Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I think I goofed when I spoke earlier about income averaging, which is really not within the group or section with which we are now dealing, so perhaps the parliamentary secretary would be kind enough to forgive me and deal with that during the next round rather than when dealing with this group.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I was simply going to respond to the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants on that point by suggesting to him that the parliamentary committee wrestled at considerable length, as did the experts retained by that committee, with the whole problem of downward averaging, but no satisfactory solution to that question was found, nor are we aware of any jurisdiction in which a satisfactory answer to the question could be devised and applied. I am not so sure I would have any different or lengthy explanation when we do come to the appropriate section, so I thought I might as well get that off my chest now.

The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants also raised the question of the administrative burden, if you like, being imposed on recipients of payments from the taxpayer, which the taxpayer proposes to deduct under the child care allowance provisions of this bill. I think at first blush one must agree there is an administrative burden imposed here. I would suggest to the hon. member that the absence of provisions such as those to which he has taken exception would create something more like a barn door than a loophole in the Income Tax Act, particularly bearing in mind that payments under that section are allowed to be made to members of the immediate family of the taxpayer. I think equity among all taxpayers rather demands that, as a general principle, where a taxpayer is allowed to deduct from his taxable income some payment he has made there should be a very good reason for not ensuring that it be included in the taxable income of some other taxpayer. Certainly, I can see the administrative difficulty which would be imposed on individual taxpayers by this provision, but I am afraid I have no alternative that would satisfy what I regard to be the basic requirement of the Income Tax Act that we ensure equity between taxpayers and at the same time avoid imposing this particular burden.

The hon. member mentioned the question of the social insurance number as a matter of principle. It is my understanding that at the time that particular law was brought in the then Prime Minister of Canada gave assurance that Canadians would not be required to produce that number. However, it would appear that the undertaking by the former Prime Minister was prempted by the enactment of section 130(A) of the present Income Tax Act. I would refer the hon. member to that particular section which is reflected in section 237 of the bill before us I believe in identical terms, although I have not compared the two verbatim. Section 130(A) was enacted in the 1966-67 session of Parliament and, as I say, would rather overrule Mr. Pearson's commitment.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has suggested, not unexpectedly, that other amendments which would increase exemptions and otherwise lighten the tax burden on our older taxpayers should be implemented with retroactive effect for the current tax year. The tax package as presented to the House in Bill C-259 involves a related grouping of exemptions, of deductions, of income inclusions of allowances and so on and it is certainly not beyond the realm of ingenuity of the government, from a legal point of view, to present it piecemeal, but the fact is that it is not the intention of the government to present it in that way.

I do not think the hon. member is entirely justified in relating these various provisions, such as the increase in exemptions to older taxpayers from $500 to $650 and the reduction of age for that from 70 to 65, to the retroactive exclusion of the guaranteed income supplement for the current tax year. As the hon. member pointed out, the anomaly of the inclusion of part of the guaranteed income supplement payment during the current year was the result of amendments relatively recently adopted by Parliament to the old age security act. Certainly, the government did not intend the result from the income tax point of view which occurred, so we are moving quickly to remove that anomaly for this year. However, I think I must regard the other amendments in Bill C-259 as being part of the over-all reform and not subject to piecemeal implementation.

The hon. member also suggested by way of a transitional period at least that the inclusion of unemployment insurance benefits in taxable income should be deferred. I noted he did not suggest that the deduction of unemployment insurance premiums from taxable income be deferred as well. I think those two items go hand in hand. I again perhaps would lump them in the same general area as the earlier discussion about the treatment of senior citizens. This is a tax reform package and there are numerous changes both in deductions, exemptions and items of accretion to wealth which should be included in taxable income.

The hon. member for Fundy-Royal and the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville dealt with the problem of taxation in respect of scholarships, fellowships, bursaries and research grants. The hon. member for Fundy-Royal as well as the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville have discussed this with me privately on earlier occasions, although I must say that in speaking to the hon. member for Fundy-Royal I was under the impression that the item we were talking about involved the problem of the professional on sabbatical or otherwise non-resident which really comes up under section 115 rather than under this particular block of clauses with which we are dealing. However, it is a problem of the same nature; at least, it deals with the same group of taxpayers and perhaps it would be appropriate to discuss it here. Section 56 does require that all scholarships, fellowships, bursaries and prizes for achievement in excess of the exemption of $500 be included in income. This $500 exemption is deductible from the aggregate of those classes of income. That is a point which must be made clear.

It should also be pointed out that while any items of scholarship, bursary, and so on in excess of $500 must be included in income, students are still able to deduct from their total income their tutition fees and in many cases the moving expenses which are incurred as a result of moving to permit them to use the scholarship at a particular institution. They also have their personal exemption. If we take the example of a single student who reeives a scholarship or bursary, he has his $1,500 personal exemption, he has the standard $100 deduction and he has the special $500 deduction. This brings his total deduction to $2,100. Then, on top of that he has the amount if any he pays in tuition fees to the institution he is attending. I do not think in reality anyone could argue that students who are in receipt of scholarships, bursaries and so on are likely to be impoverished as a result of this decision. The decision here was made as a result of the recommendation of the Commons committee. I think we have to make a distinction. I gather from the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville that the institution of higher learning have not yet themselves distinguished between research grants, scholarships and bursaries.

The section regarding research grants contains provisions which basically have been in the law before and which allow a taxpayer on receiving a grant to deduct expenses that are incurred by him. I think representatives of universities and graduate schools whom I have met over the past several months have been fair in admitting that there was a bit of a tax dodge here that was being rather well used in certain quarters in respect of research grants for overseas purposes.

The anomaly, as suggested by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal, of the moving expenses being allowed to a student or other recipient of a research grant carrying on his work outside Canada when he is moving from Canda to wherever he is doing his research but not back, is based on the principle that the deduction of expenses incurred in earning a research grant must be made against the research grant itself. I would expect that if a student—if I may use that term to include not only students but many professors—goes overseas, conducts his research, exhausts the research grant and decides to stay on with his family for holidays, a pretty good question arises as to why the return fare should be a write-off against the research grant. If, on the other hand, his research grant involves work overseas and work back here in Canada to complete its use, the travelling expenses both ways would undoubtedly be allowed. So, I think there is equity in the provision before us.

The hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville raised in specific terms the problem of those who are currently on a sabbatical or otherwise out of the country. This is a genuine problem. Again, it is a problem that I have discussed with the universities and with graduate school representatives. If for no other reason they needed to know several months ago what our intentions were from their own budgeting point of view. The option is open to them to make the funds available to the student for the balance of the term of his arrangement with them before the end of this calendar year, and if that is done then of course it will not be taxed as provided in the current act. Other than that there are, I am sure, throughout the whole act, through any major change in the income tax legislation, a number of places where persons may be caused some inconvenience and where indeed they incur some cost as a result of major revisions to the income tax laws. Transitional provisions, such as the hon. member for Fundy-Royal noted, have been afforded to many of our industries, to the co-operatives and credit unions most recently by amendments tabled here. But the point of transitional provisions is to relieve some relatively long term problems that may arise as a result of the new provisions, and certainly not to relieve situations which will resolve themselves in a matter of months, as is the case here.

I think that deals with all of the questions. I am sorry that my response could not have been more favourable, but if I have missed anything, I am sure hon. members will call it to my attention.

Mr. MacGuigan: May I just say a further word on this subject, Mr. Chairman. It seems to me that in his discussion regarding moving expenses the parliamentary secretary has been somewhat unfair. It may be, of course, that there are some professors who combine their work with a subsequent European holiday, but this is surely not the rule. I do not know whether it happens as often as it does not, but I think a provision could be written into the act which could take that into account. If it was half play and half work, that would be a different situation from the situation of someone who goes to Europe purely for research purposes and returns here having accomplished his research.

Mr. Mahoney: I suppose I will have to ask the hon. member whether he took his wife and family purely for research purposes, because this is the problem we have in these areas. I do not blame a man, from the point of view of his own family life, wanting to take his family with him when he goes away for that long a trip, but much of the travelling expense that is incurred in these cases would in ordinary circumstances be regarded as personal and not incurred for earning an income.

Mr. MacGuigan: May I ask the parliamentary secretary whether, if the person did not take his family with him, he could then claim expenses both ways.

Mr. Mahoney: The Income Tax Act does not envisage in ordinary circumstances, and subject to the special problems mentioned by the hon. member for Moose Jaw, the deduction from taxable income of personal living expenses.

Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): I would like to say a few words on section 60 and that portion of subsection (e) dealing with exemptions for university students registered at a recognized college or university here in Canada. Many times in the House I have urged that no income tax should be levied on the earnings of students who are willing to finance their own university education. Perhaps this plea has fallen on deaf ears and I have a suggestion to make to the parliamentary secretary. Under subsection (e), which deals with tuition fees, the student is granted the privilege of deducting from his taxable income the amount of tuition fees, so perhaps we should give him some other basic deductions here.

In some other sections, certain arbitrary amounts are set which the taxpayer may deduct for specific purposes. Perhaps it would be difficult to set an arbitrary amount to help finance the cost of living away from home, such as residence fees, the cost of textbooks and so on. I wonder what the parliamentary secretary would say to doubling the basic exemption for a single person who is forced to live away from home to obtain his education. All members of the House are continually being asked for assistance by students endeavouring to obtain student loans. It seems to me that doubling their basic exemption while they are registered at a recognized university or college might be a means of doing away with a student loan, the means test that goes with it, and all the administrative detail as well as the disappointment in not getting it. It seems to me that to double the basic exemption of a single person, as I suggested, would make it unnecessary for a student to apply for a student loan. In addition, the summer earnings that he makes would, in a large measure, be his own.

Perhaps this would be one way of assisting our young people to obtain a college education. There may be other ways. The parliamentary secretary may have a better way of assisting these people, but I suggest this off the top of my head as one way of doing it, that is to increase the basic exemption. If doubling it would be too much, we could put in some other figure. I think it is rather contradictory for the government, on the one hand, to provide student loans and, on the other hand, to force these same students to pay income tax on the earnings they have made to finance their education away from home. I think we want to look at another way of doing it, and it could be found by increasing exemptions as I have suggested.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to respond briefly to a couple of the comments the parliamentary secretary made a few minutes ago. He seemed to feel that it was difficult to adjust the income tax package in such a way as to provide for the exemption of the $650. for senior citizens to be made retroactive to January 1, 1971. I am grateful to him for having pointed out to me earlier how the bill deals with the matter of making the guaranteed income supplement not taxable for this year. It is simply a matter of section 71 at page 702 being written into the bill. The changed wording is spelled out and subsection (2) reads:

This section is applicable to the 1971 taxation year.

In other words, what it amounts to is that when the government wants to make a change retroactive rather than in the current year, it seems to have no difficulty in doing it. I continue to express my regret that this change has not been made so that when senior citizens are computing their income tax for the year 1971 they will get the benefit of it. As it stands, they will have to wait until they are computing their income tax for 1972, away off in April, 1973. A lot can happen between now and then.

The other subject which I raised on which the parliamentary secretary was generous enough to make comment was unemployment insurance. The ease with which my friend can brush aside these complaints is something to behold. I know there is income tax deductibility for the few cents that people pay into the unemployment insurance account as opposed to the tax that they have to pay on their benefits. It is almost a one horse-one rabbit situation. Apart from that, I regret to say that the parliamentary secretary seemed to miss my point altogether. I was not arguing the rights or wrongs of permanent basis. What I was pointing out was the the sudden change-over on June 27 has produced many anomalies under which people are getting less than they thought they were going to get, despite all the unemployment insurance commission's advertisements that this new act is such a wonderful deal. I suggest that because these anomalies are having this effect it might be reasonable to request that they be softened by not applying income tax to unemployment insurance benefits for at least a year. I am sorry that the parliamentary secretary misunderstood my point.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question? The hon. member for Lambton-Kent.

Mr. McCutcheon: Mr. Chairman, while we are on section 56, I should like to direct a simple question to the parliamentary secretary and I think it will only take him a moment to reply. Section 56(C)(ii) mentions retiring allowance. If this is a little honorarium received by an employee on retirement, generally a couple of hundred dollars, that is fine but is there a provision whereby executives are able to take advantage of this retiring allowance in order to receive a fat bonus from their employer? May I ask the parliamentary secretary if there is a ceiling on the amount covered by this item?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I do not quite understand the purport of the hon. member's question. This is not an exclusion or an exemption from income; this is an amount which must be included when computing income for the taxation year. The retiring allowance must be included in income.

I should point out that the option is there, and as we mentioned when discussing the comment made by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants earlier, if the lump sum is very large the taxpayer may opt to purchase an annuity. This would effectively spread the taxation over the period that the annuity was payable rather than it having to be paid in the taxation year the lump sum was received. But the amount is taxable; it is not an exclusion, it is not a loophole or break for anybody.

Mr. McCutcheon: I am pleased to have an explanation from the parliamentary secretary. However, the section says, "but not including" and then goes on, so it is a classic example of how confusing this bill is to people who are not as skilled as the parliamentary secretary. I shall have to take his word for it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the hon. member would like to note that he is perfectly right about the confusion of this bill. But would he also like to note that the phrase which starts with "but not including" is part of paragraph (i) which began on the previous page and ends with line 14 on page 129. Then, we pick up (ii) which is "a retiring allowance" and (iii) which is "a death benefit . . ." and so on. In other words, the paragraph that says "but not including" is just a qualification of (i) but does not qualify (ii) and (iii). Have I made it worse?

Mr. McCutcheon: No, indeed, Mr. Chairman. I thank the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre for his words of explanation. However, I think I am a reasonably ordinary Canadian with a modest amount of intelligence, and if I cannot understand it a lot of people on Main Street are not going to understand it either.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Don't be so modest!

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question? The hon. member for Lambton-Kent.

Mr. McCutcheon: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the parliamentary secretary another question. On page 131, paragraph (j) reads:

amounts that the taxpayer became entitled to receive in the year upon the disposition of an interest in a life insurance policy, to the extent provided by section 148;

At page 408, section 148 (1) (a) reads:

in respect of any life insurance policy other than an annuity contract, the amount, if any, by which the proceeds of the disposition of an interest in the policy that he became entitled to receive in the year exceeds the adjusted cost basis of the policy to the policyholder as of the time of the disposition;

That is not so terribly confusing but paragraph (b) reads:

in respect of any life insurance policy (other than a policy that is a registered retirement savings plan or that is or is issued pursuant to a registered pension fund or plan)—

This is the point that I am a little concerned about, and maybe I shall have to call again on the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre:

—all or any part of the insurer's reserves for which vary in amount depending upon the fair market value of a specified group of assets (in this section referred to as a "segregated fund"), such portion of any amount allocated to the policyholder in the year under the policy as was allocated out of gross revenue of the insurer from the segregated fund, other than gross revenue that is a dividend (other than a taxable dividend) received by the insurer on a share of the capital stock of any corporation.

What happens to the policy holder of a mutual company?

Mr. Mahoney: If any amount is allocated to his credit as a result of the policy he holds in the mutual company, I do not think there is any distinction in this particular case between a mutual company and a shareholder owned company. This refers to amounts that are credited to the policy account of a policyholder and, of course, excludes payments made in respect of a policy that is used to implement a registered retirement savings plan, pension fund, and so on. This is simply an accretion of his assets as a result of the holding of his insurance policy. I admit that this is complicated terminology because of the desire to exclude the retirement savings plan and others like it. I just do not know whether I can explain it any better. This is the amount which becomes the property of the taxpayer during the taxation year as a result of his owning that insurance policy, and it is therefore included in his income.

Mr. McCutcheon: I thank the parliamentary secretary. What is the segregated fund? I notice that is mentioned here. According to my experience, there is a reserve fund or a reserve with respect to an insurance policy. There is also the dividend that is declared with respect to participating policies. Many people have said that the dividend is merely the refund of an overcharge on the premium. Frankly, this provision is completely confusing. I do not know who understands it. Certainly, I do not.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, the taxation of insurance companies is a rather specialized subject at best, and I am sure I will be more prepared to deal with it when we come to section 148, although, as the hon. member notes, this subject is brought in, by reference, here.

I am advised that the segregated fund referred to in subparagraph (b) is a very special sort of arrangement. Not all insurance companies have entered into that arrangement. Some do not have segregated funds. The fund may be referred to in this manner: an insurance company may issue a special class of policy with respect to which it sets up a particular reserve that applies to that class of policy but not to all policies which would be in the general reserve. I am afraid I am not able to answer the hon. member's question in a more satisfactory way. The general rule as to what credits to his account or to his policy account the taxpayer has to add to his income is covered in subparagraphs (a) and (b) and relates to exceptional circumstances.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, my remarks will be related to life insurance policy proceeds. As my colleague for Lambton-Kent has indicated and as the parliamentary secretary has indicated, this taxation of insurance companies and insurance policies is a new area of taxation and there is a great deal that is hidden. The side note by section 148 merely says, "Subsection 79D(1) modified". That word "modified" is the interesting word. Certainly, there is a considerable spreading out into the field of insurance here. I am wondering what the government's philosophy is in moving in here. Is it doing its best to try to take every dollar it can get and to discourage every form of saving that is made in this country? Canadians as such have a reputation for being strong savers via life insurance. Why the government feels, and I am speaking particularly of this administration, that big brother knows best, I do not know. This administration wants to get every blessed dollar it can and to discourage saving by individuals through life insurance which, in itself, is one of the best sources of domestic investment in this country.

Look at, shall we say, the proportion of Canadians who invest in life insurance and then at the performance of the life insurance companies in investing in Canada; and yet here we are, moving in on people who do not have large incomes and who are not in any privileged position. There is hardly a household today in this country, unless it is a very improvident one, that does not hold some form of life insurance, be it only of some limited kind. It may be only burial insurance. There is some degree of life insurance in almost every household. Yet here we are, as I say, moving in, digging, digging and digging deeper to dissipate and break up the attractiveness of life insurance. And for what purpose? Because big brother government says it wants the money and can spend it better. This is the very fundamental philosophy of a government that says, "We need the money and therefore must find it". I say they tax up to their expenditures. I have been saying this for years and years, and that applies particularly to this administration. This process started under the previous administration. They tax right up to their expenditures—

Mr. Mahoney: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): —and they always want more money.

Mr. Aiken: The parliamentary secretary ought to let the hon. member finish his sentence.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, this is a very eloquent speech. Yet I do not think the hon. member ought to leave the impression that these provisions are new in the amending tax bill. These provisions have been carried forward from the existing Income Tax Act. May I remind the hon. member that subsection 56(1)(f) which the hon. member referred to when originally opening this question is similar to a provision presently in the act. The clause which he is excoriating at the present moment is subsection 79(D) of the present Income Tax Act. So, while the philosophy is good and the speech is great, we are really not talking about changes in the income tax law.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, that is the type of intervention that comes from the parliamentary secretary. The wording opposite section 148 is, "Subsection 79D(1) modified." If the word "modified" means nothing, take it out. We have seen many areas in which a tax might be modified. There are many things which might slip in under a modification. For instance, you could double a tax as a result of a modification. As I was saying, this administration is moving further and further into the area of taxation of life insurance proceeds and life insurance companies. Surely to goodness it is germane to the thrust of the argument to say what I have said. If the parliamentary secretary wants to say something or argue a point, let him not rise on a point of order, because section 56(j) refers to section 148, and I am talking about section 148. There is no way one can raise a point of order with regard to relevancy of taxation of life insurance proceeds by trying to say this just carries forward an old section of the act. The explanatory note says this is a modification. If the parliamentary secretary wants to embark on how thin his knowledge is, let him indicate precisely in language that can be understood by members how the modification works and how this language is explained. Then, we will agree with him. Let us not take anyone to task about it.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, in response to—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is all right. I have the floor.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Mahoney: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member has invited a comment. When we are dealing in committee with section 148, I will be very pleased to give detailed answers. However, that section is not among the block of sections before us at the present time.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. I doubt whether that is a point of order. The hon. member for Edmonton West has the floor. He should be allowed to continue his remarks.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): If I have to read the words into the record in order to clarify this point, I will do so. Section 56(1)(j) reads:

> Amounts that the taxpayer became entitled to receive in the year upon the disposition of an interest in a life insurance policy, to the extent provided by section 148;

No one is going to ask this committee to pass section 56(1)(j) without a reference to section 148. If we did, when we comment on section 148, we would be faced with the argument that it, had already been approved in principle. I do not normally like to be cranky, but this type of intervention does not help the situation one bit. In any event, I made my point. We are moving further and further into the savings of Canadians by these further extensions of taxation of life insurance. If it started to creep in or earlier budgets, there is nothing wrong with commenting on it today. We must cry "halt" to this sort of thing.

I now wish to move beyond section 56 and again make reference to the child care expenses in section 63. If the parliamentary secretary has already made a reference to this, it will be sufficient. I do not know whether he has had an opportunity of discussing with the minister the proposition I put to him the other day about the limitation of age 21 of a relative to whom a payment may not be made. Many provinces have now adopted age 18 for the adult. It seems ludicrous to exclude from this new proposal persons between the ages of 18 and 21.

In addition, persons age 18 earning $600 a year or more from employment are obligated to pay into the Canada Pension Plan. This is one of those types of operations where contributions may have to be made to the Canada Pension Plan by the employer. At today's rates, it certainly does not take much for a full time child care attendant to earn $600 per annum. I do not know of any householder who can get full care for a child or children for less than $50 a month. If that is the case, the parent who hires the child attendant will have to make a contribution to the Canada Pension Plan, and it is necessary to make such a contribution to the Canada Pension Plan for a person between the ages of 18 and 21. Under the Income Tax Act, for certain relatives between the ages of 18 to 21, as proposed in this bill, a working mother will be disentitled to child care allowance because of the reference in this provision to age 21. If he has not already done so, I urge the parliamentary secretary to discuss this matter with the minister to see if we can bring about a little bit of normalcy or uniformity between the Canada Pension Plan requirement and that part of the Income Tax Act relating to child care allowance.

In addition, we will want to say something when section 74 is before the committee and the related questions with regard to the wife as an employee of her spouse's business. I merely want to mention this again. It is highly inequitable for the wife of a country town doctor or dentist who must act as a nurse-receptionist in the small clinic where her husband and associates work to be precluded from obtaining the child care allowance, although she has to go into the clinic in order to utilize her skills or it may be required that she work. It may be said by some that this is not necessary for professionals. What about young professionals trying to establish themselves in a rural town? Such professionals do not earn that much money in the early stages.

It is often necessary for the wife of the doctor or dentist to act as receptionist or nurse. The act disallows her to be classified as a separate wage earner. It disallows her the working mother's entitlement under the amendment to the act. This may be even more important in the case of someone who works for a partnership in which her husband is involved, particularly a non-professional business. If people feel professionals earn enough to get along, that is one way of looking at it. However, I know of many instances of carpenters, plasterers, electricians and others where the wife of a partner or possibly the wives of two partners have to work in the business in order to make a go of it. Under the proposed section 63 of the act, they are disentitled. This is wrong. There is thus a discrimination that should not exist.

It is always very interesting when the general public decides the government has done something popular. In this case, the government is alleged to be allowing working mothers to claim child care expenses. However, if you look at the fine print, you will see that the limitations are rather severe. The wording certainly curtails the scope of this provision of the act. Many people feel that they might qualify, but they will be absolutely astounded when they read all the qualifications. I do not know just how much good this will do.

The other matter I want to deal with is moving expenses. I do not know what can of worms this is likely to open or how many regulations will have to be brought in so as to eliminate abuse. Just how far will taxpayers have to go in order to justify their claim that a move results from a change in employment? Suppose it were a technological change? Some of our larger companies keep several operations going within such cities as Toronto and Montreal and staff are often transferred from one plant to another. Or consider some of our major department stores. In my own city of Edmonton, Woodwards, for instance, have a branch near the northern limits of the city, almost on the border of my constituency. They also have a store about nine miles away as the crow flies, in the southern part of the city. Staff are transferred between one store and the other. It could happen that a member of the staff was promoted, say, from assistant buyer to buyer on condition that he move to the other store. If he lived close to his original place of employment he might well decide that he could not put up with going back and forth across the city to work. So he would sell his home and buy another, or rent an apartment much closer to his new place of work. It is nonsense to insist that a man ought to spend an hour or an hour and a half every day travelling to work and back.

But would the cost of moving be deductible in such a case? Or will the regulations insist that in order to qualify people must move a distance of at least 25 miles? What are the basic requirements to be? This is what we must consider. Are we thinking in terms only of new work, a new job, a fresh start with a new employer? I know there was a good deal of discussion on this point during the committee hearings. Our conclusions were indefinite. It was a subject which seemed to open up, as I say, a can of worms. I hope the parliamentary secretary will tell us precisely what is intended to be done by way of regulations. The wording here reads:

Where a taxpayer has at any time ceased to carry on business or to be employed at the location or locations, as the case may be, in Canada, at which he ordinarily so carried on business or was so employed ... and commenced to carry on a business or to be employed at another location in Canada—

A man who works in the northern end of Toronto, let us say, could be transferred to new employment, or find new employment in the southern part of the city, 20 or 30 miles away. Why should he not be able to claim moving expenses providing they are not paid for by the employer? These are some of the questions I wish to raise. If the parliamentary secretary has answers, we shall understand the bill a little better than we do at present. And we shall see where we go from there.

Mr. Ritchie: I should like to speak on clause 61, Mr. Chairman. I am particularly interested in the forward income averaging proposal. To begin, I should like to refer to the minutes of the Senate Banking Committee dated September 29, 1971, at page 3512. Mr. Stephen Smith, a witness before the committee, stated:

The more interesting one, really, is what is usually termed forward averaging. That is the provision in clause 61 which will be of most help to taxpayers who have a very high income in one year. Clause 61 permits the taxpayer to spread his income by taking any amount of his income and buying an income averaging annuity from an institution. He is given a deduction for the premium he pays for the annuity under certain limitations.

Speaking of the way in which the method would function, Mr. Smith said:

The annuity can be issued by any company authorized to carry on that business ... It must be issued for a single lump-sum premium ... The annuity must be for life and with or without a guaranteed term, which cannot exceed 15 years.

While this might appear to be beneficial at first sight, I submit it has considerable drawbacks. I believe, also, that it is likely to have considerable repercussions upon the Canadian economy. Those who take advantage of this provision must buy an annuity which will pay a fixed amount for the balance of the years during which they live. Funds are tied up indefinitely in this annuity. This may not be a bad idea for persons approaching years of retirement. People aged between 50 and 65 might well wish to take advantage of it. But consider its effect on those of younger years, the restrictions it would impose on those who wish to change their positions, or businesses, who might wish to sell their property and expand their interests, and who need money with which to do it. It seems to me we could devise other types of forward averaging in connection with the so-called voluntary recovery appreciation which did not require taxpayers to put money into an annuity from which they could only draw a fixed amount each year.

It is often said that Canadians are great savers and investors in enterprises which carry no risk, but that they are not good risk-takers and do not sufficiently support entrepreneurs. I would point out that those who are licensed to provide annuities are extremely restricted when it comes to the nature of the stocks and securities in which they can invest. The bulk of their investment is in government bonds and similar securities, so by means of this provision the government is in effect ensuring itself of a lending pool from which it will be in a position to draw funds. I question whether or not this provision is advantageous to the economy as a whole. I think we might well have to provide for alternative forward-averaging whereby the taxpayer would settle his accounts with the government, but within a shorter time than having to take an annuity that would span his whole lifetime. This provision might well affect significantly the pattern of borrowing and investment in Canada. If I am mistaken that the taxpayer must take an annuity for life at a set amount per year, then I shall be glad to hear the parliamentary secretary say so; but as I read the provision this is the only form of forward-averaging available and really locks in an individual for his lifetime. If someone is only 30 or 35, this may not be all that advantageous to the economy as a whole.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I believe the hon. member for Dauphin has misunderstood the provisions of this section. May I refer him to the definition of "income-averaging annuity contract" which appears at page 148 of the bill and is subsection (4) of section 61. This provision states that such an annuity may indeed be a life annuity, as the hon. member has pointed out, but subparagraph (B) also states it may be an annuity to the individual for a guaranteed term. So, the annuity can be of either type. If an individual chooses to average a lump sum payment over an eight or ten-year period, then he would buy an eight or ten-year endowment annuity. He also has the option, of course, to purchase a life annuity.

While I am on my feet, might I refer to the point raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West? I see he has left the chamber, but since so many points have been raised I should like to mention this one before I forget it. The distance that a person has to move to get moving expenses is 25 miles. The distance is not governed by whether one moves from one community to another. In many of our cities such a distance could be traversed within the boundaries of the metropolitan area.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the parliamentary secretary whether there is a minimum time within which this forward-averaging annuity can be brought forward?

Mr. Mahoney: I do not think there is a minimum time. If someone had a $50,000 payment and wanted to split it $25,000-$25,000, he could take a two-year annuity. But a taxpayer's own circumstances would dictate the option that he chose.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Chairman, this point has possibly been answered but it relates to section 56. Reference is made on page 129 to a retiring allowance, and I should like the parliamentary secretary to explain whether or not severance pay is included in this provision. There has been considerable anxiety about this on the part of many people working in factories which close down and severance pay has either been negotiated or agreed upon, or in some way allowed. I wonder whether this provision relates in any way to severance pay.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, ordinarily severance pay is regarded as income under the Income Tax Act, and as such should be included in the computation of income. I am aware that in certain cases special regulations or legislation have been passed, but under the general income tax law this is regarded as income from an employment and is therefore included as taxable income in the year in which it was received. Again, of course, this is subject to the option of forward-averaging which we have just been discussing.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Chairman, I am sure members of the committee are all aware of the problems that may arise with severance pay. When a refinery closes down, any workers who receive severance pay are confronted with the fact that they cannot receive unemployment insurance since this pay is shown as earnings. The whole purpose of severance pay is to give people time to relocate themselves in some other part of Canada. This is a question that has received a lot of attention, particularly during the last two or three years.

According to section 62, which we discussed in this committee last week, in the event that a worker is told by Manpower to apply for a mobility grant for moving expenses, where would he apply? We have all heard of cases of people who have tried to obtain mobility grants under the manpower legislation, and section 62 does give consideration to relocation, moving expenses and so on. Would the parliamentary secretary elaborate on these two areas that are covered by section 62?

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall section 56 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the parliamentary secretary would just clarify that point. That was the purpose of asking the question.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I am not really in a position to discuss in detail Manpower mobility grants. If the hon. member can point to a section of Bill C-259 which brings them into income, then I will agree with him that these are taxable. If he can point to a section that excludes them from income, then I will agree they are excluded. But I am not entirely clear just what sort of comment the hon. member is expecting from me at this point.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Chairman, I cannot point to a section in this large volume before us. The only point I want to clarify is where the average taxpayer looks for assistance if he wants to relocate himself in some other part of the country. To which piece of government legislation does he look? Does he look to Manpower mobility grants or to section 62? When this question is placed on my desk, I like to be able to answer it. Invariably, of course, I have to telephone a department of government to find out who looks after what. This is the only point I want to clarify at this time.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I think it would be fair to describe this bill generally as an extractive statute. If the hon. member's constituent is desirous of obtaining a grant, he will have to look elsewhere than the Minister of National Revenue.

[Translation]

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. McBride)—Atomic energy—Basis for loan to rehabilitate Glace Bay heavy water plant; the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave)—Manpower—Reasons for exclusion of reserve Indians from labour force survey—Inclusion in local initiatives program.

[English]

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, on October 14 the Minister of Finance brought in a lot of "mini-budgets" which announced new programs designed to combat the tremendous amount of unemployment expected in Canada during the forthcoming winter. I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary whether there is any involvement of the $25 million program set up for on-the-job training in this legislation we are discussing. Will there be amendments or changes to cover the travelling expenses of those people involved in apprenticeships or on-the-job training which is being initiated? The people who will want to participate should know where they stand and how this will affect their incomes, travelling allowances and things of this nature.

• (5:00 p.m.)

Mr. Mahoney: The Minister of Manpower and Immigration is in the chamber and the hon. member might like to discuss manpower retraining programs privately with him. I can only say that under section 56(1)(m) of the bill there is a clear indication that moneys paid under that type of plan would be taxable income. That is the extent to which sections 56, 57, 58, 60 and 63 of Bill C-259 allude to the particular matters the hon. member has raised.

Mr. Howe: It is my understanding that this is a new program being initiated and I am sure those people involved would like to have a clear definition as to how they stand under section 56(1)(m) in respect of income from this new training program. Perhaps the minister in charge of these programs could elucidate a little more on what is to happen to these people and whether they will be involved under this new tax bill.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to appear obtuse, but I did think there was some general disposition to be relevant at this point. I seriously suggest that any discussion of manpower retraining programs at this particular time would not be relevant to the sections under consideration. I am sure the information the hon. member seeks could be obtained privately from the minister who is in the chamber at the moment. We have amendments to the Income Tax Act before us. The provisions in section 56(1)(m) provide that there shall be included in income amounts received by the taxpayer in the year as or on account of an adult training allowance paid to him under the Adult Occupational Training Act. That is about as far as this particular bill goes in dealing with the subject the hon. member has raised. While I would not for a moment denigrate the remarks he has raised, and indeed I might be much happier discussing them than the bill before us, they are not germane to the present bill.

Mr. Howe: I feel they are germane to this particular bill because this is a new program announced on October 14, and these income tax matters will certainly have something to do with the incomes of certain individuals in Canada. While we are dealing with this matter a clearer explanation should be given as to what will happen to these people.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Chairman, I might agree with the parliamentary secretary that we are not considering things which come under other departments, but if he will refer to page 131 he will see that adult training allowances under the Adult Occupational Training Act are mentioned in this bill. Perhaps the analogy is not good, but the people of Canada are getting a little fed up with the number of departments of government in which there is no continuity. In this field of retraining we have manpower, labour and now income tax involved. We are trying to find out where these people should go to obtain the assistance to which they are entitled.

The parliamentary secretary suggests we are dealing with income tax matters this afternoon, but included in the bill are some things we want explained. We have a minister in charge of Manpower and Immigration, and perhaps he could give the explanation, but this matter of the Incomc Tax Act involves manpower mobility grants. These people involved in manpower mobility will be affected by these amendments and they are entitled to find out what they will mean. The parliamentary secretary would naturally suggest they should not go to the Minister of National Revenue or the Minister of Finance for that type of assistance, but perhaps he should indicate the department to which they should go. In all seriousness, I think this is a matter which should be explained to the people in order that they will know whether they are entitled to consideration under the Income Tax Act.

It is my feeling there are too many departments overlapping, all trying to build their own empires. No one in Canada seems to know where he is going or how to get there. Somewhere along the line there should be some continuity of purpose, so the taxpayer who is paying the shot will know which way to go and when.

[Translation]

Mr. Godin: Mr. Chairman, we could say that they are trying to play a trick on us, since the bill under consideration is against the small wage earner. Indeed, taxes throughout the world have always been paid by the rich or the lucky ones but under section 56, the poor would also be taxed. In my opinion, nobody now is in a worse position than the many unemployed Canadians and I wish to object to that clause, Mr. Chairman. However, before resuming my seat, I would like to ask the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney) if his experts know how many persons will be affected by the new legislation and what amount the government expects to collect through it?

[English]

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, reference is made to bursaries at page 131 of the bill. Do I take it that a person in receipt of a bursary or scholarship is to be taxed to the extent that the value of it exceeds $500?

Mr. Mahoney: A person in receipt of a scholarship or bursary would be entitled to an extra $500 exemption over and above his personal exemption. The maximum would be either $500 or the actual amount of the scholarship or bursary obtained, if it happened to be less.

Mr. Gleave: It seems to me there is a conflict of aims or objectives. Obviously, the purpose of governments granting scholarships is to allow students who are non-earners to pursue their studies. If a student is an earner, the government would not be giving any bursary or scholarship. We give bursaries and scholarships at various levels of government in order that people in non-earning positions can continue to study and carry out research. I do not follow the logic of providing that a scholarship will not be taxed up to a value of $500, but only on the rest. A student could not pursue a course of study or hope to accomplish some objective in six to eight months on $500. If the exemption were set at a level which would permit a student to spend a year on his project, then it might make some sense.

It seems to me that this section treats the bursary as income and, therefore, assumes that the bursary is an earning. But it is not really. A bursary should not be regarded as an earning; it should be regarded as a grant given to a student to pursue some research which, in most cases, the provincial or federal government regards as a desirable objective. Or course, some students get grants from private sources, but if it is the opinion of the government that amounts from private sources are excessive, then this might be a reason for seeking to tax part of it in the hands of the private sources. If they think the amounts from government sources are excessive, then the obvious thing to do is to cut down the size of the grant from the government. But to tax above the first $500 of bursaries which are given to students to pursue studies and research does not add up.

Mr. Mahoney: First, I must apologize to the hon. member for Portneuf for not answering his question immediately. I had to get the figures here. I have no idea of the number of individual taxpayers who might be involved. However, in terms of dollars, an estimate appears in the summary of the tax reform legislation, and I would refer the hon. member to page 64 of the English version. I hope it is the same page in the French version. I refer to the table entitled "Revenue Effect of Personal Income Tax Changes in the First Year of the New System". On the basis of the 1972 incomes, it is anticipated that the inclusion in income of unemployment insurance benefits would result in revenues of $130 million, while the deduction of unemployment insurance premiums paid by employees would result in revenue deductions of $100 million. So, the net figure is an estimated revenue gain of $30 million.

So far as the question of the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar is concerned, I did answer it at some length earlier this afternoon when the hon. member was unable to be with us. I shall simply say briefly that the thing to remember here is that this is an additional exemption over and above the $1,500 exemption, over and above the $100 standard deduction, and of course in addition to that students are entitled to deduct from their taxable income the amount of tuition that they paid to an institution. So, leaving aside the tuition completely, no student in receipt of a $500 or more scholarship or bursary would pay tax until his income reaches the amount of $2,100 a year. The $500 is not the level at which students start to be taxed, but it is an additional exemption over and above that which they otherwise have.

I would also take some exception to the hon. member's generalization that scholarships and bursaries are necessarily paid on account of need. Indeed, many are, perhaps most are, but certainly not all, and I think that is a fact to remember. I really feel that most students should not feel hard done by, by having to start to pay income tax at the level of $2,100 net after payment of their tuition fees for the year.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I should shed some light on the argument that was started by the hon. member for Fundy Royal and which has been followed by others, winding up with the statement we just heard concerning the taxation of scholarships and the like. Having been a member of the committee, I may say that it was our feeling that if you added that to the basic exemption you probably got something that did cover tuition and residence fees of universities. I think that was the reason for it. Even so, I think a number of us did feel that perhaps we should not be so meticulous about bringing every dollar that moved in Canada within the clutches of the tax collector. We felt that there may be good reason for saying that students should have some kind of preferential treatment because we knew that later on, as the major taxpayers in Canada, from the preferred positions in the professions and with preferred income, they would be shouldering a substantial part of our income tax load. Anyway, I think the parliamentary secretary would probably agree with me that after the $500 which was arrived at, adding that to the basic exemption, you get $2,000, and we felt that generally this should be good enough at least to cover the university fees.

I should now like to go to another point, if I may. However, if anyone wants to follow up that line, I would be glad to yield my place for the time being.

Earlier today I made an objection to a story which appeared in the Mail-Star of Halifax on Saturday afternoon written by Dan Turner of the Canadian Press. I do not withdraw a word of the objection that I made to Mr. Turner's report as it was edited and as it appeared in that newspaper. However, he has shown me a report that he had apparently done earlier for the Canadian Press which I thought was eminently fair and which did represent what actually took place on Friday afternoon. I only wish the gentleman had carried that type of reporting forward into the next day. So, I have done him half an injustice, not a complete injustice, and he has done us a half injustice and not complete justice.

The point about which I wish to talk goes back to the day care or child care centres. First, I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary whether there are any other provisions in this legislation which would promote day care or child care centres in Canada. Are there any other provisions which would make it worthwhile for industry in particular, because we are dealing with people putting themselves in a tax exempt position or being entitled to write off certain deductions, or for government departments for that matter to provide day care centres?

Mr. Mahoney: I am not aware of any, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. McCleave: I would like to put in a plug for the consideration of such. I think that perhaps we are taking the wrong approach and that we are really trying to tax the pin money of people rather than getting to grips with a pretty big problem. I am pretty sure that when the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway gets after all of us tonight on this question of day care and child care centres we will learn much more than I could possibly say now. But I should like to put on record the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition when he spoke on March 16, 1970 at a dinner in Sault Ste Marie, Ontario:

> The government could offer incentive for companies to provide day care facilities on their premises. It could act as an example itself by setting up day care centres for its employees.

I think these remarks commend themselves. We are at the dawn of something that is very important.

My other point relates to the particular matter which I raised, namely the mama and papa position, that is the people who run the corner grocery stores or small businesses across Canada. Some of the provisions in the Income Tax Act simply do not give them tax relief. After I left the House on that particular evening, one of my colleagues mentioned a husband and wife who ran a garage under such circumstances—I guess you could call it a mama and papa garage. The wife brought their five children, under the age of six, who were placed in a room in the back part of the garage. They survived, I guess, as best they could through the day while mama attended to the books and so on and while papa attended to the job of dispensing the gasoline, grease, oil and so on.

This is similar to the situation I mentioned the other day where, because the business is not incorporated, such people do not get relief under the provisions of this act. If the business were incorporated I believe section 74 of the act would take effect and there would be no presumption that the woman was earning a separate income on her own. Therefore, obviously, if one looks at page 151 she could not qualify as having an income for a taxation year. I suggest this is one of the technical things which have been overlooked or is something which has been missed. I would hope, since this is part of the story, the parliamentary secretary might indicate that there will be some relief in this direction before we conclude our consideration of the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member of course raised this during the discussion on section 109 and section 110. This perhaps is the other side of the coin. Now we have a situation where those in wedlock apparently have been penalized under the Income Tax Act, while those who choose to go unchurched may have some small benefit accruing to them. The problem has been considered. I believe we would admit in honesty that there are many ways in which marriage imposes a genuine hardship. However, the administrative problems of dealing with payments from husband to wife or from wife to husband as the case may be, where such payments result in a reduction of the over-all tax burden on that particular family, are formidable. Frankly, we have not come up with a solution to the problem that would satisfy the government in trying to achieve the balance of equity principle in the government's dealings with taxpayers and equity among taxpayers themselves to make sure we do not afford any particular group or class of taxpayer an undue opportunity for tax avoidance. If hon. members can come up with any good suggestions that would achieve both these objectives we would certainly be pleased to hear them.

Mr. McGleave: Mr. Chairman, since he frankly granted that the problem does exist, I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary if anybody will be burning the midnight oil over the next few days in an effort to see if something can be done. I know many of us can raise problems but perhaps we do not have sufficient time during the day to come up with exact answers. Granted that the problem exists, is anybody trying to cure it?

Mr. Mahoney: I am advised that the tax people in the Department of Finance have been burning the midnight oil over this particular problem for many years and are still burning it. I am not saying that the solution will manifest itself in the two or three days left to us to deal with this particular area of the bill.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Maybe they should try it in broad daylight.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Chairman, as you know, I have tried without success to persuade the government to exercise its moral and social conscience with regard to raising the exemptions of single individuals and married couples. I have also tried, without success, to change the government's view in respect of allowances for travelling expenses. I shall again try in my very humble way to persuade it to make certain changes in respect of other sections. I would direct the attention of the parliamentary secretary to page 129, of the bill which covers the question of alimony. If I read the section correctly, payments of alimony which have been made pursuant to either a court order or a separation agreement are not taxable income. A question arises in respect of a husband who pays moneys for the support of his wife and children and, because he does not have a court order or a legal separation agreement, cannot claim these moneys for income tax purposes. When I read this section I see the government is still sticking to the principle that there must be either a separation agreement or a court order before this amount is allowed as a deduction to the husband.

I would have thought from experience, and from the representations made by the various groups, the government might have yielded a certain amount and permitted as an exemption that payment by the husband to the wife for the support of herself and the children, even though there is an absence of a court order or a separation agreement. We should keep in mind that in many of these instances where there is absence of either a court order or a separation agreement, the parties are motivated by one of two things. It may be that, because of religious principles, the wife is not motivated to move either for a separation agreement or a court order, or it may be that the husband is hoping for a reconciliation. However, why should he be penalized because, although he is assuming his family responsibilities and is making payments to his wife, he does not have a court order or a separation agreement. This strikes me as being unfair and inequitable. That is the first point I should like the Parliamentary Secretary to explain.

The second point is set forth on page 132 of the bill and is captioned "indirect payments". It reads:

A payment or transfer of property made pursuant to the direction of, or with the concurrence of, a taxpayer to some other person for the benefit of the taxpayer or as a benefit that the taxpayer desired to have conferred on the other person shall be included in computing the taxpayer's income to the extent that it would be if the payment or transfer had been made to him.

Quite frankly, I am not too sure what that means. Perhaps I might give an example. Suppose a husband and wife were separated and the husband was making a nominal payment to the wife but also held with the wife the mortgage on another property. Let us say the mortgage is in the amount of $10,000. As a result of some complaining by the wife that the amount he is paying to her is not sufficient he is persuaded, as a matter of moral social conscience, to transfer his portion of a mortgage to her which he had held jointly with his wife. Would this mean that the $5,000 in respect of the mortgage becomes taxable in the hands of the wife? If it does, there is something unfair about this provision. I may be misinterpreting this section, Mr. Chairman, and if so I would like the parliamentary secretary's assistance.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Broadview was in his seat when I responded to the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants on the problem of the reduction of total income to the family unit as a result of payments to one spouse by the other. Without going over that ground again, surely the hon. member will appreciate the problem raised in connection with alimony or maintenance payments by one spouse to the other in the absence of a court order or separation agreement. Some criteria have to be established in order to ensure that such payments are in fact made for the purpose claimed rather than simply as a device to avoid or reduce taxation.

The example which the hon. member cited in his discussion of section 56 (2) might be responded to in the same way. The payments covered by that section do not necessarily limit themselves to gifts as between husband and wife. The section is identical to present section 16 (1) of the Income Tax Act and its purport is to provide that amounts due to the taxpayer do not cease to be his income merely because he directs that they be paid to someone else. Other circumstances may enter into the transaction which would justify his suggesting that this should no longer be his income but that of the person to whom it has been assigned. However, the mere fact of assigning it does not relieve him of the liability for taxation on it.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I would ask the parliamentary secretary a question prompted by the question of my friend the hon. member for Broadview. The case is covered where there is a judicial decree or a legal separation drawn up in a law office and signed by both parties and witnessed. I do not see why it would be out of order if you had a simple written statement made by both parties to the effect that a sum of money had been paid during a taxation year for the support of one of the parties and the children residing with that party. This would not really be a written agreement of separation but simply an acknowledgement signed by both parties that one had paid and the other had received. Has that idea been scouted as a feasible way of tackling the problem?

Some people will not go to the expense of getting a divorce. I guess I got myself in trouble the other day by making a plea on behalf of some of them. Some people would go to a lawyer's office although they would not go near a divorce court. They are willing to try and regularize their legal liabilities. Some people prefer a simple way of doing things, just a sort of acknowledgement system. Has this ever been discussed?

Mr. Mahoney: The section simply provides for a divorce, a judicial separation or a written separation agreement. There is no suggestion in the section of the degree of formality required in the written separation agreement. I think any agreement in writing that did effect a separation and that the parties did in fact substantiate should, if the question were asked, satisfy the Minister of National Revenue. This is a question of interpretation, which I would be glad to present to the Department of National Revenue for an answer. I should again point out that the jurisprudence should be ample here because this section is identical to one in the existing act.

Mr. De Bané: I should like to put a question to the parliamentary secretary. Do I understand from his remarks that the amount paid by the husband to his wife pursuant to the judgment of a tribunal is deductible from his taxable income?

Mr. Mahoney: That is correct. Of course, it is income in the hands of the party who receives it.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Chairman, I should like further enlightenment because I was not satisfied with the answers given by the parliamentary secretary concerning the payment of alimony. We find that democracy has its limitations even though democracy depends on persuasion. It seems that no matter how much you attempt to persuade the government, it falls on deaf ears. It is rather unfortunate that we have run into this low state of democracy.

The other night I said, with all the strength of Horatio when he defended the bridge that fell, that I hoped some hon. members on the other side would come to the defence of some of the cases we have raised and would speak up and speak out in an attempt to persuade the government. This has not been done, and it is most unfortunate.

I direct my question to another provision which is very relevant, that with regard to the allowance of $500 for a child. I have direct knowledge of this problem, and when I read the section which allows $500 it makes me feel ill. As an example, there is the problem of a couple I know who have a retarded child. The expenses incurred necessitate that both husband and wife work to make sufficient income to take care of that child and one other. I have been told that they pay $60 a week to a woman who comes in at eight o'clock in the morning, leaves around five o'clock in the afternoon and takes care of the retarded child during the day.

The parents feel that she is underpaid. But $60 a week for 50 weeks amounts to $3,000. It is absolutely necessary that they both work in order to meet the mortgage and other payments incurred in running their household.

As I read this section, it means they will be allowed $500 each year for the $3,000 they pay for the care of this child. There is something morally wrong with this situation, Mr. Chairman. If the government were the least bit conscientious, socially and morally, they would do something about it.

It would be quite easy for the parents to put their retarded child in one of the provincial institutions, but they do not want to do that because they love the child. As the years go by, the attachment of the child to the parents becomes stronger and makes it much more difficult to place the child in an institution. I hope the government is not so callous as to disregard the expenses of a couple who are trying to meet their family responsibilities.

The miserable $500 allowed in circumstances like these is unworthy of any government. The example I have cited could be repeated many times across the country. The parliamentary secretary who used to be the government whip is listening to me attentively. He is a lawyer by profession and I am sure has heard problems like these stated many times.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I do not think he is a lawyer.

Mr. Gilbert: He must have heard of cases of parents accepting their responsibilities for retarded children, keeping the children at home and bringing a person in to look after them during the day. Surely these parents ought to be shown special consideration. What has the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance to say about that, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the vigour with which the hon. member has presented his case and with which he is carrying out his assignment. I will co-operate with him as best I can to make sure we get at least to six o'clock before running out of steam on this section of the debate. However, I do not propose to repeat the remarks made during the debate on sections 109 and 110. The debate lasted for several days and dealt at considerable length with the improved tax treatment of parents of disabled or handicapped children. If the hon. member requires the page references in Hansard, I will be glad to send them over.

He is quite correct in his observation that under this section the limit of deduction for such a child would be $500. However, I think that you cannot, in the circumstances to which he alluded, deal only with this section; one also should refer to the various deductions that are permitted under section 110.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the parliamentary secretary would clarify his reference to section 110. I regret that I have not had time to look up those references. He suggested some additional assistance is given under section 110. Could he elaborate on that briefly?

Mr. Mahoney: I think that would be carrying co-operation from this side a little too far. That section was debated at length and adopted and I suspect the work of the committee might be unduly retarded if we went back and discussed sections we have already adopted. There are 333 sections in this bill and I believe we have now passed six of them. I would much prefer dealing with the sections before the committee now instead of reiterating at considerable length that which has happened.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, I could have obtained my answer in a shorter time than it took the parliamentary secretary to deliver his little lecture to the committee. However, I think the suggestion of the hon. member for Broadview is very good. We all know of cases where a disabled child has been an enormous burden to its family. There has been enormous hardship, particularly in cases where the family has opted to look after the child instead of placing it in an institution. Sometimes the child is disabled and not necessarily retarded. I ask the parliamentary secretary to consider making the full limit available in special cases involving mentally retarded or physically disabled children. The suggestion makes a great deal of sense.

If the parents of a disabled child could be given that kind of exemption and thereby could look after the child and relieve the public of the heavy expenses of maintaining the child in an institution, everybody would be further ahead. Society generally would be further ahead and the child would adequately be taken care of. We have heard of the many horrors existing in institutions which are not equipped to handle these problems. Often a child's disability calls for a person-to-person attachment. We ought to do as much as we can to encourage families to look after their disabled children.

I am not moving an amendment, for two reasons. One, it might very well be out of order and, two, I want to persuade the government, through the parliamentary secretary, to bring in a substantial improvement in this field. The $500 deduction with regard to services for a child who is being looked after in the home is an improvement over existing legislation. We acknowledge that. However, I do not think it would cost the treasury too much if we were to go the whole way, recognize the special case of disabled people and include in this legislation a provision which recognizes their case.

The government has brought in many amendments. Surely they could bring in another one covering this type of case. Perhaps this section could be stood for a little while to enable the parliamentary secretary to consult the minister and government advisers with a view to improving the bill.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, the suggestion just made by the hon. member for Waterloo relates to proposed section 63. I refer to the suggestion that the section stand. This is also the section on which the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway wishes to speak. May I inform the parliamentary secretary that the hon. lady is now in Ottawa; therefore we have not waited for her in vain. I wonder if we have reached the point where all that is left for consideration in this group is further discussion of proposed section 63, and whether sections 56, 57, 58, 60, 61 and 62 could not be called. I have in mind particularly the fact that to sections 57, 58, 60 and 61 there are amendments by the Minister of National Revenue which are not as clear to me as are some parts of this bill.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Chairman, you know the old saying, whom the gods would destroy they first make mad.

Mr. McCleave: They make them parliamentary secretaries.

Mr. Gilbert: The more I read the 707 pages of this bill, the more mad I become. I become mad in the sense that my moral indignation is aroused, and not in the sense that my sanity is affected. Many might say, "Thank goodness for that." When the parliamentary secretary suggested that we on this side were doing a pretty fair job in keeping debate going until six o'clock, I was hurt. For that suggestion to come after my speech of persuasion, the suggestion being that I was carrying the ball so to speak until six o'clock, hurt me, Mr. Chairman.

An hon. Member: You were not listening to Stanley.

Mr. Gilbert: That hurt me. I hope some members of the government party will be persuaded by my argument to rise in their place and support my suggestion.

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

Mr. Gilbert: I think that many government supporters are men of good conscience.

An hon. Member: Name one.

Mr. Gilbert: They have experience of these things. No doubt they are familiar with cases of parents of retarded children accepting their responsibilities and maintaining the child at home instead of putting it in an institution, thereby increasing very heavily their financial expenditures. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice is a man who appreciates legal problems as well as problems such as I have enunciated. I hope he will speak in favour of my suggestion.

I wish the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville, who deals with constitutional matters in the legal sense, would deal with constitutional matters in the physical and mental sense. In the final analysis they are far more important than the constitutional aspect. The hon. member has done a tremendous job as chairman of our committee. If he would deal with some of the social problems in life rather than the legal problems, he would go down in history. The law is dead unless it is infused with life, and life in itself relates to the social problems that we have. I wish I were very persuasive. I wish I were Ciceronian with regard to my conviction. I wish I had the flare—

Mr. MacGuigan: Would the hon. member permit a question? Would the hon. member distinguish so sharply between law and society if he took into account all the sociological notions of law that most legal scholars, including myself, hold?

Mr. Gilbert: I find this question difficult to answer, Mr. Chairman. One of the problems is that I am so close to my constituents that I appreciate their problems. I did not understand what the hon. member was trying to say.

During the past weekend there was a conference in Ottawa on poverty and the law. From what I hear, it was absolute chaos. The conference was weighted with lawyers. The poor people, those who have all the problems, were restricted with regard to expressing their ideas. The result was chaos. I will come right back to the point.

The Chairman: Order. I appreciate that the hon. member will come right back to the point. He is skilled in doing that. I will recognize the hon. member immediately. However, I want to draw to the attention of the committee that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre suggested a concrete and useful way in which we could spend the remaining five minutes before six o'clock. Having made that observation, I do not want to deprive the hon. member for Broadview of his time.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I regret, for my own sake and perhaps for the sake of the hon. member for Broadview, that I did not get the floor before. I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre made a very practical suggestion. However, I was caught in the eloquence of the hon. member for Broadview: I think transfixed is a better word. If the suggestion made is agreeable to members opposite, I think we can dispose of the matter in that way and immediately call it six o'clock.

Mr. McCleave: That is agreeable to us, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My suggestion is that we call section 56. It can be disposed of, and then we can call 57 and the amendment, and so on. It is understood that we do not go beyond section 62.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: If that is agreed, the Chair will proceed to put the question to the committee. Shall section 56 carry?

Clause 1, section 56, agreed to.

The Chairman: There is an amendment to section 57. This appears at page 8939 of Hansard for October 22. It is quite detailed. Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will the parliamentary secretary explain it?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, this amendment is entirely to the French version of section 57. It changes the wording used to refer to a superannuation fund or plan to bring it into conformity with the terminology used elsewhere in the bill in the French version.

Clause 1, section 57, as amended, agreed to.

The Chairman: There is an amendment to section 58. This appears at page 8939 of Hansard for October 22. Again, it apparently deals with the French version only. Hon. members have had the opportunity to read it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is the explanation the same?

Mr. Mahoney: Yes.

Amendment (Mr. Benson) agreed to.

Clause 1, section 58, as amended, agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall section 59 carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Section 59 is not before the committee.

The Chairman: I beg the pardon of the committee. We then move to section 60. There is an amendment to section 60. This also appears at page 8939 of Hansard for October 22.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Perhaps we should have an explanation of this. It is more than linguistic.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, the first amendment to section 60 is the amendment to the French version only. Again, it only changes the wording used to describe the registered retirement savings fund or plan to conform with the wording in other parts of the bill. The amendment to section 60, paragraph (j), is a correction to amend the cross-reference from section 146(6) to read 146(5). Finally, the amendment to section 60(n) is an amendment to delete the reference to the old age supplement. This is as a result of the decision to make the old age supplement deductible in computing taxable income. Accordingly, it is not necessary to provide for a deduction of those amounts.

Clause 1, section 60, as amended, agreed to.

The Chairman: We now proceed to section 61. There is one amendment which appears at page 8939 of Hansard and over on to the next page.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Explain.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, this amendment refers to section 61(2)(a). It is a change of wording in the French version to conform with the terminology used when dealing with superannuation plans or funds in other parts of the bill. The other amendment adds a new paragraph (g) to section 61(2) at page 147. The subsection to be amended describes items of income which may be used to purchase an income averaging annuity. The new paragraph (g) to be added to this amendment will provide for all or part of a prize for achievement in excess of $500. The excess $500 can be deducted. It can be averaged over a number of years by purchasing an income averaging annuity. It recognizes that a prize or achievement may be of substantial amount. If all of such a prize were taxed in one year it might be subject to a high rate of tax. That would be undesirable.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In the printing of this amendment at the top of page 8940 of Hansard there appears the phrase "/500". Is that just a typographical error? Should it read "$500"?

Mr. Mahoney: Yes, Mr. Chairman, the wording in the last line should read "exceeds $500".

Amendment (Mr. Benson) agreed to.

Clause 1, section 61, as amended, agreed to.

• (6:00 p.m.)

The Chairman: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has drawn to the attention of the committee a typographical error. This has been confirmed by the parliamentary secretary and I take it there is an order of the committee that an amendment be made accordingly.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall section 62 carry?

Clause 1, section 62, agreed to.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Six o'clock.

The Chairman: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall section 62 carry?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I understand that section 62 carried before six o'clock and that section 63 is the one we are now dealing with.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The reason I called section 62 was that it was not clear that the section had been carried. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre called it six o'clock and it was not clear whether it had been carried. If it was carried at six o'clock, then shall section 63 carry?

On clause 1—section 63: Child care expenses.

Mrs. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, I am very glad to have an opportunity of saying something on section 63 because this is a very definite, though small, breakthrough in a very important area, that of child care. I believe this is the first recognition by Parliament that has been given to the need for providing care for the children of working parents and I want to express my appreciation to the government for establishing this beachhead, as it were, in this particular area. I do not think, however, that this is a very big breakthrough, and I shall go on to say why. This is one of the gaping holes that exists in our social security system in this country. I am glad to see that a beginning is being made to plug this hole, though I think much more will have to be done to plug it thoroughly.

As I understand it, this section provides for a deduction of $500 for each child of working parents up to a maximum of four children, which is $2,000, or for two-thirds of the parents' earned income, whichever is the lesser. At the outset I should like to put a question to the parliamentary secretary and he can either answer it now or make a note of it. I should like to know whether this deduction is applied to the total income of both husband and wife if both are working, or is it applied only to the lesser of the two incomes, be the lesser income that of the husband or the wife? Certainly this is not clear as the provision is now drafted.

We have to face the fact that conditions today are such that only a small number of working parents can afford to care for their children while they are away working. This may seem a startling statement to make, but as far back as 1965 when I was doing some door to door campaigning I was amazed at the large number of children who were out on the loose after school, with the front door of their houses locked or with a latch key around their necks and whose parent or parents were away working. This is far from the state of affairs that a good many of us think exists today that is, parents looking after their children at all times during the day. Many people think that if parents are away working, relatives care for the children. But we have now moved almost imperceptibly to the point where there is no one to care for so many of these children, be they relatives or neighbours, unless special arrangements are made.

For a long time many people were worried that there was no federal provision—or any other kind of provision for that matter—to plug the gap that was left when the mother or father, or both, were working away from home during the daytime. To substantiate my statement that only a minority of working parents can afford to take care of their children while they are away, I should like to cite some figures. Admittedly, these are not 1971 figures but they are the latest I could obtain. They were compiled by the women's bureau of the Department of Labour.

According to these figures, in 1966 the median annual earnings of working mothers were $1,783—that is, working mothers with husbands—and $2,856 for widowed, separated and divorced mothers. This last category embraced 10 per cent of the mothers in the working force. I think the figures prove the point I am making, namely, that on these salaries or wages working mothers simply cannot afford to look after their children by paying others to care for them adequately.

The women's bureau also said that 29 per cent of families of working mothers where the husband was present had a combined annual income of less than $6,000 in 1966, and the average combined income for a two-parent family was $7,302. One might suggest that since 1966 wages and salaries have gone up. That is true, but I want to point out that the cost of living has also gone up enormously since that time and that the situation has become even more aggravated.

Proof of what I am saying lies in the fact that when the Royal Commission on the Status of Women was hearing representations and visiting many parts of Canada this was the problem expressed above all others, that is, the urgent need for child care for parents working outside the home, particularly for working mothers. That royal commission was impressed with the urgency of this matter. I should like to point out the need from another angle.

Again using information supplied by the women's bureau of the Department of Labour, a survey was conducted in April of 1967 which showed there were 540,000 mothers of children under 14 years of age in the labour force. One working mother in every five had children under 14 years of age. This involved more than one million children. The other day I asked the women's bureau to make an estimate of the current figures and they came out with the following: as of July 24 this year, instead of 540,000 mothers in the labour force with children under 14 they estimated there were 678,000 working mothers with children under 14. Almost 20 per cent of the mothers in the labour force have children under 14 years of age.

This is a very serious situation, one which shows that the time is long overdue to help working mothers with child care arrangements. The problem is growing and it is divided into a number of categories. The after school problem is very serious. When we complain about vandalism, juvenile delinquency and all that sort of thing we must realize that a great deal of it is the result of lack of proper and adequate arrangements for children coming home after school when the mother is out working. This would also apply in respect of a father of a single-parent family.

This summer I attended a conference in Ottawa on child care. It was attended by representatives from across Canada. At that time I realized this problem is growing worse by leaps and bounds in every province. I also attended a single-parent conference recently in the city of Ottawa and discovered that in a great many families the father is the only parent to care for the children. This adds to the difficulties.

The problem is most acute and urgent in respect of children under school age. In 1967 there were 357,000 children under six years of age whose mothers were in the labour force, yet less than 3,000 of them had been placed in day nurseries or centres. The need today is much greater and is growing fast. The Royal Commission on the Status of Women said there should be 450,000 places in child care centres provided in the immediate future.

For a few minutes let me refer to the element of cost of child care facilities. Under this income tax bill a deduction of $500 is being allowed per child, up to four children, or a total of $2,000. One hon. member from Toronto indicated the other day that this figure fell far below the actual cost of child care today. I have discussed this cost with child care people and have come to the conclusion that $500 is a very unrealistic figure in relation to the actual cost of child care.

The $500 deduction works out to $10 per five-day week in a 50-week year, or $2 per day. I should like to know if any member of this House knows where you can get child care for $2 a day. If I did know I would be hustling around to get the minimum wage people working on the situation. This is a very low figure which the government is providing. The amount of $2 per day for child care is pretty mean and also represents a violation of the federal minimum wage laws.

The actual minimum for which child care can be provided is $15 per week. This works out to an annual figure of $750. There are very few child care centres where you can obtain child care for $750 a year. The actual minimum market figure begins at $20 a week, or $1,000 a year. That is exactly twice the figure provided for child care in this legislation. It would be a very good idea for the government and the Parliamentary Secretary to have another look at this figure. The Canadian Conference on Child Care this summer suggested that even $1,000 per year was a minimum starting figure and that the actual market price was considerably higher.

Let me suggest also that this problem is far too big to leave to private arrangements. I may have to come back to this matter a little later because I see I have just about exhausted my time on the first round, so I will confine myself at this stage to private arrangements. I think the government is thinking in terms of parents making their own child care arrangements with individual baby sitters. That is a very unrealistic situation. Even if the exemption were raised to $1,000, which is far more realistic, this situation would not be good enough.

We have reached a stage when we must consider child care as we consider education. Years ago education was left to parents who had the means to hire private tutors or send their children to private schools. Only the well-to-do could afford that. There were tutors and private schools available for them, but we came to the conclusion in Canada many years ago that this system was not good enough for the people of this country. I think the government will have to go much further than even $1,000 a child. This is a realistic starting figure; it should be at least $1,000 per child per year instead of $500. The government, however, will have to go much further than that. I will leave the matter at this point and return to it later.

Mr. Thomson: Mr. Chairman, before making a speech I should like to ask a question of the parliamentary secretary. How did the government arrive at the figure of $500 in respect of this exemption? It might be interesting to know how it was arrived at. Is it a ball-park figure, or what?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, as one unnamed colleague here just mentioned, that is a mysterious process. The process by which these figures are arrived at involves a combination of things that are fed into an assessment of what the revenue impact may be and what objectives one would like to achieve in making changes to the Income Tax Act.

In this particular case the estimated revenue reduction as a result of the child care allowance we are talking about is $50 million a year. In all these figures such as rates, exemptions or any other deduction which may be limited by a top figure, for example, the employment expense allowance, we try to strike a balance between the government's revenue requirements and what we would like to do both politically and equitably for the taxpaying public.

Mr. Thomson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few comments on this provision. I do not profess to be an authority in this area such as is the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. However, I have spoken to individuals who have had to deal with the problem. I was a little surprised to find out what is being paid to baby sitters these days. It seems to me that the "grandmother figure" who looked after children as I knew the situation does not work for peanuts any more but works for union wages.

[Mrs. MacInnis.]

One even hears about people putting children through college by looking after someone's youngsters. I was horrified to hear the charges made for looking after children. I suppose this might be fairly natural for a bachelor because he is not accustomed to paying these costs. If one were in the position of being a single parent it would seem to me it would be almost cheaper to get married. Seriously, it seems to me we should consider a larger exemption for people who have to contend with this problem. We already find that within new apartment complexes day care centres are being established. With this type of exemption such centres may be more widespread.

When both parents work they have the problem of providing care for their children. It is logical that some arrangement should be made for the children quite apart from the convenience to the parents. In this connection I am very interested in the welfare of the children. If a single parent should be involved, or if both parents are involved because they must work for economic reasons, I think the child has a claim on society for a proper upbringing. I am quite concerned when I hear of people who are unable to provide an adequate standard of living for their children. In some cases the solution to this problem may mean the provision of baby sitters or day care centres. I think we should consider an increase in the $500 exemption because of the problems which people have.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, there is one point I wish to raise. I am going to strike out for male liberty in respect of this provision. Many people have been talking about single parents and there has been a suggestion that it is always the mothers of children who are involved. This act does not provide for the father at all except if he should be separated from his wife pursuant to a written separation agreement. This is repeated time and time again in the act. A man can qualify for the child care allowance for his children only if he is no longer married, second, if he is living separate and apart from his wife pursuant to a written agreement or, third, if the wife is certified by a qualified medical practitioner to be a person who by reason of mental or physical infirmity is confined for a period of not less than two weeks to an institution.

Mrs. MacInnis: How about widowers?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The widower is not specifically provided for, nor is the man whose wife decides she wants to play in greener pastures and has left him with children. We know this happens. Perhaps it does not happen quite as often as the case of a husband deserting, but there are many instances in which the wife deserts and leaves the children with the husband.

It seems to me the separation of these parties should be wider than pursuant to a written agreement. The widower, of course, is covered by the provision that he is not married since under these provisions he is not considered to be married. I must say there are many instances in which the wife has deserted the husband and has left the children with him. He would be in no position to negotiate an agreement, nor would there be a compelling reason to do so.

Perhaps a court order should be included. Suppose the parties were separated merely by means of a court order: say, for instance, that the family court decides for the benefit of the children or for other reasons that the husband shall live separate and apart from the wife. If the children are in the custody of the husband, surely to goodness he should be entitled to receive the child care allowance. One provision which might be abused is the deduction referred to in section 63 (1)(b) (iii)(A) where the wife may be confined to bed, there is a certificate that she is so confined for a period of two weeks, and there is need for child care. I think something could be worked out under that provision.

I ask the parliamentary secretary why the benefit is restricted to the taxpayer who is the father of children and who is separated pursuant to a written agreement. I know there might be opportunities for the parties to decide to live apart in order to see if they can get some edge. But surely to goodness where it is proved that the wife has decamped, or where a court has ordered the parties to live apart with the husband having the care and custody of the children that should be sufficient for him to qualify for the child care allowance.

Mrs. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, there are three questions that I would like to ask the parliamentary secretary at this point. The first concerns the matter of receipts. What will be the position of full-time university students who work during the summer to earn money to cover university fees and who require day care for their children during the university year? Under the act will they be recognized as parents working in the home?

The next question is, what will be the position with respect to receipts which must be submitted as validation for claims, first in the case of established day care centres? What will be the process for validating these organizations? The second case is with respect to parent co-operatives. What legal entity exists in a parent co-operative, because they would be issuing receipts to themselves?

Having said this I should like to deal with the matter of the receipts. This matter has been one of the more thorny issues among the people with whom I have discussed the question. There is the point of view that it is a pretty good thing to issue receipts because in this way some kind of standard is established. This is why I want to find out from the parliamentary secretary what the validation process will be and generally what the criteria for these receipts will be. It seems to me that if there is child care and receipts are issued for it some kind of standard should be required in connection with the child care. A very dubious benefit will be conferred on the child if we do not have some criteria in this respect.

Another point which I wish to raise is that a number of low income people with whom I have talked would like, to look after children and get paid for doing so under this income tax deduction provision, but they are afraid that if they do so this would interfere with their social assistance and, as a result, their social assistance might be cut.

Therefore I took the trouble to contact the Canada Assistance Plan people in the National Health and Welfare department and found out that if you are fortunate enough to live in some provinces you may receive $500 for looking after someone else's children without social assistance being reduced. The provinces wherein one's social assistance would not be reduced are Ontario, Quebec, Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and British Columbia. Nova Scotia is close to the line but it would probably be on the right side of it. In the other provinces social assistance would be affected before you could get $500 for looking after children. This is something which the parliamentary secretary should consider. He should find out whether there is some way in which this matter could be handled by his department in co-operation with the social assistance authorities, because it is a real problem for people on social assistance who want to become engaged in child care work.

There is another point which I should like to mention. When payments are made to people for child care there should be some obligation regarding the quality of child care. I do not know whether the parliamentary secretary would like to answer all those questions at this stage, but I would like to pursue the matter of eligibility and criteria if he would answer them.

Mr. Mahoney: The question which the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway asked first in her first presentation was whether child care allowance was applicable to the total income of the family. The answer is no. As to whether it is applicable to the lower of the two incomes, again the answer is not necessarily, although in practice that would be the usual case.

Section 63 makes it very clear that if the lady in the house is earning an income she is automatically qualified to claim this, but the man in the house has to pass a number of tests in order to be able to claim it, as was alluded to by the hon. member for Edmonton West. Either they are separated or he is not married and is supporting children for one reason or another, being a widower or divorced, or his wife is separated from him pursuant to a written agreement, or his wife is mentally or physically incapacited for a period of time during the year which would permit him to claim this allowance under section 63.

In passing I might refer to the comments of the hon. member for Edmonton West and note that of course in this particular area in almost every circumstance that I could conceive which the hon. member mentioned, the taxpayer would be entitled to claim a full, married exemption on behalf of a dependant other than his wife if the circumstance which he described existed. I would like to look at his comments to see if by any chance we have provided a situation where a man could not claim either the child care deduction or the married exemption on behalf of a dependant other than his wife. However, I do not believe that that situation exists. I think he is entitled to one or the other in those circumstances.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): What if he puts the children in a boarding school and avails himself of the provisions governing the placing of children in a boarding school, with its limitations? He would be denied that?

Mr. Mahoney: I do not think so. Assuming that his wife is not claimed as a dependant, one way or another he would be able to claim the equivalent of a married exemption in respect of one of the children. He would be able to claim the child care allowance up to $15 a week for the boarding school and up to the limit of $500 per child and $2,000 for the family. This is the sort of thing that I would like to pursue with the hon. member over a cup of coffee, when we could get down to the particular section in the bill in some detail. But I believe I am correct in my interpretation.

The questions raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway in her last presentation regard, first, the university student. The answer is yes, the university student can claim this exemption provided he can say that the child care payments were made for purposes of earning income and not simply for purposes of freeing the parent to attend university.

The exemption during the year is related to the earning of income and I would think that in many cases the working university student, one who works during the off season, would find that he or she could in fact claim at least a good part of this $500 exemption during the period that he or she is earning income. The allowance is not there specifically to allow the university student or any other student to claim the exemption so that he can attend the institution of his choice. It is related to the earning of income.

On the matter of day care services, there is no special restriction on this as far as the co-ops or anything else is concerned. Someone must issue a receipt; that is the whole situation. There should not be any problem about a parent co-op if it is bona fide and if it issues a receipt.

Earlier today we discussed the problem which arises when we propose to allow people to make a deduction from their taxable income in respect of payments made to people living under their own roof, to people within the family unit. In equity to the general body of taxpayers it is felt that some provision should be made to circumscribe and formalize the arrangement whereby a taxpayer can reduce his taxable income by making payments to another person in the family. As the hon. member can appreciate, these payments can be made to other members of the household provided that person is not entitled to be claimed as an exemption by the taxpayer claiming the child care allowance.

Undoubtedly there will be some administrative inconvenience for the taxpayers concerned, but we hope that the benefit of the general allowance, which will be a matter of an additional $50 million left in the hands of the taxpayers for the coming year based on the 1972 income, will outweigh any administrative inconvenience.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, the parliamentary secretary mentioned administrative inconvenience. That raised an important question in my mind which I shall pose as briefly as I can. What sort of thrust is there for change in our income tax law within the Department of Finance and also the Department of National Revenue which perhaps has the more immediate responsibility for administering the law?

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

I ask this question because as we get into a whole new system of reforms it is possible that we may create as many injustices as existed under the old system against which the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway and others fought for so long. Earlier today the parliamentary secretary said that people were burning the midnight oil in order to try and solve the problems. Perhaps the problem I chose was an unfortunate one because it has been around for years and has not yet been solved.

We have passed a good many reforms today and I hope that somewhere we get credit for that. I wonder if the parliamentary secretary could tell us how the process of reform works within the administration. Perhaps if we understood that we would feel better about saying "adopté".

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, as a private Member of Parliament I suppose that from time to time I feel as strongly as does the hon. member about the frustrations encountered when making representations to the Department of National Revenue on behalf of constituents whose cases seem transparently equitable at first blush. I must agree that we are into a period where the Department of National Revenue will be called upon to deal with a number of new situations. There are under this bill many new concepts being created for which there is no jurisprudence and no backlog of judicial or administrative decisions for guidance.

Speaking for the minister of the department that establishes tax policy, as opposed to that which administers the tax law, I can only say that we have attempted to achieve in the new tax law and the bill a situation of tax equity, and that applies not only to the relative treatment of different taxpayers but also to the relationship between taxpayer and the Department of National Revenue. We hope and intend that the Department of National Revenue will deal with this new tax bill in a fair, reasonable and realistic way. We expect that they will because we believe they are competent to do so and have the same objectives in mind. This is something which will be proved over a period of time. I can only give a testimonial in advance. I hope I can give the same testimonial three or four years from now.

Mr. McCleave: Could I ask a further question? I understand that a few months ago the Minister of National Revenue had established a group of people from across Canada who would advise him on an informal basis. I know the man from my own area is Professor Edwin Harris. I have complete confidence in him and I am sure the other people were chosen were equal care. I should like to know if it will be the responsibility of that particular group to consider any complaints that we may have about the operation of this new law a year from now when people have had a chance to see whether it has worked well.

How do we get to that group? Do we funnel our inquiries through the minister, or may we direct them in any other way? Will the group be carrying on continuing studies to ensure that we do not have to go through the great exercise in which we have been engaged for ten years and also to ensure that tax reform may come about more quickly in the future?

Mr. Mahoney: If the problem is in the area of administering what this Parliament presents to the Minister of National Revenue to administer, then the avenue suggested by the hon. member of dealing through the minister and his advisory council is correct. On the other hand, if it turns out that we have misconceived here what we thought we were doing, and if a change in the law rather than a change in the method of administering the law is indicated, then representations should be directed to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I wonder if the parliamentary secretary could tell us what Solomon-like distinction has been imposed upon blood relationship. At what point does the distinction cease? At page 153, lines 38 to 40, section 63 (3) (a) (iii) (B) reads:

who, during the year, was under 21 years of age and connected with the taxpayer or his spouse by blood relationship, marriage or adoption—

Perhaps there is a definition clause, but I have not been able to find it. Is blood relationship to be limited to immediate family? Is it the niece, nephew, great aunt? Do we get as far as great aunts? With many of my good Chinese friends anybody who is of the same family is known as cousin or auntie. Some of these relatives are joined by marriage. Why, in those shorter periods when the spouse is confined to hospital, shall we say, for an illness, is the sister-in-law being eliminated? I ought to mention a younger sister-in-law. She may be the most convenient and logical person to hire as a baby sitter; she knows the children. Yet the act seems to insist that one should get an outsider. Why is there this elimination?

I know some people say, "You will get your mother-in-law in to look after the children and she should not be entitled to qualify as a satisfactory child care attendant." I am just wondering why you should eliminate, say, a sister-in-law, the wife's aunt, or other persons bearing a similar relationship. I should be interested to know what is the thinking of Solomon in this connection.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And here speaks Solomon.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I will not attempt to answer the first part of the hon. member's question except to this extent: I refer him to section 251. If after perusing that rather lengthy section that deals with arms-length transactions, the definition of arms-length and the definition of persons related by blood relationships he is still in some doubt as to the clarity of the section, I would be glad to answer. These matters are defined in section 251.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): But, Mr. Chairman, the term arms-length connotes a different relationship and serves another purpose. An arms-length transaction is a business transaction and implies a business relationship. Here we are talking about child care allowance. Are we to lay down lines as to blood relationships?

An hon. Member: Is the hon. member talking of anyone in this House?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No, I am not talking of anyone in this House. It is remarkable that language like this should be used because there are such things as kissing cousins, and so on. They bear a second cousin relationship, which is a blood relationship and comes within the banned limits so far as marriage is concerned. Why would there be that sort of restriction with regard to the child care allowance?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry the hon. member wants to debate this question before looking at section 251 which deals with arms-length transactions. Actually, I am sorry that I said what I did because obviously my remarks led the hon. member to misunderstand what I said. The section also defines a number of other relationships, including those he mentioned and about which he asked a specific question. As I said earlier, I could read subsection 6 of section 251 which defines blood relationships for the purposes of the Income Tax Act, if that would help. However, the hon. member may wish to look at it himself. If he has some particular questions about the section, he could raise them now.

On the question of a sister-in-law and her eligibility for payment in respect of the child care allowance, I do not think that under section 63(3)(a) there would be any real problem so long as it is clear that the relative, be it a sister-in-law or otherwise, is not a person whom the taxpayer claiming the deduction is also claiming an exemption for under the Income Tax Act. I think the payment could be made to anyone who is actually performing the service.

The only problem arises when payment is made to someone who during the year was under 21 and who is connected with the taxpayer by blood relationship, adoption or marriage— in short, who is a person whom the taxpayer might claim as an exemption or claim an exemption in respect of for the year. I do not think there is any real problem so long as it is not a person with respect to whom the taxpayer was entitled to claim an exemption.

Mrs. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, I do not think we should leave discussion of this section without mentioning that, important though this provision is, if this is the government's whole program in regard to child care—and there is no indication that there is to be anything more—it is not adequate at all. We have gone past the stage when many people can provide through their own means for adequate child care arrangements. The commission appointed by the government went deeply into this matter and suggested that we cannot get by in this regard unless the federal government takes the initiative in providing for proper child care in co-operation with the other two levels of government. The federal government should take the initiative, it is recommended.

I raise this matter at the present time because there seems to be no other clause in the bill under which I can discuss it. The omission I refer to should be included in one of the sections. May I ask the parliamentary secretary if consideration is being given to the idea of a child care program in which the federal government will assume, not only the 50 per cent of operating costs allowed with respect to child care centres under the Canada Assistance Plan but also the 70 per cent of capital costs in connection with such projects for the initial seven-year period as recommended by the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. It suggested that the federal government's assumption of such charges is essential in the matter of child care.

I hope we are not just talking about the idea of baby parking, or about the aunt, grandmother, niece or other relative looking after the baby while the mother is working. I hope we are talking about modern knowledge as to how young children of under school age must be treated and dealt with to enable them to develop fully. Modern thinking and teaching on this subject says that we need day care centres for working mothers in a variety of locations. In some cases we need them in the community, in others in the factory and in some cases in homes where there will be adequate training, proper supervision, and so on.

I do not think we should get the idea that the $500 deduction from income tax contemplated in the section will do much to provide an adequate child care program across this country. It will not. Even if this provision led people to look after their children from the financial point of view, it still would not provide what is required for children or for the development of children across this country. It will not provide for Canada the sort of thing that is being provided in many countries of the world where children are taught under expert guidance, with helpers in child care centres so that growth, development and habit formation are promoted.

I know that much of what I have just said is not directly relevant to this section. It is, however, extremely relevant to child care. In my opinion, before this session ends the government ought to let us know that it is going ahead with a child care program across this country which will include a provision such as this one relating to the deduction of income tax and which will also enable the provinces and municipalities to set up day care centres where children of working mothers or working parents can be looked after. I think that is what the government ought to be considering at this time.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I suppose that the adequacy and timing of any particular government program is always open to criticism. As to who was right and who was wrong, that is something the historians will be better able to judge than those of us who are on the scene right now. I agree with the hon. member and appreciate her concession that this is indeed a significant step forward and a significant breakthrough. Hopefully, I feel it will be more adequate than she evidently feels it will be. Of course, that remains to be proved.

In response to the general proposition that the hon. member has posed regarding day care centres, whether I agree with her or not is rather irrelevant. Today we are talking about the Income Tax Act—concessions, deductions, exemptions and allowances, that may be made under that act. In the context of Bill C-259 we are not talking about whatever positive initiatives the federal government could or should be taking with regard to the establishment of this type of program in Canada.

I respectfully invite the hon. member to direct her ire, interest or whatever it may be to the Minister of National Health and Welfare when he is next in the House. All I can talk about is income, deductions from it and the tax that is imposed on the balance. In that context we have taken a very significant and meaningful step forward in terms of child care allowance and recognition of the fact of the working mother in our society.

[Mrs. MacInnis.]

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I was somewhat disturbed by reading section 58. I hope I am in order in discussing the section. I understand we are dealing with this group of sections. It came to my attention only a short while ago. If I understand the section correctly, it seems that it is in effect a repudiation of contracts entered into in the 1920s and 1930s.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I bring to the attention of the hon. member that section 58 has already been accepted. If his remarks, although related to section 58, are relevant to section 63 which the committee is now studying, they are in order. The group of sections put to the committee was open to discussion. Now that these sections have been accepted, I wonder whether the committee would gain anything by reopening the study of section 58 because a decision has already been rendered.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to agree with your ruling. However, if the hon. member has a special concern I might be able to answer rather quickly and assure him that section 58 does not represent an amendment to the Income Tax Act as it exists. This section is identical to the present section 78. Accordingly, whatever concern he may be expressing does not arise from any change in the law as contemplated by this bill.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Chairman, the clause under discussion can be best described as a mini-care provision for children, brought forth by a mini-minded government. When one looks at the contents of the provision, a miserable $500 for child care, one realizes the inadequacy of the amount. The parliamentary secretary stretched out his chest to its full extent when he said this program would cost the government $50 million on the basis of a $500 exemption. I remind him that the cost of refitting the Bonaventure was $18 million and the cost of building the elite Arts Centre in Ottawa was $46 million. I remind the parliamentary secretary that our budget for national defence each year is almost $2 billion. The miserable $50 million that he claims the government will lose as a result of the $500 exemption is really small potatoes compared to the total picture.

I am very happy that the Minister of Justice is in the chamber this evening. He will appreciate the impact of this miserable $500 allowance for child care. He knows the best type of law we can implement is preventive law. When young children are left unattended after school, they get into real trouble. This is when they develop into delinquents, graduate into young offenders and, finally, criminals in the full sense. The blame rightly can be placed on parents who do not have the money to take care of their children during working hours. To allow only $500 to working parents who require the money they earn to keep the family together is shortchanging them. It is developing a situation that can work hardship with regard to the children and the problems they have.

I hope the Minister of Justice, in his rosy, persuasive way will recommend to the parliamentary secretary the suggestion of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway that the minimum amount should be at least $1,000. This amounts to $20 a week, or $4 a day for child care services. The hon. member pointed out that $500 a year amounts to $2 a day for child care purposes. If we are going to save money on crime prevention and increase the prestige and reputation of the Minister of Justice in this very important field, he will see what I am driving at with regard to child care services. I hope he will persuade the likeable Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance that the appropriate amendment to make the allowance $1,000 should be brought forth.

What is $100 million when we take into account some of the larger problems we face with our young people? The Minister of Justice had a very difficult time trying to justify the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act. I hope he will see that young people, not only in the province of Quebec but in every province of Canada are given proper child care so that they can develop into good, decent young Canadians. Although I do not speak with the eloquence of the Minister of Justice when he is in full flight, I speak with humility and, I hope, persuasiveness. I hope he will persuade the parliamentary secretary that the minimum amount should be $1,000.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Chairman, when I rise to speak I always have the assistance of those people who are not in the House but are drinking coffee behind the curtain. I would like to echo the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway and the fact that this exemption is a step in the right direction. However, I think it is a timid step. The hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand said it is a short step. My hon. friend from Broadview said he was humble, and I agree that he is humble. Some people say he has every right to be humble. He says he is the most humble person in the House of Commons.

An hon. Member: What has that to do with the bill?

Mr. Rose: The only thing he is arrogant about is his humility. I support the contention of my hon. friend from Vancouver-Kingsway on the basis of the exemption of $500 per child. It is a step in the direction of providing some assistance for parents who are working, and I think increasingly in our society in order to earn a decent income both parents must be out of the home.

That is one of the glaring failures of our economy. The stresses in our society which result from this kind of situation are something I do not think we can tolerate much longer. If they are required to work to maintain the middle-class standard we often see displayed on television, we must do something about the casualties of their union, the children.

My hon. friend from Broadview mentioned the Minister of Justice. The Minister of Justice has just attended a session in Ottawa called Poverty and the Law. It pointed out, among other things, that among the unemployed poor and also the working poor there is not equal access to justice in our society and there is developing in our legal system a specialized association to deal with this particular problem which is a poverty problem.

Now the parliamentary secretary can snigger. I do not know whether he is concerned about this. I looked him up in the Parliamentary Guide before I came down here. The Parliamentary Guide says the parliamentary secretary has all the assets of a Chamber of Commerce man par excellence. He even mentioned this. Here is a man who is on the board of directors of many interesting establishment corporations and he has been very successful in his business life. I am not envious of this. It is suggested here that there is something immoral about this particular parliamentary secretary because he has made a lot of money. I do not agree with that.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member may be able to convince the Chair that he is being relevant to the section under discussion. I invite him to do so.

Mr. Rose: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Perhaps the only thing relevant about my last few remarks is that it might be said they were relevant to attacking the parliamentary secretary. I will desist, however, because if you look over his words in the last few days and in the last week and note his responses to some of the questions, and read them back to him, where he failed to answer a lot of serious questions which have been raised and ran around and hid, I think the Hansard will attack him and I do not need to continue on that line.

My contention is that there is a great need for day care centres which will not necessarily be aided and abetted by the incentive offered. In my own constituency we have a number of kindergartens and day care centres. I will tell you who goes to them. It is not the children of the working poor and of the unemployed. The children who go there are the children of doctors and business and professional men who can afford to send their children there, not because their wives are working but because they would prefer to go somewhere else.

What we need is a system which would allow the children of these people who have to be absent from home the kind of enrichment all of us know, especially our Minister of the Environment, the kind of enrichment which is provided to young children by these day care centres properly organized and properly led by trained teachers, which is not available to people who do not have the kind of affluent background which can provide the experience so necessary to learning.

I would say that compared with the affluent in our society the working poor and their children suffer almost as great a cultural gap, and that affects their learning, as exists between the working poor and our native people. This is how serious it is. If I may be free to enlarge on that topic for a moment I would like to say this, because it happens to be a field in which I have at least some professional competence. In our society, learning is largely verbal learning or learning through the printed word. Children from homes with little in the way of written material, little in the way of cultural enrichment do not have the background which is necessary for them to succeed in the verbal skills which are required in order to succeed in school.

By the time they reach grade three they get what is known as an IQ test which is based on verbal learning. When they receive this, because they do not have the background they are labelled with a low IQ for life. As they move through the grades, the gap widens. We are denying a whole segment of our society, because they lack those particular skills, the kind of advancement which is available to the parliamentary secretary and to the hon. member for Fraser Valley West.

When I argue for the development of day care centres and properly run kindergartens, if you like, or playschools, I want them to be available to families or children who really need them, because there is a cycle in poverty, a cycle in being on welfare and the only way in which we can break this cycle is to develop the kind of aptitude which can best help a child who comes from a home which is economically disadvantaged. We should provide such help for the children who really need it.

So I am in agreement with my hon. friend from Vancouver-Kingsway and my hon. friend from Broadview that we should establish a system which will not leave a child in the hands of the poorly trained girl next door or the kindly grandma but will develop through income tax exemptions a system which is well run and which would be led by well trained people.

By God, we have many people in our society, well trained ones, who are not doing anything. It is not that we do not have jobs for them today. That is not the point. The main point I should like to make is that the $500 exemption is not enough. The average person who is earning $5,000 a year or below spends $500 on putting his child in an adequately run school. I think it should be raised at least to $1,000 because the future of our leadership, the future of our whole society, democracy, if you like—if I do not sound too pretentious, presumptuous or anything else—depends upon an electorate which is intelligent and has an equal opportunity in society.

• (9:20 p.m.)

The Chairman: Shall section 63 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Rose: On division.

The Chairman: Before I put the question, as hon. members of the committee know there is an amendment to section 63, moved by the Minister of National Revenue on behalf of the Minister of Finance, which appears in Hansard for October 22 at page 8940. Hon. members have had an opportunity to look at this amendment so I should put the question first on the amendment. Shall the amendment to section 63 carry?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the parliamentary secretary explain it?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, the amendment to section 63(2)(a), on page 152 of the bill, is in connection with deduction of expenses for child care where the taxpayer claiming the deduction is a man. As the bill to be amended reads at the present time, it permits a man to deduct child care expenses in circumstances where his wife was confined throughout a period of not less than two weeks to bed, to a wheel-chair or as a patient in a hospital, asylum or similar institution, but the provision does not permit a man to deduct child care expenses where his wife is likely to be for a long-continued period of indefinite duration incapable of caring for children. The amendment will correct this deficiency in the wording and the words to be added appear in paragraph (B), at line 41 on page 151.

Clause 1, section 63, as amended, agreed to.

The Chairman: It is the understanding of the Chair that pursuant to special arrangement made last Friday, the committee will now move to the consideration of a grouping of sections 117 to 120 inclusive, together with sections 146, 147 and 204. Shall section 117 carry?

On clause 1—Section 117: 1972 rates.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, earlier today I inadvertently stumbled into this field. I took advantage of one of the small sub-sub-sub-clauses to section 56 or 57 which dealt with income tax averaging, but I will not continue those remarks. They dealt with the problem of why one would take advantage of certain circumstances when one's income was on the rise but not when one's income was on the fall. I used the name of a hockey player, and perhaps I should have not done so because Mr. Gordie Howe, the man I referred to, always had a rise in income until he saw he was at the end of the trail and rather sensibly decided to get out before he started to go backward. For the rest of the day I have frantically tried to think of other sporting figures who did not follow the sensible example of Mr. Howe but stayed on until it was too late for them, but oddly enough I could not think of any specific examples though I have read about dozens in the world of baseball.

In any event, the problem we are faced with is that the averaging provisions that have been presented to us were spawned in a time of inflation, and perhaps this is why the government has presented these averaging provisions in the bill. The parliamentary secretary said, and I think rightly, that the House of Commons committee struggled with the question of downward averaging but simply could not come up with an acceptable formula. That is true, but this does not mean that we cannot come up with an acceptable formula though it does mean that no one yet has. I think we will do an injustice if we pass this on to the ballplayer or sporting figure or the artist we are trying to help, people who are going over the hill and find themselves going down the down staircase instead of up the up staircase.

That philosophical observation out of the way, I hope we will yet come up with a better formula. After all, Joseph in Egypt was able to mingle seven fat years with seven lean years and come up with something that averaged itself out, and perhaps this is the sort of example we should follow. Having said that, may I ask the parliamentary secretary why section 117(8) is now being struck out? It appears on page 312 and was new. It is now being discarded.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I agree with my hon. friend from Halifax-East Hants. We regret that we have not been able to find a suitable way to deal with downward averaging. It was said earlier today that this was a problem that the parliamentary committee dealt with at length and neither it nor its advisers were able to find an answer. Nor were we able to locate any other jurisdiction that had been able to resolve the problem satisfactorily. This does not mean that we ought not to continue the search. I quite agree that we should and I can assure the hon. member that we shall.

The provisions in section 117 are the rate schedules that tie in very distinctly with the exemption schedule discussed under section 109 a number of days ago. I think it should be noted that they do carry out the commitment, over the period between the taxing years 1972 and 1976, that the Minister of Finance gave to reduce the rate of personal income tax on the first $500 of taxable income from the 17 per cent that will be in effect next year down to a 6 per cent level in 1976. This, of course, is one of the provisions that executes the government's undertaking that the tax reform measures now before the House will not be measures of tax increase in disguise.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, as the parliamentary secretary indicated a moment ago, section 117 sets out the rate schedule. In other words, it specifies the rate at which each taxpayer will have to pay tax on the first $500 of his income, then on the next $1,000 of his income, and so on up as far as it goes. The parliamentary secretary has already pointed out that built into section 117 is an arrangement whereby these rates make at least a modest decline over the period of the next few years.

However, I should like to come straight to the point of my intervention at this juncture. We are not satisfied with many things about this rate structure. As hon. members are aware, we do not accept the philosophy of the government that has resulted in a reduction of the rate on the top increment, bearing in mind that at the same time the government is doing away with federal estate tax and also bringing in a capital gains tax that is applied to only 50 per cent of income that is defined as a capital gain.

However, our concern throughout this debate on the income tax legislation has been and continues to be for those in the lower income brackets. We further contend, bearing in mind what you have ruled from the chair we can do, that there should be a reduction in the rate of tax applied to the first $500 of taxable income.

Possibly, I am making a mistake I made once before by giving my procedural points before moving the amendment I have drafted, but I think you and I, Sir, will agree that the ground has been pretty well cleared. You have made it clear that there are certain types of amendments you and those associated with you at the table feel you cannot accept. On the other hand, you have made it clear that if a private member moves an amendment to reduce a rate of tax and if that reduction is across the board—and you will recognize, Sir, I am using your own words—and if there is no transfer of the incidence from one group of taxpayers to another, Your Honour feels that type of amendment is acceptable.

You made that statement to one of my friends in the Social Credit Party when he sought to move one of that group's amendments. You made it again when the hon. member for Regina East moved an amendment to reduce the figure having to do with income tax deductibility in respect of medical expenses. Then again on Friday of last week, when I made another unsuccessful attempt to move an amendment having to do with another feature of the tax bill Your Honour said to me that if it were a reduction in the rate, if it were applicable across the board to all taxpayers, Your Honour would, of course, accept it.

I hope you appreciate how easy I am making your chore in this instance. I have already said that apart from any thoughts we might have about the rates of tax in the upper brackets, about the estate tax, the capital gains tax and so on, we think that the tax payable on the first $500 of taxable income should be a lot less than it is. As long as the exemption level is where it is we think there should not be any tax at all in that bracket. Of course, we cannot raise the exemption levels. We have tried and we have been ruled out of order in our attempts.

I submit it does fall to us that we have the right to move that the rate of 17 per cent which is specified in line 30 on page 305 be reduced to a lesser figure, and that is what I propose to do. Once I move to reduce that figure of 17 per cent to a lesser percentage that, of course, results in the necessity of making a reduction of the same number of dollars in each of the succeeding paragraphs.

If Your Honour is now looking at page 306 you will see that on that page each paragraph starts with an amount which represents the aggregate income tax up to that point and then indicates the rate of tax on the next increment. I have no intention of proposing any juggling of the rates or any attempt to increase the rate at one level to make up for it at another. I am proposing exactly what Your Honour has said is our right, namely, that there be a decrease in the rate on the first $500 of taxable income. Having moved for a reduction in the rate on that first $500, I then propose that the same number of dollars which that reduction produces for everyone in that first category be taken off each of the other figures all the way up from paragraph (b) to paragraph (m).

Having described my amendment, the moving of it is a mere formality. I have it here and I admit that it is in my own handwriting, but I have several copies of it and I trust it is legible. I move:

That Bill C-259 be amended, at pages 305 and 306, by changing the figure "17 per cent", in line 30 on page 305, to the figure "2 per cent", and consequentially by reducing the amount at the beginning of each of the paragraphs (b) to (m), both inclusive, on page 306, by $75.

I could have written that amendment in a longer form by taking each of the paragraphs on page 306 and actually saying that the $85 in paragraph (b) be reduced to $10, and that the $175 in paragraph (c) be reduced to $100 and so on down the page. But rather than produce such a long and wordy amendment I thought it would say the same thing if I simply said in my amendment that the amount at the beginning of each paragraph on page 306 be reduced by $75.

As Your Honour realizes, the effect of this amendment is one that is clearly across the board. It reduces by 15 percentage points the rate of taxation on the first $500 of every taxpayer's taxable income, whether he is a taxpayer who has only $500 of taxable income or whether he has $100,000, or what have you. The amount of reduction, by the same token, becomes the same for the person in the upper brackets as it is for the person in the lower brackets, namely, 15 percentage points of the first $500—in other words, $75 across the board. There is no cumulative effect to it and there is no increase in the reduction for those in the upper brackets. There is just as much of a reduction for the $500 person as there is for the millionaire, and I point out again that there is no shift of the incidence. I might mention that there are none of the things that Your Honour found procedurally wrong in some of the previous amendments. Therefore I have the pleasure of presenting this amendment and perhaps I might read it again. It is:

That Bill C-259 be amended, at pages 305 and 306, by changing the figure "17 per cent", in line 30 on page 305, to the figure "2 per cent", and consequentially by reducing the amount at the beginning of each of the paragraphs (b) to (m), both inclusive, on page 306, by $75.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has urged some very persuasive arguments and authorities on the Chair and I am inclined to agree with him. Some of the observations the Chair made previously may have been obiter, nevertheless I think the hon. member is correct in his argument that under our rules a private member can move a motion to effect an across the board change reduction in rates of taxation as long as they do not affect the incidence of taxation. I am prepared to accept the motion unless there are arguments that would dissuade me.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, of course it is a very interesting move the hon. member has made here. In fact he has done what the government has refused to do. He has applied a form of tax credit which would be the kind of flexibility a government could move into if the income tax were fixed in amounts in relation to the brackets and not the percentages, and if there were changes to be made in particular brackets then the particular credits could be made.

As Your Honour has indicated, the amendment is acceptable to the Chair. I would suggest the Chair look at subsections (2), (3) and (4). I have never heard of negative income tax being accepted in this House, and the acceptance of this amendment would result in some most interesting circumstances as a result of the further subsections which apply to tax in the years 1973, 1974 and 1975. There would be negative income taxes in the low income brackets. That is a matter for the Chair to ponder.

I would point out that we are looking at only the rates of the federal tax, but there is a little thing called the provincial tax which goes with this. These schedules, on the basis of subsection 1(a), give the tax for the year 1972. They indicate the tax rate on the income in the bracket and then, of course, we have the combined federal tax and the 30 per cent provincial tax. The schedules as shown in the act indicate the federal rate for 1972 and also the combined federal-provincial rate on the assumption that the provinces will levy a tax equal to 30 per cent of the federal tax rate. For instance, in the first bracket it would be 17 per cent plus 30 per cent of 17 per cent, or a total of 22.1 per cent.

This will effect some change in the federal share of the income tax but, of course, it will have no direct result on the quantum of the provincial tax, which is something many people have failed to recognize. I want to indicate that the House committee which studied the proposals on the white paper came down with some very definite recommendations concerning the level of tax on the federal side which is generally accepted in these proposals.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Much has been said about the tax being lowered to 50 per cent or less at the $60,000 level. But if you throw in the 30 per cent provincial income tax the total levy goes up to 61 per cent. For instance, at $60,000 the federal tax at the beginning of the bracket is $21,795. The federal tax rate on the income in the bracket will be 47 per cent, but combined with the provincial tax this means that those over $60,000 will be taxed at 61.1 per cent. That is the flat rate right now. The province of Manitoba goes as high as 39 per cent. So it will be 39 per cent of 47 per cent. That will add up to a fair amount, much higher than it is in, say, the province of Ontario.

But let us look at the middle income group, the group between $9,000 and $14,000. I might point out that many of the friends of the hon. member to my left are in that group. One does not have to go very far today to get in the bracket of $11,000 to $14,000. First-class constables and firemen, in some areas, are in this bracket. This applies to first-class constables in a number of cities in this country. Then there are members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police as well as others. The total tax rate in the bracket between $11,000 and $14,000 will be 40 per cent. Now we will see who starts screaming at the levels of income tax as a result of these changes which are proposed.

I also wish to point out something else. There has been a significant change in structuring federal personal taxation. Under the existing system the federal rates imposed contain room for an abatement in respect of provincial taxes, and in addition there are imposed separate taxes for old age security and social development. All these things are being lumped together. They are being called a new standard federal rate which does not provide for standard provincial abatement. Any tax levied by the provinces will be in addition to the federal rates. The only specific exception in the bill is a deduction of 3 per cent of the portion of tax otherwise payable that is related to income earned in a province providing schooling allowances. That means the province of Quebec.

It also seems likely that further abatements may be made on a basis similar to that under the established programs, the Interim Arrangements Act, for provinces opting out of certain shared federal-provincial programs. It is possible, but we will see what comes out of the conferences this week and early in November. At present Quebec is the only province which has so opted and an abatement of 19 per cent of the tax otherwise payable applies in respect of Quebec income.

At the present time a 28 per cent standard abatement is allowed. I spoke of a 30 per cent abatement for illustrative purposes but that does not mean the provinces are bound in any way by this, because whereas at the present time there is a 28 per cent standard abatement, Manitoba actually levies a 39 per cent tax and Quebec levies its own personal tax.

Therefore we must come to the conclusion that these rates are in themselves exceedingly high. As a matter of fact, when you consider that an individual who earns $60,000 pays $28,000 income tax on the $60,000—that is, right at the start—he pays just under 50 per cent on average. Remember, when we say a 61 per cent tax rate on income in the bracket, that is a marginal rate and in actual fact the total tax is just under 50 per cent.

If one were to take the income group between, say, $9,000 and $14,000 and figured out for them the average tax payable, one would see that a person who is earning about $10,000 would be paying about 25 per cent of his income in income tax, right across the board. Add to that his sales taxes, his customs duties and his share of other taxes—I will put aside any question of property tax—and we will see just how much tax the individual is paying.

We are complaining about the quantum of money that is taken from the individual because somebody has made it popular and it has now grown into the philosophy that Big Brother government knows better.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Big Brother government is motivated by my hon friend and his pals. They know better how to do item I am talking about the average individual who should be able to decide far more than he does how he earns and how he spends his money. Of course, I can take the hon. member's argument all the way and say, "Take everything away from the individual, give it to the government and let the government spend everything or keep it."

Mr. Benjamin: Who said that?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is an extension of the argument. If Big Brother government knows better how to spend the money, then it is logical to pursue it all the way through and to give the government all the money so it can be spent to the best advantage. If the hon. member's argument has any strength whatsoever, surely that is the natural conclusion. It seems to me that in many instances that philosophy underlies most of their stands.

Mr. Benjamin: Are you for or against it? Make up your mind.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I am not particularly in favour of this amendment.

An hon. Member: You are against the people.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I know the hon. member has made up his mind and therefore anything anybody else says is superfluous. He has the humility of the man who has made up his mind and will brook no other views.

Mr. Benjamin: Let us have some humility from you, Marcel.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is all I want to say about this particular subject. We note the changes that are to follow. The amendment does cause a problem there. Possibly the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has further amendments which will follow, but he has not indicated them.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Does the hon. member realize that if this amendment carries, it follows that there should be amendments to the other subsections and I shall have them at that time?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It does not necessarily follow, but in any event that is the position with regard to these items.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, for the last couple of days we have been trying to impress upon the Canadian public the advantage of a tax credit system as against the exemption system and tonight, in a very bold, dramatic and highly intelligent amendment the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has shown how it should be done. The value of the amendment before us enables us to grant tax relief to those in the lower income brackets without accelerating the process and providing substantially more advantage and relief to those in the higher income brackets.

It is very difficult to demonstrate the value of the tax credit system as against the exemption system in the normal course of trying to explain it, but this amendment illustrates how it can be done. While the government has had difficulty in trying to figure out an intelligent approach to providing relief for those in the lower brackets of the income tax level, the hon. member has shown them the way, I hope they will seize his torch and accept the amendment before the House.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: Is there agreement that the committee call it ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

ATOMIC ENERGY—BASIS FOR LOAN TO REHABILITATE GLACE BAY HEAVY WATER PLANT

Mr. Murray McBride (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my curiosity about Deuterium of Canada and its hitherto ill-fortuned heavy water plant in Glace Bay, Nova Scocia, is one of long standing. The events leading up to the present tragic situation tell a story of bungled industrial development.

When the regional development committee of this House heard evidence on Bill C-5, entitled "An act to authorize the making of a grant to the province of Nova Scotia for the purpose of providing assistance to Deuterium of Canada Limited"—which, by the way, still stands as item No. 10 on today's order paper—some most disconcerting information was revealed.

I should like to quote from the record of the proceedings of that committee under the date of December 1, 1970. The following was an exchange between the witness from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and myself:

MR. MCBRIDE: Would it be accurate, Mr. Chairman, to say then that no part of this grant will be forthcoming until the province has given evidence that they do in fact have a satisfactory operator?

MR. O'CONNELL: Oh, that is absolutely the case . . .

MR. MCBRIDE: April 1 is roughly seven months ago. There was no satisfactory operator then, and there is no satisfactory operator now. You assume that there will be in the reasonably near future?

MR. O'CONNELL: Yes, I think there is virtually a final decision on a consortium to rehabilitate the plant.

I went on to talk about further statements that had been made as to whether or not this was a useful purpose for directing public funds, and I said:

You said that there was no way whereby expenditures could get out of hand in a $5 million grant. It would seem to me that if a $5 million grant or a $500 grant is given for a purpose and the purpose for which it is given is not realized, the expenditure is out of hand. I was using it in that context.

• (10:00 p.m.)

I then spoke about the whole situation having been mismanaged, and so on, and continued:

Someone here has just cited that you need a lot of faith in the citizens. Is that the best answer we have here this morning, that we need a lot of faith in the people in Nova Scotia? Because if we do have a lot of faith in the people in Nova Scotia, it has not been justified by the performance of the people in Nova Scotia who were in charge of this project hitherto.

Then came the most damning statement of all when Mr. O'Connell replied:

Mr. Chairman, the history of the plant is one of misfortune.

An hon. Member: That is the understatement of the year.

Mr. McBride: Mr. Speaker, I should like to expand on the questions I directed to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) this afternoon. First, did the results of the $300,000 engineering study announced in this House by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) on January 29, 1971, at page 2887 of Hansard state that for $95 million, heavy water would in fact be produced? When will the results of that study be made public?

Second, what is the target date for full production and how much will be produced—

An hon. Member: Never.

Mr. McBride: —when the plant is in full production? Three, since the Prime Minister's statement on April 10, 1970, and the statement of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion on December 1, 1970, both gave to this House or a committee of this House the assurance that a satisfactory operator would be found prior to any federal moneys being forthcoming, has such an operator been found and who is or who are the persons taking on this vital position?

Four, in view of the fact that eight years ago the then government of Nova Scotia, under the man who is at present Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), entered into an agreement to produce heavy water by 1966 in a plant that would cost $35 million, while in fact the plant is still idle at a reported cost of $120 million, what assurance can the government provide to this House and to the nation that the plant will go into production, and will the $95 million now announced make it viable?

[Mr. McBride.]

Five, is Industrial Estates Limited, the Crown agency established by the provincial government of the now Leader of the Opposition now completely removed from any management decisions, and will AECL now be fully in control and will the federal government pick up and take over?

Six, would it not be more economical to abandon this project and start over again?

Mr. Benjamin: In Saskatchewan.

Mr. McBride: Are we not, in fact, throwing good money after bad, especially in light of the Prime Minister's statement at page 5711 of Hansard where he said:

I should like to emphasize that, according to information made available by the province, there will still be on annual shortfall a capital and interest recovery in the neighbourhood of $5 million to $6 million during the life of the new contract.

That would refer to the 12½-year contract mentioned previously in the Prime Minister's statement. Mr. Speaker, there is a parallel tragedy here which I think ought to be laid before the House tonight. That is the failure of the Official Opposition to bring any critical eye to bear on the whole operation for fear, I presume, of bringing public attention to bear on a project founded with great fanfare by the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. MacInnis: Why aren't you honest enough to get your facts right?

Mr. McBride: Mr. Speaker, if it be true that one of the responsibilities of all members of this House is to be the watchdog on the expenditure of public moneys—and surely it must be—then I would, with great respect, submit—

Mr. MacInnis: Respect? You are not even being honest about it.

Mr. McBride: —that when the opposition is prevented from doing this fundamental task then other members of the House must take it up.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. MacInnis: Why can't you be honest about it, McBride?

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I shall try to give an honest answer in three minutes, Mr. Speaker. The decision to rehabilitate the Glace Bay plant owes much to the initiative of Premier Regan. The previous Nova Scotia government had sought federal financial assistance but wanted to retain control of the rehabilitation program; the federal government had replied that it would only be prepared to provide such assistance if the province assigned responsibility for the operation of the plant to a concern in whose competence federal authorities would have confidence.

Premier Regan has now proposed that Atomic Energy of Canada Limited should take on responsibility for both the rehabilitation and the operation of the plant until such time as the earnings from production have repaid the federal costs. This proposal was attractive to the federal government but before replying an up to date estimate was required in order to determine whether the rehabilitation of the plant was technically feasible and, if so, at what cost and on what time scale. This was the engineering survey assigned to AECL as announced in January, 1971. AECL concluded that the plant could be rehabilitated and that this could be done more quickly and at less cost than would be involved in building a new plant at some other site.

Further study was nevertheless required in order to determine whether by the time the plant could be rehabilitated there would still be a continuing requirement for its production of heavy water. This additional point has now been thoroughly investigated and it has been established that there will be a continuing requirement for the output of the plant.

During his recent visit to Halifax the Prime Minister Mr. Trudeau, was in a position to announce that agreement had been reached. AECL will acquire a leasehold interest in the Glace Bay plant and will assume full responsibility for its reconstruction and eventual operation. The necessary funds will be lent by the federal government to AECL, to be repaid with interest out of sales of heavy water once the plant is in production. The lease of the plant to AECL will terminate upon completion of that repayment.

I am delighted, Mr. Speaker, that this long standing monument to the incompetence of a previous Nova Scotia government is now being renovated, for the betterment of all Canadians. Additionally, some 300 to 400 job opportunities will be opened for Nova Scotians in the course of the work which will commence by the end of this month.

MANPOWER—REASONS FOR EXCLUSION OF RESERVE INDIANS FROM LABOUR FORCE SURVEY—INCLUSION IN LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, although we raise these matters in the adjournment debate, the ministers responsible are not in their places. Apparently this debate is not considered important enough for them. The other day I asked the Mnister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) in the House whether he would consider including Indians living on reserves in the labour force survey. I might say that in my constituency there are reserves and some of their members are seeking work.

It is well known that Indians on reserves, as well as inmates of penitentiaries, are presently excluded from the count of employed and unemployed persons. This exclusion is not only discriminatory, it is also incomprehensible because the federal government is allegedly trying to bring our native peoples up to the standards of well-being enjoyed by Canadians generally. I say "generally" because a large number of Canadians are out of work.

The money the federal government has been spending in its drive to help the native population may or may not have been well spent. But on looking at the standard of living of the Indian population one cannot claim that this venture has been successful by any stretch of the imagination. Of course, one can say that only on the basis of impressions and observations, because we do not know how many people on the reserves are employed or unemployed and looking for jobs. So as a result of the policy which has been followed all we can do is make an educated guess.

That is one reason why I urge the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and his colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) who is responsible for Statistics Canada, to include Indian reserves in the labour force survey or to find enough facts by other means so as to give us a reasonably accurate picture of the situation of our native labour force. I have also asked the Minister of Manpower and Immigration to use his influence in extending the coverage of the labour force survey to the Yukon and Northwest Territories. The minister, probably by error on his part, assured the House that this extension was carried out on August 14 of this year. This has not yet been done.

I appeal to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration to consider seriously these suggestions. After all, the people of the territories have every right to be treated as other Canadians and members of the Canadian labour force. They should not be treated as members of a colony set apart from the settled parts of Canada. On reflection, I find that I am addressing myself to the wrong person. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration has so many responsibilities that adding to his burdens might be the last straw. It might drive him around the bend. His duties cover the vast field of manpower and the difficult field of immigration. He is also responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. To top it all, he is in charge of the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

• (10:10 p.m.)

Mr. Benjamin: He is the loser.

Mr. Gleave: It shows how fouled up he is. I cannot honestly claim that his performance in any of these areas has been outstandingly successful.

An hon. Member: He is from Saskatchewan.

Mr. Gleave: You may not regard us very highly. That is a typical attitude of the people from Ontario. You have had it so long it fits you like a mantle. We are the colonists, the people outside the pale. That is where you fit.

The federal government is in desperation trying to reduce the growing number of unemployed Canadians. These efforts are not primarily directed toward creation of jobs and toward combating unemployment. The battle is a battle against unemployment statistics. You are not concerned about the reality. You want to dispel the thing that exists.

Mr. McBride: Who made you the judge?

Mr. Perrault: Keep it non-political over there.

Mr. Gleave: Non-political? You are kidding. The other day the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Prud'homme) informed the House that in the fiscal year 1970-71 the Department placed 344,846 people in training. The figure for the current year will doubtless be higher. Two weeks ago the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) announced that an additional 35 million would be spent on training, which means that the number of trainees this year will increase by 30,000 to 35,000.

The attempts by the department to equate referrals to training replacements is simply scandalous. The unemployed person knows well that training in itself does not give him a job. He knows as much as the Economic Council of Canada that the manpower training program absorbs many thousands of unemployed people so that the unemployment count becomes, however slightly, more respectable and more in tune with the Minister of Finance's outrageous and ridiculous unemployment forecast.

More seriously, the Prime Minister—very elegantly I have to admit—is implying that our unemployed people are pretending to be searching for jobs when enumerated by Statistics Canada. We know that the Prime Minister has a rather elitist view of the unemployed. We know that he would prefer to send all unemployed women, whatever their qualifications may be, to jobs as waitresses and chambermaids. We know that, of all people, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) and the Prime Minister gave up in desperation their long professed goal of full employment. It now appears that the Minister of Manpower, whose prime responsibility should be to place people in jobs; and he has at his disposal over 8,000 bureaucrats—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member will be very satisfied with my answer. In his answer to the hon. member's question on October 25, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) stated that his department was giving consideration to the manner in which applications for the Local Initiatives Program would be received from Indians living on reservations. I can tell the hon. member that in so far as Indian band councils are concerned, they may obtain applications from Canada Manpower centres and submit them to the regional offices of the Department of Manpower and Immigration. Every effort will be made to ensure that band councils receive information and application forms because we are fully conscious of the need for such groups to participate.

In addition, groups of individuals living on reservations may apply for a grant under the organizations and private groups aspect of the Local Initiatives Program should they have a project which meets the necessary criteria. They would obtain application forms from their local Canada Manpower offices and submit applications to their respective regional offices of the Department of Manpower and Immigration.

As hon. members know, Indian reservations were originally excluded from the labour force sample because it was felt that participation in the labour force by Indians on reservations—

Mr. Gleave: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Prud'homme: There is no point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): The hon. member knows the rules. Would he kindly resume his seat?

Mr. Gleave: I only wish to point out, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Would the hon. member please resume his seat?

Mr. Gleave: The parliamentary secretary should use the terms "reserves", not "reservations". If he does not know that, he should not be there. "Reservation" is an American term.

Mr. Prud'homme: —because it was felt that participation in the labour force by Indians on reservations was somewhat different from similar activities on the part of other members of the population. For example, on some of the reservations economic activity consisted of hunting, fishing and other seasonal and irregular activities. Consequently, the survey procedures and questions used in the labour force survey appeared to be unsuitable. This seems to be less the case today and consequently consideration is being to the inclusion of these persons in the regular labour force survey.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned att 10.20 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF LAYING-UP OF HYDROFOIL "BRAS D'OR"

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce today that a decision has been made by the Department of National Defence to lay-up the hydrofoil Bras d'Or for a five-year period because a reassessment of Maritime Command's requirements has scaled down its priority. However, I would like to emphasize that research into hydrofoils will be continued by the department, and that the Bras d'Or could be reactivated at any time should circumstances alter.

The cost of maintaining the hydrofoil over the five-year period, including the basic cost of constructing storage facilities at Halifax, will be approximately $1 million. The Bras d'Or project began in 1961 with the awarding of a contract to the de Havilland Company for a development study of an all-weather hydrofoil craft. Cost of the construction project to date is approximately $52.2 million.

The decision which has been taken on the Bras d'Or results from the defence priorities for the department as announced in the white paper on defence in the 70's which was issued in August of this year.

The first main priority of defence policy is the protection of sovereignty and the surveillance of Canadian territory and coastlines. The acquisition of new equipment for Maritime Command must reflect this policy, and extensive studies have been conducted. Top priority calls for the replacement or major overhaul of the Argus long-range patrol aircraft. Moreover, although a major ship procurement program for Maritime Command is nearing completion, the question of replacing older surface ships, particularly with some ships capable of operating in heavy ice conditions, is one facing Canada in the next decade and for which planning and resources will be required. These factors and considerations have, therefore, lowered the priority of the hydrofoil, which began as an experimental project based primarily on an antisubmarine role.

The initial sea trials, covering both calm and rough waters, of the Bras d'Or were successful. However, completion of these trials did not mean that the development stage of the hydrofoil was finished, or that the stage had been reached where design of a production model was possible.

The cost of proceeding with the next stage in development work on the Bras d'Or would have been an estimated $4.5 million over a three-year span. However, it is estimated that possibly another $20 million or more would be required before proceeding to the stage where production could begin. Forecasts also show that production in the number which Maritime Command could have utilized—in the neighbourhood of 10—would have cost more than $20 million each. Some foreign countries which had shown an interest in the Canadian project have subsequently made it clear that acquisition of this type of vessel is also well down on their latest priority list. Because of the factors which I have stated—costs, lowering of priority, and no outlook for foreign sales at this time—it was decided for the present to limit future work to research and studies within the department.

If further trials or testing are considered necessary, the Bras d'Or could, as I have said be reactivated. Canada has developed considerable expertise on high-speed hydrofoils designed for ocean conditions, and it is considered desirable that research and study work should continue in this field.

I should also make it clear that because it is a development craft the Bras d'Or is not suitable in its present configuration for any general purpose use within Maritime Command. This, therefore, precludes its use as a patrol or search and rescue vessel.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, the announcement by the minister today is going to be received with very deep regret not only by those involved in military matters in Canadian life but by everyone who is involved in the research and development of the hydrofoil Bras d'Or. I must say that the minister's reasoning for the cancellation of the program at this time barely stands up to quick scrutiny. On very close examination I think many of the reasons he has given will not prove to be adequate.

In commenting on the announcement at this time it needs to be said that the total investment by Canadian taxpayers in the Bras d'Or is some $52 million. Part of that expenditure, of course, was brought about by a fire on the vessel. In these circumstances, the decision not to spend the additional $3 or $4 million required to complete the full evaluation and research program in connection with the hydrofoil is a wrong decision. It could be said that what we have done is to put $52.2 million worth of mothballs into a million dollar garage. In my view the government had a responsibility to complete at least the basic research work so that we could pass on to our allies the fruits and results of a full evaluation of the feasibility of the hydrofoil in open sea naval operations and related work. This we have not done and I think it is deeply to be regretted.

Lay-up of Hydrofoil "Bras-d'Or"

I hope the minister will find an early opportunity, possibly during consideration of his estimates, to explain in greater detail exactly what he means when he speaks of ongoing work in the field of hydrofoil use. I should like him to tell us where he intends to carry out this work and also to explain in detail what will happen to the Bras d'Or at the end of the five-year storage period. Will it be sold, or otherwise disposed of? Hopefully it will not be dealt with in the manner in which the Bonaventure was disposed of, at a substantial loss to the Canadian taxpayer. The minister should also tell us whether the government intends to make available to our NATO allies, if it has not already done so, the fullest possible evaluation of the results obtained and studies carried out to date in order that the research work which has been done is not totally lost.

Again, I say it is to be regretted that the minister, probably in line with the decision to freeze the defence budget, should have found it necessary to cancel the Bras d'Or program, particularly at this critical time near the end of the development and research stage.

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, it is hard for me to deal on its merits with the minister's decision to place the developmental hydrofoil Bras d'Or in storage.

To my mind the decision is one more addition to the increasingly long list of unsupportable blunders in equipment purchases and development made by successive ministers of defence both Liberal and Conservative, blunders which have arisen out of a failure to define clearly the role of our defence forces. In this situation difficulty is bound to arise when it comes to supplying those forces with appropriate equipment. It is this same omission which has virtually destroyed the morale of all but a few units of the Armed Forces. In another sphere it has made officer recruitment and the retention of officers in the service a problem of crisis proportions. It is the lack of a clear understanding of the role of the forces which has made it difficult for the government to arrive at sane decisions concerning equipment.

The money wasted by the Department of National Defence over the past dozen years as a result of bad decisions relating to equipment would, if totalled, probably eliminate this year's projected budgetary deficit. There was the Arrow, the Bobcat, DATAR, the CF-5 and, now, the hydrofoil, the latter representing $52 million down the drain or at least shelved, and a further million dollars as the cost of shelving it. No doubt the replacement of maritime patrol aircraft has a higher priority than the Bras d'Or project but I doubt very much whether this applies to the gas turbine destroyers presently being completed, given the current role of the navy which is largely the protection and surveillance of our coasts. These destroyers were constructed at phenomenal cost at a time when the real need was for coastal craft and heavy Arctic icebreakers. Here is the hidden gaffe in the minister's statement, and this is why it is difficult to discuss the statement on its merits.

I think this decision points out, first, the need for the government to define a defence posture and to stick to it, and within the framework of that policy to seek co-operation with other governments and nations in the matter of weapons development, as many of the European nations are now doing with some success.

Second, the decision underlines—and this is of even higher national priority—the need for the development of a national science policy within which defence research can be accommodated. We must do the things that we are good at and adopt an integrated approach to our research projects so that there will be a spill-over from one area to another, thus reducing costs and improving the saleability of the items that we decide to produce. I am arguing for specialization, and this can only take place effectively within the context of a national science policy. The hydrofoil, despite its potential, has by virtue of this decision become simply another costly blunder in the purchasing policy of the Department of National Defence, and I think it is a shame.

Mr. Romuald Rodrigue (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I would be inclined to congratulate the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) who has just announced that the Bras d'Or project has been dropped. Needless to say, the experience was unfortunate for Canada, because we sank $52.2 million in the project without getting really good results.

That experiment was made after others by the Armed Forces; in fact, there was the development of the Bobcat tank by the Army, and the Arrow aircraft by the Air force.

The minister says that it will cost approximately $1 million to lay-up the Bras d'Or for the next five years. Now I wonder what the cost would have been if it had been decided to go on with further testing. We know that the initial cost of the Bras d'Or project had been estimated at $10 million and that it has now reached $52 million.

I hope that the Department of National Defence will now devote more time to the study of programs advocated by the Canadian Armed Forces, in order that we may not have to deplore further large investments for such costly items as the Bras d'Or hydrofoil.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—POSSIBLE CHANGES CONCERNING COMMUNITY PROJECTS BECAUSE OF QUEBEC RESERVATIONS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister about consultation with the provinces particularly in light of the press release issued by the Minister of Manpower on October 27 in which he said that "we have had very useful consultations with the provinces concerning the implementation of the local initiatives program". Would the Prime Minister inform the House whether, in the course of these discussions with the provinces about the local initiatives program, the province of Quebec put forward its reservations about sharing in the cost of and administering community projects, and whether any change is intended in the projects as a result?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the provinces generally, and I think Quebec in particular, seem to be quite agreeable to the procedures we have adopted with regard to the municipal side of the local initiative program and to the consultations that will occur prior to any approval of applications under that program.

• (2:20 p.m.)

In the case of the community organization side of the local initiatives program, I do not know whether the point was made at the early consultation stage but the point was made by the Minister of Finance from Quebec yesterday in respect of municipal programs that they would not be involved in the administration of them and they would not want it to be taken that they were in any way undertaking any commitment to finance or complete projects which began under that program. Of course, this has been our assumption and understanding from the beginning.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, did the Minister of Finance of the province of Quebec not make the point yesterday that the province would not involve itself in any community projects other than those which had already been approved by the province?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Of course, the question as asked is hardly in order. The Leader of the Opposition asked whether the province did not make such and such a position clear. I would think a question asked in those terms would not be in order. I am sure the Leader of the Opposition would want to rephrase it.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, does the Minister of Manpower accept these reservations expressed by the Quebec Minister of Finance yesterday as being such that would enable the province of Quebec to take full advantage of his proposals?

Mr. Lang: Yes, Mr. Speaker, although some of the press reports would not seem to carry that import. As I understand it, there seems to be full agreement on co-operation regarding the initiatives side of the program. With regard to the other side, it simply means we will be doing in regard to that province as in regard to the others. Administration by the regional offices and Canada Manpower centres will lead to the approval of projects and will not involve the province in any new or additional types of expenditures.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

ARRANGEMENTS FOR GREATER CONSULTATION IN LIGHT OF REPORTED CRITICISM BY ONTARIO TREASURER

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister relating to the same matter of consultation with the provinces. It arises out of reported comments of an extremely critical nature by the treasurer of the province of Ontario about the lack of consultation in dealing with the latest United States economic measures. In view of this criticism I should like to ask whether any arrangements are being made for more adequate and more continuous consultation with the provinces in relation to meeting United States economic measures, and any adjustments in our policies that might be required in the future?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it might be worth while to remind the House that prior to 1968 these meetings between the finance ministers of the federal and provincial governments were held about once a year. Since 1968 we have initiated the practice of holding them about quarterly, or about four times as often as was the case before. We have repeated that if there were any need for special meetings or representations we would have them. The provincial ministers come to Ottawa and various ministers, including the Minister of Finance and myself, do meet them, but there is a limit to the possibility of being able to conduct the financial affairs of the country on the basis of daily consultation between 11 governments.

