed to increase consumer spending, thereby increasing the demand for goods and services. But how is it possible to predict accurately the number of people who will be protected from lay-offs as a result of these measures?

Similarly, with the balance of the program consisting of loans and grants to provinces, municipalities and associations, as well as massive housing construction programs and other programs associated with residential construction, the final number of jobs created no longer rests entirely with the government but, rather, depends upon the response of those to whom these programs are directed. There is, in addition, the multiplier effect of increased consumer spending and the indirect effect created thereby, because when the government spends sums of money, money is also enticed out of the savings repositories of associations, municipalities and individuals. Thus, how can we fairly delineate the exact amount of government responsibility for all these increased activities?

Accordingly, while the government has every expectation that the jobs stimulus of this program will be very dramatic, and while it may be possible later to ascribe a fairly exact ratio of jobs created or saved to dollars spent, it is regrettably impossible at this moment in time to give an accurate answer to the kind of question put forward by the hon. member.

ATOMIC ENERGY—RESUMPTION OF STUDY OF POSSIBLE ESTABLISHMENT OF HEAVY WATER PLANT AT MONTMAGNY

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, tonight I should like to revert to a matter which I raised in a question I asked to the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) on October 19, 1971, that is the possibility of establishing a heavy water plant in Montmagny.

In my question, I referred to the year 1966, but Hansard, by mistake, mentioned the year 1970. However, the year in question is actually 1966. My question appeared on the Order Paper in 1969.

Now, I have received on that matter a letter from the Montmagny Textile Union, which was sent in September. The letter reads as follows:

The Montmagny Syndicat du Textile wants to point out that the City of Montmagny was considered, in 1966, as the site of a heavy water plant to be built by Canadian General Electric.

Now, Mr. Speaker, on February 3, 1969, I put on the order paper the following question No. 1,307:

Did the government have a special survey made into the possibilities of locating a heavy water plant in Montmagny or its vicinity and, if so, what were the results of that study?

The following reply was given:

As far as Atomic Energy of Canada, Limited is concerned, no.

No such study was made.

• (10:10 p.m.)

Later on, that is on February 10, 1969, I asked the department for additional information. The deputy minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce answered my letter as follows:

This is the list of production facilities which are under construction or which are planned in Canada:

a) Glace Bay (Nova Scotia). Yearly output: 400 tons. Operation will begin in 1969.

b) Tupper Point (Nova Scotia): Operation beginning in 1969.

c) Douglas Point (Ontario): Operation beginning in 1972.

The construction cost of a heavy water plant with a yearly output of 400 tons is about $65 million. Deuterium of Canada Ltd. and the Canadian General Electric Ltd. have entered into contracts with Atomic Energy of Canada Ltd. for the sale of 5,000 tons of heavy water during a 12-year period. The production of the Douglas Point plant will be used by Ontario Hydro which seeks to increase its nuclear power production program.

If I can be of further help, do not hesitate to contact me.

Following this reply, I put on the order paper the following question:

1. Has the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce already considered the possibility of establishing a heavy water plant in Montmagny?

2. Has the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce ordered certain research work for this purpose and, if so, (a) what have been the results of this reasearch, (b) was the site found suitable for such a plant, (c) has the water required for such a plant been considered suitable for this purpose, (d) what is the approximate cost of the construction of a heavy water plant?

I got the following answer:

1. The possibility of building a heavy water plant in Montmagny has not been considered.

2. Not applicable.

Now, in a bulletin published by Quebec Hydro on July 25, 1966, it is stated:

The federal government, through the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys and the Atomic Energy Board of Canada had asked Canadian General Electric if they would be willing to build a heavy water plant in Canada, under certain conditions, one of the first ones being that this plant be located in one of the regions officially designated as "underdeveloped area".

—of which Montmagny was then a part.

Well, the study was made, and one paragraph of the bulletin reads as follows:

Canadian General Electric, urged on by the Atomic Energy Board of Canada, was compelled to set June 24 as the final date for registration.

—for the towns that wanted to apply for the building of the heavy water plant within their limits.

A study was conducted. Reference is made to a report in the bi-monthly review of Quebec Hydro. I am surprised to learn in newspaper reports today that apparently the plant has been built in Nova Scotia at a cost of $120 million, that it has not yet produced any heavy water, that it is intended to hand it over to the government of Nova Scotia and that, in order to put it into operation, a further investment of $90 million would be needed.

In conclusion, I would like to have an explanation, not out of curiosity, but in order to satisfy the Montmagny population and authorities. I also wish to urge again the government to look into that question. The Montmagny plant closure will lead to the lay-off of several hundred workers. The installation of a heavy water plant would help fight unemployment that will soon prevail in Montmagny.

I hope the hon. minister and the government will take into consideration the facts I have mentioned, and if it is true that there has been a study, then there is something to go on. If there has been no study, the truth should be told and from there, all government levels will be able to work on a project to achieve the construction of a heavy water plant in Montmagny. That would be much appreciated not only by the people in Montmagny by also by the population of the whole area.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as far as the federal government is concerned, no study has been made in Canada in 1970 about Montmagny as a possible site for the establishment of a heavy water plant. There is no such plan at the present time, because there is no need for it.

[English]

Members will recall that a plant at Glace Bay, Nova Scotia, has not come into production and that in April, 1970, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) offered financial assistance amounting to some $40 million to the province of Nova Scotia toward rehabilitating the plant. The offer was not taken up and the months slipped by. Early in 1971 the federal government authorized AECL to undertake a study of the plant to see what in their judgment was involved in the rehabilitation of the Glace Bay plant. Just recently AECL has been asked by the federal government to enter discussions with Deuterium of Canada Limited and the premier of the province of Nova Scotia to determine whether grounds for an agreement could be reached regarding the terms of AECL rehabilitating the plant. The outcome of this initiative should be known in the near future.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—IMPERIAL OIL CONSOLIDATION OF PRAIRIE OPERATIONS IN EDMONTON—CONSULTATION WITH MINISTER OF IMPLICATIONS

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday October 14 I asked the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) the following question:

May I ask the minister whether, prior to the recent decision by Imperial Oil to consolidate their prairie operations in Edmonton, or at any time since that decision was made, he has consulted with Imperial Oil to discuss the implications of such consolidation for regional economic disparity?

The minister took the question as notice and replied the following Monday to the effect that there has been no consultation with Imperial Oil except that four months ago when the decision to locate at Edmonton had been made by Imperial Oil, Imperial Oil came to the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and asked them if any money was kicking around for such a development. The reply was in the negative, that Edmonton was not a designated region and that oil refineries did not qualify. I find it beyond belief that in the case at least of major economic decisions on the part of Canadian industry, consultation with DREE is not automatic.

The short-term economic effects of Imperial Oil's decision to shut down refineries at Calgary, Regina and Winnipeg in order to consolidate at Edmonton are imposing, but the potential long-term effects on the cities involved defy calculation. Yet there was no obligation on the part of Imperial Oil to consult nor, it would seem, did the minister or his department feel any need to make inquiries of Imperial Oil or to discuss with that company the possibility of locating its new facility in the slower growth areas of Winnipeg or Regina. If such consultations are not automatic, how can we ever hope to lessen regional economic disparities?

The parliamentary secretary to the minister, or whoever is replying on the minister's behalf, may say that the legislation does not make such demands. I say if it does not, it should. Otherwise DREE will never do much more than give grants to companies which have already made up their minds to locate or expand in a given area. It will simply act as a slush fund. It will never effect a major relocation of industry in this country, which is absolutely necessary if the regional economic disparities which exist in Canada are to be removed.

Indeed, the very procedures adopted by the department militate against its being able to have any major impact upon the structuring of our economy. A company cannot, for example, submit several possible locations for a plant to DREE for its consideration and weigh offers for each of the locations; it must submit a single location. Then if it is to know what is available in another area in any definitive way, it must reject the first offer from DREE and submit another plan. Thus, to a large extent companies must reach their decision without any meaningful assistance from DREE. Hence, it is not surprising that Imperial Oil approached DREE only after its decision was made.

In a television interview on this subject I argued that unless DREE has the power and the necessary procedures to exert a major influence on the decisions of industries about the location of their facilities, it will never effectively deal with the problem of raising up areas of slow economic growth. The minister said in reply on the same program that the people of Canada were not yet ready for government to tell private enterprise that it must locate a facility in Vancouver, in Halifax or in Winnipeg.

I am not sure that the people of the economically disadvantaged regions of this country are not ready to see the government engage in directive economic planning as opposed to indicative planning. I am certainly ready to try it, since indicative planning has done nothing to close economic gaps in this nation. In the five or six years during which some attempts at indicative planning have been made, the gaps have actually widened.

But I am not even going so far as to ask the government that the department direct industry. I am simply asking the government to ensure that consultations take place; that the people know that if slow growth regions are to be overlooked by an industry, the government at least has made some effort to ensure that that region would not be overlooked. Surely such action is the least one could expect from a department supposedly dedicated to the removal of regional economic disparities even if, for some reason beyond my understanding, the government will not give that department the directive powers without which it can never accomplish its stated task.

Thus, I would ask again if the minister would consult with Imperial Oil to see if there is not some way to have its decision to locate in Edmonton reviewed and to have the slower growth areas of Regina and Winnipeg considered again. Moreover, I would ask the minister, if Imperial is to move out of Winnipeg despite any hoped for future efforts of DREE, to seek assurances that crude oil will continue to be supplied to the Shell Oil refinery in Winnipeg by the pipeline which is owned by a subsidiary of Imperial Oil and which now supplies both the Imperial refinery and the Shell refinery.

It would seem to me that if the Imperial refinery in Winnipeg is converted to a storage facility for finished products as projected, the pipeline might well be converted to carry only finished products, which might necessitate the closing of the Shell refinery by cutting off its crude. I hope the minister will seek assurances that this will not be the case.

Finally I want to make two comments with respect to the proposed consolidation, which are not strictly relevant to the matter under consideration but which should be heard. First, I think Imperial Oil should be commended for the fact that it gave its employees, the communities involved and the governments involved three years' notice of its eventual intentions. This has allowed the employees some time in which to seek alternative employment and the communities time in which to seek alternative employment and the communities time to plan and to adjust. It also allowed the governments, even if this one is seemingly unwilling to do so, time to get involved in the decision. That is commendable.

On the other hand, the means by which the employees were informed by Imperial Oil of the decision was absolutely reprehensible. Unless the men happened to be at work at the time the announcement was made, they found out their jobs were in jeopardy by reading it in the newspapers or hearing it on the radio. Men on another shift, on day off or on holiday were not given the courtesy of advance notice. Many men with 15, 20, 25 and even 35 years of loyal service to that company suffered the indignity of being informed of the jeopardy to their jobs by people unconnected with Imperial Oil, friends and relatives who happened to hear about it. That is unforgivable. As I said, that is beside the point but I think it should be noted.

The major points are: Will the minister consult again with Imperial Oil to see whether that decision cannot be changed and, if it cannot be changed, will the minister seek assurances that Imperial's action will not ultimately result in the closing of the Shell Oil refinery in Winnipeg?

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) replied on October 18 last to a question put by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland), his only negotiating power, in his capacity as minister, is to offer a grant to a plant locating in a designated area.

However, the minister has assured me that when an opportunity occurs, he will gladly pass on to the management of Imperial Oil the representations the hon. member for Selkirk has just made in the House.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TABLING OF COMMUNIQUÉ ISSUED AT CONCLUSION OF VISIT OF PREMIER KOSYGIN TO CANADA

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 41(2) I should like to table copies in English and French of the communiqué issued at the conclusion of the visit of Premier Kosygin to Canada.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADIAN-SOVIET COMMUNIQUÉ—MEANING OF REFERENCE TO REDUCTION OF MILITARY EXPENDITURES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister a question or two about the communiqué he has just tabled which says, among other things, that "it is the intention of both sides to continue furthering, jointly and separately . . . the reduction of military expenditures". In view of the fact that the White Paper on Defence envisages some increase in our military expenditures, is the government of Canada here speaking about reducing the military expenditures of other countries or does this mean that the government of Canada would be prepared to reduce our military expenditures proportionately to the reductions in military expenditures of certain other countries?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition will notice that this is put in the context of the NATO approach to mutual and balanced force reductions and also the Soviet idea of a conference on European security. The statement there is in line with our posture at NATO, a posture made known in the House, that if we can reach some agreement to de-escalate the arms race or even, in the European situation, to reduce military commitments, Canada would be interested in participating in such discussions. It is impossible to know how this will end up. That is why we are in our white paper taking a position of our own, but of course our military posture in Canada would be subject to any over-all agreement we reached.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question arising from the Prime Minister's reference to the NATO discussions and the possible discussions about European security as well as the reference in the communiqué about the importance of reducing troops on both sides in that area. Does this envisage the withdrawal of Canadian and United States troops from the European theatre?

• (2:10 p.m.)

Mr. Trudeau: It is much too early, Mr. Speaker, to know what the posture of the NATO countries would be in that regard. Only a few weeks ago the NATO countries named Mr. Brosio as an explorer to see to what degree the other side, the Warsaw Pact countries, is prepared to engage in serious negotiations. Certainly government policy has not been established as to whether this would end with a complete or partial withdrawal of some of the American and Canadian forces over there now.

CANADIAN-SOVIET COMMUNIQUÉ—REFERENCE TO NON-INTERFERENCE IN INTERNAL AFFAIRS OF OTHER COUNTRIES—POSSIBLE REPUDIATION OF BREZHNEV DOCTRINE BY U.S.S.R.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): It does not appear to mean anything very precise but I would like to ask the Prime Minister a very precise question with regard to the reference in the communiqué emphasizing respect for independence, national sovereignty, territorial integrity and non-interference in internal affairs of other countries. I should like to ask my right hon. friend whether this arose following any discussion, for example, of the so-called Brezhnev doctrine under which the right was asserted to intervene in other countries to protect and preserve Communist governments in those countries and whether the Prime Minister regards the statement in the communiqué as a repudiation by the U.S.S.R. of the so-called Brezhnev doctrine invoking, as it does, the right to intervene in the affairs of other Communist states?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I would not be hopeful enough to use the word "repudiation" which the Leader of the Opposition used. Certainly we indicated that we did not accept the Brezhnev doctrine, and the meaning of the communiqué as it reads to us is as described by the Leader of the Opposition. Of course we do not know how the other side will implement this, but we are hopeful.

Mr. Woolliams: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Ha, ha! We are hopeful that this joint statement indicates indeed a step in the direction that the Leader of the Opposition and we desire.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York South.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I want to deal with some other aspects of the communiqué.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member's question supplementary, because there is a request for a supplementary question on the part of the hon. member for South Shore?

Mr. Lewis: I will leave it to Your Honour. It is supplementary in the sense that it deals with the communiqué, but perhaps your Honour might want to allow the other supplementary question first.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair might allow the hon. member for South Shore a supplementary question and then we will go to the other aspect of the communiqué to which the hon. member wishes to allude.

CANADIAN-SOVIET COMMUNIQUÉ—DISCUSSION OF OVERFISHING BY RUSSIAN FLEET OFF ATLANTIC COAST

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): My question deals with the tabling of the Canadian-Soviet communiqué and I wish to direct it either to the right hon. Prime Minister or to the Minister of the Environment. The communiqué that has been tabled does not mention the fisheries problem which is troubling Atlantic Canada, despite the assurances given us by the Minister of the Environment as well as by the Prime Minister that this matter was discussed. Was there discussion about the excessive overfishing by the Russian fleet off the coast of Atlantic Canada? If so, was any agreement reached and when may we expect this agreement with regard to the conservation of our fisheries resources off the Atlantic coast to be tabled?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, a representation was made, an emphatic one, and there was some discussion of the matter. The Premier of the U.S.S.R. did say that he would take the matter under careful consideration.

CANADIAN-SOVIET COMMUNIQUÉ—SECTORS OF INDUSTRY INVOLVED IN DISCUSSIONS OF MIXED COMMISSION WORKING GROUPS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister some questions arising out of the language of the communiqué. It is perhaps necessarily general but it would be useful if he could elucidate what some of these statements mean. The communiqué refers to working groups of the mixed commission between the two countries concentrating on sectors of industry in their discussions which offer "the best prospects for further co-operation and the development of trade." Is it possible for the Prime Minister, or any other minister—in view of the wave of the arm that I noticed the Prime Minister make—to tell us what sectors of industry fall into that category?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, these groups operate under the agreement on Industrial application of Science and Technology. Already there are six bilateral working groups in existence. One is on oil, one on gas, one on construction, one on hydro power, one on non-ferrous metals, and there is another one I cannot recall at the moment.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Baldwin: On communications.

Mr. Pepin: The idea is for these groups to get together—each has already met at least once—is to try to identify areas where we have complementary technology and to see if trade opportunities can develop in these areas. Already on the Canadian side prefabricated homes and pulp and paper machinery have been identified as products that could sell in the Soviet Union. This is the purpose of the agreement and both sides give a lot of importance to it.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask a supplementary on the other side of the coin. In another part of the communiqué it was stated that Canada was prepared to facilitate the importation into Canada of goods from the Soviet Union, "including machinery and equipment," and that the Soviet Union would do likewise for Canadian exports. Would the minister be able to inform the House at this stage what areas of machinery and equipment are under discussion, if those areas have in fact been identified?

Mr. Pepin: That is the name of the game, Mr. Speaker. The Soviet representatives are supposed to identify these areas for their government.

CANADIAN-SOVIET COMMUNIQUÉ—MACHINERY FOR JOINT ACTION AGAINST POLLUTION IN ARCTIC

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, there are a good many aspects of this communiqué that are not very clear. I am not saying this critically, but it is a fact. I would like to ask either the Prime Minister or the minister of pollution—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: —the Minister of the Environment—looking across I could only think of pollution, Mr. Speaker, I could not think of the exact title—

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): You really got polluted, didn't you?

Mr. Lewis: —to inform the House what machinery has in fact been set up or what machinery is in fact planned to carry out the statements in the communiqué with regard to joint plans and joint action against pollution in the Arctic and general action to protect the environment in the Arctic? Has there been any machinery already set up? Is additional machinery contemplated? Generally, what is involved in that statement?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of machinery set up during the course of these recent consultations, but I am sure either the Secretary of State for External Affairs or the Prime Minister could elaborate on this subject.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member for York South for one more supplementary and then recognize the hon. member for Témiscamingue.

Mr. Lewis: Then may I ask whether the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs can inform us of what machinery there is with respect to fighting pollution in the north?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have been having continuous discussions with the Soviet Union and with the United States on the question of pollution of the Arctic and we have established machinery for continuation of these talks. It does not seem to us very likely that we will be able to have a treaty. Therefore we are working toward co-operation in controlling pollution in the Arctic.

• (2:20 p.m.)

CANADIAN-SOVIET COMMUNIQUÉ—EXCHANGE OF PRODUCTS WITH U.S.S.R.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

The Minister has just said that six different groups are now studying trade possibilities with the USSR and mentioned that we could export prefabricated houses, heavy machinery, etc, to that country. On the other hand, on the basis of the studies that have been made, what can we buy from the Russians that we cannot produce in Canada? Can the Minister mention any one product?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): It is not the government's policy to limit imports to those products that we cannot produce ourselves? To give concrete exemples, I will say that Canada recently bought heavy water from the USSR in order to meet the needs of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. Also Canadians may buy raw cotton from the USSR. Likewise there is a possibility to sell turbines in British Colombia.

The Soviets do for the Canadian market exactly what we do for the Soviet market, that is, they explore the needs of the Canadian market as we explore those of the Soviet market.

[English]

CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN NATO AND NORAD

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): I wish to address a supplementary question to the right hon. Prime Minister. As a result of the statement he made today I would ask if Canada still belongs to the NATO and NORAD organizations?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I think so, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not so sure either after that answer.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

WAGE AND PRICE CONTROLS—PRESENTATION OF SPECIFIC PLAN TO LABOUR AND MANAGEMENT FOR CONSIDERATION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I have a question for the Prime Minister related to a contingency plan for wage and price controls. As the Minister of Labour has been holding discussions with the CLC and the CNTU, and in light of recent indications of labour and management's willingness to consider and consult on the development of a contingency plan of wage and price controls, has the government decided to present a specific plan to labour and management for their consideration?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think this news item, which was only brought to my attention this morning, is a good sign and we are happy if labour is now prepared to consider such a plan. I have said repeatedly that the government's policy would be to have a plan of wage and income control only if necessary. As I just said two days ago, there has been no approach to business or management or the provinces for the application of such a plan at this time.

Mr. Alexander: In light of the fact that labour seems to accept its responsibility and appears to be equally concerned about the state of the economy, can the Prime Minister advise the House at this time if the government is prepared to accept the five criteria for a fair income, policy that were stated by Mr. Ed Finn?

Mr. Trudeau: I am not aware of the policy stated by Mr. Ed Finn, Mr. Speaker, but I shall look into it.

An hon. Member: You are not very sharp today, are you?

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Can the Prime Minister assure the House that any further co-operative development of a contingency plan of wage and price controls will be undertaken by the Department of Labour, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Department of Finance rather than by the discredited Prices and Incomes Commission headed by one Young?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. member for Prince Albert.

PENITENTIARIES

PRINCE ALBERT—CLEARING OF SUSPENDED GUARDS OF NEGLIGENCE IN 1970 RIOT—REQUEST THAT MINISTER WITHDRAW CERTAIN STATEMENTS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General and concerns the riots in Prince Albert penitentiary in the fall of 1970. Following this there was an investigation by officials of the penitentiaries department and six guards or warders were suspended. They appealed by way of grievance. Is the minister now in a position as a result of independent investigation which took place, to say whether the six who were condemned by him and in the original investigation have now been cleared of all negligence?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as the right hon. member knows, there was an appeal from the sentences rendered in the first instance which recognized negligence by the employees. Following the appeal, the independent commission rendered a decision that there had not been negligence.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, will the minister table that report in the House? Also, since in that report it was found that there had been no negligence and that the responsibility was that of penitentiary headquarters in Ottawa, is the minister now prepared to withdraw the statement he made in the House to me on January 22, 1971 when he said:

—six penitentiary officers were suspended following the inquiry, because it revealed circumstances where these officers had been negligent to say the least.

He also said on January 21 that the officials in Ottawa who were responsible—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the right hon. gentleman that it might be difficult from a procedural standpoint to quote in detail the references which the right hon. gentleman wants to use in support of his question. Perhaps the question might at this point be asked of the minister.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the minister stated in the House that he agreed there had been negligence by the six guards. He also stated that there had been no responsibility resting on the penitentiary officials. Now the report finds that those allegations on his part had no foundation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am asking, will he withdraw those allegations?

Some hon. Members: Withdraw!

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, following the first investigation, it was established that there had been negligence and the penitentiary authorities decided in favour of suspending the guards. At that time, I think the decision was based upon the results of the first investigation.

The second investigation revealed that there had not been any negligence and these people were reinstated.

Would the right hon. member want some change—

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the minister has not been gracious enough to withdraw the criticism he made of the officers. I ask him to table the report so we can find out exactly what took place and how wrong he was in the petty attitude he took.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

PROPOSED TAKE-OVER OF SUPERTEST BY BRITISH PETROLEUM—POSSIBLE GOVERNMENT ACTION—ACQUISITION BY PANARCTIC OILS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce who is also Acting Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the action which the government took in preventing the take-over of Denison Mines and Home Oil, is the government planning any measures to deal with the proposed take-over of the last major Canadian-owned distributor of petroleum products, Supertest, by British Petroleum Limited?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this situation has been under study and an announcement will be made in due course by the minister or somebody speaking for him.

Mr. Douglas: In view of the statement made by Mr. Heatherington, President of Panarctic Oils that he hopes that his organization will become a fully integrated oil company, is the government carrying on any discussions or will it carry on discussions with Panarctic Oils to see about the possibility of acquiring Supertest as a distributor for the products of Panarctic Oils Limited?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any particular discussions between Panarctic and Supertest. I will find out about it and, if such conversations have not been held, suggest that they might take place.

Mr. Douglas: Since this matter is to be dealt with by the shareholders on November 2, am I to assume from the minister's statement that the government proposes to stand idly by and watch this Canadian company being taken over?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

POLYMER LAY-OFFS—RESULT OF MEETING BETWEEN MINISTER OF SUPPLY AND SERVICES AND CHAIRMAN AND PRESIDENT

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Supply and Services. Did the minister summon the Chairman of Polymer Corporation and the president of Polymer Corporation to come to Ottawa in order to discuss the current reduction in the work force, and has the minister anything to report on the results of the said meeting?

Mr. MacInnis: He must have, or the hon. member would not ask the question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, it is not normal practice for the government to interfere directly in management decisions. However, in view of the seriousness of the position for the employees at Sarnia, I called the chairman and the president of Polymer to Ottawa and met with them, this morning. I am pleased to be able to report to the hon. member and the House that management have been able to cancel 35 notices of termination that were issued earlier this month. Further, Mr. Speaker, subject to the number of hourly paid employees who accept early retirement, management are hopeful of being able to cancel an additional 25 notices of termination. Finally, Mr. Speaker, I have been assured that there are no current plans to give further notices of termination to either salaried or hourly paid employees.

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): May I ask the minister if the government is thinking of or prepared to give a grant to cover wages and benefits for those who are not fortunate enough to be kept on?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, as I have stated before, the government has a number of programs. What I have done is establish a group of senior officials to work closely with Polymer to maximize the benefits of various government programs, such as the employment support bill, the winter plan program and a number of other programs possibly PAIT, which can help Polymer to maintain employment.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to hon. members that we are running short of time. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Lambton-Kent for one last supplementary and then try to go on because very soon we will have to call orders of the day.

Mr. McCutcheon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if I could ask the minister to answer my question.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

EXPANDED ROLE FOR CAMP SHILO IN TRAINING OF FORCES OF NATO ALLIES

Mr. Craig Stewart (Marquette): My question is for the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister indicate to the House whether the government has any plans or is contemplating an expanded role for Camp Shilo in the training of the forces of our NATO allies and, if so, have any agreements been signed?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, while no agreements have been signed, as the hon. member knows an investigatory team has been in Shilo for the past several weeks looking at the possibility of using it for artillery training. It will depend, of course, upon negotiation of an agreement. At the moment the matter is in the exploratory stage but we are hopeful.

RECONSIDERATION OF USE OF SUFFIELD MILITARY RESERVE BY BRITISH ARMY IN LIGHT OF ECOLOGICAL REPORT

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In light of the government's negative ecology report on the possible consequences of the British troop exercises in southern Alberta next spring, is the government taking a second look at going ahead with these tests and are arrangements with the British finalized?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): If I can answer on behalf of the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, the report rather than being negative indicated that with the exception of one or two sites on the Suffield reserve it could be effectively used for this purpose and it will be so used.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of the Environment. In view of the statement he made on October 8 that the report would be tabled, is the minister now in a position to do so?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): I expect it will be tabled later this week, Mr. Speaker.

UNITED NATIONS

ADMISSION OF PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA—SITUATION RESPECTING TAIWAN

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): My question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In light of the vote at the United Nations for the recognition of the People's Republic of China as the government of China with a permanent seat on the Security Council, will the minister say whether he accepts the view advanced by some quarters that Taiwan has been expelled or whether it is not the situation that Taiwan was never a member of the United Nations?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that the question as asked is academic.

EXPULSION OF TAIWAN—CANADIAN ACTION TO RESTORE REPRESENTATION

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): My question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Now that Canada has voted at the United Nations to expel the de facto government of Taiwan from that body, what initiatives does the government intend to take to help restore proper representation at the United Nations for the 14 million people in Taiwan?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there is no government of Taiwan as far as I am aware. The government at Taipei claims to be the government of China and for that reason walked out of the General Assembly when the People's Republic of China was seated in the China seat.

Mr. Ryan: Canada did not take that position for 20 years—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Ryan: —and we have had an embassy of Taiwan in Ottawa.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Ryan: Will the government—

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has been called to order and he should resume his seat.

ATOMIC ENERGY

GLACE BAY—INQUIRY AS TO PRODUCTION OF HEAVY WATER

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

In view of the fact that hundreds of millions of dollars have been spent for the Glace Bay heavy water plant, can the minister tell us whether that plant has effectively produced since 1969 heavy water for sale in Canada?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, there are few people in Canada unacquainted with the Deuterium situation.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

QUEBEC—UNENPLOYMENT FORECASTS

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is related to unemployment and I should like to direct it to the responsible minister. In his absence, however, I shall put it to the Prime Minister.

Could he tell us whether the government has any statistics indicating that the unemployment rate, in Montreal, could reach the same level as that in the Maritime provinces, that is 11 or 12 per cent during the coming winter? If not, what is the government unemployment rate forecast for this winter in Montreal and in the whole province of Quebec?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Calgary North.

[Translation]

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Prime Minister really understood that I was asking him the question in the absence of the minister responsible.

Mr. Speaker: Of course, the hon. member can ask his question, but he cannot insist on getting an answer.

Mr. Valade: I would like to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Would he tell the House whether he has data indicating that the unemployment rate will reach 11 or 12 per cent next winter in Montreal or in Quebec?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is only repeating the question he asked a moment ago.

[Mr. Ryan.]

NATIONAL SECURITY

NUMBER OF PEOPLE IN NEW SECURITY GROUP—PERSON IN CHARGE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I wish to direct a question to the Solicitor General with regard to security. Can the minister tell the House at this stage how many members form the new security force and who is in charge of that force?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): I am unaware of the existence of such a security force, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Woolliams: How many people form this security group, for whom do these analysts work and to whom are they accountable for their actions when they analyse the reports which the minister discussed in the House last week?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I will have to inquire. I am not primarily concerned about the number of employees in the department.

[English]

Mr. Woolliams: With the greatest of respect, Mr. Speaker, I asked a very simple question. The Solicitor General is in charge and I am sure he has the answer. I am asking to whom these analysts are accountable and who is in charge? The minister hired them. He advertised for them. They are to do the analysing of this work. Who is in charge of this group?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I have already answered about employment. The Public Service Commission, through competitions similar to those held in any other department, looks after the matter.

[English]

Mr. Woolliams: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am asking to whom these analysts are accountable and who is in charge. The Solicitor General will not give these answers because he is hiding the facts from the House and the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED EUROPEAN SECURITY CONFERENCE—READINESS OF SOVIET UNION TO DISCUSS REDUCTION OF TROOPS OR WITHDRAWAL OF TROOPS FROM AREA

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to ask the Prime Minister a question arising from the suggestion that a possible reduction in Canadian military expenses might arise from the European security conference in respect of NATO obligations and this sort of thing. Has the right hon. member any indication that the U.S.S.R. is prepared to discuss at a European security conference a reduction in military expenditures, a reduction of troops, or simply a reduction of troops in that area of Europe, in other words, a withdrawal of troops rather than a reduction?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): It is in order to get an answer to this type of question that the NATO countries have encouraged our discussions with the Soviet Union and are conducting some themselves, and that, indeed, the NATO countries have named an explorer to try to find the answer to that type of question.

Mr. Stanfield: I should like to ask the right hon. gentleman whether there has been a change in the position of the U.S.S.R. during the past year? I ask this in view of the fact it was clearly indicated to me when I was in the Soviet Union that what was involved was a withdrawal and that the U.S.S.R. could discuss an actual reduction of troops only in a global context rather than in the context of European security. Has there been a change in the position of the U.S.S.R. in that regard?

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Mr. Speaker, perhaps as a result of the trip of the Leader of the Opposition to that country there has been some advance in the Soviet position—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: If the Leader of the Opposition does not wish to take credit for it, that is fine, but we think they have moved since he last saw them.

Mr. Stanfield: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, it is all very well for the Prime Minister to be smart. I am simply seeking information on a point of great importance to this country. I asked him whether there had been a change in the position, as would have been indicated by the Prime Minister's response to my question initially. I do not think that calls for any smart-aleck remarks by the right hon. gentleman.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PROPOSED EUROPEAN SECURITY CONFERENCE—SOVIET POSITION ON CAREFUL PREPARATION AND AGREED-UPON AGENDA

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that one of the differences between the Soviet Union and the NATO countries with regard to a European security conference has been the insistence of the NATO countries that there be a carefully prepared agenda and so on before a conference is called, does the statement in the communiqué that both sides declare themselves in favour of a properly prepared conference on security and co-operation in Europe mean that the Soviet Union has now come closer to the NATO position that the conference must be carefully prepared and an agenda agreed upon before it is held?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I would venture to answer in the affirmative. There has already been a very serious advance by the Soviet side in that they have concluded negotiations with the Federal Republic of Germany. We think this is a clear indication that they are prepared to go some distance to follow up statements made last May, I believe, by Mr. Brezhnev, that they were looking for a detente in Europe and heeding the opinions which have been given by Canada and other NATO countries that there would have to be progress on the Berlin question before we could fruitfully sit down to discuss European security generally. In that sense there has certainly been some movement on the part of the Soviet Union since the Leader of the Opposition last went there.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): While discussions are going on concerning certain reductions in armed forces—infantry, artillery and the like—did the Russian premier mention the fact that the U.S.S.R. today has the largest fleet on earth, including 340 submarines, that it controls ingress to and egress from the Mediterranean—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What did he say he intended to do concerning the reduction of naval forces, particularly in the Atlantic, and especially in the number of Russian submarines which are parading through the north Atlantic and the south Atlantic as well? After all, he has protested a desire for peace. What did he say about these things?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, there is no way to get an answer out of this government. The Prime Minister has no right to deal with Parliament as he sought to do with the Leader of the Opposition a moment ago.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The arrogance of this government—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: —in refusing to give answers while protesting itself to be in favour of peace, yet allowing Kosygin to fool them in the way they have been fooled in the last few days, is something that should shock Canadians as a whole.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to hon. members that this is debate rather than privilege. I would hope that in the last two minutes remaining before the end of the question period we might contrive to get two or three more questions dealt with.

GLACE BAY—INQUIRY AS TO PRODUCTION OF HEAVY WATER

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

As the heavy water plant in Glace Bay, Nova Scotia, which was built thanks to thousands of dollars of financial aid from the government of Nova Scotia, then led by the Leader of the Opposition, has proved to be a real fiasco—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would point out to the hon. member that a question cannot be put in those terms.

Mr. Rondeau: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As that fiasco was later on compounded by the Liberal government—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

[English]

The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East.

Mr. Forrestall: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My question is related to the communiqué tabled by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member. He will be recognized in a moment. I gather there is a question of privilege being raised by the hon. member for Shefford.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

A short while ago, the minister gave an answer, but unfortunately, in this corner of the House, we did not catch it.

Has the federal government lost any hope of producing heavy water in Nova Scotia, since it is buying some from the USSR?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has indicated that he was rising on a question of privilege, and he takes this opportunity to repeat his question. He will agree that the Chair has recognized the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East.

[English]

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, my question—

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I again have to apologize to the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East. With a little more patience we shall get to him. The hon. member for Bellechasse is rising on a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order since I was involved.

In fact, my colleague from Shefford said that we did not catch the minister's reply to my question. It might have been understood but nobody heard it because of the noise. I did not want to interfere then as I preferred to wait till the end of the question period. If Your Honour would permit the minister to reply, I would be very happy provided that reply is heard.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The minister could perhaps repeat his reply, but I respectfully submit to hon. members that if half the question period is spent repeating answers or questions, it will really be reduced to twenty minutes. In any case, we could perhaps allow the minister to reply to this question in a minute—

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Make it good.

Mr. Forrestall: I don't know whether it will be good but I shall try.

CANADIAN-SOVIET COMMUNIQUÉ—DISCUSSION OF POSSIBILITY OF PURCHASING RUSSIAN-BUILT ICEBREAKERS AND MARITIME PATROL AIRCRAFT

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): My question arises out of the communiqué tabled by the Prime Minister. I want to ask him whether or not the possibility of purchasing Soviet-built icebreakers or Soviet engineering services for the design and construction of an expanded Arctic fleet was considered during the talks with the Soviet delegation? At the same time I might ask whether any consideration was given to the purchase of long-range maritime patrol aircraft?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I know of no talks having covered either of those machines.

The hon. member for Shefford told me the reasons why that company is in trouble. I suggested that along with many Canadians we were also aware of that situation.

EXPULSION OF TAIWAN—CANADIAN ACTION TO EXPEL BYELORUSSIA AND UKRAINIAN SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLIC

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the reasons given by the Canadian government for supporting the resolution at the United Nations which in effect expelled the government of Taiwan as not being the de facto government of China, does the government intend to undertake steps at the United Nations to see that the governments of Byelorussia and the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic are expelled on the same grounds?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that this is debate. I apologize to the many hon. members who have not had an opportunity to ask their questions. I have tried to make a mental note of them as they rose during the question period and will attempt to give them preference tomorrow.

POLLUTION

MEETING WITH UNITED STATES AND U.S.S.R. TO PROTECT NORTHERN ECOLOGY

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Charlevoix have a supplementary?

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Would the Prime Minister tell us whether, in his discussions with the Russian Premier, any mention was made of a summit meeting between Canada, the United States and the USSR to deal with the questions of the pollution of northern waters and the rational development of those waters?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I raised that question when I visited the USSR in May. At that time, the Russian government indicated that it was not interested in a summit or other level of meeting between the several countries interested in the Arctic. So, this time, I did not suggest such a meeting. Instead we discussed a treaty which could be signed by all interested nations. I must admit that the Russians did not appear very enthusiastic about that either.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Sainte-Marie raises a question of privilege.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege is as follows: The leaders of the various parties had agreed on the establishment of a list of ministers who would act for those compelled to be absent from the House on official business. According to that list, the minister responsible for manpower was to be present to answer questions relating to employment, labour and unemployment in Canada.

A short while ago, I asked a question to the government, in the absence of the responsible minister and no minister gave me a reply. My question was warranted, Mr. Speaker, since a minister of the Crown stated yesterday in Montreal that unemployment was to reach a rate of 12 per cent in the province of Quebec in the next few months.

Here is my question of privilege: If members of the opposition cannot get answers from the ministers designated to replace those who are not here, and if no other minister answers our questions, I feel that we are being deprived of a fundamental right—that of having our questions on crucial or current problems answered.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that my question of privilege will be taken into consideration, and that we will be assured that in the absence of a minister who should be here, the government will, through his spokesman, the right hon. Prime Minister, answer the questions asked.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I know you do not like this matter to be discussed in the House. I would only suggest to the hon. member that perhaps he is getting the roster wrong since neither the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, nor the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, nor even the Minister of Labour is on the list for today.

Once again, I think the hon. member is barking up the wrong tree.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not believe there should be a debate on that point.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member cannot speak a second time on a question of privilege. He submitted the problem to the Chair and the Prime Minister answered. I do not think the question should be pursued further.

If the hon. member wants to raise a question of privilege once again, I will listen to him, but under the rules, a member is not allowed to speak more than once on the same question of privilege.

The hon. member has raised the problem and it will be considered.

Mr. Valade: I rise on a question of privilege once again, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has another question of privilege.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I am raising this question of privilege in reply to the Prime Minister who did not answer my first question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is not another question of privilege, but the same that gave rise to a debate between the Prime Minister and the hon. member, which I cannot allow.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The debate which is being pursued by hon. members on both sides of the House makes it difficult for the Chair to hear the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In view of the many references during the question period to the communiqué the Prime Minister tabled today, I wonder whether the House would agree that it be made an appendix to today's Hansard?

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Shefford rise on a question of privilege?

Mr. Rondeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I would like to make a correction on page 9018 of yesterday's Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Order. A correction cannot be made in Hansard by way of a question of privilege. All the hon. members know that a correction in Hansard is usually made directly through the officials concerned and when it is an important correction, it must be made on motions. The hon. member can ask the unanimous consent of the House to revert to motions. Does the House agree?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member might make that correction tomorrow on motions. I think it is extremely important, because during the debate—

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, according to Hansard—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I indicated to the hon. member that such a change should normally be requested on motions. If the change is important, he should make it tomorrow on motions.

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Abitibi rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Laprise: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

During the debate, while the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) was speaking, the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Leblanc), from the seat where the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Cantin) usually sits, rose on a point of order for the sole purpose of having it reported in Hansard that the hon. member for Louis-Hébert was out of the House at the time. That is the correction we wanted made, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. member please resume his seat. It seems to me that we have spent the last ten minutes of the time of the House going over points of order and questions of privilege. I feel that these ten minutes could be put to better use.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, you will have to admit there has been some confusion today. I did not understand what happened to my request that the communiqué be made an appendix to today's Hansard. Was that agreed to?

Mr. MacInnis: No, the Prime Minister turned you down.

Mr. Speaker: It is my understanding that the response to the hon. member was negative. I might ask again if there is consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the matter might be considered after the House has gone into committee. The suggestion made by the hon. member is that the communiqué be made an appendix to Hansard.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: As the hon. member has heard, there seems to be some opposition and I think at this stage there might be some communication made directly—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps hon. members might allow the Chair to complete the remarks I am trying to make in response to the point of order raised after two questions of privilege. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre might consider communicating directly with the government House leader to determine whether his suggestion might be put in a more formal way tomorrow.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, when the discussion was taking place as to who was responsible for the refusal to allow the communiqué to be made an appendix to Hansard the hon. member for Calgary South indicated it was the Conservatives. There is no question that it was the Prime Minister who made the first refusal.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day. Order, please. I believe the hon. member for Timiskaming is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Peters: On a point of information, Mr. Speaker, I should like to inquire of Your Honour whether, when a request is made for the addition to Hansard of a communiqué or document that has been tabled, unanimous agreement is necessary before this can take place?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is asking for a ruling from the Chair in abstract. The Chair cannot, of course, be called upon to make that kind of ruling. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed, from Monday, October 25, consideration in committee of Bill C-259, to amend the Income tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act—Mr. Benson—Mr. Honey in the chair.

The Chairman: Order, please. House again in committee of the whole on Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act. When the committee rose last evening section 109 was before the committee. Section 110 has been grouped with section 109 for the purpose of debate.

On clause 1—section 109: Deductions permitted by individuals.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Chairman, last night when the committee rose I had pointed out that in the Carter Report on taxation there was discussion of the principle involved in comparing a system of tax exemptions with a system of tax credits in order to provide some relief for taxpayers, particularly those at the lowest end of the income scale. I mentioned that the Carter Commission pointed out quite clearly what the difference was between tax credits and tax exemptions. I quote:

> A tax credit involves a reduction in taxes of a given amount, while an exemption grants a reduction in taxable income.

Of course, the report, points out that quite obviously the application of a tax exemption has a different impact from the application of a tax credit. The Carter Commission, in its report, went on to draw a conclusion from its studies of this subject. I quote again from the report at page 180, volume 3:

> We believe that the primary purpose of the additional allowances for dependants, working wives, educational support, and so forth is to reduce the tax burden on low income families whose ability to pay is most heavily affected by the additional non-discretionary expenses resulting from each of these circumstances. We therefore regard the use of tax credits as a more efficient means of achieving this objective. Accordingly, we have recommended the adoption of tax credits in place of exemptions to reflect the effect of family responsibilities upon ability to pay, and have used the tax revenue gained from this substitution both to increase the effective allowances to low income families and to reduce marginal tax rates below what they would otherwise be.

So, it is quite clear, in terms of the principle put forward by the Carter Commission, that the commission opted for a tax credit system. This, of course, leaves open the question of the mechanics of the application of this principle. There are many variables which could be introduced in applying this principle, but certainly in terms of the principle itself the commission came out very clearly in favour of the principle of tax credits. The commission went on to discuss, at page 183 of the report on taxation, the effect of tax credits if substituted for the present tax exemption plan:

> The credits that we propose for dependants are equivalent to a liberalization of exemptions for lower income families and a tightening of upper income families. For families with income under a certain level, the proposed system of credits would reduce taxes from what they would be with current personal exemptions.

Possibly this explains why the government has been so reticent about introducing tax credits into Bill C-259. I want to acknowledge, of course, that in any tax structure a system could be devised based on either tax credits or tax exemptions that would, at any given point of time, produce an equivalent amount of dollars for any given income level. It is simply a matter of mechanics to arrange a tax system based either on tax credits or tax exemptions which would provide for a certain income level. Let us call it income level one—X dollars of tax. Then this could be arranged for income level two, the next higher level of income, for which the amount of dollars in tax collected would be X plus Y dollars of tax. This could be applied to any situation in any given circumstance, but that of course involves a static concept of taxation. That is certainly not the type of world in which we live. We live in a very dynamic world in which the systems we attempt to organize and establish must be designed so that they are flexible enough to accommodate change and so that it is possible to adjust to any new condition or new circumstance as they arise.

I would also acknowledge that with the tax exemption system it is possible to make a change which would have an impact similar to a change to a tax credit system. This could be done by simply knocking off the lowest rate of taxation and then increasing the exemption level. This is fine if it can be done, but I suggest it is much more difficult than might be imagined to introduce such a system into practice. Certainly it is very difficult politically, I think, to introduce such a system because there are very obvious difficulties. Any government, regardless of its political persuasion, has to face the problem of persuading people that they must or should pay higher taxes. Certainly, if there is the appearance of a higher tax level, even the type which I described, this is not very acceptable to anyone.

So the method adopted by the government when it wanted to make some improvement in the situation of people at the lowest end of the income scale was to increase exemptions. This in some ways is much easier to administer and in some ways also it is easier politically, at least under given circumstances. But I suggest there will be tax changes in the future and, by the very nature of our economy, a tax system must be designed so that it can accommodate to change both up and down. Very often the general trend has been in the upward direction, but certainly I think now and at given times in the future our taxation system will be subject to either increases in taxes or decreases in taxes. Thus, it is very necessary that we design a tax system that is both flexible and equitable. This is my concern, and the concern of many of us, in taking a look at the plan as it is proposed by the government.

I should like to examine briefly the whole idea involved in making changes in exemptions, whether it is now or at some other point in time. Basically, it seems to me that the purpose is to provide help to the lower income people in particular and also to provide one means of stimulating the economy. In terms of the help that is provided to lower income people, I think it has been pointed out already in this debate that it is questionable whether it is of any real value. Certainly it has been pointed out that if there is an increase in basic exemptions from $1,000 to $1,500 per person on a $2,000 gross income the tax saving from the increased exemption is only $33, whereas if a person has an income of $100,000 the tax saving is $397.

Certainly, this is not very equitable in terms of being of assistance to people at the lower end of the income scale.

Secondly, there is the point of stimulating the economy. This, of course, must come through increased consumption. I do not think that anyone would suggest that an increase in exemptions is designed to increase in some way the savings capability of a segment of the population in order to assist the process of capital accumulation. Rather, I think an increase in exemptions is designed by its very definition to increase consumption in the economy. I think it is obvious, or it should be obvious to all hon. members, that the best way to increase consumption through a tax change is to help people at the lower end of the income scale. By the very nature of the economic system, people at the lower end of the income scale will spend a larger percentage of their increased income or increased savings from a change in exemptions or tax credit than will people in the upper income levels. I think it should be obvious to hon. members that this will be the case. Thus, I think it can be shown quite clearly that a system of tax exemptions, as we have it now, does not achieve the objectives that are claimed for it by people on many occasions. I suggest, therefore, that our tax system must have equity if it is to be acceptable to the public and if it is to achieve the social and economic objectives that a tax system must hope to achieve.

Reference was made during the discussion of the white paper and the report of the House of Commons Committee to the question of equity versus growth. The government, and some government supporters, attempted to put this situation in the very simple terms that this was the alternative before the people, that they have to choose between equity and growth. I want to suggest that I do not accept that particular set of alternatives as it has been put forward by some people. I think it is not a simple alternative of that sort. If one wants to look at either one of those objectives, namely equity or growth, the present tax exemption system does not help to produce equity in the tax structure. I suggest that the present system of tax exemptions does not stimulate economic growth in our economy. On the other hand, I suggest that tax credits will produce a greater degree of equity in the tax system. The stimulation and encouragement of consumption will be a more effective way of stimulating and encouraging growth in the economy.

In conclusion, I should like to say that a point of concern for the government and for all members of the House must be the question of confidence in the tax system. Do people really feel that they are getting a square deal under our tax system? I know that the government will go to the country within the next year or two. They will make claims regarding what this new tax system is doing for people, that it improves the position of many people in the country. But I suggest that the government should not be too smart about this question. They should reflect very carefully on this because once this new system is in effect people will see very soon that in fact the improvements claimed for it by the government, and by government supporters, mean very little in the context of economic conditions today. I suggest that there will be disillusionment among people in Canada when they see the little that has been done for the ordinary people through the tax bill before us.

[Mr. Burton.]

I suggest there will also be a great deal of disillusionment when people find that there are many loopholes and escape clauses for many of the larger corporations and the wealthy people of Canada. This will reduce confidence not only in the government—if any government dares to stick by such a tax system—but in the entire process of our handling affairs, and that is a matter that must be of concern to all members of this House. That is why I feel it is so important that in this particular area of the bill, sections 109 and 110 as well as other areas, the government take another look at the proposals it has placed before Parliament, and that it come forward with a more equitable tax package which will produce real tax reform, not just an imaginary type of tax reform such as we have in this bill.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Chairman, during a press conference he held a few days ago, the Prime Minister informed the nation that the gross national product in Canada for the year 1971 was about $95 billion and he compared this with the year 1960-61 when it was $40 billion. He rightly stated that Canadians are increasingly efficient and that we have good reasons to be happy that the national product continually increases from year to year.

What he said is so true that the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce news letter of September 1971 features a table that is most interesting, that we should all consult in order to have a clean conscience, when we will have terminated study of Bill C-259, having adopted legislation in keeping with its possibilities, reducing as far as possible taxes applying to those who do the most to increase national production.

The table appearing on page 8 includes the following: Gross national product, 1961, 39 billion dollars, 1974, 84 billion. And the right hon. Prime Minister tells us that it will reach some 95 billion for 1971.

Now, Mr. Chairman, further on it can be seen that some groups of persons have contributed to that increase in the gross national product in Canada, and certain details are given: Man-hour production in agriculture, based on 100 for 1961, was in 1970 up to—

• (3:20 p.m.)

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman,—

The Chairman: Order. The parliamentary secretary is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Mahoney: I am wondering when the hon. member is going to relate the GNP tables for 1961 to sections 109 and 110 presently before us.

Mr. McCleave: Now you are getting fussy again, Pat.

The Chairman: I think, with respect, the parliamentary secretary has a valid point and I would ask the hon. member if he will keep his remarks within the rather broad area that I will permit him under sections of 109 and 110.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Chairman, I readily submit to the directives of the Chair, but in order to support the reasoning that I want to make regarding clauses 109 and 110, I must find some argument. This is what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) has done, on June 18, when he introduced his budget, and when he quoted the gross national product and other figures as arguments.

So, I think that I will not be departing from the Standing Orders when trying later on to show, regarding clauses 109 and 110, what I intend to recommend to this government. Since we have no opportunity of moving amendments to legislations, I hope, Mr. Chairman, that we will at least have the opportunity of bringing forward some arguments. This is what I am doing and I am convinced that, as the Chair has just said, I am perfectly in order.

I was saying that the efficiency of farmers in 1970 had reached a level of 177, compared with 100 in 1961. On the basis of 100 in 1961, the efficiency rate of manufacturing industry reached 140 and that of non-manufacturing industry, 127.

Farmers and workers having made considerable effort to contribute through their work to the increase of the gross national product, they have shown they are serious and efficient. Should Canadians get greater benefit from the national product? I think so. To allow them to do so, they must be given more purchasing power. That can be achieved in two ways: by salary increases or greater profits, or still by lower taxes.

In the case that concerns us, clauses 109 and 110 aim at amending the tax legislation by increasing the basic exemption. I entirely agree with the government about that proposal. However, I think it is not going far enough considering the great possibilities I have just outlined regarding the gross national product.

Now men's work, as a whole, that is national production, is not meant to keep on adding to the wealth of a small group of citizens but rather to ensure the well-being to all. In my opinion a society is not just if it tends to condemn a great many of those we call proletarians to be without any other property than their arms, and to be always threatened by a refusal of employment in times of unemployment or by a considerable reduction of income in cases of sickness or accident. Then, more and more, the number of those who do not own any property increases on account of the tax burden.

This is why I strongly urge the government to clearly grasp the scope of our arguments which, as far as I am concerned, I do not bring in on a sudden impulse, but from a sense of duty because I know in what situation thousands of families find themselves. I am personally aware of that situation and every day we receive representations, requests from people asking us to see that the tax burden is lessened in order to allow the Canadian family to develop.

I cannot understand how some people will not admit that it takes at the very least an income of $5,000 free of tax for an average family to live in normal conditions. I am speaking of the income tax that we are discussing right now.

I know that married couples have to pay a number of other taxes, it is a normal thing, but as far as income tax goes, in view of the immense possibilities of Canada, of the considerable increase of the national product, it is now possible to lower the contribution made by this category of people, by raising the level of exemptions.

Are we really aware of the fact that the government is asking the people to live in poverty in an affluent society? Our country is rich in many ways. I was given, a moment ago, a document which is not very old; it is dated October 25, and entitled "The National Conference on Law and Poverty". The conference will be held in Ottawa from October 28 to 30.

It offends a number of members when someone reminds the government that there is inexcusable poverty in Canada. It riles them. They say that it should not be mentioned.

Mr. Chairman, this conference on law and poverty is organized by people who are interested in the welfare of the population, among others a group of lawyers who call themselves the defenders of the poor, and it is sponsored by a section of the Canadian Law Professors Association seeking justice for the poor.

I did not have time to read the communiqué, for it has just come to my attention, but it seems that it was by an act of God that this document appeared on my desk at the very moment when I was about to champion the rights of these elements of the population.

Mr. Chairman, I have known the distress of not even having a 3-cent stamp to send a letter to my mother. I remember the hurt and that is why, today, being called upon to speak for those people, I discharge my duty by saying what must be said.

Mr. Speaker, this is what being underprivileged means. There are underprivileged people in Canada, just as there are in Europe, Asia and Africa. We just have to open our eyes to see where they are. We only need to visit our cities and see those retarded children for whom we are asked to provide more financial assistance so that they may adapt to Canadian society.

When we see, as I did last Sunday, Richelieu clubs organizing suppers in order to try and raise funds to assist underprivileged children, we realize that people are really willing to help the underprivileged in Canada.

We only need to open our eyes to see unemployed people who have to make do with the miserable pittance which they get from welfare, and yet who would like to work. Last Saturday, of 12 people who called at my office, 11 were asking for work.

• (3:30 p.m.)

People want to work, Mr. Chairman! But in order to give them the opportunity to work we will have to give a new impetus to the economy, to further the sale of our products so that the industries in turn can get going again and hire those people.

Mr. Chairman, that is the reason why I insist so much on putting the basic exemption for married couples at $5,000, because Canada can do it. Otherwise I would say: Let us tighten our belts! But, since Canada can do it—we know that, because the Prime Minister said so on the air—we must do something.

Mr. Chairman, that is my suggestion in connection with sections 109 and 110 in favour of families that do their share.

I would also draw the attention of the government to the fact that it seems very liberal to increase the basic exemption from $1,000 to $1,500 and from $2,000 to $2,850. It must not be forgotten that new elements have been included in the taxable income, like one-half of capital gains for instance. Payments from income maintenance plans will likewise become taxable, as well as adult training allowances, allowances paid under the Textile and Clothing Board Act, unemployment insurance benefits and scholarships, fellowships and bursaries, except for the exemption of $500.

This means that the basic exemption will be reduced by all these forms of income which become taxable, and one could find oneself not with $2,850 anymore, but with $2,500 or $2,400.

Mr. Chairman, in concluding my remarks, once again I urge the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance to get my message to him on behalf of my constituents of Bellechasse and of all other Canadians. Let us be reasonable and prove that we are intelligent people, that we know how to use the gross national product and let us allow Canadians to benefit from that product in order to meet their everyday needs.

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I shall not detain the committee very long. Indeed, I hesitate to get into this debate after the remarkably strong and eloquent address to which we have just listened, but I am going to deal with a much more mundane issue. When I read through sections 109 and 110 I am disappointed that they do not make provision for something for which I have argued in the past, namely a special tax reduction for those resident in the northern part of Canada. This is something that I have been pursuing for 25 or 30 years. In the House and elsewhere I have always met with the answer that it cannot be done because there must be tax rules of uniform application across this country; that it is not possible to take a parallel of north latitude as the boundary line between those taxed at one rate and those taxed at another or changes in deductions. I recognize that for administrative purposes there is some merit in the answer, but when we look at some of the things that have taken place in the last few years, particularly in the regional economic expansion program, we note that with respect to the recovery and depreciation rules at least, there are opportunities for varying the rules by the application of different rates across Canada.

The fact remains, Mr. Chairman, that what we have seen in the northern part of this country has been a failure to develop what I think is required if we are to settle in and win the north, in the sense that it should be won, a small entrepreneurial class. We have the native peoples who are now in many cases emerging from their native positions to take jobs in the milieu of the outside world. We have the large corporations and we have government, both of which make certain provisions for special northern living allowances. However, these are uneven in application and are applied to people who go into the north for a comparatively short period of time, maybe two or three years, and who serve their time and leave. The result of this policy has been that the increase in the northern population has not been what it should be when compared with other countries.

Recently we have had an opportunity to entertain Premier Kosygin and I am sure he has related some information about northern development in the Soviet Union. No doubt when the Prime Minister and others were over there they saw what has happened. It is known that certain incentives are given to people in the Soviet Union to go into the north. I suggest that through deductions for income tax purposes it would be mechanically and administratively possible to work out additional concessions for people living and working in the north. I shall not deal with the question of corporations because that comes under a different aspect of the bill. I think it is essential, however, that there be some permanency of tenure in that part of the country. Today we have to provide concessions for people who go in there to work, so they will have an incentive to stay. These concessions will have to be reflected in the rate of taxation.

In all seriousness I suggest to the minister and the parliamentary secretary that they should review their files on this matter. I know that my hon. friend from the Yukon has mentioned this subject from time to time, and I have raised it in this House on a number of occasions. There is no doubt that the further north you go the more expensive it is to live. I can recall the early days when I first went into the northern part of Alberta. It used to be fairly rough rule of thumb that every 300 miles you went north of Edmonton doubled the cost of everything, including liquor, Mr. Chairman. While it might not be that severe today, I suggest that this phenomenon is still to be observed. The government has a responsibility to make longer range plans for the development of the northern part of Canada than those that exist today because the people living there are subjected to a much higher cost of living. I am just going to leave it at that.

I am not berating the government particularly because I know there are departmental and administrative difficulties. I warn the government that failure to enact some simple concession of this kind is bound to have an adverse effect on development in the northern part of this country. I ask the parliamentary secretary to look seriously at this proposal. It may be impossible to implement it by December through the December budget. We are now in a cycle of monthly budgets. It may be that when we come to the January, February or March budgets this proposal can be implemented. You see, we are looking six months ahead, and there ought to be ample time for the gestation of this creative idea so that it may be delivered as a healthy and virile child some months from now.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I hope and believe that we have made our position with respect to proposed section 109 as clear as it can be made. We favour a tax credit system rather than a system based on exemption levels. We did our best when the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs was dealing with the white paper to make this point. We did our best to make it at second reading and we have done our best thus far, in committee of the whole consideration, to make that point. We do not seem to have persuaded the government to make the change. This is regrettable, but that is the way democracy works.

I confess to you, Sir, that I did quite a bit of reading in my favourite books to see whether there might be any way in which one could move an amendment to substitute a tax credit system for a tax exemption level system. I am afraid all the authorities are against the possibility of that being done. Although there are provisions indicating that amendments can be made with respect to tax bills, nevertheless, those amendments must be grafted upon the government's system. I will not, therefore, put Your Honour to the task of having to read the same books, as a result of which I fear you would rule out an amendment seeking to substitute a tax credit system for a tax exemption system.

That is not the end of my story. As you can imagine, I sat here yesterday with an amendment to raise the exemption levels which was similar to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Bellechasse and similar, also, to the amendment moved later by the hon. member for Portneuf. Again, since you have already ruled that type of amendment out of order, it would hardly be responsible of me to try that one again. I did not jump in with it yesterday, so to speak, because I thought that, procedurally, we already had before us one amendment to proposed section 109, namely, the amendment moved by the Minister of National Revenue which changes the word "taxpayer" to the word "individual" in one line of that proposed section. It is nice to know that a taxpayer is sometimes regarded as an individual. That change, however, is not significant. It is just a matter of using the proper word in the context of that particular part of the section. At any rate, that is why I did not move the amendment yesterday which was moved by my Social Credit friends.

Now that the possibility of an amendment that merely raises exemption levels has been ruled out of court by your rulings of yesterday on the amendments proposed by the hon. member for Bellechasse and the hon. member for Portneuf, I wish to follow another course. However, Sir, in this case I confess that I shall present my procedural argument before I move my amendment. Perhaps the citations that I shall read will indicate what is coming. Part of paragraph (2) of citation 263 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition reads:

—The principle that the sanction of the Crown must be given to every grant of money drawn from the public revenue, applies equally to the taxation levied to provide that revenue. No motion can therefore be made to impose a tax, save by a Minister of the Crown, unless such tax be in substitution, by way of equivalent, for taxation at that moment submitted to the consideration of Parliament;—

There is more to the paragraph, but I think I have read the pith of it. It is pretty clear, Mr. Chairman, that it is in order for a private member to move an amendment to a tax bill which is a substitution by way of an equivalent amount for taxation at that moment submitted to the consideration of Parliament.

A couple of pages farther over you will find citation 268. We are still looking at Beauchesne's Fourth Edition. Let me read these words from paragraph (1) of that citation:

—Though it is the function of the Committee of Ways and Means to impose rather than to repeal taxes, example—

It says "example". I believe it ought to say "examples".

—of the repeal of taxation effected in this committee are to be found upon the journals.

Now comes the important sentence:

Proposals for the variation or modification of taxation can therefore be made in the committee; but these proposals must be grafted upon the financial scheme submitted by the Government,—

And that is why I knew I could not move a motion to substitute tax credits for tax exemptions.

—and must not affect the balance of ways and means voted for the service of the year. Amendments, therefore, can be proposed to substitute another tax, of equivalent amount, for that proposed by the Government, as an alternative duty, the necessity of new taxation, to that extent, being already declared on behalf of the Crown.

Now, Mr. Chairman, may I relate that procedural submission to our position in terms of policy. We have already made it clear that we favour a tax credit system as opposed to a tax exemption system. Yesterday I said that if the government was not prepared to go for a tax credit system, we would plead with it to raise the exemption levels from the proposed $1,500 and $2,850 to $2,000 and $4,000 a year. I indicated that I was somewhat concerned about that because, after all, this is our second line of approach and not our first. As I say, I was somewhat concerned about that because, unless one adjusts the rates, the effect of raising exemption levels is to give benefits which are larger for those at the top of the income scale than for those at the bottom of the scale. But now my hand has been forced by your rulings of yesterday against the hon. member for Bellechasse and the hon. member for Portneuf and also by these citations that say that as a private member I can move an amendment for a tax that is a substitution for something the government has proposed, provided it is for an equivalent amount. The words are there. They are as clear as they can be in the English version of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition and I suspect they are just as clear in the French version.

I come, therefore, to the second approach that we take. If the government is not prepared to bring in the tax credit system, I plead with it to raise the exemption levels to $2,000 single and $4,000 married and at the same time to adjust the rates that are set out in another portion of clause 1. After all, Mr. Chairman, we are dealing with clause 1 in its entirety, a clause that has 596 pages. I suggest that changes be made in the rates of another portion of clause 1 so that the revenue lost to the Crown by raising exemption levels will be gained by higher rates for those in the upper brackets.

I have put all of this in the form of an amendment. It reads in technical language, but I have plenty of copies so that hon. members can look at it. I move:

That Bill C-259 be amended at page 277, (a) by deleting the figure "$1,500" from lines 12, 37 and 48 and by substituting therefor the figure "$2,000", and (b) by deleting the figure "$1,350" from lines 13 and 38 and by substituting therefor the figure "$2,000", and that the rates of tax provided in the proposed section 117, on pages 305 to 312, be adjusted to provide revenue equivalent to the revenue lost by changing the exemption levels as herein provided.

I suggest that should meet with everyone's wishes. Even my good friend the member for Bruce will like this. He complained yesterday that I wanted to cut out some taxes and not say where we could get money to take their place. This motion suggests where that money can be obtained.

This motion does what I think most Canadians want done. I am prepared to admit that most Canadians may not understand the tax credit system. They would understand it if it were in effect and they were getting the benefit of it. To most Canadians, the heart of this whole issue is that the exemptions levels ought to be higher.

The effect of this exemption, changing the figure $1,500 to $2,000 and the figure $1,350 to $2,000 in certain places in the bill, is that the exemption level in all places becomes $2,000 single and $4,000 married. It should not only satisfy the hon. member for Bruce, but also the government. It shows where the money will come from. It satisfies the provision in Beauchesne's Fourth Edition which clearly states that it is in order for private members to make certain changes in tax bills provided they are grafted upon the financial scheme submitted by the government and provided that where a tax is reduced another tax is substituted for it of an equivalent amount. I ask anybody in the House, what is wrong with that? Let's do it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Chairman: Order, please. I ask the parliamentary secretary to excuse me. I did not read the motion. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre read it in the context of his remarks. I want to express some reservations about the procedural acceptability of the motion. Before I recognize the parliamentary secretary, may I read the motion for the purpose of hearing arguments on the procedural acceptability. It is moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre:

That Bill C-259 be amended at page 277, (a) by deleting the figure "$1,500" from lines 12, 37 and 48 and by substituting therefor the figure "$2,000", and (b) by deleting the figure "$1,350" from lines 13 and 38 and by substituting therefor the figure "$2,000", and that the rates of tax provided in the proposed section 117, on pages 305 to 312, be adjusted to provide revenue equivalent to the revenue lost by changing the exemption levels as herein provided.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Chairman, when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre began, he carefully covered all of the ground that put him under any disability, giving advance notice that we were getting the full impact of his ingenuity in the final product. He certainly did not disappoint us with the amendment that came forward after the magnificent preamble.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am glad you like it.

Mr. Jerome: It is supposed, at least, not to be the prerogative of a counsel on a case to cite only those aspects which further his position and keep from the court those which do not. I suppose it is not fair to shackle a Parliamentarian with the same obligations. The hon. member has quoted those references which support his position and has conveniently ignored those which do not. Be that as it may, the argument in citation 263, which in general terms supports the idea he has in mind, should be carried on with the balance of the paragraph. It reads as follows:

—nor can the amount of a tax proposed on behalf of the Crown be augmented, nor any alteration made in the area of imposition. In like manner, no increase can be considered either of an existing, or of a new or temporary tax for the service of the year, except on the initiative of a minister, acting on behalf of the Crown; nor can a member other than a minister move for the introduction of a Bill framed to effect a reduction of duties, which would incidentally effect the increase of an existing duty, or the imposition of a new tax, although the aggregate amount of imposition would be diminished by the provisions of the Bill."

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

In the reference to citation 268, the hon. member failed to bring to the attention of the Chair the fact that the reference in that citation was to the committee of ways and means. This, of course, is a committee which has now been eliminated from our procedures. The considerations are obviously a good deal different when we are dealing with the final product than previously in the committee of ways and means. In addition, citation 269 was overlooked. It reads as follows:

No augmentation of a tax or duty asked by the Crown can be proposed to the committee, nor tax imposed, save upon the motion of a Minister of the Crown; nor would an amendment to extend the imposition of a tax to persons enjoying an exemption therefrom be now permitted.

The dilemma which the hon. member obviously faces is that if his amendment does what he intends it to do, it offends the rules. If his amendment does not offend the rules or does not do those things which have already been ruled out of order, it is not in his interest to put forward such an amendment. The answer to that dilemma is not a single amendment which offends the rules, but two amendments, one designed to correct the other. The amendment he is proposing to us which changes the exemptions is clearly out of order. What he proposes is a second amendment which is specifically designed to counteract the reduction in revenue resulting from the changes in the exemption levels, which are out of order, by making consequent amendments to the tax rates in order to bring the picture back into balance. The second amendment is equally out of order because it makes the same kind of changes, changes which are prohibited by all the citations to which I have referred Your Honour. I submit, therefore, that the amendment, despite the initiative which has been shown, is not less offensive to the rules which have been cited.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, it is a frequent way of doing things, when we get into procedural arguments, to say that the other fellow did not read the citations in full. Frankly, I abridged the citations because I thought it was better to focus attention upon the issue which is really before us. The things which the parliamentary secretary has read, in addition to what I read, have no effect on what we are now discussing, one way or the other. They do not alter the picture at all. For example, he read a bit more out of citation 263, where it says:

—nor can the amount of a tax proposed on behalf of the Crown be augmented, nor any alteration made in the area of imposition.

I ask Your Honour to note that this follows immediately aft er the clear authority given to a private member to propose a substitution of one form of tax for another, provided it is grafted upon the government's scheme. The net result of my amendment would not increase the total tax imposed by one dollar. It comes out to the same amount. The word "equivalent" is there as required by the rule. As for the suggestion that the area of imposition would be widened, my amendment does not include anyone under the tax arrangement who is not already there, although it does leave some out.

Then, when the hon. member looks at citation 268, he reads more of paragraph two which relates to probate and legacies and duties on real property, things which have no real bearing on the issue at all. My limiting of quotations to the parts I read was, I submit, to the advantage of everyone, to the extent that it concentrated attention on what is before us. I am fully aware of the rule that financial matters are the prerogative of the Crown and that it is the Crown which takes the initiative. But this is not an absolute rule.

Yesterday, and I draw this to the attention of the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council, you, Mr. Chairman, when you were ruling against an amendment put forward by a member of the Social Credit party, said a certain tax might be 10 erp cent and there might be an amendment by a private member to reduce it to 9 per cent, and provided the amendment did not alter the area of imposition you would have to accept it. So an exception was pointed out yesterday by the Chair itself. Authority for such exceptions is clear. There is also, of course, the citation which was read yesterday by an hon. member of the Social Credit party—the last sentence of 265(1):

This duty the members may perform by moving amendments to reduce the tax proposed by the administration.

So the parliamentary secretary cannot get away by making a sweeping generalization and saying what I have done is to compound a felony by seeking to move two amendments which are out or order. The first, by itself, I realize, would be invalid, but I maintain I do have the right to substitute one tax for another provided it is grafted upon the government's ifnancial scheme and provided the revenue form the substituted tax is equivalent to the revenue lost by revksing the first one.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a very precise remark and refer you to page 9007 of Hansard of October 25, 1971, when my colleague for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) moved an amendment.

Mr. Chairman, at that moment you referred to citation 265 from Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, 4th edition page 221. You said to my colleague for Bellechasse as well as to the committee members that the said amendment was out of order, because it intended to change the taxation field, in brief, it was against the very principle of the bill. You said that if the amendment moved by my colleague was concerned only with tax reduction, it would be acceptable, but because it was aimed at getting a number of taxpayers off the rolls, it would not be acceptable.

In this connection, I should like to repeat very quickly the citation. On page 221 of Beauchesne, it says, and I quote:

This duty the members may perform—

—of protesting the government's administration—

—by moving amendments to reduce taxes proposed by the Administration.

Now then, that was exactly the objective of the amendment moved by my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and that is why, Mr. Chairman, I would like to submit, with respect, that, in our opinion, this amendment is in order.

[English]

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Question? Okay, call it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Chairman: I thank hon. members who have assisted the Chair on the points of procedure arising from the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I should like to have time in which to think about it. If I were a betting person, I would not bet on the side of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre because I have grave doubts as to the acceptability of the amendment. But the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has made a most persuasive argument, as has the hon. member for Lotbinière and it would not be fair for me to make a ruling off the cuff when there has been so much preparation by the learned members who have argued both sides of this question.

There is just one point on which I might ask for the assistance of hon. members. One of the proposed amendments also purports to amend, as described, the proposed section 117 on pages 305-312, and that section is not before the committee. Do hon. members have any suggestions for dealing with that aspect?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I will be happy to make a comment on that aspect, Mr. Chairman. There is also before the committee an amendment to clause one by the Minister of National Revenue containing, I think, 95 parts designed to alter subclauses throughout clause one. If he can do it, if he can move one amendment to clause one dealing with a host of proposed new subclauses, then surely I can move an amendment which relates to two of them.

The Chairman: I did not raise the point in order to throw a block in the way of the committee proceeding or to indicate that the hon. member could not proceed with the amendment. I appreciate the point made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. The fact is, however, that the motion moved by the Minister of National Revenue on behalf of the Minister of Finance is before the committee. There may be some difficulty in connection with the point I have raised, but I do not think it is of great importance. I wonder whether the committee would give consent to dealing with the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre notwithstanding any procedural question which might arise. Of course, section 117 is not formally before the committee at this time.

Mr. Jerome: With respect, Mr. Chairman, I do not think that is the whole problem. I do not wish to endeavour to sustain a very strict position and argue that because we have agreed to approach this long bill in an intelligent manner, and deal with it in parts, and because we are not now discussing other parts which the hon. member proposes to amend, it would not be possible to proceed.

An hon. Member: You should hear Benson do it.

Mr. Jerome: The difficulty is much greater than that in that Your Honour is required to rule upon the legality of the amendment before us at the present time. It is designed specifically to raise exemptions and does so in dollars and cents terms. It is argued that while that is clearly procedurally offensive, what is designed to correct it is some amendment to section 117. What is really happening is that the hon. member is not putting forward that amendment to section 117, but is simply saying we should accept his amendment now and make some amendment to section 117 in the future.

The obligation to put forward a legal amendment to section 117, making changes in the incidence, the burden and the orderly imposition of taxation, has been argued today. At the best of times, if not always, it would be extremely difficult to put such an amendment in acceptable terms. I submit we are not now dealing with section 117 but rather an amendment which is supposed to legalize this procedure, but I submit it is not in sufficiently precise terms to enable the Chair to rule on it or to enable anyone to make an argument as to whether it is procedurally acceptable. I submit this puts the Chair in an absolutely impossible position.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the comments of the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Jerome), and I beg to differ with him.

First of all, fundamentally the question is what we discussed earlier and the arguments are the same.

Secondly, the Chair wonders whether we are not dealing with two sections, one of which is not now before the House. Now, when the representatives of the various parties agreed on the procedure to be followed, the question was this: Will we discuss Bill C-259 clause by clause or will we regroup them by sections or main titles?

In any event, the present debate is basically an experiment. That is what we are now doing: experimenting. The House leaders agreed on main titles, and we are experimenting, trying to speed up the work while performing our duties as members of Parliament, properly and conscienciously.

That supposes many things, Mr. Chairman. It means that if my colleague for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert), for Champlain (Mr. Matte), or any other rises and does what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre did, trying to amend—

[English]

Mr. Jerome: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. Perhaps the hon. member who is now speaking did not understand what I first said, or perhaps what I said was not translated adequately. It appears he is under the impression that in my earlier remarks I was suggesting the committee should be forced to stay with only those sections we are discussing. I want to make it perfectly clear that I was not attempting to sustain that position because it would be too rigid. I have no objection and do not propose that we on this side have any objection in a situation like this, or one which may arise at another time, to discussing other related sections. If it is necessary to put forward an amendment which deals not necessarily with the section we are discussing, but coincidentally with an amendment to another section, no one on this side would argue against that. It would appear from the matter to which the hon. member addresses himself that I took precisely the opposite position. I just wanted to make that perfectly clear.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, I am now pleased with the remarks of the parliamentary secretary since he says that there is no opposition from his party. This is precisely what we want, Mr. Chairman. We wish that the principle of debate be honored so that we may discuss a clause respecting capital gains. In this way we recognize the principle whereby we may talk about another part of the bill also under the heading of capital gains. This implies that a member of this House and of this committee may rise and introduce comprehensive amendment.

This is not provided for in the Standing Orders but it was generally agreed upon. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that we could end the discussion since, as indicated by the parliamentary secretary, we quite agree on that point.

The Chairman: So there will be no misunderstanding as to how the committee is to proceed I should like to make one or two comments. As I said earlier, the Chair did not raise this matter for the purpose of precluding consideration by the committee of all aspects of the hon. member's motion. I should like to take the arguments of the three hon. members who assisted the Chair under advisement. It would be helpful if we considered the motion as proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. If the first part of the motion is allowed, then at some later date the hon. member would have to satisfy the Chair on the procedural acceptability of the second part. I think that is the argument put forward by the parliamentary secretary. If there is no disagreement to my suggestion, I will take the matter under advisement and make a ruling later. If I allow the motion it will be on the understanding that at some later time the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre must satisfy the Chair as to the second part. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Hon. members have taken a great deal of time and effort and it would not be fair to make a hasty ruling. I will consider the matter as quickly as possible and rule on it.

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Chairman, my remarks will be brief but there are three aspects of sections 109 and 110 to which I should like to refer. The first aspect concerns the high expenses incurred by parents in respect of children suffering from cerebral palsy and other related diseases which require extensive treatment. To make it a little more clear, I am speaking not about medical expenses but about travelling expenses that parents incur when they take their children from smaller communities, villages and cities in the countryside, to major medical centres where specialized treatment can be obtained. Very often these parents run up high expenses over a period of several years. They must travel sometimes by plane to centres such as Toronto, Hamilton, Montreal, Vancouver and so on.

This disease which afflicts children requires extended treatment. I have talked to some constituents in my riding who have had expenses in the neighbourhood of $5,000 to $7,000 over a period of perhaps 10 to 12 years. A couple of weeks ago when speaking on second reading of the tax reform bill I alluded to some aspects of what I consider to be a double standard of taxation. I think we all agree there are some groups in our society which have a greater advantage in respect of writing off expenses than other groups. I feel that parents with children afflicted by diseases such as cerebral palsy should be allowed some kind of tax reduction in relation to the expenses incurred in taking their children to major medical centres. They must travel and often stay overnight at a hotel or motel. They must eat in restaurants and they may be away from home for a couple of days or perhaps a week while the child is being treated. Let me suggest to the parliamentary secretary that some consideration should be given to granting tax exemptions in this area.

Another aspect of section 110 relates to the economic or financial problems parents have in attempting to cope with a child who has a perceptual handicap. As a school teacher, I recall that 10 or 12 years ago we did not know what perceptually handicapped meant. We were under the impression that every child who was dull or a slow learner was a child with a low I.Q. who could not learn. We find now that they have physical disabilities which make it difficult to understand what they are reading. This slows down considerably their learning ability. As a result, much money is being spent officially at the board level in our school systems and in the department of education to help correct this deficiency. However, many parents believe their children should have specialized tuition. This kind of specialized tuition can be rather costly, particularly to people in the low income brackets. I would like to suggest to the parliamentary secretary that perhaps some provision could be made for a tax exemption to be given to parents who have to pay extra tuition fees for the perceptually handicapped. Again this can run into a fairly high cost if you consider that to rectify the problem in the learning process of the child, it might take not just a couple of years or five years but perhaps 10 or 12 years.

From my own experience I know the schools can do only so much. In most instances, the parents send their children to specialists in this field. Of course, the fees very often are fairly expensive. A third aspect of this section of the bill relates to expenses incurred by teachers who are attempting to upgrade their standards and improve their professional ability. Obviously, it appears I am trying to speak for only my own profession, but I think it is a well known fact that other professions in this country have—I will not say built-in safeguards—members of their professions in politics who have spoken out in their favour. I am not attempting to set myself up as a lobbyist for the teaching profession at any level, but merely wish to point out some of the problems teachers have. I refer particularly to those who are beginning their careers and are in the low or middle income bracket and those who are teaching at the elementary school level. I am not referring specifically to those teachers who are now earning, shall we say, $15,000 or $16,000 a year.

I should like to preface my remarks in this regard by saying that, as we all know, society is becoming extremely complex. In order for a good teacher to keep abreast of things and to improve his knowledge and specifically his capability to direct students in new educational processes, it is necessary for him or her to take refresher courses. At the present time so far as I know the only tax concession granted in this regard is related to tuition fees during the summer recess. Again, most teachers who are taking courses go back to school. The tuition fee itself very often is paid by the board of education and is one of the smallest items of expense incurred. They have to travel. Some of our teachers come from the north to the various urban centres across Canada. Their expenses are high. I think we should be able to provide some tax concession to enable teachers to write off at least part of the expenses they incur while attending these schools. One might argue that since teachers take these courses to increase their income, why should the government assist them in increasing their own level of income. Let us not forget that in raising their levels of income they will be paying higher income taxes, so I think it makes some sense to suggest that the Department of National Revenue will receive as much or more than it gives.

Several years ago when Bell Telephone was switching over to a more complicated technological process a friend of mine working for Bell at that time was sent to Toronto for a course. His wages came in regularly. The cost of his course was by Bell. All his bills, the hotel account, his food, lodging and so on, were paid for and the company could charge this amount to operating costs and obtain a tax concession on it. I feel that if employees of a private company can be upgraded to improve their output,—and bear in mind I do not think it is incumbent upon boards of education to pay the expenses out of public taxes—the least the government can do is allow those teachers who have the determination and ambition to improve themselves to write off their living expenses or part of their living expenses while they are away taking courses to upgrade themselves.

These are the three major points I wanted to make. I am not asking for special concessions in the sense I am asking for special status for any one group. I am simply referring back to what I said a few weeks ago to the effect that I strongly believe there is a double standard in this new tax bill. Some people can write off expenses while in pursuit of their jobs, while others can not. In referring to the first two points I have raised, I do not believe it would be unfair or inequitable to allow parents of children with cerebal palsy or any other serious ailment which requires highly specialized medical treatment in centres many miles away from home, to write off some of the expenses involved in taking their children to these centres for help. Nor do I believe it is unfair or inequitable to ask the government to consider allowing some tax concession to parents with children who have learning difficulties or who are perceptually handicapped and who require highly specialized treatment. So, Mr. Chairman, this is what I wished to contribute to the discussion at this point.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Finance is in the House. Yesterday I made a point which I presented in the form of a question. I did not think the parliamentary secretary or the officials could substitute their opinion for that of the minister or the government, so I now take the opportunity to raise the same question again. I imagine the minister is familiar with it. It involves discrimination against non-married people who are living together, whether or not they are free to marry each other, and the fact that they are not given the same type of exemption as those of us who have followed the orthodox route to such a union. The Prime Minister of this country has stated that the government has no business in the bedrooms of the nation. If that is good enough for the criminal law of our country it should be good enough for the tax law of Canada. I, therefore, ask the Minister of Finance if he will agree to make amendments to section 109 to correct what appears to be a glaring case of discrimination, or are the Prime Minister's words simply to be regarded as hypocritical baloney.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, in this respect I would simply like to say that, while I obviously am sympathetic in this case, it is very difficult to establish what a common-law relationship is. Do you allow people to claim married status because somebody has a girl friend whom he visits every now and then? The law is pretty definitive in respect of what married status is. I think that the relationship about which my hon. friend is talking may, in some instances, be the relationship of people who have gone through the formality of marriage in church or of civil marriage, but at least there is some evidence in that case, and you then move from the stage of people who have this kind of claim, a legitimate claim, down to the end. I believe that in the law it would be impossible to define the kind of relationship that is recognized if you were to consider allowing common-law marriage under the Income Tax Act.

Mr. McCleave: May I make a very sensible observation to the minister because the formula that he is looking for and which he thinks is difficult to achieve happens to be within section 109 already. It deals with people who maintain a self-contained domestic establishment. So we do not have people sneaking all around the city to accomplish this purpose of being in the category that I mentioned. They live together; it is as simple as that. They live in a self contained domestic establishment and provision for that is right in the act.

[Translation]

Mr. Matte: The clause now before us deserves our unremitting attention of course, because it can affect the greatest number of Canadian taxpayers. We should therefore take all necessary precautions in order to bring about a real change that would amount to something new for the taxpayers.

As I said before, the government has certainly sought, through this clause, to innovate so that other far less palatable sections could be adopted. The increase of the basic deductions from $1,000 to $1,500 for a single person and from $2,000 to $2,850 for a married person was thought to be a present to Canadian taxpayers.

[Mr. Blackburn.]

Mr. Chairman, let us forsake the mathematical and technical juggling and revert to the real problems facing the Canadian taxpayer.

I would like also to point out how this government or the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), through these inadequate deductions, are unable to somewhat correct certain anomalies, not to say inequities, which taxpayers have to endure.

Mr. Chairman, if one would think in terms of the individual's needs and if the tax legislation could be changed to take into account the will, the wishes and the interest of the taxpayer, the new tax deductions would have been calculated on the basis of the bare minimum that should be guaranteed to each and everyone to enable them to live at least decently if not comfortably. And it is absolutely illogical, and I repeat "illogical" that this bare minimum be taxable.

If we ever calculate the bare minimum which an adult needs to live in Canada, we reach the figure of $1,500. If we exercise a minimum of judgment, we are going to say that it is $1,500, but the minister as well as everybody else knows that if a survey were conducted, it would indicate that this amount is largely inadequate and will not even pay for the upkeep of a CEGEP or university student. This does not even cover living expenses for any other individual. It is therefore indecent to tolerate such a small exemption.

There exists a sort of contradiction which I should like to underline. When considering the minimum exemption, taking into account that when the Old Age Security Act was amended, it was estimated that the amount granted as old age pension and guaranteed income supplement was a vital minimum, I believe, Mr. Chairman, that we have in this case the vital minimum for two people 65 years old without any income. Such a vital minimum is recognized as allowing two people to live decently. They are given $255 per month, that is $3,060 per annum. This is accepted as a basis, since this is the amount given.

Now, we must at least acknowledge that since the amount of $3,060 is felt to be needed by people of 65 to live on, in general, people only 65, 45, 30 or 20 years of age need more money.

In that case, to tax an amount of $1,500 even before the individual has had time to secure food, clothing or housing is nonsense and the Income Tax Act should immediately be amended in that respect.

All hon. members will agree that no one in the House can rise and suggest that $1,500 is an appropriate vital minimum for a Canadian citizen, when they know very well that such is not the case. Nobody else would pretend that it is so.

I wonder from simple common sense why the tax exemptions have not been raised higher, at least to the minimum income level which each Canadian is entitled to have.