UNEMPLOYMENT—MANITOBA PROJECTIONS FOR 1972 AND FIRST HALF OF 1973—FEDERAL FORECASTS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister arising from the meetings which the Minister of Finance held with the provincial treasurers, at which meetings the representatives of the government of Manitoba revealed their unemployment projections for 1972 and the first two quarters of 1973, ranging from 5 per cent to 6 per cent seasonally adjusted. Were the federal representatives at this conference able to submit any projections as to their estimates of unemployment for that period, and did they differ materially from the projections submitted by Manitoba?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of projections that might have been submitted by the federal government. Perhaps the question might be asked of our Minister of Finance when he is in the House. As regards Manitoba, all I would say is that if the government of Manitoba sees this type of unemployment I wish it would do something about it.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister might have told us what the Federal government is going to do. That would have been helpful. May I ask the Prime Minister whether the government of Canada is now in a position to give the House and the country its projections of the estimate of unemployment over the next year or year and a half? Surely if the government of Manitoba can provide this sort of data the federal government must have some estimates.

INCOME TAX

SUGGESTED DELAY IN IMPLEMENTATION OF BILL AND PASSAGE OF EXEMPTION AND ALLOWANCE PROVISIONS IN SEPARATE MEASURE

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. As three provincial treasurers, those of Ontario, Quebec and Alberta, have urged the government, because of the great complexity and length of Bill C-259, not to try to meet its present timetable of getting the bill through by the end of the year in order to allow time for lengthy examination and submissions from the public as well as examination in this House, is it the intention of the government to introduce a separate bill containing only the proposed tax exemptions and allowances proposed in Bill C-259 which would be assured of quick passage and leave the remainder of Bill C-259 for the detailed and more lengthy examination it deserves?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): This may be the hon. member's suggestion. I do not understand it to be that of the provinces.

Mr. Hees: It is.

Mr. Trudeau: If it is, Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that they are taking this easy line which the hon. member is of just doing the popular things now and waiting to do the unpopular things after an election. This is not—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for a supplementary and then we will go on to the next questioner and eventually return to this subject which appears to be a very popular one this afternoon.

Mr. Hees: As the Prime Minister's answer indicates that the government obviously does not intend to do this, I should like to ask a supplementary. Is this not an example of the usual bullheaded Liberal arrogance and stupidity?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: Lift your head and let us have an answer.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Five members are seeking supplementaries. We will return, as I said, to this subject later but we have to move on for the moment.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

AMCHITKA NUCLEAR TEST—AVAILABILITY OF REPORTS OF CERTAIN UNITED STATES AGENCIES—PRECAUTIONARY SAFETY MEASURES

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. In view of the concern expressed by Canadians about the nuclear test at Amchitka and in view of the fact that a United States court yesterday ordered the public release of a number of hitherto secret government reports on the subject except for two vital ones, those of the Environmental Protection Agency and the Council for Environmental Quality which I understand are still secret, is the minister in possession of these reports or has his department made any attempt to secure them?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): We have requested access to them, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Minister of National Defence. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman the same question I asked him last week about emergency measures for the west coast in the event of a disaster. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said at that time our best protection was to pray. Has there been any reconsideration of this prayerful posture and, if so, what additional precautionary safety measures have been planned?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question of course is not in order. The hon. member was recognized for the purpose of asking a question which should be in order. The hon. member might like to rephrase the question and then the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Bellechasse.

Mr. Rose: Has there been any reconsideration of the safety precautions or emergency measures and, specifically, what precautionary measures have been planned?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the question. The national emergency measures co-ordinator has been in touch with the co-ordinator of civil defence for the province of British Columbia and he has been informed that as a result of the high degree of interest in that province measures, including the following, have been taken. In addition to the normal complement of radiological measuring instruments, further equipment has been sent into the Prince Rupert civil defence zone. His civil defence co-ordinators have been advised to double-check their monitoring procedures. Local co-ordinators have been advised to give supplementary instructions to monitors. British Columbia civil defence has been providing the media with information on request. Additional information is being provided by the British Columbia organization about the nature of precautionary measures to be taken in the event of tidal waves. As a result of federal-provincial civil emergency arrangements—

• (2:30 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the minister realizes that this kind of information should be given on motions. I appreciate that the hon. member asked a question and the minister, having heard the question, is entitled to respond briefly or to seek leave to return to motions. I would think that the minister would agree with this.

Mr. Rose: I have a further supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will return to the hon. member in a moment. I committed myself a moment ago to give an

AMCHITKA NUCLEAR TEST—SUGGESTED DIRECT CONTACT BY PRIME MINISTER WITH PRESIDENT NIXON

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. On previous occasions the right hon. gentleman has declined to make personal representations to President Nixon, but since voices are being raised with increasing insistence that the Prime Minister become more personally involved, I wonder whether the Prime Minister is yet persuaded that a direct appeal by him even at this eleventh hour might be effective?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am still of the opinion that the nearly unanimous resolution of the House of Commons speaks with even greater authority than I do.

POWDERED MILK—INQUIRY RESPECTING CONSUMPTION AND SHORTAGE

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture.

Considering the conflicting reports published in the newspapers with regard to the storage of powdered milk, would the minister tell the House whether the total production is taken up by national and international markets or if the Canadian Dairy Commission must store part of it?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure to which report the hon. member is referring.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary.

I did not refer to any reports. I am merely putting a question to the minister. Newspapers have published contradictory figures on the storage of powdered milk and my question is as follows: Can the minister tell this House whether the total production of powdered milk for the current dairy season is being absorbed by the domestic and international markets, or whether the Canadian Dairy Commission must store some of it?

[English]

Mr. Olson: We have been supplying the domestic market with skim milk powder and we have also sold rather large quantities in the export market. At the present time we do not have any great amount in the inventory although there is still some there, but I can advise the hon. member that all of it has been committed for sale during the balance of this dairy year.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put another supplementary.

For the information of industrial milk producers, would the minister tell this House how surpluses stored during 1971 compare with those of 1970?

[English]

Mr. Olson: There is a decrease in the amount in storage.

SHORTAGE OF LIVESTOCK CARS IN WESTERN PROVINCES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. It has to do with a situation that has developed in the province of Saskatchewan and I think generally in the western provinces on Canadian National Railways lines. There is a tie-up of livestock cars with the result that shipments of livestock to eastern Canada are being curtailed drastically and if this situation continues it can only result in lower market prices and heavy losses to the western producer. This information comes to me from George Beilhartz of Northern Livestock Limited in Prince Albert. Will the minister investigate this matter and do what he can to ensure that CNR shall provide these cars? Otherwise the farmers who have gone into mixed farming and into cattle will find themselves in an impossible situation.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Agriculture took notice of this question for me. I have already initiated some inquiries and I hope to have an answer for the hon. member tomorrow.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister regarding the 470 persons to be laid off by Inco at its Port Colborne refinery. Has the government had talks or does it intend to have talks with Inco in order to prevent this from happening?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I would have to ask the question of either the Minister of Labour or some other minister. I have not had talks with the company.

NOVA SCOTIA—INQUIRY AS TO RELEASE OF NEW FIGURES ON EMPLOYMENT AND UNEMPLOYMENT BY STATISTICS CANADA

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): My question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Have any new statistics been released by Statistics Canada since those produced by Statistics Canada in the middle of October with regard to employment and unemployment in Nova Scotia?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Not to my knowledge, but I will inquire further.

Mr. Coates: Has any information been provided to the CBC with regard to employment and unemployment in Nova Scotia that has not been made available to the House and to the country?

Mr. Pepin: I am not sure, Mr. Speaker. My hon. friend is probably referring to the detailed analysis of the first set of statistics we obtain every month regarding unemployment, and this is a public document. If that is what he is referring to, everybody has access to it.

NOVA SCOTIA—BASIS OF CBC TELEVISION NEWS REPORT

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State. Will he have his minister make an examination of the CBC national news of last evening so that a determination can be made whether or not there is any basis in fact for the news report on employment in the province of Nova Scotia or is this no more than a figment of the reporter's imagination?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Annapolis Valley.

Mr. Coates: I should like to hear from the parliamentary secretary and, if not, there must be a parliamentary secretary to take the question as notice.

Mr. Barnett J. Danson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): The parliamentary secretary is not present today but I will transmit to him the hon. member's representation.

AGRICULTURE

ATLANTIC CANADA—POSSIBLE INCOME STABILIZATION PROGRAM FOR FARMERS

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): My question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the desperate plight of many if not the majority of farmers in eastern Canada, particularly Atlantic Canada, at the present time, is the minister's department considering or attempting to assess the possibility of an income stabilization program for Atlantic Canada farmers somewhat akin to the Lift program for western farmers?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Not exactly in the same terms but we have had a number of discussions with representatives not only of provincial governments but also of the industry on some commodities such as potatoes, eggs and others so that we could be helpful in the difficult situation they have now. I might say that we are making some progress although we have not reached a consensus on what would be the most useful action to take to improve markets immediately for some of these commodities.

Mr. Nowlan: I thank the minister for his answer as far as it goes. While the government is perhaps considering an over-all program and particular programs with regard to particular commodities, is the minister prepared to respond favourably to the specific request of the Nova Scotia Hog Producers Association in their desperate plight and attempt to bring about a quarterly payment on hogs rather than at the end of the year because if they have to wait until the end of January they will all be bankrupt?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the last comment in the preamble to the question, but I think the hog producers in Nova Scotia are aware that a payment will be made if the price falls below the support level. Those figures will not be available to us until the end of the calendar year.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Huron on a supplementary question, but I think this is an appropriate time to remind hon. members that we have gone through more than half the question period and there are some 30 members seeking the floor. Some of them should resign themselves immediately to the certainty that they will not be called today.

EGGS—SUGGESTED ACTION TO CONTROL IMPORTS FROM UNITED STATES

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact the minister announced a fowl buying program in an endeavour to assist in raising the price received by egg producers in Ontario, and as it has been brought to my attention that United States eggs are again coming into Ontario, thus negating that program, is the minister going to do anything to prevent U.S. eggs taking over the market in Canada?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we could take some action along those lines but we should recall that during 1970 large quantities of Canadian eggs were shipped to the United States.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister. In light of the sentence of five years imprisonment imposed on the Dean of Johannesburg under the Terrorism Act for what in effect was opposition to apartheid, and in light of Canada's and the United Nations' frequent expression of abhorrence of that system, will the government express to the government of South Africa its deep concern and hope for clemency in this case?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the case to which the hon. member is referring. I will investigate it and discuss with the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he can provide an answer.

POLLUTION

REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT ON REMOVAL OF SUNKEN "IRVING WHALE"

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. It has been some time since the minister has given us any word with regard to the likely raising or pumping out of the Irving Whale which still poses a very grave pollution threat to the north coast of Prince Edward Island. Has there been any decision yet with regard to a contractor to deal with the problem, and can he give any indication of when the problem will likely be resolved?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker, there has been no action. The tender call is out, as I advised the House and the hon. member some time ago. So far as I am aware the various parties are preparing their submissions, but they have not been returned to date. As soon as they are I will let the hon. member know, and he can look at them if he wishes.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): In view of the fact it is highly unlikely because of the lateness of the season that any action will be taken effectively to remove this threat before the winter and spring, can the minister advise whether any officials of his department are taking interim measures to make sure that over the next six to eight months substantial deterioration of the vessel will not occur?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, an investigation has been undertaken. I am not sure of the technical method but I believe it was by use of a small submarine and a diver. They have looked over the hull and are satisfied there has been no leakage. There was some seepage from the hull at one point, not very much, but this was determined to have been oil from the engine of a very light variety. The bulk of the cargo is all right.

RIDING MOUNTAIN—PUBLIC HEARINGS ON MASTER PLAN

Mr. Craig Stewart (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Before the summer recess the minister stated in the House that public hearings would be held in Manitoba in late 1971 or early 1972 concerning the government's master plan for Riding Mountain National Park. Can the minister now tell the House the definite dates of the public hearings in Manitoba, as many groups want to present briefs?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, as soon as the date is set, it will be made public. Interested groups will be informed of the date and place of the public hearings but I cannot give it at the present time.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, can the minister give us his assurance that when the hearings take place they will be held in western Manitoba, preferably in the city of Brandon?

MANPOWER

NUMBER OF JOBS TO BE CREATED BY WINTER WORKS PROGRAMS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Although the government has refused to table its forecasts of unemployment for the coming months, would the minister at least consider providing to the House, through a statement or in some other form, his information as to the number of jobs the recently announced winter works programs are expected to create during the winter months?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we have also indicated we would tend to avoid doing that partly because of the number of indirect jobs as well as direct jobs that may be involved. Under the local initiatives program our target is to create the greatest possible number of jobs from the project applications that may be submitted.

ON THE JOB TRAINING—REMOVAL OF EXCLUSION OF MUNICIPALITIES FROM GRANTS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): While not accepting that answer, Mr. Speaker, I would like to try another question. Following the requests of a number of municipalities for changes in the on the job training aspects of the program, which currently exclude municipalities from the right to receive grants for on the job training, and following suggestions that they could usefully retrain some people, would the minister seriously consider changing the regulations that exclude municipalities?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we are having consultations specifically to test what alterations or improvements might be made in the program. In particular, there might be a case for including in it those activities of municipalities that are carried on in some regions by municipalities themselves and which are carried on by private contractors in other regions.

Inquiries of the Ministry

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—SUGGESTED REMOVAL OF 30 MAN-MONTH REQUIREMENT—NUMBER OF PROJECTS APPROVED

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the minister a supplementary question. Would he reconsider the restrictive aspects of the local initiatives program, such as the 30 man-month requirement, so that small municipalities can take advantage of that program?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the minimum requirement of 30 man-months is designed to limit to some extent the number of applications we will be considering. Since we expect under this popular program, more applications than can be approved in any case, we are encouraging municipalities where possible to combine parts of programs into one larger program to meet this minimum limit.

Mr. Lundrigan: Would the minister tell the House how many projects have been approved to date under the LIP program?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the applications are beginning to come in. I do not imagine that approval has been made to this point, but it should not be long before we begin to have approvals.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. I would like to ask the minister whether he is now approaching the end of his revision and, if so, whether he has consulted, in the course of this revision, the local organizations that have expressed great interest in this project?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): The answer is yes on both counts, Mr. Speaker. We believe we can resolve the matter of the type of access to be provided, but what we cannot do at the moment is assure that there will be ease of access for air travellers, which was the reason we got into the matter in the first instance. We will be asking the local groups concerned and the municipalities if they can find some way to have a bridge built which will ensure speedy access to the airport and one which can be operated on a toll-free basis or some similar system.

LOCAL INITIATIVE PROGRAM—AGREEMENT WITH QUEBEC RESPECTING ADMINISTRATION

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I would like to give the Minister of Manpower and Immigration the opportunity of clarifying a question directed to him by the leader of the opposition.

Since newspapers report that the Quebec minister of finance has expressed some reservation on behalf of his government in connection with the administration of programs initiated by the federal government and that the minister replied that the difficulties had been wiped out, can he indicate whether the federal government has found a new formula to meet the requirements of Quebec concerning the administration of programs which the federal government is promoting to fight unemployment this coming winter?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I can add anything to the answer I gave earlier in regard to this matter. So far as I know the procedures in regard to the program are satisfactory.

Mr. Marshall: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

Can the minister tell if the Quebec finance minister has approved the formula put forward by the federal government regarding programs which the latter intends to implement in order to fight unemployment during winter or if he has put restrictions on the implementation of these programs?

[English]

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has indicated that they welcome the initiatives which we have taken and, administratively, I think we are working very well together.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe. The hon. member has caught both the Speaker's eye and the Speaker's ear.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—AVAILABILITY OF INFORMATION TO ORGANIZATIONS IN REMOTE AREAS—PROVISION OF QUOTAS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): That was my parade square voice of 25 years ago, Mr. Speaker. I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. It has to do with the local initiatives program as it affects community organizations and local groups. I am referring to areas that are far removed from manpower centres. Could the minister advise us what steps are being taken to give those organizations and groups information? Also, is he considering quotas for those people in remote areas where unemployment is greatest?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as far as the municipalities are concerned, it is expected that the provincial co-ordinator in each case may supply application forms and information to the municipalities within the province. Manpower centres are fairly widespread and, of course, some mobile services bring these services even closer to the municipalities and community groups interested. As far as the question of distribution is concerned, we have, of course, the objective of distributing the available money among the regions in relation to unemployment. This principle will tend to be—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are running short of time. Both answers and questions should be brief. Is the hon. member rising on a further supplementary?

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, I think the minister missed the purport of my question. I am not referring to municipalities. I am referring to that portion of the program which concerns local and private groups and how they can apply to manpower centres—

An hon. Member: Where there are no municipalities.

Mr. Marshall: —where there are no municipalities. They are far removed from those centres and not getting information.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the information is readily available. I am sure if they simply write to or phone the manpower centre they will get it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

EDUCATIONAL FACILITIES IN NORTHEASTERN ALBERTA—REQUEST FOR PROVISION OF MONEY TO BUILD SCHOOLS

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board on behalf of the weak and impoverished Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development who told us on Friday that it was physically impossible to build six schools. Would the President of the Treasury Board play the role of the good doctor and inject a little financial muscle into the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development so that he can fulfil his constitutional and treaty responsibilities to the Indians of the Saddle Lake-Athabasca region?

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In light of the outburst of the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton on television and in the House yesterday regarding the right hon. gentleman's recent announcement concerning the Glace Bay heavy water plant, would the Prime Minister consider appointing him as parliamentary secretary to the cabinet minister from Nova Scotia who would educate him on the subject?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I assume that this is a representation rather than a question.

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, could I rephrase my question?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member has another question to ask since the first one was not acceptable procedurally.

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the right hon. gentleman if he will take that step, thus preventing any more of these demented diatribes from a disappointed deacon?

Mr. Rose: That was very good.

POLLUTION

LAKE SUPERIOR—REPRESENTATIONS CONCERNING DUMPING OF TACONITE WASTE ON UNITED STATES SIDE

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of the Environment. Is the minister aware of the serious pollution problem being created in Lake Superior on the United States side by the dumping of 67,000 tons of taconite waste rock daily into the lake by the Reserve Mining Company?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Harding: Have representations been made to the United States authorities or to the International Joint Commission by the minister or his department regarding this problem and, if so, with what result?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, our staffs have been in close consultation both with the Council on Environmental Quality and the Environmental Protection Agency of the United States, and discussions have been going on with respect to industrial practices on boths sides of the border.

MANPOWER

PLANS TO AVOID LOSS OF FRUIT AND VEGETABLES BECAUSE OF LACK OF LABOUR

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. My question has to do with the tragedy that is now becoming apparent. In view of the loss of thousands of tons of fruit and vegetables because of the lack of available labour during the harvest season despite high unemployment, will the minister now look into this problem to see if adequate plans cannot be made for the coming season in order to circumvent such a tragedy?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we endeavour in every way possible to meet manpower needs with regard to harvesting. Perhaps the hon. member might remind his colleagues of this situation should they criticize the Caribbean workers program in another summer.

Mr. Danforth: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are running short of time.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

NOVA SCOTIA MINING INDUSTRY—ELIMINATION OF NECESSITY FOR UNEMPLOYED TO GO TO COURT TO COLLECT UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFITS

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister arising out of the false newscast last night which was supported by the Premier of Nova Scotia. I ask the Prime Minister to ask the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion to make the Premier of Nova Scotia aware of the deplorable situation of the mining industry in Cape Breton.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is a representation rather than a question. I am sure the hon. member appreciates that.

[Mr. Harding.]

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I asked the Prime Minister whether he would ask the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion to make the Premier of Nova Scotia aware of something. I wish to ask a supplementary also.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member might ask another question. I have ruled that his previous question was not a question but a representation. If the hon. member wants to ask a question, of course he will be recognized.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a further question to the Prime Minister. Since he indicated recently in Nova Scotia that he does not believe in the use of the courts to bring about settlements, would he consider the situation in which Cape Breton miners face the prospect of having to go to court in order to recover unemployment insurance benefits which were wrongfully taken away—I use the word "wrongfully" because that was the word used by the present chairman of Devco—and make a statement to the effect that miners need not spend money to get back from the government what was unlawfully taken from them?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will take note of the representation of the hon. member.

CRIMINAL CODE

INQUIRY AS TO DEBATE ON ABORTION

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of his encouraging remarks at Darmouth last Friday, is he now in a position to tell us the approximate date of what he referred to as the "upcoming debate on abortion"?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, if the opposition parties can tell us when the present debate before the House will terminate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway has a supplementary question. The Chair will recognize her and then the hon. member for Abitibi.

Mrs. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether he would be willing to put before the House legislation which would allow Parliament to decide whether or not all references to abortion should be taken out of the Criminal Code?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker; that is not what we said we would do in the Speech from the Throne to which the hon. member is constantly referring.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member for Abitibi wishes to ask a supplementary question.

[English]

I recognize the hon. member for Abitibi for the purpose of a supplementary to a previous question. Otherwise, we have reached the end of the question period.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—APPLICABILITY IN UNORGANIZED MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration a question about the local initiatives program recently announced.

We know that in some ridings such as Abitibi several parishes are not organized into municipalities. Could the minister say how those parishes will be able to apply for grants under the program dealt with in the recent announcement?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me the question has just been asked. The hon. member might not be satisfied with the reply. In any event, the question has been asked and the minister answered it.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed, from Monday, November 1, consideration in committee of Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act—Mr. Benson—Mr. Laniel in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: When the committee rose last evening, section 117, with an amendment proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, was before the committee. Sections 117, 118, 119, 120, 146, 147, and 204 had been grouped together for the purpose of debate.

On Clause 1—Section 117—1972 rates.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, arising out of the amendment proposed last night by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—

Mr. Saltsman: I rise on a point of order. I might bring to your attention, Mr. Chairman, that I called it ten o'clock last night. Might I continue with the remarks I commenced at that time?

The Deputy Chairman: I am sure the hon. member for Edmonton West will not have any objection.

Mr. Saltsman: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. My apologies to the hon. member for Edmonton West whose remarks I always listen to with great interest.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Saltsman: Last night I spoke in support of the amendment moved by my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I stated at that time that it was one of the most brilliant amendments that had ever been put forth, certainly one of the most sensible ones that had come before this House. I am very proud to support it.

There is quite a history to the attempts of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to get the idea of a tax credit accepted. The wording of his amendments was such that the Chairman of the committee did not find them acceptable. The hon. member very carefully studied the instructions from the Chair and managed to satisfy the Chair with this amendment. In an attempt to get justice for those at the lower income levels, on another occasion the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre attempted to increase the exemption for single people from $1,500 to $2,000 and for married people from $2,850 to $4,000. I think that at this time these are really the only acceptable levels. In fact, they are minimum acceptable levels. That particular attempt did not meet with success. The government did not view that amendment with favour. Throughout all that time, the hon. member never gave up the idea of the tax credit system. In light of this particular history and the very sensible amendment before us, the government should soften its opposition somewhat, if not because of the obvious merits of the proposal then at least because of the valiant attempts of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to bring this matter before the House.

There are a number of very great advantages to the amendment before us. The amendment seeks to provide what amounts to a tax credit of $500 for every single taxpayer. It will remove approximately $75 in taxes from every person who is subject to tax. This is a good amendment in the sense that it is universal. Everyone will receive some benefit from it. The high taxpayer as well as the low taxpayer will receive this particular form of credit. Therefore, it should be widely accepted.

Unlike our present system of exemptions under which the benefits tend to escalate and improve the more income a person has, the major benefits from this particular proposal will accrue to the people at the lower income level. On a percentage basis, they will receive a higher benefit. That is really where the benefit should be given. It means that those at the lower income level who are married will receive virtually the same treatment as they would receive if the married exemption were $4,000 under an exemption system. Those at the higher income levels would still receive what amounts to a $75 reduction in their taxes. However, unlike the present system, they would not receive a greater benefit with a higher income. The advantage of this tax credit system is that it can be adjusted at any time to the needs of society with far greater precision than the system of exemptions which we now have.

To use a recent example, the government wants to encourage employment in Canada. The government has proposed a tax cut of 3 per cent on taxable income, part of which is to take effect this year. It will take full effect next year. Let us look at this proposal for a 3 per cent tax cut. What sort of benefit would a person who had to pay $50 in income taxes receive? He would receive a $1.50 tax reduction at the lowest income level. Surely, that is the level at which the greatest stimulation is required; that is the level at which people have a need to purchase more commodities. A taxpayer with a tax liability of $3,000 will receive $90 under the 3 per cent tax cut. How can something like that be accepted as just? Why should a taxpayer at that level receive a greater tax relief? It merely results in an increase in his ability to save rather than his ability to consume. We can see how illogical this system is from an economic point of view. Rather than a tax cut, it would be better to give a tax credit. In that way those at the lower end of the income scale would receive a substantial benefit. Those at the upper end of the income scale, while they would receive some benefit, would not have their benefits escalated because they have a higher tax liability. This applies to the entire tax system.

We have been very critical of the system of exemptions as compared to tax credits because of this particular effect. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre pointed out the effect of the $650 exemption for old age pensioners over the age of 65. He pointed out that those at the lowest level of income will receive a $650 benefit. Those at the higher end of the income scale will receive almost 50 per cent more in benefits. It does not make any sense, and certainly does not jibe with any concept of equity. What is often overlooked when we compare the tax credit system with the exemption system is the incentive effect which exists under the proposal advocated in the amendment before us. We know that some people who are perhaps worst off in our society are not always the ones on welfare but what we call the working poor, those who go to work every day. The minute their income exceeds $2,000 they are obliged to pay tax on it. Even under the proposal in the tax reform bill, they would still have to pay tax if their income exceeded $2,850. It seems to me that the greatest measure of relief should be given to this group of working poor in our society. Even when children are taken into account in calculating their exemptions, many people who are working will still be paying tax, although they are at poverty level or below it.

The proposal before us, which would virtually eliminate the next $500 of income from taxation, or, in the case of a couple, the next $1,000, has the advantage of the built in incentive. Instead of a person losing 17 per cent at that level of income, the loss would only be 2 per cent. That is an enormous incentive to go out to work and do somewhat better than a person might otherwise feel compelled to do.

The increased cost of living in the last number of years has substantially raised the point at which we consider a person to be living in poverty. The amendment recognizes this. It would allow a person to be free of tax or to be taxed only minimally at a level below $4,000. One of the difficulties about the tax system as it now stands, the system of exemptions, is that the marginal rates need to be much higher than would be required under a system of tax credits. We hear a great deal of complaint about how progressive our tax system is when, in fact, it is not as progressive as marginal rates would indicate. The Carter Commission pointed out that while marginal rates in Canada seem to be exceptionally high, in fact almost no one pays those high rates, certainly not at the level of 70 per cent and above, because of such factors as the 10 per cent dividend tax credit, the special concessions people get if they invest in resource industries, and so on. And now that the government proposes to abolish estate tax it seems that some will receive a substantial sum of money as an inheritance and will not be required to pay tax on it at all.

An hon. Member: Unless he lives in one of the provinces which retains the estate tax.

Mr. Saltsman: A great deal of the resentment against the present tax system is based on rates which are to some extent illusory. If the present system were replaced by another, some anomalies would remain, but the tax credit system would at least show people in a more realistic way the actual levels of taxation to which they were subject. Our present system looks a lot more progressive than it really is. In an open society there is great merit in things being what they appear to be. The present out-dated method of tax calculation merely continues an illusion.

In the course of a discussion on tax credits versus tax exemptions, the Minister of Finance in a carefully prepared statement pointed out on one occasion that the government could achieve almost identical results, if not identical results, by using the present system as might be obtained under the system we advocated. A similar position has been taken by the parliamentary secretary and by various spokesmen for the government. It is true the same effect could be achieved, but only by perpetuating an illusion, but making the marginal rates higher than they really are in practice. One could average them out, I suppose, or one could achieve the effect by continually juggling the marginal rates, but it is a cumbersome approach. For these reasons I hope members of the committee will view with favour the amendment before the chamber. As I say, it accomplishes a number of useful things. It provides relief where it is most required. It provides relief in a much fairer way than would be the case under the exemption system.

It may be that the sharp pencils on the government side have already been out and that the parliamentary secretary will rise at some point in this debate to say that commendable though the principle might be it would cost too much money to apply. In anticipation of such an approach I have made some rough calculations myself. It looks as though the cost would be in the area of $450 million. That is a substantial amount, but it is not more substantial than the sum which the government is prepared to offer to encourage employment by providing 7 per cent tax relief for corporations and 3 per cent tax relief for individuals. Using the government's own figures, the 7 per cent tax relief for corporations is estimated to cost $175 million; the 3 per cent concession to individual taxpayers is estimated to cost $225 million in the second year. The total reaches a figure very close to what it would cost to implement the proposal contained in the amendment.

If we consider the two proposals, it is evident that the one contained in the amendment is infinitely superior in the sense that it provides money to people who would undoubtedly use it and, in so doing, stimulate the economy. I do not wish to get into a lengthy argument at this point about the relative advantages of reductions in corporation taxes as compared with reductions in rates to individual taxpayers. Nevertheless, I believe that most authorities who have looked into the various methods available to stimulate the economy have reached the conclusion that the best way of doing so is by granting tax relief to those who need to make purchases and whose incomes are insufficient to meet their needs, with the result that if they received an additional amount of money they would spend it. For all these reasons, I commend this particular amendment to the House.

Mr. MacEachen: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman, to advise the committee concerning discussions which have taken place among the House leaders in respect of the manner in which we propose to deal with the next grouping of items of the bill.

First, we shall continue with the grouping upon which we began discussion yesterday, including proposed sections 117, 118, 119, 120, 146, 147 and 204. When these have been completed, we will begin another grouping, consisting of sections 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 15, 18 and 20. It is our expectation that it might be possible to complete these today. As hon. members know, Wednesday and Thursday will be opposition days so we will not be able to resume our discussion of this bill until Friday, at which time we hope to return to section 8 and complete it on Friday.

We will then consider a series of sections which might be regarded as clean-up sections, or sections relating to the major subjects that we have been discussing. This grouping consists of the following sections: 16, 67, 69, 70, 72, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 81, 126, 144, 145, 148, 149, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 205, 206, 207, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252 and 254. It is our expectation that it might be possible to complete this work on Friday.

On Monday, November 8, we will begin a new grouping, consisting of sections 28, 29, 30 and 31. These have to do with farming issues, such as the basic herd and so on, and following completion of that work we will commence the discussion on capital gains. Under this general subject we would list the following sections, at least tentatively: sections 38 to 55 inclusive, section 3, 9, 71, 73, 85, 87, 88, 89, 96 and 111. There does seem to be some duplication in regard to section 9. We would hope that we can complete the discussion on the capital gains provisions as soon as possible, perhaps early in the week.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I think the significance of the changes announced by the President of the Privy Council, which I gather is acceptable to the House leaders, is that two of the sections we shall next be considering, namely sections 28 and 29, have been grouped with sections 30 and 31, which are to be discussed on Monday next. Sometimes we designate Friday as fish day in the House of Commons, and in this case we are designating Monday as farming day, since sections 28 deals with farmers and section 29 deals with the basic herd concept. Sections 30 and 31 also deal with other aspects of farming operations.

I think it is important that we do put some kind of tag on these provisions so that we will know whether it is the farmers who are supposed to crowd back here early on Monday to take part in debate or whether it is the fishermen, lawyers or the like. I think it is useful to have that point on the record. The effect of the amendment with regard to immediate business is that we are going to take a whole flock of small items on Friday, but that we are taking a very large and substantial item on Monday, namely the taxation provisions in respect to farmers.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, in a sentence or two may I just confirm that the list of sections read out by the President of the Privy Council does represent what was agreed to today by the House leaders of the various parties. I might also state that the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants has done what needed to be done, namely to emphasize that we have made one change from the grouping we agreed to the other day, namely to separate sections 28 and 29 from the grouping they were in and to bracket them together with sections 30 and 31, so that we have a group of four sections dealing with farming matters, such as the basic herd and other considerations.

The other category that we are planning for debate but which we have not yet set up will, of course, be the grouping of sections that deal with the taxation of co-operatives and credit unions. The assumption is that these will follow the groups that have been indicated today.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the Chair to assume that the committee accepts that agreement? It is very difficult for the Chair to call this an order because there might be some changes to the time schedules, but this statement could constitute a flexible agreement for the guidance of the committee.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I think it can be said that this does represent an agreement or a target. Perhaps it should also be on the record that in each case the Chair will call the first section in the grouping.

The Deputy Chairman: Is that agreed by the committee?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, I want to make a few more points with regard to section 117(1)(a), which sets out the scale or schedule of tax rates and seals the fate of Canadian taxpayers over the years to come. The hon. member for Waterloo had a good deal of complaint about what he thought was the favouritism shown those in the higher income groups by the reduction of the top rates. He also complained about eliminating the estate tax. I want to point out to him some facts of life with regard to these rates and also indicate the effectiveness of the estate tax.

Whether he knows it or not, there is an estate tax in every province, bar one. The two socialist governments of our provinces have indicated that they are going to implement an estate tax effective January 1, 1972. The hon. member is the official voice in this House of the New Democratic Party in matters fiscal, but I am sure that the farmers in the three prairie provinces, particularly in Saskatchewan and Manitoba, as well as the farmers in the province of Ontario will really welcome the reimposition of an estate tax plus the introduction of a capital gains tax. Of course, the NDP, and I would think perhaps the people of certain parts of Saskatchewan will be more than interested in this, suggest it is fine to reintroduce the estate tax and have a capital gains tax, but they want the capital gains tax to be double the rate provided for in the bill. I should like to see the hon. member for Waterloo go out to Saskatchewan, for instance, or even to Waterloo and explain this to the farmers there.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. Saltsman: I will on Friday.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): He says he is going on Friday but by that time no one will hear him. I want him to understand that there is a Succession Duty Act in the province of Ontario; there is one in the province of Quebec; there is one in British Columbia and there will be one in each of the provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba. I presume there are some in the Atlantic provinces. All that happens under the act as it now exists is that there is an estate tax levied. There was also an assessed tax under the provincial succession or estate tax act. The two were mixed, however, but the end result was that a tax was paid to one or the other. After the tax was paid, as in the province of Quebec which retained its rights under the Dominion-provincial agreements, whatever was paid in respect of succession duties was a credit under the estate tax assessment to the federal government. Therefore, there was an elimination of double taxation to some degree.

The federal government in the present case proposes to remove the estate tax, but that does not eliminate the provincial estate tax. Therefore estate tax or succession duties will still have to be paid in the provinces, except Alberta where I am told the government has decided not to re-impose the estate tax or succession duty. The net result is that everybody has to pay the estate tax and have added a capital gains tax which is, in effect, a tax on deemed realization on death. Perhaps I have not interpreted this correctly, but my understanding is that the capital gains tax will not be considered a credit towards succession duties levied by the provinces, and therefore there will be an additional tax. We are told there are no additional taxes coming out of this package, but that is not so. There is an additional tax and the people of Canada should know about it. This so-called simplification is in many ways like a shell game; now you see it, now you don't. That is what the Minister of Finance tells us about this simplification, that everyone is to be brought under the one hat, but the hat is of a larger size and the Canadian taxpayer is being asked to wear it.

As was pointed out last night, we are being asked also to simplify one tax rate by combining what had been formerly the income tax portion, the old age security portion and the social service portion. This is now all under one heading, but this does not allow the federal government any abatement of income tax toward the provincial income tax, or for any greater allocation of funds. Any province that wants to increase its revenue will have to impose additional income tax. That is already the case in some places and I am not worried about it. In fact, in some provinces there may be a greater sense of responsibility because if they desire to spend more money that will result in the imposition of larger and additional taxes.

How do we calculate what is to be the total rate. Members have only been looking at federal rates of income tax, for instance the bracket of up to $500. Section 117(1)(a) says the income tax will be $85, or 17 per cent.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

That is not going to be the case. There must be added the conversion factor under this table, because the provincial conversion factor for the purpose of calculation so far has shown this at 30 per cent. Incidentally, there is going to be an amendment to this table.

In other words, from $500 to $1,000 the tax shall be $85 plus 18 per cent of the difference between $500 and $1,000. Then, there shall be added for the individual 30 per cent of the federal rate, which in this instance becomes 5.1 per cent, making a total of 21.1 per cent. This morning the Minister of Finance, in speaking to the provincial finance ministers, had this to say:

> We have made our best estimates about revenue yields of the new tax system. But from the beginning we have recognized that some degree of uncertainty as to these yields will exist until we have actual experience under the new system. We have said we will guarantee for three years that provinces receive no less than they would under the existing system, a length of time that we have felt sufficient to permit accurate assessment.
> The tax base upon which provincial taxes are calculated is slightly smaller than the existing base. To receive the same amount of revenue, provinces will need to express their new tax on the smaller base at rates slightly above present rates. I want to emphasize again that this would not result in a higher level of provincial taxes . . .
> Our original calculations produced a conversion factor of 30.2 over 28, which was rounded down to 30 over 28. We are now prepared to suggest that the conversion factor be adjusted to 30.5—that is, rounded up to the nearest half point instead of down—as a more appropriate expression of the provincial rates required to maintain the same revenue. Our guarantee will therefore be based on provincial tax rates converted by 30.5 over 28.

The minister then added that the period of guarantee would be extended from three years to five years. In a final summation, he said:

> To make it perfectly clear, the federal government is prepared to guarantee for five years the revenue yield of the new system as compared with the existing system, provided that provinces establish new rates for 1972 no higher than the rate derived from a conversion factor of 30.5 over 28.

I do not know what the reaction of the provinces was to that, but to hon. members I would say that this results in just a slightly higher total rate of tax to the individual taxpayer. It is actually using the federal rate multiplied, plus the result of the multiplication of the federal rate which is not 30 but 30½ per cent. So, if one were to take the table in the bracket of $2,000 to $3,000, which is the table under section 117(1)(d) where the rate is 20 per cent, the total combined federal and provincial tax will be not 26 per cent but 27 per cent at the marginal rate, an increase of 1 per cent in the marginal rate. You see, therefore, how quickly the rates of individual taxpayers have gone up. The Minister of Finance says we will use a factor of 30½ as against 30, and immediately tax rates go up because of an increase in the provincial sector. It would be interesting now to make the conversion, shall we say, in the top bracket of $60,000 which federally is 47 per cent. The rate before this had been 61.1 per cent with the provinces but will now go up to 61.33¼, I suppose 61.34. Strangely enough, percentagewise one will see the difference. I indicated there was a difference of 1 per cent in the total of the taxable bracket of $2,000 to $3,000, but over $60,000 the increase is only one tenth of one per cent.

With regard to the amendment, I have looked up the statistics for the taxation year 1970-71. A tax credit of $75 in the personal income tax field according to a reduction calculation results in a reduction of some $550 million in the revenues therefrom. I notice the parliamentary secretary is nodding his head in general approval of this as being the figure. We are considering a whole year on this basis. The $225 million the minister promised on October 14, as a result of the 3 per cent reduction in tax payable by individuals for the year 1972-73, frankly would not be necessary if a tax credit were now given. A tax credit system is the objective of the move by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and is one with which we fully agree because we have from the very outset, even before anyone else spoke about it, argued in favour of tax credits. In order to be credible in this I believe I must accept the principle of the amendment and I do so quite willingly. I have some reservation concerning the validity of the ruling with regard to the amendment. I say that merely on a personal basis. The amendment having been accepted, however, I now say we are quite prepared to support it.

The tax credit as proposed would give much more relief from tax in the lower income groups than would the proposed 3 per cent the minister has proposed for the 18 month period beginning July 1, 1971. I want to make quite clear that while I recognize the cost to the treasury in diminution of funds, it is not necessarily a total loss. It is in the first instance, but there is a multiplier effect and there is a recapturing of some of this money that the government forgives in the way of income tax because it is picked up through the sales tax, through an increase in economic activity and so on. On October 14 the minister said that the purpose of the tax cut was to stimulate the economy and that the government was prepared to put into the national spending pot some $350 million. Then, it hopes to recover a given portion of this through the increase in economic activity, more jobs, higher incomes and more income taxes both from the personal point of view and the corporate point of view. Therefore, one must not look at such a tax cut as representing a cost to the national treasury of $550 million. We have taken off $225 million with regard to the 3 per cent tax cut, which would be the exchange, and I would say there would be a good deal more revenue generated by the increased economic activity so that the net cost, bearing in mind the social purpose of the tax cut, would be more than compensated by the benefit to the individuals receiving the same. To that extent, therefore, I hope the committee would see fit to support the amendment.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Chairman, it came as a bit of a surprise to us that the hon. member for Edmonton West would support this rational, sensible and equitable proposal. We welcome the support for this serious amendment. One of the persistent and unfortunate facts of so-called tax reform in other countries in the past 30 years has been that it almost never resulted in any significant shift in income in any of the advanced industrial countries, this country included. I should like the parliamentary secretary to look at a work which might be of interest to him. I refer to Professor Titmus' study of income distribution and social change over a few years ago in England. I hope he would have a look at it and seriously assess the comments made concerning a full variety of so-called approaches to tax reform which have resulted not in redistribution of income but rather in the maintenance of the present income patterns in society. I suggest that the present tax proposals, the hundreds of pages of them that we have before us, really amount to a continuation of this lamentable tradition. We have had a number of proposals in a number of areas, and I would like to comment on each of them by way of a brief preamble to the specific amendments.

The capital gains tax has at last been introduced in this country, the last country in the western world to do it. Instead of taxing all the capital gains as part of one's income, in the typical Liberal fashion it has been decided to tax only 50 per cent of these gains. The worker pays tax on all of his taxable income, all his earned dollars if you like. But the man who clips coupons, who makes a gain in the stock market in Toronto, will be able to continue that wonderful tradition and will pay tax on only half of what he gains.

We have made reference to the estate tax proposals which again benefit the rich, notwithstanding what the hon. member who preceded me said. Incidentally,—I am sorry he has left the House—it has always been made clear by our members, particularly by our western members, that there is no intention to tax the small family farm estates. A distinction has always been made by this party in that regard and it is unfortunate the hon. member for Edmonton West did not point out this fact, since I suspect he is well aware of it.

Mr. McCleave: Sanctimonious guys.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Take it easy.

Mr. Broadbent: I will refrain from commenting on the interjection of my good friend to the right. Perhaps he will join in later. I do not make these points in jest and, as a matter of fact, I respect my hon. friend very much. I make these points in all seriousness. I think that a tax system in a democratic society is or should be one of the most important means of bringing about some equity in terms of income distribution. If this party has said on a number of occasions that this is not being done in our society, apparently it is necessary to go on saying it because we are not getting the kind of change that we think is desirable.

The third item seems to me frankly discriminatory. It is the proposal that workingmen get an exemption for work expenses so long as they do not exceed $150. The provision says nothing about the junior jet set executives who will entertain their friends in Toronto and be able to claim exemption at a much higher level than the ordinary working people.

The fourth point in the current tax proposals is the continued taxing of people whom the Economic Council of Canada says live at the poverty level. There is no decision to go beyond that kind of economic barbarism. There has been no introduction of the tax credit system which, as has been mentioned many times, is a much more equitable basis for taxation than is the changing of the level of exemptions so favoured by this government.

Finally, in words of the Minister of Finance, we have the proposal to reduce corporate income tax by 7 per cent, which is said to be an important spark or incentive for industrial expansion. I do not know any serious economist who would argue that the corporation really conducts its investment plans on the basis of expected increases or decreases in taxation levels. It seems to me that they operate always on the basis of profit levels, what they really think the market would provide in positive or negative terms. Therefore, I think that a 7 per cent tax relief for corporations is really a colossal give away to the corporate sector of this society.

Having made all these points, and I think they are worth making about the present system of taxation in Canada, especially underlining the present proposals that are supposed to constitute tax reform, I would like to make one or two brief comments about the amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. It seems to me that what it would do is something that all the other items that I have mentioned avoid doing, that is to provide relief in terms of degree where it is most seriously needed. What it really amounts to is a $75 deduction for most taxpayers. What is important about this from the point of equity is that $75 is a hell of a lot more to an average or poor man than it is to a rich man and therefore, as has been said by those who have supported the proposal, this is real economic justice. By passing this amendment we would help the unorganized worker in Halifax, the poor farmer wherever he is, the organized worker in Oshawa, Hamilton or Vancouver, and, in short, bring early, important and immediate benefits to many of the average and poor people. Therefore, I think it is desirable from that point of view.

The effect of such a reduction to these people who put most of their money into the economy directly as opposed to high income people who devote a substantial percentage of their income to investment would be an immediate economic stimulus to the economy, and therefore the net effects over a year or so, in terms of economic costs alone, could well be positive. In other words, if it is true that it would cost about $515 million to put this proposal into effect right now, the economic spin-off effect in terms of its impact on the economy could perhaps exceed that loss of revenue if the stimulus on the economy is as positive as a number of us think it would be. Therefore, on grounds of equity, and in terms of the criteria of economic efficiency for the economy as a whole, I urge support of this amendment.

[Translation]

Mr. Rodrigue: Mr. Chairman, I consider the amendment brought forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to be worthwhile and important, seeking fiscal relief for a group of people who would certainly appreciate it, particularly those in the lower income group. I therefore support the amendment and hope the House will adopt it.

This amendment would save all taxpayers approximately $75 a year. For some, the amount may seem small, but for those in the lower income group a 2 or 3 per cent increase in income would be most welcome. It would have practically the same results as boosting exemptions to $2,000 for single persons and $3,300 for a married couple.

The amendment seems very realistic to me, particularly at the present time when the cost of products and services is rising from one week to the next.

Another reason why I support this amendment is that it would leave in the hands of the people a good deal of money. The hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) mentioned a while ago that this amount would be around $450 million. That would be an injection of money in additional purchasing power into an economy which is slowing down. It is exactly what the government is trying to do at this time, by implementing new programs.

We are specially concerned in this debate on the Income Tax Act about the fate of people in low income brackets. As a matter of fact, the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre aims at saving them a certain amount of tax money.

As members of the Social Credit party, we have repeatedly suggested basic exemptions of $3,000 for single people and of $5,000 for married persons. But, even if this amendment does not meet with the goals we had called for, it seems to us that it represents a step forward towards that objective.

The adoption of that amendment may create some technical difficulties. But in my opinion, we should not be tied down by this detail.

With respect to the difficulties that the provinces might encounter concerning what tax percentage should be set up, some of them may not be satisfied. But we should not forget that some provinces have been asking for a greater share of the taxes. I fail to see why those provinces should hesitate to increase their income tax percentages if they have to, considering that it would be a good thing anyway for Canadians to know, once and for all, how much tax they have to pay to the federal government, and how much to provincial governments. This tax credit would mean additional income in the hands of people who really need it.

I hope that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney) will take my remarks into consideration and give serious thought to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, in which we join and which we fully support.

• (4:00 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I would like to deal with the substance of the point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I should like also to give notice that later I will be dealing with some technical points arising out of section 146(9)(a) on page 395 which relates to the disposition of property by trusts. I shall do that after we have dealt with the amendment before us. I hope to persuade everybody that I am trying to keep a rather amorphous debate within limits as much as possible.

I would like to add my support to that of the hon. member for Edmonton West for the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and which was accepted by the Chair. Two speakers earlier we heard the remarks of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, that delightful fellow. I think he and I share a great admiration for a great stalwart in the political spectrum, John Stuart Mill. However, I think the hon. member might tend to look down his nose a bit at the Tories in regard to the matter of tax credits. Indeed, I suspect he could find himself on the road to Damascus and, while he was undergoing conversion, might notice that all the people raising dust in front of him on that road were members of the Conservative party who were initially sponsors of the idea of tax credits in this country. If he wants proof positive of this statement he would look at the very thoughful presentation that was made to the Finance Committee by the government of the province of Ontario. I notice that government lacked nothing in popular support when it went to the polls very recently, so it must be blazing some trails.

In any event, Mr. Chairman, I know there is a school of thought that believes that anything the hon. member says is the gospel truth and, even though I and others of my ilk have gone down that road to Damascus in front of him, that anything we say is not to be believed. I know there are enough characters of that kind in the press gallery. I am just stating a fact. Let me get to the guts of the amendment before us because that, after all, is what we are being asked to decide upon, although I do like to keep history straight from time to time. It is one of my preoccupations.

What the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre proposes is to give those on lower incomes an exemption of up to $75 on their income tax, assuming they are taxed from zero to $75. Then, from that point on everybody would be given an exemption of $75 on the personal income tax they pay. I do not think we should lose sight of the fact that from $75 down to zero, that is for those people who earn $500 taxable income or less per year, the benefits are in diminishing proportions, whereas for those over that figure they are on a quantum basis of $75 across the board. Apart from that, I think it can be regarded as a tax credit, as my hon. friend from Edmonton West has labelled it.

The advantage of the proposal is that it provides a very large sum for the economy. My hon. friend from Edmonton West thinks it would be in the neighbourhood of $550 million a year, if I heard his calculation correctly. I, myself, have worked it out at $532.9 million a year. But in any event, we are dealing with more than half a billion dollars that would be pumped into the economy as a result of the amended Income Tax Act that we are being asked to pass in this parliament. But the greater advantage is that it is not a lump sum left in any one particular person's hands or in the hands of any one group. Except for the group I have noted, this sum is divided amongst the population on the ratio of $75 per person. Each of us can look around and determine that if he or she had $75 more in his or her pocket or purse that that money would be infused, indeed enthusiastically infused, back into the economy. In that sense, because the effect of it is spread from one end of the income earning spectrum to the other, I think it probably has a greater advantage than the proposal made to us by the Minister of Finance.

As you will recall, Mr. Chairman, in an act of extraordinary repentance on a Thursday evening a few weeks back, the Minister of Finance did suggest a certain cut in income taxes over a specific period of time, with the purpose of getting money into the economy. I suggest the formula we have now before us gives everybody a crack at using the money that will come back to us—or will not be extracted from us, I guess would be a better way of putting it—for clothing, for food, for education for our children, for a better car or a Japanese radio set or heaven knows what. There are so many different ways to spend money, and I am sure we will all spend it. This proposal commends itself. It is a better approach than the one suggested by the Minister of Finance.

We should also accept the fact, because we have to be fiscally orthodox to a certain extent and we have to be almost close to paying our way if we cannot pay our way at certain times, that if we vote for the amendment presented by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, as I intend to do, we cannot accept the alternative presented by the Minister of Finance. This seems to be a quicker and better way of achieving what he is trying to do, which is get money back into the economy when the economy needs it, no matter whether you call it a tax credit system or anything else. The proposal commends itself to me. I do not think we should be looking at two things. I prefer one, and I prefer the one I intend to support in a few minutes.

• (4:10 p.m.)

Mr. Matte: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words in favour of the amendment. To all intents and purposes, it aims at increasing the basic exemption to $2,000.

It is timely, because if we stop and think of the Canadian who earns $2,000 a year, we know full well that this amount is far from adequate. The individual who earns that amount can barely pay his room and board. I say "barely" because he still has to get clothes for himself, and he has other unavoidable expenses. All hon. members, and specially the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), will surely recognize that $2,000 a year is clearly inadequate.

Consequently, is it reasonable? Is it logical then that this individual should pay $85 in income tax? Mr. Chairman, to ask the question is to provide the answer. This is something which is absolutely illogical, something which does not make any sense. In other words, before being in a position to provide for essentials such as food and clothing, the individual who earns $2,000 will have to pay $85 in income tax. That is overdoing it! This is why if such an amendment was passed, we would deal with the basic injustice from which the small wage-earner suffers.

Apparently the government is always inclined to think that there are no small wage-earners having a $2,000 yearly income. On the contrary, they do exist. There are people in some areas or at least in some constituencies who actually receive an income which is not over $2,000. This means that these people who are hard up and can scarcely make both ends meet are compelled first and foremost to pay $85 in income tax to their government. This is truly shameful.

I think that under the proposed amendment this situation is being improved upon, and that the individual who is in a truly bad predicament and who is being paid a very low salary is being treated a little bit more fairly.

It would then be quite fair, as the amendment suggests, to reduce the rate from 17 to 2 per cent. I therefore approve this amendment without any qualification.

[English]

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Chairman, the amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is so clear, concise and convincing that I will restrict my remarks this afternoon. I was impressed by the hon. member's amendment, as well as by the argument in support, presented by the hon. member for Waterloo and the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, for the reason that the amendment contains within it the principle of universality. If there is one principle that ought to be applied today in these matters, it is the principle of universality. In the past we have got into great trouble in the provision of certain programs because we attempted to get away from the principle of universality. Here is an opportunity for us to apply this principle across the board to all Canadians.

I am sure that past objections of the parliamentary secretary to the effect that the tax credit system was difficult to impose have been cleared away as a result of the amendment that was brought forward yesterday evening by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. The parliamentary secretary has always suggested that implementing the tax credit system would be too difficult. If we implement a tax credit system, we shall give some recognition to the late Mr. Carter, who was responsible for the Carter commission report. We shall honour him, because one of the fundamental recommendations in the Carter report related to the implementation of the tax credit system. In such a system Mr. Carter saw enshrined the principle of equity and fairness. That principle would apply to all Canadians. So, Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to honour and respect the man who has tried to bring about equity and fairness in our tax system.

I think Mr. Carter might be sadly disappointed if he were here today, because we are not adopting one of his suggestions, namely, that we reduce the personal income tax rate from 80 per cent to 50 per cent. That suggested reduction was based on the premise that we would also include in this bill two other major principles of taxation, one being the principle of a full capital gains tax and the other the principle of integrating all incomes that a person receives. We have sadly deviated from the principles laid down by Mr. Carter.

At present we have the opportunity to implement the tax credit system. I hope some members of the Liberal party will speak in support of this principle. Thus far, the debate with regard to the reduction of 15 per cent, or the reduction of $75 across the board, has been carried by members of the opposition. I was happy to hear the hon. member for Edmonton West support the principle we support, Mr. Chairman. He is the first lawyer I have known who, in a 20 minute speech, could speak for 15 minutes against the principle and for the last five minutes in favour of it. Perhaps as he looked skyward and saw the lights in the ceiling of the chamber he saw the light of conversion on the road to Damascus, so to speak.

An hon. Member: Hallelujah, brother.

Mr. Gilbert: I was rather happy to hear what he said in the last five minutes of his speech. He was under that divine direction which gave him insight, foresight and the necessary articulation for supporting this amendment.

[Mr. Matte.]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. member a question? I wonder if the hon. member for Broadview has had the patience and opportunity to read from the earliest committee reports of the examination of government officials and the minister on the white paper and the advocacy then of the hon. member for Edmonton West for the tax credit system?

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Gilbert: I am very happy the hon. member has come around to supporting our position. It really does not matter which party brings forth an amendment to implement the tax credit system. The important feature is that it is brought forward. We in the New Democratic Party brought it forward. We are very proud and happy that the hon. member for Edmonton West is supporting this principle.

Yesterday the Minister of Finance for Ontario recommended, on behalf of the province of Ontario, a tax credit system. He indicated the unfairness of the present system to people in the lower income brackets with regard to sales, property and income taxes. Maybe we will be able to persuade the adamant, stubborn parliamentary secretary that this proposal is fair. He shakes his head. This indicates that he opposes the tax credit system. Is it any wonder that we in the opposition become so frustrated when the government takes this position?

I notice the hon. member for Scarborough West is in the chamber this afternoon. He is a brilliant economist who supported Walter Gordon. He is known as one of the whiz kids of Canada with regard to economic theories. I invite the member for Scarborough West to state why he, as a member of the Liberal party, will not support this amendment. I would like to hear his explanation. As I said in my opening remarks, it is only the members of the opposition who have participated in this debate. The parliamentary secretary has sat back and smugly waited for us to fall by the wayside.

It has been pointed out that the hon. member for Don Valley has not participated in this debate. He comes from the affluent society, the upper middle class of Don Valley. I would like to hear what he has to say with regard to the impact of this amendment on the people of Canada. If I thought he would get up and speak, I would immediately sit down. I am attempting to persuade him and the member for Scarborough West, both men who have had experience in the field and know what the impact will be, to get up and let the people of Canada know just what is wrong with the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. This amendment has been described as brilliant. I agree. At the beginning of my remarks, I said I would be brief. I have been very brief. I resume my seat on the assumption that some Liberal members will either speak for or against this amendment.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words on this amendment. It has considerable appeal. I wish to add a few ideas on the averaging formula in the bill and its relationship in the future.

The rates on the progressive income tax for the so-called middle income group have some curious financial implications. To some extent, they are a tax on inflation. Inflation has risen as high as 6 per cent a year. It rarely has been lower than 3 per cent a year. This is a result of fiscal dividends. As a taxpayer's income increases, he moves into higher brackets and, accordingly, pays relatively higher taxes. The new tax structure moves substantial payments into income for this so-called middle income group, mainly capital gains, research scholarships and other things. Even at the lower end of the scale, the so-called unemployment insurance coverage may now be extended to include teachers and salaried workers earning a substantially higher amount of money. This fiscal dividend becomes important.

In light of the fact the amendment will reduce the tax in the lower bracket and the fact the $75 will be applicable to each bracket in some ways the proposal can be likened to the so-called temporary surtax which has now been removed. The surtax did something in that it was at least a tax on a tax on income. Those at the bottom of the scale contributed very little. Those who paid a lot of tax contributed substantially more. Through the progressive tax for the middle income group, governments each year, even in times of inflation and without any real growth, substantially increase their tax take in the income tax field.

With regard to the matter of averaging, I commend the government for making a very modest attempt at general averaging provisions. This is long overdue. In my particular profession, it is necessary to spend many years preparing to earn a living. I did not make any money until I was 34 years of age. I received less than $1,000 a year. Then, I was pitchforked into a fairly large and substantial income. I do not know if this income is too much. However, I suggest that the progressive income tax creates economic distortions, particularly in the high salaried area. We might well consider the implications of this. A person's take home pay really reflects what society thinks he is worth or what he is able to command in society, whether or not this is always economically sound. In essence, people receive their take home pay plus taxes. However, we still persist in considering the gross salary or gross income of a person before taxes and on this basis make our assessment of how much he earns, whereas we should really be considering the individual's take home pay.

The very modest, general averaging proposition by the government is a backward averaging, 110 per cent in one formula. If it is above 110 per cent in the immediately preceding year or 120 per cent of the average income for the immediately preceding four years, you get the beginning of an averaging formula. It is useful. It should be of some value when salaries are increasing rapidly, as they often do between the ages of 40 and 50 and particularly in the 50's. However, there is no real way of increasing or giving a true averaging on a downward grade. This should be dealt with in the tax structure whenever possible. For people who reach a peak in their 50's, and must of necessity have a reduced income later, there is no provision for averaging on the downward trend. If a true averaging could be carried out, and I admit this would probably result in large and formidable changes in income tax revenue, it might help our economic system substantially. If there were a true five year average it might reduce the demand for wage increases. For many years, farmers have been able to do this and it does not seem to have created enormous difficulties for the Department of National Revenue. In any case, the present averaging proposal is a step in the right direction. If it proves a sensible one and works to advantage we would be well advised to proceed with it further in the years ahead.

In the matter of income and annuity averaging, I should like to draw the attention of the parliamentary secretary to one feature which may not have been mentioned. The annuity must be bought within two months of the end of the taxation year, as the bill is presently drafted. This may be doing a disservice to the very people the legislation is designed to help. I have in mind a man who once in a lifetime sells a house or a business for a lump sum of money. Not being used to chartered accountants and so on, he may be unaware that this provision applies to him. If he must take action before the normal date on which he computes his income tax he may well find that the legislation does not help him.

In essence, the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North has much to commend it. I would support it in a general way. I would even support it on the basis that if it is to replace the 3 per cent cut in the personal income tax, whatever the equivalent is, then that should be built into the amendment, or something like it. I believe it would do much for the present state of the economy to provide increased income for the lower income group. I noticed in dealing with cases this summer that many of the lower income group were better off taking welfare, particularly if there were three or four children in the family, than working at occupations where their incomes would be subject to tax. I will clarify this statement by saying that if the government can accept the equivalent of 3 per cent income tax I would be happy to support the amendment in some way which could be worked out.

[Translation]

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Chairman, I am happy to say a few words on the amendment under consideration.

The object of this amendment is to reduce the tax rate on the first $500, from 17 per cent to 2 per cent. It is therefore with pleasure that I wholeheartedly support this amendment, because I know that Canadians already pay too much taxes.

We know that rates and taxes make the economy more sluggish and prevent its progress. This amendment to the Income Tax Act will reduce the already too heavy tax burden of the Canadian taxpayer. The latter would thus gain a small benefit or a small reduction in taxes; even if it is not much it is better than nothing at all.

It is our duty, as citizens and representatives of the people, to take part in the discussion and support this amendment, and if that had been possible, I should have liked to say more on this subject.

We support this amendment, and commend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for having moved it, slipped it among the others, which will enable Canadians to breathe a little easier.

I am convinced that by carrying on with the consideratiion of this legislation, we will manage to find other means to alleviate the tax burden of taxpayers, so that the law may be more logical and that taxpayers pay less and less taxes.

I know that the tax legislation means a substantial increase in taxes. Taxes are reduced in certain areas but increased in others.

Since all citizens may benefit from the proposed amendment, we are prepared to support it.

[English]

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to speak at this time. I have nothing much to say, in fact. My contribution on this particular subject was to have been my vote. I intend to vote this amendment down, or contribute to voting it down. But I thought it was funny to sit here and listen to the two opposition parties argue about which was further down the road to Damascus and which one was being blinded by the other's dust. Sitting on this side I must say that those two parties, the Conservative party and the New Democratic Party, are very much alike.

This is a situation which disturbs me very much. I would not support the amendment, but I would very much welcome a true Socialist alternative before the people of Canada. I would be glad to see a party which stood for a new concept of industrial democracy, a party with its own sense of social justice, a party with new ideas.

An hon. Member: What about the amendment?

Mr. Kaplan: What we find, if I can put it in a gentle way, is a group of benign chisellers who come before us in a well-meaning manner saying something like this: "You have proposed a minimum wage of $1.75. Why not make it $2.00? You have proposed $1,400 as the minimum exemption. Make it $2,000—we will settle for $1,800." This is their style. They are quite satisfied with the social order. I regard my party as being a more revolutionary party than theirs.

I can remember when I was a little boy listening to the hon. member for York South on the radio. He was saying then exactly the same thing that I heard him say a month ago during the Ontario provincial campaign. The people of Canada, he said, are not fools; they will reject the old line parties. That statement is the oldest line in Canadian politics.

The Chairman: Order, please. With respect, I think the Chair is able to conduct the proceedings of this committee more to the advantage of hon. members if, when an hon. member rises in his place, he indicates to the Chair why he is rising. This will give the Chair the opportunity to recognize him. I recognize the hon. member for Hamilton West.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Chairman, I do not need any gratuitous remarks from the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance. With all due respect to the Chair, I did point out that I was rising on a point of order. My point of order is this: I have been sitting in this chamber for days listening to contributions that had some merit. Having heard the Chair admonish and chastise those hon. members who did not follow the rule of relevancy, my point of order is that we on this side had hoped the hon. member for Don Valley would make a fantastic contribution—

Some hon. Members: He did.

Mr. Alexander: —as he was challenged to do by the hon. member for Broadview. But instead of that we listened to fairy tales. With all due respect, I think the hon. member's remarks have been irrelevant to the subject matter under debate this afternoon.

The Chairman: Order. I think I should say to the hon. member for Hamilton West that I was unable to ascertain that he was rising on a point of order because his microphone was not switched on. However, it did seem to me that perhaps the hon. member for Don Valley, who has the floor, was wandering a bit and I would invite him to come back to the subject matter of the bill.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Chairman, as it happens I was just coming back to my main point, which was to indicate that I regarded the benign plea for an extra $75 across the board as one that we should reject. I was characterizing it in terms of the whole behaviour of the New Democratic Party. May I finish in one more sentence? Decade after decade this party, which purports to have something new and which rejects, it seems to me by its own words, the "old line", proves it is the same old party, a party where power is inherited, as is its leadership.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, I have a few additional comments to make on this amendment. If this committee ever required an endorsation of the amendment and arguments to support it, I think we have had them from the hon. member for Don Valley. Not once did he deal with the substance of the proposal we are debating. Faced with the logic of our argument and the justice of our stand, the Liberal party have resorted to vile rhetoric, to wild benality. I would have expected from the hon. member for Don Valley far more than the kind of performance he has given us.

An hon. Member: He made an excellent contribution.

Mr. Saltsman: He may have made a contribution to this debate, and it is understandable that there are divisions of opinion and people with differing views, but if the hon. member has differing views and has some substantial disagreement with this amendment, why did he not say so? Whether we are nice guys or whether we are not, whether on occasion the New Democratic Party and the Conservative party happen to agree, has really nothing to do with what we are discussing. We are discussing something that is of vital importance to almost six million taxpayers in this country. If there were any need for reassurance to us on this side that we are on the right track and that the government does not have any substantial or good reason for rejecting this amendment, then we received that assurance by the intervention that has just been made.

Mr. Harding: Mr. Chairman, I intend to speak very briefly on the amendment before the House. The remarks of the Liberal member for Don Valley disappointed me. According to him, any time the government brings forth a tax measure we always try to increase the benefits. In this particular case we are talking of those in the extremely low income tax brackets. I want to inform the hon. member that apparently he has not done his homework on this particular phase of the legislation.

To prove my point, all I have to do is refer to the cost of living index. The present personal tax exemptions were set in the year 1949, and at that date the cost of living index stood at 77.4 per cent. Today, it stands at 134.7 per cent. What we are attempting to do is to raise the exemptions for a single person from $1,000 to $1,650. This represents a 65 per cent increase. Over the period I have referred to, the increase in the cost of living has been over 74 per cent, so even with our figure we are not catching up with the increase in the index since 1949, the year on which the exemptions were based.

This is why the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre moved his amendment which seeks to cut the tax rate on the first $500 of income from 17 per cent to 2 per cent. What is wrong with that? This will give the working people of this country, the pensioners and those on fixed incomes who are in desperate straits, the opportunity to pay less income tax. This country in the year 1971 is much wealthier than it was in 1949 when the present rates were set. It is sheer idiocy and nonsense for Liberal members across the aisle to laugh and to vote this amendment down. If the government is not prepared even to bring the rate up to a level that reflects purchasing power today, then it is not doing the job it was elected to do.

This is a good, sound amendment, one for which we have been fighting. Organizations across the country, old age pensioner groups and so on, have been asking in hundreds and thousands of letters and telegrams they have sent to Members of Parliament that legislation of the kind that is reflected in our amendment be supported. I suggest hon. members opposite do so, if not for themselves at least for those they represent.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Chairman, I consider it as my duty to support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). As this amendment aims at an immediate reduction of personal income tax, I think we must support this amendment if we consider the facts which have already been analysed in the course of the preceding debates on clauses 109 and 110.

Small enterprises must absolutely benefit from a tax reduction in order to be in a position to protect as much as possible their sources of income and to invest more in order to better serve their environment. The survival of those small enterprises which contributed so much to the development of this country must be assured.

I also consider that this tax reduction must be applied immediately to the workers who contributed in a fantastic way to the development of this country, namely to the increase of the gross national product to which I drew the attention of the Chair last week when sections 109 and 110 were under consideration.

I also think that the small shopkeepers in our cities and villages are doing a lot for the people. For them to survive, they should also benefit from tax exemptions because if we continue along the same lines, overtaxation will eliminate some of them year after year. And when our small shopkeepers, grocers, butchers, and so on stop operating the corner stores and extending the weekly credit needed by our families, particularly the larger ones, low-income families will be deprived then of that service.

Mr. Chairman, farmers also are overtaxed. Production costs are increasing from day to day, and it is enough to look ever so little at the situation to realize that it is worsening from day to day.

Mr. Chairman, if I had more time I would read a letter I received today from an industrial milk producer in my riding who complains because he had to convert his business. He was forced to choose either one of the two types of production, whole milk and industrial milk, in which he was engaged. He opted for industrial milk production, which is liable to reduce considerably his income. If we do not immediately grant this category of producers a tax exemption, we once again run the risk of seeing a greater number of people leave their farms to become welfare recipients and costly dependents of the community. And then, the governments through their finance ministers will ask those who are still working and are lucky enough to operate a business to carry a heavier tax burden in order to maintain the unemployed.

In such circumstances, the whole House should get together to adopt the amendment calling for immediate reduction of personal income tax.

Mr. Chairman. sometimes, and this is most unfortunate, some hon. members, seeing opposition members rise to take part in an important debate such as the one on Bill C-259, believe they are filibustering, or just trying to delay the proceedings of the House and the passage of such an important piece of legislation.

I should like to take the opportunity to show that our parliamentary system is useful and necessary and that all hon. members, whatever party they belong to, have an important role to play as spokesmen of the people of Canada.

It is therefore upsetting, Mr. Chairman to see them right and left, playing at representing opposition members as useless or as members who are only seeking to delay the business of the House.

If the government is not satisfied with our parliamentary system, all it has to do is introduce amending measures and if it wants to remove the opposition, it should say so frankly. As a matter of fact, it is not for our own pleasure that we rise and claim more equitable legislation for all social classes.

We are not favouring a social class in particular, but we want an equitable and rational personal and corporate income tax, and the government should not go beyond a reasonable rate.

Considering the representations that are made to us, we find the government is going beyond a reasonable rate, it does not pay any attention to the taxpayers' ability to pay, thus jeopardizing the security and the freedom of individuals as well as the development of the Canadian family.

If the government wants to get the money needed to finance its own services and to provide the Canadian people with the services they are asking for, we must proceed with a thorough reform of our tax structure as well as of our monetary structure which has become a cancer within Canadian society. And once society has become basically "cancerous", one can hardly keep quiet and hide the truth from the whole population.

This is why I think that the proposed amendment should go through, in the best interest of the whole population, because it is of the kind that will ensure fairness to individuals, to small tradesmen and businessmen, who all have a place in society. In fact, they have to remain in existence in order to serve the community. But if their survival is to be ensured, we will have to cut their income tax, and thus give them a chance to expand and provide improved services in their neighbourhood. By so doing, they will allow Canadian society to advance.

This is why I support this amendment, and I hope it will carry.

[English]

The Chairman: Order, please. Before I recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, perhaps I might be permitted to advise members of the proceedings on the adjournment motion tonight.

It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis)—Criminal Code—Inquiry as to debate on abortion; the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave)—Air Transport—national policy—possibility of Canadian Pacific Airlines becoming second trans-Canada carrier; the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn)—Labour conditions—Ste. Therese, Quebec—lay-off of employees by General Motors—government action.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I believe the effect of the amendment that is now before the House is quite clear to all hon. members. It proposes a tax cut. It proposes it in a way which perhaps is fairer than any tax cut which has ever been put before this House of Commons for a vote. Most tax cuts give more to those who have than to those who have not. This one would provide a decrease in the amount to be paid on the first $500 of taxable income for every taxpayer in Canada. It would provide the same number of dollars for those in the lower income brackets that it provides for those at the top. Since there are more taxpayers at the lower end of the scale, that is where most of the dollars would go. I suggest this proposition is perhaps fairer than any this House has ever dealt with by way of an income tax reduction and I hope the committee will give this amendment its support.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, first of all I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on the modest manner in which he has endorsed his handiwork. I think we are all indeed impressed by the result of his labours. I could not help but be, having listened to his testimonial.

I should make a number of comments on the various items which have been raised to date during the debate on this particular block of sections. First, I should say I do not propose to rehash my side of the debate on the relative merits of tax credits as opposed to the exemption syndrome. This was discussed at length in the debate on section 109 which dealt with the exemptions. All that has been passed and this is now a matter which has been decided by the House because the House has passed the sections which set the new exemptions. However, I do wish to congratulate myself for not having risen in respect of the matter again raised by the New Democratic Party members, particularly the hon. member for Broadview, in respect of his security blanket which is fashioned from what he imagines Mr. Carter said. Again, I shall not reiterate at length the comments I made a few days ago in reminding the House what Mr. Carter said. Mr. Carter did not recommend a tax credit system. He recommended an exemption system such as we have, with tax credits in certain cases. Those who use Carter as an authority for the substitution of a tax credit system for the present exemption system are stretching their authority rather far.

I should also say to the hon. member for Broadview that I did not suggest that a tax credit system is too difficult. What I did suggest—and I agree with the comments of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre when he introduced his original proposal in that regard—was that there would have to be different tax credits for different family circumstances, and so on, it would not, in fact, be a simpler system than the one we have had up until now and the one we propose to continue under the new bill. I would suggest also that the exemption system can achieve the same result as a tax credit system and that it is equally flexible. Furthermore, of course, it does have the great advantage—since you can achieve everything under a tax exemption system that you can achieve under a tax credit system—of being familiar to the Canadian taxpayers. The important thing in either system is not that you have a tax credit or a provision which exempts a certain amount of income from taxation, but it is the rate schedule which applies to the income which is to be taxed.

Then, we had the comments of the members of the New Democratic Party on the question of top marginal rates. Again, I do not think the complete story can be told on that particular point without consciously considering the inclusion of the capital gains in the tax base. I think these are the facts. There is a feeling in Canada that, somehow or other, there is a great mass of wealthy taxpayers who are avoiding taxation and that if somehow we were to get them into the tax collector's net there would be a great reduction in tax at the lower level. In the 1971 issue of taxation statistics which apply to the 1969 taxation year, out 7,363,963 taxpayers in Canada 190 reported incomes of $200,000 and more. A further 1,553 reported income of $100,000 a year or more. Even if you confiscated all the income of those people over their basic exemption, you would not make any significant difference in the tax burden which the other Canadian taxpayers have to bear. The inclusion of the capital gains in the tax base will go a very long way in making sure that those people pay a fairer share of taxes than they heretofore have. We assume that these are precisely the people who are able to arrange their affairs in such a way as to minimize the tax attracted under the present system because of the non-inclusion of capital gains in the tax base.

The hon. member for Edmonton West discussed at some length that various rates and the suggestion advanced by the Minister of Finance today to the provincial treasurers. I am not sure the hon. member appreciates that the suggested rate—the 30.5 over 28 formula that was advanced by the minister—is not necessarily the tax rate the provinces will adopt but is merely the ceiling which the federal government has indicated to them. If they do not exceed that ceiling they would be entitled to receive the revenue guarantee offered by the federal government. Of course, one would have to apply it to individual tax rates in each given province at the present time in order to arrive at the final figure of provincial taxes.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): But, Mr. Chairman, the Parliamentary Secretary will agree that the 30.5 suggested by the minister this morning is the equivalent of what we call the basic 28.

Mr. Mahoney: It is intended to replace it and it certainly is roughly equivalent to it, yes. The point, however, is that under the tax bill the tax reductions for about two out of every three taxpayers—and the complete elimination of income tax in respect of one million is envisaged—will be borne by the federal government and the rates which have been suggested to the provincial governments will be rates which will permit the provincial governments to collect as much provincial income tax under the new system as they are presently collecting. The federal tax generally will result in a reduction of taxation for most Canadian taxpayers.

The amendment the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has before us is not, of course, acceptable to the government. The hon. member for Waterloo ascribed to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, in almost as glowing terms as the member for Winnipeg North Centre himself used in respect of his amendment, most of the adjectives in the litany of saints. The only one he forgot was "irresponsible". In this particular case the government, in proposing tax amendments has to determine just what kind of budgetary considerations are acceptable for the continued prosperity and the economic growth of Canada and its good government. Certainly, a tax reduction which I think has been rather accurately estimated as costing between $450 million and $550 million is not one which the government would regard as responsible in addition to those which have already been made.

I notice hon. members opposite have been very generous in suggesting that perhaps the Minister of Finance could be allowed to abandon some of the other things he has suggested to stimulate the economy and to put more money into the hands of Canada's taxpayers. I thank them for that generosity, but I think that as long as this government is here this government is the one that must accept the responsibility for determining what the best tax measures are.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mahoney: Finally, the hon. member for Dauphin raised the question of the requirement that for income averaging an annuity be purchased within two months of the end of the taxpayers' year. As a matter of fact, that item is dealt with in section 61 which was adopted by the committee yesterday and the averaging provisions that are now before us are the general averaging provisions under the Income Tax Act. However, I think the hon. member will appreciate that since the individual taxpayers' taxation year coincides with the calendar year, and since he must file his return by the end of April, that decision has to be made some time before the end of April, so the two months after the end of the taxation year was regarded as reasonable.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The question is on the amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. All those in favour please rise. All those opposed please rise.

Amendment (Mr. Knowles, Winnipeg North Centre) negatived: Yeas, 42; Nays, 64.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The text of the next amendment proposed by the Minister of National Revenue is to be found at page 8949 of Hansard for October 22. Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. McCleave: I am sure that in the excitement of the vote, Mr. Chairman, your voice did not quite carry through although ordinarily it is strong, clear and pure. I wonder if you would mind repeating the point about the amendment please.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Boulanger): The question is on the amendment which was proposed by the Minister of National Revenue. The text is to be found on page 8949 of Hansard for October 22. The amendment reads:

That section 117 as set forth in clause 1 of the said bill be amended by striking out subsection (8) thereof on page 312

Mr. McCleave: I am glad that I am reminded of it, Mr. Chairman. I asked the parliamentary secretary the other day why the section was being deleted, and I think he owes us an explanation.

Mr. Mahoney: It is being deleted only temporarily and, as a matter of fact, if we had been dealing with this bill in consecutive order, it would already have to be replaced in section 82. The amendment is simply to delete a provision in section 117 which, when we reach it, will be inserted in section 82 and a further amendment to the same effect is proposed. The subsection being deleted is a provision to deal with a situation where a taxpayer's married exemption is reduced by reason of dividends received by his spouse and where neither the taxpayer nor his spouse can use the dividend tax credit involved. The deleted provision will be replaced by a new subsection in section 82.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Benson) agreed to.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall section 117 as amended carry?

Clause 1, section 117, as amended, agreed to.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Boulanger): Shall section 118 carry?

On Clause 1—Section 118—General Averaging

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Section 118 has to do with averaging and it is a new provision. With regard to this principle of averaging, we must recognize that the present Income Tax Act contains a number of averaging provisions which would tend to smooth out the progressive rate structure of a taxpayer who has an unusually high income in the year because he has received certain specified types of income during that year. For instance, if he has been repaid a lump sum out of a pension plan, if he has exercised his rights under an employee stock option plan, or if he has had a property on which he has claimed depreciation, has sold it and there is a recapture of the capital cost allowance, he may then average out. However, there are limitations as to that.

In any event, Bill C-259 will eventually eliminate all the present averaging provisions except those applicable to farmers and fishermen, and it will replace them with two averaging provisions available to all individuals. First, there will be a general averaging provision which applies regardless of the type of income, and second, an income averaging annuity provisions which applies only where special types of income have been received. The use of the latter does not affect the first type. In other words, the utilization of the second form of averaging will not affect the first form because the latter will be instituted directly and automatically by the Department of National Revenue.

The general averaging proposal we are considering in section 118 follows that contained in the white paper. It will apply in any year in which the individual's income is (a) at least 110 per cent of the immediately preceding year, and (b), 120 per cent of the average income for the four immediately preceding years. Let us illustrate this by an example.

Let us assume that in the four preceding years the income was $30,000 but in the fifth year, for some particular reason, the income goes to $36,000. Now, let us apply the tests to see whether that $6,000 could be averaged in any way to smooth out the rather dramatic escalation that there will be in tax due to the progressive tax system. Under the first test, that is, at least 110 per cent of the immediately preceding year's income, 110 per cent would be $33,000. So therefore since the income is $36,000 it has passed test (a). Now, let us look at test (b), which says that the income has to be at least 120 per cent of the average income for the four immediately preceding years. If you take 120 per cent of $30,000 it comes to $36,000, and so, unfortunately, the income does not exceed the 120 per cent of the average of the four immediately preceding years. There is no averaging excess, and therefore there is no way that the general averaging will be available. So, one has to be very careful about this.

I suppose that to consider this we could go into certain refinements. But in the year of death of a taxpayer, for instance, the averaging formula will be read as if the percentages in what I call (a) and (b)—the (a) being 110 per cent of the preceding year, and the (b) being 120 per cent of the four preceding years—as though those percentages were 100 per cent, and this concession is not available if the executors elect to file a separate return in respect of rights or things receivable at death. This is another very complicated provision of income tax for consultants and auditors. But let us have a look at the transition. This does not come into effect in 1972. The general averaging provision I referred to is not available for 1972, and in the years 1973, 1974 and 1975 the formula will be applied as if condition (b), that is, the 120 per cent of the four immediately preceding years, were to read respectively one, two and three years, so that by 1976 it will be into the full four years.

The existing averaging provisions deal with employee stock options, the sale of inventory and receivables, authors, and combined income and capital receipts, and may be used by individuals for tax years ending in 1972 and 1973. These are matters of detail. The present averaging rules covering recaptured capital cost allowance and incorrect inventory valuation will continue for individuals for the taxation years ending before 1976. Neither the new general averaging provision nor the transitional provisions are available to corporations which, under the present act, can average on certain of these items, such as recaptured capital cost allowance.

It is said that these rules are somewhat more generous than those proposed in the white paper, and to that extent I suppose they are an improvement. Mr. Chairman, it was very easy to improve on the white paper. May I say that I do not know who was responsible for all of these changes. I do not think the finance committee should take any credit here because, frankly, the moves in here are so elaborate and complicated that they go beyond the ken of the average member of this House to thread his way through them, and we would need the advice of tax consultants. So, while we recognize that some of the new sections are going to provide some benefits, all taxpayers should know that there are limits to them. Having said that, Mr. Chairman, I am quite prepared to accept the changes made, to the extent that they are an improvement over the white paper. They are not as generous as individuals might have wanted, but I think they are better than what had originally been offered.

In his statement today to the provincial finance ministers, the Minister of Finance indicated that undoubtedly there would have to be many amendments next year and in the following year to provide for inequities that might show up, and that in any event, if there were inequities that could not be corrected by changes in the Income Tax Act in the immediate future there would always be a form of relief that could be granted under the Financial Administration Act. From past experience, Mr. Chairman, I can say that holding out this hope of relief under the Financial Administration Act is almost like telling an individual he may be forgiven his sins providing he can climb up and see the Lord Almighty to get forgiveness.

Clause 1, section 118, agreed to.

On clause 1—section 119—Averaging for farmers and fishermen.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall section 119 carry?

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, this section deals with the averaging formula for farmers and fishermen, and it provides substantially what we have had in the law previously. But perhaps it would be useful to have on the record an answer to a question that I would like to present to the parliamentary secretary. I present this question for the reason that we have had some changes in the circumstances of fishermen, particularly as the result of the war against pollution. I am thinking more particularly of the swordfish fishery in my riding.

I suspect that the modifications that are presented to us are really so insubstantial compared with the former law that they are not worth elaborating on, but I would like to give the parliamentary secretary a chance to do that also. It might be helpful if he can indicate that there can be averaging for fishermen who suddenly find themselves in periods of loss because they are no longer allowed to carry out their trade, to go to sea to catch swordfish because of the mercury pollutant level that has been established in those fish. Perhaps they are being hurt by foreign trawlers in offshore waters, and the like. I think it would be worth while if the parliamentary secretary made a statement. I do not expect, a long one. I do not expect, if you will pardon the expression, a Newfoundland-type debate. However, I should like the parliamentary secretary to say something about the points I have raised.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, the only change is that the word "taxpayer" has been changed to "individual" in this particular section, as in another section; otherwise the purport of the section is the same. That is the only modification. The hon. member is quite correct in suggesting that fishermen may average down as a result of losses to their income from the causes he mentioned.

There is one point I should like to take under advisement, however, and that is his suggestion that perhaps a fisherman has completely left the fishing trade. I would not want to give an off-the-cuff answer on that point. For example, if as a result of problems in the swordfishing industry a fisherman has abandoned his occupation as a fisherman and has gone to work elsewhere, that is something we shall consider. I should like to take that point under advisement. However, so long as he is still a fisherman, certainly he can average down.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, so that we do not hold up the committee unnecessarily on this point, could we not agree that if the parliamentary secretary needs to examine some of the points I have mentioned in order to reply, that he be allowed to come back to these points and speak to them, and that otherwise the section be passed?

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the parliamentary secretary a question about subsection (7) which relates to rents or trust income from farming or fishing? Does the wording of the subsection imply that that portion of a trust income that arises from farming or fishing can be averaged?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, is the hon. member dealing with section 119?

Mr. Ritchie: I am speaking on subsection (7) to be found on page 319 of the bill.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, this provision has been in the act from time immemorial. It is a relieving section and is to make sure that for purposes of averaging that type of income is farm income. I suppose this problem would relate quite closely to the problem I left up in the air when answering the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants. For example, if a farmer leaves farming but rents the farm to someone else, then that rental is considered as farming income and therefore can be averaged back against the years when he was in active business.

[Translation]

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Is section 119 agreed to?

Section 119 agreed to.

[English]

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, perhaps this section could carry, with the proviso I made that if the parliamentary secretary needs to reopen discussion on the points I raised, he be permitted to do so in order to deal strictly with those points.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I will certainly clarify the points of the hon. member, and I agree that if we must reopen discussion on that part of the section, we will reopen it.

On clause 1—section 120: Addition to tax re income not earned in a province.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, with regard to section 120 I want the parliamentary secretary to verify what is meant by the words "Addition to tax re income not earned in a province". Does that mean that if part of the income is earned in a province and part is earned in a territory, all the income shall be deemed to have been earned in Canada, or does this in some way say that the individual who has lived for a period in a particular province and then has gone out of the country and earned income for the balance of the year shall be assessed on the basis as though he had earned the income within the province?

I ask this question because section 120(1) provides that there shall be added to the portion of the tax that is payable under the federal portion an amount that bears the same proportion to 30 per cent of that tax that the amount of the income which is earned outside of the province bears to the total income. Does that not mean that if the income earned outside the province were 25 per cent of the total income, there would have to be added 7½ per cent of the tax payable?

It seems to me that here we talk about the proportion that the income earned outside the province bears to the total income for the year. If that exteriorally earned income is 25 per cent of the total, then the portion of the tax with respect to that shall be 25 per cent of 30 per cent of the tax that is payable under the federal rate. I want to know whether I am correct in this assumption.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this provision is to impose an extra tax where there is some income not earned in a province. I suppose the most conspicuous case would be income earned in the Northwest Territories or the Yukon. This brings the tax back up to the general level as if one included provincial taxation. The additional tax corresponds with provincial taxes, and while they may be imposed they are not likely to be less than 30 per cent. That is why 30 per cent was chosen. I suppose the absence of an amendment on our part to change that figure to 30.5 per cent by reason of the points the hon. member raised earlier is very clear evidence of our intention to try to pass tax cuts at the federal level along to individual taxpayers.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, I am not satisfied on that last point. I think there may have to be a change here in that since the guarantee is now to be at 30.5 per cent we may find ourselves using that figure. Be that as it may, the government may have agreed to the 30 per cent figure because it would be rather complicated to bring in an amendment providing for that extra one half of one per cent. Therefore the federal government may well agree to accept a shortfall in taxes resulting from the difference between 30 per cent and 30.5 per cent. That is quite all right.

I made some remarks last night with regard to subsection (2). The province of Quebec is the only province in which subsection (2) will apply, because this is a specific exception in the bill. Here is provided a deduction of 3 per cent of that portion of tax that is payable on and related to income earned in a province, and is with regard to the provision of schooling allowances. I suppose that 3 per cent to cover the schooling allowances of the province of Quebec is introduced in lieu of the youth allowances program which is an extension of the family allowances program that exists in all the other provinces. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary could confirm whether my understanding is correct in this regard.

Mr. Mahoney: Yes, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member's understanding is correct.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall section 120 carry?

Clause 1, section 120, agreed to.

• (5:40 p.m.)

On clause 1—section 146: Definitions.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The question is now on the amendment moved by the Minister of National Revenue for the Minister of Finance. It is found at page 8955 of Hansard for October 22. The amendment reads as follows:

> The French version of section 146 as set forth in clause 1 of the said bill be amended by striking out lines 31 to 33, on page 397 and substituting the following:
> "b) à titre de cotisation à une caisse ou à un régime enregistré de pensions ou en vertu d'une telle caisse ou régime enregistré,"

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, this amendment to the French version only is simply to change the wording used to describe a registered retirement pension fund to make it conform to language used in other parts of the bill.

Amendment (Mr. Benson) agreed to.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall the section as amended carry?

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I indicated to the parliamentary secretary that I have a question arising out of paragraph 9 on page 395. That paragraph concerns events in the taxation year and provides:

> Where in a taxation year a trust governed by a registered retirement savings plan
> (a) disposes of property for a consideration less than the fair market value of the property at the time of the disposition, or for no consideration, or
> (b) acquires property for a consideration greater than the fair market value of the property at the time of the acquisition—

These appear to be rather puzzling events. They seem to indicate transactions not really taking place at arms length but where someone operating within several companies, one of which is operating a registered retirement savings plan, is disposing of property at a considerable loss or disposing of the property and making artificial adjustments or getting much more than it is worth. Perhaps I have simply restated my puzzlement. I ask the parliamentary secretary exactly what we are trying to do here. I notice that this is a new provision added to the law.

I also have another question which involves a substantial number of people, particularly employees of Simpsons-Sears and similar organizations. Perhaps in the few minutes remaining before six o'clock the parliamentary secretary would again state the changes proposed in this section and the next, particularly the section that deals with registered retirement savings plans. I think the answer to my question and a general statement on the government's philosophy would be helpful to us.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, section 146(9) is part of the new rules concerning the investment operations of a trust for retirement savings plans. As the hon. member has said, it requires that amounts shall be included in the income of the annuity under a plan where the trust property is sold for less than its value or greater than its value. It is assumed that such a situation would only arise where there was a non-arms length transaction, if not between the trustee and the person who is buying and selling then certainly a non-arms length relationship between the annuitant and the person from whom the trustee was buying or selling. The intent is to prevent a trustee using the plan to confer a benefit on the annuitant or someone named by him and thus perpetuating a tax avoidance.

Mr. McCleave: I thank the parliamentary secretary for the explanation. I cannot see any reason why we should not have such a provision in the section to prevent abuses. With regard to my other question, perhaps the parliamentary secretary could be a little more general and give the committee and the country, through Hansard, an explanation of the one or two proposed substantial changes that are being introduced with regard to registered retirement savings plans.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, the particular question regarding the Simpsons-Sears plan actually arises under section 147. However, I suppose it is appropriate to deal with both of them at the same time because the registered retirement savings plan is very similar in scope. The general rules for these plans have not been changed but the contribution limits have been increased. Rules are added to govern the investments that may be made by the trust, and so on. We were talking about one of those rules when dealing with subsection (9). Also, the present special tax treatment for a return of contributions on death is cancelled.

The definitions in this subsection are the same as in the present subsection 79B(1) except that definitions have been added for non-qualified investments and qualified investments. We will get to them when we reach section 204 in this group of sections. Trusts for plans in existence will not be required to dispose of non-qualified investments that they now hold. The non-qualified investments are defined in paragraph (1)(e) of section 146 as property acquired by the trust after 1971.

Transitional clause 61 in part III of the bill, at page 695, provides that property acquired after June 18, 1971, and before January 1, 1972, be deemed to have been acquired by the trust on January 1, 1972. Only investments by trusts for retirement savings plans come under the new rules. It is possible to have a non-trustee plan in such a case when dealing with a licensed annuity company, an endowment insurance policy or something of that nature which as long as it is issued by a corporation approved by the governor in council as a seller of investment contracts. That type of non-trustee plan is not subject to this particular problem.

The complaint of Simpsons-Sears and similar organizations concerning deferred profit-sharing plans under section 147 relates to the taxation of lump sum withdrawals. The old formula for taxing such a lump sum was contained in section 36. That was one of the special averaging positions that the hon. member for Edmonton West was discussing a few moments ago. That is replaced in the new bill by the general averaging provision which the committee has just adopted.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, my question to the parliamentary secretary is one in the course of which I shall ask him about certain relationships. For example, we have on the federal statute books the Pension Benefits Standards Act and there are similar pieces of legislation on the statute books of some of the provinces. I believe most of these statutes run more or less parallel. I should like to know whether the requirements laid down in this section with respect to registered retirement savings plans meet the conditions spelled out in the statutes to which I have referred.

At the same time, could the parliamentary secretary tell us what the relationship is between this statute and the Blue Book—at least it used to be called that. I think the colour has changed, and instead of its being put out by the Department of National Revenue it is now put out by the Department of Insurance. In other words, this is a question about relationships. Do these things all hang together?

Mr. Mahoney: Do I understand the hon. member to be referring to the investment discretion left to a trustee under the Pension Benefits Standards Act or are we talking about vesting provisions and various other items which require that a pension be fully vested within a limited period?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am directing my question to the general requirements in the Pension Benefits Standards Act. It is in relation not to any specific subsection but to the whole of section 146.

Mr. Mahoney: The registered retirement savings plan is, of course, a man's own pension plan. It is fully vested. The money which goes into it is his own. Thus, the provision in the Pension Benefits Standards Act which requires employers' contributions to be vested in certain minimum periods of time does not apply. There are no provisions in this bill which would be parallel to the type of provision to which the hon. member has referred.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In other words, it is correct to say we have now reached a stage at which control over pension plans generally is not through the medium of the Income Tax Act but more directly through the Pension Benefits Standards Act and similar legislation in the provinces?

Mr. Mahoney: That is correct. Of course, the Pension Benefits Standards Act applies only to those to whom the Canada Labour Code applies. I suppose most of the other 95 per cent of employees in Canada are affected by the provincial legislation which I understand to be uniform throughout the country.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And this bill applies to all taxpayers.

Mr. Mahoney: That is correct.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I have a number of questions to ask with regard to this section, which is a lengthy one and extremely complex; as a matter of fact, it covers some ten pages of the text of this bill. I think I shall approach them seriatim from subsection (1) onwards.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Why not call it six o'clock?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): May I first refer to subsection (1)(g). What is a qualified investment? The parliamentary secretary, at my request, met with a delegation from the British Columbia Teachers' Federation who put forward a brief on behalf of members of the federation and members of the Alberta Teachers' Federation who participate in a registered retirement savings plan covering some 3,500 members. The funds are invested in a credit union which then lends the money to teachers in remote areas of British Columbia to provide them with housing accommodation and certain other amenities. There is a considerable fund of money invested in these particular notes and this is the only way in which the result I have mentioned can be achieved. Actually, such credit union notes do not qualify for acceptance under the definition of what is known as a qualified investment.

I want to know what consideration has been given to the proposal put forward by the teachers. Is there to be any undertaking given that an appropriate regulation will be passed under subparagraph (iv) of paragraph (g) or is this whole program—a very laudable one designed to bring about a result which cannot be achieved in any other way—to be knocked on the head?

I do not know why it has been assumed that these teachers could produce, out of thin air, housing for themselves in remote areas of the constituency of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, for instance, or of the hon. member for Skeena where normal lending agencies, including Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, declined to lend money for the building of homes for teachers. Out of sheer necessity the teachers have formed this co-operative, and the only way in which the co-operative could get funds was to obtain them on the basis of notes provided through a registered retirement savings plan.

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Edmonton West is just arriving.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, I apologize to hon. members but there is a thing called a slow elevator around this place and I took one. I think the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo should be talking about the particular matter about which I am going to speak because there are many teachers involved. At six o'clock I was talking about section 146(1)(g) which has to do with qualified investments under registered retirement savings plans. I was indicating that the B.C. Teachers' Federation had a supplementary pension plan whereby funds were paid into a national trust company under the trust plan and were then transferred to a credit union run by the B.C. teachers under the security of a note. These funds were then used by the borrowers, the teachers, to build homes in central and rural areas of British Columbia.

Some 1,250 teachers participate in this registered retirement savings plan in British Columbia, and there are 72 in Alberta as of July 1, 1971. The amount invested in the fund at that time was $1,650,000. The plan is designed to enable members of the plan to designate at the time of subscribing to the plan and at annual intervals thereafter the amount to be contributed to each of the investment income sections and the equity section. Funds contributed to the investment income sections are paid over to the trustee who is free to invest in notes of the B.C. federation and co-operative association so long as the association is prepared to receive them at current rates.

Under the new section that describes what is a qualified investment the notes signed by the teachers' federation co-operative are not qualified. They will not be covered by this section unless some change in the bill is made by the government so as to include this type of investment under the heading of "qualified investment". The government can either make a specific amendment to this effect or utilize the provision contained in section 146(1)(g)(iv) which provides:

—such other investments as may be prescribed by regulations of the Governor in Council made on the recommendation of the Minister of Finance—

The plan to which I have referred provides a supplementary pension for the teachers, most of whom are within ten or 15 years of retirement and want to supplement their pensions with a savings plan. They started teaching at a time when teachers' salaries were very low and therefore the contributions to and interest in their pension plans are rather slim.

I think the teachers have done a very fine job, not only on their own behalf but also in providing credit funds for building homes and other facilities for teachers in outlying areas where no other credit facility will venture. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will not go to these areas, the banks will not go and the conventional insurance companies will not go. It seems to me it would be a tragedy if some rather too rigidly drawn provision—which, by the way, is an amendment to the Income Tax Act—should knock this completely on the head.

I have been talking to the solicitors representing the teachers' federation and co-operative, and they have not been able to devise any other way whereby the form of security is one that would qualify under the presently enumerated paragraphs of section 146(1)(g). Therefore I make this plea to the parliamentary secretary, and through him to the minister, that since the teachers' federation have presented their case to the government, the government should be able to decide now whether this will be allowed to go forward.

I also want to make reference to section 146(2) which deals with the acceptance by the minister of registered retirement savings plans. It seems to me that in the past an almost scandalous situation has existed whereby the Minister of National Revenue and his officials have held plans in abeyance for a long time. I want to know whether this situation has now been cleared up and, if so, under what conditions. Or am I confusing this with some other type of plan?

Mr. Mahoney: Pension plans.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Then that is fine; I shall withdraw my comments in that regard. But what I am concerned about is this: In the case of non-acceptance by the minister, what recourse does an individual have? Does he have any appeal if certain steps are taken? Surely it would not be to the Tax Review Board—but would an appeal lie to the Federal Court? Perhaps the parliamentary secretary would consult his officials, who have much more detailed knowledge of this legislation, and tell us what is the situation. After all, subsection (2) provides:

The minister shall not accept for registration for the purposes of this act any retirement savings plan unless, in his opinion—

This is great, because it is tied to the opinion of the minister and his ability to exercise discretion as to adherence and compliance with certain requirements laid out in the section. I should like to know what recourse an individual or a group of individuals might have who want to qualify a bona fide registered retirement savings plan which the minister or his officials have deemed not to comply with the subsection. To some extent the same thing would apply to subsection (3) where we find the words, "The minister may accept", and so on.

Let me turn to subsection (5) and again ask for an explanation from the parliamentary secretary. While there is a modification here, I should like him to confirm that the date February 28 is still the operative date in respect of any registered retirement savings plan. If an individual wishes to exercise his option during the first two months of 1972, can he qualify for a registered retirement savings plan for 1971 and be entitled to deduct the appropriate contributions made in 1971 from his net income before arriving at his taxable income?

Then I should like an explanation of subsection (6). What can be done for the disposition of non-qualified investments? May I say here that I have run into problems where a taxpayer has changed his or her mind regarding a registered retirement savings plan. The contribution was put forward but the deduction was not made on the income tax return. As a result of misunderstandings we do encounter situations where an individual may be chastised, or it may be put to the taxpayer that he furnished improper information in the return. I suppose every case depends on the circumstances. In any event, I should like a full explanation of subsection (6).

We then have a whole series of new subsections—(9), (10) and (11). I should like an explanation from the parliamentary secretary in respect of these. This section has 16 subsections, but many of the others are carried forward from the present act and I need not go into them in detail or get explanations in that regard.

Mr. Hogarth: Mr. Chairman, I should like to reply briefly to the remarks of the hon. member who has just spoken in respect of the position of the B.C. teachers regarding section 146(1)(g). As the hon. member has suggested, the B.C. Teachers' Federation sent representatives to Ottawa to meet with all persons concerned, including the B.C. caucus, to discuss problems which have arisen pertaining to the provisions of section 146.

As I understand it, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance will be commenting on this matter shortly. But as I understand it, the government is extremely sympathetic to the views of the B.C. teachers who have a particular form of investment which, as it now stands, offends the provisions of the bill before this House. Theoretically, we should move to amend the act in order to correct this deficiency. However, the B.C. caucus in unanimity has taken up the problem with the Minister of Finance, his parliamentary secretary and officials of the department and we are assured that by virtue of the provisions of section 146 regulations will be passed to accommodate the peculiar position of the B.C. teachers pertaining to their investment in their retirement savings plan.

We ask, as the hon. member for Edmonton West has asked, why it is that we do not move to amend the act? The government's position and the position of the B.C. caucus is precisely that any move to amend the statute at this stage would probably accommodate many other situations which offend the substance of the provisions we are considering in section 146 and would permit further tax avoidances which section 146 as it now stands is designed to prevent.

There is no doubt in the minds of the B.C. caucus that the government will be moving more or less with the passage of this act to provide by regulation—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): What is the B.C. caucus?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What group is this?

Mr. Hogarth: As far as we are concerned, the B.C. caucus is made up of government members on this side of the House. The government will be moving by regulation to accommodate this organization and such other organizations in the country that can show themselves to be bona fide and within the purview and substance of this particular provision of the bill.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It is very touching to note that there is a sub-party or sub-group in this House which seems to have taken up the cudgel. It is quite proper that B.C. members should do that. I, too, met with the B.C. teachers. It came to my attention, through another source, that they were down here to see me. I did speak about this on a previous occasion, and that possibly inspired the hon. member to make some inquiries.

I must say the suggestion that the government will pass regulations governing this and other bodies, if they can show they are affected in the same way, is one thing. But this does not deal with the problem of individual members of the teachers' federation who want to know whether they should continue making payments into the retirement savings plan. They want to know now, not six months hence. They are not interested in the suggestion that in the normal course of events—and that is very slow when it comes to the Department of Finance and the Department of National Revenue—regulations will be passed permitting these people to go forward.

Since their plan was registered, legal and in existence, nothing should be done now by bringing in an amendment to the act which would nullify the present plan and its arrangements. It is perfectly bona fide, and surely to goodness the 1,200 or more members in this savings plan are entitled to an answer now. I trust the parliamentary secretary will give an answer, or at least an undertaking to answer. I do not want to indicate the name of a particular official because he is not in a position to answer in this House, but he is here and has had a good deal to do with this. At the committee hearings he would be questioned by me and other members.

This question goes back many months. I am sure there is good will all the way but I am concerned about the time element and what the people who participate in this plan are to be told. What are they to do? Are they to suspend their payments? After all, they have an obligation under their contract with the trust company. Would they place themselves in default, and would their contract be in default if they did not make the payment? This is a question which must be answered.

Mr. Pringle: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words with respect to this section. I believe the hon. member for Edmonton West has missed the main point made by the hon. member for New Westminster. While we are all in sympathy with the predicament in which the B.C. Teachers' Federation retirement savings plan is involved, we have all been well briefed and have thoroughly discussed this matter on behalf of the teachers' federation. We must also realize that by virtue of the fact that it is a change or a departure from a previous list of the type of investment which can be accepted by the Minister of Finance, there are also such organizations as the B.C. central retirement savings plan and there will be others.

With regard to the time element, I think we all understand that the proclamation of the bill will not be made on the day the bill is passed. This will give the Minister of Finance plenty of time in which to hear submissions from various other organizations. I am quite confident that the B.C. Teachers' Federation would be sympathetic to similar types of organizations in other parts of Canada which may have within their organizations the criteria to obtain agreement from the Minister of Finance that a change should be made and that they should be included as well. I think this is the vital and important feature to be considered.

Amendment of the bill on behalf of the B.C. Teachers' Federation retirement savings plan would be acceptable, I presume, so far as we are concerned. It certainly would be so far as I am concerned and so far as my colleagues are concerned. We feel, however, that the more appropriate way would be to provide them with the necessary legislation through regulations subsequent to the passage of this bill. Therefore, I would support my colleague from New Westminster and I should like to assure the B.C. Teachers' Federation that we certainly feel, after exhaustive examination and discussion, that this is a better method by which to bring about a solution to the problem and to provide them with the necessary machinery so that they will be able to carry on without any problems in the interim. I would therefore hope we can continue on that basis on behalf of the federation.

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Chairman, I shall be brief because the hon. member for Edmonton West, the hon. member for Fraser Valley East and I all heard the same representations from what one might call, in all kindness, a very good lobby group and we might all say much the same thing. The question of the slowness and the uncertainty which has been raised is something which hits just about every other group affected by this section.

Candidly, I cannot see that it is a serious objection. I should like to point out that the particular plan we are talking about is one which is financed out of the pockets of the teachers who contribute. It is not the situation of a company or its employees contributing to a fund which they in turn—although they call it a retirement fund—use for the purpose of the business of the company. This is not a device to do something outside their control; it is a legitimate way of protecting themselves for the future, after retirement. I am sure many members know that until very recently the provisions for the retirement of teachers in British Columbia and Alberta had been very poor.

The hon. member for Fraser Valley East raised the point that the British Columbia central retirement savings plan, which is substantially the same as the B.C. Central Credit Union, has exceptions in respect of the regulations for the British Columbia teachers. Will those exceptions apply in a generic sense to other organizations just the same as to the British Columbia central retirement savings plan and other such schemes?

I quite agree that the government is correct in its attempt to plug the hole in the income tax regulation whereby it is possible to put money into a retirement savings plan, lend it back and have it used by the company and thus be a device by which to get around the tax law. In at least these two instances, however, I feel the people have acted in good faith in setting up such a scheme.

I should like to know exactly what the proposals are in respect of the regulations and whether not only these two but similar organizations might be involved. While we have talked consistently about the B.C. teachers' retirement pension plan, there is a similar plan in operation in the province of Alberta. This is not strictly a matter of personal interest to British Columbia, in my opinion: we are dealing with an issue which is general to the country at large. I promised to speak briefly, Mr. Chairman, and I trust I have done so.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Chairman, I should like to add a word of dissatisfaction on my own part with the way in which the government proposes to deal with deferred profit-sharing plans which are in effect, which have been in existence and under which in many cases very considerable contributions have been made. Under the present law a deferred profit-sharing plan is an extremely attractive way in which to save for retirement. The employee of a company makes contributions and at retirement, under the present law, he has been able to draw out the substantial sum that has been built up during his working career and invest it in a small business. In the case, for example, of the Simpsons-Sears deferred profit-sharing plan, this is frequently done.

The proposals in the bill before us permit continued favoured treatment to the pay-out provided that the retiree invests his savings in a pension. If he continues to do what has been traditional in the past, that is, if he takes the money out and invests it in a business or in other capital assets, it is taxed at an extremely heavy rate compared to the previous treatment it enjoyed. I would ask the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance to give consideration to the possibility of permitting this continued favourable treatment for investments in preferred profit-sharing plans, especially when the assets are withdrawn and used for investment in the capital assets of a business.

It is one thing for someone who has saved all his working life in a deferred profit-sharing plan and who retires, draws the money out and spends it on improving his home or in some other form of consumption, say in retirement travelling or making gifts or something of that nature, but it is another where a person continues to invest the money but rather than investing it in an annuity he invests it in a small business or in a capital asset. For these people there are ways of providing a more equitable tax treatment.

The parliamentary secretary will recall the days when the finance committee operated and a number of methods of achieving this result were put forward. I proposed one myself and I am disappointed that it was not possible for the minister, in the bill which he proposed, to consider this important situation. I hope that the parliamentary secretary will not inform me that all hope should be abandoned, because if that is the case it will be a grave setback to the deferred profit-sharing plans of many corporations which have been of great benefit to the country.

Mr. Thomson: I have a question for the parliamentary secretary. Has he received many representations regarding the particular item mentioned by the hon. member for Don Valley?

Mr. Mahoney: I should say that the only representation I have received on this particular item has been from the Simpsons-Sears deferred profit-sharing plan. However, that is a personal answer and does not necessarily reflect the representations that may have been received either by the minister or by the Department of Finance. I am afraid I do not have an assessment of what the volume of representations may have been in that respect.

Mr. Thomson: The question which I intended to ask was whether there were many companies that had this type of plan. Logically, if a great many companies had this type of plan, maybe they should receive general consideration. I wonder if the government has looked at this question to see whether they might give more equitable treatment to these employees.

Mr. Mahoney: Of course, the problem here is not only one of more equitable treatment, but perhaps I will deal with that when I have an opportunity to respond to the various general representations that have been made. There are a number of companies, probably a couple of dozen—I am reminded of Dofasco, the Dominion Foundry and Steel Company—that have this type of set up, as well as Simpsons-Sears and one or two of the oil companies in my own area; and there are a few others.

It is not a plan that is widely used in terms of the business community, but where it is used it is certainly one to which the people who have implemented it seem to have a very deep attachment. The problem that arises here and to which they are really objecting is the substitution of the current very favourable averaging provisions under section 36 of the present act on some payments taken out of the deferred sharing plan. Section 36 will continue in effect under the new tax regime for contributions made up to the end of the current year, but for contributions made in 1972 and beyond, the general averaging provisions which the committee approved earlier today will apply and the favourable averaging provisions under section 36 will be replaced by those provisions.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of asking the parliamentary secretary whether he will comment on the matters which have been raised with respect to the B.C. teachers' retirement plan. I do not think there is any necessity to repeat what has already been put before the parliamentary secretary. We would like to know what amendments he would be prepared to move or to accept, particularly with reference to the one point at issue in section 146(g), or whether there is some way under the regulations by which he proposes to deal with the situation which has been described—because there is no doubt that in section 146(g) the government is trying to prevent some of the abuses that have taken place.

There is always the possibility of a retirement plan being used to benefit the members in some way other than just for retirement purposes. But I think it is fairly clear from all the data which I have seen and from discussions with those who are interested in this plan that the B.C. teachers' retirement plan has not been used to benefit the members directly but has become a co-operative that has made it possible for teachers all over B.C. to borrow money to build houses. The advantage has been that the interest rates are fair and reasonable.

More important, the interest rates are uniform across the province, with the result that a teacher in Tofino can borrow money at the same rate as a teacher in Vancouver or Burnaby. This has been very helpful in providing housing accommodation for teachers all over the province of British Columbia. I do not need to labour the point; I am sure the minister is familiar with it. I understand that the representatives of the B.C. teachers' retirement plan discussed the matter with the parliamentary secretary and received a very sympathetic hearing. My reason for rising was to ask the parliamentary secretary whether he has reached any conclusion regarding how this problem might be resolved.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I certainly did not intend to avoid responding to this question. However, it seemed to me that there was a certain amount of home cooking going on around the chamber and I wanted to give all hon. members who wished to get their cases on the record an opportunity to have their say before I answered. However, if no other hon. members wish to discuss this point I shall be delighted to deal with it now.

The B.C. central retirement savings plan, which is the creature of the B.C. Central Credit Union, and the B.C. Teachers' Federation retirement savings plan, which operates through the B.C. Teachers' Federation Co-operative Association, both made very persuasive arguments to the government in respect of the problem with which they are confronted—the intervention at this point of the sections defining qualified investments. There is no question that the method by which these organizations have invested up to this point their extra pension funds—and of course this is over and above the statutory pensions with which B.C. teachers are provided in the ordinary course of events by the school boards, and so on—is not at present, under the bill before us, an authorized investment. The hon. member for Edmonton West described that rather fully so I will not reiterate what he said.

Hon. members have noted that the reason for defining qualified investments is to prevent the eventuality of a taxpayer who has deferred taxation as a result of the provisions of the tax bill that permit retirement savings to be accumulated tax free and tax deferred until the benefits are drawn out to somehow or other filter back and become available for the personal use of the taxpayer or of people who are not at arms length with him. So there are some general rules provided in the bill that will govern that situation.

There is provision in section 146(1)(g)(iv) for the Governor in Council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Finance, to prescribe by regulation additional types of investments to those specifically enumerated or referred to in the section. It is the intention of the Minister of Finance to recommend to the Governor in Council that regulations be adopted which will effectively solve the problem of the two bodies with which we are concerned.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mahoney: I am not in a position at this point to give the details of those, but I am sure the criteria will involve the number of members of the credit union and perhaps even the longevity of such a credit union before it starts to offer its securities for this purpose. However, I can give the assurance to hon. members—there have been representations from all sides of the House and in particular, I am reminded, from the B.C. caucus, whoever they may be—that I am sure when the recommendations are made public the organizations concerned will be satisfied. I am also conscious of the problem that the hon. member for Edmonton West emphasized, of the necessity of these organizations to know now that their investment policies will not be proscribed in the future. I am pleased to have the opportunity to give that assurance, and I hope they will now be able to proceed with an easier mind.

Hon. members have raised other matters in the course of the debate. I think that in responding to the specific questions of the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley I perhaps answered the hon. member for Don Valley as well, in dealing with the rather specific problems that were raised by the Simpsons-Sears deferred profit-sharing plan management, among others. I am sorry the answer is not more favourable, but the proponents of that plan and of other profit-sharing plans have presented their case very eloquently to the Minister of Finance and to the department.

I can assure the House that there is no retroactive penalty or effect in the provisions of the bill with respect to those plans, but for future contributions beyond the end of the current year the general averaging provisions, rather than the very favourable averaging provisions which pertain under section 36 of the present act, will apply. The general averaging provisions are not in fact as advantageous to the taxpayers as those special provisions are in the case of lump sum withdrawals from deferred profit-sharing plans.

The hon. member for Edmonton West has raised a number of specific questions involving subsections (5), (6), (9), (10) and (11).

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): And subsection (2).

Mr. Mahoney: And subsection (2). I am getting a little confused, as we call "bingo" here, with the subsections of section 146. I will deal with these seriatim as well. So far as subsection (2) is concerned, this is the same as the present subsection 79B(b). This subsection, together with subsection (3), describes the requirements to be met by a plan if it is to be accepted for registration by the Minister of National Revenue. The plan must provide that the proceeds be taken as an annuity for life. The whole purpose of retirement savings plans is to provide for those who cannot become members of a pension plan, or people who have an inadequate pension plan, to defer tax on amounts set aside for retirement income. For this reason the rules concerning these plans, and in particular the rules about the use of proceeds, are designed to be comparable to the rules under which pension plans operate. With respect to subsection (5)—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, the particular point I raised was not so much questioning the regulations or requirements of the plan but what provision is there if there is an honest difference of opinion? Is it the minister's decision that is final, and where do we now turn, if at all, for any particular type of appeal? Here I am relying on the encyclopedic knowledge of the officials.

Mr. Mahoney: I would refer the hon. member to section 172(3). If when he has perused that he has further questions, I will be pleased to answer them or try to answer them. Dealing with subsection (5) this, again, is the same as the present provisions of the bill in subsection 79B(5), except that the limits on the amount of a premium that may be deducted from income have been increased. The new limits are, first, where the individual is a member of a registered pension plan to which contributions are made by an employer, an amount that when added to the amount deducted by him for the year of the pension plan contribution does not exceed the lesser of $2,500 or 20 per cent of his earned income, and where the individual is not a member of a registered pension plan, the limit is the lesser of $4,000 or 20 per cent of his earned income. The present limits of $1,500 and $2,500 are replaced by the limits of $2,500 and $4,000 to which I have referred. No change has been made with regard to the limit of 20 per cent of earned income.

With respect to subsection (6), Mr. Chairman, this is part of the new rules for the investment of trust and other savings plans. It provides relief for the penalty imposed for non-qualified investment. This should be read in conjunction with subsection (10) which requires that the cost of a non-qualified investment made by a trust should be included in the income of the annuitant. Where a trust disposes of a non-qualified investment an amount equal to that amount included in the purchase cost may be deducted from the annuitant's income. If a non-qualified investment is disposed of for less than cost, then only the proceeds of disposition may be deducted.

With respect to subsection (9), again this is part of the new rules. It requires that the amounts shall be included in the income of the annuitant under the plan where a trust sells trust property for less than its value or buys property at greater than its value. I think I dealt with this matter at greater length in response to a question by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants. One would not ordinarily expect such an eventuality to arise except in transactions that were not at arms length, and this to avoid a tax deferred income to people with whom the annuitant is dealing on a non-arms length basis.

Subsection (10) imposes a penalty where a trust governed by a registered retirement savings plan acquires a non-qualified investment or uses trust property as security for a loan. The penalty is an amount equal to the cost of the non-qualified investment or the value of the property used as security, and requires that it be included in the income of the annuitant under the plan. And, as I mentioned earlier, that should be read in conjunction with subsection (6).

Subsection (11), again, is part of the new rules concerning investments of a trust for retirement savings plans. The definition of qualified investment for retirement savings plans does not include life insurance contracts, but this will permit a trust to hold certain kinds of insurance contracts. The policies described are the same as those which may be held by a trust for a deferred profit-sharing plan as described in section 198(6) of the bill. The cash surrender value must not be less than the amount insured at a certain time before the seventy-first birthday of the insured person.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that I have responded to the specific questions which have been asked. If I have missed any, I welcome reminders from hon. members opposite.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the parliamentary secretary a question? I know that those who are interested in the B.C. teachers' retirement plan will be most appreciative of the statement just made by the parliamentary secretary. There is no doubt that this question can be dealt with much more expeditiously by regulation than by a complicated amendment here. Is the parliamentary secretary in a position to make any commitment that such a change in the regulations will be made almost immediately after the act is proclaimed, in order that there may not be any gap in time during which the matter of investments could be called in question?

If there is any hiatus in that regard, serious legal complications could result. If the parliamentary secretary could give me an assurance in this regard it would ease the minds of those who are concerned about this matter.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, without being able to say when the provision will be promulgated by the Governor in Council, I can assure the hon. member that its terms will be such that no gap will exist.

Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Chairman, I rise to ask the parliamentary secretary whether he thinks that the legislation respecting profit-sharing plans will have the effect of phasing out this type of arrangement between employer and employee. I ask this question because I feel that this type of arrangement with the employees of certain companies has gone a long way toward maintaining excellent employer-employee relations and has worked to the benefit of both employer and employee. I wonder if the people who have such profit-sharing plans are satisfied with the legislation. In fact, I know they are not completely satisfied. Does the parliamentary secretary think that those people can live with the legislation, or will it have, as might be suggested, the effect of phasing out such arrangements?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, it should not have that effect and I do not think it will have that effect. I believe the effect will be this: it will treat this type of plan, which is a method of providing for retirement savings, in exactly the same way as it treats other methods of providing for the same eventuality. Both registered retirement savings plans and pension plans will be so treated. Lump sum payments with respect to those plans will be treated in a similar fashion rather than being given the extremely favourable treatment under section 36 of the present act.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, the parliamentary secretary referred me to section 172(3). Most of us are not familiar with this part of the bill because these are entirely new sections. I notice that that section comes in a total block dealing with the Tax Review Board and the Federal Court of Appeal, and therefore any commentary on these matters ought to be made when that section is considered. This is a very convenient block which I hope we will get to before too long.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I would ask a short question that arises out of a phrase on page 390, subsection (2)(a)(i), which provides:

(a) the plan does not

(i) provide for the payment of any benefit before maturity, except by way of a refund of premiums—

My question arises out of that phrase and may interest the B.C. teachers, among others. Since this is rapidly becoming a country of nomads in which people cross provincial boundaries, my question is pertinent. A person may work for a short while as a teacher in British Columbia, Nova Scotia or what-have-you and then move. All that person can look for, I take it, will be a return of premiums paid with respect to this plan. I take it that the language of this subsection means that he cannot get interest on the money that is being applied to these savings plans and that after letters are exchanged back and forth that person may get his money returned without any other benefit or interest. In other words, he merely gets a straight cash return. Am I correct in assuming that?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, the word "premium" and the phrase "refund of premiums" have rather unusual meanings in this section. I would refer the hon. member to the definition section contained in subsection 146(1)(f) in the case of "premium" and to subsection 146(1)(h) in the case of the definition "refund of premiums". Essentially, however, the hon. member is correct. The plan, to qualify, must provide that the proceeds will be taken as an annuity for life, and the only thing that the member may get back is his contribution.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question? Shall section 146 as amended carry?

Clause 1, section 146, as amended, agreed to.

On Clause 1—section 147: Definitions

The Deputy Chairman: The committee will now proceed to consideration of section 147. The Minister of National Revenue, for the Minister of Finance, has moved an amendment to section 147, at page 408 of the bill, which reads:

That the French version of section 147 as set forth in clause 1 of the said bill be amended by striking out line 14 on page 408, substituting the following:

contribuable était un employé qui était un bénéficiaire en vertu'

Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment (Mr. Benson) agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall section 147 as amended carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause 1, section 147, as amended, agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: The committee will now proceed to study the last section of this grouping, section 204 at page 490 of the bill. Shall section 204 carry?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a suggestion with regard to this part, even though I have not consulted my colleague for Halifax-East Hants. This section really forms the last part of the series that starts with section 198 with regard to taxes on deferred profit-sharing plans and revoked plans. Actually, this is the last part of part X of the bill. It seems to me that consideration of this part ought to be deferred until we deal with this matter in the bill, because in that way debate could be much more cohesive and manageable.

I am sure that when we come to section 198 the hon. member for Don Valley will be interested in making some observations because we shall be dealing with deferred profit-sharing plans. There are some changes and modifications in that area of the bill. It seems to me that in this circumstance we could move directly to section 9 which is the opener of the next series.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, in view of the small change contained in part X, I wonder if that whole part could not be dealt with at the same time. There is not much in it.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I want to have a look at that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I think it might be better to accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Edmonton West. Section 204 was obviously omitted from the long list that was read today, because it was already in the grouping we are now considering. I suggest we could agree to transfer section 204 to the other grouping, after consideration of section 203.

The Deputy Chairman: Am I to understand that the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is that section 204 be grouped with the numerous sections which will be studied next Friday along with sections 200, 203 and 205?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is right, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: I understand there has been agreement of the committee to study section 204. I invite the comments of the parliamentary secretary before we agree to this.

[The Deputy Chairman.]

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I understand that the whole of part X, including section 204, is included in Friday's menu to be dealt with after we deal with section 8 which has been stood. I think we will be quite agreeable to that suggestion.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that section 204 be stood and included in the group of sections to be examined next Friday?

Clause 1, section 204, stands.

The Deputy Chairman: Pursuant to an order accepted Friday of last week, the committee will now proceed to the consideration of sections 9 to 13 and sections 15, 18 and 20.

On clause 1—section 9: Income from business or property

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, in these eight sections we are being asked to consider, with regard to two of them—namely, section 15 on page 48 and section 18 on page 57—that most of the provisions relating thereto are new. With regard to the rest of these sections, I notice that the law that is proposed is the law already in existence. It strikes me we are getting into remarkably little new ground in dealing with these particular sections.

It might be helpful to the discussion if the parliamentary secretary would lead off in a general way to indicate the new ground that is being broached. Also, since we have not reached the section on capital gains, perhaps he could indicate whether the definitions or income provisions incorporate the new capital gains provisions. I will have some technical questions to ask as we go through them. This might be a reasonable point of departure on the tail end of a rather successful day.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, in this group of sections I wish to deal with section 10(1) which has been somewhat modified. As far as the taxpayer is concerned, this has been done very badly. Will the parliamentary secretary indicate if there is an existing regulation or if it is proposed to put in any regulation which will not materially affect section 10(1)? This deals with the valuation of inventory property. It reads:

For the purpose of computing income from a business, the property described in an inventory shall be valued at its cost to the taxpayer or its fair market value, whichever is lower, or in such other manner as may be permitted by regulation.

Just what method may be permitted by regulation? Are any other methods now in existence and, if so, what are they? Are there any methods in contemplation which may be brought in by regulation and, if so, what are they? If not, is the last phrase "or in such other manner as may be permitted by regulation" put in by the draftsman merely as a type of caution that he has provided for the eventuality that there might be some way in which the subsection is too restrictive? Can the parliamentary secretary give us an explanation?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, section 10(1) is identical to the provisions of section 14(2) of the Income Tax Act. It has remained unchanged since the last major revision of the act in 1949. I am advised that the government has not heretofore prescribed any regulations under the authority granted by this section.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Why put in the word "modify"? Has somebody put a second dot to an "i"?

Mr. Mahoney: The expression "modification" refers to the over-all section. Previously there was subsection 14(1) of the bill which was repealed in 1958 without changing the numbers of the subsequent subsections. This is the modification. It is a housekeeping chore.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Clause 1, sections 9, 10 and 11 agreed to.

On clause 1—section 12: Amounts to be included as income from business or property.

The Deputy Chairman: On clause 12, the committee has in front of it an amendment moved by the Minister of National Revenue, for the Minister of Finance.

[Translation]

Mr. Gray moved:

That the French version of section 12 as set forth in clause 1 of the said Bill be amended by striking out line 7 on page 26 and substituting the following:

"(ii) déduite, en vertu de l'alinéa 20(1)n) ou du paragraphe 20(7),"

[English]

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment (Mr. Benson) agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall section 12 as amended carry?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, I want to pause on one of the new paragraphs and draw to the attention of the committee what I call a drafting nightmare. Section 12(1)(e) reads:

(e) any amount

(i) deducted under paragraph 20(1)(m) (including any amount substituted by virtue of subsection 20(6) for any amount deducted under that paragraph) or subsection 20(7), or

(ii) deducted under paragraph 20(1)(n) or subsection 20(7).

Let us now go to the key paragraph, section 20(1)(m) which appears at line 10 on page 66. It reads:

subject to subsection (6), where amounts described in paragraph 12(1)(a) have been included in computing the taxpayer's income from a business for the year or a previous year, a reasonable amount as a reserve in respect of—

It then refers to goods and services. Even for a lawyer who is presumably somewhat familiar with legal language we have here, first, a direction that there shall be included in the income for a year from a business or property such of the following amounts as are applicable and so on. That is all right. That is our general direction—arriving at some income to be included in business income.

Then we read about any amount which has been deducted under a further subsection, 21(m), including any amount which was substituted by virtue of another section if any amount deducted under that paragraph was from a further subsection. Then we go to 21(n) and we find a further reference back. Surely to goodness something better than that could be devised. How are we to understand such things as this? And this is supposed to be, not for large corporations but for small businesses such as grocery stores or service stations. Their tax auditors, who are not high-priced tax advisers, must wallow through verbiage of this nature. We just wonder where we are getting to.

Mr. Mahoney: Again, I have to profess to the same degree of perplexity as the hon. member feels when he reads this clause for the first time. But the fact is that these are carryovers from the existing Income Tax Act rather than anything new.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I thought this was reform.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): This is supposed to be reform.

Mr. Mahoney: In the mind of the government, reform involves basic principles rather than semantics. I can only say this. Obviously, this is not one of the areas of complexity about which the members of the Canadian Bar were complaining, because they have been working with this since 1949.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That does not make a bit of difference. It is almost facetious for the parliamentary secretary to say this is existing law and it is already in force. We have heard a great many complaints about the complexity of the Income Tax Act. The minister is asking for the re-enactment of provisions. As far as he is concerned, he is back to square zero. The fact that it existed before means nothing. If these sections were nonsensical, they continue to be nonsensical and this House will be even more nonsensical if it were casually to adopt a provision which is meaningless to most people. This particular item has been flagged; it is not a case of bumping up against it for the first time.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, a particular provision of sections 20 (m) and (n) allows the deduction from taxable income for the year of amounts which a taxpayer anticipates he will have to spend in meeting commitments entered into for the sale of goods, services, and so on. In the case of (n) there is provision for the deduction of amounts in anticipation of the sale of property. The provision in section 12 simply requires that this be brought back into income if it is actually realized. This is the usual practice followed in dealing with various reserves which a taxpayer is allowed to make out of business income. I do not see that there is the amount of confusion here the hon. member is suggesting, at least in the minds of the people who deal with this subject.