All the more so as this tax reform proposal is so complicated that taxpayers computing their returns will be lost to the extent that they will probably have to pay someone if they want to pay their taxes. Besides, an odious factor will be added to something already not too exciting since our workers, the salaried people, precisely those who pay their taxes at the source—consequently before their food, lodging and clothing—have no time to study all these technicalities and will therefore have to call in an accountant to figure out their taxes.

This again reveals how eager the government was to show its false generosity because certainly nobody can live with $1,500 a year. I think this no longer exists and if it did it should be definitely changed.

This is why I fail to understand why the Minister of Finance does not immediately propose an amendment similar to that moved yesterday by the hon. member for Bellechasse and to that moved today by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I wonder why the Minister of Finance does not immediately move an amendment to boost this amount of $1,500 to $3,000 and allow a $5,000 exemption for married couples.

There would be no exaggeration in that, Mr. Chairman, but it would merely be logical and sensible. And we would have then done something for the Canadian taxpayer. Moreover, considering all the means that are resorted to and that are used to get more money, one must say after all that with this mass of taxation reform, the government would surely get more from taxes.

How strange that one should not realize that if more money were left in the taxpayers' pockets, there would be less involvement on the part of the state in the individual's life and government's administration costs would therefore be reduced. That thought never occurs to us. Put an additional $500 or $1,000 in every taxpayer's pockets, and the unemployment problem might perhaps not be what it is today. Perhaps we would not have to cope with the problems of small, average or big industries that are fighting against financial difficulties and must therefore lay off employees.

That would be a good solution because everybody could go their own way and that is, I believe, what Canadian taxpayers want above all, namely that kind of freedom which will make them really happy to live in this country. But it rests with the government to grant them that possibility and that is why I deem it my duty to express once more the taxpayers' opinion, in my constituency and throughout Canada: That the exemptions advocated in section 109 are inadequate, that they are far from being satisfactory to the Canadian taxpayer and that in the case of a person earning $3,000, $4,000 or $5,000, a small wage-earner, it would be put a mere difference of some $30 or $40 for a whole year of work. That is merely making fun of the taxpayer.

• (4:40 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Chairman, I read reports in the press today that the parliamentary secretary, replying to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on the question of tax credits, said that these would not be nearly as simple and straightforward as the advocates of a tax credit system seemed to believe. But, Mr. Chairman, all of us realize that nothing is as simple and straightforward as we would like.

I think we should look back and see what the Carter Commission did say. That commission was dominated by an eminent accountant, a former tax expert in the civil service. You would not expect such a person to recommend a plan that would be impossible to administer. At that time there was a lot of talk about the necessity of hiring armies of tax experts, but it was just talk.

We in the New Democratic Party believe in that portion of the commission's report which advocates a tax based on tax credits, a comprehensive system that should include capital gains and windfalls. But when we talk about tax credits and exemptions the thing that makes me worry is how one person, Colin Brown, can convince the government, through a skilful propaganda process, to change its mind and not even consider tax credits as recommended by the Carter Commission.

I would like to quote one short paragraph for the benefit of the Minister of Finance and his parliamentary secretary, and then give the source. It reads as follows:

> The Carter Commission would not limit, much less deny, the rewards of successful individuals and companies. It would insist that they, like everyone else, pay their fair share of taxes on gains in wealth. The outcry against the Carter Report has come from a very small section of the Canadian people—not more than the top-earning 2 to 5 per cent, according to a speaker at a Canadian Tax Foundation Conference. But because of the lack of any comparable outcry for the report from the unorganized millions of lower and middle income taxpayers, there is a clear danger that the report will be shelved. It may become an academic document to which professors refer wistfully when they are talking about an ideal tax system, rather than a practical charter of just taxation for Canadians. The Church should urgently support the Carter Report as a magnificent document which deserves to be implemented in the main.

That is from "The Cutting Edge," the 43rd annual report, 1968, of the Board of Evangelism and Social Service of the United Church of Canada. If we are talking about justice and equity in taxation, then instead of being harassed by people like Colin Brown the government should take into consideration the 95 per cent of people who could be helped by a tax credit system. However, it appears that the government is too concerned about its friends in the upper 5 per cent bracket. It wants to try to please them rather than introduce a proper, equitable tax system to help millions of people across the country.

We have to ask ourselves whether the rights and liberties of the individual are protected under the system. It appears to me that adoption of the amendment offered by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, which the Chair has taken under advisement, would bring about a more equitable tax system. So far as this party is concerned it would not take the place of tax credits, but is second best.

I believe the Minister of Finance must realize that it is the principle of equity that is facing this Parliament. We have to ask ourselves a number of questions about the type of exemptions proposed here. We have to ask what personal circumstances should be recognized in allocating tax burdens among individuals and families. How much should tax burdens differ between those in one circumstance and those in another? There are questions of belief, and we in this House must recommend and put into legislation that which we believe to be fair. We in this House are given the responsibility of making recommendations and enacting legislation that we think will be fair to the majority of the people. The tax burdens of those facing heavy family obligations and responsibilities should be reduced to reflect the non-discretionary expenditures that they are required to make. We know, Mr. Chairman, that this could be done through the adoption of separate rate schedules and tax credits. The parliamentary secretary suggests that such a system would be difficult to administer, although Carter indicated that it was possible.

• (4:50 p.m.)

The National Pensioners and Senior Citizens Federation presented a brief to the government in 1968, to which reference was made yesterday. One clause reads:

RESOLVED that we ask that the allowable income ceiling be raised to $3,000 per couple, $2,000 per single person,

The brief from the same body dated October 18, 1971 suggests $3,000 for single people and $4,500 for married couples. This body is representative of the senior citizens all across this country. Surely, more could be done for them than has been done in the three years since the first brief was presented. It appears, however, that the government is not interested in this area.

I should like now to refer to that portion of section 110 dealing with exemptions and would call the attention of the Minister of Finance and his parliamentary secretary to it. The cost of burial—I am quite prepared to say facetiously that this bill should be buried or cremated and then maybe we could get back to the basic problems of this country! This is a matter of great concern to the senior and all citizens of this country. I have a letter dated October 8, 1971 from the minister which reads:

Funeral expenses are, of course, a personal expenditure unrelated to earning income and, in cases of hardship, need not be incurred in any significant amount. For these reasons such expenses are not provided for as an allowable deduction.

Well, Mr. Chairman, though it may sound frivolous, one individual told me recently that this would be fine and dandy if you could leave the body on top of the ground and tell the government to bury it or cremate it. The minister is in the House at the moment and I should like to ask if he could give some serious consideration to allowing funeral expenses as a legitimate deduction from income taxes. The letter suggests that funeral expenses are a personal expenditure, but surely it ceases to be personal when the law decrees that a body must be buried or cremated. Whether we like it or not, this is a legitimate expense and should be included in the provisions of this act. It appears to me that when we talk about funeral expenses being a personal expenditure which has to be absorbed somehow, we must be realistic and acknowledge that it is a burden to the majority of people.

The minister's letter states that such expenses "need not be incurred in any significant amount". Surely, this suggests "have" and "have not" funerals. The minister probably did not mean to suggest two classes of funeral—one rather elaborate and one to drop the body in a hole. But this is the reply received to a letter I wrote to the minister concerning an individual who wished to have such expenses considered for exemption from income taxes.

In many cases when a husband or wife is ill, the doctor will recommend that the spouse remain near by. This can entail considerable expense for travelling and accommodation, but as far as I know such expenses are not allowed under the Income Tax Act. I should like very seriously to ask the minister if he could give consideration to allowing a fair amount for funeral expenses, whether cremation or burial, and thus eliminate the "have" and "have-not" distinction. I know that we will not make any radical change at this time, but perhaps he would look into it. Allowances are made in many other areas and with the increasing cost of burial in Canada today, surely consideration could be given to this matter.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. Before I recognize the hon. minister I should announce the proceedings on the adjournment motion. The questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands—Regional Economic Expansion—Atlantic provinces—assessment and revamping of departmental programs in light of criticisms—long term targets; the hon. member for Brandon-Souris—Post Office—Steps to improve service and avoid exorbitant cost for mailing letters; the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley—Agriculture—Farm machinery—federal assistance to prairie provinces in testing program.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, I simply wanted to say that I would consider the representation of my hon. friend but it is a very difficult matter when one suggests bringing in expenses which are not related to the earning of income. I should indicate that the government did recognize problems in this area when we enacted the Canada Pension Plan. A death benefit was included there to look after the particular situation for people who had contributed to the plan.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Chairman, I have listened at some length to the remarks that have been made. Many points have been brought out so I am going to be very brief. One of the government members mentioned that they could not go beyond the exemption of $1,500 single and $2,850 married and he mentioned a cost of half a billion dollars. That is a lot of money, but perhaps if we cut out the waste and extravagance and look things over very carefully it can be done.

If we go back to the time of the St. Laurent government in 1949, we find that the exemption levels were fixed at $1,000 single and $2,000 married. This was fair and equitable then, but surely it is not fair and equitable now to settle for less than the amount of the rise in inflation over that period. I, for one, believed that those figures were fair and equitable when brought in by that Liberal government. There has been a significant change in the cost of living since then. We set the basis for calculating the cost of living index back to 100 in 1961 or 1962. In other words, we ran from 1949 to 1961 and then set the clock back. But we had already suffered a loss of 25 per cent in the value of the dollar. Now, we have gone from 1961-62 to 1970-71 with a consequent loss of 27 per cent in the value of the dollar. Surely, it does not take a mathematician to add 27 and 25 and arrive at 52 per cent.

We are now asking taxpayers of this country to settle for something that will give them far less than the St. Laurent government established for them in 1949. Surely, this is not fair. I have attempted to calculate out what would be a fair exemption for a single person. Statisticians in the government ought to work on these figures. It is no use asking the Minister of Finance to work on them, because sometimes he is in error. According to my figures, the exemption for a single person ought to be established at around $1,800 and for a married couple at around $3,600. Perhaps the minister could tell us of any figures that the people in his department have established. Perhaps he can tell us why he has established the present levels. At any rate, so far as I can figure out, the exemption levels I have suggested ought to apply. If one considers cost of living increases between 1949 and 1961 and between 1961 and the present, one will see that the exemption levels I have suggested are about right. Surely, in this age of computers and electronics we can arrive at a better way of working out these matters without cheating our taxpayers.

By setting exemption levels as we have we are cheating the taxpayers at a time when their dollar is being eroded. Surely, that is not right. Provision ought to be made in this bill, for higher levels, and I will ask the minister to give that serious consideration. He ought to introduce a new system whereby exemption levels are adjusted each and every year to take into account increases in living costs, inflation, or whatever the case may be. There is no reason for not doing that in this electronic age. Actually, income tax forms are processed electronically, so that there is no excuse for not looking into this matter every year, two years or even five years. Let us not wait again for a period as long as that between 1949 and 1971 before adjusting exemptions. Such neglect looks a bit ridiculous in the present age.

The increased exemption of $650 for those of 65 and over is a good measure, because among those people there is an increasing toll of illness and their illnesses are of longer duration. As I say, however, the minister ought to give the matter of the adjustment of exemptions serious consideration. If they cannot be adjusted yearly, perhaps they could be adjusted every three, four or five years. I think it could be done yearly. I would not like to see exemptions increased in the same way as the guaranteed income supplement is being increased. Let there be no 2 per cent per year escalation there. I think exemptions ought to be granted which would take into account inflation and the erosion of the dollar. I leave that thought with the minister in the hope that he will bring the system up to date and rectify the erosion that is taking place every year, so that in the future people will be treated as nearly as possible in the same way as when this bill is passed.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I am afraid the number of unanswered questions I have accumulated may outrun the opportunity that I will have to answer them in 20 minutes. At this time, I should like to answer at least a few of them. Perhaps I may sufficiently anticipate the points of the hon. member for Fraser Valley West that he will not feel called upon to exercise his talents of oratory.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mahoney: That is most unlikely, however. Perhaps the wish is father to the thought.

The matter of tax credits has been raised again by numerous speakers. I ought to say that this point was investigated thoroughly by the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs when it was considering the white paper proposals. A document submitted to that committee under date of January 23, 1970 and prepared by the Department of Finance for the information of the committee, made a number of points worth noting. Although the figures, Mr. Chairman, refer to the exemptions and rates as proposed in the white paper, the point is equally valid at present and a comparable set of tax credits and adjusted rates could certainly be prepared in connection with Bill C-259.

The paper presented to us made the point that both tax credits and exemptions are methods by which amounts of income can be excused from taxation. An exemption can be viewed as adding a zero rate bracket to the bottom of the rate schedule. A tax credit can be viewed as transforming the bottom rate bracket or brackets, or parts thereof, into a zero rate bracket. The paper prepared a series of comparisons of a tax credit system showing tax credit for a single taxpayer of $210 and then an additional tax credit of $253 if he were married. It demonstrated that, point for point in the various income brackets, these were precisely the taxes that would have been paid by a single taxpayer or by a married taxpayer without dependent children, if one were to compare them to the schedules appended to the white paper.

The paper also pointed out that under a tax credit system, if the government wishes to provide that no one with an income of $1,400 or less will pay income tax, it must provide a credit which equals the tax on the first $1,400 of income. If a rate of 50 per cent had been applied to the first $1,400, the tax on $1,400 of income would have been $700 and the tax credit would have been $700. If the rate applied to the first $1,400 of income had been zero, the tax credit would also have been zero. In summary, the document said, and I quote:

> —the rate or rates applied to the first $1,400 are meaningless in that no one pays them. In practice, only the rates which apply to income above that level affect the amount of tax that is actually to be paid, and these rates can be adjusted in either regime.

So, again, I suggest to the committee that the easy suggestions hon. members have made in their general submissions that the tax credit system is more flexible and fairer to low income taxpayers than the exemption system are simply superficial observations completely without foundation. Hon. members cited no authority for their submissions. The important thing is not whether we introduce a tax credit system or a tax exemption system. The important thing is the rates that are applied to income upon which tax is actually paid, no matter whether that income is above the income which is excused from taxation, as under the exemption system, or whether it is that tax on income is net after the deduction of tax credits, as under the proposed tax credit system that hon. members opposite have been discussing. There is nothing magic about the tax credit system. The exemption system that this government has decided to remain with certainly gives the same opportunities for flexibility and fairness.

The hon. member for Edmonton West raised a number of points yesterday, and I want to refer to them. First, the hon. member referred to subparagraph 110(1)(c)(iv) and said:

> At the present time there is difficulty in interpreting those words. Some assessment officers indicate that a taxpayer or a dependent must be confined to bed for a period of 12 months prior to entry into a nursing home if any nursing home expenses during that 12 months in the taxation year are to be claimed or allowed.

The interpretation of this language, as well as the language of other sections of the bill, of course, will be the responsibility of the Minister of National Revenue. I can only say that that particular paragraph is the same as present subsection 27(1)(c)(iv) and has therefore been administered for many years. There ought to be ample precedent for its interpretation.

The hon. member for Dauphin raised a related question about the same section. He wanted to know whether an elderly person could deduct as medical expenses the amount that he pays for full time care in a nursing home. In this case it is assumed that the elderly person requires care but is not confined to bed or a wheel chair. Such expenses under the bill do not qualify as medical expenses. There is a problem in defining a nursing home, as the hon. member pointed out. Amounts paid to a hospital qualify as medical expenses, but homes for the elderly range all the way from private hospitals to accommodation which would compare favourably with some of our better hotels. A deduction for amounts paid to nursing homes could give some individuals a deduction for personal living expenses that would be quite unjustified.

Yesterday the hon. member for Greenville-Carleton raised a point under section 110(1)(c)(vi). The hon. member for Brant reiterated that point today. Each of them was talking about a different ailment, but nevertheless the answer is the same. This pertains to the question of children requiring special care or training because of mental or physical illness. Section 110(1)(c)(vi) is a new section in the bill. I commend it to both hon. members. It is among the list of deductions that may be made for a medical expense, and I quote:

for the care of the taxpayer, his spouse or any such dependent in a school, institution or other place of care that is specially equipped to provide care to persons who are physically or mentally handicapped and that admits for care only persons who are so handicapped,

There is an amendment to that clause which has been submitted by the government. It will make it clear that this provision extends to care and training as well as care alone. We feel that answers the question which the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton raised in connection with the disease dyslexia and which the hon. member for Brant raised in connection with perceptually handicapped children.

Yesterday the hon. member for Edmonton West raised the question of the guaranteed income supplement still being included in the computation of taxable income. The reason for including this supplement in income is to require that it be taken into account along with the old age security pension and other income in determining the extent to which an individual may be regarded as a dependant for tax purposes. It does not affect the taxation of the individual receiving the guaranteed income supplement. Indeed, at the present time no tax will be payable by that person. It does affect the taxation of persons who may be claiming a recipient of a guaranteed supplement as a dependent.

If the supplement were excluded from income, many elderly individuals would be regarded as receiving only the old age security pension of $960 a year for taxation purposes and would be qualified as dependents even though they may be actually receiving at least $1,620 a year. Under the system in Bill C-259, an individual does not cease to be a dependent for tax purposes when he has income in excess of $950 a year, as is the present system. A taxpayer could deduct $550 for his parent who had income of only $960. The requirement that the supplement must be included in income will have the result that all individuals eligible for old age pension throughout the year will have at least $1,620 income for tax purposes.

The hon. member for Peace River raised the matter of special concessions for northern residents under the Income Tax Act. There is no doubt that mechanically this could probably be done. However, it is a basic policy decision. It is a policy dealing with the northern territories and economy rather than a tax policy question. I really cannot offer to answer it beyond that point.

The hon. member for Brant raised the question of travelling expenses for handicapped persons. We have looked at this. We do not have any satisfactory answer to offer at this time.

The question of upgrading teachers and refresher courses was raised. In his speech, the hon. member was fair enough to cite most of the arguments against implementing his recommendation. I can only say that we place a different weight on the arguments against it than he obviously does.

The question of deemed realization on charitable donations, of items of property as opposed to money, was raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West. I prefer to deal with that question when we come to the capital gains section of the bill rather than under 109 and 110.

The hon. member for Edmonton West also raised the question of adjusting the provision dealing with eligible medical expenses, so that all such medical expenses would be prescribed by regulation. The bill before the House has made an amendment to the section dealing with appliances and devices to provide for that. The reason for that amendment in this particular instance is that technological advances in this area are proceeding extremely rapidly. In the opinion of the government, the law was not sufficiently responsive to these changes. It was necessary to be fair to taxpayers to provide a means by which deductions in this area could be allowed on a more rapid basis than has been the case in the past where an amendment to the act is required. However, on a general policy basis, deductions, changes in incidence of taxation of this nature, can be a very important decision. The government feels that Parliament should have the right to pass on them rather than the governor in council.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that tidies up the bulk of the questions to which I have not responded over the past few hours. I will check my inventory and no doubt I will have an opportunity to pick up any loose ends later.

Mr. Rynard: I wish to ask the parliamentary secretary a question. I was not clear on his answer with reference to nursing homes. Did I understand him to say that this might lead to people going into homes and claiming deductions when it was not necessary for them to go into these homes, thereby getting an allowance for living expenses?

Mr. Mahoney: No, Mr. Chairman. I was not questioning the motivation of people going into nursing homes. I was pointing out that the conditions under which they go into them, from a personal point of view, can be vastly different. Some nursing homes are tantamount to private hospitals. Others are very fine accommodation indeed, but do not render medical care or treatment of any description. In many instances, a general allowance of payments to nursing homes would result in taxpayers being allowed to deduct what are essentially personal living expenses. This would be inequitable as far as the vast body of taxpayers is concerned.

Mr. Rynard: As far as I know, and I know the Minister of Finance will correct me on this if I am wrong, in Ontario it is necessary to obtain a doctor's signature to get into these homes. They are all licensed.

Mr. Benson: I believe in most cases they are licensed.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Chairman, ordinarily I would be delighted to respond to the suggestion of the parliamentary secretary that he be denied my oratorial skills on the ground that some of the things I am about to say have been covered, at least in part by other speakers. From my experience, I feel that repetition in this House is not unique and that I must move ahead. Therefore, I cannot stand pat.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (5:20 p.m.)

Mr. Rose: I say that with the utmost charity.

Mr. Chairman, I understand that although today we are discussing section 109, section 110 is also fair game, although it was not yesterday. I am glad this has been ironed out. I am concerned about the 3 per cent rule, the situation in which medical expenses for a variety of the things the parliamentary secretary has mentioned in response to other members' speeches are covered or allowed as deductions. We should examine what this means. It means that a person earning $5,000 can deduct expenses in excess of $150. That is the way I read it; if I am wrong I would be pleased if the minister would correct me. I suppose one might describe $5,000 as an average sort of income and depending upon other circumstances the allowance might, or might not, be of great benefit, because a taxpayer would still have to pay the first $150. Those who earn a great deal more money are entitled to be sicker, or at least, deduct a larger amount for medical expenses.

I should like to draw attention to cases which have arisen in my own constituency and which have been brought to my notice. I have been in touch with the department about some of them. I was pleased to hear the parliamentary secretary indicate that transportation expenses would be considered tax deductible if associated with an illness. Perhaps, I did not clearly understand him correctly.

Mr. Mahoney: No, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member did not hear me correctly, I am afraid. The bill proposes no change in the situation as far as that is concerned.

Mr. Rose: I am sorry to hear that. In my view it should. A difficult situation is created for many people who are affected directly, or whose families are affected, particularly when regular treatment for certain ailments is required. I recall a situation where a businessman in the community which I have the honour to represent is obliged to put about 20,000 miles on his car each year to take his wife to a large centre where she can receive treatment for a kidney ailment requiring the use of a special machine. At 10 cents a mile, this adds up to $2,000. The man has no choice. If he does not follow this routine, his wife will die. He is allowed a deduction amounting to $150, yet he must face this fantastic burden of transportation costs. Situations of this kind should be investigated.

What is happening is this: the purpose of the medicare legislation, which has been applauded on all sides of the House, is being defeated. I know the minister must be tired of hearing about these special cases and I realize it is difficult to design legislation which will cover all eventualities. In spite of what some people say, I do not believe he is a hard-hearted individual. His own doctor has suggested he should go to Florida. While this is a wonderful idea, I would not argue that he should be allowed to deduct the cost of such a trip from his income tax. But I have made my point, and I do not wish to be facetious about it. By the way I might add, before I leave this case, that the constituent I have mentioned was invited to talk this matter over with the regional director. They had a nice chat but it did not mean a thing. He still faces the same high travel expenses.

Case No. 2 is another difficult situation involving a child requiring special training and care—a little girl suffering from spinal meningitis. The family is doing its best but is bearing a tremendous burden since school and training facilities suitable for this child are remotely situated. In a case like this, a maximum allowance of 3 per cent is not enough. If the child had only been sensible enough to have contracted a different kind of illness, things would have been fine. But this did not happen. It was not the luck of the draw.

The next point to which I should like to draw attention concerns the cost of necessary prescription drugs to older citizens. Many of these older people are obliged to live on meagre incomes. The party to which I belong has discussed this issue many times and our position in regard to it is well known. On occasions, the cost of prescription drugs runs as high as $90 or $100 a month. Three per cent of $3,000 amounts to $90 a year, which is no exemption, really. Something should be done about this; most of the people about whom I am concerned in this context have incomes which would fall close to the figure I have mentioned.

Reading the bill we find that in section 110 (1) there are some 14 places in which the need for such things as wheelchairs, special appliances, trusses, limbs, glass eyes and so on is recognized. But the legislation does this only in a tokenistic way. Members of Parliament should be well aware that there is no magic attached to the 3 per cent figure. It has not always been 3 per cent. Once it was 4 per cent.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Rose: An hon. member over there said "No". Does he want me to yield him the floor? I believe we should be considering seriously whether the 3 per cent figure should be retained. I understand the problems encountered by the minister responsible for this legislation. There are always people who will try to take advantage of any concessions. However, I do not think this is any reason we should not strive to enact the best possible kind of legislation. After all, legislation should be designed to serve the people; people are not designed to serve the legislation. If we keep this in mind it will be helpful. Instead of 3 per cent, why not 1 per cent? What is special about 3 per cent? It is simply a figure out of the air. I believe an amendment should be introduced to change this figure. I hope someone will move it. I shall not do so because there is already an amendment before the committee.

I want the parliamentary secretary to pay attention. I know that when a member speaks in the House he does pay attention and takes the representations made to him under consideration. I believe there should be provision in the bill which would allow a regional director, in the Department of National Revenue, or, if you like, a specially constituted board, to hear special cases and make provision for meeting them. If this were done, the law could be just, and anomalies could be handled with proper consideration. Most of the work which falls on me as a Member of Parliament in dealing with constituents concerns people who have run up against the stone wall of bureaucracy. They cannot get through to the decision-makers. They are stopped by the clerks at the front desks who have nothing before them but the rulebook.

I am saying nothing against our public servants when I say this. The people who meet the general public most of the time are not in decision-making roles; they can only operate on the basis of the rules before them. We want cases of the kind I have mentioned to go before someone with the power to act, the power to interpret.

I leave the committee with these two suggestions as to how to look after the anomalies hon. members have raised. We should reduce the 3 per cent rule because it is unjust. Whether we remove it or allow it to remain, we should have in the national revenue legislation a provision so a regional director will have the power of interpretation in respect of the extraordinary and special case.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman, I shall attempt to take a positive position in what I have to say. I think we all agree that the government is to be commended for taking this long overdue step in increasing exemptions for Canadian taxpayers. However, I realize also, as I think all hon. members do, that there is a limit above which personal exemptions cannot be raised.

The question before us is whether or not equity is being achieved for the average Canadian. I suggest, with deference, that it is not being achieved. As the hon. member for Fraser Valley West has said, I do not think that many of us here seriously doubt the good will of the Minister of Finance. Certainly I do not doubt it. I may question his forecasts and statistical bases sometimes, but I feel he has the basic welfare of the country at heart.

[Mr. Rose.]

The money required to run this country has to come from somewhere. There is no magic formula available by which we can get money, as some monetary theorists would like to suggest, such as from a printing press. I suggest, however, that something could be done. Our taxation rate schedule could be revised. I say this in all seriousness because in the lower income groups the tax increases very sharply in proportion to income, whereas in the higher income groups we find that an increase in income is not subject to the same sharp tax rate increase.

The government should take a good look at the rate schedule. Perhaps it will find that those of us who are fortunate enough to be in a higher tax bracket would not seriously object to paying a higher percentage of income tax if it were to the benefit of those Canadians who are not so fortunate. When talking about the unfairness and inadequacy of these exemptions for Canadians we are forgetting one factor. Much has been said about the cost of living increase since 1949, but other factors have come into play which did not exist in 1949, one of which is the increase in the types of tax the average Canadian must now pay.

Only recently in my own province have we had to cope with provincial sales tax. It is only fairly recently that federal sales tax has been a factor with which all Canadians must reckon in the purchase of ordinary goods and services. Municipal taxes have risen dramatically, in some cases 10 times since the early 1950s. That is the case in at least the province in which I live. These factors have not been given sufficient emphasis. The average Canadian has to pay a great deal more in over-all taxes than he did in 1949 when the St. Laurent government, in its wisdom, decided that personal exemptions of $1,000 and $2,000 were adequate.

Let me leave that point for a moment and associate myself with the remarks of an hon. member who spoke before me regarding the exemption of funeral expenses. I agree that benefits from the Canada Pension Plan are available and do alleviate some of the difficulty, but there are some people to whom the benefits of the Canada Pension Plan are not available. This is a fairly new scheme in our country. In all seriousness, the Minister of Finance should take another look at the possibility of permitting in specific cases the deduction of funeral expenses or at least a portion thereof.

Another area in which there seems to be some unfairness is that of municipal tax and mortgage interest payments. I think it would be worth while if the government were to consider allowing the home owner to deduct either part of his municipal taxes or a portion of his mortgage interest. If a home owner was smart enough to form a small corporation or make other arrangements he could in fact deduct mortgage interest and municipal taxes from his income. The average Canadian who owns a home cannot do so.

As a gesture, if nothing else, this would be the equitable thing to do, and it would promote the desire in everyone to own their own home if they felt they could benefit to some extent through a tax exemption. This government, rightly so, has promoted the idea that Canadians should own their own homes except in crowded urban centres. I think the government should make a tax concession for those Canadians who are struggling under the burden of owning their own homes in this day and age when it seems they must pay taxes to everyone.

I do not intend to continue at length because much has been said about these sections and there has been a great deal of repetition. It seems to be illusory to some extent to talk about exemptions of $1,500 and $2,850 being of great benefit. Certainly this is a substantial benefit, but it is not good enough. In view of present concepts of income, many taxpayers who will be taken off the tax rolls this year will be right back on them before too long, paying more taxes than ever.

In conclusion, it is rather obvious that tax revenue has to come from somewhere. In all sincerity, the place to get the revenue is from taxpayers in the higher income brackets, giving the lower income people a break even though it is at the expense of those a little more fortunate. I should not like to see corporations taxed more heavily; I should like to see the tax rate on corporations lowered still further. The business community and the corporations must create the impetus if we are to generate economic activity in this country permitting it to grow and develop without undue reliance on foreign capital.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words about the 3 per cent rule in respect of medical expenses. I agree with the hon. member for Fraser Valley West who suggested this figure should be reduced. The 3 per cent rule was adopted a long time ago when incomes were much lower and 3 per cent was considerably less, relatively, than it is now. There are other reasons why this rule should be reduced. At the present time almost everyone has hospital and medical expenses covered by insurance for which they pay premiums. I have no argument against this system, and I am sure the 3 per cent rule applies in respect of an extremely small number of taxpayers.

There are some people who have legitimate expenses and substantial costs which are not covered. At this time we have vast increases in medicare, hospital and general welfare services. We must have some control in this regard. One way to meet the situation is to have citizens spend some of their own money to obtain medical and hospital services. Many people cannot obtain these services at times convenient to them and some will leave the country to obtain them elsewhere. It is a fact that our institutions are being overloaded and that this overloading will substantially increase. If there is any way in which citizens would pay for some of their expenses I think we as a country would be much better off.

The parliamentary secretary was kind enough to give me an answer in respect of the nursing home situation. I believe the department should look at this aspect of the matter. In my province of Manitoba and, I believe, in other provinces, nursing homes are rigidly licensed and regulated and nearly all admissions are under the control of the public health department. No one, whether a paying or non-paying patient, is admitted without the sanction of the public health officials. In effect, this means that admission to a nursing home is by means of a government official.

I am not sure of the figure, but I believe that approximately 90 per cent of the persons in nursing homes in my province are there as guests of the state. In other words, they do not have sufficient funds to pay for their care, which amounts to $400, $500 or $600 a month. Only a small number pay their own way. There would seem to be unfairness in this regard. Last night I detailed the case of a 100-year old woman whose old age pension plus a pension from her deceased son just equalled the cost of her stay in the nursing home. On top of that she had to pay income tax. This deprived her of the extras she might have had and meant that her family in effect had to pay her income tax.

Then there are people who find their life's savings being chewed up in order to pay for their care in nursing homes, whereas 90 per cent of the citizens receive it gratis. It would seem that this is an area in which something should be done. It affects a relatively small number of people. There would seem to be unfairness in the income tax regulations in this regard.

Finally, I should like to make a comment or two in respect of section 110(1)(c)(iii) which refers to medical practitioners, dentists and nurses. Here, again, it would seem that this provision could be broadened to include all members in the health field who are licensed in the province in which they operate so that whatever payments are made to them could be deducted in computing income tax. It would seem that in some professions which are licensed to carry on health disciplines, payments made are not deductible in the same way as payments to a medical practitioner, a dentist or a nurse. In this area it would seem that an anomaly exists and I thought the matter should be raised.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Chairman, I should like to raise a further question in respect of funeral expenses. When the Minister of Finance was here he said that the Canada Pension Plan would pay part of this cost. I am sure the parliamentary secretary would agree that people who are covered by the Canada Pension Plan are covered, but it is those who are not covered by the plan that we are concerned about. In fact, some people will not be covered in so far as funeral expenses are concerned. Therefore, could the parliamentary secretary or his officials give an undertaking that they will look at this area which is of concern to many people?

Mr. Mahoney: I think I can indeed give an assurance that we will look into it. I know the minister was here when the hon. member raised the question and is certainly well aware of the interest, as I am, and representations of members from other corners of the House. The general philosophical question of what deductions from income which are not related to earning the income should be allowed for various other good reasons is a tough one. There are many good causes, many unavoidable expenses and many occasions in the lives and deaths of people which result in expenditures which one cannot regard with anything but a great deal of sympathy. Yet if we were to extend the deductions from income tax into these areas we would be open to some serious question.

The question raised by the hon. member for Central Nova regarding home ownership and the possibility of deducting mortgage interest and property taxes of course is a subject which has been raised by many people. However, I believe such a provision would be very discriminatory against people who cannot afford or do not choose to own their own home. I would only say to the hon. member that if he is really aware of any situation where a home owner has been able to claim such an expense through the medium of a corporation, I think the district taxation office would be most interested in knowing about it, even under the present law.

In my earlier answers I neglected to deal with a couple of questions raised yesterday by the hon. member for Edmonton West. I should like to deal with them briefly. He suggested, when I originally discussed the relative levels of taxation in Canada and in other jurisdictions, that I was perhaps misleading the House. I was very careful at that point to use statistics which are not subject to any variation on the basis of provincial, municipal or other taxes. The figures I used were the income figures at which a person starts to pay taxes on those jurisdictions. This figure does not vary, so far as I am aware, on the basis of any particular local condition.

The hon. member suggested that perhaps under section 109 (1)(d) the age of 21 that is presently prescribed in respect of a dependant resident in his parents' household should be reduced to 18 in conformity with changes in the law being made in both federal and provincial jurisdictions. I believe that upon analysis the hon. member would agree that such a change would impose an additional burden on taxpayers, would not be relieving, and that perhaps it would be of advantage to taxpayers to be able to automatically claim their children up to age 21 as dependants rather than having to prove they are mentally or physically handicapped or are in an educational institution once they get beyond age 18.

I may not have picked up all the points raised recently by hon. members. The hon. member for Dauphin raised some points concerning medical expenses. Certainly we are most interested in obtaining a suitable definition of a nursing home because we agree there is a great deal of merit in the argument presented here. We will look into the situation in the provinces to ascertain the validity of the contention that persons require bona fide medical certificates, and so on, in order to get into nursing homes. If it is possible to obtain a fair definition, then I am certain the minister would be more than happy to consider the representations which have been made here. The hon. member for Dauphin also made representations concerning the extension of the medical category to other health services. We will consider that matter but I am not, perhaps, too optimistic in this regard.

I do not think there is anything else. I gather that no one else is prepared to speak and that the Chair is ready to rule on the hon. member's amendment. If I am correct, we might call it six o'clock.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the parliamentary secretary would make a few comments on the remarks made by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West, the hon. member for Dauphin and perhaps others on the 3 per cent level that is still in the Income Tax Act with respect to medical expenses. One of the advantages of having been around here for a while is that one remembers the history of these things. When it was first brought in, it was 5 per cent. We pleaded for it to be wiped out altogether, and eventually we got it down to 4 per cent and then down to 3 per cent. Why stop there?

Mr. Mahoney: I think that the figure cannot be regarded as anything except one arbitrarily chosen and this is, in my opinion, fair enough. I think most families, in addition to the assistance that is available to them through medical plans today which are subsidized by the general body of taxpayers, have to regard a certain amount of medical expenses as being personal living expenses.

The objective here is to make sure that people with unusual burdens of medical expense not be placed in a very unfair and untenable position. I have not heard any arguments that would lead me to believe that 3 per cent is wrong. I appreciate the fact that 1 per cent or 2 per cent would be more favourable to the taxpayers; certainly it would be more favourable to some in the higher income brackets who would benefit greatly from the ceiling being lowered.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A tax credit would be better.

Mr. Mahoney: However, a figure has been chosen. Perhaps there are arguments, but I have not heard them, to suggest persuasively that it should be reduced.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Chairman, may I put a question to the parliamentary secretary in that regard? He expressed the view that an individual should retain some responsibility for medical expenses and that this provision is really designed to provide some compensation relative to unusual medical expenses. The parliamentary secretary will recall that when the 3 per cent level was established, with the exception of progressive and forward-looking provinces like Saskatchewan which had a hospitalization plan already in effect, most of the provinces and jurisdictions did not have any hospitalization or medicare plan and all of these expenses could be considered in making the calculations concerning medical expenses. Therefore, would the parliamentary secretary not agree that the concept at that time was that only medical expenses of an unusually high nature were to be considered?

I ask this question relative to the fact that at that time the 3 per cent covered all medical, hospital expenses and other items now included in the proposed bill, or most of them. The proposal now before us relates only to special items, and the 3 per cent level is still being retained.

Mr. Mahoney: I do not pretend to know what the criteria were in choosing the original 5 per cent, reducing it to 4 per cent and then to 3 per cent, but I do think that the 3 per cent level has not been demonstrated to be unfair as yet. I can see, certainly in general terms, the desirability from the point of view of individual taxpayers of having that figure reduced, but I do not know what the criteria were in the first place.

I think today we accept the idea that in most cases publicly supported medical plans are available in Canada and most Canadians enjoy the benefits provided by them. This is, today at least, more of a safety valve and not necessarily designed to permit the deduction of what would be regarded as ordinary or normal medical expenses.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I am advised that the Chairman of the committee is ready to make his ruling on the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I think it would be best to leave it to the committee to decide whether it prefers to hear the ruling now or at eight o'clock, and to call it six o'clock now.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, are you privy to this at all? Do you know how long it would take? If it would take four or five minutes we could have it now, but if it would take ten minutes I suggest we should hear it at eight o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: My understanding is that it might be a five-minute ruling.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Now.

The Deputy Chairman: The Chair cannot call it six o'clock unless there is unanimous consent, and there does not seem to be unanimous consent. But if we invite the Chairman of the committee to make his ruling at this time, I hope the committee will agree to sit beyond six o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If you keep on talking, Mr. Chairman, it will be six o'clock.

The Chairman: Order, please. I am prepared to make the ruling now although I admit that, as the Deputy Chairman indicated, it may take six or seven minutes. I should like to leave it to members of the committee to decide whether they want to hear the ruling now or at eight o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Chairman, as it is now six o'clock, it would be better to wait for your ruling until eight o'clock, when we will be much more inclined to understand it.

[English]

The Chairman: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Chairman: Order, please. When the committee rose at six o'clock the Chair was prepared to make a ruling on the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Hon. members will recall that I had asked the committee the privilege of considering the motion of the hon. member, the arguments made in support of it and the arguments made in opposition to it, earlier in today's sitting.

It might be helpful if I began my comments by reading the motion. It was moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre:

At this time I took the matter under advisement. Because of the importance of the proposed amendment and after taking into account the obvious care and thought put into its preparation, the Chair sought and obtained leave of the committee to take the question under study. I would assure the hon. member that I have given careful and earnest consideration to his proposal. At the outset of my study I endeavoured to reconcile one authority with another, but inevitably it seemed that I could do no better than refer to a decision of Mr. Speaker which in my opinion bears directly on the point at issue.

If I may be permitted, I should like to put in my own words—I want to do this before referring to the ruling of Mr. Speaker so that we may consider it in the context of the motion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—what I consider to be the purport of the proposed amendment. It seems to me that the hon. member's proposal would increase the exemptions and as a result thereof, as stated in his proposal, the rates of tax provided in proposed section 117 on pages 305 to 312 of the bill would have to be adjusted to provide revenue equivalent to the revenue lost by changing the exemption levels provided in the bill.

With the leave of the committee I should like to read from the proceedings of the House as recorded at pages 188 and 191 of the Journals of the House for December 11, 1969. Before I do this I would suggest that hon. members who are familiar with the arguments made earlier today on the procedural acceptability of the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre note that the various authorities referred to in those arguments are dealt with by Mr. Speaker in the ruling to which I shall now refer. That authority is as follows:

> The order being read for resuming debate on the motion of Mr. Gray, seconded by Mr. McIlraith,—That Bill C-155, An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act, be now read a third time and do pass.
> And on the motion of Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West), seconded by Mr. Dinsdale in amendment thereto,—That all the words after "That" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> > "Bill C-155 be not now read a third time but be referred back to the Committee of the Whole with instructions that clause (i), paragraph numbered 10 be reconsidered to provide an air transportation tax on a flat fee basis to be determined by the committee as providing an equivalent return to and in lieu of the tax therein provided".

That was the motion that Mr. Speaker had for consideration. I now come to Mr. Speaker's ruling where he said:

> We all recognize that if this amendment was accepted as put to the House it would have a rather far reaching effect in that it would be a new principle. I recognize that we should not be afraid to accept a new principle simply because of the fact that it is new, but we should look at such situations perhaps with even more attention than is normally accorded to such procedural matters.

Mr. Speaker continued:

The proposed amendment terminates with the words "in lieu of the tax therein provided". These words, it is suggested, if they have a meaning would direct the Committee of the Whole to delete a complete provision from Bill C-155 and substitute in lieu thereof a new taxation provision.

Mr. Speaker went on to say:

The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) has quoted section (2) of citation 263 of Beauchesne's 4th edition. I would agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that this citation does not help the hon. minister's case at all. The effect of the citation would appear to support the proposition that a private member may move to substitute a taxation provision for a proposal in a government bill provided that it is estimated that the new provision would yield an equivalent in the amount of moneys to be collected. That would appear to be the logical conclusion which could be drawn from that citation. In this respect I fully agree with the hon. member for Edmonton West and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, but Beauchesne's citation is based on May's Parliamentary Practice, 13th edition. This is the authority given by Beauchesne for his citation.

However, at page 733 of May's 17th edition it is stated: "The view which made the proposal of taxes dependent upon the demand for supply prevailed at the time when it became necessary to find a procedure which would protect the financial initiative of the Crown from being infringed by amendments. It tended to connect the Royal initiative exclusively with the amount of revenue which it was the object of a tax to raise. Hence, in early editions of this book, it was stated that 'the Crown has no concern in the nature or distribution of taxes.' Hence, also, amendments were at first permitted which proposed the substitution of a different tax for a tax proposed by the government (provided that both were estimated to yield an equivalent amount) on the ground that the necessity of new taxation to that extent had already been declared on behalf of the Crown. In modern practice this view is regarded as incomplete, and as requiring to be supplemented by the view that the Royal initiative in taxation implies the exclusive right to define the incidence as well as the amount of burdens to be placed upon the people, and that an amendment which transfers a burden to taxpayers not previously liable is an infringement of this initiative."

The principle outlined in the foregoing citation from May's 17th edition is also set out in section (1) of citation 276, Beauchesne's 4th edition. That has already been brought to the attention of the Chair by the three hon. members who took part in this discussion. At page 826 of May's 17th edition it is stated: "Amendments must not exceed the scope, increase the amount or extend the incidence of any charge upon the people, defined by the terms of the ways and means resolutions, as agreed to by the House, by which the provisions proposed to be amended are authorized."

Mr. Speaker's ruling continued:

May I again refer to page 826 of May's 17th edition where it is stated: "A new clause offered in committee on a bill, which proposed to alter the incidence of income tax as between landlord and tenant, was ruled out of order on the grounds that it increased the existing charge upon one of the parties.

An amendment moved in committee on a bill, proposing to vary the method of levying a new tax, was required by the Chair to be framed in such a way as not to increase the charge which would be imposed on any individual payer of the tax."

There is little question that the purport of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Edmonton West is to reduce the tax in respect of transportation by some persons travelling by air and to increase the tax in respect of other persons. Even if the amendment is intended to affect precisely the same taxpayers and that, in theory at least, it means to provide precisely the same amount of revenue, it would of necessity transfer a greater burden of taxation to one particular class of taxpayers or to a particular group of taxpayers. In doing so it is suggested that the amendment is an infringement of the financial initiative of the Crown.

[The Chairman.]

Having referred to and quoted from the decision of Mr. Speaker, I feel I must follow it. Indeed, the authorities direct me to follow His Honour's decision. I should like to say, however, that in the helpful argument on the procedural acceptability of this motion emphasis was placed upon various citations which, as I have mentioned, are difficult to reconcile. It seems to me, in the final analysis, that I must be guided by the practices of this House as enunciated by Mr. Speaker.

Accordingly, following the precedent of Mr. Speaker to which I have referred, I must regretfully decline to put the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Too bad.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Regina East.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Chairman, earlier in the debate today we had some discussion on the question of medical expenses. I feel that this matter deserves further consideration, because section 110 at page 282 continues the present system which involves a threshold level of 3 per cent of income in relation to medical expenses before a deduction is allowed. I questioned the parliamentary secretary on this matter before the dinner hour and I was not satisfied with his answer. He acknowledged that there were arbitrary features to the law as it has existed and as it is proposed in this bill. That is not good enough, Mr. Chairman.

First of all, when the 3 per cent level was enacted it was possible for taxpayers to include the entire cost of a doctor's services, the entire cost of hospital services and a variety of other services such as are now included in subsection (i) (c) at pages 282-283 of the bill. Since then, Mr. Chairman, there has been a reduction in those items which qualify for inclusion as medical expenses: it is no longer possible to include the cost of a doctor's services or hospital services as medical expenses. A long list of expenses which do qualify is set out at page 282. But while the situation regarding those two major items of medical expense incurred by most families has been changed, there has been no change with respect to the 3 per cent threshold level in calculating medical expenses. Thus, I feel that it is very necessary for the level to be changed to keep up with the great change in the concepts of medical care and medical practice in recent years.

In the past we have had what might be termed curative medical practice; whereas today we are more interested in preventative medicine. I think we should not retain the concept as outlined before the dinner hour by the parliamentary secretary, namely, that only unusual expenses would qualify for deduction from taxable income. This is a thing of the past. If the government is to achieve the objective it is trying to achieve, namely, the reduction of health care costs without in any way impairing the quality of medical care, we must adopt new approaches.

Thus, I feel that it is necessary for us to look at the provisions contained on page 282 of the bill. I think one of the best steps that could be taken would be to reduce the threshold level above which taxpayers could deduct expenses incurred as medical expenses. At present that threshold is set at 3 per cent of taxable income.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member should have said, not "taxable income" but "income".

Mr. Burton: I beg your pardon. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has pointed out that I should have said 3 per cent of income. This 3 per cent level has been in existence since 1953. For some years prior to 1953 it had been set at 4 per cent, although when first introduced in the wartime budget of 1942, I believe, it was set at 5 per cent.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I feel it would be in the best interests of the Canadian people and would assist the government to achieve its policy objectives in other areas, namely, the areas of health care and government considerations involving health costs, if we were to reduce the threshold level for taxpayers. Accordingly, I would move the following motion:

The Chairman: Order, please. Hon. members have heard the motion of the hon. member for Regina East. The inclination of the Chair is to accept it as being in order. It deals with the deduction under subsection 110 of certain medical expenses and the effect of the hon. member's amendment would be to reduce the figure of 3 per cent to 1 per cent. Before the committee deals with this motion I invite hon. members to submit procedural argument.

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Chairman, would you read the motion again? Some of us did not hear it when the hon. member read it.

The Chairman: I will be pleased to accede to the request of the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra and read the proposed motion. It occurs to me that there is before the committee a government amendment that precedes this proposed amendment. Does the committee wish to deal first with the amendment of the government and then revert to the motion proposed by the hon. member for Regina East and deal with it?

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, we have had the government's amendments in our hands for some time, and I think that probably the amendments of private members on the opposition side should be dealt with first on this and other occasions.

The Chairman: For the sake of orderly procedure, does the committee wish to deal first with the motion proposed by the hon. member for Regina East and then with the government's amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: I thank the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants for bringing forward a good point. Now I will accede to the request of the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra and read the proposed amendment of the hon. member for Regina East:

Amendment (Mr. Burton) negatived: Yeas, 10; nays, 59.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. For the sake of procedural clarity I wonder if members of the committee now wish to deal with the amendment moved by the Minister of National Revenue for the Minister of Finance. The minister moved:

That section 109 as set forth in clause 1 of the said bill be amended by striking out line 37 on page 279 and substituting the following:

'(ii) dependent upon the individual for'

Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the said motion?

Amendment (Mr. Benson) agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall section 109 as amended carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I wish to indicate that this section is to carry on division. It contains conflicting parts, some of which we support and some of which we do not. It ought to carry on division.

The Chairman: Shall the section carry on division? Is that agreed?

Mr. Caouette: No, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Would the hon. member please resume his seat? I understood the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants to say that the section would carry on division. Is it agreed that this section shall carry on division?

Mr. Caouette: No, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Shall section 110 carry?

Mr. Caouette: No, Mr. Chairman.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, before section 109 goes through, I would like to say a few words.

Even in an amended form, that section 109 under which exemptions will be $1,500 for a single person and $2,850 for a married person does not meet the requirements or even the wishes of the Canadian people. Indeed, the federal government itself admits that the minimum wage providing a decent standard of living is $3,000. How can a government introduce in this House section 109, clearly stating that a single person will be taxed from $1,500 up and a married person from $2,850 up when we know that the minimum should be $3,000?

That section 109 is directly in opposition to the policy stated in this House by the government. There is more and more talk about a guaranteed yearly minimum for every Canadian citizen.

Mr. Chairman, we moved amendments to the section before us and this afternoon my colleague for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) suggested raising the exemption to $3,000 per year for a single person and to $5,000 for married couples. The government ignored that. The Chairman says that it is out of order because we ask the government to take measures so that there would be fewer taxpayers, while the government itself says—

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Caouette: All right, speak all together and the Chair will not hear anything.

• (8:30 p.m.)

[English]

The Chairman: Order please. The Chair is really seeking advice from the committee. Hon. members will recall that yesterday there was general agreement that sections 109 and 110 should be debated together. I think we have followed the correct procedure. However, we have adopted section 109 and it seems to me the hon. member is now dealing with that section. I, personally, do not have any objection to that because of the general agreement arrived at by the committee yesterday, but I think it is my responsibility to draw this point to the attention of the committee.

Mr. Mahoney: The hon. member has not yet spoken on either of these sections in this debate and I think he should be accorded the opportunity to do so. I certainly would have no objection to his continuing.

Mr. Alexander: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. As I sit here wondering what occurred at the time you called for the vote I ask myself whether in fact the section was carried. There seemed to be some confusion. I noticed the leader of the Social Credit party attempting to get your attention and I believe that when he started to speak he was under the impression the vote had yet to be decided. Perhaps there was some misunderstanding.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, apparently, there was a misunderstanding. For our part, we thought that the question was on the amendment moved by the previous speaker or by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters), and not on the main motion, that is, on the clauses now before the committee. That is why our colleague is taking the floor. The committee proceedings seem quite confused. We regret being constantly interrupted in our work and wish some attention was paid to the speech of the hon. member for Témiscamingue and he would no longer be interrupted with questions that seem out of order.

[English]

The Chairman: As Chairman, I have no real difficulty, as I intimated when I reluctantly interrupted the hon. member for Témiscamingue. The point of order arises as a result of dealing with two sections together for the purpose of debate. It seemed it was proper to put section 109 to a vote. However, there was agreement yesterday that the two sections would be grouped for debate.

I did not interrupt the hon. member for Témiscamingue with the intention of curtailing his speech. My purpose was to clarify the situation. Having said this, I hope there will be agreement among hon. members that the hon. member for Témiscamingue be allowed to continue on the basis established yesterday.

Mr. McCleave: I was about to say what you have already indicated, Mr. Chairman: there should be generosity among all of us in dealing with this complicated legislation, and I am sure my hon. friends will agree that the hon. member be allowed to continue his speech.

[The Deputy Chairman.]

The Chairman: I thank the hon. member. He has echoed my sentiments and, I believe, the sentiments of all hon. members.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order.

Once more, I wish to remind the Chair that, through no fault of ours, we sit in the far corner of the House and hear with some difficulty the rulings of the Chair. The hon. members talk in good faith and we do not understand what you say. I should like to know at what point of this sitting clause 109 was carried, because, after all, it is quite important that we know. If it was carried and a special favour is being granted to the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette), I am all for it, but I wish I were told at what point that famous clause 109 was carried.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Lotbinière is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, we are not challenging your ability in conducting the debate, neither do we question your integrity, but while you were speaking, nobody on this side of the House could hear what you were saying and when you put the question of clause 109—and we realize it now—we understood absolutely nothing. We would like to ask you to consider that the question on clause 109 has not been put so that we may proceed with the debate since some Social Credit members including the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) have other comments to make. We have nothing against the Chair, but we do not understand what it says. We are unable to hear what comes out of the loudspeakers.

• (8:40 p.m.)

[English]

The Chairman: The Chair understands the difficulty and must bear a considerable amount of the responsibility in the matter. If there was a misunderstanding about the vote taken on section 109, the matter is now in the hands of the committee; but it was my duty to put the question. If there is a misunderstanding I hope that hon. members will open the matter again. If that is the case, and it is important to hon. members who have spoken on this point of order, I would ask the committee whether there is leave to open section 109 and then put the question again.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

The Chairman: If there is leave, I will put the question. Is it agreed that I put the question again on section 109?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall section 109 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On division.

Some hon. Members: No.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: That is true, Mr. Chairman. Clause 109 has not yet been carried and we are thus able to proceed with what we have to say.

I was stating a few moments ago that my colleague, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert), asked that deductions up to $3,000 for a single person and $5,000 for a married person be allowed, whilst the government's proposals are for $1,500 and $2,850 respectively, because it does not recognize—and at this stage I call upon the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney)—that to attain a minimum of social or economic standing, you need at least $3,000. Why is it that the government proposes a legislation which penalizes single persons by limiting their non taxable income to $1,500 and that of married people at $2,850? Why?

The government is contradicting itself. But the vital point on which the government is basing its policy is to create a decent standard of living in Canada. We are then seeking out all kinds of solutions and proposals in order to establish what is termed in English a welfare society, a society in which people expect to live on government resources. And this applies equally to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) who is chatting with his neighbour and is totally oblivious to what we are saying.

Mr. Chairman, he did not even understand. He keeps on talking. This does not change anything. If the Minister of Labour was listening perhaps he could understand, but he is not listening and he will not understand, his earphone is not working.

An hon. Member: He is listening!

Mr. Caouette: If the minister would send his chum back to his seat, he would have more time to listen because those people will not settle the Lapalme workers case tomorrow morning by discussing as they are doing.

Mr. Chairman, the government is seeking to establish a society where both bachelors and married men would feel at home. Under this bill, nothing will enable Canadians to enjoy better living standards.

Let me explain, Mr. Chairman. Everyone, and the Prime minister first with his cabinet, is talking about social welfare and a just society. The 1968 election has been won by the Liberals with their slogan "The Just Society" which all the Canadians—I see an hon. member applauding across the way—think will exist someday.

After three years of liberal administration, we find that the number of unemployed people has increased. Everybody is convinced of that. The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) stated last night in Montreal: "We have more unemployment than ever and we will still have more in November." This is a statement the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion made in Montreal last night to the members of the Board of Trade. So we will have more unemployed in November. He did not mention December, January or February when we have perhaps one million, one million and a quarter or one million and a half unemployed.

So this is the just society! And in its attempt to better things, the government is offering us solutions that will help out American companies. As a matter of fact, it will distribute $80 million as incentives to Canadian industries to allow them to export to the United States because our neighbours below the border have imposed a 10 per cent surcharge. This program will not create a single job but will simply allow some of our industrialists to export their goods to the United States.

Mr. Chairman, this program will not create a single job; it will not help us to set up the just society that we want in Canada, nor will it—

[English]

The Chairman: Order, please. If I understand the position of the committee, the hon. member who has the floor may direct his remarks to sections 109 and 110. It seems that he is now engaging in a debate which may have been in order on second reading or during our initial round of discussion in committee of the whole. I have some doubt whether the hon. member has the right to roam as far as he has roamed, and with respect I would ask him to confine his remarks to those two sections which deal generally with the compilation of taxable income, deductions, exemptions, and so on. I invite the hon. member to assist the committee in this regard.

• (8:50 p.m.)

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, I thank you for your suggestion that I stay within the ambit of sections 109 and 110. But this afternoon, I had the opportunity of listening to the speeches of members of all parties and the Chairman never called anyone to order and told him that he was not dealing with the tax exemptions mentioned in sections 109 and 110. This evening, I am called to order and I am asked to deal strictly with the government proposals.

Mr. Chairman, this afternoon, social security and all kinds of things were discussed, but this evening I would not be permitted to express my views on those tax exemptions which, after all, are the basis for an economic reform which would allow Canadians to be better off than they are now.

Mr. Chairman, I say this: at the present time in Canada, with the government proposals about the direct taxation system, we are taking from some to give to others. Such is the program included in clauses 109 and 110. We say that we are wasting our time and that we are not farther ahead today than we were five or ten years ago because this is a social welfare system based on income tax exemptions which is offered to the Canadian people. All that social welfare encourages fraud, laziness, scheming and stealing. Everyone runs for help from social welfare. Some refuse to work for fear of losing their welfare benefits.

Mr. Chairman, reducing the income tax is ridiculous finally because many people do not earn enough to pay income tax, and single people who earn $3,000 or $5,000 a year will have to pay some. The government is not consistent. This is where we, the Créditistes, make a concrete suggestion, which rubber-necks still laugh at whether they are liberals or progressive conservatives. They laugh! There is but one solution: guaranteeing Canadians social security, regardless of the income tax system, to achieve a balance between consumption and production. What did we suggest? Instead of lowering income tax which the government now suggests, that all persons 18 and over be guaranteed an annual income of $1,500 when they are single and $2,500 when they are married.

A married man with one child would get a basic exemption of $2,750; with two children, $3,000; with four children, $3,250; with five children, $3,750 and with six, a maximum of $4,000 as guaranteed annual income or social security.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the people will be told, as I said on the national TV network: If an individual finds a job of $4,000 or $5,000 a year, he should accept it, because it would not reduce his social security allowance, since it would be guaranteed. We would all receive it: the poor, the less poor, the more or less rich, everybody. We would all have that guarantee, regardless of our income.

We would see the unemployed—there are some 500,000 in Canada at the present time—look for a job and their salary would be added to the social security guaranteed to all. A person earning $10,000 would still receive his $3,000 in social security.

It is the opposite at the present time. Nowadays a man drawing welfare allowances keeps away from work. Even prostitutes in Montreal draw welfare payments on top of their earnings or whatever salary they may get from various firms.

Mr. Chairman, the present system of social welfare is an incitement to laziness and dishonesty. We ought to replace it with a system of social security which would foster honesty, work and personal initiative in every Canadian citizen.

This is not understood yet. We hear people make fun of our proposals. The other night, I heard the hon. member for Papineau (Mr. Ouellet) say that this would cost $18 billion. It will soon cost more than that to cope with revolutions which are being organized throughout Canada. Then members on the government side or members of the opposition will feel sorry and say: We were not courageous enough to act while there was still time left.

It is being said today that the silent majority does not move. Now, the silent majority begins here in this House where people do not have the courage to rise, where people laugh at those who offer concrete solutions, solutions that appeal to the intelligence of man, instead of the intelligence of the chap who will sell his vote at the next election for a small amount of social welfare.

Mr. Chairman, sections 109 and 110 will not change Canada's economic situation. The other day, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) announced a 3 per cent reduction in personal income tax. For the Canadian who has to pay $300 in taxes, this will mean a reduction of $9 for a year or 75 cents per month. If he has to pay $200 per year, the reduction will be $6, or 50 cents per month. And Liberal members will say: We have been generous to the people of Canada.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Caouette: That is what I call a stupid person! I see a Liberal member applauding. He does not know why he is applauding, but he applauds. He thinks this is funny; he sits on the Liberal side of the House.

Mr. Chairman, they may laugh, they may take our suggestions lightly, but things will happen before long in Canada—we have already experienced a few—exactly as they have happened in communist and socialist countries, because the government will not have had the guts to take position and act at the right time. We are afraid of making decisions. Again recently, we have been scared to make decisions as a free people, as free citizens.

Last night—and this has nothing to do with tax exemption in Canada—Communist China was admitted in the United Nations. Do we know that China became communist because of terrorists, bandits and murderers? And they are recognized in the United Nations while the Canadian army is called in to fight a dozen FLQ members or people planting bombs in Montreal. The Prime Minister of Canada is ready to roll out the red carpet for those people's entry into the United Nations Organization.

An hon. Member: Yes indeed!

Mr. Caouette: When they are raising cain in Montreal, those people are called bad lots.

I see the Chairman rising, which would indicate that I am straying from the subject, to which I shall therefore return immediately.

• (9:00 p.m.)

[English]

The Chairman: It did occur to the Chair that the hon. member might have been somewhat irrelevant in the latter stages of his remarks, but in any event I rose to advise him that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Chairman: Order, please. Of course, the hon. member may continue if there is unanimous consent of the committee.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Chairman: There is no such consent. Is the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka rising on a point of order?

Mr. Aiken: No, I am rising to speak, Mr. Chairman. I was quite prepared to permit the hon. member for Témiscamingue to continue but I understand he has not been given consent. I would yield to him at this point so that he may continue.

Some hon. Members: Encore!

[Translation]

Some hon. Members: More.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman—

An hon. Member: Democracy at work.

Mr. Caouette: —I thank my good friend of the Progressive Conservative party for having suggested that I continue my comments, but I shall not take advantage of this courtesy.

I congratulate the Conservative member from I do not know what riding.

An hon. Member: Parry Sound-Muskoka.

Mr. Caouette: The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken). I believe he will become a Créditiste one day.

Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to hold the committee too long. Earlier I was talking about the United Nations, as everybody knows. The Liberals know it and we know it. Last year, I was one of the most convinced advocates of using the Canadian armed forces to fight terrorists in Montreal during the October crisis.

Mr. Roy (Laval): Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. member for Témiscamingue a question.

Mr. Caouette: Agreed.

Mr. Roy (Laval): I would like to ask the hon. member for Témiscamingue—the leader of the Social Credit party whose convention I followed carefully and whom I congratulate on his organizing ability—whether he could tell me the difference between a socialist party on credit and a socialist party that wants to socialize all existing companies for cash.

An hon. Member: That is stupid. Have you ever heard anything more silly?

An hon. Member: That is inexplicable.

Mr. Caouette: Where does that chap come from?

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): From Laval.

[English]

The Chairman: Order, please. I suggested to the hon. member before he relinquished the floor following his first presentation that perhaps he was not staying within the confines of sections 109 and 110. I was fortified in my decision when I heard the question of the hon. member for Laval. I would hope that hon. members would give due regard to the rules of the committee and would not enter into a general debate. The question having been asked, perhaps the hon. member would wish to answer it briefly. I hope that he will then continue his remarks having regard to the confines of sections 109 and 110.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, you are absolutely right. The Liberal member for Laval (Mr. Roy) got a bit mixed up while asking his question, he did not know exactly how to put it. It is rather difficult to answer a question that does not make sense. But, in any event, I say to him that a socialist system, in my opinion, is not appreciated in Canada, but with all the rules and bills like the one that is before us, particularly clauses 109 and 110, we are moving on toward state socialism that constitutes a step toward authentic communism.

Mr. Chairman, while trying to address myself to clauses 109 and 110, I want to say this: A moment ago, I spoke of the admission of Communist China to the United Nations and I say—let us remember that we have here about fifty Liberal members from the province of Quebec,—that last year I supported the government 100 per cent as far as the war measures were concerned when taken against the terrorists of Montreal. Everyone knows that.

[English]

The Chairman: Order, please. Under the rules of the committee the hon. member for Témiscamingue has the floor. I think this is the third or fourth time that I have appealed to him. I do it in all sincerity, I think with the support of the committee. The hon. member should not discuss matters which are irrelevant to the purport of sections 109 and 110. I entreat him to obey the rules. All of us transgress at times. I know the hon. member is a very fluent and forceful speaker, but I hope he will try to confine his remarks to sections 109 and 110.

Mr. Caouette: I will definitely try to obey your request, Mr. Chairman. There is my good friend, the doctor, who has saved my life once anyway, and he is a Liberal. I am not a socialist. But this is not on section 109. He saved my life once and I am still alive. The Conservatives know very well that I am, and so does the Minister of Labour.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, I want to confine myself to the subject matter of clauses 109 and 110. However, I cannot at this point but admit that I am in the same frame of mind this year as I was last year when I sided with the government. When I see a government, be it China's or the U.S.S.R.'s, assuming power with the help of terrorists, and by resorting to violence, I cannot accept anything more now than I did last year. This is all I have to say on that subject.

• (9:10 p.m.)

Mr. Chairman, clauses 109 and 110 clearly state that the government intends to improve the standard of living of Canadians or to create the just society which we were promised during the 1968 election campaign. This just society has not even materialized in Valleyfield. Neither has it materialized in Quebec City, Montreal or Rouyn-Noranda.

Mr. Chairman, I have specifically detailed our suggestions a few moments ago and I urge all sincere members, whatever their political allegiance,—not as social crediters, or progressive conservatives, or new democrats or liberals—

An hon. Member: Or independents—

Mr. Caouette: If we are to have a hard working people, a people who works, whose initiative we respect, let us give him a social and economic security which it has not hitherto obtained. We are giving economic security to the U.S.S.R. and China, but at the expense of personal freedom. Nobody, even a member of this House, wants to lose his personal freedom.

Then, Mr. Chairman, a solution is available although the hon. member for Papineau interjected the other night that it would cost $18 billion. The last war cost us $14 billion and nobody has warned about inflation. We have made war and won it, but it has cost $14 billion. No one objected to this expenditure of $14 billion, not even the Minister of Finance. Even the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Lessard) did not object.

Mr. Asselin: A former colleague.

Mr. Caouette: A former colleague who used to understand more when he was with me than he does presently. Nobody objected to an expenditure of $14 billion to wage a war. But when it comes to spending $18 billion to guarantee social security to each Canadian citizen, people stand up and say: The Social Crediters "are starting the money press".

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): This is quite funny!

Mr. Caouette: It is funny, indeed, but what is funny is to see those funny guys, the liberals, being funny. And when the Liberals were not in power, the Tories were having the same reaction. And that was thought to be funny.

Mr. Asselin: No one ever talked about the money press.

Mr. Caouette: The hon. member for Charlevoix never talked about it because he does not know how it works. The hon. member for Charlevoix is consistent. He came to see me the other day behind the curtains to ask me how it would work. I told him it would work very well.

The Deputy Chairman: The Chair hesitates to interrupt the hon. member but it can hardly see the relation between the hon. member's remarks and the two sections under consideration. I think all hon. members are interested in the analysis of the problems that are presently facing this country but since the committee must study two specific sections of bill C-259, the Chair would appreciate it greatly if the hon. member for Témiscamingue would relate his remarks from time to time to the sections being considered.

Mr. Caouette: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I am not used to relating my remarks to just anything. I am used to making remarks and at this time we are discussing sections 109 and 110. Several things are related to them. The objectives of sections 109 and 110 are an increase in the purchasing power of Canadian consumers by allowing exemptions of $1,500 for single persons and $2,850 for married couples.

The minister of Finance himself said not so long ago that the vital minimum was $3,000. A great deal of things are connected with that minimum and we bring proposals that would enable hon. members to study something. The government does not give them anything to examine; we are the ones who give them something to think about and those who can think—there are some who cannot, and I sometimes wonder if the minister of Finance can—can at least consider our proposals.

Mr. Chairman, the government proposals under which a single person's income up to $1,500 and the income of married persons up to $2,850 is to be tax free do not meet the people's requirements. The government itself admits there must be at least a $3,000 minimum, in order that people may live or at least exist.

We ask, as my colleague from Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) did this afternoon, tax exemptions of $3,500 for single persons and $5,000 for married persons. We, members of this House, have tax-free expense accounts up to $8,000. I have yet to see a Liberal say in this House or in his constituency that it was inflation in his pockets. Everybody thinks it is all right. And for ordinary workers, millworkers, plant workers, farm people the exemption is $2,850.

Mr. Chairman, we believe that all incomes under $3,000 for single persons and under $5,000 for married persons should be tax free. Let us establish in this country not what we call a welfare state but a state of social security, a state where people are provided with social security, where they feel free, where they are still human beings, where the individual can act by himself, not through the government's will or through any other organization the human being must be respected.

Mr. Chairman, the day we get that, Canada will be sheltered from outside attacks, revolts, revolutions, revolutionaries and terrorists. But until then, if the government members, the ministry and the other hon. members remain idle, before not too many years there will be in Canada terrible bloodshed as occurred in some countries in Europe or Asia.

If that is the kind of administration we want, all we have to do is to let things go. But if we want something else, we should assume our responsibilities. I call upon the Liberal members, who are holding a caucus tomorrow morning, to tell the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister, the federal cabinet, the government should be told such things. Hon. members should assume their responsibilities. We are the silent majority. If we do not act, the revolutionary minority will crush us as it crushed the people in Russia, Poland, Hungary and China. This is not what we want. We want a Canada that belongs to us, to which we can contribute. Therefore, we should pull together, not as members of this or that political party, but as Canadian citizens determined to save their country, Canada.

Some hon. Members: More! More!

• (9:20 p.m.)

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Chairman, after the various speeches made today, I would like in turn to give my opinion on those most important clauses.

I admit that this bill is important because it is bringing a number of changes which I think are necessary. As a member of Parliament it is my duty to express my opinion on sections 109 and 110 which, I think, are far from meeting the needs of Canadians.

Many people before me have informed the minister and the government of their claims and have asked their representatives in Parliament to unite so as to convince the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) that the exemptions of $1,500 and $2,850 are inadequate.

All we need is to compare with the social security pensions which allow a $3,060 exemption for people aged 65 or more. If we want to justify our positions it is quite easy to prove that a couple or a much younger family has greater needs and this $1,500 exemption for a single person or $2,850 for a married couple is inadequate. I think this is self-explanatory.

This is why I want to draw the attention of the House and of all government members who will have the opportunity, as stated earlier by the Social Credit leader, of discussing this question with the ministers and the Prime Minister.

I would request their greatest consideration to the "inadequate minimum".

We referred to a $5,000 yearly minimum for married people and one of $3,000 for a single person. No member of this House could say that a person earning $60 per week should be taxed. I do not believe either that a couple earning $100 per week should be subject to any tax.

We are all aware of the increase in the standard of living and I believe it is only fair to claim a much higher exemption than that suggested by the minister.

I recognize the difficulties that this creates for the government. I also recognize willingly that it will cost more to the government. However, the government must find a way of providing for that minimum living wage. I believe that every member considers $5,000 for a couple and $3,000 for a single person as a necessary thing. No member of this House would dare deny that we can afford to tax people with such an income.

The first reply we will get will be that it is difficult to change the estimates since it would complicate the drafting of the bill. Other comments will be made about those citizens who do need that vital minimum.

Since we are still considering sections 109 and 110 I would invite all hon. members to speak on those sections and say in plain words who is right.

I am convinced that it poses some difficulties to the government but I think that in the present circumstances no government should hesitate to provide the vital minimum resulting from a basic exemption much greater than the one proposed in this bill.

Of course, this is an improvement that goes back to 1947 since it is not often that amendments are introduced to tax legislation. As far as I remember, the changes brought into the tax legislation go back to 1947, since it is always very difficult for the government to alter substantially its tax policy. It is all the more important that we seriously consider the amendments of clauses 109 and 110 because I have the strong impression that they will be in force for many years to come.

With reference then to all the speeches that were made in this House and to all the arguments which were submitted, I take the liberty once more to urge hon. members and the members responsible for the government to adopt a straightforward attitude which would be far more attuned to the just society which is desired not only by liberals but by all hon. members alike.

We long for that just society as much as those who promised it but, nonetheless, endeavours are necessary. I am under the clear impression that we do not take that great step when setting the exemptions at $1,500 or $2,850. In fact, we would be in a better position to conquer or at least obtain the confidence of the people if, through a positive gesture, we were to set the exemptions at $3,000 and $5,000.

I do not think that I am exaggerating. A while ago, the leader of the Social Credit (Mr. Caouette) drew a parallel with the non-taxable $8,000 allowed to hon. members. I am not entirely in agreement with him, because I think that the workman who might discuss the $8,000 exemption surely does not know what is involved in an hon. member's duties.

The argument used by the leader of the Social Credit is indeed not serious. However, his observations were perfectly justified, like those of the member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) this afternoon, and should be taken into consideration by the vast majority of members.

Mr. Chairman, I close on those words, hoping that the government will amend clauses 109 and 110, thus proving to the Canadian people that it is seriously endeavouring to achieve a more just society.

[English]

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I rise to say a few words—and they will be few—on behalf of the many parents of university students who are sending their children through university and paying their tuition fees, their board and lodging and their incidentals which may run as high as $2,000 or $2,500, and who receive no tax exemption or deduction whatever. All they are allowed is what is set out in various parts on section 109 for a child over 21 years of age who is attending university, and the maximum there is $550.

Mr. McCleave: Not enough.

Mr. Benson: But we are paying half the cost.

Mr. Aiken: I would be glad to accept the minister's question, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Benson: I am sure my hon. friend understands that half the operating costs of post-secondary education are paid by the taxpayers of Canada.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I think the minister interrupted me too soon. I am trying to draw a little equity into this situation and perhaps he will see my point in a moment. Those parents who pay the full amount of their children's tuition are taxpayers and presumably they are paying an income tax on that $2,000, if we take a round figure, of between 20 per cent and 50 per cent. It is therefore costing such a parent not only the $2,000 actually paid out but also the tax he pays on top of that.

I am trying to compare this situation to that of a student who is sent to university on a bursary or scholarship, who must borrow money under the scholarship plan, or who in some way or other gets the money from a source other than the parent. In such a case there is no tax attracted to the money that is paid for tuition. I am trying to point out the unfairness of the situation to the same group of people who are paying most of the taxes of this country, the people in the middle-income bracket, the people who are sending their children to school, the people who are paying their way through life and in the result get stuck with income tax whereas other income attracts no tax and there is no benefit to the federal treasury.

This question has been put to me many times by parents who are laying out a great deal of money and getting no tax reduction. I agree with the minister that this money comes from taxes in any case to pay for university education. But I do not feel that it is a fair distribution when those who are making an effort and paying, when the student cannot get work during the summer—as many have not during the last couple of years—end up paying a premium on whatever their income tax rate is for the right to send their children to university on top of the expense incurred in sending them there. The point I am trying to make is that there should be some deduction in order to create equity in taxation for the parent.

I shall not move an amendment at this point. We have had rulings on amendments which seek to raise exemption levels, so I will not waste my time or the time of the committee in moving such an amendment. Despite the many efforts to get around the difficulty, all such amendments have been ruled out of order. I am merely bringing this matter to the minister's attention and asking him to give serious consideration to the tax to be imposed on a person who is trying to put his children through school. Many people will make that effort even though they cannot afford it. They will do that rather than ask for a bursary or a student loan for the child.

In many cases the circumstances in which a student loan is given are very narrow and the situation is most unfair. When a student gets a government loan under the student loans program, no tax is attracted; however, if that narrow line is crossed and the student does not get a loan, then not only must the parent pay the penalty but he must pay tax in addition. This situation is most unfair and in many cases applies to the middle-income person who is trying to pay his way—not depend on the government, not draw sustenance from other people but who is trying to do the right thing. In doing so, not only does he get stuck with the cost but he pays income tax in addition which can run as high as 50 per cent. For these reasons I think the minister should give this matter serious consideration and see if some equity cannot be introduced into this situation.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, due to the importance of clauses 109 and 110 of Bill C-259, I feel it is my duty to take part in this debate to put forward some arguments which may perhaps prompt the government members to review their position concerning those exemptions.

I would like to base my arguments on two particular points: The increase of poverty in Canada and the efficiency of means to control it. In conclusion, we will see that we are before a dilemma or a problem with two possible solutions, either true socialism or Social Credit.

First, I should like to make a brief summary.

This government proposes, in clauses 109 and 110, to increase personal tax exemptions to $1500 for single taxpayers and to $2850 for the married ones. This, according to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), so as to give these people a greater hope for a just society. According to him, this would mean that these people would be more fairly treated by federal taxation.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not go through the scientific calculations of my colleagues, but it happens that this tax mess proposed by this government does not, in fact, amount to a difference of more than $50 a year, which is finally a swindle and does not reduce poverty in Canada.

On the other hand, the Minister of Finance—the Minister of High Finance—has already stated that, starting from a certain date, 750,000 Canadians would be totally exempted from income tax. And he boasts about this as if it were good news. This does not make anybody happy in our party.

If 750,000 Canadians do not have to pay any income tax, it means that 750,000 Canadians do not have enough income to make them liable to the tax according to the government's rates. So, the government deserves no credit for removing some people from the tax rolls, because, even if it wanted to compel them to pay taxes, they would no longer be able to do so because they have had to tighten their belts too much at the government's request.

It is now proposed to increase basic exemptions. This is the same argumentation, the same spirit, the same principle and the same administrative philosophy which would have us believe that this is a step forward.

Mr. Chairman, as my colleagues of the Social Credit party of Canada, I pretend that this is administrative hanky panky which settles nothing. Increasing the exemptions to $1,500 or $2,850 will not solve things any more than the elimination of income tax for 750,000 Canadians will solve their problems, allow them to take part in production and increase their purchasing power.

To be fully understood, these remarks must be placed in a general context; for example, we offer retraining courses to workers. It is an indirect and disguised way of providing them with social welfare allowances. Retraining courses have become for the federal government an indirect means to intrude in the area of social welfare which, in some provinces, is exclusively the latter's responsibility. In fact, 50 per cent, if not more, of those who benefited by the training programs sponsored by the federal government are people living below the poverty level.

Mr. Chairman, I will be told that exemption of these people from income tax might solve their problems. That is wrong, just as those training programs did not solve them. I will be told that increasing the amount of their basic exemptions will solve their problems; that also is not so.

And to support my assertions and make the hon. members opposite well aware that the proposals contained in Sections 109 and 110 will not be efficient, I would like to refer them to the 8th Annual Review of the Economic Council of Canada issued in September 1971, and more specifically to page 97, where the following can be found:

> We are constantly striving to bring the policies of the Department within the reach of the underemployed and the working poor ... Of 301,000 adults trained last year, some 50 per cent were below the poverty line.

That means, Mr. Chairman, that 50 per cent of the 301,000 adults in training receive an income below the poverty line, that is less than $3,000. Will their removal from the income tax lists solve their problems, Mr. Chairman? Not at all, since they had no income on which to pay income tax anyway, because they were already being retrained or unemployed.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, the problem is not solved. It might perhaps be said that that training will solve it, but let us ask ourselves the question. I will then refer my colleagues to page 116 of the same Annual Review, Table 6-3 entitled Pre- and Post-Training Annual Earnings Distributions, 1969, which deals with the program that is doing wonders, according to the federal government. This table indicates that of the 301,000 Canadians who took a course, and who cannot pay income tax because they are below the poverty level, 78.4 per cent in each class, before undergoing training, had an income of less than $5,000, $4,999, it says here. Before the course, 78.4 per cent had an income of less than $5,000. Therefore, their margin over the poverty level is $2,000 only. Moreover, the family must be small! After these so-called effective courses provided by the federal government, which are disguised social welfare, 73.1 per cent of these people could not find employment and are still under the $5,000 level.

So, Mr. Chairman, in order to achieve that just society and this small mathematic calculation is ample proof, the government invented various programs. To the aged, it gives old age pensions. To children, it will give family allowances; recently we messed around with that. To the penniless, it gives welfare benefits with the tip of its fingers, a pittance, after both provocating and humiliating tests. To the unemployed, it gives unemployment insurance, and even then the individual has to fill out oodles of forms before being eligible. Those who are left over, when the rate of unemployment is too high, receive training courses and, finally, as I have just demonstrated, nothing is solved.

All those programs, as my hon. colleague for Témiscamingue pointed out, cost billions each year; they cost a mint. Any wonder they represent the major item in the federal budget; that is what raises personal income tax. The people whom the government is concerned with in clauses 109 and 110 do not have, even before exemptions, the means to pay their income tax. Is the government doing them a favour? No way! On the contrary, it is only messing about further in their almost empty pocket book, even though it may hold $50 more a year.

Such is, Mr. Chairman, the just society! This is why we object to clauses 109 and 110. We maintain that the lot of the people affected by those provisions will not be improved. This is why we are again urging the government to increase those basic exemptions to $3,000 for single persons and to $5,000 for married couples.

There is nothing more logical than the figures which I have just given you in connection with the retraining courses. Indeed, I stated that before attending those courses, 78.4 per cent of the 301,000 individuals in each group had an income lower than $5,000. They were attending courses to improve their lot, because their income was inadequate. If the government recognizes that it is necessary to improve their lot by providing courses for them, could it not much more easily solve most of the problem with a total tax exemption, at $3,000 for single taxpayers, and at $5,000 for married people?

My colleague, the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) even told the government, this afternoon, and the same argument applies in the field of old age security pensions—when both husband and wife are drawing the maximum, that is $255 a month or $3,060 annually, establishes a sufficient minimum income, not to live, but to subsist. People who are the least fortunate in our society, the unemployed, the aged, children, the crippled, the widows, are precisely those who must pay the most for housing, clothing and food. These three essentials of live are precisely the most expensive items, judging from the increase in the cost of living and the tables of Statistics Canada. Consequently, the less favoured are the first hit by the increase in the cost of living and the government's failure in its fight against inflation.

Of course, if the government considers that $3,060 is enough as a minimum income ensuring the bare subsistence of the older person, supposing that both the husband and wife receive the guaranteed income supplement, our argument is all the stronger when we ask the government to grant the same amount to the people who, as my colleague from Champlain has stated, are not 65, but 60, 40 or 30.

I have already shown that people who receive less than $5,000 per year cannot make ends meet. That is why they are registering for retraining and that they make use of government programs. They have no other choice.

Mr. Chairman, when old people are asking for an increase in their old age security pensions it is because they cannot make both ends meet. Furthermore, if the government is aware of that, is it not willing to increase basic exemptions from $1,500 to $3,000 for single people and from $2,850 to $5,000 for married couples?

Mr. Chairman, if the head of a family of two or three children receives a $5,000 income, it represents only $1,000 a year per person, less income tax. Because the government is refusing to increase these exemptions, these people will have to pay taxes. This is sheer nonsense. If that is what we call the just society, Mr. Chairman, living conditions were better under the old system of 1867. At least, at that time people were not annoyed with tons of documents and with the administrative flimflam of incompetent Public Service employees. At least they could manage with their axe and make a living.

How is it that in those days, people could do without degrees, education, social welfare, old age pension, retraining programs, the just society. Indians and Englishmen managed to live. Today, billions of dollars are spent on old age pensions, family allowances, unemployment insurance benefits, retraining courses, scholarships. Now, Mr. Chairman, one hand will give a scholarship and the other will take taxes from the recipient. How brilliant!

Mr. Chairman, as my colleague from Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) said, that is really serious. If the government does not wake up and smarten up and if it continues to have bats in the belfry, it will very soon face a revolution in Canada.

It seems to me it is high time to get out of the clouds and come down to earth and look at the problem where it is. The problem of poverty is increasing in Canada. How can we explain that with all this fine government programs promoted with such ability, they have not succeeded in getting rid of ½ per cent of poverty in Canada? On the contrary, it keeps on increasing. Would it be that these programs are inadequate?

Mr. Chairman, this does not make sense and we cannot swallow this fact. That is why my colleagues and I, following our devoted leader, the hon. member for Témiscamingue, stand up and protest against these schemes, these proposals. This bill of 710 pages, designed to tax our fellow citizens, which does not remove the least bit of poverty and solve any problem, is only an example of administrative tinkering that civil servants are fond of. It justifies their salaries.

Mr. Chairman, I must protest. I address my protest to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) who will not even listen to what we have to say, preferring to joke and "swing". Mr. Chairman, I am compelled to urge that he increase the basic exemptions so that our fellow citizens in Lotbinière and throughout Canada may have at least a semblance of subsistence and no longer depend on governments.

That goes with governments, Mr. Chairman. That is what the Economic Council of Canada say in their Eight Annual Review, which I invite my hon. colleagues to read. They speak of government and decision-making, of political implementation of development of human resources. There can be no further development of human resources, they are being crushed, frustrated, forced to sign application forms, on all fours before civil servants to obtain their hand-outs.

That is not the way to develop human resources. Let us implement the social security program mentioned by the hon. member for Témiscamingue in order to safeguard individual freedom instead of crawling before tipsy officials. In that way, we will begin to set up some sort of just society at least.

Then, let us stop giving with one hand and taking away with the other. If we go to the universities and tell the students "Long live the just society!" they will answer: "Is that the just society when you give us a scholarship with one hand and take it away with the other through taxes? Moreover, we cannot find jobs during the summer." Mr. Chairman, those young people are not all "lousy" and revolutionaries. They want to build Canada. Those young people want to work, as the hon. member for Témiscamingue told the House. Those young people are not heartless; they want to participate.

Mr. Chairman, if we grant single people a basic exemption of $1,500, while a year at university costs them $2,500 and if, moreover, they end up on the unemployment market—we cannot talk of the labour market any more in Canada—it is hard for a father to teach them the value of authority, it is hard for any authority, at any level, to say to those young people: "Help your country, get involved, get into the game!" The young man will reply: "Help me first of all to make use of my degrees which are lying on a shelf, then we will talk about politics."

People—those in my constituency as well as those in the constituency of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) or any other member—want to participate, but let us quit messing around!

If, on the one hand, the maximum old age pension awarded is $3,060 a year, it means that the government is conceding that the minimum for subsistence is $3,000. Why not then grant basic exemptions of $3,000 for single people and $5,000 for married couples?

Before resuming my seat, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance, who did not listen to a word of what was said, to at least reveal his own thoughts on the bill.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I must unfortunately interrupt the hon. member to remind him that his time has expired.

[English]

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Chairman, I interject at this moment merely to ask a question for clarification. I have in mind section 110 (1) (c) (xii). In this regard rulings are made with due and just cause—but we only receive rulings, never an explanation. Subparagraph (xii) provides:

for any device or equipment, not described in any other subparagraph of this paragraph, of a prescribed kind, for use by the taxpayer, his spouse or any such dependant as prescribed by such a medical practitioner—

Let me give an example of what I have in mind, for the information of the minister and his parliamentary secretary. I know of a gentleman who has unfortunately been struck with a serious and incurable disease which necessitates his using a wheel-chair to travel from his place of residence to his business. In order to do this it was necessary to instal handrails and a ramp at his home as well as special controls in his automobile.