Mr. Ritchie: I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary a question in connection with section 12(1)(b) concerning the amount receivable with respect to property sold or services rendered in the course of business. It says:

Unless the method adopted by the taxpayer from computing income from the business and accepted for the purpose of this part does not require him to include any amount receivable in computing his income for a taxation year unless it has been received in the year.

Will this be further defined in other sections of the act?

Mr. Mahoney: This is the same kind of provision as is contained in section 85(1)(b) of the existing act. An example I can think of in this section which is fairly common is the permission given to contractors to report on a complete contract basis rather than on a cash basis in respect of contracts running through more than one fiscal year.

Clause 1, section 12, as amended, agreed to.

On clause 1—section 13: Excess of proceeds over undepreciated capital cost.

Mr. McCleave: I have one question arising out of section 13. This is on page 34. It deals with a new provision in the law, that is, subsection (8) which deals with property disposed of after ceasing business. Normally, in winding up a business, everything goes at once so you liquidate in an orderly fashion and are left, presumably, with nothing but money which then finds its separate ways and a court order disposes of the whole operation. I was wondering what particular area this clause is reaching into. Is it the individual who has incorporated as a grocery store and then has wound up the grocery business and is left with an asset on which he has claimed depreciation? Over the years the grocery store flourished, and therefore he is liable to make his peace with the income tax department before he sells the property. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary can tell us precisely what is involved here, and also why it is involved.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, this section is a new section. It clarifies the rates applicable when a business property is sold after the taxpayer ceases to carry on business. It provides that the rates shall apply to terminal losses and to recaptured capital cost allowance in the same way as though the business were still being carried on.

Mr. McCleave: In other words, he cannot take advantage and throw it into another fiscal year: he is caught within the year in which his business ceases during the time in which his business ceased to operate? Am I right in that assumption?

• (9:20 p.m.)

Mr. Mahoney: I will have to take that question as notice and supply the hon. member with an answer.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Chairman, on page 29, subsection (4) refers to subsection 20(5a) modified. I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary in what manner it has been modified.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, we shall have to compare that with the present section of the Income Tax Act before I can supply the answer. I can give no obvious response.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Chairman, I should like some information from the parliamentary secretary. On page 34 of the bill one finds subsection (8) about which the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants posed a question. I should like the parliamentary secretary to tell me whether this section is the recapture of depreciation section. If it is, is there any substantial change in this recapture provision compared with the provision in the old act?

While I am on my feet I would ask the parliamentary secretary whether as a result there has been any change in the tax rate. Let me give him an example. Supposing that a person who owns a small business has assets totalling $10,000. During the time he is in business these assets depreciate to $8,000. Then he subsequently sells his assets for $12,000. What recapture is there in those circumstances and what rate would apply? How much would be recaptured and what effective rate would apply?

Mr. Mahoney: In the example the hon. member has given, the taxpayer would have a $2,000 recapture and this is ordinary income. No particular rate would apply; it is just regarded as income.

Mr. Ritchie: Could the parliamentary secretary inform me which sections deals with property that is disposed of at less than its depreciable value?

Mr. Mahoney: Could I ask the hon. member to give the number of the section? We are dealing with quite a large block of sections here.

Mr. Ritchie: That is what I am not sure of. As I understand it, there is a section that deals with depreciated property. If a taxpayer sustains a loss on a property that he sells below its depreciated value—the so-called terminal loss section, I believe—which section of the act will cover that situation?

Mr. Mahoney: Terminal losses are covered by the regulations under the Income Tax Act and are not dealt with in the present bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney) to explain the meaning of subsection (4) of section 13 on page 29:

Insurance and compensation proceeds

Does this subsection apply, for instance, to compensation paid to a farmer under crop insurance and does it mean that such compensation would be regarded as income, even if the crop lost was not fully covered by insurance supposed to cover losses the farmer may incur?

[English]

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry, but the translation did not come through well enough for me even to get the section number to which the hon. member was referring. Could I ask him to repeat his question more slowly for the benefit perhaps of the interpreter?

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Chairman, I see that we sometimes misunderstand the interpretation. I feel that the interpreters are not to be blamed, but the communication is rather difficult. This problem which the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney) faces does not upset me at all. I know that there is an explanation for that.

My question was as follows: Concerning subsection (4) of section 13 on page 29, which states:

Insurance and compensation proceeds

I should like to know whether compensation which would be paid to a farmer under crop insurance following a loss suffered during the year could be considered as a taxable income.

[English]

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I think the answer to that question is yes. Crop insurance normally replaces income. If the insurance proceeds replace income, then those proceeds are themselves income. The premiums payable on the insurance are deductible, of course.

While on this same section, the hon. member for Dauphin asked a question about what change had been made. The change to this section is the addition of lines 30 to 37 inclusive on page 29 of the bill. That is all new.

The Chairman: Members of the committee appreciate that there is a proposed amendment to section 13. If it is agreeable to the committee we might deal with that at this time and then the Chair will put the section as amended. The amendment appears at page 8934 of Hansard for October 22, moved by the Minister of National Revenue for the Minister of Finance. It reads as follows:

That section 13 as set forth in clause 1 of the said bill be amended by striking out lines 1 and 2 on page 35 and substituting the following:

(11) Any deduction made under subparagraph 8(1)(j)(ii) of this act or subsection 11(11) of The

Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment (Mr. Benson) agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall the section as amended carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Clause 1, section 13, as amended, agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall section 15 carry?

On clause 1—Section 15: Appropriation of property to shareholder.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, there are two new provisions here and I should like to deal with one of them. I did ask a question earlier of the parliamentary secretary which arose in part from the new provisions on page 48, but obviously capital gains are not dealt with here. The section I intend to raise is subsection (5) which deals with a shareholder who has the benefit of an automobile. I suppose in some ways this is the counterpart of an employee who has the benefit of an automobile.

I take it this provision really deals with the income of people in Canada. If a corporation which is not even resident in Canada or does not carry on business primarily in Canada provides the use of an automobile for a shareholder and he does not meet the entire cost of the automobile—this is a simplification of the situation—it must be counted as income. Am I correct in interpreting this provision in that way?

Mr. Mahoney: This is very comparable to the provision we discussed under section 6(1)(e) when we were dealing with an employee who had the use of an automobile provided by his employer. This deals with the situation where a company provides an automobile to a shareholder and makes that a taxable benefit.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): If you look at section 6(1)(e) and section 15(5) you will see that they are the stand-by charges for automobiles. The wording is the same and they are subject to the same disabilities or difficulties. Why should there be a difference if the automobile is leased or owned by the employer? Why should there be a different formula? If the car is owned or leased by the company, why should this make any difference to the shareholder? This suggests that section 6(2) is applicable mutatis mutandis with section 5, so we are dealing with precisely the same sort of thing. Why is this not on the basis or theory that there is an aliquot portion per month or value of the automobile? Why is it not on that basis?

The hon. member for Calgary Centre asked what sort of solution is to be provided for the difficulties of an automobile salesman. A salesman on straight commission might be using a demonstrator car for his personal use. It may be a very valuable car. Two weeks later he may be using a standard model which has a much lower value. This could easily be true of a salesman who works for a multi-model agency. I will not name one because I might offend hon. members who have a liking for a different automobile manufacturer. But if you walk down a few blocks from this edifice you might find a Chevrolet, Oldsmobile, Cadillac agency. A salesman there might be furnished with a Chevrolet car for a period of a month, then he might be given an Oldsmobile and, subsequently, a Cadillac. There is quite a difference in the selling price of those vehicles. How do you work out this formula in that situation?

If the taxpayer happens to be a shareholder in the company owning the dealership, the same questions would have to be asked. Why should there be these differences? Why is this not simply worked on the basis of a proportionate value of the automobile, because in cases where different automobiles are made available you run into trouble. This question of leasing or owning a car involves the use of a different formula, particularly under section 6, and that is a lot of nonsense.

An hon. Member: That is part of the weekly swindle-sheet.

Mr. Mahoney: I think it is the practice of the Department of National Revenue, where an individual is both an employee and a shareholder, to look at him as an employee for this purpose. We did not run into that kind of confusion, or at least that was my experience when I was in both positions and had a company car. Those were the good old days.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): All I can say is that the parliamentary secretary's confusion must be compounded, because section 6 is worse than that.

Mr. Mahoney: The question raised the other day by the hon. member for Calgary Centre regarding salesmen for automobile companies is one we have undertaken to look at. There is a problem which is recognized, and certainly any rectification of that problem will be effective for the whole of the 1972 taxation year.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Why is there a different formula in respect of leasing compared with owning an automobile? Section 6 ties into section 15 by cross-reference, so my remarks regarding the complications of section 6 are fully germane. Why is there a distinction between leasing and owning a vehicle? It provides for different formulas for charging a taxpayer who operates a vehicle under lease or one that is owned.

Mr. Mahoney: The value of the unit is what is assessed for the purpose of the taxpayer. There is obviously a different cost to the employer depending on whether he leases or owns the car provided the employee or the shareholder, and hence the value is different.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): With the greatest respect, I find that this is similar to determining the value of a horse by its rear end. It is the benefit to the taxpayer or the employee that is important. It is that benefit which is being taxed; it is not what the employer has to pay for the car that is involved. What is the value to the employee, that is the question? You may have two salesmen working for competing companies. There may be more advantages to one company in leasing cars than the other because one is bigger and is entitled to a fleet discount.

There are no hard and fast rules which apply to leasing vehicles. We have two salesmen doing the same blessed thing, driving similar cars, yet you are going to charge one more than the other, which is quite conceivable under a leasing agreement, yet the benefit to each is precisely the same. It matters not one whit what the owner or employer has to pay for the vehicle. That has nothing to do with it. What is involved is the benefit to the employee. If a salesman for Procter and Gamble gets a standard Chev. leased by a company, and another salesman gets the same kind of car leased by a much smaller soap distributing company which has to pay more under the leasing agreement, is the minister or the parliamentary secretary saying that the salesman for the smaller company is to be charged more for the benefit he receives? This is patent nonsense.

Mr. Mahoney: I am inclined to agree with the hon. member. This certainly is nonsense. The value of the benefit to the employee is not based on whether he is given precisely the same car as his neighbour. The value to him as an employee is based on a great number of variables, including the amount of use the employee has for the car. Employee "A" may be given exactly the same car model as employee "B", but employee "A" gets considerably more benefit from that car because he drives it 4,000 miles on his annual holiday and things like that, whereas employee "B" does not. So the only criterion from a practical point of view that the income tax department can use in assessing the value of the benefit is the cost to the person providing that benefit. The value to the particular person receiving the benefit depends entirely on how much he uses it. All these are variables which will change from person to person. There is no practical way in which to measure it from that point of view.

• (9:40 p.m.)

The Chairman: As the committee knows, there is a proposed amendment to section 15. The amendment appears at page 8934 of Hansard for October 22. Shall the said amendment carry?

Amendment (Mr. Benson) agreed to.

Clause 1, section 15, as amended agreed to.

On clause 1—section 18: General limitations.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, once in a while a person has a nightmare in which he dreams he is dealing with tax reform on the floor of the House of Commons. I find myself involved in such a nightmare now. More particularly, my anguish arises out of trying to understand what is meant by subsection (2) at page 55. This is something which has been added to the law and in that sense I suppose it qualifies as reform if one could understand what in effect it means. This deals with the question of what one can claim on the ownership of land. I presume it really is an attempt to control speculation in land, or at least to see that speculation in land does not automatically by itself draw tax benefits, because in part the section provides:

—except to the extent that the taxpayer's gross revenue, if any, from the land for that year exceeds the aggregate of all other amounts deducted in computing his income from the land for that year.

As one goes through the whole thing it is like the music that goes around and around and one wonders where it comes out. I will put my bafflement in this way: Am I correct in understanding it is really to discourage speculation in land, that is, that people simply are not to be allowed to hunt around the edges of our rapidly growing cities, pick up land and enjoy certain tax benefits as a result of so doing? In other words, if land is so acquired it must be land which can bear its share of the taxes of this country? If I have asked the wrong question perhaps the parliamentary secretary could give some enlightenment on th ephilosophy of this subsection.

Mr. Benson: Well, Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: The hon. gentleman has returned.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Welcome to Parliament.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, here we are dealing with people who buy land who really are not in the business of dealing with land. That is, they are not in land trading and buying and selling all the time so that they have profits and losses from it but, rather, are buying land on what one might say is a speculative basis. These are people who might write the particular cost against other income. Under the new section this will be added to the inventory value of the land and, when he ultimately sells it, it would be subject to a tax; but this will become part of his costs and not operating expenses which he can write off with other income.

Mr. McCleave: I would not fault the minister for this approach although I believe from a practical sense the once-in-a-lifetime deal in land has attracted income taxes in the past. I am aware of one man in Halifax, for example, who has spent the last 15 years trying to reverse a decision made that long ago. However, I ask: Where does the difference lie between a fellow who jumps in for the purpose of speculation and the fellow who jumps in for the purpose of being a land developer? Does a person have to buy more than one parcel of land in order to qualify in the latter category, or must his income position be different? Or how does he achieve the hallowed position of a respectable land dealer rather than the unhallowed position of a speculator in land?

Mr. Benson: The position is exactly the same as under the existing law. Had we moved, as originally proposed in the white paper, to the point where gains were fully taxed, this question would not arise; but in a situation where we are to tax capital gains at half rates we will have the same problem of distinction between what is a capital gain and what is a trading profit as we presently have. Here it is a matter of case law and decisions by the courts.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Chairman, would the minister indicate if any consideration is being given to the introduction by regulatio nof a more realistic capital cost allowance schedule. Th eproblem to which a solution is addressed arises because an undue and unrealistic amount of capital cost allowance is available for buildings beyond the amount of actual depreciation. It is thi sproblem area which leads to the apparent unfairness in the tax system.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, first of all, it does not apply to this particular section with which we are dealing since it deals with lan donly. The matter of the capital cost allowance, as I have said, is a matter to be reviewed by the government in due course. We have asked for submissions, with regard to a capital cost allowance, from various interested parties including the Canadian Manufacturers Association. I think the whole system of capital cost allowances will have to be reviewed. I should like to emphasize, however, that until this thorough review is carried out there is no intention on the part of the government to change the present capital cost allowance schedules.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, I will start right at the very beginning, on section 18 (1) (a). I think this is the area in which one can come up with a personal beef or bleat for Members of Parliament and others who may find themselves in a simila rposition. I would say it is also possible for a member of a provincial legislature to be in a similar position.

The lawyer, the accountant, the medical practitioner or the engineer, by being a full-time parliamentarian, is reduced in his professional capacity to an almost non-operating basis; he has little or no income from his business or profession. However, he will attend, for instance in the case of lawyers—and remember he does not have an independent office—the annual convention of the Canadian Bar Association because he is particularly interested in this House in being a specialist in, shall we say, the law of the sea, the law of the air or perhaps, now, the law of pollution control. He may be a specialist in criminal law and he will go to the Canadian Bar, but he has little or no professional income: it may be merely nominal and certainly would be less than 50 per cent of his parliamentary stipend.

I put it to the minister that the interpretation of section 18 (1)(a) is that he would not be entitled to his expenses, although there is another section that deals with convention expenses and so forth, yet this is an outlay of expense except to the extent that was made by the taxpayer for the purpose of gaining or producing income from his business or property. He is not gaining any income from his business.

The hon. member for Laurier could attend an annual convention or some of the periodic conventions of the Canadian Tax Foundation or of the Institute of Chartered Accountants to improve his knowledge so as to make him a better member of the House. I have been to several conferences of the Canadian Tax Foundation and I hope it has given me greater knowledge and greater facility in dealing with tax matters. Yet I have gone to the tax department and they have said I was not entitled because I am not a practising lawyer, my connection with the law firm is purely tenuous because I am a full-time member of the House. I find it rather strange that a Member of Parliament cannot go to one of these professional conferences within his own competence in order to keep himself up to date and to improve his professional knowledge so as to make him a better Member of Parliament. I would like to hear the views of the minister in this connection.

Mr. Benson: I would say that hon. members cannot have it both ways. We have an expense allowance which, by legislation, is tax free. If a Member of Parliament is practising law as well as being a Member of Parliament, which many members used to be able to do—I agree that now it is difficult to do so because this is a full time job—he could deduct such expenses as my hon. friend mentioned. If a person has chosen, instead, to be a Member of Parliament he cannot deduct any expenses, but he does have the advantage of the tax free expense allowance.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): But that is in connection with many other claims from his constituency. There is no reason why a Member of Parliament should not be on the same basis with regard to attending those conferences as are members of the minister's department who attend these conferences by the dozen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): This also applies to the officials of the Department of National Revenue. I get to know them at these conventions—because they are always there.

Mr. Benson: All that is wrong here is that we should change the members of the House of Commons and Senate act in order to allow the government to pay such legitimate expenses as these, which would not be taxable benefits. I see nothing wrong with it. If my hon. friend wanted to make such a proposal I can assure him that the government would give it every consideration.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is the wrong way to do it.

Mr. Ritchie: At page 55, subsection (3) reads:

In subsection (2), "land" does not include (a) any property that is a building or other depreciable property affixed to land—

I should like to ask whether, if a taxpayer has property which under subsection (2) is not eligible for interest property tax deduction except as revenue from that, the definition of land on which there is a building becomes depreciable property in relationship to the land on which it is placed. Also, on page 56 paragraph (b) reads:

the land subadjacent to any property described in paragraph (a)—

Does this also apply to (c)?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, subsection (3) of section 18 excludes certain items from the provisions of subsection (2), and of course included among that are buildings or other depreciable property affixed to the land. So subsection (3) is a list of exclusions from subsection (2).

Mr. Ritchie: If there is a building on a piece of property which applies under subsection (2), can the depreciation be deducted from the taxpayer's income other than what is applied in subsection (2); that is, can it be deducted from a source of income other than on that land?

Mr. Mahoney: I think that on studying this section the hon. member will realize that depreciation as such does not come into the question. If there is a depreciable asset fixed to the land it does not come within the provisions of subsection (2), and therefore the question of interest on borrowed money and property taxes is not the subject of the deduction as referred to in section 18(2). The depreciable property is the test, but in talking about section 18 we are not talking about the deduction of depreciation of capital cost allowance from income.

The Chairman: Order, please. Before I see the clock it might be useful, for continuity of the record—because I understand the committee will not come back to this section until Friday—to mention that the section is subject to an amendment moved by the Minister of National Revenue, for the Minister of Finance, but not yet dealt with, appearing on pages 8934 and 8935 of Hansard for October 22.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

CRIMINAL CODE—INQUIRY AS TO DEBATE ON ABORTION

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, in deliberately keeping the matter of abortion from being discussed in the House of Commons, the government is guilty of a series of very unfair and very cruel acts. It is forcing unknown numbers of women to bear unwanted children, with all the terrible consequences to them and to society. It is forcing women on low income to face the horrors of a back street operator or the do-it-yourself procedures which cripple and kill. It is forcing women who can afford it to go to foreign countries for an abortion.

Last year 1,649 Canadian women had to seek such help in New York state. I understand that 44 per cent of them were from the province of Quebec alone. It is forcing uncounted other women to run from hospital to hospital in Canada trying desperately to find one that will help them while the clock ticks remorselessly on and the authorities, with eyes averted from their misery, pass by on the other side.

It is permitting those who are opposed to abortion to force their will on the majority in Canada who believe, equally strongly, that abortion should be legalized. All these things are going on while the government washes its hands and refuses to accept responsibility for a situation which it alone can change. Yet last Friday the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) told a high school class in Nova Scotia that women should be the ones to decide whether they should have the legal right to have an abortion if they want one. The young folk applauded loudly, quite unaware of the fact that the Prime Minister is unwilling even to have a debate on abortion in this House this session, as he promised a year ago.

He told the students that he would be very much influenced by the overwhelming feeling of women. He said, "I don't feel I can speak with great authority on this because I am not a woman." Yet when I asked him this afternoon if he would bring in a measure to take abortion from the Criminal Code and allow the elected representatives of the people to vote on it, he completely sidestepped the question. He and his government are the only ones who can bring such a measure before Parliament. Why don't they do it?

To leave the law as it is now simply means that they are on the side of those who are opposed to abortion and are determined to force that position on everyone else, regardless of what it does to women in every part of Canada. Let there be no mistake about that. I can only hope that this attitude will arouse freedom-loving women and men to bring organized pressure on the government in order to show it how wrong it is.

The forces which today are preventing changes in the abortion law are the same ones who for years were successful in keeping birth control illegal and which will resist government action for effective methods of birth control across Canada. These are the forces responsible for unnecessarily large numbers of abortions. These are the forces causing untold suffering and injustice to thousands of women who should have the right to consult their doctors and seek an abortion safely, legally and openly.

On November 20 a large group of Canadian women are coming to Ottawa to impress upon the government the fact, as the Prime Minister told the students in Nova Scotia, that women should be the ones to decide whether they should have the legal right to an abortion. I trust that he will give them that opportunity by having a debate on the subject in Parliament and then by introducing legislation to take abortion out of the Criminal Code and leaving it, as we leave all other medical procedures, a matter between the patient and her doctor, thus allowing both sides to practice their principles freely without either side trying to force its beliefs on the other.

Mr. Barnett J. Danson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate with the hon. member. This is a subject which raises deep emotions among all of us. I would question the phraseology of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) in saying the government is deliberately postponing facing this issue. The government liberalized the existing legislation and made it far more humane through amendments to the Criminal Code.

In the Speech from the Throne the government said it would set aside a day for debate on this issue, but the fact is that the government simply has not committed itself to further amendments. It said it would set aside a day in the hope that this subject, which is sensitive to all of us, could be aired. Regrettably, the progress of business of the House and the priorities involved have delayed the doing of many things which the government would wish to do. But to say it refuses to accept responsibility is, I think, somewhat unfair. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) did, indeed, in Halifax make a statement similar to that attributed to him by the hon. member. But the people in their wisdom have not elected very many women to the House of Commons.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Wisdom?

Mr. Danson: The woman that has been elected to this House certainly represents her constituents with great credit. I came here from a dinner given for some of our guests from Yugoslavia, Mr. Speaker, and when they heard that I would be answering the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, the only woman member of the House, they expressed surprise that there was only one woman in the House of Commons. I do not think that reflects particular credit on us. Perhaps women make the ultimate decision in some matters. Yet the men here represent men and women and they are given the responsibility to take into consideration the representations of women and the influence that they bring to bear on our lives.

We must consider the representations made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. It is not an easy matter. Progress, regrettably, comes more slowly than one would wish. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway represents a viewpoint. She states that if women are not to be allowed to make this decision, women will be demonstrating on Parliament Hill. We should be guided by her remarks and remember, indeed, that this is not total representation and that there are many women expressing this viewpoint.

AIR TRANSPORT—NATIONAL POLICY—POSSIBILITY OF CANADIAN PACIFIC AIRLINES BECOMING SECOND TRANS-CANADA CARRIER

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) has escaped back, alive and well, to the mainland from Newfoundland in the company of Mr. Smallwood and that I am to have the pleasure of hearing the parliamentary secretary reply to my question.

The question that I raise at least once a year is about the possible extension of Canadian Pacific Airlines service into Atlantic Canada so that there will be two national airlines serving from coast to coast. The Minister of Transport looked a little askance when I asked this question the other day. He thought that I simply meant to give CPA the profitable run between Montreal and Halifax. I assured him, and this is my view on the subject, that such national service means service from Bonavista to Vancouver Island and from the forty-ninth parallel to as near the North Pole as one can go. Let there be no doubt about that—I am not asking for any privilege for Canadian Pacific Airlines.

If government policy is rearranged in this direction and Canadian Pacific Airlines is allowed to compete in Canada east of Montreal, I hope that it will not compete on the profitable runs only but that it will bear some of the burdens borne by other airlines; in other words, that it will become part of the national air policy to service all parts of Canada. Or, to put it in more vulgar terms, I hope that it has to take the skim milk as well as the cream.

I raise this matter because I think the feelings of opposition members should be made known on national matters and should be placed on the record. I know that aviation economics is not the most delightful subject for a company controller to dabble in, that airlines are having a great deal of trouble making profits, that the regional airlines play a most important part in the Canadian picture, and that in Atlantic Canada Eastern Provincial Airways has done a tremendous job. One cannot simply ask Canadian Pacific to burst holus-bolus into the picture; the economics of airline transportation must be considered carefully before any such decision is made.

It should also be noted clearly for the record that there must be a cabinet directive before the Canadian Transport Commission can even consider extending Canadian Pacific Airlines service in eastern Canada. If the cabinet is silent on the matter, Mr. Pickersgill, as head of the Canadian Transport Commission, will be justified in refusing to consider the matter at all. I know the Minister of Transport was not quite as frank as he usually is when dealing with the question asked in this regard the other day by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay). He seemed to imply that the cabinet does not have a role in this, whereas I suggest that it does.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) has asked me to respond to the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave). In speaking to him earlier, he planned to be here this evening. There were some last minute changes in his schedule. I disagree with the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants that the minister looked somewhat askance when he heard the question. I have never known him to look that way in this House. He is a pretty forthright, honest member of the treasury benches.

The present transcontinental air policy clearly sets out the framework under which Air Canada and Canadian Pacific operate. In terms of this policy the minister has consistently raised with Air Canada, in the interests of the travelling public, the continuous need for improved services between Halifax and the rest of the major trunk lines operating across Canada, and I understand that the management of Air Canada are sympathetic to these needs.

In so far as the extension of Canadian Pacific services to Halifax is concerned, this would be a matter for referral to the Canadian Transport Commission under the existing policy prescribed for the two major carriers on domestic trunk routes and the sharing formula which is well known to the hon. member. The government is continuously keeping an eye on the changing patterns of travel growth in Canada, and if any policy changes are required as a result of this the House will be informed in the usual way.

In conclusion, I noted that the hon. member was honest enough, as he usually is in his presentations in this House, to recognize the area of aviation economics and to recognize this particular area of involvement and concern.

LABOUR CONDITIONS—STE. THÉRÈSE, QUÉBEC—LAY-OFF OF EMPLOYEES BY GENERAL MOTORS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, my remarks this evening arise out of a question I put to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) last Friday. It related to the imminent lay-off of 665 workers at the General Motors Plant at Ste. Thérèse, Québec. I asked the minister if he would consider the argument put forward to him personally by representatives of local 1163 of the United Auto Workers. The argument was to the effect that if all workers worked a shorter work week, no lay-offs would be necessary. The minister replied that this would not be practical, for if this were done for one industry it would have to be done for all such industries facing lay-offs. The answer also implied that it would be too costly.

I would like to outline the argument put forward by local 1163 to the minister. The proposal by the union local was based on research carried out by Professor Sydney Inkerman of McGill University. Now that the 665 workers have been laid off they will be receiving $77 per man per week in unemployment insurance benefits. Based on a six-month period, which is a reasonable assumption, this expenditure will cost the federal government $1,331,330. Some of this money will go back to both the federal and Quebec governments to the extent of $83,802 in taxes.

For their computations, the union uses as its example one married man with a child. In the brief the union stated that the family would be paying $100 per month for rent and $151 for food, for a total of $251 per month. The remaining income from unemployment insurance would be taxed for such things as clothes, cigarettes, gas, etc. The union argued that the company should not lay off anybody but that all should work a four-day week. In addition, the government would pay 80 per cent of the net earnings for all employees for the fifth day.

The cost to the government, over the same six-month period, would be $1,311,336. This alone would be a saving to the government of $20,000. In addition, the 665 workers, over the six-month period, would contribute $28,528 to the Unemployment Insurance Commission. This, coupled with the employer's contributions, would amount to $57,057. Now that the 665 workers have been laid off, these contributions are lost. Moreover, if the men laid off had been kept on the job they would be paying $28,129 to the Quebec pension fund and, with comparable contributions from the company, the total contribution would be $56,259. Again, this money has been lost due to the lay-off.

The amount of money the laid-off workers would have paid in the form of federal income taxes, had they been employed over these six months, would amount to $295,659. Another sum of $197,970 would have been paid into Quebec income taxes. Again, this money has been lost. In addition, if these 665 men were still employed they would have had $312 left over after food and rent costs each month. Over a six-month period the 665 men now laid off would have had $1,244,999 to pump into the consumer market. Sales taxes would have amounted to $99,599. Medicare contributions, now lost, would amount to another $45,645 from both employer and employees. Had the UAW, local 1163, recommendations been accepted it is very possible that the federal government would have received $352,716 in revenue and the Quebec government would have received an added $399,475, for a grand total of $752,191 in revenue.

So far as the company is concerned, by accepting the union argument or proposal it would have taken 39.2 hours of labour per unit—in this case, per automobile—but under the present situation, with the lay-off of 665 men it is going to take 42 hours of labour per unit.

Mr. Speaker, cost of materials would remain the same, operating overhead or fixed costs would remain the same. In short, and in conclusion, the UAW's proposal would not have cost the company any more, neither would it have cost the government any more. But now that 665 men have been laid off the government will lose income tax revenue, it will have to pay out benefits in unemployment insurance, purchasing power has been reduced, the Quebec pension fund will suffer and Quebec medicare premium income also will suffer.

Mr. John Roberts (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for having raised this question. His inquiry in the House and his speech tonight indicate his concern over the situation we face at Ste. Thérèse. I should add that the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Comtois) has approached the minister several times as a result of his concern for the people who are involved in these lay-offs. I should like to congratulate the hon. member for presenting to us the research prepared by the UAW local. If it is anything to the House, I must confess it was rather dense. I do not mean it was unintelligent; I mean it was densely packed with statistics in support of the argument presented. I should like to look at it again tomorrow to make sure I am not getting any percentages mixed up.

However, as the minister indicated in the House when this question was raised, he was sceptical of the approach which had been suggested, partly on account of the precedent it might create in other sectors of the economy. I do not think the hon. member addressed himself to the question of what the effect of such an approach might be in other areas as distinct from the automobile sector of the industry in Ste. Thérèse. This scepticism is all the more justified in that there is an alternative approach to dealing with these problems, one which seems to be fruitful in its effects.

As the minister indicated in this House, he discussed with members making representations to him the procedures under Manpower that will assist these workers with their problems. As a matter of fact, both the company and the union at Ste. Thérèse have been contacted by the Canada Manpower consultative service and it was agreed that the establishment of a joint committee under the Canada Manpower adjustment program would be deferred until January 1, 1972, when we will know a little more definitely exactly what the situation of the 600 workers laid off at Ste. Thérèse will be, whether the lay-off will prove to be temporary, as we hope is the case, or permanent.

Many of the workers laid off are entitled to supplementary unemployment benefits amounting to over 90 per cent of their regular earnings for varying periods of time while on lay-off. It is due to this fact that the lay-offs have just become effective at the end of the month, and demands placed on Canada Manpower consultative services for assistance have been very limited, at least up to the present. As soon as those who have been laid off have visited—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the parliamentary secretary, but the motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, November 3, 1971

The House met at 2 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CONGRATULATIONS TO MEMBER FOR VANCOUVER EAST ON 38 YEARS OF PARLIAMENTARY SERVICE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege I ask the indulgence of the House for a moment or two in order that I may make reference to one of our highly respected and most distinguished colleagues, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch).

As hon. members are aware, our colleague indicated to his constituents yesterday that he does not intend to be a candidate in the next general election. This is something all of us regret. However, there is a significance attached to his timing which I think we could note. Yesterday the hon. member completed 38 years of parliamentary service; he is today, therefore, beginning his 39th year as the member for Vancouver East in the legislature of British Columbia or the Parliament of Canada. We pay tribute to our friend and we extend to him our very best wishes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: On behalf of all the members of the House I congratulate the hon. member for Vancouver East and wish him well in the years ahead.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

POLLUTION

TABLING OF NEW PULP AND PAPER EFFLUENT REGULATIONS

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2) I wish to table the new pulp and paper effluent regulations as provided for in the Fisheries Act.

AGRICULTURE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF REDUCTION IN DAIRY COMMISSION HOLDBACK ON IN-QUOTA MANUFACTURING MILK DELIVERIES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Dairy Commission's rate of holdback from payments to dairy farmers on in-quota deliveries of manufacturing milk is being lowered to ten cents per hundred pounds of milk, or 2.85 cents per pound of butterfat. The previous rates had been 26 cents on April and May deliveries and 20 cents on deliveries starting in June.

The new rate will apply to all in-quota deliveries of manufacturing milk since April 1, 1971. It will be effective on future milk payments and there will be a refund to producers on previous deliveries for the difference between the earlier rates and the revised rate. This refund to producers will amount to 16 cents per hundred pounds of milk, or 4.57 cents per pound butterfat, on all in-quota deliveries to which the earlier 26 cent rate had applied and ten cents per hundred pounds milk, or 2.85 cents per pound butterfat, on previous deliveries at the 20 cent holdback rate.

The amount to be refunded on earlier deliveries and the saving to producers at the lower rate on subsequent deliveries will add about $8.5 million to the income of shippers of manufacturing milk in the 1971-72 dairy year.

The holdback is used by the commission to cover the difference between Canadian support prices and surpluses exported at a lower price. The surplus is, or has been, mainly skim milk powder.

The international and domestic dairy marketing situation has improved significantly this year. Surpluses, including those in Canada, have been reduced substantially and world prices are much firmer. With the heavy producing season now past, the Commission's costs for the year ending next March 31 can now be more closely estimated, thus permitting reduction in the holdback on in-quota milk to the ten cent rate. And, by the way, Mr. Speaker, there is no holdback on in-quota cream at the present time.

Mr. H. A. Moore (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, we are naturally pleased to hear of the reduction in the holdback from payments to dairy farmers on in-quota deliveries of manufacturing milk and also that there is a general firming, internationally and domestically, of the market for dairy products and of prices. Since we now have a short supply rather than a surplus of dairy production in this country, we hope that future dairy policies will be designed to keep producers in business rather than to force so many out, as has been the policy of the government in the past few years. We also hope that some of the inflexibilities in the sales policy of the Dairy Commission will be reviewed in light of a situation that was brought to our attention in the committee on agriculture relating, for example, to Mexican purchases of skim milk powder some time ago.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the previous speaker that we welcome this move to increase the incomes of producers of manufacturing milk. We also hope that the pressure that has been put on producers to cut back and which has actually caused some producers to go out of business will now ease.

Although this may be a little outside the scope of the minister's responsibilities, I hope the government will also turn its attention to the possibility of distributing milk products and by-products to those people in our country whose incomes are at or below poverty level. In this way some of our productive capacity could be used to see that all people in Canada are well fed. I hope the government's policy does not settle into a pattern of cutting back production for the non-commercial market and ignoring entirely that very considerable sector of society which has not been able to afford all of the protein foods it needs. We have heard reports in recent months that in one of our major cities conditions exist of which Canadians should be ashamed. We cannot justify cutting back production of basic protein foods while such conditions exist.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy about the announcement the Minister of Agriculture has just made.

The adjustment he has just announced has been made possible as a result of the efforts of the producers concerned who have greatly contributed to the establishment of a dairy policy more profitable for manufactured milk producers.

Also, the international market has improved. Stronger prices have enabled the Canadian Dairy Commission to recommend to the minister to mitigate the penalty imposed upon producers for quite some time, through a reduction of the holdback and a refund of part of the amount held back since April 1, 1971.

I am very happy, Mr. Speaker, that the petition signed by 25,000 industrial dairy producers, which I had the honour of introducing in the House on February 18, 1970, is at last having effect. At the time, the producers were much disappointed when they left Ottawa, but they subsequently realized that they could anticipate the improvement the hon. minister has just announced.

I am also glad that I brought forward in the House on February 19, 1970, a motion to discuss dairy policy. At that time, there was little hope, there did not seem to be enough interest in the problem. However it was subsequently realized that dairy policy was improving from month to month and was having genuine results.

I therefore congratulate manufacturing milk producers who looked after their business. It proves that if they are alert and we as members of Parliament take our responsibilities, it is possible to provide a fairer policy for the farmers. We should say it out loud as we do when we criticize the government.

I wish to commend the important work performed by the Canadian Dairy Commission, which should be better known not only to hon. members but also to manufacturing milk producers.

In conclusion, I add that we shall have to be careful in the future not to disorganize our industry and be consequently obliged to import dairy products. We will have to keep a close eye on the situation so as to avoid the opposite extreme.

[Mr. Gleave.]

That is what I wanted to say after the minister's statement which I consider good news.

GRAIN

Question No. 1,598—Mr. Yewchuk:

1. What consideration is being given by the government to the Canada Grain Council reports that (a) in country after country Canada is unknown as an exporter of feed grains (b) more effective selling systems must be developed (c) government should finance market research (d) government should offer grants to help establish feed mill facilities in the Caribbean to promote Canadian feed grain sales?

2. What consideration is given by the Canadian Wheat Board to the Canada Grain Council which reported that (a) present barley varieties will not compete in the feed grain market (b) many countries are not familiar with barley (c) many countries do not want feed barley the way it is now graded?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister Responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board): Part 1: In October, 1970, the Government's Prairie Grains Policy Proposals stressed the aggressive development of new grain markets as one of the prime areas requiring new and intensive attention by the grain industry and government. In this context, consideration has, of course, been given by the government to the feed grain mission reports of the Canada Grains Council which were published in March, 1971. To assist in giving new emphasis in this area, the government is making available substantial amounts from a fund which will eventually have up to $10 million annually for the support of specific market development projects undertaken in co-operation with the Canadian Wheat Board and industry. Funds can be used for projects to enlarge and assist in maintaining existing domestic and export markets for food and feed and also on activities for developing new products and uses for our grain. The market development approach includes provision for supporting Canadian industry investment in grain transportation, storage, handling and processing (milling, crushing, feed grinding, baking) facilities abroad.

The Canadian Wheat Board appointed in July, 1970, a Committee of internationally recognized grain marketing specialists to evaluate Canada's system of selling grain under changing world conditions and to report back to the Board. The Board has made a careful study of the Committee's recommendations and action has been taken with regard to a number of the recommendations. The Board is very much aware that to develop and maintain a systematic approach to selling Canadian grain, improvements and modifications must continously be made to our existing selling system to adapt the system to the product, the customer and changes in the market situation. This is illustrated by the record 172 million bushels of Canadian barley exported in 1970-71. A concentrated market development effort must be maintained in feed grain markets. In this respect, the development of an integrated feed grain marketing program is in progress at both the Governmental and Canadian Wheat Board level.

Developing our product and services to a point where buyers have a strong preference for them is not easy and cannot be done overnight. A long term plan is being adopted and will be pursued with persistence and adequate resources. However, since Canadian resources are not unlimited, the first and immediate priority in our overall plan must be given to our major feed grain markets and the designing of market programs specifically tailored for each. In the short term, feed grain import markets of highly developed countries, in which all classes of livestock are fed on a variety of coarse grain rations, depending on the area in question, must receive priority attention. Feed grain import markets in some developing countries, particularly those in which livestock is fed on corn and sorghum-based rations, must initially form part of our long range program, where the thrust will be primarily on educating feeders to develop a preference for Canadian feed grains.

Part 2: Reports of the Canada Grains Council are received by the Canadian Wheat Board as they are by many other agencies in the grain trade. They are of course reviewed and considered in the light of all the marketing knowledge gained directly by the Board through its own extensive efforts and from a variety of other sources. It must be remembered that the same Canada Grain Council Mission reports which draw attention to certain possible export markets for feed grains in Central and South America and the Caribbean, also indicate that the quantities involved were relatively small. It must also be indicate that the quantities involved were relatively small. It must also be remembered that sources of supply in close proximity to these markets were able to satisfy these markets at prices reflecting the geographic advantage of the supplier. It is recognized that there is a need to constantly review and improve barley varieties, our grading system and our promotional efforts. However, the fact that Canada was the world's largest exporter of barley in 1970-71, is an indication that the characteristics of Canadian barley are well known and appreciated in major world barley markets.

AIR CANADA—PAYMENT OF CAPITAL EQUIPMENT FROM CONSOLIDATED REVENUE FUND

Question No. 1,643—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. What purchases of capital equipment were made for Air Canada from the Consolidated Revenue Fund for the fiscal years 1968-69, 1969-70 and 1970-71?

2. What were the individual and total amounts of these purchases?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Management of Air Canada advises as follows: 1 and 2. Pursuant to the annual Canadian National Railways Financing and Guarantee Acts the Minister of Finance upon application of Air Canada approved by the Minister of Transport, may with the approval of the Governor in Council make loans to Air Canada out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund during specifically designated periods of time for the purpose of enabling Air Canada to discharge obligations that have become due and payable during said periods. As such borrowings are combined with the Corporations self generated funds to meet expenditures included in its approved capital budgets it is not possible to determine what portions of the loans are used for specific items of equipment. Page 20 of the Air Canada Annual Report for 1970 gives a statement of the source and application of funds. Similar statements may be found on Page 18 of the 1969 Annual Report and Page 19 of the 1968 Annual Report.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—RETIREMENT AGE OF EMPLOYEES

Question No. 1,645—Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

1. At what age does the Canadian Wheat Board retire its employees?

2. Is there any difference in the retirement age for men and women and, if so, what is the retirement age in each case?

3. Is there a stated reason for any such difference and, if so, what is it?

4. Is consideration being given to establishing one retirement age for all Canadian Wheat Board employees?

[Translation]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. Age 65 for males. Age 60 for females.

2. Answered by 1 above.

3. No stated reason. Plan instituted in 1948 at a time when such distinction was common in many retirement plans.

4. Yes.

CNR—STATUS OF EMPLOYEES IN P.E.I. AS A RESULT OF ESTABLISHMENT OF SERVOCENTRE, CHARLOTTETOWN

Question No. 1,666—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. How many CNR employees have lost or will lose their employment with the CNR in Prince Edward Island as a result of the pending establishment of the Charlottetown Servocentre of the Canadian National Railways?

2. How many of the former employees have been assigned positions in Prince Edward Island?

3. What is the employment status of other employees?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: 1. The setting up of the Servocentre has resulted in the creation of fifteen new jobs in Prince Edward Island. At the same time however CN has applied for permission to remove agents from seventeen stations which become redundant with the setting up of the Servocentre.

2. Of the fifteen being created, seven are being or will be filled from the ranks of agents on the Island. The other jobs are claimed by members of another union. All jobs in the new Servocentre are being filled by employees already on the Island.

3. All employees affected by the closure of agencies will be able to use their seniority to bid for other jobs in the Maritime and Chaleur Areas. An analysis of attrition and manpower requirements for remaining agencies in the Atlantic Region indicates that no agent with more than six years service or older than 26 will have to seek employment outside his particular line of work in the company. Only one agent in the stations affected falls into this category. The company has a manpower planning program to ensure that every effort is made to ensure that any agents who cannot find employment in their own line of work as a result of closures are given opportunities to fill other jobs in the company for which they are qualified. For example a number of the supervisory and management positions opening up as a result of the setting up of Servocentres have been filled by former agents.

GRAIN—COST OF MOBILE DISPLAY UNIT ILLUSTRATING GOVERNMENT POLICY

Question No. 1,683—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. What was the cost of the mobile display unit illustrating government policy in the grains industry, which covered the western fair circuit?

2. What was the total amount allocated to this project?

3. How many people were employed in this project and what were their salaries?

4. What was the total amount allocated for radio, newspaper, television and other display aids spent to date on this programme?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): 1. The cost of the mobile display unit was $23,548.46.

2. $40,000.

3. Two people were employed. Their salaries totaled $4,921.80.

4. The total amount allocated and spent on radio, newspapers, television and display aids with regard to the mobile display unit was $5,106.

SCIENTIFIC AND TECHNOLOGICAL AGREEMENTS

Question No. 1,759—Mr. MacLean:

1. With what countries has Canada scientific and technological agreements similar to those signed with West Germany, Belgium and the USSR?

2. Are similar agreements being negotiated with any other countries at the present time?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. None.

2. No.

WHEAT—BASIS FOR REFUSAL TO MAKE PAYMENTS UNDER TEMPORARY WHEAT RESERVES ACT

Question No. 1,789—Mr. Burton:

What is the authority or basis on which the government acted in not making certain payments to the Canadian Wheat Board under the terms of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act since August 1, 1970?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the government has made payments to the Canadian Wheat Board in accordance with the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act.

WATERLOO-OXFORD HIGH SCHOOL GLEE CLUB PARTICIPATION IN 1971 FESTIVAL, GERMANY

Question, No. 1,792—Mr. Nesbitt:

1. Did the Waterloo-Oxford High School Glee Club request financial assistance from any federal department or agency in order to take part in the Festival competition in Germany during the summer of 1971 and, if so, was any such financial assistance given to this Organization?

2. Were arrangements made for this Organization to perform at the Canadian Air Force Base in the Black Forest and, if so, what were the details of the arrangements?

3. Was the scheduled performance at the Air Base cancelled and, if so, for what reason?

4. Was a letter sent to the group by the Minister of Citizenship (Mr. Stanbury) congratulating the group and indicating how pleased the government was to lend financial support to their tour of Germany?

5. Are arrangements being made to provide any financial support to this group?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of Secretary of State and the Department of National Defence as follows: 1. (a) The Waterloo-Oxford High School Glee Club did request financial assistance from the Citizenship Development Branch of the Secretary of State. (b) No.

2. No.

3. Not applicable.

4. Yes, since the group received financial assistance from the Trans-Canada German Alliance which had received a grant from the Citizenship Development Branch of the Secretary of State to cover a portion of the transportation costs involved for groups participating, in this organization's German programs.

5. No.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—FEDERAL EXPENDITURES FOR HEALTH SCIENCES TEACHING FACILITIES

Question No. 1,812—Mr. Orlikow:

In the past year, what were the federal expenditures on the planning, building and equipping of health sciences teaching facilities for each of the following (a) Hospital Construction Grants (b) National Health Grants (c) General Public Health Grants (d) National Research Council (e) Medical Research Council (f) Health Resources Fund (g) others?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of National Health and Welfare and National Research Council as follows: (a) Nil; (b) nil; (c) nil; (d) nil; (e) nil; (f) 37,500,000; (g) nil.

PROJECTS APPROVED BY OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM

Question No. 1,828—Mr. Yewchuk:

How many projects which have been approved by the Opportunities for Youth Program (a) have terminated with the return of students to their studies (b) will be continued next summer (c) will continue on a permanent yearly basis?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): 1. (a) All projects which have been approved by the Opportunities for Youth Programme have terminated as of September 30, 1971; (b) If projects wish to continue under Opportunities for Youth, they would need to reapply next summer, if the program is continued; (c) Since Opportunities for Youth is strictly a summer programme, projects cannot continue on a permanent yearly basis. However, some projects have fulfilled a real need in the communities in which they were situated and the communities have felt that the services provided would really be missed. Therefore, attempts are being made by Opportunities for Youth to encourage other departments to fund projects which fall under their area of concern.

MANPOWER TRAINING COURSES

Question No. 1,915—Mr. Latulippe:

1. How many people took Manpower Training courses between August 1, 1970 and September 1, 1971?

2. How many of these were unemployed when the courses began?

[Translation]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. Between August 1, 1970 and September 1, 1971, 352,216 adults received training under the Canada Manpower Training Program. Of these 102,968 were enrolled in part-time courses or training-in-industry programs.

2. Of the remaining 249,248 between 50 and 55 per cent (124,600-137,000) may have been unemployed at the time of referral. (Estimates based on prior year's pattern. Actual figures not yet available.)

REPRESENTATIONS RELATIVE TO FOOD PRICE WARS

Question No. 1,920—Mr. MacDonald (Egmont):

What meetings, if any, took place between the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and representatives of the major food chains relative to food price wars over the past year and when and where did these meetings take place?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): None.

INCREASED AMERICAN TARIFFS—DISCUSSIONS REGARDING POTATO MARKETS

Question No. 1,925—Mr. MacDonald (Egmont):

What discussions, if any, have taken place between the Minister of Agriculture and representatives of the Canadian Horticultural Council regarding potato markets support in face of increased American tariffs?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): The Minister of Agriculture met with representatives of the Canadian Horticultural Council on September 27, 1971 to discuss the effects of the United States surtax on potatoes and other horticultural crops.

MARITIME COMMAND—CHRISTENING AND COMMISSIONING CEREMONIES FOR THE "IROQUOIS" AND THE "HURON"

Question No. 1,952—Mr. Forrestall:

Has the government and the Department of National Defence or the Department of Supply and Services given consideration to having the current tribal leaders perform the christening and commissioning ceremonies for the two remaining DDH-280 destroyers, the Iroquois and the Huron and, if not, for what reason?

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Traditionally, sponsors who perform the christening and commissioning ceremonies for naval ships, are the wives of principals in government or industry involved in the building and operation of the ships in question. Insofar as Iroquois and Huron are concerned the same principle will apply; however, consideration is being given to inviting the tribal leaders to be present at the ceremonies.

NATIONAL DEFENCE PUBLICATION "DEFENCE QUARTERLY"

Question No. 1,953—Mr. Forrestall:

With respect to the recent publication entitled "Defence Quarterly", a publication designed to provide a forum for the free expression of opinion with respect to defence matters, and edited by Mr. John Gellner, has the Minister of National Defence authorized the Chief of Defence Staff to indicate to serving forces personnel their right to contribute to this form of opinion without prejudice and, if not, for what reason?

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Q.R. & O. Article 19.36 deals with disclosure of Information or Opinion by members of the Canadian Forces. The Chief of the Defence Staff has made it known that he encourages members of the Forces to contribute articles on various aspects of their profession to the Defence Quarterly and other military journals, within the guidelines laid down by the Queen's Regulations.

CANADIAN FORCES RESERVES—AGE FOR ENROLMENT OF OFFICERS

Question No. 1,962—Mr. Robinson:

Will the proposed age limit of thirty-five for commissioning in the primary reserve component of the Canadian Forces apply to the arms as well as the services?

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): No, the age for enrolment of officers in the Combat Arms for the Primary Reserve is between 18 and 25 years of age; however, in special circumstances, Mobile Command may authorize enrolment of an applicant up to 29 years of age. An ex-officer of the Canadian Forces may be considered regardless of age provided he would have five years remaining prior to reaching compulsory retirement age in the Primary Reserve.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO INDIAN ORGANIZATIONS

Question No. 1,402—Mr. Yewchuk:

1. During the past five years, which Indian organizations (a) received (b) were refused funds from the government for purposes of office and administrative costs?

2. Which Indian organizations closed their offices, within the past year, because of insufficient funds for office and administrative costs?

Return tabled.

Motions for Papers

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—CANCELLATION OF PROJECTS

Question No. 1,635—Mr. Coates:

1. How many projects of the Opportunities for Youth Program that were initially approved were cancelled by the government?

2. In each instance (a) what was the project (b) what was the financial obligation of the government (c) what proportion of the funds were used (d) how many persons were involved in the project (e) what was the reason for cancellation (f) has any action been taken by the government for recovery of the funds expended?

3. (a) How many projects were abandoned by the initiators (b) what was the project in each instance (c) how many persons were involved (d) how much money was involved (e) how much was used (f) has any action been taken to recover the monies used?

Return tabled.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, before dealing with notices of motions may I comment on one. The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg) asked last week for some information concerning notice of motion No. 75 standing in his name. I understand the hon. member has received a good many of the reports referred to in this motion and I hope we will be able shortly to provide him with the balance.

Notice of motion for the production of papers No. 245 is acceptable to the government subject to the usual reservations concerning confidential documents and the authorization of the government authorities concerned.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the conditions mentioned by the Parliamentary Secretary, is it the pleasure of the House that notice of motion No. 245 be deemed to have been adopted?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

MATERIAL SENT TO RAPESEED PRODUCERS CONCERNING DESTRUCTION OF MOTHS AND ARMY WORMS

Motion No. 245—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all research and educational material sent to rapeseed producers and the Governments of the Prairie Provinces concerning the method and timing to destroy the moth and/or the army worm.

Motion agreed to.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, may I ask that the remaining notices of motions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining notices of motions stand?

[Mr. Yewchuk.]

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might have your indulgence for a moment to raise a question with regard to notice of motion No. 247, which admittedly is dated September 9 and is not of great vintage but relates to the import of goods into Canada in a certain part of northern British Columbia contrary to the customs regulations. There is urgency because the people of the community concerned are attempting to develop a brief for presentation to the government and this information is most necessary in the preparation of that brief. Would the parliamentary secretary look at the matter from that point of view to see whether or not a response can be given next week?

Mr. Jerome: I would be only too glad to do that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining motions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—INTRODUCTION OF NEW DEVELOPMENT POLICIES AND GOALS IN LIGHT OF CRITICISMS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In light of the statement made by the Minister of Transport to the recent meeting of the Nova Scotia Liberal Association to the effect that DREE areas need stronger goals to guide their development, and in light of similar criticisms by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, the Atlantic Development Council, the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council and the Canadian Council on Rural Development, is the minister now prepared to act on the advice of these agencies and announce more coherent development policies and goals for DREE in the immediate future?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I read a statement by the administrator of the city of Saint John, New Brunswick, praising the department and saying it is the best thing that has happened to the maritimes since confederation.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister if he is now prepared to answer my question, which is very important, because apparently he does not share the views of the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN SPEAKER'S GALLERY OF PRESIDENT OF SOCIALIST FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF YUGOSLAVIA

Mr. Speaker: I should like to draw the attention of hon. members to the presence in the Speaker's gallery of a very distinguished official guest of Canada, the President of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, His Excellency, Josip Broz Tito.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: President Tito, as hon. members know, is making his first official visit to Canada. On behalf of all members of this House may I say, Sir, that we welcome you and the members of your party most cordially to our nation's Parliament. We trust that your visit with us and the discussions that you will have here on topics of mutual interest will further enhance the already friendly relations between our two countries. We sincerely hope, Mr. President, that your stay in Ottawa and in the other cities that you will soon be visiting, will be both enjoyable and fruitful, and that you will take back with you impressions and memories of the respect and good will, and of the most cordial welcome of all Canadians.

[Translation]

May I add, Mr. President, that we have a grateful recollection of the hospitality you showed a delegation of Canadian parliamentarians on a visit to Yugoslavia in the spring of 1970. My colleagues are eager to greet in Canada a delegation of Yugoslav parliamentarians.

Again, Mr. President, on behalf of the House of Commons, I cordially welcome you and your wife to Canada.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—INTRODUCTION OF NEW DEVELOPMENT POLICIES AND GOALS IN LIGHT OF CRITICISMS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, in view of the very proper interruption I wonder whether I might repeat the question since I did not get an answer to it. I should like to ask the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion whether, in light of the statement made by the Minister of Transport to the annual meeting of the Nova Scotia Liberal Association to the effect that—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think it is necessary for the hon. member to repeat the whole question. Even if he received no answer, I am sure the minister heard the question. The hon. member might invite the minister to reply, but it should not be necessary for him to repeat the question in all its details.

Mr. McGrath: May I then ask the minister whether he shares the view of the Minister of Transport to the effect that DREE areas need stronger goals to guide their development, similar views having been expressed by all agencies which are charged by Parliament with giving the minister advice?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, like the Minister of Transport, I feel that still more funds should be available for regional development, even if, during the past two years, we have tripled our expenditures, mainly in the Maritimes.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: May I try to ask the minister another question. In view of the criticisms coming from all sides to the effect that the minister's department is too heavily involved in infrastructure expenditures, is it his intention to review the expenditures of his department to see if this is so?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the Premier of New Brunswick, the hon. Richard Hatfield, made a proposal to me with regard to the renewal of the agreement, and 40 per cent of the funds provided for infrastructure were included in that proposal.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is obviously debate and I would hope we would not pursue the discussion on this basis. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East on a supplementary question.

DEVELOPMENT OF INFRASTRUCTURE FOR CREATION OF MAJOR MARKETING CENTRE IN HALIFAX-DARTMOUTH AREA

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): This is not a point of debate, Mr. Speaker, but legitimate questioning. I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. It also arises out of his colleague's statement during the weekend in Halifax. Can the minister say whether or not, in light of the unusual delay in getting on with the infrastructure development for what the minister described as the necessity of developing a major marketing complex in the Atlantic provinces, he is now prepared to heed the advice of his colleague and overcome the difficulties that seem to be standing in the way of the development of the infrastructure for the creation of a major marketing centre in the Halifax-Dartmouth area?

• (2:30 p.m.)

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I regret, but not one of the governments of the Atlantic provinces has claimed that we were spending too much on infrastructure. On the contrary, they all asked that we spend more.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East for a last supplementary question on this point and return to the subject in a short while after we have had the first round of questions.

Mr. Forrestall: My question to the minister is whether or not his department, he himself and the government recognize the principle enunciated by his colleague that the Atlantic area needs a major marketing centre, and is he prepared to accept that principle and do something about it?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, we are bringing considerable attention to this problem.

INCOME TAX

POSSIBLE ADDITIONAL BURDEN ON TAXPAYERS BECAUSE OF INCREASE IN CEILING ON FEDERAL REVENUE GUARANTEE TO PROVINCES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In the absence of the Minister of Finance may I direct my question to his parliamentary secretary who has shown himself very knowledgeable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But without any heart.

Mr. Douglas: My question arises out of the announcement by the Minister of Finance yesterday that part of the provincial income tax levied by the provinces is to be raised with the consent of the federal government from 30 per cent to 30.5 per cent. Since this is an incremental tax rather than an abatement, may I ask the parliamentary secretary how many millions of dollars this will add to the total tax burden being paid by personal income taxpayers?

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest, with respect to the hon. member, that the question he has asked seeks statistical information and I wonder whether in those terms it is acceptable. If the parliamentary secretary could reply briefly without referring to statistical information the question might be allowed.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member misunderstands the significance of the 30.5 figure. That is the ceiling of provincial taxes that the federal government would permit if its revenue guarantee is to be effective to the provinces. What levy the provinces themselves establish, what percentage of federal tax they establish as their provincial tax, is a matter that is entirely within the discretion of their own legislatures. This is merely a ceiling after which, if they exceed that figure, the federal government would not offer the revenue guarantee.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, I recognize that this increase is within the area which the federal government is allowing and that there are additional amounts over which the federal government has no control. However, in view of the fact this half of one per cent increase will not reduce the amount which the federal government will be collecting and is not a tax abatement, what additional burden will be added to the personal income taxpayers of this country? May I point out that the government surely must have made an estimate of this before it made this offer to the provinces.

Mr. Mahoney: That figure of course could not be given until we know what the ten provincial legislatures determine what their provincial tax rates will be.

NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING MINING EXPLORATION PROGRAM IN NORTHWESTERN QUEBEC

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Could he say whether negotiations are going on between the federal and Quebec governments, concerning the establishment of a mining exploration program in northwestern Quebec, under the ARDA program and, in the affirmative, can we expect that an agreement will soon be reached?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I can inquire so as to be able to give the latest news on this subject to the hon. member, and I could perhaps give him an answer tomorrow or Friday.

[English]

EVALUATIONS OF PROGRAMS IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES—INTRODUCTION OF NEW PLAN

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion a supplementary question. The eighth annual review of the Economic Council of Canada made a specific recommendation that his department should undertake program evaluations of all its programs in Quebec and specifically in the Atlantic region. Have these evaluations been carried out and, if so, when will they be made public?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I think that those programs are constantly reviewed. We do not intend to present a general report to the House, but since those programs have been in effect for a few years, it would undoubtedly be interesting to report to the House in order that a general debate may be held on the matter.

[English]

Mr. Lundrigan: In view of the fact there has been no appreciable change in the unemployment rate in the Atlantic area compared with the rest of the country—in fact, it has gone up—is the government prepared to accept the recommendation of the Atlantic Development Council that there be instituted a new plan or a new development strategy for regional development in the Atlantic region?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I cannot answer that question, Mr. Speaker, for the simple reason that the hon. member's premises are wrong and that the unemployment rate in the Maritimes in comparison with the total rate has declined since the establishment of the department.

[English]

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This, of course, is debate. The hon. member for Egmont has been seeking the floor on a supplementary and the Chair will recognize him and then the hon. member for Edmonton West.

Mr. McGrath: The minister should resign. Let somebody else get on with the job.

Mr. MacInnis: On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond rises on a point of order.

Mr. MacInnis: My point of order arises from the fact that the Chair fails to draw to the attention of members of the cabinet, on occasions when they express opinions instead of giving answers to questions, that they are out of order. It is time the government was prevented from expressing opinions that are not in accordance with the facts.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has just done this on behalf of the Chair and I am grateful to him. The hon. member for Edmonton West.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. We have raised some very serious questions which the minister, in his characteristic way, refused to answer. More specifically I would like to know, and I think the House is entitled to know, which policy prevails within the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. Is it the policy expounded in Halifax last week by the Minister of Transport, which appears to be a departure, or is it the policy persistently followed in this House by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows that this is a debate. It has nothing to do with a point of order. The Chair has already recognized the hon. member for Edmonton West.

FINANCE

RENEGOTIATION OF FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FINANCIAL AGREEMENTS AT FIRST MINISTERS' CONFERENCE OR LATER MEETING

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In light of the very numerous and strong representations made by the provincial Ministers of Finance regarding fundamental points in the dominion-provincial financial accords which end on March 31, 1972 with respect to changes in the stabilization formula, the equalization formula, and the tax credit system, would the Prime Minister tell the House if consideration is being given to extending both the agenda and the time of the first ministers' conference two weeks hence to take in these matters, or will these subjects be carried forward to some future conference on the eve of the renewing of these agreements in March next year?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the plan would be for the Ministers of Finance and provincial treasurers to report to the first ministers' conference, and at that conference we would attempt to reach a solution acceptable to everyone. If we found we did not have enough time in the three days set aside for the first ministers' conference, then it might be necessary to have a further meeting of Ministers of Finance, say in December. We have not planned such a further meeting because we are hopeful progress will be made at the first ministers' conference. But the eventualities may cause one.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): In light of the very fundamental nature of these representations which go to the heart of the federal-provincial financial accords, would the Prime Minister agree that a conference of first ministers would be necessary at the earliest possible moment in order to take up these matters so that we can get a sensible agreement in March, or are we to be faced with a fait accompli?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I would certainly agree with that. That is why we are going to be discussing those subjects, based on the reports from the finance ministers, when we meet 13 days from now.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING JAIL SENTENCE IMPOSED ON ANGLICAN DEAN OF JOHANNESBURG

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Yesterday the Prime Minister, in answer to a question from me, said he would pass it on to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Will the minister express to the government of South Africa the concern of the Canadian people at the sentence of five years' imprisonment imposed on the Anglican Dean of Johannesburg for activities that amounted to political opposition to the system of apartheid, for which the United Nations and this country have frequently expressed their abhorrence?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I share the abhorrence of the hon. member, as I am sure do all members of the House, to apartheid in South Africa. However, I should point out to the hon. member that the very reverend gentleman is now free on bail awaiting the result of an appeal against his sentence, and I do not think it would be quite proper at this time for me to express a view such as that which he has asked me to express. I can assure him, however, that the views expressed by the Canadian government in general are exactly the same as his own. The sooner apartheid ends in South Africa the better the world will be.

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question.

Can the Secretary of State for External Affairs tell us why the Dean of the Anglican Church in Johannesburg was condemned and why the reasons my hon. colleague gave are totally contrary to the facts submitted before the court in Johannesburg?

Mr. Speaker: I believe the hon. member for Sainte-Marie wishes to put a supplementary to the previous question.

FINANCE

POSSIBLE MODIFICATION OF FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS WITH PROVINCES

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the one put by my colleague to the Right Honourable Prime Minister about the tax basis sharing between the provinces.

Does the Right Honourable Prime Minister intend to amend the tax basis sharing arrangement during the present session or are these measures contemplated for the next session only?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the present arrangements will expire next spring. However, it is anticipated that new arrangements will be entered into between the provinces and the federal government before the expiration date. The government will report to the House in due course.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister for further details. Is his answer to be construed as to mean that the provinces simply cannot hope that the tax basis sharing will be changed before 1972 or 1973?

• (2:40 p.m.)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, since the present agreements will only come to an end in several months hence, we are certainly not contemplating the unilateral termination of those agreements before they run out.

HEALTH

RECONSIDERATION OF CANCELLATION OF RESEARCH GRANT TO NATIONAL CANCER INSTITUTE

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the minister's loudly and frequently announced concern about cancer and its relationship to tobacco, will he reconsider his decision to cut off federal grants for cancer research through the National Cancer Institute?

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, for many years we have supported the institute of which the hon. member speaks and we are prepared to discuss their budget with them again. I would advise, though, that much federal money goes into cancer research of one kind or another, most of it through the Medical Research Council.

DISCUSSIONS WITH TOBACCO INDUSTRY ON TERMINATION DATE FOR CIGARETTE ADVERTISING

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): My supplementary question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Can the minister indicate the status and, hopefully, the progress of the talks which I understand are going on between representatives of his department and the tobacco industry in regard to the termination date for all cigarette advertising?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, there are technical discussions going on almost continuously between the department and the tobacco interests, but as far as the termination date is concerned we know nothing more than what the tobacco manufacturers themselves have said. They have publicly announced that, in terms of broadcasting, their termination date is the end of this year.

Mr. Mather: Is it not a fact that the meetings that are taking place are seeking to establish a target date for the termination of all cigarette advertising?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's supplementary is in the form of argument.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF AGENDA FOR MEETING OF FIRST MINISTERS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

Considering that the prime ministers are going to meet in a few days' time, I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether the program of that meeting has been decided upon, and whether it will be made public before the opening of the conference. Also, in view of the concern expressed by some provinces about implementation of the new tax system, will this issue be discussed with the prime ministers?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I followed the usual procedure of submitting to provincial premiers, two or three weeks ago, a draft program based on the issues that the provinces and ourselves feel should be discussed. Again according to established procedure, the first thing that the conference will do will be to agree to that program or amend it—and only then will the program be made public.

However, as I said earlier when I answered a question from a member of the Social Credit party, I think, and another one from the Progressive Conservative member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Valade), it is the intention of the government to discuss the tax sharing arrangements if the provinces so wish.

HEALTH

SHORTAGE OF CANADIAN-TRAINED MEDICAL DOCTORS AND PERSONNEL—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON GOVERNMENT PROPOSALS

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Recognizing the great fear and anxiety in the hearts of the Canadian people over the acute shortage of doctors and the great uncertainty of any action being taken to prevent further deterioration, would the minister be prepared to make a statement in the House in the very near future outlining proposals to combat the shortage of doctors and Canadian-trained medical personnel?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I have made many statements on the very meritorious actions, I think, taken by the government in this area. I am sure the hon. member has copies of those statements.

Mr. Rynard: The other day the minister stated certain facts regarding what he was doing. Many members of the House have asked me what is really going on behind the scenes. I am only asking him to make a statement to the House on what the proposals are.

An hon. Member: What do you have to hide?

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, to answer the hon. member, in reply to his question last week, I indicated our view of the matter and what is being done about it.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

AMCHITKA NUCLEAR TEST—CANADIAN GOVERNMENT ACTION TO MONITOR RADIOACTIVE FALLOUT

Mr. Robert Borrie (Prince George-Peace River): My question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. In view of the great public concern about the dangers of radioactivity along with other effects from the United States atom bomb test at Amchitka, would the minister advise what steps are being taken by the government to monitor radioactive fallout?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that this question was asked and answered yesterday. If there was some aspect of the matter that was overlooked, the minister might be allowed to reply briefly.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, we have sent a research aircraft up to Alaska where I understand it will be accorded the same privileges as United States research aircraft in monitoring the blast later this week.

AMCHITKA NUCLEAR TEST—DECLARATION BY UNITED STATES OF 50-MILE CONTROL ZONE

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I gave his parliamentary secretary notice of the question, although it was short notice. Has the United States unilaterally declared a control zone in the vicinity of the Amchitka nuclear test which would alter the established three-mile limit and, if so, what is its radius and does such control zone have the effect of inhibiting the usual right of innocent passage on the high seas?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that the United States has proclaimed a control zone in which there may be danger some 50 miles around the island of Amchitka. It has also restricted the right of innocent passage even within the three-mile territorial seas of the United States. This, I understand, is the factual situation, Mr. Speaker. Whether it does contravene the established law of the seas I do not know but my offhand opinion is that it does.

AMCHITKA NUCLEAR TEST—SIGNING BY PRIME MINISTER OF MEMBERS' PROTEST TELEGRAM

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Since the Prime Minister has frequently suggested to the House that the best way for us as members to express our opposition to the test at Amchitka is through some form of united action, can he inform the House whether his signature will be among those of the other members of the House on the telegram going to the United States protesting this test?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should point out that the best form of collective action by this House is the resolution adopted by the House. I remind the hon. member that the resolution was introduced by the government and therefore it had our support and my personal support. I was present at the time of the vote, which I regret to say is not true of the leaders of the other parties.

PROPOSED ATMOSPHERE NUCLEAR TESTS BY FRANCE—CANADIAN GOVERNMENT PROTEST

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In light of the announcement that atmosphere nuclear tests will be conducted by France, is the government going to protest formally and immediately against these tests?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should inform the hon. gentleman that the resolution to which the Prime Minister has referred was presented to the French foreign ministry as soon as it was approved by this House. It expressed our general view about nuclear tests and if the French government does intend to proceed with a test we shall make our views known at that time.

Mr. Baldwin: Before or after?

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF 50-MILE CONTROL ZONE OFF EAST COAST OF CANADA TO CONSERVE FISHERY RESOURCES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the action of the United States in establishing a 50-mile so-called control zone, is the minister prepared to take similar action and establish a 50-mile control zone off the east coast of Canada to protect our continental shelf and conserve our fisheries?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think we have taken greater and more effective action than any other country in the world in extending—

Some hon. Members: Where?

• (2:50 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are a number of hon. members seeking an opportunity to ask questions. Perhaps we might allow the hon. member for Skeena one last supplementary on this important matter and then continue with the next subject.

AMCHITKA NUCLEAR TEST—GOVERNMENT ACTION AT UNITED NATIONS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I have a supplementary for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Inasmuch as the minister agrees it is more important to stop the bomb than it is to monitor the potential danger after the blast, what action has he or the government taken with regard to keeping this matter alive at the United Nations, either in the General Assembly or the Security Council, and what support have we from other member nations of that body?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think it is fair to say that Canada has taken the lead of all countries in protesting the Amchitka test.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: We have made our views known in the United Nations and to the United States government. I am very happy to see that Canadians generally are supporting the Canadian government in the views it has expressed. I only hope the advice will be taken that support is not expressed in ways that are counter-productive.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): A supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will appreciate we should go on to another subject. If there is time at the end of the question period we will return to the hon. member who might have a supplementary.

POSSIBLE ESTABLISHMENT OF HEAVY WATER PLANT AT MONTMAGNY—DISCUSSION WITH QUEBEC PREMIER

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Could he tell the House whether he had talks or an exchange of letters with the Premier of Quebec about the building of a heavy water plant at Montmagny?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mo, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Can the minister tell us whether he has had discussions or any contacts with a company or corporation planning to build a heavy water plant in Montmagny and to this end soliciting a grant from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): No, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL PARKS

ESTABLISHMENT OF THIRD PARK IN NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Can the minister inform the House when we may expect the long anticipated announcement about the exact location of a third national park in Nova Scotia and, specifically, whether this announcement may be timed to coincide with the upcoming Nova Scotia by-elections?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have two objections to the question asked. I have an objection to the question and to the supplementary. In a general way I suggest to hon. members that I doubt whether it is in order to ask questions about national parks. I know these are very important and questions are asked every day. I think that often these questions ought normally to be asked in writing rather than during the question period. If there is urgency, they can be considered at the time of adjournment. In the case of the hon. member, if it is a matter of urgency the question can be considered when we hear the questions which have been delayed for the adjournment period.

PROPOSED GUARANTEED ANNUAL INCOME PILOT PROJECTS—PROVINCES EXPRESSING INTEREST

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): My question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Will the minister advise the House what progress is being made in consultation with the provinces with regard to pilot projects for a guaranteed annual income and what provinces have expressed interest in participating?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, to date the provinces that have expressed interest and I believe are taking action in mounting projects are Ontario and Manitoba.

POST OFFICE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON DESIRABILITY OF INSURING PARCELS

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): I have a question for the Postmaster General. I wish to welcome him back to the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Where were you?

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I have been trying to ask this question for the past three weeks and I have not been able to catch the Postmaster General in the House. In view of the large number of parcels lost by theft from post offices and post office boxes across Canada during the last Christmas season, especially parcels addressed to senior citizens, old age pensioners and others,—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: —for which no compensation was paid because the parcels were not insured, will the minister consider at this time—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should ask the question because he will again miss the Postmaster General.

Mr. Paproski: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am glad you support me. Will the minister consider at this time making a statement to the Canadian public impressing upon them the desirability of insuring all valuable parcels so that this will not occur again? Do it! Advertise it!

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, first of all, the hon. member's lecture on attendance is unwarranted as I believe myself to be one of those with the best attendance record here.

I was in the House yesterday and I could also have wondered about his attendance. Last week I attended the Postmasters Conference in Regina and that is perhaps one of the only days I was not in the House.

Regarding the hon. member's question, I did not quite understand it and he might perhaps repeat it.

[English]

Mr. Paproski: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I consider this to be a very important matter. About six or seven months ago I asked the Postmaster General to look into some serious thefts in the Ottawa area in the constituency of the Minister of Justice which he could not look into—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: I asked him to look into the matter, Sir. On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I appreciate that the hon. member may want to reiterate the question he has asked. I am sure that all hon. members, including the minister, appreciate that the matter is serious. Perhaps the minister might be allowed to reply or indicate whether a reply will be given later. There is not much point in raising the matter again on a point of order because we will be running short of time very soon.

[Translation]

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I do not know yet whether I am being asked a question or if a suggestion is being made to me. If the hon. member suggests that I use every means available so that there will not be so many thefts at Christmas, I will answer that, every day, we try to take all necessary measures to ensure delivery of all parcels.

As for next Christmas, we have advised all postmasters to make doubly sure, when they hire additional staff for delivery of parcels, that these people are honest.

[English]

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): On a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Minister of Justice is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I just want to assure the House that I was doing very well with the Postmaster General until the hon. member got into it.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which has been aired in the House on several occasions. I draw Your Honour's attention to the fact there is a qualification attached to all questions asked in the House, namely, that they must be urgent and national in nature. I say that the urgency of questions has been completely destroyed by the roster system imposed on the House by the Prime Minister. It rules out the element of urgency. We must either change the rules applied to questions or the cabinet of this country must be responsible to every member of this House and be present to answer questions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. member for Prince Albert.

• (3:00 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Where is your leader?

Mr. Bell: Assiniboia. You will find out on Monday.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the right hon. member for Prince Albert. He will be recognized in a moment.

An hon. Member: Here is your real leader.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond seeks the floor on a further point of order or question of privilege.

Mr. MacInnis: The Prime Minister is asking where my leader is. He is in the west, serving the nation by eliminating the possibility of this government strengthening itself by electing another member.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: That is hardly a question of privilege. I think that at this point we should give the right hon. member for Prince Albert a chance to ask his question because we have come to the end of the question period.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, I would not want to bring up anything that would be provocative.

POSSIBLE RE-INTRODUCTION OF STABILIZATION BILL—RELATIONSHIP TO BY-ELECTION IN ASSINIBOIA

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether or not, following November 8, there will be introduced in the House a stabilization bill to take the place of the one which was withdrawn, and containing amendments such as were asked for by various farm organizations in western Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): That is certainly an interesting question coming from an important member of the official opposition party. We are glad to see that some hon. members opposite are at last converted to the stabilization formula. We hope they will convey the message to other members of the party and to their leader. Perhaps we can then discuss this matter and bring it up again in a future session.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That has become the stock answer, Mr. Speaker; I knew that would be the answer. It leads me to ask the Prime Minister whether or not the Minister of Manpower, speaking in Avonlea, Saskatchewan—a copy of his speech was made available to all of us—undertook that if Jim Hooker is elected—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hook comes a little later.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: —if Jim Hooker is elected he will get that stabilization bill into and through the House of Commons. Does this mean, if he was speaking as a member of the government, that the Prime Minister has given up all hope of that result in Assiniboia?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have reached the end of the question period but I think we might allow the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to ask a last question before we turn to the orders of the day.

PENSIONS

RESPONSE TO REPRESENTATIONS CONCERNING POSITION OF RETIRED CANADIAN NATIONAL AND CANADIAN PACIFIC EMPLOYEES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport? On September 8 and October 8 I asked the minister questions regarding the position of retired employees of the Canadian Pacific Railway and Canadian National Railways and he promised to make further representations to those two companies. Has he anything further to report at this time?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I made representations as I had undertaken to do. I regret to advise the hon. member that within the last few days I have received a letter from Canadian Pacific indicating that they are not prepared at this time to make any further changes in their pension program. Having received this reply, I know of no other course of action left open to me.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Has the minister received any reply from the Canadian National with respect to the matter I drew to his attention on October 8?

Mr. Jamieson: No, Mr. Speaker. To the best of my knowledge I have not received a reply from Canadian National on that matter.

I wonder if I might answer a question posed to me yesterday by the right hon. member for Prince Albert.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have pointed out to hon. members that the question period expired three or four minutes ago. The minister could, of course, reply with the consent of the House. Is this agreed?

Mr. McCleave: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, one of my hon. friends had a supplementary to ask in connection with the last question. I think that should be allowed before the minister is permitted to answer a question asked yesterday.

Mr. Speaker: In that case the Chair will call orders of the day.

Mr. Carter: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. For two days I have been trying to put a question to the Minister of Transport on a matter which affects the livelihood of a large number of people.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have made a note of this and I undertake to the hon. member to give him priority tomorrow. I hope the minister will be here to answer his question. Of course, with the consent of the House the hon. member could ask his question now.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Speaker: Again, there is not unanimous consent. I apologize to the hon. member and I undertake to give him priority tomorrow. Orders of the day.

Mr. Nesbitt: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I decided not to raise this point of order until the end of the question period because I did not wish to take up the time of the House during that period.

On October 7 I placed the following question on the order paper:

1. Was an application for summer employment by Mr. Ian Hayes of Vancouver made to the Public Service of Canada on or about March 15, 1971?

2. In response to this application was any reply ever sent to Mr. Hayes by the Public Service Commission of Canada?

3. If so, on what date was the reply sent?

4. What was the purpose of the reply?

Last Monday, the day before yesterday, I received the following reply. I will read the reply. The question appeared somewhat changed and altered compared with the question I placed on the order paper.

1. Was an application for summer employment by Mr. Ian Hayes of Vancouver made to the Public Service Commission on or about March 15, 1971?

Here is one of the changes:

2. In response to this application, was any reply ever sent to Mr. Hayes by the Public Service Commission and, if so, on what date was the reply sent?

3. What was the purport of the reply?

My first point of order, Mr. Speaker, is that the whole tenor, the whole meaning, of the question I placed on the order paper was changed when it appeared on the return. Now I come to the reply, which is as follows:

Answered by the Hon. Gerard Pelletier, Secretary of State of Canada.

I am informed by the Public Service Commission as follows:

1. Yes.

2. Yes. June 1971.

3. He was advised that it appeared unlikely that he would be offered employment.

Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand a letter sent to Mr. Ian Hayes and dated August 31, 1971. The letter reads as follows:

Dear Mr. Hayes,

Your application submitted to the Public Service Commission of Canada for summer employment has been reviewed.

Your interest in our program has been appreciated, but it now appears unlikely that you will be offered employment.

My second point of order is this: I very properly object to receiving completely wrong information in reply to written questions, and I hope the Secretary of State will carefully check into this matter with the Public Service Commission in an attempt to prevent unfortunate incidents such as this taking place in the future whereby the House is misled and minsinformed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is a slight procedural difficulty. Orders of the day have been called. However, perhaps with the consent of the House the hon. member for Peace River might speak. I appreciate that he is rising on a point of order concerning the business for this afternoon.

Mr. Baldwin: The point of order is that there has been a discussion with regard to the length of the speeches and, while no firm agreement has been reached, the general understanding is that the first speaker from each party might speak for 30 minutes and that thereafter speeches should be limited to 15 minutes. On our side these limits will be strictly adhered to. This is the suggestion I make to the House with the hope that hon. members will accept it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we agree to the times suggested, and we wholeheartedly support the proposition that no one ask for overtime.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed and so ordered?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—NON-CONFIDENCE MOTION—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO DEVELOP POLICIES TO ENSURE ECONOMIC INDEPENDENCE AND FULL EMPLOYMENT—DETERIORATION OF RELATIONS WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough) moved:

That this House, noting the continuing deterioration of communication on the basis of common interest and mutual respect between the government of Canada and the government of the United States, condemns the government for failing to employ and improve firm and constructive economic and political relations with the United States, and, at the same time, for failing to develop a new economic policy which would strengthen our economic independence and fully employ our growing and highly-skilled human resources.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the last time I led off an opposition day to debate matters dealing with the external relations of Canada was May 28, less than half a year ago. That debate was brought on by feelings of discomfort and anxiety on account of the government's actions, and more particularly and painfully by the injudicious utterances of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in the Soviet Union. Some of the same elements of concern are among the motivations for this motion and debate.

During the five months since, there have been some vast and at times perilous changes. Today the conduct of our foreign policy, especially our relationships with the United States, is far from being an intellectual exercise or a philosophic exchange. There are problems in the economic field that are of enormous gravity and very serious portent. Canada is not a great power, nor a super power. We are not, however, among the least nations in the world; not large enough to be feared, we are not so small as to be despised. We are not neophytes in diplomacy. We are a charter member of the United Nations, as we were a charter member of the League, and in large measure this country was the creator of the modern Commonwealth of Nations.

We have been activists in multitudinous international bodies and we do have a concern for the wider world. But for a host of reasons, some voluntary and some involuntary, our relations with the United States are the most vital, the most absorbing and of greatest concern and interest to all Canadian citizens. Indeed, it might be said that 90 per cent of our foreign policy concerns our relations with the United States and the conduct of those relations. If we have today reached the stage where Canada-United States relations are in confusion, disarray or in jeopardy, we are, Sir, at a very grave situation.

It is, I fear, painfully apparent that we are at such an unwelcome and potentially hurtful phase. Any government that presides over the deterioration of Canada-United States relations bears a fearful and awful responsibility before the Canadian people, because the fallout of such deterioration could penetrate and injure every nook and cranny of our economic structure. Let us, therefore, not minimize the seriousness and the gravity of the matter placed before us by this motion today.

I would be less than candid if I suggested that the government of Canada was solely responsible for the unhappy situation now prevailing. But I would be myopic and irresponsible in my role as a parliamentarian if I did not try to analyse the contributions that have been made, willingly or unwillingly, wittingly or perhaps unwittingly, by the government of this country to the decline in our once close relationship with our southern neighbour.

Nor should any of us, regardless of party, pretend that there has not been a decline, that communications are as they used to be or as they should be. It would be naïve, regrettably naïve, perhaps dangerously naïve, to suggest that all is well. So it is the purpose of this debate to examine the conduct of Canadian foreign policy in relationship to the United States to see wherein errors and miscalculations have been made, and hopefully to find avenues for more useful, practical exploration and operation.

In the last few months there have been developments in the broader world in which Canada has played a part and some to which we have been merely a witness. There have been momentous and interesting developments. There have been alterations, at least, in the postures of the great powers, and there has been a great change in the complexion and composition of the United Nations. Sometimes, perhaps in response to some of these larger moves and developments, the government of Canada has adopted postures, has taken positions, or has followed courses of action which have been unhelpful to its essential association with the United States.

I think, Sir, at a time of such great sensitivity as this, and on a matter of such fundamental importance, that we must all be especially alert, particularly careful in our utterances, in our evaluations, in our judgments and in our appreciations. Diplomacy, like domestic politics, is anything but a static thing. It is not bound and shackled by the narrow confines or the brittle rigidities of the past. Changes, new developments, new emphases and new priorities emerge and must be tested and evaluated. I am unsympathetic—and here I speak euphemistically—with those who would seek to bind us forever in the pessimistic and rigid postures of the cold war. The tough doctrines of the Dulles era doubtless played their part and served their purposes, and we may indeed owe much of our present existence to their efficacy. But they may not serve us well in today's realities. President Truman in his time was one of the world's greatest statesmen, but these times are not his times.

I welcome the opening out of relations and the broadening of contacts between the United States and the People's Republic of China, and between the United States and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. I believe that President Nixon has shown statesmanship and realism in his decisions to move into a new era of closer contact and, perhaps—who knows?—closer understandings between his country and the vast nation ruled by the men at Peking. I hope that his visit to that country will be useful and valuable. I think that efforts to scale the great walls of separation and misunderstanding are all to the good.

I was particularly happy that the leader of my party was one of the first western statesmen to visit China in the new era of acceptance by that country of people and leaders from our part of the world. While at the time I expressed criticism of the utterances of the Prime Minister of Canada in the Soviet Union—and I still regard those utterances as unwise, unhelpful and improper—I nevertheless believe that contacts between our two countries and visits by the people of our two countries should be encouraged, and hopefully will be productive of a degree of common good. We would all welcome that.

The recent weeks have been interesting. We have seen a renaissance of summitry. This is not to be scorned, it is to be welcomed. Indeed, we almost see before us in the world a sort of mobile or perambulatory Congress of Vienna as statesmen from all over the world make visits, though none of us believe, as we would not believe about earlier activities, that all is altruism and that the old norms of realpolitick have been discarded as the leaders of the great powers move about on the world's stage and engage in competition for acceptance. The only danger, as I see it, in summitry is when summitry is accompanied by naïveté, and some of us are old enough to remember the tragic and inane example of this when that pathetic figure, Neville Chamberlain, was for an unhappy and tragic space of time one of the leaders of the western world. In his complete acceptance of what he was told, he apparently lost the capacity to evaluate what he should have seen.

In the current summitry among the great power leaders, I believe we can count upon a general and useful realism. While advances may be made in understanding, while gains may be achieved in accommodation, there will be no forgetfulness of such hard realities as Hungary, Czechoslovakia, the Berlin wall, naval penetration in the Mediterranean, Tibet, Korea, or the Bay of Pigs and many other crude emanations of power politics on the international scene. Indeed, it is well that among great powers today there is a degree of realism. In that realism there may be for some of us much less powerful, much less important, a not inconsiderable hope, if not an option of security.

I will not soon forget the opportunity of being at the United Nations in 1963 when two world powers brought us to the very razor edge of a lethal confrontation, but finally they looked at matters and at one another squarely and found a course of action that just in time moved us all away from the abyss. But it is not to these factors and areas over which we do not have control that I want to direct our attention today. We must look at our own conduct of Canadian foreign policies and ask if any new ingredients have been added recently which have brought new concern to our own people, or surprise, mystification and anxiety to many of our friends abroad.

In the Ottawa Citizen of October 28 I read a Canadian Press report which stated:

One senior Liberal MP said "there is nothing wrong with developing closer ties with Russia. In advancing the process of this friendship Mr. Trudeau went to Russia and made a gratuitous insult about an American military threat to Canada, and then Premier Kosygin comes here and criticizes American economic policy. Is that any way to make new friendships."

Another member of Parliament, the very distinguished member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Blair), who has had extensive experience at the United Nations and other international bodies, wrote in his weekly column:

—we must not permit ourselves to be used by the Soviet or any other government for the purpose of breaking up ancient friendships and important alliances. We should not become a backboard channel for attacks on the United States. We should be careful in making new friends, that we do not offend our old friends.

When these matters to which members of the opposing party refer are brought up, we should be concerned, they should be concerned, and I commend them for being concerned, because it is our right and duty to do some serious thinking and make a careful analysis of such matters.

The leader of my party is not one who is given to extreme or inflammatory statements, but I believe he spoke for the great majority of Canadians when he said a couple of days ago:

—it is perfectly legitimate . . . for Canada to improve its relations with the Soviet Union. It is inappropriate, it is stupid for Canadian spokesmen to use a Soviet platform, or to encourage Soviet leaders to use a Canadian platform to attack the United States.

The leader of my party was in China a matter of months ago, and he was in the Soviet Union prior to that. I am sure he spoke there with his usual candour and forthrightness, as well as his moderation. I am sure he displayed the friendliness which has always characterized him, but it is notable that in these discussions he did not find it necessary in establishing entreé with the leaders of the Soviet Union and the People's Republic of China to denigrate, denounce or even to snipe at the United States. I am indeed confident that he made a worthy contribution toward better understanding between that country and the countries he was visiting. We are all supposed to be in favour of that.

If the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) can do it, I would suggest that others less restrained and less moderate might, in the words of Patrick Henry, profit by his example. No one suggests that this country need or should react with supine acceptance to every diplomatic lead of the United States. This has never been necessary before. I had the honour of supporting a government a few years ago which found itself capable and competent of disagreeing vigorously and forcefully with the United States when Canadian interests were endangered.

An hon. Member: It was fighting with them all the time.

Mr. Macquarrie: It is too bad I cannot reciprocate. I do not believe in making my speeches from the posture that the hon. gentleman is displaying, so I cannot do so. If he is enjoying himself, he can go right ahead.

Mr. Baldwin: We would have more intelligent heckling if you did so.

Mr. Macquarrie: I do not believe the Canadian delegation at the United Nations should have voted for the United States resolution regarding China because the United States proposed it. I think it should have voted for it because the expulsion of Formosa or Taiwan was a cruel act, and one for which the government of Canada had no mandate from the people. If I were not limited to 30 minutes I could produce chapter and verse right up to the eve of polling on that matter in 1968.

I will not take the time to refer to many of these statements made at the United Nations, in this chamber and in other chambers as well as to the Canadian people to indicate, when the appropriate time came, the callous and cruel abandonment by this government of its own position in reference to the universality of U.N. membership. In the process, we indulged in cold compression upon any possible effort in the foreseeable future by the Formosan people to work out for themselves a new degree of self-determination and eventual recognition by and admission to that world body. If the people across the way are proud of that, let them say so, but I do not think it is anything of which Canada should be proud.

Nor do I find that my high regard for the United States as a great neighbour and as a great nation prevents me or should prevent any other Canadian from deploring and decrying its president's decision to go ahead, against so much social and scientific opinion in his own country and others, with the Amchitka test. This has been discussed before. I am no more enthusiastic about his doing it than I am about the French doing it or the other two powers who tell us after they have done it, that is the Chinese and the Soviet Union.

A good neighbour policy does not require acquiescence from a smaller neighbour. Solidarity does not require eternal and constant uniformity of opinion on every given issue, but realism dictates that no government in Canada should recklessly engage upon a rampage of anti-Americanism without being prepared to face some painful consequences. Not that the United States will or should indulge in retaliation for our seeming recalcitrance, but because our relations are so close, our ties so intimate, our interdependence so great we require a special relationship. We require a continuing capacity to speak in a special way to retain that special relationship. It is the loss of this good understanding that worries me today and which worries the people of this country.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: I care not how often the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) goes to Moscow, to Peking, to Belgrade, to Samarkand or to the Coral Reefs, but I wonder why he does not go to Washington. I wonder why, in this crucial time, the Ottawa-Washington hotline has gone dead, has grown cold. I wonder why when I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) about a measure or about an opinion which is important, and which should be conveyed to the United States, I receive a reply through indirect discourse that the United States knows our position, that they hear our speeches at the United Nations and know our opinions. However, when we ask if that opinion was conveyed to Washington we do not get the answer "yes"; that is the problem.

With all due deference to Mackenzie King, indirect discourse is not the way to do it. On this matter of Amchitka which troubles us today we have reached the stage where there is one man and one man alone in this country who can make contact with the one man in the United States who has the decision. The Congress of the United States has very clearly and definitely laid the matter at the doorstep of the President. The chief executive of this country is the Prime Minister. He is the man to contact the President even at the eleventh hour. How far are we removed from the days of the good neighbour, the era of Franklin Roosevelt and Mackenzie King, when our leaders spoke freely and regularly on matters concerning our countries. How far are we removed from the spirit of Hyannis Port of which we heard a few years ago. When a phone call cannot and will not be placed, the Canadian people have a right to know why. What has happened? Do we have nothing but indirect discourse for the transmission of opinions? Is that all we have left?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Sharp: Resolutions of Parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members will remember there is an order of the House that there cannot be an extension of time, so the hon. member really should be given a chance to complete his remarks without interruption.

Mr. Macquarrie: I assume I have eight minutes, Mr. Speaker, and will use seven of them. I say to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, if he can hear me through the patter of the seated orators around him, why cannot the once good neighbours converse as they used to converse. I ask why, in a day of very, very serious economic problems and difficulties in the economic relations between the two countries, there is not some form of summitry at the Ottawa-Washington level. That is the question which should be asked and must be answered. We cannot be a Yugoslavia. I read that a great British newspaper believes Mr. Trudeau wants to be a western Tito. He cannot be a General de Gaulle. That may be appealing but that is not for Canada. We cannot for many reasons, hard reasons, such as geography, history, economics and all the rest, forsake our role as an important integrated ally of the United States. All the talk about countervailing forces, and all the talk about enjoyable anti-Americanism, will never remove the hard facts of life which make it necessary for us to deal with the United States from strength, in our own interests, and not leave it all to indirect discourse.

[Mr. Macquarrie.]

I say to the Prime Minister, let not brittleness, pique, pride or petulance prevent him from contacting the President of the United States on these grave economic issues which are hurting our people. We have had enough economic suffering from the atrocious bungling of the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: This country does not need a further economic burden placed upon its people because of the bungling in respect of the relations between the two countries, the United States and Canada. That is the great problem. I say to the Prime Minister, let him not miss an opportunity to speak in friendliness, to speak in frankness and candor, but for heavens sake to speak to the government of the United States. We have had our troubles with the United States. It does not require a genius to point out its errors or to dilate upon its inequities and inequalities, but there is still no substitute for a good working relationship between our two countries.

It is not so long ago that we had the President of the united States in this very Chamber. I refer to President Kennedy who was here a decade ago. How long ago it seems since he was introduced by the present member for Prince Albert, who was then the Prime Minister. The then Prime Minister referred to another New Englander, Robert Frost, and referred to that poet's inscription on the guest book of Hebrew University in Jerusalem in these words, "Something there is that does not love a wall—it is friendship".

In these difficult and trying days there is too much sniping and too little understanding, too much sniping and too little dialoguing, too much grandstanding and too little understanding.

But we all remember, those of us who were here, what the young President said. He spoke about the realities that bound our two countries to a destiny which cannot be dealt with callously or casually. He said:

Geography has made us neighbours. History has made us friends. Economics has made us partners. And necessity has made us allies. Those whom nature hath so joined together let no man put asunder—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: I actually hear groans from members in this House.

Mr. Nesbitt: From the Moscuvites.

Mr. Macquarrie: I must say I am not at all ashamed to honour the memory and words of the former President of the United States. I would say that if any constituent or fellow Canadian of mine thought I was jeering at or mocking his words I would be very quick to deny that I had anything to do with such intellectual indecency. I am not reluctant to say that these great words, the aspirations uttered at that time and the admonitions set forth, are eminently worthy of consideration and adoption today. It does not upset me that the House has displayed unusually bad manners on a matter which should commend itself to top priority considerations. If the economic well-being of Canadians, if relations between this country and its most important neighbour, are not important, I wonder how far down the road of irresponsibility we have in fact gone.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the motion which has been placed before us by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) provides the House with an excellent opportunity to debate Canada's role in a changing world and to discuss our relations with other countries, particularly with neighbouring countries. The motion has two substantive items of condemnation. The first condemns the government for failing to employ and improve firm and constructive economic and political relations with the United States, and the second condemns the government:

> ... for failing to develop a new economic policy which would strengthen our economic independence and fully employ our growing and highly skilled human resources.

Since I agree with the second criticism and want to disagree with the first, let me deal with the second criticism first.

Mr. Francis: At least you are being logical.

Mr. Douglas: Let me say first of all that this party supports the statement in the motion which condemns the government for its failure to develop policies which would strengthen our economic independence. In Canada that has become now rather like being in favour of motherhood and apple pie. I thought there was a good deal of contradiction in the speech made by the hon. member for Hillsborough, since in one breath he wants the government to establish better relations and be more quiescent to the United States and in the next talks about strengthening our economic and political independence. I do not know how you do that except by talking frankly and dwelling in a world of reality, not in a world of sentiment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: There is no doubt that in this country today, in the business world, among working people, farmers and the public generally, there is a growing demand that Canada strengthen its economic independence. That does not mean that we Canadians want to live in a state of economic isolation or self-sufficiency. Canada is a trading nation which must trade in order to live, and we know that we cannot live unto ourselves. But trading relationships with other countries do not imply that we have to turn over to the control of foreign corporations and multinational corporations the control and ownerships of the resources and the economic activities of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: Pleading for economic independence does not mean that those who do so are anti-American. This accusation has been thrown many times at those of us who have spoken along this line. As a matter of fact, the other day I raised on two occasions the question of Supertest being taken over by British Petroleum Limited. That is not an American company, but is a company 51 per cent of the shares of which are owned by the government of the United Kingdom. It is really almost a Crown corporation. I am not concerned about whether they are American companies, Japanese, Russian, British, French or German companies. I am opposed to any foreign corporations having the decision making power that affects the economic destiny or the welfare of the people of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: This does not mean either isolationism or a spirit of animosity to other countries. Sweden, Norway, Switzerland and Japan have all passed legislation limiting the amount of foreign ownership in their respective countries. As a matter of fact, Japan, which has probably received more massive inputs of American capital than any other country in the world, two years ago passed some of the most restrictive legislation that can be found on the statute books of any country limiting the amount of foreign ownership which there can be in that land.

There is no doubt that Canada will always have a special relationship with the United States; 70 per cent of our export trade goes to the United States, and we buy from and sell to the United States more than any other country. Because of our proximity, because of the fact that our economies are to a very large extent complementary, this type of trading relationship is bound to continue, but it must continue on the basis of our being masters in our own house and not on the basis of being renters in our own country with the decisions affecting this country being made elsewhere.

I want to say that I do not think any motion of condemnation can be too strong with respect to the failure of the Liberal government to take effective action to stop this steady erosion of Canadian control of our economy. We have now reached the place where in the last three years 200 take-overs annually by foreign companies have further eroded Canadian control of our economy. The Liberal party has been strong on rhetoric but it has been poor on performance. I need not go back over the speeches of Mr. Walter Gordon when he spoke about buying back the Canadian economy, or the Watkins Commission set up by the former prime minister which reported in 1967 but following whose report virtually nothing has been done, or the task given to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray) to look into the question of foreign ownership. I understand that he has made a report to the cabinet which I am convinced we will never be allowed to see. Today that report is virtually dead. This government is giving no indication at all that it intends to take any effective action with respect to the continuing acquisition of Canadian corporations by foreign companies.

Let me turn now to the second ground on which the government is being condemned, that is for failing to employ and improve firm and constructive economic and political relations with the United States. I must say that I am surprised at the way in which this criticism is worded. In recent months there has been a not too subtle campaign carried on in this country, through the press, by some public spokesmen and by the representatives of certain right wing groups, accusing the government of cosying up to the communists and turning their back on our good friends in the United States. The government does not need any defence from me, and I have never proposed to set myself up as one of their defenders. But the fact remains that the statement contained in the motion which we have before us, and the speech made by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie), seem to be giving effect to exactly that type of campaign.

It is being pointed out, for instance, that the Canadian government voted against the U.S. resolution in the United Nations with respect to the Two-China policy. Well, Mr. Speaker, we in this party have been advocating for years that the government ought to recognize the People's Republic of China and, if we recognized the People's Republic of China we could not also recognize the nationalist government as the government of China. There could not be two governments for China. When the hon. member for Hillsborough criticizes that position, may I remind the House that for 20 years the governments of Great Britain and France have recognized the People's Republic of China as being the government of that country, and not the nationalist government of Taiwan.

There has been criticism of those statements which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made in the Soviet Union. They are described as being unuseful and unhelpful. Yet, Mr. Speaker, it seemed to me that the Prime Minister was dealing in the field of reality, in recognizing the difficulties that faced this country both with respect to our relations with the United States and our relations with the Soviet Union.

I am rather intrigued with the new role which the Conservative party is now presuming to play as the champions of the Americans, and holding themselves forth as the party which is best able to establish amicable relations with our friends across the border because Mr. Speaker, many members of this House will recall the elections of 1962 and 1963 when a program of vilification against the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and his government was carried on by the United States, by U.S. companies in Canada. The right hon. member for Prince Albert even claimed that officials of the American government were exerting some influence in that election.

Mr. Paproski: He knows how to forgive.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Douglas: I am not criticizing the Conservative party's capacity to forgive. I am questioning their capacity to be any more successful in making friends with the United States now than they were when they were in office. That is what I am questioning.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, I want to say that we in this party believe that anything which can be done to open the windows toward the east, anything which can be done to remove the obstacles to better understanding between our country and any other country, irrespective of its ideology, its race, its colour, or its creed, is all to the good.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: And I do not think that friendship with one country necessarily means that we have to be at enmity with another country. The President of the United States has also recognized this. In spite of whatever differences he may have had over the question of Taiwan in the United Nations, he is proposing to visit Peking. He is proposing to visit Moscow. That is a sensible decision because if we accept the McLuhan concept that the world has now become a global village, then we must make headway in improving the communication of attitudes and ideas between nations in order that there may be better understanding and mutual respect.

The NDP, we have always made clear, is nationalist in its desire to have Canadians control their own political and economic affairs, but it is internationalist in its desire to live in harmony with other nations which have a similar aim. My quarrel with this first criticism in the motion is that in my opinion the Canadian government were not responsible for the deterioration of the economic and political relations with the United States. As a matter of fact, the government have gone a long way to make friendship between the two countries possible.

I need hardly remind the House that as early as May, 1970, Canada unpegged its dollar at considerable cost to our exporters. The dollar went up from 92½ cents to over 99 cents, and in the province of British Columbia every one cent increase in the value of the dollar cost the B.C. forest industry $14 million a year. We in this party supported the government when they did that because we thought it was a courageous and necessary action.

An hon. Member: What did it do to the wheat growers?

Mr. Douglas: It cost them money, too. The Canadian government, both on GATT and on the Kennedy Round, have not only lived up to the agreements but have acted in advance of the agreements with the result that Canada today has the lowest tariffs in its history.

When we talk about the deterioration of relations between Canada and the United States, let us keep in mind some of the things that have happened. It was not Canada's fault that the President of the United States unilaterally, without consultation with anyone, decided to impose a 10 per cent surcharge on imports into the United States, an action which the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) says, if it persists for one year, will mean 90,000 less jobs in Canada. We cannot blame the Canadian government for the fact that the Americans have introduced a buy-American policy, and a 7 per cent tax credit on capital goods which it is estimated will cost Canada at least $100 million a year. We cannot blame the Canadian government for the U.S. Domestic International Sales Corporation, or DISC program. I was glad to see that yesterday it was defeated in a tie vote in a committee of the U.S. Senate, but the Senate is now seeking to revise it and bring it forward again. I hope it does not pass, but it does represent the protectionist forces that are at work in the United States. Those forces are the natural reaction of any Republican administration which, whenever it gets into economic difficulties, retreats into protectionism.

Relations with the United States have been injured not only by those protectionist measures, unilaterally invoked, but there is not any doubt that relations between the United States and many countries have been hurt further by the statements by the President of the United States and some of the leaders in Congress when they threaten to retaliate against the countries which voted against the U.S. resolution on Taiwan. That threat could mean only one thing, namely, that much of the foreign aid was being paid out, not on the basis of human need, but on the basis of having captive votes at the United Nations, which could be counted upon when they were required.

The decision of the President of the United States to go ahead with the Amchitka test despite the protests of the Canadian Parliament, the government of Japan and even the Governor of Alaska, to say nothing of the thousands of conservationists in the United States, has done nothing to improve American relations with the other countries of the world.

Mr. Speaker, I am not saying that there is an end to friendship because certain actions have been taken by the Americans which annoy us and which annoy other countries. One of the tests of friendship is that you can annoy one another, disagree with one another, patch it up and again be friends. This is what we have to do. What I do object to is that the government of Canada is blamed for the deteriorating relations between Canada and the United States, when I think the United States government must accept a major part of the blame.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: Heaven knows this government has enough sins on its conscience and has made enough blunders on its own without blaming them for the mistakes which the government of the United States has made.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, where I do criticize this government is for its failure to respond adequately to the protectionist measures introduced by the President of the United States. Those measures were announced on August 15. On November 3, two and a half months later, we still do not know what provisions the United States government is laying down as a condition for removing the 10 per cent surcharge or any of the other protectionist measures that were invoked. The government keeps telling us that they do not know what the Americans want as a quid pro quo. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce says they are waiting for a list of irritants. But everybody else seems to know, Mr. Speaker. The Secretary of the Treasury, John Connally, makes speeches in the United States and in London, wherever he goes, saying that the only way the surcharge will be removed is to get certain bilateral talks going with the various trading partners of the United States with a view to reversing the American unfavourable balance of payments. Mr. John Petty, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, has been laying down what he considers to be the conditions for a removal of the surcharge.

One can probably disregard the conjectures that come from correspondents in Washington, but one cannot disregard the fact that Mr. Petty called a press conference to state on behalf of his Secretary, Mr. Connally, and the American government, that two of the conditions which must be met by Canada were, first, removal of the transitional safeguards in the Canada-U.S. auto pact and, second, an increase in the value of the Canadian dollar. Mr. Connally has gone further and said there are other matters which the Canadian government would have to deal with in order to help the United States balance its international payments.

The fact is that in recent months the world has entered a new phase in international trade. We are now playing in a different ball game. For the moment at least, the United States has retreated into a citadel of protectionism. Great Britain has just had a vote in the House of Commons approving entry into the European Economic Community. As one prominent business executive said the other day, Canada is in grave danger of being the "odd man out" in the international trade picture.

My quarrel with the government is not that they are responsible for deteriorating relationships between Canada and the United States; my quarrel with the government is that they have said nothing and done nothing to indicate what they propose to do in this very confused and difficult situation. Members of this party, through the leader of our party and through the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) in the debate on the Employment Support Act which was before the House, outlined some of the economic measures that we thought the Canadian government should adopt. They referred to such things as monetary policy and lowering our interest rates which would have an effect on inflow of capital—thereby keeping our dollar from going beyond parity, the need for fiscal measures that would increase effective demand by lowering taxes on low income groups, the proposal that we should use our raw materials, and particularly our energy resources, as bargaining tools for getting access to American and other markets for our processed and manufactured goods.

We are not without weapons in this matter. We do not want to enter into a trade war and retaliation would be sheer nonsense for Canada. But we are not completely defenseless. The OECD has pointed out that Canadians consume more imported goods per capita than any country in the world—$700 per Canadian as compared with $185 in the United States and $150 in Japan. We are a very good market. Despite the fact that we are only one-tenth the size of the United States, we are their best customer and a great market for their goods. We have established the lowest tariffs in Canadian history. We have co-operated in the matter of GATT and the Kennedy Round. Surely, we ought to know what the government is doing in respect of its negotiations with the United States. We are not told by officials or ministers whether any discussions are going on; all we are told is that we are waiting for this list of irritants.

Canada has entered a very difficult phase in her international trading relationships. We are either going to be integrated with the United States in some form of continentalism or we are going to try to establish some type of viable economic relationship with the European Economic Community or we are going to continue to build, if we can, multilateral trading relationships with as many countries as we can, looking particularly to those nations of the Pacific rim. But what is the government's policy? What is it seeking to do? How does it propose to offset the economic dangers and disadvantage that will derive from the protectionist measures taken by the United States? I want to plead with the government to come clean with the Canadian people and to stop taking this attitude, like Mr. Micawber, that if you sit still and do nothing something will turn up.

Therefore, I move, second by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the motion be amended by deleting therefrom all the words from "noting the continuing" to and including the words "at the same time", and by substituting therefor the following words:

"condemns the government for failing to respond adequately and effectively to the protectionist measures introduced unilaterally by the United States, and".

• (4:10 p.m.)

If the amendment were accepted by the House, the motion would then read:

That this House condemns the Government for failing to respond adequately and effectively to the protectionist measures introduced unilaterally by the United States, and for failing to develop a new economic policy which would strengthen our economic independence and fully employ our growing and highly-skilled human resources.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Hon. members have heard the motion put by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas). Although the Chair might be ready at first glance to accept this amendment, in all fairness it feels it should at this time invite the comments of hon. members. I think the House is placing itself in a difficult situation because the acceptance of this amendment might open the way to abuses of these motions on future occasions.

This being a debate on an opposition day, identified with one party of this House, in my opinion it would be unjust to that party, for the Chair and the House to allow an amendment that more or less brings in a completely new question or substitutes one question for another. The reason I said at the outset that I might be able to accept this amendment is that it seems to bring a closely related question into the amendment. Although it substitutes another approach to the problem mentioned in the motion which is before the House, it still concerns the relations between the two governments. If hon. members have opinions, I invite them to bring them to the attention of the Chair. I will reserve my decision.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, one finds it difficult to resist Your Honour's suggestion. Hon. members have opinions about almost everything. Certainly, I have an opinion on this particular aspect. I take the same approach as the Chair. I am not only concerned about this particular situation, but about possibilities which may exist in the future. While interpretations in the past have not been quite as rigid with regard to opposition motions as they have been with regard to other motions in the House, this is a new departure in this House in dealing with motions on opposition days.

Let us look at it in this sense. If the motion which Your Honour has to consider stopped at the words "the United States" on line seven of the motion which appears on the order paper, the effect of the amendment would be to get the original motion. It would supplant it with a matter involving a completely new idea, principle and approach. All that would be parallel up to that point would be that both condemn the government. The reasons for condemning the government are totally different. An opposition party moving an amendment might well be deprived of putting the government in an equivocal position in light of what another party endeavours to supplant for that part of the motion. I am not going to get into the merits. My colleagues will do that later.

Concerning the view which the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) took with regard to the issue, he said quite specifically "I disagree with the first part of the motion and I agree with the second." Under those conditions, Your Honour must have some regard for the rules relating to the right of an hon. member of this House to express an opinion on a motion. You can vote for it, vote against it or endeavour to amend it in a way that is acceptable. However, you cannot, through a motion in the form of an expanded negative, put something entirely different in its place.

Listening to Your Honour carefully, I have the idea that this is a matter of some concern to the Chair as it is to me. It will certainly alter the procedure we will adopt in this House with regard to opposition motions from here on if another party seeking to deal with such a motion can effectively remove the opportunity to consider the basic and fundamental principle expressed in the motion by putting something else in its place. I am not going to argue rigidly on this because we are making up our jurisprudence as we go along without departing too far from some of the rules of the past. I simply ask Your Honour to consider what our position will be if the amendment is accepted. I think this is important in light of our intent. What did we intend to do? What does this amendment seek to put in place of the motion? The amendment is far removed from the motion that there is not that relationship which should exist with regard to an amendment. I leave it at that.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I certainly do not quarrel with the position taken by Your Honour and underlined by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) concerning the abuses which there could be if an amendment to a motion were such that it completely destroyed the original motion or put something in its place that is entirely different from that which had been placed before the House in the first instance. I think it becomes a matter of judgment as to whether or not the amendment we have put forward is guilty of that abuse. I do not think it is, otherwise I would not be associated with it. It is, after all, a matter of judgment.

Although the hon. member for Peace River seemed to come down on the side of thinking that the amendment ought not to be allowed, he certainly did not press the point with the vigour of which I know him to be capable. In other words, it does not bother him as much as it might. He realizes that his party is in a position that if it does not like the alterations we have made it can vote against our amendment and thus get a final vote on his party's motion in the words in which it was placed on the order paper. Recognizing that there is a line beyond which we must not go in presenting amendments, I do press the proposition that when a motion is placed before us which contains two separate ideas we surely have the right not to be forced to vote on those two ideas at one and the same time. Basically, this is what we have sought to avoid, by cutting out of the motion a portion of it with which we find it difficult to agree. I do not mind saying that in the consideration of what we might do at this point we did discuss the possibility of simply moving to cut out the offensive part of the motion before us, leaving in the part with which we agree.

I submit that as long as we are in the same area, it is appropriate for us to suggest something a little different in connection with the subject on which the original motion pronounces. We could not go along with the part in the middle of the motion which talks about the government "failing to employ and improve firm and constructive economic and political relations with the United States". We think there is a problem there about which the House should be concerned, but we believe the issue is stated more effectively in the wording we have put forward asking that the House condemn the government for failing to respond adequately and effectively to the protectionist measures introduced unilaterally by the United States. In other words, it seems to me that the first part of the motion is really by way of preamble, and not particularly important. We thought it would be better if those words were left out. Then, when we come to the first idea proposed, we felt it would be better stated in more forceful terms. As to the final proposition, we agreed with it, so we left it.

All told, I think our amendment avoids the kind of abuse against which Your Honour has warned us. Since the hon. member for Peace River did not rise to the heights he sometimes reaches in this House I suggest Your Honour would be quite justified in putting the amendment.

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, as regard the procedure to be adopted to decide on the acceptability of this motion, I would like to underline a few points. I think that Your Honour was justified in advising the House to avoid moving too many amendments to motions submitted by opposition parties.

I believe that the privilege of making use of opposition days enables each party to move motions, and I wonder why someone would attempt to amend a substantive motion submitted on behalf of a party. I think that your advice to the House deserves our earnest consideration. However, I would like to state the reason which may lead to suggesting amendments to certain motions of the opposition. Actually, when the question on the motion before us is put, we will have the opportunity, if the amendment is accepted, to vote on a new amendment.

There is perhaps a way out of this difficulty which would consist in accepting all the motions of the opposition parties on opposition days.

[English]

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I want to add one thought to our discussion of this matter. The normal manner of amending a motion such as this is to add words by way of supplying more particulars or more precise direction. Virtually all the amendments that are made to motions of this kind are in this form. If this had been done in the case before us, the hon. member would have brought his amendment into the area of relevancy. However, he has found it necessary to move to delete a major portion of the original motion and substitute something else. This, by admission, results in a completely new approach from the original motion. I think the amendment takes us in a completely different direction from the one suggested in the original motion and that it cannot be said to be directly relevant to the original motion.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to add any lengthy argument to what you have already heard. But, surely, the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka is wrong in suggesting that this is not a legitimate amendment because it does not confine itself to adding certain words. All of us who are experienced in parliamentary matters are familiar with amendments which propose to take out certain words and substitute other words therefor. This is a familiar practice and the limitation which the hon. member suggests is totally out of conformity with this practice.

The other point I have in mind has been made already, but I believe it might be emphasized. I can understand that an amendment in these circumstances would be out of order if it introduced a totally new subject matter into the resolution. However, if it proposes a new method of dealing with the subject matter of the resolution it is, surely, a legitimate amendment. This is precisely the situation here. We are not introducing any new subject matter. We are proposing an alternative way of dealing with the subject matter which has been introduced.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I should like to add a few brief words to what has been said on this matter, Mr. Speaker. It has already been stated that there are two substantial aspects of the motion introduced by the Conservative party. The first deals with economic or governmental relationships between Canada and the United States. The second deals with our own economic policies. It has been agreed that our amendment coincides with the second half and, indeed, we have changed the wording of the original motion.

The question has been raised whether the first part of the motion has been altered to such a degree as to depart entirely from the substance of the matter. I suggest that this is not the case. The original motion comments upon existing Canada-United States relations. The amendment presented by this party comments upon exactly the same relations between Canada and the United States but offers an alternative interpretation of those relationships and of what should be done about them. Therefore, I am arguing that in terms of the substance of both parts of the original motion, the proposed amendment of the New Democratic Party should be accepted as being procedurally correct.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I thank hon. members for their comments, at the invitation of the Chair, on this difficult point.

[Translation]

First of all I would like to thank the hon. member for Champlain (M. Matte) who to a certain extent repeated what I said regarding the danger for this House to accept such an amendment. It is the point I had raised at the outset when I reserved my decision. In my opinion it was important for an hon. member to insist on that point and show the danger of making the rules of this House flexible to the point where they lose their importance.

[English]

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said in his argument that although he saw some difficulty, since he blamed the motion itself for touching two subject matters, he seemed to expect from the hon. member for Peace River a silent acceptance of the amendment. I must tell the hon. member that the Chair cannot make a judgment on the mere fact that one party would find it possible at some time or another to vote for or against the amendment or to approve completely or more strongly disapprove of the amendment. I think the question in front of us is more important than that. The reason the Chair has made this point is that it felt this might be a good opportunity for us to establish some kind of guidelines to help opposition parties in further debates and in the preparation of their motions on opposition days as well as in the preparation of amendments.

I still feel that the rule of relevancy, whether in a debate on an opposition day or any other kind of debate, is the basic rule of debate in the democratic process of this House, although it is more difficult to apply that rule when a motion before the House covers two different matters, or matters which though related could be treated separately or debated separately. However, I think the point made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is very well taken. At the same time, he said that the acceptance of this amendment is a matter of judgment. Again I say that that judgment cannot be based on the kind of point made by the hon. member for Peace River.

The Chair has listened to the views that were expressed and has again read the motion put by the hon. member for Hillsborough, but I must say that the position of the Chair has been one of hesitation. At first when the motion was put to me, it was my intention to warn the House of the kind of difficulty in which it was putting itself by presenting such an amendment, and there were some guidelines that I wanted to offer hon. members either for the preparation of amendments or for motions put on such occasions.

While the procedural debate went on I made a further study of what was basically in the motion and in the amendment and became more and more convinced that it would be very difficult for me at this time to accept the amendment in its present form. Taking into account the fact that this debate will go on for two days, I feel that I should invite the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre or any other member from his party, in order to protect the House and its procedure, to take a later opportunity of presenting a modified amendment. Alternatively, he may want to accept the proposition that has been put by the hon. member for Peace River to eliminate the words after "United States" and have the amendment begin after those words. In that case, it would be my feeling that he would leave in the motion of the official opposition the first proposition, which I think is the crux of what the representative of that party wanted to bring to the attention of this House.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel).]

If the hon. member for Peace River does not accept the suggestion made by the Chair at this time I have no alternative but to refuse the amendment.

Mr. Baldwin: No, Mr. Speaker, I do not accept it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, you seem to have made two suggestions and we are prepared to follow either one of them. The simplest suggestion, of course, is that the amendment be not accepted and that our next speaker try again, bearing in mind the points made by the Chair. On the other hand, considering your other suggestion, if it were acceptable to the Chair that the amendment delete only those words in the middle of the motion, namely "for failing to employ and improve firm and constructive economic and political relations with the United States" and substitute the words "for failing to respond adequately and effectively to the protectionist measures introduced unilaterally by the United States", my colleague for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands would be prepared to alter the amendment accordingly.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): This is not the suggestion that the Chair had in mind, nor the suggestion which was made by the hon. member for Peace River. I think the best solution would be for the hon. member and his party to look at the question again and that their next speaker bring in a motion that would meet the rules and requirements of the procedures of the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Thank you, Sir, that is what we will do.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, we now have the opportunity of considering a motion allowing us to determine where we stand in the relationships that exist between the government of Canada and that of the United States. It is important that we may immediately bring to light certain facts regarding those relationships because it would be a sad day if we were to wake up one morning and realize that they have aggravated to the point of creating a disruptive or disastrous situation.

Mr. Speaker, the whole Canadian nation is aware of the fact that the relationships between the Canadian government and the United States are not so good. They have been better in the past. This is due to several factors, and may I be permitted to single out a few of them. First, despite its relatively small population compared with the United States, Canada is of course always at a disadvantage if one looks at this population differential, and of course it is very difficult to set up a policy in the present system. May I say in passing that if we had a system different from the one we now have those problems could not exist or would be much smaller in any case.

Because of this situation, we find it difficult to gain a degree of economic independence. We must, despite our efforts to reach economic independence, continue to abide by most of the decisions taken by American high finance. It is therefore not easy, in the light of such a factor, to improve our relations if we aim at reducing more and more the American share in our economy.

Some others factors should be taken into account. For years, even if no action was taken in this direction, our leaders and particularly the Canadian people, have been most anxious to be more and more independent from the United States from an economic standpoint. Certainly all our governments have more or less wanted this.

The head of our present government is well known, particularly in the United States, for his anti-Americanism.

That does not contribute to create a favourable climate, all the more so since the head of this government seems to be trying to implement certain theories he has always had. He seems to be trying at all costs to eliminate American domination—and on this I agree with him—but nevertheless some specific facts should be considered.

From the orientation which is given at the top, the government seems to be trying to reduce the American hold on Canada by shifting this hold to other countries.

Let's get our facts straight here. Of course we should diversify our foreign trade. With our present system the more we have clients, the more we have trade relations with as many nations as possible, the more it is beneficial to our economy.

Still, if we should give some other orientation to our economy, simply in order to shield it from American influence, without giving enough thought to establishing new relations with other countries, the relations between our two countries would deteriorate even more.

No wonder, having in mind such factors, that the President of the United States, when deciding to impose the famous surcharge on imports, would not at all consider the consequences of his move on the economic and political climate in Canada.

No wonder, since the people in the United States know very well that the stand taken by Canada's Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is definitely pro-Canadian.

Mr. Speaker, no doubt anti-Americanism antagonizes our neighbour to the South; this is a fact. However, our geographical, political and economic situation being what it is, we must, as the motion says, consider other essential factors such as our mutual interests.

Mr. Speaker, we can say all we want about economic domination, financial take-over and even undue political influence on the part of the American people, but there is a fact that we cannot ignore: they are our neighbours and, consequently, the mutual interests of both countries have to be preserved.

Moreover, we must not for any consideration whatever aggravate good relations but rather always respect neighbours who are ready to help us, to stretch out a hand and who are always courteous.

Mr. Speaker, that does not mean—and I strongly insist on this—that we should not do anything to secure our economic independence. I do not mean that at all when I talk about the need to preserve our common interests and ensure mutual respect between our two nations.

The fact remains that, as indicated in the motion, and while showing a firm and constructive attitude, there are surely means of improving our relations with our neighbours without bullying or insulting them. There is not only the possibility of considering that there are means; we have no choice, we must take them since it has to do with our neighbours.

Under the economic system we tolerate or have to put up with—no matter what term we use—we can be sure that we need the United States and who ever would claim to make the economy totally independent in the present system would make a great mistake, Mr. Speaker.

Therefore, I believe the government is illogical. Without changing the basic part of the system, which is causing those difficulties, it is still striving to widen the financial and economic gap between Americans and Canadians. It is impossible, since we have a system which accepts and tolerates the absurd.

No one worries about the physical capabilities for production of the country. This is not the question asked. Rather, one asks: can we produce more profitably? That is a stupid principle and, as long as that question is being asked, we shall unfortunately have to purchase American or other foreign goods. Why? Because a country of 23 million inhabitants, a country with fewer workers, with less human potential, cannot compete with American or other foreign industries. It is impossible! And yet, that is what the present system favours.

We have always held, and we still do, that we could effect a change. A sound economy must rest on other principles than those that will inevitably lead us to economic and financial failure.

If we were to apply this principle in Canada, even to a limited extent, we should first ask ourselves what our requirements are. Second, we should wonder what are our possibilities of producing what we require.

Once these two questions have been asked, we would realize that when nothing more than capital is involved and there is no permission to be obtained from financial interests, this is neither a problem nor a mystery but a very simple thing. If we are physically capable of achieving production, let us make it financially feasible.

If we had such a system, we would never maintain bad relations with other countries since we would not be interested in producing for nothing or purchasing from other sources what we could produce in this country.

To do so, we only have to apply a basic mathematic rule, that is to give to the people the necessary purchasing power to consume national production.

Mr. Speaker, the more abundant and satisfactory our goods, the more we will increase the standard of living of each Canadian. Thus, whatever may happen in the United States or in Europe, we will be wearing clothes and shoes made by us. It matters little if President Nixon decides to let go of one if all the foodstuff we need is available.

Moreover, when we will only have to trade our surplus products for a few lemons, oranges or bananas, there will be no more problem. I still wonder by virtue of what idiotic principles we will buy carrots in the United States, under the pretext that they are less expensive. It must be pointed out that this is not true, and in any event, the principle is not sound. If we can grow them here, let us do so. Would there be then a problem of labour? The motion concludes by saying, and I quote:

—a new economic policy which would strengthen our economic independence and fully employ our growing and highly-skilled human resources.

I agree. The intention of the mover of the motion may not be the same as my own, but I know that to apply that motion, one only has to tell Canadians to produce what they need. Then, the labour problem would automatically be solved. Then our problems with the U.S. are settled for, if China and Russia buy millions of bushels of wheat from us, it is probably not to help us get rid of our surplus production but because they need it.

It is very difficult to create artificial needs in foreign countries to get rid of our production. This is what allows us to see, how disastrous and stupid it is to base an economy on trade relations with countries other than those with which we normally trade. That is the problem. Last summer the U.S. simply decided to protect their producers by imposing an import surtax. In an economic system such as the one advocated by the Social Credit, this would not have damaged our economy at all. In addition to the evidence of certain facts like the strained relations now existing under the present system between the United States and Canada—no matter what the prime minister may say—we have to admit that we are closely related to the American policy. We are bound by their rulings and the only way we can free ourselves from their economic influence—since all other pressures from that country are due to their economic stronghold over Canada is to apply the formula under which we produce ourselves all we need and to ask ourselves but one question: Is it physically possible? If so, we only have to make it financially workable.

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this debate for two reasons. First, it brings to light an effort being mounted by the Official Opposition to convince the Canadian people that the Canadian government is anti-American. Second, it gives the Official Opposition an opportunity to state what it would do in response to the economic measures of the Nixon administration. After listening to the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) I suggest to him that he did not make a very strong case of anti-Americanism against this government nor did he make a very strong case on even the narrow issue of communications. I like listening to the hon. member for Hillsborough. I find his speeches charming, and I admire his wit. There is not always as much substance as wit, but I suppose that is true of most speeches. But there were many occasions when I listened to him today when I applauded.

• (5:00 p.m.)

An hon. Member: Let us have a little substance.

Mr. Sharp: The sentiments that he expressed were sentiments with which we could all agree, namely the importance of good relations with the United States and that no government should embark upon anti-Americanism, and so on. These were sentiments that we could applaud heartily. Indeed, I think the applause from this side of the House sometimes exceeded the applause from those behind him.

However that may be, in my opinion the trouble is that the hon. gentleman is not quite convinced about his own case. Indeed, he is not quite sure what this motion means, and of course we are very puzzled, too. Perhaps I may attempt to paraphrase the motion which I tried to read a number of times. Perhaps with the amendment it will not be necessary to read all of it, but in any event, taking the motion as presented, it condemns the government for failing to be closer to the United States, and at the same time it condemns it for not being more independent. Perhaps that is possible for the opposition but for the government it just does not make any sense, and I think the hon. gentleman should have clarified his intention which is not at all clear in the motion.

Indeed, I thought the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) dealt very effectively with the hypocrisy of the motion of the Official Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: The real problem I suspect is that the Official Opposition has not resolved its own internal problems. I think of its attitude toward China, and I listened to the spokesmen on the other side and, if I may say so, I do not really know who speaks for the Official Opposition on this question. I listened to the hon. member for Hillsborough, and I have listened to the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather). I am not quite sure whom I should believe. Sometimes I would like to know who does speak for the Progressive Conservative party with regard to its policy toward China.

Mr. Chrétien: They have no policy on anything.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wish to draw your attention to the fact that the minister does not know the rules of the House when referring to the Official Opposition, and he should learn how to do it.

Mr. Perrault: That is not an official point of order, either.