As outlined in this section, this type of equipment must be prescribed by a medical practitioner. As a matter of fact, the devices were prescribed by this man's doctor who advised him on the manner in which they must be installed and how they should be used. His doctor also helped to obtain the necessary equipment for the automobile. On making application to have the costs of these things deducted from his income, this man found they were disallowed and he asked me to make an appeal on his behalf. I did this, but the ruling was not in his favour.

I know the department looks at these matters very carefully, but I am unable to understand why they disallowed what I considered a very fair and just deduction in accordance with the wording of the act. I am wondering whether an explanation can be given.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, under the existing law the only things that can be deducted are those defined in the act. Under the act as it will be when this bill is passed, I hope very soon, the Minister of National Revenue will have the power to decide on the new things that should be allowed as deductions, such as equipment, and so on. I cannot say whether it will cover such things as ramps, hand-railings and that sort of thing. We are allowing wider discretion to the Minister of National Revenue in order that he can hear cases and make changes rather quickly without having to come to Parliament each year in order to make small changes.

Mr. Danforth: Perhaps I might be permitted to ask the minister another question. The minister has just stated that this is a new provision and is a modification of the act. The minister is familiar with the problem I have outlined, but is it his understanding that under the terms of the new act such a deduction will be allowed, in terms of the bill now before us?

Mr. Benson: I cannot say that. Certain things are prescribed in the act and the Minister of National Revenue is given certain latitude in determining those things which may be additionally prescribed. I should not like to prejudge decisions which will be made in this regard.

Mr. Haidasz: May I ask a question, Mr. Chairman?

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. Unless the hon. member has unanimous consent, the responsibility of the Chair is to indicate that we have now reached ten o'clock and unless otherwise directed by the committee I must report progress.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: If it is agreed that I do not see the clock for a few moments, that is fine, otherwise the committee must abide by the rules of the House.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I think there might be agreement to get through these two sections, and I ask whether it is understood that we will be dealing next with sections 4 to 8 inclusive.

Mr. Benson: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, we are trying to reach an agreement on an experimental basis between parties and, so that members of other parties can keep their word, why not carry on before the agreement has been reached on what is now proposed? We gave our word of honour and we shall keep it.

The Deputy Chairman: It is not a matter of knowing what sections will be dealt with tomorrow, but rather of finding out if the Committee is allowed to sit past ten o'clock or whether the Chair should call it ten o'clock.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, we do not agree. We shall use the rest of the evening preparing ourselves for a good day's work tomorrow.

• (10:00 p.m.)

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I could suggest that we answer one question which has been raised and that tomorrow we proceed with sections 4 to 8 which are very wide ranging. I should think if the Chair wanted to indicate that we would accept one question, we would be pleased to do so, but without additional debate. If there is no consensus among members opposite to deal with these two sections tonight, then of course we cannot deal with them.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, we disagree. This is like when we ask the minister to study Social Credit and his answer is no.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—ATLANTIC PROVINCES—ASSESSMENT AND REVAMPING OF DEPARTMENTAL PROGRAMS IN LIGHT OF CRITICISMS—LONG-TERM TARGETS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, on October 20 last, as recorded at page 8856 of Hansard, I raised the question of evaluating and assessing the program of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion because of the criticisms levelled at that department at a recent meeting of the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council. Those who attended that meeting are not opposed to the purposes for which the Department of Regional Economic Expansion was set up. What they are saying is that a department which is now 2½ years old and which has become one of the major spending departments, spending in the order of $330 million a year, with 2,000 employees, needs to be evaluated to see whether Canadian taxpayers are getting value for their money and whether the programs are accomplishing the objectives for which DREE was set up.

The criticisms from those who attended this meeting of APEC were three in number, in the main. First, the programs of DREE seemed to lack long-term planning and co-ordination. Mr. Guy Henson of Dalhousie University put it very well. The press report states:

—he chided the government for its failure to produce an imaginative concept; a clearly definable long-term strategy similar to those developed for the Tennessee Valley scheme and a regional development program in northern Norway.

Instead of a long-term concept, Ottawa had produced ad hoc plans couched in all the right phrases and clichés and with an appearance of high competence, which amounted to no more than narrow development of tools.

APEC itself, in its annual report, criticized the DREE program and said that rather than working closely with the provincial governments and municipalities to plan an infrastructure, DREE has simply lunged forward with a whole series of what can only be described as public works thinly disguised as regional economic expansion.

The second criticism had to do with the fact that the long-term objectives that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion was established to pursue have been short-changed in the interest of short-term political expediency. It seems that increases in the programs are determined by the political complexion of the region rather than by the economic needs of the area. The original concentration of certain carefully selected regions for development has been submerged in the cross-currents of political pressures. For instance, the area for federal incentive grants has now been extended to the point where half the labour force of Canada now lives in designated areas. The result has been to dilute the effectiveness of the incentive programs.

The third criticism which seemed to come out of these discussions was that the government's regional development policies have been undermined by lay-offs in firms which have received grants to establish plants in slow-growth areas. An instance was pointed out the other day of Canadian Ingersoll-Rand starting to lay-off some 300 workers in Sherbrooke, Quebec, although the firm received a grant of almost $200,000 from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in 1970. The minister of the department said yesterday, according to a report from Montreal, that there is nothing abnormal about lay-offs in subsidized firms. I take this to be an admission that regional development policies have little hope of success when the national economy is faltering and employment is dropping.

DREE often talks about the national-regional trade-offs that are necessary to bring about balanced growth throughout the country, but what can the national economy spare for the slow-growth regions when apparently it can do so little for itself? I think this was summed up very well by the former deputy minister of DREE, Mr. Tom Kent, who said at the same conference, as reported in the Globe and Mail of October 20:

"It is impossible to expect" that a program conceived on the assumption of an expanding national economy would be successful when economic growth rates declined.

It seems to me that in light of these criticisms and in light of the growing concern which is being felt in many areas, the time has come for the minister to give us an evaluation and an assessment of these programs. I think it was summed up very well by Mr. T. N. Brewis of Carleton University who said the following at the conference, as reported in the Globe and Mail of October 20:

—there is need for a greater public evaluation by DREE of its efforts. What assessment has been made in ministerial statements has been unsatisfactory and he accused the department of supporting its arguments with "phony" figures.

In view of the money which is being spent, in view of the desirable objectives which this department was set up to achieve, I think the time has come when Parliament has a right to expect from the minister of this department a statement as to the extent to which it has accomplished the goals set out for it, whether or not the programs being carried on have brought about the results which were required and whether the Canadian people are receiving value for these expenditures.

Mr. James Hugh Faulkner (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to reply on behalf of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) as follows: The report of the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council has been received and carefully read. It contains a good deal of useful information and analysis of a number of interesting suggestions. For this reason it will receive intensive study in the department. The report also contains a number of criticisms of departmental programs. To the extent these are constructive, or so intended, they are welcomed. To some extent, however, they seem to be based on misconception or lack of perspective.

The hon. member undoubtedly knows that many of the department's programs are based on a joint planning process that is dependent on a close working relationship with provincial governments. The department is engaged day in and day out in a planning exercise with its provincial counterparts and this exercise is now generating in each of the areas in which the department functions with a comprehensive development strategy. The programs of the department are subject to continuing evaluation, but if changes are considered necessary they will be made. No such changes, however, are contemplated at the moment.

POST OFFICE—STEPS TO IMPROVE SERVICE AND AVOID EXORBITANT COST FOR MAILING LETTERS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, on October 20 I directed a question to the Postmaster General (Mr. Côté) with respect to a statement that had been made in the city of Winnipeg by one of his officials, supported by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Osler), to the effect that if efficiency did not increase in the Post Office Department in the immediate future, Canadians would be paying 26 cents to mail a letter.

In recent months discussion of the Post Office service has been somewhat quiet compared with what it was immediately following 1968. We have a new Postmaster General and I think hon. members have been waiting to see how he handles the mounting problems of Post Office service. It now appears that the pattern that took shape in 1968, with services decreasing and costs increasing, is still present in the postal service of Canada.

Tonight I would like to ask whoever will speak for the Postmaster General some very specific questions. When this Postmaster General took over he said he would be adopting a more humane and understanding approach to Post Office problems. We accepted this at face value because, after all, postal service is the basic and most important communications service in any country. I suppose it was the first government service to be established as a public utility for that purpose. But the volume of mail handled by the Post Office still continues to decrease as a result of rather exorbitant increases in rates, along with a declining service. For example, by January 1 of next year the cost of mailing a letter in Canada will have increased by 100 per cent since 1968.

I want to deal specifically with protests that have been raised by the Letter Carriers Union in their publication "The Courier" of September-October, 1971. They point out that there has been a 30 per cent reduction in postal service in recent years. Obviously, there is dissatisfaction among letter carriers. I think it goes without saying that if you are to have an efficient postal service you must have a happy work force.

I would like the comments of the government spokesmen on this point. There can be, and there have been reforms. There was the assured mail delivery reform which was supposed to guarantee 24-hour delivery service to the major cities in Canada. This is not actually an improvement because Canada has had air mail delivery for 20 years. In the ordinary course of events, were it not for the decrease in efficiency over the past three years we should have expected the service to be substantially improved by assured air mail.

Recently there was the announcement of the all up overseas rate which provides air service to all mail originating in Canada at the rate of 15 cents per ounce. This is a five-cent increase on an overseas air letter because the air mail form is no longer used. I understand there has been such a log jam of air mail destined for overseas that there is now a considerable delay, mainly because no reciprocity has been achieved for this service with countries in Europe and other parts of the world. This is one of the matters put forward as an urgent necessity when the Postmaster General originally made his announcement in the House. Now we are to have the zip code which is supposed to bring the dawn of a new age in postal efficiency. It could, if the Canadian public accepts the mechanization of the post office service.

I want to specifically get the answer that I tried to get the other day. Is it the policy of the government to insist on a profit in this basic communications service? This seems to be the thought behind the various changes in operation and direction of the Post Office over the past three years. They say the Post Office is losing money. I would remind hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches that the CBC loses $200 million in public funds, we are spending $70 million to launch a Canadian satellite, and railroads and other basic means of communication all lose money. Why does the Post Office Department, why does the Postmaster General, why does the government insist that this basic means of communication realize a profit?

Even in this Parliament we maintain parliamentary mailing privileges to ensure maximum communication between representatives and constituents. We have come a long way from the penny Post Office and I hope that the prognostication made in Winnipeg the other day, of 26 cents to mail a letter within nine years, will not be realized. Tonight I should like to hear how the Postmaster General intends to avoid this very undesirable situation.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for Brandon-Souris for raising this question. Unfortunately, when he did so, the minister was not allowed to reply in the House because of certain allegations. But I can assure the hon. member that it is my pleasure to reply tonight since the minister and his parliamentary secretary are not in attendance.

I would like to advise the hon. member that the Post Office Department has of course no idea of how much it will cost to deliver a first class letter within the next nine, 10 or 20 years.

The amount of 26 cents has been mentioned. Perhaps we shall reach this amount but probably not for many years.

But I would like to point out to the hon. member that there is a huge difference between what it costs the Post Office for the handling of a letter and the proportion of that cost that will eventually be paid by the user. The government's present policy—I insist upon that—does not imply that the Post Office will necessarily pay its way. The honourable member emphasized that point. We may be sure the department does not necessarily intend to pay its way.

I do not know what will be the government's policy in 1990, Mr. Chairman, but last year the Post Office implemented measures to prevent an excessive increase in costs and consequently in the deficit. The first of those measures is of course the Postal code and the mechanization programme which Mr. Fultz referred to the other day in his Winnipeg statement.

The mechanization programme will help to reduce mail handling thereby reducing the cost of such handling. We hope that the use of the postal code will be general by July, 1974. The guaranteed postal delivery program also will reduce expenditures while easing the pressures being exerted on the postal services during peak hours, as well as ensure a better use of both personnel and facilities. Besides, expect the creation of new postal facilities in Toronto, Winnipeg and Montreal, when these are entirely automated, costs will be maintained at a reasonable level.

The work to be done in the field of commercialization, which has been mentioned so often, will boost postal revenues in encouraging the use of the "postpack", promoting the philatelic service sales and developing the small parcels service and the use of containers, thus reducing handling costs.

• (10:20 p.m.)

[English]

I should like to assure the hon. gentleman with regard to the other point he raised in his presentation. I will certainly bring this matter to the attention of the minister and he will take care of it in due course.

Mr. Dinsdale: Just keep the cost down. That's the thing that worries me.

AGRICULTURE—FARM MACHINERY—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO PRAIRIE PROVINCES IN TESTING PROGRAM

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) this question:

In view of the fact that the three prairie governments are co-operating on a farm machinery testing program, as recommended by Professor Barber, have those three provinces approached the Minister of Agriculture for assistance in this regard? If not, what will his answer be if they do approach him?

The minister answered to the effect that there have been a number of discussions about this. I suggest that it is not enough to appoint a royal commission that has done a wonderful job. I suggest that there comes a time when you must do something about the recommendations that the commission has made to the government. If the Minister of Agriculture intends to do anything about those recommendations, he is surely taking his time.

We can see that the provincial governments are considering co-operating in this regard. I ask the minister this evening whether the federal government will contribute any money towards a farm machinery testing program, as recommended by Professor Barber. May I read a small excerpt from Professor Barber's report. His royal commission was a creature of the federal government. In that sense I think he speaks with authority, the authority of the government. I read as follows from page 3 of the report of the Royal Commission on Farm Machinery:

With farming much more highly mechanized, the farmer has also found himself more vulnerable to the effects of machine breakdown during his busy seasons—in particular during seeding operations in the spring, during the haying season, and at harvest time.

At page 10 the report reads:

Yet as machines become larger and more expensive, a farmer's machinery-investment decisions become increasingly critical. It is for this reason that this report includes a recommendation for an evaluation and testing unit that could supply farmers with much more reliable and comprehensive information to help them make their decisions on machinery investment and replacement.

A little further on Professor Barber suggests that people who are in a position to judge farm machinery are under pressure from farm machinery companies. He was thinking of newspapers and universities which receive advertisements and grants from farm machinery companies. That is why they are not in a position to make known critical evaluations of how farm machinery works. Professor barber suggested that logically the government ought to set up a unit to look into this particular problem. The Barber report says at page 495:

In an earlier section of this report . . . it was pointed out that the benefits that had been derived from improvements in farm machinery technology in the past were extremely large. Indeed, over the period from 1926-66 it was estimated that the net benefits obtained were probably of the order of from $2 to $3 billion annually and might well exceed those derived from all other agricultural improvements.

This is one of the reasons in support of the suggestion that there should be evaluation of machinery. The following is one of the recommendations of Mr. Barber:

Accordingly it was recommended that the Canada Department of Agriculture set as its short term goal to be reached by 1980 the allocation of 10 per cent of its social research budget to supporting improvement in farm machinery.

It seems to me, as a farmer, that the system of testing agricultural machinery operated in Saskatchewan in the past received almost universal approval. I have in mind the reports of the Agricultural Machinery Administration. One heard farmers quoting the AMA reports as to what certain machines could do or could not do. Many people were critical when the program was dropped, but consideration is now being given to re-establishing it.

I should like to know whether the government intends to do anything. Professor Barber recommended that something be done. In view of the success of the program in Saskatchewan, is it not time to consider again the advantages which were derived from a project of this kind? It is not only farmers who benefit. It has been suggested that we might provide testing facilities for Canadian farm machinery manufacturers which are small by world standards and which do not have the means or the facilities required to carry out elaborate testing on their own. As a result they may not have been getting their share of the farm machinery market.

If we could do something to improve the technology of our home-made farm machinery, so to speak, we might not only be able to supply a larger share of our home market but also sell more abroad. I suggest to the government and to the parliamentary secretary that what I am suggesting would be of advantage to all Canadian farmers, not just to prairie farmers. Imagine a machine shut down at harvest time for lack of a 25-cent seal! It is not a good thing to happen but it has happened. These machines should be tested thoroughly before they are put on the market; it would save the farmer and the country a lot of money. Mr. Speaker, we have procrastinated long enough and I believe it is time we did something. I want to know what the government intends to do.

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) I am pleased to inform the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. Thomson) that under the auspices of the Canada Committee on Agricultural Engineering discussions were held as late as September 22-24 among the federal government, provincial governments and the universities on the subject of the Royal Commission on Farm Machinery.

As to the question raised concerning assistance from the federal government, I must say that up to now we have received no requests from provincial governments concerning present programs. At the moment a committee within the department is studying the practical application of some of the recommendations contained in the Barber commission report and I can assure the hon. member that these discussions within the department and between the provinces and the federal government will be continued. I am sure that very good results will flow from these discussions. We may be in a position in a short time to announce interesting programs and progress which might help to solve the difficulties raised, quite properly, by the hon. member.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.33 p.m.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DECISION BY UNITED STATES TO PROCEED WITH AMCHITKA NUCLEAR TEST

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, members of the House will be aware that the United States has just announced President Nixon's decision that the underground nuclear test at Amchitka will take place on or shortly after November 3.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Sharp: The government deeply regrets this decision and shares the widespread concern of the people of Canada as expressed in the resolution of this House of October 15.

I need not remind the House that the government has both publicly and privately made clear to the United States Canada's firm and consistent opposition to the continuation and escalation of nuclear weapons testing, and our specific concern about the threat the Amchitka test poses to the North Pacific environment that we share with them, with the Russians and the Japanese.

Our ambassador in Washington was notified of the President's decision this morning shortly before it was made public. I at once took steps to contact Mr. Rogers, the American Secretary of State, and have conveyed to him that this action on their part can only result in a deep sense of disquiet among Canadians.

The hard fact is that in the end the United States government has the legal right to carry out this test. Presumably it is doing so in accordance with what it perceives to be the national interest of the United States. We have also never suggested that this test involves a high element of risk, but no one denies that risks exist.

Canada and other nations threatened will necessarily hold the United States responsible for any short or long-term effects of this test.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the House that our specific objections to this test are wholly consistent with Canada's opposition to nuclear weapons testing of all kinds and by all nuclear powers.

• (2:10 p.m.)

Mr. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that in view of what the Secretary of State for External Affairs has just said the House will be pleased to give unanimous consent to a motion I intend to propose under Standing Order 43, if unanimous consent is granted, relative to a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, namely, today's announcement by the Atomic Energy Commission in Washington that the United States will proceed with the Amchitka nuclear test on November 3.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin):

That this House do direct the Prime Minister to undertake a personal and direct contact with the American President to express the opposition of the Parliament and the people of Canada to the Amchitka nuclear test and further—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the Leader of the Opposition but it seems we are proceeding somewhat irregularly now. My understanding was that after the statement on motions had been made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs spokesmen for the opposition would be given the opportunity, as provided under the Standing Orders, to comment if they wished on behalf of their parties. It was my impression that the Leader of the Opposition would be doing this subject to his right of course, after these comments had been heard from the different parties, to make the motion which he is proposing. Perhaps the Leader of the Opposition would take that into consideration.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I simply felt I was co-operating, as I always wish to co-operate, with the members of the government—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): We can take a joke.

Mr. Stanfield: —in presenting this motion at this time, and I hope it will receive the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. Speaker: Before the motion can be put we have to proceed in accordance with the Standing Orders which require that representatives of the opposition parties be given an opportunity to comment on the statement made by the minister. The Chair will now recognize the hon. member for York South.

Amchitka Nuclear Test

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, one of my colleagues was also considering moving a motion on the same subject, but I do not see the value of it now in view of the debate that took place the other day.

I want to say on behalf of our party, and perhaps on behalf of most if not all Canadians, that the news which the Secretary of State for External Affairs has given us now makes this day a very sad one. The President of the United States has shown himself entirely insensitive to the needs of the world. He has decided to ignore the concern of Canadians in that area and, indeed, the concern of all people throughout the world that this kind of nuclear arms race should continue unabated.

I cannot help but say shame to the administration of a big and strong power that has so much to do with the welfare and peace of the world ignoring world opinion and ignoring the facts of the situation. This cannot help to produce a greater feeling of warmth or friendship toward the administration of that powerful country.

In my reading of the situation, Mr. Speaker, there are a good many scientists and military strategists who have pointed out that the test is militarily of doubtful value, if not useless, and that the Safeguard system which it is supposed to serve cannot be supported by so huge a bomb as that which will be exploded on or about November 3. I cannot help but feel that President Nixon has yielded to a desire to establish the prestige of the United States in a race that threatens the peace of the world and, indeed, the very existence of this world.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that even at this late date the strong expression of opposition which the Secretary of State for External Affairs has made—I say without hesitation that I congratulate him for his statement and am pleased he made it so clear and so strong—and the expression of opposition by the members of this House may still persuade President Nixon to get off this course of danger and the threat to humanity, to the ecology of the northwest and in general to the morality of the modern world posed by this atrociously unnecessary and atrociously dangerous test.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, my colleagues and I highly commend the firmness shown by the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) in notifying the United States government of Canada's opposition, not only on the part of the government, but also of Parliament and the people of Canada, to these nuclear tests to be carried out by the Americans shortly after November 4.

It is astounding to see what short shrift the United States government gives to nations which in the past have co-operated with them in many areas, completely ignoring our representations when we ask them to spare Canada and other countries consequences which can only be disastrous.

I now understand why representatives and citizens of the United States are not so very welcome in most of the countries I have visited, precisely because of their disregard for other nations. The Canadian government has made some representations but the American government advises us that it is not important.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker, the Americans will entirely bear the onus of their decision. We strongly object to the nuclear test which will be held in Amchitka and I join my colleagues in congratulating the government for the firm stand it has taken with the American authorities.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. My understanding is that the Leader of the Opposition might want to propose at this time the motion he referred to a moment ago.

DECISION BY UNITED STATES TO PROCEED WITH AMCHITKA NUCLEAR TEST—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O.43

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in putting this motion I wish to make it very clear that I am not accusing the President of the United States of shameful conduct or immorality. If I get the unanimous consent of the House I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin):

That this House do direct the Prime Minister to undertake a personal and direct contact with the American President to express the opposition of the Parliament and people of Canada to the Amchitka nuclear test, and further that the Prime Minister make this direct contact an absolute and immediate priority.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Talk to McIntosh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the motion proposed by the Leader of the Opposition. Under the terms of Standing Order 43 this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

An hon. Member: Who said no?

An hon. Member: The Prime Minister.

Mr. Hees: The Prime Minister said no and I heard him.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CANCELLATION OF CERTAIN TRAINS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O.43

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Matane): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I would like to ask the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on an important matter requiring urgent consideration.

The Canadian National Railways have announced their decision to discontinue the service of trains Nos. 122 and 123 in eastern Quebec. The decision constitutes an infringement of the spirit of the agreement concluded by the government of Canada and the government of Quebec about the eastern part of Quebec, which is obviously a matter of national concern. It is a unilateral decision in which the population had no part whatsoever, it will jeopardize the development of our region and it denies the principle of participatory democracy.

Therefore, seconded by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. LeBlanc), I move:

That the House invite the government to make strong representations to the Canadian National to make them cancel their plan to discontinue trains 122 and 123 and undertake real consultations with the people of eastern Quebec.

• (2:20 p.m.)

I believe that my colleague would like to put in a word.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has proposed a motion under the terms of Standing Order 43 requiring the unanimous consent of the House.

Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Speaker: I might say that it is difficult for the Chair to determine whether there is unanimity.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: I have heard a number of yeas but I am not sure whether other sounds could be interpreted as nays.

An hon. Member: Let the government House leader say no, if he dares.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent and the motion cannot be put.

Mr. Hees: Some dirty Liberal said no.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

GRAIN

LETTERS TO PRODUCERS FOLLOWING PAYMENTS UNDER TEMPORARY WHEAT RESERVES ACT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I rise to request the unanimous consent of the House to propose a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. This matter concerns the conduct of the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board in connection with payments recently received by prairie grain producers under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Downey: If I have the unanimous consent of the House I propose to move the following motion, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

Whereas, in letters dated the 20th October, 1971, and addressed to and received by prairie grain producers on the same day or shortly after the producers received payments lawfully made under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, the minister responsible for the Wheat Board deliberately and incorrectly stated that the government had been forced to withdraw its proposed prairie grain receipts stabilization program although the minister knew the bill was and is on the order paper of this House under government business; and—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is making a speech. He knows that this cannot be done. He should indicate what the motion is.

An hon. Member: He is reading the motion now.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure whether he is reading the motion now but if he is that should be brought to the attention of the Chair.

Mr. Downey: I beg your indulgence, Mr. Speaker. I am coming to the point. I continue:

Whereas the minister deliberately and untruthfully stated that the courts would have been in an awkward position in hearing a case under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act while Parliament was debating the repeal of that act although the Minister is fully aware that this House debated and passed a Bill to repeal the Surcharge on Imports Order, now chapter 18 of the 1963—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I feel I must take exception to the kind of procedure now being followed by the hon. member for Battle River. I suggest to him, and I have had occasion to remind the hon. member for Battle River of the very same point, that the purposes of Standing Order 43 do not permit argument and do not permit one to engage in debate in circumstances where no opportunity is provided under the terms of the Standing Order for anyone to reply to the motion proposed by the hon. member. The only way in which the matter can be handled, in so far as the hon. member is concerned, is for the hon. member to indicate the urgency of the matter and propose the motion. He cannot argue, as he is now arguing, his case in support of the motion. He should indicate what the motion is and then the Chair will ascertain whether there is unanimous consent. But there should not be unilateral debate of the type in which the hon. member is now engaged.

Mr. Downey: Mr. Speaker, I was only trying to show the precedents with regard to the case we are now reviewing which involves the Wheat Board. I will briefly finish, if I may, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Propose the motion.

Mr. Downey: In essence, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the stabilization program that has been before the House I move:

Correction in Hansard

That this House holds that the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board is unworthy of continuing to answer for the Wheat Board.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to bring to the attention of hon. members that all motions are not automatically accepted because they are moved under the terms of Standing Order 43. Motions made under the terms of Standing Order 43 are subject to exactly the same rules as other motions. I have very serious doubts whether this motion is acceptable and I propose to take it under consideration before it is put to the House.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, will the Chair also take into consideration the fact that the same minister a few minutes ago tabled certain documents under Standing Order 41(2) with respect to which he should have made a statement in the House so that other hon. members could have had a chance to reply?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Peace River may have a valid point. Perhaps the minister will want to take that under consideration.

Hon. members will appreciate that I do not want to create difficulties in any way, but I feel that motions made under Standing Order 43 ought to respect all the rules in the same way as all other motions. Perhaps I have been guilty of giving the impression to the House and hon. members that any motion made under Standing Order 43 is automatically in order and should be put. However, there are some motions which, even if they were to receive the unanimous consent of the House, in theory should not be put if, according to the views of the Chair, they are not consonant with our practices and with the rules of the House.

I have serious doubts about the hon. member's motion. Basically, I think it is a privilege motion, and the hon. member knows how that kind of motion has to be proposed. That is my impression at first blush. I do not want to be unfair to the hon. member and I will look at the matter very seriously before I make a ruling.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CORRECTION IN OFFICAL REPORT OF DEBATES— PROCEDURE FOR MEMBERS

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a correction in Hansard.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: From the sublime to the ridiculous.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, you can see who is making all the noise. I hope they will wait until they hear the correction. On October 14, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): —at page 8691—

[Mr. Downey.]

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I just want to change one word.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I thank hon. members who with billowing voices are asking for order, but that is the responsibility of the Chair.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): It is only a matter of one word, Your Honour.

Mr. Hees: Is it a four letter word?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): The word "there" should be changed to the word "tears". I was speaking to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield). The sentence should read: "How is the heavy water tears, Bob?"

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: It isn't Hallowe'en and you are being funny already.

Mr. MacInnis: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, in order to seek the guidance of the Chair. Am I to understand that a precedent has been established today and that we can now go back two weeks and bring up a question such as the hon. member has just raised?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The point raised by the hon. member is well taken, but he and all hon. members will appreciate that the Chair has to wait until the point has been made. I certainly disagree wholeheartedly with any suggestion that hon. members can rise on motions and correct Hansard of two weeks ago.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (2:30 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is right. No precedent has been set. I have, in any event, indicated to hon. members on many occasions that changes to Hansard should be made in the normal way simply by calling the Editor of Debates, thus saving the House a good deal of time. This applies to all hon. members.

I appreciate that on some occasions mistakes which might have been made in the report could lead to difficulties affecting individual members. In such circumstances there is, I think, a responsibility on the part of the House to hear an hon. member who wishes to correct the record immediately. In other circumstances I do not think it is in accordance with the spirit of our rules to change the record or to seek corrections on motions, or at any time, except where there is a very serious change to be made. And that should be done immediately, not ten days or two weeks later.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

GRANTS UNDER OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM

Question No. 1,449—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. How many grants have been made to date under the Opportunities for Youth Program?

2. What is the name and province of residence of each successful applicant?

3. What amount (a) was requested (b) was granted?

4. What grants are presently under consideration?

5. What is the name and province of residence of the applicants?

6. What amount is being considered and when will the grant be awarded?

7. How is the initial payment to be made to the successful applicant?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): 1. Opportunities for Youth had made approximately 2,304 grants as of May 31st.

2. A report is being prepared for public release containing the names of the successful applicants. Approved projects, by province, have been announced in periodic press releases.

3. At best, the total amount requested was awarded. However, many amounts requested were adjusted in accordance with Opportunities for Youth criteria and the relative funds available. (a) The target was set at $1,000 salary per student, per summer (i.e. for a three month period). (b) Minimum overhead costs were funded where absolutely necessary.

4. It is impossible to retrace the exact number of grants that were under consideration as of May 19th, but by May 31st 2,304 grants had been awarded.

5. See (2).

6. No applicable.

7. Each successful applicant received a contract outlining the terms of agreement under which he would carry out his project. After he had signed the contract and returned it to Opportunities for Youth he received a photocopy of the contract now bearing the signature of the Secretary of State, Under Secretary of State or Assistant Under Secretary of State. The first payment, a percentage of the whole amount, was then forwarded to him either from the Opportunities for Youth office or directly from the M.P. of his riding.

PROJECTS APPROVED UNDER OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM

Question No. 1636—Mr. Coates:

1. How many projects were approved under the Opportunities for Youth Program and what was the total financial commitment of the government to these projects?

2. What was the total number of persons involved in the Opportunities for Youth Programs?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): 1. Under the Opportunities for Youth Program, 2,312 projects were approved. The total financial commitment of the government was $23,117,585.32.

2. The total number of jobs created through the Opportunities for Youth Program was 27,832, apart from a considerably larger but undetermined number of persons involved. The figure indicating the number of participants directly or indirectly affected by the projects will not be available until all final reports have been received from the projects.

CANADA MANPOWER TRAINING PROGRAM

Question No. 1,687—Mr. Rowland:

1. What were the federal expenditures on the Canada Manpower Training Program in each of the fiscal years since 1967-68, together with the estimate for 1971-72, for each of the five regions of Canada?

2. How were these expenditures in each of the five regions distributed among (a) purchase of full-time training from the provinces (b) allowance payments to trainees (c) purchase of part-time training from the provinces (d) administrative costs incurred by provincial and municipal governments (e) apprenticeship-training (f) training-in-industry?

3. What were the total administrative costs in each of the four fiscal years, incurred by the Department of Manpower and Immigration in connection with the Canada Manpower Training Program?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. Federal expenditures on the Canada Manpower Training Program:

1. Federal expenditures on the Canada Manpower Training Program

The figures in any one year may reflect training supplied in another year since payments are based on estimated costs which are then subject to audit and adjustment.

3. Departmental accounts are not structured to reflect the administrative costs because referral of clients to training is only one of the tools used in the ultimate matching of clients to occupations. Therefore, the administrative costs for the Canada Manpower Training Program are very closely interwoven with other administrative costs and any apportionment of costs on an estimated basis to the Canada Manpower Training Program would now have to be done arbitrarily and thus be misleading.

Note (1): Includes Part-time training since separate breakdown not available.

RIDING MOUNTAIN NATIONAL PARK—PURCHASE OF COTTAGES

Question No. 1,703—Mr. Stewart (Marquette):

Have any cottages been purchased by the government at Wasagaming in Riding Mountain National Park and, if so (a) how many (b) what was the total cost of the cottages (c) what will the land be used for?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Yes. (a) two; (b) $16,000; (c) Parking facilities.

GRANTS TO INDIAN STUDENTS

Question No. 1,734—Mr. Godin:

Does the government subsidize the Indian students who are educated outside of their reserve and, if so, what amount is granted in each province to students (a) at the primary level (b) at the secondary level (c) at the college level (d) at the university level?

Mr. Judd Buchanan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Yes. (a) and (b) In most cases, the amount is negotiated by means of joint school agreement with the Province concerned. The amount in dollars paid to, or on behalf of, students may vary owing to regional disparities in the cost of living, the negotiated tuition fees and grade level of the student, the number of books he requires. (c) and (d) At these levels, the students receive training allowances to cover the costs of tuition, books and supplies, board and room, transportation and clothing. The allowance rates are similar to those paid under the Occupational Training for Adults program of the Department of Manpower and Immigration.

PEI—APPLICATIONS FOR LOANS

Question No. 1,757—Mr. McQuaid:

1. For the period January 1, 1971 to August 31, 1971, how many applications were received from the Province of Prince Edward Island for loans under the (a) Farm Loan Board Act (b) Farm Improvement Loans Act (c) Fisheries Improvement Loans Act (d) Small Businesses Loans Act?

2. Of the applications received, how many were approved and what is the amount of the loan in each case?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Farm Credit Corporation and the Department of Finance as follows: 1. (a) Thirty-two applications. (b), (c), and (d) Data is not available concerning the number of applications received by chartered banks and other lenders under these three Acts.

2. (a) Twenty-two approvals in the amount of $542,500 and six applications are under consideration.

NOTE: The Farm Credit Act (SC 1959, c. 43, proclaimed on October 5, 1959) established the Farm Credit Corporation as successor to the Canadian Farm Loan Board established in 1929. The Corporation, which is a Crown agency, reports to Parliament through the Minister of Agriculture.

(b), (c), and (d) The following table shows loans granted in P.E.I. for the period January 1, 1971-July 31, 1971. (Figures for August 1971 are not yet complete).

Act	No.	Amount
Farm Improvement	410	$993,881
Fisheries Improvement	72	$119,219
Small Business	7	$ 43,302

ALBERTA—LAND FORECLOSURES

Question No. 1,778—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. Have any land foreclosures been made in Alberta due to the unsatisfactory discharge of mortgages provided for by the Farm Credit Corporation in the years 1969-70, 1970-71 and April, 1971 to the present time and, if so, how many in each period?

2. How many farmers in Alberta held Farm Credit mortgages as of (a) September 30, 1971 (b) September 30, 1970 (c) September 30, 1969?

3. How much money does this represent in each of the above years?

4. How many farmers are in arrears in Alberta by (a) one year (b) two years (c) three years (d) four years?

5. (a) How many actions for foreclosure have been commenced in Alberta, up to the period ending September 30, 1971 (b) in those actions commenced, have stay of proceedings been granted by the courts and, if so, how many?

6. Has the Farm Credit Corporation undertaken to pay property taxes on farm lands in arrears in Alberta and, if so (a) how many in the years 1969-70, 1970-71, April 1, 1971 to the present date (b) how much money does this represent in each of the years?

7. In the case of foreclosures, how is the land disposed of and what is the total net loss or gain in each case?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): The Farm Credit Corporation advises as follows: 1. 1969-70, 3; 1970-71, 8; 1971-Sept. 30, 9.

2. (a) 15,983; (b) 15,982; (c) 15,702.

3. (a) Sept. 30, 1971, $289,396,944; (b) Sept. 30, 1970, $285,315,625; (c) Sept. 30, 1969, $270,389,221.

4. (a) 1,992, (b) 682, (c) 204, (d) 85.

5. (a) 85 for the period April 1, 1960 to Sept. 30, 1971; (b) Yes, 20.

6. (a) (1969-70) 22; (1970-71) 16; (1971 to Aug. 31/71) 9. (b) (1969-70) $33,200; (1970-71) $20,909; (1971 to Aug. 31/71) $13,461.

7. When land is acquired by foreclosure it is advertised publicly and sold for cash or on terms to the party making the best offer acceptable to the Corporation. Net loss for the period April 1, 1969 to Sept. 30, 1971 was $14,975.03.

SPECIAL EMPLOYMENT OFFICES FOR STUDENTS

Question No. 1,801—Mr. Godin:

1. During the last school holidays, how many special employment offices for students were opened by the Department of Manpower and Immigration (a) in Canada (b) in each province?

2. (a) What was the address of each office opened in the Province of Quebec (b) for what period did these offices provide such services?

[Translation]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. During the 1971 vacation period for students the Department of Manpower and Immigration operated Canada Manpower Centres for Students as follows: (a) in Canada a total of 119; (b) in Nova Scotia, 4; New Brunswick, 4; Prince Edward Island, 1; Newfoundland, 1; Quebec, 43. (N.B.: The Canada Manpower Centre for Students at 239 Queen Street, Ottawa, was set up to serve all students in the Ottawa-Hull area so that, in effect, there were 44 points of service for students in the province of Quebec.) Ontario, 56; Manitoba, 2; Saskatchewan, 2; Alberta, 3; British Columbia 3. (N.B.: The Canada Manpower Centre for Students at 729 West Hastings Street, Vancouver operates year round.)

AID TO INDUSTRIES IN SCIENTIFIC ACTIVITIES

Question No. 1,803—Mr. Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley):

1. Does the Minister of State for Science and Technology intend to encourage industries through aid in research and development and, if so (a) what type of industries will receive aid (b) what criteria will be used to decide which industries will receive aid?

2. Does the Minister intend to involve the Canada Development Corporation in providing practical application to scientific development?

3. To what extent will the Department be involved in aid to new companies who are attempting to make practical application of new technological ideas such as the laser?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of State for Science and Technology): 1. Responsibility for aid to industries continues to be that of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and other concerned departments and agencies. The Minister of State for Science and Technology will assist in the development of policies in that regard.

2. The Canada Development Corporation is an independent Crown Corporation. The Ministry will of course develop close liaison with that agency in relation to the science and technology aspects of its activities.

3. The Ministry will be concerned with government policy in relation to new technological ideas.

PURCHASE OF SCULPTURE CALLED "TRAFFIC"

Question No. 1,822—Mr. Hales:

1. What department approved the purchasing of the sculpture called "Traffic" which is situated in the park beside the National Arts Centre?

[Mr. Lang.]

2. How much was paid for this sculpture?

3. Who was responsible for signing the purchase order for this work?

4. Was this sculpture purchased after it was built or was the Laarrtist commissioned to make a sculpture for the park?

5. What department and vote covered this purchase?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the National Museums of Canada as follows:

1. The National Museums of Canada on behalf of the National Gallery of Canada, which is a component of the National Museums, is the agency which approved the purchase of the sculpture called "Traffic".

2. It has been the long established policy of the National Museums of Canada not to divulge the prices paid for works of art.

3. The Director of the National Gallery of Canada.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

CITIZENSHIP COURTS

Question No. 1,673—Mr. Alexander:

1. What was (a) the total amount (b) the individual amounts per court expended for administration of Citizenship Courts for the years 1965 to 1970 inclusive?

2. How many Citizenship Courts are there and where are they located?

3. How many applications for Canadian Citizenship were received in the years 1965 through 1970 inclusive and how many were ultimately processed and refused in each year?

4. Have any studies been made of Citizenship Courts or related institutions in Commonwealth countries and the United States and, if so, when were they made and which countries were involved?

5. Has a study been made of the efficacy, administration and function of Citizenship Courts and, if so, when was it completed and who made the study?

6. How many applications for Canadian Citizenship were received at the Citizenship Court in Hamilton from 1965 through 1970 inclusive and how many were processed and refused in each year?

Return tabled.

CANADA MANPOWER TRAINING PROGRAM

Question No. 1,688—Mr. Rowland:

1. How many persons commenced training under the Canada Manpower Training Program in each of the five regions of Canada, and in each of the last four fiscal years, in (a) full-time courses under the general purchase agreements (b) part-time courses under the general purchase agreements (c) apprenticeship courses under the apprenticeship agreements (d) training-in-industry?

2. How many of these persons (a) successfully completed their training (b) discontinued their training or were otherwise unsuccessful, in each of the four categories and in each of the four fiscal years?

Return tabled.

CANADA MANPOWER TRAINING PROGRAM—NUMBER OF GRADUATES

Question No. 1,689—Mr. Rowland:

1. Does the Department of Manpower and Immigration have knowledge of the effectiveness of the Canada Manpower Training Program in terms of how many graduates get jobs?

2. How many graduates from the general purchase portion (full-time) of the Canada Manpower Training Program were there in each of the fiscal years 1967-68, 1968-69, 1969-70, 1970-71 in each of the five regions of Canada?

3. How many of these graduates in each of the five regions of Canada and in each of the fiscal years (a) obtained jobs in occupations for which they were trained (b) obtained jobs in occupations related to their training (c) obtained jobs in occupations unrelated to their training?

4. What is the distribution of these graduates in these three categories according to (a) the time-lag between graduation and employment (b) the duration of employment?

5. How many graduates did not obtain jobs within the measured time-lag in each of the four fiscal years and the five regions of Canada?

6. How many graduates who did not obtain jobs re-enrolled in the federal program since its inception in 1967?

7. How many of the trainees under the general purchase agreements (full-time) re-enrolled in the federal program once, twice, three times, four times, five times, six times, more than six times?

Return tabled.

INDUSTRIAL RESEARCH ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Question No. 1,766—Mr. Orlikow:

Since the inception of the Industrial Research Assistance Program (a) how much money has been paid in each year under its provisions (b) what was the amount of each grant (c) to which companies were grants made (d) what evaluation was made of applications for grants (e) who made the evaluation (f) what evaluation was made of the effectiveness of grants (g) who evaluates the effectiveness of grants?

Return tabled.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, on September 29 I placed a starred question on the order paper which read as follows:

What is the authority or basis upon which the government acted in not making certain payments to the Canadian Wheat Board under the terms of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act since August 3, 1970?

In view of the fact that the minister was able to move so promptly in sending out a letter to wheat farmers containing a false statement, I wonder why it has not been possible for the government to answer this straightforward and simple question in the same prompt manner.

Mr. Jerome: I have made a note of it, Mr. Speaker, but I do not know how the hon. member can say that a matter which occupied so much of the time of the House in acrimonious debate can be called simple and uncomplicated.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call motions 140, 246, 252 and 255?

LIST OF BOOKS AND PAMPHLETS PROHIBITED FROM ENTRY INTO CANADA

Motion No. 140—Mr. Orlikow:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the list of books, pamphlets, etc. prohibited from entry into Canada under Item 99201-1 Schedule C of the Customs Tariff Act on the grounds that they were of an immoral or indecent character.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, there is no list of books, pamphlets, etc. which are prohibited from entering into Canada under tariff item 99201-1, Schedule C of the Customs Tariff. As stated in reply to question No. 2044, answered on Monday, October 5, 1970, no separate list of material prohibited under the tariff item is maintained nor does the department issue such a list.

Mr. Speaker: Is the motion dropped?

Mr. Orlikow: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH PRAIRIE PROVINCES CONCERNING EXPECTED INVASION OF BERTHA ARMY WORM

Motion No. 246—Mr. Skoberg:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House a copy of all correspondence entered into between the Department of Agriculture and the Government of each of the three Prairie Provinces, concerning the expected invasion of the Bertha army worm during 1971.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, this motion is not applicable since there was insufficient early evidence to predict the serious problem with the Bertha army worm. While a larger than usual number of moths were observed at a few locations, these observations did not, in the light of current knowledge, warrant forecasting undue difficulties with the Bertha army worm. As soon as the situation developed, communication between officials of the Canada Department of Agriculture, provincial officials and others was conducted by telephone and by personal contact in order to avoid delays.

Mr. Skoberg: In view of the fact that the minister said, in reply to a question in the House, that there had been communication between his department and the provincial ministers, I should like to call for the question on this motion.

Mr. Benson: Haven't you heard of the telephone?

Mr. MacEachen: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

CORRESPONDENCE RELATING TO ESTABLISHMENT OF SECOND NATIONAL PARK IN P.E.I.

Motion No. 252—Mr. McQuaid:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between any federal department and any department or Minister of the Government of Prince Edward Island concerning the establishment of a second National Park in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, this motion is not acceptable as negotiations are still in progress between the federal government and the government of Prince Edward Island regarding the creation of a second national park in that province. All documentation relating to this matter is therefore of a confidential nature. Under these circumstances I would ask the hon. member to withdraw the motion.

Mr. McQuaid: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY FOR THE UNITED STATES

Motion No. 255—Mr. MacDonald (Egmont):

That an humble Address be presented to his Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House a copy of all correspondence between the Minister of Finance and the Secretary of the Treasury for the United States of America between August 1, 1971 and October 15, 1971.

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there is only one document involved. A letter dated September 8, 1971, from the Minister of Finance to the Secretary of the Treasury has been printed as an appendix to the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence for September 16, 1971, of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. The hon. member may wish to withdraw his motion.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I find it incredible that in a matter so important to the economy the parliamentary secretary can say there is no correspondence in addition to the document which is now available. Therefore I should like to have the question put.

Mr. MacEachen: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

Mr. Skoberg: With regard to notices of motions Nos. 70, 75 and 76 of October 8, 1970, and particularly notice of motion No. 75 asking for research studies concerning transportation policy, can the parliamentary secretary say when we may expect replies?

Mr. Jerome: I am not able to do so at the moment but I have made note of the numbers to which the hon. member has referred.

[Mr. Speaker.]

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

AMCHITKA NUCLEAR TEST—SUGGESTED DIRECT CONTACT BY PRIME MINISTER WITH PRESIDENT NIXON—NOTICE OF DECISION PRIOR TO PUBLIC ANNOUNCEMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he is now prepared to initiate direct contact with President Nixon in the hope of securing some reversal of the Amchitka decision? I ask this question particularly in light of the joint communiqué issued yesterday by the government of Canada and the government of the U.S.S.R. on the whole subject of nuclear testing and nuclear explosions.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): On the question of the authority which I might have in speaking to the President, it seems to me I could not be expected to exercise more than the unanimous vote—minus one Conservative—of the House of Commons. Therefore I do not see exactly what the Leader of the Opposition would want me to say to the President except that which he already knows, and knows more strongly, from the House of Commons itself.

I think there is a further question of practicability. I understand that the chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission of the United States, when he made the announcement that the test would proceed, also indicated that operations had begun which would make it impracticable to recover the device. It seems to me that the President's decision having been taken, and the operation having begun, it is really futile to think that further representations in addition to those already made, and which are matters of record, could be put forward successfully immediately the decision had been made known. Further representations would really be in the nature of grandstanding.

Mr. Stanfield: I do not quite understand why the Prime Minister should continue to downgrade the influence that the Prime Minister of Canada might have with the President of the United States, but I should like to ask the right hon. gentleman to tell the House whether his government was made aware of the substance of today's announcement in Washington prior to its public disclosure at the news conference held in the United States by the Atomic Energy Commission?

Mr. Trudeau: As to the first part of the question, it seems to me it is a novel approach by the official opposition to suggest I am downgrading the influence of the office of Prime Minister, but I do take note of that suggestion. As to the substance of the question, perhaps the Secretary of State for External Affairs could report.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The answer to the second part of the question is that about an hour and a half or two hours before the public announcement was made, our ambassador was called in to the state department and informed of the decision of the President.

• (2:40 p.m.)

Mr. Stanfield: Following that indication to the government of Canada, did the Secretary of State for External Affairs communicate with the Prime Minister—I am not asking for the disclosure of any confidence—with a view to making additional representations to the President of the United States in view of the concern expressed in the House and in Canada?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker. It so happened that I was sitting beside the Prime Minister when I received the news from our ambassador in Washington and I immediately communicated, on the basis of our joint agreement, with Secretary Rogers and expressed our deep regrets and the great concern that the people of Canada would have at this decision of the President.

AMCHITKA NUCLEAR TEST—ADVANCE NOTICE OF EXPLOSION—PRECAUTIONS IN CASE OF TIDAL WAVE

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether the Canadian government is expecting to receive any advance notice of the precise time and date of the Amchitka explosion, or will we have the approximately one and a half hours' notice that we have had in the case of the announcement of the decision to proceed?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the announcement that has been made indicates that they are planning for a date around November 3 or 4. I do expect, of course, that the United States government itself will be giving sufficient notice so that ships and others can be out of the way of danger when the explosion takes place.

Mr. Rose: I understand that Governor Eagan of Alaska is considering seeking from the United States government the stationing of ships along the coast as a safety precaution and for rescue purposes. Can the minister tell the House whether Canada has made any similar contingency plans for coastline protection, because all of us will recall the damage that the tidal wave caused the city of Alberni only a few years ago?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I quite understand the purpose of the question. The preparations that the state of Alaska is apparently talking about concern the stationing of ships. I would not have thought that the stationing of ships would prevent a tidal wave.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a supplementary?

Mr. Rose: For purposes of clarification, Mr. Speaker. In the event that tidal waves cause difficulties in coastal cities in Alaska, I understand that the governor is requesting certain naval or marine safety precautions to be taken in case there are problems with flooding and damage caused by tidal waves. What I am asking is precisely whether Canada has considered any similar coastline protection for coastal cities and, if so, what is it?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the specific answer to that question is no, and I doubt very much whether, if there were a tidal wave of this proportion, anything more than warning could be given. This kind of warning has now been given. We hope it does not happen and the danger does seem to be very minimal, but if it does happen I just say "Let us pray".

POWER

PROPOSED JAMES BAY HYDROELECTRIC PROJECT—POSSIBLE USE OF NUCLEAR BLASTING FOR EXCAVATION PURPOSES

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question related to the whole question of nuclear testing and nuclear blasts, and I direct it to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister say whether he is aware of the statement made recently by Robert A. Boyd, commissioner of Hydro-Quebec, reported in the Ottawa Journal on October 23 last, in relation to the planned James Bay power project, that excavation using nuclear explosions is one of the many areas being explored by planners of the project, and what does the government plan to do in light of that statement?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this is not a question that ought to be directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I would suggest it be directed to one of my colleagues who is far more concerned with internal affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member might redirect his question, but my impression is that with this supplementary we may have gotten away somewhat from the original question and I gather there are direct supplementaries that hon. members are seeking to put. Having asked the question the hon. member might be allowed to redirect it, and we will then return to the original subject.

Mr. Simpson: I direct my supplementary to the Minister of the Environment. Is the minister aware of the statement of Mr. Robert A. Boyd to which I have just referred, and has the government taken any action in light of this recent statement?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am not personally aware of this statement. I might add in respect of an earlier question that our scientists and seismologists have indicated that the chance of a tidal wave resulting from the Amchitka blast is extremely remote.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED LETTER TO UNITED STATES SENATORS AND REPRESENTATIVES WHO OPPOSE AMCHITKA NUCLEAR TEST

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Since the American government has not seen fit either to delay the nuclear test at Amchitka or to listen to the representations from the Canadian government, could the Secretary of State for External Affairs tell us whether he or some official from his department intends to send a letter of congratulations to those senators and representatives of the American government who have opposed this test?

UNITED STATES DECISION TO PROCEED WITH AMCHITKA NUCLEAR TEST—DIRECT CONTACT BY PRIME MINISTER WITH PRESIDENT NIXON

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. After the Prime Minister had been informed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs of the formal reply of the United States administration to the Amchitka problem, did the Prime Minister attempt to get in touch with the President of the United States and, if not, why not?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The answer to the question is no, I did not so attempt, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize a few supplementaries on this point but, as hon. members know, when we spend 15 to 20 minutes on the first question, toward the end of the question period a number of our colleagues do not get an opportunity to ask their questions. Yesterday I undertook to try to give an opportunity today to a number of members in the fourth and fifth rows who did not have a chance yesterday.

Mr. Nowlan: The silent majority, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Yes, the silent majority, as the hon. member says. Therefore I would hope that we might try to reduce the amount of time spent on the first two or three questions.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member rising on a supplementary?

Mr. Nowlan: After your admonition, Mr. Speaker, only in relation to the second part of my question, which was "if not, why not" and which, had it been answered, would have obviated the necessity for me again to take the time of the House.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I thought the hon. member would appreciate that I was obviating the necessity to repeat what I had said a moment ago in answer to his leader, namely, that I did not see the utility of doing this and apologizing to the President that even though the House of Commons itself had tried to get a unanimous vote some Conservative was against such a move.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Egmont on a supplementary and then recognize the hon. member for York South on the next subject.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. In view of the lengthy interest that has been taken in this problem for some weeks now and the recorded vote by the members of this House, and bearing in mind the normal contacts that exist between Prime Ministers of this country and Presidents of the United States, can the Prime Minister indicate whether he at any time expressed to the President the tremendous disquiet that exists in this country and the strong feelings registered from time to time in this House regarding the contemplated blast at Amchitka?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I believe I have answered this question before. The answer is no. There has been some communication between the President and myself on other matters, but I repeat that I thought the vote of the House of Commons spoke for itself in this instance.

TRADE

POSSIBLE CANADIAN CONCESSIONS TO HELP UNITED STATES SOLVE BALANCE OF PAYMENTS PROBLEM

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State of External Affairs arising out of his brief broadcast over a United States network in which he said that we—presumably Canada—would like to help the United States get out of its balance of payments difficulties. I should like to ask the minister whether he, or any other member of the government to his knowledge, has indicated to the United States any specific ways in which Canada will try to help the United States with its balance of payments problem?

• (2:50 p.m.)

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the United States knows that we have complied with the requirements laid down by the President. In my broadcast I was indicating—and it seems the point was taken—that it is very difficult to settle the kind of problems now facing the world, economic and financial, if one is faced with ultimatums. In other words, the only way we will be able to deal with these problems is in a spirit of friendship and co-operation. I was indicating that if the United States were to approach us in the spirit and not by saying, "here is a surcharge which will remain on until you do such and such", then I thought we could make greater progress, and I hope that is the attitude the United States will subsequently accept.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, that leads directly to an obvious supplementary. I would ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs or the Minister of Finance, whichever one can inform us, exactly what they would expect to give to the United States in respect of concessions and in what area? The minister said the problem can be solved in friendship and co-operation. I am asking him, as we have asked before, what areas of concessions is the Canadian government contemplating if the United States should be willing to sit down with the Canadian government and negotiate some reduction in the Canadian surplus in the balance of payments with the United States?

Mr. Sharp: Just in a general way, and I know the Minister of Finance would agree with this, we would like to settle the problems in an expanding economy and not in a contracting economy. In other words, we would like to see the trade surplus we now have with the United States reduced by an expansion of trade in which the volume of our imports went up reflecting an expansion of demand in Canada. That is the spirit in which generally we would like this problem to be settled. On the other question of what we could talk about specifically, the United States has not even indicated the subjects they would like to talk about.

POSSIBLE IMPOSITION BY UNITED STATES OF COUNTERVAILING DUTIES BECAUSE OF EMPLOYMENT SUPPORT ACT

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. On October 21 reports from Washington credited an official of the United States government with saying the Canadian government had been informed that countervailing duties would be imposed industry by industry if U.S. companies complained about the assistance given to Canadian industries under the $80 million Employment Support Act. I want to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if such information was conveyed to him either through the Canadian embassy in Washington or through the United States embassy here in Ottawa?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker. It has not been conveyed to the Canadian government at any level.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the Leader of the Opposition and then go to the hon. member for Témiscamingue. We have not yet had the first round of questioning and have been going for 15 minutes.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the reference of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to unilateral actions, positions and this sort of thing, may I ask whether it is in order for the government of Canada to unilaterally decide it can break an agreement with the International Monetary Fund with regard to floating our dollar and then protest about the United States taking some unilateral action?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that the hon. member's supplementary is argumentative and is debate.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—AVAILABILITY OF APPLICATION FORMS

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

He tabled today the local initiatives program. Are these application forms presently available at the various Canada manpower and immigration centres throughout Canada?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, they have been mailed to all manpower offices. Many manpower offices may in fact have the local initiatives program application forms today and all the rest should receive them almost immediately. So far as the municipalities are concerned, the co-ordinators for each province are expected to mail application forms directly to the municipalities within their area and that includes the territories as well.

FINANCE

GOVERNMENT ACTION RESPECTING EXCHANGE LEVEL OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In light of the answer of the minister on Monday that the Department of Finance had acted to support the Canadian dollar in the market over the last week, would the minister now tell us whether he can assure the United States authorities that the Canadian dollar is freely floating and therefore not running afoul or counter to the United States conditions for the application of the surcharge?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Well, Mr. Speaker, that was not the answer I gave.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, the minister did indicate that there had been government action to affect the value of the Canadian dollar and keep it below par with the United States dollar. If this is not action by the government, what is?

Mr. Benson: I said nothing of the kind, Mr. Speaker.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INQUIRY AS TO ANNOUNCEMENT OF STEPS TO STRENGTHEN

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. When may the House expect the government to announce—and I shall quote the minister's words—the "dramatic new moves" to strengthen the Canadian economy as mentioned by the MInister of Industry, Trade and Commerce in a speech to an audience at Montebello, Quebec, on October 18 in which he said the government is planning such moves at the present time?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is a question of dates here. Perhaps the minister had drafted his speech before the Minister of Finance made his announcement in the House.

Mr. Hees: No, Mr. Speaker. The speech was made five days after the minister's speech—four days after—and did not refer to that speech. Therefore I shall pose a supplementary question because the Prime Minister is not aware of these moves. They obviously are not dramatic.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: I would ask the Prime Minister whether the government has not been convinced by the latest Gallup poll that mere brave words are not impressing the Canadian people and that positive action along these lines is long overdue?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REASON FOR AVERAGE WEEKLY WAGE CEILING OF $100

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration arising out of the statement he tabled today. In view of the fact that many, if not most, persons involved in the local initiatives program will have been relatively well paid industrial workers prior to being laid off, could the minister explain why a $100 weekly average wage celing has been established as one of the qualifying conditions for the program? I ask this question because the other part of the program, the manpower retraining aspect, has no such ceiling.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there are a whole variety of programs which may be more or less available for different groups of people. This is an average rather than a ceiling. It is the average upon which the limiting of the grant for employment under the program will be made. It does not limit additional amounts being put in by an organization in the right case. The objective, of course, is to do some preliminary sorting, in effect, among the many applications we expect and to indicate preference for support of a maximum number of programs putting the maximum number of unemployed people to work.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Calgary North.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has recognized the hon. member for Calgary North. I bring to the attention of hon. members that I am trying—and I can only do this with the co-operation of hon. members—to move on because we are running short of time. This is why I am trying to reduce, if possible, the number of supplementaries.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid you did not hear me. I am rising on a question of privilege with regard to the answer the Minister of Finance gave me a few moments ago. I went back to the record and I find that at page 8986 the minister indicated that the government did take action. The minister says he did not say that on Monday. The minister may have forgotten, but I do not want him innocently to mislead the House. The position must be made clear.

• (3:00 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows very well that a member cannot raise, by way of a question of privilege, a debate as to what has or has not been said. I do not want to be unfair to the hon. member if he thinks that the point should be made, but I suggest to him and to all hon. members that it is not very useful, by way of a question of privilege, to try to determine what has been said and what has not been said previously. But having said that, if the hon. member feels that he has a case and would like to pursue the matter by way of a question of privilege it is my duty to hear him.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I am a little puzzled by the interpretation. I would like direction from Your Honour.

Mr. Speaker: The direction I would give the hon. member is that he should try to state the question of privilege as briefly as possible and, as I said, I would have to hear him and I will hear him.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): My question of privilege concerns the answer given me by the minister in which he said that he had not said something, yet the record shows clearly what he did say, which was my interpretation of it. Surely the House is being misled and I am being misled. If that is not a question of privilege, may I respectfully point out that there must be some way of correcting it at this time.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has made a correction, but I have to rule that it is not a question of privilege. There are many precedents, which are well known to the hon. member, in support of my contention. In any event, the hon. member has made his point. The Chair will now recognize the hon. member for Calgary North.

[Later:]

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The answer which I gave on October 25, 1971, appears at page 8986 of Hansard. Perhaps the answer did mislead the hon. member for Edmonton West. It should have read, first of all—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Edmonton West, the Minister of Finance and all hon. members will see where this kind of question of privilege can lead us. If hon. members take five minutes of the question period to say that what the minister said is not what he said, and the minister replies that what he said was what he thinks he said, we might go on for a long time. I do not think it is a question of privilege on the part of the hon. member for Edmonton West or on the part of the Minister of Finance.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VISITS BY FOREIGN HEADS OF STATE—ARRANGEMENTS TO PROTECT RIGHTS OF PEACEFUL DEMONSTRATORS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It deals with the security of visitors to Canada, particularly in view of the imminent visit to Canada of President Tito. I put this question to the Prime Minister in all seriousness. In light of the fact that the federal government is the guarantor and ensurer of security of all foreign visitors, prime ministers and heads of state, as was the case with the recent visit of Premier Kosygin, what liaison, what instructions and what plans were worked out between this government, as part of its responsibility, the city of Toronto and other cities in Canada to safeguard and protect the civil rights of peaceful demonstrators and observers, particularly in the city of Toronto? I ask the question because this matter is the responsibility of the federal government.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hope the minister will reply briefly because this appears to be a very general question. It seems to me that it calls for an answer which should normally be made on motions. If the Prime Minister can reply briefly, the Chair will recognize him.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can be very brief because I do not know the details of the arrangements which were worked out. I do know, of course, that there was contact. I can discuss the matter with the Solicitor General to see if there is anything further on which we can report to the House. But certainly the point of view of peaceful demonstration was foremost in everyone's mind, and wherever we were able to allow demonstrations to take place we certainly did not intervene. But we also had to be wary of what the Leader of the Opposition himself, on Monday of last week, termed the dangers of a breakdown in security and we tried to keep a neat balance between the two.

Mr. Woolliams: May I ask a short supplementary question. In light of the alleged brutality which took place by the Toronto police with reference to children and women, and the responsibility of the federal government in this respect—and I appreciate the Prime Minister's answer today—would he be prepared to make a statement at some future time informing the House who pays the city of Toronto and other cities for the security which they undertake?

[Later:]

Mr. Woolliams: In light of the fact that an interruption occurred when the Prime Minister was about to answer, may I put this question seriously to him. May I say, first of all, that I appreciate his courteous answer. Would he at some future time make a statement in the House on this matter and advise us what levels of government paid for the security for Premier Kosygin and will pay for the security of other dignitaries who may visit Canada at the request of this government?

Mr. Trudeau: As I said in my previous answer, I will certainly discuss this series of questions with the Solicitor General. It would seem to me that this is the kind of question which usually appears on the order paper. The hon. member might want to consider asking the questions in an orderly form on the order paper and we will give an answer in due course.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member might be allowed to ask a further supplementary question, but I have been trying for almost 40 minutes to invite hon. members to proceed a little more quickly in the question period because we are running short of time.

Mr. Woolliams: I appreciate that, Mr. Speaker. Before I put the question may I say that I think security is an important matter and questions concerning it should not be placed on the order paper. This is an important matter because women and children have been run over by police officers, as alleged in the newspapers. I ask the Prime Minister again, in light of the responsibility of the federal government would he check into this important matter with the Solicitor General and make a statement in the House?

Mr. Trudeau: I said in my answer that I would check into the matter. I did not undertake to make a statement in the House. I do not agree with the hon. member that if a matter is important it should not appear on the order paper.

CRIMINAL CODE

INQUIRY AS TO DEBATE ON ABORTION

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the fact that last year 1,649 Canadian women went to the state of New York to have abortions performed, will the government now—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. MacInnis: As usual, Mr. Speaker, we get the snickers. Will the government now consider honouring its promise of a year ago in the Speech from the Throne and set a date in this session for a debate on the abortion legislation in this country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have answered this question before. I can only repeat the answer in like terms, that in the Speech from the Throne a year ago last month or this month we said we wanted to deal with many things in this session which was supposed to finish at the end of June. We are now several months beyond that date. Since I cannot guarantee the way in which the House will meet all the problems that have been put before it, I cannot guarantee that we will have time to deal with this particular matter before the end of this session. It really depends on when the session ends and on how fast we deal with matters. I do admit that we made the commitment in the Speech from the Throne to deal with this and several other matters which have not yet come before the House, and if we do not deal with them it is because the opposition has not given us the time.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: It is because you do not arrange your program.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I point out to the Prime Minister that we are running short of time not only during the session but during the question period.

Mrs. MacInnis: Am I to infer from the Prime Minister's priorities that he is now resigned to a continental policy on abortion?

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

SUGGESTION THAT RESPONSIBLE MINISTER MAKE REPRESENTATIONS CONCERNING PRERETIREMENT OF PERSONNEL AND REHIRING PROGRAM

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In light of the information provided by the Minister of Supply and Services yesterday that on behalf of the government he had interfered directly in the management of a Crown corporation, Polymer, and as a result notices of termination of employment with that corporation had been cancelled, thus establishing a precedent, I ask the minister whether he would prevail upon the senior officials of the Cape Breton Development Corporation to cease their preretirement of personnel and also commence a rehiring program in the coal mines of Cape Breton where the unemployment rate is in the vicinity of 25 per cent?

• (3:10 p.m.)

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I think that Devco management have acted in accordance with the act adopted by this House and, as we all know, we spend millions of dollars a year trying to maintain employment in the coal mines despite the fact that the House had agreed that the size of labour force in general should be reduced.

[English]

Mr. Muir: May I ask the minister whether it is the intention of the government and the corporation to continue to phase down the coal mines and put people on the streets but not provide any other type of industry and employment for them as the legislation stated was to be done?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, to my mind, considerable effort has been made to find alternative solutions. Devco now has a new management; I have reason to hope it may find formulas or solutions the other did not, but I feel the hon. member is right. We were to find alternative activities and still hope to be able to do so.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

CHECKING OF GRANTS—REASON FOR GRANT TO STEP LITE MANUFACTURING LIMITED

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Could he assure the House that his department checks closely the grants that are given to companies to establish in designated or depressed areas?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Hales: Could the minister advise the House and the taxpayers of Canada why his department gave a grant of $216,000 to a company whose principal was heavily in debt in the area which he left, who owes the income tax department money, who owes Ontario Hydro, who owes land taxes, who owes rent—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: He must be a Liberal.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I ask for an explanation from the minister.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is hardly a point of order.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I have asked the minister a straightforward question on behalf of the taxpayers of this country—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hales: —and I want to know why $216,000 was given to this firm.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Which firm?

Mr. Hales: I shall take it from a communiqué tabled today. The firm is Step Lite Manufacturing Limited which is going to locate in Renfew, Ontario. The principal of that firm is heavily in debt to the income tax department, Ontario Hydro and many other people. Why was that money given?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, the news release did not indicate that we had granted any money. Of course, we promised a subsidy, provided all the other conditions were—

[English]

An hon. Member: There is a difference.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Don't laugh; this is the way it proceeds. It has been proceeding this way all the time. I will inquire into the case and give the hon. member a more detailed answer tomorrow.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker, the communiqué states that this company would receive—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): "Would."

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Winnipeg North.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT FORECAST FOR MONTREAL—SOURCE OF MINISTER'S INFORMATION

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In light of the statement by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion in Montreal on Monday that that city would have more unemployed this coming winter than all the maritime provinces, could the minister check with his colleague and get the source of that estimate and also find out whether there are any estimates for the rest of the country?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have the impression that this question was asked yesterday or the day before by the hon. member for Sainte-Marie.

[Translation]

The hon. member could ask another question since I ruled out the first one. The hon. member may ask his question now.

QUEBEC—GOVERNMENT FORECAST AS TO UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, since the question just asked by the hon. member was put yesterday while the minister was not here, would the latter be now in a position to answer, in order that we may know if the government had any extrapolations to the effect that unemployment would reach 12 per cent in Quebec next winter?

Since the minister was not here yesterday, the Prime Minister undertook to see that someone would answer in his place. Can the minister do it know?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure, because I was not in the House yesterday, to what figures the hon. member is referring.

[Translation]

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Yesterday the Prime Minister told the House that he would refer this matter to the minister of manpower and pointed out that it had to do with the statement made in Montreal the day before by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. I think the minister should be aware of his colleague's statement and reply to that question.

FISHERIES

INCLUSION OF CONSERVATION OF OFFSHORE RESOURCES IN NEGOTIATIONS WITH SOVIET UNION ON NEW TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Fisheries. In light of the recent failure to reach an understanding with the U.S.S.R. on the conservation of offshore fisheries, is it the intention of the government to propose that a fisheries agreement be made part of the pending negotiations over a new economic agreement with the U.S.S.R. and, if so, when may we expect details of such an important agreement to be made public?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Ask George Hees.

Mr. Hees: I know more about it than your boys do.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, we have not failed to reach an understanding with the U.S.S.R. We have made various submissions. We hope we will be able to carry our points and get the U.S.S.R. to agree to our proposals. It would have been a help, however, if members opposite had been present to make representations at the external affairs committee when the Premier of the U.S.S.R. was here and attended the meeting.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crouse: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, as the member for South Shore I was present when Mr. Kosygin visited Canada and met with the minister and members of the external affairs committee.

Mr. Davis: Why didn't you speak up?

Mr. Crouse: Why didn't I speak up, the minister asks. The reason I did not speak up was that the whole meeting was entirely controlled by the Liberal chairman.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think we should pursue this matter.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, I request the right to finish that statement.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a question of privilege?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: May we have order, please. The hon. member should resume his seat, and also the hon. member for St. Paul's. We have reached the end of the question period; in fact, we did so a few moments ago. Again I must apologize to the many hon. members who after a fruitless day yesterday had the same experience today. I will try to do my best for them tomorrow, but now we have questions of privilege which should be heard.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, the entire proceedings in the external affairs committee were under the direction of the chairman of that committee. Members of the committee were only permitted to ask questions in order of rote; there was no opportunity for other Members of Parliament in attendance to ask questions. As a matter of fact, at twelve o'clock sharp the chairman of the committee informed all present that the period for asking questions was now terminated, and this robbed me and other members who were in attendance of the opportunity of asking questions with regard to negotiations. Frankly, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Fisheries has a responsibility to look out for the interests of Canadian fishermen and he did not carry out his responsibility.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (3:20 p.m.)

Mr. Wahn: On the question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, it is untrue to state that the proceedings at that committee meeting were controlled by me.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: Were they under control?

Mr. Wahn: The procedure at that meeting was agreed upon by the steering subcommittee of the external affairs committee and confirmed at a meeting of the external affairs committee. The number of members from each party to be called upon was agreed upon at both those meetings and it was not imposed by me. In point of fact, a number of members of the opposition parties were called upon in accordance with the decision made not by the Liberal chairman but by the steering subcommittee representative of all parties and the external affairs committee itself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: Untrue.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Greenwood rising on a point of order?

Mr. Brewin: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I just want to say that the hon. member for St. Paul's is absolutely correct.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member for Spadina kindly resume his seat? The question of privilege raised by the hon. member for South Shore contained an allusion to the hon. member for St. Paul's who, in fairness, was allowed to make his statement. However, I do not think that hon. members really want to pursue this discussion all afternoon. It seems to me it is rather pointless. Hon. members have made their points and I invite them now to return to the work of the House.

Mr. Ryan: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Spadina rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Ryan: This is on the same point of order, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Crouse.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member for Spadina wants to rise on a question of privilege or a point of order I will hear him, of course. But I suggest to him as I have to all hon. members, that there is not much to be gained by pursuing the matter.

Mr. Ryan: I will make it a question of privilege, then. I was present at the meeting. It lasted two hours, from ten o'clock to twelve o'clock, and it took Mr. Kosygin half an hour to answer the first question. It appeared to be a planted question, and nobody from then on—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Battle River.

Mr. Downey: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Downey: Yes, Mr. Speaker. It arises out of the matter I brought forward under Standing Order 43 earlier this afternoon. I am sorry that the minister in charge of the Wheat Board has left the chamber. I refer to the letter that went out from the minister's office to prairie grain producers shortly after the producers received their payments under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. My question of privilege is, was this blatant attempt to influence public opinion paid for out of public funds—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It may be a question but that does not make it a question of privilege. I had hoped during the question period to recognize the hon. member because he had raised a matter under Standing Order 43. Rightly or wrongly, in such circumstances I always try to give an hon. member the opportunity to ask a question and I fully intended to recognize the hon. member for Battle River. The question might be raised tomorrow, but I doubt if it can be raised now by way of question of privilege. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed, from Tuesday, October 26, consideration in committee of Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act—Mr. Benson—Mr. Honey in the chair.

On clause 1—section 109: Deductions permitted by individuals.

The Chairman: When the committee rose last evening section 109 was before the committee. Section 110 has been grouped with section 109 for the purpose of debate.

Shall section 109 as amended carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Chairman, we are still dealing with section 109 of Bill C-259. It is an extremely important section since its passage will change the tax schedule for millions of Canadians.

Mr. Chairman, before coming to the heart of my remarks on income tax, I should like to define the various economic systems in order to make it clear where the tax proposal of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) is leading us.

I have here several definitions of socialism, communism, fascism, economic liberalism, the bureaucratic liberalism that we know, and capitalism, and I think that in this list of definitions, the Minister of Finance will recognize himself quite well.

Socialism means that if you have two cows, the government takes one away from you and gives it to your neighbour.

Under communism, if a citizen has two cows, the government takes them away from him and gives him back milk through a dropper.

Fascism means that if a citizen has two cows, the government takes them away and sells the milk to the people.

Nazism means that if a citizen has two cows, the government takes them away and shoots the man.

Democratic economic liberalism—and here, I believe that the Minister of Finance should listen—means that if a citizen has two cows, the government takes them away, kills one, milks the other and throws the milk away.

An hon. Member: Enough of that bull.

Mr. Rondeau: Capitalism means that if a citizen has two cows, he sells one and buys a bull.

Mr. Chairman, yesterday I had an opportunity as well as a good number of my colleagues, to hear most of the speeches made here.

In my opinion, the Minister of Finance has shown sheer arrogance during the debates by not even listening to the suggestions made by all hon. members who took the floor. I only witnessed this response from the minister: he kept the lower part of his body firmly in contact with his seat and looked very confident. He was thinking: Say whatever you want, suggest anything you want, I do not care, I will not change anything in this bill since I have with me a sufficient majority of members who have more wool on their backs than they have guts for reacting, for speaking their minds and state what their constituents want and would like their representatives to say in the House.

Before dealing with the clause itself I would say that I was shocked, two years ago, following questions asked by my hon. colleague from Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) regarding privileges granted to Canadian companies in the last ten years, to learn that Canadian companies had been exempted since 1958. Those figures, Mr. Chairman, are astronomical because they show that an amount in excess of $2 billion that the federal government had the right to collect was not collected from those companies. Instead of seeking to collect the taxes due by those companies the government in 1971 thinks it must seek revenge or impose new taxes on the Canadian taxpayers.

Bell Canada was exempted from the sales tax during ten years for an amount of $79,916,000; Northern Electric, $13,545,781; Distillers Corp. (Seagram), $23,613,000; Canadian Business, $10,463,000; George Weston, $23,078,000; Steel Co. of Canada, $149,736,000; Dominion Foundries, $101,617,000; Algoma Steel, $68,442,000; Ford Motors, $11,249,706; Chrysler Corporation, $69,340,398; Alcan, $149,774,404; Aluminum of Canada, $139,405,412;—

• (3:30 p.m.)

[English]

The Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member. I have listened to him with interest. I wish to address my remarks to all members of the committee. I am not here to beat hon. members over the head about the rule of relevancy, however, if we are to give orderly consideration to the bill I must impress upon all hon. members that we must be concerned about that rule. We are now dealing with sections 109 and 110 of Clause 1 of the bill. I have tried to find some link of relevancy between the hon. member's remarks and the contents of sections 109 and 110, but I cannot. Perhaps I am in error. If I am, no doubt the hon. member for Shefford will point out to me where I err.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: I thank you for your comments, Mr. Chairman, but I must say that it is not my fault that the list of corporations which have been exempted from federal tax is that long and that a new tax legislation is now deemed necessary in Canada. It is perhaps that we have been unable to collect the federal sales tax owed by these corporations.

International Nickel Company of Canada Limited was exempted to the tune of $102,100,000; Cominco Ltd., $21,258,000, not to mention others. The total owed by six corporations, Mr. Chairman, adds up to $642,632,000. A sum total of approximately $2 billion was not been collected by the federal government.

I would like, with the help of information supplied by accountants and economists, to draw a comparison between the Canadian personal income tax and that same tax in the United States. I do not draw this comparison with underdeveloped countries, but with our neighbours who have almost the same resources as Canada, to show the difference between the Canadian personal income tax and the same tax in the United States.

Before giving figures, I would refer to a speech made on January 30, 1970 by Mr. R. M. Fowler, president of the Canadian Association of Pulp and Paper Manufacturers, on the occasion of its annual luncheon meeting. He said:

During the last few years, the tax rate levied on Canadian companies has been allowed to exceed by 10 percentage points that applied to our American competitors.

I also have here the brief submitted to the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce by the representatives of the Canadian Manufacturers Association who, after a comparison between the Canadian and the American tax, had this to say:

[English]

The increasing disparity between the United States and Canadian tax rates offers cogent reason for such action not only because the U.S. rates are the best available measure of the reasonableness of those in Canada, but also because the extent of the disparity may well be decisive in the minds of able, highly-trained, mobile personnel seeking to exercise their talents in a more hospitable economic climate. The white paper acknowledges the importance of retaining Canadians with outstanding ability but of equal importance is that we continue to attract immigrants of the kind that can make a contribution to Canadian economic and cultural progress. The proposed tax increases on taxpayers earning more than $9,000 is a move in the wrong direction for they neither encourage desirable immigrants nor the retention of Canadians which the country cannot afford to lose.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, the figures that I will quote were taken from the U.N. Yearbook of National Account Statistics.

[English]

The U.N. Yearbook of National Account Statistics indicates that Canadian per capita income in 1967 was 37 per cent below that of the United States in the same year.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, even if the per capita income in Canada is 37 per cent lower than in the United States, our personal income tax, according to the figures I shall quote, is double that which the Americans have to pay.

I would like to refer to studies made by a firm of chartered accountants, Price Waterhouse & Company. Here is what those tax experts had to say about the Canadian and the American income taxes.

[English]

Canadian taxpayers have long suspected that they pay more in personal income taxes than taxpayers in the United States at similar income levels . . . few Canadians realize just how large the difference is between the effective rates of Canadian and United States personal income taxes on employment and professional income . . . But some valid comparisons . . . show that . . . middle-income bracket Canadians may well be paying up to twice as much personal income tax as their counterparts in the United States at the same income level.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, if, apart from the fact that the Canadian per capita income is 37 per cent below that of the United States, Canadians must in many cases pay twice as much tax as Americans, it is not surprising that a lot of Canadians want to emigrate to a country where taxes are twice as low as in Canada.

That is why the chartered accountants who made a tax research had this to say:

[English]

A materially unfavourable comparison might be a factor both in inducing talented Canadians to leave Canada, taking with them their abilities and their capital, and conversely, in inhibiting the immigration of skilled newcomers from other countries into Canada. The United States is the logical country with which to make such a tax comparison, because of its proximity to Canada, its similar standard of living, and the frequent movement of its residents to and from Canada.

• (3:40 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, I have here figures taken from page 274 of the 1970-71 Canada Yearbook. They show that in the last five years, 226,465 skilled Canadians with degrees have left Canada to go and live south of the border because they had to pay twice as much income tax as people in the United States.

[Mr. Rondeau.]

Now I would like to give comparisons between underprivileged people in Canada and in the United States. I am still referring to the study I mentioned earlier, because if I quoted figures computed by Créditistes, you might not believe me. Here, then is what the experts say:

[English]

—we have concluded that in many cases skilled Canadian personnel would find themselves paying anywhere between 50 per cent to 100 per cent more personal income taxes because they live in Canada rather than in the United States. If the comparison is between two taxpayers at similar levels who own their homes, the Canadian counterpart may quite likely incur double the personal income tax burden of the United States taxpayer—

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, here are the figures: the difference between a Canadian living in Ontario and an American living in the state of Ohio is that, if the Canadian is earning $8,000 in Canada or in the United States, he must pay $1,044 in income tax to Canada while he would have to pay only $416 in the United States, a difference of $628. This means that income tax in the United States if 60.15 per cent less than in Canada. The Canadian levy on an income of $12,000 amounts to $2,327, while it would be $1,007 in the state of Ohio, which means that the $12,000 man in the United States is better off by $1,320 than his Canadian counterpart, a difference of 56.73 per cent. Or an income of $15,000 the United States tax is $1,884 less than in Ontario. On an income of $25,000, the tax is $3,946 less in the United States; on an income of $50,000, it is $7,995 less, a difference of 40.73 per cent.

Judging by the conclusions of the study:

[English]

The United States home owner has an additional advantage over his counterpart in Canada in the same income bracket, because the United States taxpayer is permitted to deduct his home mortgage interest and property tax payments in computing his taxable income for United States tax purposes.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, in the United States both interest and taxes on property are deductible. I am not saying that the American taxation system is tops, that it cannot be improved, but I use this as an example to show the Minister of Finance that there is room for improvement in Bill C-259.

I will make a comparison between the taxpayer in Ontario and his counterpart in the state of New York: on an $8,000 income in Ontario, the annual rate is $1,044, while in the state of New York the levy is $473, a difference of $561 per year or 54.69 per cent. On $15,000 it is $1,598 less and, on a $50,000 income, the difference is $5,683.

Mr. Chairman, to speak only of mere tenants, in Canada as in the United States, who do not benefit from deduction of interests for real estate taxes, an income of $8,000 in Canada involves payment of $1,044 in taxes, whereas in the state of Ohio it would be only $500, or $544 less. Taxes on an income of $8,000 are $1,044 in Ontario and $569 in the state of New York, or a difference of $475, in terms of percentage, 45.5.

To summarize the difference between personal income tax in Canada and in the United States it can be said that on an income of $8,000, American or Canadian, a citizen pays 29.55 per cent less in taxes in the United States than in Canada. On an income of $12,000, he pays 28.88 per cent less in the United States than in Canada. On an income of $15,000, he would pay 27.7 per cent less in taxes in the United States. On an income of $25,000 American taxes are 23.28 per cent less than in Canada.

Then the Minister of Finance will not find a solution? In fact, he thinks that there is no room for improvements in his bill—

[English]

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Montreal-Bourassa is rising on a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Trudel: Would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Rondeau: Yes.

[English]

The Chairman: The hon. member knows he may ask a question with the consent of the hon. member who has the floor. I take it there is such consent.

[Translation]

Mr. Trudel: Mr. Chairman, I carefully listened to the hon. member and his party leader. Since he does not trust any economist, I would ask him to kindly tell us where he gets his statistics, because I believe that in all the tables he mentioned, there are certainly some figures that are inconsistent.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Chairman, it is with great pleasure that I shall give to the hon. member the figures he is asking for, but I don't understand how he can ignore them, because they have been sent to him as well as to me. This proves that he is more or less informed, and that all he is waiting for is to vote for the bill, the effects of which he cannot measure.

Mr. Chairman, in answer to my hon. friend, I say that these surveys were made by Price, Waterhouse & Company, a firm of chartered accountants he must have heard of, because it is very well known. These accountants based these figures on the findings contained in the UN Yearbook of National Account Statistics.

[English]

The U.N. Yearbook of National Account Statistics indicates that Canadian per capita income in 1967 was 37 per cent below that of the United States in the same year.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, I thank you for having given me the opportunity to answer my hon. colleague, and I hope that with those references, he will take at least a few minutes to consider the recommendations of that responsible firm of accountants which gives extremely interesting figures.

Before resuming my seat, Mr. Chairman, I am quite pleased to put an amendment for the information of my colleagues. I therefore move:

That the tax rate applicable—

Mr. Trudel: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege.

I wish to point out to the hon. member that I examined the figures he quoted before he put his amendment. We now know where he took his figures! He should at least speak his mind, be honest with himself and quote the entire report, which would surely alter his statement.

Mr. Rondeau: Really, I did not quite get his question, or rather I did not understand it at all. So, as I am not in the habit of talking through my hat, I will let the matter drop. Here is my amendment:

That the tax rate applicable to personal income in clause 109 of Bill C-259 be reduced by such a percentage as to bring the basic exemption to $3,000 for single persons and $5,000 for married persons.

• (3:50 p.m.)

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Shefford has read the amendment which he filed with the table. I shall not take the time of the committee by inviting argument on the question of procedural acceptability of the amendment. It seems to the Chair, with great respect, that the amendment is clearly out of order on two counts. First, it is contrary to rulings already made in committee during this debate by the Deputy Chairman and by myself—rulings made with respect to other amendments of a similar type. In the second place, the amendment is drafted in general terms: it is the statement of a proposition; it is not drawn so as to amend a particular portion of the section. Having said this, I shall not deprive hon. members of an opportunity of making submissions if they wish to do so, though I am quite satisfied I cannot accept the amendment.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, will you let us comment on the acceptability of the amendment, or is your decision final?

An hon. Member: It is final.

[English]

The Chairman: The Chair has to be frank and say it really cannot be persuaded that the amendment is in order. I have made a ruling on similar amendments, as has the Deputy Chairman, and these rulings to my mind are binding. Then, as I have indicated, even if there were no other reasons for rejecting the amendment it is out of order because it is a statement of a general proposition, and on this ground alone it cannot be accepted.

Mr. Haidasz: Mr. Chairman, in rising to take part in the committee stage discussion of Bill C-259, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, I would like to make a few pertinent points in connection with medical expenses which may be deducted from personal income as set out in section 110(c)(iii) to (xv).

The federal government's proposals in this section, as in many others, will alleviate the tax burdens of more than 1.75 million Canadian taxpayers. This is most commendable. Another aim of a tax reform bill is to plug loopholes and eliminate ambiguities and unfairness in our tax legislation. Many complaints and representations from constituents involve tax decisions made by officials of internal revenue who base their decisions on tax legislation. It appears that tax legislation is often ambiguous, unclear, incomplete or unfair in particular circumstances. We could eliminate much of this difficulty if we were to legislate tax reforms that are clear. I believe some of the points in the section to which I have referred deserve further clarification.