Mr. MacInnis: I would very much appreciate a ruling as to whether the minister may continue to refer to the Official Opposition in the manner in which he did.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I asked for a ruling from the Chair.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): It would be difficult for the Chair to make a ruling on something that he did not hear. The Chair was speaking to the Deputy Speaker. If the hon. member wishes to make a specific charge and tell the House what cannot be accepted under the rules, I will try to make a ruling.

Mr. MacInnis: The minister should know that under the rules he must not refer to any political party in this House. He referred to members on this side of the House in their capacity as members of the Official Opposition or of the opposition parties, but he may not put name tags on members on this side and he may not express opinions in this House; that has been ruled upon several times. I think it is time that the minister was told some of the rules which he should observe. If the Chair has not been listening, it might be better to send for Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Sharp: If I may continue, if it would satisfy the hon. member, may I make two statements.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The Chair has been asked to make a ruling. Although I feel that the hon. member is a little aggressive toward the Chair, I will try to make a ruling. I think that it has been the practice—perhaps not the best practice but an accepted practice in the House—to refer to opposition members in other ways than as members of the Official Opposition.

I have heard many times from both sides of the House identification of members as members of their parties. This is not the proper procedure which is to identify members by the name of their riding. I think that the point of order was taken too far. At this time, I can only take the opportunity to invite hon. members who take the floor to follow the basic rule of the House to identify hon. members by their constituency and not by name or by any other means.

Mr. MacInnis: I have one further point of order, Mr. Speaker, and I will make it simple for the Chair. The minister, in his last few remarks, referred to the China situation and to members of the Official Opposition who spoke on this matter. I draw your attention to the motion before us and I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to bring the minister back to the motion before the House. We are not discussing the China policy at this time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member is asking me to rule on the procedural acceptability of some of the remarks of the minister. I do not feel that the point of order is valid. If he so desires, he may raise another point of order regarding relevancy, but the point of order which he put forward in my view relates mainly to the language used by the minister and the Chair cannot comment further on the remarks of the minister. This is a question of debate and, although the minister's remarks might not have been relevant to the motion before the House, the Chair will follow what the minister has to say from now on.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the reason I was referring to China was that I had been invited to do so by the hon. member for Hillsborough who, I was assuming, spoke both for the Official Opposition and as a member of the Progressive Conservative party.

Mr. MacInnis: Would the minister permit a question?

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. MacInnis: The minister surrendered the floor to me to permit a question. Now that he is dealing with China, would he also deal with the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) when he spoke in Russia about the American military threat?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Perhaps the Chair should take the opportunity to intervene and to bring the attention of hon. members to the motion before the House. Questions as well as speeches should be relevant to the motion.

Mr. Sharp: The hon. member for Hillsborough had been outlining in his speech the attitude that he took toward the question of the membership of China in the United Nations as a point at issue between Canada and the United States. I do not agree with his point of view, and I suggest that some members of the official opposition and of his party do not agree with him, either. So, I suggest that this is a question upon which the official opposition should make up its mind before it brings a motion such as this before the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Sharp: The attitude of the Official Opposition even toward Amchitka seems to me to be ambivalent. It is remarkable that there was only one member of this House present at that time who voted against the resolution of the House of Commons upon the Amchitka test, and it was a member of the Official Opposition who spoke about it and indicated that that was the position he would take. I suggest that this kind of issue should be resolved within the opposition before they accuse the government of not having a firm policy toward the United States.

I will bring forward another of these issues at stake between Canada and the United States, namely, the auto pact. What has been the position of the Official Opposition on the auto pact? They condemned it. That was their initial position. But now, after the benefits of the automobile agreement have become manifest, they are very anxious that the government should protect the interests of Canada. I suggest once again that the Official Opposition should make up their minds how they want to deal with the United States, and with the issues which are under discussion between our two countries. Indeed, I suggest in general that the attitude of the Official Opposition towards the United States is ambivalent. The attitude of this government towards the United States is not ambivalent. We have taken clear positions and we intend to continue to do so. We think that is the way to maintain good relationships with our friend to the south.

When I think back to the rapid deterioration that took place in relationships between Canada and the United States between the years 1957 and 1963, when a government led by the official opposition was in office, my view and I think it is one that history will confirm, is that the problem arose out of the lack of a firm policy on the part of the government of that day. It was the confusion in the minds of the Americans about Canadian government policy that led to that very serious deterioration in relationships that the hon. member for Hillsborough, in his selective reading of history, omitted to mention. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the main problem we have here, to quote the words of the resolution put forward by the hon. member for Hillsborough, is that the official opposition fails to see that there is no reason why a distinct Canadian policy should be detrimental to the "common interest" we share with the United States, or detract from the "mutual respect" that the two countries share.

We have our own interests, but we are aware of and are taking into account the interests of others. Our interests compete. Competition produces some friction and it generates heat. But the degree of friction is a function of the complexity of our contacts. We do not have many problems in our relationships with Mongolia. That is because we have very few contacts with Mongolia. The problems that concern us here in our relationships with the United States stem from the many points of contact. That conflict is healthy and it is positive, as long as it is contained and managed.

This resolution speaks about a "continuing deterioration of communication." When he put those words down the hon. member must have had his tongue in his cheek. When I look at the whole complex of mechanisms that have been established between Canada and the United States over the years, and that have been increased since this administration took office, I wonder how the hon. gentleman could have felt justified in putting those words on paper.

You know, Mr. Speaker, I can understand the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) who thinks that the introduction of those words is only going to interfere with a sensible debate on these matters, so he moved that those words should be omitted. I suggest to the hon. gentleman that we would have had a better debate if those words had been omitted because they fail to take into account the tremendous development of relationships between our two countries. I will just mention a few of them. I will first take some of the older, established ones.

There is the Permanent Joint Board on Defence.

Mr. Forrestall: How often has it met in the last five years?

Mr. Sharp: It has met frequently, and it is meeting very soon. They share information and resolve problems about the joint defence of North America. Two countries whose relationships are bad are not going to be talking about their joint defence. Countries that have a continuing deterioration in communications and whose relationships are bad are certainly not going to be talking about common defence problems.

The International Joint Commission which was established to regulate disputes over boundary waters is to be the chosen instrument to carry out an agreement between Canada and the United States to achieve, maintain and monitor water quality standards in the Great Lakes, the first agreement of this magnitude between any two countries in the world, and under negotiation right now despite the Official Opposition's doubts of the effectiveness of our communications.

So important indeed and so far reaching are our relationships that our two countries established a joint ministerial committee many years ago, when Mr. Pearson occupied my present portfolio under Prime Minister St. Laurent. This committee has met frequently during this administration. It last met in November, 1970. Preparations are under way for another meeting of the committee soon. U.S.-Canadian relationships are not static. They have been changing to meet the changing circumstances that are now emerging, and profound changes are taking place in power relationships.

There is the emergence of China as a member of the Security Council, and probably as the leader of the Third World. Just this morning I had the opportunity of having private conversations with the Foreign Minister of Yugoslavia, and we were speculating about the result of the entry of the People's Republic of China into the United Nations. What a profound change this is going to make in the debates in that assembly, and in the configuration of the power complex.

Then, we must look at the signs of detente, the tumbling down of the old barriers. There is the Berlin Agreement, a four power agreement that is now being negotiated between the two Germanies. There are the first tentative approaches towards a mutually balanced forces reduction in Central Europe, with Manlio Brosio going as an explorer from the NATO countries to talk with the Soviet Union to find out if the Soviet Union is serious. A European security conference is now being planned.

Then, we must look at the trading patterns, the emergence of the Common Market not just as a group of six but as a group of ten that will account for 45 per cent of world trade. We must look also at the U.S. balance of payments problems. It is against this background that the recent Canadian moves and the recent Canadian activities should be seen.

It is childish and, I suggest, very immature to suggest that the tentative and the positive Canadian moves towards better and more rewarding relationships with China, the Soviet Union and other communist nations are an act of defiance towards the United States.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: After all, the United States is moving in the same direction. The other day in answer to a question I said that we are not looking for credit but perhaps we have helped to break down some of the walls that stood in the way of better relationships between the United States, the Soviet Union, and China. And it is childish and immature to suggest that we expect that better relations with China and the Soviet Union will equal, or offset, or replace our close alliance and friendship with the United States.

This is a central fact of our life. We are here situated on the same North American continent. Our destiny and our geography have made it clear that it is in the interests of the Canadian people for us to have good relationships with the people and the government of the United States. Surely, that does not have to be defended as a proposition. That is not new. But there are changes going on. This is one of the reasons Canada decided to exchange diplomats with the People's Republic of China and in due course, and logically to support the occupancy of the China seat in the United Nations by that government. It was not long after we had taken that position and achieved this exchange of diplomats that the President of the United States said he was going to Peking. That was met with applause in the United States. Any suggestion that in taking these initiatives toward China we are acting contrary to the policies of the United States seems to me to be quite confounded by the facts.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: When the hon. gentleman criticizes Canada, by implication, for having diplomatic relations with the People's Republic of China at the expense of the Republic of China government, is he suggesting that we should have waited until the United States inevitably takes the same step and we follow it meekly? Is that his policy?

An hon. Member: Sure.

Mr. Sharp: It is not mine.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: The hon. gentleman seemed to suggest that somehow we had stood out in the United Nations as the one country that had flown in the face of American public opinion and voted in favour of the Albanian resolution. He knows very well, though he omitted to mention it as he made a selective reading of other matters, that Canada voted alongside all the NATO countries except the United States. We voted with over two-thirds of the full membership of the United Nations. Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that we are acting in a thoroughly logical, responsible and reasonable way. I do think, however, that perhaps we deserve a little bit of credit for having led the procession. It was our action in the establishment of diplomatic relations with Peking that caused many countries to think again about whether they wanted the People's Republic of China or the Republic of China government in the United Nations and they came out in our favour.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brewin: It was so good it should have been done years before.

Mr. Sharp: That could be. We are cultivating relations on a broader front in this world because I believe that is in the Canadian interest; I believe it is in the world interest and I believe it is in the interest of world peace. I believe we are in a position from time to time, even though we are not a very big country, to take useful initiatives and in recent years I think we have done this. I make no apology for it and I certainly do not think it should be termed anti-American, not at all. I think that the United States is rather pleased that Canada was in a position to take some of these initiatives for which they had not quite prepared their own people.

On the question of the Nixon economic measures, Mr. Speaker, I need hardly say that these were not directed against Canada. I have seen some rather silly statements—I must say they were not made in this debate and I hope they will not be—to the effect that somehow the economic measures taken by the United States are directed against us because the United States is not happy with our policy.

Mr. MacInnis: Who made them?

Mr. Sharp: Obviously, this is not so but these are the sort of statements that have been made.

Mr. MacInnis: By whom?

Mr. Sharp: I should like to take this occasion to say that these are obviously a lot—

Mr. MacInnis: Who were they made by?

Mr. Sharp: Various people.

Mr. MacInnis: Name them.

Mr. Sharp: I think that obviously—

Mr. MacInnis: Why bring it up if you are not prepared to name names? Why bring it up?

An hon. Member: Oh, sit down.

Mr. MacInnis: It is just a question of guts, that's all.

Mr. Gibson: You are not impressing anyone.

Mr. Sharp: I met with my Mexican colleagues the other day. We were exchanging views about the American economic policies and I told them that it had been suggested that we did not get an exemption from these measures because the United States was not happy with us and that some sort of retaliation was involved. I mentioned that I expected they were very much affected as well. They replied that they were but they did not think they had done anything to deserve the kind of measures taken against them by the United States. I said, "We are in the fortunate position of having a balance of payment surplus, while you are in balance of payment difficulties." If the United States had wanted to have a selective policy they would have left Mexico out. In effect, these measures were applied by the United States on a universal basis and were not directed particularly against us or anyone.

There are some other issues, Mr. Speaker, upon which the United States and Canada differ. I would draw your attention, for instance, to the Arctic legislation and the law of the sea. I would remind the House that the government acted with the full support of this House. Indeed, as I recall, it was one of those few occasions when this House acted unanimously.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: Give us something to be unanimous about.

Mr. Sharp: In regard to Amchitka, I have spoken already about the almost unanimous views expressed in this House. I do not think it is a matter on which the opposition can criticize the government for defending Canadian interests or for expressing its opposition, both on the grounds of the dangers to the environment and the need for a complete test ban.

Mr. MacInnis: You are speaking of October 4, I take it.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, in conclusion—

Mr. MacInnis: Let's deal with October 4.

Mr. Sharp: —I should like to return to a fundamental principle of relationships between nations. Profound disagreements—and there are some between Canada and the United States, let us not gloss them over—need not endanger nor even impair close and harmonious relations. In the whole course of events since August 15, which was referred to specifically by my hon. friend, communications between the governments have been as forthright and free as ever and probably more voluminous than at any period in living memory. Contact and communication at the ministerial level and between officials have been constant. I have had many conversations with Secretary Rogers on these subjects. The hon. member for Hillsborough said that I have not been in direct and personal contact with Secretary Rogers—I think that is what he said—but I have made representations on Amchitka, on the economic policies and other issues between us, personally and at length. They have also been made at the official level, and I can think of no more direct form of contact between any two governments than between the foreign ministers.

It is very exceptional in the modern world to find direct communication between heads of government. This should occur only in the most exceptional circumstances and if no other form of communication is possible. In this particular case, we have the machinery for letting the President of the United States and the government of the United States know fully the views of Canada on all the subjects that are under discussion. As you know, the Prime Minister is not reluctant to make his views known. I am certainly very happy to see that the official opposition has as much confidence as I have in the Prime Minister of Canada and know that when he speaks the world listens.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: To come to the question of the relations between the President of the United States and the Prime Minister, the hon. member for Hillsborough omitted to mention the fact that the first contact the Prime Minister of Canada had with any head of government after he took office was with the President of the United States.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: These other visits that are now taking place after we established close and very good relations at the top level, will be useful. They are useful but I do not think, for example, that the Prime Minister would be justified in going to the President and saying, "What I tell you about the Amchitka test is more important than what the members of the House of Commons say."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: I would not advise him in that direction. He has a proper regard for Parliament, even if the Official Opposition does not.

• (5:30 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Muir: That is the biggest joke you have told this afternoon.

Mr. Sharp: I can only cite the recent actions of the opposition. They consider the Prime Minister more important than Parliament. He does not and I do not.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: The relationship between Canada and the U.S. has always been complex and dynamic. Periods of relative calm generally precede periods of stress. A harmonious U.S.-Canadian relationship remains a paramount factor in Canadian foreign policy as practiced by this government. This is because so many of the things we would like to achieve in the external environment, such as disarmament, new moves toward freer trade, a meaningful response to the more troubling challenges of modern society, will continue to depend on the influence and commitment which the U.S. is prepared to bring into play.

We have every reason to have that very close contact with the United States because we are intimately bound up with the future of that country. When we look outward from North America to the Soviet Union, China and the rest of the world, our perceptions, initiatives and responses do not differ materially from those of the United States.

Nothing, in the opinion of this government, of this House, of the people of Canada, can equal in importance continued good relations with the United States founded on shared hopes, mutual respect and a common heritage of freedom. Nothing is today inhibiting the volume, variety, frankness and frequency of contact between our two governments at ministerial and official levels and between our two peoples at any level anyone may like to mention.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I propose to deal with that part of the motion that has to do with the failure to develop a new economic policy which will strengthen our economic objectives.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fairweather: The opposition has placed this motion before the House as a serious attempt to throw some light on a problem which, whether the minister likes it or not, is causing Canadians some concern. To espouse the cause of Canadian nationalism,—which is the historical position of the party that I have the honour to be part of, does not prevent the fostering of good relations with the United States. To seek to control our natural resources is not to deny them to others who need them, but upon Canadian terms. To want to pursue an independent foreign policy does not exclude sharing many of the aspirations of the United States as she continues to carry a large part of the leadership of the world. I suggest that none of these concepts is mutually exclusive.

I am reminded, if anybody cares at this hour of the day, of a poem that is in danger of becoming a cliché. Because some clichés are acceptable, we all use them. I am reminded of Robert Frost's poem called "The Mending Wall". Interestingly enough, it is the theme of the only speech made in this country outside Parliament by the assassinated President of the United States. I quote:

> . . . The gaps I mean,
> No one has seen them made or heard them made,
> But at spring mending-time we find them there.
> I let my neighbour know beyond the hill;
> And on a day we meet and walk the line
> And set the wall between us once again.
> We keep the wall between us as we go
> To each the boulders that have fallen to each.
> . . . Good fences make good neighbours.

Surely, the point that Frost makes is that the job of keeping the fence in good repair is a joint undertaking. Each side has an obligation. Each side must work at it. Each neighbour has an obligation at spring mending time. The speech of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene), the off-hand remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) during his visit to the Soviet Union, the events of Premier Kosygin's visit, the NATO review, whether one thinks of them as being good or bad really does not matter. In my opinion, they are peripheral to the main issue. The main issue is that in an anxious search for an independent posture, the government has neglected the nurturing of a sound relationship with the United States based upon the interests and aspirations of both our countries.

I do not accuse the government of anti-Americanism. Rather, I accuse it of denying neglect. Our interests and those of the United States require that we trade together. Yet the Prime Minister has still to formulate an economic strategy which will enable us to plan a healthy trading relationship with the United States. Our interests, and those of the United States, call for a relationship which will permit Canadians to have a greater share in the economic decisions which will affect our future. The Prime Minister has failed to provide any leadership which will restore Canadian confidence in our independence in this aspect of our national life. For us, Canadian economic independence and Canadian economic development are inseparable. They are simply the ordering of our economic thrust so that the optimal development of the Canadian and United States economies are mutually beneficial. I have often reflected on the curious aspect of our life, particularly because of the cold climate, that Canadians spend such an inordinate amount of time examining their own navels. Self examination is a preoccupation in this country. Such a pastime may satisfy a deeply felt national psyche, but it is no substitute for national purpose and policy.

There are several attributes of economic independence which I think should be discussed in this debate and in their place. These are ownership, control, costs and benefits of foreign investment in Canada, the phenomenon of the multi-national corporation and the key sector approach to an economic policy. The major issue of the debate on foreign investment is the possible frustration of national trading or commercial policies by the extra-territorial application of the law of the government of the country from whence that investment originates. This is a real issue and I suspect it would be recognized as such by both the foreign country involved and, despite public statements to the contrary, by the officers of the company involved. Policy decisions to deal with the problem would not be resisted by foreign governments. This has been discussed many times, particularly with our American friends.

Because there is a potential for extraterritorial application to Canadian subsidiaries of the laws or regulatory practices of the country of the parent company, there is need for a policy decision by the government of Canada. It is not the foreign capital that is the culprit, but in the case of the United States, it is mainly concerned with the application of that country's anti-trust legislation and legislation dealing with trading with the enemy, whatever that nebulous and mysterious word might mean. It is here that fence-mending should take place.

After all few would deny the validity of a policy which ensures that the operations of any enterprise in Canada, regardless of ownership, are responsive and accountable only to Canadian laws. Because Canada is not now nearly so dependent upon foreign capital, we have room to manoeuver. In recent years we have produced a surplus in our balance of payments on current account which demonstrates a capability on balance to export capital or to retire obligations abroad. This situation will change if, as, and when Canada enters a new phase of economic growth. We are in the midst of a breathing space because of relatively subdued activity. The reason for this lull is, partly, lack of confidence in the present government. The balance of transactions will shift toward a deficit matched by an inflow of capital in one form or another.

I propose that, rather than turn inward in developing policies toward foreign capital, Canada should take the initiative in the international community to establish acceptable rules within which foreign capital will have to operate. Such an initiative would have as its purpose changes in other countries' laws to facilitate desirable international investment. The key to such general policy would be reciprocal treatment of Canadian capital seeking to participate in the economics of other countries.

The provinces must be consulted closely on any new economic policy. There must be much more effort and emphasis placed upon co-ordination of effort. We heard recently, I think it was at the conference of finance ministers, a call for an exposé by the government of the whole philosophy of the Gray report. The once-trumpeted Gray report, which seems to have been shelved or to have been lost somewhere in the flow charts of the cabinet committee system, cannot have much relevance unless there is close consultation with the provinces. I have sought publication of the statistical data which supports the Gray report recommendations, but the government has not yet complied with what I thought was a reasonable request. Secrecy and lack of candour frustrate public discussion and debate.

Canada requires a new national economic policy is designed to: Insist on the processing of more national resources and minerals in Canada; drastically increase the amount of research and development carried on in Canada by companies based here; make attractive the switching of savings to equity investment; promulgate an explicit policy on resource development; exploit Canada's bargaining power when others need our natural resources; co-ordinate these goals with the provinces, which have concurrent constitutional responsibilities in several of these policy areas.

I have often been struck by the fact that when the Minister of Finance tries to cool the economy down a little through fiscal and economic measures, the next thing we know we read stories in the financial pages of our newspapers about visits to New York by representatives of the provinces and the great municipalities in order to get investment capital. I must say this is not altogether the fault of the federal government but there is, in fact, very little co-ordination between the two levels in connection with these very sensitive questions of fiscal and economic direction.

Dependence upon external sources of capital for financing in periods of heavy investment activity has been characteristic of Canadian development. The main source of that capital used, for good historical reasons, to be Britain. However, during the first part of the inter-war period, the United States became the principal source of external capital, and by 1926 the portion of Canada's international debt owned in that country exceeded that owned in Britain. With some interruption during the 1930's, United States investment in Canada continued to increase, particularly after 1947 when the period of intense activity in the petroleum industry got under way.

More than half of the United States investment in Canada by the end of 1967 had been accumulated since 1957. At $28,030,000, United States investments in 1967 continued to represent more than three-quarters of all non-resident investment in Canada. The main rise between 1957 and 1967 occurred in direct investments in companies controlled in the United States which almost doubled. In the same period, portfolio investments in Canada owned in the United States more than doubled, due mainly to large sales of new issues of securities in that country.

Even if the inflow of United States direct investment capital to Canada were to be reduced in the future, the growth of American-dominated operations in Canada would continue. This has been pointed out earlier in the debate. In recent years, an increasing amount of the funds required to finance the growth of Canadian subsidiaries of American corporations has been financed by retained earnings of Canadian subsidiaries and by borrowing in the Canadian market. The government publication "Foreign Owned Subsidiaries in Canada 1964-1967" reported that:

> In 1965, most of the financing done in the United States was through transactions with parent and affiliated companies . . . In 1967, the larger users of external funds drew largely upon Canadian sources of financing.

A further but related source of concern to Canadians derives from the number of Canadian companies which are being taken over by American owners by the purchase of shares of assets or as the result of mergers. Such take-overs may benefit Canada, for example, by injecting into the economically stagnating firm new financing, new technology, access to new markets, etc. However, there are definite disadvantages to Canada of such take-overs as well. The benefits just mentioned are wiped out when Canadian firms taken over by Americans are not economically stagnating, but rather are viable and successful. In this instance, the net result is to increase the number of United States firms in Canada and to reduce the number of Canadian ones with no net advantage for Canada.

There are many more specific sources of concern to Canadians arising from the increasing American economic intervention. The majority of most federal grants to industries under various programs go to non-resident owned firms, mainly United States firms. Another problem is the large-scale ownership by non-residents, mostly Americans, of intangible industrial property such as patents, trademarks and industrial designs which are particularly important in the most rapidly developing industries based upon improved technology. We heard a warning on this subject the other day from Dr. Firestone who pointed out the need for a whole new policy in the national field of patents, copyright and so on. For example, 96 per cent of all the patents issued in Canada in 1964 were issued to non-residents, a level far higher than that tolerated by any other western country.

The question of how to deal with these issues is not clear-cut. There are a number of complicated factors because United States involvement in our economy has brought with it a lot of benefits as well as disadvantages. The problem is to find a way of reducing the disadvantages without sacrificing all the benefits.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member. I do so only to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Steven Otto (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I have no difficulty at all in understanding the motion. As a member of the government, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) naturally has to couch his words and his thoughts carefully, but as far as I can see the motion is abundantly clear. I venture to say that it sets out the platform issue for the Conservative party for the next federal election.

The motion speaks of a continuing deterioration of communication on the basis of common interest. Somehow, we, as the government, get blamed for this deterioration. It was we, according to the opposition, who instituted the surcharge. Did this government convince the Americans to introduce a 10 per cent surcharge? Did we have much to do with getting United States multi-national corporations to invest 50 per cent of their capital throughout the world and take production out of the United States? Is that our fault? Did we cause this? Were we responsible for this? Is this the deterioration hon. members speak of? Or do they mean the automotive pact, as a result of which we have become more productive? We did suffer from some disadvantage until 1965, but was that our fault?

Is it possible that the United States did not like our visit to the Russians, or the Russian's visit to Canada? Are we to bow and scrape to them? The hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) said that Canada is not big enough as a nation to be feared—I agree with that—but we are not small enough to be despised. In the eyes of the United States, we are just about the right size to be invisible, to be completely ignored, and this we do not like. That is the deterioration of which hon. members opposite speak.

The next part of the hon. member's motion speaks of "failing to employ and improve firm and constructive economic and political relations with the United States". That is the gist of the motion, but what it really means is that the Conservative party is in favour of the status quo, of complete dependence upon the United States. Hon. members opposite feel we should remain as we are, that we should do as we are bid. Certainly, that is what the motion means. It means that we will continue to be completely dependent upon the United States; that we shall continue to send our resources to the United States for them to convert into energy, and to manufacture goods which they will send back to us. The motion means that the Conservative party is in complete agreement with a continental energy policy, indeed with a completely continental political policy. That is exactly what the United States wants.

I am very pleased to learn that the line has now been drawn clearly and definitively. If this is to be a campaign issue for the Conservative party, then I am pleased that it has the guts to say that this is what it believes. It may be what it believes, but it is not what I believe. I refuse to maintain the status quo. It is now up to this government to put forward its position. I suggest to the government that it should put forward the case for economic independence. Economic independence, but not the nationalism of Mr. Walter Gordon, which is unacceptable to most Canadians. Economic independence means that we must create an economic policy. We must create confidence within the country to process our own resources, to deal in the business world as both importer and exporter. We should think more of man hours, when we talk of the balance of trade, than dollars. Indeed, we should look to countries in South America, Europe, China and Asia in which we can foster trade relations. But most of all, we must have leadership and the confidence that we can succeed.

I suggest to the government that this should be the position to take. It is not enough to say that we are going to blame the United States, because we cannot blame the United States for the present situation. On the other hand, it was not Canada that convinced the United States to get involved in a very expensive war in Viet Nam. I also do not see the point of going begging to the United States, saying that it should not do this to us, because if the United States does have to take some measures it must take universal measures. I think the way to become visible again to the United States is to stand on our own feet and be independent—not nationalistic, but independent.

As mentioned by some members opposite, the question then arises: Are we really able to be independent? Do we have a big enough population to be independent? I think we have. This rationalization that with only 22 million people we are not large enough as a nation does not stand up to scrutiny in modern times, and never did in ancient times for that matter. Many nations of this world have made a success of their policies with smaller populations than Canada, some of them with almost no resources. We have lots of resources. Look about you, Mr. Speaker. We have mountains of iron ore, nickel, all the minerals of the world. We have the population, the expertise, and now we have the confidence.

Mr. MacInnis: All we need is a government.

Mr. Otto: If indeed this is the position of the Conservative party, then I am pleased that it has put it forward now. This will compel the Prime Minister to consider just why he was elected. He was elected because there was a haunting conviction in this nation that he would instil confidence and bring about reform; that he and the Liberal government would lead Canada to this position of which I speak.

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I was simply rising to ask the House whether it would be agreeable to calling it six o'clock, since there is only one minute to go.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the House agree to call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock p.m. this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, November 4, 1971

The House met at 2 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

GRAIN

REPLACEMENT FOR STABILIZATION BILL—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The pressing and urgent necessity lies in the cash shortage facing farmers and the desperate need to establish stabilization and farm income support programs that are truly geared to the urgency of the present situation which has been particularly aggravated in western Canada by the refusal of the government to bring in acceptable legislation. If the House grants unanimous consent I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie):

That this House gives unanimous consent to the withdrawal of Bill C-244 concurrent with the introduction of a well balanced farm income support and stabilization measure free from the defects of Bill C-244 and including immediate distribution of the interim acreage payment of $100 million, and the House leaders of the respective parties be instructed to make arrangements to facilitate forthwith the consideration of such measure.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Vegreville. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not and the motion cannot be put.

TRADE

POSSIBLE U.S. EXCISE TAX ON AUTOMOBILES IMPORTED FROM CANADA—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I will see if I can be a little more successful since some efforts have been made in advance to obtain unanimity. I rise under the probisions of Standing Order 43 which provides that in cases of urgent and pressing necessity a motion may be moved if unanimous consent is given. The matter of urgent and pressing necessity is the potential loss of millions of dollars in trade revenue and of jobs of thousands of Canadians employed in the automotive industry. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales), the following motion:

That this House urges the government to make it clear in the current discussions with officials of the United States that the excise tax proposal on automobiles approved yesterday by the United States Senate finance committee contravenes the Canada-U.S. automotive agreement and as such is unacceptable to the people of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion moved under Standing Order 43 which requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I should like it recorded that the nays came from the Liberal side of the House.

INDIAN ACT

AMENDMENT TO LOWER VOTING AGE TO 18 IN ELECTIONS ON RESERVES

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-272, to amend the Indian Act.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member shall have leave to introduce the bill?

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, this bill seeks to amend the Indian Act. The purpose is to lower the voting age to 18 years from the present 21 years of age in elections for the positions of chief and councillor of Indian bands so as to conform with the legal voting age in federal elections and the legal voting age in many of the provinces and to give young people in the age bracket of 18 to 21 years an opportunity to participate fully in the democratic process as it relates to elections on Indian reserves.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

TRADE

UNITED STATES IMPORT SURTAX—INQUIRY FROM VISITING AMERICAN OFFICIALS AS TO OBJECTIVE, GRIEVANCES AND PRECONDITIONS FOR LIFTING

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Since top United States trade officials are in Ottawa to meet our people today, will the government formally inquire as to what the U.S. government hopes to achieve by the surcharge, and will attempts also be made to find out whether there is a list of grievances and preconditions for lifting the surcharge as it applies to Canada? I ask this question in view of repeated statements by the government that it does not know what the United States wants to achieve.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Of course the question is in order only so far as the first part is concerned. Perhaps the minister might like to reply to that.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, it is too early to know these things yet. The meeting that is taking place today between Canadian and United States officials is exploratory or preliminary, but this is the sort of subject that will be raised. It is too early to know what the list of matters will be that may be provided by officials on the other side.

POSSIBLE IMPOSITION BY UNITED STATES OF EXCISE TAX ON AUTOMOBILES IMPORTED FROM CANADA—AUTO PACT SAFEGUARDS

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, since the United States Senate finance committee has given President Nixon authority to apply an excise tax on cars imported from Canada, will the government urge him not to initiate this tax or, alternatively, is the government prepared to consider genuine and complete free trade in automobiles as has been suggested in some United States quarters?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, our opinions are very clear on this subject. What is suggested by the committee if it should become law, would be contrary to the Canada-U.S. automotive agreement. I remind the House that this proposal is only at a very preliminary stage. Approval by the full Senate, a House-Senate conference to iron out differences and a subsequent vote by both Houses on an agreed version, if any, must still occur before any of these provisions becomes law. So it would be like the motion that was presented a moment ago. It is too early in the game, if I may use that word, to raise the issue formally.

Mr. Baldwin: You want to wait until the axe falls.

Mr. McCutcheon: Mr. Speaker, will the government express a clear position on retention of the auto pact safeguards both to these officials and to this House, or is this feature negotiable?

[Mr. Foster.]

Mr. Pepin: It is being negotiated, as I have said on a number of occasions before.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As he knows, in the United States process all the steps he has indicated are necessary can be rapidly taken as a matter of national urgency. With this in mind, in the current negotiations taking place in this city has the government informed the United States officials that in its view the proposed excise tax does contravene the Canada-U.S. automotive agreement?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had listened to the first part of what I said he would have heard the answer to his question.

AUTOMOBILES—ALTERNATIVE PLANS TO PROTECT INDUSTRY IN LIGHT OF POSSIBLE UNITED STATES EXCISE TAX ON IMPORTS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I will try again, and I did listen with care. In light of the possibility of the United States taking action in accordance with the excise tax proposal, does the government of Canada have alternative plans or proposals in mind that could be used to protect the automotive industry in Canada?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think it is too early to talk about this subject. Discussions are going on between Canada and the United States on this matter at the present time and have been going on for a number of months. The Minister of Finance has just reminded me that even if such a bill were passed in the Senate and in the House of Representatives the President would still be free to implement the recommendation or not to do so.

AUTOMOBILES—CONSULTATION WITH ONTARIO AND QUEBEC AUTHORITIES RESPECTING NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a further supplementary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Because of the prime importance of this industry to Ontario and to a lesser degree to Quebec, have the provincial authorities been brought in as consultants? Are they working with the federal government or are the negotiations strictly on a unilateral basis between the federal government and the government of the United States?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the relations between my department and the Department of Commerce of the Ontario government, for example, are good. Personally, I have met with Mr. Grossman, the Minister of Trade, three times in the last three or four months. This is the kind of subject that can be brought up by the Ontario or Quebec governments at any time they feel like. The other day when speaking to the Minister of Finance for Ontario I said I was willing to see him today, tomorrow or yesterday for that matter. We are very accessible, and if he wants to discuss this subject I will be delighted to do so with any member of the Ontario or Quebec governments.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that perhaps we should go on to the next question and return to this one in a short while. For the moment the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Athabasca on a supplementary and then see what can be done about further supplementaries later.

DISCUSSION OF CANADIAN OIL AND GAS EXPORTS WITH VISITING UNITED STATES OFFICIALS—POSSIBLE PARTICIPATION BY ALBERTA IN FUTURE TALKS

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. Can the minister indicate whether the agenda for the discussions with the United States officials will include the subject of oil and gas exports?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): No, Mr. Speaker. It has already been stated by the Prime Minister that discussion of energy matters with the United States would not take place at this time.

Mr. Yewchuk: If and when discussions on oil and gas exports are held, is it the intention of the government of Canada to invite participation by the government of Alberta in these discussions with the United States?

Mr. Pepin: If by "inviting" my hon. friend means to take part in the discussions, this is something different from having previous consultation with the government of Alberta. I suggest there is a difference between the two, and that the second is more possible than the first.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands rising on a supplementary?

Mr. Douglas: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I might indicate to the House now that the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands on a supplementary and the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate and then go to the next subject and call on a representative of the party to the extreme left of the House.

PARTICIPATION BY FINANCE DEPARTMENT OFFICERS IN OTTAWA MEETING WITH UNITED STATES OFFICIALS—DISCUSSION OF EXCHANGE RATES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. Are officials of his department involved in the discussions which are taking place today with the representatives from Washington and, second, will the whole question of exchange rates be on the agenda?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Yes, Mr. Speaker. My officials are taking part in these discussions and as a matter of fact they were in Washington last week having discussions on this whole matter with the officials of the treasury.

Mr. Douglas: Press reports indicate that there have been statements by spokesmen of the Department of External Affairs to the effect that discussions have been going on for some time and it is hoped that the ministerial meeting will be held early in the new year. Does this mean that certain areas of agreement have been reached and, if so, how soon will a statement be made by the government and is it necessary to wait until the new year before the ministerial meeting is held?

Mr. Benson: I think the two matters are mixed up. The ministerial meeting between certain ministers of the United States government and the Canadian government which takes place annually and discusses a great many matters is to take place early in the new year. I understand this is the statement of the Department of External Affairs. So far as the exchange problems and the balance of payments problems of the United States are concerned, the Group of Ten is planning a meeting in Rome, as my hon. friend knows, within a couple of weeks, on November 22 and 23, which I hope I as well as the secretary of the Treasury of the U.S. will be attending.

AUTHORITY FOR U.S. PRESIDENT TO INCREASE IMPORT SURTAX TO 15 PER CENT—CANADIAN REACTION

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Has the Canadian government been informed officially or was it informed prior to now that today the United States Senate finance committee has voted to give President Nixon the authority to raise the U.S. import surcharge to 15 per cent on all products, not the restricted list of some months ago and, if so, what is the Canadian reaction to this position?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): All I have on this matter is a telex. I think what the Senate committee is doing is simply to give President Nixon very broad powers. This is not an indication that he should do this or that. The same applies to the excise tax on automobiles. The Senate committee is simply giving the President, according to the telex I received, very wide powers to do whatever he deems necessary in particular circumstances.

Mr. Baldwin: How naïve can you be?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate on a last supplementary question and then recognize the hon. member for Compton.

Mr. Lundrigan: Can the Minister of Finance tell the members of the House and the Canadian people whether, before he received the telex in question, there was any prior consultation with the American authorities, and what has been the initial response from his office?

Mr. Benson: First of all, I received the telex since I came into the House regarding the decision of the U.S. Senate committee. With respect to consultation, consultations on the particular problem of the surtax have been going on since it was first imposed. There have also been consultations with the United States government on a rather continuing basis with respect to their balance of payments problem.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION AND UNEMPLOYMENT—POSSIBLE WAGE AND PRICE FREEZE

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Finance.

Can he tell the House whether it is his intention to recommend a price and wage freeze in order to curb inflation and bring down the unemployment rate?

[English]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): If any such step were to be taken by the government it would be announced in the House.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

PRICE INCREASES IN CANADA BY AMERICAN-OWNED COMPANIES BUT NOT BY PARENT COMPANIES IN UNITED STATES

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Matane): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he is concerned and what he intends to do about American-owned companies which are unable to increase the prices of their products in the United States because of the price freeze there but are increasing their prices in Canada? Does he intend to do something about it and is he concerned about the problem?

Mr. Bell: Probably not.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has put his question.

[English]

I am not sure that the question is supplementary to the one asked by the hon. member for Compton. The question will be allowed if the minister wants to reply briefly, and then we will go to another subject.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): I will bring the matter to the attention of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I stated a moment ago that we would try to pass on to a second subject and, for that purpose, the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Egmont.

AMCHITKA NUCLEAR TEST—STUDY OF SECRET REPORTS RELEASED BY UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT—DIRECT CONTACT BY PRIME MINISTER WITH PRESIDENT

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): My question is for the Prime Minister. In light of the publication yesterday of a secret report by the top environmental council to the President of the United States that the Amchitka test potentially could cause an earthquake and tidal waves, what steps has the Prime Minister taken to ascertain the importance of this report and its validity and, if so, what is his response?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): It is because of the possibility, although we think it is remote, of disturbances of this kind that we made our first protest to the United States and have protested in various forms since then.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Would the Prime Minister indicate whether or not anyone in his office or anyone in the office of the Minister of the Environment has taken the opportunity to study this and the other reports that have not been made public? If so, is there any attempt being made, even at this late hour, by the Prime Minister to exercise his normal right of office with respect to communication with the President?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of the Environment reported to the House some time ago, we had our own scientists look into this matter and their views apparently are not dissimilar to those contained in the report. It is on the basis of their views that we have made our views known to the American government.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether there is a communication problem, but twice I have asked directly whether any governmental officials in this country have looked at these reports and, if so, do they add any further information, and will there be further representations? Perhaps I could get a straight answer to that question.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, with respect to the latter part of the question, whether there is any further information, the answer is straight—yes, the minister responsible for the environment has had information of his own. As to whether this particular report has been looked at by anyone in my office or in the minister's office, I will inquire.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): As a supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Again I invite the co-operation of hon. members so that we may move on. I will make a determined effort to have as many questioners as possible included in the question period today, but if we are to achieve this I hope we will have as few supplementaries as possible and that they will be brief and will be answered briefly.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, in view of this report and the mounting concern throughout the country over the proposed test on Saturday, will the Prime Minister now reconsider his view on this matter and communicate the concern of the Canadian people directly to the President of the United States?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, my own position has been made known on this, but I hope that members of the Official Opposition who are protesting U.S. action on this basis or on the economic basis will vote againt the motion which is before the House now.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

LAY-OFF OF DOCKYARD EMPLOYEES, ST. JOHN'S, NFLD.—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Minister of Transport or to the minister's parliamentary secretary. Will the minister say what action has been taken on behalf of the large number of Canadian National dockyard employees at St. John's, Newfoundland, who were served with lay-off notices on October 25 which were rescinded on October 27, re-issued on October 29, rescinded again on November 1 and re-issued again on November 2?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will take the question as notice and look into the matter.

Mr. Carter: In view of the fact that these lay-offs will impose considerable hardship on the people affected, would the parliamentary secretary ask his minister to intercede to have Canadian National withdraw the lay-off notices, and do everything possible to prevent a recurrence of this inhuman treatment of its workers by Canadian National?

Mr. Duquet: I can only say to the hon. member that the matter will be looked into today.

WHEAT—STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF SUPPLY AND SERVICES ON NECESSITY OF TWO-PRICE SYSTEM—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. Was the Minister of Supply and Services stating government policy earlier this week in Assiniboia when he said a two-price system for wheat was now necessary, with a minimum price of $3 a bushel for wheat sold domestically in Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did not understand what the minister was quoted as having said but I will look at both Hansard and what he said and then answer as to government policy.

COMMUNICATIONS

GOVERNMENT DIRECTION CONCERNING CONTRACTS FOR FEEDS FROM BEAVER HARBOUR TRANS-ATLANTIC CABLE

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Minister of Communications since the minister is absent but with good cause. Frankly, I want an answer at ten o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McCleave: Would the minister tell the House whether a government direction has been made with regard to the question of the forthcoming award by the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation of contracts for feeds to this continent from the Trans-Atlantic cable shortly to go into Beaver Harbour, Halifax county? The question has urgency because Treasury Board is now considering the tenders, and the decision may be reflected in hundreds of thousands of telephone bills across Canada.

Mr. Trudeau: Ten o'clock.

Mr. McCleave: You be there, Mr. Prime Minister, and I will too.

IMPLEMENTATION OF OUIMET COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Solicitor General. Has the interdepartmental committee set up to consider implementation of the Ouimet committee recommendations yet reported to him and, if so, will he be making that report public?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, this committee still meets regularly and over 50 per cent of the recommendations contained in the Ouimet report have already been put into effect. Work is going on for implementing the others, provided they do not conflict with our policy.

[English]

Mr. Orlikow: Would the minister consider making a statement on motions at an early date indicating which recommendations of the Ouimet report have been implemented, which, if any, the government rejects, and what steps it proposes to take to get the co-operation of the provinces in implementing those recommendations that require provincial approval?

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ALLEGED DELAY IN PROCESSING CLAIMS—OPPORTUNITY FOR MEMBERS TO QUESTION COMMISSION OFFICERS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. In view of the increasing number of complaints concerning the payment of unemployment insurance claims—I have a letter here from a member of the board of referees in the city of London, Ontario—will the minister provide some vehicle by which members of the House from all parties may have an opportunity to question members of the commission concerning their administrative practices and the many complaints that it regularly takes five or six weeks to pay claims? Would the minister, who is very sympathetic to labour and labouring people, do something? He would make himself very very popular if he would.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is now making a speech. He has asked the question and the minister might be allowed to reply.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I had a report on my desk this morning indicating that the number of complaints tabulated by the commission has in fact decreased over the last few weeks. When my estimates come before the appropriate committee the hon. gentleman will have full opportunity to ask further questions. However, I am quite prepared to arrange for an interview between the hon. gentleman and the chief commissioner of the Unemployment Insurance Commission at the hon. gentleman's convenience so that he can bring up these problems personally.

Mr. Nesbitt: Could the minister be persuaded to make arrangements when the new session commences to have his estimates brought on early so that it will not be next summer before the matter is discussed? Also, since the minister has been kind enough to suggest that he would arrange a meeting between myself and the administrator of the Unemployment Insurance Commission, would he include other members who have received all sorts of complaints as well?

Mr. Mackasey: I would prefer to do that, Mr. Speaker, rather than have the civil servants of the Unemployment Insurance Commission rapped with an unfair charge periodically in the House.

FINANCE

CANADA SAVINGS BONDS—INQUIRY AS TO PROTEST REGARDING ADVERTISEMENTS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): I have a question for the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister or his department received any protest or comment from the Ontario Consumer Protection Service that the advertisements of the Bank of Canada and/or the Department of Finance with regard to Canada savings bonds are in direct breach of the Consumer Protection Act of Ontario?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker. The advertisements I have seen indicate that Canada savings bonds are something that should be invested in by every Canadian.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. Has Mr. Donald Peacock been appointed a press officer in London, England, and is this the same person who wrote the life history of the Prime Minister before the last election, a very notable work of fiction?

AGRICULTURE

EGGS—SUGGESTED ACTION TO CONTROL IMPORTS FROM UNITED STATES

Mr. J. G. Lind (Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. My question is prompted by the minister's announcement of a fowl slaughter program to stabilize egg supplies. How does the minister expect his program to stabilize egg supplies when I understand that eggs are being imported into the Toronto area from the United States at a price which enables the importer to sell his product at a lower cost than the local producer? Could this be considered dumping and is there any way that the government can place a surcharge on these imported eggs to protect our egg producers?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I understand that a very small quantity of eggs was imported from the United States under special circumstances. The price of eggs in Ontario has increased about eight or ten cents per dozen in the last week or so and of course this makes the Canadian market somewhat more attractive to American producers. In so far as dumping is concerned, if we can establish that United States eggs are being offered or sold in Canada at a lower price than in the United States then anti-dumping provisions can apply.

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Agriculture. Will the minister tell the House whether these United States eggs being sold in Canada have to be marked as such and, if not, will he take action to ensure that they are marked as U.S. eggs on the grocery shelves?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I am inclined to believe that these eggs were not put on the market at all but perhaps went to the breaking plants.

BUTTER—IMPORTATION FROM UNITED STATES OR NEW ZEALAND

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Agriculture. May I ask whether currently or within the last month the Canadian Dairy Commission or the department has imported butter from the United States or New Zealand?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker, they have not and there may be no imports for several weeks and perhaps months. However, the projections now would indicate that to the end of this dairy year we may be short eight or 10 days' supply on total requirements of butter for the year.

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of reports recently of the deaths of seven people who had taken the drug MDA, with no other apparent cause of death, is the minister conducting an investigation into the use and safety of this drug?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I shall check into the matter and report to the hon. member.

GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATIONS TO INTERNATIONAL NICKEL COMPANY TO PREVENT LAY-OFF OF EMPLOYEES AT PORT COLBORNE REFINERY

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I have a question for the Minister of Labour. The other day I asked the Prime Minister whether he was aware of the situation which exists at Inco involving the possible lay-off of 470 employees. I understand the matter was taken up with the Minister of Labour. Can he now advise whether there has been any discussion with Inco regarding this problem with a view to alleviating the situation?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): The Prime Minister spoke to me about the question and I spoke to the appropriate minister who was not available the other day, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. I am sure he would inform the House that Inco complied with the law and discussed the proposed lay-offs with his department so that the facilities of that department will be placed at the disposal of both management and the affected personnel.

Mr. Alexander: In view of the situation that exists at Inco, is the minister planning to inject a further $100 million into the employment support program?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): The employment support program is only beginning to be put into operation and that question does not arise at this point. The Department of Manpower and Immigration is having specific discussions with Inco under the consultative manpower services in the hope of arriving at an agreement for working out the best possible solution for employment for the individuals involved.

Mr. Alexander: A further supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member may ask a last supplementary but we will soon be running short of time.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INTRODUCTION OF POLICIES TO AVERT BUSINESS FAILURES

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): In light of the fact that Dun and Bradstreet of Canada has indicated that business failures rose in September to 216 from 168 in the corresponding year-earlier period, and that the largest number of September failures occurred in Quebec, 100 companies compared with 88 in September, 1970, is the government considering new selective fiscal measures to avert such high levels of business failures next year?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will appreciate that the question as asked would normally invite a general statement which ought to be made on motions. I would not think that the question in those terms is in order. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain.

Mr. Alexander: A point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I apologize to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain. The hon. member for Hamilton West is rising on a point of order.

• (2:40 p.m.)

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I thank you for your patience. In view of the way you ruled on my question, may I ask the Prime Minister this question. In light of the fact that business failures seem to be increasing, would he indicate to the House when a statement will be made regarding the policies that the government will undertake in order to avert this situation? Surely the Prime Minister can answer that.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know if the hon. member is suggesting that we should make a specific statement to tell businessmen how not to fail. However, if he is not asking that, if he is asking about the general state of the economy, may I say that the Minister of Finance made a statement less than two weeks ago and we are frequently making such statements.

Mr. Baldwin: And that statement caused another 50 failures.

GRAIN

COMPLAINTS REGARDING NON-RECEIPT OF PAYMENTS UNDER FORAGE CROP AND GRASSLAND SUBSIDY PROGRAMS

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration in his capacity as the minister answering for the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the large number of complaints that have come to light recently with respect to tardy payment or non-payment of moneys owing to western farmers under the government's forage crop and grassland subsidy programs which are related to the Lift program, what steps, if any, is the minister taking to clear up this serious situation?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, to the extent that any individual problems are brought to my attention we attempt to check into them. We find, on occasion, that cheques which have been sent out have been lost. There are bound to be some cases like that among the 100,000 applications which were dealt with under the program.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

LAYING-OFF OF EMPLOYEES IN SPITE OF PROFIT MADE

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the high unemployment rate in Quebec, does he know that one Crown corporation, COTC, has fired fourteen men at a time when the company is making $20 million in net profit? Why is that policy allowed, and does the minister intend to change that situation with regard to Crown corporations?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think the specific question had better be addressed to a colleague of mine rather than to me. It is, of course, government policy generally to allow Crown corporations to exercise individual business judgment. As far as the Department of Manpower and Immigration is concerned, we continually offer our services to employees of Crown corporations in the same way as to others who are affected by a lay-off.

SOUTH AFRICA—GOVERNMENT POLICY RESPECTING POSITION OF NON-WHITES

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister say whether Lieutenant Colonel W. Kenneth Robinson, a Member of Parliament, was expressing government policy when he stated on a short summer visit to South Africa that—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows that a question in those terms would not be in order. He cannot ask a representative of the government to indicate whether a member making a statement outside the House is enunciating government policy. That is clearly not in order.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member might rephrase the question.

Mr. Skoberg: Is it government policy to suggest that South African non-whites should realize they are not yet ready for full political independence, as was indicated by Lieutenant Colonel W. Kenneth Robinson?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON CRASH OF AIR SEARCH AND RESCUE PLANE

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, it is with sadness that I rise to ask this question of the Minister of National Defence. It concerns the first serious accident involving an air search and rescue craft in about 20 years. Would the minister make a brief comment on whether the bodies are recoverable, and so on?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the question. The tragic accident I think will serve as a reminder that the business of search and rescue is not only arduous and at times unexciting but also dangerous. I am sure the House will join me in expressing our sorrow to the bereaved families. The accident, as the hon. member indicated, is the first fatal accident involving a Canadian Armed Forces Dakota since 1951. A board of inquiry is under way at the moment. I cannot report at the moment on the possibility of recovering bodies, because, as the hon. member may well know, the crash was complete and there was heavy burning at the time.

In view of that interest, would he follow it up by asking Treasury Board to review the final report of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs in order to bring about a just settlement of this question?

Would the minister indicate when the people of Canada will be given more information on the projects that can be carried out by the departments of Public Works, National Defence, National Health and Welfare, Industry, Trade and Commerce and others?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I cannot put a specific timing on when further details will be announced but they will certainly be announced as specific decisions are made and announcement is appropriate. Decisions are moving forward and I think we may have an announcement about the details before very long.

DELAY IN PROCESSING CLAIMS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Since it has taken between four and six months and in some cases up to eight months to process claims under the Canada Pension Plan, would the minister be good enough to have that situation investigated and ascertain if further equipment is required such as computers, or more staff, in order to expedite these claims?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would advise the hon. member that, because of the hundreds of thousands of claims now coming in as the program ages, it has been necessary in order to catch up with the load for us to do the very thing the hon. member is suggesting. We are converting to computers but the process is not complete.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INDIA—CANADIAN ASSISTANCE FOLLOWING TIDAL WAVE

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if the government has now arranged a program of special assistance for the victims of the terrible tragedy in the state of Orissa, India. If so, what is the nature of the assistance?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I inquired of the department this morning and they are putting before me today a recommendation for some temporary assistance at least in the form of a cheque to the Red Cross, but since it has not come formally before me I cannot yet announce it.

HEALTH

TESTING OF MORNING AFTER CONTRACEPTIVE PILL

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is he aware that an American research laboratory in Chicago has conducted successful experiments with the morning after contraceptive pill, and is the minister's department prepared to conduct similar tests on this pill to determine whether or not it is suitable for use in Canada?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the answer to that, generally, is yes. We are watching the developments in this area closely. Our most recent action was to reconstitute the experimental committee on the pill and other recent discoveries in this area. We expect to have a report from them shortly.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INCLUSION OF COST OF COMPUTERIZED WEAPONS SYSTEMS IN COST OF HYDROFOIL DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister tell the House whether, in the figure of $52.5 million he gave in his recent statement regarding the cost of the development program for the hydrofoil Bras d'Or, there is included the cost of computerized weapons systems and other armament costs?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I think this is a matter of public record but I can look up the references and let the hon. member know.

AIR TRANSPORT

USE BY ROYAL AIR FORCE OF UNITED STATES FACILITIES AT GOOSE BAY BECAUSE OF DETERIORATION OF DEPARTMENTAL RAMPS AND HANGARS

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I have been trying for three days to catch your eye.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Peddle: Actually, I had been absent, Mr. Speaker, attending the funeral—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Peddle: —of a government. My question was to be addressed to the Minister of Transport but in his absence I will direct it to his parliamentary secretary. It is an international question, Mr. Speaker, involving Great Britain, the United States and Canada. Is the minister aware that the Royal Air Force, which up to now has been using Department of Transport facilities at Goose Bay, is now using United States Air Force facilities for its aircraft as a result of the deterioration of DOT ramps, and hangars? If so, what action is the minister prepared to take to ensure that this RAF activity is returned to the Canadian site?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will take this question as notice.

ABORTION

MEASURES TO ENSURE LAW IS APPLIED FAIRLY REGARDLESS OF WHERE PEOPLE LIVE

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. In view of evidence that the abortion law is being unevenly applied, partly as a result of congestion in certain metropolitan hospitals, is the minister studying any measures in conjunction with the provincial health ministers intended to ensure that this law is fairly applied regardless of whether people live in rural or urban communities?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): This is a matter we can properly deal with in debate. Of course, the administration of the law depends on enforcement by the provinces.

[Later:]

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Justice, arising from his earlier answer to the effect that uneven facilities for abortion available in different hospitals could be considered in debate. I should like to ask the minister to do his best to see that we get an opportunity for such a debate during the present session.

INDUSTRY

INCREASE IN PRICE OF CERTAIN SHIRTS BECAUSE OF IMPORT RESTRICTIONS

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Has the government calculated what, if any, increase in the prices of work shirts and low and medium-priced dress shirts will result, or has resulted, from the new import restrictions announced last month?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The opinion of my experts is that the effect will be minimal if any. I would remind the hon. gentleman that there will still be a little more than 1.2 million dozen low priced shirts imported into Canada next year. I am quite sure the hon. member will be able to find one his size if he cares to.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: I do not think we should get personal, Mr. Speaker. May I ask whether the Prices and Incomes Commission was consulted in connection with the decision to limit imports of work shirts and low and medium-priced dress shirts?

Mr. Pepin: Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker but all departments were.

INCOME TAX

PROPOSED DATE OF IMPLEMENTATION OF NEW BILL

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the hon. Minister of Finance a question.

The Finance Minister of Quebec stated yesterday that he still hoped the new tax system would not go into effect until 1973. Could the minister tell the House whether the government intends to apply the new system in 1972?

[Mr. Ritchie.]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): I have indicated very often that it is the intention of the government to proceed with Bill C-259 and to have it passed and implemented on January 1, 1972.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR RESTRAINT IN PRESSING FOR PAYMENTS ON FARM CREDIT CORPORATION LOANS

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Bearing in mind the cash shortage among farmers today, would the minister consider sending a communication to the Farm Credit Corporation asking them to show understanding, caution and friendly restraint in attempting to extract from farmers payments on Farm Credit Corporation loans?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I did that several months ago.

MEETING BETWEEN MINISTER AND ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT COUNCIL—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the elusive Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Has he met with the members of the Atlantic Development Council, and when may we expect a statement from him concerning the recommendations contained in the council's first report?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not met with the members of the council; I have not been asked to meet with them, though I shall probably do so at a future date. However, if I have a statement to make I shall make it in due course.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East on a supplementary and then call orders of the day.

SIGNING OF SUPPLEMENTARY AGREEMENT WITH NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): I wish to direct a supplementary or related question to the minister. Can he now confirm the signing of the supplementary DREE agreement with the province of Nova Scotia and tell us when an announcement may be made?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I think all these questions should be a little more precise. Does the agreement to which the hon. member refers concern highways? If so, I hope it will be signed very soon.

DRUGS

INQUIRY AS TO FINAL REPORT OF LE DAIN COMMISSION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Can the minister tell us when the LeDain report on the non-medical use of drugs will be completed and made public?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): As I said in the House some time ago, the latest advice I have received, after discussing the matter with the Chairman, is that it will probably be available by the latter part of December at the earliest.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the leader of the House what the business is to be for the rest of this week, and what plans the government has for next week, particularly bearing in mind that next Thursday will be Remembrance Day? Can the hon. gentleman indicate whether there is any special plan for the sittings next week?

Mr. MacEachen: Tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, we shall resume the debate in committee on the tax bill and continue it next week. With respect to Remembrance Day and the holiday which is provided for that day under the rules, a number of hon. members have indicated that they would like to participate in ceremonies in their constituencies on that day. However, it will be difficult for hon. members, especially those from outlying constituencies, to do this and be back on Friday morning. If it could be arranged to pick up the hours which are normally spent on government business on Friday early in the week, it might be possible for us not to sit on Friday in order that hon. members can spend Remembrance Day in their constituencies and still be able to get back for the sitting on Monday.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: If that is agreeable we can do something about it tomorrow by way of making it an order.

Mr. Baldwin: I wonder whether the minister is able to give the House a statement as to the government's intentions respecting business for the rest of this session. What happens after Bill C-259 has been completed? In particular, is it the intention of the government or of the Minister of Finance to introduce further budgetary measures which would have to be passed before this session ends?

Mr. MacEachen: It is not the intention of the government, following the completion of the tax bill, to commence discussion of new items which are not presently at the report stage, except, possibly, with respect to the tax legislation arising from the statement in the House some time ago by the Minister of Finance. That would be a possible additional item.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise merely to indicate that as far as this party is concerned we would agree to the suggested arrangements for next week. We feel it would be proper for the House not to sit on Friday, it being understood that the time lost on government business because of our not sitting on Friday would be made up on Monday and Tuesday.

Mr. McCleave: May I express the hope, Mr. Speaker, that we who star in the late show will not be forgotten in all this amity and concord, and that the late show can start, instead of at ten o'clock, at midnight or one o'clock in the morning, whenever the beautiful people in the House of Commons decide to adjourn.

Mr. Blair: As hon. members are aware, Mr. Speaker, there are a number of private bills which have been on the order paper for a long period. It seems that every time there has been an arrangement by the consent of all parties to put one piece of business ahead of another it has been at the expense of these private bills. I ask the leaders of the parties to take into account the fact that this will happen again next Thursday under the present proposal. Can arrangements not be made to replace at least some of the hours which have been lost?

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—NON-CONFIDENCE MOTION—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO DEVELOP POLICIES TO ENSURE ECONOMIC INDEPENDENCE AND FULL EMPLOYMENT—DETERIORATION OF RELATIONS WITH UNITED STATES

The House resumed, from Wednesday, November 3, consideration of the motion (Mr. Macquarrie):

That this House, noting the continuing deterioration of communications on the basis of common interest and mutual respect between the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States, condemns the government for failing to employ and improve firm and constructive economic and political relations with the United States and, at the same time, for failing to develop a new economic policy which would strengthen our economic independence and fully employ our growing and highly skilled human resources.

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House reads:

That this House, noting the continuing deterioration of communication on the basis of common interest and mutual respect between the government of Canada and the government of the United States, condemns the government for failing to employ and improve firm and constructive economic and political relations with the United States, and, at the same time, for failing to develop a new economic policy which would strengthen our economic independence and fully employ our growing and highly-skilled human resources.

There, Mr. Speaker, is an expression of the kind of courageous leadership that this nation requires as it moves into one of the most difficult phases of its history. There stand the Tory statesmen with feet firmly planted, one on each side of the fence, issuing the traditional clarion call of Canadian politicians in difficulty—"Join us in confused inaction". If I did not know the source of this motion I would have sworn that it emanated from the Liberal party. It sounds like something Mackenzie King would have said were he here today. Indeed, I suspect that the motion was written by Eddie Goodman sitting in Laurier House. That, at least, would explain the clear case of schizophrenia which has gripped the person who prepared the motion.

The hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) yesterday presented us with a highly emotional defence of his motion. It was emotional by necessity since one obviously cannot employ logic in speaking in its favour. Following one of the more sentimental passages which drew appropriate reactions from other members of the House, the hon. member for Hillsborough obliquely charged that hon. members were being intellectually indecent. Let me say this, Mr. Speaker: if anything was intellectually indecent in this House yesterday, it was the speech of the hon. member for Hillsborough. When I see a man such as the hon. member for Hillsborough, whom I personally admire, representing a party for which I have a great deal of respect, the party of Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Robert Borden and Arthur Meighen, consciously and deliberately hurl himself into the depths of intellectual dishonesty, I become depressed and angry. This motion reeks with intellectual dishonesty, an intellectual dishonesty motivated by the crassest political cupidity.

This resolution was carefully designed to create the impression that Canada, by taking a slightly more independent stance on foreign affairs, had betrayed its ancient ally, was cozying up to the Godless communists, and that in righteous anger the United States government had smitten us with the 10 per cent surtax. I know that the hon. member did not say that in so many words, but that was the impression he was seeking to leave. One need hardly say that such is a total and complete misrepresentation of the situation.

In the name of what noble cause has the Conservative party perpetrated this disservice to the nation? In the name of more votes at the next election and more money for its next election war chest. The Conservatives know that there are sizeable numbers of people in this country who suffered terrible indignities in Eastern Europe and who undoubtedly as a result view attempts at east-west rapprochement with mistrust. Tory strategists obviously wish to fan the flames of fear in the breasts of such people in the hope that that fear will be transformed into Tory votes at the next election.

The Conservative party is attempting to create a species of sophisticated neo-McCarthyism. It is attempting to form an unholy alliance between the right-wing extremists of the Edmund Burke sort and persons who, because of terrible personal experiences, legitimately mistrust the governments of eastern Europe and the People's Republic of China. That kind of raw political opportunism stinks to high heaven and is unworthy of the Progressive Conservative party.

But what is beneath contempt is the other political pay-off that the Conservatives expect, that of having their warchest swelled by funds from United States corporations operating in Canada. They learned through bitter experience in 1962 and 1963 that U.S. corporations in Canada are extremely nervous about even the most watered down manifestations of an independence of spirit on the part of Canada, and that they will do whatever is necessary to crush it if a Canadian political party gives them the opportunity. The Liberals gave them that opportunity in 1962 and 1963, to the eternal shame of that party and to the discomfiture of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). The Tory party has now determined to play that role. As I said, that is crass political cupidity.

What makes me even more angry is that the whole exercise is not only intellectually dishonest, in direct opposition to this country's best interests, but it is also bloody stupid and completely inept. This motion is making those do-nothing continentalists on the other side of the House look good. To my horror, yesterday I found myself applauding on occasion the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp). The Liberal party, which more than any other institution in this country has contributed to Canada's becoming virtually an economic fiefdom of the United States, is coming out of this debate sounding like the guardian of Canadian independence, courtesy of the Tory party.

Just what has the government done that is so bold and innovative? It has recognized the People's Republic of China. Britain and France did that in 1949. We in the New Democratic Party have been demanding such action for years and so, by implication, have western Tories who have cried for increased grain sales to that country. The government has voted to have the People's Republic of China seated in the United Nations. This the hon. member for Hillsborough called a cruel act. This "cruel act" was supported by two-thirds of the membership of that organization. Is it a cruel act to say that the effective government of China is the government in Peking which rules 600 million Chinese rather than the government of Taiwan which rules approximately three million Chinese and another 10 million or so highly discontented Taiwanese? What bold steps has this government taken which would have the effect of shaking United States confidence in us? Was it because the government invited Marshal Tito for a visit? He was in Washington first. Was it because the government invited Mr. Kosygin for a visit? Mr. Nixon himself is going to the Soviet Union to see him.

What bold actions that are contrary to the interests of the United States have we taken? We have allowed our dollar to float, which is in accordance with United States desires. We have the lowest tariffs in our history, which is also in accordance with United States desires. This government has seen to it that Canada lay supine as Canadian industry after Canadian industry and Canadian resource after Canadian resource has fallen into the hands of foreign corporations. The rate of take-over after the war of about 50 corporations a year has now risen to 175 a year. This is the government which in principle part has presided over the development of a branch plant economy in Canada, a branch plant economy that has hobbled our capacity to be productive, which has warped our economic development into a misshapen horror and left us horribly vulnerable to the effects of the United States DISC program, if and when it comes into effect.

This is the government which four years after receiving a report on the danger to our independence of increased foreign ownership of our economy has done nothing to meet that danger. This is the government that ten weeks after the imposition of the U.S. surcharge on imports has taken no effective steps to counteract its effects, even though by its own calculations the surcharge, if left on for one year, will result in the loss of 90,000 jobs in Canada. This is the government which, threatened by wholesale shutdowns of United States branch plant operations in Canada should DISC come into effect, mutters vaguely about contingency plans and which has not presented any concrete measures for the protection of the Canadian economy for discussion by the Canadian people.

This is why the second part of the motion makes so much sense. The second part reads:

—for failing to develop a new economic policy which would strengthen our economic independence and fully employ our growing and highly-skilled human resources.

What do the Tories really mean by those words? Let me quote a passage from a speech by a prominent Conservative recently:

Another suggestion that has been made, which may shock ... some is that the inevitable answer for Canada is to seek closer economic integration with the United States. There are two sides to that question. Personally, I believe that integration, on a planned and programmed basis, of our economy with that of the United States is absolutely necessary. We have integration now. It happens to be unplanned and unstructured, and it is that lack of planning and lack of structuring that has caused the particular problems of this emergency.

This is a statement by Senator Grosart on October 4. So while the statement in the motion stands as valid, one must question the sincerity of its drafters. There are things we can do and must do right now to meet the current emergency. Spokesmen from my party have mentioned them time and time again, and I will review them briefly.

One of the first steps this party suggested was the reduction of interest rates in Canada, and I am pleased to see there have been some steps in that direction. We have also suggested the establishment of a monitoring agency, similar to that proposed in the Watkins report of 1968 and supported by the External Affairs Committee, to ensure that Canadian subsidiaries of United States corporations do not transfer production to their parent companies in the United States, or elsewhere, for that matter. The third suggestion we have made is implementing very substantial tax cuts, particularly for low income people, in order to increase aggregate demand in Canada. We have suggested the immediate, massive infusion of funds into the field of housing and construction. We have suggested that the federal government should make a serious contribution of funds for building waste treatment plants across the country, both for the purpose of expanding economic activity and for the purpose of dealing with the problems of pollution.

Hon. members will certainly note that none of these measures imply retaliation against United States economic measures. They are measures that Canada can and must take at home to stimulate and build up our own economy, to make it more resistant to measures such as those the United States has implemented. There are also things we can and must do now in order to guarantee the continued independence of this nation. My party has suggested on numerous occasions medium and long-range policies which are absolutely necessary to that end. Again, spokesmen from my party have gone into that time and time again so I have no need to do so now. In fact, time would not permit me to do so.

In summary, it is my contention and the contention of this party that we must now, in the words of the motion, develop a new economic policy which would strengthen our economic independence and fully employ our growing and highly skilled human resources. It is our further contention that a more independent stance on the part of Canada has not and will not result in a deterioration of relations with our friends to the south. If those relations are slightly strained at the moment, if communication is slightly more difficulty, it is not Canada which is at fault. That is not to say we should not be seeking to repair any damage that does exist with all the means at our disposal, but how great is the damage? I would remind hon. members that today's papers carry headlines announcing that United States officials are in Canada to discuss the surtax.

I would, therefore, move, second by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the motion be amended by deleting therefrom the words "for failing to employ and improve firm and constructive economic and political relations with the United States, and, at the same time",—

The motion as amended would then read:

That this House, noting the continuing deterioration of communication on the basis of common interest and mutual respect between the government of Canada and the government of the United States, condemns the government for failing to develop a new economic policy which would strengthen our economic independence and fully employ our growing and highly-skilled human resources.

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): As the House is aware, I hesitate to get into partisan politics, but I have been tempted by the speech we have just heard from the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland). He did make some rather harsh criticisms of the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie). As as matter of fact, he said his speech was an example of crass political cupidity. In referring to the speech of the hon. member for Selkirk, I think I should substitute the word stupidity for cupidity. I do this kindly because such speeches were heard from one end of Ontario to the other during the election campaign last month which resulted in the demise of that party.

It is not strange for us to hear the hon. member utter words of praise for tighter or closer ties with Communist nations. This is a policy that party has been advocating for years. What is strange is that they have an anti-U.S. policy, to prevent the United States take-over of Canadian industry and, at the same time, their Maritime manifesto refers to the state taking over industries without compensation. I have often wondered why, as have many people in this nation, when this party is dealing with anti-U.S. policy and United States interference in this country, they never talk about the interference of the United States unions in Canadian domestic affairs or of retrieving Canadian moneys used for financing United States unions. We never hear them speak about this. If they are to be concerned about Canadian independence they should deal with the whole gamut.

One of the real disappointments to me in this entire debate, as a member for Ontario where this matter is of vital importance, is the fact that the government speakers in the main have not dealt with the actual issue before us. It is not good enough for the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) to spend his allotted time whining about the reaction of our party when we were in government 10 years ago. We want to know what is to be done about the situation facing Canada today, and we want to know what the government's policy is toward the problems of tomorrow. It is not good enough for the Secretary of State for External Affairs to cry about their efforts to date. The man on the street and the people of this nation know there is a difficulty in Canada-U.S. relations today. They know there is confusion and they know we are facing problems we have never faced before. As far as we can gather from the speeches of any members of government, in an official or unofficial capacity, there is no plan, no policy and no program; therefore, there is no progress.

I am going to support many of the statements, and emphasize them if I may, made by my colleague, the hon. member for Hillsborough. In his speech he intimated that we are now in a brand new ball game, and we are. We heard the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto) talking about the Tory party making this an election issue. I should like to deal with that because the Liberal party started making statements of this type during the war of 1812, and they have not changed since. That is nothing new. I would like to say that in this era we are not just dealing strictly with United States-Canadian relations. We are in an era of world trading groups; we are in an era of international combines, corporations, factories and businesses. The hon. member for York East probably knows this aspect of the subject as well as any other member in this House. Why did he not deal with it on that plane rather than deal in partisan politics? He is from Ontario and knows the importance of good United States-Canadian relations.

There are several areas in which we can make progress. One thing I should like to mention is the fact that this government seems to have been almost panic stricken by the application of the surcharge. In his reference to this the hon. member for Selkirk mentioned that the surcharge was applied ten weeks ago but there has been no action yet by this government. I believe the government should be criticized for this because the United States action was not unforeseen. As a matter of fact, those on the government benches who were in a position to be well informed economically, those in the opposition and in the financial circles of Canada, could tell from the fact that the United States dollar had been in trouble for months because of the balance of payments difficulty that the United States had almost no other course of action than the one it took.

My criticism of this government is based on the fact that, having this knowledge and knowing this course of action was almost inevitable, it did not have any program or contingency plan to meet it. The terrible shame is that to date, ten weeks later, we still do not have any program and are still not making any progress. The fact which must be emphasized is that we are still waiting for the United States to make a move. The onus should have been on us. I think this was an opportune time for the Canadian government to show the leadership Canadians expect, because we are in a brand new ball game. The trading patterns in the future are not going to be comparable to those of the past. This was the time for us to break new ground. The fact that we are alienating ourselves from the United States, whether through political moves or government economic moves, matters little if we are to end up all alone. The pattern today is for nations to align themselves together into strong trading groups which can take a share of the markets of the world.

The fact is that Great Britain, which has long been a pillar of strength as a trading nation, has decided it could no longer go it alone and has joined the European Economic Community. It should be pointed out in no uncertain terms that this is the trend. This is the way we are going. We should not be staying on the outside looking in and asking for crumbs from the table of the Americans. When we asked the government what was going on in the European Economic Community, since we were not within the inner circle of informed people, we were told that there had been some consultations in respect of some of the negotiations but we had taken no part in working out the ramifications of such a treaty. This was not the case with Australia and New Zealand; they obtained concessions. Canada did not obtain any concessions. We do not have to leave it at that. There are other areas which we should be exploring. Does it not seem logical and plausible at this time for Canada to start exploring either unilaterally, bilaterally or multilaterally the other markets of the world that are developing right before us? We have Japan; we have the Pacific rim; we have the European Economic Community; we have a whole group of nations.

The world is breaking down into blocks of potential consumers. I am afraid that Canada will find itself running around at the last moment trying to beg someone to look at it as a trading nation. Canada must choose what it wants to be. It must do this now and not count, as we seem to have been doing, on the patience of others as we vacillate without any clear and consistent long-term objective. We must take a stand. With Information Canada which this government uses so well, and with the facilities for the dissemination of news which we have in Canada either through television, radio or the press, if this government had had any policy whatsoever, everyone in the factories and on the street would know about it. But ask any learned gentleman or lady today who is earning a living what the policy of the government is toward the industry they work for or the business in which they are engaged and they cannot give you a single plank, platform or promise. They do not know. I suspect the government does not know. Is it not time we started to take measures to do something about it?

I think the problem is that there are so many departments in this government that one department does not know what the other is doing. A prime example of this is, at a time when a major industry is in trouble through lack of markets, either domestically or internationally, the Minister of Regional Economic Affairs (Mr. Marchand) is allocating money to establish the same type of productive capacity as that which is in trouble. This does not make any sense. Is it not time we embarked on a program to find out what we could do best to compete in the various parts of the world. We should concentrate on these particular objectives, instead of muddling along in the same old manner that was outdated years ago. Certainly, we should learn. If we cannot learn and if we have lost all initiative, then we can copy.

I point to the economic status today of West Germany, which not only has no unemployment problem but has a problem obtaining sufficient workers. We should look to Japan whose industries were smashed during the war some 30 years ago and who today is an industrial giant. Here we are in Canada talking about going to the United States on our knees and asking for concessions. Where is the leadership? Many of us in this House, especially from Ontario, have grown up next door to the United States. Many of us have been engaged in businesses directly concerned with companies in the United States. I am not afraid of United States domination. I am not afraid of a take-over by the United States. That is not what they want. These are businessmen. All they ask is that their counterparts in Canada be businessmen, too, and speak to them as one businessman to another. They do not want Canadians to go to them with cup-in-hand and say "please". They want the co-operation that is their due as one neighbour to another. Is this too much to expect?

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. Paul St. Pierre (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my adrenal glands do not seem to be pumping very hard today. I am more in the mood in which the House was yesterday, I suppose, when I found myself very frequently applauding individual statements made by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie), the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) and others, because I think there were some profound truths spoken about Canadian-American relations. But there seemed really to be more agreement among speakers than disagreement. I wondered for a time if I might see a repetition of something that happened a good many years ago in British Columbia. There was a young judge in the Kootenays named Cox. He visited his circuits only occasionally, and in the district of Boundary it was usually eight months before the judge arrived. At one time the inhabitants of this mining area saved up quite a splendid collection of law suits with which to test the young judge. But his horse went lame on the Kootenay trail and the judge did not arrive on time, so the litigants repaired to the local saloon. Judge Cox was a long time getting there, so they stayed in the saloon three days. At the end of that time all the litigation had been settled among themselves and there were no cases left for the judge to hear. They were strong men in the Kootenays and continue to be so. I will refrain from speaking about Coast-Chilcotin this afternoon because it would take too long.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. St. Pierre: I thought yesterday that perhaps sometime this afternoon the opposition party would decide it was not really worthwhile to bring their resolution to a vote today, but after hearing them today I think perhaps they feel it should come to a vote.

I have had some trouble with the resolution, as have many others. I have looked at it sideways, straight-up, upside down, and I have held it up to a strong light, but I really cannot be sure what the official opposition party is trying to say here. The closest I can paraphrase this statement is that we must stand up to the Americans but we must never tell them anything that they might not care to hear.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. St. Pierre: I am afraid we cannot have it both ways. I am quite convinced that neither our American friends nor any other friendly nation on this earth would want us to do that. The United States does not expect that Canadian policy should be identical with theirs on every issue. We may find such complete harmony of views among the governments of eastern Europe, but not within free and independent societies such as ours, and to suggest that our American friends really expect Canada's views to be identical with the American in every aspect is to insult the intelligence of the American government and of the American diplomats. What the United States does have a right to expect of us is that our position be clear, and that we speak as frankly and calmly about the few areas of disagreement as we do about those vast regions of bilateral and multilateral relationships in which the two governments have worked in complete harmony for many years, and in which they will continue to work in such harmony.

I suggest that in dealing with other states we must have policies which have the immense virtue of credibility. I should like to quote the diplomat Talleyrand. This is a partial quote from a long statement, but I think it is appropriate here. This is what he said:

> In order to destroy a prejudice fairly generally current, I must here point out that diplomacy is in no way a science of cunning and duplicity. If good faith is necessary anywhere, it is especially so in political transactions, for it is good faith that makes them strong and enduring—

In respect of credibility, we might cast our thoughts back to the disagreement between the United States and Canada over the Bomarc missiles. I am sure I do not have to remind members of the Official Opposition about that issue because they were in government then. This was a situation in which Canada accepted the Bomarc delivery vehicles and then said that we did not want to put warheads on them. It would be hard to imagine a less credible policy than that one. It can only be compared to a man who walks into a shoe store, buys a pair of shoes and announces he will only wear one of them. It is such lack of credibility, such unreliability in dealings abroad, that arouse the contempt, anger or scorn of other governments, and who could blame them?

Let us compare this with the recent China vote in the United Nations in which Canada and the United States voted in different ways. First, let us consider that Canada had not pledged itself to support the United States. Second, we had instead informed our ally in advance what our policy was, why we felt as we did, and how we would vote. We did no proselytizing. Other nations could vote as they saw fit; we would vote as we saw fit. Of course, the Americans would have preferred that we support their view, but even in disagreement we were straightforward and our behaviour was credible. I suggest to the House that the Americans fully appreciate our position, and I draw the attention of the House to the fact that not a single responsible U.S. government official or diplomat has accused Canada of betrayal.

In my closing remarks, I would like to deal with some of the opening remarks of the hon. member for Hillsborough in this debate. He said that Canada was not so big as to be feared nor so small as to be despised. I would agree with him, but I would add one more line. I would say that we are not so large as to be feared, not so small as to be despised and not so young as to be pampered. I wonder if psychologically our country was, for much of the first century, in a psychologically dependent frame of mind. For so many generations we looked to mother Britain, who too must have wondered at times if we were ever going to get out of the nest. Last week Britain voted to join the organization which appears to be evolving rather rapidly into the united states of Europe. Are our relations less friendly and less open with the British? Of course not, but the relationship is and has been for some time on an entirely different basis from the old, the basis of two nations with a multitude of common interests and a tradition of friendship. Never again, however, will Canadians even subconsciously be able to take a tug at mother Britain's apron strings.

Then, in our later evolution, I wonder to what extent we depended on spontaneous affection from good old Uncle Sam to the south—Uncle Sugar as he came to be known for his generous spending in many parts of this world. Well, Uncle is still friendly despite what some may say, but we have been reminded that he is a great power and he will behave essentially as any great power and most small powers would do and should do. The government will act in what it conceives to be its national interest, and Canadian governments must also so act. But nothing in this precludes the central fact which has been recognized by most and perhaps all of the participants in this debate. We and the United States are two nations which have a vast multitude of common interests and a long tradition of firm friendship, and this will continue.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, the government members are wondering why the opposition has presented the motion now under consideration. I think that the answer is extremely simple.

For several months, the members of the opposition have tried on several occasions to find out what uneasiness could exist between our country and the United States. Unfortunately, as a result of vague answers, we have been compelled to state the problem clearly in the House and that is why we presented the motion now under consideration.

[Mr. St. Pierre.]

Hon. members, including the government members, would be blind if they did not realize that we have been witnessing for several months a serious deterioration in our relations with the United States, a deterioration which is due, in my view, to some inflammatory statements.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I guess because we imposed a surcharge on them.

Mr. Asselin: We will come back to that later. If the Minister for Regional Economic Expansion wants to make a speech, we will listen to him. If he has remarks to make or questions to ask, I can answer them immediately.

Mr. Speaker, I say that deterioration is the result of the inflammatory remarks made recently by members of the government about our relations with the United States.

Must I remind you that, generally, Canadians bitterly deplored the statement the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made during his visit to the USSR when he spoke of the economic imperialism of the United States? Must I remind you that the equally inflammatory statements of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin), after the 10 per cent American surcharge was levied on imports did nothing to improve our relations with the United States?

Mr. Speaker, the true sense of diplomacy as exercised by former governments has been relegated to the second rank. The attempts of the former Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Pearson) will be remembered: wishing that China be recognized in 1968, he met President Eisenhower and discussed the matter with him; when the president told him that U.S. public opinion was not ready to recognize the People's Republic of China, the prime minister replied that it was impossible for Canada to make such representations if we were not supported by the U.S.

I do not say, Mr. Speaker, that we of the opposition blame the government for having made representations in favour of the recognition of Red China or voted in favour of its admission to the United Nations, but we say that all those decisions must in our view be taken in consultation with our allies, and our closest allies are the United States. In that connection, we have been greatly remiss in our duty by not relying on the quiet diplomacy which is important in our relations with the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I say again what we said a short while ago that we, Canadians, do not want the government to bow before the Americans in order to formulate our economic policy. Nor do we oppose the efforts of Parliament when it enacts laws to guarantee the economic sovereignty of this country, but we want the government to show greater leadership when it comes to establishing with our neighbours to the South relations which in our opinion can have extremely important effects on the Canadian economy as a whole.

Mr. Speaker, to restore Canada's name in the United States, it was even suggested, after the application of the 10 per cent surcharge, that the Canadian government could retaliate against that country, if the latter did not withdraw it.

Does such an aggressive and provocative statement represent the best way to solve this problem?

And despite the fact that the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce went to the United States, we have failed to influence the American's decision and the 10 per cent surtax, as we are all aware, will certainly penalize a great many Canadian industrialists and manufacturers.

Mr. Speaker, as I said, it is not a matter of our going on our knees to the Americans and ask their blessing when we have to take decisions in the interests of Canadians. But I suggest that we must find a formula to coordinate relations between the two governments so that the measures taken by either administration will not penalize Canadians as is now the case with the 10 per cent surcharge.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps we should ask the government to read once more the report submitted by ambassadors Heeney and Merchant on the coordination that should exist in our relations with United States. I feel that if the government chose to reread this report which has been made public, they would find all necessary guidelines to ensure better coordination of our relations with our neighbours to the south, especially in matters as important as those we have dealt with recently.

Obviously, the 10 per cent surcharge, as I said a moment ago, will have a considerable effect on Canadians, which will be felt mainly in the province of Quebec. If we look at the statistics on imports, we find that in 1971 exports from Quebec to the United States and other countries were decreasing, and this has very serious consequences for Quebecers.

Everyone knows that the employment situation is very bad in Quebec. We need all our resources. We must make all possible means available to our industrialists and manufacturers, not only in order to create new jobs but also to protect the existing ones.

Mr. Speaker, I have already spoken here, and I am doing so again today, of the pulp and paper industry, because the subject is of great interest to me and also because some mills are located in my riding. For many years, that industry was the most flourishing one in Quebec. During the past year or so, pulp and paper mills are in an extremely precarious situation, and this is, obviously, because this government and high officials have failed to coordinate our trade relations with the United States. In fact, most of our news-print is sold in the U.S., and mostly in New York.

We have gone through proceedings, Mr. Speaker, and I am extremely concerned when I see that these firms, which had flourished for decades, are now laying off workers, or shutting down for two or three weeks. This is, by the way, what Donohue Brothers Limited and other pulp and paper companies in Quebec are doing, and this government, though we have insisted on that, has not managed to meet with some representatives of the U.S. government so as to ensure the survival of the news-print factories.

Mr. Speaker, other industries in Quebec are also affected by the 10 per cent surcharge, and it would be enough to name the snowmobile industry. Even if the snowmobile industry is tax exempt under the automobile agreement, the fact remains that because we impose a 12 per cent tax on imported snowmobiles, we now have an important fight to win. In fact, we notice that American snowmobile manufacturers have been trying for some time to influence the Nixon administration in order to get a revision of the automobile agreement, so that the United States tax snowmobiles imported from Canada at the same rate we tax those we import from that country. The snowmobile industry was created in Quebec. Thousands of Canadians earn their living from it and because of the lack of leadership from the present government, Quebec is losing important profits in that field.

Mr. Speaker, in closing, I wish to point out that we did not merely want to criticize the government in a non-objective way with regard to our relationships with the United States, because it is not a matter of being pro- or anti-American, but of strictly facing facts.

We have serious problems with our southern neighbours and for the past few months we have been asking the government to enlighten us, to define its policy of co-ordination of relations with those neighbours, and since we have had no specific replies, we introduced this motion in order to clarify the situation.

Hon. members, whatever party they belong, to, should seriously consider the possibility of supporting our motion in order to force the government to show better leadership, in our relations with our southern neighbours.

[English]

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, participating in this debate yesterday, my colleague the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto) said that this motion which is before us now was perhaps the issue which the Official Opposition might use at the next election. The question was put very squarely to the hon. member for Kent-Essex (Mr. Danforth) and there was no reply given in any terms understandable to me. I sincerely hope this is not the case because if there is any issue in which the loser would be Canada, it would be such an issue. None of us could gain by seeking any narrow partisan political advantage out of events that have taken place with our neighbour to the south. I listened with a great deal of interest to some very good speeches.

An hon. Member: From this side.

Mr. Francis: I felt that perhaps there was no reason for members on this side of the House to rise when I listened to the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) and the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland) attack the Conservative party for its hypocrisy in attempting to blame the deterioration of our relations with the United States on the Liberal party, and—

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Francis: —when they recalled the deterioration that had taken place under the last administration for which the Official Opposition was responsible some years ago. But then we saw, through an interesting procedural device, the presentation of an amendment by one party in the opposition to a motion presented by another party by which the absurdities of the motion itself were reduced to a minimum. I find it strange, in listening to the very good speeches, that the member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands had found a method of defending it so that they could-

An hon. Member: You only listened to half the speech.

Mr. Francis: They have changed the thrust of the motion. They have deleted one-half of the motion, and the part they have deleted is the charge against the government that it is responsible for the deterioration of relations with the United States of America. Therefore, all the sanctimonious pieties that we heard in the speeches from the Official Opposition are, by the admission of the opposition itself in accepting the amendment, thereby denied by their own act. There is no longer any obligation on members on this side of the House to attempt to answer the absolutely absurd charges contained in the first half of the motion.

What we have before us now, Mr. Speaker, is purely and simply a motion which is cast in the framework of economic nationalism which says that Canada should seek to become more independent in its economic relations with our neighbour to the south. This is the thrust which the New Democratic Party has given to this debate and which has been accepted by the movers of the motion, admitting the clumsy way in which it had been originally construed and the absurdity of trying to put together the pieces which were totally irreconcilable.

We have to look at the economic realities of Canada. As a result of the events of recent days we have a wave of economic nationalism surging in our country. We all recognize that. As Canadians, we have a certain dual aspect to almost everything we do with the United States. On a day to day basis we want to drive a motor car of North American manufacture; we want to buy gasoline of a North American brand; we want to be able to cross the border and use credit cards; we want to watch the same programs on television; we want to participate in the same national or international sports of football—and argue whether it should be three downs or four downs—and hockey in which we trade our players back and forth. We want at the same time to maintain our complete social, economic and cultural independence.

There are certain problems in seeking those objectives and the problems come out when we have to deal with matters like this. I have received, as I am sure every member of this House has, letters from constituents demanding that we take forcible and vigorous action against our neighbours to the south. Indeed, my colleague the hon. member for York East who spoke earlier in this debate also spoke in the debate in this House on September 10 when he said Canada should stand alone. These are fine phrases, but Canada's record as a trading nation is something that we should not forget. We know that 28 per cent of our gross national product is derived from exports and that per capita we are one of the world's great trading nations. We have to look at places like Singapore, Hong Kong and so on to get a similar situation in per capita terms.

We have to look again at what is happening in the contemporary world. I listened to my good friend the hon. member for Kent-Essex when he spoke about Great Britain joining the European Economic Community. It is no accident that the decade of debate was finally resolved by a government of the United Kingdom supported not only by a majority of its own members but a very significant group of the Official Opposition in the House in a historic decision to join the European Economic Community.

Those of us who speculated about what such a decision would mean to Canada have got over the initial alarm with which we approached the potential loss of the Canadian markets, realizing that we must look forward. It is suggested that we must take advantage of the expanded markets and prosperity of western Europe, especially since that prosperity will undoubtedly grow in the years ahead. Yet, there is no immediate prospect of Canada's joining the European Economic Community. The facts of geography are against it. The facts behind the trading patterns of Canada are also against it, if one examines those facts. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) have said in this House that we must face the problem of creating jobs and protecting jobs.

In its 1965 report the Economic Council of Canada pointed out that resource development does not create enough jobs and that we have to look to secondary industry if we want to create jobs. In order to achieve our national objectives, industries that show reasonable prospects for development should be given the greatest encouragement possible to develop. Where are we to find markets for those export products other than our national resources that create jobs in Canada? I listened to my hon. friends on the other side talk about the growing Japanese market. Does Japan really want to buy our aircraft, or does that country want to buy our copper, paper, coal and primary materials? We complain in Washington, and justifiably, in my opinion, that the Americans want Canadians to be hewers of wood and drawers of water; yet would not the Japanese wish even more to create such a pattern if we were to seek to expand our trade with them?

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Francis: Would they be prepared to accept Canadian manufactured products as a substitute for the raw materials that they are now buying in such quantities as to create serious balance of payment problems which affect our relationships with Japan?

An hon. Member: In what quantities?

Mr. Francis: Those of us who think that Canada should seek markets ought to be a little more precise. They ought to specify which markets for which products they have in mind. I listened to the hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Kierans) say that we should export more wheat. He distinguished between renewable and non-renewable resources. Where should we export more wheat, Mr. Speaker? Where should we export more paper products? Hon. members ought to tell salesmen of the pulp mills across Canada where to sell paper. They are doing their very best to sell paper right across the world. We should export our manufactured products, of course; but where do we find the markets that want to buy our manufactured products?

An hon. Member: We'll find them.

Mr. Francis: Which markets will take our manufactured products instead of taking basic raw materials which they feel we should supply? Mr. Speaker, the so-called "simple facts" of economic life in Canada are not at all simple. We are an exposed nation and, on top of all our other difficulties, we face difficulties in our relationship with our neighbour to the south. We face a major crisis in the field of international currency. In view of the difficulties involving the International Monetary Fund and the collapse of the Breton Woods Agreement, we face the prospect of a long period of floating currencies without any agreement to bring about currency stability in sight.

A nation that is thus exposed in the markets of the world is not a nation to rattle any kind of economic sword, Mr. Speaker. There are those who will say that I am not belligerent enough, that I am not demanding enough for Canada and that I am not adopting a sufficiently bellicose line in standing up to those who are uttering such terrible things in Washington. The word I want to leave with the House is this: no one stands to gain by pursuing aggressive and ill-conceived policies of economic isolationism, as I said yesterday to my good friends in the NDP when I applauded them after they had spoken so well of the true record of this government in the field of foreign relations.

This debate is related in part to the field of foreign relations, and we have conceded that there is no case against the government in terms of what it has done. We are now talking about how far we can pursue economic isolationism in the name of Canadian independence. We must think hard, Mr. Speaker, and we must think in terms of our own vulnerability. That should not inhibit us from driving the best bargain we can, from fighting for stable currencies with the Council of Ten and from doing our best to play our role as a constructive international trader, because that is our role in the contemporary world.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member may only ask a question with the permission of the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Francis: Agreed.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, I merely want the hon. member to clear up something that arose in his remarks. He said that the Official Opposition, "has accepted an amendment to our resolution". Of course, this is not factually correct. Will he not agree that we merely did not object to it as being procedurally acceptable as we did yesterday?

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, if hon. members on the other side want to say where they stand on this matter, they will have an opportunity to participate in the debate and clarify the record, because their position is far from clear.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, before coming to the main part of my remarks may I indicate to the previous speaker, and to others who have spoken today, one of the sources of the concern that has resulted in the motion under the name of the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) being put before the House. One concern arose as a result of remarks made last night by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp). He was responding to the opening remarks of the hon. member for Hillsborough and was dealing with the multiplicity of avenues and channels of communication with our good neighbour, the United States. He said in part, as reported at page 9310 of yesterday's Hansard:

> I will just mention a few of them. I will first take some of the older, established ones.
> There is the Permanent Joint Board on Defence.

I interjected and asked, "How often has it met in the last five years?" The minister answered:

> It has met frequently, and it is meeting very soon.

For the sake of the record and to indicate to hon. members the concern that led in part to the bringing forward of this motion, may I say that the Canada Ministerial Committee on Joint Defence, formed in September, 1958, met, actually, in 1958,1959, 1960 and 1964. That board has not met since.

Mr. Danforth: There goes the minister's credibility.

Mr. Forrestall: The Secretary of State for External Affairs saw fit to refer to this matter. That was his first example of the level of our relationships with the United States. What he said was not correct. That shows why we are concerned and that, in part, is why I am on my feet now.

In addition, I should like for a few minutes to talk about another aspect of our deteriorating relations with the United States. In the general area of defence, our relations have deteriorated. We stopped listing the United States as potential enemies in our official war strategy planning documents back in 1931. Sometimes you get the feeling, and I have had it particularly in the last two or three years, that, for some reason unknown to Canadians, we have decided to list them in that category again. We long ago recognized, as many hon. members in this chamber have noted, the inseparableness of our positions with respect to defence.

Indeed, the truth of this statement will be borne out by an examination beginning with the Hyde Park Declaration of 1941 and ending with present defence production sharing arrangements. It will be seen that in the development of this particular relationship with the United States, it has become absolutely necessary for us to enter into the closest and frankest of relationships with our American allies in the areas of defence and defence expenditure. John Gellner expressed this view on this matter in his Globe and Mail article of April 28, 1971:

> Canada is the only country in the world with almost unrestricted access to the U.S. arms-market. The cornerstone of the Defence Production Sharing Programme which was put together in 1958, was the waiving by the U.S. of the Buy American Act where Canadian Goods were concerned.

I am trying to show the closeness of our relationships in this area and the degree of sincerity with which the United States recognizes the existing, close relationship. The degree to which we are involved in defence production sharing is evident from two or three simple facts.

First, over the years it has provided, and continues to provide, jobs for well over 100,000 Canadians. As of the latest figures we seem to have a surplus in the order of $509 million.

Here again, is a reason for one of the fears which has led to the tabling of the motion we are discussing today. The United States treasury people are eyeing this surplus closely, so closely in fact that pressure is building up to knock some of it out through the forced sale of the Lockheed Orion. During the past year and a half, I suppose, there has been a departure by the United States from practices and procedures which have been followed for a long time. We must ask ourselves out loud, why this is. It is unfortunate, Mr. Speaker, but one does not have to look very far to find an openly expressed opinion in the United States that during the past two or three years Canadian negotiators have been acting more like hungry headhunters in search of victory rather than honest traders. As a result, our American friends have been much more cautious in their trading approach, because they believe, rightly or wrongly, that our end is victory for victory's sake in order to satisfy what some people might consider to be a sentiment in Canada which would say "To Hell with the Americans". This is an impression which exists in the United States because the government has done nothing to correct it.

In a field as complex as defence, it is imperative that those involved enjoy mutual confidence and trust. Because of this, our attitude toward our United States neighbours must always be honest, frank and open. The 1964 white paper was a basis for departure from an approach which we had taken for many years. It paved the way for what has become a serious deterioration in the quantity and quality of information we exchange with the United States on military, scientific and related matters. Let us consider some of the reasons for this. First of all, there was the unilateral decision to cut back NATO troops in Europe. This comes to mind immediately. There was the decision to reduce our maritime fleet by virtually half—though, admittedly, some of these vessels were obsolescent. There was the hesitancy displayed with regard to the part we would play in NORAD in the future. The white paper of 1971 made no mention of what our posture would be in 1973 when the agreement comes up for renewal. There is the Prime Minister's statement that the preservation of Canadian sovereignty was considered more important than continental defence. Peyton Lyon had some interesting comments to make about this proposition.

I, myself, am hard-pressed to imagine how one could separate the defence of Canada from the defence of North America, but in any event this observation has created serious doubts among our NATO allies to the south. We have shut down Bomarc sites. We have refused in a determined way to permit the use of our facilities at North Bay in the event,—which Heaven forbid—that Colorado Springs was destroyed or put out of action as a result of nuclear attack. One has heard expression in many quarters from time to time in traditionally Liberal circles, not to mention circles close to those who sit to my left, that what we are doing is retreating from traditional military ties and associations, particularly with Britain and the United States, to a position of neutrality. People are wondering out loud whether we are doing this in order to placate the Soviet Union, so as not to disturb the new relationship with Russia. Again, in the policy papers for Canadians we find that the maintenance of Canadian sovereignty is listed as the No. 2 priority, whereas in the white paper on defence it was said to be priority No. 1. Mr. Speaker, if we do not understand whether it is our first priority or our second, how can we expect our American allies to understand it?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Forrestall: We on this side sincerely suggest that it is the responsibility of Canada to participate to the fullest possible extent in continental defence. I do not think this view is seriously disputed on either side of the House, but I believe it ought to be stated. In spite of the fact that we may generally agree with this thesis, it is apparent that we are not taking steps to accomplish it. Nor do we go to the trouble of informing our friends to the south of our changing plans. I cannot help but wonder whether the Americans consider that we are likely to make any real or meaningful contribution to military defence. I think this uncertainty has resulted in a very serious downgrading of the quality of military and related information exchanged between the two countries.

The importance of this downgrading is, indeed, very real. Dr. G. R. Lindsey, Chief of Defence Research, told the maritime defence sub-committee in January, 1970, that reductions in Canada's military contribution had resulted in the drying up of United States military and scientific information which used to flow into Canada. Dr. Lindsey specifically said, and I quote:

> Not too long ago we did make a survey of the number of reports that have been coming in from some of our allied countries, and it is much less than it used to be. Of course, we do not know what reports they have written they did not send us, but it seems surprising that we are getting fewer. I think we find ourselves invited to less exchanges of information and scientific and technical meetings than we were.

This decline in reports was particularly noticeable, he said, in relation to plans for new military equipment or the results of the testing of experimental vehicles. In short, the whole field of nuclear weapons, radar and sonar detection devices. In this respect, I can only conclude that the government's attitude toward the United States, as reflected and determined by the Prime Minister's decision to use Soviet Russia as a platform last summer from which to take a whack at our United States allies, could lead to an even further decline in these exchanges of vital information. Maybe the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made his observations facetiously on that occasion. I do not know. But he did make them, and he has not retracted them. He said he feared economic or military domination from the south.

Surely, Mr. Chairman, a determined government can broaden and extend its relationships with other countries, such as the Soviet Union and China, while at the same time continuing to enjoy good relations with the United States. These are good things and we in this party welcome them. We also welcome the initiatives of the President of the United States. What we do not welcome, and what continues to scare us, is the fear being engendered by the present administration because of its inconclusive and undetermined policy objectives, particularly in the military field, that have let our United States allies not to take us nearly as seriously as they have in the past, and indeed as they should if we are to continue to get along on this continent in the way we should.

It is my contention that our weakness comes only from fear itself. We have no need to fear, as the hon. member for Kent-Essex (Mr. Danforth) said, economic domination by the United States because this will not happen.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I regret I have to interrupt the hon. member, but I do so to inform him his time has expired.

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, as a North American country, it is inevitable that Canada has developed North American points of view on political, social and economic questions and possesses certain North American social and racial characteristics. Geography is an important part of the relationship between Canada and the United States, the customs and outlooks we have acquired, and also accounts for the constant flow of people between the two countries. It has been estimated that one-third of all the people of Canadian origin are now living in the United States, and a goodly percentage of American people are living in Canada. It is, therefore, natural that economic and financial relationships are closer and more extensive than those between two foreign countries.

It is because of this background that in the course of time United States capital began to exploit and develop our immense natural resources and provide a market for our nickel, iron ore, oil, gas and forest products, to name a few. This invasion of capital from south of the border has been exploited by various groups, and has initiated a wave of anti-Americanism, condemning any and all United States investments in Canada. It is not the government that is anti-American.

In an interview given by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to a journalist last February, he was asked: "Do Canadians suffer because of domination of the economy by American business interests?" The Prime Minister replied:

> They don't, I think, suffer in an economic sense or even for that matter in a technological sense. It is because of American capital investment, and the technology that came with it, that we enjoy one of the highest standards of living in the world—that our resources, which are extraordinarily abundant, have been exploited to the extent that they are and have provided wealth for the people of Canada. So they don't suffer in that sense.

I believe that anti-Americanism in Canada stems from the fact that United States capital has successfully developed some of our major industries, hence the voices of blind nationalism which are heard almost daily in this very chamber. A few weeks ago, I listened to a panel discussion on the topic of American investments in Canada. It sounded as though the "taking over of Canada" by the United States was well on the way; and it ended with a good dose of anti-Americanism. There are reasons for this sentiment. Americans can be ruthless, hard-boiled, keen investors, not afraid to risk capital ventures in the hope of making a fortune, and they often have. However, the fact is that we are forever tied to the United States by reason of geography, history and circumstances, so let us be practical and make the best of it.

The United States is a great and wealthy nation, with many good qualities and great achievements to its credit. It was born of revolution. It lives in, and on, crisis. But it has been, and continues to be, the most generous nation the world has ever known. It has contributed millions of dollars through foundations and in other ways to Canadian universities and organizations. Its colleges and schools have been freely open to Canadian students and scholars, and every year thousands of them take advantage of these opportunities for study and research. Its contributions to science and technology are almost fantastic. Do we want to build walls against this? Do we want to reject it, and refuse to permit its entry to Canada? As for United States investment and the often repeated cry of "take-over" by our nationalists, this is a matter of concern to every thinking Canadian. But we do need United States capital and United States know-how, and I believe we should continue not only to admit it but to go after it. At the same time we should and must take the necessary steps to ensure that actual control remains in Canada; and the government of Canada is doing just that.

Mr. Gordon Archibald, president of the Maritime Telegraph and Telephone Company, speaking to a conference in Toronto, as reported in the Globe and Mail of October 8, made a vigorous plea for the benefits of continued foreign investments in Canada. He linked it with sharp attacks on anti-foreign investment arguments of the Committee for an Independent Canada, and said:

> Businessmen must rally to convince others who oppose foreign investments on emotional and nationalistic grounds. Few, if any, practical businessmen oppose foreign investment, particularly in our resource industries. It would be fine if Canadians could control all companies doing business in Canada, but this is not practical. Until we can, let us be thankful we have a wealthy neighbour, whose citizens have the resources and are willing to take risks and to invest in areas where we Canadians, even when funds are available, are not so inclined to invest our money.
> The Committee for an Independent Canada charges that Canada is being "bled", which is questionable indeed.
> The basic inflow-outflow comparison ignores the over-all gains resulting from the foreign investment itself: in the form of various taxes and reinvested profits, the creation of exports, substitutes for imports, demand for imports, and other beneficial effects to the balance of payments.

In conclusion, he warned of the serious danger of adopting any kind of nationalism, or desperation measures, to save Canada from an imaginary, self-induced situation.

The "Business Review" published by the Bank of Montreal for October 27, 1971 carries an article by Mr. Leonard Walker, president of the bank, and I should like to quote a few paragraphs from it:

> The Canadian attitude towards foreign capital has been described as a love/hate relationship and the description seems to me to be quite appropriate. On the one hand, as a matter of national policy we have from the beginning welcomed foreign capital with open arms, and even the most ardent nationalist will admit that we could not have got along nearly as well in the world as we have, or have enjoyed so many of the good things of life that come from a high and rising material standard of living, if we had not been able to use other people's savings for the development of our great country. On the other hand, there have over the years been waves of resentment about the degree of dependence on foreigners which the use of their capital seems to imply, as well as ill-defined fears about the dangers in terms of loss of political sovereignty or the loss of a national cultural identity. However, as with any relationship as devoid of logic as the phrase love/hate suggests, realism has tended to be submerged by emotion.

Frankly, I am less concerned about the so-called "American take-over" in the sphere of industry, economics, and natural resources, than I am about unemployment. If American capital will develop an industry in Thunder Bay that will create jobs for our unemployed, I am all for it. I am confident that the Canadian government will continue to recognize the need for foreign investment for some time to come. Canada has the fastest growing labour force, relative to population, in the western world. The investment required to create a new job in manufacturing is around $25,000.

Job requirements and welfare costs are the main reasons Canada has a continuing need for foreign investment. The economic nationalists argue that Canada should be able to get along without foreign investments. Their argument fails to take into account the rising cost of new job creation, and social welfare. Recently, the Hon. Jean Marchand, Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, announced an incentive grant of $332,000 to Larson Woodlands Research Limited for a new plant to manufacture short wood harvesters in Thunder Bay. The new plant will empl oy 80 persons. The incentive is based on a rate of 15 per cent of the approved capital costs which are estimated at $.5 million, plus $3,200 for each new job created.

The President of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, Mr. Neil V. German, speaking to the Canadian Club of Toronto, a few weeks ago, said:

The goal of Canadian foreign policy should be to obtain some kind of special relationship with the United States imbedded in law and treaty, which could begin with selected free trade, industry by industry.

Since Canada has no major outlets for its manufactured goods, which employ more Canadians than any other economic sector, we may find ourselves obliged to seek and make special arrangements with the United States, so that they will give us some special treatment. Our bargaining power for such negotiations is substantial: they need our raw materials in the foreseeable future.

One fact of life is that it is clear that Canada is utterly dependent on the American market.

No one can deny that foreign capital has helped to keep Canada together, and prosperous, as a nation, beginning with the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway a century ago, down to the development of the Steep Rock Iron Mines in northwestern Ontario and the creation of a community of 6,000 people at Atikokan.

Another example is the export of Canadian coal to Japan, mined in the Kootenays of British Columbia, developed by United States capital which alone will contribute $324 million in labour income, and $210 million in taxes over a 15-year period, according to Mr. H. M. Romoff, Research Manager of the Canadian Pacific Railways. He made these statements before a Canadian Transport Commission hearing, which further indicated much greater loss than the sum of these two figures, if the area was not developed at all. There must also be taken into consideration all the jobs created; special railway equipment had to be designed and built in Canada; a new superport, Robert Bank, had to be built; townsites had to be constructed to accommodate staff, with all that means in provisions of supplies and services, as in the case of numerous other developed projects. Whole new areas have been and are being opened from such simple beginnings as a single mine—from new homes to offices, beauty salons, bowling alleys, supermarkets, hotels and newspapers. The fact about this particular coal mine is that the coal which is now being mined would still be in the ground, unused and contributing nothing, if an American company with the necessary money and nerve had not undertaken to develop it.

Full employment is the key to prosperity and, although the employment picture across the country is one of concern, there has not, and it appears there will not be, any immediate danger of mass lay-offs in Thunder Bay. The manager of the Canada Manpower centre in my constituency said recently that we did have some lay-offs at the Great Lakes Paper Company. He said, however, that the economy in Thunder Bay in general is fairly reasonable. Construction has been booming. The shipyards and Canadian Car are moving ahead with work; and there will be no slackening of activities at the grain elevators. In other words, the Thunder Bay economy, I am pleased to say, appears to be better than in most Canadian cities.

In conclusion, I want to stress that my views on foreign investments are that I would much prefer to see greater encouragement for Canadian-owned industry, rather than discourage foreign investments.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): During my comments I will not spend any time discussing that intellectually confused or dishonest, and I hope it is the former, resolution presented by the Conservative party. It has already been dealt with adequately by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland), and even, God forbid, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp). What I should like to deal with primarily is the automotive industry.

In terms of the resolution before the House the automotive industry, perhaps more than any other in Canada, symbolizes the issues at stake. On the one hand, it is a major industry employing, if we include, as we must, the supplier plants to the automotive manufacturers, some 83,000 Canadians, and its exports are responsible for an annual surplus of trade to the extent of $200 million. It is therefore a major industry both in terms of the number of Canadians employed and our trading position. In my view, it is also the major bone of contention in terms of the United States government's economic policies as they are directed toward this country.

In recent weeks, the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, Mr. John Connally, and the Assistant Secretary, John Petty, as well as numerous Congressmen, Senators and other officials within the president's office, have all been referring to the Canada-U.S. auto agreement as the major block or obstacle in that government's view to what is necessary for the removal of the surcharge against Canada imposed by President Nixon in the middle of August. There can be no doubt that automotive pact changes are a major objective of the United States. The single most important area of trade in terms of our favourable position with the United States is the automotive industry. Therefore, in terms of U.S. economic interests in redressing what they consider to be an unfair imbalance, they want to go after the automotive pact. As recently as today, we heard that further action is planned by the United States government. A measure has been introduced in the U.S. Senate and was passed by its finance committee yesterday. This was a proposal to allow the president to levy a 7 per cent tax on automobiles exported from Canada to the United States. Of course, this would be in complete violation of the Canada-U.S. automotive agreement if it were enforced.

When the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) and, as I recall, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), were questioned about the matter this afternoon, they dismissed it as being not a very serious matter in the typical, nonchalant government fashion. It was suggested by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce that this was just a first step. He said that before it could be acted on it would have to get through the Senate as a whole, the House Committee on Ways and Means, and then be approved by the President. I say to the government of Canada that that process should not be lightly dismissed. If the United States government, both the executive and legislative branch, should deem it to be of prime importance to their economy to act quickly, they could get that measure right through all stages of the legislative process in a matter of days. Then, President Nixon would be in a position to act as unilaterally as he did in imposing the surtax in the first place. This possibility cannot be lightly dismissed.

I should like to say something about what led up to our present crisis. Before I do so, however, perhaps it would be worth while to mention the numbers involved in terms of the practical matter of jobs which seems to concern people around here in the abstract but not in terms of any attitude or emotion which results in any concrete action in respect of rectifying the situation. The people in Ste. Thérèse, Quebec and in St. Catharines, Oshawa and Windsor in Ontario as of Monday this week experienced about 2,300 job reductions. This affects currently at least 7,000 or 8,000 men, women and children if we take families into consideration. This is very significant. It is 10 per cent of the General Motors labour force and cannot be lightly dismissed.

If the safeguards in the auto pact are not maintained—and no one including the Prime Minister of this country has said in recent weeks that they will be maintained—what is currently happening in General Motors could spread to Ford, Chrysler and American Motors. In a year or two, it might mean that instead of having 83,000 persons employed in this industry the figure could be down to 10,000. I repeat that this possibility should not be lightly dismissed. This is a distinct possibility. It is a distinct desire on the part of certain United States Senators, including the senator for Michigan, and it is the distinct desire of many other congressmen. Unless this government makes its position clear in respect of these safeguards it is very understandable that the state of apprehension and anxiety which exists in the automotive homes throughout this country will be maintained.

In 1964, it was decided to set up the automotive agreement which was finally signed in 1965. At that time the government of this country had to make a major decision. It had to ask itself whether Canada, like Sweden or Japan, should create an independent autonomous automotive industry. That was one possibility. That would have been difficult to bring about. However, that was one alternative. The other alternative was to more fully integrate our industry into the economy of North America. That was the decision reached and that principle is embodied in the Canada-U.S. automotive agreement.

When this was done it was realized by the government that we could not simply have free trade in automobiles because this industry is virtually owned and controlled in the United States and there would be nothing to protect jobs in this country if pressure should be built up, as has been the case in the past six months in the United States, to create and maintain jobs in that country. So, important safeguards were provided in the pact. The first safeguard concerns the ratio of production to sales of vehicles in Canada. The agreement provides that, as a minimum, manufacturers must produce vehicles in Canada in the same ratio to sales as they produced in 1964. The second safeguard concerns the amount of Canadian economic content involved in the production of automobiles in this country. A certain Canadian dollar level, different for each manufacturer, based on its 1964 position, must go into the production of cars in Canada. This provision ensures that not merely units of cars but real dollar value is protected in Canada and that a certain amount of the labour content in the production of automobiles is ensured for this country.

These are the safeguards which the government of Canada has refused to assure the people of this country they will maintain. They must be maintained at all costs, but in addition to this the government of Canada should be seeking in a positive, non-belligerent way to improve the position of this industry within the country. The Canadian government should be insisting that the minimum objective is to increase the Canadian value added component to 100 per cent. That is to say, if the total value of cars sold in Canada by a North American manufacturer is $100 million, then the minimum Canadian dollar value of his production should be $100 million. This is a very important point because at the present time we do not produce all we consume in terms of dollar value in the automotive industry. The government has, therefore, a legitimate and positive point it can make in negotiations with the United States. It need not maintain its defensive, supine position on this issue. These two points rest directly on the issue of our economic relationship with the United States, and on the kind of trade arrangements which exist between our government and the government of the United States.

There is the matter of employment. I would remind you, Mr. Speaker, that this is the last part of the Conservative motion. Very few people have spoken of this. The motion criticizes the government for its failure to develop a policy to fully employ our growing and highly skilled human resources. Something must be done to encourage the expansion, or at least retention, of the number of jobs which currently exist in this industry. I remind hon. members that at present the number of jobs in the automotive industry is being reduced and that a state of genuine apprehension exists, I am sure, in the ridings of at least 10 or 15 members of this House.

What else can the government do? If it is concerned about the creation and maintenance of jobs, it can remove entirely or at least substantially reduce the federal tax on automobiles. It did this last spring in respect of the electrical appliance industry, and the effect on the economy and on that industry was very positive; jobs were created. There is no reason this could not be done in the automotive industry. Second, I urge that a very serious investigation be made of the price-making policies of the automotive industry in this country. There is no adequate reason at this point that automobiles in Canada should be sold at prices which range between $100 and $700 more when purchased in this country than when purchased in the United States.

I have here two shipping statements taken from automobiles produced in Oshawa. They reveal a very interesting situation, indeed. One is off a car being sent to Verdun, Quebec, and the other is off a car being sent to Rochester, New York. These are identical automobiles produced in Oshawa. The manufacturer's recommended price for the automobile to go to a destination in Canada is about $700 higher than the recommended price for the automobile being shipped to the United States. This is an astounding fact. These are the manufacturer's recommended prices. I repeat that these are identical cars run off the line in Oshawa. If you add to the difference in the recommended prices such things as vinyl interior, floor mats, wheel covers and so on, all of which are listed as extras although most people would hope they could be taken for granted, you will find there is another $100 of difference in the recommended price for the car sold in the province of Quebec and the car sold in the state of New York.

I think it is a scandal that after all the years of the auto pact's existence, after all the capital renovation of plants that has taken place on this side of the border which has led to the fact that we have the most efficient industry in North America on this side of the border, not on the American side, we should be paying from $100 to $700 more for a car. Therefore, I say that this government has an obligation to investigate this industry very thoroughly and to reveal its findings to the public of Canada. I say this both in terms of the general interest of Canadians as consumers, and more specifically in this case in terms of the interest of the 83,000 Canadians who are employed in that industry. If we want to compete with Japanese imports, one of the best ways of competing, in my judgment, would be to drop the prices of automobiles very soon. If General Motors and other companies were prepared to accept the same profit margins that Japanese and German automobile producers are prepared to accept, then they could compete, and we would not have as we now have some 25 per cent of the cars sold in this country being small foreign imports. They would not be imported because they could not compete if our major producers decided to set prices in an equitable fashion.

I will conclude, in terms of the recommendations for the federal government with regard to the automobile industry, on that point. I have tried to stick as closely as I could to factual points. I will repeat my opening observation that this industry above all others in Canada is perhaps symptomatic of the issue involved in this debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I must advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. C. Terrence Murphy (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I will not take any time dealing with the wording of the motion which has been placed before the House because that has been done adequately by many speakers before me. I need not say any more than did a very eminent gentleman lately, who said that the resolution seems to be one of the things that meets itself coming around the corner.

During the course of the debate there have been a number of excellent speeches, and I would like to comment on some of them, particularly the opening speech by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie). That speech was emotionally touching; its phrasing was beautiful, and at times it was even melodramatic. But at the end of it I seemed to get the impression that the hon. member was so carried away with the brilliance of his eloquence that he forgot to deal with the facts. I must endorse the comments of the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland) when he dealt at greater length with that particular speech. During the course of his remarks he said that he experienced great difficulty during the course of the speech by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), because he was agreeing with it, and even at times had to applaud it. May I say to the hon. member for Selkirk that I found myself in the identical position while the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) was speaking.

Mr. Baldwin: That makes four of you in the wrong.

Mr. Murphy: There were a couple of other speeches, one by the hon. member for Kent-Essex (Mr. Danforth) and one by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall), both of whom said that we have nothing really to fear from the Americans; they have no aims on our country and all they want to do is to deal as businessmen. That may be so, and I do not dispute it, but I wish I could be as sure of that as these hon. members are because there are other people around who are not that sure. I should like to quote someone of their own ilk. This article appeared in the Toronto Telegram of October 8. It was written by Aaron R. Einfrank who, the Toronto Telegram alleges,—at that time at any rate it was not a Liberal newspaper—to be an expert on things in Ottawa. He wrote:

> The surcharge and other protectionist moves against Canada are indications of the change which has been brought home to me during ten days of interviews in Washington . . .
> An example of what might be termed the end of an era is a conversation I had with a high-ranking Nixon Administration Official in his office.
> I asked this official, who is close to the ultimate political power in the U.S., what would happen if American protectionist policy led to the destruction of the Canadian state because of resulting economic chaos in Quebec and elsewhere in Canada.
> He began his answer in a routine way by saying "I don't think it will happen." Then I was stunned to hear him ramble on: "But if it did happen, it might not be a bad thing."

In explaining why "it might not be a bad thing" for Canada to disappear, he made two points:

The North American economy could be planned on a unified, continental basis, in regard to land and resources, including energy and water, as well as in regard to industrial development.

The addition of 21 million predominatly white "stable" Canadians to the American body politic would counter-balance "our minorities here". In other words, these 21 million "stable" Canadians would tend to off-set the influence of 23 million blacks in the U.S.

I do not know whether or not that is correct, but I recommend to the hon. member for Kent-Essex and to the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East these comments for their consideration when they are considering the whole problem.

During the course of the debate there has been much philosophizing and much flowing oratory. I should like, if I may in my small contribution, to come down to the facts and face hard realities. What are the facts? I submit that if we really look at them, and look at history, we will admit that Canada and Canadians have been spoilt. We have been spoilt first by the United Kingdom, later by the Commonwealth, and more lately, since the second world war, by the United States of America. We have reached that lofty plateau where we are described as having the second highest standard of living in the world, and I suppose we have. We arrived there, particularly during the last two decades, by looking to the south and seeking to follow as the sheep follow the shepherd. Why do sheep follow shepherds? Sheep follow shepherds because the shepherd takes care of them, and that was what was happening to us during the last 20 or 25 years.

Then came August 15 and the boom was lowered. The shepherd found that his house was in danger. He found that he could no longer take care of all the sheep; he had to look after his own interests, and that is a quite valid position. If he did not look after his own interests, he would be a fool. Some people in this country seem to think that the actions taken by President Nixon on August 15, and latterly by Secretary Connally, are tragedies and represent, in effect, a tragedy for Canada. I do not think so. I think that those activities, and what has happened during the last two months, have given Canada the pause it needed to stop and look at itself. We must must look at our policies, find out where we are, and determine where we want to go. If we re-assess the facts there are two or three things that become obvious.

In order to exist, we must trade. In order to trade, we must have markets. Those markets do not exist in Canada. We need the markets in the United States. We need the markets in the United Kingdom, in Europe, in Russia, in China, in Japan and wherever else we can find them. One alternative, the one that seems to be espoused by the loyal opposition, is that we can seek some form of economic integration, the suggestion being that this economic integration be with the United States of America. One of the members memtioned, and used as an example, the moving by the United Kingdom and other countries into the European Common Market so that that community will now be a group of ten as compared with a group of six. This is the type of example we are told we should follow.

I should like to point out that it is one thing for six or ten countries of approximately equal size, approximately the same interest in all ways, but particularly in size and particularly in the value of gross national product, to get together and form a bloc. But it is another thing completely for a country the size of Canada to join a country ten times its size and hope to retain any type of national recognition. There is no way that can be done. Economic integration with the United States will lead eventually to complete economic domination, and economic domination will lead to political integration and eventually to political domination as well.

Mr. Baldwin: How about Luxemburg and Germany?

Mr. Murphy: Luxemburg, the three Benelux countries, always work together with Germany as a group and have the same voice as Germany in the Common Market. They are three countries and they work together as one.

A second alternative is to throw up the barriers and take the route to economic nationalism; I think everyone agrees that would be disastrous. A country this size, trying to go it alone, would end up completely on the outside, bankrupt and completely undone, and would be at the mercy of any other country. This, too, would lead to the loss of our national identity.

Thankfully, Mr. Speaker, there is a third route. We, as Canadians, can decide to mature economically. We have been weaned, as I said, by the United Kingdom and by the Commonealth, and to a degree we have received special treatment and pampering from the United States. Now is the time when we should be prepared to recognize that we are no longer economic infants; we are mature people prepared to act responsibly and with maturity.

We must decide if it is possible to enjoy the luxury of having the second highest standard of living in the world and at the same time compete with other countries in the market places of the world. Can we any longer afford the luxuries of wasteful industrial strife, high wages, fat profits large dividends, short work weeks, a high return on the dollar, and so on? Can we afford all that and still claim for ourselves the right to economic and political independence? As responsible adults, what do you do when you realize you are living beyond your means: What then should responsible Canadians do if they wish to retain the right to be called Canadians? That is the question facing us today, Mr. Speaker. Have we matured enough as a nation to recognize and accept our responsibilities? Are we ready to put our work muscles where our mouths are?

We were born a little more than 100 years ago. We took our first faltering steps as a nation when we helped our friends in the Boer War. We passed the age of puberty with flying colours by our participation in World War I. We learned in our adolescence that life is not a bowl of cherries. That was the lesson of the thirties. We demonstrated our strength and daring as young adults in World War II and later in Korea. Now, in a time of crises, in this time of re-assessment, I believe that Canadians have the opportunity to prove to the world and to themselves that they have attained the full maturity of adulthood, and I do not think we should be lacking in the courage to try.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, the first thing I want to say is that the speech by the hon.

member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) yesterday has drawn consistent and continuous remarks from every member. I cannot understand how a speech which was "so inadequate," "so incomplete," "so contradictory," "so emotional," "so filled with nothing good" could draw such a tremendous response from everybody, beginning with the past leader of the NDP and moving over to the person who sits to the right of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). That struck me as a bit strange when listening to this debate.

In June, 1970, the government published what it termed a theoretical framework of Canadian foreign policy, a white paper which consisted of six booklets: Canada's position on Europe, Canada's position on the Pacific region, Canada's position on Latin America, Canada's position on the United Nations, Canada's position on Development Assistance. But there was no reference at all to Canada's position on her relations with our neighbours, those whom we in this party talk about as our neighbours to the south of us. On numerous occasions we have given the government the opportunity of spelling out its position on economic policies and on other policies connected with our relations with our southern neighbours. We did so again yesterday, and yesterday I listened to the speech made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp). Later, I re-read his speech to see if I could believe my ears and eyes.

His speech contained no reference at all to our present political and economic relations with the United States, no reference at all to the present economic moves by the United States, no reference at all to the Gray Report which finds itself locked away in somebody's desk drawer, no reference at all to energy policies, and no reference at all to the conflicting statements made by people such as the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien). It was just unbelievable. I have never read or heard so much in my life and learned absolutely nothing from it. The minister's speech was filled with words like "childish". I repeat that this was a speech by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, that great diplomat. It was filled with words like "silly," "contradictory," and "hypocrisy," all in reaction to the position taken by our spokesman on external affairs, with no reference at all to the position of the government. There was a continuous challenge, one which seems to be dominant in the front benches of the government, a challenge to our party to state our position on a multitude of issues.

It may be trite to say the obvious thing, Mr. Speaker, that we are living in a unique nation. It is the second largest nation in the world geographically speaking, a nation of 22 million people, a nation with great resources and with great regional disparities but which has a rather unique tariff policy. Our tariff policy reacts to the tariff policies of another government, the government of the country to the south, which has devised a system which makes it difficult for us to manufacture and export manufactured products but which makes it very easy for Canadian industrialists and business people to export raw resources.

Despite the bragging of the government that we have a buoyant economy, we have a country which has had massive problems over the last several years, not just since May, not just since the imposition of the U.S. 10 per cent surcharge, with rapidly growing unemployment. We have a government which has allowed the business community to remain in a position of uncertainty to the point where, if one watched the stock market over the last several months, one saw a drop of 10 to 12 percentage points from the level that existed six or seven weeks ago. According to recent statistics, business failures in the province of Quebec have increased by about 10 per cent and have increased right across the nation.

In November, 1971, we are faced with two significant challenges. The first is to improve our interrelationships with our neighbours to the south through discussions, and the second is to see what we can do within the confines of the Canadian economy, bearing in mind our resources, our manufacturing position, our taxation and tariff position, to help a staggering and sick economy. These challenges have faced this nation for the last several years.

I cannot see how any of those people who sit to my extreme left can say that the motion before us today is the least contradictory. We are saying that we have a challenge to establish healthy working and friendly relationships, both political and economic, with our neighbours to the south. We are also saying that, bearing in mind our resources, the economy of the Canadian nation, the tariffs and the business community, bearing in mind all the conditions that are peculiar to Canada, we can develop economic muscle. That is what we are saying in the motion.

The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Murphy) was here for 15 minutes today and I heard him and the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin (Mr. St. Pierre) say that we have been spoiled, that we have emerged from puberty and adolescence, have reached adulthood and must become independent. They said we have to become big boys and expose ourselves to all the winds and forces of the international scene, that we have to be able to negotiate with other countries and maybe even turn our backs on our friends to the south, saying that we have now reached the age of maturity. But I ask these members what we have done in the last three years to put muscle in the Canadian economy so that we can become independent, so that we can insult our friends and allow a breakdown in our international relations? Right now we find ourselves in a corner, because at the moment our neighbour receives 80 per cent of our exports.

There are questions that I should like the Secretary of State for External Affairs to answer today. What have we done with energy? Have we found out from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) what our total capacity is? Have we discovered how much the Americans depend on it? Are we in a strong bargaining position? Do we know what our own domestic needs are? Is it necessary to develop the Fundy Tidal Power project? The Churchill Falls project has been developed privately with the assistance of one provincial government and no assistance at all from Ottawa. What is the position on resources domestically? And have the Americans become so dependent on our resources that we can talk tough to them? Have we developed strategies to help our resource industries by means of tax credits, tax abatements, tax incentives or industrial growth incentives? Are the Americans so dependent on our resources that we can take that line of attack without hurting ourselves? Can other nations in the world supply the resource needs of the American people? If we talk tough are we liable to lose the market and thereby the jobs which have been created through the export of raw materials? I feel that this government has reached conclusions on these questions, but for political reasons or through incompetency is afraid to disclose them to the Canadian people.

What is our position on technological capability? Are we so capable technologically that we can forge ahead and become dominant in the world? What have we done about developing managerial capability? The books I have read say that any nation is dependent to a large extent on managerial capability for independence in the industrialized world. Has Canada set up special programs to help business communities, industry, universities and technical colleges develop managerial expertise? I am not talking about a master's degree from a university; I am talking about spending a lot of Canadian dollars to assist the business community in developing competency in the field of management.

What have we done about the recommendations of the Science Council of Canada for a new industrial strategy? I am not referring to an auto pact or an ad hoc policy on textiles or a policy on resources that is ad hoc to everything else in Canada. What I am talking about is a major industrial strategy which includes tax policies, tariff policies, expertise in management. Has the government considered these measures? This is what we are talking about in the second part of our motion when we refer to a number of things that we can do within Canada in order to make ourselves more vigorous and viable. No nation in the world will react to Canada making moves on its own considering its unique characteristics, its qualities, its advantages and disadvantages. This government has not stated any policy on energy, on resource development, on managerial capability nor a new industrial strategy. I do not think that our neighbours to the south can talk with people in this government because I do not believe this government knows where it stands on these issues.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lundrigan: If the Gray report found that we are so inextricably involved with the United States economy that it is going to be difficult for us to do any more than reconsummate the marriage, why are the Canadian people not informed? If this government has found in discussions on energy and resources that we are not indispensable, why are the Canadian people not informed? These are things that the Canadian people must accept. I do not believe that the Canadian people are all that upset and terrified over losing their economic sovereignty. If they were faced today with a choice between losing economic sovereignty or suffering massive unemployment, I think they would quickly opt for closer relations with our neighbours to the south.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lundrigan: I do not believe that in order to stand as adults among the nations of the world we have to sacrifice our political independence or identity as a nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lundrigan: Newfoundland became part of this nation in 1949 and has not lost its identity. It has not lost its culture or its heritage.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lundrigan: It is an integral part of the Canadian nation in every sense of the word. In the last three and a half years, I think we have had the worst of both worlds. I see members on the other side of the House whose feelings I know are the same as mine. Our economy went from a position of relative strength four years ago to one that is causing grave concern to every Canadian. The economy has been weakened to the point that more than 7 per cent of our labour force, on a seasonally adjusted basis, is unemployed. We have a government that persists in blaming this on our neighbours to the south. They blame everybody. They blame striking workers, single people, young people, the aged, new technologies, lazy deadbeats, organized labour and participation rates; and now they are blaming our United States neighbours for our unemployment.

Instead of blaming all these people, the government ought to accept the challenge of establishing closer and better working relationships with our neighbour to the south and attempt to offset the devastating economic situation that has arisen in Canada. Instead of doing that, we have offended our neighbours. We have made it much more difficult to establish healthy working relationships with them. At home nothing has been done to help us find a way out of our present position in order to make sure that when similar moves are made by other nations in future, the Canadian people will be better able to stand alone. That is the devastating part of what has happened. The challenge facing this government and the Canadian people is this: we must find a better, quicker and easier way to establish adequate working relationships with our neighbour to the south. We must remember that, aside from relying on the United States, we can do many things for ourselves within Canada, so that in future we may stand economically independent.

Mr. Ian Wahn (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, despite the eloquent and forceful manner in which the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) expressed his point of view, it is entirely clear, of course, that the motion originally introduced by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) is not only confused and illiterate, it is also intellectually dishonest or schizophrenic. That has been clearly established by a number of speakers, including the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) and the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland).

I do not intend to spend much time repeating arguments which have been advanced. The motion, however, is helpful and important because it exposes clearly a fundamental cleavage within the ranks of the official opposition. This cleavage cannot be denied and is clear if one reads the record of yesterday's debate. One of the views is that expressed by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) who emphasized the importance of developing, basically, policies of Canadian nationalism. In so speaking, he was speaking in the tradition of the original founder of his party, Sir John A. Macdonald. On the other hand, the hon. member for Hillsborough spoke in another tradition, a tradition which has also been associated with his party for many years, a tradition and I say this with respect because I respect the views of the hon. member, that is based on what I might call the colonial mentality, the fear of independence which pervades a large part of Canadian society and which affects some of our business people, some of our professional people and some of our bankers and other financial people. This is a fear of new initiatives, expressed by the desire to remain in a sheltered position or, as is sometimes said, under the American umbrella. Theirs is the desire to maintain the status quo. After all, these are privileged people and very comfortable at present. They do not want to rock the boat. They are not anxious to take new initiatives. They want to wait and see.

Years ago they wanted to wait to see what Great Britain would do, and then they would follow; and today, Mr. Speaker, they want to wait and see what the Americans will do, and then they want to follow. They are terrified at the possibility that a country so small, so weak and so dependent as they suspect Canada is, should ever do something before our American friends do it. This was made entirely clear in the remarks last night of the hon. member for Hillsborough.

What were the reasons he gave for attacking the present government for alleged anti-Americanism? We had taken an initiative in developing friendlier cultural and trading relationships with the Soviet Union and other countries of eastern Europe. We had taken steps to establish trading and cultural relationships with the People's Republic of China, and we had failed to follow the United States lead with regard to the recognition of the Peking government of China. We were diversifying our economic and cultural relationships and the hon. member said—and I emphasize that I am referring to what the hon. member said—that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) had made some injudicious remarks to this effect. On that basis, this government is accused of an anti-American policy. It is a very serious charge and appears on page 9299 of Hansard, where the hon. member for Hillsborough is reported as having said:

—no government in Canada should recklessly engage upon a rampage of anti-Americanism without being prepared to face some painful consequences.

That is true, of course, but I think the implication is clear. The hon. member is charging this government with such a policy. And that is false; that is far from the truth.

An hon. Member: That is what the hon. member says.

Mr. Wahn: That is absolutely false.

An hon. Member: Bull.

Mr. Wahn: It is false for the reasons I have given. There is no basis for the charge, as proved by those illustrations which I have already given. Obviously, there is nothing inconsistent with our diversifying our relations with other countries and developing friendly relations with other countries while maintaining friendly relations with the United States and our traditional friends.

Nevertheless, and this is an important point, we must recognize that, unfortunately, in Canada today there is a great deal of anti-American sentiment. But that anti-Americanism has not been sponsored or encouraged by this government. That anti-Americanism shows itself in many ways. For this reason, we should be very careful in Canada to emphasize and continue emphasizing, and re-emphasize, if necessary, our desire to maintain the friendliest possible relations with the United States while at the same time—and this is not an inconsistent position—diversifying our relationships and trying to build friendlier cultural and trade relationships with other countries as well, even though they have not traditionally been our friends. For example, when we start firing off telegrams to the President of the United States protesting against the Amchitka blast, I think we should also send telegrams to the heads of state of the Soviet Union, France and the People's Republic of China, because they are all doing much the same thing, and it is bad no matter who does it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wahn: When we protest, as we often do in Canada, against the American involvement in Viet Nam, should we not also protest against the Soviet Union's involvement in Hungary of some years ago and its involvement in Czechoslovakia?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wahn: When we protest against the American treatment of blacks and other minority groups in the United States, should we not also protest—and send telegrams—against the treatment in the Soviet Union of minorities in that country and should we not also protest against our own treatment of our own minorities in Canada?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wahn: Although there is no substance in the allegation of the hon. member for Hillsborough, which charges our government with anti-Americanism, I am happy that the point has been raised and brought into the open because, in repeating that allegation the hon. member for Hillsborough, whether he realizes it or not, is joining in and participating in a widespread whispering campaign which is now under way and which is designed to suggest that the present government of Canada is communist oriented and is trying to "cozy up" to the communists—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wahn: —and give up its traditional friendships with the United States and the countries of western Europe.

An hon. Member: That is true.

Mr. Wahn: I suppose all of us in the House have received some of the filthy publications which mostly come, I think, from extreme right wing organizations in the United States which make these charges. I am, in a way, glad to see this charge raised in the House in this debate so that the people of Canada can realize just how insubstantial it is.

I should like to return to the most important aspect of this discussion. Should Canada seek economic integration in a single continental American market dominated by the United States, or should we seek economic independence based upon the development of a new Canadian economic policy which in turn must be founded upon the development of multilateral relationships, basically economic relationships? This is the fundamental economic problem which faces us in Canada at the present time. And opinion in Canada is divided right down the middle.

I have spoken of the cleavage within the ranks of the Official Opposition. But there is also a cleavage within the ranks of the NDP. This becomes clear when we emphasize that it is not just business dependence we are talking about but dependence in the field of trade unionism, and the domination exerted by the so-called international unions, which are really United States dominated unions.

Within my own party there are obvious differences of opinion. Although I respect the views of my hon. friend from Fort William (Mr. Badanai) as expressed earlier today in this debate, I can hardly agree with them.

The hon. member for Fundy-Royal attacked the government because it has not yet made up its mind what its policy should be in this field. It has, indeed, taken time to make up its mind and it is just as well that it should not hurry the process. Because when the new policy is published, if it is directed toward achieving a greater degree of Canadian independence, we can be sure that hon. members opposite will attack the government for being anti-American.

Policy in this area has to be developed very carefully and in a responsible way. While continuing to emphasize that we shall necessarily for many years continue to be highly dependent upon our United States friends in many ways, I certainly hope that when the policy is published it will indicate clearly that we are moving toward a greater degree of economic and cultural independence. I hope that we shall reject the notion of complete economic integration with the United States as being inconsistent with the maintenance of an independent and unified Canada.

I should like to emphasize that the new Nixon economic policy involving the 10 per cent surtax and other protectionist devices does pose a serious economic threat to Canada. But it also presents us with a tremendous opportunity if we have the courage to take advantage of it. It emphasizes, as nothing else could, the extent of our dependence on the United States. What is the use of the people of Canada having elections to elect members of this House if our economy is completely integrated with that of the United States: if, as a result, all the basic economic decisions are made in Washington, if at all?

The people of Canada are primarily concerned about their jobs, their families, and getting enough to live decently. All these things are related to the state of the economy. If our economy is integrated with that of the United States, decisions in this area will be made in the United States unless, as sometimes appears to be the case, the U.S. economy is completely beyond the control of the American people, in which case there would be no one guiding our economy.

For these reasons it is important that the government announce promptly its policy concerning foreign investment in Canada. I hope it will be a policy pointing in the direction of less rather than greater economic dependence upon the United States. Mr. Speaker, to help our United States friends I think we should renounce voluntarily and unilaterally the benefit of the special exemptions they have given us in the past. We should give up our exemptions under the interest equalization tax and other balance of payments programs introduced by the United States to protect its balance of payments position. Our reserves are higher than ever before—more than $5 billion. We could well afford voluntarily to give up the benefit of these exemptions as an indication to the United States that we recognize their problems and wish to help them, while at the same time moving in the direction of greater independence for Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): I was beginning to doubt that I would be able to get the floor on this subject today.

I have the pleasure to speak to the non-confidence motion which condemns, and I quote:

> the government for failing to employ and improve firm and constructive economic and political relations with the United States, and, at the same time, for failing to develop a new economic policy which would strengthen our economic independence and fully employ our growing and highly-skilled human resources.

I think this motion should be closely scrutinized since it allows us to look back briefly at the performance of the various governments we have had since 1962.

To this end, I will give the substance of the first four speeches I heard in the House. As I only have 15 minutes, I will quote the analysis of those speeches published in today's edition of Le Devoir, entitled "Canada-US hot line cooling down", which states:

> The foreign affair critic, Tory MP Heath Macquarrie, yesterday stressed the fact that no Canadian government can afford the luxury of violent anti-Americanism. This statement was booed by the Liberals.
> The economies of our two countries, Mr. Macquarrie stated, are closely related, and any government which tries to undermine traditionally good relations between Ottawa and Washington is endangering the position of Canadians, who are in the hands of Americans.

That was for the first speech. The article comments as follows on the second speech:

> Secretary of State for External Affairs Mitchell Sharp answered that disagreements between Canada and the United States do not necessarily reflect a deterioration of the relations between the two countries but that they are more likely the outcome of the development of these relations.
> These relations must develop according to the circumstances and that sometimes may cause some disagreements, said Mr. Sharp.

He could have added: the extension of their relations with other countries.

And I quote further:

For this part, former New Democratic Party leader T. C. Douglas, commended the government for its efforts to establish better relations with the socialist and communist world.

He said that he was surprised to hear that blame from the official opposition which in his opinion goes along with the right wing organizations and newspapers that attempt to accuse the government of turning its back on "our excellent American friends" in favour of the socialist and communist regimes.

However, the NDP member expressed the hope that Canada will achieve greater economic independence and closer control over the corporations operating in its territory.

As we may see, member of the New Democratic Party are always tempted to come back to their socialist doctrine in order to control corporations. So they keep trying to stand against those who dare talk against certain communist doctrines.

As usual, they moved an amendment which was rejected. So, they came up with another one. I want to point out that as far as we are concerned the chair should never accept amendments on allotted days, days which by right belong to the parties moving the non-confidence motion. Often the other parties take that opportunity to try to bring in their own ideas about the motion moved so that it completely loses its meaning, as it happened in our case.

This is why I ask that such amendments not be introduced in future but that we discuss instead the non-confidence motion moved by an opposition party. We should not have to put up with these amendments. Let us deal with the subject matter.

I resume the quotation:

As for Mr. Matte, he stated that we should not wait for a further deterioration of Canada-United States relations before taking action.

Relations are not too good, he went on, compared with what they have been in the past.

Speaking of the Canadian economy, the member for Champlain reiterated that the evil is more in the present system than in the nature of Canada-United States relations.

If Canada could achieve production equal to its consumption, the 10 per cent American surtax on imports would have had little effect on us.

Those were the opinions expressed by the first four speakers on the motion.

Now, let us get down to facts. First political aspects, after which we will deal with our economic situation and finally with our future diplomacy.

To my knowledge, and I have been sitting here since 1962, this matter of anti-Americanism began under the former administration, that of the Progressive Conservative party under the leadership of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). That government was charged with anti-Americanism because it opened more widely its doors to British goods. That was the opinion of the then right hon. Prime Minister and he may have been right at that. That assuredly did not please the United States because non only did we see the consequences in the progressive conservative defeat, but we all know that the Americans financed the liberal victory. American financiers attempted to bring back to reason those who wanted us to stop relying so much on North American markets.

That is the nature of the present conflict and I do not contend that the Progressive Conservative government was any more anti-American than the Liberal government that followed was pro-American, but I say that we acknowledge facts. American capital put the government headed by the right hon. Mr. Pearson into power, because the previous Progressive Conservative government disappointed Americans a little.

The present government under the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) then presided over the destinies of the country. Several questions come to our minds. We feel the United States are also asking themselves questions, because they do not know whether the present government is pro-American, anti-American, socialist, capitalist or democratic. We still do not know. It is neither flesh nor good red herring. I think that is partly what the United States fear. Even those who are members of the cabinet fear that. Privately, they are afriad of the Prime Minister: is he a socialist disguised as a liberal, or a liberal disguised as a financial dictator? We still do not know.

That is, I believe, part of the cause of our present difficulties with regard to our relations with the United States. At times, he says that he is of the left or of the far left, although he looks to the far right and remains with the Liberals. And this governmental instability surely scares the United States, although, on the whole, some effort is made today to find markets outside the American continent—which is very well—but the economic context should not be ignored.

And this brings me to my second point, the economic context in which we find ourselves. What are our present economic positions? In fact, in many areas, especially with regard to raw materials, we are exporters. We also export a certain quantity of semi-finished products, but we import large quantities of finished products, and this poses a threat to our economic situation.

In order to direct our economy toward increased independence, as proposed in the second part of the motion, I feel that it is time for Canada to deal with its own affairs as regards finished products. This is where our economic weakness is most apparent. As long as we are not aware of this economic weakness, we will not be able to live beside a country like the United States and deal with them on equal terms, because we are dependent on them. In fact, we are a little bit like the child who has not yet left his mother; we are still being led by the hand by the United States since we have to get from them 60 per cent of our consumer goods.

If this government really means business, if it wants to act responsibly, let it start first by developing our secondary industries so as to satisfy the needs of local consumers. That is the first step to take.

On the other hand, we often compete with the United States. We should not conceal the fact. As competitors, we should play the game and be cautious. If we are selling the same product to other countries, it gives rise to conflicts because the United States are used to treating us as a child and when we want to act like an adult, they get angry.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

[English]

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, as has been said by other hon. members, this Conservative resolution is an embodiment of contradictions. They are trying to have it both ways; they are trying to ride two horses at once. On the one hand they condemn the government for poor relations with the United States because it took certain initiatives, and on the other they condemn the government for not presenting a policy of economic independence, which in itself is a very serious issue that could disrupt relations with the United States. I do not view this as an argument against such a policy and I will discuss this question later. The Conservative opposition condemns the government when it takes steps to make this country more independent, but at the same time criticizes it for not doing more. Fortunately, most Canadians can see through this nonsense.

What are the matters raised by the Conservatives when they allege there are poor relations between Canada and the United States? First of all they refer to the recent economic measures introduced by Mr. Nixon, the surcharge and others. If those measures resulted from Canadian action, certainly all governments in the world could be condemned by the same resolution. I submit, as many others have done before me, that the United States action is an attempt by that government to solve their economic problems by riding on the backs of not only their enemies but also their friends. In that particular instance I say Canada is not at fault. We have floated our dollar, we have had very liberal trade with the United States, and we have tried to communicate on all problems. What has happened is not the fault of this government.

Another issue raised is the Amchitka incident. If there are poor relations between Canada and the United States as a result of our protests regarding the Amchitka test, whom are we to hold responsible? Are we to hold responsible those people who may be damaged seriously by such a blast, or are we to hold responsible those people who are initiating this atomic test which could cause serious ecological and personal damage not only to Canada but to many parts of the United States and other areas of the world? I fail to see how the Canadian government bears any responsibility if there is a breakdown between Canada and the United States on that point.

Next we have the visits of Messrs. Kosygin and Tito to Canada and the visit of our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and our Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) to eastern Europe. We also have developed relations with China. Again, I fail to see how our initiative in attempting to build bridges between the west and the east for the good of peace in the world can be considered a measure which is anti-American. I fail to see how an attempt by this government to take strong initiatives for the independence of Canada by spreading our contacts and creating friends in many parts of the world can be considered anti-American.

The Conservative position in this regard is just not credible. As has been pointed out, the United States itself has followed up the initiatives we have taken. After we established relations with China, the President of the United States announced that he would be visiting that country. We do not think he will try to establish relations with China, but his visit could lead to that in the long run. The President is going to the Soviet Union. Our Prime Minister took the initiative and went there last year; he was the first western head of government to do so.

If in raising these issues the opposition is trying to present them as a policy of anti-Americanism, I fail to see how that can be done. These policies have been followed by the government in an attempt to make Canada more independent economically, politically and socially. As a result of these new contacts in the eastern bloc and in Asia we hope to develop cultural and economic relationships which will be of benefit not only to Canada but to the western world.

There have been other measures taken in the last few years. We have attempted through the Canadian Radio Television Commission to develop a more independent broadcasting policy and we have attempted to develop more independent policies in other areas. For a long time we have maintained relations with Cuba and we have traded with that country although the United States did not do so. No one considers that as being anti-American.

I reiterate that it is in the interests of Canada, since we lie between the Soviet Union and the United States, to establish good relations with both these countries. In this era of modern communication and fast means of transportation the Soviet Union is as close to us, in many respects, as the United States and I think it is necessary that we maintain these close relationships.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Perhaps the Chair might make its first request. The hon. member has only a few minutes left; perhaps hon. members would agree to let him finish so that we can start with a new speaker at eight o'clock.

Mr. Allmand: Perhaps I could have another five or ten minutes, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: No, it is six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): There is not unanimous agreement. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, before the supper hour I had pointed out that the government has taken many new initiatives in respect of foreign policy. We admit that and are proud of it. But as I mentioned before, these have been pro-Canadian policies rather than anti-American. If the United States blames us for helping ourselves and for trying to protect our own interests, then it is doing this as a pretext for carrying on its isolationist policies. We want friendly relations with the United States. It is in the interests of both countries to have friendly relations—but we would not want such relations at the expense of our own interests, our own sovereignty, our own resources, and so on. We feel we can be a close friend of the United States and still be very pro-Canadian. I believe the United States is big enough and mature enough to appreciate and accept such a relationship.

The second part of the resolution condemns the government for failing to develop a new economic policy which would strengthen our economic independence. That is not true: the government is developing such a policy and has taken certain steps already. It has set up the Canada Development Corporation. It has taken action in the case of Denison Mines and Home Oil. Also, several fiscal measures have been adopted. It was a Liberal government which appointed the Watkins commission, and another Liberal government which referred the report of that commission to a cabinet committee. In addition, the Government reported recently through the Prime Minister that it will make its policy on the Gray report known very shortly.

I was a member of the external affairs committee which prepared the report on United States-Canada relations in 1970. I fully support the recommendations in that report and hope that several of them will be included in the government's policy statement when announced. I think it would be worth while to repeat some of the important statements in the report of the external affairs committee. In summing up their assessment of the U.S.-Canadian relations the committee said:

> The danger facing Canada is not one of political absorption by the United States: The danger which Canada must guard against is that it will drift into such a position of dependency in relation to the United States that it will be unable, in practice, to adopt policies displeasing to the United States because of the fear of American reaction which would involve consequences unacceptable to Canadians. The committee believes it is in the interests of both Canada and the United States that Canada should remain politically united and economically strong.
> The committee has concluded that, in addition to maintaining political independence, Canada must also maintain a sufficient degree of military, economic and cultural independence that it will, in practice, be able to make the independent decisions which constitute the vital characteristic of an independent nation.

This was a report by a committee with a majority of Liberal members. It is true we had support for these recommendations from members of other parties. One important recommendation in the report is that we must adopt positive measures to make our industry much more efficient so that it can compete on a world-wide basis. We also recommended the establishment of a Canadian Development Corporation. That has been set up.

Another important recommendation was that we enact a Canadian ownership law which would set up a Canadian ownership and control bureau. It was suggested that this Canadian ownership and control bureau would monitor foreign ownership, would keep a close watch on foreign companies operating in Canada and would see that these companies follow the guidelines and laws laid down for foreign corporations. It would do many other things which I cannot go into this evening because I do not have sufficient time. One thing it would do would be to monitor a rule which we think should be implemented, to the effect that in key sectors of Canadian industry 51 per cent of voting shares should be in Canadian hands. Unfortunately, this recommendation was misunderstood when the report came out and was badly reported in the press. It was reported that we had recommended that companies operating in Canada must have 51 per cent Canadian control. That was not the recommendation. The recommendation was as follows:

> Nevertheless, the committee recognizes that as a general rule it is desirable that Canadians should control Canadian companies by owning at least 51 per cent of their voting shares particularly in the important sectors of the economy where American control is now most highly concentrated, and that we should move toward this goal as rapidly as capital requirements and other relevant circumstances permit.

The recommendation was that in important sectors of the economy we must maintain control as we acquire the capital. Another important recommendation was that there should be no take-over of a Canadian company unless such take-over is passed by the Canadian ownership and control bureau. This is a very important recommendation. There were others with respect to the extraterritorial effect of American and other foreign laws in Canada, the role of foreign-based trade unions, cultural imperialism, and so on.

I submit that this was an important report. Much time was spent on it. I presume that the government is taking these recommendations into consideration in preparing their economic independence policy statement, in addition to their consideration of the Gray recommendations. I feel that the government has been moving in this direction and I have confidence that soon we will have a strong policy on Canadian economic independence.

In conclusion, I want to state again that I think the motion by the Conservative opposition is a nonsense motion. It is trying to sit on both sides of the fence at the same time. It criticizes the government for the very thing that it asks for in the latter part of the resolution.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I cannot say that there has been a high-level debate from some quarters today, but it has been a very interesting one and it is the first occasion for some time that government members have been really smoked out. Shakespeare had a word for nearly everything and what he said certainly applies to government members—methinks she doth protest too much! I have never seen such an exhibition and heard such pronouncements of how much we love the United States. What a reversal this is from the actions, which speak much louder than words, of the last two or three years. I will deal with those in a moment.

Also very interesting to me was the speech of the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland). I am sorry he is not in the House at the moment because I dislike criticizing a member in his absence. I am extremely sorry that the hon. member for Selkirk dealt with the speech of the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) in the way that he did. He got himself all wrapped up in pious observations about intellectual honesty. If I recall his speech this afternoon, he described the expulsion of Taiwan from the United Nations—mentioned by the hon. member for Hillsborough in his speech—as a cruel act. He intimated that the hon. member for Hillsborough had said that the seating of the People's Republic of China was a cruel act. Of course, this is pure nonsense.

I am not imputing motives to the hon. member for Selkirk: one cannot do that. I can only assume from what he said and from the evidence that he is new in this House and, I presume, very new to the United Nations and that therefore he probably made a mistake. What the hon. member for Hillsborough said is clearly on the record. I think in the view of nearly all members of the House, if not all, the People's Republic of China should indeed have the Chinese seat in the General Assembly and on the Security Council.

What was objected to by members of this party was that Taiwan, which is a different government altogether and for which the American resolution would have provided a seat, should not have been allowed some representation at the United Nations. They had been a good member of long standing. They had paid their dues better than some other nations. Taiwan, with a population of 14 million, has a bigger population than half of the other members, including bogus members such as the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic which represents nobody other than the Soviet government, and Byelorussia. I remember that a senior delegate of that country said, "Our foreign office is one room over a grocery store in Minsk".

The very least this government could do is to recognize Taiwan. I hear lots of pious observations from the government side and from my friends to the left about universality being the great thing in the United Nations—pious hypocrisy! If a Communist nation had been concerned, they could have forgotten it, but with Taiwan they could not. The very least the government could do was to bring forward a resolution—

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Nesbitt: The hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Faulkner) should keep still for a moment. He ought to remember what happened to his riding in the provincial election. The very least the government could do in this case was to bring a resolution before the General Assembly to seat Taiwan which is a de facto country. Certainly they do not represent mainland China—nobody suggested they did—but they are certainly entitled to representation. That was promised in the last election by the man who sits in the seat of foreign affairs minister of this country. "Oh, no, we would never sacrifice Taiwan", he said in the nice manner of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp). He changed his mind pretty quickly.

I am sorry that the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Wahn) is not here, but I was very interested in his mind-reading speech this afternoon. All I can say is that it is just another indication of how disturbed hon. members over there are about this whole debate, because everybody recognizes them for what they really are no matter what they say. The hon. member for St. Paul's wanted to know why people in Canada and on this side of the House think the government is anti-American.

I have some examples which I am happy to be able to provide for him. Let us take the following, for example. During the Prime Minister's recent visit to the Soviet Union, in what was I suppose a happy frame of mind after a Russian dinner—you can get in that frame of mind after those dinners—he said that Canada needed to have closer relations with Russia to counterbalance the military threat from the United States. Then, of course, there is the little item of the cutting of our NATO commitments and certain other matters which were dealt with by my colleague, the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall), regarding our lack of co-operation in other defence fields.

Then there was the red carpet treatment given by us to U.S. draft-dodgers. Let us only compare the immigration difficulties presented to good, honest immigrants who wanted to come here from Italy, the Netherlands or elsewhere. They were examined for security and everything else, but the draft-dodgers were cleared, so we were told, sometimes in half an hour. There is also the recent attitude at the United Nations regarding Taiwan. I have already mentioned that. There was the reported behaviour of members of the Canadian delegation jumping with joy, laughing and screaming epithets at the American delegation when the United States suffered the diplomatic defeat which they did. This is bad manners.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. St. Pierre: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Is the parliamentary secretary rising on a point of order?

Mr. St. Pierre: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member should check his facts. What he stated is absolutely untrue.

Mr. Nesbitt: This is not a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am certainly prepared to accept the word of the hon. member for whom I have great personal regard. I realize he was there at the time in his capacity as parliamentary secretary. The only thing I have to say is that I had reports from some of my colleagues who were there, and when the question was raised in the House the other day the Secretary of State for External Affairs seemed a little unsure of his facts on the matter. While there is no question in my mind that the hon. member who has just spoken would certainly not have engaged in such activities, I am informed that some of our other delegates did. Perhaps the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin (Mr. St. Pierre) did not see it.

There are other matters. The division concerning Canadian-American relations is not confined to the government; unfortunately, it also exists among the people of these two countries, with the daily barrage of anti-American propaganda whipped up by some members of the government party and by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in its daily, venomous attacks on the United States.

• (8:20 p.m.)

People in the United States hear this; the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation covers a large section of the United States. Since it is the CBC they think it is the public mouthpiece of the Canadian government. Mr. Speaker, you know that is not so and I know it is not so. We know that the CBC is an entity very much unto itself. But people in other countries do not understand these niceties, particularly when they hear "hate America" propaganda every day.

I remember that at one of the last meetings of the broadcasting committee I asked the president of the CBC if he could produce one program from the public affairs division that had been even neutral to the Americans within the last five years. He had to think for a while and then he said there were two, a series on the American landings on the moon, and de Tocqueville's visit to the United States, which I think took place about 1828.

Then there is confusion about U.S. investment in Canada. We hear "Yankee go home" from all quarters. We heard something like that from a former Minister of Finance, Walter Gordon, a prominent member of the Liberal party, and from others. Yet we do not seem to have any policy. This is something that has been mentioned by a number of members on the other side of the chamber. It must be very difficult for our American friends when we have the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) going down to the United States begging Americans to invest their money in Canada, and then we have the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene)—I am sorry he also is not here—speaking and giving Americans hell for investing here. The Secretary of State for External Affairs is saying much the same thing. This must be puzzling to Americans.

Then we have the provincial premiers, the premier or former premier—whichever he is—of Newfoundland, the premier of Nova Scotia, the premier of New Brunswick and the premier of Quebec going down to the United States asking our American friends to invest in Canada, and when they do and they come up here they get a chorus of "Yankee go home". You cannot blame our American friends for being a little puzzled about where we are going.

I have heard the question asked, "What are you people going to do about it?" The first thing that I suggest the government should do about it is try to produce the Gray report, on which the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray) spent one dickens of a long time and much hard work, instead of burying it in the recesses of cabinet lockers. Let us have a look at it. The government should formulate a policy on American and other foreign investment in Canada. But the government has done nothing, has shown no indication of doing anything and has not given any leadership other than schizophrenic pronouncements by various cabinet ministers.

We would like a co-ordinated effort in this regard. The government should take the lead in determining our policy on American and other foreign investment. It should hold a conference with the provinces on this matter and, in all fairness to our friends, whether they be in the United States, the U.K., West Germany, Japan or wherever else, the government should say, "This is our policy. We would like your money here under certain terms and conditions. These are the terms and conditions." But we have had none of that, not one bit of it. There has been no leadership. All we get is anti-American propaganda when someone on the other side of the border does something that does not suit the views of this government.

In 15 minutes, Mr. Speaker, it is pretty hard to deal at length with a very complex subject such as Canadian-U.S. relations. But there is very little doubt about one thing. The government says that things are fine and relations have never been better with the United States. But everybody in the country knows that is not so. All we ask the government is this: please try and avoid in the future incidents such as I have mentioned tonight. A recent example of such an incident concerns the Amchitka explosion. I am sure that nobody in this House approves of nuclear explosions. I certainly do not, and I spent a good many years of my life working at the United Nations on this problem. But some of us object to the selective vilification of the United States. On this point I agree with the hon. member for St. Paul's who spoke this afternoon.

The government of France has announced that it is going to detonate nuclear explosions in the atmosphere next spring. I hope there is the same amount of protest to the French government and in front of the French embassy next spring as there has been in front of the American embassy, and also in front of the Russian embassy, because I point out that the Russians detonated a big nuclear blast last month; and I hope the same thing happens with respect to the Chinese. You can readily understand why people in the United States think the Canadian government is anti-American when it selects the American government for selective vilification and all other governments are allowed to do whatever they like and no one here utters a peep.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, there is an old expression which says that it is not what you do, it is the way you do it. No one in any party in this House does not want the Canadian government to stick up for Canadian national interests, but you do not have to be anti-American to be pro-Canadian. It is as simple as that. And it is not in our national interest to be attacking the United States constantly, gnawing at our closest neighbours. They are our closest neighbours whether we like it or not. If a major war breaks out and nuclear bombs are dropped on Detroit, that will affect the whole southern end of Ontario. If dropped on the Seaway, that means Montreal; and if dropped on Seattle, that means Vancouver.

Whether we like it or not, we are tied up intimately with the United States—militarily, economically and in many other ways. The best thing for us to do is to get along with our friends, and they have been our friends at least since 1812. We can be firm with them and we can be severe, but we do not need to be unnecessarily abusive and provocative.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the parliamentary secretary rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. St. Pierre: Would the hon. member permit a question, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Nesbitt: Certainly.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Just before he concluded his remarks the hon. member's time had expired. If there is unanimous consent he may be permitted to reply. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. St. Pierre: Mr. Speaker, could the hon. member tell the House whether the person who said members of the Canadian delegation were hooting and jeering at the Americans, dancing and stomping, claimed to have been present in the assembly at that time, because this was total fiction? I ask him to inform the House whether this person claimed to be present. Actually, the proceedings are all on television tapes at the United Nations and can be checked there.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, I have to go by the reports I received and all I can say is that I was also told certain remarks were passed to the Saudi Arabian delegation. This appeared on the CBC, if I am not mistaken. I am not disputing the veracity of the parliamentary secretary's remarks. What he says may be so, but this was not the report that appeared on the CBC and reports I received from my colleagues. I just leave it at that.

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to intervene in this debate but I think I share with people on all sides of the House a sense of sincere regret that the hon. member who preceded me made so many rather unfortunate remarks.

Mr. Nesbitt: Unfortunate for you, maybe.

Mr. Anderson: The first thing, of course, is, as we have known for many years—it stretches back throughout our history—that there is no easy way to co-exist with the Americans. This has been mentioned often enough, not just over the last 100 or 104 years of confederation but long before Canada existed as such. It was mentioned in the days of the early colonies. It is deep in the history of many of our people.

Many of the Loyalists came from the United States. Indeed, ironically those who left the States and settled here were known in the States as Tories. I wonder whether those people who left wealth, position and comfort in the United States, who were happy to call themselves Tories, would be proud today to hear the drivel spouted a few moments ago by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt). They would be shocked and dismayed, Mr. Speaker.

• (8:30 p.m.)

An hon. Member: Better than the drivel we are hearing right now!

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned, the question of relations with the United States is most difficult. In this country, through two world wars we suffered enormous losses in wealth and materiel but particularly in terms of personnel, people killed. We suffered enormously before the Americans came in. We welcomed American citizens in our armed forces, those who came to fight for what we thought was democracy, for what we thought the two countries, Canada and the United States, stood for even before their government realized this. At this time I think we should bear in mind that there are many Americans then and now who have shown themselves to be friends and who shared our ideals even though their own governments were a little behind.

We realize that in the two world wars it was necessary for many European nations with whom we also have very close links, the United Kingdom in particular, to virtually give away, to sell at fire-sale prices, all their assets overseas to American corporations and American interests. I wonder whether the U.S. today remembers this.

I think it is only fair to point out that we have long experience of a fruitful relationship, but one that was never easy. It was not easy back in 1812 when, as the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) mentioned, we had our difficulties. It was not easy during the Fenian raids or at any other time since then.

I must say I find the present debate very disappointing. We have heard that the Tory party which has abandoned its traditional positions which, incidentally, it held 93 years ago when my great grandfather, the nominated Tory candidate, stood down to allow Sir John A. Macdonald to be elected in Victoria. He did this because he believed in the principles that Sir John A. stood for then. What the Tories stand for now we do now know, and we have not learned a great deal in the last day and a half. All we know is that it is far from their historical position, far from the position of the great Sir John A.

An hon. Member: You should have been in the House.

Mr. Anderson: I see the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) sitting opposite and I realize this is a very difficult resolution for him to defend. On the one hand the Conservative Party has been criticizing the government for its failure to rush down to Washington and plead for our special interests; on the other hand it has been complaining bitterly about what it considers our too close relationship with the United States. Faced with this dilemma, the hon. member for Hillsborough is to be congratulated. He has steered a most tortuous course, swinging back and forth on thin ice, trying hard not to break through. He did a fine job.

Mr. Yewchuk: This is a reactionary speech.

Mr. Anderson: I hear the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) describe the speech of the hon. member for Hillsborough as reactionary. I think that is unfair.

An hon. Member: He is talking about you.

Mr. Anderson: Perhaps more than most, we on this side of the House often see irreconcilable differences among members of the Tory party which, of course, because they are in opposition and intend to remain in opposition, they make no attempt to reconcile or deal with.

The problem facing this nation of how to arrange relations with the United States which takes such an enormous amount of our trade, which has so many Canadian born citizens, which wields more power than any other nation on earth, is an extremely difficult one. To suggest that we can somehow deal with this problem with simplistic formulae, in a trite and trivial manner, is foolish and does no service to good relations between our two countries, which I hope all members of this House are anxious to see in as good condition as possible.

With respect to trade, we understand the American position and their vast balance of payment deficits. They have a war in Indo-China. Perhaps more than most members I realize what a traumatic experience this is for the Americans because I spent a year in Viet Nam in 1963-64. We realize that this war has led to economic difficulties because the United States government was unwilling to finance it by taxing the people. They attempted to finance it by a peculiar form of deficit financing which, to a large extent, I believe, has led them to their present difficulties.

We warned them that the problems they now face might occur. At the same time, despite the criticism of members of the Conservative party and the New Democratic Party, we have attempted to do something about these problems, something to help the United States. For example, over a year ago we freed our dollar and allowed it to float. There were cries of anguish from the opposition that we were hurting the Canadian exporter, yet it was known at that time that this step was necessary in order to prevent the trade situation becoming so unbalanced that the Americans would be forced to do something drastic about it. We tried to act in a reasonable way. We pointed out to them the amount of American ownership in this country. I could refer to the U.S. trade and ownership figures. The hon. member for Athabasca regards this as very amusing.

Mr. Yewchuk: Say something original.

Mr. Anderson: We tried to point out to them that the extensive ownership of Canadian industry has created problems for Canada. This is known not only to members of the Liberal party but also to the New Democratic Party. If the Tory party ever listened to their youth wing it might even find they have some interesting things to say about this. Even people in their own party have commented upon the difficult situation caused by the enormous amount of American ownership in Canada.

It is easy to say that this creates a situation in which we should show ourselves to be more pro-American. This is taking the easy, thoughtless way out. I think it is indicative of the lack of content of this resolution that Tory members opposite pay so little attention to the debate of today and yesterday. It is almost an irrelevant debate because I think they have chosen such a bad motion.

An hon. Member: You are not helping it any.

Mr. Anderson: I see the difficulty and I appreciate and sympathize with hon. members in the Conservative party—

An hon. Member: Sit down, then.

Mr. Anderson: —for the dilemma they face. I know it must not be easy to defend such an absurd resolution and I am sure when it comes to the vote they will find that members of other parties will not support them.

But we are still faced with the question of how to deal with the United States. There have been criticisms of this government for attempting to create better relations with other nations, in particular such countries as Yugoslavia, the Soviet Union and communist China. I think we are much more fortunate than the American people or their government in that we do not have the enormous burden that they carry as the world's most powerful nation, and so it is possible for us to be more flexible than they are. It is ironic that the President of the United States, who made his name largely by his strong anti-communist stand, is now making a trip to the People's Republic of China and, later, to the Soviet Union. We find in President Nixon a great pragmatist.

Those who criticize Canada for its independent role are ignoring the fact that in some ways we have been only a step, if not only half a step, ahead of the American people and the American government. I do not think that the Americans object to our attempts to create a world in which there is more understanding and less suspicion, less of the cold war, and more understanding. They are doing precisely the same thing. Those who have embarked upon a rather shabby course of criticizing the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) for his efforts to bring about better understanding between the communist and non-communist worlds are really doing this country a disservice as well as a disservice to the United States.

• (8:40 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Anderson: I know that some hon. members opposite are criticizing. I wonder what the right hon. gentleman for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), who has been noticeably absent during the whole debate, would say to all this. I daresay, since the government he headed instituted trade between this country and communist China and brought about closer relations in that regard, he would be embarrassed by this Conservative motion which is being debated in the House.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member for Athabasca rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Yewchuk: No, Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I think the hon. member's 15 minutes have expired.

An hon. Member: Check your watch.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. With respect, the Chair watches the time very closely and the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich still has the floor.

Mr. Anderson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am afraid I was not watching the time as closely as you were or as closely as the hon. member for Athabasca was. He seems to have difficulty telling the time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Anderson: Nevertheless, I submit that it is still pretty easy in a debate like this to score second-rate debating points when speaking of our problems in dealing with the United States. There are real problems, difficult problems, problems based on realities all Canadian governments have had to face, including the governments headed by the right hon. member for Prince Albert, by former Prime Minister Pearson, whose constituency is now represented by the present hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster), and by the present Prime Minister. All our governments have had to face such difficulties. The governments of Mackenzie King, Borden and other Prime Ministers faced these difficulties.

The simplistic approach in dealing with such problems and the shallow criticisms which have come from the Tory party do a disservice to the people of this country. The problem is difficult and nobody pretends that there are easy solutions except, apparently, the Conservative opposition. I do not think the Americans would want us to adopt the servile position in world affairs suggested by some members opposite and echo U.S. views in the United Nations and elsewhere. The U.S. knows there is value in demonstrating to the world that it is possible for an independent and much smaller nation living close to them to trade with them and to maintain friendly and fruitful relations with them.

I regret that the difficulties involving the surtax which is in large part directed against us, the Amchitka problem that we are now facing, and the problem of the Alaska pipeline involving threatened damage to the Canadian west coast from oil pollution, should all have arisen at the same time. It is unfortunate that they have arisen at a time when the American government apparently is feeling isolated and, in a sense, feels misunderstood by other nations.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member. I do so to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member may ask a question only if he has unanimous consent of the House. On the other hand, it occurs to the Chair that since there was a special order perhaps it would not be advisable to ask for such consent. The hon. member for Edmonton Centre.

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, before beginning my main remarks may I say to the hon. member who has just finished speaking that if it had not been for the entrepreneurship of the Conservative party under the leadership of the right hon. member for Saint Albert—I beg your pardon, Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker)—the hon. member opposite would be supporting the government of a second-rate nation instead of a first-rate nation that is led by a second-rate government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The right hon. gentleman is not a saint yet.

Mr. Paproski: I am pleased, Mr. Speaker, to take part in the debate on this non-confidence motion and to add a little weight—

An hon. Member: Physical or moral?

Mr. Paproski: —to my colleague's argument in order to show that this government has brought about a deterioration in Canada-United States relations in the field of energy. Canada has energy resources which can be used to power our industries and those of the United States, but the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has yet to tell Canadians and Americans what is his position on Canadian energy policy, let alone continental energy policy.

An hon. Member: He has no policy.

Mr. Paproski: When recently questioned in the House of Commons on the position of Canada-U.S. energy talks, the Prime Minister had this to say:

> We are not at this time prepared to continue them because we do not have the wherewithal, the personnel and the time to arrive at a decision.

Obviously, this cannot be true since talks between Canada and the United States have been going on for the last two years and by now Canada should have at least a temporary position on domestic energy in the continental American market. Furthermore, the reluctance to initiate further talks on energy at this time suggests strongly a veiled threat by the Prime Minister to use Canada's energy exports as a lever to counteract domestic effects of the recently imposed 10 per cent surcharge. Such a posture by the Prime Minister of Canada adds further support to the growing concern felt by many over the deterioration of Canadian-American relations. My following statements proposed to elaborate on this assumption by placing the Canadian position in its proper perspective.

Let me ask, Mr. Speaker, where does Canada stand? Let me give a little background to my remarks. The largest consumer of oil and gas in the world is the United States of America. If I may illustrate, last year the Americans used approximately 15.6 million barrels of oil daily. This year that consumption has risen to 16.5 million barrels daily. By contrast, Canada's daily consumption of oil was about 1.4 million barrels daily in 1969 and last year it was about 1.5 million barrels daily. This year's domestic consumption is about 1.6 million barrels per day.

The largest oil reserves in the world are found in the Middle East, Russia, South America and the United States. May I illustrate. Of total, known world recoverable oil reserves, the Middle East has about 50 per cent, Russia and South America 30 per cent and the United States 10 per cent. By contrast, Canada holds only 2 per cent of recoverable world oil reserves. Furthermore, on the basis of present patterns of consumption, the Middle East has enough oil for the next 50 years, Canada for the next 20 years and the United States for the next 10 years.

As these figures show, the United States has been relying and will continue to rely increasingly on foreign imports of oil and gas to protect her meagre reserves while at the same time meeting rising domestic demands for these commodities. Presently foreign imports of oil and gas to the United States come from essentially three regions, Venezuela, the Middle East and Canada. Of these foreign imports, Canada supplies about 25 per cent of the daily requirements of the United States. In 1969 Canada's exports to the United States stood at about 555,000 barrels per day. By 1970 this export had increased to about 670,000 barrels per day.

On August 15, President Nixon announced the by now famous 10 per cent import surcharge. This surcharge affects about one quarter of Canada's exports to United States markets. The surcharge, however, does not affect the sale of Canadian oil and gas to the American market. In fact, as the latest preliminary figures from Statistics Canada indicate, the export of petroleum in September increased 18.5 per cent and natural gas exports increased about 27.5 per cent. These very large export increases came about one month after the surcharge was imposed and probably reflect the increasing demand and dependence of the American market on Canada's energy fuels.

On October 4, 1971, the Prime Minister indicated to the House of Commons that talks between Canada and the United States on energy, which were adjourned in the spring of this year, have not been resumed this fall because—

> —at this particular point we are preoccupied with other matters, particularly economic matters, and . . . we are not in a position at the moment to sit down with United States officials and continue these talks. But there has been no indefinite postponement of them, there is merely an inability to find the time now to proceed with them.

• (8:50 p.m.)

That is reported at page 8385 of Hansard for October 4.

On October 8, 1971, the Prime Minister had this to say when questioned about the resumption of energy talks between Canada and the United States:

We are not at this time prepared to continue them because we do not have the wherewithal, the time and the personnel to arrive at a decision.

Mr. Mahoney: What page is that on?

Mr. Paproski: This is on record in Hansard at page 8549. I wanted to make sure that I quoted the Prime Minister in the right context. The hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney) knows that in our province oil is our lifeline and bloodline. He should keep quiet or at least get up and say something.

Canada and the United States have been holding both official and unofficial talks on energy from time to time. These talks were initiated by the Prime Minister's visit to Washington in March, 1969, and were to be consistent with responsibilities of the regulatory bodies concerned for an increasing trade in crude oil products and other fuels between the United States and Canada. The latest talks between Canada and the United States took place in the spring of this year when the then Secretary of the Interior, Walter Hickel, announced in Ottawa that the United States was considering a free access agreement for Canada's oil to the United States and that America was ready to take on more Canadian oil.

Mr. Mahoney: And he was fired.

Mr. Paproski: Canadian producers responded so vigorously during the remainder of 1971 that in September, one month after the imposition of the 10 per cent surcharge, Canadian exports of oil and gas to the United States were up 18.5 per cent and 27.5 per cent respectively. Yet despite the prospect of continued sales of more oil and gas to the United States as well as the planning for more formal, long-range agreements between Canada and the U.S. on energy matters, the Prime Minister announced that we were not prepared to continue talks because we did not have "the wherewithal, the personnel and the time to arrive at a decision".

Obviously this cannot be true, since talks between Canada and the United States have been going on for the last two years. By now Canada should have taken at least a temporary position on energy in the continental American market. Furthermore, the reluctance on the part of the Prime Minister to initiate further talks on energy with the United States at this time suggests strongly a threat by the right hon. gentleman to use Canada's energy exports as a lever to counteract the domestic effect of the 10 per cent surcharge.

Canada cannot afford to stop exporting oil and gas to the United States. However, at the same time care must be taken not to overextend domestic reserves and not to ship too much energy to the American market. What is needed now is a comprehensive Canadian energy policy, rather than the threats of our Prime Minister, if we are to stabilize our domestic industry and support better Canadian-American relationships in this vital sector. Let me say that the following points in a Canadian energy policy could help to achieve these objectives:

1. A Canadian energy resource policy should encourage a de-emphasis on any one particular energy commodity by stressing new alternative sources of energy. A better energy mix can be achieved if less reliance is placed on such commodities as oil and coal and if such new sources as tides, chemicals and wind are tapped.

2. Energy should not be treated solely as a commodity available for export but as a factor of production in the Canadian economy. Because of its unique role in our economy, better energy balances must be achieved between regional production and consumption and between domestic and foreign consumption.

3. Present thermal systems can convert fossil fuels to electricity at 40 per cent efficiency. New technologies can do the same at 55 to 60 per cent efficiency. Canada must develop these new technologies to conserve her domestic fuel supply.

4. Of the five conventional energy sources, hydro, uranium, coal, oil and gas, coal is the most abundant in Canada. Because of escalating energy demands Canada must convert more extensively to the use of coal.

5. A Canadian energy resource policy must attempt to achieve better regional and northern development. To this end attempts should be made:

a) to forbid any mineral extraction from areas north of the treeline while at the same time encouraging more exploration in these regions;

b) to develop a government assisted program for mid-Canada which will build up suitable industries in northern communities once the mineral extractive phase is over; and

c) to achieve a more balanced approach to oil and gas exploration in Canada's marine and offshore areas.

6. No attempt should be made to enter into any long-term continental energy arrangements with the United States. At the same time, no attempt should be made to exert leverage on the United States by not exporting any more oil and gas to these markets.

We in the House of Commons have had our eyes opened. We have been told by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) that Canada-U.S. relations are on a firm and reliable basis because our grey-flannel diplomats are more on the ball than ever before. All must be well because our diplomats and our officials are talking as they have never talked before! Mr. Speaker, I am still not impressed, because I do not believe diplomats and cocktail parties have, will or can formulate constructive and self-interested foreign policy to protect and maximize Canadian-made interests within North America.

The talks and contacts the present government has had with U.S. officials over the last three years have, by and large, been ad hoc, superficial, inconsistent and indecisive. Our diplomacy with the United States is simply an extension of this government's performance at home. Now, because diplomacy cannot function in a vacuum, the real crux of the issue is the fundamental and original failure of the Trudeau government to develop a new economic policy for the most beneficial and independent development of the Canadian economy.

While the machinery and competence of Canada's diplomatic efforts in Washington must and can be improved, it is naïve and dangerous to suggest we can construct optimum Canada-U.S. relations before we decide what are the best goals for Canada. Diplomacy is at best a servant of Canadian goals. Therefore, we cannot have an effective and coherent diplomatic strategy without an effective and coherent strategy for Canada.

Mr. Speaker, it is here that the Trudeau government has neglected my country's interests and squandered our opportunities.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: The present government is not equipped to negotiate a practical and reliable energy policy with the United States because it has failed to formulate a comprehensive energy policy for Canada. The government is not equipped to negotiate an end to the surcharge or a constructive new trade policy with the United States because it has not succeeded in formulating an industrial policy, an employment policy or a regional and national development policy for Canada.

The government has been unable to take leadership in the IMF or in the Group of Ten talks on trade and currency reform because it has formulated neither an optimum dollar nor an optimum trade strategy for Canada. Simply, it cannot reach out to the United States or to the world. It cannot bargain and it dare not bargain, because it has no policy for Canada.

If the government is to stop compromising our long-term interests and moving from crisis to crisis and inconsistency to inconsistency in its relations with the United States, it must first stop doing the same with Canada. It is of first priority that the government come clean with Parliament and the provinces of Canada and develop a new economic policy. The government must construct an industrial policy, a trade policy, a foreign investment and capital policy and an energy and human resource policy. With such new economic policy for Canada it would then be possible to achieve reliable and self-interested relations with the United States. The United States will recognize and respect the interests of Canada when Canada defines and develops her own destiny.

Mr. Kenneth Robinson (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I was surprised indeed upon reading the motion of the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) to find it was so unclear. It was difficult to see what he was driving at. This is not like the hon. gentleman who is usually so clear and concise that there is no misunderstanding. What he means is usually what he says.

As I understand the motion, it condemns the government for failing to foster closer economic and political relations with the United States and at the same time it blames the government for failing to develop economic and political independence of the United States. This is the old story—be damned if you do, and be damned if you don't. I wonder which of the condemnations the hon. member really means.

Let us deal with the first. Canada has traditionally had close economic relations with the United States. In fact, about 70 per cent of Canada's trade is with the United States. So how much closer do hon. members want Canada to get to the United States? In effect, the United States has provided Canada with needed investment capital and expertise. It has also provided Canada with a ready market for goods and products of all kinds. As a result, Canada has had and still enjoys a standard of living considered the second highest in the world, second only to that of the United States.

It is true, as was stated in a recent study by the Ontario Federation of Labour, that 138 plants were shut down in Ontario between June, 1970, and June, 1971. It was also true that 55 per cent were foreign-owned and controlled and employed about 63 per cent of the workers who were laid off or had their jobs made redundant. However, it is to be remembered that the other 45 per cent of the plants shut down, which accounted for the 37 per cent of the employees who lost their jobs, were under Canadian ownership and control.

Can you say with any degree of certainty, Mr. Speaker, that it is United States influence that has closed these plants when there were wholly-owned Canadian plants that shut down also? Do not the percentages I have quoted merely represent the degree of United States influence in Canada's economy? Surely you would not suggest, Mr. Speaker, that when a business is not viable it should continue until bankruptcy results.

When President Nixon of the United States announced his new economic rules, the Canadian government immediately sent off a ministerial mission to see whether Canada could get an exemption. But to no avail. The United States was advised of Canada's position. It was pointed out that the 10 per cent surcharge on imports would fall particularly heavily on us because of our large volume of trade with the United States. Other countries made representations because they also are affected by the surcharge, such as Japan, France, West Germany, Italy, the United Kingdom and others. Canada was not singled out for specially tough treatment; nor was Canada singled out for special consideration, in spite of our traditional trade arrangements with the United States. Nearly every country is affected by the 10 per cent surcharge, and no special exemptions have been granted, that I know of, apart from the quota on Japanese textiles.

What about the second condemnation contained in the motion, namely, the government's failure to foster economic and political independence from the United States? Surely the hon. member is aware of the government's desire to find other markets besides the United States on whom Canada has economic dependence. Canada stands to lose its preferred position with the United Kingdom with the impending entry of the U.K. into the European Common Market. Canada now stands to lose its preferred position in the United States market due to the 10 per cent surcharge. Obviously there is a moving away by Canada from dependence to economic independence.

Since this government took office there has been a concerted effort to find new friends and new markets throughout the world. Hence the diplomatic ties with China, the Soviet Union and many other countries where alternative markets for Canada's goods and produce can be found. If that is not tantamount to fostering economic independence, then I do not know what is.

The fact is that in political and international affairs Canada has been ahead of the United States. It is only now that the United States is following Canada's lead. For example, the U.S. is planning to send its President to China and the Soviet Union. The fact, also, is that in times of economic crises, of tremendous inflation and unemployment, this government has been far ahead of the United States in reducing the inflation spiral and in taking steps to alleviate unemployment through additional benefits by way of unemployment insurance, manpower retraining schemes and other manpower programs.

It is a fact that further government action was taken with regard to prices and incomes through the establishment of the Prices and Incomes Commission. This kind of action is only now being taken in the United States. It is also the fact that at a time when the United States is taking protectionist measures and has applied a 10 per cent surcharge on imports to achieve economic survival, Canada did not sit idly by and do nothing. Canada did not break into tears or wring its hands. No—it did none of these things; rather, it took decisive action. It provided $80 million in federal aid to surcharge-smitten industries. It provided $1 billion infusion into the economy by way of a host of programs to help the country immeasurably and to assist in warding off the effects of the United States surcharge.

This government realizes that the surcharge could be retained for a considerable period of time, that it could even be increased and that further action may be taken by the United States to bolster its ailing dollar position. This government will take positive, decisive, action as deemed necessary to protect our economy and to maintain our high standard of living.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, the motion before us today in the name of the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) surprised, I think, a number of us on this side of the House. It would not have surprised us had it been moved by one of a number of other members in the Conservative party, though I confess it looks more like a Liberal motion. The hon. member for Hillsborough has planted one foot firmly on each side of the fence. Looking at the motion, Mr. Speaker, I am reminded of Mackenzie King. On the one hand the hon. member is saying that we should condemn the government for failing to employ and improve firm and constructive and economic political relations with the United States; on the other hand, in the second part of his motion,—

Mr. Baldwin: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I know that the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) is too modest to say so, but to compare his motion with one coming from the Liberal party is, I think, a very slanderous statement, which makes it contrary to the rules of the House.

[Mr. Robinson.]

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I am very happy that the House leader of the Conservative party has stood in his place and admitted this great error that his party has committed. He admits it is a very slanderous thing. It is also a very curious motion and I think points up some of the divisions within the Conservative party. They realize that there is a great feeling in this country of nationalism, a desire to develop an independent foreign and economic policy. Certain members of that party are also paranoiac when it comes to being anti-Communist or anti-anything that might offend the United States. In fact, one of the people very close to the nerve centre of the Conservative party told one of my colleagues that they had to include the first part in the motion to appease certain extremist elements within their party. I think perhaps this goes a long way to explain why this type of motion is before the House today.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the hon. member for Hillsborough should move a motion like this because I did not think he was that sort of person. I thought he was a man who saw the world in a more global way. I thought he was a man who took a more progressive attitude to international and domestic affairs. This type of motion totally breaks with the traditions of the Conservative party, from the time of Sir John A. Macdonald to the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) who has been very conspicuous by his absence.

We all remember very well the general election campaigns of 1962 and 1963 when that right hon. gentleman was accused of being anti-American. Some of my constituents who voted for the Conservative party at that time would be very curious now about this motion. One reason they voted for the Conservative party was that the leader of the party at that time was a Canadian. He was talking about Canada asserting itself and he took the odd swipe at some of the multinational corporations. Then all of a sudden something happened to that party. A fellow named Dalton Camp came along, and so did a few Bay Street Tories, and the motion now before the House proves to me and to my constituents, no doubt, the many suspicions they had about the new Tory party—a party that has changed, that is now different, a party that is continentalist, a party that now wants to cosy up even more to the United States than it has in the past.

I think this motion was moved for a number of reasons. I do not doubt the sincerity of some members of the Conservative party and I do not criticize members such as the hon. members for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) and Egmont (Mr. MacDonald). One of the bases on which the motion was moved is political opportunism. The Conservatives have sensed there is a bit of emotion in the country because of the visit of the Soviet Premier, perhaps because of the visit of the President of Yugoslavia, and other things. They are trying to play upon the emotions of a number of people who have genuine fear because of things that happened in the past.

Some people have suggested there may be an aura of McCarthyism developing in this country. This is not being helped by the motion before us today. Perhaps there is another reason for moving this motion. Perhaps the Conservatives are looking toward the next federal election. They will need a lot of money to finance a big campaign. Perhaps they are considering what happened in Ontario, where the money comes from for their elections. I think a motion like this may have been drafted with that in mind. Perhaps they hired a public relations man from Michigan to help them draft this motion with a view to convincing the Canadian people. This is the type of motion we often see from the Conservative party.

Mr. Paproski: What you see is what you get.

Mr. Nystrom: The hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) is making his typical remarks in a debate of this kind.

A number of things have brought about this motion. The Conservative party has been very concerned about our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) visiting the Soviet Union and signing a protocol with them. People were concerned about the visit of Premier Kosygin to Canada because this might alienate us from the United States. Mr. Kosygin went to the United States, yet still people in this country are concerned about his visit here. They are also concerned about the visit of Mr. Tito. He was also in the United States a few days ago.

In this House we have some intellectual dinosaurs in the Conservative party crying about the Taiwan situation and nationalist China being seated in the United Nations. We failed to recognize the People's Republic of China for 20 years, but at least we have recognized that they are in existence. The French recognized them in 1949.

Mr. Nystrom: We have a number of critics in this House, and the one for Oxford is now interjecting. Many of the opposition members are worried about the poor people in Taiwan, but the arguments they put forward would ordinarily amaze me. Many members are laughing and using these arguments as an opportunity to be witty. It surprises me that they are so concerned about issues such as this when we have problems facing Canada which are genuinely serious.

Motions of this kind criticize the government for taking direct action to build bridges to ease world tensions. The extreme element of the Conservative party is very much worried about this. The young people in this country—I suggest, the overwhelming majority—are happy that Canada has now recognized China and that China is now seated in the United Nations. We now have a Conservative party that is paranoiac through worry about some of these things. They suggest we are out of touch with reality. That is a sad commentary on this Parliament of Canada.

The hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) is very worried about why we protested with such vigour the nuclear bomb test at Amchitka. Members of this party have protested nuclear blasts participated in by the Soviet Union, China and France. I am very proud of this country and the people here for protesting the blast at Amchitka which will probably go off on Saturday. If we have not stopped that blast by our protests, perhaps we will have stopped a future blast by the Soviet Union, the United States, China or France. This is a step in the right direction. I do not care a damn whose bomb it is, but perhaps the hon. member for Oxford does. If it is a Russian or an American or a French bomb, it is a bomb. We must do all we can to promote disarmament in the world and to stop nuclear tests in the atmosphere or underground.

It is very interesting that we should be concerned about this matter at this time. Mr. Nixon and Mr. Kosygin, as well as the leaders of other countries, are carrying out these tests but the only people who seem to be concerned are the reactionaries—

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am very much afraid that my friend who is making these remarks has the advantage over me. I am much too old to know everything.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should be old enough to know better, but apparently he does not. He has sat in this House for a long time and I am astonished that he would utter some of the statements he did tonight.

Mr. Nesbitt: I have sat here much longer than you will.

Mr. Nystrom: If I am in the House as long as the hon. member for Oxford and begin to support the suggestions and policies he supports, I shall be glad to leave. We must continue in the direction of improving our foreign affairs. We must try to make the United Nations a universal body, giving it more power and sovereignty. We must continue in that direction. I commend the government of Canada and members of my party as well as others who have tried to convince governments for years to move in that direction.

There are a number of other things that might be said in this debate. The second part of the motion does raise some concern regarding the economic policy of Canada. It is about time we in Canada developed an economy which is independent in order that we can make our own decisions, provide more jobs and not be a branch plant of another country, or a multinational corporation. This is the direction in which we must move and we must do so soon if Canada is to continue as a nation.

The only industries we actually control in Canada are the broadcasting industry, the banking industry and the booze industry. That is a sad commentary on the well-being of this country. The sad thing is that the Americans do not come in with only their money. The United States department of commerce has issued a statement to the effect that over 90 per cent of foreign investment by multinational companies in Canada have used Canadian money generated in Canada by plants operated here or generated on the Canadian financial market, so they are buying us out with our own money. We are losing jobs and a lot of our political sovereignty, and we are exporting more wealth than we are importing from the United States.

It is about time we in this country woke up and devised policies whereby Canadians can control their won destinies. That should be the main thrust of this debate. That is what the Conservative member for Fundy-Royal is concerned about and that is the concern of most Canadians from coast to coast. They are more concerned with this than with the phony issues dragged out by some of the more reactionary Tories in this House.

Economic Relations with United States

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I should like first of all to say a few words about the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland). My party cannot support it, because we believe to do so would be to condone the government for what it has done and we feel what has been done has not been adequate.

In any debate such as this we must take a serious look at the point of view held by the United States and decide whether or not we agree or disagree with its position. We must remember, I believe, that before World War II the Americans were isolationist and were soundly denounced by many people in the western world, including Canadians. Since the end of World War II they have taken a most active part in the world and at the present time they feel they have ended up with fewer friends and find themselves disliked intensely in many parts of the world.

In their opinion they have aided the world a good deal since World War II. I think we can say that Germany and Japan, which were bankrupt, benefited a great deal from the Marshall aid plan which went a long way toward making those countries very aggressive in a commercial sense. The United States has carried the burden of an enormous defence in a nuclear world with little or no help from Germany, Japan, Canada and the western European countries. The United States has followed a policy of containment of Communism in the Viet Nam war. In the minds of historians, the Viet Nam war may well be viewed as the war that contained the Chinese communists until the red regime of Mao Tse-tung quieted down and lost some of its aggressiveness. Almost certainly, without the Viet Nam war Chinese Communism would be extending far into the South Pacific and most likely would have overwhelmed the Philippines and be lapping at the shores of Australia.

What has all this effort brought to the American nation from their own viewpoint? It has brought the United States into the situation of seriously reassessing its position. It is faced with a trade deficit of $13 billion. It is reassessing its position of defending for free the western world. It is increasingly aware of so-called interference by United States companies in the commercial world and the accusation that they are trying to buy up the world. As to the trading position of the United States, perhaps this can best be illustrated in the words of Maurice H. Stans, United States Secretary of Commerce who on October 27, 1971, said:

> Our share of the world's international trade dropped from approximately 21 per cent to about 18 per cent within a decade.
> In 1970 Germany replaced the United States as the world's leading exporter of manufactured goods.
> Our trade in minerals and fuels and low technology goods are steadily moving deeper into very severe deficits.
> Even our traditional dominance in high technology trade has begun to be challenged by a number of countries in a number of items, including electronics, computers and aircraft.
> Other countries have begun investing relatively more than we are doing in plant assets, in research and development, and in incentives for technological achievements, and they enjoy substantially lower wage levels.
> Over the past five years productivity in American industry has had the smallest increase of any industrial nation in the free world—far slower than our major competitors.

[Mr. Nystrom.]

> Finally, competing countries have confronted us with a large and growing array of trade barriers, investment restrictions and various violations of accepted international rules and agreements—all of which severely jeopardized our competitive position in the world, and undermined the strength of the dollar.

He continued:

> Out of all these individual problems, several conclusions have become very clear! For one, the United States cannot go on absorbing the goods of the world, unless we are able to compete equally and fairly in the markets of the world. Secondly, the time has come for new international agreements on tariffs and trade, on the protection of foreign investment, on the elimination of non-tariff barriers, on uniform technical standards, and so on.

Whether we agree with this or not, these are the words of a responsible member of the United States government. But what has happened? During the last decade the foreign policy of Canada has shown a tendency to diverge from the United States. Since the advent of this administration the government of Canda has moved a remarkably long way in its difference of opinion with its American neighbour. The present administration has acted very much as if Canada were in orbit, spinning around sometimes very close to the Soviet Union.

In April, 1969, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) downgraded Canada's role in the western collective security system and put stress on "protection of our sovereignty." By making a distinction between collective security arrangements and protection of our sovereignty, the Prime Minister revealed his ignorance of Canada's defence problems. Due to Canada's position, and especially since the advent of the nuclear era, we have to rely on the collective protection of other people. Since 1940 the mainstay of our security has been the North Atlantic Treaty Organization whose backbone has been the might of the United States. Had the United States wanted to do so, it could have swallowed us decades ago, the same as Russia has done with the Baltic states. The only real protection we have to our sovereignty is collective defence, and for self-evident reasons our well-being depends entirely on western collective security.

The white paper on defence states:

> It is highly unlikely Canada would be attacked by a foreign power other than as a result of a strategic nuclear strike directed at the U.S. . . . Canada's overriding defence objective must therefore be the prevention of nuclear war . . . Because of Canada's obvious inability to deter major nuclear war unilaterally, we can best contribute to peace by participating in collective security arrangements.

The reduction of Canada's participation in NATO is well known and has made us suspect in all of western Europe. But as if this were not enough, in Singapore the Prime Minister next turned his attention to the British Commonwealth of Nations. There the Prime Minister effectively sided with the forces of India, Tanzania, Zambia and Uganda, all of whom are intimately connected with communist China against Great Britain.

Then in respect of the enormous Soviet menace in the Indian Ocean it was said that the Canadian delegates could care less if somebody pulled the plug from the Indian Ocean. Canada sided with those countries that were against the sale of British arms to South Africa, arms which could be used in the naval defence of the Indian Ocean, while at the same time it made little comment on the sale of arms by France and Italy which could be directly used against villages and their inhabitants.

Then in May of this year the Prime Minister made a visit to the Soviet Union. The western world had too late prevented the communist enslavement of eastern and central Europe but had stopped Soviet expansion in the heart of the continent and stabilized a line of armed coexistence. It was not the western world but the communists who turned the dividing line into an ideological as well as a physical iron curtain with electrified barbed wire and machine-gun towers. It has turned the whole Soviet Union into a huge concentration camp. In his report to the Twenty-fourth Congress of the Soviet communist party on March 30 this year, Leonid Brezhnev said:

The full triumph of the socialist cause all over the world is inevitable. And we shall not spare ourselves in the fight for this triumph—

And what did the Prime Minister say about this? In a communiqué he issued the following astounding statement:

The discussions revealed that Canada and the U.S.S.R. hold similar views on a number of international problems.

Then there was his assertion in Kiev that Soviet and Canadian citizens were living under similar federal systems of government. Then there was his repeated allegation of acute United States "danger to our identity from the cultural, economic and perhaps even military point of view". The visit of Premier Kosygin, which might have been turned into a reasonable exchange between countries of different ideologies, was made the occasion to launch an attack by Mr. Kosygin on the economic policies of the United States.

Now we have the surcharge of August 15. For many years economic nationalists in Canada have been busily claiming that the Americans are making us hewers of wood and drawers of water. This has been the cry in many quarters of central Canada. It has been the cry of the hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Kierans)—and I do not put any more stock in what he said about this than I do in his running of the Post Office. The Prime Minister recently said that if the Americans do realize what they are doing, and if it becomes apparent that they want us to be just "sellers of natural resources to them and buyers of their manufactured goods, we will have to reassess fundamentally our relations with them, trading, political and otherwise".

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), on September 7 while speaking in the House of Commons on President Nixon's surcharge, said that 85 per cent of exports of Canadian finished goods are sold in the United States. Surely this rejects the Prime Minister's view that Canadians are treated as hewers of wood and drawers of water. Our export statistics show that in 1969 Canada sold abroad highly-finished industrial products worth $5,630 million. Of this total, 86.8 per cent went to the United States, 1.78 per cent to the European Common Market and 1.4 per cent to the United Kingdom. Excluding the United States market, we have sold only 13.2 per cent of our export manufactured goods to other countries. In 1969 the export total of $14.87 billion bears the classification of processed industrial materials. Here the labour content is lower but it is still substantial. We sold $5,251 million worth of processed industrial materials abroad. Of this total, 69.5 per cent went to the United States, 10.2 per cent to the United Kingdom and 6 per cent to the European Common Market. Canada's exports now total $17.5 billion, of which 75 per cent goes to the United States.

Those who say, including the Prime Minister, that the Americans just want us to be "sellers of natural resources to them and buyers of their manufactured products" must realize, surely, that this does not bear up under examination. The United Kingdom, the European Common Market and Japan have been getting raw materials from Canada without providing any substantial outlet for any industrial goods. Indeed, Japan is noted for this. If Washington had always had its own interest at heart, why would it have signed the auto pact agreement when the United States had $704 million surplus in 1965 which has been turned into $1,200 million in favour of Canada this year?

If it is true that the government hopes to replace the United States in exports to the Soviet Union, let us take a look at trade last year. We sold $128 million to the Soviet Union, mostly in wheat, and took back $8 million. The energy talks which have been suspended by the United States after the outburst of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) have not been resumed. Communications between Washington and Ottawa are at a low ebb. Apparently the Prime Minister has forgotten that Washington has an enormous political and economic clout and that their influence could have a severe impact on the Canadian economy.

No one knows what the new measures of phase 2 in the Nixon administration will be, but it is likely that they will be no less severe than the surcharge. This may well require some hard bargaining over the auto pact. There may have to be bargaining over the sale of energy, and if so what will the amounts be? We have energy for sale but it is high-priced energy and the only buyers can be the Americans. We will have to decide whether or not we will sell them any more.

With regard to the larger issues, Canadians will have to do some deciding with regard to their future course of action. Almost certainly the United States is entering a period of trade protectionism and is withdrawing within its own borders. The United States has the resources to provide its people with a reasonable standard of living. We must decide if Canada wishes to accept the premise of Economic nationalism with restrictions on foreign capital and with the consequent restriction in job expansion in the immediate future.

The reports would indicate that the unpublished Gray report pursues a policy of restrictions on foreign capital. We will have the fastest growing labour force in the western world in the next decade. We have built up the most comprehensive welfare system, in its broadest sense, in the western world which is still increasing its share of the take of the gross national product. The Unemployment Insurance Act goes a long way toward guaranteed income and provides 44 weeks of benefit for eight weeks of work. The tax bill presently before the House will restrict the development of the resource industries and channel investment money to manufacturing. That area will increasingly feel shut out from its only real market by the action of the United States.

It is widely stated that the new competition act and the labour act will restrict business growth. These will have to be considered extremely carefully. Canada will have to assess whether it wishes to have closer trading arrangements with the United States or revert to a more independent status. If the United Kingdom, with its population of 55 million, feels it has to join the Common Market, surely the importance of trade with the U.S. and whatever results it might have will require considerable debate by Canadians.

Under the present administration there will be no meaningful dialogue between Canada and the United States regarding these problems. Dialogue with the United States will be at a relative standstill until this government is replaced.

Mr. Jerry Pringle (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity provided by the opposition motion to comment on what I deem to be a deliberate attempt to weaken the natural and proper bond which has for many decades existed between Canada and our neighbour to the south. I do not know how many hon. members live as close to the border as I do, that is, two or three miles. I live in a great area where tourism is important. I live in an area where we mingle with our friends from the south. They come to our area and we travel back and forth. We have learned to understand each other.

I would like to say at the outset that I do not know of any man who has received as many compliments for being an out-and-out courageous individual, one who is really intent on being a statesman in our country. These are the statements that have been made to me by our American friends, statements directed at our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

Some hon. Members: Hooray!

Mr. Howard (Skeena): He is not only a statesman, he is a United Statesman.

Mr. Pringle: This gentleman has not only received the admiration of the United States people but he has also received their respect.

I do not know how many members in the opposition are in business. The young gentleman from Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom), of the NDP, has said, I do not know how many times, "We shall do this and we shall do that for the good of Canada". I do not know how many payrolls he had had to meet and how much he has contributed to the gross national product of Canada. I do not know how much he has added to the gross national product, to something that can be used and can create prosperity or at least some cash flow to the country. If he has been doing this, if he is really interested in the future of Canada, then for heaven's sake let him find out what is needed and what has to be done in order to create prosperity.

Mr. Baldwin: Vote Conservative.

Mr. Pringle: You do not create it with words or with rhetoric. You create it with hard work to contribute to the gross national product with something that you can sell.

[Mr. Ritchie.]

We have not yet found a way to provide the standard of living which we have in Canada without selling something, without trading with people, without initiating a manufactured product or at least a type of product. True, our natural resources are basic. We know that mining, lumbering and farming are our basic industries. Out of this grows our gross national product, the service industries and everything else. This is all very well, but first we must have markets and, as we know, our problem in agriculture has never been production. We have in Canada the most efficient agricultural industry in the world, but our problem is markets. We must realize that without the United States we are confined so far as our markets are concerned.

I agree that a minority element in Canada is attempting to drive a wedge between us but I submit that they are not impressing our American friends, although they are treading a dangerous path, apparently supported by the NDP. The vast majority of Canadians and Americans who pass freely across the forty-ninth parallel know that the bond of friendship is strong and shall not be broken.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pringle: The opposition, through the speech of my very good friend, the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie), say that our Prime Minister, the first minister of Canada, should attempt to govern the U.S. from Ottawa.

Mr. Baldwin: He should try to govern Canada first.

Mr. Pringle: What they say is utter nonsense. Now they attempt to condemn us for acting responsibly. They keep jumping from one side of the fence to the other, hoping the political climate will somehow improve and assist the lost cause of their party which has been searching in vain for ten years to find anything on which to hang a hope.

Of course, the Americans are tough traders. Those of us who have been involved in doing business with our American friends know full well that when one deals with an American one had better be careful, because they are pastmasters in the art of making a buck. That is what has made them great. This is not confined to Canada. Those who would suggest to the Canadian people that the Americans are simply interested in making investments in Canada for the purpose of taking it over should consider the fact that 52 per cent of the assets of the world are at least partly owned by the United States of America.

I can recall reading in history books of the time when England, that small island, sent out her merchant ships all over the world to take the products of the rest of the world back to England, from where they were traded to the nations of the world. They did a fine, a fantastic job. They opened the trade routes of the world. They created the necessary basis for trade, which is so essential to all of us. I wonder how many of us really know how much British investment there still is in Canada. Just a year or two ago the Hudson Bay Company decided it was time to transfer its head office to Canada, where the company's principal operation has always been and where its money has been made. I can recall that when I worked in the Bank of Montreal, every Thursday I had to send a statement to Threadneedle Street in London. I know that the CPR did not do that well just on Canadian investment; it needed the help of British investment.

Suddenly it is now suggested by the opposition, I believe for purely political expediency, that we are taking a whack at the United States of America. In reply I say that suddenly we have been confronted with a problem. Every day businessmen are confronted with these problems. Suddenly a good customer decides that he is too good a customer, or he is actually in trouble. He decides that maybe he has overextended. Anybody in business who has been in a position of overextension knows how difficult this can be.

I suggest that the Americans today could be rather overextended in their investments throughout the world and that their money is having a little problem because of that fact. They have been going out into the nations of the world investing their money, not entirely because they want to assist the rest of the world but because by investing in other areas they may find labour that is cheaper and raw materials which are easier to obtain. Any sound businessman investing in anything is not doing it for others, but for himself.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. It being 9.45 p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 58(9), to interrupt these proceedings and forthwith put every question in respect of the motion before the House.

• (10:10 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost. It being after ten o'clock, this House stands adjourned until 11 o'clock tomorrow morning.

At 10.16 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, November 5, 1971

The House met at 11 a.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

HOUSE OF COMMONS

HOURS OF SITTING NEXT WEEK

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, there have been some discussions about the hours of sitting for next week, especially in respect of an arrangement that might make it possible for Members of Parliament to be present in their constituencies on Remembrance Day to attend ceremonies to which they have been invited without the necessity of making extraordinary efforts to be back in the House on the following day. I have been attempting to meet that favourable objective and at the same time save the hours that might be lost as a result of not sitting on Friday.

If it is agreeable to the House I would suggest that we pick up the hours lost on Friday, a week today, by sitting an additional hour on Monday from 10 p.m. to 11 p.m., and an additional two hours on Tuesday from 11 a.m. until one o'clock on government business. This time would be equivalent to the time lost on the succeeding Friday. If that is acceptable, the House will rise on Wednesday, November 10, and stand adjourned until November 15, 1971. If I have the unanimous consent of the House I should like to move a motion to that effect.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, we in this party are quite agreeable, although it should be understood that the normal routine proceedings and the question period will be at two o'clock on Tuesday rather than at eleven so that government business will not be interrupted by nasty questions.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the proposal made by the President of the Privy Council is in accordance with our discussions and we are happy to give our agreement.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, we are also in agreement with those proposals.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Is there agreement for the President of the Privy Council to propose a motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacEachen: I move:

That, on Monday, November 8, 1971, the time of adjournment of the House shall be 11 p.m., provided that proceedings pursuant to Standing Order 40 shall be taken up at that time;

That, on Tuesday, November 9, 1971, the House shall meet at 11 a.m., rise at 1 p.m. and resume its ordinary hours of daily sitting at 2 p.m., provided that Government Orders shall be taken up between 11 a.m. and 1 p.m., and that the daily routine of business shall be taken at 2 p.m. in that sitting;

And that, when the House adjourns on Wednesday, November 10, 1971, it shall stand adjourned until Monday, November 15, 1971.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

NUCLEAR TESTING—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43, in view of the obvious imminence of tomorrow's five-megaton blast, and in light of the recent events involving the excavation of a second hole on Amchitka Island for a possible further detonation of a nuclear device, and because of the announced atmospheric nuclear explosion by the government of France and the likelihood of other countries continuing their own tests, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the government of Canada immediately request the Secretary General of the United Nations to immediately declare a one-year moratorium on all nuclear tests, so that the United Nations during that period might complete a permanent agreement to end all nuclear testing.

• (11:10 a.m.)

In view of earlier representations by this House and the nature of the motion, I feel the House might be disposed to pass the motion without debate and I urge the House to do so.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Egmont. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, on a matter as important to the people of this country and the members of this House as this is I believe we should have some explanation. I was unable from my seat to hear any objection.

Mr. Speaker: Had the hon. member been sitting in the Speaker's Chair he would have determined that there was objection.

AMCHITKA NUCLEAR TEST—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, because of the unanimous decision a moment ago I think my chances might be equal to those of the President of the Privy Council. I should like to seek the consent of the House under Standing Order 43 to move a motion, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). The urgent and pressing necessity is apparent in the following motion:

In view of the spontaneous and massive objections and protests that have been developing in Canada from all areas since the United States announcement to proceed with the Amchitka bomb test and inasmuch as there is an overriding need for the Prime Minister, even at this late moment, to communicate directly with the President of the United States of America expressing the concern, dismay and objections of all Canadians about the proposed Amchitka blast, with the hope that the bomb test will be cancelled, this House urges upon the Prime Minister that he immediately communicate with President Nixon and so express that concern, dismay and objection.

Mr. Speaker: The motion proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43 requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if we might have some explanation from the government benches as to why they object to this course of action?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows this is debate and that this is not provided for under the terms of Standing Order 43.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

TRADE

POSSIBLE U.S. EXCISE TAX ON AUTOMOBILES IMPORTED FROM CANADA, INCREASE IN SURTAX AND IMPLEMENTATION OF DISC—CANADIAN COUNTER-MEASURES

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Finance. In light of the decision of the United States Senate finance committee to authorize additional powers to the President with regard to the imposition of an excise tax on automobiles imported from Canada and an additional surcharge, as well as its recommendations regarding DISC, could the minister now expand upon his statement yesterday that the Canadian government could be in a position to take appropriate counter-measures in the event that such action might be taken by the government of the United States?

[Mr. MacDonald (Egmont).]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I think it very unlikely that the President will take action with regard to changing the level of the surtax or imposing an excise tax. As a matter of fact, the United States administration have indicated several times that they would like to get rid of the surtax as soon as possible when stability of world currencies can be established and some other trading guidelines given. However, if they were to take such action we could take action in respect of taxes very quickly in this House. Of more concern to the government is the DISC program which was recommended in an amended form by a committee of the Senate. Of course this proposal has to go to a joint meeting of the two committees of the House of Representatives and the Senate and then the legislation has to go through both chambers. However, we are watching very closely to see what kind of DISC proposal ultimately comes out, if one does emerge from these consultations between the two Houses, and are considering what action we would take in that case.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Does the minister agree that this is a dangerous escalation, and is the Canadian government taking further initiatives both in regard to this move and also with regard to settling the international exchange situation which seems to underly the whole problem of the surcharge and our relationship with the United States?

Mr. Benson: First of all, Mr. Speaker, I do not consider it an escalation. They have simply granted authority to the President. In the United States the President has to have underlying authority in order that he may take action, whereas in Canada action on taxation under any circumstances can be taken by an announcement in this place. With respect to the DISC program, the announcement would indicate that it is in a much modified form from the form put forward by the administration, but if passed as recommended by the Senate committee it would still be very damaging to Canada, and we have protested officially with regard to the DISC program.

With regard to the underlying situation, talks took place in Ottawa yesterday and there will be further meetings. The next meeting of the Group of Ten is to be held later this month in Rome.

UNITED STATES IMPORT SURTAX—PRESENTATION BY AMERICAN OFFICIALS OF LIST OF GRIEVANCES AT MEETING IN OTTAWA

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): In the discussions which took place yesterday in Ottawa on the United States surtax, did the American officials present to the government of Canada their list of so-called grievances?

Hon. E. J. Benson: (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker, there is no list of grievances on either side. What took place yesterday was a discussion of various problems on both sides. Such talks have been going on for quite a long time in an effort to work toward a solution on both sides of matters that are annoying each country.

Mr. Broadbent: Was the Canada-U.S. automotive agreement specifically discussed and, if so, what particular changes were recommended by the Americans and what response to these proposals did the Canadian government make?

Mr. Benson: I would rather not disclose the individual items that were discussed.

REVIEW OF INCOME TAX BILL PROVISIONS AFFECTING INDUSTRY IN LIGHT OF POSSIBLE U.S. ECONOMIC ACTION AND REPORT BY CANADIAN SENATE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): In light of the potential or proposed United States action and the urgent need to take every possible move to strengthen Canadian industry, as indicated in the interim report of the Senate Finance Committee, will the government even at this late date review its position on the tax bill and delay implementing those provisions which have an unsettling and deteriorating effect on the Canadian economy?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): That is the hon. member's opinion. We intend to proceed with the tax bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Shefford have a supplementary?

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I shall give him the floor in a few minutes. We will carry on with supplementary questions on the present subject and I shall call on the hon. member for Shefford as soon as possible.

[English]

UNITED STATES DISC PROPOSAL—CONTINGENCY PLAN—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES, BUSINESS, LABOUR AND ECONOMIC EXPERTS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the enormous potential threat to the Canadian economy posed by the DISC plan, is the government formulating any contingency plan to meet the situation and does the government propose to hold some sort of hearings or consultations with business, labour and economic experts as well as the provinces to meet the threat posed by this program?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, first of all we have to see how the DISC plan emerges. As I have indicated, we are quite a long way from that and it will not be too late then. That is the only time at which we would take action.

AUTOMOBILES—POSSIBLE EXCISE TAX ON CANADIAN AUTOMOBILE IMPORTS IF UNITED STATES TAX IMPOSED

Mr. Robert P. Kaplan (Don Valley): My question also is for the Minister of Finance. With reference to the possible automobile excise tax in the United States, is the government prepared to impose an excise tax on Canadian imports of automobiles from the United States to produce an equal countervailing against American protectionism?

• (11:20 a.m.)

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I consider that to be a hypothetical question.

UNITED STATES DISC PROPOSAL—PUBLICATION OF PART OF FOREIGN OWNERSHIP REPORT TO CABINET DEALING WITH OPERATIONS OF AMERICAN MULTINATIONAL CORPORATIONS

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, in light of the DISC threat will those sections of the Gray Report dealing with the behavior and operations of United States multinational corporations be made public? I asked this question of the Prime Minister the other day, and I hope that we now can have an answer.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): I would have to take that question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): As a final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, is it a fact, because the Minister of Finance has come into the chamber today on a day he should not be here, thus incurring the wrath of the Prime Minister, and has given all these meaningless answers, that finally he is desperately worried about the United States economic measures?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

AMCHITKA NUCLEAR TEST—PARTICIPATION BY PRIME MINISTER IN MEMBERS' PROTEST TO PRESIDENT NIXON—FORMAL COMMUNICATION OF HOUSE RESOLUTION TO PRESIDENT

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I had a question I wanted to put to the Prime Minister. I assume his absence is due to the departure from Ottawa of President Tito, so may I put the question to the Acting Prime Minister. I believe my hon. friend, the President of the Privy Council, would like to enjoy notoriety for a moment or two. Now that 119 members of the House have wired President Nixon reminding him of the opposition of this House to the Amchitka test, will the Acting Prime Minister take up with the Prime Minister the possibility, even at this late date, of his joining with us in expressing the hope that this blast will be cancelled by President Nixon?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I need to take the point up with the Prime Minister because I have already discussed the matter with him. He, of course, joined with other members of the House in the formal resolution passed by the House of Commons indicating the view of the House with respect to this test. It was his view that it was entirely up to other hon. members whether they wished to sign this telegram, and that a further signature would not add anything to what had already been done by the House in a formal resolution.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as a supplementary question I wonder if the Acting Prime Minister can tell us whether the resolution passed by the House on October 15 was actually communicated to the President and, if so, by what method?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to tell the hon. gentleman exactly what procedure was followed, but I understand it was communicated to the government of the United States by the Department of External Affairs, as it was to other governments.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of reports from the United States that Canada is not among the countries that formally protested, will the Acting Prime Minister look into this, and if the resolution was not formally communicated to the President will he see that this is done?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I will look into it. I feel certain that the resolution was communicated to the government of the United States but I will find out, if possible, whether the resolution was actually put in front of the President. I cannot answer that question now.

NUCLEAR TESTING—SUGGESTED HOUSE MOTION REQUESTING U.N. SECRETARY GENERAL TO CALL FOR MORATORIUM

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the President of the Privy Council in his dual capacity as House leader and Acting Prime Minister. In view of the motion I presented this morning, would he be willing to confer with the House leaders of the other parties to determine if there would be general agreement to pass it, or a similar motion, without debate in order that the Secretary General of the United Nations might call for a one-year moratorium on nuclear testing by all nations, thus eliminating what seems to be a major barrier to the United States preventing them from not going on with their test, namely, concern for their own defence and security?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I take it that the hon. member is properly bringing this matter before the House because he does express, I think, the sentiments of all hon. members. I think what separates us at the moment is the question of whether a further resolution will add to the strength of what has already been done by the House of Commons. We take the view that what has already been done is strong evidence of the feelings of this House and that any further action by the House would serve to weaken what has already been done.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): A supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Egmont on a supplementary and then the hon. member for Shefford.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I think the minister has not really answered the question. My motion was a good deal different. Would the minister indicate whether he would not consider seriously with the other House leaders a motion that could be passed unanimously and directed to the Secretary General of the United Nations? Second, are any steps being taken to determine whether a second test is being planned for Amchitka Island as was reported yesterday and again today?

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Question your own party for the solution.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I want to be courteous to the hon. member and I will not refuse to give further consideration to the possibility of talking to the other House leaders about this matter. However, I would be dishonest if I indicated to him that there would be any change in attitude on the part of the government in joining at this time in passing a further resolution. I think my hon. friend appreciates that. On the second question I really cannot provide an up-to-date answer.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PARITY OF REMUNERATION BETWEEN ARMED FORCES AND PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of National Defence.

Further to his statement this morning with regard to pay increases in the Armed Forces in order to establish pay parity between the Armed Forces and the Civil Service of Canada within the next two years, would the minister say whether he intends to announce that his department will soon reassess the necessity and the role of the Canadian Armed Forces so as to be able to meet adequately the needs of Canada in 1971?

Hon. Donald S. MacDonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I already made such an announcement in the White Paper on National Defence.

[English]

ASSURANCE RESPECTING NO INCREASE IN RENT AND OTHER COSTS OF PERSONNEL FOLLOWING PAY RAISE

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): I have a supplementary for Santa Claus too. On behalf of the 85,000 or 90,000 people in the Canadian Armed Forces I wonder if the minister could give some assurance to members of the forces that he will not increase rents or the costs of meals and other recoverable cost items within the defence structure?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, there have been long-term policy announcements with regard to bringing into balance rents for permanent married quarters. Therefore I cannot give the undertaking that the policies under way will not be carried out as needed. Where certain payments have been based on income, of course where income has gone up payments will have to go up too. In general terms we are trying to arrive at the basis that, if compensation is to be on the same basis as the civil community, services to be paid for will of course have to be on the same basis.

[Later:]

POSSIBLE ADJUSTMENT OF ARMED FORCES RETIREMENT AGES AND PENSION RIGHTS FOLLOWING PAY INCREASES

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to previous questions asked of the Minister of National Defence. Will the changes in pay outlined in his press release today lead to further changes in the retirement ages of our forces personnel and their pension rights? In other words, by bringing their pay more in line with the civil service will we be making other adjustments as well?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is referring to the age of retirement, of course very different factors apply to members of the Canadian Armed Forces and of the Mounted Police than apply to other members of the civilian community. I do not anticipate any changes there. With regard to pensions, of course the pay increases also carry with them a requirement incumbent on the government to make further contributions to the pension fund. I must confess that I really do not understand the full import of the hon. member's question.

WAGE AND PRICE FREEZE—DISCUSSION WITH PROVINCES RESPECTING JURISDICTION

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance.

I would like to know if, in his meetings with provincial finance ministers, a wage and price freeze was considered and in the affirmative, if provinces indicated to the minister that they would agree to waive their jurisdiction in that field supposing the federal government would decide to implement this policy in order to fight inflation.

[English]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I recall, this question did not arise.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

LAY-OFF OF DOCKYARD EMPLOYEES, ST. JOHN'S, NFLD.—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport. Does he have an answer to the question I posed yesterday concerning the lay-offs at the Canadian National dock in St. John's?

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we are advised by the Canadian National that at first they thought employment could be found for these employees. This is why the lay-off notices were rescinded. But as they failed to obtain contracts, they re-issued the notices. This is the only explanation for their decision. CN usually get their contracts through public tenders, and they are now seeking new ones in order to re-hire their employees.

INVESTIGATION OF UNION CHARGES THAT ST. JOHN'S DOCKYARD INEFFICIENTLY OPERATED

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the parliamentary secretary in the absence of the minister who is supposed to be here today, according to the roster. Since the pending lay-offs are an urgent matter, will the parliamentary secretary communicate with the minister and undertake to investigate charges made by the unions that this Canadian National dockyard in St. John's, Newfoundland, is inefficiently operated and hence unable to compete with other docks?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly transmit the remarks of the hon. member to the minister.

SCIENCE

RESULTS OF STUDIES OF SCIENTIFIC DATA ON NUCLEAR TESTING

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of State for Science and Technology. Will the hon. gentleman convey to the House the results of the studies by scientists working for the Canadian government of the large amount of detailed scientific data and studies on nuclear bomb testing that has been received from the United States over the last couple of years, with reference particularly to the proposed bomb test that is to take place tomorrow at Amchitka?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the representation of the hon. member. I cannot give him the undertaking he seeks.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Surely this is a preposterous situation. This was a matter of such concern that it prompted the government to act in the first instance and now it does not know what happened to the resolution that the House passed on this matter. The Minister of State for Science and Technology has completely evaded the question about the evaluation of existing studies.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is debate and not a question of privilege.

TRANSPORT

POSSIBLE COMBINING OF OFF-SEASON TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY PASSENGER SERVICES—CONSULTATION WITH ALBERTA GOVERNMENT

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, in view of the suggestion by the Canadian Transport Commission that Canada's two major railways should combine their off-season transcontinental passenger services, may I ask the Minister of Transport—in this case I direct the question to his parliamentary secretary—whether the minister can assure us that the government of Alberta will be consulted on any transport changes, as has been requested by the premier of the province, since Alberta is one of the two landlocked provinces of Canada?

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Transport Commission made their suggestion only recently, and I can say on behalf of the minister that such a suggestion was at first approved. I understand very well and I hope that hon. members will understand also that this matter is most important; it requires a thorough study and certainly consultations.

ALLEGED INADEQUATE TRANSPORTATION AND TERMINAL FACILITIES FOR GRAIN

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport may I ask his parliamentary secretary whether, in view of the statement by Mr. Gibbings of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool that transportation provided for grain is inadequate, that terminal facilities need to be reviewed to see if they cannot be made adequate for the handling of our grain, and that we have lost sales and have had to turn down sales because of this inadequacy, there has been any consultation between the minister of Transport and the minister in charge of the Wheat Board to see if this situation can be improved?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hope the question has now been asked, and I hope the parliamentary secretary can reply briefly. I suggest to hon. members that an attempt should be made to shorten questions. If each question takes more than a minute and the answer is just as long, the number of questions that can be asked is cut down.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I share your point of view, but I would prefer to consider the matter further before giving an answer.

INDUSTRY

SHOES—REPORT OF INVESTIGATION BY ANTI-DUMPING TRIBUNAL

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, following his statement that the government had established an inquiry commission to examine the Anti-dumping act.

Considering that the opposition has made many representations in favour of shoe manufacturers, could the minister tell us when he expects a report on this matter and what the government intends to do with regard to the many lay-offs in that industry, at the Red Carpet Shoe Company, for example, where they have dismissed—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to set the facts straight. The problem of leather shoe imports has been submitted to the anti-dumping court so as to get from it, under section 16, a ruling on the prejudice suffered by this industry.

So, before taking or considering the possibility of taking unilateral measures, this government, under that section of the act, must obtain the views of the anti-dumping court.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question which is not supplementary but which is intended to clarify my first question. When does the government expect to receive a report on the results of this investigation carried out by the anti-dumping court?

Mr. Pepin: The anti-dumping court is carrying out this type of investigation for the first time, because it is under a recent amendment that it now has this capacity. We do not know exactly how long this will take. Normally, the anti-dumping court, so I am told, makes its rulings within 90 days, more or less, in a matter of dumping.

I hope that it will also be possible then to assess the prejudice, but the investigation will have to be quite exhaustive. How long it lasts will depend on the evidence which is heard and on the quality of information presented to the anti-dumping court.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, does the minister mean that the advocated steps will compel manufacturers to reopen, after they had to close as a result of heavy shoe imports?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, since I do not know what will be the opinion of the anti-dumping court, it is difficult for me to comment on that.

Mr. Jacques-L. Trudel (Montréal-Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The member for Montréal-Bourassa on a point of order.

Mr. Trudel: Mr. Speaker, I think that the answer of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has not been given through the interpretation system. There has been a delay and we have been unable to hear what the minister had to say.

PARLIAMENT HILL

SECURITY MEASURES DURING VISIT OF PRESIDENT TITO—ABILITY OF MEMBERS TO PROCEED TO OFFICES

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister and arises out of the security measures that were implemented on Parliament Hill during the last several days as well as the apparent lack of communication or co-operation between the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the security staff of the House of Commons. What were the special instructions issued to the RCMP on this occasion and, in particular, were any special instructions issued that would prevent members of this House from proceeding to their offices on any of those days—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McIntosh: —or is this the first indication of a police state?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that there is no indication of a police state in anything that has happened on the bill. As my hon. friend knows, the building and the security staff of the House are not matters for the government. However, I will make inquiries with respect to that part of the question having to do with the RCMP.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. While the minister is making those inquiries will he assure the members of the House that on future occasions such as the last two we have experienced—the hon. member for St. Boniface is shooting off his face again—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member who has the floor should be allowed to ask his question.

Mr. MacInnis: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I have the floor and I am asking a question. I would, ask the Chair to pay special attention to the member who used to come from St. Boniface. If he has anything to say, he should have the guts to get up and say it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member might ask the question he wanted to ask. Then we will proceed because there are just about five minutes left before the end of the question period.

• (11:40 a.m.)

Mr. Guay: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. It is twofold. First, I wish to advise Your Honour that I would like to ask a question today. Second, I would like to advise Your Honour that we would like to keep the hon. member healthy and alive for a long, long time.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that this kind of question of privilege is not very helpful if we are to proceed effectively before the end of the question period. Will the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond kindly ask his question and we will then proceed to the next subject.

Mr. MacInnis: Briefly on the question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I think thehon. member should acknowledge—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I seek the hon. member's co-operation. I do not think the matter should be proceeded with further by way of a question of privilege. I appreciate the hon. member has a supplementary to the question asked by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek.

Mr. MacInnis: I just thought I should be thanked for giving the hon. member an opportunity to open his mouth and get to his feet. Will the minister ensure that on future occasions, such as the state visits that have taken place in the last few weeks, any security measures will be properly co-ordinated with the security staff of the House of Commons so that the situations that developed will not be repeated?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's suggestion seems to be reasonable and I will investigate whether it is possible to do that.

Mrs. MacInnis: In the meantime is the minister taking steps to see that no other native Indian women are deprived of their Indian status for this reason?

DECISION NOT TO SELL CANADIAN ARSENALS PLANT

Mr. Colin D. Gibson (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Supply and Services. As tenders on the Canadian Arsenals plant in Toronto were due two months ago, can the Minister of Supply and Services please inform the House whether he has reached any decision on the sale of the plant and, particularly, how the employees will be affected in view of the unemployment situation?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the government was prepared to sell the Long Branch plant of Canadian Arsenals but none of the bids that we received was satisfactory either in amount or, particularly, concerning our terms about continuing employment of present employees. Therefore our decision is to keep the plant in operation and to do everything possible to increase the work load. I am pleased to say to the hon. member that this decision means there are no lay-offs contemplated at the Long Branch plant of Canadian Arsenals.

COMMUNICATIONS

ALLEGED RACIAL DISCRIMINATION IN MASS MEDIA ADVERTISING—REVIEW OF GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS WITH AGENCIES

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I wish to direct a very important question to the Acting Prime Minister. In light of the fact the Elkin report to the Ontario Human Rights Commission on visible minority performers in advertising concludes there is little doubt that racial discrimination occurs in mass media advertising, in that the image of the Canadian population reflected in Canadian advertisements is biased in the sense that we tend to see a country made up of whites with very few Asians, Indians, Eskimos or blacks, and in light of the fact that this is a multicultural society emphasizing, among other things,—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member realizes that according to the rules a question cannot be asked in those terms. The matter raised by the hon. member is important. The question, however, should be asked in a more direct way. It seems to me that the hon. member is now making a speech.

Mr. Alexander: I will get right to the point, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister review all government let contracts from this point of view, hopefully to deal only with firms and advertising agencies which actively adhere to the general principle of Canada being a multicultural society, and will he ensure that all government publications and advertisements demonstrate the ethnic and racial diversity of Canada?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the question raised by the hon. member is important, complicated and comprehensive. With regard to his over-all objective, I am sure we share his point of view, but how it can be done is a matter that will have to be looked into.

Mr. McGrath: Paul Martin would be proud of you.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this kind of consultation between officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the provincial housing authorities is taking place all the time. It has again been accelerated in the face of the $113 million that is being brought forward from next year to accelerate employment as well as low-cost housing during the next few months.

AJUSTMENT OF ARMED FORCES PAY TO REFLECT HIGHER VALUE OF GERMAN MARK

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (St. Boniface): My question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. Is any consideration being given to adjusting the Armed Forces wages to reflect the higher value of the German mark which has the effect of reducing living standards for our troops and their families stationed in Germany?

• (11:50 a.m.)

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is yes, this is being considered. This problem has arisen from a number of quarters so far as it affects the Canadian Armed Forces in Europe. The difficulty, of course, is to try to find some permanent basis on which to adjust pay in view of the rapid changes that are taking place in international currencies. At the moment the matter is under investigation.

IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS ON EDUCATION IN FIFTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE—OPPORTUNITY FOR DEBATE

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I am glad you have finally recognized me; I was beginning to feel that my ability to speak in this House on behalf of the constituents of Athabasca was being curtailed. May I ask the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development a question. A few days ago I asked him whether he had had a chance to review the fifth committee report dealing with Indian education and he said he was studying it. Would he now indicate to the House whether he intends to implement any of the recommendations in this report and, second, whether he intends to bring this report forward for debate in the House in the near future?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I have studied that report and we are presently considering what recommendations could be accepted. There is however a very difficult problem: I promised the Indians that they would be consulted on the development of any new policy. I discussed that on several occasions with the president of the Canadian Federation of Indians who are not in a position presently to submit their own recommendations on this very important problem.

INCREASE IN ARMED FORCES PAY—POSSIBLE REALLOCATION OF FUNDS—PROVISION OF SEAGOING ALLOWANCE TO RESERVE PERSONNEL

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of National Defence and is supplementary to the earlier questions regarding the welcome announcement that armed forces' pay will be brought more into line with civilian scales. Can the minister indicate whether or not the increases in salaries will result in a significant reallocation of funds as between personnel, maintenance and the purchase of new equipment?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it will, of course, have that effect since the amounts paid to personnel will be going up. However, I should make it clear that at least part of the sums will not be found in the current budget and there will be a supplementary estimate for this purpose. To the extent that the pay increase relates to increases for the current fiscal year, this is, of course, contemplated in the present budget. To the extent that there is a pay parity element involved, this will be the subject matter of a supplementary estimate.

Mr. Rowland: May I ask the Minister of National Defence whether, in the adjustments made for special pay, reserve force personnel will now receive a seagoing allowance just as they receive flying pay, submarine pay and diving pay?

REVIEW OF PROVISIONS OF BILL CONCERNING INTERNATIONAL COMPANY OPERATIONS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the decision by International Utilities to relocate its head office in the United States as a result, in part, of the anticipated tax changes, and in view of the contents of the interim report of the committee on banking, trade and commerce of the other place dealing with international investment, is the minister now going to make a review of the provisions of Bill C-259 to see whether he can bring in some modifications in regard to it?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): First of all, Mr. Speaker, this company has been in touch with us and Bill C-259 is not the basic reason for their move. The difficulty was that being a United States company they had to live under two sets of laws and regulations, both United States and Canadian, and that was the main reason for their attempt to come under only one set of tax laws.

Second, I have already indicated that the sections regarding international operations will be reviewed. Most of them do not come into effect until 1976, though the passive income provision does come into effect in 1973. In view of the Senate committee report and other representations that have been made, we are taking another look at these sections, as I have indicated before.

DECREASE IN NUMBER OF GRADUATE STUDENTS FROM UNDERDEVELOPED COUNTRIES FOLLOWING CHANGES IN RULES RESPECTING CERTAIN GRANTS

Mr. D. Gordon Blair (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. I put this question forward as one which might form the basis for a discussion at ten o'clock. Is the Acting Prime Minister aware that as a result of recent changes in rules respecting grants made by the National Research Council, the Canada Council and other agencies of the government of Canada there has been a drastic reduction in the number of graduate students in Canadian universities from underdeveloped countries? If he and his government are aware of this, are they prepared to take measures that will ameliorate this rather serious situation?

Would he advise the House what action he intends to take on the suggestion made by the Pulp and Paper Association that they be given tax relief in order to make the paper industry more competitive?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have been studying this matter and have asked the association, which made representations in many areas much earlier in the year, to submit to us additional information. We are gathering this information from them particularly to compare their tax position in Canada with the tax position of their competitors in other countries.

AMCHITKA NUCLEAR TEST—SUGGESTED SPECIAL APPROACH TO PRESIDENT NIXON BY CANADIAN AMBASSADOR IN WASHINGTON

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question that is really a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact that Japan has officially protested the proposed Amchitka test three times in the past few days, including a final attempt by their ambassador today, I would ask the Acting Prime Minister, since personal intervention will apparently not be made by the Prime Minister, whether the government would consider making a special approach through our ambassador in Washington to President Nixon to express our concern over the coming test and to request that it be cancelled?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will convey the hon. member's representations to the Secretary of State for External Affairs whom I shall be seeing later in the day.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

[Translation]

The House resumed, from Tuesday, November 2, consideration in committee of Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act—Mr. Benson—Mr. Laniel in the chair.

[English]

The Deputy Chairman: When the committee rose on Tuesday, November 2, 1971, section 18 and an amendment proposed by the Minister of National Revenue were before the committee. Sections 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 15, 18 and 20 has been grouped for the purpose of debate. Sections 9, 10, 11, 12, 13 and 15 were agreed to. The question is on section 18.

On clause 1—Section 18: General Limitations.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I want to ask a technical question that arises out the wording to be found on page 56 of the bill, in subsection (4) of this section, which deals with the limitation of deduction of interest by certain corporations. I gather that the purpose of this subsection is to ensure that a foreign owned corporation does not skim off money from its Canadian subsidiary operations by means of some dodge involving interest rates or charges. The minister and the department are making an attempt, with which I must say I agree, to see that any such practice is stopped. The technical problem that I should like to raise relates to paragraph (A) which uses the phrase "the corporation's paid-up capital limit". I wonder if that wording is sufficiently precise to achieve what the minister hopes to achieve, or whether it might be better to use simply the words "paid up capital"?

• (12 noon)

Mr. Mahoney: I cannot put my finger on it immediately, but I am advised there is a definition of the term elsewhere in the act and I will endeavour to find it for the hon. member.

Mr. McCleave: There is a definition elsewhere. It is referred to in section 89(1). I have read that section as well, but I still think it would be worth while for the parliamentary secretary to look at this in order to determine whether the government is achieving what it has set out to achieve. I do not want to hold up the subsection because of that point, but the government advisers might take a second look at this. They can always re-open the matter later.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, I should like to return to the point I was making the other night regarding section 18(1)(a). I realize there are other sections which deal with business expenses, but I am not at all satisfied with the suggestion of the minister, and I feel that the parliamentary secretary has completely misunderstood my idea. I do not intend that members of the House who are professionals should have an additional advantage, but they should be allowed to deduct the legitimate expenses of attending professional conferences. I have in mind lawyers attending the Canadian Bar convention or the Canadian tax convention, or doctors attending a convention of the Canadian Medical Association. I should like to have the ear of the parliamentary secretary in order that he might understand this point.

Mr. Mahoney: You are plugged into this system.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The system may be plugged into your ear but I want it plugged into the grey matter, and that is something different.

I should like to have the disability in respect of the interpretation of the statute removed so that the fact a Member of Parliament draws a stipend here, which is likely greater than his professional income, does not bar him from claiming that legitimate expense. A professional who is a member here and attends a professional conference should be entitled by law to deduct those expenses. That is to say, a lawyer or a doctor in practice should be able to claim these expenses, although only at a marginal rate. This is not a claim for total expenses, compensation or reimbursement, but he should be entitled to put this in as a deduction, thereby reducing his taxable income, to gain the benefit of that fractional, marginal rate. That is all a lawyer in practice is able to do, and that is the limit of my representation which I hope will find a reasonable reception.

Let me suggest to the parliamentary secretary that if an hon. member attends the Canadian Tax conference he might improve his personal knowledge, and thereby be of assistance to this House. A lawyer attending the Canadian Bar Association conference on a specific segment of criminal law or perhaps constitutional law, would improve his knowledge as a Member of Parliament and he should be legitimately entitled to that allowance. All this means is that if I earn $1, $200 or $300 as a lawyer, and the rest of my income is my parliamentary stipend, I should not be barred from claiming these expenses to the same extent allowed a full-time practitioner.

Mr. Mahoney: It is my understanding of the law that the hon. member can claim these expenses against his professional income. He cannot reduce his parliamentary stipend by claiming such expenses, but if he has a professional income as a lawyer, an accountant or a doctor, as the case may be, the expenses connected with earning that income, including the cost of attending certain conferences and so on, are allowed as an offset against that part of his income. He cannot get his parliamentary salary or wage reduced, because that is not professional income or wage. This is the purpose of the tax free expense allowance an hon. member is entitled to, if he feels he must incur that expense to carry out his duty as a member.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The interpretation placed on this subsection is that your major income must come from your profession, and that is quite impossible under our circumstances. This is what I wanted to change; that 50 per cent bar.

Mr. Mahoney: I will certainly take the question under advisement. I will read Hansard and have the officials read Hansard as well, because we may be misunderstanding the hon. member's point.

The Deputy Chairman: The committee has been considering the amendments moved by the Minister of National Revenue on October 22, which may be found at pages 8934 and 8935. Does the committee wish me to dispense with the reading of the amendment?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, the reference you have made to certain pages in Hansard may be correct, but if you referred to the particular subsections it would be helpful. I have them before me and do not need to read Hansard, but your reference would require us to scurry back through the pages of Hansard.

The Deputy Chairman: If I understand the hon. member correctly, he wishes me to relate the amendments to the particular sections.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is right.

The Deputy Chairman: The amendment by the Minister of National Revenue relating to section 18 of the bill is to be found at pages 55 to 58. Does the committee wish the Chair to read it?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I do not think it should be read, but I think it should be included in Hansard at this point as if it had been read.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee agree that the amendment be included in Hansard as though it had been read at this time? I could read it if hon. members so desire.

Mr. Mahoney: I think the hon. member for Edmonton West has made a helpful suggestion. Some of these subsections we are dealing with run on for several pages and it would be helpful to have them enumerated more specifically. The first amendment is to section 18(2)(a); the second is to 18(4); the third is to 18(5) and a further one is to 18(7).

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): And 18(2)(b) as well.

Mr. Mahoney: Yes, section 18(2)(b) as well. You are correct, Sir.

[Editors' Note: The amendment referred to follows:]

The Deputy Chairman: Is the House satisfied?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): We are on the same wave length for once.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Gray) agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall section 18 as amended carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause 1, Section 18, as amended, agreed to.

On Clause 1—Section 20: Deductions permitted in computing income from business or property.

The Deputy Chairman: Now, the committee will proceed to section 20 at page 61 of the bill. There is also an amendment by the Minister of National Revenue which appears in Hansard for October 22, at page 8935. The amendment reads as follows:

That section 20 as set forth in clause 1 of the said bill be amended

(a) by striking out line 26 on page 63 and substituting the following:

'Discount on certain obligations

(f) an amount paid in the year in satisfaction of the'

(b) by striking out lines 16 to 23 on page 64 and substituting the following:

'the amount by which the lesser of the principal amount of the obligation and the amount so paid in satisfaction of the principal amount thereof exceeds the amount for which the obligation was issued, and

(ii) in any other case, half of the amount by which the lesser of the principal amount of the obligation and the amount so paid in satisfaction of the principal amount thereof exceeds the amount for which the obligation was issued.'

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, my question on section 20 will be brief. Your reading of the amendment points up the fact that, substantially, the new provisions here as compared to the old Income Tax law involve subsection 1(f) of section 20 dealing with the discount on certain obligations. I think perhaps it would be helpful if the parliamentary secretary could briefly tell us why this change has been presented in this bill.

Mr. Mahoney: Well, Mr. Chairman, the basic concept here of course, is that certain types of payments, while perhaps technically of a capital nature, are really indistinguishable from income. For example, if a bond sells at a discount, at 97 per cent of the principal amount, in addition to the interest on the bond that 3 per cent, when the bond is retired or matured, would be considered as income.

Mr. McCleave: I take it that would be regarded as income in the year in which the bond was redeemed and not averaged out over the intervening period. Am I correct in that?

Mr. Mahoney: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, I do not know that there is anything particularly new or contentious in these subsections. However, I should like to point out that it seems they are almost incidental within the confines of personal income. As a matter of fact this section deals with expenses which may be deducted from gross income to arrive at the taxable income. In fact most of the subsection deals with corporate income, for instance, the cost of issuing shares, the cost of issuing other obligations, the discounts on the issuance of a commercial bill and matters of this kind which certainly are not personal income. This is a sort of omnibus catch-all type of section. To that extent, I do not find there is anything particularly wrong with it except that when we get to subsection 11 we get into the computation of foreign taxes on income from property exceeding 15 per cent and foreign state income tax. There is a point here on which I would like to make a certain comment.

I think there has been some advantage in this, although I do not know quite how it is covered under the treaty—and this matter is covered by a treaty. This particular provision under subsection 12 of section 20 as it appears at page 74, I suppose one could call the "Windsor clause". No doubt the Minister of National Revenue had something to do with this particular clause. If a state adjoining Canada should impose a state income tax, and there are a number of Canadians working in that state, hitherto the state income tax was not allowable as, shall we say, an offset on the Canadian income tax that would be payable by a resident of Canada on income earned abroad. I think if we can be satisfied that the United States has extended reciprocal provisions to Americans working in Canada, we should do the same for our citizens working in the United States. I am much happier seeing Canadians working in Canada if they are living in Canada, but I think this is a reasonable and just provision. After all, it is pretty tough if you have a legitimate income tax rebate against your income or part of your income and are not able to get appropriate adjustment for it.

With regard to subsection 13, I would suggest that again is much more a corporate matter. As a matter of fact, this is one of the propositions relating to transfers of foreign income where you can have a dividend declared by an affiliate—and we will come later on to the definition of what is a foreign affiliate—and then transfer it to another affiliate, have a tax exempt surplus and then transfer it into Canada. I would like to have an explanation concerning why this subject is dealt with under this particular section which deals primarily with expenses, and yet concerns a declaration of exemption from income or a tax exempt status of a dividend received from a foreign affiliate with a tax exempt surplus.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, this whole section 20 of course deals with deductions from income generally. Detailed provisions regarding tax treatment of dividends of foreign affiliates are dealt with in sections 90 to 95 inclusive. This is merely the superstructure and declares that that type of payment is an allowable deduction from income. On the question the hon. member raised regarding subsection 12, yes, the United States does recognize in its tax laws provincial income tax paid in Canada.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Gray) agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall section 20, as amended, carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause 1, Section 20, as amended, agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: The Committee will now proceed to a group of sections that were identified as cleanup sections by the President of the Privy Council.

• (12:20 p.m.)

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, may I raise a point of order? I understood that, first of all, we were to complete section 8 and then, as you said, we were to deal with a number of sections. I believe that if the government is ready to dispose of section 8, it would perhaps provide us with a few interesting moments before we get involved in a lengthy bit of housecleaning.

Mr. Mahoney: I had spoken privately to the hon. member whose amendment to section 8 is before the committee, and I regret not having anticipated this question. The cabinet did not have the opportunity yesterday to consider the possible amendment to that section, that might be agreeable, and accordingly, with the indulgence of the committee, I would ask that that section continue to stand. I am not too sure what the timing will be in view of the fact that next Thursday is a holiday, but I assume that at some point next week the cabinet will be meeting, so I hope that we can deal with this some time next week.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, we were so advised, and I may say that we are quite prepared to let section 8 stand until we have word from the government that it has decided to do something about it, hopefully in the right way.

[Translation]

Mr. Rodrigue: Mr. Chairman, having listened to the Parliamentary Secretary, we are prepared to let section 8 stand until the cabinet can discuss the possibility of bringing in amendments. I hope that there will be further consultations between the House leaders of the various parties and that hon. members will be told when that section is to be dealt with here.

[English]

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that section 8 shall stand?

Mr. Mahoney: If I understand the import of the suggestion of the hon. member for Beauce, I would be quite prepared to undertake to give, say, two days' notice of when we would be ready to call section 8 again.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: As I was saying, the committee will proceed with the consideration of an important group of sections which are related to the main sections that have been studied up to this time. The list is as follows: 16, 67, 69, 70, 72, 74 to 78 inclusive, 81, 126, 144, 145, 148, 149, 198, 199, 200 to 207 inclusive, 248 to 252 inclusive and 254. As was done previously, all these sections will be open to discussion, but the Chair will call the first one for the purpose of obtaining approval to the consideration of this group of sections. Shall section 16 carry?

On clause 1—Section 16: Income and capital combined.

Mr. McCleave: I think the committee will be thrilled to know that I do not intend to make a general speech on our housecleaning operation, but I have a brief question with regard to section 16. Since subsection (3) of section 16 is new, may I ask the parliamentary secretary to report briefly why this subsection has been put in the bill?

Mr. Mahoney: Is the hon. member referring to subsection (2) or to the whole of the section?

Mr. McCleave: Simply to the addition that is made to the present law.

Mr. Mahoney: Subsection (1) is a continuation of the present law, and subsections (2) and (3) carry forward, with some slight modification, the rules of the present law concerning the treatment of bonds under bonds issued at a substantial discount by tax exempt organizations. Under these rules, the discount may be treated as income in the hands of the first taxable Canadian holder. The treatment of discounts on bonds issued by taxable organizations has already been discussed under section 20. That is the big change in the section.

Subsection (4) is a continuation of the existing one, and subsection (5) is a technical provision that makes it clear that the blended payment rule in section 16(1) does not apply in cases where this discount is regarded as income.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I merely rise to say what I think is in the minds of all of us, that it would take more ingenuity than most members in the House possess to make a general speech on this collection of sections. So, I suggest that we take them seriatim.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that we call every section one after the other and allow discussion on each of them as they come? Shall section 16 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause 1, section 16 agreed to.

On clause 1—Section 67: General Limitation re Expenses.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): This is one of the sections that can be readily missed by a taxpayer because, notwithstanding the fact that in certain areas or certain sections of the bill stated expenses are allowed to be deducted, this is the little door right down in that back corner which gives the assessor a way to disallow deductions by simply quoting the following:

> In computing income, no deduction shall be made in respect of an outlay or expense in respect of which any amount is otherwise deductible under this Act, except to the extent that the outlay or expense was reasonable in the circumstances.

This provision gives the assessor a straight discretion and it leads in so many instances to the biggest hassle between the taxpayer and the assessor. The parliamentary secretary might wish to consult the Minister of National Revenue as to where the balance lies. Perhaps the assistant deputy minister in the Finance Department who deals with taxation could also say from his experience in the tax field where the balance lies. I know that you can make a statute so rigid that you cannot get a break from the assessor now and then. On the other hand, what I do not like to see are funk holes whereby a taxpayer reading a section wherein it is stated that he shall be allowed certain expenses in relation to earned income, and then when he makes his claim, finds that under section 67 the assessor says "I do not think the expenses are reasonable under the circumstances".

We all know that if there is a serious question about an item it can go further up the line, and ultimately to a court. This is one of those sections under which neither the Tax Review Board nor the Federal Court of Appeals would substitute their discretion for that of the assessors. They will say it is not a matter of law. The Tax Review Board might, however, but certainly no member of what had been the Exchequer Court, and which will now be the appropriate division of the Federal Court, will substitute the court's discretion for that of the assessor which, by the time the case gets to the court, is the opinion of the minister. Who says they are not reasonable under the circumstances? These statutes cannot be written merely for administrative convenience. This is one point where I will stop, right there and then, if the criterion is to be always the administrative advantage. The taxpayer has a tough enough fight as it is without our loading the dice against him all the time. This is one of those sections that, if it were in a contract, would be in superfine print. I want to get a full explanation.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, as the hon. member noted, this does continue a provision that is in the present act. It is basically to provide that an outlay or an expense is deductible only to the extent that it is reasonable.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Why don't you say so?

Mr. Mahoney: The words "in respect of which any amount is otherwise deductible," that appear in this section are there to make it clear that the limit also applies where the deduction is indirect rather than direct. An example of that might be where a person paid an exorbitant amount of money for a capital asset, which he then depreciates, and the depreciation, an indirect deduction from income in this sense, would have to be reasonable and be related to a reasonable capital cost.

On the basic question of jurisprudence, Mr. Chairman, I can only say that I do not think the courts have ever been particularly shy in accepting the responsibility of determining what is or is not reasonable. It is a mixed question of law and fact. Usually, when it comes under a taxing statute more often it is a question of fact, and they will exercise their jurisdiction and discretion in determining whether the taxpayer has been reasonable and perhaps whether the tax assessor has been unreasonable in his interpretation of the transaction.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I hate to disagree with the parliamentary secretary's opinion, but if there is an indication that there is an appeal on a point of law to a particular court—and we must remember that in many instances on this point appeals only lie on a point of law—the matter of reasonable interpretation gets terribly short shrift on application to the court. This is what I am questioning all along the line. This is why I feel there are some difficulties here.

It would be better with respect to this question of reasonableness if a direct indication were given in bold letters in conjunction with the main section dealing with expenses, rather than having it tucked away in the position that I have described of being in very fine print. I say this because when we come to consider sections 66, 69 and so forth, the subject matters are entirely different.

Mr. Blair: Mr. Chairman, I am interested in the comments which are being made by the hon. member for Edmonton West. I wonder if I correctly understood what he has said. If I have not correctly understood, then I am sure he will appreciate that my difficulty in following him lies in my being this far away from him in the chamber at the present time. Does the hon. member suggest that the present test of reasonableness for this type of expense should be replaced by some codified, arbitrarily defined one outlining the categories of expense? Is he suggesting that?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, I am sure that in that outer-limits post which he occupies the hon. member missed what I was trying to say. This subsection deals with expenses required to earn an income, from a business or otherwise. There are various sections in which these things are determined. For instance, we have considered them under section 18. I ask the hon. member to look at section 18(1)(a) which reads:

> In computing the income of a taxpayer from a business or property no deduction shall be made in respect of
> (a) an outlay or expense except to the extent that it was made or incurred by the taxpayer for the purpose of gaining or producing income from the business or property;

But, on the other hand, section 67 reads:

> In computing income, no deduction shall be made in respect of an outlay or expense in respect of which any amount is otherwise deductible under this Act,—
> An amount that would be deductible under section 18(1)(a).
> —except to the extent that the outlay or expense was reasonable in the circumstances.

Section 18(1)(a) does not say anything about reasonableness, and there is a flat indication that in many instances section 18 does not speak of any limitations. It is related to the earning of income from the business or property.

Using the example given by the parliamentary secretary about indirectly controlling the nature of the expenditure, whether it is reasonable or not, let us say that the proprietors of a high rise apartment, a high class one, instal some equipment in the lobby which is of a particularly high quality. This, of course, affects the level of depreciation, and I think the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton will agree with me that it affects the quantum of depreciation. If on the one hand the assessor, and through him, the minister, says, "No, this is far too elaborate; this is not reasonable with regard to this particular building," I point out that section 18(1)(a), and section 16 and section 67 are in conflict. Is it the taxpayer or is it the assessor who is going to determine what is reasonable? I would go further; would the court at the appropriate level, exercise its views or its discretion and decide whether that particular type of capital expenditure was reasonable under the circumstances?

Mr. Blair: Now that the hon. member has explained his point more fully, I feel it is possible for me to make one or two comments on it. The first thing that I think should be said is that there is no conflict between sections of this kind but they impose different tests for different purposes. So far as an expense of this kind is concerned, the first and absolute test is that it must be made in order to earn income and not for some other purpose, such as to provide clothes for the proprietor of the business. The second test is that it must be reasonable in relation to the nature of the enterprise and so on.

I do not profess to have had complete experience in the field of tax law, but I have never heard people object to the concept that expenses of this type must be reasonably related in the circumstances to the condition of the taxpayer and the type of business conducted. In saying all this, I make no comment at all on the example given by the hon. member for Edmonton West because, as he pointed out, he was talking about capital expense and capital cost allowance which may fail to be determined under different principles.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No, they don't.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Chairman, I am a little intrigued by the last portion of this clause which reads "except to the extent that the outlay or expense was reasonable in the circumstances". I think it is very easy to understand that what one person considers reasonable another person may consider completely unreasonable. It seems to me that there could be a lot of confusion as a result of this provision unless the government is prepared to present a series of guidelines as to what would be reasonable in the circumstances. Under the present situation, I suppose what they have in mind is an arbitrary power given to somebody to review what the person filing the income tax return believes to be reasonable. Who would make the original judgment of what is reasonable? Would it be some bureaucrat who could then force court action? Is some sort of appeal board being established? I wonder if the parliamentary secretary could clarify these points?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Speaker, I would refer the hon. member to section 169 and following with regard to appeal provisions. When he has had an opportunity to peruse them, I will be glad to deal with any questions on what the appeal rights are. However, I understand that there is a possibility we will be dealing with these sections later today.

I really do not believe that the hon. member is serious in suggesting that the government should arbitrarily establish guidelines in this area rather than leave the test of reasonableness to be determined in the courts. Of course, the initial dealings between the taxpayer and the Department of Revenue are through a tax assessor, but if the taxpayer disputes the ruling of the tax assessor he has the right of judicial appeal. So far in our society we have not devised a more ingenious way or a more satisfactory one of arbitrating disputes between the government and citizen than through the courts. I think the courts are generally regarded as being impartial and performing well. When the hon. member looks at section 169 and following, he will note that there are tribunals available which would allow a speedy and inexpensive determination of the matter before it gets to the federal court and the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. Yewchuk: I realize that section 169 deals with that, Mr. Chairman, but in view of the tremendous authority which seems to be given to the tax assessor in this case, I was wondering what guidelines he has to follow and who sets them in determining reasonableness?

Mr. Mahoney: It is just a question of fact, Mr. Chairman, in each case. If somebody claims that he should be able to write off $20,000 for a Rolls Royce because he is a shoe salesman, the assessor might decide that was a questionable expenditure and that a Chev would do just as well. This is the problem. I could spend all afternoon, I suppose, reciting a litany of examples but when you get down to it, these things arise when there is a disagreement between the taxpayer and the tax assessor as to what expenses are reasonably incurred in earning income. So far at least we, as a government, feel, and I think most Canadians would agree, that the test of reasonableness is not an unreasonable test and that in fact the courts function rather well in determining it.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

Mr. McCleave: I should like to enter this discussion, Mr. Chairman. I think it is important because if one examines the bible, and I use the Canadian Master Tax Guide, the CCH publication, there are pages dealing with the question raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West, followed by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton and the hon. member for Athabasca. Some of the litigation has been extraordinarily expensive and sometimes the Supreme Court of Canada comes into the field very late, after taxpayers have been subjected to certain procedures and practices and the ultimate court that we have overturns the decision of the lower court. It is at least a fruitful field for the lawyer and the chartered accountant, if a somewhat puzzling field for the taxpayer.