In addressing myself to the subject of medical expenses I should like to draw to the attention of the Minister of Finance the fact that many people in our country are still being treated unfairly. There still exists in Canada discrimination against people who reside in provinces such as Ontario and Alberta, as well as in other places, where provincial governments have determined that they will make no contribution, or only a minimal contribution, to the medical premium which is payable by the citizens in those provinces even though the federal government pays 50 per cent of all hospital and medical costs.

Some people work for employers who under a collective agreement or voluntarily pay for part of their medical care premium. Such contributions made by employers are then added to employees' incomes. Again, any payments which workers make themselves for medical coverage are in no way deductible for income tax purposes. These taxpayers are treated unfairly, and I hope the Minister of Finance will give serious consideration to rectifying this unjust situation.

The second point I wish to raise today concerns the necessity of bringing relief through tax reform to taxpayers who are burdened with heavy medical expenses in respect of special treatment either for themselves or for their dependants. I refer particularly to those with dependants suffering from perceptual or learning disabilities and those who are afflicted by paralytic diseases.

Included in the expenses they have to bear is the cost of transportation which in many cases is enormous, especially where treatment or care is not available in Canada. What is unjust is the attitude of provincial medical or hospital agencies which refuse to recognize such expenses as insured items. I therefore ask the Minister of Finance to provide that transportation expenses, whether incurred inside Canada or outside Canada, be allowed as deductible items when they are associated with an illness under the care of a physician or by referral.

The other representation I wish to make concerns medical expenses incurred in rehabilitation centres or nursing homes and services rendered by paramedical personnel. I believe such expenses and services should also be tax deductible. Canada's national health cost would be greatly reduced if these services could be rendered at home or outside a hospital specially equipped for the treatment of acute cases. In Toronto, for example, occupancy of a bed available for the treatment of acute cases costs between $50 and $99 per day. This is a great expense, not only to the province but to the federal government. If we could encourage people to seek treatment in rehabilitation centres, nursing homes and similar places I believe our national health costs would diminish.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take a few minutes of the time of the committee to ask a question for the purpose of clarification. Last evening a discussion was initiated by the hon. member for Kent-Essex with respect to section 110(1)(c)(xii), which reads as follows:

—for any device or equipment, not described in any other sub-paragraph of this paragraph, or a prescribed kind, for use by the taxpayer, his spouse or any such dependant as prescribed by such a medical practitioner—

[Mr. Haidasz.]

I take that section to mean that if a medical practitioner prescribes the use of a special device or equipment in connection with a severe disability or illness, automatically it is deductible for income tax purposes. The reason I raise this point for clarification is that, as reported at page 9068 of Hansard for yesterday, the minister said during the debate:

Certain things are prescribed in the act and the Minister of National Revenue is given certain latitude in determining those things which may be additionally prescribed. I should not like to prejudge decisions which will be made in this regard.

The Chairman: Order, please. The minister is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I can clarify the situation for my hon. friend. What the act provides is that certain items are to be prescribed by the Minister of National Revenue. If such items are then prescribed by a doctor for individual patients, then they will be deductible. However, they must be allowed for in the legislation. Doctors are not given free rein to prescribe anything and everything, which is then deductible. If over a period of time different devices are required for the treatment of certain patients, previously we would have had to change the law each time. What we are now providing is that the Minister of National Revenue will be able, following submissions to be made, to prescribe the items that are deductible, and this will be done by Order in Council.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, that does clarify the point I wished to make. May I make one further point with which I am sure the minister will agree; indeed, it has already been emphasized by the hon. member for Parkdale. One of the most crippling financial burdens is chronic illness or severe disability. I hope that the situation under the old act, where it was almost impossible to get the government, the department or Minister of Finance to be flexible in these matters, is not going to be repeated in the new act. This is why I want it expressed in quite specific terms at this time that if a medical practitioner does prescribe, in accordance with the provision to which I have just referred, a device or piece of equipment which is not in the allowable list at that particular time, there will be reasonable flexibility in making this device available.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, there will be a great deal more flexibility. The Minister of National Revenue will recommend to the Governor in Council that specific items be put in without his having to come back to the House and introduce tax legislation, which normally is only done four or five times a year when we have budgets.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, yesterday evening I spoke on sections 109 and 110 grouped together for discussion purposes, and my colleagues introduced on several occasions many amendments which were ruled out of order and which were intended to increase basic exemptions.

Our arguments have to be replaced in their context if we are to be clearly understood.

We maintain that the basic exemptions provided, offered or suggested by the government are inadequate to allow thousands, perhaps even millions of Canadians to rise above the threshold of poverty, to have a decent or a minimum standard of living.

We maintain that the proposed exemptions are not only inadequate to allow those persons to be more independent from the public sector, but that they will contribute to increase the poverty of these people, their dependency on public assistance and, consequently, the tax burden because the government will have to tax people more in order to make these social welfare payments.

This is why we insist and repeatedly urge the government to increase the basic exemptions to $3,000 for a single person and $5,000 for married couples.

One must know how to be practical. A $3,000 basic exemption for a single person means that if that person has an income of $3,000 or less, he will have no income tax to pay.

I know one person in Victoriaville, which is my municipality, who has very skilled hands and makes all kinds of small objects he sells at moderate prices to people of the city. His profit ranges from $2,000 to $2,500 a year. This same man helps here and there, doing housekeeping chores to the extent his health allows and earns $500, $600 or even at times $1,000 more during the good years, although much less at times. He is single, 45 years old and crippled. He asked for welfare but was told this: If you did not earn anything, if you stayed home, both feet up on a hassock, if you did not try to manage on your own, if you did not have more than $200 in the bank, if you took it easy, we could help you. But because you try to earn a living, to manage on your own and to improve your lot, we cannot help you. So, the man has no choice. He does not want to stay idle. He has no choice; he must earn his living. Consequently, he works despite his incapacity, runs about, wears himself out working in order to obtain a maximum income as ridiculous as $3,000 per year.

Through this tax revision, the purpose of which is to create the just society, the government is saying: We shall grant him a $1,500 exemption and he will pay income tax on the difference. This same individual, Mr. Chairman, cannot be helped through government programs because he is helping himself and, for that very reason the federal government will make him pay income tax on $1,500. Such is the just society that section 109 will establish. If this person remained idle, if he did not help himself, did not try to improve his lot and to find some income by racking his brains in order to meet his essential needs, he would not earn $1,500, therefore he would be exempt from taxes and the government would say: How generous we are! But of course, since that man does not earn more than $1,500 a year. However, the wheeling and dealing social welfare officials could say: We can help you, provided you first spend your $200 bank savings. When you are broke and without a place to live, come and see us and we shall perhaps help you.

Such is the situation for this Canadian. That is what we are protesting against. That is why, Mr. Chairman, we will fight to the bitter end. It is illogical in 1971 for the federal government not to admit that the minimum income a single person needs, not to make ends meet but to get three poor meals a day, must be at least $3,000 a year. What is most expensive for this individual, my friend from Victoriaville whose sad story I told you? Clothing, food and housing. Housing and food costs continue to climb. It is rather strange since the farmer's income is constantly decreasing. The cost of clothing is still going up, which is rather strange since our market is flooded with Japanese textiles at bargain prices. In the meantime Canadians are unemployed and Victoriaville can be cited as an example. These are the three costliest factors, they are the three essential factors of the spiraling cost of living.

The fight against inflation by the Trudeau government was aimed at these three essentials of life. The government appointed the Young Commission to stop inflation, in order to stabilize prices and incomes. As it turned out the chairman of the commission stated: It is a complete flop; no use going on, nothing can be done without new measures; it is a vicious circle. This, Mr. Chairman, is the result of the struggle. I beg you for some understanding. When the government decided to create that commission, it was because the problem of the high cost of living for low income earners was well understood. Of course, the rich, the high income earner who can pay thousands of dollars in income tax has no worries about accommodation, food or clothing.

However, the poor, the sick, the blind, mothers and others who fall into the category of low income earners cannot fight the high cost of living. They are the first victims. And although they are the main victims of the high cost of living under the present crazy economic system, the federal government says it cannot grant single persons a basic exemption of more than $1,500, as that would cost too much and make us lose too much revenue. Because the government refuses to raise the basic exemption for single persons from $1,500 to $3,000, it must collect a large part of its revenues from small taxpayers.

The federal government is unable to manage its budget except by squeezing to death the small taxpayers who make hardly any money at all. Incidentally, to make $3,000 nowadays is a joke! What can you possibly do with $3,000 a year? It is not even enough to pay for a year at university. What can we do with $3,000? The government says: $3,000, that is a lot of money. $1,500 is enough. We shall tax the difference.

Mr. Chairman, this means that the government governs at the expense of the small taxpayers, that it tinkers with our taxation system under the pretence of setting up a just society. But its only purpose is to get votes and finally it is a just society just for fun, for the big ones at the expense of the smaller ones. Secondly, it means that the government does not run the country in a responsible way and that it is not logical with itself in its fight against poverty.

If the government really wants to fight poverty, it must not bear down the poor but get them out of trouble. You can lead a horse to the watering-place, but you cannot force it to drink. If the government really wants to fight poverty, I urge the Minister of Finance to fight poverty and not the poor and, above all, I urge him to fight the causes of poverty. That would be much better and much more sensible too.

But no. The government says: We are going to deal with the poor and provide a basic exemption of $1,500 for a single person. In order to demonstrate to what extent this is sad and ridiculous, let us consider the case of a student who wins a scholarship of $1,500 and who sweats it out all summer and earns an additional amount of $500 to be somewhat better off the rest of the year. He would have, in the first place, to pay taxes on these $500. His scholarship being considered as an income he would have also to pay the relevant tax, which is absolutely ridiculous.

It means also that individual efforts to manage one's business are being discouraged. When you read the Treasury Board's pamphlet entitled "How is your tax dollar spent?", you find a beautiful coloured chart, since the government sees poverty in colours as does Mr. Castonguay in Quebec. This chart shows that 25 cents of each tax dollar are spent on social security. Why is that?

What are these social security measures for? They systematically create poverty.

I mentioned yesterday in the House, the eighth annual review of the Economic Council of Canada wherein it is said that of the 301,000 Canadians who have been following courses, 78 per cent of them have been unable to increase their income. What purpose do these courses, which cost millions of dollars, serve in the end? They are nothing but a social welfare measure.

Mr. Chairman, social security measures now cost us tremendous amounts of money and they do not stamp out poverty; on the contrary, they generate it. The government will reply that this is not true. If it is not, then let it prove that it is seriously fighting poverty and let it increase the basic exemptions.

I challenge the members opposite and all other members to think of and name a single member of their electorate who is able to live in decent affluence on a $3,000 a year income. Let them name a single Canadian citizen who can do it!

• (4:20 p.m.)

Yet, Mr. Chairman, I know several persons who do it. Several of my colleagues also know that. But is it enough to just look at them? Are we not here to pass legislation to held them? Are we here to give fish to the poor or are we not here to show the poor how to fish so they can manage on their own? Are we here to add to the legions of poor or to remedy the causes of poverty?

If we are here to remedy the causes of poverty, Mr. Chairman, there is no reason for this debate to go on in this House if we are sincere. Everybody should understand that this big thick bill is aimed at eliminating the causes of poverty. So let us increase the basic exemption for single persons.

One could say the same for married couples. What is $5,000 for a married couple, Mr. Chairman? In fact, once food, clothing and rent are paid—which are the three costliest items—that married couple does not have enough money to raise a family. That is where they stand. That couple breaks up because of financial difficulties. That couple cannot achieve its aspirations and its legitimate desires. Why? Because of financial difficulties. That couple cannot progress as it would like to do. The same goes for single persons, Mr. Chairman. Some people come up and tell us that Canada is a big country with large aspirations from coast to coast, that our country is very wealthy, that life is great under a liberal government in a "just society" with its "100,000 jobs".

Mr. Chairman, that can only last for a while. It is time for us to get serious in this Parliament, to roll up our sleeves and to stop our wishful thinking.

As for the just society, Mr. Chairman, it is not only through election promises which are never implemented that we want to see it, but we should be able to find it in books, in bills, in the government's political philosophies, which I find unacceptable.

That is why I speak, and I am not through yet on this subject, as well as my colleagues. That is why we are protesting. In our opinion, the poverty level is $3,000, and I challenge any member to prove that he is able to make ends meet with $1,500 or even $3,000 a year.

Mr. Chairman, when you have two or eight children, what can you do with a yearly income of $5,000? The statistics on poverty show that the poverty level is proportionate to the number of persons in a family, to its growth rate. This means that the larger the family, the more it is threatened by insecurity at the very time when the father finds himself jobless or when his income becomes inadequate.

Among the poor families, there are always large families. This does not mean they are unhappy, because they know what they have and appreciate it. What would a member say if he saw an individual going to the welfare office and wait "on all fours" in front of an official for an hour and a half to be told: We are sorry, but we cannot help you because your file has been mislaid; you are not eligible because you have $300 in the bank.

Such a situation is absolutely shocking. Then, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) faced with a crisis such as that of October last, will come with tears in his eyes and make a pathetic appeal for peace and reason to the Canadians, saying: Be calm, stay home, everything is under control.

Of course everything is under control; people are crushed by big finance. It is very easy to understand. That is why we said, at the outset, that we do not believe in this reform, because it makes no sense.

We want a monetary reform in depth, that will recognize that all Canadians, regardless of their political affiliations, race or religion, have the economic right to a decent living, to a share of the national output, although they may have been replaced by machinery, may not be trained to work, may be too old or too young to work.

How many hardship cases could we not mention today? The economic system should ensure security and freedom, not a system that crushes individuals to its own advantage.

Was money created to be served or to serve us?

Does Parliament exist to serve itself or to serve the Canadian people?

Mr. Chairman, when a new department is created with much ballyhoo in order to tamper with the administration, what does the government say? It says that more administration is required to deal with the situation and that another department should be set up.

So everybody applaud, discuss and finally the measure goes through. Why was a new department created? To provide better service to the people, to do this or that.

Has the department been created to serve the government or the population? We have to ask ourselves. If hon. members opposite recognize the merits of this reasoning in the case of an institution, whichever it is, they must also admit it in the case of the financial institution. The Bank of Canada is indeed an institution that is neither American nor European, but decidedly Canadian. What are we waiting for before we use it?

If for lack of revenue the government is unable to boost the basic exemptions from $1,500 to $3,000 for single people, and from $2,850 to $5,000 for married couples, the Minister of Finance should use the Bank of Canada to at least assist those people and provide them with the vital minimum. Of course the minister should stop laughing and get moving.

There is a damn limit!

If the government is unable to grant a larger basic exemption, let is say for what reasons. Naturally, the minister will answer that governmental administration is ever more costly, that our only sources of revenue are the taxes levied from the taxpayers and that each taxpayer, through some sense of national solidarity, must contribute to the fiscal revenue. If the federal government claims that there lies its only source of revenue besides funds borrowed from foreign countries, this means that it is not ready to admit it.

And if the government acknowledges the problem of poverty—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I suggest that his time has expired.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) in order to clarify a situation which is special to those who are dedicated to the administration of such public bodies as school boards and rural municipal councils.

The Minister of Finance has no doubt, as we have, received many representations in this connection, requesting that the new tax legislation take into account compensations granted to school commissioners and municipal councillors and also to mayors of rural municipalities.

Certainly, Mr. Chairman, in the case of all those people constantly dedicated to the service of their fellow-citizens it was quite normal that at some time the government should edict certain compensations to offset expenses incurred in order to attend meetings, and also the time they daily give to public service.

I can speak of this situation at first hand, Mr. Chairman as I was a school commissioner myself over a long period and have co-operated for many years with mayors and municipal councillors.

Every time they had to take a trip, the same remarks were heard: it is unfortunate that there is no law providing some small compensation for our expenses. So, the Quebec legislature passed such an act. I imagine that it is the same in the other provinces—I especially want to draw the attention of the House to what is going on in Quebec—and that some compensation has been authorized. I note, in the information given with regard to this bill, that a certain amount has been provided for this purpose. It may be that I do not understand the provision correctly, but the way I read it that amount is equal to about one third of their pay. So, if a mayor receives $300 annually, he would be allowed to deduct only $100. I want to assure the House that in rural municipalities the mayor spends $300 and more in the service of his fellow-citizens.

So, I wish we would go to the heart of the matter. That's what we are here for. We must be fair to those people and not discourage them. Even if legislation is presently under consideration in my province to abolish the positions of a great many school commissioners, I want to see the facts as they are, and deal with the present situation.

I consider that man has not been created for the state, but rather that the state must be at the service of man. This is what a great English prime minister, Sir Anthony Eden, said 30 or 40 years ago. This is still true; this proves that we, as parliamentarians, should understand clearly the scope of this thought: Man was not made for the state, but the state for man.

Under the circumstances, I would like the Minister of Finance to assure us that the bill will protect the group of persons I referred to at the beginning. A third, in my opinion, is not enough. I would therefore suggest to the Minister of Finances to amend his bill accordingly, so that in all rural municipalities—I am not referring to cities—at the school or municipal levels—the entire remuneration paid to school commissioners as well as to aldermen and mayors of rural municipalities be deductible for income tax purposes.

• (4:30 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, the matter raised by the hon. member is covered in another section which is not presently under discussion. It is section 81(3), where he will find that the allowance which previously was given to elected municipal officials has been extended to include persons on school boards and so on. The expense allowance which was deductible for some elected persons and not for others has been extended in particular to cover school trustees.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall section 109 as amended carry?

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): On division.

Clause 1, section 109, as amended, agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: The Chair will now put the amendment moved by the Minister of Finance, namely, striking out lines 3 to 9 on page 283 and substituting the following—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): This is to section 110.

The Deputy Chairman: Yes.

(vi) for the care, or the care and training of the taxpayer, his spouse or any such dependant in a school, institution or other place that is specially equipped to provide care and training to persons who are physically or mentally handicapped and that admits for care, or for care and training, only persons who are so handicapped,

Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Amendment (Mr. Benson) agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: I will now put the question on the amendment moved by the Minister of Finance which is meant to replace subsection 5 on page 286 by the following:

Where a taxpayer was, at the end of a taxation year of a partnership, a member of the partnership, his share of any amount that would, if the partnership were a person, be a gift made by the partnership to any donee, shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed to be a gift made by the taxpayer, in his taxation year in which the taxation year of the partnership ended, to that donee.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I merely rise to ask if it should not be put on record that these are amendments to the proposed section 110?

The Deputy Chairman: It was meant from the beginning that section 109 had been adopted, and the only section now in front of the committee is 110. This was understood by the Chair. I believe hon. members also understood that the amendment was related to that section.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I know that, but up in the Hansard office they might wonder what happened.

Mr. McCleave: And down here, too.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Chairman, may I ask the Minister of Finance to give us more details about that clause?

Mr. Chairman, you will understand it is not always easy to understand the general meaning of an amendment such as the one you just read. I am not the only person to feel this way, I think. Even if one consults people very knowledgeable in this field, they often find it difficult to clarify some points.

[English]

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, we have carried section 109. This amendment to section 110 is inserted so that where a charitable donation is made by a partnership, the partners can each claim a portion of the charitable donation that is made. That, simply, is the purpose of the amendment.

Amendment (Mr. Benson) agreed to.

Clause 1, section 110, as amended, agreed to.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, I believe it has been agreed among the parties that we would now proceed with sections 4 to 8 inclusive, discuss these as a group and then carry the sections as amended. The group of sections 4 to 8 is to be open for discussion at this time.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, the minister has stated correctly the agreement that we reached. Perhaps I might spell it out in one further detail. I think the understanding was that from the chair you will call section 4 but the discussion will range over 4, 5, 6, 7 and 8, and at the end we will vote on them individually and put the amendments, just as we have done with sections 109 and 110.

The Deputy Chairman: Are there any other comments? Is the Chair to understand that there is agreement within the committee as to call section 4 but at the same time allow discussion on sections 5, 6, 7 and 8?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: With the question put later, section by section?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On clause 1—section 4: Income or loss from a source or from sources in a place.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall section 4 carry?

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I have several comments to make on these sections. First, this may seem to be a very technical matter but it is something which is very important because I hope I shall strike a blow for mamma and papa, that is, those family units which run the corner grocery stores in Canada. Mamma and papa have great difficulties; they are threatened by Dominion stores, Loblaws and all the other big chains. Also, I suggest that mamma and papa will have their heads beaten in by the legislation that we are being asked to approve.

• (4:40 p.m.)

I think I can illustrate this beyond any shadow of doubt. I know, since we are not expected to carry these five sections this afternoon, that the minister and his officials would want to look again at the matter and, hopefully, to achieve change. Where do mamma and papa get into difficulty under the proposed act? The story starts with section 6, subsection 8 on page 12, which on the face of it seems innocent enough. It provides as follows:

Notwithstanding anything in section 5 or this section, in computing the income of a taxpayer for a taxation year from an office or employment, there shall not be included any amount that is, by virtue of subsection 74(3), not required to be so included or that is, by subsection 74(4), deemed not to have been received by him.

Then we jump to subsection 74(3), page 178, which is not under discussion at this time, Mr. Chairman, but I have to put it on the record to make the point about the threat to mamma and papa and their little corner grocery store. It provides as follows:

Where a person has received remuneration as an employee of his spouse, the amount thereof shall not be deducted in computing the spouse's income and shall not be included in computing the employee's income.

The next paragraph deals with the situation where a partnership exists. I shall not belabour the point by putting that paragraph on the record because I think I have established enough for the minister and his officials to see the problem that mamma and papa are up against. It is true that much of this proposed law is carried forward from the act which we are being asked to replace. If it was unfair before, I suggest it is even more unfair now.

Let us take mamma and papa in their purest form. They simply operate the corner grocery store without having gone through the legalities of setting up a partnership or incorporating. Although mamma may sit there for 16 hours a day and papa may be out doing something else for part of the time, all the income received from that operation is taxed in the husband's hands. If the store were incorporated, the wife would be taxable on her salary and she would be permitted one thing that is an important benefit under this new act, that is, a deduction for child care expenses. This means if mamma and papa operate the store on their own and the child has to be looked after outside, there is no way under the proposed legislation that any benefit can attach to papa taxpayer.

All this could apply to other types of business, Mr. Chairman, but the corner grocery store is recognized as an institution and for which perhaps we all feel something should be done. Maybe I can reach the hearts and heartstrings of the government by concentrating on it rather than on a small garage or specialty shop. In any event, put mamma and papa to the expense of incorporating, probably several hundred dollars, and lo and behold the magic of the act takes over and they are entitled to child care expenses.

I do not think this was intended. Indeed, I am sure it was not, because no madman would intend to achieve a result like that. None the less, suddenly we find that technicalities are creating an injustice. It is part of our job in this chamber, when dealing with awkward technicalities, to do our best to see that injustices do not happen, particularly to people who are hanging on by the skin of their teeth in the face of competition, people who work long hours for little return. However, I think anyone who runs out of bread on a Sunday, or sends his child out for a bottle of milk, will be using the corner store operated by mamma and papa. I think I have made the point sufficiently for it to be studied by the parliamentary secretary and his officials. Before we get through these sections I hope some heed will be paid to my complaint.

I have four other points, also of a technical and, I think, important nature. The first point concerns those parts of section 6 which deal with automobiles. Some questions were presented by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce in its submissions of September, 1971. On page 21 of their booklet they ask:

> Is it the purpose of these provisions to place a minimum on the amount of any benefit taxed in the hands of the employee or shareholder?

That refers to the use of the automobile, the company car.

> The phrase "exclusive personal use or otherwise" used in both taxing sections is not clear. Does it mean exclusive use as opposed to use by several persons? Clarification is also required as to what elements go into "cost" in these circumstances.

These are technical questions, perhaps as interesting to many Canadians as to mamma and papa because there are a lot of people who enjoy the automobile, such as travelling salesman. There is the question of dividing its running expenses between the operation of the employer and the personal use of the salesman. I present this question for the consideration of the parliamentary secretary.

The third element, which is perhaps not so much a technical one as a question of policy, concerns employee insurance benefits. Under section 6 (1) (f) it is proposed to tax all of the profits under the plan if it is supported by the employer. I suggest this is a little too sweeping. The employee may pay part of that insurance and, if so, I suggest that only part of the proceeds should be taxable or the employee should have a specific deduction for his share of the premium. I hope the parliamentary secretary will deal with that question.

I ask whether strike pay is to be taxed. My understanding is that it is not, but that unemployment insurance benefits are to be taxed. I think the niceties there escape most of us and warrant some elaboration from the minister. Finally, Mr. Speaker, I raise another point which comes from the brief presented by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce. This relates to section 7, dealing with employee stock options. Their comment is:

> We suggest that a benefit under this section, at least to the extent that the benefit represents an increase in the value of shares held under option subsequent to the date of grant, should be taxable as a capital gain.

• (4:50 p.m.)

That point is made on page 21 of the submission by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce. I continue:

> In the alternative, it is recommended that consideration be given to allowing a deduction for the employer equal to the amount of the benefit which is taxed to the employee.

That is a reasoned point and I suggest it should be given a reasoned answer in this chamber.

Those are the points that I wished to raise as we move in our consideration from section 4 to section 8. However, I come back to the point I began with concerning the mamma and papa small business operations of this country. I think there is an element of unfairness in the way this particular group would be treated under the legislation as it is at present. I know we do not intend to treat them unjustly and I hope we will be smart enough to see that this group suffers no injustice.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, although the matters dealt with in these five sections, sections 4, 5, 6, 7 and 8, are specific, which ought to make your task a little easier than it has been up to this point, nevertheless, since there are a great many of them you will not be surprised if in our remarks on them we seem to jump around. There are many different things we could talk about and still keep our remarks relevant to something that is found in these five sections. I propose at this time to raise just three things that are to be found in this group sections. One of them I welcome, another I want to ask a question about, and the third is a matter I think ought to be improved tremendously.

The proposal I welcome is found on pages 11 and 12. It is subsection 6 of proposed new section 6, which is now before us. I shall make my remarks about it brief because at some point my colleague, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, will no doubt get into the debate and have something favourable to say about the battle that he has been waging for many years finally being won. The part I refer to on pages 11 and 12 makes it possible for workers who have to be away from home in logging camps, on constructions sites, and so on, to receive allowances for living away from home or allowances for travel and for those amounts not to be included as taxable income. This is a welcome change in the income tax law, and I am happy to say so. I will leave further expressions of appreciation to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. If there are shortcomings in this part, you can count on it that he will underline those as well.

The second item I wish to refer to is found on pages 18 and 19. I am looking at subsection 11(10) of section 8—that ought to confuse you, Mr. Chairman. It has to do with trade union dues being allowed as an income tax exemption. I confess that despite the reasonable amount of homework I have done on this bill, I have not checked to see whether the wording here is exactly the same as it was in the previous act. My concern—and at this point it is a question—is whether the wording that we now have will permit as a deduction for income tax purposes the full amount of dues that a trade union member has to pay to maintain his membership in a trade union. There is no difficulty in determining what a trade union is, because the act is clear. A trade union is one that meets the definition of section 3 of the Canada Labour Code or of any provincial statute providing for the investigation, conciliation or settlement of industrial disputes.

The issue that has arisen, however, since we first won this provision more than 20 years ago, I believe, is this: when union dues are allowed, in many cases it is not the full amount that members have to pay which is allowed but only that portion of dues which the government, by regulation, has decreed as being really necessary. To be specific, there are occasions when there are special assessments because of a strike or because of a building project. Things of this sort frequently are not allowed. As I read the tax bill before me, I do not see any reason why they should not be allowed.

What the law would allow is the annual dues to maintain membership. Well, if one is a member of a trade union and the trade union makes, in addition to its normal assessment, a special assessment, the member has to pay that special assessment just as he must pay the normal assessment in order to maintain his membership in that union. I know that almost every year at income tax time I hear from secretaries of local unions or from individual union members, and particularly from those who belong to unions for which the dues are rather substantial. They express this concern, that although they may have paid $100 of $150 during the year as trade union dues, only $40 or $50, or some such figure, is allowed. I just pulled those figures out of the hat.

I should like to know whether the plain, ordinary meaning that one gets from looking at this tax bill actually shows the way this part will operate. It is clear that the taxpayer gets a deduction for income tax purposes with respect to annual dues to maintain membership in a trade union as defined. I do not see any qualification which gives anybody the right to "chisel" on that clear statement. I hope at some point we can hear a definitive answer. I hope the answer will be satisfactory. If it is not, we shall see if we cannot bring forward an appropriate amendment. Mr. Chairman, that completes my remarks on two of the things about which I wanted to speak at this time.

The third matter I want to raise is found on page 15 in proposed new section 8(1)(a)(i). I am referring to the new provision that was first unveiled in the white paper, and it has been included here just about as it was unveiled. It has to do with a deduction to be allowed to taxpayers in respect of their expenses on the job up to either 3 per cent of the taxpayer's aggregate income or $150, whichever is the lesser. If I may put that in other terms, Mr. Chairman, it means that one gets an exemption of up to 3 per cent except he cannot go higher than $150 in a year.

We feel quite disappointed at the restrictions that the government has imposed on this provision. Workers who have special expenses that are attached to the job in a great many cases have a total of expenses much higher than $150. We think that figure should be more in the order of $500. I have no objection to the higher figure having attached to it a requirement of some kind of receipts or vouchers such as is done with charitable donations. In that connection, maybe the solution is to do the same. I hope the parliamentary secretary's interest means that he is thinking about it seriously.

With medical expenses, a taxpayer has the option of claiming $100 without bothering to put in any receipts. It applies to charitable donations, except that the total for both is only $100. At any rate, the principle is clear. A taxpayer can put in receipts and claim a much larger amount. If he does not have receipts, he can claim $100. Possibly the workers could be told that if they do not have receipts, they will be allowed a $150 exemption, and if they have vouchers they can claim a higher exemption.

All that this amounts to, the way it now stands, is that a taxpayer with a taxable income of $5,000 a year or more, from any kind of employment, receives a flat additional exemption of $150. It is not a tax credit. If it were, I would be shouting hosannas at this point. But no, it is an additional exemption. For the low income person it means a small concession of 15, 17 or 20 per cent of that $150. To the wealthier person, the one in the higher bracket, it means a much larger amount because his marginal rate is much higher.

The parliamentary secretary knows I still regret that the government was not prepared to move from the tax exemption method to a tax credit method. I do not think the government needed to throw this in our faces by extending the exemption method in the way it has done. The government did not have this sytem before. There was no such thing as a consideration for the expenses of all workers. But this is not limited to industrial or office workers. Since there are no receipts or vouchers required, one does not have to be an industrial worker who has to buy certain kinds of clothing or tools.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The deputy minister gets it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The parliamentary secretary gets it too, does he not?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Not the parliamentary secretary, the deputy minister.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am being corrected. I am glad to accept the correction. Is there a prohibition against Members of Parliament getting this?

Mr. Mahoney: Perhaps I might explain, Mr. Chairman. Anyone who receives a tax free allowance of over $150 will not be eligible to claim this exemption. If, for example, a school trustee were paid a tax free expense allowance of $100, he would only be able to claim an additional $50 against his regular employment.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I freely admit I missed that, Mr. Chairman. I am very glad to hear it. It was a little bit raw as it stood in the white paper for this exemption to be added to the other in all cases.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The deputy minister gets it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As my parliamentary secretary to my right is reminding me, the deputy minister gets it. No one is saying no to that. In fact, the way the heads are nodding I assume it is true. At the marginal rates of some of these deputy ministers, that is pretty good. Really, it is a big joke. The government is making out that it is doing something for the workers of Canada. It is not doing anything. The government has just added a little bit more on top of an exemption level system that is already unfair and in the end it gives a special advantage to those at the top. One of the arguments the parliamentary secretary used in a retort to me—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The governor of the Bank of Canada gets it, too.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In this by-play over here I am being reminded that the governor of the Bank of Canada will also receive this exemption. He is an employee. In fact, he does fairly well.

I am not going to move any amendment at this stage. We have just started on this group of sections, 4, 5, 6, 7 and 8. They will probably be around for at least another day. I hope that another look will be taken at this provision. I suggest, again, the idea of requiring either receipts or vouchers so that it becomes genuine, provided the figure is a little higher. I suggest it should be $500 and the law should categorize the amounts so that the governor of the Bank of Canada, deputy ministers and some of these people will not get this additional exemption which means a great deal to them at their marginal rates.

I said I had just three things in this group of sections that I wanted to speak about at this point. Those are the three. I welcome the provision of an allowance for income tax purposes for workers who have to work at construction sites and logging camps away from their homes. I would like a precise answer about the extent to which trade union dues are deductible for income tax purposes. I hope the government will reconsider and put on a more rational basis this proposal for an extra exemption for workers' expenses.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Chairman, during the debate on sections 4 to 8 of Bill C-259, one section among others held my attention, namely section 8. Subsection (1) introduces a new element in the act.

Here is the subsection in question:

8. (1) In computing a taxpayer's income for a taxation year from an office or employment, there may be deducted such of the following amounts as are wholly applicable to that source or such part of the following amounts as may reasonably be regarded as applicable thereto:

(a) a single amount in respect of all offices and employments of the taxpayer, equal to the lesser of $150 and 3 per cent of the aggregate of

(i) his incomes for the year from all offices and employments (other than the office of a corporation director)—

A while ago, we saw how, to some extent, representatives of corporations could be exempted.

I go back to the quotation:

—before making any deduction under this section—

Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to read the whole section, because it covers six pages, and that would be useless.

I shall then confine myself to subsection 8(i) which deals with a possible deduction for employment expenses and transportation costs between the employee's residence and working place.

This new provision of the Income Tax Act was granted following numerous requests from the public. But as in clause 109 that we have just discussed, I think the government was quite reluctant to grant Canadian workers this deduction.

I think that the department officials have set at 1,000 miles per year the maximum distance allowed for travelling between the individual's home and place of work. Thus the amount of $150 mentioned as the maximum deduction comes out to 15 cents a mile. So if I consider that some hon. members get a 16-cent-a-mile allowance for car expenses, I believe that 15 cents a mile is surely not excessive for workers.

That may seem fine at first blush, but far from it. Indeed it is not an amount of $150, but rather a deduction of $150 from his income. Now if a labourer is taxed at 11 or 14 per cent, it can easily be computed. The taxpayer will save $20 at the end of the year. Not more than that!

It is utterly ridiculous to see that the deduction granted to workers travelling to their place of employment is said to be something new, while in fact any professional, either a lawyer, a physician, an accountant or a travelling salesman, is entitled to deduct his travelling expenses in full.

Mr. Chairman, the same privilege should be granted to labourers, either lumbermen or others, who must travel long distances each year, to reach their place of employment.

Mr. Chairman, according to the provisions of subsection 8(1), we arrive at a distance of four miles a day. Anyone with some knowledge of the worker's movement toward their place of employment will admit that it is not four miles a day but rather 10, 16 and even in some cases 20 miles of travel a day.

Today a worker, may it be a lumberman, a construction worker, a miner, if he has no car, finds it difficult to hold a job. I believe that in some trades, like forestry or construction work for instance, the worker must own a car and travel rather long distances to get to his job.

In order to be logical and recognize such right to the worker a deduction must be granted, not a maximum one but a deduction of 15 cents a mile to any individual who can duly prove that to hold his job he had to travel between his home and his place of employment. A construction worker may sometimes have to travel five or ten miles a day. At other times, if he has to go to another construction site, he may have to cover a distance of 20 to 25 miles a day to get there.

This reduces considerably his income. Therefore, he must be compensated for the distance he has to cover. If the Parliamentary Secretary listened to my remarks, he will understand, I think, the reason for my intervention and accept to move the required amendment. If not, I shall consider moving one myself.

[English]

Mr. McCutcheon: Mr. Chairman, I am proud to make a few comments at this time following the remarks of my hon. friend from Halifax-East Hants who discussed the matter of mamma and papa businesses. He raised a very sensible question.

As I understand it, a deduction is to be allowed for child care expenses in cases where both parents are wage earners. In my humble opinion there is rank discrimination here because, as my hon. friend pointed out, a man and his wife running a corner grocery store would not benefit from this provision. I can think of dozens of other situations where the wife in a small hardware store, a small garage or a small dry-cleaning establishment works for her husband.

I hope the parliamentary secretary will clear this point up, but as I understand it the only way in which these people can benefit from the provisions of the bill we are considering would be if they were incorporated. I would point out to the parliamentary secretary that if they could well afford to incorporate, the wife would not need to be working in the business. I hope the parliamentary secretary will give consideration to this point.

It seems to me the direction this legislation is taking is that the department just does not like individuals. I do not think the minister and the parliamentary secretary should be led by the nose down the garden path by bureaucracy which does not like to deal with individuals because it believes some individuals will be hard to trace. This is the reason given for not making this provision applicable to the ordinary individual. This is deplorable; it is rank discrimination against certain individuals in Canada. After all, it is the small family store, hardware business and dry-cleaning establishment that is the backbone of this country and the operators of these businesses should receive some consideration in this regard.

[Translation]

Mr. Godin: Mr. Chairman, as regards this clause, I quite agree that some improvements may be necessary. However, I would like to draw the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) to the abuses of some civil servants.

You will remember, for instance, that, according to the public accounts, the government had accepted a price of $12 for some CBC employees' meals. It was also reported that hotel rooms at $65 a day had been paid to CBC employees as well.

So, last spring the government was trying, through some local offices, to claim income tax amounts for certain revised years. A citizen of Portneuf received the following bill: 1968 revision—meal expenses, $750.

[Mr. Laprise.]

As it turned out, this man had been travelling between Portneuf and Montreal on 265 days in 1968. He had produced vouchers for the cost of his meals, namely $1.15 for breakfast, $1.65 for lunch and $1.75 for dinner. The total amount of meals he wanted to deduct from his income tax was $769. However, in November 1970, the Department of National Revenue, Taxation Division, sent him the following letter of warning:

Further to information obtained from your employer, we suggest that you revise your expenses as follows:

Year 1968	Previous figure $760
	Revised figure $500

Finally, Mr. Chairman, our man had claimed about $2.90 per day which was reduced to $1.70. That was what the department's local offices were prepared to accept.

Several truck-drivers of the province took it up to their member of Parliament. Others even entrusted lawyers to represent them before the offices although they knew that they were right.

I would like the Parliamentary secretary to indicate on behalf of the minister what will be the standards for the years to come. In the case of a person who leaves home for more than ten hours a day, and who must go, for instance, to Quebec City or to Montreal, does the bill provide that the local offices will be informed about that change so that the cost of the meals of that person be deductible?

In fact, as recently as last week, two truckers had to go to the Quebec city office to make representations and there was almost a squabble. The minister of National Revenue had to intervene to settle the matter.

Without a letter from a minister or the services of a lawyer, there is nothing to prevent an ordinary civil servant from the income tax to harass truck drivers whose work is already very demanding. They form a social class which has up to now contributed largely to the development of the country and which has not always been well paid for its work. In Quebec, for example, there are two ways of looking at it: if you earn $7,000 you are able to eat better than your neighbour who earns $5,000 because the province accepts these deductions in percentage form.

What I would like to know today is what the truck drivers of the province of Quebec can expect in the future, particularly concerning the accusations made against them in the past, some of which are not settled yet. In fact, I think that these accusations are completely unfounded when I compare the old legislation with the bill under study.

[English]

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Chairman, I have a few comments on Sections 4 to 8. As far as employment is concerned, it seems to me there has been no recognition of losses that may occur. As the brief presented by the Canadian Bar Association points out, under section 5 (2) a person on salary or income computes his loss, if any, for the taxation year in which the loss occurs. In other words, there could be a penalty placed upon a person who might have little or no business or property income and who sustains a loss as a result, say, of having to pay moving expenses or something like that. There does not appear to be any provision for carrying forward a loss of that kind. I may be wrong, but that is my interpretation of this section. If losses were allowed to be carried forward, the federal treasury would lose little or no revenue and I am sure this would prevent any inequities that might arise.

Further, under section 6(1)(a) an employer's contribution to a public health plan will be included in income. As I understand it, some inequities might arise here. In Quebec, for example, under provincial legislation the levy on the employer is regarded as an additional tax. Apparently this is not considered as conferring a so-called benefit to the employee. Under the Ontario or British Columbia schemes, at the present time the employee is considered to receive a taxable benefit. It seems to me that in each case it is a benefit to the employee and should be treated as such.

I should like to say something about the use of an employer's automobile. No matter whether an employee uses a vehicle for his personal use, he is considered to have acquired a value in the car by virtue of his use of it. As I understand it, under the present provision in the act an employee's income includes as a benefit the difference between the value he gets from the personal use of a car supplied by his employer and the amount he paid for its use. The determination of this value is often a matter of dispute. By introducing a stand-by charge the bill has fixed a minimum value to be placed on the personal use of such a car. The stand-by charge will be approximately 1 per cent per month of the cost of the car or, if it is a leased car, one-third the lease cost. This stand-by charge will be prorated on the basis of the number of days that the car was available to the employee.

The stand-by charge requirement means that employees having an employer's car available for personal use will have the minimum amount determined under the formula, minus any payment they make, included in income whether or not they use the car for personal reasons. The bill could result in a number of employees being assessed stand-by charges on the same car, because the car need not be available for the exclusive use of any one employee, although he could be charged for this.

There is one area which is of interest to me—I believe it is section 6 (1) (f)—where the employer makes a contribution to a salary continuation plan for an employee. This, I would presume, is the usual provision where the company, the taxpayer or employee pays into a fund which pays him in return a salary or income maintenance when he is unable to carry on his job. The way it is worded, it would appear to me that a portion of whatever benefits the employee had will be taxable. An amount is deducted from the amount the employer paid in a certain specified time previous to the employee receiving the benefit. This would seemingly create a situation in respect of an employee who has been temporarily disabled wherein he would do better than one who has been permanently disabled. This does not seem fair or reasonable.

This is probably a point which is not of great interest but I have a personal interest in it. Although I have no employer I, personally, have paid for salary continuation in the event of illness. As I understand this provision, it continues the present situation whereby a person who contributes to his own salary continuation plan in the event of illness is not entitled to have the premiums deducted from his income tax. These are the few remarks I should like to say on this section, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Chairman I wish to raise two points at this stage of the committee's consideration. The first point may have been raised but I am not clear on it and wish the matter to be clarified. The parliamentary secretary and the minister will be aware that representations, by people who are handicapped, have been made from time to time for a special allowance or a special provision in order to enable them to cover the cost of transportation to and from work. I am sure the parliamentary secretary will appreciate that many of these people are capable of carrying on useful work but have the very obvious problem of getting to and from their work and must incur special expenses in retaining employment.

I am not sure whether this situation is covered in any way under the provisions or whether the idea of the government is that it is to be covered by the $650 special allowance to be provided for blind and disabled people as set out at page 285 of the bill. However, I should appreciate a comment from the parliamentary secretary as to whether any special provision has been made for these people, because I am sure he will agree that handicapped and disabled people face an unusual problem in carrying out employment for which they qualify.

Second, I should like to underline the remarks of my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, concerning deductions for employee expenses or worker expenses as set out in section 8 (1) (a), page 15, where provision is made for an employment expense deduction of the lesser of $150 and 3 per cent. It seems to me this is another example of the type of tokenism I see in this bill—a small gesture that is made to the people of this country to get them to think something is being done for them while many other loopholes are left in our tax law.

Many other concessions are made which are of far greater benefit than this token measure. Within the scope of section 8 (1), if we look at all the various categories of deductions which are allowed to various categories of people we find discrimination. First of all, with regard to employees there is a very definite limit placed on the expenses allowed. Then if we turn over the page we find that if there are any expenses with regard to the collection of salaries or wages, whatever the circumstances may be, the legal expenses are deductible. I have no argument with this provision, but there is no limit placed on the legal expenses involved. In fact, some people may even suggest that there is advantage in the fact that there is no ceiling on such expenses. I do not wish to make any charges in this regard because obviously I am not in a position to substantiate them, but certainly this is an open-ended provision. There is no limit in respect of legal expenses which may be claimed as a deduction.

There is also special provision in respect of a clergyman's residence as provided by paragraph (c) on page 16. I have no argument with these provisions but, again, we find no limit imposed. I acknowledge that in respect of teachers' expenses related to their contribution there is a limit. However, if we turn over the page to paragraph (e) on page 17, in respect of expenses of telegraphers or station agents and the amounts they have to spend for meals and lodging while employed by a railway company away from their residence we find they are entitled to reimbursement and to deduction of these amounts. Again, I have no quarrel with this provision but there is no limit imposed.

Then we have paragraph (f) in respect of a salesman's expenses. There is no limit placed on the expenses allowed to a salesman in carrying on his occupation. Of course, there are certain obvious problems and difficulties with regard to salesmen and I think some allowances have to be made for their situation. There is limitation, I suppose, in the act; no doubt the department clamps down on some situations. I have heard of various cases where they clamp down on unreasonable claims and I cannot quarrel with it. But there are no limitations written into the legislation.

With regard to transport employees' expenses, there is no limitation written into the act under paragraph (h) on page 18. So here we find a wide range of expenses allowed to various categories of people in carrying on their work. In many cases this is justified and a rational case can be made for this type of deduction. When we come to employees and the expenses which they have to incur in carrying on their work, such as the buying of tools and clothing, and so on—expenses which they have to incur themselves—there is a $150 limit imposed. Thus, it seems that we have here a clear case of discrimination with regard to employees who have to work for a wage and who often have to incur special expenses in order to gain a livelihood.

I sincerely hope, as has been stated by other members, that the government will reconsider this section. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre made a perfectly reasonable suggestion providing for a higher amount provided receipts are supplied. I would have no quarrel with such a suggestion. There are various formulas that might be arrived at which would provide a reasonable basis for allowing a deduction for employees expenses.

I recognize that there are, of course, administrative and practical problems involved in carrying out any provision such as this. There will be people who will try to stretch the claims they make and who will find various ways of putting in unreasonable claims. These will have to be dealt with as they occur and legislation must be framed in such a way as to allow the Department of National Revenue to administer the law in a reasonable and effective way. I have no quarrel with such an approach, but it seems to me that after making allowance for the practical considerations involved in dealing with a problem such as this there is no rational basis for deciding on the ceiling proposed with regard to employees' expenses.

I hope that the minister and his parliamentary secretary—I see the parliamentary secretary in the front row and the minister in the second row, and I am not sure whether the pecking order has been reversed—will take this matter under advisement and will give serious consideration to the many reasonable requests that have been made for an adjustment in this provision. I suggest to the government that it would be to their credit to make reasonable adjustments in this regard.

In some ways, I suppose, I should not be asking the government to make such changes because if I wanted to deal with this matter in a partisan way I could say a word or two on it and then allow the matter to slip by, following which I could point this out to the people I might be visiting. I am attempting to be responsible and to bring about reasonable changes in this legislation because the minister and the parliamentary secretary seem to be in a benevolent mood today. I am not sure that this applies every day, but we are not far from Christmas and they might find it in their hearts to make a few reasonable, small changes in this bill which would mean something to a great many Canadians. These changes might make the legislation more meaningful to many people because, as I suggested during the consideration of a previous section of the bill, I am afraid there will be a great deal of disillusionment across Canada when the legislation goes into effect.

People will find that some of the benefits claimed for this bill by the government and its supporters are only an illusion and there will be a great deal of disillusionment as people see the many special concessions and benefits in the legislation for some of the privileged interests in this country. So when a reasonable suggestion is made for a change in the bill such as has been made with regard to this provision, I hope the government will take it under consideration and accept it in order that there can be a greater measure of justice for the working people of this country.

I hope that my representations have reached the minister and his parliamentary secretary and that we will hear some favourable words from them.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I have a point to raise. It is essentially on section 8, the matter of deductions; it also refers to section 6. In my riding there are a number of railway and transportation employees who have constant trouble with the income tax department concerning travelling expenses and away-from-home allowances. The trouble is compounded by the fact that there seems to be an uneven hand involved in making these allowances. I think it is more a case of neglect, or of not looking into it one year and making a detailed examination in the next year.

The railway employee has to make a certain number of trips away from home. Many of these people over the past years have kept track of the number of trips they make, the days they are away and the mileage that they travel. In the past many have been able to take a flat figure based either on mileage or trips; this figure goes through year after year and they are allowed their deductions for these away-from-home expenses. Then suddenly after four or five years they are refused the allowance on the old basis. They are asked for receipts for their hotel bills, restaurant accounts, and so forth, and of course they cannot produce them. There is a great problem there and a good deal of confusion among these employees as to exactly what criteria the department is using to establish away-from-home travelling allowances.

It is a fact that in some cases railway workers may sleep in the caboose and eat their meals from a lunch-box in order to save the few dollars they might otherwise spend. Sometimes they do, sometimes they don't; but I think it has been fairly general that they receive their allowances on a mileage or trip basis. However, this has never been established and it is a constant problem for me and other members who have railway and transport workers in our constituencies.

I ask whether section 8(g) indicates any more reasonable or definite basis for an even ruling on this type of claim. I think it is largely an administrative matter, but in various explanations that I have been given the act has been quoted and for one reason or another people have been turned down after, as I say, several years of acceptance. That is the first point, whether this legislation will help in this situation.

The second point concerns people who work away from home all week, who are not transportation workers and do not come under paragraph (g) but probably come under paragraph (h) with respect to a normal taxpayer. These people have not previously been covered for working away from home and returning at weekends. I think it is a very unfair situation. For example, people who are in logging, lumbering or construction may be required by their employers to work at a fairly distant place. They do not come home during the week but they come home on the weekend to spend some time with their families. Of course, they do not spend money on room and food while they are at home. They return home rather than pay expenses while away. This, again, is a situation that has arisen several times: people in this type of activity are refused a travelling allowance to return home at the weekend on the basis that they could very well stay away and eat elsewhere.

I would like to know whether section 8(h) will permit a broader interpretation of the law for this type of person, specifically the one who is forced by his employment to live away from home during the week, who returns home at the weekend and goes back to work on the Sunday night or Monday morning. It seems to me that under those conditions it is reasonable that he should be allowed travelling expenses.

I do not think any government should be heartless enough to say that a man can stay away from home if he wants to get his travelling expenses. That is an unreasonable attitude. A person who is working a reasonable distance from his home should be allowed to come home on the weekend and have his expenses deducted, because he is working under conditions that are not normal. Perhaps my question can be answered when the minister or the parliamentary secretary reply. I want to know if the new section will broaden the interpretation for these people and allow a little better exemption for those who have to work and live away from home.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, I would like to add my voice to that of the hon. member for Lambton-Kent and of the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants in making a plea for the small businessman or small farmer whose wife becomes an integral part of his business. She works just as hard as he does in promoting the welfare of the business. She is often there early in the morning and looks after the store while he is at lunch. These small operations are such that a wife can help make a tremendous success of them.

My riding comprises a great many small urban centres. I can think of 20 of more stores where the wife has contributed a tremendous amount to the success of the business. If she had not pitched in and helped, the business would not be such a success and would not contribute so much to the welfare of the community. It has always been a sore point with many small businessmen that they could not have their wife's salary deducted as an expense, whereas they can hire other people and take their salary off their income tax as a deductible expense.

The other point I would like to make concerns paragraph (viii) on page 7 where the allowance for voluntary firemen is listed as $300. This is a figure which was established around 1958. I well remember when the Hon. Donald Fleming was Minister of Finance that he raised the amount from $150 to $300. I point out that there has been a great increase in the cost of living and in other expenses since that time.

I ask the Minister of Finance to take another look at this $300 allowance and see if he cannot raise it to $500. Volunteer firemen do a tremendous job of protecting homes and business places in their communities. They are on call at all times. They may have to leave their own place of business to fight a fire, to protect a neighbour's house, barn or store. They must go out in the clothing they are wearing when the fire siren sounds. The result is that they have expenses which we do not realize. I think this allowance should be increased to at least $500.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

The House met at 2 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR CONSENT BY MEMBER FOR BATTLE RIVER TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43—RULING BY MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: Yesterday when the hon. member for Battle River proposed a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 the Chair declined to put the motion as proposed and undertook to study the circumstances and make a ruling. After careful consideration it seems to me that very little can be added to my comments as recorded at pages 9073 and 9074 of yesterday's debates.

I suggest to the House that the purpose of Standing Order 43 was never intended to permit an hon. member to launch a unilateral debate. It is my view that it is not in accord with the practices and proprieties of this House to use the Standing Order for such purposes when in effect it is intended only to suspend the notice requirement for a motion. It is my judgment that a member, when proposing a motion under Standing Order 43, should restrict his comments to the necessity or desirability of suspending the notice provision for a motion. It seems to me that any enlargement of that prior condition would end inevitably in great difficulty as the same Standing Order could be used from both sides of the House for the purpose of questioning the conduct of any or every member of the House.

As hon. members know, the House has developed well established and recognized procedures for the purpose of discussing the conduct of ministers and of members of the House. It is a prime duty of the Chair to safeguard the interests of all hon. members. Under the circumstances I cannot ask the House whether the hon. member for Battle River has the unanimous consent of the House to propose the motion to which he alluded yesterday.

TABLING OF FURTHER PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO BILL C-259

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 41(2) I would like to table further proposed amendments to Bill C-259, and I would ask that these be printed, with the consent of the House—

Mr. Woolliams: How many amendments this time?

Mr. Benson: A few. I would ask that these be printed in Votes and Proceedings.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

• (2:10 p.m.)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I raise a question? Yes, we get these amendments one way or another, but in view of the fact that we are, in right of the House, dealing with Bill C-259 in committee where amendments are moved, would it not be better for the minister to present those amendments when we are in committee? It seems to me this is a bit of an abuse of Standing Order 41(2).

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, really what I am trying to do under Standing Order 41(2) is to inform the House of amendments that may be made as we move through the subsequent sections. I thought it best to present them to the House so members will know what we are going to do.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: It does not follow that we will know what you are going to do.

DECISION BY UNITED STATES TO PROCEED WITH AMCHITKA NUCLEAR TEST—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I seek, pursuant to the terms of Standing Order 43, to obtain the unanimous consent of the House to propose a motion for the purpose of discussing a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, namely, the decision by the President of the United States to proceed with the Amchitka blast. As a result of the announcement yesterday and the insensitive and offensive disregard by the United States of appeals to stop the irrelevant and unnecessary Amchitka Nuclear test, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose):

That the government of Canada immediately initiate steps, with the co-operation of its allies in the United Nations, to have the matter of the Amchitka nuclear test raised in the Security Council.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Skeena which requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity; therefore the motion cannot be put.

AGRICULTURE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF PURCHASE OF TURKEYS BY AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS BOARD

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, because of the questions that have been raised on this matter in the House, I am pleased to announce that the Agricultural Products Board has invited tenders for a total of 3,600,000 pounds of eviscerated turkey. The purchase price ranges between 33 cents and 40 cents per pound. Since these birds must be of current kill it is anticipated that the purchase will have a favourable impact on producer returns immediately.

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for the announcement he has made about the government's purchase of turkeys. I hope it will bring about a slight rise in price to the producers. There may be some difficulty because the Agricultural Products Board has stipulated that the turkeys have to be fresh killed rather than frozen even though there is an abundance of frozen turkeys in storage. A good deal of the product has gone to market and those who kill fresh turkeys have regular customers for whom they have to keep turkeys available. This may make it difficult for the program to be of as much help as it would have been if it had been announced sooner and if frozen turkeys had been included. However, for what has been done we are thankful and we hope it will be helpful.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Fraser Valley West.

An hon. Member: Here is a real turkey.

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I heard a heckler suggest that I was a real turkey. I would like to point out that I am also tender.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: The member for Gander.

Mr. Rose: In responding to the Minister of Agriculture's announcement about turkey tenders, Mr. Speaker, I am reminded of the broiler tender about three or four months ago. In that case it was felt that a number of provinces did not have a fair opportunity to bid because of the nature of the tender and the lack of adequate notice and information on the ultimate destination to the producer provinces concerned. I understand that this tender is to be applied to support the price of the product. Ultimately, whether it is exported by the government is another matter. I am certain this announcement will be welcome news to those provinces with surpluses. I am confident that the government will see fit to look at all the provinces that may have surpluses and give them each a fair and equal opportunity to bid on this tender call. I say that because I sincerely do not feel that this happened in the previous situation regarding broilers.

[Mr. Speaker.]

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, for once I wish to congratulate the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson). Once is not too much. He just announced really good news for turkey producers. I am sure this contract will also have favourable effects on other categories of farmers.

The announcement of a sale of 3,600,000 pounds of turkey is indeed good news and I am convinced that the producers will greatly benefit from it and their income will increase substantially; I am very happy for all producers whether they are in the west or in the east.

In conclusion, I hope that similar transactions will be announced in the near future concerning the sale of pork meat, because hog producers are running into difficulties—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I take the liberty of interrupting the hon. member to remind him that comments following a statement by a minister should be restricted to the subject referred to by the minister. I am under the impression that we are discussing turkeys instead of hogs and I trust the hon. member will restrict his remarks to that major subject.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I stand corrected, but in view of our concern for all producers I express the hope in closing, that the same policy applies to other groups of producers.

Once more I congratulate the Minister of Agriculture.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

WAGE AND PRICE CONTROLS—PRESENTATION OF SPECIFIC PLAN TO LABOUR AND MANAGEMENT FOR CONSIDERATION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: The new leader.

An hon. Member: Where is your leader today?

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, let the record show that we on this side of the House are quite happy with and enthusiastic about our present leader.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benson: Who is he?

Mr. MacEachen: Where is he?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Hamilton West has the floor.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance regarding the government's pursuit of a policy with respect to restraints in terms of a contingency plan for wage and price controls. Although the Prime Minister said on Tuesday that the government has made no approaches for the application of a plan of wage and price controls, has the government decided to present a specific contingency plan to labour and management as well as to the provinces for their consideration?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no, and I should like to welcome the new leader of the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Monteith: That's pretty weak, Ben.

Mr. Muir: That is as big a joke as your bill, Ben.

WAGE AND PRICE CONTROLS—ACCEPTANCE OF CRITERIA ADVANCED BY UNION RESEARCH DIRECTOR—PRESENTATION OF PLAN TO LABOUR BY MINISTER

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, since the Minister of Labour has apparently been holding discussions with the CLC and CNTU which seem to want to co-operate if five conditions are met, does the government accept the five criteria for a fair incomes policy that were stated recently by the research director of the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway, Transport and General Workers?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the industrial relations critic of the official opposition, let me say that I have been holding meetings with the labour movement, as I ought to as Minister of Labour, on a periodic basis over the last four months. The subjects of such discussions are confidential with respect to the trade union movement. As the Minister of Finance indicated, at no time has the basic subject matter of any of these meetings been the implementation of a specific plan of price and wage controls.

Mr. Alexander: I thank the Minister of Labour for his answer. I am not talking about an approach with respect to the application. In these discussions with labour, has the minister brought up the question of a contingency plan for wage and price controls and, if so, what has been the answer of labour, particularly when it is now noted that they are prepared to co-operate if certain conditions are met?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is quite unintentionally attributing to one particular person who is attached to the labour movement a role that is properly fulfilled by the Canadian Labour Congress. If he feels that he can interpret the Canadian Labour Congress' approach in the whole matter of wage and price control, then he knows more than the Minister of Labour. We have never discussed specific wage and price controls in our meetings. I am not at liberty to divulge precisely what we do discuss at these meetings.

Inquiries of the Ministry

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—CRITERIA TO BE USED IN ESTABLISHING PRIORITIES FOR PROJECT APPROVAL—FUND DISTRIBUTION—APPLICATION EVALUATION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration arising out of the data he filed yesterday respecting the LIP program. As there is a real possibility that the number of applications under the LIP program may exceed the financial resources available, what criteria are being set out to establish priorities for approving these programs? Is it to be on a first come, first served basis or are there other criteria? What are the criteria which the department will use?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, many of the criteria were set out yesterday. The objective will be to attempt to approve those applications which produce the best possible project results and also are most directed to putting people into jobs who are presently unemployed and seeking work. This will be a guideline. Applications will be considered and approved progressively so there will be approvals before all the applications are in. Therefore time is a matter of importance. In the initial stages, the most clearly desirable projects will be approved most quickly, and as the competition for the money becomes more apparent the more difficult decisions will be taken.

Mr. Douglas: As I am sure the minister desires, and certainly the House desires, to see that the $100 million is distributed fairly so that all areas in Canada get their fair share of the amount of money available, has the minister made any breakdown as to the amounts that will be distributed on the basis of provinces or on the basis of regions so there will be no suspicion that any area is being treated unfairly or any area is being given special consideration?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the general guidelines were indicated at the time of the announcement of the over-all program by the government. The allocations with regard to the Local Initiatives Program are not completely rigid by any means, particularly because these can be used to balance some of the imbalances that develop in the other programs. Therefore decisions will be made from time to time. The over-all objective, of course, is to relate the programs as far as possible to the actual people unemployed and seeking work.

Mr. Douglas: Since applications by community organizations will be made directly to the local or regional Manpower offices and applications by municipalities will be made to the provincial governments, may I ask the minister whether the provincial governments will evaluate and pass on these applications or will they merely be postmen and pass them on to the Department of Manpower which will make the final decision whether or not the projects are acceptable?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the final decision on projects to be approved is to be made by the Department of Manpower. Procedures have been set up for that purpose. The provinces, however, will certainly be able to indicate which programs are inconsistent with their own notions of proper development from a municipal point of view, so they will have an important role to play.

POSSIBILITY OF ERRONEOUS INTERPRETATION OF ACT AFFECTING INVESTMENT BY NORANDA MINES IN QUEBEC

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance.

When he appeared before the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs yesterday, the president of the Noranda Mines Company said that owing to an erroneous interpretation of the legislation, his company could have trouble investing $120 million in Quebec.

Is the minister aware of the situation and are the department or high officials in a position to clear it up so that the Noranda Mines Company may invest the $120 million?

[English]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any question about their continuing with the investment. A matter of interpretation was raised by the company and I am having it looked into.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: I should like to put a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Has the minister undertaken negotiations with the president of the company? Is the entire matter settled? Can we rely on the investments of Noranda Mines?

[English]

Mr. Benson: I think the investment will go on. I would like to be in contact with them.

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO ESTABLISH TWO-PRICE SYSTEM

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the hon. member for Saskatoon-Humboldt and minister of several departments. Would he say now, having regard to all the circumstances in western Canada, that the government is close to bringing in legislation to provide—here I shall consult my notes because I want to be sure of the precise wording—for the two-price grain system?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Any decision of the government in that regard, as in any other regard, will, of course, be made known when it is taken.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the reason I asked the question. The hon. member spoke in Assiniboia, an area in which an election is taking place, and he said on that occasion that we are very close to the two-price system. Was that fiction?

An hon. Member: No reply.

Some hon. Members: Stand up.

Mr. Monteith: Caught red-handed.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GOVERNMENT PROTEST RESPECTING NUCLEAR TESTS IN SOVIET UNION

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put to the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question concerning a subject which has been discussed yesterday and on which I have not had time to put a question.

Since the Soviet Union last month carried out a nuclear test similar to that soon to be made by the United States, would the minister say whether, during the visit of the Soviet Premier, he has voiced emphatic protests against nuclear tests in the USSR, as he has done for the nuclear test soon to be carried out by the United States.

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary. Can the minister tell us what the Soviet Premier replied?

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Premier Kosygin said that the matter of the adoption of a test ban was under discussion with the United States and that the Soviet Union was in favour of a test ban, like the United States. Of course, they differ among themselves, and with us, as to the modalities.

AMCHITKA NUCLEAR TEST—SUGGESTED CORRECTION OF RECORD RESPECTING CANCELLATION—RESPONSE TO CHURCH APPEAL FOR FURTHER PROTEST

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, related to the announcement yesterday concerning the nuclear test at Amchitka. It is unfortunate the Prime Minister is not present today. I wonder whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs would like to correct the record with regard to what was said concerning the impracticability of making any further protest against these tests in light of the announcement by the chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission in the United States indicating that the device could be made harmless at any time before the actual detonation some time next week. Further, is the minister in receipt of a telegram from the General Council of the United Church asking that a final appeal be made to the United States government by the Canadian government?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I think the record should be altered. The information as to what had been said by the chairman of the AEC was incomplete at the time the Prime Minister spoke. The information that the hon. member referred to came in subsequently, so that to that extent I think the Prime Minister would want his answer altered. I do understand that there is an appeal from the United Church of Canada.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister could indicate what response will be made to this appeal and to the other appeals from the Anglican, Presbyterian and Roman Catholic Churches. In addition, in view of the proximity of this explosion to the borders of both Japan and the Soviet Union, as well as our own, is any consideration being given to some form of joint initiative that might be taken in order to avert this explosion?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the response that would be given to the appeals now being made would be the same as the answer given yesterday in the House, namely, that the government feels that the action of the House of Commons in expressing its opposition to these tests is the best and strongest representation that could be made of the views of this parliament and that the Prime Minister would simply be reiterating what the House has already expressed to the United States administration.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): A further supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may ask a last supplementary and then we will move on.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, since the minister has expressed an unwillingness on the part of the government to take any further action, is the government considering providing any form of escort for the Greenpeace, the civilian gesture being launched again from Vancouver, which will guarantee reasonable safety in its exercise of the right of innocent passage when it attempts to take its own action in regard to this test?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I ought to say that I do not agree with the first part of the answer that the hon. member gave to his own question. He asked me whether the Prime Minister was intending to make further representations and the answer to that question is no. However, in the United Nations today the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin, who is my parliamentary secretary, will be making a speech in the first committee—

Mr. Woolliams: He has already made it.

Mr. Sharp: Perhaps he has already made it—and will be bringing before the United Nations the views of the members of this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): A question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Egmont is seeking the floor on a question of privilege.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Is it the idea of this government to send a boy to do a man's job?

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

MANPOWER

RELATING OF GRANTS FOR ON THE JOB TRAINING TO OCCUPATIONS IN WHICH WORKERS ARE REQUIRED

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In his announcement yesterday he said nothing about relating the on the job training program to actual availability of jobs for men after they have taken such courses. Are steps being taken to ensure that the grants made to cover the cost of on the job training will be related to occupations for which there is clearly an anticipated market demand?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, that is the constant objective of manpower training programs of all sorts, and it will also be the objective of the on the job training program as far as that is possible.

Mr. Broadbent: If that is the case, then why was this not stated as being part of the general criteria on the basis of which grants would be made?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that that is argument.

UNITED NATIONS

CONDUCT OF CANADIAN DELEGATION ON EXPULSION OF TAIWAN

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. He may wish to take it as notice since I understand he was not, so to speak, on the spot. Was the Canadian delegation at the General Assembly in New York included among those delegations that were described by the United States administration as jumping with joy and undisguised glee at the diplomatic defeat suffered by the United States?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government was not, of course, engaged in any such activities through its delegation in New York. Our representative expressed the views of Canada. Our delegation did not lobby, did not proselytize; it expressed what I believe is the overwhelming view of the Canadian people, that the P.R.C. should be represented as the government of China at the United Nations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: It made its point and then cast its vote with the others.

CORN—MEETING WITH PROVINCIAL MINISTERS OR INDUSTRY REPRESENTATIVES TO FIND SOLUTION TO DIFFICULTIES—GOVERNMENT APPROVAL OF PROPOSALS

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture since it deals with the livelihood of many citizens. In view of the fact that the market value of the Canadian commercial corn crop has continued to drop by $1 million to $2 million per week, can the minister state whether he has invited the Ministers of Agriculture of the provinces involved or representatives of the industry to meet with him to submit a solution, and if any proposals have been made have they met with government approval?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have had a number of meetings with representatives or people from the corn producing area. There are a number of proposals that we think are valid, and they relate in particular to programs to build more storage and elevator facilities. However, one other suggestion is that we impose a value for duty or surtax on corn, and the fact of the matter is that the Canadian price at the moment is some eight or nine cents per bushel lower than competitive United States corn in Montreal.

STUDY OF FEASIBILITY OF ESTABLISHMENT OF GRAIN HANDLING FACILITY ON LAKE ERIE

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the government agreed to launch a study as to the feasibility of establishing a grain handling facility in southern Ontario on Lake Erie in order to take advantage of water transportation from that area?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): We have not agreed to launch a new study but some studies have been made in regard to a grain handling facility at Erieau, and the results of those studies, of course, are well known to the hon. member.

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

May I ask the Minister of Agriculture whether his Quebec counterpart wrote to him with regard to the present problems of the potato producers?

Mr. Speaker: I doubt that the question is in order as a supplementary. I feel that it is not strictly supplementary; but the question having been put, perhaps the minister might be allowed to answer it immediately.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker, not that I can remember, but I will check to see whether we have had such a letter.

HEALTH

SHORTAGE OF DOCTORS AND FACILITIES FOR TRAINING—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare having to do with the national health conference held last Friday. Dr. Evans, dean of medicine at McMaster University, has called for the immediate training of more Canadian doctors and the building of more medical schools so that Canada will not continue to deny her qualified young people the opportunity of becoming doctors, and has stated that we should stop trying to plug the gap by relying on foreign trained doctors. In view of this statement, is the minister now prepared to act on this evidence presented by Dr. Evans and other experts, and earlier by the Canadian Medical Association, by building more medical schools in Canada and operating them on a year-round basis instead of only nine months in the year?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, we are spending several millions of dollars on building new medical schools. With regard to some of the other recommendations referred to by the hon. member, such as keeping our established medical schools and the very expensive facilities in the new ones that we are building open year round, and enlarging classes in terms of the number of people taught, these are all matters that should be looked into very closely by the medical schools and the provinces. Dean Evans would be an appropriate person to implement policies of that kind.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Speaker, I should like to know whether the minister believes or does not believe there is a shortage of doctors?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Rynard: I want an answer.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is inviting the minister to indicate whether in his opinion he believes there is a shortage of doctors, and I do not think that question is in order.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member, who is one of the most respected members of the House, has tried for five days to be recognized in order to ask this question. He has asked the government whether it recognizes that there is a crisis in respect of a shortage of medically trained people in this country and he is entitled to an answer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I appreciate that the hon. member, like every hon. member, is a very respected member of this chamber.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has asked a question and the minister has given a reply. The Chair has to exercise judgment, and when an hon. member asks a minister to indicate whether he believes such and such, obviously he is asking for an expression of opinion. I do not want to prevent the minister from replying. Taking all the circumstances into account, it might perhaps be easier to allow the minister to make a brief reply to the hon. member for Simcoe North.

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, it is precisely because we do believe there is a shortage of medical and health manpower that we formed the federal-provincial task force on health costs. That task force recommended the establishment of all sorts of new categories of para-medical personnel to relieve members of the medical profession of a tremendous amount of routine work which does not require that sophisticated type of education.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I suggest that the minister is just pussyfooting around and is not answering the question. This is the same type of answer the House has been getting for the last three years instead of action.

LOAN PROGRAM TO CREATE JOBS—INFORMATION ON UNEMPLOYMENT BASIS AND METHOD OF CALCULATION FOR ALLOCATION OF FUNDS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer again to the program designed to create jobs this winter in order to obtain certain information from the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. When we were given information regarding the $160 million forgiveable loan program to create work this winter we were given a breakdown as to provinces and amounts, and a statement was made to the effect that it was based on over 4 per cent unemployment. I should like to ask whichever minister has the information on what date the over 4 per cent unemployment figure was taken, and perhaps the minister could also table the precise method by which these allocations were calculated?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): I would be very pleased to do that, Mr. Speaker. The figure was based on regional unemployment last winter, adjusted on the basis of what has happened since that time. I would be very pleased to table the information my hon. friend has requested.

ENFORCEMENT OF LIMITS ON TRAINING PERIODS IN ON THE JOB PROGRAM

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. I note that in respect of the on the job training program there is a limit for training, if I remember correctly, between a minimum of three months and a maximum of 12 months. Will these limits be rigidly enforced or will it be possible for people who may not require as much as three months' training in a given area of upgrading, or those who may require 13 months or 15 months instead of 12 months—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me the hon. member is asking a rather extended supplementary question. As I have said from day to day, we are running short of time. Supplementary questions should be limited as much as possible.

Mr. Lewis: Now that the minister has my meaning perhaps I might briefly, rephrase the question. Will the time limit for training be rigidly enforced, or will training be completed with assistance from this fund once a trainee has started on the job?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I should not want to rule out the possibility of exceptional cases being dealt with in exceptional ways, but the ordinary pattern is expected to fall well within these limits. From an administrative point of view it is desirable to make the available money apply to training programs which lie within certain limits, and these are the limits which have been chosen at this point in time.

CRIMINAL CODE

PRESENTATION OF LEGISLATION RESPECTING ABORTION

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice.

Is he now drafting a bill for the legalization of abortion?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I believe, as the Prime Minister has said on many occasions, that there will be a debate in the House on this sensitive subject.

CANADIAN-SOVIET COMMUNIQUÉ—EFFECT OF EXCHANGE OF SCIENTIFIC AND TECHNOLOGICAL INFORMATION ON DEFENCE-SHARING ARRANGEMENTS WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister perhaps I should direct my question to the Minister of National Defence. It relates to the Canadian-Soviet communiqué released the other day in which there are at least six different references to an increase in the level of the exchange of scientific and technological information. Is the minister satisfied that such an extended level of exchange of this type of information will not impair our capacity to remain within the defence-sharing arrangement with the United States?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied that it has not been impaired in any way.

Mr. Forrestall: I welcome the minister's assurance. Can he also give the same assurance in respect of the level of the exchange of such scientific and technological information with the United States, pertaining particularly to defence and strategic planning?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, it is a little difficult to measure that exactly, although the level of exchange at the moment is very high.

AGRICULTURE

INTEREST RATE ON LOANS FOR EXPANSION OF AGRICULTURAL EXHIBITIONS

Mr. Len Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Is he now in a position to adivse the House what interest rate will be charged on loans under the $10 million program for multipurpose agricultural exhibition expansion and, if not, when will he announce this?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give the exact figure because it will change from time to time in accordance with the amount the government is paying for meidum-term money, but I can assure the hon. member it will be very favourable in comparison with any other money that may be available for a 30-year term.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

STATUS OF VERNON MILITARY BASE

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, is the Minister of National Defence in a position to say when the Vernon air base will be declared surplus and announced as being for sale if that is the government's position, and when does his department intend to advertise the sale of that base?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I take it the hon. member is referring to the Vernon military base and the site of the cadet camp. Let me indicate that there is no present intention to phase this base out of its present activity as a cadet camp in western Canada. We expect to continue these cadet operations there for some years. Arrangements are being made with educational authorities in British Columbia to make some part of the site available for community college facilities when it is not being used as a cadet camp, but in terms of being declared surplus and being disposed of there is no present intention to do so.

AGRICULTURE

SUGGESTED POLICY TO EXPAND DAIRY INDUSTRY

Mr. H. A. Moore (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, keeping in mind the lower cost of feed grains it is now obvious that dairy production is falling below domestic demands in this country. Is the government now considering a policy based on the expansion of this industry rather than the too restrictive policy which is in force at the present time?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): That is a pretty broad question, Mr. Speaker, but in order that the hon. member can advise his constituents I should indicate that we have taken action three times this year to increase returns to dairy producers.

UNITED NATIONS

CANADIAN INITIATIVE TO OBTAIN REPRESENTATION FOR TAIWAN

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether Canada proposes at this time to take any initiative at the United Nations to obtain representation for the people of Taiwan? I ask this because I understand that universality of membership is a fundamental principle of the United Nations.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): So far as I know, Mr. Speaker, there has been no application or any consideration of the question of representation for the people of Taiwan. The government on that island claims to be the government of China as a whole.

VISITS BY FOREIGN HEADS OF STATE—ARRANGEMENTS TO PROTECT RIGHTS OF PEACEFUL DEMONSTRATORS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Yesterday I asked the Prime Minister a question regarding the security of foreign visitors such as Premier Kosygin. He said he would refer the matter to the Solicitor General. Is the Solicitor General prepared to make a report now or at some later date regarding the alleged brutality that took place in Toronto and, second, whether the federal government intends to share the cost of security for foreign visitors in cities such as Vancouver, Edmonton, Toronto and Montreal?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): On the first part of the question, Mr. Speaker, this matter is obviously falls under the jurisdiction of the Attorney General of Ontario and if the hon. member so wishes, I could inform the House of the results of this inquiry when the Attorney General is kind enough to send me a report.

On the second part of the question, no one raised the issue of costs incurred for the safety of visitors in various Canadian cities.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—USE OF FUNDS BY LANDLORDS TO IMPROVE HOUSING UNITS—PREVENTION OF RENT INCREASES

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): My question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration with respect to LIP. Will the minister undertake to ensure that the funds to improve substandard housing will not be used by slum landlords to improve their housing units and then substantially raise the rents to their tenants?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Needless to say, in the case of any application under the Local Initiatives Program the whole nature of the proposal and its impact on the community will be examined.

Mr. Ryan: Has rent control in this situation been discussed with the provinces or will it be?

Mr. Lang: Not in connection with this isolated situation by any means, Mr. Speaker.

STATUS OF WOMEN

IMPLEMENTATION OF COMMISSION RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): My question is addressed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. I should like to ask him whether he is now in a position to make a statement to the House on the government's plans to implement the recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women, and will he do so soon?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I expect that there will be some announcements in this regard before too long.

DISCUSSION WITH PROVINCES AND MUNICIPALITIES OF PROVISION OF DAY-CARE PROGRAM

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): May I ask the same minister whether he has plans in view for a conference with the provinces and municipalities to discuss the provision of a day-care program across Canada?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Not precisely for that purpose but there are heralded plans for discussion of many items with the provinces and municipalities and I have no doubt that this subject could be one of those discussed.

QUEBEC—MEASURES TO PREVENT CLOSING OF PLANTS

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, I will direct my question to the Minister of Finance.

According to Statistics Canada, at least 229 plants in Quebec were closed these last two years while others have substantially reduced their working hours.

Could the minister indicate whether the government intends to take special steps to stop this tragedy which plagues our production?

[English]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Without agreeing with the statistics, not having looked at them, I believe that my colleague in the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has done great things in opening up new job opportunities.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Ricard: Such as closing factories.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must bring to the attention of hon. members that there are some 20 or 25 members who are seeking the floor and there are only four minutes left before the end of the question period. I am afraid that many hon. members will be disappointed. We will try, if there are not too many supplementary questions, to get a number of questions asked.

GRAIN

REQUEST FOR REMOVAL OF RESTRICTIONS ON INTERPROVINCIAL MOVEMENT OF FEED GRAINS IN FOUR WESTERN PROVINCES

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): I should like to address my question to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. It arises out of representations made to him by the Palliser Wheat Growers Association requesting the removal of restrictions prohibiting the interprovincial movement of feed grains between the four western provinces. Are any initiatives now being taken in this regard by the government?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): This question is constantly alive, but particularly so when prices for feed grains are at depressed levels within any section of the designated area. The very vast sales of barley should put an end to those depressed prices and therefore avoid a great part of the problem for the time being.

REPORTED MILITARY MOBILIZATION IN INDIA AND PAKISTAN—CANADIAN INITIATIVE FOR DEBATE IN SECURITY COUNCIL

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): My question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In light of continuing reports of military mobilization in India and Pakistan and evidence of increasing tension between these two countries, is Canada going to initiate or support an emergency debate in the Security Council of the United Nations on the situation in the same terms as it is initiating the Amchitka issue in the General Assembly?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The answer is no. The government does not feel that a debate, either in the Security Council or in the General Assembly, on the unfortunate conflict between India and Pakistan would do anything to promote a settlement.

Mr. Dinsdale: Does the government then intend to support United Nations action and debate on the refugee situation in east Pakistan?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker. It is precisely for that reason that we do not want to get political matters mixed up with humanitarianism.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

CHECKING OF GRANTS—REASON FOR GRANT TO STEP LITE MANUFACTURING LIMITED

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. It deals with the question I asked him yesterday, in reply to which he said he would give a more detailed answer today.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): As a matter of fact, we did not give any money to the company to which the hon. member referred yesterday. The department has made a conditional offer of a grant to Step Lite Manufacturing Limited for a project at Renfrew, Ontario. Before the offer was made there was a careful analysis of the viability of the project, including the financial and managerial resources available for its establishment. The conditions attached to the offer are designed to ensure that these resources will be applied efficiently.

Mr. Alexander: What does that mean?

Mr. Hales: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. My question of privilege is that the minister has misled the House and the Canadian people. It is based on the fact that on October 25 he issued a news release or communiqué stating that Step Lite Manufacturing Limited would receive an incentive grant of approximately $216,000 and that this would create 99 jobs. My point of privilege is that the minister should not have issued this communiqué stating that the grant would be made and jobs created until such time as all facts were taken into consideration, as he said today. It is misleading the country and the public to issue such a communiqué before the grant is made.

[Mr. Lessard.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, several times I have explained how we proceed in that field, and that is the only way we can proceed when a company applies for a grant. We discuss the matter with the managers of that company, we make the necessary studies and we tell the representatives of that company that they will have a right to the stated amount as soon as the conditions are met. But a grant cannot be made before the jobs are created and the plant is in operation.

[English]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt that the matter should be pursued by way of a question of privilege. The hon. member might like to ask a supplementary question. It might be easier to advance if we proceed on that basis.

• (3:00 p.m.)

Mr. Hales: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My point of privilege is this—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hales: I ask the minister directly: Why was there publication of these facts in advance?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Because there is an agreement.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock. I will recognize him before the end of the question period, but the hon. member for Hamilton West rises on a point of order.

Mr. Alexander: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, in view of the interest that has now been created in this project, I hope the minister will table the conditions that have to be met by this company so that we can all be made aware of the type of conditions set.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I did not say that.

Mr. Rondeau: Can the minister tell the House whether this new bill to kill innocent human beings will be presented before the legislation maintaining the abolition of the death penalty?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the basic assumption of the member's question, and I repeat that the government will take no step in that direction before hon. members have had a chance to make their views known in the House.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNITED STATES IMPORT SURTAX—POSSIBILITY OF LIFTING IN VIEW OF INCREASED IMPORTS FROM UNITED STATES AND LEVEL OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. As the Canadian dollar is now 7 per cent to 8 per cent above its former pegged level and Canadian imports from the United States are rising, so that Canada would seem to have fulfilled U.S. requirements for the lifting of the surcharge, is there any indication that this may occur?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Not at this point, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to indicate to hon. members that the question period expired five minutes ago. I have again tried to take a note of hon. members who did not have a chance today to ask questions. They will be given priority tomorrow, just as I tried to do today for those who did not get a chance to ask questions yesterday. Orders of the day.

[Translation]

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Sainte-Marie on a question of privilege.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, this is my question of privilege. For nearly 45 minutes now, I have been trying to attract your attention in order to ask the ministers concerned and the government questions on topics now in the limelight and related to over 350 unemployed in Montreal. Because of our rules, we cannot ask questions to ministers and get answers on urgent matters concerning rather important groups of people. I think that as members of this House we should be able in this place and without any restriction to discuss problems of general interest. That is why I am raising the question of privilege. I ask that the Standing Orders be amended to allow all members to raise important issues. If our questions continue to be treated as they are at the present time, our rights are being encroached upon to the extent that a member of Parliament is unable to raise in this House and before the people of this country, problems that are very important to us.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton Centre has a question of privilege.

Mr. Paproski: It is a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have been trying for the last week and a half, to ask a question of the Postmaster General and I would just like to know whether he will be in the House tomorrow or if someone will appear for him. Further, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce was to be in the House today but he is not here. It makes it rather difficult for us on this side to ask questions if these ministers are not in the House.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, we have a roster system on this side of the House and, as acting minister, I am quite prepared to answer any questions for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Skoberg: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, some weeks ago my colleague from Battleford-Kindersley directed Your Honour's attention to the utter impossibility of hearing in this chamber. We are still confronted with the same situation. All we are hearing is part of what is said and the rest is garbled. We could hear much better before this new sound system was installed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Skoberg: I wonder if anything further is being done.

An hon. Member: Who put it in, anyway?

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate that the hon. member and some other hon. members raised this point some time ago. I believe that efforts are being made from day to day, and particularly over the weekends when members are not in the chamber, to improve the system. It is a new system, and as hon. members realize it may be a while before it is entirely satisfactory. Certainly I can assure hon. members that there is an awareness of this difficulty and an attempt by officials of the House to try to improve the situation. The hon. member for Fraser Valley West.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, my intervention is really on the same point of privilege, but it involves another side of the question dealing with the sound system. On those occasions when an answer is given in the official language other than that spoken by the particular member who asked the question, the matter is further complicated by the fact that, with the normal translation time lag, by the time the translated reply comes through there is little time for the member to form a supplementary question in light of the information given in the reply. I realize, Sir, that you have many problems with hundreds of eager interrogators every day, but when the reply is given in another language I am wondering if a little greater time lag could be allowed between the original response and the time in which to ask a supplementary?

Mr. Speaker: That suggestion will also be taken into account. I will try to follow the debates through the interpretation from now on.

Mr. Muir: On the same question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, and with reference to what has been said by the previous speaker, frankly, Sir, I do not think any blame whatsoever should be placed on the translators because they are excellent people and do an extremely good job.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Muir: However, it is most difficult for a translator, no matter how qualified or experienced he is, to translate some of the replies given in French by certain ministers.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, on the same question of privilege, I should like to raise a particular point of which you are well aware.

We agree indeed with previous speakers. The system is unsatisfactory. We have recently complained about it, especially in the committee of the whole. Such is not the object of my question of privilege.

For some time now, Mr. Speaker, you must have noticed that we, Créditistes, have been putting very few questions during the question period. But we do make up for it during other periods. The reason for this is very simple and we understand the problems that the Chair is facing, given the number of members who wish to put questions.

But the system of supplementary questions has become so abusive that backbenchers or Créditistes members are seldom able to slip in, as an average, more than two or three questions a week.

Once our leader or a representative of our party has managed to put a question, it gives rise to a lot of supplementaries and the right of other members to ask questions is encroached upon.

I do not rise on a question of privilege to blame the Chair. I am convinced that the Speaker understands my point of view, but I would like to appeal to my colleagues, especially those who sit on this side, so that they may understand the problem and that we may reach an agreement in order to establish a fairer distribution for all members.