I think I would have to agree that the courts should be given pretty wide latitude to determine the meaning of what is reasonable in the circumstances. We can never really get away from that. However, I would point out to the parliamentary secretary that when taxpayers are left in doubt and when they have to incur vast legal expenses to solve the problem, some day perhaps section 67 could be redrafted in better language.

I shall not go through the cases I have read, but I would note that a large number of them seem to be trying to draw that subtle line between what are the expenses of earning an income and those expenses which are more likely of a capital nature. Perhaps I can illustrate it with one case from the CCH report. A heavy storm created considerable damage to a cottage which was used by its owner for rental purposes. He put the roof back on the cottage and carried out repairs to bring it back to its former condition. These were held to be expenses properly incurred and reasonable in the circumstances to earned income. Being a sensible fellow, he decided that the next storm was not going to do that type of damage if it could be prevented. He extended and strengthened the retaining walls, taking an ounce of prevention to head off a ton of headaches. It was held by the courts that the retaining wall was a capital expense and was not reasonable in the circumstances for earning an income.

When you get into that sort of situation, and the tax returns are filled with that sort of thing, then you realize that more precise lines should be drawn for the guidance of those people in Canada who pay taxes.

• (12:50 p.m.)

Mr. Blair: Mr. Chairman, may I intervene again for a few minutes. It seems to me that the Jonathan opposite has made some deluded comments. Exception has been taken to the use of the word "reasonable" in the language of the section. Actually, the example the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants gave us relates to something else, namely, the test whether or not the expense was necessary for the earning of income. I think one would look in vain for cases in which the question of whether expenses are reasonable was brought up in court and for cases in which expenses had been challenged. On the other hand, one would find many cases in which the test was whether the expense was necessary to earn income. That is the question tested in many cases.

I make this suggestion. It would be a somewhat dramatic departure if this House were to consider interfering too much with language like this which has been in the statutes for many years and is well understood in industry, in the accounting and legal professions. Language such as this, or a provision such as this, is only exercised in exceptional cases in which new situations arise. I also suggest this: neither this House nor any other house can attempt to foresee, in advance, all such detailed problems which may arise and we cannot make provision to cover them.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, again, I hate to quarrel with as distinguished a member of the House as the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton. If he looks at the cases he will find that battles have been fought over the reasonableness of expenses, as opposed to battles fought about expenses incurred under capital expenditures and expenses incurred for the earning of income. For example, there is a delightful case in which a company sponsoring a baseball team for purposes of advertising and promotion asked the court to determine that this was a reasonable expense.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question? Shall section 67 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause 1—section 67—Agreed to.

On clause 1—section 69—Inadequate considerations

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I rise again. I will call this the Aunt Minnie and the white elephant section, to identify it, for members of the committee. The Aunt Minnie provision of course is suggested but not spelled out in section 69(1)(c), which reads:

> (c) where a taxpayer has acquired property by way of gift, bequest or inheritance, he shall be deemed to have acquired the property at its fair market value at the time he so acquired it.

I suppose that there are Canadians who find themselves in a strange position by having gifts thrust upon them that they could not possibly want, gifts like old antiques, say, or Aunt Minnie's white elephant or pink elephant. If she leaves it to you, you are stuck with the beast and stuck with the possible tax you may pay with regard to this elephant or other gifts of a similar, unwanted nature. I wonder if the parliamentary secretary could reassure us by saying that people are entitled to refuse bequests or gifts which put them in a somewhat outlandish position with the income tax department.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, it is my understanding that a person is entitled to refuse a gift, just as one is entitled to refuse other property. I do not think the Income Tax Act affects this right in any way. I suppose that if this did happen, a person could always re-transmit the gift to a charitable institution like a university which is willing to accept almost anything. I do not think there is any practical problem here.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, contrary to what the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton would expect, perhaps, I think that this provision which is new, and particularly section 69(1)(c), is there to protect the taxpayer from the clutches of the capital gains tax, which we will come to in due course. Here we have at least a base for the establishment of the value of something received by way of gift, bequest or inheritance. A person shall be deemed to have acquired the property at its fair market value. Of course, there may be some argument as to what is fair market value. However, the recipient of a bequest will not suddenly find himself facing a demand which is based on the amount of the original cost to the original owner. This section says that the individual shall be deemed to have acquired the gift or bequest at its fair market value, and that value is a matter for circumstances to decide. I think that is the only way to protect the taxpayer from, shall we say, difficulties which might arise under the capital gains tax provision to which we shall come. That is the only new portion in the whole of section 69, and I think it is quite appropriate that it be included here. May I call it one o'clock?

The Deputy Chairman: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the Chair.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The Committee resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Chairman, I am certainly no expert on taxation.

An hon. Member: Agreed.

Mr. Yewchuk: I have no background to indicate that I should be an expert. There are some phrases, words or terminology in this bill of which I, as an ordinary citizen, would like to know the meaning. In several subsections there is reference to "arm's length". Can the parliamentary secretary give us an official definition of the words "arm's length"?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, "arm's length" is the concept where a person is dealing with someone other than a member of his immediate family, for example. If my recollection is correct, there is no specific definition of "arm's length". There is a statement that certain relationships are deemed not to be arm's length, such as a deal between yourself and your wife or yourself and your mother. On the other hand, there may be transactions between people who do not fall within the defined relationship which might also be non-arm's length, as a result, for example, of a transaction between you and a company that your father controls. These are again questions of fact which are subject to the statutory definition that certain relationships are deemed not to be arm's length. This would be decided in the courts if the dispute arises.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether or not one's first cousin is at arm's length?

Mr. Pepin: What about your mother-in-law?

Mr. Mahoney: If the hon. member wants to look at section 251, he will find the definitions. I wonder if the purposes of the committee are going to be served by questions dealing with the existing law. I put this very politely and calmly. We are dealing with a tax reform bill. There are many sections in which there are no significant changes. I am happy to provide answers. The officials of the Department of Finance will be happy to satisfy members inquiries on situations of this nature, but I wonder if the committee is the place to do this or whether specific questions which involve the application of the existing tax law and so on might not be dealt with privately. We will be delighted to answer these questions, but as one member of the committee to other members of the committee, perhaps the committee of the whole might better use its time than dealing with matters like this.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I think the parliamentary secretary has raised a very important question, but he may have opened up the largest can of worms in his parliamentary career. We are dealing with taxation reform with a remarkably limited number of members. This has been the experience so far. I wonder whether this is a bad way of proceeding with perhaps the most important measure this Parliament is going to be asked to enact. Your Honour should have ruled the parliamentary secretary out of order and should probably rule me out of order before we get into a debate that goes far beyond the particular subsection we are being asked to consider.

In defence of my colleague, the hon. member for Athabasca asked a question that really deals with the techniques that have existed up to this time. I have been in charge of looking after the first sections of this measure. I hope that by four o'clock I will be discharged of my responsibility so that I can go home and live happily ever after. I have concentrated on the new provisions in the law so that those people who are interested in income tax reform or changes will be able to find out from reading Hansard on Monday where the changes are actually taking place. The hon. member for Edmonton West, who cannot exactly be regarded as a tax novice, raised a question this morning about the operation of a particular section which the committee passed a short while ago. I am not going into that debate again.

The hon. member for Athabasca, I think very properly, is at least interested enough to attend this afternoon, and he wants to find out what an arm's length transaction is. The parliamentary secretary has kind of sloughed him off by saying that this is something that is well known in the law. The parliamentary secretary is probably quite right about that, but the hon. member for Athabasca also has a responsibility. He has to decide whether he will give his approval to this income tax measure or will not, and in that sense he is living up to his responsibility in a very fine way.

I think we are straying from the point, but if the parliamentary secretary wants to open up cans he should be prepared to see what is within them. I conclude by saying that I do not think it serves the purposes of a very important measure to start questioning whether people should ask about existing law. I had always thought the purpose of change was to examine everything and to make observations about everything, and this the hon. member for Athabasca has done.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I think I should, as Chairman of the committee, make a statement at this time. I feel that the hon. member for Athabasca was completely right in asking his question. I am not going to intervene in this debate, except to say that as Chairman of the committee I am here to apply the rules. The question as put by the hon. member for Athabasca was within the four corners of the rules and was relevant. It is for the committee to decide how it will operate. I think up to now it has done a good job with the co-operation of all hon. members and I think that, as far as possible, we should follow the pattern that has been established.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Chairman, I rise briefly to indicate my resentment of the implication of the parliamentary secretary that only lawyers and accountants should participate in the debate on this tax bill.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Yewchuk: That is what he is saying, and I place the Minister of National Defence in the same category. He thinks only he has the right to speak on this bill. As I said this morning, I am no tax expert but I do represent the riding of Athabasca which is populated by all sorts of people, not only lawyers and tax experts. If we were to carry through the suggestion of the parliamentary secretary and the Minister of National Defence, it would mean that we would have nothing but lawyers and tax accountants in the House of Commons.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The committee should return to subsection 69. If the hon. member has a question to raise, he may do so, but I do not think the committee will gain anything by pursuing this kind of exchange.

Mr. Yewchuk: In that case, Mr. Chairman, may I place my question again before the parliamentary secretary to see whether I can get a decent answer. Would he give me a definition of the expression "arm's length"?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I regret that the hon. member misinterpreted the intent of my remarks. I shall read section 251 into the record:

(1) For the purposes of this Act,

(a) related persons shall be deemed not to deal with each other at arm's length; and

(b) it is a question of fact whether persons not related to each other were at a particular time dealing with each other at arm's length.

(2) For the purpose of this act "related persons", or persons related to each other, are

(a) individuals connected by blood relationship, marriage or adoption;

(b) a corporation and

(i) a person who controls the corporation, if it is controlled by one person,

(ii) a person who is a member of a related group that controls the corporation, or

(iii) any person related to a person described by subparagraph (i) or (ii);

(c) any two corporations

(i) if they are controlled by the same person or group of persons,

(ii) if each of the corporations is controlled by one person and the person who controls one of the corporations is related to the person who controls the other corporation,

(iii) if one of the corporations is controlled by one person and that person is related to any member of a related group that controls the other corporation,

(iv) if one of the corporations is controlled by one person and that person is related to each member of an unrelated group that controls the other corporation,

(v) if any member of a related group that controls one of the corporations is related to each member of an unrelated group that controls the other corporation, or

(vi) if each member of an unrelated group that controls one of the corporations is related to at least one member of an unrelated group that controls the other corporation.

(3) Where two corporations are related to the same corporation within the meaning of subsection (2), they shall, for the purposes of subsections (1) and (2), be deemed to be related to each other.

I am sure the hon. member will not be able to understand that unless I read the definition of "related group", "unrelated group" and so on. I shall be glad to do that if that is the wish of the hon. member.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, I find it a little difficult to follow the parliamentary secretary. I wonder whether he would repeat what he has read a little more slowly and also repeat the definition. Perhaps then we might be able to understand the definition of "arm's length". What we are asking for is a simple definition of the term "arm's length", not what is provided in the act. We want to know how the parliamentary secretary and his officials understand that term.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, there is no simple definition of "arm's length" or "non-arm's length" transactions. I must apologize to the hon. member for that simple fact.

Mr. Downey: Mr. Chairman, for purposes of clarification, since today's Hansard will be providing information for many taxpayers, I think we should ask the parliamentary secretary to carry on with his reading so that those of us who are not lawyers will have a clearer grasp of the situation that exists in the expression "arm's length".

Mr. Mahoney: To continue my reading, Mr. Chairman, section 251(4), which deals with groups, provides as follows:

In this act,

(a) "related group" means a group of persons each member of which is related to every other member of the group; and

(b) "unrelated group" means a group of persons that is not a related group.

(5) For the purpose of subsection (2),

(a) where a related group is in a position to control a corporation, it shall be deemed to be a related group that controls the corporation whether or not it is part of a larger group by whom the corporation is in fact controlled;

(b) a person who had a right under a contract, in equity or otherwise, either immediately or in the future and either absolutely or contingently, to, or to acquire, shares in a corporation, or to control the voting rights of shares in a corporation, shall, except where the contract provided that the right is not exercisable until the death of an individual designated therein, be deemed to have had the same position in relation to the control of the corporation as if he owned the shares; and

(c) where a person owns shares in two or more corporations, he shall as shareholder of one of the corporations be deemed to be related to himself as shareholder of each of the other corporations.

(6) For the purpose of this act,

(a) persons are connected by blood relationship if one is the child or other descendant of the other or one is the brother or sister of the other;

(b) persons are connected by marriage if one is married to the other or to a person who is so connected by blood relationship to the other; and

(c) persons are connected by adoption if one has been adopted, either legally or in fact, as the child of the other or as the child of a person who is so connected by blood relationship (otherwise than as a brother or sister) to the other.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Chairman, may I take a moment to thank the parliamentary secretary for his comprehensive answer, which is just what I wanted, and this whole kafuffle would have been avoided had he paid serious attention to my question in the first place.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Mr. Downey: After listening to the definition of "at arm's length" I am convinced that the point raised by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants has some validity. It had reference to common-law relationships, and I should like to know how such a common-law relationship, as well as other relationships of this kind, fit into the "arm's length" section of the bill.

Mr. Mahoney: The matter of a common-law relationship does not come into this, because the people are not married and therefore are not involved. As to the other relationships, I will leave this to the hon. member. If he would care to list them rather than leave me to speculate, I would be pleased to attempt an answer.

Mr. Downey: If two people were living under the same roof in the same house, and for all practical purposes seemed to be man and wife, could we say that dealings between them involving the transfer of shares or property might be considered to be a transaction at arm's length?

Mr. Mahoney: This involves a question of fact. If they are married, obviously this is not at arm's length. Are they married?

Mr. Downey: They are not married.

An hon. Member: For all other purposes they are.

Mr. Mahoney: I suppose I should read section 251 into the record again. It states in part:

For the purposes of this act,

(a) related persons shall be deemed not to deal with each other at arm's length; and

(b) it is a question of fact whether persons not related to each other were at a particular time dealing with each other at arm's length.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Chairman, I am still not clear as to whether two people living in the same household, not having a legal marriage contract, but dealing with each other, are considered to be dealing at arm's length.

Mr. Mahoney: The hon. member must simply take the act as it is. It depends on the facts. I could re-read the section if Your Honour does not think I would be repeating myself.

Mr. Yewchuk: This is very important to my constituents, as it is to the constituents of many other members, since a variety of situations exist in this country. People are living together without the benefit, or detriment, whichever way you look at it, of a marriage contract, and they want to know what is the legal position in this case.

Mr. Mahoney: I am afraid I am not able to give a legal opinion on hypothetical situations. If the hon. member would give me the facts of the situation he has in mind I would be delighted to attempt to give an opinion.

Mr. Downey: Is the parliamentary secretary, with his knowledge of the law and his experience, aware of any cases in the past which have been contested on the basis of this type of situation?

Mr. Schumacher: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Parliamentary Secretary if this section is new or carried over from the old Income Tax Act?

Mr. Mahoney: This is carried over from the previous act, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Yewchuk: If the parliamentary secretary refuses to answer my question, perhaps we should ask the minister to come in to carry on with this debate.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, my obligation here is to answer questions, and there is no way I can force the hon. members to understand the answers.

Mr. Downey: The answers we have received relate to one of the vital matters in this bill which contains 707 pages, and 99.9 per cent of the people in Canada cannot understand what is encompassed in these pages. They will be taxed in such a way that the bulk of them will have no knowledge of what is happening. It may be all right to give these smart aleck answers to members of this House—

Mr. Mahoney: Don't assume they are all as stupid as you are.

Mr. Downey: They may be stupid for not understanding what is encompassed in this 707 page bill, but it is very vital to parliamentarians to know what this bill is about, and to have a clear understanding of what is being done. Those people in the gallery should also understand so they can relate to the average taxpayer what is taking place. I cannot go along with the attitude of the parliamentary secretary, and I do not believe any member sitting in this House exhibits that type of attitude. We cannot accept this concept of pushing bills through which we do not understand and the significance of which we have not been told.

[Mr. Mahoney.]

Mr. Bigg: I do not expect to be considered an expert in the law on taxation, but I should like to ask a direct question. Is a common-law marriage a marriage for the purpose of this act, or is it not?

Mr. Mahoney: I think it would be fair to say that if a couple were living under the same roof as man and wife it would be presumed they were not dealing with each other at arm's length, but there may be exceptions.

Mr. Downey: With some embarrassment I should like to ask a question regarding the relationship of homosexuals. This matter has been debated in the House and I am wondering whether there is anything in this bill that applies to this relationship. Is there anything in the bill that suggests this type of relationship is to be considered as dealing at arm's length?

Mr. Mahoney: I am not aware of anything in this particular section that would apply. However, the hon. member might have some particular qualification for identifying this.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Downey: I do not know what the hon. member for Calgary South was implying by that remark, but it was in tune with some of his other remarks this afternoon. He is taking a smart aleck attitude toward this whole situation. I asked whether this situation has been considered. Is there anything in this 707 page document to cover this situation? There must be something there in relation to this matter, particularly since this Parliament has taken action in relation to this matter.

Mr. Mahoney: In view of the depth of the hon. member's concern, I will inquire to see whether this matter has been studied. I am not aware of any studies into it.

Mr. Downey: Perhaps we could stand this section until the parliamentary secretary makes inquiries of some of his colleagues who must be aware of this situation.

Mr. Mahoney: I am afraid we cannot agree to that very serious suggestion by the hon. member.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall section 69 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause 1, Section 69 agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: The committee will now consider section 70 to which there has been an amendment moved by the Minister of National Revenue, which is to be found at page 8940 of Hansard of October 22.

On clause 1—Section 70—Death of a taxpayer.

• (2:30 p.m.)

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I realize the amendment is properly before us and I thank you for the identification of it. However, on page 172 of the bill there is a substantial change in the existing income tax law, as well as on page 173. In accordance with the practice I have followed so far, I should like to have a statement from the parliamentary secretary on the record so that people who read the proceedings of this debate will understand what is intended to be done by the government.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, if I understand him correctly I believe the hon. member is asking for the explanation of the section and not simply of the amendments before us.

Mr. McCleave: Yes.

Mr. Mahoney: This section provides special rules for computing the income of the taxpayer in the year in which he died. It contains most of the present rules and provides new ones for the taxpayer's depreciable and other capital property. It also provides rules for the evaluation of the property both in his hand, or of the estate or of the beneficiary, as well as special rules for such property when passed to his spouse.

Subsection (1) is the same as the existing law. Subsection 2 also continues the existing law. Subsections 3 and 4 are the same. Subsection 5 provides rules regarding depreciable and other capital property of the deceased taxpayer and deems him to have disposed of all that property immediately before his death, and to have received the proceeds equal to the value established by the subsection. paragraph (a) of that subsection deals specifically with capital property other than depreciable property and provides as a general rule that the fair market value at the time of death is the deemed proceeds of the disposition. Paragraph (b) covers depreciable property and provides similar treatment to that given non-depreciable property. Paragraph (c) provides that the taxpayer's estate or the beneficiary are deemed to have acquired this property. Paragraph (d) covers the case where the estate of the beneficiary has acquired a particular depreciated asset. At death an allowance is attributable to a portion of the proceeds of the distribution pro rated to all assets deemed to have been acquired at that time.

In respect of the specific amendments before us, one is to 7(6)(b) and deletes the words "other than taxable capital gains". This is a technical amendment and is related to a further amendment which will be moved when we reach section 108. It is proposed to add a definition of income of a trust to section 108, which will apply not only to this section but to several other sections which occur throughout the bill.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I think I should like to make one other point briefly because we are wandering into the twilight zone which involves the question of appreciation and capital gains. I would hope that if we give our assent to this section—and I have no reason not to—that when we deal with the capital gains sections, if there should be substantial changes there, at least we would have the common sense to review this, too.

Mr. Mahoney: Yes, of course.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): At the bottom of page 173 in subsection 6(b) an amendement was introduced the other day to the effect that the taxpayer, the spouse and the trust had to reside in Canada. This was not a provision in the original instance but has now been introduced. Why is there this particular limitation in respect of the exemption, that all the parties and the trust must be resident in Canada simultaneously.

Mr. Mahoney: The underlined words in the amendment to this section have been added to provide that the rules set forth in the paragraph apply only where the taxpayer and the spouse or the trust are resident in Canada at the time of the taxpayer's death. Without this addition, the roll-over could apply to non-residents and that is not the normal way of handling transfer to non-residents.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): If I may say so with respect, I am wondering why it is absolutely essential that all concerned must be residents of Canada at the time in order that there be a roll-over. I can think of cases where the husband, the taxpayer, is a non-resident but is the owner of property here in Canada. The devolution is to his spouse who is resident in Canada and the trust could be here in Canada. Why in such circumstances should the spouse be disentitled to the benefit of the roll-over? She is a Canadian resident in Canada. The trust is here in Canada and the property is here in Canada. He might happen to be resident somewhere else, perhaps for reasons of health or otherwise. The state says that it should not get into the bedrooms of the nation, so let us not become involved in an investigation, in respect of the Income Tax Act, concerning why the parties are not living together. The husband bequeaths the property to his wife who remains in Canada and sets up a trust with a Canadian executor or trust company. Here, we have a completely Canadian situation. But you say that in those circumstances they are tainted with some foreignness and therefore may not qualify. I do not understand it.

Mr. Mahoney: I think the hon. member has raised a set of circumstances which merit some looking into. Of course, the section is drawn with the idea that the property might roll-over out of Canada and thus be put beyond the writ of the Minister of National Revenue. However, I would be pleased to take a look at this particular set of facts which the hon. member has suggested in relation to this section. If indeed some change is indicated, we would be most pleased to bring it in at a later date.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Gray) agreed to.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall section 70 as amended carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause 1, section 70 as amended agreed to.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Conditionally.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: We now have before us section 72. This section is amended and the text of the amendment is to be found at page 8940 of Hansard for October 22. Shall I read it?

Mr. McCleave: Please do not read it.

On Clause 1—Section 72—Reserves, etc. for year of Death

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Here again, Mr. Chairman, the same situation applies. I ask why must the transferor and the transferee be resident in Canada. Why must it be conjunctive, particularly if the transferee is resident in Canada and the property is in Canada.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, while the parliamentary secretary is pondering his reply to that very important point, could I also suggest, since this is a new provision, that we have a brief explanation for the record concerning why this is being proposed. I ask this because many people in an affluent society may leave very vast estates and perhaps not realize all the implications for those who will succeed to those estates.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, this section provides a special rule for the taxation year in which the taxpayer dies. It denies him the deduction in respect of certain reserves that he would normally be permitted, but it also provides an exception to this special rule for property of this kind which he leaves to his spouse or to a trust for his spouse if she and his executors elect to take advantage of it. If they do, the general rule is that deductions shall be made in computing the taxpayer's income for the year in which he died and corresponding amounts included in the income of the spouse or the trust. The amendment provides that the special rule covering such items of income as accounts receivable and the business carried on by the taxpayer in the year he died will apply only if the taxpayer and the transferee are resident in Canada at the time of the taxpayer's death. It is not intended that the rule apply where one or the other or both are non-resident.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I am sorry, I may be a little dense on this, but it seems to me that this section specifies when there shall be a denial of the setting up of the reserve. There is a denial of the setting up of the reserve. Why do you insist, in denying what you might say is a privilege to a taxpayer, that both the taxpayer and his wife be resident in Canada? I cannot understand the idea in this context of insisting that both be resident in Canada. Let us put the shoe on the other foot. The provision will not apply if either of the transferor or transferee is not resident in Canada, and presumably there would be an entitlement to a reserve.

Mr. Mahoney: The amendment does not go to the denial, it goes to the carrying forward, the election in the option, as I understand it. The amendment would come into play in section 72(2).

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I may have to ask someone to give me a private briefing session because I still do not get it. The conclusion which the parliamentary secretary has indicated in this section or elsewhere is the greatest breach of logic and development in the whole of section 72. We start out in section 72 by setting up exclusions of reserves. Does he mean to tell me that we have switched to the other side of the medal and are now granting a right in that section?

[The Assistant Deputy Chairman.]

Mr. Mahoney: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Surely to goodness, something is going wrong in that kind of drafting. This only leads to confusion. I am looking at a section which I deem to be an enumeration of exclusions of reserves, and yet half way through we come to just the reverse. Is that the explanation? I think it is nonsensical.

Mr. Mahoney: Subsection (1) is the denial and subsection (2) is an exception to that denial. It seems to me that this is a rather logical place to put it. The continuity is there, and it is better to place it right there than elsewhere in the bill.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Now, the parliamentary secretary has said that this is an exception to the denial, but the exception to the denial seems to be based on the fact that both parties must be resident in Canada, so that if one of the parties is non-resident in Canada the exception would be granted.

Mr. Mahoney: Yes, the denial of the right would apply if either or both parties are non-resident. That is the result.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Gray) agreed to.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall section 72 as amended carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause 1, section 72, as amended, agreed to.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman (Mr. Boulanger): Now, we will go to section 74 as amended, and the text of that amendment will be found at page 8941 of Hansard for October 22.

On clause 1—Section 74: Transfers to Spouse.

Mr. McCleave: I have two questions arising out of section 74. The first one is that while the side note on page 177 reads, "gain or loss deemed that of transferor", the fact is that there is no specific provision within the act dealing with loss, but certainly there is with regard to gain. So, I think we should have an explanation of this omission.

The other question concerns something which has not been changed at all, that is section 74(5) which I call the "Mama and Papa" clause. We have had at least some contributions to the debate in that regard, although not much of a change in the law which would help good old Mama and Papa. The section about which I am really curious is the old one. It is the last part of section 74(5) which reads:

> Where a husband and wife were partners in a business, the income of one spouse from the business for a taxation year may, in the discretion of the Minister, be deemed to belong to the other spouse.

For curiosity's sake I went to the bible that I have been using, the Canadian Master Tax Guide, to see whether there was much litigation or disputation between government and taxpayer with regard to the Mama and Papa section. I find that there is almost none, which suggests to me one thing, not that there is no room for improvement there but rather than the Mama and Papa type of business is apt to be run on such lines that there is not much profit from it, that Mama and Papa simply cannot afford the expensive litigation in the courts to determine their rights. I have made the point before that we have not made a proper examination of the provisions in the Income Tax Act relating to the small family business in this country operated by Mama and Papa as we have done in other areas.

When there are hundreds of millions of dollars involved, do we not all get excited in this parliament? But when there are cases of husbands and wives living on very submarginal incomes, operating small grocery stores, small garages or any small business that you would like to name, we simply have not given their problems close examination. I hope the parliamentary secretary will indicate that these provisions—admittedly we are dealing with piggy bank type operations—have received some examination by the department before we were presented with this large catalogue of tax changes.

Mr. Mahoney: The first point with which the hon. member dealt was the marginal note. In the section as it is, and particularly as it will be amended, there is a netting out of gains and losses to arrive at this end, and I believe that is the explanation.

As to the other question, I believe it goes back to the general area which was covered before. I am afraid that no satisfactory solution to the matter of the Mamma and Papa store has been advanced. We are still in the position where, as the hon. member has noted, some hardship may indeed fall where the husband and wife relationship is in this context a bona fide business relationship.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, I want to take up the cudgels along with the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants to try to defeat this old rule that identifies as one a husband and wife participating in the same business, and which says that the spouse cannot be an employee of the other. The consequence of this provision will be that no child care allowance is claimable by the spouse if she has to go and work in her husband's business unless, of course, it is incorporated. This is where the nonsensical position comes about.

It may be a small business to which the total applicable tax rate might be 21 per cent, and for the individual paying on marginal rates this is not a very high income. But if the husband incorporates the corner grocery store, as the sole proprietor he may put a share in trust with his lawyer and that makes it a Limited company, but with no greater investment in it, except that now it has "Ltd." added to the name. The wife may now be hired as a clerk, and they may have to pay some unemployment insurance premiums for her. They will have to pay Canada Pension Plan contributions for her. That is one way in which they can be covered by the Canada Pension Plan. She in turn, will be able to claim the worker's allowance, and she would also be able to claim the child care allowance. But where there is no "Ltd." she will not get the child care allowance or worker's allowance. She is not able to contribute to the Canada Pension Plan, and of course there would be no further point in paying insurance contributions on her behalf. That is the consequence of continuing section 74(3) in effect. And, of course, the same remarks apply to section 74(5), where the husband is a partner in a firm.

I have gone through this time and time again, yet there is a persistence on the government side in refusing to effect change, unless the store is incorporated. In fact, with a small business of that nature incorporation is a pure sham. I wonder why the government insists on the fiction and the sham of incorporation under these circumstances. I have heard it said that administratively it would be difficult for the Tax Department to keep track of these individuals if this change were made. That is founded on a lack of understanding of how much track the government does keep of individuals. It might have been valid 20 years ago, but today all the people involved here have social security numbers. If they file under unemployment insurance that will be another place where track of them will be kept. If they file under the Canada Pension Plan, that will be another place where track of them will be kept. And I am sure that we will see regulations with respect to worker's allowance and child care allowance. You can bet your bottom dollar that there will be regulations with respect to identification. Yet here, we persist in what I say is a nineteenth century concept of the relationship between taxpayer and spouse in matters of this kind.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, when the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants raised this question originally I participated in the debate, and the parliamentary secretary did explain why husband and wife were being treated this way. But, Mr. Chairman, there are many people affected. You only need to walk around this city and you will see many small food stores that remain open in the evening. Probably the wife opens the store at eight o'clock in the morning and runs it until noon, then her husband takes over and later their children help. These people are earning a livelihood by providing a service to the citizens. They are not going on relief. Businesses of this type are being operated in all towns and villages in Ontario and throughout this great dominion in which husbands and wives work as partners.

If the husband hires somebody else to do the work that his wife might do in the store, a deduction can be made for that as an expense. But for the life of me, I cannot understand why it is not possible for the husband to hire his own wife to work in the store and get a deduction for that. The wife contributes to the success of the business. He should have a right to make deductions for her wages in the same way he would if he were hiring somebody else to do the work. Can the parliamentary secretary explain why this has to be made so tangled, why a man cannot hire his wife, pay her wages, and charge them off to the business? Is there any particular, definite reason? Will it cost the national treasury a lot of money if we allow this? Is there any estimate of that cost?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, the matter is purely one of trying to avoid leaving gaping loopholes in the law for people to take advantage of in order to avoid taxation. As I admitted in answering the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants, there is a hardship worked on husband and wife situations where there is in fact a bona fide commercial relationship. However, so far no alternative has suggested itself that would allow us to resolve both problems satisfactorily, that is the one that the law, as it presently is, does resolve, plus the problem which hon. members have raised on two or three occasions during this debate.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, the parliamentary secretary talks about a gaping hole. Again I ask how much will it cost the treasury of Canada to allow what we are seeking? We are told that this bill is tax reform. We are asking for a minor change that could help small businessmen to be more successful. Why not make the change we suggest, and then see whether any loopholes appear? The parliamentary secretary cannot say there will be a gaping hole until we do this and see what happens. If one appears, it can be taken care of by an amendment to the Income Tax Act next year. This act can be amended next year if you find a lot of people are bilking the government out of taxes that it thought it was going to get.

Mr. Mahoney: It is not a matter of revenue. It is a matter of equity, and the government simply does not see why small businessmen should be given the option of an income split when wage and salary earners are not going to have that option.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, sections 72, 73 and 74 are all intertwined, but they have to be considered individually. There is a tremendous mixup here, and that has been demonstrated to us by the parliamentary secretary. It is suggested that there is some loophole in the government's right to take everything we own. Surely, this is a complete reversal of logical thinking. Throughout the history of the British parliamentary system, the onus has been placed on governments to prove to the taxpayers why governments should take money from them. It is not a question of whether or not a taxpayer is taking advantage of a loophole, but a question of whether a government has justification for taking away the money that the taxpayer has earned. We have gone around in a complete circle when we say it is up to the taxpayer to prove in a court of law, or even in this chamber, that he has a right to escape taxation. It is true that once the law is there, he cannot avoid taxation. That is why it is incumbent upon us as the only voice of the taxpayer to make sure that the law with which the government intends to strangle the citizen does leave some outlet for his private enterprise.

It seems to me that over the centuries the married woman has been a neglected person, a second-class citizen. There are many ways in which women's rights are shouted from the housetops today. We hear about abortions and equal pay, but here is something equally important—the right of a woman to help her husband earn a living. As I read this section, there is very little relief for the family type of project. We will talk about the family farm later; but today in many small businesses the little woman comes in from watching her children and runs the grocery store.

I take great exception to the fact that the government thinks it has some God-given right to take every cent from our citizens unless they can prove they do not have a right to the money. They only have a right to it, apparently, when the Income Tax Act says they have. I shall fight to the best of my ability in order to see that the law of Canada never gets to the point where we take over all the means of production for the family farm and the family business to the point where the individual has no rights.

I am worried about the Carter report. I am worried about the government taking the view that because a royal commission was established to look into our taxation system and some well known egghead has proposed an answer to all our problems, we should bow down and worship the written word. True, we paid for that report—but the Carter report is not the law of the Medes and the Persians which alters not. It is our duty to alter it, to amend this act which nobody seems to understand. I am supposed to be trained in the law and I flatter myself that I am as subtle as most ordinary people, but I find it difficult to understand this bill. There is no security whatsoever for the housewife in the small, unincorporated business. She has no real rights under the Canada Pension Plan and if her husband were allowed to pay for her, the competition from the large corporations—for whom I have very little sympathy—the chain stores, the great combines, the international corporations which are as dangerous as some governments—

Mr. McIntosh: Oh, hardly.

Mr. Bigg: Not quite, but nearly.

Mr. Mahoney: Keep him on the party line, Jack.

Mr. Bigg: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I would expect the things I am saying to be said by any real Liberal. I suppose you could classify me as a left wing Conservative. There are no real Liberals in this country. I have not heard real liberalism coming from the other side of this House for the last 14 years.

Mr. Bell: Paul Hellyer is the only one.

Mr. Bigg: I admit I am speaking Gladstone Liberalism. A square deal for the little people, not backed up by land and estates or large holdings in India, and foreign domination, that has all gone by the board. Let us not have the class war any more. In Canada an individual still has the right to earn a living and his wife has the right to help him. I am opposed to the many sections of this act which threaten that right.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bigg: I think we should expect the Liberal government to be the champions of the little people.

Mr. Mahoney: We are.

Mr. Bigg: I do not see it in this legislation. I do not see anything in this bill to protect the little businesses which are failing at the rate of some 3,000 a year. This cannot be blamed on the Leader of the Opposition because, if my memory serves me correctly, there has been a Liberal government in this country for five-sixths of the time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bigg: Cheer—but the people of Canada have their eyes on you. You can beat on your desks, but they want to know what you are going to do. This bill is not giving them the comfort and protection they deserve.

Mr. Gibson: It takes a million people off the tax rolls.

Mr. Bigg: Yes, and puts a million people on the unemployment rolls.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bigg: They would not be there but for the delinquency of your party. I would like to see you get to your feet and tell us what your plans are to give security to the small business people of this country. Mr. Chairman, may I have a little order?

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: I was going to call for order. I admit I cannot hear the hon. member.

Mr. Mahoney: When you do hear him you might try and relate it to the bill.

Mr. Bigg: I have been waiting for 14 years for these gentlemen to get to their feet and give us the benefit or some of their views. I would ask them for the courtesy of being heard for a few minutes in this chamber to see whether I have not some liberal views which they might adopt.

It is a very sad day for the people of Canada if their capital is to be diminished by taxation. This is one country where individuals still have some vestige of right to earn a living.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bigg: I beg hon. members in this chamber, through you, Mr. Chairman, to make sure that such a thing as good will which is built up through a lifetime of hard work is not taken away because of an unfair fiscal policy or a greedy government. I do not care how well thought-out are these plans for spending other people's money. I think there is still a place in Canada for leaving some small part of the income in the family.

I should like to have a better answer for taking it away than merely saying these individuals have found a loophole in the law. That is an insult to them. I want to know why any government can think it has a right to my private property. I am a free enterpriser, but whenever I have had a chance I have voted for the social security which is needed for our older people who have worked all their lives. Under this so-called free, democratic system they have a right to the benefits. I believe they are entitled to the old age pension and to fair prices on the farm and in the store that they helped to build up.

I see in the Carter report a sinister attempt to do legally things that the people of Canada do not want. That is the only reason why a document such as this would be presented to an unsuspecting public. It is obvious that members of this House do not understand the legislation, so how can we expect the taxpayer on the farm or in the small store to have any respect for us if we pass a bill which we do not understand ourselves.

Mr. Mahoney: That is not the Carter report.

Mr. Bigg: I agree that we have not gone as far in this bill as the Carter report, but we have gone as far as the Canadian people will stomach. We have gone as far as we can bamboozle them, as far as can be crammed into 707 pages of closely written claptrap. This afternoon I asked a simple question, was a common law marriage a marriage, or was it not? I wanted an answer, yes or no. It is simple. Everybody understands what we are talking about. The answers I want are not to be found by perusing these sections.

• (3:10 p.m.)

Say a man starts out when he is 21 and spends all his life building up a family business. When he retired, will he, his wife or his children be allowed to benefit from that business, or will some greedy government take away what he has built up and say, "What we are doing is legal. Back in 1971 we gave you a chance to make your representations through your member. We amended the act. The benevolent government brought in 101 amendments in one afternoon." Mr. Chairman, merely because we do not pass them all in half an hour we are accused of filibustering.

Mr. Mahoney: No, no.

Mr. Bigg: And I am accused of being delinquent.

An hon. Member: No, no.

Mr. Bigg: Oh, yes, that is what it has come to. The delay will be said to be the fault of the Leader of the Opposition. It will be the fault of the opposition itself; all 70 members of the Official Opposition will be lumped together in this regard and 150-off members will say that they were held up because the Leader of the Opposition was not here to pass the bill for them. That is the sort of slippery attitude that we see exhibited on the other side of the House, and it is absolutely revolting for anybody who believes in the democratic process.

An hon. Member: Filibustering will get you nowhere.

An hon. Member: If the hon. member is having a hard time, why is his leader not here to help him?

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member is having a hard time keeping to the amendment because of remarks from hon. members on the other side of the chamber. I wish hon. members would remain quiet.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, I am flattered by the attempts of the rabbits to get me off the bear tracks. I want some answers from the parliamentary secretary. A simple reading of this bill will not give me answers. The bill is not simple. The only thing that is simple and plain to understand is that: we are moving in on the free enterprise system. We are moving in on the family business unit and attempting to grind it down under the juggernaut wheels of Pharaoh.

If you introduce another four or five valuation days and another four five versions of the capital gains tax, you will destroy the whole free enterprise system of this country, as the Carter report suggested should be done. I have read the Carter report carefully and understand it, and it recommends socialism by legislation. This is the old, creeping game of trying to do legally and by subterfuge what you know perfectly well the Canadian people do not want. The first thing done by parties that openly espouse socialism is to claim they are democrats. Yet what is democratic about expropriating all the small businesses in Canada? Whether you do it at the rate of 10 per cent a year now, 20 per cent per year in two years or 25 per cent per year in five years makes no difference.

What is the rationale behind taking away all private property in Canada and using it for the purposes the government may think are good? I do not happen to think those purposes are good. I think that a man knows better what he needs and what is good for him than any government, no matter how beneficial it may think it is. That is where I stand and those are the principles on which I was elected.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bigg: I hear boos and catcalls and talk about success. I suppose I have been successful in presenting the facts as I see them. As I say, I have no quarrel with the concept of social security and no quarrel with the taxing of large corporations which have made unconscionable profits. I find nothing wrong with that. There is nothing extremely socialistic about that. When companies pile up excess profits in our cities, by all means tax them.

If companies hold to ransom young people who want to build homes, and if those companies charge exorbitant rates, we should look at them, tax the excess profits and allow the treasury to use such money for purposes of sewage disposal and cleaning up the air. Use that money to clean up the environment. Take it away from the people who are openly robbing the families of this country of their just right to a lot 50 feet in frontage and 100 feet in depth on which they can build a home. That our young people are so robbed is a disgrace in this country. I think all governments should look at all sources of revenue, but they should not raise it by taxing exorbitantly the small businessman and making it impossible for him to allow his wife and children that degree of reasonable comfort which even people on relief and others who are contributing nothing to the welfare of the country are enjoying.

People will not be interested in free enterprise if they are so heavily taxed. People will not be interested in opening the small store and giving the kind of service which only a small store or business unit can give if after 40 years of hard work they are not able to take care of their children and if the widowed spouse cannot enjoy the benefits of that hard work. Taxes which will dissipate such property are to be levied. This is wrong. When the tax becomes due, the property must be disposed of immediately, within six months, and consideration must be given to deemed profits.

The government will not even give the family unit time to make any money because someone in the Department of National Revenue will say, "We think you ought to have made "X" dollars in a certain period." These people would expect the women or children to dispose of their property quickly and pay to a greedy government "X" dollars immediately or suffer the consequences. Why cannot the department wait until prices go up, say, or the time for selling is better? But no, the people concerned must sell the property now. We want the same deal for everybody; no one should be dealt with overly severely.

Mr. Chairman, after reading this bill very carefully and after hearing what I heard this afternoon, I am not sure that if I were left, say, $10 million I would not go to Nassau and see if I could not escape some of these provisions. I know that many people in this country are earning good fees by helping others to evade some of these laws which are supposed to be foolproof.

An hon. Member: People like lawyers.

Mr. Bigg: Some people hire experts and accountants to help them evade the law, yet the small businessman who has built a family business must look ahead to the day when his family may have to sell the business.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Battle River.

Mr. Downey: Mr. Chairman, since this is a most important section, and since the remarks of the hon. member for Pembina have been most relevant, I think he ought to be allowed to continue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I must ask the unanimous consent of the committee to do that. Is there such consent?

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I believe the hon. member for Pembina may make further remarks because there were several interventions during his speech.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Yes. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Pembina.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, I will not take up too much of the committee's time. If I have not made my point clear in the last few minutes, I will never make it clear. I hope it is clear. We should all take a good look at the principle behind the expropriating of family businesses. As I say, if I have not made my point understood in the last 15 minutes I do not think I could make it understood if I spoke for 15 hours on the subject. If I have not been understood, I am sorry and I feel sorry for the members of this chamber. It is a very, very important point and I am sure most hon. members know exactly what I am getting at. If they do not, I suggest that they read the Carter report again, thoroughly.

I admit that in the Carter report there are fine suggestions on how to stop those who are fleecing the Canadian people through escaping the payment of taxes due in legitimate fields of taxation. One of those taxation fields is that of excess profits. But when you get to the point of taxing every profit made, of taxing every benefit that comes from free enterprise or family co-operation, I think you have reached the point of no return.

• (3:20 p.m.)

Mr. Bell: Mr. Chairman, I bring to the attention of hon. members that we have had a very good debate this afternoon. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance has admitted that some important points have been raised. I hope the chief government whip will retract the press release in which he said that the House of Commons is no good, we have to do away with it and close it down. This report was contained in an article in the Citizen this afternoon.

Mr. Downey: Mr. Chairman, section 74(5) provides:

> Where a husband and wife were partners in a business, the income of one spouse from the business for a taxation year may, in the discretion of the minister, be deemed to belong to the other spouse.

As with other taxation matters, the onus of proof lies on the individual taxpayer. This reminds me of a story that is going around. The Minister of Finance was driving along the highway in a big, black Cadillac. He was driving too fast and attracted the attention of an officer of the RCMP. The officer stopped the minister, went over to the big, black Cadillac and opened the door. Naturally, he was surprised to see the Minister of Finance. His only comment was "Oh, my God!" The Minister of Finance replied, "And don't you forget it."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Downey: Sections such as this, where something is at the discretion of the minister, amply bear this out. The hon. member for Pembina has very ably pointed out the troubles that can arise from sections such as this. Why can we not allow a husband and wife team to arrange their income for taxation purposes to their best advantage? For the most part they do not do this. A husband and wife operating a small business do not have the finances to hire the best accountants and lawyers to look after their situation as do large corporations which have full-time staffs of tax consultants. We are trying to close a small loophole. It is as though there were something wicked about a married couple arranging their affairs to pay the least possible tax.

We can only assume that this government is trying to encourage immorality. If two people who are not married decide to live together under the same roof, they are able to arrange their affairs. One can work for the other. In this situation, they could arrange the best tax advantage. A taxation law such as this encourages immorality.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Downey: This important concept should be discussed and amended. Our party will propose an amendment in this regard. I hope the amendment will be accepted. It may not be acceptable to this government, but I know it will be acceptable to the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: The opposition always stands for morality.

Mr. Downey: We should be considering taxation policies that will encourage and increase the Canadian businessmen, not take away their piddling incomes and make them all slaves of the state. We should encourage small business. In the majority of small businesses, farms for example, the wife works side by side with her husband 16 hours per day year in and year out. Sometimes they work for 20 or 30 years without even a holiday until they retire. This is the loophole which the government is trying to close. The government says it wants to make them equitable, on a tax basis, with the employee. This is what they are doing. The man and wife team working 16 hours per day, bucking the prairie wind or operating a small grocery store from 8 a.m. until midnight, are the people who will be affected by section 75. I will not go any further at this point because we will be moving an amendment in order to try to rectify this situation.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, the amendment which will be moved shortly by the hon. member for Edmonton West has just been drafted. It might be called something that was inspired by the ill-considered intervention, not in debate but outside this House, of the chief government whip, the member for Vancouver Quadra. I always felt that if you had something you really wanted to pursue vigorously, you should have the guts to stand up and face your peers in the House of Commons and not do it by the backdoor route of assassination, the back alley route to the parliamentary press gallery.

If the Prime Minister and other top people on the government side ask what, for heaven's sake, went wrong in the House of Commons on a Friday afternoon, when all was supposed to be sweetness and good housekeeping on the provisions of the Income Tax Act which have existed for many years, they will get the answer from the chief government whip, "Mea culpa". It is a villainous attack on Members of Parliament in very serious deliberation to use the route which he did.

Some members, including myself, have questioned the method we are using to bring about tax reform in this country. At least it can be said to our credit that we are here sweating, struggling and straining while working on very complex and tough issues. We are trying to do it in a spirit of exchange with the parliamentary secretary. At least there is dialogue, however imperfect, in the people's forum. That is important. For the chief government whip to issue his attack upon all of us and our methods, which can only denigrate Parliament, it is a great disservice to this institution.

That comment having been made, I want to reinforce what I said previously about the portion of the act we are dealing with and the amendment that will be moved by the hon. member for Edmonton West. The problem we are dealing with is large to people with a very small income. it is of no consequence to people who have no problems in this world. This problem really concerns people whose joint income is below $3,650 a year. In this area it does not pay people to incorporate. By that simple action they will lose approximately $500. What advantages will flow from it in the long run?

We are dealing with two people with an income of less than $3,650 a year. They may be operating a small grocery store, a mamma and papa garage or a mamma and papa boutique. If we cannot look after people like that we must consider our attempts in the field of tax reform to be unworthy. We are certainly going to do something for mining companies and for the "big guys". But if we cannot deal with two people who are trying to be good Canadians and raise a family on a small income, then none of us deserves to come back here. Accordingly, the hon. member for Edmonton West has written out his amendment and it will be presented as soon as Your Honour sees fit to recognize it.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Chairman, I want to make a brief commentary on this section since I find it a very unsetting one. This is in keeping with the theme of Liberal government policy for the past 3½ years, namely to wipe out small entities to destroy family units. Certainly that is happening under this provision. I want the parliamentary secretary to explain why it is such a big sin for a husband to want to employ his wife in a small business and be so heavily penalized by our taxation laws.

A similar situation prevails with a husband and wife who set up a small company and she is a partner in the company, not an employee. Why should they be penalized by the provision that the income of the company is considered the income of one person? I think both of these provisions are destructive of the family unit, of family businesses such as small farms, corner stores, and so on. This kind of provision should be amended in order to promote small business.

We all know very well that most of the job opportunities in this country are provided not only by the huge corporations, which the government put forward as examples of the nth degree of efficiency; we must also realize that in the long run the family farm and the family business is still the backbone of society and the way its people earn their living. When we bracket sections such as this with the estate tax proposal of a year or two ago we see at once almost no hope for the family business to survive and to be passed on to the heirs and successors. It is a very bad principle to destroy units of this sort.

I think it is fair to say that many of the people who came to Canada during the last 50 or 100 years did so in the knowledge that in this country any individual with initiative should be able without too much difficulty to establish and to run successfully a business or a farming operation of his own. In view of this we must not allow this kind of destructive legislation to go forward.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I do not want to delay the well heralded amendment that is coming from my hon. friend for Edmonton West, but perhaps he would be grateful for another moment or two in which to draft it.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No, I have it ready.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In any case, some of the things that have been said during the last half hour prompt me to get briefly to my feet. I know some of the conditions that have been described by my hon. friends to my right do exist; there are cases where married couples have to work all kinds of hours to maintain their livelihood. Some of the stories have been pretty heart-rending. Some people work 16 hours a day almost every day of the week and go 20 years without a holiday. I do not deny that this happens, but I suggest that these situations call for far more than simply adjustments in income tax; they call for a guaranteed annual income, for other means of recognizing the sanctity of family life in this country than simply acknowledging that it is all right for people to slave like this if they get an income tax adjustment. I hope that the government will respond to the arguments that have been presented this afternoon in a far more positive way than simply changing the Income Tax Act, important as that may be.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding the fact that the other day we passed a subsection (6) which included a subparagraph (viii) which is related to section 74, the really operative clause dealing with this situation is the one before us. Subsection (3) provides:

> Where a person has received remuneration as an employee of his spouse—

I suppose the masculine includes the feminine in the interpretation of statutes.

> —the amount thereof shall not be deducted in computing the spouse's income and shall not be included in computing the employee's income.

Then subsection (5) provides:

> Where a husband and wife were partners in a business, the income of one spouse from the business for a taxation year may, in the discretion of the minister, be deemed to belong to the other spouse.

We have the same principle here, though in the second instance this is discretionary. It will be interesting to see what criteria will be used by the minister to lump, within his discretion, the income of the two into the pocket of the one. I suppose there was a time when it was felt when this was income splitting and that there would be a reduction in the marginal rates; but it seems to me that this is secondary to the principle that we must now recognize, that we are in a different age. We now have far more women working. If women are working for their husbands, as I have pointed out and as I shall continue to point out ad nauseam if need be, if the husband is the principal owner of a limited company the wife can claim workers allowance or child care allowance in an appropriate case. She is also covered by unemployment insurance and comes within the Canada Pension Plan.

However, as long as such spouses are covered by section 74(3), and discretionarily so under section 74(5), they are not able to avail themselves of workers allowance and child care allowance and are not covered under the Canada Pension Plan or eligible for unemployment insurance. Therefore, it seems to me that since we are trying to urge women to work, including married women, they should not suffer from this disability.

Someone was talking about encouraging immorality. Certainly a man could pay his mistress to work for him, in which case she would get the advantage of child care allowance, workers allowance, and qualify for the Canada Pension Plan and unemployment insurance. Her husband doing the same work should be entitled to the same benefits, but in fact he is not entitled to any of them. This might be a very favourable incentive to men to take up that type of casual relationship. In this way they could avail themselves of these benefits under the Income Tax Act.

• (3:40 p.m.)

We know there are other sections that define an illegitimate child as a child within the meaning of the act. There are all sorts of provisions in the act which remove what formerly were moral bars. If you adopt that stand in spite of those positions, then I must say you cannot now impose an artificial provision in respect of a husband and his spouse. For that reason I would move:

That section 74 be amended by deleting therefrom subsections (3) and (5), and renumbering subsection (4) in consequence thereto.

The Chairman: Order, please. Hon. members have heard the motion moved by the hon. member for Edmonton West. Without accepting the motion procedurally, I invite hon. members to assist the Chair on the procedural aspect. I am sure the hon. member for Edmonton West and others will help me in this regard. I have some concern in respect of the deletion of two subsections in that this would change or shift the incidence of taxation. That is a preliminary thought but I ask hon. members to assist me if they wish.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I have a little difficulty following the views of the Chair, in that amendments from both sides of the House have been accepted and denied although many of them have had the same effect; they have disturbed the balance of ways and means. An amendment accepted by Your Honour the other day, moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, as well as one moved by the hon. member for Regina East, certainly disturbed the balance of ways and means; however, they were accepted.

This amendment does not pick on any particular class of taxpayer. It merely deletes certain subsections of this section which relate to separate taxes for spouses, either male or female. The wording of the section is that a person receiving remuneration as an employee of a spouse is entitled to certain things. This does not exclusively relate to a wife who receives remuneration from her husband; it also involves a husband who receives remuneration from his wife. A hotel business owned by a wife, of which the husband is an employee, should fall into this category. Unless the hotel is incorporated, the husband's salary is treated as part of the income of the wife. Therefore there is no more benefit to a so-called shareholder. All we are attempting to do is remove this discrimination. One person is an employee and the other is the employer. Either one could be the spouse and this is true in respect of a husband and wife operating as partners.

It seems to me that my amendment does not disturb ways and means to a greater extent than the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre which the Chair accepted. The same is true of the motion put forward by the hon. member for Regina East. All I can say is that those two amendments were acceptable. I am not using them as examples and I am not taking into account any specific class of taxpayer. All I am saying is that people should be treated as individuals. Whether they are married or not should not have a bearing on the fact that they are to be treated as individuals. Keeping in mind the Chair has accepted other amendments of this kind in the course of this debate, I suggest my amendment is in order.

The Chairman: I direct one point to the hon. member's attention and I do so in order to indicate my concern in this matter. My concern is not directed to a disturbance of ways and means. I make this comment so hon. members can direct their remarks to it. My concern is related to the fact that a private member cannot do something which can only be done by the Crown.

There is a citation in Beauchesne which would appear to be the authority for a private member to move to reduce taxes. The view I have taken throughout this debate is that while such a motion is in order, it must be an across-the-board reduction and it cannot shift the burden of taxation from one taxpayer to another. That is the consistent view I have taken on other occasions when I have made rulings. It seems to me that if subections (3) and (5) are deleted, one taxpayer or another will pay more or less. That is my real concern.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, anticipating that you might say what you have said, I prepared a few remarks on this point of order. Let us consider subsection (5) first. in light of the fact that there may not be any alteration at all, or a shifting of tax burden, we must consider the amendment on its own merits. We must assume that the minister is concerned and that the Chair is governed by a principle of equity. That being so, we must assume that only the minister in exercising his discretion will make a change shifting the incidence of taxation. I think there is no arithmetical means of deciding now whether there is likely to be or will be any shift in the incidence of taxation, particularly with regard to subsection (5). The subection provides: —the income of one spouse from the business for a taxation year may, in the discretion of the minister, be deemed to belong to the other spouse.

The word "may" is permissive. I would suggest, therefore, that the hon. member for Edmonton West is just taking away that permissive discretion which is otherwise granted to the minister. There is no firm means of determining there is any shift in the incidence. It is only a very slight walk to take us to subection (3). Is it not within the realm of possibility, or what we consider to be possibility—because there is not before the Chair any means by which to determine precisely what is going to be the change—that a husband and wife, working together in the circumstances which have been so eloquently portrayed by my hon. friends, could in fact create a larger income? There might be no shift at all.

These are all possibilities which we are examining here. May I say, with respect, that I challenge the Chair or anyone else to look at those two subsections and say there will be, there can be or is likely to be any shift in the incidence of taxation. It remains a possibility, but only a possibility. I say to the Chair that I believe the standard rule is that if the Chair approaches a question of the propriety of any motion and whether or not it is in order, then the onus falls upon those who say it is not in order—and if Your Honour has any doubt I suggest it must be resolved in favour of the propriety of the motion.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Due to the invitation of Your Honour to address myself to the question of shifting the incidence of tax, I would point out that this problem has been debated to a considerable extent in the past and in no case more extensively than on the basis of an amendment I moved when a bill was being considered arising out of the budget of 1970. The government at that time was proposing a 5 per cent excise tax on airline tickets. I proposed an amendment that would not change the balance of ways and means. With the greatest respect, I would put to the Chair that the question of balance of ways and means is the operative point and that the incidence of tax is of no consequence.

My motion finally was ruled out, based upon a citation in May's sevententh edition. I researched the citation and found that the editors of May's misreported the case, giving it a completely reverse meaning to what was the result. This meaning had been inferred from a decision of the chairman of the committee of the whole in the British House during World War I on a matter that was not debated. This is the sole citation that was used against the principle I invoked so far as the incidence of taxation is concerned.

No question has been raised concerning the balance of ways and means, but a decision of Your Honour has been given on two occasions accepting amendments which disturb the balance of ways and means. I will admit this does disturb the balance of ways and means, but so far as the question of incidence is concerned I say simply that the disability with regard to certain taxpayers will be removed and they will be treated as individuals. There will be no forceful pairing.

Under the circumstances I would invite Your Honour, now that it is four o'clock, to look at the judgment of His Honour Mr. Speaker in regard to the incidence of tax and the arguments I advanced on that occasion, basing myself on May's authority and the subsequent correspondence which ensued between the Clerk of the House and the editors of May's because I called into question the authorities that were cited against me.

I would call it four o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Does any hon. member wish to direct argument on the procedural points of this motion? I have had very forceful arguments from the hon. member for Peace River and the hon. member for Edmonton West and I should like to look into the matter. Particularly I wish to look carefully at the section and the proposed amendment because I do not want to make a decision until I am absolutely sure of the effect of the amendment if allowed.

Progress reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private member's business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills, private bills.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) has just left the chamber, because I am not sure whether he can be called back. Earlier today he indicated he would take an opportunity during the day to confer with the House leaders and members of the administration concerning the possible acceptance, unanimously and without debate by this House, of a resolution with regard to a direct appeal to the Secretary General of the United Nations.

I wonder if it is possible, in view of the immediate need, to have a determination from the President of the Privy Council on this question. I am not sure whether he is still in the government lobby. If he is, I know that members on both sides of the House would be happy to hear from him. Earlier I had an opportunity to confer with the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) as well as the government House leader and I think they might be able to add some useful information at this point.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): On a further point of order, Mr. Speaker, I note that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) and the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Gillespie) are here. I wonder whether either of them could speak on this matter or whether they have had an opportunity to speak to their colleagues about it, because i am sure the House would wish this question to be resolved this afternoon before we adjourn.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I apologize to my honourable clansman. I was paying close attention to the material on my desk and did not hear what he said.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister or his colleague has had an opportunity to confer on the matter of an appeal to the Secretary General of the United Nations about a one-year moratorium on nuclear tests. I know that the Secretary of State for External Affairs at noon today appeared to be interested in this suggestion. I think it would be helpful if a statement on this important question were made on the floor of the House. We will not be meeting before the contemplated blast tomorrow at five o'clock and I think it would be helpful to have a statement today.

• (4:00 p.m.)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I do not have an answer but I will go out and inquire.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

PRIVILEGE

MR. MACINNIS—REPORTED WISH OF GOVERNMENT MEMBER TO CLOSE PARLIAMENT

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. It arises from an article in this afternoon's newspaper in which the Liberal whip is reported as indicating a wish to close Parliament. As an employee of this House in so doing he cast a direct reflection on the Chair, and not only on Your Honour's position but on that of every member of this House. The following statement appeared in this afternoon's newspaper:

Mr. Deachman acknowledged his proposal to shut down the Commons from time to time would elicit outraged protests from some traditionalists. In particular he noted some would complain that shutting down the Commons would mean the loss on occasion of the daily question period.

"That wouldn't be the end of the world," he observed. "As it is, two thirds of the questions are irrelevant, out-dated or out-of-order."

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I want to draw to the attention of the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. MacInnis) and of all hon. members Standing Order 17. I suggest to the hon. member who raised the question of privilege, without in any way ruling on it, that it will have to be raised on another occasion. Standing Order 17 reads as follows:

17 (1) Whenever any matter of privilege arises, it shall be taken into consideration immediately.

(2) Unless notice of motion has been given under Standing Order 42, any member proposing to raise a question of privilege other than one arising out of proceedings in the chamber during the course of a sitting shall give to the Speaker a written statement of the question at least one hour prior to raising the question in the House.

I listened to the hon. member and have come to the conclusion that his question of privilege arises out of a statement which he alleges another hon. member made to the press; it does not arise out of proceedings in the chamber. The hon. member, like all other hon. members, must observe the provisions of the Standing Order. He would have to give His Honour notice in writing as required by the Standing Order.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, you ruled that this is not a matter which arose in the House. This is a question on which I am not too sure. I, along with many other Members of Parliament, would like to hear from the hon. member who made this statement outside the House whether or not he was instructed inside the House by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will recognize the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) in a moment. I do not think we should continue the matter much longer. In my opinion, rightly or wrongly, I have to rule that the matter did not arise out of proceedings in the chamber.

Mr. McGrath: On the point of order raised by Your Honour, I would respectfully submit that Standing Order 17 (1) clearly covers the question raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond. It reads:

Whenever any matter of privilege arises, it shall be taken into consideration immediately.

The fact is that this matter has just arisen by virtue of the afternoon edition of the Ottawa Citizen. I think there is a clear question of privilege involved. In accordance with the provision of the Standing Order, the hon. member raised the question immediately. The hon. member who is responsible for this statement in the press is one of the most attentive members in the House and it is a great disappointment to all of us that he should be casting a reflection on the proceedings of the House, because if the sessions of this House and the debates of this House—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member should not debate at this point the substance of the alleged press report. He rose on a point of order, quite properly, and I listened to his point with interest. He said that the first subsection of the Standing Order covers the matter. I think that the Standing Order has to be read in its entirety and I must rule that the matter raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond is governed by subsection (2) under which an hon. member would be required to give written notice to His Honour.

Mr. MacInnis: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am prepared to accept your ruling, but at the same time I give at least verbal notice that this question will be raised at the first opportunity on Monday, at which time I will be prepared and will have done some research referring to the fact that when this member wishes things to go to committee he is making a ridiculous suggestion and that he lied to the House with respect—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I know the hon. member feels very deeply about the matter, but the language he used is not acceptable in Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think it would assist the Chair if all hon. members took a moment or two now during which the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond might like to modify his statement.

Mr. MacInnis: I will modify it in this way, Mr. Speaker. I said that this member lied in respect of the committee. I will withdraw that and say that on another occasion I stood in the House and called that member a liar. I supported this with evidence from the committee proceedings and from Hansard, and the Speaker of the day did not ask me to withdraw the statement. I have no intention of withdrawing from the truth. The truth is recorded.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. MacInnis: You are pushing your luck, fellow.

An hon. Member: Go home and rest.

Mr. MacInnis: Did you read that piece in the paper?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman) because his name was brought into the debate, and I think that should be all. But I would ask the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond whether on reflection he would not wish to modify his statement.

Mr. MacInnis: On reflection, I repeat what I said before. I called him a liar in the chamber before and I supported it with written evidence from the committee proceedings and from Hansard, and the Speaker of the day did not insist that I withdraw it. The precedent has been established.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Peters: Just because he lied before does not mean necessarily that he is lying today.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members say "Withdraw". I do not think that is helping the situation. I am not asking the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond to withdraw his statement, but I think for the sake of decorum of this institution the hon. member might like to modify his statement. The Chair does not want to be unreasonable but hon. members realize, I am sure, that I have a heavy responsibility in the chair to protect the rights and privileges of all hon. members. I hope that before I recognize the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond would modify his statement.

Mr. MacInnis: I will put it this way, Mr. Speaker, with the assistance of the House, and say that in my first submission on the question of privilege I wanted one question answered, namely, whether the hon. member was following the dictates of the Prime Minister. That question not having been answered, I will modify my statement to this extent: just because the hon. member lied before, I have no proof that he is lying today.

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I certainly hope that the Chair will not make any ruling in respect of what has been said here this afternoon and that the matter can be dropped here. On a number of occasions in this House the hon. member opposite, for whom I hold no malice whatsoever, has referred to me as a liar. The record stands and will show that he has said that. I have heard him say the same thing about the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and so on. I am just one joined with others to whom he has given this label.

We respect the hon. member's judgment, he is an able member of this House and one for whom we all have plenty of respect, but he has one peccadillo that we have all observed. From time to time he frequently rises to call this or that cabinet minister a liar. When I find myself placed in that company I know it is a label that he retains for people in high places.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond is rising on a point of order. I gave the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra some time because I recognize that it is an important matter for him, and indeed for all hon. members, but I wonder if it would have been better not to have recognized the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra. I hope that his remarks have not re-invigorated other hon. members. I would prefer to leave the matter now, since the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond has indicated that he will give Mr. Speaker notice in the proper way, in accordance with the requirements of the Standing Order.

Mr. MacInnis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I rise to take strong exception to the fact that the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra indicated that I have called a cabinet minister a liar. This is not the case. With respect to the Prime Minister—and this does not necessarily mean this Prime Minister—the proof is in the Hansard record. I can present absolute proof supported by one of that Prime Minister's cabinet ministers.

With respect to the suggestion about dropping this matter and the gratuitous remarks of the hon. member opposite that he is prepared to drop it, all I can say is that I am not disposed to drop it because the absolute proof is in the records of this House to support the statements I have made today. If he wants to drop it, it is because he knows I can produce that proof.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

CREDIT RECORDS

REQUEST FOR MEASURE TO PROTECT PRIVACY

The house resumed, from Monday, November 9, 1970, consideration of the motion of Mr. McGrath (St. John's East):

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation to protect the privacy of every person against the improper disclosure of credit rating records and to protect the reputation of every person against misinformation contained in such records.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, we are resuming debate on a motion that was brought forward by my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), almost a year ago to the day, on November 9, 1970, and because of the length of this session we again have an opportunity to debate it.

Before moving into the main body of my address I would like to point out that once again in private members' hour we are dealing with a motion that was supported by all parties a year ago, and the fact that action has not been taken on it indicates we have not resolved a substantial problem connected with private members' hour. On the previous occasion there was almost unanimous agreement that the motion be passed, yet simply because there is no machinery in many cases to move motions beyond debate in private members' hour this motion has remained on the order paper for a year.

I hope that during the interim the government House leader and others in the cabinet have had a chance to study this very reasonable motion with a view to having the substance of it referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs where it could be more adequately dealt with than in this House.

In this debate we are dealing with the matter of credit ratings and the way in which they are used. Credit ratings are used not only to assess the nature of one's ability to pay one's debts but also to assess one's honesty and dependability as an individual. That affects jobs, promotions, appointments and the like. In essence, it affects the right of decent individuals to advance within a free society. We are wondering what response there will be from the government to take account of the rapid accumulation of information in credit card ratings, which is often best described as misinformation, containing typographical errors and irresponsible judgments.

To give an example, Mr. Speaker, just a few weeks ago I was phoned by a credit bureau with regard to an account that was outstanding and as the bureau employee spoke I told him that I would be interested in knowing what kind of information they had on my card. He began to tell me that once I had a telephone bill that I had not paid, in a town where I was working for a national chain store. I told him that was all very interesting, except that I have never been employed by any national chain store and had never had a phone bill in the place he mentioned. He became a bit embarassed and said, "Maybe we had better check back on some of this." I suddenly realized what it is to have misinformation accumulated in a file where it could be used against me any time in the future.

This motion deals specifically with the credit bureau rating systems and generally with the individual's right to privacy within our society. For over 200 years the courts have established that one of the fundamental principles of common law is that nobody, be he a state official or not, is empowered to enter on our personal property. Some provinces are now attempting to legislate in this area, and this points up the need to have some common standard.

We also have a long tradition that people are considered innocent until proven guilty. Yet the accumulation of credit information in this country has given rise to a situation in which a person can be found guilty without his knowledge, and as a consequence steps may be taken detrimental to him by those who otherwise might employ him, offer him credit or transact some other form of business with him.

Unless we apply stringent safeguards in our contemporary society we are in danger of losing the fundamental rights of privacy and property. Modern devices such as wire tapping, highly sophisticated microphones, cameras for surveillance and the establishment of computer data banks and processing centres must be controlled. If not controlled they can easily become the instruments of suppression and totalitarianism.

I realize that credit records are but one small sector of the larger question of privacy in the face of modern technology. However, the dissemination of credit information is one measure of the problem and is an area in which we can start to build a good system of checks and balances which will stipulate in law that uncontrolled and improper collection and the haphazard storage and distribution of confidential records, many of which are sold for commercial gain, will not be allowed, and in particular that the accumulation of inaccurate and hearsay information will definitely be counteracted by the individual's right to know and his right to clear away this kind of misinformation from the files.

As in all areas of technology, the pace of input into and output from any system is obviously going to be improved by innovation. Soon credit information will be computerized or microfilmed. The result will be a quantum increase in the availability of this information to those who might benefit from it. Finance agencies with quicker recall and improved facilities may find it advantageous to record the lives of customers in greater detail.

The whole trend of modern technology clearly underlines the need for greater government involvement. It is all too obvious that a good deal of the information that goes into these files has nothing to do with the individual's ability to transact his business or handle his commercial affairs but can easily involve a lot of other affairs that are no part of the information on one's credit rating. The need for clear government regulations to cover collection agencies, their operation and the rating of the individual between federal and provincial governments is obvious.

It is a truism to say that massive credit is here to stay. Consumerism has obviously been built and made vital to the operation of the marketplace. Outstanding consumer credit in this country totalled $9.4 billion at the end of August, 1971, which over a three-month period represents a 3.8 per cent increase. For better or worse we are heavily entrenched in the wonderful world of credit.

I should like to outline some of the inner workings of a credit bureau. Most of them have automated file systems that are not computerized as yet. Their credit cards are retroactive to November, 1964, or for about seven years. Cards at a minimum contain court judgments, writs, bankruptcies, foreclosures, collections, marital status, general credit rating and such things as chattel mortgages, etc. At a maximum, according to the Canadian Association of Consumers, they include salaries, wages, resumé on domestic life and even personality outlines. At the moment there is no standardized way of reporting credit profiles in Canada.

In Ontario, standard procedure when a member business of a credit bureau calls to check on an individual's credit is to simply read down that individual's credit card outlining derogatory information such as collections, etc., which have been marked in red pencil. In other words, they simply go down a list covering seven years and in some cases dating back 14 years. The decision to grant credit or not is arbitrarily decided by the member calling for the information. And, as it is well known, once an individual is tagged as having an overloaded credit rating it often affects not only further business transactions by the individual but also that person's chances of further employment or promotion in the community.

According to the statement of policy to ensure the right of privacy to consumers released by the Associated Credit Bureaux of Canada in 1970, "Credit bureaux will make known to any consumer their file content concerning that consumer." The flaw here is that the code is voluntary and a large proportion of credit bureaux do not belong to this organization. In many cases the individuals most affected by this improper information or misuse of information are so intimidated or so unaware of their rights that advantage can be taken of them. Last year, the Canadian Association of Consumers undertook in its own words, a nationwide survey of credit bureau attitudes and found that many credit bureaux are still reluctant to show files even if the person has recently been refused credit.

Because inadequacies still exist in the use of credit ratings, and the risk to individuals who are affected by them is still great, we are calling for realistic legislation and enforcement in this area believing it is the responsibility of the federal government to take this initiative. At present there exists in Canada no legislative regulation of data processing at the national level. Our party advocates controls to ensure that the privacy and reputations of Canadians are protected. In particular, all companies which collect information and dispense ratings and personal information on Canadian consumers which operate within federal jurisdiction should require a government operating licence and operate according to provincial standards.

The possible influence of companies with large amounts of economic, social and even political information on individuals is sinister. We strongly advocate the establishment of government studies and regulations relating to data collecting which, done in conjunction with the provinces, would set specified standards for the protection of the individual's rights and privacy.

In general I should like to give an illustration of the regulations that we might have so that the consumer would have rights under the law. These might be: first, that the consumer be told the name and address of the credit agency when he is denied credit, insurance or employment and it should be done at the time that he is refused; second, the consumer should be able to examine information in his file at the credit agency when credit action is taken against him; third, he should be told the sources of information in his file and to whom such information has been given; fourth, such data should be confidential, except for legitimate purposes such as a credit reference or job; fifth, disputed information should be reinvestigated with false data deleted, and notification of deletion sent to those who received erroneous reports within a specified period of time.

Sixth, he should be informed of investigations involving interviews with other persons about his personal life and have the right to be informed on the kind of questions which were being asked; seventh, he should be informed when adverse public record information is reported to a potential employer; eight, he should, after having access to record cards or a computer print-out, be able to bring legal action against those companies which do not comply with government regulations.

There have been some encouraging signs of governments coming to grips with this issue, most recently the province of Ontario. However, the federal government, which at very least should encourage guidelines to coordinate national standards for credit data organizations, has done very little in this field. The flow of detailed information is vital to the functioning of our modern society. However, the regulation and control of that information, when it affects an individual's livelihood, is equally important to the preservation of the individual's right to privacy in which we all so strongly believe.

Credit ratings are more than just optional measurements by which the honest gain and the dishonest are harmed. In a society that is increasingly based upon one's ability to have credit awarded or assessed, the credit rating is almost a matter of integrity, both financial and otherwise. It is disturbing that so little action has been taken federally on this important subject. I would hope when we are dealing with something as basic as the establishment of credit that we would feel it proper and necessary to take action on this matter as early as possible.

I would therefore like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Peddle):

That the subject matter of the motion now before the House be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

I believe in committee this matter should receive more detailed and adequate consideration for the formulation of effective federal legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I have some doubts as to the exact terminology of the motion. The hon. member is actually making a substantive motion and should have presented it in other terms. In other words, the motion should be that this matter be not now considered but that it be referred to a Standing Committee. I am not too sure about the motion as proposed and I would read it now for the consideration of hon. members:

That the subject matter of the motion now before the House be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

I have no objection to putting the motion, but if hon. members have views to express or wish to object to it from a procedural standpoint, I would hear them. Otherwise I would put the motion.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not want to take any more of the time of the House, but in reviewing the debate of November 9 last there was some concern that the actual detailed phrasing of the motion might have some difficulty in being accepted by hon. members. There seemed to be general acceptance of the thrust of the motion by all hon. members and therefore I feel that in order to assist the House, the substance of the information we are concerned about might best be conveyed to the committee that could be most adequately charged with responsibility for dealing with the matter before us.

This is an important matter and I believe all hon. members may want the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs to have the opportunity of considering it at length and then, hopefully, making useful recommendations to the House.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, an amendment to a motion in this form is not, as I understand it, usual. It is not usual procedure for an hon. member to move that the subject matter of a motion before the House be sent to a committee. I do not know what provisions are made under the rules but it seems to me that this is a unique procedure and is improper.

Mr. McGrath: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has introduced this amendment because the same motion was debated in the present session on November 9 last. At that time there appeared to be unanimity in the House as to the substance of the motion. There was some question, however, regarding its precise wording. Since there was unanimity in this House with regard to the principle enshrined in the motion, my hon. friend wanted the subject matter of the motion referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs where it would serve as a vehicle, so to speak, and provide an opportunity for this entire subject to be aired, for witnesses to be called, and so on.

Mr. Speaker: If there is unanimous consent, of course, the motion proposed by the hon. member can be put. I would think that it would be necessary, first, to discharge the motion originally before the House and put an entirely new motion to the House which would be debatable until five o'clock. If that is what hon. members desire, I will put the motion.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Egmont, seconded by the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador moves:

That the subject matter of the motion now before the House be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Francis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, as I understand it there is a motion before the House. Is unanimous consent of the House not required before that motion may be withdrawn and another motion or amendment introduced?

Mr. Speaker: Yes, and that is why I suggested that there had to be unanimous consent. I asked whether there was unanimous consent.

Mr. Francis: No, there is not, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: This is an entirely different motion that is being proposed and it can only be put with the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. McGrath: I wonder if it would not facilitate matters if we were to look upon the motion moved by the hon. member for Egmont as an amendment to the motion before the House?

Mr. Speaker: I would be ready to consider that. Yet this is not an amendment; it is a new motion, and I wonder how the hon. member can indicate that a motion proposed in these terms can be considered as an amendment. I have very serious doubts about that. As I say, however, in my role here I am trying to help hon. members and facilitate proceedings and not impede them in any way. I would think that we would need some form of consent to carry out the hon. member's suggestion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think Your Honour is quite correct and so is the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) quite correct in pointing out that what is proposed is unusual and perhaps irregular. May I also point out that there have been a number of occasions—not many, but enough to say that there are a number—when by agreement, indeed by unanimous agreement, the House has accepted the discharge from the order paper of the motion that was before it and the reference of subject matter thereof to a standing committee. I think the position of the hon. member for Ottawa West to the effect that the proposed amendment is irregular would be protected if we followed the other course. I suggest that Your Honour should ask the House if there is unanimous consent for that course.

Mr. Speaker: That is exactly what I did a moment ago. I indicated that what is proposed can only be done with unanimous consent. I thought that there was such consent. Now I will recognize the hon. member for Ottawa West.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member for Ottawa West. I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has not yet completed his remarks.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What I wanted to say was this. In my view Your Honour should not ask for unanimous consent for the putting of the motion that was suggested by the hon. member for Egmont but, rather, unanimous consent for the proposition that the original motion be discharged and the subject matter thereof referred to a committee.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has been saying and I do not misunderstand him. It seems to me that the proper procedure would involve the usual kind of conference between representatives of the parties, so that there may be agreement on what is being done. I think a number of hon. members still want to speak on the motion presently before the House. Perhaps following today's debate there might be a conference between the parties involved and I think some agreement could be worked out for dealing with the subject matter of the motion which is an extremely important one and involves a number of people. It seems to me that that is the procedure which ought to be followed.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether it might be possible to suspend further debate on the motion and proceed with some other matter until the House leaders have had a chance to discuss the proposal for referring the subject matter of the motion to the standing committee.

Mr. Speaker: That, again, would require unanimous consent. Is there such consent?

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Speaker: There does not appear to be unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: I will again try to ascertain whether there is unanimous consent for the proposition that the order now before the House be discharged and that the House consider a new motion to be proposed in terms of the motion suggested by the hon. member for Egmont.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. I suggest, with respect to hon. members, that for the 20 minutes left for we might continue the discussion on the motion before us, subject of course to the discussion which has been suggested.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, the thought has occurred to me that in view of the suggestion which has been made, while I am making my remarks the consultation suggested might take place. I would not object if there were those discussions. I agree that the subject matter of the motion is most important. It is worthy of consideration by hon. members of this House and I think that giving those concerned an opportunity to appear before the standing committee might be a most useful exercise.

The hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) obviously had a well prepared representation to make on the subject matter before the House as well as on related subject matters. If I remember correctly, he listed eight or nine points which he felt should be considered. I listened carefully to the hon. member and for the most part I agree with his suggestion. I am sure no one would quarrel with the idea that it is necessary for people who are operating businesses to have some basis on which to assess whether credit should be extended to an individual customer.

I suppose it is true to say, as the hon. member for Egmont suggested, that we will live in a society where a large volume of business will be transacted either on a long-term or short-term credit basis. Yet most of us in the course of our lives have observed occasions when knowledge, acquired through mechanisms developed in the business world for accumulating and recording information relating to credit ratings, is abused. Since the credit system is so firmly established and is in such wide use, I think some ground rules in law ought to be laid down for the governing of such operations.

One of the things that concerns me greatly—and I speak as one who has had experience of other people who have been involved in difficulties in this regard—is that no one seems to know just who has what information about us. I do not know how many credit bureaux have me listed on credit cards somewhere, either in Ottawa, British Columbia or in some other part of the country. There may be information about me tucked away in some central recording centre in Toronto for all I know.

As a matter of protection to the individual it should be defined that anyone holding such information must advise the person about whom they hold the information and, indeed, they should have to advise them what information they have. This in itself would provide protection to the individual against the recording and perpetuation of incorrect information about a particular individual. Perhaps it would do something to straighten out the circumstances that occur fairly frequently with regard to mistaken identity where the information that is presumably recorded about one individual relates to and is connected with another. This is one of the basics that should be required by law for all those who are involved in the operation and accumulation of credit information.

There has been a good deal of talk about the fact that we live in an acquisitive society. Perhaps a new term should be applied and it should now be called an inquisitive society. For example, having been a customer of the B.C. Telephone Company for a good many years I recently had occasion to make application for the installation of a new telephone in another location. I was faced with the current application form which asked all manner of questions about me, my employer and various other things. Apparently it wanted some sort of guarantor. It struck me that this was going a bit far on the part of one of the public utilities in this country. The matter of who you work for really does not have anything to do with the B.C. Telephone Company installing a telephone in your residence.

I think that kind of inquisitiveness should be restrained by law, particularly by a telephone company which collects their charges in advance each month. I have no way of knowing to what organizations the B.C. Telephone Company may belong. I do not know how much of the information they acquire as a result of people making applications for telephones is passed on to other, unknown destinations. This is the sort of thing that is of increasing concern to more and more individuals.

As pointed out earlier in the discussion, this situation becomes rather frightening and horrifying with the advent of the computer. From time to time we have the feeling that we are going to simply become numbers or some sort of code on a tape and cease to have any identity as an individual, living human being. Apart from anything else, it might help to preserve the sense of human freedom and identity if citizens know that there are some legal ground rules laid down to govern the operation of recording and using information on which credit decisions can be based.

Mr. E. B. Osler (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on one aspect of this motion. Although it has been touched upon, perhaps it can bear expansion. There is a bird in this corner of the chamber, but we cannot find it. I do not know whether it is an early bird, late bird or what worm it is after.

Mr. McGrath: The hon. member is getting a sign from heaven not to talk out the resolution.

Mr. Osler: It is an outstanding observation that the sun shines on this side of the chamber, if it is coming from where the hon. member says.

Mr. McGrath: You need the inspiration; we don't.

Mr. Osler: I wish to speak about the computer aspect. Before I get into that matter, which was touched on last year by Mr. McGrath—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Osler: I am sorry—the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). I feel that it can be expanded. I notice that other members feel the same. Before doing that I wish to say that the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) mentioned something that struck me, in the whimsical mood I happen to be in this afternoon. He was talking about checks and balances. I wonder whether he has been to Assiniboia this week and that put this in his mind. The farmers there are very cognizant of the fact they are not getting the cheques they thought they would.

It looks very much as though some balancing of budget will take place. In fact, I will be almost willing to bet on it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Which way?

Mr. Osler: I will bet the right way. The hon. member for Egmont said the federal government has done very little in the field of regulation to help the individual against the sinister forces arriving on the horizon. With regard to the sinister forces, I completely agree. I think this is an oversimplification of a broad statement. It is like someone taking an old-fashioned broadsword to open a can. From my observations in Assiniboia this week, it seems typical of some members of this august House. As these things are catching up with the people in Assiniboia; they are also catching up with the members of this House.

It is quite evident from the record. Any person who can read will know that Bill C-252 was introduced in this House earlier this session and has a direct bearing on one aspect of the problem to which the hon. member was referring. At the time it was introduced, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) said it was the beginning of a process that would cover the rest of the issue. We have no reason to doubt the integrity, good will or intention to follow through of the Minister of Justice. The simple statement that the federal government has done very little in this field is by the hour in Assiniboia catching up with the opposition.

I caution the member for Egmont to be a little more temperate because we do not want his party to get the reputation of saying those sorts of things to any greater extent than they now have. The hon. member forgets this government appointed a task force on justice and communications which has been working since February. It will report to the Department of Justice on more or less the same terms of reference as are contained in this motion. Perhaps that is why the member wants to change the motion. He feels there is no thunder to be gained by considering this motion any longer because the government has already acted on it.

With the greatest of good will, the government is in full stride of acting in this respect. It will do no harm to pass this motion. It will just put the seal of approval, or holy oil on a motion or body that is already moving in the direction suggested. There would be no harm passing it.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Mr. Barnett: Like most things, it will probably sit around gathering dust.

Mr. Osler: Reports cannot gather dust until they are finished and tabled. It is probably in the process of being written, so it cannot be gathering dust yet. As things go around here, dust does not settle very quickly but seems to stay up in the air most of the time, especially at this stage of the session.

As several of my colleagues have said, the problem of unregulated gathering of credit information can certainly be abused drastically in this computer age. Mastering knowledge has been aided by computers. Computers can master knowledge and use it to the detriment of individuals. This could not be done in former days because of the sheer mass of knowledge. I note that Dr. John Deutsch, chairman of a panel at a conference entitled "Computers, Privacy and Freedom of Information" held in May, 1970, put this quite succinctly. If I may quote from page 42 of "Instant World, a Report on Telecommunications in Canada", he said:

> In the past, we've had a protection from the limitations of the written word. While a lot of information could be collected, it was cumbersome, it was difficult to find, certainly difficult to find quickly, and this has given the individual a good deal of protection as far as privacy is concerned. It was like looking for a needle in a haystack. Well, what's happened now is that we can indeed find the needle.

That is the nub of the threat that computers pose to mankind. They can be a wonderful servant but they can also find needles that they have no business to find, revealing information that used to be buried by the normal course of events.

The ease of collecting and disseminating credit information, thanks to the computer, brings to light a number of new problem areas. First of all, there is incorrect information which can be propagated and disseminated without disclosing the source of the information or anyone being able to check the information. Then there is misuse of information. For example, information on credit ratings could be misused by those directly related to the gathering of the information or by those who come across information in computer handling.

Last year my colleague the hon. member for Saint-Jacques (Mr. Guilbault) mentioned in his intervention on this motion that he had been closely associated with a large insurance company during his career. As reported at page 1020 of Hansard for November 9, 1970, he said:

> I have had the opportunity to look at credit reports and I have often noticed, with disgust, that some of those credit reports contained information which had nothing to do with the financial situation of the persons involved.

Then he went on to say it was—> —information which has absolutely nothing to do with the financial situation, the steadiness and solvency of the individual involved.

So you can see that the information may have nothing to do with the inquiry that is made. That is bad enough, but when compounded by computer technology the problem is even worse. I presume the hon. member was referring to pre-computer days and the sort of reports that those of us who work in offices have often seen floating around. When this is added to the fact we are now in the computer age, you can see we really have a problem as far as the average individual is concerned. A person may be aware of various fragments of information that has been gathered by different sources. He may not be perturbed about these little bits and pieces of information that various people have on him; but if all these bits and pieces are gathered together by a computer a very extensive personal dossier could be compiled without his knowing it. He could be completely unaware of such a dossier and its contents.

Because the computer industry has grown so quickly and is still in a state of flux, I see no hope on the horizon for a self-regulating body that one could look to to police the industry and to cure some of its ills. Therefore, it is only right and fitting that motions of the sort we are discussing today should be moved and that the government should take the action that it is now in the full process of taking. After all, there is a real problem here.

I should like to think that when we consider both the present motion and the actions that the government is putting together as a package, we consider also the following recommendations very seriously. First of all, the licensing of data banks which would gather, store and disseminate this kind of information; second, that regulation of the sale and disposal of information stored in these banks be made mandatory; third, that regulation of international links between data banks be built into the industry. We would then know exactly what information is leaving Canada and what is coming into Canada. I think every Canadian is horrified that sooner or later the ultimate will arrive and in a little basement in an office in New York every scrap of information on every single person in Canada will be available. Certainly this would be a poor state of affairs.

I have other comments to make, Mr. Speaker, but it is five o'clock and I am afraid I will not be allowed to go on unless the House allows me a little longer.

Some hon. Members: Five o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hour assigned to the consideration of private members' business has now expired. It being five o'clock, this House stands adjourned till two o'clock Monday afternoon.

At five o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, November 8, 1971

The House met at 2 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MACINNIS—ALLEGED INACCURATE STATEMENT BY MEMBER FOR VANCOUVER QUADRA CONCERNING WHIPS DUTIES AND OPERATION OF HOUSE

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege of which I have given the proper notice. My question of privilege refers to a report in the Ottawa Citizen of Friday, November 5, when a paid official of this House took it upon himself to make an unauthorized and inaccurate statement with regard to the duties of the whips of the parties in the House. The statement, along with being unauthorized and inaccurate, is a reflection on the duties of every member of the House and the way in which members perform their duties. It makes it very awkward for hon. members to go back to their constituencies and take pride in the fact that they are representing those constituencies. I would say also it makes it impossible for members of the Liberal party to live with such a statement.

He has also criticized the method by which Parliament works and suggests that we should close Parliament and refer all our work to the committee system. He completely overlooks the fact having cirticized the length of time spent on the tax debate, that the House itself is following the dictates of the government in examining this legislation in committee of the whole.

Along with that this hon. member—and I use the word very liberally—is the author of this statement:

In this House one does not reflect upon the rulings of Mr. Speaker.

Having authored such a statement, the hon. member further reflects upon the conduct of this House when he goes to the press and makes a statement which not only casts a reflection but is very critical of the judgment used by Your Honour with regard to questions put before the House during the question period. On the basis of this unauthorized, inaccurate and critical statement of Your Honour's operation of this House I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the subject matter of the article which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen on Friday, November 5, reporting the views of the member for Vancouver Quadra, be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr.Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond has given notice of his intention to raise this matter by way of a question of privilege in relation to a statement which the hon. member says was published in an Ottawa newspaper. The hon. member had raised the matter originally in the House on Friday afternoon. I have had time to reflect on the situation and to give most serious consideration to the matter. My duty is to determine whether there is prima facie case of privilege which ought to be debated by the House and, on the basis of the decision of the House, referred ultimatey to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

I must tell the hon. member that in my view there is not a prima facie case of privilege. I have to refer the hon. member to a well known ruling which has been confirmed subsequently and which was based on previous rulings. This ruling was made by Mr. Speaker MacNaughton, as reported in Hansard for June 10, 1964 at page 4139, dealing with statements made outside the House of Commons. If the hon. member will read it, as I am sure he and all hon. members have because it has been quoted so often, the hon. member will agree that it would be extremely difficult for the Chair to agree that there is a prima facie case of privilege and that a statement which appeared in the press should be considered by a standing committee of the House.

Having given the matter every possible consideration and having looked at it as objectively and impartially as I could, in spite of the fact that, as the hon. member said, there is a suggestion that the statement might be a reflection on the Chair I would not think there is a prima facie case which should be considered by the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections as suggested in the proposed motion of the hon. member.

Mr. MacInnis: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask you, Sir, whether any precedents formerly established would cover the fact that this member is a paid official of the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would not think that would be a relevant factor.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TABLING OF COMMUNIQUÉ ISSUED FOLLOWING VISIT TO CANADA OF PRESIDENT OF YUGOSLAVIA

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table copies of the communiqué issued at the conclusion of the visit to Canada of the President of Yugoslavia, together with copies of letters that I exchanged with the Foreign Minister of Yugoslavia.

Questions

COMMUNICATIONS

BELL CANADA RATE INCREASE APPLICATION—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under Standing Order 43 concerning Bell Telephone's application to the Canadian Transport Commission for a 9.5 per cent rate increase. As this is a national public utility affecting all Canadians and a company with a profit of $38 million, I move:

That the matter of the most recent Bell Telephone rate increase application be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications with provision to examine the entire operations of Bell Canada in relation to the public interest.

Mr. Speaker: The motion proposed by the hon. member for Timiskaming requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Since there is not unanimity, the motion cannot be put.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CRIMES OF VIOLENCE

Question No. 1,630—Mr. Mather:

What was the number and rate of crimes of violence in Canada in 1965 and in 1970?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports that: The attached table shows the number and rate of crimes of violence in Canada in 1965 and 1970.

Crime of Violence	1965[1] Number Reported To Statistics Canada	1965[1] Rate[2]	1970[1] Number Reported To Statistics Canada[3]	1970[1] Rate[2]
Murder	243	1.5	430[4]	2.3
Attempted Murder	111	0.7	268	1.4
Manslaughter	34	0.2	34	0.2
Rape	641	3.9	1,074	5.8
Other Sexual Offences	6,802	41.5	9,917	53.3
Wounding	822	5.0	1,658	8.9
Assaults	44,551	271.6	76,997	413.7
Robbery	5,576	34.0	11,589	62.3

[1]Prior to September 1961, all murder was considered capital and the only possible sentence was the death penalty. After September 1961, it was divided into capital and non-capital murder. Capital murder was premeditated murder or the murder of a police officer, prison guard, etc., or murder during the commission of another criminal act. The penalty was death. All other types of murder were considered non-capital, and were punished by mandatory life imprisonment. In December 1967, the Criminal Code sections dealing with murder were amended again, this time for a five-year trial period. Capital murder now refers only to murder of a "law officer, warden," etc. The penalty is death. Non-capital murder refers to any other kind. Life imprisonment is the minimum penalty.

[2]Crime Rates based on 100,000 Population, Age seven Years and over, Canada, 1965 and 1970 (estimated population figures).

[3]These are preliminary figures reported by the police and as such are subject to revision.

[4]One incident reported in 1970 accounted for 40 victims with one person charged.

SPRINGHILL, N.S.—MINE DUMP FIRE

Question No. 1,641—Mr. Coates:

1. What action has been taken by the Department of the Environment to extinguish the mine dump fire at Springhill, Nova Scotia?

2. Were these actions continuations of previous commitments by officials formerly associated with other departments or have there been new initiatives and, if so, when were they undertaken?

3. Will the government share the cost of extinguishing this fire with the provincial government?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of Environment and the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources as follows:

1. Responsibility for extinguishing the mine dump fire at Springhill, Nova Scotia, lies with the Nova Scotia government. The responsibility of the Department of the Environment is to ensure that there is no hazard to health from air pollution due to the fire. To this effect, a survey was conducted during the past summer and a report is being prepared at this time.

2. See (1).

3. This matter is under consideration but as yet no decision has been reached.

STATISTICS ON COST OF MODERN LIVING IN CANADA

Question No. 1,642—Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

Does the government, or any department thereof, maintain statistics on the cost of moderate living in Canada and, if so (a) on what basis are such statistics calculated (b) what is the cost of moderate living in 1971 for a family of four?

[Translation]

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports that: no statistics on the cost of a defined "moderate living" in Canada are calculated by any government department. Statistics of family expenditure are compiled by Statistics Canada from information collected in household surveys. These are calculated in the form of average expenditures per family for a given year, classified according to family characteristics such as family income and family composition. Average expenditures for families of four are compiled for three distinct family types, namely, families with two adults and two children under sixteen, families consisting of four adults, or families consisting of three adults and one child. The resulting expenditure patterns reflect differences in consumption related to the different family types as well as differences in income levels. Results from a national expenditure survey conducted in 1970 are expected by the end of this year. Most recent published data are contained in Family

Food Expenditure in Canada 1969, Statistics Canada Catalogue No. 62-531 and Urban Family Expenditure 1967, Statistics Canada Catalogue No. 62-530.

ATLIN, B.C.—INVESTIGATIONS BY RCMP AND CUSTOMS OFFICERS

Question No. 1,725—Mr. Howard (Skeena):

1. Was RCMP Staff Sergeant R. L. Nesbitt stating government policy or RCMP policy when he said that the recent investigation by RCMP and a Customs Officer at Atlin, B.C. was as a result of Atlin Board of Trade's President Tom Kirkwood's complaints of "flagrant violations" of the Customs Act?

2. Upon what occasion did the said Tom Kirkwood make such a statement?

3. Is the government prepared to apologize to Mr. Kirkwood for any imputations contained in the statements attributed to Staff Sergeant Nesbitt as they appeared in the Vancouver Province of August 26, 1971?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): The answer, in so far as it concerns the Department of the Solicitor General, is as follows: 1. Staff Sergeant R. L. Nesbitt, RCM, did not use the expression "flagrant violations" nor did he attribute such words to Mr. Tom Kirkwood when discussing the Atlin, B. C. matter with a Vancouver Province newspaper reporter. Staff Sergeant Nesbitt informed the reporter that enquiries such as carried out in the Atlin area were routine in nature but were generally conducted in the autumn because of the influx of American hunters in that particular region which is adjacent to the American Border and permits ready access to Canada without having to clear Customs. Enquiries were initiated earlier this year because of complaints concerning Customs enforcement having appeared in the press and which were attributed to Atlin Board of Trade President Tom Kirkwood. Staff Sergeant Nesbitt apprised the reporter of these articles, in particular an item which appeared in the Vancouver Sun on June 11, 1971. The article appearing in the Vancouver Province August 26, 1971, indicates that Mr. Kirkwood was contacted personally by the reporter which in all likelihood influenced the text used in the news story.

2. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police do not know if in fact Mr. Tom Kirkwood made such a statement.

3. No imputations were implied or intended in Staff Sergeant Nesbitt's statement to the press which appeared in the Vancouver Province of August 26, 1971 and, accordingly, no apology is called for.

ATLIN, B.C.—POSSESSION OF WRIT OF ASSISTANCE IN INVESTIGATION BY RCMP AND CUSTOMS OFFICERS

Question No. 1,726—Mr. Howard (Skeena):

When the RCMP and a Customs Officer conducted an investigation at Atlin, B.C. in July of this year, were any of the officers who visited Atlin and participated in the investigation in possession of a Writ of Assistance under the Customs Act and, if not, is the government prepared to correct RCMP Staff Sergeant Nesbitt's statement that appeared in the Vancouver Province of August 26, 1971 that "We had a Writ of Assistance under the Customs Act but didn't have to use it"?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): The answer, in so far as it concerns the Department of the Solicitor General, is as follows: The Royal Canadian Mounted Police investigator was in possession of a Writ of Assistance under the Customs Act; however, on no occasion was he requested to produce it during the course of the investigations. Upon termination of the investigation at one of the premises the individual concerned requested, out of curiosity, to see a Writ of Assistance. The R.C.M. Police investigator obliged.

CANADIAN BIRTH RATE

Question No. 1,786—Mr. Mather:

What was the Canadian birth rate in 1950, 1960 and 1970?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports that: The Canadians crude birth rate (per 1,000 population) were: 1950, 27.1; 1960, 26.8; 1970, 17.3.

NUMBER OF INDIAN STUDENTS ATTENDING UNIVERSITIES

Question No. 1,809—Mr. Orlikow:

1. How many Indian students attending university in 1970-71 completed the full course?

2. How many Indian students attending university in 1970-71 withdrew before the end of the academic year?

Mr. Judd Buchanan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Three hundred and eighty eight Indian students attending university in 1970-71 completed the full course. This figure includes those students who have completed summer courses at universities.

2. Forty four Indian students attending university in 1970-71 withdrew before the end of the academic year.

COMPUTER INDUSTRY MARKET STATISTICS

Question No. 1,814—Mr. Robinson:

Will the government consider the advisability of providing computer industry market statistics?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports that: It plans to compile some general information on the computer services industry from the 1971 Census of Merchandising and Services which will be conducted in 1972 and plans to initiate a separate survey covering the year 1972 to obtain more detailed market statistics.

PAN AMERICAN HEALTH ORGANIZATION

Question No. 1,817—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. Did Canada become a member of the Pan American Health Organization and, if so (a) on what date (b) what is the Canadian contribution toward the budget of the Organization (c) did Canada request that a smaller figure be set as its portion and, if so, what was the proposed amount and for what reason was it not accepted by the PAHO?

2. Of what other OAS agencies is Canada a member and in each case, what was our date of joining and what has been our annual contribution since joining?

3. Is it intended that Canada will seek membership in other OAS organizations and, if so, which ones?

Questions

4. Who comprised the Canadian delegation at the 20th annual PAHO meeting?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. (a) Canada was admitted to membership in the Pan American Health Organization on September 27, 1971. (b) The Canadian contribution for 1971 will be U.S. $982,992. (c) Canada suggested to the Organization that the date of budgetary responsibility should correspond as closely as possible to the date of Canada's admission to full membership responsibility in the Organization. This principle, which Canada has advocated in other specialized agencies, would have involved payment of approximately 50 per cent of a full year's assessment. The Executive Committee of PAHO recommended Canadian membership on this basis but, at the same time, appealed to Canada to restudy the possibility of contributing a full quota for 1971 in view of the importance of the health programs for which it is intended. Responding to this appeal, Canada agreed, without prejudice to the principle of financial responsibility, to pay a full assessment for 1971 on the understanding that the additional funds thus made available in the present year would be used for health programs which the Directing Council of the Organization considered to be most urgent.

2. Canada has been a member of the following OAS specialized agencies since the dates indicated: (a) The Pan American Institute of Geography and History (PAIGH), August 15, 1961. Canada's annual payments since joining have been (in U.S. dollars): 1960-61, $9,150; 1961-62, $9,150; 1962-63, $9,800; 1963-64, $10,300; 1964-65, $14,900; 1965-66, $15,150; 1966-67, $15,150; 1967-68, $15,150; 1968-69, $15,150; 1969-70, $15,250; 1970-71, $15,250. (b) Pan American Health Organization (PAHO), September 27, 1971: Contribution for 1971, U.S. $982,992.

3. Canada has indicated its intention of seeking full membership in the Inter-American Institute of Agricultural Sciences and the Inter-American Indian Institute, both of which are OAS organizations. In addition Canada has indicated its interest in full membership in the Inter-American Development Bank and in a number of other inter-American institutions that are considered to be part of the inter-American system but are not organizationally linked with the OAS. Canada is already a member of a number of these organizations: the Inter-American Statistical Institute; the Postal Union of the Americas and Spain; the Inter-American Centre for Tax Administrators; the Centre for Latin American Monetary Studies.

4. The composition of the Canadian delegation at the 20th annual PAHO meeting was the following: the Hon. John Munro, Minister of National Health and Welfare, as Canadian Representative and head of the delegation; Alternate Representatives: Dr. Maurice Leclair, Deputy Minister (National Health), Mr. K. B. Williamson, Minister of the Canadian Embassy in Washington, and Dr. B. D. B. Layton, Principal Medical Officer, International Health, Department of National Health and Welfare; Advisers: Dr. Didier Dufour, Director, Institut National de la Recherche Scientifique—Santé, Centre de Bio-médecine, Laval University, Dr. Ernest Mastromatteo, Director, Environmental Health Services Branch, Ontario Department of Health, and Mr. L. Clark, First Secretary, Canadian Embassy in Washington.

DEFINITION OF A COMPUTER

Question No. 1,818—Mr. Robinson:

Has the government a satisfactory definition of a "Computer" and, if so, what is the definition and, if not, when will it have a definition?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Government refers to the definition of a computer established by The International Organization for Standardization. "A data processor that can perform substantial computation, including numerous arithmetic or logic operations, without intervention by a human operator during the run."

PEI—ESTABLISHMENT OF SECOND NATIONAL PARK

Question No. 1,823—Mr. McQuaid:

Is the government considering the establishment of a second National Park in Prince Edward Island and, if so (a) where will the Park be established (b) how many acres will be included within the Park area?

Mr. Judd Buchanan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Yes. (a) In the vicinity of East Point. (b) The boundaries of the Park are still under negotiation but it is expected that the Park will cover an area of approximately 15 to 16 square miles.

DUTCH ELM DISEASE

Question No. 1,850—Mr. Robinson:

Will the government advise if the fungicide developed by the Forestry Service will be madde available to all Canadians to combat the Dutch Elm disease epidemic?

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Scientists of the Canadian Forestry Service have formed a team of research people to test a number of chemicals which have shown promise against the Dutch Elm disease fungus. The program is still in the research stage and when and if acceptable results are forthcoming, the materials and method of use will be made available to the Canadian public.

NEW BRUNSWICK—NEW NATIONAL PARK

Question No. 1,854—Mr. MacLean:

1. Has land acquisition for a new national park, along the Northumberland Strait, in the Province of New Brunswick been completed?

2. When is it planned to have the park in operation?

3. What will be the area of this park?

4. Has a name been selected for this park and, if so, what is it?

Mr. Judd Buchanan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. No.

2. Operations will start in the Spring of 1972.

3. Approximately 85.75 square miles.

4. Yes. Kouchibouguac National Park.

FUNCTIONS OF THE MINISTRY OF STATE FOR SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

Question No. 1,883—Mr. Thomson:

1. With reference to complaints that too many commercially feasible ideas have died in university or government labs, what specific techniques is the Minister of State for Science and Technology considering for processing work done in such labs to test their commercial viability?

2. Does the Minister intend to use financial incentives or penalties in universities to channel technological research in specific areas and does he intend to encourage NRC to do so?

3. Does the Minister intend to contact provincial governments to avoid duplication of scientific research in Canada?

4. What approach does the Minister intend to make to the scientific community as to selection of specific areas of scientific research?

5. What financial or other incentives will be offered to skilled technical or scientific personnel in involving themselves in Canadian research, technical or business development?

Hon. Alistair Gillespie (Minister of State for Science and Technology): 1. None. The Ministry will not engage in any fundamental or applied research.

2. The Ministry itself is not one of those federal agencies involved in grants to universities. The Ministry will however be interested in the policies to be formulated for such grants which are related to Scientific and Technological activities.

3. The Ministry will establish liaison with provincial governments in areas of mutual interest relating to Science and Technology.

4. The Ministry is charged with responsibility for advising the government and assisting other government agencies in the determination of policy for the support of scientific research. In the exercise of that function there will be continuing close liaison with the scientific community.

5. The responsibility for offering financial and other incentives for the purposes mentioned rests with agencies of government other than the Ministry of State for Science and Technology.

FUNCTIONS OF THE MINISTRY OF STATE IN SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

Question No. 1,884—Mr. Thomson:

1. What specific techniques does the Minister of State for Science and Technology intend to use to encourage technological innovation in industry (a) cash grants (b) loans (c) providing technical personnel (d) providing management personnel (e) providing sales personnel (f) other?

2. In the promotion of such innovations, at what stage will the responsibility of the Minister end?

3. How will the Minister involve other government departments in enabling infant industries to grow?

4. Does the Minister intend using such commercial protective devices as tariffs or quotas in support of such infant industries?

Hon. Alistair Gillespie (Minister of State for Science and Technology): 1. The Minister of State for Science and Technology will be concerned with advice to the government and assistance to other concerned federal agencies in the formulation of government policies with respect to the encouragement of technological innovation, specific techniques to be employed would be the responsibility of various federal agencies.

2. As noted in (1) the Minister is concerned primarily with advice to the government and assistance to other government agencies in the formulation of policy for the promotion of innovation.

3. As indicated by the question other government departments are directly concerned with support for new industries. The Minister of State for Science and Technology will be concerned with reviewing and recommending policies where appropriate for stimulating R & D in Canadian industry.

4. The Ministry will be interested in the government policy for tariffs and quotas relating to scientific and technological oriented new industries.

LOANS DISTRIBUTED IN ONTARIO 1970-71

Question No. 1,889—Mr. Serré:

How many (a) loans to small businesses (b) farm improvement loans (c) Industrial Development Bank loans were distributed in (i) Ontario (ii) the Sudbury district in 1970 and 1971?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance):

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY—CO-OPERATION OF VARIOUS DEPARTMENTS IN RESEARCH PROGRAMS

Question No. 1,891—Mr. Thomson:

1. By what specific method does the Minister of State for Science and Technology intend to obtain the cooperation of various departments in research programs such as (a) telecommunications by satellite (b) marine research (c) defence projects (d) pollution and environment control (e) medical research?

2. Does the Minister intend to use the cost-benefit method in assessing scientific research programs undertaken by departments?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of State for Science and Technology): 1. Research programs in the areas mentioned are as the question indicates the responsibility of various departments other than the Ministry of State for Science and Technology. The latter Ministry will of course be assisting those departments and advising the government on such research programs.

2. Techniques including cost-benefit analysis will be used in studies undertaken by the Ministry for the purposes of assisting in the formulation of policies for scientific research.

Questions

CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGENCY—SALARIES OF STAFF

IDB INVOLVEMENT WITH CARTIER REFINERIES LTD.

Question No. 1,928—Mr. MacDonald (Egmont):

What is the involvement, if any, of the Industrial Development Bank in the financing of the purchase of shares of Cartier Refineries Limited of Québec?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): It has not been the practice, nor is it appropriate for the Industrial Development Bank to make public information concerning individual accounts or applicants.

CANADIAN CASUALTIES IN WARS

Question No. 1,992—Mr. Robinson:

How many casualties did Canada have in each of (a) the Boer War (b) the First World War (c) the Second World War (d) the Korean War?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): (a) South African War Deaths 170 Wounded Information not available (b) World War I Deaths 59,750 Wounded 138,166 (c) World War II Deaths 42,042 Wounded 54,414 (d) Korean Campaign Deaths 516 Wounded 1,211.

ENERGY

PARTICIPATION BY PROVINCES IN TALKS WITH UNITED STATES—CONSULTATION BEFORE SUSPENSION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Acting Prime Minister. In view of statements over the weekend by the Premier of Alberta, has the government of Canada invited an official observer from Alberta or, indeed, any other province, to sit in on the United States-Canada energy talks?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the Leader of the Opposition may recall, the Prime Minister said some weeks ago that because of the pressure of other matters these conversations are not proceeding at the present time.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether, at the time of that decision to which the hon. gentleman referred, the government of Canada consulted with any of the provinces, especially those provinces particularly interested in energy or the export of energy?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure what we would have consulted about. The talks are not going on at the present time. When they are resumed, of course we will be welcoming the views of any government or of any group in the country that may wish to give us its views on the question of energy.

Mr. Baldwin: What about the views of the Official Opposition?

Mr. Sharp: We hear those freely. We do not have to ask for them.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I would hope the hon. gentleman understood that I was asking whether there had been consultation before the government of Canada took the decision to discontinue the talks. In view of the reason given for the discontinuance of the talks at that time, namely, that the government did not have the wherewithal, the personnel or the time to arrive at a decision, is the government considering seeking the assistance of some of the provinces in providing some of the personnel to help the overburdened members of the government?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Leader of the Opposition would expect the government of Canada to take its responsibility for its decisions and would not want to pass these responsibilities on to any province. However, we would of course welcome the views of the province of Alberta, the provinces of Saskatchewan, British Columbia or any others that are vitally interested in this question.

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF LIAISON GROUP OF FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL OFFICIALS IN WASHINGTON—APPROVAL OF GAS EXPORT APPLICATION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, in light of what the Acting Prime Minister has said and in light of the fact that exports of crude petroleum and natural gas are so important to our balance of trade with the United States, has any agreement been reached with the Premier of Alberta on the establishment of a permanent joint trade committee group in Washington, made up of federal and provincial advisers and liaison officers, to discuss the problem continuously and to assure and guarantee the continuation of the trade that now exists and the acceleration of trade which is needed by Canada?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. gentleman is familiar with the fact that there has always been the closest consultation among the government of Canada, the government of Alberta and other provincial governments that are concerned with gas and oil before decisions are taken by the government of Canada. I do not think it would be proper for us to ask any province, whether Alberta or Quebec, to share in the responsibility for the foreign policy of Canada.

Mr. Woolliams: In light of the fact that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is not here—I make nothing of that because he is ill—can the Acting Prime Minister tell us whether the National Energy Board has approved an application for the export of two trillion cubic feet of natural gas spread over a number of years, which export would be important to our trade? Has approval been given, and are discussions going on in Washington at the present time in reference to their energy needs?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the National Energy Board has been given the responsibility by an act of Parliament to make decisions on these matters. We have not yet been informed about the decision of the board in this case, and I am sure the hon. gentleman would not wish us to interfere with that process.

GOVERNMENT POSITION RESPECTING CONTINENTAL POLICY

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister. Inasmuch as the Premier of Alberta has endorsed the concept of a continental energy policy, may I ask whether the federal government is going to endorse that concept and press that particular position in discussions with the United States?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not had an opportunity to speak with the government of Alberta to determine whether that is its view. The policy of the Canadian government is to get the maximum benefit out of the energy exchanges that take place between the United States and Canada, and that does not necessarily denote a continental energy policy.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, arising out of the minister's suggestion that the government of Canada would exercise its own responsibilities in reply to the question whether there had been consultation with the provinces prior to discussions being broken off, is it the position of the Acting Prime Minister that it is inconsistent with the exercise and discharge of its responsibilities for the government to consult with the provinces?

• (2:20 p.m.)

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker. We always consult with the provinces.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would not think that the question is in order. The hon. member for Timiskaming.

Inquiries of the Ministry

COMMUNICATIONS

BELL CANADA RATE INCREASE APPLICATION—TRANSPORT COMMISSION STATUTE—SUGGESTED REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the latest application by Bell Canada for an increase in rates, will this whole subject matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications for investigation?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, here again we have the Canadian Transport Commission which is responsible for dealing with these applications, and I would not want to prejudge its decision.

Mr. Peters: In light of the fact that in the last five years Bell Canada has made three successful applications to the CTC, will the Acting Prime Minister agree to refer the subject matter of the CTC legislation to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communication as there is obviously some difficulty when the company has to make that many applications in a short period of time for such large increases?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker, we are not contemplating any action of that kind.

BELL CANADA RATE INCREASE APPLICATION—CONSIDERATION BY PRICES AND INCOMES COMMISSION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, Mr. Speaker. Has the application of Bell Canada to the Canadian Transport Commission been referred to the Prices and Incomes Commission for their consideration?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McGrath: In view of the inflationary aspect of the proposed increase, will the minister ask the Prices and Incomes Commission to look into it?

Mr. Basford: It seems to me that the appropriate body to look into it at the moment is the CTC.

Mr. McGrath: A further supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for St. John's East for a second supplementary and then recognize the hon. member for Témiscaminque.

Mr. McGrath: Will the Prices and Incomes Commission present a brief or appear before the CTC to argue that this proposed increase is inflationary?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, we would trust that the CTC is aware of economic conditions in the country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Who is not?

Mr. Woolliams: That is one time you do not stand alone, Ron.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TRADE WITH RUSSIA AND COMMUNIST CHINA—UNITED STATES REACTIONS

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs.

In view of his statement last night on some television stations to the effect that the government intended to deal normally with the United States, I should like to ask the minister whether the United States government has made its reactions known to Canada's expressed intention to gear its trade increasingly to the Russian-Chinese Communist bloc?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the United States, like ourselves, is engaged in very actively promoting trade with both China and the Soviet Union.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: I should like to put a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Does the minister mean that the United States approve the action of the Canadian government with regard to Communist China and the USSR? Is that what the minister means?

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, we do not require the approval of any other government for our actions. All I am saying is that the United States to some extent seems to be following our example.

HUMAN RIGHTS

DISMISSAL OF RON HAGGART BY TORONTO "STAR"—INVESTIGATION BY LAW OFFICERS OF POSSIBLE VIOLATION OF BILL OF RIGHTS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice and concerns the former Toronto Telegram columnist, Ron Haggart, who wrote an article in support of a political party to which I do not belong, but that does not alter the question of principle. He was subsequently hired by the Toronto Star and when it was ascertained that he had written this article he was removed as a potential member of the staff. In view of the fact that freedom of the press generally speaking, though with limitations, and freedom of speech fall within the general ambit of parliamentary government and therefore under the authority of the Parliament of Canada, will the minister have the law officers of the Crown look into the action that was taken towards Mr. Haggart with a view to ascertaining whether what took place constituted a flagrant disregard of freedom within the meaning of the Bill of Rights?

An hon. Member: You are out of court.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, it is open, of course, to Mr. Haggart to consider his own remedies before the courts. However, I will inquire into the matter to see whether there is anything that I might properly do.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that I accept the premise of that answer which was more in the form of a brush-off. Do I have the minister's assurance that he will secure the opinion of the law officers of the Crown? Am I right in that?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman has that assurance.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

NECESSITY FOR MINER TO TAKE COURT ACTION—REVIEW BY LAW OFFICERS

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question arises out of the minister's answer with respect to the opportunity for an individual to go before the courts. May I ask the minister if he has reviewed the situation in which a Cape Breton miner has had to go to court to fight the government, despite the fact that the Crown corporation has admitted violating section 35 of the bill passed by this Parliament and section 58 of the Unemployment Insurance Act and despite the fact that in the Standing committee on Justice and Legal Affairs they admitted, as recorded in the committee evidence, that coercion was used with respect to unemployment insurance collections?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have asked the law officers to review the evidence before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs so that I will be in a position to have a talk with the hon. member.

COMPETITION BILL

PRIOR CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES ON PREPARATION—SUGGESTED REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT AS TO LEGALITY

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs a question. Since the new competition act appears to intrude into several areas of provincial jurisdiction—

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Baldwin: —was this bill prepared in consultation with the provinces and is it the intention of the government to seek an amendment to the British North America Act on which to found jurisdiction?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the provinces were asked to comment on the legislation some time ago.

Mr. Baldwin: Will the government take the opportunity to submit this bill or parts of it to the Supreme Court of Canada on a reference as to its legality before the legislation is implemented?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, there is no question of its legality. Surely the court would be entitled to have Parliament decide the issue first.

ALLEGED CONFLICT BETWEEN PRINCIPLES OF BILL AND NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION ACT—CONSULTATION WITH TRANSPORT COMMISSION

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Has the minister or anyone in his department consulted with the chairman of the Canadian Transport Commission or with anyone else on that commission in order to resolve the apparent conflict between the principles underlying the competition bill and the National Transportation Act which was passed by this Parliament?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the conflict to which the hon. member refers. Of course in drafting the competition bill cognizance was taken of existing acts that had been passed by parliament.

Mr. Nowlan: Am I to understand from the minister's answer that there has been no consultation whatsoever between his department and the chairman or officials of the Canadian Transport Commission with respect to the competition bill in order to resolve some of the apparent conflicts between the bill and the National Transportation Act?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I would refer the hon. member to section 92 of the bill. The effects of other legislation are taken into account in section 92.

PENSIONS

OLD AGE SECURITY—INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE AND LOWERING OF ELIGIBLE AGE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the statement made several times by the minister during the debate last December on the Old Age Security Act to the effect that the basic amount of pension under that act was not necessarily frozen at $80 but could be increased by Parliament, is the minister, in view of the needs of our pensioners, now considering an increase in that basic amount?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Not at this time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stanfield: This may be your last chance, John.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Then is the minister considering the lowering of the eligible age for those who are prepared to retire from the labour market?

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, as we indicated, I believe in our white paper on income security, we see this as a future trend. In terms of immediate action the government does not have any plans at this time.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister define "future"?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Baldwin: It is something this government has not got.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps this matter might be considered at the time of adjournment.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

• (2:30 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Témiscamingue wish to put a supplementary question?

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

In view of the monthly increase of 42 cents granted to pensioners, does the minister not agree that another 42 cent increase should now be granted.

Mr. Speaker: This is a suggestion rather than a question.

TRADE

POSSIBLE UNITED STATES IMPORT SURTAX INCREASE AND EXCISE TAX ON CANADIAN AUTOMOBILES—CONTINGENCY PLAN

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the recommendation of the United States Senate committee on finance dealing with a possible increase in the United States surcharge and an excise tax on Canadian autos, has the government developed any contingency plan in the event that some or all of these proposals become law?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): As I have indicated, Mr. Speaker, it is very unlikely that they will become law, but we are considering the matter.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INDIA—ASSISTANCE FOLLOWING TIDAL WAVE—AID TO REFUGEES

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if the government has yet made up its mind on what form of aid it will give to India in respect of the tragedy at Orissa and, further, if the president of CIDA has brought forth any recommendations on the broader question which the government will follow?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have not definitely decided on the form of aid to give. In fact, I am awaiting the return of Mr. Gerin-Lajoie so we can talk about that question as well as the more general question of aid to the refugees.

AIR TRANSPORT

USE OF FRENCH LANGUAGE BY TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS IN QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): In the absence of the Minister of Transport I will direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. It arises out of the concern expressed in Edmonton last week by Dick Campbell, president of the Air Traffic Controllers Association, over the use of the French language at three air control towers in the province of Quebec. Can the Acting Prime Minister assure the House that, in view of several near accidents because of language difficulties, the situation will be investigated and reported upon to the House?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot vouch for the accuracy of these reports, but this is a very serious matter and I will draw it to the attention of the minister and ask him if he can report to the House.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED CLOSING OF CANADIAN ARSENALS BRANCH IN ETOBICOKE

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): My question is for the Minister of Supply and Services but in his absence I will direct it to the Acting Prime Minister. Is the government in a position to provide the House with information concerning the reported closing by the end of this year of a branch of Canadian Arsenals in the borough of Etobicoke, near Toronto, and the consequent laying-off of 150 skilled men and women and sending of the arms contract to the United States?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I will take notice of this question, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, have I the permission of the House to answer a question asked previously? It is not an answer of substance, I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, but simply to say that the question of which I took notice was answered on Friday, as recorded at page 9370 of Hansard.

GRAIN

ALLEGED LOSS OF SALES BECAUSE OF LACK OF TRANSPORT FACILITIES

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): May I direct my question to the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of a statement by Mr. Gibbings, one of the board's commissioners, to a meeting of the United Grain Growers that the Canadian Wheat Board has passed up sales of grain because of lack of transport, can the minister tell the House the extent of the lost sales and what steps are being taken to correct the situation?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the statement, of course, refers to certain specific months as the wheat board is still selling grain. Certainly sales volumes for some months are so monumental that the capacity of our transportation facilities are strained to the maximum. We have been studying the transportation facilities for some time and are now in a position to begin to make some decision on those things necessary to have additional facilities as we are confident sales will go even higher in the near future.

Mr. Gleave: I am impressed by the generalities, Mr. Speaker, but may I ask a further question? In view of the statements by the Alberta Wheat Pool that No. 2 wheat is not in position for boats which will be arriving shortly for loading—indeed, they were referring to last week—can the minister give any assurance that this grain will be in position and available for loading?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, since something like 35 million bushels of grain went out of elevators toward Thunder Bay and Vancouver last week, I think the hon. member might get the impression that the block system is capable of bringing grain forward. Of course the whole point of the management of the block system is to attempt to bring grain requirements forward for the boats which are arriving. When we get to the very peak of our handling capacity there are times when there may be slight delays, but everything is being done to keep our terminal facilities running to the maximum.

SALE BY UNITED STATES TO RUSSIA—REASON FOR WHEAT BOARD NOT GETTING CONTRACT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): My question to the minister is supplementary in a way to the answer he gave a moment ago regarding the difficulty in securing the necessary shipping space and the like which is interfering with the sale of grain abroad. Will the minister explain whether it was because of a shortage of such facilities as transportation that in the past few days the U.S.S.R. has made its first purchase of grain from the United States in seven years, 28 million bushels of barley and 21 million bushels of oats? Did the Wheat Board have an opportunity to make this sale or is this turn of events the result of Kosygin's visit to Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the Wheat Board, of course, had discussions with the Russians concerning this grain sale as in regard to others. As far as this sale in concerned, it was associated with a very large movement of corn to the U.S.S.R. which we did not have available. As far as barley is concerned, I might say that the Wheat Board has reached the point where it is not sure that it can sell any more barley because most of the barley that has been grown has in fact been sold.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. member will be recognized for a supplementary and then the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister give the figures for barley? He usually presents figures such as he has been using in the Assiniboia by-election but not the facts.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Because of the great expectation of increased grain sales in the years ahead to which the minister just referred, would he mind putting his money where his mouth is and taking steps to increase the elevator capacity at Prince Rupert so that—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

EXTENSION OF TELEVISION COVERAGE TO NORTHERN NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): My question is for the Secretary of State. Will the minister investigate the reasons for continuous delays in extending CBC television coverage to parts of northern Newfoundland which have been denied this facility, and will he consider requesting the cabinet to include such a project for immediate action under the federal work-intensive projects?

• (2:40 p.m.)

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, both questions are presently under study, a very close examination which will allow the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to answer the hon. member's question and satisfy his curiosity. Far from being neglected, this question is under intensive study at the present time.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—PROJECTED MAN-MONTHS OF EMPLOYMENT—REGIONAL OR PROVINCIAL BREAKDOWN

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): My question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Is the minister now able to give a specific projection of the number of man-months of employment that will be provided by the local initiatives plan this winter and, if so, will he be making a statement in the House?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): As I indicated earlier, Mr. Speaker, we do not intend to make such a projection, although as projects are approved I may be in a position to report the number of jobs and man-months involved. We simply do not intend to make a projection because the quality of the projects will determine that. Of course, there will be some tremendous indirect jobs created as well as the jobs created directly.

Mr. Aiken: In view of a statement that was attributed to the minister in a speech in the Maritimes recently, will he be able to give a breakdown of the regional or provincial figures on the local initiatives plan?

Mr. Lang: Again, as was indicated in that same discussion with the press in the Maritimes, the intention is to use the allocations under the local initiatives plan to some extent to balance the allocations leading to employment under the various other parts of the special employment program rather than to make a final total initial allocation. I indicated that those areas which had the highest rates of unemployment should ordinarily expect the highest proportion of the amounts of money under the local initiatives program.

Mr. Aiken: One further supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are running short of time. There are a number of hon. members seeking an opportunity to ask questions. If we have too many supplementaries we will get into difficulty. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka and the the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate.

Mr. Aiken: In view of the minister's answer, will the acceptance of applications under the program in any way be related to regional allocation or will they be strictly according to the prerequisites set down in the application form?

Mr. Lang: They will all have to meet the criteria set down for applications. We anticipate more eligible applications than we can possibly approve, and in the approval of applications some attention will be paid to the distribution of unemployment, because we are attempting through this program to put to work as many as possible of those now unemployed.

Mr. Baldwin: Where are you going to put Hooker?

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—NUMBER OF PROJECTS APPROVED—NEWFOUNDLAND CO-ORDINATOR

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Having in mind the brevity of the program, can the minister tell the House how many projects have been approved to date and, second, who is the co-ordinating officer for the province of Newfoundland since the former co-ordinating officer, the executive assistant to the previous premier, obviously should have been replaced—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member will allow the Chair to comment on the question he has asked. The hon. member asks who is the co-ordinator for one province. I would think a question of that kind should not be asked during the question period but should be asked in writing. If the hon. member thinks it is urgent that the information be provided, a reply could be secured by raising the matter at the time of adjournment.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, the first part of my question related to the number of projects that have been approved. As to the second part, may I say that 230 municipalities are wondering to whom they should apply.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There is no point in discussing the matter. The Chair has made a ruling. If there is urgency and the hon. member thinks he is right, as he possibly is, he knows he has recourse under the rules in that he may come back and discuss the matter at the time of the adjournment. However, I appreciate that the first part of the question might invite comment from the minister.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): At this moment, as far as I know, no projects have been approved. We were hoping to assess a certain group of applications before approving the first one. But it should not be very long now before the first approvals are accorded.

GRAIN

ALLEGED LACK OF BOXCARS—POSSIBLE APPOINTMENT OF TRANSPORT CONTROLLER

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. It relates to the question asked by my hon. friend from Saskatoon-Biggar and the response which was given by the minister. In view of reports that the response of the railways to the block system of shipping grain has been to withdraw boxcars from grain movement, is the government giving consideration to the appointment of a transport controller to deal with the problems which have arisen?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): As far as the movement of grain is concerned the co-ordinator of the block system in Winnipeg plays an important role. We now have co-ordinators at both terminals. In fact, the levels of grain both at Thunder Bay and at Vancouver have been perfectly adequate to sustain the record movement of grain.

Mr. Burton: Is the minister taking issue with the comments which were made by Mr. Gibbings?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is debate.

EFFECT OF SMALLER STOCKS OF FEED GRAINS IN SHIPPING POSITIONS ON SALES

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): My question is also directed to the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. It arises out of a Canadian Livestock Feed Board report, "Grain Facts", indicating that stocks of feed grain in eastern terminal positions are down by 8½ million bushels compared with a year ago. Can the minister assure us that this decline of stocks in shipping positions will not jeopardize our sales?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): These stocks relate to an altogether different series of sales, but I can assure the hon. member that when the board indicated the other day a quota of between 20 and 25 bushels for barley this year they are bearing in mind the likely needs for feed grain in central and eastern Canada.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—APPROVAL OF PROJECTS—DISCUSSION WITH QUEBEC AUTHORITIES

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

In view of the statement made by Mayor Desrosiers, president of the Quebec Association of Mayors and Municipalities, to the effect that the winter works program is a little late and insufficient, is the minister in a position to tell us if decisions have been arrived at in co-operation with the Quebec authorities in order that these works be authorized as soon as possible, and when will that be?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it has been our objective in the case of each of the provinces to secure the maximum co-operation with the provincial co-ordinator appointed so that applications received that seem to be desirable from their point of view can come forward to us for approval very promptly. I believe we have established this kind of co-operation with all the provinces, so I do not anticipate a great deal of delay in this area.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

SUGGESTED OPEN SESSIONS AT FORTHCOMING MEETINGS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, now that the Premier of Alberta has suggested he will be calling for part, at least, of the conference of first ministers to be open to the press and television, is it the intention of the government to support this suggestion?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I would have thought this would depend upon the views of all the first ministers, including the premiers of all the provinces of Canada. We certainly would not wish the conference to be open if that were opposed by any of the first ministers.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

POSSIBLE RESTRICTIONS ON FOREIGN-CONTROLLED INVESTMENT FIRMS

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Finance. Are restrictions of any kind to be imposed on foreign-controlled investment firms?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would think the question should be more specific. The hon. member is asking a question of such a general nature that I doubt whether it is in order at this time.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK

FAILURE TO REDUCE INTEREST RATES ON LOANS—DISCUSSION WITH BANK OF CANADA GOVERNOR

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Maybe this will be more specific. In view of the reduction in interest rates by the banks, trust companies and other lending institutions, can the minister tell us whether he has discussed with the governor of the Bank of Canada the failure of the Industrial Development Bank to reduce its lending rates?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): The I.D.B. rates come up for review periodically. I will discuss this matter with the governor of the bank; I have not done so up to this point. As hon. members know, bank rates have been decreasing in Canada over the past short period, encouraged by a reduction in the Bank of Canada rate. I will take this particular matter up with the I.D.B. I imagine there has been no consideration of the matter because the board has not met.

ALLEGED FAILURE TO FULFIL RESPONSIBILITIES—POSSIBILITY OF LEGISLATION

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): In view of complaints that the Industrial Development Bank is not fulfilling its legislative responsibilities, can the Minister of Finance say whether any steps are being taken to ensure that the I.D.B. responds more fully to the needs of the economy and whether any legislative steps are contemplated shortly to make it more functional in present Canadian conditions?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): I completely deny the allegation. The Industrial Development Bank has hundreds of millions out on loan to people in Canada who could not obtain loans from other sources. The bank has also been increasing its loans proportionately more in the developing areas of Canada—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the minister and the hon. member that this is debate. We are running short of time.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HEALTH

LIST OF DRUGS SENT TO FAMILY ALLOWANCE AND OLD AGE RECIPIENTS—ACCURACY OF INFORMATION

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Will the hon. gentleman table the details of the survey which was recently conducted by his department, the results of which were sent to recipients of family allowance and old age supplement cheques in the form of a list of drugs which might have harmful side effects?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I believe the list to which the hon. member has referred was a list of comparative prices. It did not ask questions nor request replies.

Mr. Rynard: Has the minister reviewed the accuracy of this information with the provinces and the medical profession?

Mr. Munro: We are certainly satisfied that the information we gave on the inserts is accurate.

RESEARCH ON EFFECTS OF POLYCHLORINATED BIPHENYLS ON HUMANS AND ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is the department carrying on research into the polychlorinated biphenyls, or PCBs, to determine their effects both on human health and on the environment? If so, when will reports on this research be available?

Mr. Speaker: It is difficult for the Chair to determine whether this is an urgent matter. It may very well be but it seems to me that perhaps it is not. The minister might be allowed to reply briefly, though I am inclined to think that normally that kind of question should be placed on the order paper.

• (2:50 p.m.)

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I shall be pleased to look into the matter, Mr. Speaker.

WHEAT—CHANGES IN PRICING TO ENABLE WESTERN MILLERS TO COMPETE IN EXPORT MARKETS

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration in his capacity as minister responsible for the Wheat Board. Is the minister contemplating any changes in the pricing of wheat whereby millers in western Canada will be put in a position to compete in export markets in order to maintain and, if possible, increase Canada's share of the world's flour market?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, millers who export flour do, of course, have consideration given to them and are not subject in relation to that portion of their purchases to the $1.95½ higher price, that is put on wheat used for human consumption in Canada.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

INQUIRY AS TO DEBATE ON BILL

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, in order that I may respond to people who have asked me the question, may I ask the Minister of Labour when he expects to bring forward for debate the bill to amend the Canada Labour Code?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): I hardly think at this session, Mr. Speaker. I gather from the House leader that by the time the tax reform bill has been completed and other items now at second reading or report stage, this bill will probably have to be carried over to the new session.

FINANCE

SUGGESTED LOW-INTEREST LOANS TO PROVINCES AND MUNICIPALITIES BY BANK OF CANADA

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Finance.

As the Bank of Canada recently lowered its interest rate to 4-3/4 per cent, can he tell us why provinces and municipalities still have to borrow at rates of 9, 9½ or 10 per cent and whether they could avail themselves of the services of the Bank of Canada which grants loans at 4-3/4 per cent?

Mr. Speaker: I have serious reservations about that question. In any event, the minister may perhaps answer it briefly.

[English]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I disagree with the rates quoted by my hon. friend. Second, the rates at which particular borrowers may borrow in the market for particular periods of time are determined by the market.

The minister will recall that prior to the summer recess this matter was placed before the courts by Canadian National hotels.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, through our counsel I have again asked the Alberta Supreme Court to give a preferential hearing to this matter in order to get a decision as early as possible.

PROPOSED ATMOSPHERIC NUCLEAR TEST BY FRANCE—GOVERNMENT PROTEST

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether it is the intention of the government, if it has not already done so, to lodge a protest with the government of France about the proposed nuclear atmospheric device that is scheduled to be exploded some time next summer on the atoll of Moorea in the Tahitian group?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it will be recalled that I answered a similar question last week in which I said it would be the intention of the Canadian government to register a protest with the French government as soon as we knew whether they were in fact going to proceed with this test.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed, from Tuesday, November 2, consideration in committee of Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act—Mr. Benson.—Mr. Honey in the chair.

The Chairman: In accordance with the statement of the President of the Privy Council, as recorded at page 9251 of Hansard for Tuesday, November 2, 1971, the Committee will now proceed to the consideration of sections 28, 29, 30 and 31.

On clause 1—section 28: Farming business.

Mr. Downey: Mr. Chairman, I understand that the terms of reference for this afternoon's discussions are based on sections 28 to 32. I notice these provisions do not cover farm corporations, and I was wondering whether the terms of reference might be extended to include farm corporations within the ambit of the discussion of these sections.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, there are not any sections in the bill that I am aware of dealing specifically with farm corporations. I understand that the House leaders or their representatives have decided on the blocks of sections that we will deal with as we go along. I suggested last week when the hon. member raised this particular question with me privately that he discuss it with the hon. member for Edmonton West, who is representing the Official Opposition in these discussions. I said that if the House leaders agreed to a change in the allocation of blocks of sections, then we would deal with whatever had been agreed upon. However, I have not been advised that such agreement has been made.

Mr. Downey: Mr. Chairman, on looking over some of the figures released by Statistics Canada, as it has been newly named, I notice that something like 46 per cent of the gross national income in Canada is now taken by the government in the form of taxation. This seems to me rather odd. We have many programs that are distributing the wealth of the nation to the people in the form of welfare payments, unemployment insurance benefits and in many other ways. I suggest it might be well so to evolve our tax structure as to enable Canadians to retain more of their income instead of having to depend upon the largesse of the state, which takes it away from them and then hands it back again. Many countries of the world are doing just this, but I do not think it is acceptable to the majority of Canadians.

To deal more specifically with the sections under discussion, namely sections 28 to 32 of the tax bill, as far as the farming community is concerned I find very few advantages in any of these sections. To start with, we are getting away from the concept of the basic herd which has been enshrined within the tax act for many years. Under that provision a farmer or rancher can regard his cattle as a capital asset similar to a machine or some similar device. In reality, I think cattle should be a capital asset and be recognized as such. What rancher or farmer would stay in the business of producing beef if he did not have his "cow machine" to bring his product forward and to place it on the tables of consumers? I say to the parliamentary secretary that if we do away with the concept of recognizing the cattle herd as a capital asset of the farmer and the rancher, we do away with a very important concept in farming and jeopardize the already staggering plight of agriculture. We will only be hastening the demise of the basic herd, and cattle will no longer be considered a capital asset. This is a very important item which I believe we must consider. It is our intention at some later date to move amendments to this section. I hope the minister will seriously consider looking at this concept.

In going through the other sections, I noted an item which will further affect the income of producers. I refer to the averaging concept. Prior to this bill it was possible for farmers, in years of high income, to average the previous five-year period in order to have their tax reduced to a more realistic level because agriculture is a business which is subject to the vagaries of weather, and marketing. We know of many cases, in years when the farmer's income has been low perhaps because of rain or hail, where the averaging feature has been very important. If at the end of a five-year averaging period a farmer's income should be low, he can possibly get something back from the tax department. As I understand the provisions of this bill—and I would ask the parliamentary secretary to correct me if I am wrong—the averaging provision would be applicable only if one's income tended to rise. One can average it up but cannot average it down. I see the parliamenary secretary is not rising to say this is not so and, therefore, I can only assume this indeed is the case.

Mr. Mahoney: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I assumed the hon. member would give some indication he is yielding the floor if and when he wants a question answered. On the specific point he has raised, the special averaging provisions which farmers and fishermen have hitherto enjoyed continue in effect and, in fact, were passed by this committee a few days ago.

Mr. Downey: I thank the parliamentary secretary. I did not realize it was necessary to make him aware of the fact that an answer was desired. Knowing his great interest in agricultural problems, I assumed he would be sitting on the edge of his seat ready to answer at any time. I understand that the averaging provision will continue to be applicable in these circumstances, and that it is only in respect of other taxpayers that this will not apply.

Another item which I believe would jeopardize the situation of farmers is the roll-over, and the fact that we know we will have transfers of farms from generation to generation. It is true that in this tax bill the federal government is removing the estate tax, but a capital gains tax is being introduced. I believe it would be very beneficial to agriculture if transfers between bona fide farmers could be permitted without being subject to a capital gains tax. If agriculture is to continue, I suggest it is very vital that inter-generation transfers and family transfers be permitted. Very few young farmers are able to start farming today if there is not a farm already in the family. Capital is hard to acquire and the farming situation is very tight because, although the products are not selling at a higher price than they sold at 10, 20 or 25 years ago, costs are much higher. I suggest the only way in which we can ensure that farms will continue in operation is to allow these inter-generation and inter-family transfers without attracting a great deal of tax, capital gains, estate tax or what have you.

I do not believe there has been enough consultation between the provinces on the matter of estate tax and capital gains tax. The federal government says it intends to take off the estate tax, but we read in the papers that two more provinces are required to make up the necessary four before the federal government will collect estate taxes on their behalf. So, really there will be no respite for many people in this country in respect of estate taxes, simply because there has not been sufficient consultation with the provinces. Now, a great many of these people will be forced into a position where they will be subject to a capital gains tax and an estate tax as well. In the province of Alberta we are very fortunate in having a government which has no intention of bringing in an estate tax. However, provinces such as Manitoba and Saskatchewan are considering this, and therefore I feel very sorry for the farmers in those provinces.

Now, I should like to refer to section 31 which reads in part:

> Where a taxpayer's chief source of income for a taxation year is neither farming nor a combination of farming and some other source of income—

I suppose one could call this the hobby farmer section. In reality, we must remember that it means a young fellow who starts a farm and, during a period when he has no real income from that farm goes out and works for an oil company, for instance, cannot deduct the expenses of his farm from his income because his main source of income was not from farming. I realize the intention behind this section, but it is one of these examples of going after a sparrow with a shotgun. Probably we are hurting a great many people while enabling the government to receive only a small amount of revenue from people who would capitalize on this section while not being bona fide farmers. I suggest we should have an amended formula, which I hope the minister would consider, under which an individual who is trying to maintain the farming operation and is supplementing his income with other employment, may be able to deduct his expenses as a bona fide farmer, which indeed in this case he would be. I hope the department will consider this suggestion because this is a very important matter.

Another point is that in the past few years the Minister of Agriculture has made a sincere effort to try to make farms into economic units. As a result of the process of making economic units out of farms and the desire of farmers to pass on the farm to future generations, some farm operations have been incorporated. We have many farm partnerships. Often brothers start off farming together. But in this situation they will not be treated quite the same as will other individuals. I suggest that the $1,000 residence exemption as well as other provisions that are applicable to farmers as individuals, should be applicable to partnerships and to bona fide family farming operations. Some formula could be devised here, and I would adopt the suggestion the Federation of Agriculture made in its brief that so long as 80 per cent of the income of the family came from the farm held by the family, this should be handled in the same manner as the income of an individual. It is difficult to imagine why a family corporation, a partnership or something of this nature, would not qualify for the $1,000 a year exemption granted to an individual when the only reason a farm is incorporated is to sustain it as an economic unit. I think it is very important that this matter be considered.

In the matter of recaptured depreciation, we have had a method which has worked quite satisfactorily, which has encouraged farmers to upgrade their equipment and to keep up with technological advances. There is no way in which they could produce food for the same price they were getting for it 20 years ago if they had not kept pace with the times and kept abreast of the technological advances. I think that bringing any recaptured depreciation into income by way of capital gains, as is done under this bill is a retrograde step. It will not encourage farmers to maintain their equipment or to upgrade it, and this can only be to the detriment of agriculture. Many forms of encouragement are given to industry to ensure that they are able to upgrade their equipment and keep pace with the times. I suggest that under this legislation we are doing exactly the opposite when we bring recaptured depreciation into income. I might give notice that we will be moving an amendment in this regard at a later date, but I would ask the minister to give consideration to this problem.

Another situation which we should consider is that of a farmer who attempts to reorganize his business and possibly wants to intensify his operation. If he is a grain farmer he might want to sell part of his farmland and put the capital back into equipment, buildings, plant, or something to expand the livestock enterprise. I suggest that when there is a partial sale of farmland and a reinvestment of the proceeds in the farm business, that money should not be subjected to capital gains taxation. As I understand the tax act—and the parliamentary secretary might correct me if I am wrong, as he does so ably—if one were to sell a proportion of one's land, the proceeds would be taxed at capital gains rates. I suggest there should be a provision in the legislation enabling the reinvestment of the capital in the farm business.

While it is true that farmers may compute their taxes on a cash or an accrual basis, whichever they select, I imagine most of them prefer the cash basis because it is by far the more realistic method for them to use in computing their tax. If an occasion arises when, for some unknown reason, a farmer must switch from the cash to the accrual basis, there should be a gradual phasing of this process in much the same manner as is offered to the professions, because if vast amounts of grain are held in storage an immediate switch from the cash to the accrual basis of computing income tax might very well spell disaster and the bankruptcy of the individual concerned. Since we extend this privilege to professionals, I suggest that it should also be granted to the farmers.

I see that my time is nearly up and I know that many other hon. members here will have other points to bring out, some of which I may not have touched upon because this is certainly a very complicated bill. When you have a document which is as thick as four or five Eaton's catalogues, it goes without saying that the farmers of this nation will never know on what basis they are taxed.

Mr. Peters: There are no pictures in this bill, either.

Mr. Downey: There are no pictures, and 99 per cent of the farmers in this country will never know on what basis they are taxed. They will have to rely on the honesty of the bureaucracy and on honourable servants, such as the parliamentary secretary sitting over there, to interpret it for them. This is going to be the basis on which farmers will be taxed from here on in, should this document be translated into law.

• (3.20 p.m.)

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Chairman, on October 25, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture mailed a letter to the Minister of Finance, with copies to all members of Parliament. In part it read:

> This is a letter regarding your amendments to Bill C-259—or more accurately to what we regard as unfortunate omissions in those amendments.
> We have received no reply from you responsive to our brief of August 30 suggesting certain modest amendments to the bill to better serve farmers' legitimate interests.
> Unless we have missed the point in the complexities of the amendments introduced we cannot see where any of our proposals have been taken into account. We hope, however, that it has been the pressure of time which has prevented you from giving adequate attention to our requests, and that the necessary amendments will be forthcoming.

The essential proposals we made are:

> For transfer of farms within the family by sale, gift or inheritance without realization of capital gains.
>
> Retention of a basic herd system whereby basic livestock herds can be treated as capital, which they in fact truly are.

This is one of the sections we have before us now.

> More fair and liberal appreciation of the $1,000 per year farm capital gains exemption (as an option to the principal residence exemption) including its extension for family farm corporations.
> Retention of present straight line depreciation practices as a farmer's option.

This again has reference to one of the sections with which we are dealing today.

> Re-investment of capital gains on sale of farm property in the continuing farm operation (either land, or buildings and equipment) without immediate realization.
> Adding of losses on farming operations not capable of being set off against taxable income, to capital value for capital gains purposes, up to the amount of taxes and interest on borrowing, as is being provided, for hobby farmers only, under the new law.

The letter went on to say that there were other submissions in the Federation's brief, but those listed were the most significant "and are those on which we look for your appropriate amendments to the bill now before Parliament." I was a little surprised to receive such a letter so roundly condemning the proposed changes in taxation for farmers. This bill was touted as tax reform legislation. If it is intended as reform it should make the process easier and more simple for the taxpayer.

Tax reform legislation should make it possible for the taxpayer to stay in business, to conduct his business in an efficient and workable manner, and to pay his taxes to the government of Canada. In the type of society in which we live, as individuals, we realize that if we make a taxable income we will have to pay taxes. Even those who do not have a taxable income, in terms of income tax, pay taxes in other ways. They pay sales tax and other indirect taxes. In the federal field, income tax is the most important tax and most people expect to pay it.

The important feature of any tax should be that it does not interfere with the carrying on of a business by an individual, or with the work of a wage earner or salaried professional person. It should make things easier and more simple for the farmer rather than more difficult.

My criticism of the proposals in the bill is that they will make things more difficult for the farmer-rancher, and here I speak particularly of the situation in western Canada. They will make it more difficult for him in the ordinary conduct of his business, and in his attempts to comply with the tax laws of the country. These proposals will place an extra burden on the smaller operator. At times he will probably pay more tax than he should because he will not be able to hire highly skilled professional accountants to tell him how to comply with the tax provisions to his own best advantage.

Section 28 clearly says:

> For the purpose of computing the income of a taxpayer for a taxation year from a farming business, the income from the business for that year may, if the taxpayer so elects, be computed in accordance with a method (hereinafter in this section referred to as the "cash" method) whereby the income therefrom for that year shall be deemed to be an amount equal to—

It goes on to set out the method which most farmers now use, which is to set out the cash income they have taken in during a year, set off against it the cash expenses they have paid out, calculate the depreciation and other things which they are allowed, and file that as a return. At first glance a person would say, "That is very nice; there is not much change there." But, Mr. Chairman, we must look further at what the legislation proposes to do to the basic herd concept. Again at first glance the proposal is that the provisions for a basic herd, which have been optional to the farmer-rancher up until now, will be gradually phased out. But so far as I can determine, no farmer will be able to establish a new basic herd after this legislation comes into effect. Inherent in it is a proposal to phase out the total basic herd concept. The present proposal is nothing more than a transitional operation while the idea of the basic herd concept is being phased out.

It would seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that this means that if the farmer-rancher wants to build any protection into his operation he will have to go on the accrual basis for his basic herd or for his cattle operation. But there is a neat trick in this. It says the proposal is that he must conduct his total operation on the same basis, so that in declaring his income he has to follow through. In a typical operation in which there is a herd of cattle as well as cash crops involved, this means that in order to effectively operate the herd and acquire capital the farmer has to put his grain operation on an accrual basis for purposes of taxation. As soon as he tries that he will be in financial trouble because he will have to take into inventory grain which he cannot sell in the current year and declare it as income. If he has to declare several thousand dollars worth of grain on which he has not actually received any income in that taxation year, then he will have to borrow to pay tax on money which he has not received. He will have to put a value on grain when he does not know what that value will be 12 months hence. We have the situation now where the minister in charge of the Wheat Board says we are going to get this, that or the other; I can tell him how much confidence the people of western Canada and Saskatchewan have in this, that or the other. However, I hope he is right.

I am trying, Mr. Chairman, to describe the situation in which the farmer will find himself as a result of these tax laws and the sad part is that these laws are not necessary. A simple and workable alternative has been offered by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and the Canadian Cattlemen's Association. Both organizations have asked for a method by which the breeding herd could be considered a capital asset, as is machinery or buildings. Then, the ordinary application of depreciation could apply and the farmer would have the option of the cash or the accrual basis. I seriously suggest to the minister that the proposals now before the House be withdrawn and that people who know something about farming and farm accounting be consulted in order to come up with something that will work. Accountants in Saskatoon who year after year work out the tax payable by individual farmers and farm corporations in the province tell me that the proposed method will be extremely difficult. They feel that this bill should be withdrawn and a more workable one substituted.

The previous speaker pointed out some of the difficulties in the approach to hobby farming, but that is another matter. What I am concerned about, though, is that we develop a system which is simple and which allows farmers all across western Canada with a gross income ranging from $10,000 to $30,000 to easily establish their taxable income, pay their taxes and be done with it with a minimum of expense. This is not being accomplished by this so-called tax reform and the task of completing income tax returns will fall on those least able to cope with it. In some of its aspects this tax measure comes close to being unworkable if, indeed, the objective is to use the taxing authority in such a manner that the individual can continue in operation.

The straight-line basis of depreciation for farm machinery which has been in use is the simplest. In a brief presented to this government on August 30, 1971, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture said:

> Our proposal is that a simple single rate of allowable depreciation be applied to all depreciable farm assets—namely, 40 per cent on a diminishing balance basis, and 20 per cent on a straight-line basis, which latter, as noted, we hope you will retain as an option to farmers.

Perhaps some changes are forthcoming. In the case of cattle, hogs and sheep, our objective should be a straight-line depreciation system for the breeding herd because this is simply a capital investment. It takes a lot of time and effort to build the herd and when it is disposed of this is really a disposition of capital, not a disposition of inventory. The difference should be obvious to those responsible for this legislation. In a straight cattle feeder operation, the farmer is dealing with inventory which he holds for a period of time and then sells. A breeding herd of dairy or beef cattle or of hogs is a long-term capital investment through which the farmer hopes to increase his market cattle which will later be sold. I think it is simply a lack of understanding of the kind of business they are dealing with that has led to the creation of the difficulties inherent in the proposals in this reform bill.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words on the subject of farm problems in connection with the bill before us. I listened to a number of arguments on the matters of straight-line depreciation, cash versus accrual, and so on. I think it is worth while discussing some of the points raised by hon. members on the other side of the House, arguments implying that farm groups are unanimous in their opinions on this subject and that all the points which have been made by some farm groups on these subjects are perfectly valid and unchallengeable. I suggest some of them are challengeable. Some of these points are not as strong as some previous speakers have suggested.

For example, the question of straight-line depreciation has been raised. I really cannot see the value of this in a farming situation. If we talk about the depreciation of a piece of farm machinery, that machinery will depreciate a great deal more in the first year than in the tenth year. The farmer should be able to use that extra depreciation which arises in the first few years, and I really think that members of the opposition are quibbling in this area, since their arguments, if successful, would introduce an unnecessary complication in this field. That is why I cannot support their arguments and I think the bill is correct as set out.

The question of cash versus accrual accounting has been raised. Farmers have always had the right to make a choice in this area. They are in the same position as professional people, who are now required to switch over, except that farmers are not required to switch over. They are retaining the right to use either system so long as they do not switch back and forth. Having made their decision, they must stick with it. A farm group in a presentation argued that farmers should be given the opportunity of entering into some kind of time payment arrangement if they are to switch. That is a reasonable argument, and I think the parliamentary secretary ought to take cognizance of it. Perhaps it is a valid argument to say that if special arrangements are to be made for professional people to switch to an accrual system, the same kind of provision could justifiably be made for farm groups.

An argument was advanced relating to the transfer of assets within the family, that is, the transfer of assets at the time of or prior to death. I think that farmers have a valid argument here, and we ought to pay attention to it. They say that the turnover of the family farm from father to son under the new provisions will result in a deemed capital gain, and that the tax on this gain will have to be paid at once. The argument has been advanced that where a son purchases a farm from the father who takes back and holds the mortgage, the father should be permitted to pay the gains tax as the mortgage payments are received from the son. The further point has been made that incorporation should not be necessary to avoid this heavy taxation.

The concept of the transfer of the farm by way of mortgage arose during the era of the gift tax. Of course, this era is now behind us. The father sold to the son the farm and took back a mortgage which was payable in instalments of the amount of the allowable free limit on gifts each year. He did that in order to avoid the payment of taxes on the transfer. The whole mortgage could be paid off on that basis, if the father lived long enough. However, the gift tax era has gone. That area has been vacated and there is plenty of leeway now for transferring the farm assets from father to son. It could be done, for example, on the basis of transferring one-tenth of the value of the farm each year and paying the gains tax on that proportion on an agreed date. The tax will be paid in small amounts and, if the farmer transferred at the rate of one-tenth of its value each year, the whole property could be transferred to the son without incurring the burden of a massive payment of tax. Of course, an additional factor under the new provisions is this: If the father should die before he has completed the transfer, the remainder would automatically pass to his wife free of tax and the wife could continue the transfer to the son in an orderly way.

The objection might be raised that this method will result in recurring property appraisals. It does not seem to me that an appraisal after the original V-day appraisal would be a difficult or necessarily expensive matter, since over-all increases or decreases in specific items are usually easily determined in the shortrun. By this use of the new rules or lack of rules regarding gifting, estate planning would be considerably easier to achieve than under the old, complicated system of annual gifting. If the son is in a position to pay his father for the farm in occasional cash payments, the transfer of the farm does not have to be done at once. It could be done in portions, just as in the gifting process. The farmer could invest such money received in some kind of annuity program. He could invest it in a registered retirement savings plan and benefit from the consequent saving on taxes that that system allows. So, I do not think the situation we face here is nearly as onerous as members of the opposition or farm groups have feared. There are opportunities for the alleviation of the tax burden here and many farm groups have not looked at those opportunities. If they examine them they will see, I submit, that the bill is not unjust to farmers and is supportable as a reasonable piece of legislation.

There is an interesting loophole in the legislation that farm groups ought to look at. It may well arise in the first year following valuation day. If the farmer should decide to give his son the entire farm after the new legislation abolishing gift taxes has come into effect and before much time has elapsed since V-day, the gift should attract little or no tax of any sort under the V-day valuation option for capital gains. In other words, if V-day were to be some day this fall and if the farm were to pass to the son in January of the coming year, the loophole would come into play. The son would pay tax only on the difference between the value on valuation day and the value in January. That amount would be negligible. Farmers ought to look at this interesting loophole. I hope the Minister of Finance does not look at it with a view to plugging it, because there might be an opportunity here for farmers facing certain problems to solve those problems right away. I am trying to say that farm groups and members of the opposition should look at this bill very closely, because it is not nearly as onerous with respect to farmers as has been suggested. A number of areas need correcting and I believe the Minister of Finance is prepared to study them.

I mentioned the matter of cash versus accrual and that farmers should be given the same opportunity as professional people to spread out the cost of switching in this area.

A group appearing here today raised the question of deferred payments with respect to the capital gains tax and the fact that the cutoff proposed would force the breakup of the family holding. May I remind hon. members that this provision, this option for deferring payments, was present in the old gift tax legislation and, in cases of hardship, the minister had the right to allow the deferred payment of taxes of this kind. I suppose that the Minister of Finance will be prepared to make the same kind of concession in the new tax bill. I think that is a reasonable consideration and something that the minister ought to look at thoroughly. I recognize that farmers are in a position different from that of factory earners, the owners of blocks of stock and so on. Farmers own a block of land and, if that were to be broken up at time of death in order that taxes might be paid, the family would suffer real hardship. I think we should make special considerations there. I am pleased that that provision has been made in the past. I look forward to seeing the minister confirm that provision will be made in the future to give farmers the right to defer payments when passing property from father to son at the time of death.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the contentions made by my colleague, the hon. member for Battle River, on this proposition of the reform of the tax structure, especially as it pertains to the farming industry and is dealt with in the sections we are now considering.

One only has to read the sections to immediately realize that those who are responsible for the drafting never had to deal very closely with farming as a business. I do not say this unkindly or in a critical or a derogatory manner, but basically to point out that in my view the provisions as set out in the bill before us deal in the main with companies and corporations. I should like to prove that, as a business, farming cannot be just coldly classified in the same categories as other corporate structures.

When it was intimated to the farming community that there would be a reform of the tax laws, I believe it was the concept among all farmers that if indeed there was a true reform of the tax structure to which Canadians are submitted, perhaps the various governments would be able to derive sufficient funds for the operation of their various enterprises so that, as a result, there would be a more equitable distribution of the tax load throughout the Canadian community. They thought that for the individual, whether he be a farmer, day labourer, businessman or professional, his tax load as a consequence would be either lighter or would not be progressively increased, as has been the case over the past few years. I think this was the basic belief of most Canadians when they were made aware of the fact that a very serious study had been undertaken by the professions under the instigation of this department to see whether there could be a revision of the tax act.

With the advent of the white paper, most of those engaged in the farming industry changed their views drastically. It then appeared to them that what the government meant by a revision was not based on the principle in which they believed, but rather a new formula designed to increase wherever possible the tax load carried by individuals and more specifically by corporations, businesses and the farming community as a whole. As we read through the provisions of this bill, there seems to be very little to abate this fear. The fear has grown to such proportions that many farm operators now feel that if the tax rates and tax formula are as prescribed, then under the economic climate they are faced with today it will be almost impossible for them to continue farming as a viable economic enterprise. They are so convinced that, unfortunately, many of the present day farmers are deliberately advising their heirs to seek other means of making a living rather than stay in the farming business. This is indeed unfortunate.

Those responsible for drafting the tax structure which we in Canada must use to finance our government undertakings should bear in mind that we are not trying to raise every available dollar that the community can possibly part with, sometimes at the expense of the very livelihood of those who are being taxed. This should not be the concept. I am not convinced this was the intent of the bill before us. However, as a result of the method used in drafting it and some of the regulations that will follow, I am very fearful that the end result will be exactly what we seek to avoid. Because of the tax burden, many businesses will have to be phased out. In the process, we will lose many of our large and up until now successful farm enterprises in Canada. In order to be competitive in today's very competitive world, these farming enterprises must have two things. They must have an incentive to compete internationally and a profit margin. Lacking either or both of those, farming in Canada will progressively degenerate. I am convinced there is no other way to go.

I think this thought was back of the briefs submitted by the Federation of Agriculture, the Canadian Cattlemen's Association and various other groups responsible to and having concern for the farmers of Canada. They did not attempt to present to the government a way to avoid income tax, but methods by which they would be assessed what they considered to be their fair tax load. They presented for government consideration ways and means which they felt would make it possible to contribute their fair share, but not at the expense of their livelihood or at the expense of the degeneration of their various businesses.

I am not sure that the government fully realizes that the present day tax load is almost all that the agricultural industry can bear. Sometimes farmers find they cannot bear it. There are too many "for sale" signs on farms today. Too many farmers are delinquent in their present day taxes, perhaps one, two or even three years. Too many farmers are facing foreclosure and bankruptcy under the present situation. Yet in the bill before us, the government proposes to change the method of taxation under the guise of a revision of the tax law. It is going to change the method of taxation in a deliberate manner so as to broaden the actual tax base faced by farmers.

There is no doubt in anyone's mind that once these regulations and the changes to the tax act come into force, farmers are going to have to pay more taxes. It is all very well for us as legislators to say that all are going to have to pay more taxes under this revised act, but it is serious when you consider that many who are going to be taxable have a way of passing on the increased taxes by adding them to the cost of the goods and services that they provide. A labourer can demand higher wages. A businessman can place a higher price on the goods and services he is selling. But a farmer is not in a position to do this, and with profit margins shrinking, the added cost which is proposed could make all the difference between a profit and a loss for many of our successful farms. I do not believe we can classify farming operations in the same category as corporations and businesses.

When we speak as farmers against the disappearance of the concept of a basic herd as a capital asset, we bear in mind other actions taken by the government. The government is willing to offer high rates of depreciation with respect to such assets as machinery. It is perfectly prepared to offer grandiose tax concessions to industries which consent to locate in particular regions of Canada to take advantage of surplus labour. I have no quarrel with this. I am not opposed to the government's actions in this regard. Over the years, for no reason other than political expediency, tremendous tax benefits have been granted to companies and corporations through tax forgiveness, tax benefits and so on. We see no evidence of such an attitude where agriculture is concerned. No doubt the government will argue that other measures have been taken to assist agriculture. The fact remains that we must deal with these tax provisions as they are set before us, on their merits. From my study of the bill they will be disastrous for many farmers.

We are concerned over the fact that it will be almost impossible in many cases for a farm to be passed on to blood relatives. The hon. member for Okanagan-Boundary has told us that even though the gift tax will be a thing of the past a tax would still have to be paid on capital gains related to the property itself. He explained that the tax might not have to be paid all at once—payment could be spread out over ten years, for example. The point he made was a valid one and perhaps it is a fair one. The fact remains that tax would still have to be paid. We are saying that because of the very nature of the farming industry, and of the units we are considering, it will be impossible to make these payments in many cases. There is not enough money there. In many instances it will be necessary to dispose of capital assets in order to comply with the regulation. As a result, the economy of the unit will be weakened and it will be almost impossible for the farm to carry on successfully. Thus, in effect, we are destroying the unit. Mr. Chairman, we cannot destroy these units. They are the very basis of agriculture.

Perhaps it will be necessary for us to elicit from the government during this very debate a statement reflecting the position taken on this issue by those who sit on the treasury benches. Are they really concerned about maintaining an agriculture industry in Canada? This is what we are talking about, in effect. The returns to agriculture are so marginal that even as things stand we are losing many of our farms. The bill before us proposes a further financial handicap as a result of which farmers will be placed in an even less competitive position in terms of international trade. It will be interesting to learn in the course of this debate why the government should feel it necessary to change the basic concept of the taxation of farmers and farm businesses. It will be interesting to learn whether the government is at all interested in maintaining any segment of a viable agriculture industry.

I am looking forward to hearing answers to these questions, because these are the questions about which farmers are most concerned. They are asking themselves: Have I any hope of making a living for myself and my family in the years ahead? Is there any use trying to build up a strong and successful farm enterprise in order that my children and grandchildren may have an independent business and source of income, or am I simply making it possible for the government, through its tax laws, to take an ever-increasing share of my returns to the extent that I shall eventually lose my business, lose my security? Ought I to advise my heirs to go out and make a living in some other fashion? I am not overstating the position, Mr. Chairman. I am seeking in a calm and factual way to indicate to those on the government benches what the repercussions of some of the provisions in this tax measure before us are likely to be.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Chairman, on rising to take part in this debate, I find myself wondering what is in the mind and heart of the government. We are dealing today with four sections which pertain to the agriculture industry.

To be kind, the government has tried to exercise some control, some sense of direction, to give some guidance to the agriculture industry. Then, the treasury seeks to slap on a set of taxes which suggests that hon. members over there on the front benches really have no heart. One is prompted to examine the intent of other legislation which the government has introduced affecting the farm industry. A number of such measures have been brought down since 1968, and I shall list them briefly. There was the National Marketing Act, commonly known as Bill C-176. In western Canada, at least, it has been determined that this is unsatisfactory. At about the same time the government introduced a bill known as Bill C-175 dealing to a large extent with the rationalization of the grain handling system, and protein grading. It was overhauled and modified a good deal in the agriculture committee; the government did not get its way altogether.

Then the minister brought in Operation Lift, which was implemented not by legislation but through regulation. While the minister in charge of the Wheat Board may boast that the operation accomplished what the government sought to achieve, the farmers of western Canada regarded it as being most objectionable. Next, we were invited to approve a new quota system, a proposal which is still being analyzed by farm opinion. Maybe it has some merits. The stabilization plan is the subject of heated debate in Assiniboia. We shall know the answer tonight. I am confident of what that answer will be. It will be a complete rejection.

• (4:10 p.m.)

Mr. McBride: Of whom?

Mr. Horner: Of the stabilization bill and of the present government. Then, we also had on March 13 a program devised by the government and called the farm adjustment program. The federal government was seeking the co-operation of the prairie agricultural ministers in this program. When you roll all this into one package, you can well ask just where government agricultural policies are leading, and how this proposed tax legislation we are now debating fits into the picture.

Is this bill compatible with the government's agricultural legislation? What has that legislation attempted to do? It has attempted to regulate, to control and to simplify the agricultural industry. Even the spokesmen for the national marketing board would agree with that simple definition of the intent of the legislation: it is to control, to simplify and to regulate the agricultural industry. That has been the theme of the government's agricultural legislation. Has this legislation been accepted by the agricultural community? Have they received it warmly or rejected it? I think nearly to a man the agricultural community has rejected this kind of thrust, this regulation, simplication and control by the government.

In considering clauses 28 and 32 it becomes apparent that these provisions are a device to remove any special privileges that the farmers may have enjoyed to date. The previous speaker dealt with this point at length. He made a very good point when he said that the agricultural industry has been unable to pass on in the price of its products to the consumer—whoever he may be—any taxes that might from part of his increased cost of production. The industry has also been unable to meet the increase in inflation in this country.

I say this, Mr. Chairman, to emphasize the point that it is still my belief that the agricultural industry needs special consideration in the field of taxation. One has to go back to the Carter philosophy and ask whether Carter was right in his theory that a buck is a buck; that if a farmer makes a buck that buck should be taxed equally with anybody else's buck. The Minister of Finance, to be kind to him, does not fully accept in Bill C-259 the theory that a buck is a buck, and I am heartened by his generous attitude. But although he does not go quite as far as Carter and say that a buck is a buck, when it comes to agriculture he goes nearly all the way. Four or five basic rights that farmers have previously enjoyed are now being eliminated by this bill.

What does the removal of these concessions mean to the farmers? First of all, these provisions will blend in well with the farm adjustment program because they will tend to eliminate small farming operations. They will also blend in well with the marketing act which tends to introduce rigid control. The government will be able to control the advancement of the very few farmers who will still be left in business. I suppose there is an overriding feeling in the academic world, particularly around Ottawa, that if we can just get rid of two thirds of our farmers by 1980, as the task force report on agriculture suggests, the remaining one third will be so much better off financially they will not have to be subsidized in any way, shape or form, by the federal government. Certainly, this is an attitude that is reflected in federal tax measures. It is the old attitude that was expressed by the Prime Minister in Winnipeg, when he said: "Why should I sell your wheat?", giving a characteristic shrug of his shoulders. That is the attitude that is going to be rejected today in Assiniboia.

Mr. Nowlan: The Minister of Justice has been out there.

Mr. Horner: The Minister of Justice went to Assiniboia earlier in the campaign and called the issues. I hope he accepts the result, having called those issues, when it is announced later today.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): You can have half of Woolliams' benefit.

Mr. Horner: I did not hear that remark!

Mr. Burton: Tell us about the meeting you had in Winnipeg, John.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I invite the hon. member to address his remarks to the Chair as much as possible.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Chairman, I was interrupted and it brought me back to that great meeting the Minister of Justice had. The hon. member who is piloting through this legislation was also out in Weyburn.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: I think some of his Liberal colleagues should slap him on the back and thump their desks, because from what I hear only about 16 came out to hear him.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I hear you spent two days looking for a crowd, Jack.

Mr. Horner: I did not have that privilege, no. I was saying, Mr. Chairman, that one has to assess just where this particular thrust in our agricultural legislation came from. Having done that, let us couple it with the proposals of the Carter Commission in regard to the agricultural industry which the Minister of Finance has pretty well accepted intact, though there are certain differences between the minister and Carter over the capital gains tax and so on.

We have also had a number of studies conducted of the agricultural industry. Besides the Carter report on taxation we had the task force report on agriculture which was conducted by academics and one person from western Canada who perhaps knew something about agriculture—the dean of agricultural economics, I believe it was, at Winnipeg University. Then we had a study of the grain marketing situation. Then we had a study of grain handling and then one of the rapeseed industry. That was followed by the issuance of the farm adjustment program paper. All of these studies were devised by academics and directed toward control and simplication of the agricultural industry. The theory is that if the government is going to put money into agriculture, then it should control agriculture.

As I say, the tax bill that we are discussing takes away certain advantages farmers have previously enjoyed. It tends to take away, and I think eventually will take away, a farmer's right to compute his income tax on a cash basis. I see the parliamentary secretary shaking his head in dissent. I did not say that it would take it away; I said it was moving in that direction. He is now nodding his head affirmatively. This would seem to be the direction in which the Department of National Revenue intends to move. It will strive to place the farmer on an accrual income tax basis rather than on a cash basis. This will mean a great deal to the practical farmer.

These changes in income tax Act will tend to force the farmer into incorporation. A farmer with a large operation is better off with incorporation. Many farmers, however, derive their livelihood from owning a small farm and take a sense of pride in it. They do not want to become incorporated. They do not want to issue annual statements to a provincial government in which they outline their income and expenses for a given year. This legislation will tend to force farmers into incorporating. This will be acceptable to the large well-financed farmers. The farmers with small farms will not bother to take advantage of incorporation. This will hasten their demise.

The government also intends to take away the advantage of the basic herd principle which was established a good number of years ago, in the late 40's. The farmer will be able to enlarge his basic herd until December 31, 1971 and if it is enlarged after that he will have to pay a capital gains tax on the increased value of the basic herd. We would seem to be destroying one of the privileges livestock men have acquired over the years. This will tend to simplify the method of taxing the livestock man and bring about greater control over his income.

One might ask what the purpose was of the basic herd. I believe one purpose of the basic herd concept was that a person would pay income tax on money he set aside to enlarge his capital investment at the time he was earning it and then when he retired or withdrew from the livestock industry he would not have to pay income tax on this money which he had invested in increasing this herd during his working period. We must ask ourselves whether this is important to the agriculture industry. What is the average age of participants in this industry? A recent study carried on by the Alberta Wheat Pool in respect of the province of Alberta showed that the average farmer in that province is well over 45 years of age and is crowding 50. I believe a similar study has been carried on in Ontario. Without any boasting I believe Alberta ranks low in respect of the average age of farmers. I think there are more young farmers in Alberta than there are in any other province.

In any event, it is common knowledge that many people involved in the agriculture industry will be retiring within the next 10 years. There will be a tremendous changeover in the personnel involved in the agriculture industry. I believe there are 480,000 farmers today, and I should like to see the same number in the next 10 years comprised of new young men in the industry. Here we are doing away with a basic concept which encourages young men to set aside money in their working years which will not be taxable when they retire. What will happen to the people who have been involved in the basic herd during the last 20 years? They will retire perhaps in 10 years from now. I realize the price of meat to the consumer is high enough, but I have no real assurance that inflation will be curtailed or that the livestock man will not suffer from ad hoc financial policies of one government or another. Therefore, it is quite conceivable in my mind that livestock will increase in value in the years ahead. It has happened in the past, and I believe it will happen in the future.

The result of the change in the basic herd concept is that those who retire will be subject to a capital gains tax on the money they have set aside. This is not fair because, in essence, it is a change in the rules in mid-stream in respect of those who have retired and who have made use of the basic herd concept. For this reason, I can only come to the conclusion that the government is heartless with regard to the agricultural industry. The government would like to get rid of a third of the farms. Then, according to some kind of odd logic, they think all will be well.

We must deal with the effect of the capital gains tax on property which a farmer purchases from time to time. We are told the capital gains tax will affect anything of a capital value over $1,000. We all know a farmer is a large purchaser of machinery. From time to time the Minister of Agriculture and the minister in charge of the Wheat Board, in statements and propaganda in the Assiniboia riding, have suggested that farmers have a tendency to over-capitalize in respect of farm machinery. I shall not go into that now, although I believe it should be pointed out that we have just had an exhaustive study of farm machinery prices. I refer to the Barber commission. I do not know what this commission has cost. It has published 12 volumes and I believe is still publishing additional volumes. As yet the Barber commission has had no effect in lowering the prices of farm machinery. The commission did not recommend any changes in the taxation structure. These changes in the capitalization apply—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I must do so to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Horner: May I just finish the sentence.

An hon. Member: One sentence.

Mr. Horner: I would like to conclude this sentence because I was entering a vein of thought that would make no sense otherwise.

An hon. Member: Nothing else does.

Mr. Horner: The portion of machinery cost that is fully depreciated, and which is allowed on a trade-in, will now become subject to tax. This will do more to increase the cost of farm machinery than the Barber Commission has done to decrease it, by tenfold or by one hundredfold, because the Barber commission recommended nothing that this government has nerve enough to act upon. But this tax legislation will cause an increase in the cost of farm machinery. When I speak of farm machinery, I should point out that this will cause great havoc to the farm machinery dealers, many of whom will become bankrupt.

• (4:30 p.m.)

I have more to add on this subject but I do not wish to abuse the patience of the House right now, so I will give the time to someone else who might wish to speak. I thank the House for giving me the extra minute or two.

Mr. Burton: I feel that this portion of Bill C-259 is a very important part, and one which deserves serious and close consideration. As will be acknowledged by all members in the House, the agricultural industry of Canada is a very important sector of the Canadian economy. It has been experiencing economic difficulties in recent years which I think surpass any other example that might be cited of economic difficulties faced within the past few years. In my province of Saskatchewan there has been a sharp and serious decline in farm income. It has dropped from $480 million some three or four years ago to $188 million in 1970. This is a serious situation.

Leaving aside some of the issues involved with respect to that drop in income, I suggest that there is a point to be made within the scope of our consideration in dealing with this bill, namely that this drop in income imposes a special obligation on the committee to ensure that we have done everything possible to avoid further unnecessary difficulties for farmers in Canada in trying to cope with the difficult set of problems which they are now facing. I think it will be acknowledged that special problems face farmers in the agricultural industry by the very nature of the industry and by its unique characteristics. I am referring to factors such as the high level of investment which is required in the industry in order to carry on production, taking account of today's technology and economic conditions. This is a factor which must be kept in mind. At the same time, this is coupled with a pattern of low rates of interest on capital investment and in fact low rates of labour return to farmers as a result of their efforts on their farms. This is a serious problem which must be of concern to all Canadians.

I think we also have to take note of the fact that the farmer makes a contribution to the build-up in the capital value of his farm in terms of the unpaid value of his labour contribution to the development of the capital assets on that farm. The farmer never sees any return for his unpaid labour except in the low rate of return he might receive on his investment. He really does not receive the real return to which he is entitled for the labour he contributes towards the development of the capital value of the farm until he disposes of that farm. That is one of the basic problems that faces the farming industry in this country which I think must be taken into account in developing tax law.

Of course, there are other problems that face agriculture, such as the very serious and wide fluctuations in land values with which farmers are faced, particularly the prairie farmers in recent years. These must be taken into account by the tax department. It must also be noted—and I am glad that this has been recognized in some respects in the bill now before us—that much of the farmer's assets also constitute his retirement fund, and as such deserve special consideration. I am glad that some consideration has been given in the bill to this matter.

There may be other matters which also deserve consideration. One of the problems that has been noted with respect to the application of the bill as it now stands involves a new institution, a new development in the farming industry, that is the development of family held corporations which do not involve any basic change in the pattern of the particular farming operation involved. Many families, for a variety of reasons, have decided to incorporate their operation. This has to be done, of course, by simply incorporating as a joint stock company. However, this institution is of a somewhat different nature from an ordinary shareholding corporation, so I think some problems do arise.

It has been noted in some of the representations made to the government that there are problems with respect to such things as the principal residences of the farmers or the farm families, as the case may be. This deserves special consideration as well.

I think it should also be acknowledged that some further development in provincial law is required. It would be very useful and worthwhile if the provinces gave consideration to developing a special piece of legislation which would provide for the incorporation of the family farm. These companies would operate somewhat differently from ordinary joint stock companies in that the law would take account of some of the unique characteristics of the family farm and the unique circumstances that exist with respect to some of the incorporations which have been made in recent years. We have to take note of the fact that incorporations by family held groups operate in the same way in terms of company law as the large shareholding corporations which are engaged in a variety of farming business today but where the shareholders are, for the most part, completely removed from the actual operations that are being carried on by the corporation.

Another matter of concern has to do with the capital gains tax and the way it will operate for farmers across Canada. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture, as the government is aware, has made representations on this matter. They are concerned about the question of transfers of farms within a family, whether this occurs by sale or by inheritance. They have expressed the hope that some provision might be made whereby this could be done without affecting a realization of capital gains. I note, as well, that the Canadian Cattlemen's Association has made a very reasonable proposal, which I think the government should be prepared to consider as a minimum step. Their proposal is that there would be provision, not for any waiving of tax or waiving of realization of capital gains when there is such a transfer of a farm within a family, but simply a provision whereby the payment of any tax that is incurred at the time of the realization of capital gains could be spread over an adequate period of time. This could be done in a variety of ways. One way could be to provide for a fixed time period for paying the amount due as a result of the realization of the capital gain. There is a provision in the tax law for time payments in some cases, but in the case of many farms with a low rate of return on capital investment there is good cause for the extension of the time period involved. This could be done without in any way changing any of the principles that may be desirable in developing our tax law.

One other mechanism that could be considered is the provision of some form of open-ended mortgage or lien on the property, which would involve the annual payment of interest by the farmer to the tax department, he having the option of closing out the amount due at any time. Of course, I agree that the interest rate payable in such a case would have to be high enough that there would be no inducement for the farmer simply to leave the amount outstanding to the tax department over a long-term basis, without it ever being liquidated. There may be other possibilities, making provision for annuity plans that could be dovetailed into this type of situation, such as has been done in other provisions of the bill dealing with other matters.

• (4:40 p.m.)

The Canadian Cattlemen's Association made this recommendation:

> While taxes are payable on the deemed realization on the intergeneration transfer, provision be provided that the tax may be payable over a period of time sufficient to not reduce the income generating capacity of the farm.

That is the principal concern that has been expressed with respect to this matter. I am sure the government is aware of cases where, as the result of valuation of property in dealing with estates, it has been necessary to liquidate farm units which were sound economic units. I hope the government will give some consideration to this matter, and consider some further amendments to the bill.

There is another item I would like to deal with which comes within the scope of sections 28 to 31. It has to do with the government's proposal to phase out the basic herd provisions in the Income Tax Act. It would appear that this is an attempt to encourage farmers to move to an accrual system of accounting for tax purposes. The government's present proposal with respect to the basic herd amounts to no more than a transitional provision before phasing out the operation altogether.

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture has proposed that a breeding herd be treated as a capital asset, and that the taxable income from the sale of an animal from the herd would be the difference between the selling price and some other definition of price that might be determined. It seems to me there are a number of serious problems we have to consider in this regard.

In discussing this problem, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture stated as follows, in a submission to the government at the end of August:

> The basic issue is this: there is a real, valid need to have some system by which the farmer can treat his capital investment in livestock as a capital investment. Consider for example the problem of the farmer who wishes to take money out of capital to acquire a herd or a major addition to an existing herd. From his standpoint he now has a capital asset which cannot be depreciated. His cost of acquisition of the cattle is an expense to him if he is on a cash basis of accounting, giving him a number of years of severe losses that will not be corrected by the five-year averaging provision. To go on an accrual basis with annual valuation of the herd is often impractical and undesirable. A much better answer is to establish a basic herd.
> The same consideration in a less extreme way applies to farmers who wish to build up their herd year by year, reporting the cost of acquisition as income and enlarging their capital base of animals.
> If this is not provided for, the farmer builds up a large sum which will be realized as income immediately on dispersal of the herd.

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture also pointed out:

> To phase out the basic herd will have the mischievous side effect of weakening the capital structures of thousands of farming operations without producing a significant gain in tax revenues.

That is a point that might be considered by the government when it is taking a look at this matter. The Federation also stated:

> —the recognition of the basic herd as capital has validity, and there is no reason why proceeds of dispersal should not be assessed by treating the gain on disposal over initial cost on valuation day value as a capital gain rather than as ordinary income, and tax levied accordingly on only half of such gain.

There are three basic points that might be made when we are examining this. First of all, I point out that the government has stated publicly on a number of occasions that it is taking a look at the whole area of capital cost allowances, the whole manner in which depreciation is to be treated in tax law. In fact, we may expect to have some further word from the government on this in due course. Why could not this provision with respect to the basic herd be deferred until the government is conducting its examination of the whole area of capital cost allowances and depreciation?

The second point that needs to be considered when looking at the basic herd proposition is that it would seem the government is phasing out the basic herd concept partly as the result of its introducing a capital gains provision into the income tax law, with one half of the rate of tax to come into effect. This presents a real problem. If you are going to treat the basic herd as a capital asset, on which capital loss or gain may apply, then it seems to me you are treating that asset differently from the capital assets of other businesses.

Make no mistake about it, Mr. Chairman. To the farmer his basic herd, his breeding herd, is a capital asset. It is part of his capital equipment. Certainly, some of the mechanisms of the situation are somewhat different from those which apply in other areas of business. In the case of a particular type of large machine, let us say a printing press or large lathe, to which capital gains or losses apply, the tax will be applied at half rate. But in the case of a farmer's breeding herd it will be treated differently, as a matter of income and expenses. I submit that the government cannot allow this type of discrimination to exist in tax law.

There is another point that must be considered. It has been made clear by many people, and indeed I believe the government has asserted this on a number of occasions, that one of the shifts that must take place in the Canadian agricultural industry is an increase in livestock production. This is necessary if we are to make adjustments and changes in the Canadian farming industry. The manner in which we treat this matter will have an important influence on other government programs designed to encourage livestock production. If this provision is allowed to pass into law as it now stands, it will discourage farmers from going into livestock production when in fact the government should be encouraging them to enter this field. Thus, if the government fails to make any changes they will be in conflict with other government programs.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Before I sit down, Mr. Chairman, there is one further point which needs to be emphasized.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I do so to tell him that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. parliamentary secretary knows that this can only be done by unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent for the hon. member for Regina East to complete his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

An hon. Member: Might as well.

The Deputy Chairman: The Chair has heard some negatives, so it will not be possible to permit the hon. member to continue.

Mr. Burton: I take note of the place from which the "no" came.

The Deputy Chairman: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—Senate and House of Commons—Position of study of conflict of interest and possible legislation; the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall)—External Affairs—Canadian Soviet Communiqué—Effect of exchange of scientific and technological information on defence-sharing arrangements with United States; the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Carter)—Canadian National Railways—Lay-off of dockyard employees, St. John's, Newfoundland—government action.

Mr. Pringle: Mr. Chairman, I think we can agree on one thing in this House, that taxes of any kind are not too popular and whenever we are confronted with changes we are apprehensive about what they might do to our own position. I have heard members on both sides of the House state the plight of the agricultural industry with regard to the high investment required and the low return. Over a period of time, a farm requires a very considerable capital investment and over the same period, income should increase.

Today, members of the opposition have said that agriculture must be considered as a special status industry and I believe this suggestion has some validity. But in the next breath almost, the same members have said that if farm equipment is to be considered as capital then the basic herd must also be considered as such; in other words, agriculture must be considered in the same light as all other industries. There is variation of opinion here and we should all give very serious thought to this subject. Since the time the original income tax law was proposed and passed in the House of Commons, changes have taken place almost annually. However, it is a fact that regulations brought down by the Minister of Finance in the various budgets can very quickly rectify some differences which appear.

I have a couple of statements to make on the subject of farm land. It is my understanding that a farmer has two alternatives. He may claim a complete exemption from capital gains tax for his farm home and an acre of surrounding land. Alternatively, if it is more beneficial to do so, a farmer may elect to deduct $1,000 from his taxable capital gain for his entire farm operation for each year during which the farm home was his principal residence. Appraisal of the land constitutes a problem. Is farm land being valued taking into consideration the purpose for which it is being used or is it being valued with regard to the market price of surrounding land, such as housing developments or industrial developments? A farmer who is maintaining a dairy herd or who is growing cash crops for the good of the people living in urban centres should not be confronted with the problem of appraising his land at a price much higher than similar land in other areas being used strictly for farming. This whole question should be given full consideration.

As far as farm equipment is concerned—

Mr. Woolliams: I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question.

Mr. Pringle: Oh, no, I am not going—oh pardon me, I thought it was the hon. member for Crowfoot.

[The Deputy Chairman.]

Mr. McBride: Things are getting pretty bad when you are mistaken for him.

Mr. Woolliams: I appreciate the compliment. I would ask the hon. member to think about this question: Where you have a ranching, grain or dairy operation—basically I am getting into a field apart from what we are debating now but it is important because you cannot separate capital gains from a farmer's other income for tax purposes—you are going to have capital gains based on the value of the land whenever it is sold. How would the formula apply if the ranch or farm were incorporated?

Mr. Pringle: I do not differentiate, and for this reason. If a farmer is using his land for a farming operation and he suddenly dies and his family is confronted with a capital gains tax, the land must then be valued. It is my opinion that the land should be valued on the basis of the purpose for which the farm was being used when he died. In his lifetime he could have disposed of the land for industrial or housing development, so the family is confronted with a very difficult situation. In British Columbia we have examples which prove this point. I do not suggest that this situation does not arise in connection with other industries. We do not have death duties now but formerly when a man died and his property was disposed of his family was confronted with the estates tax. I think we should consider these problems connected with the valuation of farm land.

There is little likelihood that any capital gain will be paid with respect to farm equipment, since farm equipment rarely increases in value, notwithstanding our inflationary spiral. Often farm equipment must be used in rugged areas and the depreciation, in my opinion, is even higher than the allowable amount. I doubt very much that there will be any problem in this area. Of course, so far as principal residence is concerned, it must be conceded that the increase in value must be over $1,000 a year before it can be subject to the capital gains tax.

If I may speak about the basic herd, I think the Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance is giving consideration to something that has been suggested in a number of representations, namely, that the basic herd is really a capital asset and, as such, that it should be depreciated as a capital asset. The system of taxation applying to an animal that is used for reproduction should be the same as that applying to a machine used to produce products. I hope this question will be given some consideration. I support the principle of time payments with respect to taxes of the kind I have mentioned. I firmly believe that they will be allowed and I will be very surprised if that is not the case.

May I talk about depreciable assets, Mr. Chairman? The system of depreciating assets has been compared with the system involving diminishing balances. I am having a great deal of difficulty in reassuring those who say that the matter of depreciation should be continued on a straight-line basis. It seems to me that, in the long run, the system involving diminishing balances is really not that much different, although I concede that there are many arguments in this area that we must consider. Farmers now will be permitted to continue to compute their income on a cash basis rather than on an accrual basis, the method that is required for most other taxpayers. This method will not affect the amount of income tax farmers will have to pay, and I do not think there is any suggestion that the Department of National Revenue wants to to do anything differently in this area. Farmers will be allowed to continue averaging their income over five years. This provision is generally more beneficial than the general averaging provisions applicable to all other taxpayers.

Next I come to the question of farm corporations. Unfortunately, many of our farmers think of corporations as large companies. Nevertheless, many farm corporations throughout the country are, effectively, family incorporated farms. It is not only farmers with large operations who should consider incorporating. Those with medium sized and, in some instances, small farms, whose families wish to remain on the farm, should consider incorporating their farms. I believe that the young folk who are coming along in this field should also be considered. Their income often is inadequate. Often a young boy helps his father to work a farm. Often, because there is more inventory on the farm than can be used, cash is not readily available. Consequently, I feel that this type of farm help is often somewhat underpaid. Of course, there is a strong understanding in most cases that some day the young fellow will take over the farm from his father. If the farm is set up as a corporate structure, and there need not be more than two or three shareholders, it is possible through accounting procedures to eliminate a great many problems which might otherwise arise with respect to the transfer of farmland from the farmer to the younger people of the family.

Next, I come to succession duties. There is a difficulty in this area, since we, in the federal field, have given them up and we know that the provinces may introduce different types of succession duty. Such being the case, we are under a handicap. I do not think it is proper for us to advise the provinces as to what they must do, and I can see great difficulties arising if we become involved in any type of plan connected with succession duties. It is interesting to note, if one looks at this sheet entitled, "Comparison of Effect of Present Death Duties and Proposed Capital Gains Tax on a Farm Estate," that where the rate of capital appreciation on farmland is 20 per cent in ten years, a great deal of saving is brought about under the new system. As a matter of fact, the saving on an estate of $200,000 would be nearly $12,000 over ten years. The document in my hand shows the amounts various provinces would levy with regard to such an estate. The amounts vary because the provinces impose different levels of succession duty. I notice, however, that in every province of Canada there is to be a considerable saving and, if the new plan is compared with the old plan, it will be readily seen that there is to be a great deal of saving in this area.

I wish to reply to a few remarks that were made by the hon. member for Crowfoot. He talked about Operation Lift. The inference I drew from his remarks, and I do not know whether he intentionally wanted me to draw that inference, was that Operation Lift was foisted on the farmers of Canada.

Mr. Horner: Exactly.

Mr. Pringle: Operation Lift was an optional program.

Mr. Horner: Optional be damned.

Mr. Pringle: It was designed to place grain inventories in western Canada in a proper perspective.

Mr. Peters: So that grain could remain on the farm instead of in the elevator.

Mr. Pringle: It was brought in because there was a likelihood of more inventory than it was possible to move. I suggest that, in the years ahead, when we look back we will see that the program was of considerable help to the western grain business.

So far as the new quota system is concerned, may I say that when I was out west a week or so ago in my attempt to turn the tide, so to speak, I found that the quota system is generally well accepted by western farmers. The farm adjustment program, Mr. Chairman, must be mentioned. Although that program has not yet been proposed in this House, it would come into effect at the farmer's option and give farmers a method of determining their own future. The program would give them access to a realistic pension. The whole thing, so far as I can see at the moment, is to be financed by this government which is trying to give these farmers an opportunity to stay on their property and retire on it. They can participate in this pension plan right where they are and do not have to move. I wish the full story could be told.

You know, when I was in the riding of Assiniboia I was most amazed to see the way in which opposition members daily completely sabotaged and misrepresented information that was readily available to them. Of course, I am talking about the stabilization plan. Farmers thought that it was based on production, whereas they ought to have known that it was supposed to be based on farm income and that it was farm income that was to be stabilized. When people elect members to Parliament, they expect them to give the true facts. I am sorry to say, Mr. Chairman, that I found very little evidence that this axiom was being heeded. I found only confusion resulting from misleading statements by members of the opposition who had gone back to the Assiniboia area.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Horner: That's a weak story, boys, a weak story.

• (5:10 p.m.)

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, I am very happy to participate in this particular debate today because it has to do with changes in the Income Tax Act as contained in Bill C-259, as they relate to the agricultural industry. Like a lot of other people who come from areas in which there is a large agricultural population, I have been disturbed over the years by the fact that so many people are getting out of agriculture. If we look at the statistics, we find today that only 7.7 per cent of the working population are involved in producing food for the people of Canada as well as the food which we export from this great land of ours. More emphasis should be placed on incentive programs that will encourage people to stay on the land.

We talk about the family farm. I am happy to say that in my area there are many successful family farms, and this is one of the reasons I was so emphatic the other day that the wages of the wives of businessmen and of farmers should be allowable as income tax deductions. Anyone who has lived in these areas realizes that the family farm is just that. A great many of them are successful because the farmer's wife works alongside her husband for a great part of the day and for a large part of the year. The parliamentary secretary said that such a provision would cause a great deal of division of income. I do not think the income of those who carry on this type of operation would be enough to make a great deal of difference to the coffers of the Minister of Finance when it came to collecting income tax. If the earnings of the wife were allowable as a deduction, the farmer would be placed in another bracket.

I would like to say a few words about this industry and the impact it has on our economy today. I am disturbed, day by day and week by week, when I hear the consumers of Canada talking about the high cost of living. They like to complain that food costs are out of range. That is not true. I have an article that appeared in Weekend Magazine. It is entitled "The High Cost of Food is Low". It is a very interesting article and points out that a lot of the remarks made by the consumers are not true. I quote from the article:

> Food prices increased only slightly more than half between 1949 and 1969. (For a family of four the average weekly food bill was about $20 in 1949; about $31 in 1969.)—
> The proportion of average disposable income spent on food today is smaller than ever—about 15 per cent in 1969 compared to at least 22 per cent in 1949.

Canadians are eating better. This differentiation is an indication that the farming industry is efficient. However, it is not that attractive. There are many people who are disturbed about this bill and other things that have happened, such as the cost squeeze in agriculture. They have decided to leave the industry, and that is the reason farmland is not selling now nearly as well as a year ago. Another reason for this situation is this bill, the white paper and the implications that farmers were going to be faced with more bookkeeping problems. Other matters farmers have to take into consideration are the alteration in the basic herd concept and other programs they followed for many years because of the capital gains tax.

All through the piece there has been a feeling of uncertainty in the farm community. One of my neighbours is a real estate salesman. When I am home, I periodically ask how things are going. He tells me that farms are not selling these days as they were one or two years ago. This did not happen by reason of mother nature or anything like that. It happened because of the economic policies of this government and the fears and frustrations people have when they look at this monstrous bill, then wonder what will happen to them. The government has indicated that there will be changes. This is one reason people are disturbed.

It is interesting to note that, according to this same article, irrespective of the fact that only 7.7 per cent of the population is on farms today, this is not the whole picture. It is estimated that in the farming communities three out of every 10 Canadian jobs relate to agriculture. Many more than the 7.7 per cent are directly involved. They are involved in agricultural legislation and things that affect the agricultural community. With regard to the costs of farming, the article reads:

> Farmers' costs have more than doubled since 1949, so it is clear farmers gain very little from increased prices since their portion of the consumer's food dollar continues to diminish.

Does the parliamentary secretary feel that in this particular program there is any sort of incentive for people to go back to the farming area? What incentive is there for all those junior farmers who have been working so hard learning how to run a farm and the 4H club members being taught by agricultural representatives how to operate a farm? If they work on their father's farm, they feel that by the time they receive it, pay for it and the government gets through with them there will not be much left.

I wish to cite a recent case concerning a farmer in my area. He had 500 acres of very good land and a beautiful dairy herd. He had three children, two boys and one girl. They were all smart, intelligent children. They have worked on that farm all their lives, but will they continue to work on the farm? A few weeks ago that beautiful herd of 125 holstein cows was sold. They were put on the market because the farmer felt there was not any future in this type of operation. Although his family had been raised on that farm, enjoyed farming, belonged to the junior farmers' organization, were bright, intelligent young people, there was not any incentive for them to continue. They decided to leave the farm and go into some other occupation. This is a loss to the agriculture community.

The government and organizations should do everything possible to stop these bright, young people from leaving the farms. They should be encouraged to continue farming. There is going to come a day, and I would not like to predict how far away it is, when we may have to import a lot more agricultural products into this country. That will be a disgrace and a crime. It will be an indication that governments in the past did not do enough to encourage young people to remain on the farms which their fathers started many years ago, and of which they were so proud. I cannot see anything in this particular bill that will give encouragement to those people.

There were one or two questions which the hon. member for Fraser Valley West introduced into the discussion. He referred to the capital gains tax. In my area there are developments taking place around the big cities. The farmers who live adjacent to these large cities are fortunate because they receive a high price for their land. However, it does not stop there. I am referring to farmers who live around Toronto, Brampton, Guelph, Woodstock and Kitchener. They are receiving large prices for their farms, but many of them want to continue farming. What do they do? They sell the farm for a high price and move back into the country. They are driving along a road and they see a beautiful farm in a good location. They drive in. The farmer has no idea of selling his farm. But the prospective buyer looks at the farm and the house. They are attractive and well-kept. He asks the farmer to name a price. The farmer mentions a figure that he does not believe any buyer would look at, maybe $85,000 or $100,000. To his surprise, the offer is accepted. What is the result? Not only that farm but all the farms in the area are brought within an entirely artificial taxation bracket, and the consequences of the proposed insidious capital gains tax will be frightening to those who have to face them.

I might say the same about farm residences. There has been a marked trend in my part of the country for people to come from the city to seek an old stone house in which to live. There are a lot of these houses in my area. For example, two ladies driving along a road saw a beautiful stone house for which they were willing to pay $35,000. This was for the house alone; they did not want the farm. Where does it leave the fair operation of the act when cases of this kind occur, as they do with increasing frequency, unless a means is found of differentiating between the value of the farmhouse and the value of the farm itself? How will capital gains be assessed when the tax inspector comes round if the farmhouse has been sold for more than the whole farm is worth? It will create entirely false values, the consequence of which farmers who are continuing to operate their business will have to face. I can see this proposal creating many serious problems without thought of their solution. Farm values will tend to go way out of line and I am afraid the piece of legislation before us is far from helpful.

It is interesting to note that the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee of the other place was not too happy about the effect of these sections upon farmers. We have been talking about the proposal to end the basic herd concept, something our farmers have got used to and been able to live with for many years. Here is what the Senate committee had to say about that proposition:

> Under the proposed legislation, it is intended to abolish the concept of the basic herd and to treat such herds as inventory or stock-in-trade. Under the transitional rules, basic herds which have already been established will continue to be treated as capital assets to the extent that gains accrued at the commencement of the new system will not be subject to tax. However, gains accruing thereafter will be treated in the same manner as profits on the sale of inventory.
> Your Committee is not aware of any reason for not continuing to recognize a permanent herd for what it is, namely, a capital asset.

And here is the recommendation made by the committee in the other place:

> Your Committee recommends that provision be made in the proposed legislation for the continued recognition of a farmer's permanent herd as a "basic herd" and, therefore, as a capital asset.

In other words, the committee does not agree with the legislation we have before us. They advise that the existing act should not be changed in this respect.

A few moments ago I was talking about the sale of farm homes and farm land. Here is what the committee of the other place had to say about that particular aspect:

> Your Committee is of the view that farmers occupy a special position in the economic structure of this country. Over the years, this sector of the economy has become increasingly subjected to pressures which have led to a profound change in the nature and use of farm lands.
> Your Committee is concerned by this trend and believes that measures should be taken to reverse it.

And here is the recommendation which is made in this connection:

> Your Committee recommends that consideration be given to extending the rollover provisions to permit land together with any other capital property which is used by an individual in a farming activity to be transferred, either during lifetime or on death, to lineal ascendants or descendants without being subject to capital gains treatment under the deemed realization provisions. This exemption should only be available in those circumstances where the transferee or transferees continue to carry on the farming activities.

I feel that agriculture is of special importance to Canada and that we should do everything we can to encourage farmers to stay on the land. We should encourage their children, who have been trained as junior farmers and 4H club members, to follow in their father's footsteps. I do not feel the legislation before us offers any incentive or assistance to the farmers of Canada, so I would suggest these sections be amended along the lines proposed by the committee of the other place in order that the farm industry might be brought out of the uncertain period through which it is presently living, and farmers be able to go forward with hope, knowing that their future is in good hands.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, before I say a few words on this section I should like to put two or three questions to the parliamentary secretary and his experts. May I premise these questions by saying that a number of farmers in Alberta are incorporated as small businesses. My first question in this regard is as follows: Suppose the new act is passed. If a farmer incorporates, will he be taxed in accordance with the rates and allowances which govern small corporations or will the rates and allowances which apply particularly to farmers apply to him?

Mr. Mahoney: The corporation would be treated as a small business in the same way as any small corporation carrying on another business.

Mr. Woolliams: As the parliamentary secretary knows, there are a lot of big ranchers in Alberta who are incorporated, because they can run a better business operation and come up with a better tax picture. Would they be entitled to a basic herd? As I understand it, the basic herd rules and regulations apply only to a taxpayer who is unincorporated.

• (5:30 p.m.)

Mr. Mahoney: It is the intent of the bill before us to phase out the basic herd commencing the first of next year. I should like to add to my previous answer regarding the incorporated farm that a corporate farmer is entitled to calculate his income on a cash basis rather than on an accrual basis if he chooses to do so.

Mr. Woolliams: I appreciate that, and I understand the small business provisions, but what we are really saying is this: As I understand the small business deduction provision, subject to rigidly prescribed conditions, private corporations are entitled to a reduction on the rate of tax on the first $50,000. This is phased out if that particular corporation has produced a taxable income of $400,000. In eight years, that is eight times $50,000, is $400,000. This corporation then moves to a rate of 50 per cent of its net income, just as a big corporation like Imperial Oil and other corporations like that.

Mr. Mahoney: Provided that they did not reduce that accumulation of earnings by payment of dividends. If such a corporation chooses to pay out dividends, as the years go by that money comes off the amount which goes to make up the $400,000. So, a corporation of the nature of which my hon. friend refers could perpetuate its eligibility for the low rate of tax simply by paying dividends.

Mr. Woolliams: That clears up something at least. One of the answers given by the parliamentary secretary was that he thought that was the intention of the act. I hope it is the intention also of Parliament; we cannot control the interpretations of the courts. There are many interested people in Alberta where large sections of farms and ranches are incorporated at the present time, as there are in Saskatchewan. Farming and ranching is a big operation, a "big small business", as it were. It has been natural for these corporations, not only from the point of view of protection in business but from the taxation point of view, to leave their capital in and to expand operations.

Am I to take it that the rules and regulations set out in sections 28, 29, 30, and so on, which apply to farmers, only apply to farmers and ranchers who are not incorporated? I believe that is correct. Second, do I take it that the tax structure relating to incorporated small businesses applies to ranchers also? My third question is, could they, then, go on, providing they are paying the shareholders dividends, for we might say forever without ever reaching the $400,000 provision, or is there a time limit on it?

Mr. Mahoney: There is not time limit on this. To be absolutely clear on the basic herd point, if a farmer or rancher, incorporated or otherwise, wishes to establish a basic herd between now and the end of the calendar year, under the legislation he can do so.

Mr. Woolliams: That is the question I put and he has his experts there. Would the parliamentary secretary point out to me in this big volume the section which says that the basic herd provision applies? That is why I asked that question to start with. I appreciate it is a very difficult piece of legislation and I sympathize with him, but I want to put this to him. I should like to find out where it says in clear, unequivocal English that a small business corporation—which of course is what a ranch or farm would be—comes within the basic herd provision if they are incorporated. I should like him to read that part.

Mr. Mahoney: The first few words of section 29 reads as follows:

(1) Where a taxpayer has a basic herd of a class of animals—

The taxpayer can either be a corporation or an individual. The term under the Income Tax Act extends both to an individual and to a corporate entity.

Mr. Woolliams: We have that cleared up then. I hope those answers will not be the kind of answers we got from a former minister of health when we asked her on an afternoon similar to this whether Members of Parliament and others came within the Canada Pension Plan, and she said they did not. Then, we woke up the morning after the act was proclaimed and the regulations passed by cabinet to find an entirely different situation had developed. That is the trouble with this kind of tax law. As my good friend knows, legislation is always subject to the court's interpretation. A taxpayer may be a corporation under the act, but I should like to see it spelled out without any question that this law applies to the operations of a ranch or a farm that is incorporated. Then, we would know where we stood in that regard.

[Mr. Mahoney.]

This type of legislation is difficult for those engaged in agriculture. I think I know something about that having been raised in the prairie provinces and spent some time connected with farming operations, both as a farmer and as a lawyer practising in the city of Calgary. Prior to that time I was in Saskatchewan dealing with farmers and ranchers. As a result of my experience I got to know pretty well some of their problems, particularly from the income tax point of view. My concern with the method of debate this afternoon is that we are swatting mosquitoes when we should be belting horseflies. One of the things we are talking about is the basic herd. Under the old act this was treated as a capital asset. Under the new act, while it is true farmers can get on a cash basis, as the parliamentary secretary says, the real intention is to phase out the basic herds. He can shake his head but that is what he said, and finally it will work out that way. The basic herd provision will not apply to new farmers and ranchers. I do not think he can deny that.

I suggest that when we are talking about farming and ranching we should discuss all those things that apply to farming and ranching. One of the things that this act will do is this. There were members of the committee who said the white paper did not go far enough. These people really never explained to the farmers and ranchers that if it went further there would not be a farmer or rancher left. The fact is it went too far. We should be debating not only how farmers should pay their personal taxes when they are unincorporated or their corporate tax when they are incorporated, but we should integrate with this the debate on capital gains.

A member this afternoon talked about equating the value of land with the purpose for which it is used. Let us not fool around: when valuation day comes I think the valuation should be set on that day, applying the rules and regulations. There are various systems for arriving at the value, but whatever value is agreed upon between the department and the taxpayer as at valuation day, any capital gain made on the farm or on the ranch will be added to the personal income tax of the owners according to the formula, which is 50 per cent of the value. Then, you have the 25 per cent rule.

I ask these questions because of what I have heard said this afternoon in reference to the basic herd and the changes in the bill with reference to capital cost allowances and to trading in machinery.

These changes will make it more difficult for a farmer to remain on his ranch or farm and carry on the operation. I am very concerned about the situation in western Canada at this time because there is a large group of people who have operated farms and are reaching an age where they wish to either sell or turn over the farm to their children. In many cases this has been a husband and wife operation because it is difficult to obtain labourers in the fall of the year. What happens? They have built up this farming operation and then are subject to a capital gains tax. The formula is not the same as it is in the United States or in Great Britain. After the formula is applied to the top valuation, it is added to the income. I say the result will be that the family farm will be quickly turned over to the government or will be mortgaged to the government to the extent that the next generation will have to continue to work in order to meet the mortgage payments to the government. Some people to my left have said that this legislation does not go far enough. It goes so far that when the farmers wake up in a few years they will find that they cannot continue to own the farm.

If a farm is passed on to a son or is sold, the capital gains tax will mean either that the farm will be turned over to the government or will be mortgaged to the state. I believe when speaking in the southern part of Saskatchewan or Alberta during the last election the Prime Minister said that the objective of the government was to have the farms owned by the government. This is what the bill will do if the capital gains tax is implemented.

Mr. Mahoney: Let us have the report of what the Prime Minister said on the record.

Mr. Woolliams: I can easily read it into the record tomorrow because I have his statement as it appeared in the Calgary Herald.

Mr. Mahoney: It is gospel!

Mr. Woolliams: It is up to you to argue with the Calgary Herald.

Mr. Osler: Give us the reference.

Mr. Woolliams: My friend from Winnipeg is a peculiar man. He never believes anything. I just want to make my point. The hon. member should go down Main Street in Winnipeg and stand on the corner on a cold day. What would happen there on the corner I think would apply to him, and he knows what it might be. When the capital gains tax is applied against the farmer I believe he will pass on the farm or it will be mortgaged so that he will, in effect, be giving a mortgage to the government in lieu of taxes. If anyone denies that would be the result of the capital gains tax when the farm is sold, then I would ask him to stand in his place and say so.

I was interested in what one hon. member said this afternoon. I refer to the hon. member who has supported the government up until now. He spoke of equating the value of the land with its purpose. For example, if it were a dairy farm it would be valued for the purpose of dairy production. In an area between Calgary and Red Deer, in that area around Regina, Saskatoon or Moose Jaw or Edmonton, you will find that the farm is valued because of its proximity to an urban centre. I believe this would be true around Brandon and Winnipeg. The result is that the demand for the land determines its price. The amount of capital gains tax a farmer or rancher will pay when he has reached the period in which he wants to retire will be so great that he will not possibly be able to retain the title to his farm. This situation is particularly true under present marketing conditions. Let me deal with this for a few moments.

Under the capital gains tax structure and under the quota system which limits the cash flow to the farmer's pocket, the farmer would never be able to meet his obligations under this capital gains tax provision. I say this is proof that the capital gains tax will mean that the farmer or rancher will either keep the land or eventually it will become a state farm or be mortgaged so that the second generation farmer will have to work all his life in order to be able to pay off the mortgage. The farm economy is such that he would never be able to produce enough dollars in extra cash to meet the capital gains tax even if it were spread over a period of years. A tax is, in effect being added to the tax on the land on which they are producing in order to pay the capital gains tax. I believe this is a severe discrimination against a particular class of people. It discriminates against the farmer because, even though we are becoming urbanized, there are more farming operations in western Canada, in the farm belt of Ontario, the farm belt of Quebec and even in the farm belt of the Maritimes, than there are small businesses in the cities.

So this legislation really discriminates against an industry which until now has been the real backbone of our country. This is why when talking of the rate of tax, and the changes in tax structure, the real problem about which the farmers should be concerned is the capital gains tax because one cannot be separated from the other. This is why I submit that eventually those farms will go to the state, particularly under the kind of marketing arrangement we have which determines the amount of cash a farmer receives with which to pay his taxes. The minister in charge of the Wheat Board tells us that sales are good. Well, during the past five years, in respect of wheat sales, Canada has dropped from first to sixth position. The minister says we have wheat sales, but the truth is that this government and the previous government have never realized that the real problem in western Canada has not been a surplus of grain but rather the tie-up in getting the product from the farms to the country elevators, to the ports and then to the countries which buy it.

We have had management and labour disputes and so on. In these circumstances, how can a farmer pay the increased taxes which will result from the capital gains tax being added to his personal income tax or corporate tax indirectly. He will have to borrow in order to do this and he will have to pay interest on the money he borrows which will increase his cost of production. Because of this legislation and high taxes, the ownership of the farm will be turned over to the state or to other people and, as a result, the farmer who has worked all his life must pay a capital gains tax added to the tax on whatever other income or investments he may have. This is why the whole tax structure should be discussed in one package when we deal with agriculture.

• (5:50 p.m.)

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The time of the hon. member has expired. Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Woolliams: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, I appreciate that very much.

Under section 28, farmers may continue to compute income on a cash basis and the existing provisions requiring inventory and or accounts receivable to be brought to account on disposal of the business or on leaving the country are also continued. It is true that the farmer will be subject to automatic general averaging rules. He may elect to use the existing five year block averaging provisions if he so wishes. The problem here is the high capital gains tax. In the United States and in Great Britain you know the costs which you have to meet. Because of inflated land prices, capital gains will be so high that no farmer will be able to stay in business. The government leaves the impression that the estate tax has been abolished, but all they have done has been to create a vacuum for the year. The capital gains formula as applied, against these farms, will be far greater than the estate tax.

With regard to the basic herd, we have heard complaints this afternoon. I would like to quote the view of a group of researchers on Canadian tax reform. I will read what a group of accountants wrote about the subject. They wrote:

> No additions may be made to a basic herd after December 31, 1971.

That is certainly of no advantage to farmers because their basic herds do not increase. The researchers go on to say:

> —if subsequent to that date, the total number of animals of the appropriate class falls below the number in the basic herd, a sale is deemed to be made from the basic herd to the extent of the excess.

Is that of advantage to farmers? Of course, it is not. I continue the quotation:

> The basic herd cannot then be increased. In computing income of a year in which a part of the basic herd is realized, there may be deducted the December 31, 1971 fair market value of the animals so disposed of. Where a farmer has a basic herd plus other animals of the same class, he cannot, in a year of sale, reduce his basic herd by more than 10 per cent of the number of his December 31, 1971 basic herd provided he still owns sufficient animals of the class equal to the reduced basic herd.

If a farmer reached a position in which he could not keep his basic herd because of marketing or economic conditions and he wanted to dispose of that capital asset, he would lose the benefit of the basic herd formula. In other words, it is a straight bookkeeping entry. The government is in fact saying to a farmer "we will control how you market the stock, and if you market it in this fashion you will pay more taxes because we are the ones who determine the formula for the basic herd." According to the old idea, the basic herd was a capital asset, rather than part of income, until it was sold.

This is what the researchers had to say with regard to a farmer's residence:

> Where a farmer disposes of his farm and part of it was his principal residence, rather than having the farmland and principal residence treated separately, he can elect to treat the entire farm as one asset, and deduct from his capital gain otherwise determined $1,000 a year for each year the farm was his principal residence.

This means that if he is farming for ten years he can elect to take ten times $1,000 off his total capital gains. Let us consider the point I raise. If the value of the farm is inflated because of its proximity to an urban centre, when he sells it he may double his money. If that is the case he will have a capital gain of 50 per cent, that is the difference between the value on valuation day and the price at which he sold it. The 50 per cent is added to his income, with some averaging. That is the situation which is affecting farmers and which will put these people off the farms and out of business.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

If the state runs farms as they run other corporations, we know what will happen to production. Farmers will not have much trouble with marketing when the state takes over. The researchers, comment as follows:

> On the face of it, this provision should avoid the need for separate valuations on Valuation Day and the segregation of the sale price, but without the valuation and segregation, on what basis can a determination be made that the election is beneficial?

It is certainly not beneficial to the farmer, and that is my point. We must realize when we are debating these tax provisions as they relate to farmers and ranchers, that they are in a unique position because farming requires large amounts of capital. If a farmer wished to take his investment out of machinery and land and invest it in trust companies, even at today's rates of interest, he would find that he would be far better off. But farming is a way of life, and we should have the kind of taxation which would encourage those people who are serving the nation by producing food as well as by bringing back to Canada large numbers of dollars from the export of grain and cattle.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. It being six o'clock, I leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At 6 p.m. the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Chairman: Shall section 28 carry?

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, I feel it is my duty to speak on this section of Bill C-259 concerning taxation of producers and farmers.

I object to the spirit of this legislation, especially because of the sections now under consideration. Departments adopt a policy unaliterally without taking into account measures adopted by other departments and, consequently, those programs are eventually disastrous for the very people that they intended to help.

The case under consideration tonight is one of those. In fact, it shows how the government lacks logic sometimes when adopting legislation or regulations for the purpose of helping the farmer. Action is taken to help him borrow, but, on the other hand, measures are adopted to ruin him. Finally, neither policies have been effective, because they are contradictory.

In my opinion, any tax reform must take into account the objectives determined by other departments so as to avoid conflicts. To make this point clearer and make my colleagues understand that the provisions before us can in no way satisfy either western or eastern producers, I shall make a brief historical review.

There was a time when, in Canada, all producers were free to run their farms as they liked. It was what was then called the family farm on which parents and children worked and which was transmitted from generation to generation. The young took charge and so on. In eastern Canada, and particularly in the riding of Lotbinière where there is a strong rural population, two, three or sometimes four generations have lived from the income of the same farm. The farmer ran his farm as he pleased independently of agricultural policies. In any event, policies then did not particularly concern farmers.

And one day governments through their more and more complex political objectives adopted measures tending to industrialize and organize the farms and make them more efficient. People said then that it was the "efficiency folly" or "the great period of agricultural revolution from the point of view of profit", and I am one of those who said so. The Federal and Provincial governments therefore said to the Eastern and Western farmers: "What you were doing yesterday is no longer any good; today, you must improve your land, your herd, your farm machinery, otherwise you will starve.

Farmers who have never hindered progress, fell into step, although they could not afford it. It is then that the government decided to grant loans to agriculture, in order to help farmers to modernize their farms, to get into debt, which they did. They ran into debt, and the government then started to take over the farms, because immediately after having told the farmer: Modernize your operation, improve your methods, we will give you financial means to do that through farm loans, it also said: Now, we shall control the production; the days when anybody could produce anything are over. Thus, the policy of wheat, milk and egg quotas was born. Then the farmers found that their income was systematically controlled by the state. The latter started with financial control of the individual, control of the land through mortgages, and now, control of the farmer's income which the state freezes at will.

If a producer produces more than the permissible quota, not only will he not receive a salary, but he will be taxed. Such is the present policy. The government, after having taken over the farms and control of the farmer's income, taxes their meagre profits. And this, not equitably, for if it were done equitably we could not but congratulate the government.

On reading section 28, for instance, one realizes to what lengths the government intends to go to control the farmers, to own them, to socialize them. That is why I said at the onset that I did not share the spirit and the aims of the tax reform because of its aims.

Let me quote you only one example of the administrative follies we are witnessing. On page 85, clause 29 reads as follows:

Disposition of animal of basic herd class

29. (1) Where a taxpayer has a basic herd of a class of animals and disposes of an animal of that class in the course of carrying on a farming business in a taxation year, if the taxpayer so elects in his return of income under this Part for the year the following rules apply:

Thus the bill says that in order to comply with the will of the government, and I quote:

(a) there shall be deducted in computing—

—if somebody understands that, I would like him to let me know, because I have been studying that text for at least three days. I talked to some people and I have been told that no farmer will be able to make it. I feel sure of that because no one where this is taking us.

I quote again:

(a) there shall be deducted in computing his basic herd of that class at the end of the year such number as is designated by him in his election, not exceeding the least of—

And that to find out the tax which the individual will pay on his capital gains, on what he will sell. That is interesting. The quotation goes on:

(i) the number of animals of that class so disposed of by him in the year,

(ii) 1/10 of his basic herd of that class on December 31, 1971, and

(iii) his basic herd of that class of animal at the end of the immediately preceding taxation year; and

(b) there shall be deducted in computing his income from the farming business for the taxation year the product obtained when

That is fantastic. I quote further:

(i) the number determined under paragraph (a) in respect of his basic herd of that class for the year is multiplied by

(ii) the quotient obtained when the fair market value on December 31, 1971 of his animals of that class on that day is divided by the number of his animals of that class on that day.

Once this bill is adopted—if that is the intention of the government wishes so—I wonder in what kind of mess the farmers will have to manage their business since their farm is now considered as a business.

Everything has a limit. Farmers have gradually lost ownership of their farm owing to government socialization programs. The farmers' revenue is controlled by the government which wishes to make the management of a farm so complicated that farmers will have no choice but to give up business and get into a simpler field.

Several of my colleagues may not believe it, but I heard the previous speaker this afternoon mention that only 7.7 per cent of Canadian workers were farmers and that only 4 per cent among them enjoyed a minimum level of subsistence.

It is tragic. It so happens that a strict minimum of farmers feed 22 million Canadians and that instead of taking steps to help them, they are discouraged.

This means that a farmer with 30 heads of cattle, for example, is compelled to keep complex accounts for each head. I refer my colleagues to section 28 and the following to show how ridiculous and complicated it is, yet for the sole purpose of collecting a little more taxes from those who are penniless.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) was boasting recently that 750,000 Canadians will be removed from the taxation rolls under the tax reform. In all honesty, Mr. Chairman, this is not something that we can brag about, because 750,000 Canadians are no longer paying taxes it is due to the fact that they are in need of money. If their income is inadequate, it is because they are below the poverty line.

If we are aware that the basic exemptions suggested are $1,500 for single people and $2,850 for married ones, and that 750,000 Canadians will not pay taxes, this means that many married or single people are living in extreme poverty.

What will happen to farmers within that context? They have usually succeeded their father and have not had the same opportunity as other citizens to get a better education. Those people always managed somehow. They were in the fields before sunrise and came home after sunset, and they worked hard.

As a result of government schemes, those farms were taken over. Farmers are even being told today to have collective farms, to group themselves. In socialist or communist countries they have reached that point; first the farms were taken over now they are gradually reverting to private enterprise.

At the beginning of my remarks, I said that when passing a bill here it should be re-situated in the context of general policy objectives, after which it could be determined whether it does not defeat the purpose of other legislation. If it does, it is not a step forward but a step backward and I feel that enough harm has already been done to farmers as it is.

Instead of passing legislation, granting tax credits for any farmer's children willing to carry on the family business so they may continue to modernize and improve it, we do absolutely nothing.

The government talks of capital gains. This means the farmer will be taxed just like big businesses. They can afford to pay but not the small ones. The government treats on an equal basis the small business, the family farm and the big businesses. It treats them according to the same criteria. So, the small businesses, whether they like it or not, are going to be wiped out by this bill.

I rose recently in the House to acquaint the minister with the views of co-operatives, credit unions and caisses populaires. I said then that these measures would sooner or later bring about the disappearance of these co-operatives. The minister has realized his mistake and tabled some amendments. We were happy about it, but when we read them we noticed that once again people were being made fools of and that nothing had been done. Representations are therefore continuing.

The spokesmen for co-operatives and ourselves use the same language which is that the tax reform before us will entail the gradual phasing out of those institutions and of at least 50, if not 60 per cent of family farms still being operated in Canada.

Mr. Chairman, the farmers are moving into cities and becoming unemployed. We then ask them to undergo retraining courses to momentarily get rid of them, and once these courses end, they find themselves stuffed full with useless diplomas.

Instead of helping the farmer when he operated his farm, when he was independent of government, in order to preserve his independence, to increase his productivity so that he would not depend on social welfare, the government's policies have reduced him to an underprivileged status and he is totally dependent on the state.

I suggest that the rural exodus is the result of the policy of the federal government aiming particularly at ousting the greatest number of farmers with a view to laying hands on their farms, allegedly to promote collective farming which is a socialist inspired principle. We are socializing production; we have socialized lands and we are getting rid of people.

[Mr. Fortin.]

And yet when the farmers were requested to feed the Canadian Armed Forces during the war, they did not boggle and abode by the government's directions and worked.

It is not by discouraging private enterprise and personal initiative that we will make free Canadians independent from public administration.

For instance, we might just wonder, in connection with the distribution of the tax burden, what will be done with all the taxes collected under this voluminous bill. If you try to know where our tax money goes by leafing through the publication issued by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) you find that 25 per cent of this money goes to social projects.

In other words, this money is not used to increase productivity or the purchasing power but simply to keep them in poverty. At the same time, 14 per cent is earmarked for economic expansion and 14 per cent for servicing the public debt.

Mr. Chairman, the government's basic concepts are wrong. Under these concepts, the government is increasingly downgrading the farmers as masters of their free enterprise by stiffling them under taxes so as to turn them into unemployed or into poor city dwellers. Thus, unemployment and poverty continue to increase in a country bursting with wealth.

If the government is aware of the problem, let it choose the solution aimed at encouraging young people to maintain the family farm, to improve, modernize and restore it if necessary. Let it provide them with incentives, not of mere enrolment in all kinds of social measures, but of assistance through measures such as tax credits for a number of years, as it does for private enterprise.

When with great fanfare an industry establishes in a given area and creates jobs there, the government says: For a number of years, you will be exempt from taxation, or your tax burden will be eased to some extent or else, you will be given this or that land. But in the case of farmers, the government does things in a completely different way. Since it is dealing with little people, it must crush them; it is easier and it does not show much.

However, people are becoming aware of things much more than we think. The time has come to take our responsibilities in this respect. Why not help small businesses? Why not help the individual who tries to get by, to own his land, to grow, to be himself, instead of only a number in the Unemployment Insurance Administration? Why not adopt concrete measures such as tax cuts for the young man who wants to continue to operate the family farm, or else, help him reimburse a farm loan that makes it impossible for him to make ends meet, because the government has adopted an income control policy? If on the one hand the government has taken steps to control income through its quota policies, and on the other hand it controls capital gains by subjecting them to a 50 per cent tax, whether in the case of a small business or a large corporation, it is clear in my mind, as it is in those of most of my constituents in Lotbinière, that this will soon result in the disappearance of most small businesses.

As the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney) is here tonight, I take this opportunity to ask him to explain the thought behind this legislation and show us that it will promote farm development and encourage, rather than discourage, farmers. Let him prove that this will help farm development and make farmers more and more independent, less and less under the government's thumb, and then we will be willing to discuss and even to change our position. But in the light of the information at our disposal and of the results of the programs put into effect in the last 15 years in this field, we have no doubt that this piece of legislation will continue to systematically undermine private enterprise and discourage the owners.

When it is stated, for example, that upon selling any part of his herd the farmer will have to pay a tax based on the age of the cattle, I feel that is going too far; the farmers' production is being controlled far too much; this can only discourage them. In bringing my remarks to a close—

The Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member. I do so to advise him and the committee that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Chairman: The hon. member may continue only if there is unanimous consent. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, I thank my colleagues for their consideration, but I shall not take undue advantage of it. In any event, I was about to bring my remarks to a close.

I should therefore like to ask the minister to explain this section to us. I would also ask him not to interpret my remarks as political opposition, but to realize that it is in our interest that we understand this bill thoroughly and make sure that it does not go against the farmers' interests; that we truly mean to help them and to ensure that the proposed measure will not conflict with the policies of other departments.

If the minister is right, he should prove it. I suggest that he study the point I have made, namely that the farm policy has brought about the elimination of a great many producers who have simply become unemployed because we do not know what to do with them, our system being such that our main Canadian industry is now unemployment.

In the light of the experiences already attempted, I feel that it is now time for the government to study once and for all the need for adopting positive measures, instead of proposing a tax reform designed to control farm property, production and the individual, and even to tax capital gains and the proceeds from the sale of cattle, time to study at last the advisability of introducing concrete measures. Instead of discouraging individuals, it would encourage them to work. Consequently, these people would be less and less dependent on the government for a living.

[English]

The Chairman: The hon. member for Annapolis Valley.

Mr. Downey: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. This afternoon when I began my remarks in this debate I asked the parliamentary secretary a question with regard to the averaging of farm income and he indicated that these provisions are exactly the same as they were before.

The Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Downey: I am just coming to my question of privilege, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: I have some doubt about the point of privilege. It may be a point of argument. The hon. member knows that he may gain the floor when the Chair recognizes him. I do not think he should have the floor to raise this point.

Mr. Downey: Mr. Chairman, I was just introducing a preamble. My question is: Will there be the same averaging provisions as now exist with regard to incorporated—

The Chairman: Order, please. I want to be as kind as possible but I say, with respect, to the hon. member for Battle River that he has not raised a question of privilege. He may have an argument with the parliamentary secretary and his point may be a point of debate. In the fullness of time I will recognize the hon. member.

Mr. Downey: Mr. Chairman, could I, then, ask a question which is not raised by way of privilege?

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Battle River will remember that the Chair had recognized the hon. member for Annapolis Valley.

Mr. Woolliams: But he is prepared to yield the floor.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Annapolis Valley.

• (8:30 p.m.)

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I rise to participate in this debate on Bill C-259 with some hesitation. Even though I have been exposed to not only the farm community but also taxation in a professional way, I have found that the more one digs into the 707 pages, with amendments and amendments to amendments, the bill becomes not only confusing but somewhat incomprehensible to a member of this institution. It is certainly confusing and incomprehensible to the average Canadian who will be exposed to these new proposals.

In committee of the whole we are now dealing specifically with sections 28 to 31 which I will touch on lightly. In any discussion on agriculture at this time, as a member from the east I would be remiss if I did not quote part of a press release on the state of agriculture in Atlantic Canada, particularly the maritime provinces. This document was written by one of the leaders of the agricultural industry in the maritime provinces, a former deputy minister of agriculture in the Nova Scotia government. He is now president of the Maritime Co-operatives Society, Dr.

J. E. Walsh, who has been recognized in the Atlantic area and all across Canada as one of the leading voices in this country. On October 29 he said, among other things:

> Agriculture in the maritime provinces is facing its most desperate crisis in 40 years. Our hog industry is being forced to close down, our egg industry is seriously threatened, our potato and apple industries are severely depressed, our dairy industry is dwindling, and our beef industry is faced with rapidly increasing production costs.

I could go on ad infinitum.

An hon. Member: You can do that.

Mr. Nowlan: I could go on ad nauseam—

An hon. Member: You can do that too.

Mr. Nowlan: —and not just restrict my comments to one region of Canada. I could cover Canada from coast to coast. The same general critique and the same condemnation could be levelled at the leaders of government who are not providing leadership to the agricultural community in this land. If any member in this House thinks that this 5 pound 14-ounce monstrosity is going to provide leadership to the agricultural community, he is living in the land of Rip Van Winkle.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: Perhaps later tonight when the returns are in from Assiniboia members opposite will wish they were in the land of Rip Van Winkle. If the present government does not start to listen to the pulse of the farmer, the businessman, the little man, the union man, the average Canadian, let alone the lonely housewives in Canada, it will be sent to the land of Rip Van Winkle pretty soon. As I try to understand the incomprehensible, as I try to unwind—

An hon. Member: "Unravel."

Mr. Nowlan: —and unravel the twisted strain coming from the minister before I come to the specific sections under discussion, this bill will go down in the annals of parliamentary history as the arteriosclerosis of our society. Mark my words, because they will come back and haunt members opposite, especially the Minister of Finance. I say that without any hesitation. If the hon. member for Lanark, who sometimes with divine guidance and a very articulate tongue—

An hon. Member: What do you think about heavy water?

Mr. Nowlan: —and other members opposite consider the amount of time, effort and energy that has already been expended, beginning with the many studies supposedly from the Carter commission, Benson's white paper, the debate, proposals, counterproposals, briefs, counterbriefs, delegations coming to Ottawa, getting a hurried hamburger in some cafeteria so they can see the minister—

The Chairman: Order, please. When the hon. member for Annapolis Valley commenced his remarks he told the Chair he would touch lightly on sections 28, 29, 30 and 31. The Chair now invites him to touch lightly on these sections.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

Mr. Nowlan: I appreciate the good grace, discretion and direction that comes from the Chair. However, the first section is 28. It says in the marginal note, "Farming business." If I cannot talk in a general way about the farming business and the plight that affects the farmer and thereby the consumer, I wonder what has happened to the rules of parliamentary debate—with no reflection on the Chair. This is not reform legislation; it is a deformity. How can anyone in his right mind say that this 707-page monstrosity is reform when the first tax bill in 1917 had 10 pages and 20 sections? This has 707 pages not including the amendments. This is supposed to be the age of education, communication, technology, streamlined government, the whiz kids, the super-gang in the Prime Minister's office and the Privy Council office. They are supposed to have all the answers.

This bill is confused deformity. Anyone who thinks otherwise does not have the sanity that I think members had at one time in order to get this far in the House. This legislation is the arteriosclerosis, because farmers, farm delegations and other important Canadians are taking so much time, effort and energy trying to understand it. They try to interpret and react to the bill in their own way. The productive forces in this country are not being directed toward producing a bigger and better Canada but are being used in a negative way to figure out and work around the provisions of this bill. That is why I say it is arteriosclerosis. Instead of growing, expanding and producing a vibrant economy, this bill is clogging the pores of this country, the political stream and the pores and arteries of agriculture, business, labour unions, housewives and other segments of society.

I say in a general way that this Benson's bill, or Benson's bumble will become known as the arteriosclerosis. We are going to reach a high-water mark. When the government process starts, Canadians will grumble; they will not be able to redirect their lives in order to conform to this bill.

Mr. Benson: Will the hon. member permit a question? He has been talking about arteriosclerosis all evening. Is this another name for Bob Stanfield?

Mr. Stanfield: You have to do better than that, Ben.

Mr. Nowlan: If my leader had anything to do with organization and implementation of legislation we would never be faced with this deformity on the floor of the House. This bill perpetuates a ridiculous situation because Canadians are suppose to understand it. I shall come back to the minister in the way I could. While he has many faults, one of them is not lack of geniality. He certainly has geniality. I only wish his mental competence matched his geniality. If it did, he would never have tried to impose this deformity upon the House and upon yourself, Mr. Chairman.

• (8:40 p.m.)

The Chairman: I would remind hon. members that we are in committee of the whole and that in these proceedings we should make a particular effort to be relevant. It seems to the Chair that we are not advancing the work of the committee. There have been interjections from either side, and possibly the remarks of the hon. member prompted the intervention by the Minister of Finance. Neither side is helping the Chair.

May I remind hon. members that we are now engaged in considering section 28 which deals with the computing of farm business income, with section 29 which has to do with the basic herd, with section 30 which provides for deductions in assessing taxable income for land clearance, levelling and drainage, and section 31 which is concerned with losses which may be deducted when computing the income of a farmer. I have been very lenient with the hon. member who has the floor but I would now ask him to be relevant to the subjects we are discussing.

Mr. Nowlan: I shall return more particularly to the four sections now under discussion, Mr. Chairman. As Your Honour has pointed out, the first has to do with the general subject of computing farm income, the transition from cash system of accounting to an accrual system. There will certainly be pressure upon the farmer to move from one system to the other. Section 30 deals with levelling land, and tile drainage. The Minister of Finance should be careful when dealing with this section. I would suggest he clear the land, level the land and put in some tile drainage so that he can take his remarks, bury them and drain them into a cesspool. I am sure we could put the Minister of Finance on a hobby farm so that he could obtain some income from it and, as a result, take a personal interest in this legislation.

With those frivolities disposed of, I should like to discuss the proposed changes very briefly. It is quite apparent that we are being asked to abandon the basic herd concept for no understandable reason. The Senate committee, in a unique document which it issued on November 4 in anticipation of the bill passing this House, stated it was aware of no reason for not continuing to recognize the basic herd for what it is, namely, a capital asset.

The Cattlemen's Association also questions, in its brief, the decision to phase-out the breeding herd concept despite the difficulties it might have involved with provincial administration. They maintain the principle that the herd is a capital asset to be preserved. Whether we call it a basic herd or a capital asset, there should be some recognition that these animals are a capital asset on a farm in the same way as a piece of machinery and that the same rights and rules ought to apply to it. There seems to be no justifiable explanation of the government's position, and I hope the minister or the parliamentary secretary will be able to fill in the gaps in this respect.

Under the transition rules, basic herds which have already been established will continue to be treated as capital assets to the extent that gains accrued at the commencement of the new system will not be subject to tax. There can therefore be little point in treating gains accruing thereafter in the same manner as the profits on the sale of inventory or stock-in-trade. The facts require the basic herd to be regarded as analogous to other capital assets of a farmer such as land and orchards and the fixed capital assets of any other business.

A farmer wishing to acquire a herd or a major addition to an existing herd takes money out of his capital. To proceed on an accrual basis with an annual valuation of the herd is often impractical. If a farmer is on a cash basis of accounting he will experience losses in a number of years for which the averaging provision will not fully compensate.

An hon. Member: You are reading.

Mr. Nowlan: Yes, I am reading. These are very explicit notes. I suggest that all hon. members when they speak on this bill on something called a capital herd, straight-line depreciation and all these other complex forms of legislative poetry, should stick to clear notes, otherwise they will wallow around in a swampland just as these 700 pages wallow around in a swampland. I return to my basic notes. The failure of the government to treat a unique capital asset of a farmer, that is to say, his animals, as a form of capital subject to the usual rules respecting the taxation of capital gains, must therefore be regarded as discriminatory. The young farmer, especially, should be permitted to establish a basic herd and his expenses in this direction should be regarded as a capital investment.

I hope the Minister of Finance will contribute in a constructive way to this debate and explain how a young farmer, not necessarily one young in years but a farmer who wants to become established and acquire a basic herd, will be able to do so when the herd is no longer considered as a capital asset. I suggest that under the conditions now proposed he will not be able to do so. If the basic herd concept is abandoned he will be locked out and those farmers who have already built up basic herds will be locked in. There will be no way in which a new farmer, be he young or old, can move into this very necessary area.

I repeat that the expense incurred by a young farmer in establishing a basic herd should be regarded as a capital investment. The proceeds of sale from that basic herd cannot equitably be regarded as income for the year in which he sells. If the present tax proposal is not modified, the farmer will realize the proceeds of sale as income immediately on disposal of the herd. Farmers who wish to build up their herd year by year, reporting the cost of acquisition as income as they do now, will not under the proposed changes be able to enlarge their capital base in animals.

I suggest this will have a restrictive and negative impact on the agricultural community rather than a positive, constructive impact that the minister and some of his spokesmen have maintained it embodies, and that this provision in particular will have a depressing effect on agriculture. I would appreciate the minister or the parliamentary secretary explaining how a young man will be able to establish a new herd under the provisions proposed. That, Mr. Chairman, is all I have to say about the basic herd concept contained in section 29.

Coming to the next section under discussion, section 31 dealing with so-called hobby farms, even though the definition is rather loose—

The Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I do so to advise him and the committee that his time has expired.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, we are interested in these provisions dealing with agriculture primarily from a mundane point of view. For many years the Liberal party, through its legislation, has been saying that like everything else agriculture must become industrialized, that there is only room in this country for large, integrated farming operations. Most of the legislation brought in by the Liberal party during the past 20 years has been directed to that end. As a result, certain difficulties have been created.

If we are to treat agriculture in the same way as every other segment of the economy, then the Liberal party is right and it should be incorporated. Agriculture should consist of large farming operations. The sale of agricultural products should be sufficient to produce enough income to maintain this industrialized segment of the economy. The old concept that it was nice to produce cheap food and to make it available to all individuals in Canada regardless of income is now being thrown out.

The fact is that no other industry except the fisheries has the same low individual return as agriculture. Bell Canada comes before one of our commissions to ask for an increase in rates in order to meet capital expenditures or to pay dividends to its shareholders. Last year Bell paid something like 91 cents on the first quarter, 93 cents on the second quarter and 95 cents on the third quarter. I may be wrong because I am quoting those figures from memory.

Mr. Francis: Would the hon. member permit a question? Is he quoting earnings or dividend rates?

Mr. Peters: These are dividends paid on the shares.

Mr. Francis: By Bell Canada?

Mr. Peters: Yes.

Mr. Francis: Then the hon. member is mistaken.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Ottawa West rose to ask a question because the hon. member for Timiskaming was making certain comparisons. As I explained earlier, hon. members should as much as possible try to speak relevant to the sections before the committee.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, just because the hon. member for Ottawa West asked me a question does not mean I was out of order. The point I was making was that here we have a company incorporated under Canadian legislation which we allow to make a 9.2 per cent profit each year on its operations. I suppose there are very few industrialized operations in Canada operating on less than a 10 per cent profit margin per year on capital investment. I think it is safe to say that the average farmer has a declared taxable income at the end of the year of about 1 per cent of his capital investment, and this is why I think he should be placed in a special category.

If we were to reorganize agriculture in this country and give farmers a return of 10 per cent on their capital investment, I do not think there would be any problem at all for family farms to save enough money to pay valuation tax, estate tax and any other kind of tax we might try to collect when farms are transferred from one generation to another, from one farmer to another or when the property is disposed of in some way. However, we do not do this. We established a long time ago that in order for agriculture to develop it was necessary for a farmer, his wife and children to work on the farm. As a result of their labour the enterprise increased in value, size and efficiency because everything that the farmer, his wife and children earned was plowed back into the business as a capital investment.

[The Chairman.]

We are now discussing the problem of a breeding herd. I am not sure how a breeding herd was established in the first place but it is one of the capital assets of a farmer. Over the years it is true that if a family worked hard and the farming operation was successful, the basic herd would be upgraded. However, the income tax authorities can be very tough if they discover just one extra cow in the basic herd. They would object if a farmer kept an extra two or three heifers to see whether or not one of them would be fit to join the basic herd. For example, on a number of occasions they objected to the number of calves my father kept as possible additions to his basic herd.

This type of cattle is easily identifiable. Most cows in a basic herd are registered and have a better pedigree than most of us adults. They have a social security number traceable further back than the social security numbers we have. So a basic herd is an easily identifiable asset as far as a farmer is concerned. This is why I am worried about what is going to happen to the small farm, the establishment of a basic herd, the improvement of the herd and, as a result, the farming operation itself.

It has been said, and I think everyone will agree, that quite often a farmer is poor all his life but he dies rich. This is partly true. I know of no other endeavour where practically the total wages earned in a lifetime are plowed back. Perhaps when Carter said that a buck was a buck he was right, and I am not sure that our tax structure will not eventually be based on that precept. But the fact is that if we adopt this change in the Income Tax Act we will see the end of the family farm at least by the end of the next generation. This will mean the end of a whole way of life in our rural economy—the small grocery store, drug store and all the small businesses associated with a farming enterprise.

The industrial farm of the future, the industrial farm of the Liberal party, will be the type of farm that will buy wholesale in very large quantities and will make a profit on its production. The integration will be complete in respect of purchases as well as the utilization and sale of its products. That may be the Liberal way. It may be the way of the future. However, I believe we will lose something in the process. We must make an exception if we are to maintain the family farm unit. This is not a unit which has been a great problem in Canada.

We have the lowest food costs of any country which has a standard of living equal to Canada's. We do not subsidize the production of agricultural commodities. They are subsidized by the farmer, by his children and by his wife. They subsidize the very food that is consumed by the people of our nation. This has not been a very expensive process. It is true many farmers have not paid income tax, but if you travel around in this country, Mr. Chairman, I am sure you must be aware that farms have modernized, that farmers have been willing to make the expenditures necessary to provide a highly mechanized farm unit and that they have been willing to increase their basic herd content and thus have been able to upgrade their stock.

Farmers have been able to conserve their land. They have put fertilizer on it. They have done all these things mainly at the expense of receiving an income from the farm which should be in keeping with the investment they have made over the years. In many cases while changing our tax laws we have made it not only possible but mandatory that we lose some of our best agricultural land. We have done this through our tax structure, by allowing high taxes in respect of agricultural land and by claiming in many cases that land adjacent to a city should be used for subdivision purposes. We have allowed and made necessary the selling of such land to municipalities for subdivision at the expense of the Canadian public.

We might consider the Niagara escarpment, located in an area which could produce fresh fruit. However, if one went to a market this summer or into a local groceteria to buy fruit from the Niagara peninsula I doubt very much that this would be possible in many cases. Most of the fruit would have been from the United States because we have disposed of almost all the agricultural land that has produced for Canadians a very reasonably priced product by allowing taxes on such land to increase to the extent that it was no longer possible for farmers to retain it as a family farm unit.

A great controversy is raging between economists in the taxation branch. This was evident in the presentation of the white paper and other documents which have been presented by all kinds of interested parties. This controversy has involved the exceptions that could be made in the agricultural field without destroying the basic concept of tax reform. There are 264 members of this House who should be interested, in agricultural production. This question affects every Canadian. If we are to impose taxes as if this were an industry, then we will produce an industrial agricultural segment in our economy which obviously should have the same kind of profit motive as other segments of the economy.

Many small farms today in the province of Ontario—this is also true of the province of Quebec—have a resale value as a viable agricultural unit of probably $250,000. That is a good deal of money. It is also very interesting to consider the number of occasions in the past year when farms in many areas of Ontario and Quebec were foreclosed by the Canadian Farm Credit Corporation. These foreclosures were necessary because there was not a sufficient margin of profit. If the income tax department expects every year to take its share of the capitalization of the family farm unit, it will find that all it will be doing is killing the goose that lays the golden egg and the general public will have to compensate for that through increased costs. If Loblaws or any other major integrator is to own the family farm and produce a major portion of the agricultural production for consumption in Canada, it will operate in a way that will make the income tax department very satisfied.

As I indicated in respect of Bell Telephone Company—and this is the case with most industrial corporations—it will operate with a 10 per cent mark-up. They have the money. They prepare for the tax they will have to pay. They will not have to take a large slice out of the farm income. I do not know how the big farmer or even the integrator will relate the price of his commodity to the market so that he can earn the kind of income that will give him enough to pay his taxes and the other things he has to provide.

It would be interesting if the parliamentary secretary would give us an indication, with regard to the few years in which the Canada Pension Plan has been in operation, how many farmers have earned sufficient income to make payments under that plan. These payments are geared to income. I think a large number of farmers would not have earned that kind of income and therefore have not been contributing under the Canada Pension Plan.

This is all part of the parcel of the family farm. The government may consider it is something else and that they are not abusing the farmer. The establishment of a basic herd really is equivalent to establishing factory machinery. I agree that it is not depreciated. You cannot have it both ways. Hopefully, the basic herd would appreciate. It would be a very poor farmer who would have 40 milk cows and did not find at the end of 20 years that he had 40 much better cows in his basic herd. Something would be wrong if he did not. So there is an appreciation. There is appreciation in everything else. The cost of living goes up, the price of land and everything else goes up, and it would be very surprising if the price of his basic herd did not appreciate due to his entrepreneurial skill and the up-breeding of his cattle.

I am not suggesting that we depreciate cattle every year as you do factory machinery. The basic herd concept is such that when you establish such a herd you maintain it and it does not depreciate. You are not asking for depreciation, but also you are not asking to evaluate periodically and to pay a capital gains tax on it because you have stood still in a changing world in terms of the industry.

It may also surprise the committee to know that this happens in other fields. My brother bought a tractor 25 years ago and on several occasions the implement dealer offered him more for it as a trade-in than he initially paid for it. After 25 years it is worth more as a second-hand tractor than it was when it was new. But he depreciated it over the years until there was no value left in it. He could have benefited from another tax system when he traded-in that tractor, because obviously he had a greater asset than when he bought it.

If the government are not interested in establishing in Canada industrial agriculture, with all the problems that will flow from it in the changing environment of rural Canada, if they are not interested in providing food to consumers who carry all the costs necessary to run a viable industrial development in any other segment of the economy, if they are not interested in increasing the price of our commodities by five or ten times, I strongly urge the parliamentary secretary, in discussion with his officials, with the Cattlemen's Association, with the Federation of Agriculture and all the other agencies representing farmers to consider making exceptions for agriculture so as to maintain the family farm.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, Canada is facing a crisis in agriculture. At a time when we would expect sense from some of our best agricultural brains—I understand we have no less than 40 PhD's in Ottawa working on the problem of agriculture—and to be led out of the morass of bureaucracy and into some common sense, we are being led into a whole mess of socialistic nonsense. I do not blame the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Woolliams: I do.

Mr. Bigg: The Minister of Finance is nothing but a Little Sir Echo of his leader. The Minister of Finance is a genial gentleman but I find nothing genial in the words of his master. I hold in my hand the new gospel of the Liberal party according to Pierre Elliott Trudeau. The book is entitled "Federalism and the French Canadians". It is not written about French Canadians; it is written about the complete take-over of Canada by a carefully thought out strategy and carefully worked out tactics. I will not spend all my time referring to this book. I just want to introduce it to you, Mr. Chairman, and through you to the committee.

On page 124 we find a chapter on the practice and theory of federalism. Our minister's leader sets out in minute detail how to destroy not only agriculture but most of our democratic institutions by masterful use of socialistic strategy. He himself does not pretend to have invented this method. On page 125 he quotes no less an authority on the subject than one Mao Tse-tung. We read the following statement at the bottom of the page with regard to strategy and tactics:

> The revolutionary bases, in spite of their insignificant size, are a great political force and strongly oppose the power of Kuomintang—

Take out "Kuomintang" and put in "the power of the federal government." Of course, when this was written he was not the federal government; now he is. It continues:

> —which spreads over vast regions—

Instead, put "from ocean to ocean, our great and beloved Dominion".

> Revolution and revolutionary wars proceed from birth to development, from small to large, from lack of power to seizure of power—

This is not an old book; it was reprinted in 1968 on the eve of the taking over of the leadership of the Liberal party by our Prime Minister—the leader of the Liberal party not the socialist party. I do not think the Liberals themselves have read the book and they do not know in what camp they are. But I beg you, Mr. Chairman, and every member of the House, to get a copy of this book. It costs only $2.50. It is a good investment. If you read it you will probably find what one or two members of your party have done since they read it. They had to decide whether they belonged to the right or to the left.

What has this to do with Bill C-259? I will tell you what it has to do with it. Bill C-259 is a small step toward tax reform but it is a tremendous leap forward toward complete and utter socialism in Canada. The confusion is rampant and it is not accidental, it is planned confusion. We are told on the one hand to make agriculture viable, to enlarge farms and to incorporate. What happens then?

According to this bill, if you incorporate you will lose the power to average your income.

At a time when agriculture is sagging, when world markets are down and when world prices are down, what do we find? We find the 40 experts on agriculture slavishly writing nonsense at the behest of the socialist Prime Minister, nonsense which is slavishly put in by the Minister of Finance who himself does not know the purport of his own bill. To prove it I may point out that we have more than 100 amendments to the bill. The bill, the child, was dead before it was born. I say it is a good thing. Should it be revived? No, it should never be smacked on the bottom. The people who wrote the bill should be smacked on the bottom and it is our constant desire to smack that bottom until it is beautifully red, as red as that which lay behind the idea that agriculture should be taken out of the hands of individuals and free entrepreneurs in Canada and, instead, run by bureaucracy.

There might be an argument in favour of this bureaucratic running of Canadian agriculture if it in fact meant cheaper food for the Canadian people. But what has happened since the government took over the running of agriculture? We find prices going higher and higher. Butter has gone up four or five cents a pound. It is so high that the working people of Canada from whom we hear constant complaints can no longer afford one of the basic products of this country and we have to import butter.

• (9:20 p.m.)

In this process, what have we done to the small farmer, to the little housewife on the farm who used to have a broken cream jug on the mantlepiece in which she put her Christmas money and from which she took money to help her husband buy twine at threshing time? She can no longer go to the cream jug because apparently we have agreed that we want largeness and efficiency; we want the corporate farm. Yet in this bill, even though the government wants larger farms its avowed policy is to make sure that even if farms become larger they cannot make a great corporate profit.

Mr. Danson: Everybody can have a bigger jug.

Mr. Bigg: I know what I am talking about. There are several thousand small farmers in my constituency whose wives have a little, broken cream jug somewhere. But now there is nothing in the jug and they are worried. The answer is not for them to move to Edmonton, Calgary or any other city and try to make a living there.

One of my dreams from childhood has been that when I finished being a policeman, a soldier and a Member of Parliament I could get a piece of land and help the little woman fill that little cream jug until it was time to buy Christmas presents for the children or grandchildren. But I have not seen in this bill, nor in any bill that has come before this House in the last seven years, anything that provides the small farmer with the kind of security he once had. There is nothing in this bill that offers the small farmer one bit of relief.

On Friday I begged, on behalf of the small businessman, for a chance for the woman who helps him behind the counter. I begged that he be given a little tax relief. I would like to see in this bill some small step forward in tax relief but all I can see amounts to little more than one inch forward. Being charitable to the minister and his minions, I say that if there is a small step forward in this bill I would like to have them explain it to me and then I would apologize. But I see nothing in it except that each year several thousand poor farmers will have to go to the wall, sell out to corporate farms, and those corporate farms in turn will find themselves in a bind, owing money to the farm machine companies and to the government itself, with $75,000 loans being given out here, there and all over the place, with no guarantee of prices, no guarantee of markets and no relief from overtaxation.

One of my colleagues gave figures the other day, which I have no reason to disbelieve, showing that the three levels of government through their departments are taking 46 cents out of every Canadian dollar. The people who are doing this think they have some God-given right to spend the money we have earned. No such right exists anywhere, under natural law or any other law.

I ask hon. members opposite to read further into this book. They would do better to read it instead of heckling me. I ask them to read these 26 pages, and then I ask any one of them to get to his feet and say that this is not a complete blueprint for the socialization of agriculture and every other industry in Canada. It is there for them to read. I would like to know how many of them have read this book written by their own chief. If they have not the courage to read it, then at least let them have the courage to listen and I will read it to them.

I now wish to deal with the proposals concerning the basic herd. There is a pretence made under section 28 and other sections to retain the basic herd. But after you have read the bill thoroughly you know that the basic herd is doomed. The government says, "Oh, don't take away the basic herd right away. Leave the pretence there. Don't do things any faster than the people will stand." That is in the book. That is the strategy. Do it slowly, inch by inch. Cut off one toe at a time. Don't take away the basic herd at one go. Just stop the young farmer coming up. Stop the son or grandson from acquiring a basic herd. Let it be spelled out in the statute books that nobody will be allowed to start a homestead in Canada in the future and raise his herd from 10 to 20, then to 30 and get it up to the level demanded in other parts of this bill. The government demands large herds but it will not allow new herds to be built up.

An hon. Member: Using the old buggy-whip.

Mr. Bigg: If I had an old buggy-whip I would know where to use it to good advantage. My mother once had a buggy-whip which she kept in the kitchen for those who did not pull their weight. I suggest that hon. members opposite should do their homework. They should fill their own woodbox, and they can start by reading this book. If they want copies, I will buy them.

This is supposed to be the age when we all come together. This is the age when the government consults the farmers. What do the farm unions say about the basic herd? The Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the Saskatchewan Farmers' Union, the Alberta Farmers' Union, the National Farmers' Union, the cattlebreeders associations of Alberta and of Saskatchewan are unanimous in saying the basic herd is essential to a viable farm.

Where is the consultation? Who will be consulted by the government? To whom will the government listen? Whenever there is an opportunity to consult and listen, what kind of action do we get? We get the same kind of action as we had with regard to the grain stabilization act, when the ministers of agriculture from the prairie provinces came down here to discuss Bill C-244. What happened? The government immediately panicked into emergency measures. There was a threat of blackmail—$100 million or nothing. But the government was scared off that by the action of four small farmers who decided to test in the courts of Canada whether an arrogant minister of the Crown had the right to break the law. And thank goodness, at half past 11—or was it a quarter to 12 on the political time clock—the government decided it was just as well to back down. It knew the people of Canada were not yet ready to be bullied into the corner.

Mr. Mahoney: Is this under section 28?

Mr. Bigg: Yes, under section 28, section 29 and the rest of this preposterous document. It is all socialism in disguise, and very poor disguise. Mr. Chairman, hon. members to my left in the NDP are at least honest about their position. They say openly, "We are socialists. We believe in taking over all means of production. We had our Regina manifesto. We nailed our colours to the mast and we said, "This is where we stand."

The government does not always tell us where it stands. It prentends to be in favour of tax reform but all it is trying to do is take over the agricultural industry. That is what this bill and the amendments are all about. How are you going to do it? When are you going to do it? In what miserable, creeping ways are you going to do it? I do not like any part of it. The basic herd proposal is only one part of it, Mr. Chairman. It is not tax reform at all; it is confiscation by statute.

We have just under six pounds of amendments, and still the bill is unclear. We are taking a great leap which means that it will no longer be possible for any free enterpriser in Canada to own a piece of land and make a living. With inflation and rocketing costs, the small entrepreneur farmer will not be allowed to remain in business—and all in the name of efficiency! Where in this bill is the incentive to enlarge, to produce more and cheaper food, if the farmer is not allowed to retain a modest income?

• (9.30 p.m.)

It is well known that the small family farm cannot afford to incorporate. Most family farmers are so deeply in debt already as a result of rising costs of machinery and the drop in prices of products that the only alternatives are to sell out or move onto a larger farm. Farm unions are discouraged. The government prefers things this way, with the propaganda from the eggheads—

Mr. Broadbent: What? A question of privilege.

Mr. Bigg: My friend, you must have a head before you can call it an egg. This worship of bigness will not pay; it is not succeeding. It is true that people are leaving the farm, but food is not cheaper nor is farming more efficient. The farmer is not getting out of debt; indeed, his debts are larger and his problems greater. If the farm unions agreed with the government I would say they had been brainwashed. The trend should be the other way—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I do so to advise him that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee agree to allow the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Deputy Chairman: I hear some negatives; there is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Chairman, in rising to speak—

An hon. Member: Who is winning in Assiniboia, Jack?

An hon. Member: Not the Grits.

Mr. Horner: I am winning. My wagers have all been well placed. Mr. Chairman, rather than make a speech I should like to ask a question or two to clarify some questions in my mind. Regarding the change in the basic herd concept, could the parliamentary secretary indicate whether I am correct in assuming that this provision was brought about because of the introduction of the capital gains tax? I am referring to section 29 (2).

Mr. Mahoney: Yes, Mr. Chairman. It is the view of the government that with the introduction of a capital gains tax the need for the basic herd is greatly reduced or eliminated.

Mr. Horner: That is what I thought, and I note that from the point of view of the government the need is eliminated. I have another question with regard to this concept of a basic herd and the capital gains tax. Am I correct in the assumption that the family unit will be encouraged to incorporate in order to assist in the transfer from one generation to another?

Mr. Mahoney: That does not necessarily follow. There are some advantages to incorporation now with the estate tax that permits intergenerational transfers perhaps in a smoother way. It may be that this will continue to be desirable, but basically I think the bill is neutral in that respect. I do not think the introduction of capital gains into the tax base can be divorced from the elimination of estate and gift taxes at the federal level.

The net cash result of projections that I have seen would indicate that less tax will be payable in respect of capital gains than in respect of estate taxes unless the farm unit or ranch appreciates in the order of something like 10 per cent a year. At that point you cross over the line to the point where the capital gains inclusion in the tax base may result in more tax than under the present estate tax. On the projections I have seen, this applies to all situations including those in Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia where the current succession duties are presumed to be continuing, to the situation in Alberta where it is assumed that the province will not pick up the federal estate tax that has been relinquished and will not institute its own, to the situation in Manitoba where we understand the provincial government intends to take up the tax room that the federal government has vacated.