The question period is an important period during which the government reports on various current events. This means that if western Canada is interested in some problems, eastern Canada is interested in others. However, if the members persist in asking supplementaries, one or two could be asked but not ten or fifteen, as it too often happens.

Mr. Speaker, on the one hand you cannot hurt the members, and on the other hand we cannot participate in the debate.

I therefore appeal, not so much to the Chair, as to my colleagues on this extremely important point, that every member might be allowed to fulfil his duty, not only during the debates, as we do, but also during the question period.

• (3:10 p.m.)

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I intended to raise a point of order for the following reason: twice, during the week, I was able to ask questions, one of which was directed to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the other to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang), having regard to a critical problem in Quebec, that is unemployment; the Prime Minister refused to answer my question because the Minister of Manpower and Immigration was not in the House.

Yesterday, the minister was in the House and I tried to get an answer from him. Today, he was again in the House, and, even if ministers are sometimes unavoidably absent, and we understand this, we do not accept this system. Ministers, upon their return to the House, should answer the questions, this would reduce the number of questions and of supplementaries and would speed up the business of the House.

[English]

Mr. Ryan: Mr. Speaker, on the same point, it appears to me that the problem is more acute on Tuesday and Thursday. I think by this time the government should be in a position where they might want to compromise the roster scheme somewhat. I suggest that on Tuesday and Thursday the question period be 60 minutes and the full panoply of ministers be present, or as many of them as possible. I think this would solve the problem.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have noted the suggestions made by hon. members and I can assure them that I agree with nearly everything that has been said these last few minutes.

[English]

I am in full agreement with many of these points, some of which have been made before. However, hon. members will appreciate that if the question period is to be lengthened or shortened, it is not for the Speaker to decide; that should be done by agreement between hon. members following discussion before the relevant and responsible committee.

The hon. member for Lotbinière referred to a very serious problem which came up today, that is the number of supplementaries on the first questions. If hon. members insist on asking four, five, six or more supplementary questions on the first or second matter brought up, and very often these are by members of the front bench, it is just about impossible for hon. members behind them to be given an opportunity to ask questions.

Mr. McCleave: Cut them off.

Mr. Speaker: The suggestion is made that they be cut off, and I have sometimes tried to do that but it is difficult without the co-operation of hon. members themselves. I would hope that co-operation will be extended, and I can assure hon. members that from day to day I shall continue to try to permit as many of them as I can to ask their questions. What I have tried to do for some time is to ensure that hon. members who are not recognized on one day be given priority the next. That is what I tried to do today, although I may not have been entirely successful. I did attempt it, however, and I shall continue to do so.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order in connection with the Business of the House to advise hon. members that we will continue with the committee discussion of the present bill tomorrow and next week until Wednesday or Thursday, when I intend to call opposition days.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the hon. House leader. Since the members of my party have drawn straws and I picked the one that calls upon me to open the debate on the next group of clauses of Bill C-259, could the minister indicate what sections we will deal with after section 4 to 8.

Perhaps the President of the Privy Council would not mind if I state, on behalf of all members who want to take part in the debate when we are in committee, what I think is a legitimate grievance. It is felt that there should be some method or perhaps a better method of communication with reference to the specific point to be discussed. If we could have some listing, even five or six categories ahead, that would make it much easier for those who, like myself, are stuck with the rather awful responsibility. I know my friend from Winnipeg North Centre and others would agree with me.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I agree with my hon. friend, and I think his point is well taken, that in view of the procedure we are following in committee of the whole, members should have some advance warning as to the various items to be discussed. We are attempting to do this but we are really just getting this particular system under way.

In reply, and with your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, I should like to advise my hon. friend that committee of the whole is to deal with proposed sections 4 to 8 on the question of computation of income. It was proposed and agreed that following this we would deal with other subjects under the general head of personal income, and call the appropriate sections that would permit a discussion of these other items. This would include, for example, averaging, rate schedules, child care, moving expenses, fellowships, training allowances, research grants and generally any other item that would fall under the heading of personal income. The subjects I have mentioned are those singled out by the House leaders as those upon which hon. members might want to comment in a particular way. That is what we would do in committee today and tomorrow.

Mr. McCleave: When we are through with sections 4 to 8, then, which sections do we deal with in the next three categories? Let me put it on a very specified basis.

Mr. MacEachen: After sections 4 to 8, in order to deal, for example, with income averaging we would call perhaps section 28 upon which to hinge the discussion. But there are other proposed sections which deal with the same subject.

Mr. McCleave: My friend is saying section 58 plus allied sections dealing with averaging?

Mr. MacEachen: Under income averaging, proposed section 28 with associated sections. The rate schedule is proposed section 117 and associated proposed sections. I could give my hon. friend—

Mr. McCleave: Child care is section 63?

Mr. MacEachen: Section 56, for example, would permit us to discuss fellowships, scholarships, bursaries, training allowances and research grants. We would call proposed section 56 and hinge the discussion around that section and carry all allied sections under the same system.

Having given my hon. friend that kind of information, I hope to be able to do it on a more systematic basis and have in the hands of all hon. members sheets which will indicate the subject matters that the House leaders have highlighted, presumably to carry forward the wishes of the various parties and the allied sections that would be carried in connection with that subject head.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, at the risk of being a bore, may I ask another question? I think my hon. friend indicated that after the averaging provisions, found in section 28 and further on, and the rate schedules, which involve eight schedules to be found at section 117 and associated sections, we should consider the child care provisions, as included in section 63 and then the fellowship provisions, which are found in section 56. Am I correct in assuming that child care will be the third item in our consideration and that fellowships will be considered next, as the fourth item?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, that would be agreeable.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, was it not the understanding that all those things my hon. friend mentioned are in the same category?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I was making the point that all the subjects that the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants has alluded to are in the same category and that we will take that whole group after we have finished the sections we are now considering. If I may anticipate what we are to take after that, the next group of subsections will deal with capital gains.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I think that this matter is settled. I come now to the question of privilege of a short while ago.

Since the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) is anxious to speed up the business of the House and in order not to let that heavy task fall on your shoulders, I wonder whether the President of the Privy Council could not this very day enter into negotiations with the House leaders of the other parties in an effort to find some way to improve the procedure during the question period. Let us not just remain at the discussion level, but let us go into action and find a better system. Could not the President of the Privy Council say whether he agrees with that system or if he would not prefer to have a consensus in view of improving the present system and assist the Chair?

[English]

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, if it is the wish of the House leaders, I would be glad to discuss the question of the question period and see whether we can introduce some new procedures to make it more satisfactory to all hon. members of the House. I would be happy to do that at an early meeting of House leaders.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. President of the Privy Council also agree that the Speaker in his capacity as a member of the House, may take part in these discussions with parliamentary leaders.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is obviously not in order. I suggest to the hon. member that he cannot involve the Chair in discussions he may have with the government representative.

[English]

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, I am merely rising to indicate that we would certainly be agreeable to entering into such discussions with the House leader of the government.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed, from Wednesday, October 27, consideration in committee of Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act—Mr. Benson—Mr. Honey in the chair.

On clause 1—section 4: Income or loss from a source or from sources in a place.

The Chairman: Order, please. When the committee rose last evening, section 4 was before the committee. It had been agreed to include sections 5, 6, 7 and 8 with section 4 for the purposes of discussion. Shall section 4 carry?

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make some brief comments, particularly upon subsection (6) of section 6, which is related to subsections 7 and 8 immediately following. This matter was raised yesterday by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. As hon. members of the committee will note if they look at this part, this provision is a modification of paragraph 5(2) of the present act.

My initial comment on this matter must be that it is better to do something late than never. I rise to support this particular proposal in the bill because it is something I have been seeking to have included in the Income Tax Act for over 15 years. In 1956, the Liberal minister of finance, Hon. Walter Harris, indicated to me after I had been raising this matter for two or three sessions that, in his view, there was a discrimination in this regard in the Income Tax Act as it then stood and as it still stands after having been modified. The act discriminated against those who maintain a domestic establishment in one place and, as a result of their employment, have to leave home, pay room and board elsewhere as well as travelling expenses in order to undertake their particular kind of work. Our attempts to convince the government that the law in this regard discriminated against a group of workers have been long and arduous.

The particular groups of workers in my area, and in British Columbia generally, who have been most affected by this discrimination are the loggers. Over a period, three of their organizations have made many submissions on this subject to the government. Those submissions were well reasoned and well documented. I am sure that those organizations welcome the change that is being brought forward because, at long last, they will be treated with the same degree of equity as other segments in the work force of our society have been treated in connection with expense allowances. I am thinking in particular of those who may have been working in a managerial capacity.

Recently I had the opportunity to speak to a union convention in Vancouver. A large number of loggers were there as delegates. I told them that this proposal was in the Income Tax Act after 15 years of argument on this subject, that I had read the section rather carefully and that, so far as I could see, the wording of the law covered the point adequately. I reminded them, and I should like to remind hon. members of the committee and the ministers concerned, in particular the Minister of National Revenue, that from time to time that minister's department issue what we refer to as information bulletins. These bulletins often indicate what the law means for practical purposes. I told them, as I now say to members of the committee, that I hope the information bulletins put out by the Department of National Revenue will place a proper and reasonable interpretation upon the application of this proposed section of the Income Tax Act so that it will provide the kind of situation which, from my reading of the proposed clause, it is intended to provide for these taxpayers.

I hope there will be no battles as the result of an interpretation being placed on that section which is so narrow and restrictive as to make the section practically worthless. That is something that those of us who are concerned about the matter will be watching, and if the subsection is not construed to mean what its language in my opinion clearly intends, there will, of course, be some battles in and out of the chamber on that subject.

I think I have made it clear that when the government does take a step which I consider to be right and proper, as one who sits on the opposition side of the House, I am quite happy to commend the government for its action. Perhaps my appreciation may be all the more heartfelt because of the fact it has taken 15 years for me to get to the point where I can stand in this chamber and say the words I am saying today. I hope the minister will recognize the fact that we are trying to take a fair look at his bill. We will praise it when praise is merited. However, we will differ from it where we feel it is not working in the best interests of the Canadian people.

Mr. Otto: Mr. Chairman, I am going to deal with section 7. This is the section that treats shares that are given to employees during the year as income. In view of the situation in which we in Canada are going to find ourselves, I am not so sure I fully support this view. A little while ago I might have, but it seems that in the next few months, year or two years, we are going to be looking for Canadian shareholders. We will be trying to entice them to hold shares, preferably in the plants and concerns in which they are employed. Some incentive has to be given to them. If these shares are treated as income during the current year, that is not exactly an incentive.

I say to the Minister of Finance that we are also going to be faced with the problem of productivity. I have stated on many occasions that it is always very bad when we have labour-management problems and when we have low productivity on the part of Canadian workmen. The question always arises, how can we induce Canadians to produce more? I suggest that one of the best ways is to give them a piece of the action. In other words, we should make it enticing and advantageous for workmen, employees, junior executives and senior executives to own shares in the plants and concerns in which they are employed. I hope that over a period of time labour-management negotiations will not be based on a wage differential or, for example, the desire for an extra two or three days. I hope that over a period of time negotiations will be based on organized labour requiring more shares of the company.

One of the great problems of our economy is that we do not have enough shareholders. I dare say if we investigated the members in this House, a handful might be owners of shares in Canadian corporations. Of that handful, the chances are that most of them have acquired shares in penny stocks and mining shares. If some elevator operator says it is a good idea to buy Moose Pasture No. 1, Canadians will immediately go out and buy it. However, as far as holding investments from a long range point of view, Canadians do not hold shares. The share holdings are restricted to very small groups.

One of our problems of distribution of dividends is that there are not enough people to whom we can distribute them. In other words, there is not a broad spectrum of shareholders. Instead of taxing shares in companies in which the taxpayers are employed on a full-time basis, it would be preferable to tax them on a 50 per cent basis. An inducement such as that would be more likely to have the effect that the employees would own a big chunk of the business in which they are employed. In order to get more dividends and also the capital gains, which are also included in the latter part of this bill, there would be an inducement to be productive.

If the minister investigates the companies in Canada which now have or have had a share distribution plan, he will find that these are the companies which are more productive. They have less problems with management because everyone is in on the action. To start out immediately under this new bill and say that if you happen to get shares in your company, they will be treated as income for the current year will be no inducement to employees to hold shares. I seriously recommend that the minister review his thoughts on this section. Instead of the full value of the shares presumed to be income, that provision should be amended to read 50 per cent of the value of the shares.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I wonder if I might direct a question to the parliamentary secretary, since there are going to be further observations about the matter as we go along. Under sections 109 and 110, I raised the point of the rationale for establishing age 21 as the age of majority. Certain provinces have now made 18 the legal age of majority. We understand that the province of Quebec proposes to introduce legislation in the very near future to the same effect. Nearly 80 per cent of young Canadians will be subject to a legal age of majority of 18, yet this income tax bill treats the division as age 21. I would like a clear understanding from the Department of Finance on this whole question.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, for clarification, may I reply? I think the hon. member will appreciate that there was some confusion when he was starting his remarks. Is the member referring to the same item he raised the other day in connection with the exemption being extended to a child resident in his parents' home until age 21?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Yes, Mr. Chairman, that is so. That is one of them. I did not hear any explanation or answer to my question. I know this is going to arise in relation to paragraph 63, child care expenses, where the relative who is disqualified is under the age of 21. We are getting this continued use of the age 21 throughout the piece. I am giving the parliamentary secretary due notice.

I raised this matter the other day and I am again raising it. I am sure some of my colleagues and possibly some of the members opposite will raise the point again in the future. I think this matter should be looked at. There may be a valid reason why the present status should be left as is, but I fail to see it at the present time.

I now wish to turn to section 4 (4) which appears at the foot of page 4. I am wondering whether this is one of those sections which have been thrown in to grant extraordinary discretionary powers of judgment to the minister. When I was discussing this matter at an earlier stage I indicated that, somehow, it always appears that the advantage shall lie with the Crown. Never is there equity on behalf of the taxpayer or never is the situation even as between the two, even though the law is patently unfair. It was always interpreted in such a way that the Crown cannot lose. I am wondering whether this is one of those sections. In any event I invite the parliamentary secretary or the minister to give us in reasonable terms, in clear language, an explanation of what is meant by this subsection. I read:

• (3:40 p.m.)

Unless a contrary intention is evident, no provision of this Part shall be read or construed to require the inclusion or to permit the deduction, in computing the income of a taxpayer for a taxation year or his income or loss for a taxation year from a particular source or from sources in a particular place, of any amount to the extent that that amount has been included or deducted, as the case may be, in computing such income or loss under, in accordance with or by virtue of any other provision of this Part.

I am sorry, but my legal training and experience to date have not enabled me to translate into straightforward language what the drafters of the legislation meant by this particular paragraph. It is a new paragraph, and therefore it has not been the subject of any previous departmental rulings or of interpretation by tax consultants. Sub-paragraph (2) is also a new provision but it does not appear to give us much difficulty. We have seen many instances of tax authorities saying that this bill, using new terms, has unfortunately led to an entirely new family of language which is thoroughly unfamiliar to the profession and even less familiar to a taxpayer. There is no way of arriving at a ruling.

I want to go back to a point I made on second reading. The efficacy of a tax statute and the justice of a tax statute depend upon the ability of the person who has to pay the tax to understand it. We are now being led into an even greater maze of uncertainty all the way along. I cannot understand how government members, particularly, can claim in this House that they are engaging in tax reform when they are asking us to inflict upon the country an income tax act even less comprehensible than the existing one. This does not make sense. The charge of obscurity has been a common charge, even taking into account the fact that lack of familiarity with new sections leads to difficulty and that some people throw up their hands and say the changes must be bad because they cannot be understood. But even those whose experience has given them considerable practice in the interpretation of these subsections cannot say how this legislation will work out.

This is illustrated by the point I am trying to make in connection with section (4) subsection (iv): there are many businesses today whose business operations in 1971 will be subject to law in 1972. That law will be retroactive. They cannot understand it now, and as a matter of fact the transactions into which they enter in 1971 will be subject to a law which they did not even know existed, because the bill had not been published. This is an example of what I call the latent injustice which appears in the bill. Hon. members may be puzzled as to what I am saying, but in actual fact this is so. In due course we shall come to some sections which will show that there are retroactive features in this bill, in particular dealing with business, covering transactions which occurred maybe six months before this bill had even been published. This is an example of the injustice which occurs as a result of imprecise language or muddled language and sections which are very difficult to interpret.

I should like to turn to section 6, because there we are dealing with certain items which must be included in the income of an individual. A lot of the wording is carried forward from the existing act. I do not think we have any problems with 6(1)(a) or with 6(1)(b) which, again, is a carry-forward. Then, we come to something which is new, namely, 6(1)(e) dealing with the stand-by charge for automobiles. This will certainly lead to litigation. There are no two ways about it. The results are likely to be most unfair. The automobile referred to is to be made available for personal use or otherwise. Now, if the main purpose of the automobile is for business, does the section apply? Or is it caught by, maybe, a 5 per cent or 10 per cent segment that is for personal use? The phrase in parenthesis appearing at line 25 does not assist us—

"Exclusive" may be read as meaning for the benefit of that one employee as opposed to several employees rather than referring to an exclusive type of use.

These are the difficulties which arise when we say "for his exclusive personal use or otherwise". Does it mean it is exclusive personal use or does it cover other circumstances? If an employee has to share an automobile with others, why should he be hit for a charge? This is the nature of the imprecise language which is used.

Then, we come to Section 6(2). The leasing formula and the capital formula could result in different contributions to an employee depending on the type of arrangement the employer makes. The employee's benefit is constant. But why would it not have been better to use a percentage based on the cost of the car? Whether the car is leased or owned, what is the difference? The question is, what is it that we are taxing? It is the value to an employee of an automobile that has been given to him for his personal use, not for his business use but his personal use. Therefore, why go into a whole rigmarole as to whether the car is leased by the firm or owned by the firm? What effect has that on the nature of the tax? Why does the tax department concern itself with that consideration? All that is being done is the allocation to the employee for his personal use of a car worth so many dollars. That an employee can understand, and that I can understand; indeed, I think just about anybody can understand it. Instead of that, we are taken down the garden path by a long formula. I do not think that this provision helps this statute.

Section 6(1)(f) deals with employment insurance benefits, and here again I think an injustice is done. The employee is charged with the benefits if the employer makes a contribution. In such case the benefit received is taxed as a deduction for the dollar value of the premiums paid by the employee. If the employee pays all of the contributions then the benefits are not taxable; but should his employer pay just $1, then all of the benefits less the employee's portion of the premiums are chargeable. I cannot see the logic of this. Would it not be more consistent to base the benefit of the employee on that portion that is paid? If his employer pays half the premiums, then why not charge half of the benefits to the employee? If the employer pays 10 per cent, then the employee should only be charged with 10 per cent of the benefits. I think that is the only way.

I should like to pass on now to section 6(8). Here again I should like to reiterate the arguments made by a number of my colleagues. Frankly, I cannot see in this day and age why we are establishing that in business terms a wife is to be regarded separately from her husband, particularly in cases where a husband and wife are working together. Why cannot a distinction be made between them?

I would say this provision is an unnecessary exercise. It is a shame to force the husband to incorporate his business. He owns all the shares, though his solicitor can hold one qualifying share in order to make it a private company. His wife can work as a secretary or clerk and receive pay, but her income is treated separately and the parties are taxed as two individuals. In many cases in order to do this work the wife has to hire assistance to take care of her children, which would qualify her for child care benefits. However, under the act we consistently deny this distinction between husband and wife. Not only is the salary paid to the wife not considered as an expense of the business, but she will not be able to qualify under the child care benefit provision of the act.

Even further than that, suppose the husband is in partnership with one or more individuals. Let us take the case of two or three doctors and a dentist who are in partnership in a small country town. In order to operate their office efficiently the wife of one of them, who may be a trained nurse, acts as a nursing assistant or as nurse-receptionist at their clinic. In order to do so, however, she has to hire someone to look after her children. At the present time, because her husband is a member of a partnership her salary is not deductible as an expense of the partnership. Even though this is a legitimate expenditure that is normal for such a business, just because she happens to be the wife of one of the partners her salary is not regarded as a business expense. In addition to that, section 63 denies this wife who is acting as a receptionist to the doctors and dentist, child care allowance.

If the parliamentary secretary would rather I got away from the professions, take the case of the trucking firm, the plastering firm or two or three plumbers who work together. They do not incorporate their business and have good reason not to do so. As my colleague from Lambton-Kent pointed out, because of credit restrictions or other conditions banks may prefer them not to incorporate. Nevertheless, someone has to keep the books and answer the telephone on a half day basis.

The Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, and I do so only to advise him and the committee that his time has expired.

Mr. McCleave: Continue.

The Chairman: Does the committee give unanimous consent?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, if the parliamentary secretary wishes to speak, let him do so.

• (4:00 p.m.)

Mr. Mahoney: We seem to be building up a good sized inventory of inquiries and comments, so probably I should take an opportunity to deal with at least some of these.

The question which the hon. member for Edmonton West just raised was brought to us in terms of the "Momma and Poppa corner store" by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants and a number of other speakers during consideration of sections 4 to 8 of the bill. The provision they are actually complaining about is contained in section 74(4).

Mr. McCleave: Section 6(8).

Mr. Mahoney: No, to be perfectly clear, section 6(8) contains the saving provision which makes certain that people who receive that kind of income, which is not deductible by the husband, do not have to include it in their income. To make it very clear, they are not taxed on the payments their spouse would not be able to deduct from his income. Strictly speaking, the problem complained about arises in section 74, and with respect I would suggest that is the place to deal with the point. The point has been noted and we certainly will deal with it at that time.

The question of exclusive use of an automobile in section 6(1)(e) has been raised by a number of speakers. The word "exclusive" there is designed to make sure that the benefit is taxable in the hands of the taxpayer, whether the vehicle is for his exclusive personal use or for mixed business and personal use, and it goes back to the root definition of income being the sum total of benefits which the taxpayer obtains from his employment.

The matter of salary continuation insurance or income maintenance plans referred to in section 6(1)(f) has also been raised on numerous occasions. Some members have suggested that an employee should be able to deduct his premiums, or a portion of the benefits attributable to that part of the premium paid by the employee should not be taxable. The bill before the House does provide that an employee may not deduct his premiums paid to a plan each year, but when a benefit is received the employee will be able to deduct from the benefit all premiums paid since 1967, not previously deducted. In other words, he will be allowed his own contributions free of tax before any amount is added to his income. Again, we get back to the root concept of a man's income being the sum total of benefits he receives from employment.

The matter of strike pay was raised in an inquiry by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants. The bill does not provide for taxation on strike pay in the hands of the recipient. The question of employee stock options has been raised by the hon. member as well as by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Supply and Services and one or two others. Here again, there is no significant change in this bill from the law as it exists. Members, raising this point, have taken exception to a change in the present Income Tax Act which was made a couple of years ago, which did remove some exceptionally favourable treatment that was accorded taxpayers in a position to receive stock option plans. This is a valid point and it is an important point but there is no change proposed in this bill from the existing law.

The matter of expenses of workmen employed away from home was welcomed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre as the result of long effort by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, which has finally been rewarded. I am happy to note that welcome and the congratulations from that side in respect of this action. Certainly I must say I regard it as a very significant step forward.

The question of union dues was also raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, with reference to section 8(1)(i). The hon. member expressed the assumption that special assessments might be included for deduction of union dues. This section is not changed at all from the previous law. There is no particular reason to think at this point that the Department of National Revenue will interpret this section of the bill any differently from the way in which it interprets the identical section in the existing Income Tax Act. Officials of the Department of National Revenue have advised me that annual membership dues to a union are deductible even though part of the dues may be earmarked for a strike fund, but a special levy that is imposed because of a particular event, which represents more of a one shot thing rather than a year after year or annual payment, is not deductible. Section 8(5)(c) is relevant to this and I should call it to the hon. member's attention. This paragraph provides that annual dues are not deductible under section 8 when they are paid for any purpose not directly related to the operating expenses of the trade union to which they were paid. An example has been cited in which a portion of the annual dues have been earmarked to build up a fund to help finance housing for members of the union, or something like that, and that might not be deductible. As I said before, this particular section is unchanged from the existing Income Tax Act.

The matter of employment expenses and allowances has been noted by a number of members, and this is under section 8(1) (a) (i). This debate has been going on since the white paper was tabled with its proposals which are essentially carried forward in this bill unchanged, and no doubt was carried on well before that when many people saw a measure of inequity in that a salary or wage earner is not allowed to deduct many of the expenses incurred in earning income whereas the proprietor frequently can, and whereas an executive often has those expenses paid for him by his employer, which in turn are deductible by the employees. It has been suggested that the $150 ceiling be changed to a tax credit or that it be increased in some way. The law permits a deduction for a substantial number of specific expenses such as the union dues I have just mentioned, and other expenses of employees which are described in section 8 and various subsections, including expenses for meals and lodging incurred by employees who have to travel in the course of their employment, legal expenses incurred in collecting salaries and wages, and so on. This bill does introduce in the 3 per cent or $150 ceiling an employee expense allowance which is an important new deduction. The bill also introduces a new deduction in terms of unemployment insurance premiums. It also makes an important change in section 6(6), extending to all employees the right to exclude benefits in cash for kind received from an employer to cover the cost of travelling to or living at a distant work site. This was also the cause of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

The new general deduction is an attempt to provide a deduction for other expenses. The requests for deductions of a more general nature have been studied for many years by governments, but this is a very difficult problem. One of the main difficulties is finding a reasonable and fair stopping place, if a start were made to allow new deductions for amounts spent by an employee in connection with his employment.

In addition to tools used by garage mechanics there are tools used by other trades such as carpenters, painters, plumbers and radio repair men. Expenses for getting to and from work are regarded by many as expenses necessarily incurred to earn salaries or wages. In some cases special clothing is required. Some employees, such as teachers and clergymen, find they have to buy books, tape recorders and typewriters to perform their work. A case can be made that amounts spent on all these items and numerous other items should be deducted in computing income. But if such a list of deductions were allowed, there would be a very real problem in checking and controlling all the receipts involved, and the substantial loss of revenue that would result would have to be recovered eslewhere in higher rates of tax on the remaining taxable income or perhaps through other forms of taxation than income tax.

As I said, this 3 per cent deduction is an important step. Combined with the other deductions permitted to employees, such as moving expenses and so on that are new under this bill, the estimate of the revenue loss in this area is $285 million, the first year that the new system is in effect based on the 1970 income tax payments. This is the largest single income reduction item in the package, taking into account that the rate schedules plus the exemptions should be treated as a package. So, I suggest that it is a great step forward. It is one that I am sure the government will watch with interest to see how it works. I hope we will find some way of creating more equity, but I commend it to hon. members as a very important new approach in the Canadian tax law.

The question of meals claimed away from home under section 8 (g) was raised by the hon. member for Portneuf and also the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka. The problem that they seem to be raising is not related to any provision in the bill itself, but to the manner in which that item is administered at present by the Department of National Revenue. I do not note any significant change in the bill on that particular item. I can only say I am confident that the Minister of National Revenue will receive reasonable representations in this regard from taxpayers who feel aggrieved. He may, indeed, be able to point out to the hon. members who questioned the matter the fact that perhaps there is more than one side to some of the representations that are being made.

Mr. Skoberg: Different sizes of stomachs.

Mr. Mahoney: The expenses of an employee working away from home and going home on weekends was raised by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka. He suggested that it might be covered under the provisions of section 8 (h) of the bill. I suggest that probably he is stretching 8 (h) if he thinks that it will go that far.

The hon. member for Regina East raised the question of transportation of handicapped persons to and from work. This, again, is a difficult subject. I think it was dealt with in essence in our debate on section 110, and I would refer the hon. member to the various improvements that are made in this bill in section 110 as opposed to the existing act when it comes to deductions for medical expenses and the other very well deserved concessions to handicapped persons.

The hon. member for Dauphin raised the matter of the carry forward of losses from employment under section 5(2). I would suggest with respect that the hon. member is in error in suggesting that a loss from employment could not be carried forward or back in the same way as a business loss. I think he misunderstands the section, and I would refer him to section 111(b) at page 292 of the bill which contains the definition of non-capital loss and includes in that definition a loss from employment. A non-capital loss may be carried forward five years and back one year.

The hon. member for Edmonton West again raised the matter of ages under the bill. I must say that I am inclined to agree that he has a point in the allusion that he made to the age in section 63(a)(iii)(B), the baby sitting section. I did respond to his questions regarding section 109(1)(d) the other day. Evidently he did not hear me. I would refer him to my remarks rather than repeat them. When he studies them he might conclude that a change in that section would impose a heavier burden on taxpayers rather than be a relief. He might feel that a parent claiming an exemption for a child should not have to prove that a child between the age of 18 and 21 is either in an educational institution or handicapped in order to get that exemption.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): You do now for those over 21.

Mr. Mahoney: That is correct, but the change from 21 to 18 would mean that you would have to do it for those over 18 rather than 21, so perhaps it is not an improvement.

I would also draw the hon. member's attention to the change in section 75 dealing with the income from property, gifts to minors, and note that one of the government amendments presently before the House proposes to change the traditional age in that regard from 19 down to 18. There may be other sections but, as I said, I am inclined to think that the hon. member has a pretty good point on section 63. I will call it to the minister's attention.

So far as section 4(4) is concerned, the hon. member requested an explanation of that. Again, on reflection I would think that he should appreciate that this is a clarifying section which is desirable from the taxpayers point of view. It makes clear that an amount does not have to be included in income more than once, and also of course that a deduction cannot be taken more than once in the computation of income or loss. The reason for this is the considerable amount of emphasis throughout the bill, and particularly in this subdivision of the bill, on the sources of income. It is important to make sure that an item of income that is included from one source does not, by some technicality or other, have to be included again, and likewise that a deduction taken from one source of income cannot also be claimed against another source of income. It may be overly fastidious to have included this but it is a clarifying rather than a substantive section. I will check the inventory again. I hope I have caught up all the loose ends. If I have not, I will certainly try to do so.

Mr. McCleave: May I raise a point of order at this time? My point of order arises out of something which the parliamentary secretary said with regard to the representation that I made and which the hon. member for Lambton-Kent and others made about the mamma and papa provision which is contained in section 6(8). I think the parliamentary secretary made a reasonable representation and it would be agreeable I think that we deal with that later on. I hope we will always have the wisdom, if it turns out that section 6(8) is all that essential, to give ourselves leeway to come back and make any changes there. I should like to be heard later on about other matters arising out of the statement, but I realize that I am up on a point of order and I will not indulge myself now.

The Chairman: I would normally see the hon. member who is on his feet, but I think members of the committee will agree that because of the very useful line that the hon. member for Edmonton West took and which was responded to by the parliamentary secretary it would facilitate the work of the committee if I were now to see the hon. member for Edmonton West.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I will not abuse this privilege. Actually, I do not think I will use all of the time allotted to me.

I should like to return to section 6(1)(a). This provision includes in an employee's income an employer's contribution to public health schemes, but only on the basis that the benefit under the scheme depends on the employer making the contribution. In other words, in the provinces of Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta under the medicare schemes presently in force, because the employer has to participate by way of an agreement in a contribution to the scheme, the employee receives a taxable benefit to the extent of the employer's contribution. But strangely enough in the province of Quebec there is no question of agreement or otherwise. The employer's contribution to medicare is by way of a separate tax under a provincial statute. Therefore we find there is a distinction, between one part of the country and another, for employees receiving the same sort of benefit. In Quebec, the employer must contribute to the medicare scheme. In Ontario, as a result of collective bargaining, the employer has to contribute to the medicare scheme. In the province of Alberta and in the province of British Columbia the employee has to pay for it, by reason of an addition to his income at the margin on which he will pay marginal rates.

I just cannot see that as equity between taxpayers, and after all the government did say that one of the things it was striving for was equity between taxpayers. I do not disagree that you can handle taxpayers differently, but do not tell us you are going to handle them the same way. It seems to me that to determine the tax consequences to an employee on the wording of a provincial statute is absolutely the wrong way to proceed in a federal statute. And let us not hear any nonsense that the provinces should change their medicare schemes, to make the premiums under medicare a complete charge to the consolidated revenue fund of the provinces, in order to do away with this. There was never a condition precedent under any medicare scheme that such should be the case. To try to force this through the Income Tax Act is totally wrong and is, in effect, saying it is up to the provincial administration to change the set up.

Why not tax the employee in Quebec for the value of the tax paid by the employer towards the medicare scheme? It is a payment for the benefit of the employee. But because it is a tax, apparently the department doesn't want to do it, or are they scared to do it?

Mr. Peters: Maybe both.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): If it is fair to tax an Ontario employee for the benefit of his employer's contribution to a medicare premium under a provincial statute, or in Alberta or British Columbia, then it is equally fair to tax the one in Quebec. If you are not going to do it for the Quebec employee, then you should not do it for the others. But for goodness sake, treat that category of employees who are receiving part of their premiums under a medicare scheme from an employer equally and not as proposed in this bill.

I would like now to turn to the employment expense deduction. Here, I find some real anomalies. I am not going to say anything about the amount of $150, whether it is right or wrong. I am not going to say anything about whether it should be provided or should not be provided. Frankly, I do not particularly care that it should be provided. I have never been a great devotee of this particular feature because it seems to me that it discriminates, and it confers on certain employees a benefit to which they are not entitled.

When the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was speaking yesterday I gave him examples of what I considered to be anomalies. You may say that a $150 employment expense deduction for the office boy and junior stenographers in a large concern would be most welcome. I am sure they will welcome it, but if you take the case of a $75,000 a year president of a company, he too will be entitled to the $150. The president of the Canadian National, the president of the CBC and the Governor of the Bank of Canada will all be entitled to this $150. Every deputy minister is an employee entitled to it, unless such individual has an otherwise tax free allowance, such as a Member of Parliament, a city alderman, or member of a provincial legislature. Those individuals do not qualify, but all others who are employees qualify. The $150 for the man whose marginal rate is 40 per cent or 50 per cent is pretty nice, but for the man or woman whose marginal rate is 15 per cent or 17 per cent the deduction from total income really means a saving of very little, because this $150 is not deductible from your tax. This $150 is deductible from gross income.

I find these flat rate deductions to be wrong in principle, the same way that I find a flat rate exemption allowance creates some great disparities. Why do you do this? Let me give an example of it in my own profession, that of a lawyer. We will take a large law firm with a great number of staff lawyers. They will all be entitled to the working allowance. But just down the corridor are a couple of struggling young lawyers who will not be entitled to any of these travelling or employment expenses because they are self-employed.

• (4:30 p.m.)

Mr. Leblanc: They deduct their own expenses.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): They cannot. This allowance will go toward the cost of travelling back and forth to the job for a stenographer or an office boy or the worker in a factory, because it is known as an employment expense deduction. In the same bus or subway car will be the self-employed lawyer or accountant—the hon. member for Laurier should know and should stand up for his profession—but they cannot qualify.

An hon. Member: He can charge his expenses.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): He cannot charge those expenses travelling from his home to his place of business. Certainly, no lawyer can.

Mr. Leblanc: He has the compensation there.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): There is this discrimination between the two. The hon. member for Laurier should know better. I am speaking from personal experience, in my profession as a staff lawyer in a large law firm, of what is allowed and what is not allowed as an employment expense. I can also speak about the nonsense of a self-employed lawyer attending a bar convention or the Canadian Tax Foundation. When a lawyer who is a Member of Parliament attends these seminars in order to keep up to date, he cannot deduct his expenses because his profession is not his principal source of income.

Mr. Leblanc: I agree with that.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I think the hon. member for Laurier will see that there is this discrimination between the lawyer who is working for a large law firm and the one who is on his own. He cannot deduct his travelling expenses from his home to his place of business, that is for sure. I have said enough on this occasion, Mr. Chairman. I thank hon. members for allowing me this extra time and you, Mr. Chairman, for recognizing me so quickly. It may be that I will come back with further points on this section.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, a pattern seems to be emerging on the employment expense allowance, particularly after listening to the hon. parliamentary secretary. Interestingly enough, and I think honestly enough, he pointed out that there has always been inequity in our tax system regarding the deduction of employment expenses as far as the employee is concerned as against the deduction of employment expenses for the self-employed person and the proprietor, and that the government has been grappling with this problem for a long time but has not been able to sort it out. The argument presented against equity as between the employee and the proprietor is that there are fewer proprietors and more employees, therefore trying to treat them on an equal basis poses an insurmountable problem. The parliamentary secretary says that the government has moved to put a little more equity into the situation by allowing a ceiling of $150 for employment expenses.

Frankly, Mr. Chairman, that looks like the worst kind of tax gerrymandering. Whichever way you look at what the government has done, it means that virtually all adults in our society will be able to make this $150 deduction and those who cannot, those outside the labour force because of age, are taken care of because $100 has been added to the $500 previously allowed as a deduction at age 70, now reduced to age 65. The government has not moved to correct the basic inequity in the system. Instead of increasing the amount that each individual could use as a base for deduction, instead of raising the ceiling of the single exemption to $2,000 and the married exemption to $4,000 for income tax purposes, they have taken $150 out of that and applied it to this section. If you were to calculate what it would have cost if the amount of the basic exemptions had been raised as against what it is going to cost this way, I think there would have been very little difference.

They have gerrymandered the thing around. There is a certain amount of money for disbursal and they have decided that, rather than use it to grant increased exemptions, they would use it to grant an employment allowance. I am not impressed with that approach because we are still faced with the basic inequity and all the apologies from the parliamentary secretary, all the hand wringing about how difficult it is to accomplish anything in that area, leaves me cold. I think it will leave the vast majority of people the same way.

As a rule, it is the little things that are very annoying. There is one subsection in section 6 which allows employees the right to deduct the cost of selling their product or advancing the interest of their company. Now that has always been deductible. But what is not taken into account is that almost all working men in this country at one time or another have to seek new employment or seek to improve their position. In this sense, they are not different from the person who is looking for business, who is selling a product. But the cost of finding a job cannot be deducted. If a man has been phased out of one industry and has to travel all over the city or buy three newspapers to look for a job—and under present conditions of high unemployment he may spend a fair amount of time and money trying to relocate—these expenses are not deductible. In a sense, he is in the business of providing his own labour; that is all he has to sell. He does not have a product or a service to sell, just himself. Yet there is no provision for him to deduct the cost of finding employment. This is simply an indication of how callous our tax system is, Mr. Chairman, how indifferent to the needs of the majority of taxpayers and how solicitous it is of those who are self-employed or the proprietors of businesses.

The government acknowledges that the system of employment expenses is inequitable, but even if it is so difficult to bring equity into the tax system is it necessary to carry on this injustice against the larger group of our population. Something more should be done than to offer apologies. The government has one or two choices open to it. Most people will not claim beyond the $150. They ought to set up the necessary administration, as they have done with respect to business concerns and self employed people, in order to process those extraordinary expenses that some workers incur in finding and holding employment. Those expenses ought to be processed on the same basis as other, similar expenses are processed.

On the other hand, if the administrative problems that this would create are too great, then the government should move in the other direction and disallow all such expenses. In other words, there ought to be no allowances for expenses incurred in business; neither the salesman's nor the steel worker's expenses ought to be deductible. I am sure that vast sums of money are lost from our national revenues through the ability of business concerns to deduct from taxes the cost of doing business. If all such expenses were disallowed, we would introduce some form of equity. The money that is saved could be applied to everybody's marginal rate of tax. All taxes could be reduced and there would be a return to equity. I find it impossible to accept the government's explanation, namely, that although the present practice is inequitable we have no choice except to proceed as we always have.

Since the parliamentary secretary has been so good about answering questions that have been raised in this debate, could he say whether the government has calculated how much revenue is lost as a result of allowing business expenses to be tax deductible? If those amounts were not allowed, what amount of revenue would be available for lowering everyone's marginal rate of tax?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member had better ask the question again. The parliamentary secretary did not hear him. Pay attention, Pat.

Mr. Saltsman: Is the parliamentary secretary ready? I should like to know whether the government has calculated how much revenue is lost as a result of allowing these expenses to be tax deductible. In other words, what revenue would be saved if there were no deductions for business expenses, travelling expenses as well as the expenses of employment? What amount of revenue would be available to the government if those deductions were disallowed and what kinds of tax changes could be made in the marginal rates of taxpayers if that amount were applied equally to all people for that purpose?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, did I understand the hon. member to include business expenses in his list?

Mr. Saltsman: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, if business expenses are to be included in that particular litany, I think the figure the hon. member seeks would be impossible to calculate.

Mr. Saltsman: In which case, is there any kind of calculation that the parliamentary secretary could make in this regard? I think he sees what I am getting at and what kind of information I should like. If he cannot make the calculation on the basis of all business expenses, could he deal with expenses connected with the cost of employment or the costs of doing business that may be compared to the costs that the workman must meet for holding down his job?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I am afraid that I do not know of any such calculation having been made. I have grave doubts as to whether it has been made. I will look at the hon. member's question in Hansard and see if we can get any information for the hon. member. I am not aware of that calculation having been made and, as I say, I have grave doubts as to whether it has been made.

Mr. Peters: That shows what is wrong with the system.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat puzzled by the reply of the parliamentary secretary. We are asked to approve a clause in this comprehensive bill which would permit workers, as well as other citizens, to deduct the magnificent amount of $150 a year for expenses connected with their work. This is not a new subject. Members of my party as well as of other parties have raised this question over many years, namely, that many ordinary workers working for wages and many people who work for salaries pay substantially more than $150 a year directly in expenses relating to their work.

The hon. member for Waterloo talked about costs incurred by the worker who has been laid off and must drive hundreds of miles to a prospective employer in order to find another job. Yet there are tens of thousands of workers who drive between 25 and 100 miles every day to and from work. Until now, they have not been able to deduct five cents of those expenses from taxable income. Thousands of construction workers must buy their own tools. Until now, they have not been able to deduct the cost of those tools from taxable income when calculating income tax. Thousands of miners cannot go into mines unless they wear hard hats and safety boots, which they must buy themselves. Those items cost something, and the cost has not been deductible.

Mr. Mahoney: That is precisely why we are allowing the $150.

Mr. Orlikow: The parliamentary secretary has always understood clearly the position of the salaried person who travels as a salesman or of the self-employed person, with whom I shall be dealing in a moment. The parliamentary secretary interjected just now to suggest that the government is allowing $150 to cover such expenses as I have mentioned. I say to the parliamentary secretary that $150 sometimes may be too much and sometimes it may not be enough. I say to him that I believe in equity. I think the worker is entitled to nothing more and to nothing less than the kind of consideration which, for many years, Canadian governments have extended to businessmen and self-employed persons. The businessman who thinks he will get more business if he takes a prospective customer out to dinner never has to prove that he got the business from that prospective customer. If he decides to take the customer to lunch or dinner at the Chateau Laurier, the Skyline Hotel, the Queen Elizabeth Hotel in Montreal, the Royal York Hotel in Toronto or the Palliser Hotel in the parliamentary secretary's home city of Calgary, nobody asks questions. The businessman charges the expense as a business expense, and the lunch or dinner does not cost him anything. If he decides to go to another city because he can get some business there and he flies first class, stays at the best hotel and eats the best meals available, he can charge the cost of the trip as a business expense.

Mr. Peters: Towards which the worker pays his share.

Mr. Orlikow: I ought to say that 50 per cent of the cost is paid for by the people of Canada. Let us take the case of the doctor who decides to attend a convention that is being held in the field in which he specializes. The convention may be held on a cruise ship cruising the Caribbean. Of course, there are meetings, the doctor listens to lectures and acquires more information in the field in which he specializes.

Mr. Alexander: Union executives do that, too.

Mr. Orlikow: My hon. friend says that union executives do that, too. However, that sort of thing is not part of their duties. Unions, to my knowledge, are not in the business of making profits and taxpayers do not pay for such things. The members of the union may pay, or they may object. The taxpayer does not pay. If the union member does not like it, he can do something about it. The taxpayer can only do something about that sort of practice if we, in this chamber, do something about it. That is what I am trying to impress on the parliamentary secretary. We are trying to persuade him in this matter but I must admit I do not think we have much hope of succeeding. The point I am trying to make is that for years we have permitted business, self-employed and professional people to escape payment of very substantial taxes because of these loopholes. I am not talking about tax evasion. I am talking about provisions in the income tax laws. This is a very small group, certainly less than 10 per cent of the people of Canada.

• (4:50 p.m.)

I suggest to the parliamentary secretary that it is time the ordinary workingman was given the same kind of advantage. I find it hard to understand why it should be so difficult to accomplish that objective. In fact, the government says it is impossible to set up a system of accounting or bookkeeping which will permit the ordinary workingman to do this. It has never been difficult for the doctor, lawyer or businessman to do that. A lawyer may travel in his car from the west end of Ottawa to a new office building downtown, then to the court house, which is not very far, back to his office and then home. He can charge a substantial part of his automobile expenses in the year when calculating his income tax.

I admit that I am ignorant about financial matters. I would like the parliamentary secretary to tell me why the government has been able to arrive at a decision that it is right, proper and equitable for that type of person to charge these expenses against his income tax, while it is not possible to do anything more for the workingman than to allow him a flat rate of $150. In thousands of cases, this is not adequate. The parliamentary secretary has some high priced help sitting with him at the table. Why can they not spend some time devising a system which will give the same treatment to the ordinary workingman who earns $5,000 or $6,000 a year? For years there has been such a system for business and professional men in the $25,000 to $50,000 a year bracket. When the parliamentary secretary explains that to my satisfaction, he will not hear another word about that from me and this section will carry very quickly.

Mr. Peters: My remarks will probably be redundant, Mr. Chairman, but I think what I have to say must be said. I was surprised at the statement made by the parliamentary secretary in answer, to the question he was asked by the hon. member for Waterloo. The hon. member asked the parliamentary secretary to calculate what would happen if we cut off the dishonest and supernumerary allowances which are now classified as expenses. He referred to the free automobile, free meals and all other such expenditures. He asked what amount of revenue would be available for the reduction of the tax if those expenses were not allowed.

I am curious, Mr. Chairman. I am probably stupid about finances. I am in the same position as many other members who set up a company. I have a small operation and I also have a farm. It is not difficult for me to write off $3,000 or $4,000 when calculating my income tax. I spend a little money and increase my capital value. I could write that off. I maintain a truck, tractor and considerable other equipment. There would be no problem writing off those items. However, I consider that to be morally wrong. I could hire an accountant just to cheat the government, but that would be morally wrong. Just because I have the machinery and know how to do it, I can get a deduction off my taxes.

Mr. Mahoney: But you do it.

Mr. Peters: No, I do not. My deductions at the present time are $1,000 for my wife, the $100 exemption everyone is allowed and the deduction for pension. These are the only exemptions I take. I could write off $4,000 or $5,000 if I wished, but I consider that dishonest. When I attend a large restaurant in Ottawa, I see that everyone there except myself and maybe one or two others are on expense accounts. That is more than dishonest, it is downright disgusting. I have to pay at least twice what the meal is worth because the freeloaders are riding on me and all other taxpayers.

Mr. Mahoney: Will the hon. member permit a question? In what category does the hon. member regard his tax free allowance as a member of Parliament in relation to all these freeloaders in the Skyline Hotel?

Mr. Peters: That is a simple question. If the hon. member did not have such a large income from other sources, he would be aware of the answer. That exemption covers exactly what it was intended to cover, namely moneys normally expended by any member on behalf of his constituents that would not be expended in any other occupation. It is granted in lieu of increasing our salaries, and I do not think it is dishonest. Parliament passed it. It is a fair amount. You can argue one way or another about the $2,000. Some members are cheap about spending the $8,000, but I think it is safe to say that all members who a few years ago were able to live on their salary had to dig into that expense allowance to maintain themselves. In the main, those businessmen who are allowed to write off expenses such as meals are dishonest. Everyone in this country knows that 50 per cent of them are dishonest because the expenses are not justified. If the department wishes, it could curtail those expenses by at least 50 per cent and gain on revenue.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Peters: They might then be able to help the little guy in this country who carries more than his share of the tax burden.

The Chairman: Order.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO DE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Meadow Lake (Mr. Cadieu)—Grain—Lift program—Requests to farmers for repayments—Possibility of Prosecutions; the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas)—Oil—Proposed take-over of Supertest by British Petroleum—Possible government action—Acquisition by Panarctic Oils; the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald)—Regional Economic Expansion—Response to criticisms of departmental programs.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely private bills, notices of motions, (papers), and public bills.

• (5:00 p.m.)

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might have the indulgence of the Chair for a few moments in which to put to the House a proposition which has been discussed among representatives of the various parties in connection with private members' bills? It is a somewhat complicated matter so perhaps Your Honour will give me a moment or two in which to see that I do it correctly.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): After the finance bill?

Mr. Howard (Skeena): This is a procedural matter, that is why it is complicated. It will require the unanimous consent of the House to accomplish what is proposed, namely that the House proceed to consider order No. 1, the report stage, and subsequently third reading of a bill respecting the Royal Victoria Hospital. We would then proceed to item No. 5, resuming the report stage of Bill S-12 respecting Central-Del Rio Oils Limited, and a report stage amendment thereto. On the conclusion of that item, if it happens before six o'clock, we would then adjourn.

The suggestion is that the House should also give consent to the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg) to withdraw a report stage amendment which he has moved and which appears on today's order paper at page 8, and allow him to move another amendment, one which has been agreed to by the sponsor of the bill and by the company affected. If this expresses the understanding reached during the conversations which have been held, I would seek unanimous consent for this to be made an order of the House as a package agreement.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): That is precisely the understanding we reached during the discussions which were carried on this afternoon. We certainly hope the House will give unanimous consent to the proposal as it would expedite considerably the passage of these measures.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): As the hon. member has said, there is need for unanimous consent. There seems to be agreement between the parties to follow the procedure suggested. Of course, as to the question of withdrawing an amendment, that would be done when the House resumed debate on that item. Since there seems to be agreement, the Chair will abide by it as being an order of the House.

PRIVATE BILLS

ROYAL VICTORIA HOSPITAL

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce) moved that Bill S-19, respecting the Royal Victoria Hospital as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills and Standing Orders be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Allmand moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the third time and passed.

CENTRAL-DEL RIO OILS LIMITED

The House resumed, from Thursday, October 14, consideration of Bill S-12, respecting Central-Del Rio Oils Limited as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, and the amendment of Mr. Skoberg (page 6588).

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. This would be the point at which the hon. member would ask permission of the House to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Perhaps we could combine the two operations, Mr. Speaker, namely, the request to withdraw the report stage amendment which is on the order paper and consent by the House for my hon. friend from Moose Jaw to move a new amendment. Perhaps that could be put in one item. I might say the amendment has been agreed to by the sponsor of the bill and by the company affected.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The House has already given consent to that. The Chair was only inviting the hon. member to ask leave to withdraw his amendment and then to present his new amendment.

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment which appears in my name in connection with Bill S-12, and which reads:

on the condition that Sections 52 to 56 of the Bank Act apply to the company mutatis mutandis notwithstanding the provisions of Part I of the Canada Corporations Act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Does the House give unanimous consent?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Mr. Skoberg: I should like now, if I may, to introduce an amendment to Bill S-12 as follows:

That a new clause be added after line 42 on page 2:

A majority of the directors of the company or its successor shall at all times be Canadian citizens ordinarily resident in Canada.

Briefly, I should like to say that even though this may be just a token concession by the company concerned—a company which will, no doubt, change its name—this is the avenue we have to take until the Gray report on foreign ownership is tabled in the House. I might add that many of these amendments would not be necessary if the Gray report on foreign ownership were made public so that a full discussion could be held on the subject. I am sure all Canadians are waiting for the day when a debate can take place on the basis of the government's precise intentions in the field of foreign ownership.

Mr. Tom H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Since the object expressed in the amendment has always been the intention of the company, the company accepts the new amendment and we should like to thank the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg) for his co-operation.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): It's the other way around, Tom.

Amendment (Mr. Skoberg) agreed to.

Mr. Goode moved that the bill be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Goode moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the Canadian Pacific Oil and Gas Company, which really owns this particular company, is accepting these changes. Central-Del Rio is now going out of business and will hereafter be called the Pan-Canadian Oil Company. I anticipate this will be a consortium of companies taking in many of the other subsidiaries which have been mentioned as being under the control of this company.

• (5:10 p.m.)

Therefore, I think that this company should be congratulated for having taken the stand it has, one in which I am sure all members of the House are interested, namely that its directors will be resident in Canada. Hopefully it follows that this company will have a Canadian interest in its deliberations and in its day to day operations, particularly since the Gray report has not yet been released. It is to be hoped that that report will come before Parliament in the very near future, since it is vitally important that the government state its position on Canadian control of companies.

We may be naïve enough to think that control rests with the board of directors and shareholders of a company. However, if the government gives leadership and shows what it wants accomplished in Canada, then a company like Central-Del Rio will not itself have to show the leadership that is required in this regard. There are other bills of a similar nature on the order paper, and if these companies wish to follow Central-Del Rio and make the same kind of concession to Canadian nationalism, then I think they will find much less difficulty getting their bills through this place.

I therefore express the hope that the government will introduce a policy establishing Canadian control of corporations, rather than asking individual companies to make this decision which, from a legal point of view, I am sure must have been difficult to make. Nevertheless, this company should be congratulated for having made that decision. As I say, I think there is now an obligation on the government not to place companies in the position of having to come before Parliament to get Canadian control. If the government shows leadership it will accomplish what the Gray report would accomplish by giving that direction which hitherto has been lacking.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I do not like to be the sceptic here and I am not familiar with the original bill or the amendments made to it. I also kept my silence when they were explained to the House. However, I cannot see that there is any real victory for Canadian ownership in having a company declare that its directors shall be Canadians. In fact, I think this has been the case with most foreign-controlled companies for a good many years. The directors of these companies are straw men in some cases and real directors in others. Just in which cases they are straw men and in which cases they are effective directors is hard for an outside observer to tell.

Therefore, while I accept that there has been a concession in this case to Canadian direction of this company, I am not caught up in the euphoria of thinking there has been any real accomplishment here beyond the simple fact that this company must have Canadian directors. I think this is an acknowledgment of the need for legislation in this respect, and when it does come before the House I hope it will be a good deal more effective than legislation that merely provides that the directors of companies shall be Canadians.

I do not want to detract from the effort that has been made in this case because it is one step along the road. But as already pointed out by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters), something a good deal more than this will have to come from any legislation to ensure that there is in fact real Canadian control.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Pursuant to the order made earlier by the House, the work on which agreement had been reached having now been completed the House will revert to the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act—Mr. Benson—Mr. Laniel in the chair.

On clause 1—section 4: Income or loss from a source or from sources in a place.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. Pursuant to the order made by the House earlier this day, the committee will call it six o'clock and will resume examination of Bill C-259 at eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, just before we proceeded to private members' hour I was pointing out to the parliamentary secretary that workers at the lower end of the income scale have to pay the maximum amount of tax and are allowed only the stereotype deductions. That situation can in no way be related to the situation faced by people in other income categories. The parliamentary secretary suggested that if we allowed these deductions in all categories $280 million would be involved. It would be of tremendous advantage to the country if we could use that money in allowing the average worker to write off some of his expenses. If this cannot be done, then we should at least reduce some of the deduction items at the other end of the income scale.

Every time a businessman takes someone out for a meal we pay 50 per cent of the cost. If we have a meal in a restaurant we are charged 50 per cent more than we should be because most people eating in restaurants are subsidized or are on expense accounts. I have never been convinced that anyone can increase his business by wining and dining potential customers. It seems to me that what is involved is the old theory of, you scratch my back and I'll scratch yours; I will take you out on my expense account and you can take me out on yours. All that is gained is a social evening. I fail to see the legitimacy of allowing this type of exemption when we will not allow such basic exemptions as the cost of travel from place to place in the course of employment.

It is very difficult to ascertain how much an individual should be allowed for expenses. I am sure that this situation has changed radically in the last few years, mainly as a result of government action. In many areas, mines are situated some distance from where miners live. It was decided some time ago that in the province of Ontario townsites should not be developed on mining property. This has been the case for the last 15 or 25 years. It was felt that the capital cost necessary to develop townsites might be better used if the miners lived in an existing centre and travelled from there to the mine. Capital has already been laid out to establish such towns and villages. This was not the case 20 years ago.

I lived in a mine townsite which was about a quarter of a mile from the mine. The mine was easy to reach on foot. Miners in my area today drive 100 miles to and from work. It seems to me very strange that people who have to drive to their jobs are not granted at least an expense allowance to cover their travelling costs.

A farmer would be allowed capital depreciation and all the cash necessary. Probably 5 per cent or 10 per cent would be allowed for personal expenses other than for the operation of the business. But so far as workers are concerned there is no allowance for capital expenditure on an automobile. No allowance is made for gasoline or other expenditures. As my colleague says, only the rich benefit from our tax laws. Is it not time we started to be fair with the working people of this country?

I have been impressed when the minister has said on a number of occasions that the basic exemption cannot be changed, that it cannot be raised because it would cost too much. I am aware that this would help the guy at the bottom, but it helps the guy in the high categories considerably more. Is it not an indication that the tax department has not done its job when we are not able to reclaim moneys in a fair manner under our tax structure? It has been said that we cannot pay more money to old age pensioners; our tax structure is so badly out of line that we cannot equitably recover the costs from the various income categories.

The government has been very generous and I am sure that government after government will say that $150 is only a foot in the door, that next time it will be $200 and then $250. They will play with the workers as though they were a political football; they will offer them a little here and a little there toward the cost of their tools. But I know of no group of workers in this country that is not willing to document the expenditures incurred in its trade. As a miner I would have been very happy to document the fact that I paid $11 or $12 for a pair of boots necessary in my occupation, to pay the $9 or $10 for the hat necessary in my work, the $4 or $5 for a belt to carry the lamp which is necessary in my work, the $15, $18 or $20 for oilers and the $4 or $5 for neoprene gloves.

I would have been happy to document these expenses if I could have written them off as business expenditures—and in my opinion those were business expenditures. I could not work without this equipment and therefore it was necessary for my work. I think a government is pretty decadent, and so is the tax department, if they cannot see the justification in allowing workers to provide receipts for certain items which are necessary in carrying out their jobs. Yet we allow businessmen to spend all kinds of money on booze, food and women, on hotel rooms and vacations around the world. We allow this and each of us has to pay for it. It seems to me that a government that cannot make this distinction has not looked at the tax structure in the light of reform. I agree that the tax structure is incomprehensible to anyone and I think it is time there was some fairness in the exemptions that we allow.

With regard to the 3 per cent of income provision, I know of people who pay almost 10 per cent of their income in transportation costs alone and they have all the other disadvantages that go with carrying lunch-pails, eating a poor lunch and working overtime and eating a warmed-up TV dinner. I do not blame people who look at the balance-sheet and say it is costing them money to work and that they would be better off receiving welfare, and perhaps that is the alternative.

The only way in which this country will get ahead is for the working people to feel they are getting a fair break under the taxation structure. If workers know that the boss is cheating, that he has all kinds of ways of getting exemptions to which they are not entitled, they lose respect for the system and doubt the justice which everybody agrees should prevail.

I should like the parliamentary secretary to indicate that the government will consider allowing exemptions for travelling expenses if receipts are submitted. If necessary, these receipts or vouchers could be co-signed by the employer. If a person is travelling in somebody else's car, obviously they are entitled to only a share of the exemption. Most companies would be able to supervise this and there would be no need for a number of inspectors.

So far as the $150 is concerned, I say thank you very much but this is only a drop in the bucket for the people involved. The government does not ask a doctor whether he needs a new scalpel. They do not ask how much it cost; the doctor tells them how much it cost. The government does not check whether he needs three or six scalpels a year, and he does not have to provide receipts for them. He gives them a complicated breakdown of his office expenses and sometimes lets the inspector come in to look over the books. Every time, to my knowledge, they collect about three times the tax which the doctor estimated, so I expect that the receipts system in these cases is not very good.

Perhaps the parliamentary secretary doubts this, but I know of cases where inspectors have come in and taken out what I would consider to be considerably more than the fellow was supposed to be making that year, without much squawking from the person concerned. If it is good for one person, why is it not good for another? Why do we always have to ask the little guy to pay the largest share? He does not necessarily pay the most money, but in terms of the income he receives he pays the major share. He will not be allowed to collect for his wife and for his children. He will now have an exemption of $100 for dues. The fact that he may have a strike assessment will not be taken into consideration. Now we are to make it a maximum of 3 per cent of his income or up to $150 to be deducted for tools.

The workers of this country are not getting a fair break. I urge that they be given a fair break. We do not want to continue the inequitable system which favours the very rich who have cushy jobs. If we give them a concession, at least let us give the working people of this country an opportunity to get some benefits from their expenditures. They do not want these benefits so as to have a good time, to go out on Saturday night and drink beer at the Legion; they only want to cover their expenses in travelling from home to job and buying equipment which is necessary and which is becoming exceedingly costly. I think these are two provisions which could easily be amended. In the amended form they would receive the support of all sectors of our community.

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Chairman, once more I would like to take a matter up strongly with the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney). I do not know if he understood the intervention I made yesterday, but anyway several other members, among which the previous speaker, expressed the same opinion that clause 8 provides for something new, that is a tax deduction for employment expenses of not more than $150 that everyone can claim, even workers, loggers, miners and those who travel between their residence and their place of work.

I repeat what I said yesterday: the amount is minimal. It represents only 2 to 4 cents a mile. I think it is less than what it costs a worker to get to his work.

The buyer of an automobile pays the federal government a tax on car manufacturing and often, according to the province, a sales tax such as 8 per cent in Quebec and if he uses his car he must also pay substantial tax on the gas and oil he buys and on spare parts for the car he must maintain in good shape.

I think that the Department of Finance should in all justice for all Canadian workers revise that clause of the bill and allow a fair deduction for actual expenses claimed by the Canadian worker.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, during the discussion on section 4 we have also, of course, been considering sections 5, 6, 7 and 8. One of the points that has come in for a good deal of discussion has been the proposal to add an exemption of 3 per cent of income, or a limit of $150, which is said to be for employment expenses. I find it rather interesting to read the section in question, section 8. It starts at the bottom of page 15 of the bill and goes over to page 16. You discover that in the text of the section it does not say what the expenses are for. However, the marginal note helps us out in this respect and I suppose in that sense it is part of the bill. The marginal note reads "Employment expense deduction."

We have been back and forth over this ground so it is hardly necessary to do it again in any kind of detail. But I had hoped that by now the government would have realized that it really is a little unfair for it not to relent at all on the basic system, namely, that of employing a tax exemption schedule rather than a tax credit system, and to add to the insult by providing this further exemption on that inequitable basis. After all, it is simply a case of an extra $150 exemption for all taxpayers in this country who get their income from employment. There is a slight qualification; persons who have some other tax-free allowance of $150 or more do not get it. We are glad to note that that includes Members of Parliament. But apart from those few exceptions which do not alter the picture greatly, all we have in this proposal is an additional $150 exemption for taxpayers who get their income from employment.

Whenever you do that sort of thing instead of putting it on a tax credit basis or without adjusting the rates, you are compounding the inequalities that already exist in our outdated tax law. As has been pointed out so many times, this $150 provision will mean a few dollars, $20 or $30 at most, to many of the workers of Canada when they fill out their income tax forms after next year is over. But the Governor of the Bank of Canada, the president of the Royal Bank of Canada and a few other big-shots will probably get 50 per cent or 60 per cent of the $150 exemption, which is $75 or more to them. It is a lot more than the little fellow gets—and these big-shots need an extra $75 a year just like a car needs a fifth wheel! Why can't we once in a while do this type of thing on the basis of fairness? We have not been able to persuade the government to change the basic system, but here a new element is being added. Why couldn't this be done on the basis of equity?

When I was speaking about this matter yesterday I referred to a situation that is at least slightly comparable, that of the allowance for charitable donations. I pointed out that in that case, as in at least one other, the government allows a $100 exemption to a taxpayer whether or not he has receipts for the charitable donations he has made. But the same taxpayer, if he has receipts, may claim more than $100. In that case there is another ceiling somewhere up the line. I suggested that that might be a pattern to follow in this case. I put it forward as reasonably as I could, hoping the government would reconsider it overnight and come back with such a proposal today. But whether it was considered overnight or not, it is not before us at this time—and I think it should be. As I said yesterday, let us accept the $150 for everyone, without any receipts, but why not provide that the worker who can furnish receipts for employment expenses be granted up to a total of $500?

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, since the government has not proposed this as an amendment to the bill—I confess I have not had time today to look at the further batch of amendments that we received at two o'clock this afternoon, but I am sure if one of those amendments had dealt with this matter word would have reached us by this time—I would like to move an amendment along the lines which I suggested yesterday and to which I have just referred. I can see that Your Honour is wondering what is coming. Probably you can guess. I have already told you. I do not have another treatise on procedure. The other day I spent a great deal of time on a treatise on procedure and lost my amendment, but a colleague of mine rose later, offered an amendment, did not mention procedure and his amendment was accepted. So I think I should not argue; I should just present my amendment, listen to Your Honour say question, and get a vote on it.

However, I suppose Your Honour will look at my amendment and ask, "Doesn't that do something to the balance of ways and means?" Mr. Chairman, if you had been listening today to the parliamentary secretary you would have realized that those on the other side of the House are all at sea in this business of deductions for expenses: they don't quite know what it amounts to or how much you gain or lose. I suggest that if we gave the workers this extra allowance for expenses that they can document by receipts, it might result in the purchase of more tools and equipment. Then the people who sell the tools and equipment would make more profit, would pay more taxes and the government would probably be better off.

• (8:30 p.m.)

Since my argument in the direct field of procedure did not work the other day, I am trying this one on for size. Just because I am going to propose that workers be granted up to $500 rather than $150 by way of an expense allowance I do not think the Chair should just jump on it and say that it upsets the balance of ways and means. That is not necessarily so. It may in the end put money in the government's pocket. In any event, I think the committee should have the amendment before it. I have several copies and I can send one over to the parliamentary secretary and he can get one of the ministers sitting behind him to move it, if Your Honour finds it procedurally difficult. I am sure that by now they are feeling a bit sheepish about the inequity and unfairness of this $150 proposal. Therefore, I move:

That Bill C-259 be amended at page 16, in line 3, by changing the semicolon at the end of the said line 3 to a comma, and by adding immediately thereafter the following words:

"provided however that the amount deductible under this paragraph may be an amount up to but not greater than $500, if payment of employment expenses for the total amount claimed is proven by filing receipts with the minister;".

I point out that if these words were added at the end of line 3 on page 16, then section 8(1)(a)(ii) would provide for a deduction which, abbreviated, would read:

a single amount in respect of all offices and employments of the taxpayer, equal to the lesser of $150 and 3 per cent—

Then there are a number of lines simply referring to income. My words would be added at that point and would say that despite that limit of $150 and 3 per cent, the amount deductible under this paragraph may be an amount up to but not greater than $500, if payment of employment expenses for the total amount claimed is proven by filing receipts with the minister. One other comment I wish to make is that the language I have chosen at the end of the amendment is that which appears in this bill in several places, namely, that where receipts are required it is proposed that they be receipts filed with the minister which prove the expense.

Also, in this bill in various places are provisions for the making of regulations, sometimes by the Minister of Finance and sometimes by the Minister of National Revenue. As I see it, there would have to be regulations, just as there are now regulations, about the receipts that one can file for charitable donations, the required numbers and all the rest of it. The general authority to deal with certain matters by regulation would cover the right of the government through one department or another to indicate what kind of expense could be claimed and the nature of the receipts to be submitted.

However, apart from the two questions I have raised about the regularity which I contend for this motion, and apart from the attempt I have made to show how it is put together, I plead basic fairness. There is no reference in the text itself to employment expense; that is found only in the marginal note. All that tells us is that the text itself has nothing to say about employment expenses, it is just a $150 deduction. But if the government is going to call it by its marginal note, that is, an employment expense deduction, let us have a section on it and make reference, as I do in my amendment, to employment expenses. Let us also do the fair thing and make the same amount available, if he spends the money, up to $500 for the worker in the mine, the worker who has to travel or anyone else regardless of the total income of that person.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, in the name of equity for at least this part of the tax bill I propose the amendment which I have already read.

Mr. Peters: Question.

The Chairman: The Chair is not prepared to put the question at this time. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre referred to the amendment moved by his colleague, the hon. member for Regina East. I would not want the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to think that because he moves an amendment the Chair is automatically on guard. This may be a logical conclusion to draw; however, the Chair can find a distinction. I accepted the amendment of the hon. member for Regina East the other evening on the basis of Beauchesne's citation which says that it is open to members to reduce taxes. I would accept such an amendment if it were, shall I say, to reduce taxes across the board.

The difficulty I have with the amendment now before the committee is that if I permitted it and it were carried, it would shift the incidence of taxation. I am speaking now only on the procedural aspect and not on the fairness or moral aspect, as the hon. member urged on me—I make no decision on that. It seems to me, on the procedural aspect, that if this amendment were adopted there would be a shift in the incidence of taxation. There would in fact be an infringement on the financial initiative of the Crown. That is my preliminary thought on the matter. If the amendment were carried, of course, the situation would be that some taxpayers would pay less taxes and others would pay more.

I make this preliminary observation. If hon. members wish to try to convince me otherwise, I will listen to their arguments, otherwise I would regretfully have to rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, perhaps I should say that you have not taken me by surprise but I do not see how you can put much weight on the argument that my amendment shifts the incidence of taxation. In order to contend that, of course, I may have to contend that it simply reduces the total amount of taxes that has to be paid in.

The argument that a proposition shifts the incidence from one group to the other perhaps applied to the motion I made the other day when I tried to raise the exemption levels and thus take taxation off those on the lower end of the scale and put the tax on those at the higher end. This amendment simply takes the taxation off the workers who can submit vouchers for up to $500. As for the question of whether or not it is across the board, I think it is: it would apply to the worker at the lower end of the scale and to the governor of the Bank of Canada if he could submit vouchers for expenses up to $500.

On the other question, all I can say is I think there is no proof at all that this kind of amendment would result in any loss of income to the treasury and it would be much fairer to the workers of this country.

Mr. Peters: Question.

The Chairman: The concern that the Chair has, of course, is not really cleared by the hon. member's remarks, because if his amendment were adopted I think we would be in the position that those taxpayers who are employees would have the benefit of the amendment. The situation is that there are other Canadians who are not employees, they are self-employed, so that the benefit that could accrue under this amendment to Canadians who are not self-employed but are employees would be borne by Canadians who are self-employed.

• (8:40 p.m.)

As I said, the argument of the hon. member may be morally or reasonably correct—although I make no comment on that—but I suggest it is not procedurally correct and a private member cannot, as the hon. member seeks to do, interfere with the financial initiative of the Crown by shifting the incidence of taxation. For example, if all Canadians were employed, then I think I could agree with the hon. member's argument. Some Canadians, however, are not employees; they are self-employed and thus would not have the benefit of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Therefore, those who are self-employed would, it seems to me, be carrying an additional burden.

I think, with respect, that the hon. member is doing something that can only be done under the financial initiative of the Crown. Accordingly, and regretfully, I must rule that the hon. member's motion is out of order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, could I ask the Minister of National Revenue, who represents that great, industrial city of Windsor, if he would not like to adopt this amendment and move it on behalf of the workers of that city as well as on behalf of all the workers of Canada?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Chairman, the proposal is a step forward, and the best way to help the workers in this regard is to pass this proposal of the government which is before the committee as quickly as possible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, could I ask the minister if what he said has become government policy?

Some hon. Members: Repeat that.

Mr. McCleave: Has what the minister said become government policy?

Mr. Gray: I was talking about the measure that the government has proposed to the House and that is before the committee, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Chairman, I want to go on a voyage of discovery for a few moments and refer to some matters which have been raised in the House a number of times. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary could advise me whether some of these questions have been dealt with, because that may save some debating time.

Some time ago a representation was made to the government involving the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool Employees Association. It came to the attention of many members of the House and had to do with the different ways in which people who work on different types of construction jobs are treated. For instance, we are told that expenses incurred by people who work on a new construction site can be included as tax deductible, whereas if workers do repair work on the same type of installation, or on annexes, elevators and the like, their expenses are not deductible.

Could the parliamentary secretary advise us whether there have been changes in the way this law has been interpreted? Perhaps the Minister of National Revenue could say whether there have been changes in the regulations under the pertinent sections. Those who are concerned would appreciate this information.

It appears that the government is completely insensitive to the whole area of expenses incurred by people working away from home. We have tried to suggest that certain matters could be included within the law and the government has suggested that if you open the door at all there will be no end to what will be asked. In this situation employees who are discriminated against are those who undertake repair work on certain annexes and elevators across the country. It appears that the criteria for determining their eligibility to deduct expenses are based solely upon the definition of work performed.

Perhaps the Minister of National Revenue or the parliamentary secretary could indicate whether change is to be expected in this area. I do not think consideration is being given to it. Members of this committee want the government to explain why such expenses should not be deductible for tax purposes. It seems to me that we are discriminating against people whose work is exactly the same as that of others whose expenses are tax deductible and who are employed on new construction.

I am sure the parliamentary secretary, who comes from western Canada, well knows that people who are repairing elevators are doing the same work as those who are building new elevators and that they are entitled to the same type of treatment. After all, they are doing the same type of work. Why cannot both groups of people be treated equally? I ask the parliamentary secretary to tell us why employees doing similar jobs cannot be treated the same way.

Another area that has been debated at length—some of our arguments go back to the 1960's; one letter on the subject was written in 1967—is that of travelling expenses of those employed in construction, transportion or other, allied trades. This afternoon the parliamentary secretary suggested that this involves a personal situation, that it is the obligation of workers to move from their homes to their places of work. Those engaged in the various trades in this country are faced with a high degree of mobility, I agree; yet we can cite instances—I will use Canadian Pacific Railway and Canadian Pacific Express as examples—to show that because workers lack the necessary seniority in their respective terminals they must travel many miles in order to obtain employment.

The Minister of Manpower and Immigration has told us how important manpower training and retraining is for Canadians. Representations in this area have been made to the Minister of National Revenue. There is a letter from the Minister of Finance saying that the subject of expenses incurred in earning salary and wages is receiving careful study during the current review of the income tax law. Surely when people cannot gain employment in their trades within their own terminals, places of origin or domicile and must travel "X" miles to obtain employment, consideration ought to be given to the deduction from taxable income of their travelling expenses.

I agree that if it appears that such people will become permanently employed at the new location, they ought to move to that location. In the long run this is what they will do and thus they will no longer pay travelling expenses. Yet somewhere along the line consideration ought to be given to allowing such travelling expenses for a certain length of time, especially in cases where people cannot get jobs in their own terminals or places of domicile. Consideration ought to be given to allowing some type of mileage charge in computing travelling expenses in cases where people must travel to another terminal or location for work. After all, they have to obtain food and shelter and keep up their homes. No consideration has been given to such people. Even now, one group can obtain concessions so far as expenses are concerned yet others who work under similar circumstances are denied these concessions. Consideration ought to be given to those so affected.

May I refer briefly of situations existing in the railway industry. I am sure that the parliamentary secretary, who comes from the city of Calgary, knows many railroaders in that city. We know that with the type of seniority prevailing on the railroads some people are forced to go away from home to obtain employment. If they want to work they must travel many miles to another location. At one time the railway companies themselves provided accommodation for their employees. Today those who are forced away from home for work invariably must obtain their own accommodation and pay their living costs at the work terminals.

[Mr. Skoberg.]

I am glad that in the bill there is provision for an exemption in so far as telegraphers' and station agents' expenses are concerned. I would like to know why the government cannot include in those exemptions the expenses of employees working away from home terminals because they have exercised their seniority. The parliamentary secretary is well aware that people from Calgary go to Red Deer to work. They have to pay their own expenses. No consideration is given to that type of expense. If the parliamentary secretary would answer this question right now it would be appreciated by all those affected.

We witness the disappearance of passenger trains throughout the country. It used to be that running trade employees could go to away-from-home terminals by train, but now that is practically impossible. They have to use their own automobiles to travel to away-from-home terminal for employment. They receive no consideration for expenses incurred in this way. Again we are faced with the situation where you have two sets of conditions. There are people with ability and seniority who work within their own territory. Others have the same ability but not the seniority and are forced to go away from home in order to obtain employment. Surely there could be some amendment or a few words added to the clause at the top of page 17 to include the running trades to which I am referring.

The same applies to the non-operating trades. They have what they call roving gangs. These people no longer have a domicile to call their own and are used throughout the territory. They are in the same situation of having to drive from one location to the other but receive no consideration so far as tax exemption is concerned. Possibly the government would agree to add a few words to this clause to look after the situation with which these people are faced. I do not see any object in trying to move an amendment to include this group of people unless it includes construction workers, railway workers and other trades and craftsmen.

If these people were included, their legitimate expenses could no doubt be documented to the extent that the government would know how much money was spent. As far as blanket coverage is concerned, I agree that this is not in the interest of the Income Tax Act. If legitimate expenses were documented I see no reason why these people would not be entitled to consideration under the proposed changes.

Over the past few years the Minister of Finance has suggested that these areas were being considered. I think he was sincere when he said that at the time the Income Tax Act was to be revised and revamped. When I look through it I see that the three areas to which I have referred are not included. No consideration given to these situations. With regard to people in the construction industry and railway industry, I think some words should be added to the legislation to cover the situation. I leave it at that. Possibly the parliamentary secretary, who is well versed in the Calgary situation where there are very many railroad people, has received representations. I am sure he is aware of the problems I have recited.

Mr. Mahoney: I am indeed, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member has asked a couple of very specific questions that might as well be answered now as later. On the matter of employee expenses, the hon. member cited the problem experienced by contractors' employees who are away from home building grain elevators and employees of grain companies out on maintenance and repair work.

If the hon. member examines section 6(6) of the bill I think he will be satisfied that that particular anomaly has been removed. Workers who are employed away from home on repairs will now be in a position where the payments made to them by their employer for living expenses away from home will not have to be included in income. There is a distinction that is important. The employee is not entitled to deduct from his income his personal expenses. It is a matter of an employer making him an allowance to cover those expenses while he is away from his home base. In those circumstances that allowance is no longer an income item.

With regard to travelling expenses, Mr. Chairman, I am sorry the response to the hon. member cannot be as favourable, at least from his point of view. The government has not yet satisfied itself as to an equitable means of permitting people to deduct the expenses of travelling to and from work. This applies as much to travelling to and from work ten miles across the city, 20 miles down the road on a daily basis or, indeed, as do some of our top executives—for whom I am sure the hon. member is not speaking—flying across the country two or three times a week while locating in a new job and trying to find a house in a new location. No satisfactory answer to this, at least from the hon. member's point of view, has been found. However, I should point out that under section 62 the transfer costs of the employee moving from one location to another are covered when he actually moves his home to the site of his new employment. Was there another point?

Mr. McCleave: Yes, there was, Mr. Chairman. Can the parliamentary secretary elaborate on his statement that the government is not really satisfied with the answer of the travel allowance? Where is it going and when are we to have an answer?

Mr. Mahoney: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman; I am not quite clear on the purport of the question.

Mr. McCleave: I think the parliamentary secretary said that the government is not really satisfied with the answer it has with regard to travel allowances. Are special studies being carried on, or is this where the matter rests? He sounded very frank. I wonder where this frankness will lead us.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, the government is and will continue to review the matter. The dissatisfaction to which I alluded was the fact that I was afraid I could not provide the hon. member for Moose Jaw with an answer that would satisfy him.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Chairman, the real question, as the parliamentary secretary suggested, is that section 62 takes into account the transfer cost from one home to another. He is missing the point that their seniority is established in a particular terminal. If these people transfer every time they have to move 140 miles to another terminal in order to gain employment, they will be transferring back and forth all the time. It is this situation about which the railway brotherhood is concerned, as well as employees who are involved in this type of transfer.

If an employee who did not possess sufficient seniority had to travel 150 miles to work in his seniority district, how many times could he be allowed the transfer of his home effects back and forth? It could be a number of times. This is the problem the railway people are facing.

Mr. Mahoney: Again, I do not think I can give the hon. member a very satisfactory answer. I must say I question very much the thesis that a particular group of taxpayers who because of collective bargaining arrangements have a certain problem, should have preference over other taxpayers. There are many taxpayers who travel to and from work daily. It costs money to travel across Toronto. It costs money to travel from Burlington to Toronto or, as the hon. member said, from Moose Jaw to Regina. For various reasons many people do not choose to live near their work. I do not think the fact that this problem may be enshrined in a collective agreement is a good reason for the government to make an exception in the income tax provisions.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Chairman, the other night I tried without success to arouse the social and moral conscience of government members with regard to the level of personal exemptions, to be raised from $1,000 to $1,500 for individuals and from $2,000 to $2,850 for married couples. I suggested that the minimum exemption for an individual should be $2,000 and for married couples $4,000.

Tonight I shall attempt to persuade the committee with cogent, clear and convincing arguments that the members on the government side should take the initiative concerning employment expenses. I have been disappointed by government members' participation in the debate. On some of the main items dealt with in this clause by clause discussion their contribution has been very small and ineffective. I would hope that the hon. member for York East and the hon. member for Parkdale—

Mr. Haidasz: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I should like to draw to the attention of the hon. member for Broadview the fact that I took an active part in the discussion of an important part of this tax bill yesterday, as he will see if he consults Hansard at page 9093.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Otto: And I did today.

Mr. Gilbert: I appreciate the part the hon. member for Parkdale played yesterday. I understand it related to medical expenses. What I am saying in substance is that Liberal participation in the discussion of key sections of this bill has amounted to more tokenism. They may have received specific instructions from the Minister of Finance and the parliamentary secretary not to participate in this debate.

Mr. Otto: Oh, come on!

Mr. Gilbert: I am reminded of the time the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act was debated in this House. It was only the Minister of Justice on that side who took an effective part in that debate. The situation appears is very similar in this clause by clause discussion.

The clause before us indicates the government's meanness to workers and its magnanimous attitude toward businessmen. I ask myself why the government would be so mean to the workers and so magnanimous to businessmen. The clear conclusion to me is that members on the government side know where their political funds come from.

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Gilbert: They know they have to protect the people who contribute to their political party fund. They do it either by not participating in debate or by fighting proposed changes. They appear to be adamant against any changes in substance. The reason I want hon. members opposite to participate in this debate is that many of them, more especially the members from Toronto, know that many industries are located—

Mr. Otto: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. I do not mind having to put up with a great deal of the stuff which is coming from the other side, but the hon. member is way off the subject notwithstanding that agreement was reached among party leaders that speeches should be relevant. On the question of privilege, he mentioned that two hon. members did not take part. The fact is that the hon. member for Parkdale took part, and I took part. But the hon. member has not been in the House long enough to listen, or he has not read Hansard.

An hon. Member: Resign.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I have heard the point of order and I think we should get back to the bill, particularly to section 4. I hope that order can be maintained in the committee because sometimes I have a hard time hearing the speaker.

Mr. Gilbert: His reaction to my remarks indicates how sensitive the hon. member for York East is with regard to the truth. He finds it difficult, because he does not participate in debate on many of the subjects before this House. With regard to the substance of the legislation before us—I will repeat this for the benefit of the hon. member from York East—I say the attitude of the government with regard to workers' expenses is mean, callous and despicable. The attitude of the government toward business and other expenses is one of magnanimity.

An hon. Member: We do not have the lush fund of the unions.

Mr. Gilbert: I repeat, they know they get much of their funds from these institutions.

An hon. Member: What about the unions?

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The Chair asks the cooperation of hon. members, especially those who take the floor, to be as relevant as possible. I do not think the committee can make progress if we proceed as we have in the last few minutes. I am issuing an invitation; the Chair cannot force hon. members to follow the rules of the House. At the same time, it is to the benefit not only of the House but of hon. members that as far as possible hon. members stay within the confines of the rules and observe the rule of relevancy.

• (9:10 p.m.)

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Chairman, may I clearly express the position of the New Democratic Party on employment expenses. We have said that all legitimate expenses that can be documented by receipts or standard deductions be allowed as a deductible item, and I think that is a fair position to take. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre attempted to reach a compromise position this evening by moving an amendment to the effect that we change the existing clause to provide that where receipts are supplied by a worker, the deductions should be to a maximum of $500. That amendment was rejected.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The rules of the House clearly prohibit hon. members from referring to a decision made by the House or even commenting on a decision of the House. The motion was put to the committee but was not accepted by the Chair; therefore, I do not think the hon. member should refer to it in the way he has. I would not want to prevent his putting forward any suggestion as to possible amendments to the section now under discussion, but I hope that he will not pass judgment either upon a decision of the House or of the Chair on the motion that was put to the committee.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, could I speak on the point of order for a moment? I have known you—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I do not think the Chair can allow the hon. member to do so. The Chair rose simply to bring to the attention of the hon. member the danger of his engaging in the kind of argument he is making; the Chair did not invite hon. members to comment on the decision.

Mr. Gilbert: I am sure you will agree with me, Mr. Chairman, that my references were not to the ruling of the Chair on the amendment but to the substance of the amendment itself. I expressed no criticism of the ruling. What I expressed was disappointment about the non-acceptance by the government of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and I am sure it is within the rules of the House to do so.

The reason we in the New Democratic Party believe that all legitimate employment expenses should be deducted is that in urban centres we find that many major industries have moved from the core of the city to its suburbs. Many of the workers have bought homes in the core of the city, and having established themselves and their families in the downtown area now find themselves in the position where if they wish to retain their employment they must travel to the plant out in the suburbs. They thereby incur additional employment expenses.

It can easily be argued that perhaps these workers should move from the centre of the city to an area closer to the plant in the suburbs. Many of them cannot do this because of their age. They have worked hard to save sufficient money to purchase a home. Having purchased the home they have paid off their mortgage over a long period of years.

Mr. Alexander: By blood, sweat and tears.

Mr. Gilbert: As the hon. member for Hamilton West says, by blood, sweat and tears. That is true, but what is even more true is that by moving from the centre of the city closer to the plant in the suburbs they have to buy a new home at a highly inflated price and assume a mortgage at an interest rate that ranges from 9 per cent up. I realize that the Secretary of state who is in charge of urban affairs is not happy about the high interest rates in the housing field, but the position of these employees has to be brought home to the government, and brought home forcefully. This is why I want members from the urban centres to speak to this matter.

Many of these workers are being penalized for living in the centre of a city. Is it unreasonable to ask the parliamentary secretary or the government to take these representations into account and to permit these workers to deduct their reasonable travelling expenses occasioned by going from their homes to their place of work in the suburbs? This is why we in the New Democratic Party contend that all legitimate expenses that are substantiated by receipts should be deducted.

Mr. Chairman, I have always found you a man of fairness. I have found some members of the Liberal party men of fairness. Yet in some debates I find these men sitting idly by when crucial matters which affect their constituents are discussed in the House. Through you, Mr. Chairman, I would ask members from urban centres in Quebec and Ontario, areas that are highly industrialized and in which there is a high degree of mobility of employment, to rise and tell the government in no uncertain terms that the deduction of 3 per cent or a maximum of $150 is a mean, despicable, niggardly, unfair and inequitable provision. The least these hon. members can do is persuade the government that the minimum deductible amount, backed up by receipts, should be $500.

I am a man of reason, Mr. Chairman. I am a man who tries to be fair, a man of Irish background, a man of passion.

Mr. Reid: Now we understand you.

Mr. Gilbert: I am sure I have convinced you. I hope that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, a man who the other night said he represented Liberal-Labour—whatever that means—will express his views regarding this despicable provision that the government is attempting to present to the committee.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, I wonder how the government arrived at this ceiling of $150 for deductible employment expenses. They must have pulled it out of the air because it bears no relationship to the real expenses incurred by working men in the course of their employment.

I should like to deal with the question of the automobile. Anyone who has operated a car knows it is almost impossible to keep it running for less than $500 a year. It may be argued that workers are running cars for their own convenience, that they run them for pleasure rather than to get to work. In my experience this is not the case. Virtually every working man I know has been forced to buy a car to keep his employment. Even in an area like Waterloo, where work and residence are closely related, it is almost impossible for a man to hold a job unless he has a car.

Very often workers can arrange car pools and can be picked up by fellow workers, but just as often that is not possible. Many people have called me because they have been disqualified for unemployment insurance after the breakdown of a car pool or because a fellow employee could no longer pick them up. The ruling was based on the fact that lack of transportation is no excuse. The Unemployment Insurance Commission recognizes the responsibility of a worker to provide his own transportation to the job site, yet the government does not recognize this responsibility under the Income Tax Act.

No one can provide transportation for $150 per year. When I suggested $500 I had that figure in mind as an absolute minimum. If you calculate the cost of insurance, licence plates, depreciation and the cost of gas and oil it would amount to at least $500. If you do not include depreciation, then the other costs plus the cost of repairs would amount to $500 per year. I suggest the ceiling should be $500 rather than $150 as proposed in this bill.

There was a time when the steel mills and the houses in which the workers lived were close together. An employee could run across the back yard, across the street or four of five blocks to get to work. People could manage in those days without a car, but now there is hardly anywhere in Canada which has zoning by-laws where this is the case. Residences and plants are separated by a considerable distance and municipal by-laws virtually ensure this, yet the income tax system does not make any allowance for this situation.

The purchase of a car is one of the things that faces young people starting out in marriage and working careers. I do not think there is a member of this House who has not received a telephone call from someone who is having difficulty meeting car payments. This is one of the main things which upsets the budgets of young people. I am sure other members have taken a look at these budgets and suggested to the individuals that they could not afford a car. I am sure hon. members have advised them to make other arrangements for transportation. These people invariably say they must have a car to get to work, that if it was only for pleasure they would give it up but they cannot find employment without a car.

I am sure many hon. members have received calls from time to time from constituents who have had their operator's licence taken away and have wound up on relief because they could not get to the job. If you cannot drive in modern society you virtually cannot work in most areas of this country. There are exceptions, but generally speaking a car has become a vital necessity for the workingman.

I am not one of those who is hung up on the idea that every person should have a car, and I am sure other hon. members share that view. There is a great need for public transportation. We must have a close look at zoning by-laws and the artificial, antiseptic transportation systems we now have. We must consider carefully the development of industrial and residential areas. We do not have good public transportation at this time. Many workers in this country find public transportation inadequate. Perhaps this is because we do not have proper zoning by-laws. In any event, it is a fact of life that most workers must have automobiles, yet they are not allowed to deduct what is a necessary cost of employment. It is beyond my understanding why the government has not taken this fact into consideration. I am only referring to the cost of operating a car; I am not dealing with the cost of tools a workman requires or the cost of books required by a university professor in the course of his employment, although these are important items of expense.

I am not dealing with the safety equipment required by law and the many other expenses workingmen encounter in the continuation of employment. I am dealing with only this item to demonstrate how unrealistic is the $150 ceiling. The very least the government could do is make the allocation of car expenses as between pleasure and business, now available to self-employed persons or proprietors, available to the workingman. The workingman would be willing to prove the extent to which he needs his car for business as compared with pleasure. That is the kind of proof required of the self-employed and proprietors. The workingman is quite willing to provide the same kind of proof and accept the same kind of allocation of cost as between business and pleasure. But he is not given this opportunity. He is being fobbed off with this $150 which really should have been part of the original exemption. It has been put into this bill because the government knows the present tax system is inequitable but is not prepared to make significant changes.

The government is hoping that this little carrot or piece of camouflage will offset the discontent which exists in respect of the unfairness of the system. I cannot understand why a better system was not formulated. The parliamentary secretary has been helpful in answering our questions but I should like him to explain the basis upon which the government decided on the $150 ceiling. Is that all the government felt it could afford? Why has the government not been as arbitrary with the self-employed? Does the government feel $150 represents a realistic cost of finding and maintaining employment? I should like to hear about that and I ask the parliamentary secretary to try to justify the $150 in relation to the cost of operating an automobile.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak for a few minutes on a matter raised by the hon. member for Moose Jaw, namely, the problem faced by employees working on construction sites away from home. This matter was drawn to the attention of the government and members of the House of Commons by members and officials of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool Employees Association.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw expressed the case very well when he pointed out the problem that exists in respect of discrimination between workers of the same construction crew, based solely on the particular type of project, whether it was classified as new construction or as repair work. I was very pleased to hear what the parliamentary secretary said in response to the hon. member's point in this regard and I am glad this provision is included in the bill. There is only one matter that requires clarification and I put it to the parliamentary secretary.

[Mr. Saltsman.]

In his response the parliamentary secretary made reference to the problem faced by contractors and employees of contractors. I recognize that this would be the case with contractors and their employees working at a site some distance from home, but I inquire about the situation in respect of the specific example raised by the hon. member for Moose Jaw, that is, involving the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool Employees Association. This is not a case involving a contractor; it involves employees working directly for the Wheat Pool on construction and repair work. I want to obtain the assurance of the parliamentary secretary that the new provisions will apply to employees faced with that sort of situation just as they will apply to employees of a contractor.

• (9:30 p.m.)

Mr. Mahoney: My reference to contractors was not meant to mislead; it was merely an example. It is an employer-employee relationship that counts here, not the particular function that the employer or employee happens to be performing.

While I am on my feet, in response to the hon. member for Waterloo I would say that the $150 figure that was chosen as the ceiling was not designed to cover travelling expenses to and from work. Presidents of banks do not get their travelling expenses to and from work. This is not one of the expenses that is allowed any employee, any executive or anyone else. This is something that is simply not allowed. The $150 was not designed to cover that type of expense. It was designed to cover the special tools, the special clothing, and so on, that taxpayers need to earn their living. I can think of examples where $150 is not adequate and I can think of other examples where $150 will be more than adequate for the type of expenses which it was designed to cover.

It is simply not the purpose of this provision to cover all the expenses that a taxpayer incurs from the time he leaves his door after breakfast until he returns at supper time. In this context I submit that on a gross basis, on an average basis, the $150 is not a niggardly figure as has been suggested by hon. members opposite.

Mr. Gilbert: May I ask the parliamentary secretary a question? What does he think about travel expenses that are involved by a worker travelling from home to his place of work, especially when it is a considerable distance away, say 20 or 25 miles? Does he think that these expenses should be allowed, and what would the exemption be—because the hon. member for Waterloo said that the amount of $500 is a bare minimum in so far as expenses that a worker incurs in travelling from his home to his place of work are concerned. Would the parliamentary secretary please enlighten me with regard to his attitude concerning exemptions for expenses that workers incur in such instances?

Mr. Mahoney: I do think that there are some expenses that are personal. The government makes no attempt to dictate to people where they should live in relation to their place of work. Personally, I see nothing intellectually or logically wrong with the idea that a taxpayer has the responsibility of delivering himself to work in the morning. This applies as well to the manager of an insurance company who is driving 20 miles in from the suburbs or country estate to his office in downtown Toronto as it does to a worker in a steel plant in Hamilton who may be driving across town.

Perhaps we are fortunate that the economic system under which Canada has lived has permitted workers to move out from under the shadow of the steel mills and the smokestacks under which they lived. This is one of the benefits that Canadians have experienced as a result of our social and economic system. In making the decision to move away from the mill or the factory they have obviously decided to incur some expense and some inconvenience in getting to work, but obviously the price is worth paying because that is the decision they have made.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Lambton-Kent.

Mr. Saltsman: I am glad to have received some of the comments from the—

Mr. Faulkner: Let someone else speak.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The Chair recognized the hon. member for Lambton-Kent.

Mr. McCutcheon: I was interested in the remarks of the parliamentary secretary and I agree with what he had to say, namely, that this item with which we are dealing is not designed to cover automobile expenses as such. But I am still of the opinion that, taking into account today's prices, the amount is less than adequate. I am thinking of a particular group of people, namely, automobile mechanics who work in large establishments. I know of some who will probably break, wear out and lose more tools than this $150 allowance will cover. When you stop to think of the cost of replacing even some of the tools which these people have to use, you run into extremely large sums of money. I feel that expenses in that regard should be covered. Workers are perfectly willing to submit vouchers.

With reference to the matter raised by the hon. member for Waterloo, transportation allowances, I think that this does have some bearing. Many people in southern Ontario, where I live, are forced, due to lack of housing in our urban centres, to live in substandard housing and on abandoned farm lots. I know of many instances where workers on hourly rates drive 25 or 30 miles in broken-down automobiles in order to get to their work because the cost of housing in urban centres is so high that there is no way in which they can afford to live there.

After all is said and done, when you drive a round trip of 50 miles per day 300 days in the year, you put 15,000 miles on your automobile. This is done not out of choice but out of necessity. If those people were treated anything like the civil servants and allowed 16 cents a mile, they would probably be able to drive much better cars than they do at present. Although I do not normally agree with members of the party to my left, in this instance I feel that there should be some provision for the workers in this country who through no choice of their own are forced to live a long way from their work.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (9:40 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Dionne: Mr. Chairman, although I have scrutinized the voluminous bill before us, I have found no provision likely to help Canadian workers employed in U.S. territory.

Earlier, I heard the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney) seemingly boasting about the economic situation in Canada, claiming that people were able to travel wherever they wanted. I should however like to point out to him that the Canadian workers who have to cross the border in order to find jobs they cannot find in Canada, whose economic conditions have just been flaunted, must drive 40, 50 or 60 miles twice a week to reach logging camps. They cannot remain there during the weekend because the camps then close down for two days. Nevertheless, they are allowed no deduction for travel expenses. In fact, the famous bill containing over 700 pages completely ignores them. Yet, those workers have to file three income tax reports to satisfy the taxing authorities and the country in which they live. The first one is for the Canadian government, the second for the province of Quebec and the third for the American taxing authorities. And we are told that economic conditions are normal and satisfactory. Those who have drafted this bill, with the help of numerous civil servants who have been dealing with taxes for 20 or 25 years, have forgotten this category of workers.

I draw this fact to the attention of the parliamentary secretary and I would like to hear his views on this problem.

[English]

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I want to pursue the argument which the parliamentary secretary used to try to explain why the government feels the $150 expense allowance for workers is sufficient. If I understood him correctly, he said that the economic situation is such that the miner can afford to move more than a quarter of a mile away from the mine shaft, that he can afford to move 10, 15 or 20 miles away from his place of work and that the state does not and should not subsidize his expenses in travelling to and from work. But the parliamentary secretary did not address himself to the question that we have been asking. Why does the government have two standards? Why does the government apply that particular standard to the workingman, the factory worker, the man working in a mine or a mill?

To the doctor who lives in Rockcliffe and has an office in downtown Ottawa, who uses his car to go from his home to his office and from his office downtown to the Civic Hospital to see his patients, the government does not say, "You want to live in Rockcliffe and if you have to see your patients at the hospital you will have to pay expenses you incur." On the contrary, the government says to him, "You can charge off a very substantial part of the cost of your car, not just the gas and oil but depreciation and everything else."

The government says to the lawyer who wants to live in Kanata, uses his car to come to his office on Sparks Street or on Metcalfe Street and then uses it to go to the court house, "You can travel from your home in Kanata 20 miles to downtown Ottawa, from there to the court house and back to Kanata at night, and you can charge off 70 per cent of the expense of your car in the form of a deduction from your income tax." I suppose, Mr. Chairman, I am pretty stupid—

An hon. Member: We won't disagree on that.

Mr. Orlikow: I would like the hon. member who sits there to stand up and speak sometimes, but I suppose the reason he is not the stupidest member of the House is that he has just enough brains not to get up and speak.

Before this item passes I would like the parliamentary secretary to explain to me, in language which I can understand so that I can show it to my constituents, why working people are not treated in the same way.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member who has just spoken is under a rather grave misapprehension as to the law regarding travelling expenses for doctors travelling from Rockcliffe to their offices in downtown Ottawa. That expense is not allowed to doctors and there is ample case law to substantiate this.

Mr. Peters: Of course it is allowed.

Mr. Mahoney: It is rather futile debating this point. If hon. members opposite wish to continue to perpetuate the fiction that somehow or other wage and salary earners are discriminated against in that they cannot deduct the cost of travelling to a mill or factory, while professional people are favoured in that they can deduct the cost of going from their homes to their offices, there is nothing I can do to stop them. But it simply is not true.

The hon. member for Kamouraska raised a rather specialized matter and I must apologize for not jumping up immediately to answer his question regarding Canadian taxpayers who are employed outside Canada. So far as travelling expenses are concerned, so far as the cost of commuting home for the weekends is concerned they are in exactly the same position as if they were employed in Canada. That is not an expense which the income tax department allows. However, for those particular people there is a provision in the bill which I would draw to the attention of the hon. member. It is section 8(9). This, for the first time, will permit these employees to credit against their tax in Canada, to deduct from their tax payable in Canada the taxes they have to pay to the state in the United States in which they are employed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mahoney: Heretofore they have been able to deduct the federal tax, but now they can deduct the state tax as well. I am sorry; it is a deduction from income but not a deduction from tax. This is something new and should be of benefit to the particular taxpayers about whom the hon. member for Kamouraska was concerned.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, we are sitting around here this evening waiting for some decisive results from the eastern part of Canada. Apparently at the moment the election has become rather a stalemate, but anyway it is a little better than it has been. I was going to ask the parliamentary secretary—

[Mr. Orlikow.]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member should not leave us in the lurch; he should tell us what the figures are. You, Mr. Chairman, are restricted to the chair and I am sure you, too, would like to know the results from Newfoundland.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I would advise the hon. member that the Chair would not rule out anything he might like to add.

Mr. McCleave: I am getting some conflicting figures, but I understand there is one seat difference between Mr. Smallwood's party and the challenging party, and that the Labrador party has also got one seat. I don't know what that means at all, but while we are waiting for it to be resolved may I raise this matter with the parliamentary secretary. This afternoon, in answer to a question that I raised yesterday, he simply said that it was government policy with regard to the Income Tax Act that strike pay would not be included as a taxable benefit. I think at least we should hear a statement of government policy on this so that some of us can decide whether to debate it further or not.

Mr. Mahoney: The hon. member, as a member of the Standing Committee on Finance during the study of the white paper, will be aware that this issue was faced and the recommendation by the committee was that strike pay be included in taxable income at least when it came from sources funded by tax deductible contributions. The government considered that matter and made the decision that that would not be a desirable thing.

I am afraid that I am not in a position to give the background reasons for that decision, but the matter was distinctly faced up to and considered. As a matter of fact, I am sure we are all aware of the typographical error that crept into schedule A in the ways and means motion where the marginal note referred to this matter but the provision was not there. I am afraid I cannot give the reasons but I can simply say that the matter was faced up to and the decision was deliberately made.

Mr. McCleave: I would like to make what is probably a very legitimate point for all members of the committee including those on the government side. We are frequently faced with the representations of organizations and associations from different parts of Canada some of which have fought a continuing battle on tax reform over the last ten years. It is a pretty legitimate matter for any one of us to say that at least we should have on the record of the House of Commons, before we dispose of this bill, the reasons why we take certain courses. This is why I posed the question to the parliamentary secretary. I know we dealt with it in the committee as we did many other things, but I think it is a matter of compressing within a short period of time the reasons why the government is or is not adopting certain suggestions.

I make no apology for raising the matter. I think that to let people know what we are trying to do here is a very important element in persuading them why tax reform should be carried out. I make no apology for that, sir.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I should like some clarification on the point that the parliamentary secretary raised a minute or two ago. I agree that if the parliamentary secretary takes his car and drives to the office or goes home, he is covered by other allowances. I think it is safe to say that unless he has an interest in the oil business or has another job, he is not going to get any money for his automobile. However, I think he would be hard pressed to pass on that example to professional people.

It may be true, and I think it is, that the doctor would not say that he had three patients in the Civic Hospital and was driving there from Rockcliffe, but I am sure that everyone here knows that the doctor can claim a percentage of the capital cost of his car, that he can claim a certain percentage of the operating expenses and as long as he does not claim 100 per cent the income tax department will not be very strict. This applied in the horse and buggy days as well. I presume when I was born the doctor had to drive 11 or 12 miles with the horse and buggy, but there was an allowance for it.

An hon. Member: You are not that old.

Mr. Peters: I think the parliamentary secretary is not being fair to members of this House when he says he will not accept that there is a difference between the worker who takes his automobile to work, whether it be ten or 50 miles and where there is no other means of transportation, and the doctor who is driving his car in the course of his duties. In one case the worker can get no consideration for his car expenses against the income he earns, and in the other the doctor gets a percentage of the cost. I have operated on an expense account where I was supplied with a car. As long as I did not claim 100 per cent there was no difficulty. I owned two cars, so I said that I was using the company car for business and I allowed 5 per cent for casual driving. I used the other car for other purposes, so I was not entitled to that consideration.

I think the parliamentary secretary is being unfair to members who believe that the same type of concession should be given to the worker as is given to the professional man and self-employed citizens in respect of the operation of an automobile.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, since it is so close to ten o'clock I must apologize to the other hon. member who sought the floor. However, in view of the allegations which have been made I felt I should respond immediately rather than tomorrow. The fact is that the doctor in Rockcliffe does not have the right to claim the cost of motoring from home to the office against his income. The Department of National Revenue applies percentages of expenses and this varies with the experience of individuals. A doctor in a small rural community might very well be allowed over 75 per cent of the cost of his motor vehicle because it is regarded as a proper business expense.

An hon. Member: What about the worker?

Mr. Mahoney: The doctor in the large community may be allowed as little as 50 per cent. I would not go so far as to say that each individual case is individually assessed, but certainly all are looked at in typical areas and if any professional man feels that he is using his vehicles for business purposes to an extent greater than the norm in the community, he could justify this to the Department of National Revenue.

What about the worker driving to work? He is not going to get his expenses for operating that motor vehicle to and from work and he is not going to get any allowance while it is sitting in the parking lot outside the factory, either. The doctor drives the car in the course of earning his income. That is the criteria; the car is operated while the man is earning income—it is part of his necessary operations in earning his taxable income. It is not necessary for anybody to park a car next to his office building all day long.

Mr. Peters: The doctor does not take the car into the surgery, either.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

GRAIN—LIFT PROGRAM—REQUESTS TO FARMERS FOR REPAYMENTS—POSSIBILITY OF PROSECUTIONS

Mr. A. C. Cadieu (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, on October 14 I asked the minister in charge of the Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) a question to which he did not give a satisfactory answer. My question was:

Is it the intention of the hon. gentleman's department to proceed with prosecutions in cases where aerial photographs have proved that a farmer's application in connection with the LIFT program was incorrect?

• (10:00 p.m.)

The minister gave an unsatisfactory answer to my question, more or less saying he would need more information. My supplementary question, which went unanswered, was:

Is it true that the PFRA Regina office is making demands with regard to these repayments?

I think that this has gone a little too far and it is time the farmer had some idea where he stands. Regarding the Lift program, the government was advised by all agriculturalists and members of parliament who were involved in farming that the Lift program was unsatisfactory. Farmers were forced into the Lift program against their will because if they did not participate they would no longer have a permit book, which is necessary if they are to sell grain.

Now very misleading figures have come out. The government anticipated that approximately $140 million would be paid into the lagging western economy in connection with agriculture but wound up paying less than $80 million, with approximately $2 million going into administration and aerial surveillance. This figure would have been increased greatly had it not been for the fact that the administration people took over the PFAA office that had been established and set up with personnel. If it had not been for this, the cost of administration would have greatly exceeded $2 million.

The farmers were forced into the plan. I have heard of much dissatisfaction from people who did not receive any payment at all but had planned their crop year so as to receive some benefit from the program as well as from people who received the interim payment and later had a demand to pay it back. I cannot for the life of me see how the government hopes in any manner, shape or form to demand a repayment of those funds which were, in effect, a grant. One would not look for this kind of action from a former dean of law. It is ridiculous for the government to be asking for money back, because they have no legal right to it. In a number of cases that I took up with the department it was found that their figures were wrong and they made a further payment.

I should like to put on record the contents of one of several letters I have received. I received one letter from a young farmer. Part of it says that one year ago he applied for a payment under Operation Lift and in good faith accepted a payment of $135. This was accompanied by a letter saying that this was an initial payment and that the balance would be forwarded later. Upon receiving this initial payment he spent the money, later paid income tax on it and now they are requesting that he pay it back. That is one of several letters I have received.

May I also draw the minister's attention to the Western Producer, a farm paper, dated October 7, 1971. The heading over one letter reads, "Another Lift victim". Another letter to the editor is headed, "Lift cheque received, return demanded". That is the kind of thing you see in the press.

I am just wondering what this government thinks it can do. The farmers were forced into the program. I have heard many complaints from farmers who seeded land to forage. They were promised $4 per acre if they left it in grass and they were to receive $4 the following year if the inspector found that the land had been left as grassland. Now farmers are finding that these payments are being denied them. They have not received any payment on their forage. I am wondering what kind of deal the government is giving the farmers of western Canada when it engages in monkey business such as this. It is paying out money and then demanding it back. The government has displayed a great mistrust of the farmers by spending a great deal of money on aerial surveys, money which would have been much better paid to the producer who is in great need.

Is it morally or legally right for the government to make a payment with one hand and then demand it back with the other? I am sorry the minister is not in his place. I would like him to straighten out this mess in western Canada. Many farmers have received no payment whatsoever. In fact, their applications have not even been acknowledged. Many did not feel it was necessary to apply because they were not concerned with it. They later found they had to apply or they would not receive a permit book to sell grain. It is time the farmers of western Canada knew where the minister is going with his cockeyed Lift program.

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the minister responsible for the Wheat Board and the application of the Lift program I am pleased to give the answer to the question asked by the hon. member. It is as follows. The Lift office at Regina—PFAA—has written to a number of farmers who for various reasons had received an overpayment under the Lift program. As the hon. member knows, in order to give farmers money quickly interim payments were made upon receipt of applications, with final balancing and a final payment made later. Aerial photographs were one of the means used for checking applications. Whether or not prosecutions will be undertaken in individual cases if repayments are not made voluntarily will be determined at a later time and will depend upon the circumstances of the particular case.

[Mr. Cadieu.]

OIL—PROPOSED TAKE-OVER OF SUPERTEST BY BRITISH PETROLEUM—POSSIBLE GOVERNMENT ACTION—ACQUISITION BY PANARCTIC OILS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, October 26, as recorded at page 9032 of Hansard, I asked the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin), who is also Acting Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the following question:

—is the government planning any measures to deal with the proposed take-over of the last major Canadian-owned distributor of petroleum products, Supertest, by British Petroleum Limited?

The minister's answer, to my way of thinking, was entirely unsatisfactory. He said:

Mr. Speaker, this situation has been under study and an announcement will be made in due course by the minister or somebody speaking for him.

I do not think the House should be asked to wait for this unidentified minister or person who is going to make a statement. The meeting of the shareholders is scheduled for November 2. The government ought to make a clear-cut statement as to what it intends to do about this proposed take-over. The point I want to make is that the oil industry is by far one of the wealthiest industries in Canada. In the Canadian Petroleum magazine issue of May, 1970, Mr. Carl O. Nickle, a former member of this House and the publisher of the Daily Oil Bulletin in Calgary, said that the value of reserves at present prices for oil, gas and sulphur is $1,118 billion. That is based on present oil, gas and sulphur prices. It is the equivalent of $50,000 for every man, woman and child in Canada.

• (10:10)

This vast reservoir of wealth has been steadily slipping out of control of Canadians with the result that today over 80 per cent of oil and gas production is in the hands of foreign corporations. The major portion of the oil distribution facilities is in the hands of foreign corporations and 99 per cent of refining of petroleum products is in the hands of foreign investment.

There was some hope raised in people's minds when a few months ago the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) intervened to prevent the take-over of Home Oil Company, the last Canadian-owned company which had any hope of becoming a major oil producer. I give the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources full marks for the courage and vision he showed on that occasion. But, Mr. Speaker, oil production must be accompanied by facilities for oil distribution, and Supertest is the last of the Canadian petroleum distributors, with 1,200 outlets. It will now be purchased, if the shareholders agree, on November 2, by British Petroleum Limited which, by the way, is 51 per cent owned by the government of Great Britain. If that happens we shall have virtually lost control, as far as Canadian companies are concerned, over the distribution of petroleum products in Canada.

The bright spot in the picture is that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) and his predecessor showed considerable vision by investing public funds in Panarctic Oil, largely because many of the foreign investors who were quite willing to put money into Canada were not prepared to take the risk in the Arctic. The investment has paid off. Panarctic has discovered one of the largest deposits of natural gas in the world. The government's investment of between $30 million and $40 million is now worth $150 million to $200 million. Mr. Heatherington, president of Panarctic, has envisaged his company becoming a wholly integrated oil and gas concern. If this is so, it will need petroleum outlets.

This is why it is important that Supertest should not be allowed to pass into the hands of a foreign company. If Panarctic is not ready to act now, there is no reason why the Canada Development Corporation, providing the shareholders are intent on selling it, should not acquire Supertest and operate it until such time as Panarctic is in a position to need a distributor of petroleum products.

This is Canada's last chance to get a piece of the action. It is our last chance to prevent control of the wealthiest industry in our nation slipping entirely out of our hands. It is not enough for the minister to tell me that somebody is going to make an announcement. In the course of the next few days a decision will be made, a British company will take over an oil distributing firm and we shall find ourselves in the position of having lost almost the entire oil distribution network of this country to foreign companies.

I say to the government that if they want to retain the confidence of the Canadian public they must act now, otherwise the action they took with respect to Home Oil and Dennison Mines will have lost its effectiveness and we shall have allowed a valuable part of our economy to slip out of the hands of the Canadian people.

Mr. Allen B. Sulatycky (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, perhaps in the next couple of minutes I shall be able to relieve the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) of some of his anxiety about this matter.

Following a joint statement by BP Canada Limited and Supertest Petroleum Corporation Limited on July 29, 1971, relative to a planned merger of interests between these two companies the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) wrote to confirm the prior notice given to the government of Canada by these two companies and to advise of the desire of the government to review the transaction in terms of the national interest, in accordance with the government's policy of understanding important economic activity taking place within Canada or affecting Canada. Subsequently, both meetings with senior officials of BP Canada and Supertest and the study of relevant material on the proposed takeover merger were undertaken but a final report to the government of Canada by officials was not made until Supertest issued its information circular dated October 7, 1971.

The government of Canada today has advised BP Canada Limited and Supertest Petroleum Corporation Limited that it does not intend to intervene. However, both BP Canada Limited and Supertest Petroleum Corporation Limited have been advised of the importance attached to maintaining a fully competitive market and their assurance that the merger is likely to enhance this fair competition in the interest of the consumer is relied upon.

Also taken into account is the assurance from these companies that western Canada produced oil will continue to be utilized in the Supertest marketing system, and that the merger of the BP and Supertest marketing interests will lead to the early consideration of expanded refinery capacity for the Ontario market, in accordance with the national oil policy.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—RESPONSE TO CRITICISMS OF DEPARTMENTAL PROGRAMS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise this evening to deal with a matter that has been of some interest in this House for the past few weeks. I make no apology for raising it again this evening, though I am somewhat disappointed that neither the minister nor his parliamentary secretary has thought it sufficiently important to be here to deal with this question directly.

A good deal has been said about regional economic expansion over the last few months and much of the criticism has been fair and honest. Some, we will have to admit, has perhaps been a distortion. But of all the criticism one thing can be said—that essentially this criticism has gone unanswered by the minister and his government. For a government to make a major commitment, as this government has at least over the last few years, to regional development and then to refuse to deal openly and honestly with well developed criticism, even when it comes from its own agencies, is surely showing not only a great lack of responsibility but is a dereliction of duty. Quite frankly, I wonder how long the people of Canada are going to tolerate this kind of irresponsible attitude on the part of the minister.

Criticisms and suggestions have come from such recognized agencies as the Canadian Council on Rural Development, the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council and the minister's own agency, the Atlantic Development Council. To continue to ignore these criticisms and suggestions as if they were unworthy of reply is certainly unworthy of all the programs that the minister has said repeatedly are designed to deal with regions of economic disparity in this country.

The chief criticism that has been enunciated again and again is that having to do with the various goals and targets that are supposedly part of the strategy of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. When the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr.

Douglas) raised a somewhat similar question on October 26 he received an answer from the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State which provided little information. Indeed, it contained a very disturbing comment in the final sentence when the parliamentary secretary said that "no such changes, however, are contemplated at the moment".

This is an incredible position to be in, with the material that has been on the minister's desk, some of it for months. To be willing to suggest to a third person or intermediary that there were no changes contemplated is completely and totally shocking. For the life of me I cannot understand how this minister believes he can continue to ignore public and responsible criticism from the three bodies I have just mentioned. We need answers because some basic questions have been raised. These are basic questions about a chief and major program of this department, that of designating areas for special incentive grants. This is a program that has grown like Topsy.

Originally we were told that parts of the country would be designated as special areas where there was a chronic situation of under-employment or unemployment of a long-term nature which could be described as regional disparity. Yet as the department has carried on—and it has not had a long life,—we have learned from time to time that new districts have been added, the latest and most major of which was a good deal of the city of Montreal. It is interesting to note that since Montreal has been designated some independent studies have indicated a drop in the proportionate grants to other designated regions across the country.

Some things have been admitted recently by the minister, I suppose by way of some kind of self-serving statements and not by way of clarification. We know, for instance, that in the two years the grants program has been operating, some 5,500 jobs have been created in the Atlantic region. But there are many things we have not been told. We have never really been told what kind of guidelines are in operation for the allocation of these grants. In fact, when we debated the establishment of this department and the program we were continually told that in order for the program to function effectively there had to be the widest possible latitude given the minister and the new department.

Members of this House on all sides, even though they were well aware of the pressures which would exist in respect of the multimillion dollar program, were willing to give the minister some leeway, with the somewhat naïve belief that the minister would eventually describe to this House and to the people of this country what guidelines were in fact operating. It has been in operation for two years and we have not yet heard what those guidelines are, what industrial structures have been favoured in the Atlantic provinces, Quebec, Ontario and western Canada what firms are succeeding and why, and what funds are helping and why.

Except for the occasional question put in the House in respect of a specific industry that involves an obvious and flagrant misuse of government funds, we are never really told what the situation is in respect of the firms that qualify for assistance or how these funds are used in the way of industrial development. We know there has been no public evaluation but we know that some 5,500 jobs have been created in the Atlantic region. We know, as well, that during the same period the unemployment figure has been sometimes more and sometimes less than 65,000, so if we measure success against those who are unemployed in the Atlantic region we are talking about 3 per cent or 4 per cent, and one cannot get very enthusiastic about that kind of result.

Many suggestions have been made, too numerous to mention this evening in the brief time available, about over-centralization and the lack of consultation not only with provincial authorities but with municipal authorities, about the need for more information and a review of the spending program in relation to job creating industries, the spending on infrastructure and the need for monitor industries to see that the jobs that were supposed to be created are still there at a specific time period, and to see what happens to the public money given to those industries. We have had no response, or the only response we have had is what I would call corridor blackmail. Outside the chamber the minister has said if we do not like his program the government will simply stop it. That is the meanest form of response to provinces and areas which are greatly in need of finding the answer to their chronic problems of unemployment and under-employment.

The time has come to end that kind of corridor blackmail and non-response by this minister and this government. One hopes that in the immediate future we will have some public evaluation, some public response to the legitimate and responsible suggestions and criticisms that have been put forward, and in particular some response to the minister's own body, the Atlantic Development Council, which some months ago placed before the minister a strategy for the Atlantic region from which we have had no definite response and which we must have if we are to be informed on what this department plans to do with regard to economic expansion in the Atlantic region.

Mr. James Hugh Faulkner (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): I am pleased to reply on behalf of the minister. I will deal specifically with the report of the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council and not the rather exaggerated and political remarks made by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald).

As I pointed out on Tuesday last to the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), the report has been received and is being given careful study. We pointed out on Tuesday that it contains a number of useful suggestions, information and analysis, and in so far as that material is there it will be studied carefully. I also pointed out that in the view of the department the report contained a number of criticisms of the departmental program, some of which criticism is constructive but some of which seems to be based on misconceptions. Because of this I would like to make one or two comments about the report.

APEC suggests that for a variety of political and short-term reasons the department watered down the objectives and the criteria for the expenditure of scarce funds, to the disadvantage of the Atlantic provinces. I reject this suggestion. The departmental budget increased from $120 million in 1968-69 to $333 million in 1971-72, excluding Devco and the loan funds. Approximately 50 per cent of the total has been and is being spent in the Atlantic provinces. In fact, in the fiscal year 1970-71 and 1971-72 the department spent or will spend more money in the Atlantic provinces than was spent in those provinces by comparable programs such as ARDA, FRED, ADB and ADA in the fiscal years from 1965-66 to 1969-70.

I see no evidence to support the view that the objectives of the programs have been watered down. APEC suggests that the department is spending relatively too much money on infrastructure and relatively too little money on what it refers to as economic development. In my view the conclusion is based on an artificial distinction that fails to recognize the contribution to economic development made by residential and industrial land assembly, water and sewer systems, arterial and municipal roads, vocational schools and other projects commonly included in the infrastructure category.

APEC suggests that the department has done little integrative planning within a firm set of objectives and strategies. Hon. members know that many of the programs are based on a joint planning process that is dependent on a close working relationship with provincial governments. We still have a long way to go in developing this process but frankly we are quite proud of the progress that has been made. We are engaged day in and day out in a planning exercise with our provincial counterparts that is now generating, in each of the areas in which we function, a large number of action-oriented studies of long neglected problems and the beginnings of a comprehensive development strategy.

APEC suggests that our industrial promotion and development activities have been too passive. I am not sure that when directed at a department little more than two years old this can be regarded as fair criticism. Grants made under the Regional Development Incentives Act have to date helped to create direct employment for over 6,000 Canadians in the Atlantic provinces. The department has shown a willingness to experiment with brand new techniques, such as those represented by the New Brunswick Multiplex Corporation and the proposed Newfoundland Development Council, the department is now considering support for a new Maritime Provinces Industrial Services Council which will be concerned at the regional level with industrial intelligence, industrial research and the provision of management services. I doubt that a program with components of this kind can be regarded as passive.

APEC suggests that the departmental organization is unduly centralized and should be dramatically changed. In the course of doing so it manages to imply that we have 2,000 employees located almost entirely in Ottawa. On the latter point I should state the facts. The department employs a total of 1,600 people. About 700 work in the west for PFRA. Another 250 are employed in our provincial field offices. There are about 625 employees in Ottawa, most of them involved in general administration, in central planning and in the incentives program. I do not intend to get drawn into a debate on questions of departmental organization. There is good reason to believe that the department is one of the most decentralized of all federal departments. There is reason to believe that—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

PROPOSED TAKEOVER OF SUPERTEST BY BRITISH PETROLEUM—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43 I wish to raise a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, namely, the government's announcement last night that it has decided not to intervene in the proposed takeover of Supertest by British Petroleum Company Limited. May I be permitted a brief statement before submitting my motion.

Foreign control of the production, refining and distribution of petroleum products has been accelerating at an alarming rate. Canadians are increasingly excluded from the ownership and control of the petroleum and gas industry. The government's inaction can only result in allowing one of our most vital and potentially richest resources falling under foreign domination. Supertest constitutes one of the few remaining Canadian owned outlets for the distribution of petroleum products and steps should be taken to keep it in Canadian hands.

Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House urges the government to reconsider its decision and take whatever steps are necessary to prevent the takeover of Supertest by the British Petroleum Co. Ltd. in order that the continued acquisition of the petroleum industry by foreign corporations may be brought to a halt.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. This motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent and the motion cannot be put.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

EVIDENCE OF PLOTS TO ASSASSINATE PREMIER KOSYGIN WHEN IN CANADA—REVIEW OF SECURITY ARRANGEMENTS TO ASSURE SAFETY OF PRESIDENT TITO

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister but in his absence perhaps I could direct it to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Have the Royal Canadian Mounted Police uncovered definite evidence of plots to assassinate Premier Kosygin when he was in Canada and, if so, is a statement to be made in the House?

• (11:10 a.m.)

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, there has been much speculation such as that referred to by the hon. member. Many reports have been received by the R.C.M.P. before and after the visit and each one was considered on its merits by the police authorities concerned.

[English]

Mr. Aiken: The minister's answer, Mr. Speaker, did not reveal very much but perhaps I could put a supplementary. In light of the events during the visit of Premier Kosygin has the government been able to assure President Tito of his safety in Canada during his forthcoming visit, and are security arrangements being reviewed?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I think that if we attach too much importance to security, when the Canadian government invites some personalities to meet government authorities and the Canadian people, we would completely distort the purpose of such visits which is, I believe, to make exchanges in the political and economic fields. Indeed, I think that we should call instead the attention of the Canadian people to the positive objectives rather than on security matters which are, of course, considered on their merits.

[English]

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, am I to understand from the Solicitor General that security arrangements are not being given first priority?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I believe that the hon. member has misunderstood my remarks. I said that security matters are certainly assessed according to their significance and that is important, but I think that what is more important, is that Canadians should be concerned with policy discussions held at the level of various departments.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED TELEGRAM SIGNED BY MEMBERS APPEALING TO PRESIDENT NIXON TO STOP AMCHITKA NUCLEAR TEST

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the President of the Privy Council who is the government House leader, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence in his capacity as acting government House leader. Would the minister take up with the government House leader the possibility of calling a meeting, say on Monday, of the House leaders of the various parties to see if arrangements can be made for a telegram to be sent to President Nixon making one last appeal to stop the Amchitka test, with special arrangements being made for all Members of Parliament who wish to do so to sign such a telegram?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to bring that suggestion to the attention of my colleague, the President of the Privy Council.

AMCHITKA NUCLEAR TEST—ALERTING OF EMERGENCY MEASURES ORGANIZATION

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of National Defence. Despite the fact that the dangers of a physical disaster resulting from the nuclear blast at Amchitka are minimal, has the minister placed the Emergency Measures Organization on alert to meet even the minimal possibility of such a disaster? If so, can the minister give us some idea of that organization's plans?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the Emergency Measures Organization, as the hon. member knows, is continually on alert and on these questions in particular they have effective liaison with the provincial emergency measures organizations. As to the actual measures to be taken, I am afraid I cannot report on that this morning.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Minister of National Defence whether the rescue co-ordination centre in Victoria, in co-operation with the coastguard and the Emergency Measures Organization, is making heightened preparations to give advance warning and to take action if it becomes necessary as a result of the Amchitka blast?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the rescue co-ordination centre, as the hon. member suggests, is on a state of alert.

Mr. Nystrom: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville for one more supplementary at this time, and then recognize the hon. member for Témiscamingue.

[Mr. Goyer.]

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister. Has he been given formal notification of the precise hour of the Amchitka test?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL PARKS

DISCUSSION OF ESTABLISHMENT OF PARK IN TÉMISCAMINGUE AREA

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister responsible for national parks.

The Témiscamingue regional Chamber of Commerce held a meeting last night to discuss the development of a national park in Témiscamingue.

Is the minister aware of the action taken by the Chamber of Commerce and has his department come to any conclusion about the matter?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, we are aware of the action taken by the Chambers of Commerce in the area. We are presently studying the problem, but, as hon. members know, no decision can be made with regard to a problem like this one without consultation with the provincial government.

Mr. Caouette: I would like to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Is the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development holding discussions with the provincial authorities regarding the development of a national park in Témiscamingue?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we are consulting with the government of the province of Quebec about the possibility of developing new national parks in several areas of "la belle province», including Témiscamingue.

[English]

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): A supplementary question. Is the province of Ontario involved in this national park which will involve an interprovincial boundary and affect both provinces?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: We are considering that possibility, Mr. Speaker, We believe it might be beneficial to have a park in an area astride the two provinces, which would prove that we can be good neighbours.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILE PACT—MEETING WITH MAYORS OF MUNICIPALITIES THAT WOULD SUFFER HARDSHIP BECAUSE OF POSSIBLE CHANGES

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): My question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce but in his absence I will direct it to the Acting Prime Minister. Has a meeting been held with a group of mayors of municipalities who have expressed a desire for such a meeting and whose economy is very much dependent on the automobile industry and will suffer hardship following any changes in the automobile pact which result in export of jobs to the United States? Have assurances been given that such changes will be opposed by the government?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I answer this question? The government, as hon. members know, has been attempting to maintain the favourable features of the automobile agreement that was so strongly criticized by the opposition in the past. I hope we will continue to have the support of the opposition in maintaining these features.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, the question concerns the proposals of the United States in connection with the transitional features of the safeguards. This is the question that is at issue, not the automobile pact. Has the government arranged to meet the mayors of these various municipalies and, if so, what is the date of the meeting?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is arranging to meet the mayors. I did want to assure the House, however, that the government is fully aware of the advantages of the automobile agreement and has been negotiating to have the best possible rearrangement of the agreement to preserve the advantages to Canada.

Mr. Danforth: Are these various parties who are so concerned being invited to express their opinions as to a solution or is the problem going to be left in the main in the hands of the government in the continuing negotiations which the government insists are taking place with regard to this important pact?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member will agree that negotiations between governments must necessarily be in the hands of the Canadian government and the United States government. We are, of course, seeking useful advice that will enable us to support our case in negotiations with the Americans from wherever we can get it.

AGRICULTURE

PROVISION OF FUNDS TO UNIVERSITIES FOR RESEARCH

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): I would like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of State for Science and Technology. In their absence, possibly the parliamentary secretary will obtain an answer for me. A well-known and respected scientist, Dr. P. D. McTaggart-Cowan, stated that it was the policy of the federal Department of Agriculture to monopolize millions of dollars in research funds and as a result starved research scientists at universities. Will the Minister of Agriculture discuss this matter with his colleague, the Minister of State for Science and Technology, to see whether this money can be given to universities for research, particularly to the University of Guelph faculty of agriculture?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would think the question is in the form of a representation.

CANADIAN FOREIGN AID PROGRAM—SHIPMENT OF GOODS THROUGH CANADIAN BROKERS

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): My question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It concerns Canada's foreign aid program. Will the minister ensure that arrangements for shipment of our substantial gifts abroad are made through Canadian brokers rather than New York brokers and that, hopefully, the shipments are made on our Canadian foreign freighter fleet, all two of them, which otherwise will be tied up in Halifax harbour for lack of business?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will inquire into these representations.

PROPOSED JAMES BAY HYDROELECTRIC PROJECT—REQUEST FOR PUBLICATION OF REPORT ON ECOLOGICAL EFFECTS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): My question is for the Minister of the Environment. Will he make public the review which his department is conducting on the ecological effects on northeastern Quebec, James Bay and Hudson Bay that will result from the building of the proposed hydroelectric project on rivers running into James Bay?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): The answer would be yes, Mr. Speaker, if substantial reports are completed. However, I should mention that this work is being carried out in close co-operation with the government of the province of Quebec. Where we are working co-operatively I would think the concurrence of the province of Quebec would be required as well.

• (11:20 a.m.)

Mr. Orlikow: Would the minister give consideration to permitting interested organizations such as conservation groups, wildlife groups and ecologists to make representations on their views with regard to the proposed plan after the view of the department has been made public and before the department approves proceeding with this tremendous project?

Mr. Davis: I doubt very much whether the federal Department of the Environment would ever be in the position to approve that project in all its details since it is specifically one within the confines of the province of Quebec. However, we would certainly be glad to co-operate with those private groups and make information available as long as this was consistent with our liaison with the province of Quebec.

PROPOSED JAMES BAY HYDROELECTRIC PROJECT—FINANCIAL SUPPORT FOR INDIANS TO TAKE LEGAL ACTION

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): May I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. If the Indians who are living in the area concerned and who have already expressed their opposition to this project were to decide to go to court to seek an injunction to prohibit the project, would the hon. gentleman's department help to finance such a legal appeal?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me that the question as asked is hypothetical. In those terms I would not think it is in order.

COMBINES

INVESTIGATION OF SALE OF TORONTO "TELEGRAM" SUBSCRIPTION LIST TO TORONTO "STAR"—FEDERAL AID POLICY FOR CANADIAN PUBLICATIONS—PRESS REVIEW BOARD

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): In view of the cessation of the publication of the Toronto Telegram and the disappearance of three more independently-owned Ontario daily newspapers into chain ownership, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister, whether he can inform the House about the position of the investigation of the combines branch with respect to the sale of subscription lists and whether we can soon expect a policy of federal aid to Canadian publications and perhaps the establishment of a press review board as recommended by the Senate media committee?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Perhaps I would be permitted to take that question as notice.

INCOME TAX

REQUESTS FOR DELAY IN IMPLEMENTATION OF BILL

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Along with many others, the Premier of Alberta has asked the government to delay for one year implementation of the proposed tax bill, C-259. Is the government open to consider such a suggestion at this time and at the conference which is to be held with the provinces?

[Mr. Orlikow.]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): We shall, of course, consider any representations that are made but it is not our intention to postpone the enactment of the bill.

Mr. Paproski: Does the minister agree with Toronto lawyer J. S. Peterson who has described the tax measures affecting foreign business operations as "a nightmare of overkill"—

Mr. Benson: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order please. The hon. member knows the reservations I have about questions of that type. He is inviting the minister to express an opinion. I have to reiterate my contention that such questions are not acceptable from a procedural standpoint.

Mr. Paproski: On a point of order, I regret that the question was not worded properly, Mr. Speaker, but I have other questions for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and for the Postmaster General and it takes a little time to formulate them properly. I regret that I asked that question.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CHANGES IN LIGHT OF CRITICISMS—JOBS CREATED

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In light of the fact that last week the minister indicated in a press release that two of the recommendations of the Atlantic Development Council were going to be implemented, and since the parliamentary secretary suggested last night in answer to a question of mine that some of the criticisms contained in the recent report of the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council were constructive, when can we expect some kind of detailed elaboration by the minister with regard to possible changes and his own response to very important criticisms of the program and, in particular, some comment with respect to the over-all strategy of the Atlantic Development Council.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member is not expecting me to indicate today all the changes that will be made but I think he will become aware of them gradually, both in the House and elsewhere. I shall no doubt have an opportunity to indicate not the change in strategy, as I do in the House, but insofar as other changes are concerned I shall make them known as and when they are made or considered.

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): In view of the minister's speech last week in which he talked about the total number of jobs created under the incentives program, I wonder whether he is in a position to indicate if this total number of jobs, which was said to be 37,524, represents jobs that have been created or will be created by the end of this year? Could the minister also indicate whether monitoring procedures are in effect to determine that this number of jobs will be sustained during the next time period of the manufacturing industry's operations, and whether it will be more than one year?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, the figure of 37,000 stands for the number of jobs which will be created if all the applications approved effectively result in implementation of projects covered by those applications.

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have to remind hon. members of the suggestion I made to them yesterday that we should try to limit supplementaries if we are to have as many questioners as possible during the question period. The hon. member for Egmont.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, since it is always difficult to know from these releases by the minister whether we are talking about jobs which have been created or which will be created, will he be in a position, perhaps at the first of the week, to indicate the exact number of jobs that have been created and those that he expects to be created within a reasonable period of time?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I shall see, Mr. Speaker, whether this can be calculated. If it is possible, I shall gladly do so.

[English]

[Later:]

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, this question follows earlier questions directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In light of the government's understandable delicacy about burdening us with statistics, would the minister be prepared to table the figures on unemployment goals and what the minister projects those to be for this winter and next year? This will be very helpful to us when we consider his departmental estimates and other aspects of government policy.

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I do not know if these are figures on unemployment in Canada or only in regions that—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): This is not the same thing.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): This is not the same thing indeed, as indicated by the hon. member for Edmonton West. This is therefore in designated areas.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EXPULSION OF TAIWAN FROM UNITED NATIONS—CONTINUATION OF COMMERCIAL RELATIONS BY CANADA

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Now that Communist China has been admitted to the United Nations and that the Taiwan government has been expelled, does the government intend to maintain its trade relations with Taiwan and to have a permanent attaché there? Will Canada still keep certain relations with the Taiwan government?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, when we established diplomatic relations with the People's Republic of China we could not, of course, maintain relations with the government that claimed to have authority over the same area, namely, the Republic of China government which happens to be located at the moment in Taiwan. We did make it clear to the representatives of the People's Republic of China that we would, however, continue to trade with the people of Taiwan; but since we do not recognize another government of China we cannot have any formal relations with the Republic of China government.

• (11:30 a.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Since the Canadian government has extended considerable assistance to certain industries in Taiwan, will it continue to do so in view of the fact that they were made financially possible owing to the Canadian government?

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I am unaware of the sort of assistance to which the hon. gentleman is referring.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

EDUCATIONAL FACILITIES IN NORTHEASTERN ALBERTA—SIT-IN AT EDMONTON REGIONAL OFFICE

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It arises out of the difficulties emanating from the Keeheewin Indian reservation in northeastern Alberta where there was a sit-in yesterday by a number of Indians at the department's regional headquarters. Will the minister advise the House in view of what Chief Goodchild, I believe that is his name, the leader of the Indians, said, to the effect that all employees, both Indian and white, of the regional office were on the side of the Indians, where the block or difference of opinion is between the Indians and the department, and is it true that the local officials are on the side of the Indians?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that after the beginning of the difficulties I made concrete proposals to the Indians, and we have put $250,000 aside to help ameliorate the conditions. I indicated it was not possible under the present budget to build six new schools on these reserves. We have increased our contribution to quite a large extent, but it is not physically possible to build six schools. The Indians have now said to me that I have to meet all their demands before they will send their children back to school. I have indicated to them that it is impossible to meet their demands and it is absolutely unacceptable for the parents to keep their children out of school. I hope they will reconsider and send their children back to school and then we will be able to negotiate.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, what steps are being taken by the minister to negotiate a relaxation of this sit-in at the regional office of the department in Edmonton which is being occupied by members of the band and sympathizers on a 24-hour basis?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I made many concessions at the beginning of this matter. I have offered to put up three temporary schools on the reserve, I have sent some people to repair the water system and I have sent carpenters to repair the schools, but each step I take seems to form another platform for new demands. I have said it is unacceptable for the parents to keep their children out of school, and when they return to school I will be ready to negotiate. My door is open and if they want to come they will be welcome any time. I am willing to meet them any time they want to meet with me.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again I must seek the co-operation of hon. members. We will be reaching the end of the question period very shortly and if we allow five or six supplementary questions on the same matter we will be in difficulty.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my last supplementary question is similar to the question I originally posed. Is there anything being done by the minister to negotiate the end of this sit-in at the regional office? That is the immediate problem; we are aware of the other problems that exist.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, my special assistant talked with the two chiefs yesterday and asked whether there was any possibility of a compromise. They said the only thing they will accept is an answer by the minister and that he will build six schools, but that is impossible. I have very good people in the field in whom I have every confidence. There are responsible officials of my department who are able to deal with problems in the field. Three are Indians and I will not pull the rug out from under them.

ALLEGED INVOLVEMENT OF REGIONAL AND DISTRICT OFFICE EMPLOYEES IN SADDLE LAKE BAND POLITICS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development whether he has been made aware of an allegation or accusation by the chief of the Saddle Lake action committee on behalf of the people of the Saddle Lake reservation that departmental staff in the Alberta regional office and the Saddle Lake-Athabasca district office have become involved in the internal politics of the Saddle Lake band? Has he examined the matter to see whether this is true and, if it is, does he not feel there is some need to perhaps pull the rug out from under them?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I must say I am aware that some parents would like very badly to send their children back to school. Some have been in touch with my officers, but my officers are not putting their noses into Indian politics on the reserve. They have certainly indicated to me that some parents want to discuss the possibility of sending their children back to school.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Skeena for the purpose of making one last supplementary question and then we will move on to another subject.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I asked the minister whether he was aware that the Saddle Lake band had made the accusation that the staff of the regional office and of the Saddle Lake-Athabasca district office had been interfering in the internal politics of that band and whether he would examine that situation. I did not ask him to go into a dissertation about what he hopes to do.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am aware of that accusation and I have been discussing the situation with my officials each day. I will be talking with them again today and will ask whether this is true, but the information I have so far would indicate that it is not.

While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, with the indulgence of the House I should like to recognize Chief Dan George in the Speaker's gallery, who is to be honoured with the Order of Canada later today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the fact that the Liberal ship is sinking in Newfoundland, is the minister contemplating throwing a lifebuoy in the form of increased economic assistance to that province?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STE. THÉRÈSE, QUEBEC—LAY-OFF OF EMPLOYEES BY GENERAL MOTORS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, following the meeting of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion with representatives of the United Auto Workers from Ste. Thérèse, Quebec, concerning the lay-off of 600 men to take place on Monday, November 1, will he inform the House whether the government is able to do anything to hold off these proposed lay-offs?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I had a long discussion with the representatives of the Ste. Thérèse union. I indicated to them ways and means of helping those who would be laid off, particularly in contacting Canada Manpower Centres; I also mentioned that under the new programs announced by the honourable Minister of Finance, employment might be found for a large number of the people laid-off.

[English]

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Speaker, would the minister consider urging the Quebec Minister of Labour to consider the UAW proposal that the number of hours worked per man be reduced slightly as one means of avoiding the proposed lay-offs?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, the union members made that suggestion to me. To my mind, it is not realistic, because if we did so for the people in Sainte-Thérèse, we would also have to do it for all the unemployed: I would like the hon. member to figure out how much that would cost.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

COMMENDATION FOR PROGRAM, «THE TENTH DECADE»

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State who reports to the House for the CBC, may I direct this question to the Acting Prime Minister. Would he be good enough to relay to the president of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and all those who had anything to do with the first program in the series, "The Tenth Decade", a commendation which I am sure would be supported by millions of Canadians for the portrayal of the lives of two great Canadians, and express the hope that the following sequences will be equally as interesting and factual?

HOUSING

IMMEDIATE ACTION TO SUPPLEMENT LOW INCOME HOUSING IN OTTAWA AND OTHER CITIES

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. As Ottawa has the lowest vacancy rate in Canada for rental accommodation, about one per cent, and CMHC officials have stated that some low income families can find absolutely no shelter, is the government going to take direct and immediate action to supplement low income housing in areas such as Ottawa and, if so, when will a statement be made?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we are doing this on a regular basis and we will be delighted to enlist the services and assistance of the hon. member in dealing with the government of Ontario which has a more direct relationship with the kind of housing he is talking about for the Ottawa area. It really depends very much on their decision on priorities within the provinces, using federal money placed at their disposal.

Mr. Ryan: Has the minister contacted the province of Ontario about this particular problem?

Mr. Andras: Yes, Mr. Speaker, we are in regular communication with them, although there has been a slight impediment in getting through over the past few weeks.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

AMCHITKA NUCLEAR TEST—ADDITIONAL ACTION TO PROTEST

Mr. Murray McBride (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of the Environment. In view of the large number of members of this House including the Minister of the Environment, I understand, who have today put their names to the Ottawa "Blast-o-Gram" which is to be sent to President Nixon, will the minister indicate what additional action is now contemplated?

• (11:40 a.m.)

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): As the hon. member knows, this House has spoken out very effectively. We have all individually done the best we can. I do not think I can say any more.

AMCHITKA NUCLEAR TEST—STEPS TO DEAL WITH POSSIBLE ECOLOGICAL DAMAGE

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, because the probable effect on the ecology from the Amchitka blast is a very real consideration, can the Minister of the Environment tell us what steps his department has in mind in case the blast does proceed in order to deal with the ecological damage either directly within the department's authority or in conjunction with international agencies?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, my understanding of the situation is that the ecological damage at a distance of more than a few hundred miles from the site is likely to be very small. Our concern has to be about the effects a few miles off Amchitka within international waters and over a long period of time.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HOUSING

ROCHDALE COLLEGE—ISSUANCE OF FINAL ORDER OF FORECLOSURE—REFERENCE OF MATTER TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In light of the fact that the minister has issued a writ of foreclosure against Rochdale College—I know he cannot make a statement at this time because of the legal niceties—can he at least advise the House whether a final order of foreclosure has been signed and issued?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): As I have indicated on previous occasions, a writ of foreclosure was sought on August 17, I believe. It was our forecast at that time that it could take up to 18 months or two years before total legal possession is surrendered to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I think the hon. member is aware there are at least three or four other mortgagors or creditors to be dealt with and that there are legal processes by which this thing must be solved. We cannot hurry up the process. We have financial and management control of the operation at this time, but there is no way the process can be speeded up except through the courts.

An hon. Member: What about the suicides?

Mr. Alexander: I have one supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I shall not go into the legal—

Mr. Andras: On a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, there was an aside which suggested something about suicide. I think that casual reference to this kind of very sad events is not really helpful and I would wonder how CMHC could be assigned the responsibility for law and order in such a situation or in fact to impose itself upon all the personal decisions that would go into such a tragic event.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, on the same question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps it might be a different question of privilege because I doubt whether that was a question of privilege.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, in light of the fact that I started this conversation I hope the Minister of State for Urban Affairs knows that the hon. member for Hamilton West did not make that interjection. In any event, without getting into the niceties of the legal argument to which the minister referred, can the minister assure the House that once legal title is placed in the hands of the government of Canada he would refer this whole matter to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs so it can look into it and come up with a report which will perhaps help to prevent the type of situation he is faced with now?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I doubt whether there would be a necessity for any such reference to be made, but I also would take no steps to prevent discussion of the matter before the committee on an appropriate occasion.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize a last supplementary because we are running short of time.

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, can the Minister of State for Urban Affairs tell us, with respect to the action against Rochdale on the first mortgage of CMHC, whether a writ of possession has been obtained from the courts and a judgment signed with reference to subsequent encumbrances on the title?

Mr. Andras: I do not think I can make any further legal interpretation or comment on the affair other than what I have already stated in response to the hon. member for Hamilton West.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SUGGESTED WITHDRAWAL OF AUTHORIZATION FOR UNITED STATES BOMBER TRAINING FLIGHTS OVER SOUTHERN MANITOBA AND SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the lack of responsiveness of the United States on matters of concern to Canada as evidenced by the recent Amchitka test announcement, is the government considering withdrawing its authorization for U.S. B-52 bomber training flights over southern Manitoba and Saskatchewan and reviewing other arrangements such as NORAD?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): No, sir.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

LENNOX ISLAND RESERVE—CONSTRUCTION OF LINK TO MAINLAND

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development with regard to the longstanding concern about the construction of a permanent link between the Lennox Island Indian reserve and the mainland of Prince Edward Island. In view of the acceleration in the projected cost of construction of this permanent link, can the minister inform the House whether he has reached a successful conclusion with other departments in order to have sufficient money available to start this project either late this year or early next year?

• (11:50 a.m.)

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I believe the Minister of Public Works has something to announce in that regard.

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I would be most grateful to hear from the Minister of Public Works because there is a great deal of concern.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, so far as I know everything is in order. The viaduct, as I call it, is going to be built and I think it is on time. I know of no trouble.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): It is extremely good news that the project is to go ahead. Can the minister give some indication when tenders will be called and an approximate date when construction may commence?

Mr. Laing: Yes. We want to do as much work as possible before winter sets in.

HOUSING

POSSIBILITY OF LOANS UNDER ACT FOR DAY-CARE PREMISES NOT CONNECTED WITH LOW-RENT HOUSING

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Is the minister now in a position to say if he has determined whether or not the National Housing Act will permit the making of loans for the building or renovation of day-care premises in places not directly connected with low-rent housing.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I regret I am not in a position to make a definitibve statement on that matter at this time.

Mrs. MacInnis: When the minister has made an investigation, will he be introducing legislation to make it possible for this to be done?

Mr. Andras: That factor is being considered as well as the basic decision, Mr. Speaker.

UNEMPLOYMENT LEVEL ACCEPTABLE TO GOVERNMENT

Mr. Steven E. The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion stated that the recent tax cuts will help us maintain the unemployment rate at an acceptable level. Is that the policy of the Minister of Finance and, if so, what is the acceptable level of unemployment the government wants to maintain—the 6.4 per cent average of last year?

POSSIBLE DEVELOPMENT OF SUFFIELD MILITARY RESERVE IN LIGHT OF WILDLIFE SERVICE REPORT ON ECOLOGY

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Is the minister or his department looking into the recent report made by the Canadian Wildlife Service on the ecology of the Suffield military reserve and, if so, are they considering the possibility of it becoming a national park possibly in connection with the Cypress Hills area?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, my department, like the others, is studying the report of the Canadian Wildlife Service. We have yet to reach conclusions on the subject. We have made commitments elsewhere which might achieve the same results.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed, from Thursday, October 28, consideration in committee of Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act—Mr. Benson—Mr. Laniel in the Chair.

The Deputy Chairman: When the committee rose last evening section 4 was before the committee. Sections 5, 6, 7 and 8 have been grouped with Section 4 for the purpose of debate.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I gather there have been discussions, which I am reporting upon although I was not privy to them, which have led to an agreement among the parties that the amendments which the Minister of Finance laid on the table yesterday, and which may be found appended to issue No. 200 of Votes and Proceedings, should be moved at this time notwithstanding the fact that they may relate to sections that are not yet under consideration, so that they can in due course be before the committee when they are called. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I would just like to confirm that that is the understanding. Perhaps the committee can make an order accordingly, and on the basis of that I could move the amendments.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I rise merely to confirm that that was the agreement we reached, namely, that a minister would move the amendments at this time, just to put them into Hansard so we will have them before us, in the same way as was done last Friday with the first batch of amendments.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee give consent for the minister to move the amendments found in Votes and Proceedings, in the same way as was done previously, and does it agree that this be an order of the committee at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Then, I move:

New clause 6.1 (page 600)

That the said Bill be amended by adding, immediately after clause 6 on page 600, the following clause:

'Established Programs (Interim Arrangements) Act

6.1 (1) The definition "basic tax" in subsection 2(1) of the Established Programs (Interim Arrangements) Act is repealed.

(2) The definition "tax abatement" in subsection 2(1) of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

' "tax abatement"

"tax abatement" means the percentage that is applied to the tax otherwise payable to determine the amount that may be deducted under subsection 120(2) of the Income Tax Act for a taxation year by an individual;'

(3) Subsection 2(1) of the said Act is further amended by adding thereto, the following definition:

' "tax otherwise payable"

"tax otherwise payable" has the meaning given to the expression "tax otherwise payable under this Part" by paragraph 120(4)(c) of the Income Tax Act;'

(4) All that portion of subsection 8(2) of the said Act immediately preceding paragraph (a) thereof is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

'Equalization amount

(2) The unit equalization value mentioned in subsection (1) that is applicable to a province in respect of a standing program is the amount, if any, that, when added to the amount, as determined by the Minister of Finance, representing one per cent of the aggregate amount obtained from the tax otherwise payable in the province in respect of a calendar year coinciding with or ending in an operating year of the standing program, will cause'

(5) Subparagraph 8(2)(b)(i) of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

'(i) the amount, as determined by the Minister of Finance, representing one per cent of the aggregate amount obtained from the tax otherwise payable in the two provinces in which the per capita amount obtained from the tax otherwise payable in respect of that calendar year is greatest'

(6) This section is applicable in respect of the 1972 and subsequent taxation years.'

Clause 9 (page 600)

That the said Bill be amended by adding, immediately after clause 9 on page 600, the following clause:

'Application of Part VIII of amended Act

9.1 Part VIII of the amended Act is applicable to dividends paid by a corporation (in this section referred to as the "payer corporation") where the control of the payer corporation was acquired after 1954, except where the control was acquired after 1954 by a non-resident corporation from another non-resident person that acquired control of the payer corporation before 1955.'

Clause 10 (page 601)

That clause 10 of the said Bill be amended by adding, immediately after subclause (4) on page 601, the following subclause:

'Certificates

(5) Any certificate of exemption issued by the Minister under subsection 106(9) of the former Act that is in force on December 31, 1971 shall, for the purposes of subparagraph 212(1)(b)(iv) of the amended Act,

(a) be deemed, for greater certainty, to have been issued under subsection 212(14) of the amended Act, and

(b) be deemed to be in force on January 1, 1972 and thereafter without interruption until the end of 1974, at which time it ceases to be in force, except that if at any time before the end of 1974 the person to whom the certificate was issued has ceased to be exempt, under the laws of the country of which he is a resident, from the payment of income tax to the government of that country, the certificate ceases to be in force on the later of

(i) January 1, 1972, and

(ii) the day on which he so ceased to be exempt.'

Clause 11 (page 602)

That the French version of clause 11 of the said Bill be amended by striking out line 15 on page 602 and substituting the following:

'suit le début de 1976, l'impôt payable par elle'

Clause 19 (page 607)

That clause 19 of the said Bill be amended

(a) by striking out line 1 on page 607 and substituting the following:

'Income maintenance payments

19. (1) Notwithstanding section 9, paragraph'

(b) by adding, immediately after clause 19 on page 607 the following subclause:

'Effect of certain changes made in plan established before June 19, 1971

(2) For the purposes of this section, a plan described in paragraph 6(1)(f) of the amended Act that was in existence before June 19, 1971 does not cease to be a plan established before that date by reason only of changes made therein on or after that date for the purpose of ensuring that the plan qualifies as one entitling the employer of persons covered under the plan to a deduction, as provided for by subsection 64(4) of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, in the amount of the employer's premium payable under that Act in respect of insured persons covered under the plan.'

Clause 20 (pages 608 and 610)

That clause 20 of the said Bill be amended

(a) by adding, immediately after subclause (1) on page 608 of the Bill, the following subclauses:

'Where depreciable property disposed of to spouse or trust

(1.1) Subsection (1) is not applicable in any case in which subsection 70(6) or 73(1) of the amended Act is applicable in respect of the disposition by a taxpayer of any depreciable property of a prescribed class to the spouse or trust, as the case may be, referred to therein, except that where the spouse or trust, as the case may be, subsequently disposes of the property at any time, subsection (1) is applicable as if the spouse or trust, as the case may be, had acquired the property before 1972 and owned it without interruption from December 31, 1971 until that time.

Other transfers of depreciable property

(1.2) Where, by virtue of a transaction to which any of subsections 85(1), (2) or (3), 87(2), 97(2), 98(3) or (5) or 107(2) or section 88 of the amended Act applies, a taxpayer has at any particular time after 1971 acquired any depreciable property of a prescribed class from a person who acquired the property before 1972 and owned it without interruption from December 31, 1971 until the particular time, for the purposes of subsection (1) the taxpayer shall be deemed to have acquired the property before 1972 and to have owned it without interruption from December 31, 1971 until such time after 1971 as he disposed of it.

Transfers before 1972 not at arm's length

(1.3) Without restricting the generality of section 18, where any depreciable property has been transferred before 1972 in circumstances such that subsection 20(4) of the former Act would, if that provision were applicable to transfers of property made in the 1972 taxation year, be applicable, paragraph 69(1)(b) of the amended Act is not applicable to the transfer and subsection 20(4) of the former Act is applicable thereto.'

(b) by striking out lines 32 to 40 on page 610 and substituting the following:

'(d) notwithstanding paragraph (c), a person who became a member of the partnership after June 18, 1971 and who was a member of the partnership thereafter without interruption until December 31, 1971 shall be deemed to be a person described in paragraph (c) and the amount may be claimed by him thereunder as a deduction in computing his income for any taxation year should not exceed 10% of the aggregate of the amounts determined under subparagraphs (c)(i) and (ii).'

Clause 22 (page 615)

That clause 22 of the said Bill be amended by striking out lines 1 to 3 on page 615 and substituting the following:

'Deduction of interest by certain corporations

22. (1) Notwithstanding section 9, subsections 18(4) to (7) of the amended Act are applicable to taxation years commencing after 1971.

Idem

(2) In its application to the first taxation year of a corporation commencing after 1971 and to the immediately following taxation year, subsection 18(4) of the amended Act shall be read as if

(a) subparagraph (a)(i) thereof were read as follows:

"(i) the greatest amount that the corporation's outstanding debts to specified non-residents was at any time in the year, less the amount, if any, by which

(A) the least amount that the corporation's outstanding debts to specified non-residents was at any time in the last taxation year of the corporation commencing before June 19, 1971 (in this subparagraph referred to as the corporation's "base year") exceeds 3 times the aggregate of

(B) the paid-up capital of the corporation at the end of its taxation year immediately preceding its base year in respect of all of the shares of its capital stock, and

(C) the corporation's undistributed income on hand (within the meaning assigned by this Act as it read in its application to the 1971 taxation year) at the end of its taxation year immediately preceding its base year,", and

(b) paragraph (b) thereof were read as follows:

"(b) the greatest amount that the corporation's outstanding debts to specified non-residents was at any time in the year".'

Clause 23 (page 617)

That clause 23 of the said Bill be amended by striking out lines 15 to 19 on page 617 and substituting the following:

'(ii) in respect of each such partnership the adjusted cost base to the taxpayer of his interest in the partnership immediately after the end of the fiscal period of the partnership ending in the year;'

Clause 26 (pages 619, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627 and 628)

That clause 26 of the said Bill be amended

(a) by adding thereto, immediately after subclause (1) on page 619, the following subclause:

'Principal amount of certain obligations

(1.1) For the purposes of subsection 39(3) and section 80 of the amended Act, the principal amount of any debt or other obligation of a taxpayer to pay an amount that was outstanding on January 1, 1972 (in this subsection referred to as an "obligation") shall be deemed to be the lesser of

(a) the principal amount, otherwise determined for the purposes of the amended Act, of the obligation, and

(b) the fair market value, on valuation day, of the obligation, and in its application to any obligation, paragraph 39(3)(a) of the amended Act shall be read as if the reference therein to "the amount for which the obligation was issued" were read as a reference to "the lesser of the principal amount of the obligation and the amount for which the obligation was issued".'

(b) by striking out lines 24 to 27 on page 621 and substituting the following:

'January 1, 1972 shall be deemed to be the amount that was its actual cost or its amortized cost on January 1, 1972, as the case may be, to the original owner; and'

(c) by striking out lines 30 to 39 on page 621 and substituting the following:

'(i) there shall be added the amount, if any, by which

(A) the actual cost to the subsequent owner of the property

exceeds

(B) the cost to the original owner of the property, determined under the provisions of this section, and'

(d) by striking out lines 1 to 13 on page 622 and substituting the following:

'Idem

(5.1) For the purposes of subsection (5), an amalgamation (within the meaning assigned by section 87 of the amended Act) of two or more Canadian corporations shall be deemed to be a transaction between persons not dealing at arm's length.

Reacquired property

(6) Where a taxpayer has, at any time after June 18, 1971 and before 1972, disposed of any property owned by him on that day and has, within 30 days after that time, reacquired the same property or acquired a substantially identical property, for the purposes of this section

(a) he shall be deemed to have owned the property so reacquired or the substantially identical property so acquired, as the case may be, on June 18, 1971 and thereafter without interruption until the time when he so reacquired or acquired it, as the case may be;

(b) where the property was property so reacquired, its actual cost or its amortized cost on January 1, 1972, as the case may be, to him shall be determined as if he had not so disposed of and so reacquired it; and

(c) where the property was substantially identical property so acquired, its actual cost or its amortized cost on January 1, 1972, as the case may be, to him shall be deemed to be the amount that was the actual cost or the amortized cost on January 1, 1972, as the case may be, to him of the property so disposed of by him.'

'(i) for the purpose of paragraph (3)(a), its amortized cost to him on January 1, 1972 shall be deemed to be that proportion of the aggregate of the amortized costs to him on January 1, 1972 of all obligations'

(f) by striking out lines 1 to 48 on page 624, lines 1 to 45 on page 625 and lines 1 to 39 on page 626 and substituting the following:

'Cost of interest in partnership

(9) For the purpose of computing, at any particular time after 1971, the adjusted cost base to a taxpayer of an interest in a partnership of which he was a member on December 31, 1971 and thereafter without interruption until the particular time, the cost to him of the interest shall be deemed to be the amount that is neither the greatest nor the least of the following three amounts, namely:

(a) its actual cost to him as of the particular time,

(b) the amount determined under subsection (9.1) in respect of the interest as of the particular time, and

(c) the amount, if any, by which the aggregate of the fair market value of the interest at the particular time and all amounts required by subsection 53(2) of the amended Act to be deducted in computing its adjusted cost base to him immediately before the particular time exceeds the aggregate of all amounts required by subsection 53(1) of the amended Act to be added in computing its adjusted cost base to him immediately before the particular time, except that where two or more of the amounts determined under paragraphs (a) to (c) in respect of the interest are the same amounts, that amount shall be deemed to be its cost to the taxpayer.

Determination of amount for purposes of ss. (9)

(9.1) For the purposes of subsection (9), the amount determined under this subsection in respect of a taxpayer's interest in a partnership as of a particular time is the amount, if any, by which the aggregate of

(a) his share, determined at the commencement of the first fiscal period of the partnership ending after 1971, of the tax equity of the partnership at the particular time,

(b) such part of any contribution of capital made by the taxpayer to the partnership (otherwise than by way of loan) before 1972 and after the commencement of the partnership's first fiscal period ending after 1971, as cannot reasonably be regarded as a gift made to, or for the benefit of, any other member of the partnership who was related to the taxpayer, and

(c) the amount of any consideration that became payable by the taxpayer after 1971 to any other person to acquire, after 1971, any right in respect of the partnership, the sole purpose of the acquisition of which was to increase the taxpayer's interest in the partnership,

exceeds the aggregate of

(e) all amounts each of which is an amount in respect of the disposition by the taxpayer after 1971 and before the particular time of a part of his interest in the partnership, equal to such portion of the adjusted cost base to him of the interest immediately before the disposition as may reasonably be regarded as attributable to the part so disposed of.

Where interest acquired before 1972 and after commencement of 1st fiscal period ending after 1971

(9.2) Where a taxpayer has, before 1972 and after the commencement of the first fiscal period of a partnership ending after 1971, acquired an interest in the partnership from another person, subsection (9.1) is applicable as if, for the purposes of paragraphs (a), (b) and (d) thereof, the taxpayer had had in respect of the interest, throughout the period commencing at the commencement of that fiscal period and ending at the time he acquired the interest, the same position in relation to the partnership as that which he would have had in relation thereto if, throughout that period, he had been the owner of the interest.

Amounts deemed to be required to be deducted in respect of interest in partnership

(9.3) For the purpose of computing, at any particular time after 1971, the adjusted cost base to a taxpayer of an interest in a partnership of which he was a member on December 31, 1971 and thereafter without interruption until the particular time, the lesser of

(a) the amount, if any, by which

(i) all amounts in respect of the interest determined under paragraph (9.1)(d) exceed

(ii) the aggregate of

(A) his share, determined at the commencement of the first fiscal period of the partnership ending after 1971, of the tax equity of the partnership at the particular time, and

(B) the amount in respect of the interest determined under paragraph (9.1)(b), and

(b) the amount, if any, by which

(i) the aggregate of amounts in respect of the interest determined as of the particular time under paragraphs (14)(e) to (g)

exceeds

(ii) the aggregate of amounts in respect of the interest determined as of the particular time under paragraphs (14)(a) to (d), shall be deemed to be required by subsection 53(2) of the amended Act to be deducted.

Application of section 53 of amended Act in respect of interest in partnership

(9.4) For the purpose of computing, at any particular time after 1971, the adjusted cost base to a taxpayer of an interest in a partnership of which he was a member on December 31, 1971 and thereafter without interruption until the particular time,

(a) clause 53(1)(e)(i)(B) of the amended Act shall be read as if the reference therein to "relating to" were read as a reference to "relating to section 14 or to"; and

(b) clause 53(2)(c)(i)(B) of the amended Act shall be read as follows:

"(B) section 31, subsection 40(2), section 55 and the provisions of the Income Tax Application Rules, 1971 relating to section 14".'

(g) by striking out lines 21 to 26 on page 627 and substituting the following:

'(iii) in any other case, the actual cost to him of the obligation, plus that proportion of the discount, or minus that proportion of the premium, as the case may be, in respect thereof that'

(h) by striking out the word "and" at the end of line 17 on page 628, and by striking out line 22 on page 628 and substituting the following:

"Tax equity"

(3) exceeds the principal amount thereof; and

(g) "tax equity" of a partnership at any particular time means the amount, if any, by which the aggregate of amounts each of which is

(i) the amount of any money of the partnership on hand at the commencement of its first fiscal period ending after 1971,

(ii) the cost amount to the partnership, at the commencement of that fiscal period, of any partnership property other than capital property or eligible capital property,

(iii) an amount in respect of any property (other than depreciable property) that was, at the commencement of that fiscal period, capital property of the partnership, equal to,

(A) where the property was disposed of before 1972, the proceeds of disposition thereof,

(B) where the property was disposed of after 1971 and before the particular time, the amount determined under this section to be its cost to the partnership for the purposes of computing its adjusted cost base to the partnership immediately before it was disposed of, and

(C) in any other case, the amount determined under this section to be its cost to the partnership for the purposes of computing its adjusted cost base to the partnership immediately before the particular time,

(iv) an amount in respect of any prescribed class of depreciable property of the partnership, equal to the amount, if any, by which the aggregate of the undepreciated capital cost to the partnership of property of that class as of January 1, 1972 exceeds the capital cost to the partnership of property of that class acquired by it after the commencement of that fiscal period and before 1972,

(v) an amount in respect of any property that was, at the commencement of that fiscal period, partnership property that was depreciable property of a prescribed class, equal to,

(A) where the property was disposed of before 1972, the proceeds of disposition thereof minus the amount, if any, by which the lesser of

1. the proceeds of disposition thereof, and

2. the capital cost of the property, exceeds the undepreciated capital cost of all of the property of that class at the time of the disposition,

(B) where the property was disposed of after 1971 and before the particular time, the amount, if any, by which the lesser of

1. the proceeds of disposition thereof, and

2. the fair market value of the property on valuation day, exceeds the capital cost to the partnership of the property, and

(C) in any other case, the amount, if any, by which

1. the lesser of the fair market value of the property on valuation day and its fair market value at the particular time

exceeds

2. the capital cost to the partnership of the property, or

(vi) an amount in respect of any business carried on by the partnership in its 1971 fiscal period and thereafter without interruption until the particular time, equal to the percentage of

(A) 2 times the eligible capital amounts (within the meaning assigned by section 14 of the amended Act) in respect of the business (computed without reference to section 21 of this Act) that would have become payable to the partnership if it had disposed of the business at the particular time for an amount equal to its fair market value at that time, that is equal to

(B) 60% minus the percentage obtained when 5% is multiplied by the number of full calendar years ending after 1971 and before the particular time, exceeds the aggregate of amounts each of which is the amount of any debt owing by the partnership or of any other obligation of the partnership to pay an amount, that was outstanding at the commencement of the partnership's first fiscal period ending after 1971, minus such part, if any, thereof as would, if the amount had been paid by the partnership in that fiscal period, have been deductible in computing its income for that fiscal period.

Meaning of "actual cost"

(13) For the purposes of this section, the "actual cost" to a person of any property means, except as expressly otherwise provided in this section, its cost to him computed without regard to the provisions of this section.

Idem

(14) For the purposes of this section, the "actual cost" to a taxpayer, as of any particular time after 1971, of an interest in a partnership of which the taxpayer was a member on December 31, 1971 and thereafter without interruption until the particular time means the amount, if any, by which the aggregate of

(a) the cost to him of the interest, computed as of the particular time without regard to the provisions of this section,

(b) all amounts each of which is an amount in respect of a fiscal period of the partnership that ended before 1972, equal to the aggregate of

(i) the amount that the taxpayer's income from the partnership for the taxation year of the taxpayer in which the period ended would have been, if the former Act had been read without reference to subsection 83(5) thereof, and

(ii) the taxpayer's share, determined at the end of the period, of all profits made from dispositions in the period of capital assets that were partnership property of the partnership, to the extent that such profits were not included in computing the income or loss, as the case may be, from the partnership, of any member thereof,

(c) where the taxpayer had, before 1972, made a contribution of capital to the partnership otherwise than by way of loan, such part of the contribution as cannot reasonably be regarded as a gift made to, or for the benefit of, any other member of the partnership who was related to the taxpayer, and

(d) where, by means of the partnership, the taxpayer carried on before 1972 a business that was a profession, the amount that his 1971 receivables (within the meaning assigned by subsection 23(5)) in respect of the business would have been if, before 1972, he had carried on no businesses except by means of the partnership,

exceeds the aggregate of

(e) all amounts each of which is an amount in respect of the disposition by the taxpayer before the particular time of a part of his interest in the partnership, equal to such portion of,

(i) where the disposition was made before 1972, the actual cost to him of the interest, and

(ii) in any other case, the adjusted cost base to him of the interest immediately before the disposition, as may reasonably be regarded as attributable to the parts so disposed of,

(f) all amounts each of which is an amount in respect of a fiscal period of the partnership that ended before 1972, equal to the aggregate of

(i) the amount that the taxpayer's loss from the partnership for the taxation year of the taxpayer in which the period ended would have been, if the former Act had been read without reference to subsection 83(5) thereof,

(ii) the taxpayers' share, determined at the end of the period, of all losses sustained from dispositions in the period of capital assets that were partnership property of the partnership, to the extent that such losses were not included in computing the loss or income, as the case may be, from the partnership, of any member thereof, and

(iii) the taxpayer's share, determined at the end of the period, of such of the drilling and exploration expenses, including all general geological and geophysical expenses incurred by the partnership while he was a member thereof, on or in respect of exploring or drilling for petroleum or natural gas in Canada as were incurred in the period and after 1948, to the extent that such expenses were not deducted in computing his income from the partnership for his 1971 or any previous taxation year, and be deemed to have elected in the manner referred to in that clause to be a public corporation and to have complied with the conditions referred to therein.

Designation by Minister

(3) For the purposes of paragraph 89(1)(g) of the amended Act, where at any particular time before the 90th day after the day this Act is assented to the Minister has, by notice in writing to a corporation, designated the corporation to be a public corporation or not to be a public corporation, as the case may be, and at the time of the designation the corporation complied with the conditions referred to in clause (ii)(A) thereof or (iii)(A) thereof, as the case may be, the corporation shall, at such time as is specified by the Minister in the notice, be deemed

(a) to have been designated by the Minister, by notice in writing to the corporation, to be a public corporation or not to be a public corporation, as the case may be, and

(b) to have complied with the conditions referred to in clause (ii)(A) thereof or (iii)(A) thereof, as the case may be.'

Clause 51 (pages 680 and 681)

That clause 51 of the said Bill be amended

(a) by striking out lines 14 and 15 on page 680 and substituting the following:

'(a) determine the tax under Part I of the amended Act that, but for this subsection, would be payable by it'

(b) by striking out lines 27 to 35 on page 680 and substituting the following:

'(b) determine the tax under Part I of the amended Act that, but for this subsection, would be payable by it for its 1972 taxation year on the assumption that

(i) its amount taxable for the year were an amount equal to the amount, if any, by which its amount taxable for the year, determined without regard to the provisions of this subsection, exceeds its net capital gains for the year, and'

(c) by striking out lines 6 and 7 on page 681 and substituting the following:

'(d) determine the aggregate of the taxes that, but for this subsection, would be payable by the corporation'

New Clause 57.1 (page 689)

That the said Bill be amended by adding, immediately after clause 57 on page 689, the following clause:

'Cooperative corporations

57.1 (1) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the tax under Part I of the amended Act payable by a cooperative corporation (within the meaning assigned by section 136 of the amended Act) for a taxation year ending after 1971 and before 1981 is the aggregate of

(a) the tax under that Part that, but for this subsection, would be payable by the corporation for the year if

(i) subsection 75(3) and paragraph 75(4)(b) of the former Act were applicable and subsection 135(3) and paragraph 135(4)(f) of the amended Act were not applicable, and

(ii) the references in subsection 75(3) and paragraph 75(4)(b) of the former Act to section 27 of that Act and to paragraph 62(1)(k) of that Act were references to section 111 and to paragraph 137(6)(b) respectively, of the amended Act, and

(b) an amount in respect of the taxation year equal to

(i) where the year is the corporation's 1972 taxation year, 1/10

(ii) where the year is the corporation's 1973 taxation year, 2/10

(iii) where the year is the corporation's 1974 taxation year, 3/10

(iv) where the year is the corporation's 1975 taxation year, 4/10

(v) where the year is the corporation's 1976 taxation year, 5/10

(vi) where the year is the corporation's 1977 taxation year, 6/10

(vii) where the year is the corporation's 1978 taxation year, 7/10

(viii) where the year is the corporation's 1979 taxation year, 8/10

(ix) where the year is the corporation's 1980 taxation year, 9/10 of the amount, if any, by which the tax under Part I of the amended Act that, but for this subsection, would be payable by the corporation for the year exceeds the amount determined under paragraph (a) in respect of the corporation for the year.

Ss. 51(1) not applicable

(2) Subsection 51(1) does not apply for the purpose of computing the tax payable by a cooperative corporation (within the meaning assigned by section 136 of the amended Act) for its 1972 taxation year.'

Clause 58 (pages 690, 691, 692 and 693)

That clause 58 of the said Bill be amended

(a) by striking out lines 20 and 21 on page 690 and substituting the following:

'the product obtained when the number of full taxation years in the period'

(b) by striking out lines 35 and 36 on page 690 and substituting the following:

'of such improvement or addition, as the case may be, exceeded $10,000),'

(c) by striking out lines 30 to 49 on page 691 and lines 1 to 27 on page 692 and substituting the following:

'Deemed deductions

(2) For the purposes of paragraph 137(1)(c) of the amended Act, a credit union shall be deemed to have deducted, in computing its income for its 1971 taxation year

(a) under paragraph 137(1)(a) thereof, the maximum amount determined in prescribed manner that would have been claimable by the credit union under that paragraph as a reserve in respect of property described therein in computing its income for its 1971 taxation year if section 137 of the amended Act had been applicable to that year, and

(b) under paragraph 137 (1)(b) thereof, the maximum amount determined in prescribed manner that would have been claimable by the credit union under that paragraph as a reserve in respect of debts described therein in computing its income for its 1971 taxation year if section 137 of the amended Act had been applicable to that year, except that where the amount of the credit union's 1971 reserve is less than the aggregate of the amounts described in paragraph (a) and (b), it shall be deemed to have deducted in computing its income for its 1971 taxation year,

(c) under paragraph 137(1)(a) of the amended Act, such portion of its 1971 reserve as it may claim, not exceeding the amount described in paragraph (a), and

(d) under paragraph 137(1)(b) of the amended Act, such portion of the amount, if any, by which its 1971 reserve exceeds the amount determined under paragraph (c), as does not exceed the amount described in paragraph (b).

Tax for 1972 to 1980 taxation years

(3) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act except subsection (3.1), the tax under Part I of the amended Act payable by a credit union (within the meaning assigned by section 137 of the amended Act) for a taxation year ending after 1971 and before 1981 is the aggregate of

(a) the tax under that Part that, but for this subsection and subsection (3.1), would be payable by a credit union for the year if section 137 of the amended Act were read without reference to subsections (3) and (4) thereof, and

(b) an amount in respect of the taxation year equal to

(i) where the year is the credit union's 1972 taxation year, 1/10

(ii) where the year is the credit union's 1973 taxation year, 2/10

(iii) where the year is the credit union's 1974 taxation year, 3/10

(iv) where the year is the credit union's 1975 taxation year, 4/10

(v) where the year is the credit union's 1976 taxation year, 5/10

(vi) where the year is the credit union's 1977 taxation year, 6/10

Income Tax Act

(vii) where the year is the credit union's 1978 taxation year, 7/10

(viii) where the year is the credit union's 1979 taxation year, 8/10

(ix) where the year is the credit union's 1980 taxation year, 9/10 of the amount, if any, by which the tax under Part I of the amended Act that, but for this subsection and subsection (3.1), would be payable by the credit union for the year exceeds the amount determined under paragraph (a) in respect of the credit union for the year.

Special rule applicable to 1972 taxation year

(3.1) Where a credit union has a taxation year part of which is before and part of which is after the commencement of 1972, the tax under Part I of the amended Act payable by it for that taxation year is that proportion of the amount thereof computed under subsection (3) that the number of days in that portion of the taxation year that is in 1972 is of the number of days in the whole taxation year.'

(d) by adding, immediately after subclause (4) on page 692, the following subclause:

'Amount of non-capital loss

(4.1) The amount, if any, by which

(a) the aggregate of amounts each of which is the amount, as of the commencement of the credit union's 1972 taxation year, of any share in the credit union of any member thereof,

exceeds

(b) the amount that would be the credit union's 1971 reserve if paragraph (5)(c) were read with reference to subparagraph (vi) thereof shall, for the purposes of section 111 of the amended Act, be deemed to have been the credit union's non-capital loss for its 1971 taxation year, and, for greater certainty, section 37 does not apply for the purpose of computing a credit union's taxable income for any taxation year.'

(e) by striking out lines 13 to 23 on page 693 and substituting the following:

'"1971 reserve"

(c) "1971 reserve" of a credit union means the amount, if any, by which the aggregate of amounts each of which is

(i) the amount of any money of the credit union on hand at the commencement of its 1972 taxation year,

(ii) an amount in respect of any property described in paragraph (1)(a) or (b), equal to the amount at which it is required by those paragraphs to be valued at the commencement of its 1972 taxation year,

(iii) an amount in respect of depreciable property of a prescribed class owned by the credit union on the first day of its 1972 taxation year, equal to the amount determined under paragraph (1)(d) to be the undepreciated capital cost thereof to the credit union as of that day, or

(iv) an amount in respect of any capital property (other than depreciable property) owned by the credit union at the commencement of its 1972 taxation year, equal to its cost to the credit union computed without reference to the provisions of section 26, exceeds the aggregate of amounts each of which is

(v) the amount of any debt owing by the credit union or of any other obligation of the credit union to pay an amount, that was outstanding at the commencement of its 1972 taxation year, excluding, for greater certainty, any share in the credit union of any member thereof, or

(vi) the amount, as of the commencement of the credit union's 1972 taxation year, of any share in the credit union of any member thereof.'

Clause 59 (Pages 693 and 694)

That clause 59 of the said Bill be amended by striking out lines 24 to 47 on page 693 and lines 1 to 9 on page 694 and substituting the following:

'Non-resident owned investment corporation

59. (1) In its application to the 1972 to 1975 taxation years of a corporation, section 133 of the amended Act shall be read as if

(a) subsection (3) thereof were read as follows:

"(3) The tax payable under this Part by a corporation for a taxation year when it was a non-resident-owned investment corporation is the aggregate of

(a) 25% of the lesser of

(i) the corporation's taxable income for the year, and

(ii) the amount determined under subparagraph (9)(b)(iii) in respect of the corporation for the year, and

(b) 15% of the amount, if any, by which the amount determined under subparagraph (a)(i) exceeds the amount determined under subparagraph (a)(ii).", and

(b) the references in subsection (9) thereof to "1/3", and "4/3" were read as references to "15/85" and "100/85" respectively.

Idem

(2) In its application to the 1972 and subsequent taxation years of a corporation, section 133 of the amended Act shall be read as if, in respect of such portion of any period described in paragraph 133(8)(d) as ended before the commencement of the corporation's 1976 taxation year, subparagraph 133(8)(d)(i) were read as follows:

"(i) at least 95% of the aggregate value of its issued shares, and all of its bonds, debentures and other funded indebtedness, were

(A) beneficially owned by non-resident persons (other than any foreign affiliate of a taxpayer resident in Canada),

(B) owned by trustees for the benefit of non-resident persons or their unborn issue, or

(C) owned by a corporation, whether incorporated in Canada or elsewhere, at least 95% of the aggregate value of the issued shares of which and all of the bonds, debentures and other funded indebtedness of which were beneficially owned by non-resident persons or owned by trustees for the benefit of non-resident persons or their unborn issue, or by two or more such corporations;".'

Clause 62 (page 696)

That clause 62 of the said Bill be amended by striking out lines 1 and 2 on page 696 and substituting the following:

Assessments

62. (1) Subsections 152(4) and (5) of the amended Act are applicable in respect of any assessment made after the coming into force of this Act, except that subsection 152(5) thereof is not applicable in respect of any such assessment made in consequence of a waiver filed with the Minister before the coming into force of this Act in the form and within the time referred to in subsection 152(4) thereof.

Interest

(2) Subsections 161(1) and (2), 164(3) and (4), 183(2), 195(1), 202(5) and 227(8) and (9) of the amended Act, in so far as those subsections relate to the rate of interest payable thereunder, are applicable in respect of interest payable in respect of any period after the coming into force of this Act.

Penalties

(3) Subsection 163(1) of the amended Act is applicable in respect of any return of income required to be filed after 1971 and subsection 163(3) thereof is applicable in respect of any appeal instituted after the coming into force of this Act.

Appeals

(4) Subsection 165(3) of the amended Act is applicable in respect of any notice of objection served on the Minister after the coming into force of this Act.

Idem

(5) Division J of Part I of the amended Act is applicable in respect of any appeal or application instituted or made, as the case may be, after the coming into force of this Act.

Appeals to Federal Court

(6) Any appeal to the Federal Court instituted within 2 years after the coming into force'

New Clause 64.1 (page 697)

That the said Bill be amended by adding, immediately after clause 64 on page 697, the following clause:

'Life insurance corporation's control period earnings

64.1 Notwithstanding anything contained in subsection 192(10.1) of the amended Act, the amount of a life insurance corporation's earnings for a control period that was available for payment of dividends at a particular time is the aggregate of the amount thereof determined under that subsection and all income or profits taxes paid or payable by the corporation, for taxation years ending after 1968 and before 1971 that are in the control period, to a government of a country other than Canada or to a state, province or other political subdivision of a country other than Canada.'

Clause 65 (pages 698 and 699)

That clause 65 of the said Bill be amended

(a) by adding, immediately after subclause (1) on page 698, the following subclause:

'Idem

(1.1) Where, at any particular time after October 13, 1971 and before 1972, a taxpayer to whom Part XI of the amended Act applies has acquired a foreign property that was a share of the capital stock of a corporation that would be an investment corporation if subparagraph 130(3)(a)(i) of the amended Act were read without reference to the words "that was a public corporation", for the purposes of subsection (1) the share so acquired shall be deemed to be a share described in paragraph (1)(a).'

(b) by adding, immediately after subclause (2) on page 699, the following subclauses:

'Foreign property acquired by registered retirement savings plan

(3) Where, at any particular time after 1971 and before 1974, a trust governed by a registered retirement savings plan has acquired a foreign property described in paragraph (1)(a) or (b) or a foreign property that would be described in paragraph (1)(c) if the references therein to the "1971 taxation year" of the trust were read as references to the "1972 and 1973 taxation years" of the trust, the property shall, to the extent that the cost to the trust thereof does not exceed the amount, if any, by which the trust's foreign reinvestment limit exceeds

Income Tax Act

the aggregate of the cost to it of all such foreign properties so acquired by it after 1971 and before the particular time, be deemed

(a) for the purposes of Part XI of the amended Act, to have been acquired before June 19, 1971 and not to have been acquired after June 18, 1971, and

(b) notwithstanding paragraph 146(1)(g) of the amended Act, to have been a qualified investment for the purposes of section 146 of that Act.

"Foreign reinvestment limit" defined

(4) In subsection (3), "foreign reinvestment limit" of a trust governed by a registered retirement savings plan means such portion of the aggregate of

(a) the trust's income from property for its 1972 and 1973 taxation years, and

(b) all amounts each of which is such portion of any premium paid in 1972 or 1973 by the annuitant under the plan as was deductible under subsection 146(5) of the amended Act in computing the annuitant's income for the 1972 or 1973 taxation years, as was, under the terms and conditions of the plan as fixed on or before June 18, 1971, required to be invested by the trust in foreign property described in paragraph (1)(a) or (b) or foreign property that would be described in paragraph (1)(c) if the references therein to the "1971 taxation year" of the trust were read as references to the "1971 and 1972 taxation years" of the trust.'

New clause 65.1 (page 699)

That the said Bill be amended by adding, immediately after clause 65, on page 699, the following clause:

'Part XV of amended Act

65.1 For greater certainty,

(a) section 9 is not applicable in respect of the repeal, by section 1, of Part V of the former Act and the substitution therefor, by that section, of Part XV of the amended Act, and

(b) in its application in respect of any offence described in subsection 239(1) of the amended Act that was committed before the coming into force of this Act, paragraph 239(1)(f) of the amended Act shall be read as follows:

"(f) a fine of not less than $25 and not exceeding $10,000 plus, in an appropriate case, an amount not exceeding double the amount of the tax that should have been shown to be payable or that was sought to be evaded, or".'

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, was it not also agreed that at this point the Acting House Leader, or someone, would put on the record the agreement that we reached regarding the groups of sections that we will ask the committee to consider after we have finished this group known as 4 to 8?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, again it is my understanding that the House leaders agreed this morning that the following three groupings would be considered in sequence immediately following the disposition of the sections now before the Committee. The first grouping will be sections 56, 57, 58, 60, 61, 62 and 63. The second grouping will be sections 117, 118, 119, 120, 146, 147 and 204. The third grouping will be sections 9 to 13 inclusive, 15, 18, 20, 28 and 29.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, may I just confirm that these are the numbers of the sections we agreed to group for consideration, and it was also understood that in each case we will be doing what we have been doing thus far. Your Honour will call the first one in each group and the discussion will be permitted to range over all the others in that group.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed by the committee that we will follow the same procedure we have previously followed, calling the first section in each of the three categories but allowing discussion on all the other ones mentioned in the groupings outlined by the parliamentary secretary?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Yes, Mr. Chairman, and may I point out that this is a preliminary grouping. I believe there may be some ancillary ones that may come in subsequently with regard to personal income. However, this is the grouping that has been made now. It is being put on the record so there may be some coherence in the discussion and to take pity on the parliamentary secretary, the minister and his officials, so they will not have to check back and forth too far in replying to questions. When discussion is finished on a grouping, the question can then be put with regard to the various sections.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall section 4 carry?

On clause 1—Section 4: Income or loss from a source or from sources in a place.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, yesterday afternoon and last night, we were discussing the question of the $150 exemption which is being permitted to all people for expenses incurred in connection with their work. Members of this party, and some members of the Official Opposition, tired to make the parliamentary secretary understand our concern about what we consider to be the inequities. We tried to point out to the parliamentary secretary that $150 may be too much for some people, but may be much too little for many people.

A number of our members, and also I think the hon. member for Lambton-Kent, pointed out that there are many workers who, because of the housing situation and because of the way in which industries may close factories in one city and open them in another city 25, 50 or 75 miles away, have to travel that distance to and from work. It is not a question of choice for them. Short of disrupting their home life by moving their homes, they have to travel considerable distances to and from work, and this costs them substantially more than $150 a year.

We compared this unfavourably with the treatment given to professional people such as doctors and lawyers. The parliamentary secretary tried to answer our argument on a number of occasions. I do not often quote from Hansard, Mr. Chairman, but here is just one of his statements which summarizes what he tried to tell us. I quote from page 9142 of yesterday's Hansard where the parliamentary secretary was reported as saying:

> If hon. members opposite wish to continue to perpetuate the fiction that somehow or other wage and salary earners are discriminated against in that they cannot deduct the cost of travelling to a mill or factory, while professional people are favoured in that they can deduct the cost of going from their homes to their offices, there is nothing I can do to stop them. But it simply is not true.

We never said that we wanted people to be able to deduct their expenses for travelling just for the sake of travelling. We were talking about travel which is necessary if a working man is to do his job. I would like the parliamentary secretary to come to Winnipeg, get up early one morning with me, and drive out to St. Boniface where there are three major packing plants. The first shift starts at seven o'clock in the morning. If a worker is to be at his bench at seven o'clock in the morning, he has got to be in the plant by 6.30 in the morning in order to change clothes and get ready.

This is just one of thousands of examples that I can give. I would like the parliamentary secretary to explain to me how that worker can get to work without using his car. Of course, the parliamentary secretary said somewhat facetiously yesterday that the worker could not charge expenses for the car since it would be sitting out in front of the plant for the rest of the day. Of course, the car sits outside the plant for the rest of the day while the worker is at work. We have tried to make the point again and again that the worker has a problem getting to his job if he does not use his car. His expenses are there.

• (12 noon)

I have already put on the record one of the parliamentary secretary's statements to the effect that we are wrong when we say doctors and lawyers can charge car expenses for travelling from home to the office. The parliamentary secretary may be technically correct, but only technically. Doctors are permitted to charge the expenses of their car if they are making calls or going to the hospital. I submit there is no difference between the doctor and the worker who has to drive a considerable distance to work.

I am not an expert in this field so last night I consulted with one of my friends who is an accountant, not with the Department of Finance, but a working accountant who helps doctors, lawyers and others like myself make up their income tax returns. I would like the parliamentary secretary to listen to what my friend told me because I would like an answer. He said that the parliamentary secretary is right, that in recent years the government has become much tougher with regard to doctors and lawyers. Not too many years ago a doctor in any city, Winnipeg, Ottawa or Toronto say, could charge 80 per cent of the expense of his car when calculating his income tax. My friend says that at the present time in Winnipeg, and the same is true of any city in Canada though maybe they are a little easier on rural doctors if there are any left, doctors are permitted to charge 25 per cent of the cost of operating a car.

What does that mean, Mr. Chairman? The cost of operating the car for which they permit the doctor to charge 25 per cent includes gas, oil and automobile insurance. I estimate all this to be in the neighbourhood of $600 or $700 a year. The doctor is also allowed to charge depreciation. My friend the accountant was perhaps a little conservative when he said a doctor may drive a car which costs around $5,000. Most of the doctors I know drive big Buicks and Cadillacs, but let's take that $5,000. In any year the 25 per cent depreciation comes to about $1,250; add the $600 or $700 for gas, oil, maintenance and auto insurance and the doctor is being permitted a deduction of $2,000 a year for his car when calculating his income tax.

I have not got the figures for the average income of doctors in front of me, but as I remember the figures published each year by the Department of National Revenue it is somewhere in the neighbourhood of $30,000. Many make much more than that, and I estimate that most doctors are in the 40 per cent income tax bracket. By permitting a doctor to charge $2,000 for car expenses he is being given an allowance in the calculation of his income tax not of $150 but more in the neighbourhood of $800. Now, Mr. Chairman, nobody has ever questioned the right of the doctor who wears a white coat or jacket in his office to charge off the cost of buying that, or of laundering it. Yesterday my friend the hon. member for Timiskaming mentioned the cost of the doctor's scalpel. I am sure doctors use much more sophisticated instruments than scalpels today, Mr. Chairman. That expense is quite legitimate and I am not questioning it. I would not want any member of this House to think that I am questioning the right of the doctor to deduct legitimate expenses when calculating his income tax. What I am saying to the parliamentary secretary, what I said yesterday and what I think the figures I put on the record today demonstrate very clearly, is that in permitting the $150 deduction for everybody for expenses connected with work without the requirement of filing receipts and statements, we do not have any more equity than we have had in the last 25 years or more.

The government is continuing its policy of giving to those who have and taking from those who have not. As far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, that is not good enough.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Peters: How about letting the parliamentary secretary answer?

Mr. Mahoney: They are the same questions as were asked yesterday.

Mr. Saltsman: The parliamentary secretary did answer last night, and I regret to say that his answers were very unsatisfactory. It seems to me that he is making some assumptions about the nature of work and the expenses that people incur which do not jibe with the facts of life. Perhaps the people he knows are different from the people I know. I should like to refer to his remarks as recorded at page 9140 of Hansard:

> The government makes no attempt to dictate to people where they should live in relation to their place of work.

That is quite true, but as you read the parliamentary secretary's remarks you become aware he assumed that people are quite free to live where they please or to work where they please and therefore if they have to drive to work it is their own fault. It is a very Calvinist kind of attitude to the situation and does not relate to what is happening. Most of the people I know would like to live reasonably close to their place of work. They would also like to have public transportation but the fact is that they cannot have either.

Offices and plants shift, and this government makes no provision for that or for plants shutting down or consolidating. They just say that is the way our society works. But a man cannot shift around that quickly. If he has a house which costs a considerable amount of money it might cost him from $1,000 to $1,800 to sell that house. Perhaps he does not know how long he will be in the next job, so he is caught in the situation where he follows the plant around. It may shift from Galt to Hespeler and from Hespeler to Guelph and often it shifts from one province to another. Today workmen are very specialized which means that they have to secure work in another shop sometimes if their particular shop contracts out part of its operations. The worker does not really have the kind of freedom to choose where he is going to work or where he is going to live that the parliamentary secretary infers. This creates problems because under these circumstances the car becomes an instrument of work just as much as the hard hat or safety shoes.

I am not happy to see this kind of thing take place. I am very much in favour of public transport and I would not want to see any further encouragement of private transport because of all the problems it creates, but nevertheless this anomaly exists in the government. They display one attitude towards the self-employed and professionals and another towards the ordinary workman. I know the government does not take into account the cost of going to and from work, no matter whether professionals or working people are involved. So far, our income tax regulations have not recognized such costs. Those who observe the scene in this country know that it is almost impossible to say whether a car is being used for professional reasons or for going to work. I realize that the government faces difficulties in this regard, as do those who administer our income tax regulations. Nevertheless, let us admit that fringe benefits so far as automobile use is concerned accrue to some people and do not accrue to others. Let us find a realistic solution to this problem. Let us say, "That is the way the system works for some. In all equity we must give all elements of our population these advantages, regardless of the type of work involved". Let us do that instead of moralizing and saying that it is a workman's fault if he does not live near his job.

Few workmen can choose where they may live in relation to their place of work, particularly in these days of high unemployment. A workman cannot guarantee that he will be working tomorrow; he does not even know where he will be working. He takes a job when it comes up and then looks for ways and means of getting there. It is often difficult for a man to travel to his work. I know of many families that spend 20 per cent of their total budgets on necessary transportation so that the breadwinner can hold down a job. He must spend that much because, without transportation, he cannot hold down the job. Surely, considering all the wisdom that is supposed to reside on the government side of the House which has at its disposal the great brains of the civil service, it ought to be possible to bring in some measure of equity in this regard in order that all persons in our society may be fairly treated under our taxation system.

The grievance I have mentioned will not vanish after passage of this clause. This is a long standing grievance and has been a constant source of irritation to people who must work for a living in the factory or mill, to use the words of the parliamentary secretary. The grievance will continue until some decent arrangement is made with regard to the deduction from taxable income of transportation costs involved in going to work. I am glad to see the parliamentary secretary taking notes. He appears to be listening. The other day he said that he was pleased workmen need no longer live close to the smelly factories in which they must work. What kind of suggestion was he making? Does he think that by moving to the suburbs our people can escape from smog and gasoline fumes? Does he not know that you cannot run away from the effects of air pollution simply by moving away from the factory? His attitude is typical of the sort of Liberal moralizing we have heard in the past. Instead of asking people to move away from the factory, why does the government not remedy the pollution at its source? The effects of pollution are not confined to any geographic area.

Mr. Mahoney: What has the Clean Air Act to do with income tax?

Mr. Saltsman: Why not stop factories polluting? After all, there is some relationship between where a person lives and where he works, and I do not think the answer lies in asking people to travel vast distances between where they live and work. In some ways the worker's condition when he lived beside the mill was an unhappy one; yet, in others, it was good. If the mill is polluting the environment, stop the pollution. Do not ask people to move away from the mill. If they move away they will encounter transportation problems. We ought to deal with the problem of pollution at its source. Mr. Chairman, that concludes my remarks at this time. I was prompted to make them by what I thought was a somewhat insensitive response by the parliamentary secretary to matters we had raised. I admit I was most surprised to hear what he said.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Chairman, I thought that the parliamentary secretary would answer some of the questions and concerns which have been raised by my two colleagues who have spoken. I have noted the parliamentary secretary's answer with regard to subparagraph (e) on page 17 of the bill, which has to do with, "telegrapher or station agent's expenses". It appears that the parliamentary secretary is still not familiar with that which I tried to draw to his attention yesterday. I know that railway terminology is not easy to understand and the parliamentary secretary, coming from Calgary, probably has not talked with many railroaders to any extent. He may not be aware of the concerns which have been raised with respect to this subparagraph. May I read in part what the parliamentary secretary said yesterday about the point I was trying to bring to his attention. He said, as recorded at page 9137 of Hansard:

I should point out that under section 62 the transfer costs of the employee moving from one location to another are covered when he actually moves his home to the site of his new employment.

I was not talking about employees moving to new employment. I was talking about a situation over which they have no control. Sometimes the company instructs the employee to go to a particular location and to assume certain duties, which might be of a non-operating or operating nature. The employee must go to that location as directed and fulfil the directive of the company. This is not a case of the employee moving to that location and to that employment of his own free will, so to speak. I do not think the parliamentary secretary quite realizes the significance of what I was trying to bring to his attention. I think he missed the point.

May I quote, in part, another answer of the parliamentary secretary, as recorded at page 9137 of Hansard:

I must say I question very much the thesis that a particular group of taxpayers who because of collective bargaining arrangements have a certain problem, should have preference over other taxpayers.

I suggest to the parliamentary secretary that a provision of the law at present covers telegrapher's and station agent's expenses in this regard, as is proper. These people, however, are in exactly the same position as other groups of employees who, as I am trying to emphasize, are not being treated fairly. Would the parliamentary secretary explain why their expenses could not be allowed as deductions? The parliamentary secretary went on to say:

I do not think the fact that this problem may be enshrined in a collective agreement is a good reason for the government to make an exception in the income tax provisions.

The collective agreement has nothing to do with the type of arrangement to which I refer. You cannot e..pect a company to hire a new set of employees every time that company needs employees with certain skills and expertise at a different location.

Mr. Mahoney: I wonder if the hon. member would clarify something for me. I may have misunderstood him last evening. It was my impression from the hon. member's remarks that the necessity for a particular railway employee to drive, for example, from Moose Jaw to Regina arose from the seniority rights that he had. It was also my impression that those rights flow from the collective agreement.

Mr. Skoberg: The first part of the parliamentary secretary's statement is correct. He was mistaken, however, with regard to our system of seniority rights which do not involve questions of ability or the lack of it. If the question of ability were part of the picture, management personnel could place their sons and daughters in certain jobs. What I raised was a separate issue. I used the example of an employee driving between Moose Jaw and Regina merely to show that some employees do not have job opportunities at their respective places of residence. They must then move elsewhere to try to obtain employment. This does not have anything to do with the collective agreement. In that particular case, they have to go wherever the job is. It is not a case of saying they will stay at this point and work. There is no work, so they have to move. This is where the seniority provision comes in under the collective agreement.

• (12:20 p.m.)

In this case, the situation is exactly the same as the one which is already covered by this section in two areas, telegraphers' and agents' expenses. These people live at a terminal, whether they be non-ops, maintenance, crane operators, bridge builders, engineers, firemen, trainmen or brakemen. These people have to go outside on an assignment for the company. They are not exercising seniority but are acting upon the instructions of the railway company. The words contained in paragraph (e) should include other railway employees who are affected in the same way as those referred to in that paragraph. I agree there could be a point of discussion when a man exercises seniority to move to another point.

I appreciate the fact that the parliamentary secretary pointed out the provisions of section 62. I am sure many are pleased to see this wording put into the bill. This is a new section. If we do not allow those people to whom I am referring the same concession as that contained in the bill, we will have two sets of rulings for the same type of people working for the same company. This has been a bone of contention for a long time. I cannot understand how we can have two sets of rules and regulations for the same area of concern.

We should look at the various areas across the country. The hon. member for London East is fully aware of this problem to which I am referring. There are railway people in his constituency. He is a railway man, just as I am. He knows the concern of these people who, through no fault of their own, are forced away from home on an assignment for the railway company. These are the people whose problems I am trying to emphasize to the parliamentary secretary. They should receive equal treatment under paragraph (e). The hon. member for Bourassa, the hon. member for Labelle and the hon. member for Lachine must have received the same type of approach. We are all familiar with it.

If it were possible to acquire new employees at a certain location to fill the job requirements of management, possibly there would be room for argument. In each and every case I am referring to, these people have long-standing seniority. They have long-time service records with the railway companies. In many cases, they have to leave their homes and work away from home for a limited length of time. They should be entitled to the same deduction as the two other groups of railway employees. The deduction should be allowed to all employees whose working conditions are the same. I wish to emphasize that point. At this time, I move:

That Bill C-259 be amended at page 17, in line 6, by inserting therein immediately after the word "work" the following words:

"or any employee working away from his home terminal."

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. It is the feeling of the Chair at this time that the amendment just put by the hon. member for Moose Jaw is acceptable to the Chair. Unless members have opinions as to the procedural acceptability, the Chair is ready to put the amendment.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I am very much afraid that I cannot accept the logic in the hon. member's argument. The section in which he proposes to insert this clause deals with relieving station agents, telegraphers and people on maintenance and repair work on the railway who, in the course of their employment, are ordinarily away from their home base. By the very nature of their work, these people are required to travel away from home base.

The hon. member has described a situation that has arisen in many parts of western Canada at least. I am aware of many situations where the location of a man's permanent job shifts away from the place he has been accustomed to living. By this amendment, the hon. member is attempting to allow people to be reimbursed for expenses involved in commuting from their ordinary residence to their ordinary place of employment, which is one location, not a man travelling as a relieving telegrapher or maintenance-of-way employee to point A this week, point B next week and so on. It is not the same situation at all. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I must say that the government cannot accept the amendment.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I think this could have been expressed in somewhat neater language. If the hon. member had moved to delete certain words, the section would read: "amounts disbursed by the taxpayer in the year for meals and lodging while employed by a railway company away from his ordinary place of residence to the extent that he has not been reimbursed, etc." Be that as it may, I think the wording is cumbersome. The point is quite clear. I think it states a principle which my colleagues can support. We intend to do so.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Chairman, the parliamentary secretary has again failed to grasp the significance of what I am trying to bring to his attention. There is absolutely no difference between an operator or telegrapher relieving at various points throughout his particular seniority (district) and a trainman, bridgeman, sectionman, engineer, conductor and all railway employees who are also relieving for temporary periods of time. I agree that he has a point. If I were trying to create two home terminals, there would be no argument. But all I am asking is that the same consideration be given in this case as is given to two groups of people already. And all they are doing is relieving. Relieving in the industry as it is today may be for four days, or for a week, or for two weeks. The holiday relief system has assumed increasing importance in recent years. When staff are relieving, they are not exercising seniority. It is not by choice. They are directed by management to go to a particular place to fulfil an obligation the company has undertaken.

I am not asking for the world. All I am suggesting is that we should be consistent—that there should not be two sets of rulings affecting the same people. I wish the hon. member for London East would rise to speak in support of the argument I am putting forward. He knows that this is what happens. We have seen it happen year in and year out, all along the line. I am not asking that special consideration be given to one particular group. I would not try to do that. All I am asking is that consideration be given to people in the railway industry who through no fault of their own are assigned by the company to work away from home. I hope that instead of rejecting this plea out of hand, the parliamentary secretary will agree to take it under further advisement. If he will agree to do so I will certainly be prepared to allow my amendment to stand while he takes a further look at this question.

Mr. Orlikow: As a member for the City of Winnipeg, the home of such a large number of railway workers, I rise to join my hon. friend from Moose Jaw in his plea. I was interested to note that this time the parliamentary secretary did not reject the idea which my hon. friend has put forward. He contented himself by observing that it was out of place, that it was advanced at the wrong place in our proceedings.

The railway industry has gone through a revolution since the end of the second world war. The number of employees both in the operating and in the non-operating phase has declined each year. This has often meant major moves for those who have been able to keep their jobs. In his amendment, my hon. friend deals with the case of employees who are required to relieve on a job for a few days or a couple of weeks. I can refer to cases of employees in the dining car department who have lived in Winnipeg for 20 years or more. Because of the reduction in railway service during part of the year, they have been required to work out of Prince Rupert or Vancouver. Nobody has suggested they ought to move their families, because in the summer when business picks up, they are back on the run out of Winnipeg. But for part of the year they must leave their families and move to Vancouver, or anywhere else where employment is awaiting them, not because they wish to move but simply because this is the only way in which they can earn a living.

So the situation arises in which for a certain period, four or five days, two weeks, or even longer, a railway worker whose family is living in one city and incurring expenses for rent and food, must live in another city and bear similar expenses. I could refer to cases where this situation has lasted not for two weeks but for four or five months. There should be equity between different groups of railway workers, equity as between people. No one questions the right of a salesman to travel across Canada from Winnipeg to Regina, to Calgary, to Vancouver, back to Edmonton and Saskatoon and back to Winnipeg, to charge his expenses for hotel accommodation and meals. He needs to visit those cities in order to earn a living. Why do we not permit the railway worker who needs to be away from home in order to earn a living to do exactly what my hon. friend has proposed? I urge the parliamentary secretary and the government to consider favourably what seems to me to be a very reasonable and modest proposal.

Mr. Harding: Mr. Chairman, I should like to endorse the amendment which is before the committee. It seems to me to be a clear and sensible amendment. It seems to me it is good policy, in so far as both labour and taxes are concerned, to be consistent. I suggest to the parliamentary secretary that the privileges given to others should be extended to those who are forced to go away from their home bases.

May I outline some examples from my own area and from adjacent areas? To the north, in the riding of Okanagan-Kootenay, there is the City of Revelstoke. A large number of engineers and other people are forced to leave Revelstoke and go to the east and the west. For example, they might go to Golden and work out of Golden for a number of days. They should be allowed to write off the expenses which they will be obliged to incur as a result of this change of base. I see nothing wrong about this proposition and I urge the parliamentary secretary to take a fresh look at the proposal.

In my own area there is a railway centre at Nelson employing a large number of people. The same situation prevails there. In many instances, men are required to leave Nelson and spend several days outside their home bases. It is far more costly for them than working from home. Again, it comes back to the old story. We have set up privileged groups in our tax society. One of them is doctors. I am not complaining about doctors having exemptions when they use cars to visit patients or hospitals. But the same treatment should apply to other workers, and this is an example. In following their employment at the wishes of the company these railway workers are obliged to incur additional expenses and in my opinion these should be deductible. Once again I urge the parliamentary secretary to look at this amendment. It is a good one and will eliminate one of the anomalies that exist in the bill.

• (12:40 p.m.)

Mr. Rowland: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to reiterate the arguments of my colleague in defending the logic of this amendment; I simply appeal to the parliamentary secretary. This bill is 700 pages or more in length and obviously the parliamentary secretary is not so well acquainted with it that he knows all its details. This particular provision deals with railroaders. My colleague from Moose Jaw knows railroading; he was once a railroader himself.

The hon. member has proposed an amendment which seeks to give equal treatment to all railroaders. I suggest that is a proposition worth examining. I would hate to see this amendment cast aside simply because it is close to the lunch hour. Why cannot the parliamentary secretary stand this particular clause of the bill until he has discussed the amendment with his departmental officials over the lunch hour and decided whether or not the argument advanced by my colleague from Moose Jaw is correct? The parliamentary secretary makes no response. I do not know whether we shall be obliged to talk until one o'clock so that he will have an hour over the lunch period to examine it with his officials. Could we not stand this section and have the amendment examined as I have suggested?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I have no reason to agree to standing it at this point.

Mr. Turner (London East): Mr. Chairman, as a former railway employee I was many times on the "spare board", which means I had to work on extra jobs. I have been forced to go from London to Toronto, to Windsor, to Fort Erie and to live out at different terminals. I could be at these places for one week or sometimes for two months, and all I received from the company was a place to sleep, which they call a rooming house. I had to supply my own meals. Other groups of railway employees, such as telegraphers and sectionmen, are forced to move around quite a bit in the course of their employment. The system is this: If a telegrapher, for example, at a station becomes sick, you have to replace him with a spare man who is based at the main terminal. I support the amendment because these people are constantly on the go. Sometimes they are on the spare board for ten or 12 years. Their expenses are constantly building up and they receive no relief from the company. In addition to that, their expenses at home are increasing. Therefore, these workers should have some relief from the expenses they incur while constantly moving around while they are on the spare board.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, the example given by the hon. member for London East is that of a telegrapher. A relieving telegrapher is, of course, provided for in section 8(1)(e) of the bill. I should like to hear whether he has any other examples that are not covered of people who ordinarily are required to move around and incur additional expense of this sort.

I should also like to inquire whether the hon. member can tell me why it is that the railway employees find themselves in this particular situation. Ordinarily, when an employee of a company is sent away from his home base to do a particular job he expects to receive compensation from his employer for his hotel, meals and extra expenses on the road. Why is it that in the case of railway employees this is not so, or is it?

Mr. Turner (London East): Mr. Chairman, if I may answer the parliamentary secretary, this is one of the issues over which the unions have been fighting for many years. They have been trying to recover the expenses incurred when these men are forced to work away from home. This moving away occurs because of the very nature of the work—the railroads run from coast to coast and serve many areas. These people cannot always work at the same terminal because, for example, business might be slack. Naturally, when someone has to work away from home it is the youngest or most junior worker who has to move. But we have never been able to get anything into a contract that will take care of expenses incurred when away from home.

I was away in Mimico for approximately a year. At that time I had a young family and I found that keeping two homes going was hard on the pocket book. Once I returned home, naturally I was relieved of this extra expense. In the old days I could have worked 20 hours a day in Mimico if I has wanted to double up, and I had to do this to take care of the extra expense. Today you work eight hours and that is all. Of course, it is expensive to live in Toronto compared with a small place outside. I think this amendment is definitely a step in the right direction and deserves serious consideration.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that since last night we have pretty well come full circle. I cannot see that this question is anything that could not be covered by the provisions of collective bargaining agreements existing between the railway companies and some of the trade unions in the railroad industry. A round trip, as the defence minister has just commented. To suggest that the general tax law of the country should be changed to accommodate an anomaly existing in collective agreements in a particular industry just does not make sense.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Chairman, I do not think the parliamentary secretary appreciates what it is we are trying to bring to his attention. He asked the hon. member for London East why the railway workers find themselves in this situation. Samuel Freedman discovered that railway workers were in a particular situation, and he had to write a report about it. His report well documented the fact that workers in the railway industry are in a situation that is not found anywhere else.

If I may reply to what the parliamentary secretary said, I am not trying to use one group in a particular industry against another group. I am not trying to have them given favourable recognition under the tax laws which others do not have. Nevertheless, at the present time the expenses of telegraphers and station agents are considered to be a legitimate deduction, as they should be. All I am suggesting is that railway workers should have the same consideration. They are working in every area that serves the needs of their customers. By serving the needs of the customers they are serving the needs of management.

Whether or not this obligation should be placed upon management is something I am sure the collective bargaining process will have to decide at some other time. By the same token, these two classifications are bracketed together in the same collective agreement, and there is no question that they are permanently based at home; they have to move at times in order to serve the needs of management. The situation is the same for this classification of employees as for those we have been speaking about this morning. I contend this group of employees should receive the same treatment. If we were asking for something that was completely unacceptable, or if we were just trying to make a point for the sake of trying to do something for the railway workers, then I could understand the bull-headedness of the parliamentary secretary. But we are not. All we suggest is that there be across the board consideration given to all those railway employees who find themselves in the same situation.

[Mr. Turner (London East).]

It was suggested a while ago that relieving workers away from home base is something that is particularly akin to telegraphers and station agents but not other classifications of employees, and if that were so I would buy the argument. But it is not so. The number of people who have to move away from home temporarily for a short period is not that high. As suggested by the hon. member for Selkirk, perhaps if the parliamentary secretary could stand this particular item over until after lunch we could make some progress. In fact, if he would stand in his place and indicate what possible difference there is between that group of people who are included and the group of employees to which I and other members have referred, perhaps we could accept his argument. I suggest he is playing with words when he says that one group is relieving from home base and the other group is not relieving from home base. The people now covered are relieving from home base and this is a legitimate deduction. The people we are talking about are also relieving from home base. They all start from the home base, whatever their classification. Those people relieving from home base are in exactly the same situation as those who are covered by the provisions of the act, and they should receive the same consideration in so far as deductions are concerned.

• (12:50 p.m.)

Surely, the parliamentary secretary and his two advisers could come up with a better answer than the suggestion that this amendment is not acceptable to the government because we are not talking about the same thing. We are not talking about employees from airlines but rather employees of railway companies. These employees have to accept an assignment away from home base in order to fulfil an obligation of the company. We are not talking about expenses, and whether expense deductions should be allowed for all employees of the railway companies. I would urge the parliamentary secretary to stand this part of the section and give it serious thought over the noon hour. We are not asking for special concessions for one individual group in the railway industry, but rather the same type of consideration and deductions for all railway employees who are involved in exactly the same type of relief operation.

We are not talking about a transfer to another point or travelling expenses; we are talking about those people who are forced to go 150 miles away from home to man an assignment of the railway company but who receive no consideration for this. They cannot even stay in the bunkhouses any more. They must provide their own accommodation in a private rooming house, a hotel or a motel and pay their own expenses out of their own pockets. This type of deduction is allowed in respect of salesmen and other individuals, and by accepting this amendment we could close a gap that should be closed.

I cannot understand why the parliamentary secretary is trying to confuse this issue by suggesting there are different classifications involved. We are talking about employees in exactly the same circumstances, namely those relieving at a terminal away from home areas where the company requires their services. The provision of these services is in the interest of the entire travelling public and the nation, whether they are provided at the little individual whistle stops or elsewhere. People have to assume these assignments which may involve switching at a brickyard or somewhere else, and we feel the same type of consideration should be given those people involved in relief operations.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, there have been some discussions about the business this afternoon, and I wonder if the committee would be agreeable to rising now and reporting progress in order that I might put forward a proposal to the chamber in respect of that business a little later today?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ARRANGEMENTS FOR DISPOSITION OF BILL S-9

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the business I was discussing, which I understand was agreed to, relates to Bill S-9, an act to amend the Copyright Act. It is item No. 91 on the order paper. The arrangement is that the business under consideration at three o'clock this afternoon will be interrupted, Bill S-9 will be called and, notwithstanding the provisions of the Standing Orders, all questions necessary to dispose of the bill will be put at this sitting. I wonder whether that is a correct understanding. If it is, perhaps that could be made an order.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): No, Mr. Speaker, that was not the understanding. We urged that Bill S-9 come on at three o'clock, but it was very clearly understood that private members' hour would not be interfered with this afternoon. I know who is proposing the motion this afternoon, but that was a clear understanding. There is the expectation that the bill will be dealt with in the allotted time.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that there was an agreement which would apply to second reading only, and that during the hour from three to four the bill would be disposed of on second reading.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Yes.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, there seems to have been some breakdown in communication. There was an agreement that we would call this bill at three o'clock. It was also agreed that if it was possible to get it through in that hour we would waive any rule about second reading, the committee stage and third reading taking place the same day. However, there was no iron-clad agreement that the bill would get through in that hour. There was every expectation it would, but certainly there was no agreement that we would stay with it under any order to finish it, at today's sitting.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, apparently the understanding on this side is not the same, so at this point all I can do is announce that at three o'clock there will be a proposal to adjourn the committee at that point and call Bill S-9.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The House has heard the proposal made by the minister that the committee will report progress at three o'clock for the purpose of resuming the study of Bill S-9. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): It is so ordered.

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act—Mr. Benson—Mr. Laniel in the chair.

On clause 1—section 4: Income or loss from a source or from sources in a place.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Chairman, I am wondering whether the parliamentary secretary has had time to consider the amendment a little more over the one-hour break and whether or not he could possibly give some explanation now concerning why he considers these people should not be covered by this section of the act so far as deductions are concerned.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I might add my plea. Earlier I indicated that my colleagues would accept the amendment which has been moved although we thought perhaps it was a rather cumbersome way of arriving at a result which could be arrived at in short order. It is not a question of procedure with which we are dealing now but rather a question of substance and of justice. For the life of me, I cannot see why the government should be obdurate about something which, from a revenue standpoint, is not apt to be substantial.

From the standpoint of the way in which we deal with the expenses involved in being able to earn a dollar in Canada, this is probably as important and as basic an issue as we can have. The fact is that what is being asked in this amendment, as I understand it, is that if a person should be wrenched away from the family table as it were—and the hon. member for London East I thought put it very well because he had gone through this and the hon. member for Moose Jaw put it very well because he had gone through it also—he should not have to suffer a disability as a result of being forced to go out and get his meals, his living and everything else. We have made a provision for ourselves in this regard in this Parliament. It is recognized. I am not allowed to sit down at my table in Halifax or my hon. friend is not allowed to sit down at his table in Calgary during much of the year. This is part of the handicap we suffer. He does not have his wife's good cooking and I do not have my wife's good cooking, either. We have to eat our meals out and have to pay for them. What is being proposed here relates to a similar situation.

The railway people do have their own bunkhouses, but probably the employees should be paid danger pay to live in them. I shall not deal with that aspect of the question. Simply from the point of very elementary justice, however, I really would hope if the question is too involved to be answered today this item could be allowed to stand so that the cabinet, would have a chance to consider what has been said by the hon. member for Moose Jaw, and all the other people, and deal with it as a basic issue on which I believe most Members of Parliament feel very strongly, even though some of them are on orders to stand up and vote against it. I think a sufficiently strong case has been established here today that, as a matter of elementary justice, we should pass everything else and let this stand, even if we have to hold it back for a month so that people will have a chance to examine it. Let us do it in that way and then get a reasoned response. If we are turned down, we are turned down; if we win, we win. Surely, we do not want to just shoot off opinions from the tops of our heads and make judgments on very short notice when perhaps some pretty lengthy deliberation is needed.

The other point I should like to make to my friend the parliamentary secretary, who is a pretty human fellow, is that we are not being asked to overturn the world by accepting a proposition such as this. We are simply being asked to give justice to people who, because of the way in which they earn a living, have to accept a rather different way of life than that of perhaps the parliamentary secretary who would go to his law office in Calgary or I would go to mine if I were practising law at home. These people have to move about. I think these people deserve some extra consideration, and I would hope we would immediately get on to the job of passing sections 4 to 8, while leaving this open for some extra consideration. Mind you, we may come back and still have the government say no, but it is so important an issue that I make this request.

Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak on this matter since it relates in a small way to the area I represent. The establishment of servo centres for the movement of freight by the railway systems will require a great many employees to travel beyond the communities in which they have established homes, and this is a fundamental, basic reason the government should yield on this point.

It would be no disgrace for the government to admit that members of the opposition once in a while do have some sound ideas, and some pretty basic principles of justice to put forward. I can only add my voice to the many others who have spoken on this. I urge the parliamentary secretary not to force a vote on it, but to yield to reason and allow the amendment to pass.

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Chairman, the views already expressed in this part of the debate lead me to say a few words. It seems to me that once again we, on behalf of the people of Canada, are giving in to some of the most powerful organizations in the country, the railways. The hon. member for London East graphically explained the difficulty that he, as an individual, faced. I just cannot understand why the railway companies, on the general principle of fair treatment of their employees, would not take care of this type of problem themselves. Here we are being asked to expand an exception, one which I regard as doubtful in principle. Perhaps instead of expanding section 8(1)(e) we should be restricting it. I fail to see why we should be encouraging through our tax law, a situation in which people are not being given their fair expenses by the companies that employ them. I hope the parliamentary secretary will deal with this matter. I feel that this exception in the statute with respect to telegraphers and station agents is basically wrong in principle, should not be extended further, but should be scrapped. The railway companies, which are probably Canada's most powerful organizations, should not be placed in the position of being able to continue what apparently are very poor labour-management practices.

I also wish to speak on section 8(1)(c) dealing with clergymen's residences. As is well known, there are many large tracts of land in Canada which are held by the churches. One of the reasons they are held in this way is the peculiar tax provisions which we allow to churches and clergymen. If the public which supports churches is willing to pay for a residence, and I think members of that public should, I do not see why we, in turn, after providing a tax deduction for charitable donations to churches, should again give another exception with respect to the residence. I think we should try to put all of this on as fair a basis as possible, so that the tax burden falls more equitably on all members. In that way, members of a congregation can themselves decide, based more on the true cost of a clergyman's residence, to what degree the residence should be supported.

I raise this because of one particular community in Gaspé which I have visited. I know a number of people there. Only 35 per cent of the buildings, residences and property in the town is taxable. All of the other property is either in the hands of the church or of educational institutions. There is a tremendous warping of the tax structure of a municipality when you make all these exceptions for religious and educational purposes. I believe that the people who directly support these establishments should be given a tax rebate for such support. They should not be in a position of getting two sets of tax rebates, as apparently we are providing in section 8(1)(c). It is not my intention to propose an amendment to strike this out, but I think this is a view that should be expressed. It is one that is rarely expressed when we are dealing with taxes that affect church property. Again, I think the parliamentary secretary should comment on why there is this peculiar exception with respect to telegraphers and station agents. I think that in the interests of rationalization it, too, should be struck out.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I am not sure whether this is a tribute, or the reverse of a tribute, to the eloquence of the hon. member for Moose Jaw, but the longer he talks the longer he seems to take to get his message through clearly, at least to me. Perhaps that is a commentary on my own situation, but I would very much like an opportunity to read the record of the debate this morning to see if I do understand the point that is being made. I think there has been some element of inequity demonstrated. I think this is an element of inequity as between certain classes of railway employees, that privileges are being granted to telegraphers and relieving station agents, and not to other employees who, in the circumstances and under the conditions mentioned by the hon. member, might merit the same sort of tax treatment. However, I would like an opportunity to be able to look at the record, and then return to the debate on clause 8(1)(e). I do not know whether we are on clauses now or paragraphs, but I suggest that we allow 8(1)(e) to stand over, and proceed to deal with the other items in this block of sections.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, in the light of the suggestion or offer made by the parliamentary secretary, I wonder if I may make a procedural proposal? Technically speaking, you have put section 4 before us. My understanding so far as my colleagues are concerned is that on this group of 4 to 8 my hon. friend from Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands is the only one left who has something to say on any of them, and that is on section 6. May I suggest that we carry 4 and 5, have a brief discussion on 6, dispose of it, carry 7, and then let 8 stand until Monday?

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I raised this particular subject a couple of days ago and am glad that it has been followed up. I certainly think this section should be allowed to stand, as suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and that we dispose of the other sections.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Shall section 4 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. MacKay: This is on section 8(1)(e), Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps the hon. member did not listen to what was suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. There seems to be agreement to move on through the different sections. As we get to one on which some hon. members still wish to make comments we can allow further discussion. It was also understood that clause 8 could be stood until Monday when we would have another discussion on it.

Mr. MacKay: As I understand it, this particular section with which the parliamentary secretary dealt a few moments ago will be brought up again on Monday.

The Deputy Chairman: This is the agreement. If the hon. member wishes to speak at this time on section 8 he will more or less negate that agreement. Nobody can prevent him from speaking at this time, but if he agrees with what has been put forward the Chair will make sure that he has an opportunity to speak on this clause when it is next before the committee.

Clause 1—Sections 4 and 5—agreed to.

On clause 1—Section 6: Amounts to be included as income from office or employment.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, I want once again to raise this matter of the deductions for expenses which workers incur as a result of their employment. For at least 15 or 20 years this has been a matter of great concern to organized workers and has been discussed in the House many times. It is recognized that there is an inequity between wage and salary earners with respect to their right to deduct such expenses from their income tax, and professional groups, travelling salesmen, insurance agents, book agents and others who are able to deduct such expenses.

I must congratulate the government on having finally recognized this problem and trying to do something about it. Our complaint is that the government has followed the usual procedure of bureaucrats in solving the problem by saying that the $150 exemption will be granted to every employee irrespective of what their expenses are in connection with their employment. This $150 exemption will apply where the only thing a man has to buy in order to do his work is a ball point pen as compared to a logger who has to buy a power saw which could cost anywhere from $300 to $600. It will apply equally to a man who lives a few blocks from a plant and can get there by bus and to a man who has to drive 30 or 40 miles. It seems to me that the government could have done a much better job in resolving this problem This is the Procrustean bed theory. You force everybody into the same bed; if they are too short, you stretch them and if they are too long, you lop a piece off without any regard to the circumstances, equity or justice.

I want to draw the minister's attention to two groups in my constituency who will be adversely affected by the inequities of this provision. The first is the men who work in the logging camps. They have to buy special equipment, hard hats, special work boots and they have to provide their own power saws in most cases. This involves an expenditure far in excess of $150 a year. In addition, many have to drive very long distances to work. I know that in subsection 7 there is a definition of a special work site. Under certain conditions a man may claim travelling expenses as an exemption. The special site is confined either to something of a temporary nature, which I take it means simply a construction site and would not cover a logging camp which could operate for several years, or some place where the taxpayer could not reasonably be expected to establish and maintain a domestic establishment. This is going to raise a good deal of controversy.

In my constituency there are logging camps where accommodation is provided for single men. There is limited accommodation for families so men drive 20, 30 or 40 miles morning and night to these camps. They really have no choice in the matter, as it is doubtful that they could get accommodation at the camps. In many cases they already own a home. It is surely not suggested that they try to dispose of their home and move into a bunkhouse in a logging camp. It seems to me that some provision should be made for such a group.

The second group of employees for whom this provision constitutes an injustice is the longshoremen. They have no choice of where their operation may be. A man may live in Chemainus and then he has just the ordinary travelling expenses of going to the docks. But at any time he can be ordered to a port 50, 70 or 80 miles away; he must travel there, work all day, and return at night. Certainly, a port 50 miles away will not constitute a special work site because it is not temporary. He could get housing accommodation there but he may only work there for two or three days.

Considering all the thought the government has given to this tax reform legislation, I would have expected the tax experts to come up with something much better than this uniform exemption of $150. In some cases it is unnecessary and in the cases I have cited, as well as many others, it is grossly inadequate and certainly unfair. I can only conclude that either the personnel of the Department of Finance and the minister and his parliamentary secretary have not consulted at all with the people who are familiar with the working conditions of Canadians or they would surely have proposed a better provision than the one presently before us.

I should like to appeal to the minister to revise the definition of the circumstances under which a worker would be entitled to travelling expenses and to board and lodging. The limitation is too narrow. A great many workers have to travel long distances and be absent from home, but they will not qualify under this legislation and will not be allowed to deduct the expenses incurred as a proper exemption under the Income Tax Act.

I hope that before section 6 is allowed to pass the government will undertake to make some changes in order to increase the number of persons to whom exemption will be granted with respect to board and lodging and travelling expenses necessarily incurred in order to carry out the duties related to their employment.

• (2:30 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Chairman, following the remarks of the previous speaker, I should like to point out to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney) that all told this $150 maximum amount of expenses allowed for tax deduction will represent for the ordinary worker a tax reduction of only $20 or $25, which I believe totally inadequate.

Besides, we have begged for many years in the House for such a taxation relief, and the government always turned a deaf ear when it came to workers. In fact, I stated myself in this House that there was shameless discrimination against the worker. One must consider that other professional groups, such as insurance agents, businessmen, doctors and dentists have the right to deduct from their gross income the cost of their equipment and all travelling expenses incurred in the discharge of their duties.

Workers are right to protest against injustice because I believe that the lumbermen, both in my constituency and throughout Canada, are entitled to a better treatment. Everyone knows that today the lumberman's work is so mechanized that he must spend thousands of dollars to buy machines such as mechanical saws, etc., but he will be allowed to deduct only $150 from his total income. I ask the parliamentary secretary to give more consideration to this group of workers who make up almost 85 per cent of the labour force in the area. In fact, only 15 per cent of the workers will get anything out of this while an injustice will be committed against the others who quite often are the most in need because they earn less.

[Mr. Douglas.]

For example, I am thinking of the plumber or mechanics whose tools may cost up to $1,000 or $1,500. These tools must be constantly renewed so that the amount of $1,000 which could be deducted for tax purposes would be over a period of two or three years. This gives you an idea of the cost of those workers' tools, which I call third-class workers, in relation to those who have been granted advantages by the government and who managed to have special laws passed to enjoy tax exemptions. I wonder whether this was not due to their influence in this Parliament against the workers of our regions.

I believe they exerted a great influence and had great supporters. I have no grudge against them! I have nothing against the professional classes because I myself as a merchant am very happy to be able to deduct travelling expenses incurred while looking after my business.

However, I want as much fairness for everybody and I want those workers to be in a position to deduct the cost of their tools and their transportation. It must be realized that the worker no longer lives in a lumber camp today, that he uses his car in the morning to cover 70, 75 or even 80 miles in order to cut wood the whole day long and returns at night, because lumber camps are no longer maintained, as in the past, when the lumberman "hibernated" for four, five or six months, in short, as long as the contract lasted.

Today, because work stops on Friday afternoon, the worker must come back to town, return home on the weekend because there is no cook at the camp.

He cannot even be repaid, if only one third of the expenses related to his work.

I could talk about all the other trades which do not seem to be considered in this bill. It seems to me that this would have given the minister a unique opportunity to say: At last, justice will be done to them. For the last seven or eight years, the government has been urged to try and give justice to this group of workers who will be voting in a proportion of 85 per cent in the next election.

This group is large enough, Mr. Chairman, for the minister and his parliamentary secretary to give them consideration, and I urge the government, before passage of those sections, to give them a second thought and not to think only of themselves but also of those who elected them. They deserve some sort of tax relief once in a while.

I do not want to take up too much time, but I could not let this section be passed without calling upon the minister and asking him to amend it so that all will be treated equally. All I am asking for is an act of social justice. In fact, we heard it so often said during the last election campaign: Fellow Canadians, from now on, we will have a just society.

We are calling for a positive act of social justice for the workers. We are not asking for special exemptions but only what has been always granted to the others. They have a right to an equal treatment and let us stop making this group that makes up 95 per cent of the population a group of underprivileged citizens, a third class group in our society.

I hope the parliamentary secretary will note those remarks and that before passage of this section, he will introduce something more sensible, more positive and more equitable.

[English]

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word or two about subparagraph (e) of subsection 6(1) and about subsection 6(2), entitled respectively, "standby charge for automobile" and "reasonable standby charge minimum amount". I want to relate my remarks to people employed particularly as salesmen for automobile firms. I will not go into the question of whether there should be such a charge or not. It has been brought to my attention that some salesmen employed by automobile firms are required, as part of their duties, to drive cars as demonstrators. The value of these cars may vary greatly. One day a car salesman may demonstrate a car selling for $2,000 and the next day he may demonstrate one selling for $7,000 or $8,000. In the case of salesmen of this type it would be impossible to apply these provisions in any equitable way.

Also, salesmen like these are in a different position from, say, salesmen selling products for Burns & Company, a furniture company, or some company like that. In other words, the vehicle supplied to such salesmen for their own use is the vehicle which they are selling. It is the merchandise which they are selling and they are, therefore, in a position different from that of a salesmen to whom automobiles are supplied. As a result, there ought to be included in the bill a provision exempting them from the particular subsections I have referred to; or some type of special provision ought to be introduced to make sure they will not be unfairly discriminated against and placed in an impossible situation in determining what they ought to pay. I hope the government will make a modification along the line I have suggested. I should like to hear what the parliamentary secretary has to say about this matter.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, the particular matter raised by the hon. member for Calgary Centre was brought to the government's attention yesterday by a delegation, perhaps the same group which saw the hon. member. Certainly, it is recognized there is a genuine problem here. We are looking at it. At this time, I cannot indicate what the solution might be. However, I can assure the hon. member that it is being given very serious consideration. As I say, unfortunately it was only flagged for us very recently.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, might I ask if we can take it for granted that this section will not be finally passed until some amendment is introduced in connection with the matter?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I do not think that is an agreeable solution to the problem. We intend to face up to it. It is going to require some study in order to determine the magnitude of the problem. As the hon. member may know, the suggestion has come forward from the people who are concerned with this problem that a flat amount of some sort or other be assessed each month or each year in order to take care of the situation where the gentleman is driving a Cadillac one day and a Volkswagen the next, because the computation problems would obviously be somewhat horrendous. I can only say at this point I am not prepared to suggest we will necessarily have the solution by the time we feel that the bill should be passed. I do not think this solves the problem, but we will look for a solution.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak briefly on this. This is a classic example of the way the government trys to deal with something. They think they have a problem and, in dealing with it, they create more problems. There is one other area on which I would like to speak very briefly. I will refer back to section 74(3) and (4) and also section 63; this deals with the worker's employment allowance. A married woman working for a firm which is owned by her spouse, one that is not incorporated or in which her spouse is a partner, provides the services of an employee but will be denied the worker's allowance because she is not considered to be an employee. As I said, by trying to do something, the government is creating more problems.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I wish to return for a few minutes to the subject matter recently raised by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands and followed up by the hon. member for Roberval. If the congenial parliamentary secretary is becoming a little weary over the persistence with which this matter is being discussed, I remind him that this Pandora's box, if that is what he regards it as being, was opened by the government in the white paper.

The provision in the white paper of this flat rate $150 deduction for those in receipt of employment income was put forward and at that time was hailed by the Minister of Finance as being a great reform in the tax system. If I recall correctly, when we had the discussion on the white paper, I was the first member in the House to jump on that proposal with both feet. I remember the rather startled look on the faces of some of the government members when I condemned it out of hand. I concede that as I read the white paper, it appeared to me that this $150 proposal was being put forward as a substitute for the partial recognition of board, lodging and travelling expenses which exist in the present Section 5 of the Income Tax Act which had reference only to construction workers. Some hon. members will recall that particular proposal was brought forward and put into the act in 1957 by the first Conservative Minister of Finance when the right hon. member for Prince Albert was Prime Minister. It has remained in that position ever since.

As one read the white paper, it appeared that that concept, partially recognized in the present Section 5 of the act, was to be removed and this $150 flat rate was to be put in its place. As I said in the committee discussion yesterday, I am happy that that surmise on my part has not proven to be correct when the bill came forward, whether or not, as a result of the representations made concerning it at the time. However, recognition was given to what I consider to be the grossest discrimination against people whose income comes from employment. I remind the parliamentary secretary through you, Mr. Chairman, that it was on the initiative of the government that this proposal was put forward. The more one talks about it, the more unrealistic and unfair that proposal is in its present form. As the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands pointed out, some workers will really get a bonanza as a result of this proposal. When we were discussing the white paper, I said it brought in a new form of discrimination against some of the people who are self-employed. To that extent at least, one can regard it as a retrogressive step.

Last night I listened to some members of my party and members in other parts of the House who come from urban areas discussing this particular proposal. They tried to point out this weakness. The parliamentary secretary attempted to provide a rationale for the proposal as it stands. I admit he made a valiant attempt, but he certainly did not convince me he was on the right track in his thinking in the arguments he presented.

I wish to come back to the point made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre at the very outset of this current phase of discussion on the bill. He quite properly drew a parallel between the $150 proposal as a basic exemption and the existing plan with regard to medical expenses. All taxpayers are able to claim a $100 falt rate if that, in fact, covers the incidental medical expenses they have incurred. However, if they have the documentation necessary under the regulations, they can claim an additional amount if, in fact, they have incurred additional expenses over and above the minimum amount. It seems to me that when it brought forward this $150 proposal in the white paper the government failed to recognize the principle which has been generally accepted as being reasonable, fair and just with respect to medical expenses. For the life of me, I cannot see why the government is not prepared to recognize the same principle in the case of transportation expenses.

When arguments have been presented in the past in favour of improvements in the law, they have often been resisted on the grounds that administration would be difficult or costly. This used to be the reply to proposals which some of us put forward in the House for the establishment of a pension plan. The position today is that a great many calculations, including calculations in respect of income tax returns, are put through computers and this has opened up a whole new range of administrative possibilities when dealing with large numbers of forms. In the light of this development, I believe that properly vouchered claims for transportation expenses should not be too difficult for the administration to handle. Having gone so far as to make this $150 flat rate proposal, the government should now be prepared to go the rest of the way to make it possible for workers who have a bona fide claim to expenses above that level to receive proper consideration.

The parliamentary secretary can advance all the arguments he likes about it not being the responsibility of the government to decide where a person should live in relation to his job. But the fact of the matter remains that in both urban and rural areas workers who may be able to stay in their own homes every night must, of necessity, incur substantial travelling expenses. This is the only way in which our industrial machine can continue to operate. I am sure it is possible for those who devise the working rules under which the Income Tax Act is administered to work out the necessary regulations and requirements with regard to documentation so that a proposal which would meet the situation outlined by my hon. friend from Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands could be put forward.

[Mr. Barnett.]

In my view, it would be more equitable for the government to withdraw this $150 flat rate proposal altogether than to leave the clause as it is, because it is simply not fair that all workers should be put into this same box; it is simply not fair that this formula of the 3 per cent or $150 maximum should be attached. As the arrangement stands, it means that the lower income workers will suffer the heaviest discrimination. I have in mind workers who must travel long distances in order to secure or to hang on to a job. It will be the least well established members of the work force who are likely to be the most heavily penalized under this proposal. I do not know whether my hon. friends agree with me or not, but I would personally prefer to see the whole thing forgotten rather than write this $150 thing into the bill as it now stands.

Mr. Peters: It is obvious that the minister and the parliamentary secretary will, in any case, have an opportunity to consider this question overnight, at least. I should like to know what we are talking about. How much money are we talking about? Is it a sizeable sum? The sum of $150 has been used as a cut-off. What does the 3 per cent amount to? Are predictions as to the probable cost available? What escalation has there been during the last ten years in this field? Are we getting into it deeper, or getting into it less than was the case previously and, if so, what is the cost of this proposition to the treasury? I am sure this just did not come out of a hat, this figure of $150 or the 3 per cent figure. On second thought I am not so sure but, hopefully, the department does have some figures as to what this proposal would cost.

We have drawn an analogy between professionals and the labour force with regard to the tools of their trade. And we have pointed out that not all the returns made are beyond question. The minister is always sending inspectors around the country to assess the validity of some of the claims made by those in the self-employed and professional fields. So I ask the parliamentary secretary to tell us, if he can, whether or not the proposal advanced from this corner of the House can be adopted without great cost to the treasury.

The Deputy Chairman: It being three o'clock, pursuant to the order previously adopted by the House, it is my duty to report progress and ask leave to consider the bill again at the next sitting of the House.

Progress reported.

COPYRIGHT ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING RECORDS, PERFORATED ROLLS OR OTHER CONTRIVANCES FOR MECHANICALLY REPRODUCING SOUND

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs) moved that Bill S-9 to amend the Copyright Act be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think this bill merits some brief explanation here, although I recognize there is a general disposition in the House to deal with it expeditiously because of some deadlines of which all hon. members are aware.

The purpose of this bill is to remove any legal right that may exist for record manufacturers to obtain royalties through the use of a performing right on their records. As hon. members may know, composers, authors and publishers of music have a right to charge for the public performance of their works. This is an inherent part of the Copyright Act and results in substantial annual payments being made to these groups of persons. Each year the performing rights societies file a proposed tariff of fees with the Copyright Appeal Board which in turn assesses and fixes the fees that are to be paid to them by users for the public performance of their works. This right allows these societies to examine the financial records of the users and to extract a fee based on the gross revenue, in many cases, of the user.

Four years ago an additional performing rights society was created, that of Sound Recording Licenses Ltd. This society consisted of a group of some 18 Canadian record companies, approximately 90 per cent of the record manufacturers in Canada but which are principally subsidiaries of foreign corporations. In due course they claimed a "performing right" in their sound recordings, a right that is distinct and apart from any right they had to prevent the copying of their records by others. The result would be to exact from the Canadian broadcasting industry rather substantial fees for their use of recorded music.

Their claim to a performing right is based on a technical and complex provision of the present Copyright Act which the bill now before the House amends. While the original tariff of fees filed with the Copyright Appeal Board would have resulted in fees payable somewhere in excess of $3 million per year, the Copyright Appeal Board allowed a somewhat lower fee. However, the question is really one of the principle that no performing right should exist in a record, that is, the purely mechanical apparatus upon which sound or images are recorded, as distinct from the intellectual and human input to those products. They are already taken care of by the other performing rights societies.

In 1966 the government asked the Economic Council to study the law of copyright and its economic effect upon Canadians. Subsequently they were specifically asked to consider the question of performing rights for record manufacturers. The Economic Council reported its findings this spring and it reaffirmed the recommendations of the Ilsley Commission in its report on copyright in 1957 which recommended that the act be amended to ensure that no such performing right could be claimed. While the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) would have preferred to await a complete overhaul of the Copyright Act before considering this matter, the fact is that the Copyright Appeal Board awarded a tariff to SRL this spring and it is the government's feeling that such a tariff is in principle wrong.

It should be pointed out that there is no conflict with any international obligations we may have under copyright, nor does the United States, where the parent companies of SRL's member firms are located, have such a provision in its copyright legislation, although there is at present and has been for some years a bill before the United States Congress which would change that. I am led to believe that it has little likelihood of passage.

SRL has offered to keep a substantial part of the money in Canada and has also offered to pay a part of any fees collected to the musicians who record the music. While this is admirable, it is an attempt to evade the issue. If the singers and musicians who make a recording should have a performing right, that is something that should be dealt with on its own and not through the back door of providing a performing right and a tariff for the record companies.

It should be made clear that the government is not denying copyright protection to records. The protection of records against copying exists in our law and will continue to exist. Bill S-9 does not affect the protection provided record companies against copying or against piracy. However, in the government's view that is all the record companies are entitled to. It is the government's position that even though the Copyright Appeal Board allows only a small fee now, SRL recently filed a new tariff of fees and applied for a substantial increase in its tariff. It is wrong, therefore, to allow a totally new vested interest to be built up at this time and it is now that appropriate steps must be taken. Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, the government asks the co-operation of the House in disposing of this very important item of legislation.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, the government, as is usual, of course, will have the co-operation that it seeks in processing this legislation. However, it is something of an anomaly that in the case of the grain stabilization act the excuse given for not proceeding with the bill was that there was a court action, while in the case of this bill a court action is to be nullified by statute. I suppose it depends which band you play in.

Mr. Mahoney: The court action is not against the government in this case.

Mr. Fairweather: I am not going to waste part of Friday afternoon on an argument of semantics; I should just like the anomaly brought to the attention of the House. We are going to co-operate because we feel that this is really a matter for debate by, or a battle to be fought between two very large and important interests, interests that the government has to adjudicate upon or with regard to which it must act as referee.

I agree with the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney) that it is a very great pity that the fundamental reform of the Copyright Act has not yet seen the light of day in spite of the fact that since the Copyright Act of 1921 there have been numerous royal commissions and studies, the latest of which was a most excellent report published by the Economic Council of Canada. This was a report on intellectual and industrial property which at page 258 gives a very lucid exposition of the principle that this bill is designed to embody.

As the parliamentary secretary said, we are not dealing here with the fundamental rights of singers and musicians; hopefully, their rights will be underlined in legislation that will have to come before the House at a later date. However, when the bill gets to committee, presumably the rights of singers, musicians and performers as enunciated by ACTRA and other trades union organizations will be aired, and doubtless SRL and other such organizations will also want to appear before the committee.

Copyright consists of an exclusive right in a musical, literary or dramatic work. A necessary consequence is that such work may not be reproduced except by permission of the copyright owner. Secondly, copyright consists of a performing right in the work so that no one may perform the work except upon payment of a royalty to the copyright owner.

In 1921, upon a revision of the Canadian Copyright Act, parliament enacted in subsection (3) of section 4—the provision we are dealing with here—that copyright should subsist in records, perforated rolls and other contrivances by means of which sounds may be mechanically reproduced in like manner as if such contrivances were musical, literary or dramatic works. This provision was copied from the United Kingdom prototype and, as the parliamentary secretary has reminded us, there is no such provision in the copyright law of the United States.

It is my understanding—I think the parliamentary secretary mentioned this in his brief remarks—that there has been for some time a bill on this issue before the United States Congress. I presume that if this Parliament did deal with the issue it would mean that increasing pressure would be brought to bear to move along the bill in the United States Congress. No one appeared to assert performing rights under the provision, which is perhaps not strange because it really has something to do with the whole expansion of the recording industry. There was no assertion of the right from 1921 until 1968. In that year, Sound Recording Licenses—a consortium of the eight major record companies in Canada of which six are subsidiaries of United States companies—a Canadian company, filed an application with the Copyright Appeal Board for approval of a tariff. The parliamentary secretary has told us of the outcome.

In 1968 the government introduced Bill S-20. I am sorry to take a minute or two on this matter but I think that the bill having come to us from the Senate, when future historians are trying to discover what we were doing on October 29, 1971, they will need some historical perspective in this regard. I will take a minute or two to bring the House up to date on the various emphases, and so on, placed on this question. I can assure the Parliamentary Secretary that there will be no difficulty, in so far as this party is concerned, in giving the bill second reading in the time allocated.

The government introduced in the Senate Bill S-20, the prototype of Bill S-9 which we are discussing. There was an explanation given in the records of the other place. I am not going to use that cliché any longer. I prefer to call the Senate, the Senate because that is a perfectly sensible word. I will hereinafter refer to the Senate as the Senate and to Senators as Senators. I believe that the ancient system of discussing that part of Parliament as "the other place" is unnecessary.

There was a short debate on second reading during which the opposition House leader questioned the principle of the action the government was taking, and on February 6, 1969, the government withdrew the bill. This action was taken in agreement with SRL, which undertook not to proceed with its tariff application until the Economic Council of Canada reported on the reference made to it to study the question. The government was anxious to have the advice of the Economic Council. That advice covered many aspects but in particular the government was seeking advice about the whole copyright field.

It might be of interest to recall that in June, 1954, a royal commission under distinguished Chief Justice Ilsley, a great Nova Scotia parliamentarian, had been appointed to inquire into patents, copyright, trademarks and industrial designs. This report was printed in 1957, but unfortunately very little action followed. In other words, there was the usual non-action on the part of successive governments to the activities of royal commissions. The commission recommended that copyright subsisting in a sound recording should continue to subsist but for a period of 40 rather than 50 years from the first publication, but that record manufacturers' performing rights and broadcasting rights in records or in the recording embodied in the record should be abolished.

The Economic Council reference was ordered in July, 1966, and it reported five years later. The Economic Council recommended that the performing right in a sound recording should be removed. However, the chairman of the council, in a preface to the report, advised that two members of the council could not concur completely with the analysis and recommendations on copyright. Then, as the parliamentary secretary has said, SRL revised its application to the Copyright Appeal Board applicable to the year beginning January, 1971. Then in December of 1970 the government introduced Bill S-9. It will be noted that clause 2 provides that the bill is to take effect January 1, 1971. So the principle embodied in the bill has had a rather chequered career; it came forward and was dropped almost as fast as Parliaments come and go.

The bill was referred to the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. At the second meeting of the committee the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) appeared for the purpose of announcing that the Copyright Appeal Board had granted the SRL claim and fixed a scale of tariffs. That is really the chronology, although other members may be interested in different aspects of this matter which they will want to discuss. I want to underline on behalf of this party the comment of the parliamentary secretary, that in no way does the Official Opposition wish to see the right of a singer or musician circumscribed or nullified in any way by this bill, and that issue must be faced in spite of what Parliament may do with this legislation.

There is a second aspect which I am sure will grip the attention of hon. members even more than those first few minutes of chronological presentation. I refer to the constitutional aspect of the bill. Under the British North America Act, copyright comes under paragraph 23 of section 91—that great division of powers—but there it simply states that it is, in legal effect, a subtraction from the exclusive provincial authority to legislate upon property and civil rights in the province. We are advised in this regard, although the courts are not allowed to look to the draftsmen for help in interpreting the constitution—and this is an anomaly that some day Parliament might get around to reforming.

The draftsmen of the BNA Act had before them for guidance two existing constitutions, that of the United Kingdom and, equally important to the draftsmen, the federal system as it was in effect in the United States. The United Kingdom, because of its unitary nature, has authority over property and civil rights. Within this broad scope the United Kingdom Parliament can define "copyright" in its own terms, either limited to the accepted conceptual idea of copyright or artificially and, therefore, conceptually inexact.

The attention of the draftsmen of the BNA Act was no doubt also directed to article 1, section 8 paragraph 8 of the Constitution of the United States. That paragraph empowers Congress to promote the progress of science and the useful arts by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive rights to their restrictive writings and discoveries. Whatever the inspiration, however, in respect of the copyright part of the British North America Act, I think it is important to take a minute or two to remember this bit of historical background when considering the bill before us.

Parliament, in the definition in the bill that we are considering today, appears to be saying that sound recordings are not original musical, literary, dramatic or artistic works as defined in section 2 of the Copyright Act. The point of taking an extra minute or two was only to once again emphasize how essential it is for us to consider at an early date the whole matter of the right of a singer, a musician or other artist. The philosophy, if I can put it that way, of this bill has had fairly thorough examination by the Senate. It also has the merit of being reinforced by the report on intellectual and industrial property.

There is one other aspect which I should like to discuss in a sentence or two to remind the House that the SRL's dividing the spoils, if I can put it this way, really does not mean that those spoils accrue to the benefit of Canada. As a matter of fact, the division will largely be made by the American Union of Musicians. I am not entering into a philosophical debate on international unionism but am reminding the House that the division of those funds will take place under a formula worked out by the American Union of Musicians and the various other trade unions and groups representing not only musicians but the technical people who are involved in the making of recordings.

Therefore, when we think about the bill I believe we should ask ourselves where the benefit will accrue, or what I might call the windfall. In other words, there would be a windfall if this legislation is not passed. A substantial part of this windfall would accrue to the United States of America. Here, as a caveat, I say I am not conducting a rather unpleasant discussion such as has been going on in this country vis-à-vis the United States; I am just saying that a very large amount of money which until 1968 had never been the subject of an assertion would accrue and be distributed to the benefit largely of another country.

I urge the government with its experience and, as the parliamentary secretary said, having to meet a deadline, to let the whole subject matter of copyright law be subject to a good and progressive piece of reform legislation. With that admonition and with the suggestion that we are really dealing with an adjudication between two variable interests, I may say that we support the bill. We hope that these large interests will have an opportunity for their day in court, so to speak, before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs and that the fundamental right of those whom we should seek to help—that is, the performers—will be kept very much in mind.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the explanation of the government's position by the parliamentary secretary and the rather interesting subcommentary by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) I am inclined to support the motion that the bill receive second reading and go to committee. I was worried for a while when the negotiations were under way that perhaps the bill would not go to a standing committee for examination and that it was the intention of the government to seek to have all stages concluded in the House. I would think, despite the impression I have that justice lies essentially with the performers and that on balance we should be supporting their position rather than that of the recording companies, the recording companies have a right to appeal to the Commons directly and to have their case heard.

There is an interesting aspect to this bill. The Commons really is being asked to adjudicate between two conflicting pecuniary claims. The government has taken the position that the income of performers should be protected and should not be diminished by the inclusion of the recording companies in this field. I have stated our feelings on the matter and we are quite prepared to see the bill go to committee and receive quick passage thereafter.

Mr. J.-T. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words on this bill. I take this opportunity to remind the government, as I have on many occasions in the past, that it is high time we got down to serious business and revised not only the Copyright Act, which is about 60 years old, but also the Patent Act, the Trade Marks Act and the Industrial Design and Union Label Act.

We talk a great deal about the economy, labour and finance of this country, but the Acts to which I refer are all restrictive to our economy. They make it possible for Canadians to export as royalties or otherwise about 60 per cent, 80 per cent or 90 per cent of the income derived under them to foreign countries, and to restrict the use by Canadians of patents of inventions, processes of manufacturing, and so on; trademarks in the use of words and copyrights to perform or to use reading matter in the case of books. I would have hoped, especially after all the royal commissions that were in action 10, 12 or 15 years ago, and after the reports of these commissions and of the Economic Council of Canada, that at this time we would seriously be discussing not a simple amendment, important as it may be, but new legislation which would be drafted in the interest of Canadian citizens.

A great deal has been made about everyone wanting to be a great Canadian nationalist; but we are still servants, under so many of these acts, to our foreign competitors and producers. I hope the government will look at this particular type of legislation as well as the other legislation which affects our lives but perhaps not as directly from an economic point of view as the Patent Act, the Trade Marks Act, the Industrial Design and Union Label Act and the Copyright Act. In the meantime I would remind the government that it is well for it to participate in some of the international meetings relating to the protection of industrial property but not to be in too much of a hurry to sign agreements which would make it impossible at a future time to draft laws relating to copyright which should be in the interest of Canadians. I have already attended a number of such conferences. Our hands are already tied in respect of many international agreements. Let us not be in too much of a hurry in the future to agree until we have drafted an act which is in the interest of all Canadians.

This legislation apparently is necessary because action by the SRL would impose another burden on broadcasters in Canada, and surely any burden on them means more expense on the part of our citizens who will have to contribute to the expenses of the broadcasters. For these reasons I hope this bill will be given second reading immediately and be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions about the order of business. In view of advanced hour of the afternoon I think agreement has been reached that the time is ripe now to hear the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on his private member's bill. I think there is an upswell of sentiment that rather than divert to anything else we should go into private members' hour right away so that we could have the advantage of the hon. member's particular wisdom. Could that be agreed?

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, I thought the minister was going to rise in connection with the bill that we have just concluded. There is some anxiety to have that bill brought to a conclusion as quickly as possible. I merely want to indicate that our party is anxious to get the committee proceedings concluded quickly and get it back into the House for third reading. Hopefully, this can be done before the time limit which has been mentioned.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, supplementary to my comments on the order of business and while we look forward to hearing the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I suggest that the period for private members' hour be only one hour from the time we commence, rather than one hour and 25 minutes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there agreement that by leave it shall be called four o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Richard.]

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

HOUSE OF COMMONS

DESIGNATION OF SPEAKER AS MEMBER FOR PARLIAMENT HILL

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved that Bill C-52, respecting the designation of the Speaker of the House of Common as the member for the electoral district of Parliament Hill, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is an interesting afternoon. I shall certainly underline the things that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) said about me when I get a copy of today's Hansard. I also want to express my thanks to the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) for once again seconding my motion with respect to this bill.

Another preliminary remark I should like to make is that I hope I can be permitted, for the sake of the record, to draw attention to the fact that when during the course of this debate we address you, Sir, as Mr. Speaker, it is Your Honour, Mr. Deputy Speaker, who is in the chair at this time. In other words, I am drawing attention to the fact that we are debating this matter in the absence of His Honour the Speaker himself, and I think that is as it should be.

The purpose of this bill, as hon. members are fully aware, is to open the question of finding a way to provide for a continuing Speakership. This is a matter that has been discussed a good many times over the years. It gets the most serious discussion when we have in the chair an occupant such as the present Speaker. I am sure that all of us in this House feel that this institution itself is the better for the kind of leadership being given to us by today's occupant of the chair—and because of that leadership, because of what His Honour does for us, I suggest that right now there is even more discussion than usual on the desirability of finding a way to provide for a continuing Speakership.

I confess I have to express some regret that with the next election probably not more than a year away, no formal steps seem to have been taken to make sure that the present incumbent will be in the chair when we come back after the next election. I still hope that some way may be found to make this possible, and in particular I would hope that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the leader of this House, would meet for discussions with the leaders of the other parties to see if something cannot be done to achieve this desirable end.

Sir, with respect to the bill itself I should like to say that I have given the matter a good deal of thought and I have discussed it with a good many people. I have no hesitation in saying that I think the provisions that are spelled out in my bill meet the various problems and that my bill represents the best solution of this matter that has yet been put forward. At the same time, I want to say that my concern is not with the details that I have put into this bill but with the principle. It will not offend me at all if persons speaking on this bill find details in it that they think should and could be improved. Indeed, I would welcome any other device that might be brought forward as a means of achieving the purpose. However, I hope that if anyone is going to propose another device or another bill it will be something that is better than this one, something that copes with the problems that in my bill I have endeavoured to resolve.

Having said that may I, just for the purposes of the Hansard record, indicate the way my bill would provide for a continuing Speakership. The bill is entitled, "An act respecting the designation of the Speaker of the House of Commons as the member for the electoral district of Parliament Hill." It would provide that when a Member of Parliament has been elected in the normal way and has subsequently been elected to the chair by the House of Commons—the way we have done it for over 100 years as spelled out in the British North America Act—that that incumbent once he had two full sessions in the chair could, by a resolution of the House of Commons, be designated as the member for Parliament Hill.

May I make the point that that is an optional provision; the House would not have to do it. It would be free to do it if it was satisfied, as we are in this Parliament, with the job being done by the person in the chair. But in any case, the resolution to declare an incumbent of the chair the hon. member for the electoral district of Parliament Hill could be made only in the case of a member who had been in the chair for two full sessions. The present occupant has many more sessions than that. If this bill were to become law, of course it could be applied immediately in this case.

The step that would immediately follow from the designation of Mr. Speaker as the member for the electoral district of Parliament Hill would be that the constituency that had elected him at the previous election would be declared vacant and a by-election would be called there in the normal way. This is achieved in my bill by having, in addition to the amendments it makes to the British North America Act, the amendment that it makes to the Canada Elections Act. Thus, a vacancy having been declared in the constituency from which His Honour the Speaker had come, that constituency could hold a by-election and elect another member who would be a voice for that constituency on the floor of the House of Commons.

My bill expressly provides that in that circumstance Mr. Speaker, as the member for the electoral district of Parliament Hill, is a full member of the House of Commons in every other way. Indeed, it provides that the number of members of the House of Commons would be one more than is normally the case. In other words, if this bill were made law and came into effect at the present time, a new member would be elected for Stormont-Dundas and there would be a total of 265 seats in the House of Commons.

This bill goes on to provide that at the time of dissolution Mr. Speaker, who even under the present law continues in his office as the person in charge of staff and other arrangements in the House of Commons, would continue to be the member for the electoral district of Parliament Hill. He would not have to run anywhere to continue to hold that membership. He would be that member until the day the next Parliament, following an intervening election, meets as required by law to elect its Speaker. At that point my bill provides that he would be an eligible candidate for the Speakership of that new Parliament.

I trust it is clear from the way I put it that it would not be automatic; he would not be forced upon the succeeding Parliament. Presumably he would know and everyone else would know from what had happened in the previous Parliament whether it was likely he would be wanted. That being the case, the incumbent of the chair could carry on. He would be free, if he did not want to exercise that right, to run in a normal constituency and revert to the more normal role of us ordinary mortals who make up this chamber.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, while there are arguments about whether Mr. Speaker throughout his time in the chair should be a member in the sense that the rest of us are, having connections with a constituency, the argument comes down on the side of the proposition that the Speaker should in the first place be an ordinary Member of Parliament, should know what it is to run and get elected, perhaps run and get defeated and all the rest. But I think there comes a time when the incumbent of the chair has done such a good job, as is the case with the present incumbent, that it means more to Parliament as a whole to have him continue in that role than to put him in the position of having to go back and run in a partisan contest at a succeeding election.

I said earlier, and perhaps I may be permitted to repeat it, that the time when one considers this sort of thing, the time when it is most desirable to consider it, is when one has a person in the chair concerning whom there is a unanimous feeling of support and respect. You do not get a continuing Speaker—and you note that I prefer that word to the word "permanent", a bit of semantics I suppose but I cannot see anyone being a permanent fixture although I can see a continuing operation—by just deciding to one day go out and pick up a university professor or a worn-out politician, or a brand new one either, and put him in the chair. He might succeed or fail, no matter what his recommendations may have been.

You get a satisfactory continuing Speakership by seizing the moment when you have someone in the chair who is doing the job, who has proven his capacity, and saying that now is the time to continue this relationship. That is why I think there is a fair amount of discussion about the matter at the present time and I hope the discussion this afternoon will indicate that there is support for finding a way of putting this idea into practice before the next election.

As I have already said, I think my bill meets the various problems and meets them well. However, I do not have the kind of pride of authorship that would make me offended if changes in the details are proposed. I hope there will be some discussion, and I hope it will be favourable, of the general principle of finding a way to provide for the Canadian House of Commons a continuing Speakership and I hope we can find a way to keep in the chair the illustrious occupant we have at the present time.

May I conclude my remarks by simply pointing out that there are four things in particular that I believe are problems related to this whole question, all four of them being problems that my bill solves. In the first place, to become a continuing Speaker one cannot be just a choice that was picked out somewhere; he has to have been a Member of Parliament elected in the first place in the ordinary way. My bill so provides.

In the second place a Speaker, once elected to the chair, does not automatically become a continuing Speaker; he has to prove himself through at least two sessions. This is called for in my bill.

In the third place, although my bill makes provision for a continuing situation it does not deny the right of each succeeding Parliament to make its choice. The good Speaker of one Parliament is there for the next Parliament to choose, but that new Parliament does not have to take him unless it, too, is satisfied.

My final point is that my bill makes it possible for a constituency that has done so well by electing a person who can fill the chair also to be a constituency that would have the right, in two years or so, to choose a member who would speak for it on the floor. This is achieved by the vacancy that is declared and the by-election that is to be held, as set out in Bill C-52.

I present the bill and its various points believing it is a matter that is of interest not only to members but to all Canadians who are concerned with the good image and the good functioning of Parliament, and I hope the debate on the bill this afternoon will be in that vein.

[Translation]

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question to the hon. member?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes.

Mr. Béchard: Under Bill C-52 introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre regarding the designation of a permanent Speaker, an hon. member must have acted in that capacity for at least two sessions. What would happen should the occupant of that office die or resign? Should the same procedure be started over? I do not see at all the permanency that can exist in such a case.

[English]

Must we have a member sitting as the Speaker for two years before he can be appointed permanent Speaker?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): There is a probationary period.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): First of all, may I revert to my reference to semantics and say that I do not like the word "permanent". I prefer "continuing". Perhaps the difference is not as meaningful to my hon. friend as it is to me.

• (3:50 p.m.)

The second point is that we have that situation now. Somebody excellent occupies the chair. A Parliament lasts for two, three or four years. Parliament is dissolved and the Speaker is out, so to speak, and we must go through the process of electing another Speaker. I think that giving ourselves the right to arrange for the Speaker to continue from Parliament to Parliament makes good sense, both for the Speaker and for ourselves. There must be what my parliamentary secretary to my right calls a probationary period in which we make sure that the person we have chosen is as good as we thought he would be.

Mr. Hogarth: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question. My question relates to the second Parliament in which Mr. Speaker might serve. Let us suppose the first Parliament lasts for two sessions, Mr. Speaker is confirmed and then Parliament is dissolved and a new Parliament is formed. If he is not elected in that second Parliament he will be without a seat.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is right, and that is a query a number of people have put to me. My answer to them is this. At the end of a Parliament or when Parliament has reached the point of dissolution, surely the members of that Parliament, the leaders of the parties and Mr. Speaker will know whether he is the sort of man who will be wanted for the next Parliament. If the relationship has not been good, he will know it and make other plans. Otherwise, he gambles. He does not run. He is the member for Parliament Hill, and even though there might be a change and somebody else might be chosen, even from his point of view it will be worth taking the gamble to maintain his independence.

An hon. Member: But he cannot run.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I do not think you should impose upon the new Parliament a choice that it has the right to make.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I suppose it might be considered an impropriety for me to speak here, since I held the position of Speaker of this House. I would approach this question with, shall we say, equanimity and impartiality.

An hon. Member: You lost the job.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member was not given the full probationary period.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): May I say right from the start that I am unequivocally opposed to the idea of this bill. Let me make that clear from the beginning. I realize what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is trying to achieve, yet somehow there is a fatal flaw in the whole idea. First, although I should like to read copiously from a certain book I hold I shall content myself with reading part of what is printed inside the dust-jacket. It ought to be on the record, and reads as follows:

> The Speaker is the representative of an institution which is a mocrocosm of the British nation and his prestige is immense. As the historic guardian of its privileges and its spokesman in its relations with the Crown, the House of Lords and authorities and persons outside Parliament, he is approached with ceremony and deference. His is a high and lonely office, above sectional interests and immune from party influences, and an extremely onerous one. He presides over debates, maintains discipline, interprets Standing Orders and gives rulings, and in addition has many administrative duties.
> The idea of an impartial Speaker is a modern one.

That is the point I want to emphasize.

> From the end of the fourteenth century, when the Speaker's name first appeared in records, he was for more than 250 years the King's man and as such liable to sudden rises to power and even quicker, sometimes fatal, falls.

If I may interpose, seven of them lost their heads.

After the Civil War the office became the perquisite of the government of the day and things began to improve, though of one Speaker it could still be said that 'nothing can exceed the badness of his character even in this bad age'. Great Speakers stalk the pages: Onslow, who served for a record thirty-three years in the eighteenth century and who is largely responsible for the modern concept of the Speaker; and Peel who, with his austere personality and splendid figure, dominated the House like a great actor and whose very presence was sufficient to quell disorder. Less happily, there was Speaker Gully who, in one of the House's worst moments, called in the police in 1901 to remove some recalcitrant Irish members.

There have been included in the Hansard of Westminster, in the Hansard of this House, in the Australian Hansard and the New Zealand Hansard very fine passages about the duties and responsibilities of the Chair. I have a quote from one of the recent Speakers of the New Zealand House on this point. It is noteworthy, however, that most of those speeches were made by members who did not occupy the chair. One ought to know that such paragons of virtue are exceedingly rare. One of the best descriptions of the duties, responsibilities and qualities of the Speaker is to be found in the Hansard record of this House for the year 1935. It is recorded in an exchange that took place between the Leader of the Opposition, Mr. Bennett, and the returning Prime Minister, Mr. King, during the only really contested election for the office of Speaker. The contest had arisen as the result of some action taken rather precipitously by the Speaker-designate.

I hope the House will forgive me if some of my views are subjective. May I say that Mr. Speaker derives his authority and the respect of the members of this House from essentially being one of them. To my mind he is the first among peers, and to be first among peers he must be one of the peers; he must be one of the members of the House. I have always believed that.

There have been motions and bills presented in the British House and elsewhere supporting the idea that has been advanced, with some variations, by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. In Britain they wanted to call the Speaker the hon. member for St. Stephen's Hall. However, as soon as a member is elected to a position in which he is not one of the members of the House he becomes a super-official and is not one of the members. To my mind that is a fatal flaw. Even though the Speaker may represent a pseudo constituency, that is only a thin camouflage. Saying that he is elected to represent the constituency of Parliament Hill only thinly camouflages what he is.

One quality that we want of a Speaker is that he shall be scrupulously impartial. To be scrupulously impartial he must be independent—independent of government and independent of the opposition. This independence is fairly apparent in many ways in the United Kingdom where the custom has grown up that changes in government do not bring changes in the Speaker's office unless the Speaker has conducted himself in a completely unacceptable manner; otherwise he is expected to continue in office.

I recall what happened when the Labour government came to power in 1945. There is a famous story about the then Speaker. He was at King's Cross railway station, on his way home, and met Mr. Ernest Bevin, a minister in the Labour government. Mr. Bevin asked the Speaker, "Where are you going?" The Speaker replied, "I am going home to my constituency." "And what are you going to do there?" Mr. Bevin asked. The Speaker said, "Well, I am no longer wanted; isn't that so?" Mr. Bevin, who was a senior member of the then new Labour government, said, "Of course not. Don't be silly. Go back to your office; that is where you belong." I have paraphrased the story.

A little over a year ago I had the pleasure of seeing the only Labour Speaker of the House of Commons elected under a Conservative government. At that time there was no question that there would be any change. There has now been a change. The Speaker was nominated from government ranks only because Dr. King, the former Speaker, resigned for reasons of health. There is only one minor flaw in the British House. For the past year or two it has been said that at the end of a Speaker's term it is automatic that he shall be given a peerage. However, there is also the determination of his pension. What shall be the quantum of his pension? There has been a natural inclination to be rather pleasant to all members so that Mr. Speaker's pension will go through without any difficulty. I suggest it is a human failing, but that has been a trait.

Let us follow the procedures suggested by Bill C-252. An hon. member elected as Speaker of this House has, shall we say, a probationary period of two years. He must then wait and see whether the shoe fits. Will there be a resolution on the order paper proposing him as the hon. member for Parliament Hill? What will assure him of that? The bill is silent. Whose resolution will it be? Will it be that Mr. Speaker is appointed by government resolution? Mr. Speaker is the presiding officer of this House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): So it cannot be a government resolution.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): How does a resolution get on the order paper to guarantee debate and that it will be taken up? Does it have precedence at the time of an election? Parliament will have met but the new session will not have started. There are some procedural difficulties. Will the resolution come after informal discussions through normal channels between the opposition and the government? This is a point. Human nature being what it is, there is a very grave danger that we will see in that section some equivocal acts in the mind of the occupant of the chair to guarantee that resolution appearing on the order paper next year.

During the first two years, is Mr. Speaker going to be independent of government? He may incur the wrath of the government or even the wrath of the opposition. He may incur the wrath of the government by a tough decision which is right. In recent years we have seen some reactions from government as the result of decisions by the Chair. Displeasure has been expressed in no uncertain terms. As a result, the House will suffer. I am concerned about the effect on the House and the protection of members on both sides, the protection of members one against the other, the private member from the government and the government from the opposition.

It is quite a job to protect the rights of this House. Mr. Speaker must not merely act as a referee and let the players slug one another as long as they do so above the belt. That is not the position of Mr. Speaker: he is much more than that. He must protect one member from another on both sides of the House. I wish to read what was said by Mr. Speaker Algie of the New Zealand House:

> Since I have been in this House, I have listened with pleasure to a very great number of extremely able debaters and I have noted that the best of them are brief, terse, concise, relevant, and constructive. I have noted also that in their best moments they have been supremely polite, courteous, and free from personalities. That is the standard, honourable members, that we would like to attain and which the public would like us to reach.

I subscribe to that view. In order to achieve it, Mr. Speaker must take that attitude toward hon. members. By qualifying through a probationary period, Mr. Speaker's position might be very difficult. I come to a very practical problem, namely, the decision of an hon. member to accept an invitation to become Mr. Speaker. It has always been difficult. I assure hon. members that I wrestled with the problem. For a younger man it means a political derailment. Once Mr. Speaker takes the first step to the chair he must put aside partisan politics. There is no caucus, no special friends in any caucus and no political meetings. He becomes like Caesar's wife; there cannot be a finger of reproach pointed at him in this regard. This affects a person. Having occupied the chair I can assure hon. members that it still affects me in many ways.

Where does a man relatively young in service go from the chair unless there is to be a continuation? Is it going to be from the chair to the other place? That has been the record of a number of Speakers in this House, men of senior years. Is it going to be as some, myself included, who because of circumstances went from the chair into the cabinet? There is nothing wrong with that. I have seen the reverse, from the cabinet into the chair. The Speaker of the British House is a former cabinet minister. Former Speakers of this House have been chief whips of the government party.

What is to be the Speaker's career after the chair? One of the most serious deficiencies is that nothing is provided at the end of the road for Mr. Speaker. The pension scheme was thin; it is even thinner now. I think what we do is scandalous. Mr. Speaker as to abandon his private career. Being Speaker is a 150 per cent job. If Mr. Speaker is a young man he must consider his family, the future of his wife and himself. These are all factors to be considered.

But under this bill an hon. member who accepted the invitation to go into the chair would pass the probationary period, be elected by resolution, named to be the member for Parliament Hill and his constituency would disappear as far as he was concerned because his constituency would be represented by another member. We then have a general election. He is the representative for Parliament Hill. He does not go through a general election. There is a change of government, and where is he? There is no guarantee that he is going to continue, and he is out of the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): His guarantee is the decency of Parliament.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): He is out of the House when he has taken the step that all hon. members have taken. They have made a conscious decision in many instances to give up business or professional careers. They have dedicated themselves to becoming Members of Parliament on behalf of their constituents, to a career in Parliament, that is, a career in public life. Again, the Speaker does not know. How is he to know he is going to carry on? There is a new administration. Remember, if this bill becomes law there is no alternative open to him, no certainty that a new administration would come along and accept Mr. Speaker. I much prefer the British system which we have seen put into practice following the last election, the steps which were taken at that time, albeit tentative.

It seems to me that now Parliament is a year-round proposition and has been for some years, and we have taken this tentative step, if Mr. Speaker indicates he wishes to continue as a member of a constituency he is not officially opposed and he does not contest the election. And let me tell you that the status of Mr. Speaker in his constituency during election time is very high. Other people can campaign on his behalf. It seems to me this does not put him at a disadvantage as far as the election is concerned.

So on a number of grounds I cannot endorse the proposal before us. First, I find that the last part of the probationary period would be very difficult for Mr. Speaker and I think deleterious to the interests of this House. I wish to be perfectly objective here without considering the personality of any man who has been in the chair.

Second, when we see a change in administration or even if there were a continuance of the same administration, what guarantee is there that the man who is in the position of the member for Parliament Hill, the outgoing Speaker, will be asked by the new administration to resume the chair? Suppose he has been called upon to make some very hard decisions—and sometimes they are very hard, decisions which incurred the wrath of the leader of the government party? That has happened and it will happen again in the future. It seems to me that by developing a system where by if Mr. Speaker has been conducting his office to the best of his ability and if, by reason of health and so forth, he is willing to continue, and if we also make sure in due course, as a major reform to come, that there is a proper pension available for him, we shall achieve what we want to achieve by way of an independent, continuing Speaker.

Mr. D. Gordon Blair (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I think all hon. members have had the benefits of listening to a good discussion by two of the most experienced members of this House. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has not sought to retreat from the difficulties of the proposal he is advancing. His solutions to some of those difficulties are ingenious. On the other hand, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has not only portrayed for us the intrinsic difficulties of this proposal but has made specific comments critical of the solutions proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

I begin my remarks by suggesting that we are discussing something which is highly important to the work of this chamber and to parliamentary government in this country. It seems to me that this is the kind of proposal which should be referred to a committee in order that it may be studied further. I am surprised that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has suggested it should go to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs rather than to the distinguished committee of which we both are members. But I attribute this to his well known modesty.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Perhaps the hon. member would permit me to point out that the decision as to the committee to which a bill is referred after second reading is made not by the member concerned but by the Chair and the officers at the table.

Mr. Blair: In this debate today, above all others, one should not say anything which could be considered as the least critical of the decision of the Chair and the officers of the House.

All hon. members are aware that we have made many important and constructive changes affecting the office of the Speakership even in the brief time during which I and others who first came here in 1968 have been in the House. To begin with, an important tradition has been supplanted. Formerly it was a tradition of Parliament that, after an election, a new Speaker should be chosen. I understand that it was also a tradition that the Speakership should alternate between a person whose mother tongue was English and a person whose mother tongue was French. But if I am not mistaken, it was determined for the first time before the election of 1968 that it would be advantageous to ask Mr. Speaker to continue in office. Arrangements were made between the parties during the election of 1968 which permitted Mr. Speaker to continue in office unembarrassed by a major political contest.

Other changes have been made which have increased the independence and the role of Mr. Speaker. Perhaps the most significant was the change in the rules which prohibited appeals from the Speaker's rulings. We know that the terms of Standing Order 26—a great favourite of hon. members opposite—having to do with emergency debate have also been revised so as to place much greater discretion in the hands of Mr. Speaker when determining which debates shall be allowed and the manner in which those decisions should be reached. One could mention other important changes which have been made in the rules conferring greater discretion on Mr. Speaker—for example, those dealing with the question period.

As we approach this debate we must realize that the force of recent opinion in this Parliament and, I suggest, also in the country has been in favour of creating a situation where the independence of the Speakership can be assured. This is the occasion that gave rise to the present debate and I think we are all equally concerned to find the best method of achieving this independence in the future.

I believe that the rules of this House, if not the rules of good manners, prevent me from saying anything more than the hon. members for Winnipeg North Centre and Edmonton West have said about the present Speaker, but perhaps I might just say this. His distinction in his office is an added reason why all members of the House are now seeking and striving to find a way of ensuring the continuity of an independent Speakership of excellence and great quality. We must realize that, more than any other member of the House, the Speaker faces certain problems of membership. He is detached from many of the concerns of ordinary life. Under present circumstances, where Parliament sits for many months of the year, the Speakership itself is more than a year-round office.

In addition to this, in his office as Speaker he is deprived of any of the usual political arrangements that maintain contact in his constituency. At each election he faces the problem of determining how to go to the people and seek reaffirmation of his mandate when, by the very nature of his office, he is prevented during his term from participating in any of the usual activities associated with membership of this House.

If I might be permitted a personal observation, it has been my privilege as a member of this House to represent a constituency which lies beside that of Mr. Speaker. In addition, my provincial colleague during most of my term has been Speaker of the Ontario House. I am well aware of the feeling—which is not entirely justified, I must say—on the part of the people in the constituencies that a person who is Speaker is not representative of his constituents in the same sense as an ordinary member. I say that this feeling is not entirely justified because I have been able to observe rather closely how well the respective Speakers of this House and of the Ontario House have represented their constituents. But none the less the feeling persists and it is one which in a democratic society has to be recognized.

Coming more directly to the motion before us, we are all well aware of the history and traditions of the British Speakership. At least, we are well aware of them in general, though I think there is a certain mythology which attaches to the Speakership at Westminster. There are a great number of people in this country who believe there is a permanent Speakership at Westminster. People believe that there is a seat that is set aside for the Speaker. We know that this is not so. In fact, the independence of the Speakership at Westminster is the product of a long history, some of which might be regarded as fortuitous.

It happens that no Speaker since, I think, the year 1710 has been defeated in an election at Westminster. It also happens that for more than 180 years there has never been a contest in the House of Commons at Westminster over the election of a Speaker. As I understand it, this has been removed from all types of partisan consideration. In each election in the United Kingdom the Speaker stands as a candidate in his constituency and a determination has to be made by all political parties whether or not there will be a contest or whether there will be an acclamation. In the early years of this century, perhaps for almost 50 years, Speakers were acclaimed, but I believe the practice which has prevailed since 1945 is that British Speakers have gone through contested elections.

It is said, and I think not without reason, that the situation that prevails in the United Kingdom is rather different from that which prevails in this country. There the territory is smaller, the opportunity of people who may be represented by the Speaker to have access to other Members of Parliament is much more apparent than it might be here. This is the reason for the added weight given to the arguments in this country for the creation of what might be called a fictitious constituency which Mr. Speaker might represent.

This matter, as hon. members I am sure know, has been studied in a number of different areas. The British Parliament in 1939 had a very select committee consider this problem, the members of which included Winston Churchill, David Lloyd George and other parliamentarians of great reputation. They concluded in their report that it was an artificial solution to create a fictitious constituency for the Speaker. This conclusion appears to have been reinforced by a short debate that occurred in the United Kingdom Parliament on April 24, 1963.

In our own Parliament, as all hon. members are aware, extensive consideration was given to procedural matters prior to the election of 1968 and a great deal of work was done by our predecessors and by various people who contributed to their deliberations. Professor Denis Smith of Trent University filed a report entitled, "The Speakership of the Canadian House of Commons: Some Proposals", published as an appendix to Votes and Proceedings for June 2, 1965. There we find in a full blown way—unhappily, I cannot refer to the report except briefly—the argument for the creation of a permanent Speakership in which the Speaker would represent an artificial constituency, perhaps called the constituency of Parliament Hill.

Another important academic contribution was made by Professor J. H. Aitchison, who gave extensive attention to the office of Speaker and whose findings were published and reported, among other places, in the Ottawa Citizen for April 19, 1963. His conclusions are roughly the same as those of Professor Smith and both of their studies are entitled, I think, to great weight in any consideration that we give to this question.

On the other hand, I might mention the views of two distinguished parliamentarians of our generation which are to the opposite effect. The right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), speaking in this House on May 20, 1965, as reported at page 1517 of Hansard, declared himself firmly against this idea. He said:

• (4:30 p.m.)

> I do not believe in the principle that a constituency should be set up for the purpose of providing a Speaker. He would then cease to be the first Commoner that he is, because he would be there by choice and not election.

To the same effect are the words spoken by the then Prime Minister, Right Hon. L. B. Pearson, on May 19, 1965, as reported at page 1483 of Hansard as follows:

> This possibility has its attractions, but it seems to me that it also has its disadvantages, and I am not sure that it would achieve the objective it was desired to achieve in putting it into effect. This device would certainly transform the Speaker from being an equal with his fellow members over whose deliberations he presides into—I say this in no derogatory sense—some type of parliamentary functionary, and I suggest that the change might even reduce the prestige of your office.

Finally, I should like to refer to the important words spoken by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) at the time of the election of Mr. Speaker on September 12, 1968, as reported at page 3 of Hansard of that day. The Leader of the Opposition said:

> The appointment of a permanent Speaker remains one of the necessary objectives of parliamentary procedure and parliamentary improvement. I hope we can all agree upon the urgency of taking action in this regard . . . is urgent in that respect as well as for the regulation of parliamentary procedure that early consideration be given to alternative methods of removing the election of the Speaker from partisan considerations.

We face a difficult problem. The best method of providing continuity of the independent Speakership of this House is one which we should earnestly seek and search for. We should also seek a method which would guarantee to the person who holds the onerous responsibility of our Speaker the greatest measure of security and independence. For this reason I urge all hon. members to support this motion so that it may be more fully considered in committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired.

At 4.35 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

AMCHITKA NUCLEAR TEST—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 and because of a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, the imminence of the nuclear bomb test at Amchitka, I seek the permission of the House to move the following motion, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett):

That this House express its best wishes to the Greenpeace Two, hopes that it and the crew thereof have a safe journey and that the mission upon which the Greenpeace Two is embarked is successful to the end that President Nixon, in the interest of mankind and for humanity's sake will cancel the proposed nuclear bomb test at Amchitka Island.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The motion proposed by the hon. member for Skeena requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous agreement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the motion cannot be put.

DEPARTMENT OF REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION GRANTS

Question No. 1,277—Mr. Rondeau:

1. Since its inception, has the Department of Regional Economic Expansion made any grants for tourism or para-industrial projects and, if so, on what criteria are such grants made?

2. For each grant made (a) what was the amount (b) what were the names of the recipients?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): 1 and 2. The Department of Regional Economic Expansion has not made any grants for tourism or para-industrial projects. However, during 1970-71, contributions were made to provincial governments for Tourism and Recreation, under agreements listed below. Reimbursements to cover Canada Land Inventory and other research costs are not included.

PUBLICIZING OF OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM

Question No. 1,495—Mr. St. Pierre:

1. How many persons on the staff of Information Canada were assigned to the distribution of announcements of the Opportunities for Youth Program?

2. Was any agency other than an agnecy in the government service employed for publicizing the announcement of this program and, if so, (a) what agency (b) at what fee (c) for what reason?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by Information Canada and the Department of the Secretary of State as follows: 1. Three members of the staff of Information Canada assisted with the initial distribution of the announcements.

2. Yes. (a) A firm of public relations consultants, Carleton-Cowan Public Relations, was hired for advisory services by the Department of the Secretary of State in connection with the announcement of the Summer '71 student employment and activities programs, which included the Opportunities for Youth Program. (b) A total of $1,155 was paid to Carleton-Cowan Public Relations to publicize the announcement of the Summer '71 programs. (c) In light of the considerable interest which would be generated by the new programs, additional resources to the existing information services in the Department of the Secretary of State were required to cope with the information and publicity needs of these programs on an urgent basis.

WRITS OF ASSISTANCE (CUSTOMS ACT)

Question No. 1,708—Mr. Howard (Skeena):

Since January 1, 1971 have any writs of assistance been issued pursuant to the Customs Act and, if so (a) how many such writs have been issued (b) what is the name and office held by each person to whom a writ was issued (c) on what dates whas each such writ issued?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): (a) Eight. (b) Corporal L. R. McKergow, RCMP, Federal Law Enforcement (Ontario); Constable A. C. Moores, RCMP, Federal Law Enforcement (Ontario); Constable J. L. R. LaPerriere, RCMP, Federal Law Enforcement (Ontario); Corporal J. G. L. Boivin, RCMP, Federal Law Enforcement (Quebec); Constable J. J. G. Bouffard, RCMP, Federal Law Enforcement (Quebec); Constable J. L. G. Dionne, RCMP, Federal Law Enforcement (Quebec); Constable P. M. Laxson, RCMP, Federal Law Enforcement (Quebec); Constable A. R. Lockwood, RCMP, Federal Law Enforcement (Quebec). (c) All eight writs of assistance were issued on May 25, 1971.

IMPOSITION OF TARIFF TO PROTECT CANADIAN APPLE INDUSTRY

Question No. 1,710—Mr. Fairweather:

Does the government intend to protect the Canadian apple industry by the imposition of a tariff equal to the tariff imposed by the United States on the importation of Canadian apples?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): No. Although the Government is studying a full range of possible measures which might be adopted to mitigate the effects of the U.S. economic measures on the Canadian economy once their impact is clearly defined, it does not plan to retaliate against the effects of the U.S. surtax on Canadian exports. Recent reports suggest that the United States will implement the last of its Kennedy Round cuts on January 1, 1972; Canadian fresh apples would then enter the U.S. duty free. The U.S. surtax would not then apply to U.S. imports of fresh apples.

QUEEN'S HONOURS

Question No. 1,796—Mr. Coates:

Are all honours awarded by the Queen to outstanding Canadians made on the basis of recommendations from the government and, if not, are awards granted on Her recommendation?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): The Government of Canada does not recommend to Her Majesty the Queen the award of British honours to Canadian citizens. The Order of Canada provides for the recognition of outstanding achievement and merit of high degree. Canadians are eligible, however, to receive certain classes of honours which are bestowed by the Queen on the recommendation of the United Kingdom Government and with the prior consent of the Government of Canada, e.g. for meritorious service as an employee of a British Government agency in Canada. Certain categories of honours, e.g. the Order of Merit, are the personal gift of the Queen alone and are not subject to recommendation.

OPERATIONS PERFORMED AT WHITEHORSE GENERAL HOSPITAL

Question No. 1,800—Mr. Nielsen:

1. How many hysterectomies or other similar operations having as their result the sterilization of female patients have been performed at the Whitehorse General Hospital over the past two years?

2. Of such operations, how many have been performed on Indian patients and how many have been performed on white patients?

3. In each such case where such operations were performed, was a form of consent signed by the patient and obtained from such patient before such operation?

4. If such consent signed by such patient was not obtained, what other authority, if any, was obtained for the performance of such operation?

5. In the case of each operation, what was the name of the doctor performing the operation?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. One hundred and forty. NOTE: Hysterectomies, although they result in sterilization, are usually performed in the course of treatment of benign and malignant tumours and other pathological or functional disorders affecting health.

2. Twenty seven Indians; 123 others.

3. Yes.

4. See question 3.

5. It is not in the public interest to give such information without consent of the doctors.

PUBLIC SERVICE—POSITION OF CUSTOMS AND EXCISE OFFICER, CHARLOTTETOWN, P.E.I.

Question No. 1,820—Mr. MacLean:

1. Did the Public Service Commission advertise in July, 1971 for the position of Customs and Excise Officer located in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island?

2. What are the duties of this position which require proficiency in both official languages?

3. What percentage of the population of Prince Edward Island is not proficient in both official languages and was thus disqualified from this position?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Public Service Commission as follows: 1. Yes.

2. "Under general supervision, applies the provisions of Customs and Excise laws and regulations for the prevention of smuggling and other evasions and the collection of revenue; enters and accepts reports covering vessels and aircraft arriving from abroad; examines the baggage of passengers and crew; provides for the return of articles exported in the company of residents visiting abroad; composes reports and correspondence and performs other related duties".

3. 92.5 per cent according to the 1961 Census. The justification in requiring the incumbent of the position to be bilingual was, however, to provide service in both official languages to the travelling public as required by the Official Languages Act.

PERCENTAGE OF ATTRIBUTABLE COSTS OF MAILINGS PAID FOR BY USERS

Question No. 1,833—Mr. Robinson:

What percentage of attributable costs of (a) bulk mailings (b) first class mailings (c) second class mailings (d) air mailings, is paid for by the users?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): (a) Bulk mailings are included in the class which applies to the items conveyed; (b) 97 per cent; (c) 38 per cent; (d) air mailings are included in the class which applies to the items conveyed.

SUMMER EMPLOYMENT—APPLICATION BY MR. IAN HAYES, VANCOUVER

Question No. 1,836—Mr. Nesbitt:

1. Was an application for summer employment by Mr. Ian Hayes of Vancouver made to the Public Service Commission on or about March 15, 1971?

2. In response to this application, was any reply ever sent to Mr. Hayes by the Public Service Commission and, if so, on what date was the reply sent?

3. What was the purport of the reply?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Public Service Commission as follows: 1. Yes.

2. Yes. June 1971.

3. He was advised that it appeared unlikely that he would be offered employment.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE—LEGAL SECTION

Question No. 1,840—Mr. Fortin:

1. How many people work in the Legal Section of the Department of Justice and of them, how many are legal officers and what are their names?

2. Which ones have (a) civil law training (b) common law training?

3. How many are (a) bilingual (b) unilingual (French) (c) unilingual (English)?

4. Is legislation drafted simultaneously in both languages or is the French version a translation of the English?

5. What action is being taken to ensure that legislation respects both legal systems?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): 1. In the Legislation Section there are 30 persons employed, exclusive of the jurimetrics division and other services attached to the Section. There are 13 legal officers whose names are: Beseau, P. Boileau, P. Dawson, Mrs. M. du Plessis, R. Geoffrion, R. L. J. Gibson, F. E. Juteau, G. Lindsay, R. F. MacDonald, Miss E. I. Pepper, M. H. Popp, A. H. E. Shepard, M. Ryan, J. W.

2. Messrs. Boileau, du Plessis, Geoffrion and Juteau and Mrs. Dawson have civil law training; Messrs. Beseau, Gibson, Lindsay, Pepper, Popp, Shepard and Ryan and Miss MacDonald have common law training. Mrs. Dawson is trained also in common law.

3. (a) Five, (b) nil, (c) eight.

4. First drafts are prepared in the Legislation Section in the language in which the instructions are given by the Department primarily concerned with the sponsorship of the legislation. A translation of the first draft is then prepared, which is then sent to officers in the section working in the other language or legal discipline. Subsequent drafts are adapted to both the requirements of the two legal disciplines and two official languages. The draft printed bill is then prepared concurrently in the two language versions. Because of the method used, the French version of a bill is not, nor is it intended to be, a translation of the English version or vice versa.

Questions

REDUCTION IN TAX ON TELEVISION SETS

Question No. 1,890—Mr. Robinson:

Will the government ensure that the 15% reduction in tax making for a like reduction in the price of TV sets is passed on to the consumer?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): The government does not have a system of price controls. Vendors of television sets announced price reductions immediately following the announcement of the tax removal.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION—ALLEGATIONS RELATIVE TO CARTIER REFINERIES INCORPORATED

Question No. 1,929—Mr. Macdonald (Egmont):

Has the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs issued any directive to the Combines Investigation Branch that would serve to either hastne or postpone completion of investigations relative to allegations made by Robin Austin and John Featherstonhaugh, Q.C., in relation to Cartier Refineries Incorporated?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): No.

ANNUAL PENSIONS TO WIDOWS OF FEDERALLY APPOINTED JUDGES

Question No. 1,944—Mr. Kaplan:

How many widows of federally appointed judges are currently receiving annual pensions in respect of their spouses' office of less than (a) $2,000 (b) $3,000?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): (a) nine; (b) 47 for a total of 56.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVES ACT—APPLICATIONS FOR ASSISTANCE

Question No. 1,701—Mr. McQuaid:

1. Since the coming into effect of the Regional Development Incentives Act, how many applications for assistance from each of the Provinces of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick were (a) received (b) accepted (c) declined (d) allowed to lapse after approval?

2. What were (a) the applications accepted from the Province of Prince Edward Island (b) the estimated capital cost of each approved project (c) the type of industry benefited (d) the rate of offer (e) the estimated additional employment to be provided in each case?

3. Of the applications accepted from Prince Edward Island, how many projects have actually commenced?

4. What is the total amount paid to date for each of the approved applications from Prince Edward Island?

Return tabled.

INDUSTRY

SUBMISSION OF INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT STRATEGY TO FINANCE MINISTERS' MEETING—APPROPRIATENESS OF PROPOSED CORPORATE TAXATION CHANGES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the urgency expressed a few weeks ago in the interim report of the Science Council with regard to the development of an industrial strategy and the importance that the council placed upon co-ordination, the government of Canada is placing any proposals with regard to a co-ordinated industrial development strategy before the Ministers of Finance from the provinces who are meeting with the federal minister in Ottawa?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe such a detailed strategy will be proposed to the Ministers of Finance. The House knows that we appointed a Minister of State for Science and Technology some time ago, and one of his priorities is, indeed, to arrive at some policy formation in this area.

• (2:10 p.m.)

Mr. Stanfield: I am sure the Prime Minister has had an opportunity to study the report. In view of the urgency stressed in it, has the Prime Minister ordered any study of this report and, in particular, has he ordered any study of the tax legislation now before the House in order to determine whether those parts of it that particularly relate to proposals for changes in corporate taxation are relevant to an industrial development strategy under present conditions in this country?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, this is only one of many reports that have dealt with the subject, both external and internal reports. The House knows that the government has taken various measures to encourage science and technology and the industrial application of science both in our internal operations and through negotiating agreements with other countries, to wit, the recent agreement with the Soviet Union to have exchanges on the industrial application of science. The government has been moving in these fields. We are continuing to determine if there are other ways in which we can continue this movement.

Mr. Stanfield: I asked the Prime Minister whether he had ordered any examination of the appropriateness of the tax reform bill now before the House with regard to an industrial development strategy. Will the Prime Minister consider asking the Minister of Finance, now that the minister is continuing to introduce amendments to the tax bill, to bring in one very far reaching amendment, namely, to drop all of the bill other than those parts concerning personal income tax exemptions and related matters?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, this type of consideration was in our mind when we drew up the taxation reform bill and when we brought in some of the amendments. The Leader of the Opposition will have an occasion to explain his point of view when that part of the bill is reached and discussed in the House. I am saying at this time that we are not proposing to bring in any further amendments.

[Later:]

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I have a supplementary for the Prime Minister following the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition. Is it the intention of the government to have the Minister of State for Science and Technology make a report to the cabinet for study and consideration of action thereon by the government in the same way as the government had the Minister of National Revenue study the question of foreign investment in Canada and report to the cabinet? If that is to be the case, does the government intend to completely ignore the scientific report, as it ignored the report made by the Minister of National Revenue?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's question is not asked in a way that would make it acceptable procedurally.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

POSSIBLE LEGISLATION RESPECTING RIGHT OF ACCUSED TO COUNSEL, LENGTHY DETENTION IN JAIL BEFORE TRIAL

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I want to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. It arises out of the study made by the Canadian Civil Liberties Association and financed by the Ford Foundation. This study shows that almost half of the accused persons whose cases were studied went through their entire trials without a lawyer and that in about a fifth of the cases the accused were kept in jail anywhere from one week to three months before coming to trial. In view of the facts that have come to light as a result of this study, is the minister going to propose any amendments to deal with this state of affairs?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a look at that report. The newspaper commentaries indicated that the report was limited to five major cities in Canada. I would hope some of the alleged facts might be reversed when the bail reform bill is proclaimed on January 2.

Mr. Douglas: In view of the fact the study showed that a great many persons had been refused permission to telephone from the police station at the time of their arrest and that a great many had given self-incriminating evidence prior to seeing their lawyer, is the minister prepared to introduce legislation which will make it mandatory for an accused person to have legal counsel before a conviction can be registered against that person?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I am considering whether the right to counsel ought to be embodied in the Criminal Code. It will be recalled that we were unsuccessful in having it inserted in the Canadian constitution as a result of the failure to ratify the recommendations of the Victoria conference. At any rate, right to counsel has to be supplemented by legal aid, and I am reviewing that aspect as well.

[Later:]

REQUEST FOR REFERENCE OF CIVIL LIBERTIES ASSOCIATION REPORT TO LAW CONFERENCE OR STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): My question is directed to the Minister of Justice. In view of the statement in the report that the courts are insensitive to the problems that face people who come before them, would the minister include this subject of this report on the agenda for the law conference next February so that it can be discussed and relayed to the judges who will be in attendance?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I will consider the suggestion, though it might be difficult to carry out at this stage. The primary responsibility for the administration of the courts falls, of course, within the purview of the provincial Attorneys General. It might be that the proper recourse would be to take the matter up with them.

Mr. Gilbert: Would the Minister of Justice refer the subject matter of this report to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs so that the committee might study it in depth, invite the persons who prepared the report to appear, and engage in a full discussion on the subject?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That is a suggestion worth considering.

FINANCE

NEWFOUNDLAND REPRESENTATIVE AT MEETING OF FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL MINISTERS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he can tell us who is representing the province of Newfoundland at today's finance ministers' conference in view of the fact that the Minister of Finance for Newfoundland went down to defeat with the Smallwood government in that unknown election to which the Prime Minister referred in Halifax on Saturday when he was asked about the Newfoundland election. I should like to ask the Prime Minister specifically who is representing the province of Newfoundland today at the meeting with the provincial Ministers of Finance in view of the fact that the Minister of Finance for Newfoundland, together with the Smallwood government, went down to defeat last week?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Not only did I not refer to an unknown election, but I was not in Halifax on Saturday. The facts are all wrong.

Mr. McGrath: May I, without repeating the premise of my original question, which was accurate—it was perhaps last Friday—ask the Prime Minister who certainly knows now that there was an election in Newfoundland last week—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I thought the election was over.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bell: It has just started.

Mr. McGrath: I apologize, Mr. Speaker, for getting carried away. I should like to ask the Prime Minister to tell us who is representing the province of Newfoundland today at the finance ministers' conference in view of the fact that the Newfoundland Minister of Finance was defeated in last week's provincial election?

Mr. Trudeau: The premise was still wrong. As to the question itself, I do not know.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Can we be assured by the Prime Minister that the paving which is going on outside this building is not left over from the Smallwood campaign?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): I am sure there is none left over. It was all used in my riding.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lundrigan: May I ask the right hon. gentleman to tell us who will be invited from the province of Newfoundland to attend the conference of first ministers to be held later this month?

Mr. Trudeau: The premier of Newfoundland, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lundrigan: Can the Prime Minister tell us who that man is?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED APPROVAL OF PURCHASE OF CF-5 AIRCRAFT—POSSIBLE REOPENING OF CANADAIR PRODUCTION LINE

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I am sure Frank Moores will get the invitation. In welcoming the Toronto Sun to Canadian journalism I wonder whether I could ask the Minister of National Defence a question based on an article which appeared in this new publication this morning indicating that Treasury Board has approved $10 million for the purchase of more CF-5's to replace equipment to be sold to Venezuela. Will this in fact entail the opening up of the production line at Canadair again?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the discussions with Venezuela are currently in process and I do not think it would assist them or the Canadian aviation industry to indicate at this point the exact stage the discussions have reached. However, the White Paper on Defence indicated that some of the CF-5 aircraft would be used in an advanced training role and for this purpose the department's budget would be increased so that some of the aircraft now in inventory can be converted. As to whether the existing aircraft will be sold to Venezuela and replacement dual aircraft purchased to put into inventory or whether the existing single aircraft will be converted to duals, this will depend, of course, on the outcome of the proposed sale to Venezuela.

Mr. Forrestall: Do I gather from the Minister of National Defence that Treasury Board has not yet approved an item of $10 million so that the production line at Canadair might be reopened?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): In view of the fact that at the moment we do not know whether there will be a sale or a conversion of the existing aircraft, because we do not know yet whether the sale will be completed, it is a little difficult for Treasury Board to arrive at any conclusion.

Mr. Forrestall: May we have some assurance from the Minister of National Defence that a statement will be made by himself, or by his colleague the Minister of Supply and Services or by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce at the conclusion of the negotiations with Venezuela?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, it is the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce who is now in the process of negotiating the sale. I am sure that if he brings off an advantageous contract he will not be loath to announce it to the House.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to hon. members that we should try to limit supplementaries so as to give effect to the very valuable advice given to the Chair last week. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar.

GRAIN

LIFT PROGRAM—REPAYMENT REQUESTS TO FARMERS—REFERENCE TO LEGAL OFFICERS OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that the minister's parliamentary secretary said in the House on October 28 that whether or not prosecutions in regard to the Lift program would be undertaken in individual cases if repayment is not made voluntarily would be determined at a later time and depend upon the circumstances of each case, would the minister inform the House whether the question of overpayments under the Lift program has been referred to the legal department of the government both as to cases pending and as a question of principle?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there are a variety of reasons why there appear to be overpayments. In some cases the figures in the application do not correspond with the figures in the permit book for the previous year; in other cases the figures do not correspond with the aerial photographs, and so on. Some of these, hopefully, will be settled when further explanation is given either to the farmer or by the farmer to the officer inspecting. These cases are not all exactly the same, but I am sure the hon. member would expect us to collect any overpayments made or, indeed, any payments that were made that were not in accordance with the regulations under the program.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Without accepting the understanding the minister has attributed to me, I should like to ask whether individual cases of farmers were examined by counsel in the Department of Justice or any other department of government before payment was demanded by letter from these farmers?

Mr. Olson: No, Mr. Speaker, not each individual case, although we will be referring some of them to the Department of Justice. The simple answer to the question is that each individual case was not examined by the Department of Justice before we asked for repayment.

ATOMIC ENERGY

BASIS FOR LOAN TO REHABILITATE GLACE BAY HEAVY WATER PLANT

Mr. Murray McBride (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Prime Minister concerns a reported announcement made by him on Friday that the federal government will make a $95 million loan to Atomic Energy of Canada to rehabilitate the heavy water plant at Glace Bay. Is the government taking this action on the basis of the results of the $300,000 engineering study announced by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources on January 29 and, if so, is that report now public?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this decision was not based essentially on that report; it was based on a requirement that the country has for heavy water and on an examination of the proposition put to us by Premier Regan to the effect that we can rehabilitate this plant and obtain heavy water from Glace Bay sooner and, hopefully, cheaper than we could by building a completely new plant elsewhere.

Mr. McBride: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question which is also directed to the Prime Minister or the minister answering for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In the Prime Minister's statement to the House on April 10, 1970, which appears at page 5711 of Hansard, he made federal assistance to Nova Scotia conditional on a satisfactory operator being found. In view of evidence given to a committee of the House at a more recent date that no such operator had been found, I should like to ask whether such an operator has been found and who is it?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for St. John's West.

Mr. Broadbent: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. Since we now have persistent and dangerously high levels of unemployment, since the rate of close-downs in factories in the province of Ontario is at its highest level since 1929, and since some 2,000 auto workers are effectively out of work as of today, I should like to know why neither the Minister of Manpower nor his parliamentary secretary are in the House today when according to the roster system they should be. Perhaps the Prime Minister can answer that.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the very simple reason is that the minister is at the federal-provincial conference today dealing with the provinces on the very subject on which the opposition has said we should be dealing with the provinces.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McBride: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has asked a question, and I will recognize the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby in a moment for the purpose of asking a question if he wishes to do so. For the moment the Chair recognizes the hon. member for St. John's West.

Mr. McBride: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

An hon. Member: Oh, sit down!

Mr. Speaker: I recognize the hon. member on a point of order.

Mr. McBride: My point of order or question of privilege is very simple, Mr. Speaker. Just because those characters on the other side start hollering does not mean that a question is not deserving of an answer.

An hon. Member: Vice versa.

Mr. McCleave: Onward Christian Soldiers.

ELECTIONS

ALLEGED THREAT TO NEWFOUNDLANDERS BY MINISTER OF TRANSPORT

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. Will he reassert the rights of Canadians to political self-determination without fear of reprisals from his government? I am prompted to ask this question in light of a statement made by the Minister of Transport last week which contained veiled threats to Newfoundlanders if they did not vote Conservative.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising to ask another question? We really have to move on. I recognize the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby. Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for St. John's West to ask a question and then the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

• (2:30 p.m.)

Mr. Carter: Mr. Speaker, I should like to correct the record. It should have read "if they did not vote Liberal".

This is a very important matter, Sir. When a member of this government has stated during an election campaign that it would be unfortunate if Newfoundlanders did not see fit to support his party, I think this affects the democratic rights and the franchise of all Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

MANPOWER

LAY-OFF OF AUTO WORKERS IN ONTARIO AND QUEBEC—RETRAINING FOR OTHER JOBS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister and I should like to preface it briefly with a comment on his answer. It may be the case—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has been recognized for the purpose of asking a question. He raised a question of privilege a moment ago and I am sure did not expect a ruling from the Chair. The matter having been looked at in this way, perhaps the hon. member should be allowed to ask a question.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister since the parliamentary secretary is not in the House although he is in the building. What steps is the government taking to deal specifically with the 2,000 auto workers who are being laid off today in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec in terms of retraining them, with their considerable experience in this industry, for other jobs?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will take the question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

APPLICATIONS FOR REMOVAL OF STATION AGENTS IN PRAIRIE PROVINCES—REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT APPOINT COUNSEL TO OPPOSE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport following Waterloo I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. Notice has been given by Canadian National Railways that it intends to remove the station agents at more than 100 stations in Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba, following similar action involving some 285 in the last four years thereby translating these localities into ghost towns as similar experience has shown. As up to the present time the Canadian Transport Commission has not shown any desire to protect the western towns that will suffer as a result, even though the chairman was born in Manitoba and is a former Newfoundlander, would the minister ask the Minister of Transport to have counsel representing the government of Canada appear before the Canadian Transport Commission in order to argue how wrong it would be to grant the orders sought by Canadian National Railways?

[Mr. Carter.]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would be very happy to take that question as notice for the Minister of Transport, but I should like to advise the right hon. gentleman that this process took place in that part of Canada I know best between 1958 and 1962.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That answer, so-called, does no social credit to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the right hon. member rising on a supplementary question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I thought that was the supplementary question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And also on a question of privilege, Sir. That statement is false. The minister will argue it is not false, but 285 have been closed since 1968 and a large number more are to be closed. Will he give his assurance as a western minister—

Mr. Olson: What about those in 1958 to 62?

Mr. Diefenbaker: —that counsel will be appointed—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister is entitled to respond as the Acting Minister of Transport but I suggest to him and to hon. members that the minister is not allowed to respond in his capacity as a western member.

Mr. Olson: In taking notice for the Minister of Transport I can assure the right hon. gentleman that they will be given more consideration than they were given about ten years ago.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That statement is false.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are running short of time. The hon. member seeks the floor on a supplementary but many members have not yet had an opportunity to direct a question. The hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton asked a question a moment ago and suggested that he did not have an opportunity to hear a reply. My understanding was that no one rose to reply to the supplementary he asked and this is why someone was given an opportunity to ask a subsequent question. Is the hon. member rising on a supplementary?

ATOMIC EMERGY

BASIS FOR LOAN TO REHABILITATE GLACE BAY HEAVY WATER PLANT—REQUEST THAT BILL C-5 BE PROCEEDED WITH

Mr. Murray McBride (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I understand why the opposition is embarrassed on this subject—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is not allowed to debate the matter. That ruling applies to the hon. member as it does to all hon. members and I would ask his co-operation.

Mr. McBride: Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the House leader. When does the House leader intend to call Bill C-5 for third reading so that adequate debate may ensue on this whole sordid and tragic question?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question as asked is not in order.

OIL

PROPOSED TAKEOVER OF SUPERTEST BY BRITISH PETROLEUM—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT COMMITMENTS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister because of the absence of the Minister and the Acting Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. On Thursday night the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources indicated to the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam that the government had decided not to intervene in the takeover of Supertest by British Petroleum. Would the Prime Minister advise the House whether there have been any undertakings or any commitments by the government of Canada to any of the parties involved, particularly involving Panarctic Oils Limited?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, there have been no undertakings given.

GRAIN

POSSIBLE REVIVAL OF STABILIZATION PLAN

Mr. Gordon Ritchie(Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the Prime Minister's interview in which he stated that the federal government had failed to get its message across to the western farmers in the matter of Bill C-244 because of the clever opposition tactics—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member ask the question.

Mr. Ritchie: Will the government bring back a true stabilization plan in the near future?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, it is rather late in the game for the opposition to tell us it is now going to support this bill.

NATURAL RESOURCES

OFFSHORE MINERAL RIGHTS—RENEGOTIATION WITH PROVINCES OF SHARING OF REVENUES—RECOGNITION OF EXCLUSIVE PROVINCIAL OWNERSHIP

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. May I ask the right hon. gentleman whether the federal government is prepared to negotiate again its original stand on the sharing of revenues from offshore mineral rights with the provinces and, if so, does the federal government recognize exclusive provincial ownership of such rights?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, since December of 1968, I believe, we have been prepared to negotiate a settlement with the provinces and we put forward a proposal to the provinces to see if we could achieve some agreement on the matter. Since that time there has been no specific counter-proposal made to us. Indeed, there has been no indication by the opposition that it has a better suggestion for the solution of this problem.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he has received no specific proposal from the Premier of Nova Scotia?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): On the whole problem of the offshore, the answer is no. There has been a discussion between us but there has been no proposal put forward of a firm and final nature.

AMCHITKA NUCLEAR TEST—SUGGESTED ASSISTANCE TO "GREENPEACE TWO" BY CANADIAN NAVAL FORCES

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. In light of the fact that on a couple of occasions this year the United States Coastguard has invaded Canada's territorial waters in pursuit of fishing vessels, and in light of the peaceful mission of the Greenpeace Two in respect of the Amchitka bomb test, would the minister be prepared to keep the naval forces under his jurisdiction on the alert to assist the Greenpeace Two in case of harassment by United States forces in international waters?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it would seem to me that those on a ship called Greenpeace would want this matter settled by peaceful rather than by warlike means.

INDUSTRY

PULP AND PAPER—TAX RELIEF MEASURES BECAUSE OF DIFFICULTIES

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): My question is for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance. In view of the crucial employment situation in the pulp and paper industry and its particular difficulties, is the government considering tax relief measures for the industry and, if so, will the government be taking immediate steps?

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Any tax relief measures would have to be announced in the House in the usual way.

Mr. Marshall: In view of the fact that the Pulp and Paper Association has asked the government to give tax relief of up to one-third on measures for controlling pollution and on investment in expansion, is the government considering this and when will an announcement be made?

Mr. Mahoney: The government is aware of the pulp and paper industry's representations but any response must await an announcement in the usual way.

YOUTH

SUGGESTED CONVENING OF YOUTH PARLIAMENT

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): My question is for the Secretary of State. Was the minister expressing the position of the government in applauding the Committee on Youth report and will legislation based on the report be introduced soon?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is well aware that questions referring to statements made outside the House should normally be addressed to the Prime Minister as leader of the government.

Mr. Dinsdale: May I ask a supplementary question and perhaps make the question legal. In view of the obvious desire on the part of Canadian young people to be involved in devising programs of their own to deal with their problems, would the Secretary of State call together the long delayed youth parliament so that they might engage in this useful exercise?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Brandon-Souris should know that the young do not wait for governments to take action. Up till now, they themselves have convened some fifteen interprovincial, intermunicipal or intercultural meetings to discuss the report on youth. And this goes on with the support of the youth movements, some of the oldest and most respected in the country, and I believe that the public debate that we wanted is presently taking place without any help from the government.

[English]

Mr. Dinsdale: Would the Secretary of State answer the specific question with respect to the youth parliament? Is the government considering activating this group as was recommended strongly by a parliamentary committee?

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that I gave an unequivocally negative answer, but since one has to use the word "no", the answer is "no".

[English]

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON FUTURE OF OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State. Would the minister undertake within the next week or ten days to make a statement on motions regarding the future of the Opportunities for Youth program and the whole question of summer student employment for the coming year?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the government intends to make a statement soon. As for saying that it will be forthcoming within a week or two, I cannot make such a commitment at this time.

[English]

REQUEST FOR REFERENCE OF REPORT AND OPPORTUNITIES PROGRAM TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): My supplementary question is for the Secretary of State. In view of the minister's enthusiastic endorsement of the youth report, will he take the necessary steps to refer this report along with the Opportunities for Youth program to the appropriate House committee for further study?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I think that the matter of submitting various reports to parliamentary committees is one that we should consider carefully. The hon. member knows that some of these reports are worth being considered by a committee; as for others, the committee itself decides that they are not worthy of any consideration. A decision will have to be made in the light of the views of hon. members in this regard.

AUTO PACT—RECOMMENDATION THAT ASSEMBLED VEHICLES IMPORTED FROM UNITED STATES HAVE SPECIFIED CANADIAN PARTS CONTENT

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): My question normally would be directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, but in his absence and since it does reflect government policy perhaps I may be allowed to direct it to the Prime Minister. In light of the very serious effect on Canadian employment implied in any modification of the Canada-United States automobile pact, will the government now reconsider its rejection of the Automobile Parts Manufacturers Association's recommendation that assembled vehicles imported into Canada from the United States be required to have a specified portion of Canadian parts content?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to take that question as notice on behalf of the minister.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INDIA—CANADIAN ASSISTANCE FOLLOWING TIDAL WAVE

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): My question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It concerns the tragedy which has recently befallen India in the state of Orissa where thousands of citizens of that country have died in a tidal wave. Can he indicate whether the government of this country is showing its concern for a fellow Commonwealth nation by making an immediate grant of assistance to that country?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The matter is under discussion in the department now and I hope I will be able to make an announcement soon one way or the other.

NATIONAL SECURITY

QUEBEC—EVIDENCE OF BROAD SUPPORT FOR UPRISING

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): My question is for the Secretary of State. Is it the position of the minister that the potential danger of broad support for a popular uprising in Quebec is probably greater today than it was a year ago, and will the government provide us with whatever evidence it has that there was broad popular support for an uprising a year ago and, to avoid a supplementary question, what new evidence does the Secretary of State have regarding this year's broad support?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, on the first part—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have very serious doubts about that kind of question. I would think it should be placed on the order paper because it is so general in nature and also because the hon. member is inviting the minister to express an opinion.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—SIMILAR PROGRAM FOR OLDER PEOPLE

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): My question is supplementary to those asked a few moments ago of the Secretary of State in connection with the Opportunities for Youth program. Having in mind the interest in and the need for such a program, can the minister say whether his department or other departments at other levels are giving any consideration to initiating an opportunities for age program on behalf of senior citizens?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): No, not by my department, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar might be allowed to ask a supplementary question. He has had difficulties with his supplementary questions this afternoon.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—AMOUNTS OUTSTANDING IN RESPECT OF PROJECTS

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): I should like to ask the Secretary of State whether there are still amounts outstanding in respect of projects which were undertaken by students and, if so, can he tell the House how much is involved?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR MEDICAL AID TO PERSON IN RUSSIAN LABOUR CAMP

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): My question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is based upon a representation that has been made to me by the cousin of Miss Silva Zalmanson who is currently serving a ten year sentence in a labour camp in Russia and who is seriously ill. Part of the representation reads as follows:

She is losing her hearing and cannot eat. Life is leaving her not by days but hours.

Would the minister use his good offices and perhaps those of the Red Cross to give urgent medical aid and care to this person?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I should like to thank the hon. gentleman for bringing the case to my attention. I will see what can be done as urgently as possible.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO PAY INCREASE FOR MEMBERS OF ARMED FORCES

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): My question is for the Minister of National Defence. Have the long overdue pay increases for the armed services cleared all the administrative hurdles in the Department of National Defence and Treasury Board? Are they to be announced in the near future and, if not, when?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): As the hon. member has put it, consideration of a pay increase has not cleared all the administrative hurdles. I would hope to be able to make an announcement very soon, but I cannot give an exact date.

Mr. Nowlan: In view of the answer I must ask a supplementary question. Can we expect that the next period will reflect these increases. Will the decision be made before then?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Does the hon. member mean the forthcoming month? If so, that will depend on when the announcement is made.

GRAIN

LIFT PROGRAM—REPAYMENT REQUESTS TO FARMERS—POSSIBLE FORGIVENESS IN CERTAIN CASES

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina Lake Centre): I have a supplementary question on a matter raised by my colleague the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar. In view of the large number of requests for refund of alleged overpayments under Operation Lift and the fact that the administrative costs may amount to more than the overpayments, may I ask the Minister of Agriculture whether consideration will be given to forgiving overpayments of any amounts under $50? Further, where overpayment was caused by Lift officials misreading aerial photographs, can the minister tell the House whether demands for such refunds will be stopped?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in any case where we find that the photographs were interpreted wrongly, and there is a discussion between the farmer and the officials which brings that to the fore, of course no further action will be taken. We are certainly not attempting to collect money that has been paid out properly.

POWER

BAY OF FUNDY TIDES—DISCUSSION BY PRIME MINISTER AND NOVA SCOTIA PREMIER AT HALIFAX MEETING

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. During his meeting in Halifax with the Premier of Nova Scotia—the three maritime premiers were there—were there any discussions about re-examination of the programming board report on Fundy tidal power? If discussions were held, can the Prime Minister inform the House as to their extent and the results?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, no such discussions took place.

FISHERIES

PROPOSALS TO PREMIER KOSYGIN DURING RECENT VISIT RESPECTING CONSERVATION

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): My question is directed to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister tell the House whether any specific proposals were made to the Soviet premier during his recent visit to Canada on the offshore fishery conservation problem?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of the Environment answered this question while the hon. member was in Newfoundland last week.

Mr. Lundrigan: I am asking the Prime Minister whether he himself made any specific proposals and recommendations to the Soviet premier which would help the conservation of fishery resources off the east coast of Canada. If he did, would he be kind enough to table them in the House so that all east coast Canadians can understand what the specific proposals he made were?

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will refer to Hansard he will see what the minister answered.

Mr. Lundrigan: I am not asking what the Minister of Fisheries did; I am asking what the top official of the Canadian people did. Did the Prime Minister make specific proposals or did he not make specific proposals?

An hon. Member: The answer is obvious.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have just about reached the end of the question period. We should normally go on to orders of the day but the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley might be allowed to ask a rapid question. Is the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate rising on a question of privilege? I have just indicated to hon. members that I thought I was extending the question period by allowing the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley to ask a question, but if that is not the desire of hon. members we will call orders of the day. The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate has asked the same question three times. He may not be satisfied with the reply which was given but as he will appreciate that does not give rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege is quite simply that the Minister of Fisheries has answered in the House that they got no response. There was no reference to the fisheries problem in the communiqué. No reference was made to the fisheries problem during the premier's visit. I want to give the Prime Minister the opportunity to tell a lot of east coast Canadians that this is not a bluff. That is what they are saying and I would like him to clear up whether—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley.

ATOMIC ENERGY

GLACE BAY HEAVY WATER PLANT—AGENCY IN CHARGE OF RECONSTRUCTION AND OPERATION

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. Will Atomic Energy of Canada Limited be doing the reconstruction in regard to the Glace Bay heavy water plant and will Atomic Energy of Canada Limited be operating the said plant once it is completed?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it has not been decided whether we will operate it through Atomic Energy of Canada Limited or whether ACEL will do it through an agent.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed, from Friday, October 29, consideration in committee of Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act—Mr. Benson—Mr. Honey in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose on Friday, October 29, 1971, Section 6 was before the committee. Sections 4, 5, 6, 7 and 8 had been grouped for the purpose of debate and Sections 4 and 5 were agreed to.

On Clause 1—Section 6—Amounts to be included as income from Office or Employment

The Chairman: Shall section 6 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Clause 1—Section 6—agreed to.

On clause 1—section 7—agreement to issue shares to employees.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I just have a question which arises out of the proposal that I presented on Friday that the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Moose Jaw be held over until today. I should like to have an answer for the parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, it was my intention, when we reached section 8, to ask that the amendment be allowed to stand. Hon. members will appreciate that the Minister of Finance is occupied with the provincial treasurers for the next few days, and I should like to give him an opportunity to consider the problem which the hon. member for Moose Jaw and the hon. member for London East have very forcibly brought to our attention.

Mr. McCleave: And others.

Mr. Mahoney: And others as well.

Clause 1—Section 7—agreed to.

On clause 1—section 8—Deductions allowed.

The Chairman: Shall section 8 carry?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I should like to request that this section be allowed to stand.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I was the one who originally made the suggestion, but in light of the motion by the hon. member for Moose Jaw supported so ably by the hon. member for London East, I may say that we are perfectly agreeable to letting it stand. However, I just want to make a point about the interest in this debate and the calibre of reporting of this debate that we are getting from our press gallery. There is an article in the Mail Star of Saturday, October 30, by one Dan Turner, that never makes the point the hon. member for Moose Jaw made or the very thoughtful speech that the hon. member for London East made or the point that I made. I think that is lousy reporting, and I think the Canadian public is ill served by this type of reporting on what is perhaps a most fundamental piece of legislation. Certainly, this piece of legislation affects more people in this country than any other legislation of which I am aware. I just want to put that on record. I am distressed and I am disturbed that we cannot get a better report when we provide all the facilities in this place. We are spending tens of thousands of dollars to give better facilities to the press gallery to report to the Canadian people what is going on in this place.

It does not matter to me. My name could be left out of the dispatches because my part was a small one. I am simply saying that since the hon. member for London East, certain members to my left and some of my colleagues were so exercised about the matter I thought the issue could have been postponed for second thought by the government over the weekend. That idea was accepted by the parliamentary secretary, and I give him credit for that.

The hon. member for London East did something that is very very rare around here and anytime it happens it should be commended. The hon. member had the guts to look his own party in the face and say, "Look, you are making a mistake. I was a railway man before I came here and I can tell you that this is the way it is; in order to give these people a break you should adopt the course that the hon. member for Moose Jaw recommended." I think it is disgusting, I think it is disheartening and I hope that the Canadian Press will take a second look at the way it is represented in the press gallery. If it does not—

Some hon. Members: Where are they?

Mr. McCleave: —something else will take its place.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that section 8 with two amendments shall stand?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is agreed. In order that we may know what we are talking about, I wonder if that could be identified as the part beginning with the numeral 8 on page 15 and going over to the middle of page 23; in other words, the proposed new section 8 of clause 1. Is it agreed that that is what we are standing, with the two amendments which have been proposed thereto?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Hon. members have heard the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. He has identified the part that is to be allowed to stand. Does the committee agree that that is what is to be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: It is so ordered.

Clause 1—Section 8 stands.

The Chairman: Pursuant to the special arrangement made on Friday last, the committee will now proceed to the consideration of a new grouping of sections. As the Chair understands it, the committee is to consider sections 56 to 58 inclusive and sections 60 to 63 inclusive.

On clause 1—Section 56—Amounts to be included in income for year

The Chairman: Shall section 56 carry?

Mr. McCleave: Again, Mr. Chairman, we have agreed to consider seven sections together, and I wish to comment on two of them. Other colleagues of mine will deal with other matters contained in these sections. Of the two to which I specifically wish to refer, the first has to do with the day care provisions and the second with the averaging provisions. Perhaps, before I forget, I ought to say that on Friday afternoon I went to the airport with the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, who is probably the biggest booster in this House of the child care provisions and of certain day care laws that she wishes to see introduced. She will not be back until this evening. When she learned that the sections now being discussed were to come before the committee on Monday afternoon, she asked me to say that she would not be back until Monday evening. She hoped that the day care provisions would not slip through by a fluke and that she may have a chance to make a new speech this evening. I say this, realizing that she is not a member of my party. On the other hand, we did share the same cab on Friday afternoon.

Mr. Bell: Explain.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I trust the hon. member paid the fare.

Mr. McCleave: She went to fly to the sunny west and I went to fly to the gloom, down east, Mr. Chairman.

May I make one or two points with regard to the child care provisions. I suspect that these provisions are nuisance provisions, and that we are really providing for nuisance taxation of those good ladies of the neighbourhood who are going to look after the children while mother or father or both are downtown earning their living. I notice, further, that in this provision the social insurance number is to play a large part with regard to receipts. I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that that requirement is an abuse of the use of social insurance numbers as originally introduced in this Parliament. Perhaps hon. members within earshot of my voice will remember the assurance that was given when the social insurance number concept was introduced in Canada. According to my understanding, the number was not to be used for the purposes set forth in this clause. That is, it was not to be used in such a way as to identify somebody with the earning of a particular income. That is one aspect about which I want to ask the parliamentary secretary.

The present President of the Privy Council introduced this concept when he was minister of national health and welfare. Clearly, one or the other of them must answer my question, namely, did Parliament intend when the social insurance number concept was introduced that the number would be used to pin down people with respect to income tax, as now contemplated in the section we are being asked to pass? I am referring particularly to the matter of day care centres. I think that is an important matter. In any event, I make the point that that tax will be a nuisance tax. It is a pin money tax, because here we are talking about people who earn very little income and we are asking them to file income tax returns with respect to the very modest amounts of money that they might earn as babysitters for small children. That, I suggest, is unjust.

[The Chairman.]

Not only is the measure unjust, but it may also tend to defeat existing relationships in this field. If babysitters have to pay some kind of tax, it is obvious that, to meet that extra expense, they will tack on to the babysitting charge what they must pay, so that the cost of looking after small children will go up. This matter also involves Canada Pension Plan payments as well as income tax, since the babysitting service might grow to such proportions that it becomes a business which uses certain facilities. All these things will be involved. Either way, the low income, working mother will lose and the good old babysitter next door will be put to a great deal of nuisance, if I may put it that way. I hope that the parliamentary secretary, who has become a very reasonable fellow as the debate has been progressing and who sees other viewpoints, will take a second look at this section during the adjournment hour.

The other point I wish to deal with concerns the averaging of rising income. One might call these the Gordie Howe provisions. Perhaps, after all, they should not be called that, because Gordie Howe is retired and has gone to whatever sanctuary the Eaton Company can provide. Let us call these the Rusty Staub provisions. Rusty Staub plays in right field for the Montreal Expos. The weakness of this plan, as I see it, is that it only permits the averaging of a rising income, so that while Rusty Staub is in his prime and able to hit ever more home runs and do the brilliant fielding of which he is capable, this measure will bring him some advantage. On the other hand, when Rusty loses the strength of his legs—and I apologize to Mr. Staub for using him as an example, but I think it is better if you pin these things down definitely rather than leaving them up in the air without definite form—and when management starts cutting down on what he receives as take-home pay, this provision will not be to his advantage.

According to my reading of the section, he will not be allowed to average his income so as to offset the tax charged on the non-recurring, large income made in the first years. He would, in short, pay considerably more tax than another taxpayer who has had an identical total income over the five year period. Well, Mr. Chairman, I hope that we manage to strike a blow for those who do not quit when their incomes are on the rise but quit when they find that the game is no longer worth the salary they are paid. I suggest that the issue of averaging is most important; yet we should not confuse rising incomes with increased salaries and emoluments which are bound to be paid as a result of inflation. The day may come when the fellow we are talking about has reached his peak and gone past it. Management may not need to tell him to get out. He himself may know that he cannot bargain for those salaries that he commanded in the best years of his life. The player or actor may still be good enough to take part in his profession. The legs may still be good enough for a game and the acting, though not as good as before, may still be good. The fellow may still carry on for a few more years. I think that fellow also deserves a break. At least he is contributing out of a healthy salary scale. He is contributing more than any rookie who takes his place.

We have to recognize that. I make a plea for that particular person.

• (3:10 p.m.)

These are the points I wanted to make with regard to these particular sections. The matter of the taxation of scholarships and the like will be dealt with by another member of my party. Other members will deal with the niceties contained in the other sections. I wanted to put in a plea to take a very careful look at the taxation of the person providing day care. I am not referring to large business. I am referring to a neighbourhood mother who takes a few children into her home and looks after them so that their mothers can go to work. I think we can differentiate between a business proposition and a neighbourhood proposition to earn pin money. I ask the parliamentary secretary to look at that. Then, if we grant an averaging system, we have to grant that those who go up also come down. We must look at that aspect as well.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, as the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants has pointed out, these seven sections with which we are now dealing cover a wide range of matters. Therefore, this is hardly the point at which to make a general speech or even one that covers all of the matters. I imagine that each of us who takes the floor will have something to say about some of the items that are included in the seven sections. There are three about which I would like to speak and concerning which I have questions and suggestions to put to the parliamentary secretary.

First, this group of sections includes the provision for taxation of various kinds of pensions. It makes it clear, as it has been from the beginning, that income received as old age security is taxable. However, there is also in this group of sections the provision which makes it unnecessary to regard as taxable the amount received as guaranteed income supplement. At least, I believe this is the place which deals with that point. I am looking at page 129 where the reference to old age security benefits and Canada Pension Plan benefits is followed by the statement that although one must include such benefits, this does not include, and I quote:

> the amount of any social assistance payment made on a means or a needs test basis,
> 1. by a registered Canadian charitable organization, or
> 2. under a prescribed program provided for by an Act of the Parliament of Canada or a law of a province.

I gather that is the legal provision under which money received as a guaranteed income supplement is not to be taxable. If this is somewhere else in the bill as well, perhaps the parliamentary secretary can advise me.

Mr. Mahoney: On the specific point, Mr. Chairman, I refer the hon. member to section 110(1)(f). Rather than have him look it up, perhaps I can read it.

> Deduction for payments of supplement under Old Age Security Act.
> (f) the amount of any supplement under the Old Age Security Act or of any similar payment under a law of a province, in respect of which any amount has been included in computing the taxpayer's income for the year by virtue of clause 56(1)(a)(i)(A).

The preamble to section 110 is for the purpose of computing the taxable income. I quote:

> —there may be deducted from his income for the year such of the following amounts as are applicable.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If there was any doubt, Mr. Chairman, it seems to be doubly clear. It strikes me that it is there in both cases. In any event, the question I wanted to ask about the non-taxable nature of the guaranteed income supplement is as follows: Where in the bill is the provision which the minister announced in his speech to the effect that this would apply for the taxation year 1971?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I will find out for the hon. member. Possibly he would like to carry on with his comments on another point. This is in Part IV.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I have turned up something which I cannot find in the bill and which the parliamentary secretary cannot find, at least not yet. I am sure the parliamentary secretary will find it.

Mr. Mahoney: The parliamentary secretary has found it. I refer the hon. member to clause 71 in Part IV of the bill.

An hon. Member: What page?

Mr. Mahoney: I am sorry I cannot help the hon. member there. I am using a different edition than hon. members. It is in Part IV of the bill which is entitled Amendments to the Income Tax Act, 1952.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is in the clause after we get through clause 1.

Mr. Mahoney: That is correct.

Mr. Alexander: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. Can the parliamentary secretary advise the House from which book he is quoting his facts and figures, where this is available and whether hon. members have this particular book? It seems to be a condensation of the entire matter, an easy reference for those sitting on the other side.

Mr. Mahoney: The particular clause which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was looking at is on page 702 of the bill. The book I am using is a CCH edition of this bill. The reason I use it is I have to lift it frequently. This is to relieve my bursitis.

Mr. Alexander: I accept that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, we have it confirmed that payments made under the guaranteed income supplement are not taxable. We also have it confirmed that they are not taxable for the year 1971. This is a welcome change that the government has made. It will solve one of the problems created when War Veterans Allowance recipients were pushed, either in whole or in part off the War Veterans Allowance on to the guaranteed supplement.

There still remains a question which many of us have been asking since June 18. It is this: Why has the government not seen fit to make other changes affecting elderly persons likewise effective January 1, 1971? I refer in particular, of course, to the increase in the age exemption amount from $500 to $650. I realize that now we are in November the present taxation year is almost over, but even if this bill gets passed this month or some time before Christmas, it will come as a bit of a shock to senior citizens to discover when they make out their income tax returns in April that the returns they make at that time must be on the basis of the old law. It seems to me that just as the government has been willing to make the non-taxability of the guaranteed income supplement apply back to January 1, 1971, it should make the extra exemption retroactive to cover the taxation year 1971.

• (3:20 p.m.)

The second point which comes within the purview of these seven sections is the provision that unemployment insurance benefits paid under the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, are taxable. I was a member of the committee which poured over that legislation. I recognize the rationale of granting tax deductibility for payments one makes into the unemployment insurance account and having to pay tax on unemployment insurance benefits if they place one in a taxable bracket, but it does seem to me that this should be put into effect only after things have worked out. Application of the principle should, in my opinion, be postponed. We have already run into a number of anomalies in the Unemployment Insurance Act administration arising mainly from the sudden changeover which took place on June 27 when the new act came into effect. We have come across a great many cases of persons who expected to enjoy a certain benefit but who found they could not obtain that benefit because, for example, they were not unemployed until after June 27. This applies to people who are in receipt of Canada Pension Plan payments, to people who are 70 years of age or older, and so on. This is not directly to the point, Mr. Chairman, but it is related to it. My point is that the sudden change has brought about many anomalies and this is another of them, that people have received less by way of unemployment insurance benefit than they thought they would collect. Some people who believed they would receive payments during the best part of the year got only three weeks. I think it is unfair to add to this unfairness by the application of income tax liability at this point.

I am not now making a plea for cancellation of the decision to apply income tax to unemployment insurance benefits. After all, that battle was fought in the committee. But I am asking the parliamentary secretary to delay the coming into effect of this provision for at least a year until things have sorted themselves out and people in receipt of unemployment insurance benefits are getting them on the basis of a structure which is completely founded on the new act.

I hope I have got my point across. What is happening here is that people are losing out because of the changeover and it is a bit cruel to say that not only should they get less money than they would otherwise have received but that such money as they do get is taxable right away. I would therefore urge that implementation of this part be delayed until at least the end of June, 1972.

The other point on which I should like to comment, among the many subjects to be found in these seven sections, is the provision for income tax consideration with respect to expenses which a working mother is to be allowed. I might add that if the father is the one who is responsible for the children and has to hire help in looking after them, he is entitled under the terms of the bill to the same assistance as is made available to mothers. The consideration is set out in detail in section 63. As my hon. friend from Vancouver-Kingsway has already pointed out, and as she will do again when she gets back, as announced to us by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants—and I can confirm it—there are some features of this provision which bear looking into. The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants has called attention to one of them, namely, that though there will be some tax savings to working mothers, because of all the reporting which has to be done, extra taxes may have to be paid by those who do the kind of work which makes it necessary for working mothers to use their services.

Apart from that, it seems to me the principal criticism I have to make with this provision is the standard type of criticism we make with respect to most tax concessions. The proposal is that the taxpayer should get a tax concession in terms of an exemption amounting to a maximum of $500 a child. There is a limit on this. No matter how many children a mother may have the amount cannot be more than $2,000. Then, there is a further limit. A mother cannot claim by way of expenditure on child care an amount greater than two-thirds of her earned income. It is the old story. A working mother with a low income may find that this does not help her much. There is not much point in my saying that a working mother with a high income would probably be better off because a mother with a high income would probably not be out at work.

What is to be granted to these working women, I might point out, is not $500 in cash; it is not $500 off their income tax, or $500 toward the cost of child care. It is simply an exemption of that amount, and by the time one applies a marginal rate of 20 per cent, say, it does not mean as much as it might otherwise have meant. It seems to me this is another case where the tax credit principle would have been far more appropriate. I do not understand why the government continues to resist this tax credit concept as it has done in all cases as far as earned income is concerned. It is true the principle has been applied to investment income in certain cases. Yet a tax credit is a method whereby one can ensure that those in the lower income brackets can get the amounts they need, that, as a matter of fact, they will receive the same amount, if they spend the dollars, as will those in the higher brackets. I do hope that in the study which will yet be given to this proposal some thought might be directed to the application of the tax credit method.

Mr. Chairman, I think that is enough comment on these sections for the time being. We shall be back later.

Mr. Fairweather: My hon. friend next to me, in his eagerness to hear what I have to say, almost upset the water, Mr. Chairman. I have a serious proposition to put before the parliamentary secretary. I have discussed it briefly with him and he promised to respond to any submission the opposition might make with regard to it. It has to do with the proposed taxation of scholarships, fellowships and bursaries. Research grants, Canada Council grants and similar grants will be taxable, and the cost of equipment, fees, travel, lab charges, etc., will be deductible. In commenting on this section I should like to remind the committee that at present such bursaries and scholarships are exempt from tax. The change in the legislation will mean a reduction in income, particularly for graduate students. The provinces' efforts to maintain graduate schools and to compete with attractive scholarship programs in United States universities will only be weakened. Furthermore, students will be able to obtain United States scholarships tax free. In a country like ours which is not comparatively generous with graduate students in general and with their activities, I suggest with great respect this proposal is a retrograde one. If one goes back to the Carter Commission, one learns that this commission maintained that one of the strategic sources of economic growth is a rapid improvement in the educational quality of the labour force. That is really part of the thrust or one of the many aspects of the report with which we have to deal.

The new legislation we are considering not only imposes an extra burden on young students but also on university professors who are receiving grants to conduct research that is essential to their respective fields. By taxing scholarships, fellowships and bursaries with only a $500 exemption, the minister has completely reversed the direction in which the Carter Commission said that tax reform should move. This proposed change will mean that the provinces' efforts to maintain graduate schools and to compete with attractive scholarship programs in United States universities will be seriously hamstrung. I am making this appeal to all members of this committee, no matter what their political persuasion may be, who have an interest in university and graduate school work and in the essential part that this plays in our country. Fellowships are traditionally granted to Ph.D. level graduate students who are engaged in research.

Sabbatical leave at most universities is granted at about 50 per cent of full salary. This means that through careful planning, with perhaps the addition of a research grant, a teacher may be able to move himself and his family abroad in order to consult resource material essential to his field. I suggest the government has not given sufficient consideration to the hardship its proposal will create for those academics who have planned to spend the academic year 1971-72 on sabbatical leave abroad. In other words, midway through their term—a term that has nothing to do with the enactment of this bill—there is to be a major change in taxation for recipients of bursaries and fellowships. From September to December they are not taxable; from January to the end of their year, to put it very simply, they will be taxable should this bill get the approval of Parliament.

The government plans to implement its proposals for taxation of non-residents on income from a Canadian source a couple of months hence, namely by January 1, 1972. I earnestly suggest that even if the bill cannot be changed now, or if the government does not see the merit of my comments, there should be some transitional arrangements for students who are well along in their sabbatical year or their year of research. For those who have already made their arrangements and are now out of the country or about to leave with grants awarded from six months to a year ago, the action the government is taking will almost certainly result in their having to curtail their stay, and consequently their research, unless additional funds are made available to them. It seems to me paradoxical that a government that is anxious to promote excellence, and which has recently appointed a minister of science and technology to look into this and other elements in this field, should narrow the base, so to speak, of taxing proposals which will have a serious effect on our whole graduate student program.

It seems to me strange that the minister has made transitional periods available for such industries as mining and petroleum, as well as the transitional period for corporation income tax which has been written into the act. Just the other day we had the minister's amendments to the co-operatives and caisse populaire provisions, yet the area concerning me at the moment has apparently been disregarded. I suggest that the graduate program is of equal validity in the argument for flexibility of approach upon the part of the government. A transitional period of at least six months until July 1, 1972 would enable those teachers committed to spending this academic year pursuing research to do so. When I have finished my remarks in a minute or so I hope the parliamentary secretary will be able to state that a transitional period will also be effective for this vital element in our nation's wealth.

The most ridiculous aspect though of the new legislation is that which governs moving expenses as applied to persons undertaking a year of research work outside Canada. An individual is allowed to deduct the cost of moving his family abroad to complete a specific research project. But once the project is completed, the current legislation does not allow this individual to deduct the cost of returning his family to Canada—I am sure there is a mistake here, and if there is I shall be glad to hear the parliamentary secretary admit it—since his research project has been completed and, by law, he is allowed no further deductions. It seems that the minister is not only attempting to discourage students from completing their education in Canada through his tax on scholarships and bursaries, but he is attempting to keep young Canadians out of their country permanently. I am sure that this cannot be the intention of the minister, despite the rather loose construction of the statute, and I shall be glad to hear that I am wrong on this issue. A man undertaking a year of research work outside the country surely is entitled to deduct the cost of taking and returning his family.

The Official Opposition suggests that this should be clearly stated, in view of the fact there is no relief provided under section 62 for moving expenses. A man is entitled to a one-way cost deduction within Canada if moving to take up new employment, and that is all. Obviously, an academic on research leave does not qualify here since he may not be "a student in full time attendance at an educational institution". The new legislation should be more specific, I suggest, and should include a provision for those on extended research leave to deduct the cost of moving their families; for example, "a scientist, a teacher or other researcher engaged in research which requires his continued absence from his normal place of residence".

Under section 56(1)(o) we encounter the problem of matching cash received in the taxation year with expenses incurred in the academic year. I suggest provision should be made in the legislation to permit the holder of a research grant to carry back expenditures in order to match expenses with revenue received in the taxation year. I presume that this is what the department will want to do, but we nevertheless feel that it should be clearly spelled out at this stage of the legislation. In the matter of short-term employment, defined as anything less than the full academic year of any institution, that is summer school, guest lectureships and so on, universities have traditionally not provided a special travel grant. The individual has been defined as having employment status within the second institution and has been ineligible to deduct these travel expenses to and from that institution. A teacher engaged in short-term employment should have the right to deduct the cost of travel to and from his employment.

I hope this point will be clarified quite quickly by the parliamentary secretary, and perhaps the other points I have raised can be cleared up so the whole philosophy, which I should think the government would support enthusiastically, that is the philosophy and importance of not hamstringing our program of graduate research, will not be modified by taxation proposals.

Mr. MacGuigan: Mr. Chairman, I am very pleased to rise to support the persuasive words the hon. member for Fundy-Royal has just put to us. He has made a general case in respect of professors and students, and, while I would agree with everything he has said, I would add a few other considerations.

It seems to me that the problem in respect of section 56(1), paragraphs (n) and (o) is a classification problem, and is a difficult problem in the academic world itself. I do not know of any sharp distinction which is made in the academic world between concepts such as scholarships, bursaries and fellowships. Even within some universities there seems to be some confusion, and certainly as between universities it would be hard to establish a crystal clear pattern and meaning for them.

It is also important to note that the additional classification which appears in (o), that is, a grant which is to enable one to carry on research or similar work, is not really substantially different or different in kind at all from that of fellowship or scholarship money granted to graduate students across the country. Therefore, it is illogical that in one place you should be allowed more than $500 to be attributed to the expenses one incurs in the pursuit of scholarship or research work, but not in another place.

Therefore I suggest that the words "scholarship, fellowship or bursary" be deleted from paragraph (n) and inserted in paragraph (o). I do not know whether that would leave anything worth retaining in paragraph (n), although I expect that the words "prize for achievement" have a rather different meaning, so that if the parliamentary secretary were disposed to transpose these words there could be a reason for still retaining paragraph (n). I would strongly urge on him the advisability of using the words "scholarship, fellowship or bursary" in paragraph (o). I also suggest that paragraph (o) might then read, following the words "or in similar work": "or on account of any fellowship, scholarship or bursary". Then, following the word "exceeds" I would suggest the insertion of the additional words "$500 or", which would provide two different methods of dealing with the deduction being claimed. The whole thing would then read:

> (o) the amount, if any, by which any grant received by the taxpayer in the year to enable him to carry on research or any similar work or on account of any fellowship, scholarship or bursary, exceeds $500 or the aggregate of expenses incurred by him in the year for the purpose of carrying on the work—

Like the hon. member for Fundy-Royal, I should like to draw the attention of the Parliamentary Secretary to the fact that an injustice is being done to these people in relation to scholarships, fellowships and bursaries this year, or indeed on sabbatical leave during the academic year 1971-72. This year is already in progress and we are proposing, without any transitional period being allowed, to impose this as of January 1.

It may perhaps be thought that this difficulty could be avoided if the granting bodies were prepared to grant the whole of the money before the end of this calendar year. That would certainly avoid the application of the new law. Aside from the fact that universities would probably be reluctant to put themselves in the position of appearing to avoid the payment of tax on part of their faculties by paying earlier, there is also the consideration that many of the granting bodies would certainly not be in a position, for financial or administrative reasons, to advance the date on which they make the second instalment of their funds for the present academic year.

Therefore, just as we have made a transitional period for various business groups under the tax law, I would suggest it would be more than appropriate that there be a transitional period for people involved in this particular field. This is also true of professors on sabbatical leave this year. Although that point arises more properly under section 115, I believe these people are often geographically far removed from dealing with universities and other granting bodies, and therefore unable to persuade these bodies to pay them the full amount before the end of this year, resolving their problem in that way. Many are probably abroad, and if we enact this legislation just as it is we will place them in a very difficult position this year.

I do not believe there is any great need for me to go through all the other points made by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal. I am in complete agreement with the policy statements and details he has presented. I would merely conclude by urging the parliamentary secretary and, through him, the minister, to give very serious consideration to the points which have been raised.

These young people or young professors who may be taking advantage of the opportunity of furthering their studies, and their own careers as well, by continuing their research are performing a task which is of benefit not only to them but also to the whole country, especially at this time when there are so many cries throughout the country that we should have Canadian professors teaching Canadians. That is not a cause which I thoroughly endorse, and is much overdone from time to time, but we do want to ensure that there is a ready pool of qualified Canadians who could be university professors. We also hope that universities will hire them when their competence and qualifications are equal to those from abroad. If we do not put provisions in our tax laws to ensure this, then the universities and the academic profession in Canada will be the worse for it.