Mr. Horner: I have another one or two short questions, Mr. Chairman. The parliamentary secretary has said that the introduction of capital gains should not be divorced from the concept of estate taxes and their removal. Would it be fair to assume that the capital gains tax would not be income declared operative until there had been negotiations with the provinces? This is a very important point because of the vacuum in some of the provinces now—in Ontario, for instance, and Saskatchewan where there has been a change of government and it is my impression that they will introduce an estate tax. Alberta has no estate tax, or in effect is refunding 75 per cent of the present estate taxes.

Would it be fair to suggest that this section not be proceeded with? Can the agricultural industry expect that it will not be proceeded with until there is a general announcement or clarification by the provinces?

Mr. Mahoney: The federal government has indicated to those provinces that do not have machinery for the collection of death duties—that is all of the provinces except British Columbia, Quebec and Ontario—that the federal government would be willing to continue to act as collecting agent under certain terms and conditions. However, the federal government has very emphatically and explicitly rejected representations that the tax reform package be deferred until such time as the provincial governments have an opportunity to establish the machinery to enable them to move into this field when they choose.

Mr. Horner: Then several months ago, when the minister in his opening remarks suggested that in fact it was the government's intention to do away with the Estate Tax Act and to bring in capital gains and that the one would offset the other, really he was saying that the amount the government would receive from the capital gains tax is only equal to that portion which the federal government received under the Estate Tax Act; in other words, 25 per cent of the Estate Tax Act? Would that be a correct assumption?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, the introduction of capital gains into the income tax base is part of income tax reform. The decision to discontinue collection of estate and gift taxes is an independent decision. I joined these subjects together. Certainly they must be taken together when one considers the impact or influence of taxation on intergeneration transfers. Basically, however, the two decisions are independent. I do not think the Minister of Finance ever connected the two in any statement he made, although I have seen them connected in public utterances and press statements.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to prolong this discussion but the hon. member a few minutes ago connected the two together and said they could not be divorced. The Minister of Finance said in his budget speech of June 18, I think—I am not certain when he said it but it was in a budget speech—that we are getting out of the estate tax field and in its place we are bringing in the capital gains tax.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: Can the parliamentary secretary give the committee an estimate of how much money the government hopes to net from the capital gains tax, if revenue from that tax is not to equal approximately 25 per cent of revenue from estate taxes? How much will the capital gains tax bring in? We want to know because here we are bringing in mass changes that will affect the whole industry. Could the parliamentary secretary give us some idea in that regard?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, if I may use a semi-agricultural term, I think the hon. member is putting the cart before the horse in terms of the relationship between the withdrawal from estate and gift taxes on the one hand and the introduction of capital gains tax on the other. It was thought that since the government had made the policy decision to introduce capital gains to the income tax base some relief with regard to estate taxes obviously had to be given. The decision was made, of course, ultimately to discontinue collection of estate and gift taxes, the double-whammy of the white paper debate, if I may use a popular expression. That taxation would have impact at the time of the death of a taxpayer.

As to the specific question regarding the expected revenue from the collection of capital gains taxes, on the basis of 1972 incomes it is anticipated that in the first year of the system $50 million will be collected from corporations and $80 million from individuals.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to prolong this discussion. I am wondering if we could agree on another concept since we seem to be getting along very well. Is it logical to assume that the capital gains tax which is to apply to the basic herd and to other items will bring in increasing revenues as the years go along? The parliamentary secretary mentioned that $50 million would be collected in the first year from corporations and $80 million from individuals.

I do not want to be out of the ball park completely. Is it logical to assume that the revenue the federal government expects from the capital gains tax will increase as the years go on? Judging from the past performance of our economy, is it fair to assume that revenues from the capital gains tax will increase?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, since the provisions of the bill do not permit the capital gains tax to be applied retroactively to gains accrued or realized before valuation day, the tax in the first year would apply only to gains from valuation day to the date of realization. So it will probably take five years for the system to mature and for the ordinary number of transactions involving capital assets and capital gains revenues to level out. These revenues should increase for the first five years and then reach some sort of norm.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the frankness with which the parliamentary secretary is helping the committee to understand this legislation. May I ask another question? Why should these revenues level off after five years, since the capital gains provisions in effect after valuation day would apply to land, cattle, various assets and residences which increase by more than $1,000 per year? They will apply to all increases in capital values. Surely these values will tend to increase by so much every year after valuation day. I do not understand why we should reach the norm in five years. Why would such revenues not continue to grow? You might reach a plateau in terms of the number of transactions or turnovers; however, in essence, would not revenues continue to grow every year?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, the five-year period is based on the experience in the United States, which we may relate to these provisions. That period is a guesstimate, if I may say so. We expect, from their experience and from studies that the Department of National Revenue has carried out here, that by the end of five years the ordinary number of capital transactions will probably level out and that we shall obtain some sort of normal level of revenue from that source.

Mr. Gleave: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I do not wish to curtail this discussion, but I recall that when we started discussion of this section today the hon. member for Battle River, I believe, requested that the sections dealing with capital gains and inheritance be brought before the committee at the same time as the sections we are discussing, because all these sections are very closely associated and deal with the question of herds and procedures of taxation that will be followed with respect to farms. If I remember correctly, the parliamentary secretary pointed out that the leaders of the parties had not agreed to this and therefore he was not prepared to enter into a discussion on the matter.

As I say, I do not want to curtail the discussion we are embarked upon because I think it is most relevant. However, the parliamentary secretary must adopt one course or the other. I only bring this to your attention, Mr. Chairman, since you might bring it to the attention of the House leaders who could determine how this matter could be handled.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Chairman, I knew that I might be treading on dangerous ground when I opened this discussion. Since I am one who likes to stick to House rules, I led nervously and gently to the question of how this tax would apply to the basic herd. I wanted to know whether the question I had raised was or was not related to the concept of capital gains. The parliamentary secretary said yes, it was related. Now I want to proceed one step further. I think the parliamentary secretary was comparing the capital gains tax provisions tax in Canada with those of the United States.

You have to lead into these things before you can get to where you want to go. I will now get to my next question. Does the parliamentary secretary agree to our imposing a capital gains tax on cattle similar to that in the United States?

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Horner: I am just asking for the reasoning and logic.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member is taking advantage of a point of order to ask this question. The parliamentary secretary also wants to say a few words on the point of order.

Mr. Mahoney: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman. If the hon. member checks Hansard he will see that the point which the hon. member for Battle River wished to include was the question of corporate farms. The indication at that point was that it was up to the House leaders as to what block they might consider. I was certainly not aware of any particular sections of the bill that deal with corporate farms as opposed to corporate anything else.

In the spirit of the debate we are entering into I am quite prepared to try to range over the field of taxation of agricultural enterprises. I do not think there has been very much in the speeches we have heard until now to indicate that we are dealing strictly within the terms of the four sections before us. I suggest, on the basis that the points are important, that they must be dealt with at some point during consideration in committee of the whole. Perhaps if we deal with them in the context of these four sections being our opportunity to deal with agricultural matters specifically, we will not have to re-cover the same ground when the particular sections involved come up for discussion.

I say this on the basis that the special averaging provisions applicable to farmers and fishermen have already passed the House. How you can talk about taxation of farmers without bringing section 119 back into the debate, I do not know. This is provided Your Honour does not feel we are straying too far afield. Certainly we on this side are quite prepared to talk about taxation of agricultural enterprises generally.

Mr. Gleave: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, it was not my purpose to prevent discussion ranging into this area. My purpose was to point out that if we were to range into this area, those responsible for planning the business of this House and which sections of this bill shall be before us at a given time should have included the sections dealing with capital gains and estate taxes at this time. That is my point, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The Chair feels that the point of order might be useful to the committee although it does not have to rule on it. It is my feeling that the questions put were useful to members on all sides of the House. This will permit a better discussion on a very complicated subject, although the Chair can only be guided by agreement among House leaders or those working out the schedule of work of the committee and trying to be as fair as possible. One of the questions I must ask myself, in fairness, is how many questions I should allow the hon. member for Crowfoot to ask without depriving the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar of an opportunity to intervene.

Mr. Horner: I appreciate your concern, Mr. Chairman. I assure Your Honour that if anyone wants the floor to discuss these sections I will gladly contain my curiosity.

I wish to ask the question I was slowly approaching when the untimely interjection broke my train of reasoning. I will try and give a quick synopsis of the point I had reached. We were dealing with the application of the capital gains tax on the livestock industry, the purpose and reasoning behind the application of the capital gains tax and the possibility that there may be a growth factor in the application of that tax. The parliamentary secretary suggested that the best guesstimate he could give the House is that it would tend to reach a norm in five years. I believe he is being slightly optimistic in that figure. I think it will probably level out closer to ten years, and I would settle on nine.

Your Honour might ask what the capital gains tax has to do with the livestock industry. This was the question of the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar. I had just brought the parliamentary secretary to the point where he said he was basing his calculations on the American capital gains tax and the returns derived from it. My next question is whether the government is prepared to entertain and possibly accept an application of the capital gains tax on the livestock industry similar to the capital gains tax imposed in the United States. Basically, they have a situation where you can opt for either a short gain or a long period. There is written in a kind of roll-in provision with regard to capital gains in the livestock industry. I now pose that question.

I apologize for being a little lengthy. The parliamentary secretary may not be in a position to answer yes or no. If so, I ask him to please not answer no. Can the parliamentary secretary give the committee some idea on this? Has he studied it? Has the government looked at the application of the basic herd concept rather than bring in its dissolution? Has he looked at the capital gains tax as it applies to American cattlemen, and can he give us an opinion on that question? Perhaps then we will better understand why the government did not accept it. In light of the guesstimate being based on the United States system, maybe we would be better off with their system. I wonder if the parliamentary secretary will give us his views in that regard.

Mr. Mahoney: First, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is perhaps giving undue significance to my reference to the United States. With regard to the United States system I was referring to the length of time it would probably take our capital gains system to mature. That was strictly a timing matter. It is not basically related to the system itself but, rather, to the fact that you have a capital gains tax and how long it will take to reach what might be regarded as a normal plateau in terms of revenue and transactions.

I must confess that I am not sufficiently familiar with the United States system of capital gains tax on this particular type of asset to discuss it with the hon. member. Therefore I can neither say yes or not. I suspect that the debate on this section may be continuing tomorrow. Perhaps by eleven o'clock tomorrow I will have had an opportunity for some self-education.

Mr. Horner: That is why I cautioned the parliamentary secretary. I am very reluctant to accept the answer "No" when a person does not have knowledge of the situation. I thank the parliamentary secretary for assuring me that he will look into the matter. I then ask him this question: what good is his guesstimate if he stands up within the next minute or so and says that our capital gains tax is not related to the United States capital gains tax? It seems to me it would be of little value.

I know the parliamentary secretary does not have to be well versed in the livestock industry, but this bill has been before us a long time. Section 29 deals with the basic herd concept and he and his officials know that this was a tax concession fought for by the livestock men, for value received and amply used, particularly by men who are reaching retirement age. The bill has been under study for a long while and surely the officials at least have considered the system of capital gains taxation employed in the United States as it affects the livestock industry.

The bill before us did not appear from nowhere. Surely we have the right to inspect an outline of the situation before we are asked to pass this section. Subject to correction, as a man engaged in the livestock industry I would much prefer the United States capital gains tax system to the system which is proposed here. I have other questions I should like to ask, but if the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar is anxious to take the floor I shall say no more at this time.

Mr. Mahoney: Perhaps I might say a word in clarification of this point before we move on to another plateau. The United States experience is one which basically involves timing. When we talk about a capital gains tax system and speculate about when it will reach what might be regarded as a norm of transactions and, hence, of revenue, it is really a question of acquisition of holdings, the length of time in which property of one sort or another is held and the disposition of the same, at which point the tax becomes applicable. We believe that the United States society is comparable to our own in this area and that their experience is valid for this purpose, which is not, of course, to indicate that the system we present is by any means identical with theirs.

Mr. Horner: The point the parliamentary secretary has not noticed is that the United States system involves a time factor which is built in with application to the livestock industry. A taxpayer can opt for a short-term or a long-term application of the tax. This is where the number of years in the guesstimate is involved. Would the parliamentary secretary have one of his officials do a little study on this point overnight?

Mr. Mahoney: That is what I have undertaken to do.

Mr. Horner: I appreciate that.

Mr. Gleave: Would the parliamentary secretary comment on a situation which as I see it may place the individual farmer in a difficult position? If we approve a capital gains tax as proposed, and if at the same time certain provinces decide to impose an estate tax, would the hon. gentleman agree to consider the position of the individual entrepreneur farmer as against that of the corporations? Would he care to consider the possibility of the survival of each of those two structures, bearing in mind that the individual is subject to capital gains tax and at the same time to estate taxation, while the corporations are subject only to the capital gains tax and then, possibly, at a lower rate?

Mr. Mahoney: I am a little mystified as to the significance of the difference which the hon. member sees as between corporations and individuals at this level. It is true, of course, that corporations do not die, and hence there is no estate tax. But shareholders of corporations, who are the real farmers, do die and in a jurisdiction where death duties are applicable those duties will apply on the value of the interest they might have in a corporation. So I am not conceding that the owner of shares in a corporate farm is necessarily in a better position from this point of view than an individual farmer.

Of course, the decision of some provincial governments—coincidentally, those of the hon. member's political persuasion—to move in and occupy the field which the federal government intends to vacate is one which I rather regret. I think these provinces have perhaps ignored that they will be sharing in whatever increased revenues are collected as a result of the inclusion of capital gains in the tax legislation.

Mr. Gleave: It really would not matter whether the provincial governmen which proposes to levy on estate tax is of my political persuasion, or Social Credit or Conservative or Liberal because the net result would be the same. My understanding is that there is provision within the government's policy for the levying of an estate tax if four provinces agree on this procedure. I see the parliamentary secretary indicate that this is not the case. In any case, it is quite possible for this to be done.

My question is: Is the government prepared to look with equanimity on the imposition of both a capital gains tax and an estate tax on these individuals at the same time? Is it considered they will be able to hold enough capital to enable them to remain in business? I doubt that they will be able to do so.

Mr. Mahoney: It was clear in the budget announcement that it was the intention of the federal government to withdraw from the collection of estate and gift taxes. This indicated the government's view. At the same time, the imposition of an estate tax is a matter entirely within the competence of provincial legislatures. The federal government has not said it would continue levying estate taxes provided four provinces agree this should be done. What we have said is that we will collect it for them. The Department of National Revenue will collect provincial estate taxes if four provinces who do not already have collection machinery decide to enter this particular tax field. We would act purely as a collecting agent and would expect to be paid a fee. We would also expect the enabling statutes to be pretty well uniform, to be fair and reasonable, and so on.

But it would be purely a matter of making available to the provinces the tax collecting facilities of the Department of National Revenue, which we assume would be a more economical means of collecting this revenue than if the provinces were to set up their own collection divisions in the provincial public service.

Mr. Richie: Mr. Chairman, before discussing capital gains in a general way I ask the parliamentary secretary whether he could clarify a matter for me. Section 31 is known as the hobby farmer section and deals with a loss from farming where the chief source of income is not from farming. My question is: Does the department rule on whether a person is a farmer or a hobby farmer? If a person's income from a source other than farming exceeds his income from farming in any given year, is that person, for the purposes of this section, classified as a hobby farmer?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, it is not really a question of classification, it is a question of a person being able to offset losses from farming operations against his income from another source. The question of what is the chief source of income of a given taxpayer in a given year is a simple matter of calculation. If his chief source of income is from farming, then it may be he will sustain a loss for the entire year. But if some other source of income, say from professional investment or some other business, is the chief source of income, then he can only offset a limited part of his farming loss against such income.

Mr. Ritchie: Take the case of a farmer who has a crop disaster and takes, say, a job building roads or something like that. For that year that is his main source of income. Are the losses he sustains in that year and which he may deduct restricted by section 31?

Mr. Mahoney: If whatever income he has from his farming operations is entirely offset by the cost he incurs in conducting those farming operations, then he is limited to the $2,500 as provided for in that section. Then above that $2,500 he may deduct half of the balance of his loss up to a total of $5,000 from his income as a construction worker on a road gang.

Mr. Ritchie: Suppose a taxpayer sustains a $2,500 loss during his taxation year; can he include in that loss his property taxes on the land, the interest he pays on any mortgage on the land, and so on?

Mr. Mahoney: As far as his farming operations are concerned, they are factors that go to determine his cost. If they bring his net to a loss position rather than to a profit position, then yes they are part of the loss.

Mr. Ritchie: If his loss is greater than $2,500 and his property taxes and interest on his mortgage have to be paid, I understand he would use what is called an accumulated cost basis in assessing his tax; is this correct?

Mr. Mahoney: This is for a hobby farmer who may have an opportunity to write off that loss later against income other than farming income. But this is not a section that would apply to a bona fide farmer. We are talking about people who run a farm as a sideline. I think the hon. member could conceive of a situation where a farmer might find himself in this position in a given year, but I do not think it happens in practice. A hobby farmer is a hobby farmer; a bona fide farmer is not.

Mr. Ritchie: I find this section a little confusing. Today you can easily lose $2,500 on a very modest farming operation if you have a bad year. To get back to the construction worker, his principal income would be that derived from road building in the year that he had a crop failure. Let us say he sustains a loss of $3,500, $1,000 more than for which relief is allowed. Five hundred dollars is deductible under the one-half provision. The interest on his mortgage would no doubt be quite heavy if he were just starting his operation, and so would his property tax. These items would not be carried back to the farming income that he may well expect to earn in the years ahead. Therefore, as far as I can see he will never be able to deduct his losses until he sells his farm; and if he realizes a capital gain he may get some recompense for that loss.

I think this is one area which should be looked at. I think the problem is one of definition. What is a so-called hobby farmer? Some people are hobby farmers, but according to surveys I have conducted I have found that over 50 per cent of our farmers have some income other than from farming. Very often this income is earned by the wife. But as far as our tax laws are concerned I think we are moving toward some sort of income splitting and some recognition will have to be given to family farming units if this is the case.

A good many farmers have income derived from sources other than the actual farming operation. Very often this source of income represents in cash the chief source of income. As a matter of fact, many farmers in western Canada and in my area admit that if it were not for their jobs outside the farming industry they would not be able to remain on the farm.

I should like to speak for a few minutes on the problem of capital gains as applied to farming. As a broad, general philosophy I believe a capital gains tax is really more important to the farming industry and will have greater impact there than on any other segment of our economy. I believe it is important to recognize that, because of the peculiarities of the agricultural industry. It has been said that over the years everything in the capital gains field had been narrowed down to include all groups except the stock market and the farms which had been virtually cut out. I think this is probably reasonably accurate in a general way. A person might sell a house once, but if he sold it a second time the revenue people would be around and would say he was in the business of buying and selling. Only in the stock market would the capital gains not apply, and also to a large extent in farming.

I think people who have stocks may well be able to cope with the capital gains within reason, but I suggest a farmer would not be so successful in coping with the situation. I believe this is a very serious problem and one we should take a good look at. As the hon. member for Crowfoot said, I do not think we should look at capital gains in respect of farming without comparing the situation in the United States. In Mr. Nixon's surcharge episode we have an example of how important it is to have our tax structure competitive with the tax structure in the United States.

Mr. Nixon said he intends to turn the balance of payments around in favour of the United States by reversing the trend in respect of the $13 billion. He expects the farmers in the United States to be one group of people who would reverse this trend. I believe with that in mind we must look very closely at our policy to make sure our farming position will be good enough to compete with the United States in the coming competitiveness which is ahead of us.

We talk about the $80 million involved in the process of helping manufacturers hurt by the United States surcharge, but no group will probably feel it more than the farmers. For a year or two Mr. Nixon has been telling us he intends to have United States agricultural products on the markets of the world. He has said he is not forgetting that the United States has become alarmed about the trend in world agricultural trade.

The Americans have been explaining that their farmers are highly efficient and that the United States government wants them to share in the nation's growth and in world markets. They, in effect, are calling on Japan and the European Common Market countries to develop policies which would allow for a comparative advantage in world agriculture and an increase in agricultural trade. In this way farmers of the world would be able to seek wider markets and consumers could look forward to rapid improvements.

I believe this is important, because when you consider that all Canadian farmers have to sell abroad it is obvious that we must compete with the United States and must have a capital gains structure in line with that in the United States. For instance, the United States does not produce rapeseed, but the soybean market is very competitive with rapeseed. The United States also grows flax in large quantities. They also grow barley in large quantities and, in addition, have corn which is very competitive. So we must look very carefully at the capital gains structure under which Canada will operate.

The United States has designed its farm policy to support an orderly expansion of world trade and has in general avoided rigid commodity by commodity planting restrictions. It also avoids price support loans which serve only as an umbrella for uneconomic production. It provides levels of price support to farmers which permit free movement of commodities into world markets. It includes direct payments to bring returns of farmers up to a specified goal without stimulating unneeded production. In other words, it is designed so that agricultural trade can be carried on in a reasonably unsubsidized and unfettered way.

The United States has given a great deal of thought to its agricultural program and has moved away from many programs in which they have been involved. I believe this is brought into sharp focus when we attempt to bring in a capital gains tax. We certainly are increasing the taxes which the farmers must pay to the government. The farmer either must obtain more for his product, or the money must come out of his savings or out of the capital of the farming operation. This is the reason I believe it is most important that we look at what the United States is doing and relate it to our own trade. In a general way, Ottawa's policy in respect of agriculture shows a tendency to restrict our produce, with a few exceptions into the domestic market. I do not think this is a good thing.

Turning to the matter of the basic herd, I believe we must look at this question because, after all, North America virtually is one meat market involving cattle, pigs, and so on. The price structure remains the same; as it goes up in the United States the flow is south, and as it goes up here the flow of produce is north. This means that if our farmers are to survive they must compete on an equal basis so far as possible with United States producers. If we consider all the capital gains provisions involved in Bill C-259 I do not believe it requires any great seer to realize that compared with the Americans our producers will be at a basic disadvantage in the long term.

Everyone seemed to be happy that the estate tax was phased out and replaced by a capital gains tax. This was the proposal of the Minister of Finance, but really it did not mean much because only 25 per cent of the estate tax went to the federal government in any event. Now we are faced with the possibility of an estate tax being levied by the provinces. Many provinces feel they must levy an estate tax. They feel it would be sacrilegious not to levy it because the wealth must be divided.

I suggest that the capital gains tax as envisaged in Bill C-259, as well as the estate tax—and I am sure both of them will be enforced in nearly all the provinces of Canada—will create extreme hardship in agriculture and in the farm units as we know them today. I believe that in the matter of stocks more flexibility is available to people than in farming where an extremely rigid capital structure exists. I believe it is a good capital structure which has provided a high level of efficiency.

The western grain industry, with practically no subsidy, has been doing quite well, and our exports have provided around 10 per cent of our total exports in western grains, not to the United States where we cannot diversify our trading arrangements but to countries where we can diversify our trade. I think the farming industry has been most useful in this respect. As a matter of fact, Canada's growth would have been greatly impeded had large amounts of grain not been exported over the years.

I should now like to turn to the proposal to wipe out the breeding herd as a capital asset. By doing so the government will obviously increase taxes and take people out of the cattle breeding business. The basic herd provisions have not heretofore been codified in the statutes and there are variations from province to province, but until now it has been recognized that a breeding herd is a capital asset. This is a most serious omission in the legislation.

It may be that the tax authorities, not being familiar with the cattle industry, have assumed that the basic herd provision has been nothing more than an arbitrary concession to farmers, a concession which they firmly believe would now be discontinued. We most emphatically disagree. The problem with capital gains in farming is that, as I have said, our tax structure is on a yearly basis—whatever your cash income for that year may be, you have to pay tax on it no matter whether it is a risk dollar, a non-risk dollar or a salary dollar, and the farmer has the problem of saving money in the yearly stages of his farming life to pay for the basic capital needs of the farm.

It is obvious that the purpose of the basic herd concept has not been understood by the tax authorites, for the stated justification for phasing out the provision on the basis that the introduction of a capital gains tax reduces the need for the basic herd provision is invalid and misses the main purpose for which the basic herd provision was established. It is the argument of beef producers, and I agree with it, that enlightened tax legislation should provide for the definition of a breeding herd as a capital asset. I think we first have to decide whether or not it is right to define a breeding herd as a capital asset. It takes many years to amass a breeding herd. A breeding herd of livestock is analogous to machines in a factory. In the case of the beef breeding herd, the product is calves which are either fed for slaughter or returned to a breeding herd for the production of more cattle. So cows wear out as do machines in the factory.

Let us consider why the loss of the basic herd provision would be such a disaster and would cause considerable difficulties to livestock farmers in increasing their herds as rapidly as they can, more so than at present. I think the old adage is well established, that farmers live poor and die rich. This will be made worse by the loss of the basic herd provision. Let us consider the reasons for this. Obviously, during the early years of establishment of a breeding herd the farmer will have many expenses and little or no income. He will have the cost of buying his cattle, he will have to retain as many as he can and he will have very little income.

He can have a five-year averaging provision, but at the end of the five years he will not be much further ahead than when he started. In the second five years, again he will not be further ahead. During these years, in many cases the farmer may not even be able to fully utilize his personal exemption. Apart from that, he may not have been able to pay into the Canada Pension Plan. Although we hear of citizens who are working very hard and who are useful contributors, they are classified as being poverty stricken because they will not be able to contribute to the Canada Pension Plan.

Thus it can be seen that this tax legislation would mitigate against the satisfactory growth of newly-established breeding herds. This means that the farmer will have to build up his herd over a longer period of time. He will be obliged to sell his heifers in order to generate sufficient income to partially offset his legitimate expenses. During the years of large sales of cattle from the breeding herd, or in fact at dissolution, a high rate of taxation would apply. Also, it would be quite normal for large sales or dissolution to occur in years of lower than normal expense. In other words, almost certainly at some time in his life he will be faced with abnormally heavy taxes.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The time allotted to the hon. member has expired.

Mr. Blair: Mr. Chairman, one of the sections of the income tax legislation which causes an undue amount of alarm and concern in my constituency is section 31. This deals with the disposition of a taxpayer's income where the chief source of income is not from a farm and where he may in various years have farming losses to charge off against his income. The rulings that have been made with regard to a number of people in this position in my constituency have caused me great distress. In my opinion, the Department of National Revenue has chosen to apply a narrow and restrictive definition to what is the business of farming—

[Mr. Ritchie.]

Mr. Gleave: I am glad to have your support.

• (10:40 p.m.)

Mr. Blair: —with the result that unless a person is a farmer in a large way, or unless he is a farmer who has actually earned a profit in a given year, there seems to be a disposition in the Department of National Revenue to disregard him entirely as a person who is engaged in the business of farming.

I have several examples, unhappily, that come to mind. I know of a man who is a retired serviceman, who has a relatively small pension and who is trying to establish himself as a farmer. He has no great capital resources and as a consequence has had to build up his operation slowly over the years. He has experienced losses, but there is no question that he devotes himself almost entirely to the conduct of his farming operation. Yet because he has not prospered at it immediately, he has been told that he is not sufficiently in the business of farming to qualify for the privilege of deducting the losses from his farming operation from his other income.

I know of another case where a young couple would like nothing better in this world than to establish themselves as large farmers on a prosperous farm, but they have not the capital resources which would entitle them to do that, with the result that the husband has another job and practically every dollar the family earns is devoted to building up the family farm. The financial results of their farming enterprise have not been spectacular to date, but from what they have accomplished I would judge that over a period of time they are likely to accomplish their purpose. In circumstances like these I would suggest it is greatly in the national interest that they should be encouraged. But, again, because they have not prospered, because they have not a great herd of cattle, because they have not a huge collection of farming machinery, the revenue department has determined that they are not engaged in the business of farming and therefore has ruled against the deductibility of the losses of their farming operation from their other income.

I have made many submissions in the course of the last few years against these rulings. This has always resulted in the repetition to me of the various definition sections of the Income Tax Act—the definitions of what is a business and what is farming. If these were wealthy people I am quite sure they would have the opportunity to exercise their right to challenge these rulings in the courts. But it is very difficult to advise people in marginal positions like this to embark on costly litigation and, as it were, to make themselves legal guinea pigs in order to determine whether or not a precise and correct definition is being applied to the words of the statute.

So far as I can see there is no great change in the pattern of these statutory provisions in the new bill, but I hopefully ask the parliamentary secretary whether there are any changes and whether it is intended that the same course of interpretation and administration will apply under the new act. I express the hope that it will not and that the administration of this statute from now on will make a division between that fortunate group in the community whom we have traditionally called hobby farmers, and on account of whom these restrictive provisions were initially put in, and the other group, the bona fide, small, struggling persons who want to become full-time farmers, so that some balance can be struck in their favour.

Mr. Southam: Mr. Chairman, I took part in the general debate on clause 1 of the government's tax reform bill, C-259, back on September 29. This evening we are now in committee of the whole studying sections 28 to 31 inclusive or, more particularly, those sections of the bill dealing with several aspects related to farming.

Like many other pieces of government legislation, this bill, as time goes by, is coming in for more and more criticism. As the hon. member for Annapolis Valley said earlier in the debate, it is confusion compounded. This confusion is not only related to the sections dealing with agriculture but it seems to be the problem in every area of the 4½-pound, 710-page document that we are examining. I say this because as time goes by members' desks are being piled high with briefs from every sector of our society, pointing out serious defects in the bill affecting their respective areas of concern.

These defects have been amplified and emphasized by the fact that the Minister of Finance has been forced to table over 125 amendments or subamendments to the bill since it was introduced. What he should be doing is taking the recent advice of several provincial premiers. He should shelve the bill and rewrite a proper tax reform bill in the future. In the meantime, the only practical reform clause in this bill, that increasing the income tax exemptions for low-income earners, could be implemented at once by a simple tax amendment that I am sure would be supported by all members of the House.

As several members of the official opposition have already pointed out in this debate, various farm organizations including the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the National Farmers' Union, the prairie pools, farm cooperatives and various livestock associations, including the widely supported Canadian Cattlemen's Association, have all taken strong exception to many provisions in the bill.

It seems to me that many of the principles of the bill as related to agriculture were adopted from the agricultural task force report. In the view of many farmers and farm spokesmen it appears that many of the suggestions that were put forth in that report, if implemented, would hasten the day of the agricultural industry's demise. The experience we have had with the Lift program and with the proposals set out in Bill C-176, which is now resting quietly on the bottom of the government's agenda, and latterly with the furore created over Bill C-244, the grain stabilization act, along with the clauses in this bill would all indicate that this total load of unacceptable legislation could be the final straw to break the camel's back in so far as the agricultural industry is concerned.

Let us look at a few of the comments submitted by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. Its members have had access to some good research and have taken the time to make a close study of those provisions of the bill relating to agriculture. Even at the risk of trespassing on the time of the House, and although there may be some repetition here simply because I have not been able to listen to all the contributions made thus far, I wish to put on record some of the submissions made by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. Under the heading "The family farm corporation," the federation says:

> One general point we would like to make is that all provisions applicable to farmers as individuals should in principle be applicable to family-held farming corporations. We suggest there be some general provision in the law providing for this. This requires definition of what a family farm corporation is. We would suggest perhaps that 80 per cent of all shares require to be held by members of the family, and 80 per cent of the income to the corporation be from the farming operation. This can be important in many connections.

Under the heading "Transfer of a farm within a family, whether by sale or inheritance, without realization of capital gains," it says:

> There is, as we understand it, absolutely no provision for farms to be transferred within a family (except to a spouse), whether by sale or inheritance, without immediate realization of capital gains. This would be true of the sale or transfer of a farm to a son, or inheritance by the son of the farmer. We have been informed that this problem can be avoided in many cases by good estate planning through incorporation of the farm, and this may well be so.

• (10:50 p.m.)

I point out to the parliamentary secretary that every farmer, particularly every small farmer, has not the financial wherewithal to go to tax experts and lawyers for the advice suggested here, but nevertheless it would sometimes result in the wrong decision being made relative to this bill. The brief continues:

> Even in such a case the death of the son, holder of common shares in an incorporation, prior to that of the father, could result in realization of taxable capital gains while the father was still in active charge of the running of the farm, creating severe financial problems.
> Beyond this, however, we do not believe that it should in all cases be necessary for the farmer to incorporate in order to achieve stability and continuity of the farm business within the family.
> Payment of tax on capital gains out of the tied-up assets of an ongoing family farming operation could and probably would be disruptive, and place the continuation of the enterprise in jeopardy.
> We would again very strongly urge that transfer of a farm to the son or daughter of a farmer, whether by sale, gift or inheritance, carry with it no realization of capital gains at that time, but that in later disposition the capital gains be calculated as of from the valuation initially established for capital gains purposes. The $1,000 per annum exemption provision should apply for the whole of this period of course.
> Finally, while the federal government has, as far as its own funding is concerned, given up use of estate and gift taxes, this does not settle the question of what may be done by the provinces in this area. Farmers, under your proposals, are still potentially faced with double taxation of the farm on inheritance—something which should at all costs be avoided.

Mr. Chairman, this point was belaboured and discussed at length earlier this evening by interested members. However, I think I should refer to a brief presented by the Canadian Cattlemen's Association on November 1, 1971, which also emphasizes the importance of this legislation. The brief reads as follows on page 6:

> Moreover, it is not inconceivable that various provincial governments might enter the areas about to be vacated.
> We believe it is incumbent upon the several provincial governments to clarify their intentions in this area and equally incumbent upon federal government to seek such clarification.
> It is unfair that Canadian citizens be asked to contemplate capital gains taxes without being fully informed of the status of succession duties and gift taxes as contemplated by the various provincial governments. It had been the public's understanding that the proposed legislation would result in a rationalization, co-ordination and simplification of the tax laws rather than a fragmentation and duplication.

It is not difficult to imagine the devastating effects that might ensue should provincial succession duties and/or gift taxes be added to capital gains taxes.

One of the most disastrous effects that is likely to flow from the combined impact of capital gains taxes and succession duties, if instituted in some provinces, will be the incentive thus created for foreign ownership of Canadian farms and ranches. This will happen, we are advised, because foreign owners will be in a position to avoid taxes on both capital gains and succession duties. To the extent that this is true Canadian farmers will be at an extreme disadvantage in competing with foreign investors for ownership of Canadian soil.

We are certain that this disadvantage was not contemplated in the draft legislation.

Mr. Chairman, here again this has been an important issue in western Canada, as I know from the mail I receive and from questions put to me in the boundary areas of Saskatchewan. Farmers there have been facing this problem for some time and are quite concerned about the tax advantages that American farmers would have by coming up here and availing themselves of our natural resources in the form of farmland. I should like the minister or his parliamentary secretary to clarify this point, "We are certain that this disadvantage was not contemplated in the draft legislation." The Cattlemen's Association brief goes on to make the following recommendation on page 7:

We therefore urge the federal government to establish an undertaking with provincial jurisdictions to the effect that, revenue lost to provinces through the discontinuation of federal estate taxes and provincial succession duties be reimbursed from funds made available by the federal government.

To expedite this principle we would recommend further that, should any province impose estate taxes or succession duties;

A tax abatement system be introduced in the federal legislation such that the amount of capital gains tax payable may be abated by the amount of succession duties payable to the province.

As we in the farming industry know, particularly in western Canada, this concern of double-taxation is a very basic problem. Incomes are low as a result of decreasing prices for farm produce, input costs have been accelerating, machinery, repairs, taxes, fuel and high interest rates have all added to the load and any further tax placed on the farmer's back at the present time will be the straw to break it.

May I call it eleven o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS—POSITION OF STUDY OF CONFLICT OF INTEREST AND POSSIBLE LEGISLATION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Friday, October 22, as recorded in Hansard at page 8926, I put this question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau):

Mr. Speaker, if the President of the Privy Council were still here I would put this question to him but since he has departed—

That simply meant departed to Nova Scotia.

—perhaps I might put it to the Prime Minister. Some time ago, under the direction of the former President of the Privy Council, now the Minister of National Defence, the government had given some attention to the question of legislation respecting conflict of interest, having in mind particularly Senators, Members of Parliament and high-placed government officials. Can the Prime Minister say what has happened to that study and whether there is any present plan to bring in legislation in this area?

The Prime Minister replied to my question as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the study was pursued so far as we could within government circles. We discussed it among ministers for our own guidance, but we see no possibility of bringing in legislation in the immediate future.

I have to say, Mr. Speaker, that I was somewhat disappointed in the answer which the Prime Minister gave me on that occasion. This subject of the conflict of interest so far as elected representatives and highly-placed government officials are concerned is a very important one and it has received a good deal of study in the United Kingdom, the United States and in other jurisdictions. Actually, in some of these jurisdictions legislation has been adopted or rules have been laid down to prevent as far as possible a conflict of interest or, at least, to make sure that the interests of certain persons are declared.

• (11:00 p.m.)

As a matter of fact, when the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) was President of the Privy Council certain studies were conducted under his guidance. I have in my hand copies of two sessional papers that were tabled by the former President of the Privy Council. One was tabled on Wednesday, July 16, 1969; this is a document of 49 pages. Another was tabled on Wednesday, January 28, 1970; this is a document of nine pages. These, of course, can be found in the sessional papers' office. The point of referring to them is to indicate that the matter is a serious one to which study and attention have been given.

I do not want to be disrespectful about the Prime Minister's answer. However, it seems to me that on Friday, October 22, he was simply saying to me, "We are all right; we have looked into the matter and find we are quite pure, so nothing more need be done about it." I did not think much of that answer and I was glad to learn that the Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council (Mr. Jerome) was to give me an answer tonight. Here is his chance. I hope he has a better answer to give.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, it is a very important question that we have been asked to answer this evening and I will be happy to do my best to supply the hon. member with something more than he got from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I of course have looked at it and have thought about the answer the Prime Minister gave the other day. Although the hon. member has put his own interpretation on it, that being, "We are pure and do not need to do anything more," I submit that it is the kind of answer that can be interpreted in many ways.

The words, "the study was pursued as far as we could within government circles" could mean, on the one extreme, that which the hon. member has taken from them; on the other extreme they could mean that we are doing everything possible to deal with this important subject. Undoubtedly, since the Prime Minister, according to everybody's understanding, was answering a question which should have been directed to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), since it was that office that had been responsible for the study, the Prime Minister's answer was brief. I think we must look at it in that light.

I think we must put this construction on the answer: The Prime Minister was trying to convey the meaning that everything had been done that could be done and that everything was being done that could be done in continuing the study of this important question and that, indeed, the conflict of interest with respect to all elected representatives is an important subject, it has been treated in that way and we will continue treating it in that way.

There are immense difficulties, of course, in reducing to comprehensive legislation the rules that can eliminate all the fields of conflict of interest that can be contemplated without at the same time restricting too greatly the opportunity for all people to enter fairly into the legislative field as elected representatives. However, as difficult as that may be, I assure the hon. member that it is the desire of this government to do everything possible in that way.

In case the hon. member took from the Prime Minister's answer the impression that the work had stopped, or that the government was satisfied with the study up to that point and was not going to do anything more, I specifically want to assure him that is not the case and not the meaning the Prime Minister intended to convey. In fact, the work is continuing in a very serious vein and at a very serious level at the present time. We hope the study, research and reporting aspect will be completed fairly soon. Of course, depending on the nature of the report the government will carry on to recommend and draft legislation in line with the recommendations that will come forward. It is too early to say at this stage because the study has not yet been completed.

I again wish to assure the hon. member that the study is continuing and that the government is very much concerned about the results of the study. It has gone on at a very high level of government and on the political side as well. In conclusion, we hope the study will soon be completed and if possible, if the study so indicates, legislation will be drafted in due course.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is a great deal better.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—CANADIAN-SOVIET COMMUNIQUÉ—EFFECT OF EXCHANGE OF SCIENTIFIC AND TECHNOLOGICAL INFORMATION ON DEFENCE-SHARING ARRANGEMENTS WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I am a little curious about who is to respond. I had hoped for the minister's presence or at least the presence of his parliamentary secretary. My question arises out of the most recent agreements of exchange with the U.S.S.R. If I can set the premise which brings me here this evening, I can do this best by repeating the question that I asked in the House the other day. In the absence of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) I directed the question to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald). It related to the Canadian-Soviet communiqué released the other day in which there were at least six, and possibly seven different references to an increase in the level of exchange of scientific and technological information with our allies. The specific question was as follows:

Is the minister satisfied that such an extended level of exchange of this type of information will not impair our capacity to remain within the defence-sharing arrangement with the United States?

The minister replied:

Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied that it has not been impaired in any way.

I asked a supplementary based on the same levels of exchange of information as outlined in the protocol with the Soviets. I asked whether this would hold true with respect to the level at which we exchange particular scientific and military information with our allies in the United States. The minister replied:

Mr. Speaker, it is a little difficult to measure that exactly, although the level of exchange at the moment is very high.

My concern is with the defence production arrangement with the United States which now provides Canadians with in excess of 110,000 jobs. This is meaningful. There is a very apparent sentiment in Canada today which leads many Canadians to believe that this government has deliberately extended, lengthened or plotted the pipelines of exchange of information with the United States to the point where these two points are in jeopardy: first, the willingness of the United States to remain in the defence production-sharing arrangement with the people of Canada; second, and even put hypothetically, their preparedness to remain in this program with us that will result in a downgrading of the level at which they permit an exchange of scientific and technological information with us.

• (11:10 p.m.)

To illustrate the seriousness of this question I cite one or two other points. First, it is interesting to note that Canadian military and scientific people have received no direct output from such scientific sectors or "think tanks" as the Rand Corporation, for example. I mention this because it is startling and specific and because it highlights the degree to which those involved in science and technology of defence production and defence planning feel that relations between Canada and the United States have deteriorated in recent years.

The question must be faced by the government in light of related economic difficulties. I would welcome from the parliamentary secretary an answer which is a little more frank and forthright than the response given by the minister which indicated that the level at which we exchange technical and scientific information remains very high. I think this is nonsense. The minister was probably carried away by the events of that week, having just returned to the House after seeing Mr. Kosygin off to Cuba. Possibly he was not fully cognizant of the response he gave to the question. To back up this assertion, and in conclusion, I might say that article II of that protocol, the Canada-U.S.S.R. General Exchanges Agreement, states:

Both governments will encourage and facilitate the exchange of visits by scientists and scientific research workers and the exchange of scientific information.

The whole basis of our defence research production program and sharing program rests entirely on the willingness of the United States to exchange details of highly classified strategic military information with respect to weapons systems, and so on. I suggest that this confidence has been impaired and that the people of Canada deserve a better answer than the one the minister gave the other evening.

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to reply to the hon. member and to reassure him in his concern about this matter. Canada has entered into a new agreement with the Soviet Union to exchange information on technology for the purpose of promoting mutually beneficial business arrangements between the two countries as part of our program to diversify our trade relationships throughout the world. But I hasten to assure the hon. member that any such arrangements have not and will not infringe in any way upon Canada's long standing arrangements for the sharing of military information with the United States.

Mr. Forrestall: They already have.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): I assure the hon. member that any exchanges of information or any sales of material to the Soviet Union have to be agreed to by the Department of National Defence and that no sensitive materials may be exchanged. We have a list of specific materials and items which cannot be exchanged with the Soviet Union. We are obligated in our agreements with the United States to refrain from exporting U.S. technology to the Soviet Union. We honour those agreements and we will continue to honour them.

Furthermore, we have commitments to NATO that we will consult with them on the exchange of materials with any country other than NATO countries, and we honour those commitments and will continue to do so. I can assure the hon. member that his concern is unfounded and that we will continue the course of action we have followed in the past.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—LAY-OFF OF DOCKYARD EMPLOYEES, ST. JOHN'S NFLD.—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson), as reported in Hansard for November 5 at page 9367, was prompted by the recent action on the part of Canadian National in St. John's, Newfoundland, and what I consider to be grossly unfair treatment accorded 28 of their employees. In this particular instance I am compelled to raise two objections. First, I consider that with proper planning and consideration on the part of Canadian National the lay-offs in question were not necessary. Secondly, I take the strongest possible objection to the callous and almost inhuman treatment given their employees by Canadian National officials in Newfoundland, as evidenced by the way the lay-off notices were issued.

Union officials have informed me that on October 25, 22 members of the boilermakers' union and six shipwrights first received word of their impending lay-off. On October 27 the lay-off notices were rescinded. On October 29 lay-off notices were again issued, only to be rescinded again on November 1. On November 2 the men were finally told that on Monday, November 8, their services would no longer be required. What kind of treatment is that to give men who in many cases have large families and have given the best part of their adult lives to service in their trade for Canadian National?

Is it any wonder that these men, as well as their fellow employees have lost confidence in Canadian National management in Newfoundland? How dare they toy with the jobs and livelihood of a large number of people in such a heartless, cold-blooded way! One would not expect that kind of treatment from any employer, least of all from one of the largest corporations in this country. This is just one of many indignities imposed on Canadian National workers in St. John's by management in recent years.

Canadian National's St. John's operation can rightfully boast of having on its payroll a group of dedicated, competent and highly skilled workers. It is unfortunate that the fine attributes of the workers have not been matched by high calibre management as well as the facilities provided to enable them to be in a position to compete with their mainland counterparts and to realize the operation's true potential.

St. John's has been referred to as the service station of the Atlantic. Our geographic position lends itself to a truly exciting prospect in so far as ship repairs and related work are concerned. I am of the opinion that we are not taking full advantage of our potential in that respect and the workers themselves are being denied opportunity for full and lucrative employment. Too often must they contend with lay-offs which have been brought about mainly by inefficiency on the part of management. Today, with the high cost of living and with the normal financial commitments that are expected of family men, C.N. dockworkers in St. John's can ill-afford the luxury of a ten-month work year.

What is needed, Mr. Speaker, is a thorough investigation into all aspects of Canadian National's drydock operation to determine, first of all, the potential of the port as well as an inventory of existing facilities, their capability of being able to cater to our potential under existing conditions and the feasibility of upgrading facilities at the dock which could, in my opinion, result in continuous employment for the existing staff as well as a large number of others who could be employed there.

In Newfoundland there is a widespread feeling that Canadian National has embarked upon a phase-out program. We all know the story of the abandonment of our rail passenger service, a plan that was well calculated and well executed by Canadian National. In recent months we have seen evidence of a repeat performance with regard to our rail freight service. I understand that the coastal boat service is in danger of being abandoned and I suspect that next on the list will be our drydock operations.

The other day we received an interim report from the railway transport committee concerning the study of a rationalization program for the Montreal-Toronto-Vancouver passenger train services operated by CN and CP. It is regrettable that the second study commissioned by the railway transport committee of a similar nature, wherein they plan to undertake an investigation of other principal passenger services in the Atlantic region by CN and CP rail, will terminate in Nova Scotia.

It is about time Canadian National and the Canadian Transport Commission recognized that a transcontinental railway should not terminate in Nova Scotia but in St. John's, Newfoundland. It is a little ironic that while the railway transport committee appears to be so concerned with respect to finding ways of upgrading a transcontinental railway service in Newfoundland they have adopted an opposite course, because in our province they have apparently adopted different criteria and instead of upgrading that which we had, they have imposed upon us a passenger service that would not be acceptable in any other part of Canada.

I should like also to call upon the powers that be, the Minister of Transport and the Canadian National officials, to show a deeper concern for the plight of our Canadian National dockyard workers, especially the victims of the most recent lay-off. I would also urge them to develop a closer liaison with Canadian National workers in St. John's. I suggest that if and when they undertake a study and investigation of the docking potential of our dock, as well as the capabilities of existing facilities, they involve the heads of the unions at the CN dock at St. John's as well as some of the senior employees who, having spent years working there, have accumulated a wealth of information which I am sure could be of tremendous help to Canadian National in assessing the potential of the dock.

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond this evening for the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson). He is presently on his way back to Ottawa from Newfoundland.

As explained in the House last Friday by the minister's parliamentary secretary, the situation at the CN dockyard is dependent to a very large extent on the number of projects which CN are able to attract to the yard. As the hon. member knows, there normally is a drop in the workload at this time of year. This necessitates a reduction in the number of employees. Canadian National have advised the minister they are searching actively for more work which could be done in the dockyard and that every effort will be made to keep as many men as possible employed until the time when the coastal boats start coming in for annual maintenance, usually in January.

It is because of the company's attempts to obtain extra work that this confusion arose. The company was under the impression that additional work was coming in and it would be possible for them to maintain employment in the dockyard. But this proved to be false. They were unable to obtain the orders and for that reason confusion arose and the men were laid off again. The minister has had direct communications with the machinist union. They are aware of the efforts that the CNR has made in order to bring additional work to the dockyard.

The hon. member has made a number of valuable points this evening. I will be happy to bring them to the attention of the minister. However, I assure the hon. member that the minister has been in close contact with the CNR and with the union on this matter and he is confident that the CNR is making every possible effort to obtain whatever work is possible in that area to maintain employment in the dockyard at St. John's.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 11.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, November 9, 1971

The House met at 11 a.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed, from Monday, November 8, consideration in committee of Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act—Mr. Benson—Mr. Laniel in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: When the committee rose last evening section 28 of clause 1 was under consideration.

On clause 1—section 28: Farming business.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, the sections we are considering now, those dealing with farm problems, are another example of the great number of complexities contained in this bill which require a great deal of examination not only by the House but by the public. Time is required to allow public bodies, particularly farm organizations in this case, to come to Parliament, appear before the agricultural committee and make submissions in respect of their views concerning how these clauses could and should be improved for the good of the farm population of Canada. Time is required so that the suggestions and submissions to be presented to the agricultural committee by the farm groups of Canada could then be thoroughly examined by members of the House in order to make sure that when this bill is finally passed the country will have good legislation and not an uncertain and unsatisfactory act as would seem to be the indication at this point in time.

It is for these reasons that the provincial governments, when they appeared here last week, strongly urged the federal government not to try to maintain its present timetable of completing the consideration of this bill by the end of the year, but to allow more time for thorough examination. These are the reasons the Official Opposition has urged the government to split this legislation into two bills. The first would consist of the exemptions and allowances found in the present bill. Such a bill containing those tax exemptions and allowances would pass the House quickly and become effective.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The Chair feels it is not easy to intervene at this time, but although the hon. member's remarks are very interesting and concern the whole question of taxation he will note that the procedure normally followed in Committee of the Whole is for hon. members to restrict their remarks to the clauses before the committee at that time. The committee has agreed to group different sections of the bill for the purpose of discussion. The hon. member has gone much beyond that and I hope he will come back as quickly as possible to the four sections which are before the committee at this time.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I was just on the point of returning to the specific question of agriculture. I have simply referred to the reasons why it is desirable to deal with this legislation in a different way.

In reading the sections of the bill that apply to agriculture with which we are dealing at present, it is quite apparent that those responsible for drafting this bill are certainly not farmers, and not men acquainted with agriculture as a business and its associated problems. There is no doubt at all that in the past there have been flagrant violations by business corporations through loopholes which existed in the tax legislation of the day. But the flagrant misuse of the legislation in the past was not something that was done by farmers. It was something that was done by business corporations. There is no reason for treating farmers in the same way and penalizing them heavily for the sins of business corporations in the past, because in their zeal to close these loopholes so far as business is concerned, those who have drafted this bill have created hardships for farmers in general.

What this bill does is to decrease the incentive to stay on the farm and make a career of farming. Unfortunately this is taking place just at a time when there is a particular need to attract energetic, aggressive young men to stay on the farm and make a career of farming. After all, farming is still the basic industry of this country. The people of this country rely on farmers to produce the food they need during the year. If we do not make it attractive for people to remain on farms and continue farming, we will be in a sorry plight so far as the food we need is concerned as well as the food we export every year which provides us with very important revenue and foreign exchange.

In the province of Ontario today—I would think this would apply to most provinces but it certainly does in Ontario where my constituency is situated—the average age of farmers is between 45 and 55. It is apparent from this fact that young men are simply not farming today. They are leaving the farms, going to cities and making their careers there. The reason they are doing so is that it does not seem to the young people of today that there is an economic future in farming. One of the reasons for this view is the very unsympathetic attitude adopted by the federal government toward farming and farmers in general. One examples is found in the fact that the government is engaged in the process of phasing out the basic herd concept. This is very damaging indeed to dairy farmers in Canada, as all dairy farmers know only too well. We have pointed this out to the Minister of Agriculture over and over again, but he has turned a deaf ear and does not seem to be interested. He is determined to proceed along the path he has chosen.

The second way in which the government has shown it is not interested in the welfare of farmers is by the introduction of the capital gains tax which will make it very difficult, if not impossible, for a farm, as a viable economic unit, to be passed from one generation to another. Anyone who has examined this legislation knows very well that payment of the capital gains tax which will be levied against the farm when possession changes will require the disposal of at least part of the assets of the farm to pay the tax. This will, of course, further decrease the size of the farming operation, and make it less economic and less likely to survive in today's increasingly competitive farm conditions.

For these reasons I feel that the government should eliminate the proposed capital gains tax as it applies to farms. I think it is important for the government to remember that farmers are in a special category. They cannot pass on any increase in costs, because the prices of their produce are not set by the farmers themselves, but by international, national or provincial forces which are completely beyond the control of the farmers themselves. Thus their prices are completely out of their hands. Their costs are going up steadily, and this is the reason they are caught today in a serious economic squeeze. For this reason, the application of the capital gains tax will make it increasingly difficult, and in many cases impossible, for farms as we know them today to continue as viable operations.

Therefore I say to the government they must realize that farmers are in a special category, and they must start treating farmers in a manner which will make it possible for them to continue to farm economically; which will make it attractive for farmers' sons and daughters to stay on the farms instead of leaving for the cities and factories as they are doing at present. If the government does not do this, in a short period of time this country will find itself in a deplorable situation. We will be short of food because, in a little while, we will be unable to resuscitate farms that have been allowed to run down in the production of the food we need.

So I strongly urge the government, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Agriculture, to start looking at farming and farmers in the way they have long deserved, and to bring in the kind of legislative measures which help, and do not hinder, the farming operations of today.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Chairman, last evening I was dealing with the subject matter of section 29 concerning the basic herd concept and I said that the capital gains tax in essence has changed the approach of the tax legislation to the basic herd concept. I was appalled that tax reform legislation has been studied for a number of years and yet the government apparently has not considered any other approach to this question. In fact, it appeared to me that in the tax field extensive research and examination had been undertaken on everything but agriculture.

What is the purpose of studying a bill in committee of the whole? It is that the minister and his parliamentary secretary may have the experts with them. Any questions asked can be readily answered. The sources of information are there. Last evening I asked a couple of simple questions. I asked whether they had considered the method by which capital gains tax is applied to the livestock industry in the United States and the use of a similar application in Canada. I told the parliamentary secretary that if he did not know the effect of that application in the United States he should not turn it down but should consider it. Then he replied that they really did not know and his officials before him really did not know.

I warned him that the application of a capital gains tax to the livestock industry in the United States had been in force for a period of years, and I cautioned him that my question was only a lead-in. Really, Mr. Chairman, I was appalled that in preparing a tax bill 707 pages long, which was at least three years in the making, they had not even considered how a capital gains tax is applied to the livestock industry in the United States.

Mr. Mahoney: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member's attributions of comments to me are a grotesque misrepresentation of the question and answer period that we had last night. I hate to ruin your script, Jack.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Chairman, the record will bear out what I said. The parliamentary secretary said he did not know, and he was kind enough to say, "I won't say no; I will consider it." He said he would give the facts today. He said we would be back here at eleven o'clock today and he had reason to believe that this subject matter would be up for debate. He said he would then tell the House how the capital gains tax is applied to the livestock industry in the United States.

I point out, Mr. Chairman, that I was not the first member on my feet today. Before I started to participate in the debate the Chair had asked whether this section would carry. Why is this matter so important? The hon. member for Dauphin put the answer on the record last night. We participate in the North American market, and that applies particularly to the livestock industry. We may be divorcing ourselves from the Americans on questions concerning armaments and the like, but I repeat that our livestock industry shares in the North American market.

Our farmers and ranchers must remain competitive. In ranching and farming the first thing that has to be paid is the taxes. No matter what business you are in this is the case, and it is particularly true in ranching and farming. You have to pay the taxes. First you pay the land taxes, then you pay the income tax, and now you will be paying the capital gains tax.

Last night the hon. member for Dauphin also dealt with the disappearance of the basic herd. Until now the basic herd has been allowed to grow but after December 31, 1971, according to the provisions of this bill, the basic herd ceases to grow. If a man has already built up a basic herd then, out of the goodness of heart of the Minister of Finance, he can maintain it, although he will have to pay capital gains tax on the increased value. But no new basic herds will be allowed to develop.

In the United States the basic herd is still allowed to grow. The Americans have a growing policy. Nixon, the President of the United States, and Connally have both said they are out to reverse the American import-export trading trend by a total of $13 billion. Agricultural products are one of the United States' greatest exports. They want to get into the European market with their agricultural products. We in Canada want part of the North American market and part of the international market.

Again I put the question to the tax experts who are assisting the minister and the parliamentary secretary: how does capital gains tax apply to the livestock industry in the United States? I have the facts here on how it applies. The second question I pose is: are they prepared to give the livestock man in Canada the same break as the U.S. livestock man gets in the application of a capital gains tax?

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The Chair wishes the hon. member to be fair. He knows that only the minister and the parliamentary secretary may answer his questions in the House of Commons. He should not direct his questions to anybody else, only to persons who are qualified to be members of the House.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Chairman, I thought I was being vividly clear, but in my anger I suppose I wasn't. I was directing my questions through you to the Minister of Finance who is in his place and has his officials before him. The hon. member for Calgary South should know what the livestock industry means to this country. I will take my seat the minute either one of them is prepared to indicate that he will answer the two questions I have posed.

Last night the hon. member for Calgary South said, "Tomorrow at eleven o'clock I will have the facts. We will burn a little bit of midnight oil and we will get the facts." But apparently he is not prepared to put them on the record. They have not said that they will answer my questions. I will repeat them until I get some answers. I am sure they would not want this legislation to pass in ignorance. Surely as legislators we must be knowledgeable about it. If we do not get the answers we must persist until we do, or we must put the answers on the record ourselves and, as I indicated, I am prepared to do that. Considering the generous mood of the parliamentary secretary last might, I want to give him and the minister the opportunity to say they know the livestock industry in Canada has to be competitive with the United States and that if the livestock man in the United States is getting a better deal in the application of the capital gains tax to him they are prepared to consider that.

I could move an amendment to section 29 very easily, but sometimes I find that governments are reluctant to accept amendments from opposition members. Instead I make the request that section 29 be stood until the government has had ample opportunity to study the point that has been made so well by the hon. member for Dauphin and myself, that we share in the North American market and are in fierce competition with the United States.

If the price of beef cattle goes up in Canada, then in come American cattle. If the price goes up in the United States, our cattle move freely into that market. That market has been a safety valve for the Canadian cattleman for years and years. We must remain competitive if we are to stay alive in the livestock business.

Surely one of the key cost factors in any business is taxation. It is only fair that the minister accept the suggestion that section 29 be stood and that the whole matter with regard to the basic herd be reconsidered. Is he prepared to do that? He sits glum and silent, as if somebody had thrown a pail of cold water down his neck.

Mr. Benson: You have got the floor.

Mr. Horner: I am disappointed at the hon. member for Calgary South because sometimes Calgary boasts of being the cow town of Canada and sometimes tries to win the favour of the livestock men. The hon. member for Calgary South should win a little favour right now by honouring the pledge he made to me last night that he would burn the midnight oil and today put on the record how the United States capital gains tax is applied. It would seem that somebody got to him in the intervening hours and told him to sit there and not say a word, to let us blow off steam. He should rise and put the record straight in regard to how the United States capital gains tax is applied to livestock.

• (11:30 a.m.)

I want to explain vividly how the basic herd operates in Canada. The basic herd principle has operated as a growth factor. A farmer in the livestock business could purchase cattle, pay income tax on the money involved, put them into a basic herd and when he retired he did not have to pay income tax on the proceeds of the sale of the basic herd because he had paid income tax on the money going into the herd when it was being acquired. Section 29 says in effect that if you have a basic herd on December 31 you can keep it but we will not allow any more basic herds to be established nor will we allow the basic herds that are established to grow. In other words, they are cutting off the growth factor in the livestock aspect of agriculture.

How does the United States capital gains tax apply to livestock? If you have stock, bulls or females, for over two years you can treat them on a long-term capital gains basis—in essence, the same as our basic herd would be treated with the application of the capital gains tax. The parliamentary secretary nods his head in a negative manner.

Mr. Bigg: He doesn't know.

Mr. Mahoney: Only one year—12 months.

Mr. Horner: If it is only one year that improves the situation.

An hon. Member: Sure it does.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mahoney: It does not improve the hon. member's accuracy.

Mr. Horner: It does not bear witness to my accuracy? I think the committee and you, Mr. Chairman, can bear witness to the fact that I begged and pleaded with the parliamentary secretary to put his accuracy on the record first but he did not believe it could stand up. He did not have the nerve to put his accuracy on the record first; he did not have the nerve to disobey his senior. He wants to climb up the political ladder so he is a "nicey, nicey" boy.

Mr. Jerome: Be serious.

Mr. Danson: He is not climbing; he is being elevated.

Mr. Horner: I am glad the hon. member added that he is not climbing, he is being elevated. That is it exactly. He knows how to be elevated; it is through being a "nicey, nicey" boy to his superiors. That is not the role that Calgary wants him to play.

Mr. Danson: It is through ability.

Mr. Horner: It is my information that there is a two-year holding period for cattle, females and bulls, and for horses. The American provision is to this effect:

Long-term capital gain treatment will not apply to the sale of cattle and horses acquired after 1969—

This is a new departure.

—unless they have been held for at least two years for draft, breeding, dairy or sporting purposes.

That is very different from our concept. If they are held for two years, in essence they can be put into what we in Canada classify as the basic herd and come under the application of the capital gains tax which will apply on that capital asset. There is no doubt in my mind that a rancher involved in the livestock business—this is the gut issue—is in a better position than his counterpart in Canada after the application of the capital gains tax when the basic herd is dispersed.

I ask the parliamentary secretary and the Minister of Finance through you, Mr. Chairman, if they really think that a rancher in Canada is in much better shape than his counterpart in the United States? Let us examine the situation and see what a rancher in the United States has to contend with. Does he have to feed all through climatic conditions like ours or can his cattle run throughout most of the winter? Everybody knows the answer to that. He has a weather advantage in raising cattle. If we are to compete with him we need a tax break in regard to land costs or in the application of the capital gains tax to the capital asset.

Who is in the better position with regard to proximity to the market? The American ranchers have to feed 220 million people and this tremendous market is close at hand. How far is the midwest from the large population centres of California, Chicago and the eastern states? Not too far. They can move their cattle to population centres north, south, east and west. Ranchers in this country can move cattle to the population centres of central Canada and a portion of the lower mainland of British Columbia, a long way from the ranching areas of western Canada. We are at a disadvantage in regard to both climate and market. We do not have as many people to feed and they are a long distance from the ranching areas. On top of that, this government proposes to bring in a capital gains tax which will remove the basic herd concept and is more detrimental to us than the capital gains tax is to our competitors in the United States.

Already the government is saying, "get rid of the small farmer", and there is no doubt in my mind that they have the same intention regarding ranchers. The rancher does not come to the government begging for assistance or handouts; he wants an even break. What kind of break is he getting? The hon. member for Calgary South is afraid to rise and put the facts on the record. The Minister of Finance smugly sits there and does not answer. The rancher has not come to this government or other governments asking for interference or handouts but he is a skilled lobbyist when it comes to demanding a fair break.

Let us examine the record. Are there a lot of ranchers that have to be put out of business? Are we overproducing livestock?

Mr. Bigg: They are all free men.

Mr. Horner: The opposite is true. The minister in charge of the Wheat Board comes out with a regrazing program. The former premier of Saskatchewan came out with low-interest loans to encourage farmers to go into the livestock business. What are we setting the trap for? Is the livestock man a sucker? He is not, but he comes here and argues that he should be given equal treatment with his competitors.

We are not overproducing in Canada. In fact, we have absorbed a great deal of beef from the southern hemisphere without harming our livestock industry. From time to time cattlemen have complained about the importation of Australian and New Zealand beef, but we have survived.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I do so to inform him that his time has expired.

• (11:40 a.m.)

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member were to open his ears perhaps he might be able to hear better what is being said here. In the first place, I wish to make it clear that I did, indeed, undertake to look into this matter last night and I came prepared with an answer. At no time during the debate last night did I indicate that the government had not looked at the United States capital gains system because it is obvious that the government has looked at that legislation as well as at other capital gains systems. The United States does not have a tax concept identical with the basic herd rules which have been applied in practice in Canada in the past, but it does permit capital gains treatment on the sale of livestock held for draft, breeding or dairy purposes if it is held more than 12 months from the date of acquisition. For their purposes livestock includes not only cows, horses, sheep and swine but also mules, donkeys, goats, fur-bearing animals and other mammals.

Treated as a capital gain, the United States tax on disposal of a herd could be higher than the tax which would apply to a capital gain of a like amount in Canada. In the United States one-half of a capital gain is included in income and with a top personal rate of 70 per cent the effective rate on such gains would be 35 per cent. In addition, under the recent tax reform in the United States the untaxed half of a capital gain is treated as a tax preference item and subject to additional tax. The additional tax is a minimum tax of 10 per cent which is applied to part of a preference item under a special formula, and it could effectively add about one additional percentage point to the level of tax.

There are a number of differences, Mr. Chairman, between what is regarded as a capital gain in Canada and what is so regarded in the United States. To some extent this is just a reflection of modifications made in the Canadian tax system from time to time to meet our own particular needs. For example, if I may refer to an industry that concerns people coming from the province of Alberta, in 1962, on the instigation of the government then in office, Parliament passed legislation the effect of which was to include the proceeds of oil properties in income and, at the same time, to permit the immediate deductibility of the cost of oil properties. That, of course, is precisely what is suggested with respect to the acquisition of breeding stock, and so on, after January 1, 1972.

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Chairman, this matter is of such vital importance to the Canadian agricultural industry that we must, if we are to represent farmers across this country adequately, deal in much greater detail with the matter we are considering. The parliamentary secretary has admitted that this bill is designed to phase out progressively the basic herd concept. That shows what the government thinks about that particular aspect of farming and demonstrates the government's attitude toward the entire farming business. I therefore wish to direct some questions to the parliamentary secretary and to the Minister of Finance. The officials sitting in front of them may be able to help with the answers.

Would the parliamentary secretary or the minister tell us the basic philosophy behind the government's approach to taxation in the farming field? Has the government considered that the farming industry is not in the same category as other corporations and businesses across this country? We are not just dealing with some type of business; we are dealing with an industry whose peculiarities have been recognized by various governments throughout our history.

Without doubt, in attempting to revise the tax system the government has made a strong attempt, as is evident by the instructions given to those who drafted this bill, to plug loopholes. Some of our larger corporations took advantage of the admitted weaknesses in the old act and, by hiring able accountants and good corporation lawyers, were able to evade certain taxes. Without doubt, many millions of dollars that should have been paid as taxes were not paid and were siphoned off for the benefit of these corporations through various loopholes in the old legislation. Having read some parts of this bill, there is no doubt in my mind that the government has tried deliberately and meticulously to close many of these loopholes. I do not quarrel with that. I think that is good and sound.

In bringing forward this basic revision of the tax structure I do not doubt that the government felt, as do the majority of people generally in Canada, that if the tax system were made fairer, if everyone paid his share of taxes, there could be a general reduction in tax rates. The government felt, in other words, that those who were least able to pay would pay less tax and that in Canada we should adopt a tax system that would be workable, plausible and acceptable. However, in their zeal to make this possible and to follow this prescribed and commendable path they failed, I think, to consider the vagaries of the agricultural industry. They failed to realize that basic principles applying to business corporations and larger industries do not apply to the same degree to smaller businesses and to farming. That is why we are so incensed at what seems to be a deliberate attempt on the part of the government to put through legislation that could adversely affect the livelihood of farmers in Canada.

My colleague has spoken about the fact that we must compete in the North American market. This market is vital for the Canadian agricultural industry. Since the industry can sell in Canada to only about 20 million customers, the industry must export a great deal in order to survive. The very nature of agriculture today makes it imperative for Canadian farmers to employ the very latest methods, the latest implements and the latest scientific techniques. All these are very costly to employ, and if the market is small our farmers cannot use these new techniques because the per unit production cost will be too high. On the other hand, if 30 per cent or more of our cattle production and agricultural production in general can be exported to international markets, Canadian farmers can survive because per unit costs of production will be lower and there will be some chance for profits. If the tax advantage that agriculture has enjoyed in the past is tampered with, if the tax position of agriculture is made less attractive under the provisions of the bill we are considering, as I suspect is happening, the position of agriculture will be precarious indeed.

So I return to my opening statement and ask the government to tell us, before hard and fast positions are reached from which it will be almost impossible to deviate, what the government's basic philosophy is in its approach to the taxation of agriculture. Is the government aware that by removing the basic herd concept it will be destroying the incentive in the future for people to take up that kind of farming? Is it aware that the capital gains tax will make it almost impossible for farms to be handed down from generation to generation? Is it aware that the very nature of farming, and especially the very nature of livestock raising, is not simply a one-generation process? It is not like selling shares, obtaining a sum of money, building a factory and being in business in a matter of months. Building up the basic herd concept with specialized breeding stock sometimes takes two or three generations. In many instances today it is the grandfather who takes pride in the output of a grandson. It is not something that has been developed over the course of two or three years. I wonder whether the government is aware of this.

Something that has troubled me greatly—I wonder too whether the government is aware of this—is the ramifications, especially where the agricultural industry is concerned, if this legislation is passed and the provincial governments are not sensitive to the provisions of this legislation with regard to agriculture. What happens if this taxation of farmers is only a small part of the entire package and farmers and farm businesses are faced with additional estate and income taxes imposed at the provincial level? These are questions to which we must have answers before we are prepared to pass these sections of the bill.

We want to know where farmers will stand in the future. We want to know what the basic view or thrust of the government is where farmers are concerned. Is this measure designed to extract from the farming community the greatest possible revenue for the government while gambling that the farmers can stay in business? Is this the view? Has any consideration been given to a policy that will bring about a viable agricultural industry in order to sustain many thousands of families and provide a high standard of food for Canadians? What is the thinking of the government? This is what we are interested in and must know. This is what the cattlemen, hog producers, tobacco growers and producers of fruits and vegetables across this country are asking today. To date, the only source of information has been chartered accountants. The stock answer of every chartered accountant I or any farmer has queried is, "I am sorry, we haven't the foggiest idea; this bill is massive and complex and it is going to take time to digest." This is not good enough. While it is being digested, processed and regulations drawn up, if the basic concept is that farmers are going to pay a higher degree of taxation the ultimate result will be the destruction of too many substantial farm units across the country that we cannot afford to lose.

Something that has been causing increasing alarm among those in agriculture has been the disposition of our basic herds, high production dairy animals and some of our top-notch breeding herds because of the fact the economic climate today is not such as to create an incentive for these businesses to continue. The economy of today is such that there is a balancing of the scale. Good, substantial farmers may or may not have a possibility of getting out of farming. Unfortunately, a tremendous number of farmers are in debt to such a degree that they cannot get out unless they are forced to do so. I am speaking of those who still have a choice. If they are undecided now, my fear is that the imposition of a greater tax load, which cannot be passed on to any other source but must be taken out of the dwindling profits of their business, will cause the whole agricultural economy to collapse. As all hon. members are aware, this would be to the detriment of Canada.

These are some of the questions we feel must be answered before we proceed too much farther with these sections of the bill.

Mr. Downey: Mr. Chairman, I have one or two questions I wish to ask the parliamentary secretary. One is with regard to the definition of farming as found on page 569 of the bill. It reads:

> "farming" includes tillage of the soil, livestock raising or exhibiting, maintaining of horses for racing, raising of poultry, fur farming, dairy farming, fruit growing and the keeping of bees, but does not include an office or employment under a person engaged in the business of farming;

How would a farm manager or a son who may be working for his father and endeavouring to get into the business fit in here? Are any concessions going to be made with regard to whether he will be considered a farmer, and will he be eligible for the normal deductions of a farmer at the time he is entering into farming operations? I am referring to someone working for a farmer in the capacity of manager.

[Mr. Danforth.]

Mr. Mahoney: If a farm manager or son were employed in that capacity, he would be an employee and would report the income he receives from the proprietor of the farm as personal income. Of course, the amount of wages or salary paid to him would be an expense of the farm and deducted from the farm gross income when calculating the taxable income.

Mr. Downey: This would not help a farm manager. Suppose he had a portion of the ownership of the farm at the time and had a few cattle or something else upon the owner's property and was trying to establish himself. We are interested in some provision for him while he is trying to become established. There are many cases of farmers working in oilfields, roughnecking on drilling rigs, who are having a hard time. Has any thought been given to extending the definition of farmers to include this type of situation?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, the person in the situation the hon. member described would be a farmer in relation to the activities he carries on with the cattle or whatever he was operating. If he were operating a part of the land on shares and so on, his personal status would be determined by what he is doing. To the extent that he is receiving salary or wages he is an employee. To the extent that he is farming or raising cattle in some way on shares, he is a farmer and reports his income as such.

Mr. Downey: Is it correct to say that if 51 per cent of his income came from work outside the farm he could not be classified as a farmer?

Mr. Mahoney: No, Mr. Chairman, that is not correct. The hon. member should refer to section 31 which reads:

> Where a taxpayer's chief source of income for a taxation year is neither farming nor a combination of farming and some other source of income—

Certainly in the situation that the hon. member described where a person is being paid to manage a farm, and also running his own herd this is his own farm income. However, the principle or chief source of income would be a combination of farming and some other source of income. I think the exclusion at the beginning of section 31 takes him out of the category of general farmer and away from the limitations to which the hon. member has referred.

Mr. Downey: What I am interested in is the proportion of income. My point is that there must be a definite income ratio. At what point can a man be classified as a farmer? Just what is the criterion? Is it something which is at all negotiable? Is it a matter for a ruling by the department? Is there any humanity being exercised in this regard?

• (12 noon)

Mr. Mahoney: Again we are in an area where it would be a question of fact, subject to the usual right of appeal under the act. If the hon. member were to describe a particular situation to me I would be glad to refer it to the revenue department and obtain an opinion as to how the ruling would go. I imagine it might be very difficult for a person who derived 5 per cent of his income from farming and 95 per cent from other sources to convince people that he was a farmer in the first year. On the other hand, someone who had been carrying on a farming operation for years and whose income from farming had dropped, for some temporary reason, to 5 per cent of his total income in a particular year might still be allowed to continue on the basis that he was a farmer.

While I have the floor I must apologize to the hon. member for Crowfoot for an error I made in connection with timing as applied to herds in the United States. He was right in referring to two years. This is an instance where they did change the timing from a one-year period to a two-year period in their 1969 tax revisions.

Mr. Horner: I admire the honesty of the hon. member for making that correction. It used to be one year but, frankly, they found there was too much hanky-panky so they made it two years, which is a little more rigid. When the parliamentary secretary spoke of 12 months I said this would be better for the stock raiser. That remark led me to believe that the parliamentary secretary did not understand the concept at all, when he did not believe that 12 months was better than two years.

I understand that when the parliamentary secretary rose to speak he made the remark that I should keep my mouth shut and my ears open. That is an awful remark to make to a fellow by the name of Jack Horner. I well remember the old nursery rhyme: Sticks and stones may break my bones but names will never hurt me. I also recall the saying—it is one the parliamentary secretary should remember: Stones that are hurled with harsh intent, a man can use to build his monument. The hon. member can hurl all the stones at me he likes, but that will not further the debate or elevate the discussion in any way. Nor does it elevate the parliamentary secretary as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister suggested should be done.

I am quite serious about this question of the application of the capital gains tax to the basic herd. Perhaps I should explain the effects a little further. What the basic herd does is to allow ranchers or dairymen to pay income tax on money as they earn it. When they retire or sell out they then sell the basic herd as a capital asset. They do not have to pay income tax on the sale of the capital asset. With the application of the capital gains tax they will have to pay capital gains tax on the increased value of the capital asset. But they will not be required to pay income tax on the capital asset. We have to take a look at the averaging principle to see how this applies.

In this tax legislation we are being presented with an averaging principle applicable to all people. The basic purpose of this principle is to take into account the application of the capital gains tax. How will the averaging principle affect the farmer? The parliamentary secretary says it is the same as it was. He says there are no changes. I ask this question. With the advent of the capital gains tax, is the averaging concept as useful to the man engaged in the livestock industry? That is the crux of the matter. The answer is no.

Let me give an example, Mr. Chairman. Suppose I am in the livestock business and I am getting along pretty well. I have had some good years and I average. Suppose I averaged last year the preceding five years right up until 1970. Let us suppose that through no fault of mine I suffer a severe heart attack and have to sell out. I have a basic herd. Capital gains tax will apply on the basic herd but I will not have to pay income tax on the proceeds of the sale. Under this legislation, if it comes into effect, let us suppose a young farmer has averaged up until last year. He has no basic herd because he cannot build up a basic herd. He has averaged every year he can average. He has to sell out through no fault of his own. What effect does the averaging have? He cannot average because he has averaged all his five preceding years. This bill does not provide a forward averaging principle for a farmer. No way. Suppose he has suffered a heart attack and cannot work and his family has to be provided for. He cannot put the money into a government annuity. He has got to buy a house and live somewhere else. He has to pay. The averaging principle is not as good now with the introduction of the capital gains tax. The livestock man needs a basic herd concept as well in order to ensure that he can put aside money which will not be taxable in the event he has to sell out and still live. It is as simple as that.

I cannot understand the cold, heartless attitude of the government. While I do not like it, while I complain loud and long, I can understand their attitude toward the wheat farmer. They say: the farmers are producing too much wheat; we must get them out of business. It is a negative attitude but at the same time I can understand what they are thinking. I do my best to alter their thinking in this regard. But there is no similar situation involving the livestock men. They are not overproducing. Indeed, many consumers across Canada will say they are not producing enough and this is why the price of beef on the table is so high.

Why is the government trying to get rid of the men engaged in the livestock industry on the one hand while on the other the minister responsible for the Wheat Board says he intends to provide $40 million over the next ten years to get more people involved in the livestock industry? Why are we taking these steps on the one hand and destroying the competitive position of the industry on the other? It is beyond my comprehension. I have tried and tried to understand it. I lay awake most of last night trying to figure out the reasoning of the government in this regard. The American rancher can put cattle into a holding position provided he has kept them two years. They do not call it a basic herd down there. In essence, Mr. Chairman, what he has is a capital asset, and if he sells out he is not subject to high taxation rates on the sale.

• (12:10 p.m.)

A little while ago the parliamentary secretary said that these things have to be considered. He said the United States farmers pay a higher rate of tax, that the top rate was 70 per cent. Who gives a hoot what the top rate is? Only a very few ranchers fall within the rop rate, about one-quarter or one-tenth of one per cent. They are people like Bing Crosby, though he would probably regard his ranching operations as income from another business.

I am talking here about the heart and the guts of the ranching industry. Certainly the average rancher does not fall within the top brackets. Indeed, they are in a lower bracket than they are in Canada. Let the parliamentary secretary rise to his feet and correct himself in this respect, because that is the fact. This bill will hurt the cattle industry in Canada, a cattle industry that will be and has been subject to severe competition on the North American market.

I do not have to recite to the House the effect of the outbreak of foot and mouth disease in 1951 because it is well known. As a result of that outbreak we were cut off from the North American cattle market and right away cattle prices dropped ten cents a pound. We have just recovered from that low of the early 1950's. Although the outbreak of foot and mouth disease did not hurt the cattle industry as such in Canada, it did cut us off from the North American cattle market and caused a drop in price. That is why I ask whether we should adopt a piece of legislation that almost does as much harm and certainly hampers and hinders the cattle industry of Canada.

It has been suggested that I want to hold up this bill. I do not want to hold it up for the sake of holding it up, but I am on sound and firm ground when I contend that in this bill we are being coldhearted to the best part of Canada's agricultural industry. We are being insensitive. I do not think any adjective would be too strong to describe the attitude displayed by the parliamentary secretary and the minister in this debate and their reluctance to put forward facts. When goaded to they then have to correct themselves later and accept the facts I put forward.

People ask me why it is Liberal policies have been so firmly rejected in western Canada. These policies have not been bad in all cases; the reason is the callous attitude adopted by the government. For example, the Prime Minister says in Winnipeg, "why should I sell your wheat", showing an indifference that people out west have not recovered from yet. The attitude that the government is displaying toward the livestock industry in removing the basic herd contributes to the indifference.

Westerners are generous, bighearted and will soon forgive a man and give him a second chance. But that man has to show interest and concern for the west. He has to demonstrate that he is learning and is sympathetic to western problems. This government has not shown that it is. Operation Lift was an example. The government said to the farmers: "Here it is; buy it. If you don't like it you can lump it, because we are going to eliminate the surplus of wheat." The farmers did not like it and they had to lump it.

Then the government introduced its grain stabilization bill and there was much heated argument over it. The prairie agricultural ministers came to Ottawa to discuss it and asked the government to reconsider it because it was unacceptable. But the government said: "No, we are not going to make any changes to the bill". Here once again I am on solid, concrete ground. The government has not even studied the application of the capital gains tax to the U.S. cattle industry, yet they are prepared to implement such a tax as far as the Canadian cattle industry is concerned. Once more this shows lack of concern and indifference.

I am thankful, Mr. Chairman, that this lack of concern and indifference has fully registered on the people of western Canada. If the hon. member opposite gets to his feet and says that the hon. member for Crowfoot is just a loud mouth and does not know what he is talking about, that he is just blowing off steam and if we hear him out it will be all right, then that is one thing. But when he stands up and says that I should keep my mouth shut so my ears can hear and then 15 minutes later has to correct himself and say that I was right and he was wrong, then whose ears should be opened, would you say, Mr. Chairman? I think that illustrates who it is that should be listened to.

I led into this subject as gently and as quietly as I could with all the finesse that I could muster last night. I started to ask a few questions. I asked whether the government had considered the United States situation and the parliamentary secretary was kind enough to say: "Well, we will not make a decision yet; we will take a look at it". Again today I suggested that if the government does not like having to listen to my repeating myself and haranguing the government about its callous indifference, let the hon. member opposite stand clause 29 so it can be reconsidered. They can indicate that they are not going to buy my suggestion, or adopt the United States system, but let them say they will take a look at my suggestions and also examine the application of the capital gains tax. Then at least the government will indicate that its ears are open and that some of the comments made on this side of the House are penetrating. But apparently the government is not even prepared to do that.

As I look across the House I observe that the great defenders of government farm policy are nowhere to be seen. The great advocates on the Prairies, these great defenders of agricultural policy, these livestock and grain men, are just not around. They are all represented by one man who looks as though he might be prepared to speak on this subject, and I hope he does. I think he is indicating that he will, so at least I have been penetrating his ears, something that I can assure the committee is appreciated in all corners of the House.

This issue is an indication of why government policies are not accepted in western Canada. The minister in charge of the Wheat Board gives us the answer: "Well, I guess we didn't sell our story well enough". What did the Prime Minister say in Calgary this summer about Bill C-176? He said that the people out there had been listening to false prophets. He also said: "You Liberals in western Canada have not sold the story well enough". No matter what the story is, Mr. Chairman, it has to be sold if it is to be accepted. You have to convince people that the government is interested in them, that the government is trying to help them. Once they are convinced of that you can then explain how you are going to help them. However, if a man is convinced beforehand that you are not trying to help him he will not listen to you. He will not take your medicine or benefit from the salve that you rub on his wounds.

• (12:20 p.m.)

I have pointed out vividly that the United States cattleman is in a better position in respect of capital gains than is a Canadian. I have pointed out why we should be in a better position. Cattlemen in the United States have proximity to large markets. They have a favourable climate. The livestock industry in Canada suffers from pretty severe winters. Let the hon. member for Meadow Lake tell us about ranching in northern Saskatchewan. Let the hon. member for Dauphin tell us about the situation of ranchers up north. They will tell you about the winters. Perhaps some of the ranchers in the foothills close to Calgary South may enjoy a climate somewhat equal to the climate many ranchers experience in the United States. However, not all of us can live in the sheltered belt of the foothills; not all of us can enjoy the chinooks in the southern part of that province. Many of us have to raise cattle where the going is tough. We should have a tax break in order to be competitive.

We might ask the former head of the products division of the Department of Agriculture, Ralph Bennett, about this situation. He has addressed many groups across Canada and has said that the price of our cattle always hinges upon the price in the United States, on what is going to market in the United States and on what is going to market here. The price received is governed accordingly.

When we look at the price received we must take a look at the cost of production. We must look at the costs in order to arrive at the net position of the livestock man. Is the livestock man in Canada in a better net position than the livestock man in the United States? No. Machinery costs and all other costs right down to a lariat are higher in this country. I once used the word "lariat" and the press never forgot it. Even a lariat can be bought more cheaply in the United States than in Canada. The price of fencing, wire, machinery, saddles, lariats and all these things used in the livestock industry is less in the United States than in Canada. Taxes on land are another item. The taxes on ranch land in the United States are no higher than they are in Canada. In fact, land cost in some areas is cheaper in the United States.

I notice, Mr. Chairman, that you are about to interrupt me and therefore I shall finish very quickly. There is no doubt in my mind that the cost of production is cheaper in the United States than it is in Canada and therefore we should have a tax break and not a tax increase.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make it very clear that we are always willing to accept the more worth-while suggestions of the hon. member and are quite prepared to stand section 29 if that is the disposition of the House.

Mr. Horner: Thank you.

The Chairman: Perhaps the Chair did not understand. Is there a suggestion that section 29 be stood?

Mr. Mahoney: Yes, Mr. Chairman. Of course we are still debating sections 28, 30 and 31.

The Chairman: The Chair would like to put the matter in order to make sure that representatives of all groups are agreed. The suggestion is that section 29 of this group be stood and that the committee proceed with its consideration of sections 28, 30 and 31. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Chairman, may I ask what the intention is in terms of proceeding further with clause 29 if it is to stand?

Mr. Mahoney: I beg your pardon. I did not quite catch the question.

Mr. Burton: I want to find out what the intention of the government is or what action the hon. gentleman has in mind in respect of proceeding with this section. Is it to stand on an indefinite basis?

Mr. Mahoney: Yes, indefinitely. Obviously we will have to come back to it some time.

The Chairman: Is the committee agreed that section 29 shall stand.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause 1, section 29, stands.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, the agricultural sections in this tax bill are of great interest and concern to anyone involved in the agricultural industry either directly or indirectly. One very worrisome part is section 29 which the parliamentary secretary has suggested be stood indefinitely. As a result of this section being stood I shall not comment on the question of the basic herd other than to say I very much hope that when arrangements are made concerning how to deal with this particular section the government will agree to send it to the Standing Committee on Agriculture so that witnesses may be called and points of view presented in order that we may have a much better understanding of the dangerous possibilities of this section as it now stands. The parliamentary secretary has indicated that the government is very glad to receive constructive suggestions which would improve the legislation, and therefore I hope his seniors will follow out his good will in this regard. There may be other sections of this tax bill which should also be referred to the committee, but I will make my comments in that regard on another occasion.

One further argument for sending this bill to the committee is that while it is all very well for the government to say that the matter of tax reform has been under public discussion for many years—and we agree that it has—while there was discussion in very general terms of tax reform agriculture-wise and every other way when the white paper on taxation presented by the minister was before us, no one in the country, including members of this House, knew what the specific proposals were to be concerning tax reform in general and agriculture in particular until June 18 last. As has been mentioned in the House on many occasions, even the tax experts in the country do not understand the full implications of the bill. Certainly certain parts of the bill could be passed now, as has been suggested by my colleague the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings. I believe this would be a good idea because it would benefit the taxpayers in the lower income brackets and the elderly. Certain parts of the bill, however—not only section 29 but others as well—I believe should be referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture because it is quite obvious that the bill has been drafted by law officers of the Crown who are not familiar with farming. This fact is quite obvious because of the way in which the bill is drafted. One cannot blame them because they are law officers of the Crown and it is their business to draft legislation. But it is difficult to draft good legislation when you are not familiar with the type of industry for which you are legislating. It would be very helpful if not only section 29 but also the other sections were referred to the committee.

I cannot understand why there is such a great rush to shove this legislation through by the end of the year. Perhaps the Prime Minister has set a deadline for the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of National Revenue and the Minister of Finance and has said that it must go through—period. Although I cannot see any great reason for the rush, perhaps the government may be considering an election and wishes to be in a position to say that it got the tax bill through in a hurry. That may be the reason, but even from the government's point of view this may not be helpful since it might cause a good deal of flak against the government. We heard a good deal about tax reform through the years and about how great it would be. Now that we have the legislation before us, an enormously complex document of 595 pages of small print plus hundreds of amendments with the possibility of more, surely there is no hurry to rush it through in five or six weeks. It should be given careful consideration.

Having said that, I suggest there is another point which the parliamentary secretary might take into consideration. In the sections that we are now discussing the government does not seem to be particularly interested in changing the basic concept with regard to the taxation of farms and farm businesses. Certainly it will be very difficult for farms to pass from father to son and for farms to be kept in the family. It is true that the tax can be spread over a period of years, but if you are going to deplete the working capital of a family farm corporation or a family farm this will cause serious problems in carrying out the farming operation. Most farms are pretty short of working capital as it is, and certainly this kind of legislation will not help.

It has been alleged by a number of members in the House and by competent authorities in agriculture outside the House that the taxation which under these proposals is to be levied on agriculture may have the effect of not only driving people out of the farming business but of preventing younger people from entering the farming business. This has been mentioned by the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo, the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings, the hon. member for Kent-Essex and by others who have some concept and some knowledge of what they are talking about, not to mention various agricultural organizations which have commented on the matter. It is a pretty serious problem if there is any substance to these allegations, namely, that farming may well cease to be the basic industry of Canada, which it still is, and become a very minor industry provided it is not wiped out altogether.

The government, I have noticed, is almost in a panic when allegations are made regarding our environment. If somebody says that our waters are being polluted and that in five years we will cease to have fresh water in Canada, the government virtually panics and takes great pains to check into such allegations. I am not opposed to the government doing that, but when the government decides to look into some of these matters it is highly selective. The government moves quickly on matters that have an emotional appeal to the public such as insecticide poisoning which is dangerous to people or wildlife. These matters are looked into by the government even when such allegations prove to be incorrect after further study, as now appears to be the case with DDT. However, when much competent opinion is expressed in this case that the present proposals will put farming out of business, there does not seem to be any rush by the government to look into the matter, to hear these complaints or to send these sections of the tax legislation to a committee for further study.

It seems to me that if there is any kind of substantial or serious allegation that the basic industry of our country will be put out of business, it should be given careful consideration. There is no doubt that some of these allegations may be pretty hairy, so to speak, pretty wild. I am sure some of them are. On the other hand, there is sound and well informed advice in this regard and I think the government would be well advised to look into this advice before it moves so hastily and for no reason, as anybody can see.

The government should consider everything that is presented in the House and we should hear experts on why tax changes should be made. We do not want to drive the agricultural industry out of business. We do not want to become dependent on imported food. Just imagine anyone being told five or ten years ago that Canada might become an importer of food such as butter or milk. I gather from what the Minister of Agriculture said the other day that pretty soon we will be faced with importing butter and milk products before the end of the year because we are facing a shortage. This is something we should consider very carefully. We should consider the social implications, our international trade, our relations with the United Stated and many other things that are of concern in this case. For this reason, a careful study should be made.

I have touched on these matters in general and I will have more to say on them later. However, I am glad to hear that the parliamentary secretary has stood section 29 and I hope he will use his influence to send that section concerning the basic herd concept to the committee on agriculture. I also hope that this will be possible with other sections as well. As I have already said, we are dealing with many far-reaching problems with respect to the future of agriculture in this country, and I can see no reason for hastily passing these four sections without proper study when clearly they were drawn up by people who have no knowledge of farming or agriculture.

Mr. Burton: I was pleased to hear the statement of the parliamentary secretary a few minutes ago when he undertook to stand section 29 concerning the basic herd provision in the income tax bill, and I trust that the time allowed for consideration will result in some satisfactory solution to the problem. The parliamentary secretary is aware of some of the suggestions made by members of our party and of the fact that we did press for a change in the government stand on this matter. Contrary to the impression which the hon. member for Crowfoot attempted to leave a few minutes ago when I stepped out of the chamber for a few minutes, members of my party have been very active on this matter. I say this without in any way denigrating the efforts of some of his colleagues as well as of himself on this particular matter.

When the government has this matter under consideration I hope it will give adequate consideration to the situation of small as well as large livestock producers. The position of the small and medium livestock producers must be given serious consideration. The small producer is often in a difficult position because he may not be able to afford or may not find it economic to acquire the skilled assistance and the expertise that may be necessary to take full advantage of the provisions which may exist in the tax law. In fact, some provisions may operate in a different way for a small, individual producer than for a large producer or a large incorporated enterprise. When the government reconsiders the matter, I hope it will give full consideration to the particular problems of small and medium livestock producers because I think the government has admitted in relation to other proposals which have been brought before the House and comments which have been made by ministers and officials of the government from time to time that a real problem exists in Canada with respect to small farm operators who are living on a low farm income. Ways and means must be found to assist these small farmers to expand their operations and to develop viable economic units. This should be taken into account in the framing of tax proposals concerning the treatment of livestock producing because one of the major areas of agricultural production and expansion is centred in livestock production.

Some real problems exist in Canada at present because more and more of our livestock production is becoming concentrated in the hands of large producers and of corporate enterprises carrying on specialized operations where in fact the owner of the operation is completely or far removed from the operation itself. It is a different sort of situation, an entirely corporate type of situation, compared with the traditional links that have existed in the family farm type of operation, or an operation in which there was an association between the ownership of the operation and the labour input of the operation. Thus I hope the government will give the fullest consideration to the operations of small producers and will come up with proposals that can be passed by Parliament and meet with the approval of all interested parties in this regard.

There is just one other aspect I want to raise, and I hope I may be permitted to place it before the government at this time. If the parliamentary secretary has any comments to make on this proposition I would be pleased to hear what he has to say. Yesterday it was noted in the debate that the effect of the change with regard to the basic herd provision would be to force many farmers to change over to an accrual type of farm accounting from the cash type of farm accounting, even though the option exists in the act. However, the practical effect would be to force many farmers to move over to an accrual type of accounting. It seems to me that this poses some other problems because there are many instances of farmers who are engaged in a mixed livestock and grain operation. Those farmers may be forced or may feel that their best option is to go into a livestock type of operation. But that still leaves the grain operation to be considered, particularly in the prairie provinces. The parliamentary secretary and the government will be aware that a farmer has no real control over the time when he may be able to market his grain. This is entirely dependent on the setting of quotas. The question of when market opportunities may arise is determined entirely by the decisions of other people. The farmer does not have control over his own situation. He cannot exercise control over when to ship his products to market.

I think the parliamentary secretary will agree that this is one of the basic reasons for keeping the cash accounting option open for farmers. This is one of the factors. But what is the situation with respect to a mixed livestock and grain operation? Will the farmer who finds himself in a position of having to switch over to accrual accounting with respect to his livestock operation be forced to use accrual accounting with respect to his grain operation? It has been suggested to me that this in fact would be the case. This would pose many serious problems for many farmers.

There are many farmers who, in recent years, have been forced to keep the grain they have produced in storage for a period of several years, in some cases for periods of up to five years. This, of course, would mean that a serious problem would be faced by some of these farmers who had been forced to keep their grain in storage for an extended length of time. Thus I hope the parliamentary secretary will be able to comment on this matter and also consider any changes that may have to be made or should be made in order to clear it up.

There is one other point I want to take up at this time. It has to do with a section which is not before the committee at this moment but is related to our considerations at this time. I refer to section 12(1)(g) as found on page 26. Section 12(1) provides for amounts to be included as income from business or property. Paragraph (g) then deals with the matter of payments based on production or use. It reads:

(g) any amount received by the taxpayer in the year that was dependent upon the use of or production from property whether or not that amount was an instalment of the sale price of the property (except that an instalment of the sale price of agricultural land is not included by virtue of this paragraph);

That does provide for an exclusion so far as this paragraph is concerned, but I want to clarify with the parliamentary secretary whether that means that there are other instances where in fact such an instalment of the sale price would be included in the computation of income? Are there other circumstances where this would be the case? I would hope the parliamentary secretary would be able to clear up this point when we are on a discussion of farm matters.

I also want to ask some questions with regard to section 31 of the bill, following up on the questions which were raised by the hon. member for Battle River. Section 31, of course, has to do with the matter of losses from farming operations.

As I understand the answers given by the parliamentary secretary to some of the questions posed, if it is considered that a person is engaged in a farming enterprise such that his object is to gain income from that enterpise, even though he may be combining his line of work with farming, or in fact at the same time he is carrying on another line of business, possibly carrying on a business of some sort, a store operation, a trucking operation, or possibly he is working for a wage—there are many instances near large urban centres where a person is living on a farm and is gaining some income from the farm and at the same time he is working for a wage, and I suppose in many cases actually making more by way of taxable income from his other line of work than he is from the farming operation itself, nevertheless the entire line of work he is carrying on might be regarded as one operation in many respects—my understanding is that if in fact a loss is incurred in the farming operation in circumstances such as that he will be able to write off that loss in computing his taxable income. I want to clear that matter up.

I am interested in knowing just how far the scope of this section extends. What are the guidelines? Is this simply a discretionary section where in fact the Department of National Revenue will have to develop its guidelines, will have to develop regulations as time goes on? Or just what is the case? I would be interested in knowing more about the concept involved in this particular section.

I suppose I might even make reference to the fact that there are some farmers who are also Members of Parliament. What is the situation with regard to them? Are they to be included? I do not wish especially to draw attention to that, but it is simply one example of the type of situation that may exist and that should be considered.

I also want to deal with the question—it may have been adequately answered already by the parliamentary secretary—that has to do with the problem of the variability of farm income. If I understood the parliamentary secretary correctly, there may be a situation where a person is engaged in farming together with another line of work, and in some years his major source of income may be from farming but in other years he may have a very low level of income from farming or may incur a loss. What then is the situation in this regard? There are any number of combinations of circumstances that a person might run into and that might occur, and I would like to have further clarification from the parliamentary secretary on this matter as well.

I want to conclude by saying that I am happy the government has agreed to reconsider the section concerning the basic herd. I hope some way will be found to come up with an adequate solution to this problem because I think it is very important to the future of the agricultural industry. It is a very important matter in relation to programs which might be carried on by this government and by the governments of various provinces in an attempt to diversify the agricultural industry, to expand livestock operations, and thus to work toward a more healthy agricultural industry than we have at the present time.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Regina East posed so many questions that perhaps I should take the opportunity to answer them, at least as much as I can, while they are fresh. Personally, Mr. Chairman, and I am very much aware of the contention of the Canadian Cattlemen's Association that somehow the removal of the basic herd concept would impel ranchers to move from the cash to the accrual basis, I must say that so far the continuity of the logic of that argument has escaped me. That, of course, is one of the reasons why we have suggested that we not deal with section 29 at this time.

At the moment, of course, with the basic herd a rancher pays for his stock with tax paid dollars. In a sense he is paying a little more tax in advance so that he will have a tax-free capital gain out of it at the end, if he feels this kind of planning is presumably to his advantage. Just why the farmer would feel impelled to switch from the cash to the accrual accounting system as a result of this particular provision in the bill, I do not know.

I think I should point out to the hon. member, and to the cattlemen, that they have drawn an analogy between this situation in which, if the rancher or the farmer did decide to make this move, would be a voluntary move and the provision for the move to the accrual accounting system by professionals. In the case of professionals, of course, the changes in the act will require that they change from cash to accrual accounting. It was felt appropriate that some transitional provisions be allowed in that case. In the case of farmers and ranchers any such change from a cash to an accrual basis would be voluntary and the desirability of transitional provisions is not apparent.

• (12:50 p.m.)

The hon. member referred to section 12(1)(g). This, of course, is a section that remains unchanged from the existing act and the exclusion of agricultural land was noted. The type of property that would be included in that would be other resource properties, for example, mining property, the sale price of which is in essence related to prospective production although it may be expressed in capital terms. That is type of situation which this particular section, one of long standing, is intended to cover.

The parameters of the gentleman farmer and his definition have been discussed here and basically this comes under section 31(1). The section says:

> Where a taxpayer's chief source of income for a taxation year is neither farming nor a combination of farming and some other source of income—

What is contemplated is that he is a bona fide farmer and is not just dabbling in farming as a hobby. There are no regulations under this section and there is no change in it from the existing act. The question of whether he is or is not a hobby farmer is one of fact. It is one that is open to appeal through the usual procedures if the taxpayer disputes the initial ruling of the assessor. I am afraid I cannot be very helpful to the hon. member in defining that much further.

As I indicated earlier to the hon. member for Battle River in reply to a similar line of questioning, particular situations can certainly be referred to the Department of National Revenue and we can get examples of what the rulings have been in these situations in the past. I did suggest to the hon. member that in all likelihood a person would have some difficulty if only 5 per cent of his income was derived from farming and 95 per cent from other sources. It might be difficult for him to establish himself as a bona fide farmer in the initial circumstances. On the other hand, if he had been and was a bona fide farmer and for some reason or other his farming income had dropped off, there is no reason to think that he would be excluded as a farmer. It is my understanding that once he is a farmer or his income is derived from farming and some other source, the special averaging under section 119 is available to him.

Mr. Burton: I have a couple of follow-up questions. I may have missed something that the parliamentary secretary said with regard to section 12(1), but my question was related to the bracketed portion of that section on page 26. Is there some other area which would bring in an instalment of the sale price of agricultural land—unless the parliamentary secretary is suggesting the case where agricultural land was sold for mining purposes or something like that? Was that what he meant?

Mr. Mahoney: No, Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to make it clear that agricultural properties are excluded from this whole provision. If an agricultural property is sold for cash in the customary way on an agreement for sale or with a mortgage back there is no problem but you can have a situation where agricultural property is sold for a share of the crop over a period of years. While we want to be sure that this is regarded as an income transaction, when it comes to other resource industries, a mine or oil property or something like that, we also want to make sure that a similar sale of agricultural property is regarded as a capital transaction rather than an income transaction.

Mr. Burton: With regard to the situation concerning accrual accounting that the parliamentary secretary responded to, will it be possible—

The Chairman: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member to report progress. I would not want him to ask the question and then not give the hon. parliamentary secretary time to reply.

Progress reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

REFERENCE OF POLLUTION OF OCEAN TO STANDING COMMITTEE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the permission of the House to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity, namely:

That this House, knowing that tankers and freighters are frequently smothering or poisoning our undersea gardens and that there is loss of marine life as a result thereof and having the desire to co-operate with the Minister of the Environment in his declaration that we must take a coastal initiative herewith refers to the Standing Committee on Environmental Pollution the question of the need to extend Canada's jurisdiction seaward to include the continental shelf and slope.

The urgency of the matter is so self-evident that I do not desire to embark on any explanation.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member might find it difficult to do this under the terms of Standing Order 43. He will first need the unanimous consent of the House. I will inquire whether he has this unanimity. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The hon. member's motion cannot be put at this time.

BELL CANADA APPLICATION FOR INCREASED RATES—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the indefensible application by Bell Canada Limited for a substantial rate increase in a year of record profits and the need to examine the purposes of the requested rate increase and, generally, to seek more effective ways of preventing Bell Telephone from abusing its monopoly position to exploit its customers.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) has given the Chair due notice of his intention to request leave to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of debating the matter stated by him. There is little doubt that the matter raised by the hon. gentleman is of national interest and of much concern to Canadians generally. Having said that, it remains for the Chair to determine whether the proposed matter meets the requirements of Standing Order 26 in that the question is such that it requires immediate and urgent consideration by this House.

It does seem to the Chair that Parliament, by virtue of the Railway Act, has delegated its authority to the Canadian Transport Commission and has established machinery and procedures for the purpose of dealing with applications for rate increases by the Bell Telephone Company.

It also appears to the Chair that the hon. gentleman, in the main, is asking for a review or a reconsideration of the statutory powers of the Transport Commission. That is my understanding of the closing words used by the hon. member in his notice and I quote, "to seek more effective ways of preventing Bell Telephone from abusing its monopoly position to exploit its customers". It may well be that such a review or reconsideration of the powers of the commission might be desirable, but it does not seem to me that a debate under Standing Order 26 is the appropriate or the effective method for such a review.

I appreciate that the hon. member for York South might feel that it may be futile to debate the matter after the commission has taken a decision, but as the Chair stated on June 22, 1970, the normal functions of a statutory body in relation to an application for an increase in tolls should not constitute a matter for urgent debate under the provisions of Standing Order 26.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

POLLUTION

ALLEGED SUGGESTION CANADA EXTEND CONTROL ZONE—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Was the Minister of the Environment stating government policy when he suggested that Canada would extend her pollution control zone 100 miles into the Pacific and 400 miles off the coast of Newfoundland? If this represents a statement of government policy, does the government propose to introduce legislation and might we expect to receive such legislation in the near future?

• (2:10 p.m.)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am informed by the minister that he never made such a statement. I would be interested, for the record, to know where this quotation comes from.

Mr. Stanfield: It comes from a speech made by the Minister of the Environment yesterday; that is where it comes from.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Trudeau: Is the hon. member quoting the speech?

Mr. Stanfield: I was paraphrasing the speech.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, if I were to make a long quotation from the minister's speech the Prime Minister would be among the first to object.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the Chair would be the first to object. The hon. Leader of the Opposition might like to ask a supplementary or to rephrase the question.

Mr. Trudeau: Quote his words.

Mr. Stanfield: I am asking the Prime Minister whether the Minister of the Environment was stating government policy when he said yesterday that Canada should extend her pollution control zone 100 miles into the Pacific and 400 miles off the coast of Newfoundland.

Mr. Trudeau: Not only was he not stating government policy, but he did not make the statement he is quoted as having made.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York South.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I apologize to the hon. member for York South. He will have to wait for the applause. The hon. Minister of the Environment is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Davis: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. In the course of a carefully prepared address yesterday, I made no reference to extending anti-pollution activities 100 miles or 400 miles beyond our territorial limits. I did, in an early part of the speech, describe the extent of Canada's continental shelf, and those mileages which the Leader of the Opposition mentioned are the mileages which correspond to the outer limit of our shelf.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There seems to be debate as to what was said or what was not said, and that matter cannot be raised by the hon. gentleman or by the opposition as a question of privilege.

INQUIRY AS TO ANNOUNCEMENT OF REGULATIONS COVERING TERRITORIAL WATERS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I have no intention of entering into debate. I should simply like to ask the Minister of Transport at this time whether he can indicate to the House when the government will be announcing the regulations necessary for it to fulfil its limited objective with regard to the control of pollution within our territorial waters.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I anticipate it will be within a matter of a few weeks. I cannot give the hon. member an exact date but a draft has been prepared and circulated to the various interested parties for comment. I do not anticipate there will be a delay of more than a few weeks.

Mr. Speaker: I think the Chair should recognize the hon. member for York South.

SALE OF SUBSCRIPTION LISTS OF TORONTO "TELEGRAM" TO "STAR"—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Solicitor General. Can the minister inform the House whether personnel of the R.C.M.P. and/or personnel of any department of government have been ordered to investigate, and whether they are investigating, the books and related documents of the defunct Toronto Telegram concerning the manner in which it sold its subscription lists and goodwill to the Toronto Star, or any related subjects?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of that, but I will be glad to inquire and report to the hon. member.

SALE OF TORONTO "TELEGRAM" ASSETS—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF POSSIBLE TAX EVASION.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): While waiting for this minister to inform us, perhaps tomorrow, may I ask the Minister of National Revenue whether he can inform the House whether he has ordered an inquiry or investigation into the manner in which the Toronto Telegram sold a part of its assets and the manner in which it has arranged for the future sale of other parts of its assets, to make certain that this scheme is not one which is deliberately intended to evade tax liability which would otherwise arise in the recapture of write-offs for depreciation and similar write-offs?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, under the terms of the law passed by this Parliament matters of the sort referred to by the hon. member are confidential. I can assure him that the department will be carrying out its responsibilities.

NATIONAL SECURITY

VIOLENT DEMONSTRATION—INTRODUCTION OF ANTI-WRECKERS LAW—POSITION OF PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

Yesterday during his visit in Quebec City, the Prime Minister mentioned an anti-wreckers legislation and stated to his listeners that the federal government was drafting one. Is the Prime Minister ready to tell us when the government plans to present such a bill in Parliament?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, that the member has been wrongly informed. I did not refer to the legislation, but on two occasions, I think, once during a press conference and another time at the CEGEP, the matter of anti-wreckers legislation has been brought up by one of my questioners. This is what I said and what the House already knew: As a result of the expiry of the exceptional legislation last December, we have presented a resolution suggesting that the House should deal with the matter, saying that we would be pleased to know the views of members of the other parties regarding the importance of such a law.

I repeated what we had then said in the House, namely that I thought there was a loophole in the present laws when it comes to facing certain violent and anarchic situations.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Témiscamingue wish to put a supplementary question?

Mr. Caouette: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

I appreciate the Prime Minister's answer, but I should like to know, since this is a criminal matter which is under federal jurisdiction, whether the organizers, that is fellows like Chartrand, Laberge and others, would definitely be considered as organizers of "wreckers" demonstrations, such as the ones that we have experienced—

Mr. Speaker: I do not feel that the question, as put, is in order. Unless the hon. member is prepared to change the wording, he will appreciate that it is impossible for the Chair to let him put his question.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I shall rephrase it.

Would such a legislation be directed against the organizers of "wreckers" demonstrations?

Mr. Speaker: There again I believe that the question, as put, is hypothetical.

PRICES AND INCOMES COMMISSION

STUDY OF INFLATION—INQUIRY AS TO PUBLICATION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. On January 18 last the chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission promised to carry out a series of research studies into the question of inflation and to make public the results before the end of the year. Have these studies been completed and when may we expect the results to be made public?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I know that that commitment has been fulfilled by the commission and that a great deal of research work is underway, but I shall have to inquire of the chairman exactly when he expects publication of this work.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ALLEGED INTENTION OF GOVERNMENT TO REMOVE "ROYAL" FROM NAME—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, in order to allay the fears and the anxieties of members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he is prepared to give his assurance that the government has no plans at the moment nor does not intend to remove the "Royal" from the designation "Royal Canadian Mounted Police".

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): That is the first I have heard of this suggestion, Mr. Speaker, but I will be prepared to take it under consideration.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, petulance is no answer, even for the Prime Minister. The same kind of frivolous answer was given when I asked last year whether the Queen's Printer was going to be abolished, and the change took place during my absence.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was absent because of illness.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the right hon. gentleman would ask his supplementary question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would ask the Prime Minister this, Mr. Speaker, and I do not want a frivolous reply. Is it or is it not a fact that this government now has plans to remove the word "Royal" from that designation? That is a simple question.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Mr. Speaker, if the member will look at my answer tomorrow in Hansard he will find I said that this is the first I heard of such a suggestion. Therefore, it follows that we have no such plans.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is fine.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

COST OF DESTROYER CONSTRUCTION PROGRAM—DATE OF DELIVERY OF SHIPS AND POSSIBILITY OF COMPLETION OF WORK AT EAST COAST YARDS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might direct a question to the Minister of National Defence arising out of the continually mounting cost in respect of the DDH program. I should like to ask the minister whether he could indicate to the House if any of the four ships will get out of the river yards before the end of this year and perhaps he might indicate whether plans are being formulated to complete the work on these ships either at the government dockyard in Halifax or at one of the east coast yards.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): I can inform the hon. gentleman that the plans for the ships are as I mentioned before the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence; that is to say, three of the ships will be delivered from the yards during the course of 1972 and the fourth during the early part of 1973.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister could indicate to the House whether he would be prepared, sometime prior to the end of the year, to give a statement at the earliest possible opportunity to the Standing Committee with regard to the cost estimates of this program to date.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): As the hon. member knows, Mr. Speaker, I gave a very elaborate statement on the contract to the committee. I would be prepared, however, during the course of the committee's consideration of departmental estimates, to go again into the question if the committee wishes.

[Later:]

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, my further supplementary is to the Minister of National Defence. I should like to ask him whether he would be prepared to answer the first part of my earlier question, that is, is the department giving consideration to having the completion of the final work on the DDH's done in the dockyard at Halifax or in one of the east coast yards.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I suppose even after the ships are delivered, and have undergone their trials, there may be some work to be done on them as a result of the trials. It depends on how much work. Essentially, I would not think any work prior to commissioning would be done in east coast yards. These ships would be completed in the manufacturing shipyards.

POSSIBLE SALE OF CF-5 AIRCRAFT TO VENEZUELA—PURPOSE OF REPLACEMENT BY TWO-SEATER VERSION

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether my question is supplementary but it relates to the possible sale of 20 CF-5 aircraft to Venezuela and the statement that they would be replaced in the Canadian Armed Forces by a two-seater version. I should like to ask for what purpose the two-seater version would be employed.

Mr. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as indicated in the white paper on defence published in August and as I indicated in response to a question last week, it would be the intention to use some of the CF-5 aircraft for the purpose of replacing the T-33 aircraft which is now at the end of its life as the advanced trainer. The proposal would be either to convert existing single aircraft or if there were sales under the aegis of my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, to construct additional duals.

POSSIBLE PURCHASE OF HIGH SPEED AIRCRAFT—PURPOSE OF TRAINING IN USE OF HIGH SPEED AIRCRAFT

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, is it anticipated that the Department of National Defence will be purchasing additional aircraft capable of speeds in excess of Mach I and if so what kind and for what purpose. If not for what purpose are these trainers to be employed?

Mr. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Well, I might remind the hon. member that the CF-101 aircraft as well as the CF-104 will continue in service, probably until the end of this decade. It is for that purpose that training in advanced high-speed aircraft is desirable.

REASON FOR SALE OF CF-5 AIRCRAFT

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, since the minister assured us a year ago when questioned on this matter that the CF-5 was completely satisfactory for the use of the Canadian armed forces, and would be used by the Canadian armed forces, I should like to ask now why the government is in such a hurry to sell these planes.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That, of course, is a debating point. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East, who raised this matter in the first instance, for a last supplementary and then go on to the next subject.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNITED STATES ECONOMIC MEASURES—INQUIRY AS TO MEASURES REQUIRED OF CANADA TO OBTAIN AMELIORATION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the meeting which was held at the end of last week between high Canadian and United States officials, is he now in a position to convey to the House the measures which the U.S. government is requesting Canada to adopt in order to obtain some amelioration of the economic steps which President Nixon announced on August 15?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): No, Mr. Speaker. These conversations will be continuing.

ALLEGED DESIRE OF UNITED STATES THAT CANADA REVALUE DOLLAR

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In view of the statement which appears in the New York Times quoting certain American officials to the effect that the solution of the American balance of payments problem requires a revaluation of the Canadian dollar, may I ask if this is one of the proposals that has been put before the Canadian government, and is the minister able to assure us that the fact the dollar was allowed to increase 9 per cent since May 1970 is all that the Canadian government is prepared to do at present?

Mr. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Personally I am not aware that this suggestion might have been made to the Canadian government, but I will take notice of the question for the Minister of Finance to answer tomorrow.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the minister whether he is telling the House that after discussions of last weekend, he is still not able to tell the people of Canada what the preconditions are?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is asking the same question as he did in the first instance.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

DRUGS—RESPONSIBILITY FOR SURVEY OF PRICES

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the fact a recent survey on drug prices was carried out in Canadian cities by the Department of National Health and Welfare, was the minister abrogating his duties or did he ask the Department of National Health and Welfare to carry out this survey?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member with respect that the question asked in those terms is not in order. I will not go into the details of the question as aked, but it is certainly not acceptable from the procedural standpoint.

Mr. Rynard: May I then ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs whether he ordered this survey.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): This particular survey was, of course, ordered by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, but the two departments and the two ministers have worked very closely together on this program.

CONVICTION OF INDIAN UNDER GAME LAWS OF ALBERTA—REQUEST FOR AID IN APPEAL TO SUPREME COURT

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I should like to ask a question of the acting Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development whose day it is to languish in the House. Is there any intention on the part of the government in respect of a treaty Indian called Cardinal, whose conviction was upheld by the appellate division of the Supreme Court of Alberta for an infraction of the game act of the province, despite the defence of the treaties under which this Indian lives, to facilitate an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada and help to defray the costs of counsel for the Indian?

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of State): I will bring that question to the attention of the minister when he returns.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

ALLEGED DESIGNATION OF AREA IN BRITISH COLUMBIA TO FINANCE ROAD CONSTRUCTION AND PAVING OF ALASKA HIGHWAY

Mr. Robert Borrie (Prince George-Peace River): I have a question for the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the special agreements with Newfoundland, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia to finance road and bridge constructions in these provinces, is the department preparing plans to designate north of the 52nd parallel in British Columbia as a special area to provide financial assistance for the construction of roads and paving of the Alaska highway?

Mr. John Roberts (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): This is not the minister's day in the House, but I will bring the question to his attention. I think I can say, in a general way, that it is the practice of the department to keep suggestions of this kind under constant review.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bell: They even told him to get a haircut.

ENERGY

CONSULTATIONS WITH UNITED STATES—REASON FOR DISCONTINUANCE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Yesterday the hon. Leader of the Opposition asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs about his consultations with the provinces in connection with energy exports, referring of course natural gas and crude petroleum, to the United States, and also with reference to the consultation going on between Canada and the United States. In reply, and I paraphrase what he said at that time, the minister said that the talks between the United States and Canada are not going on at the present time. Would the Prime Minister tell us why it is these consultations have ceased at this time, in view of the fact that the United States is requesting more energy from Canada, and that means the export of natural gas?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, they are requesting, and they are indeed buying, more energy from Canada at this time. Concerning the talks themselves, I answered this question about a month ago and gave the reasons for the change. We are not yet in a position to resume them.

Mr. Woolliams: May I put this question, Mr. Speaker? I think I can put it very simply. Could the Prime Minister now tell the House why those talks have ceased? Perhaps I could put it even a little more clearly. Have those talks ceased because this is a form of retaliation by the government against the imposition of the surtax by the United States, which is discriminating against western Canada at this time?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The second part of the question, as asked, is argumentative. Perhaps the Prime Minister might reply to the first part of the question.

Mr. Woolliams: I will rephrase it then, Mr. Speaker. I did not intend it to be argumentative.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will be recognized for that purpose.

Mr. Woolliams: Thank you very much. Could the Prime Minister tell us what are the reasons that those talks have ceased? Is the reason I suggested one of the reasons that the talks have ceased?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member was given an opportunity to rephrase the question. He did not rephrase it, he just repeated it along with his argument. I suggested to him that it was in the form of an argument. Maybe the Prime Minister should be allowed to reply briefly, and then the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Shefford.

Mr. Woolliams: Well, Mr. Speaker, may I rephrase it and leave out the last part?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

[Mr. Bell.]

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I don't think it is argumentative, with the greatest respect.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I allowed the first part of the question. I indicated that I had no objection if the Prime Minister wanted to reply to it.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, there is a certain kind of chicken that lays an egg, and then turns around and eats it. I think that is what the hon. member is doing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I am going to treat that answer with the kind of contempt it deserves. I would say to you, with the greatest respect, this Prime Minister needs the kind of defence he got this afternoon, because he is not capable of answering.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether the hon. member has improved the situation at all. He saked an argumentative question. It was ruled out of order, and it is still ruled out of order. The hon. member for Shefford.

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

Following the Cuban Prime Minister's decision to visit many countries, has the Canadian government or the Prime Minister invited him to visit Canada, as other communist heads of state have done recently?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, no such invitation was tendered. But, unless I am mistaken, the Prime Minister or President of Cuba, whatever his title may be, has come to Canada before. In fact, he has visited the province of Quebec. He did not come to Ottawa, but he was given a cordial welcome in Quebec.

PICTOU, NOVA SCOTIA—IMPLEMENTATION OF PLANS FOR IMPROVED FACILITIES

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. While at the same time expressing my appreciation for the work which is being done to improve the ferry facilities at Caribou, Nova Scotia, could the minister tell us whether there is any chance of implementing the third phase of the long arranged and awaited port improvements for the town of Pictou, in view of the widespread dissatisfaction being expressed by the Board of Trade and local industry?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I will be glad to send the hon. member a copy of the latest report. I was down to take a look personally at the situation recently. There are some plans for improving it, but I think there are some differences of opinion at the local level as to what should be done.

PULP AND PAPER MILLS—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE IN COST OF INSTALLING CONTROLS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of the Environment. In view of the fact there are marginally profitable pulp and paper mills in regions possessing little alternative employment, would he advise if the government will contribute to the cost of additional pollution controls incurred under the terms of the pulp and paper effluent regulations when production processes are modified or improved?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, provisions for assistance for existing plants is being discussed. I might add that under the present income tax regulations it is possible to get a two-year write-off of new investments of this kind.

BOWATER—REQUEST FOR SPECIAL CONSIDERATION FOR COMPANY IN VIEW OF HIGH COST OF INSTALLING CONTROLS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St.Barbe): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the President of Bowater Pulp and Paper Mills at Corner Brook has indicated that it will cost $11 million to introduce the anti-pollution measures, would the minister investigate this allegation in order to help this company avoid a situation which could cripple completely the economy of that city?

Hon. Jack. Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I would be surprised if the investment required would add up to one-tenth of that amount.

PULP AND PAPER EFFLUENT REGULATIONS—INQUIRY AS TO EFFECTIVE DATE

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of the Environment. Since the pulp and paper effluent regulations do not now apply to any mill in Canada, would the minister be able to set out some timetable of expectations when, as a result of negotiations or desire on the part of his department, those regulations will come into effect with respect to all the mills that now exist?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, those regulations apply now to any mill under construction or any mill built in the future. They will apply on a negotiated basis, often through the provinces, to existing mills as well.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am quite aware that what the minister just said is contained within the regulations. I asked, since the regulations do not apply to any existing mill, and their application is going to be negotiated with each mill, can he set out any expected timetable as to when they will be applicable?

Mr. Davis: As I said before, Mr. Speaker, they do apply now to mills which are under construction. For existing mills the timetable will be set by negotiation mill by mill, having regard to the economic circumstances of the firm and the community in question.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): As a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, since the minister is completely evading the issue, would he be prepared to refer this subject matter to the Committee on Environmental Pollution?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

POSSIBILITY OF LEGISLATION TO EXTEND CANADIAN CONTROL BEYOND TERRITORIAL SEA LIMITS

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, my question is related to the broader issue of pollution of the seas. In view of his statements yesterday can the minister say whether he plans to introduce any legislation to extend Canada's pollution control authority beyond the territorial sea limits set out in existing legislation?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

INQUIRY AS TO AGREEMENT WITH FRANCE CONCERNING CONTROL OF OIL EMISSION INTO THE SEA

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. In connection with the proposed regulations under Bill C-2, which are now presumably in the drafting stage, can the minister tell the House whether agreement has been reached with the government of France with respect to the implementation of the provisions of this bill off the south coast of Newfoundland and in the area of St. Pierre and Miquelon?

• (2:40 p.m.)

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I cannot say for certain whether a legal agreement has been reached between the government of Canada and the government of France because, I repeat, that would presumably be a matter for the foreign ministers of both countries. I can say that I, personally, have visited St. Pierre and Miquelon and have discussed it on a personal basis with the governor. An operational plan has been agreed to by both parties, but whether or not that plan has yet been implemented by any treaty, I am afraid will have to be answered by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We will be running short of time soon and there are quite a number of supplementaries yet to be asked. The hon. member might ask the last supplementary on this subject, then we will go on to the other questions.

Mr. McGrath: As a supplementary, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if agreement has been reached with the government of France regarding that country's treaty rights off the south coast of Newfoundland with respect to St. Pierre and Miquelon. I am thinking of this Parliament's provisions with respect to pollution control and conservation.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe those various matters are under discussion. The matter of fisheries is under discussion and, at an earlier stage, I believe the matter of seabed resources and mineral resources had been under discussion. However, I know of no treaty having been reached, subject to the answer of the Minister of Transport that the Secretary of State for External Affairs may have negotiated something of which I have no knowledge. I can say there has been no agreement reached in a formal manner.

REGIONAL EXPANSION

DEPARTMENT ADVERTISEMENT IN "GAZETTE"—REASON FOR NOT PRINTING IN ENGLISH

Mr. Raymond Rock (Lachine): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and in his absence for his parliamentary secretary. Why was an advertisement placed in the Montreal Gazette last week by his department entitled "Des Subventions à la mesure de votre industrie" not printed in English?

Mr. Speaker: That question should be placed on the order paper.

[Mr. McGrath.]

POLLUTION

PULP AND PAPER MILLS—LACK OF CONTROLS AT FOREST PRODUCTS COMPANY—DISCUSSION WITH GOVERNMENT OF MANITOBA.

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): I have a question for the Minister of the Environment and I shall endeavour to ask it as a supplementary to previous questions on the subject of pollution being caused by effluent from pulp and paper mills. Can the minister say whether further discussions have taken place between officials of his department and the government of the province of Manitoba on the pollution being caused by the Churchill Forest Products Company at Le Pas, Manitoba, where the minister himself indicate no pollution control was in effect at the present time?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Yes, Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions between our own departmental officials and those of the province of Manitoba. A program has been discussed and the schedule will incorporate the new standards which have been announced.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Churchill will be allowed a supplementary, but I have to bring to the attention of hon. members that there are just a few minutes left before the end of the question period. I am counting on their co-operation on behalf of their colleagues.

Mr. Simpson: I wonder if the minister could indicate whether any deadline has been set for the proposals to be put into effect?

Mr. Davis: I think so, Mr. Speaker, but I do not have them in mind.

TRADE

CANADA-U.S. AUTO PACT—POSSIBLE ALTERNATIVE FOR SAFEGUARDS—GOVERNMENT POLICY.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Can the minister inform the House whether the government of Canada last week presented to the American officials a proposal which they would accept as a replacement for the safeguards which currently exist in the Canada-U.S. agreement on automobiles?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I cannot answer that, Mr. Speaker, except by saying that the discussions on the subject of the automotive agreement are continuing. On my left side, I have people saying that Canada should have abandoned the safeguards a long time ago, while on the other side I have people who say—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Baldwin: How about the people behind you?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. At this time I must bring the hon. minister to order. The hon. Leader of the Opposition.

[Later:]

Mr. Broadbent: My supplementary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is to ask whether the government presented to the American officials an alternative proposal to the safeguards, and does the government at present have a policy position which it would consider as an acceptable replacement of the safeguards which exist?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I believe we have one, Mr. Speaker, but it would not be terribly wise to announce it today.

SURVEY OF INVESTMENT INTENTIONS IN CONSTRUCTION MACHINERY—REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO STIMULATE INVESTMENT AND ENCOURAGE EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce a question arising from the survey of investment intentions conducted by his department which shows an intention to increase investment in construction, machinery and equipment by a mere 3 per cent in 1972 as opposed to 10 per cent this year. Could the minister tell the House whether his department or the government proposes to adopt any measures to stimulate investment which will encourage employment?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The statement is more intelligent than the use that is made of it, Mr. Speaker, because it points out a number of factors that are changing now. Among those is the announcement recently made by the Minister of Finance of cuts in taxation for corporations and individuals.

AIR TRANSPORT

STOL AIRCRAFT—GOVERNMENT SUPPORT FOR DEVELOPMENT

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): My question is for the Minister of Transport. Has the government decided to continue to support parent companies in the development of the STOL airliner, the DM C-7, or is a better solution to the problem under consideration?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is referring to the DH C-7, the de Havilland aircraft, which I assume he is, there has been no change since I made the announcement some time ago. We are continuing to give encouragement to that particular project.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

PROPOSED PROGRAM ON SPRINGHILL MINE DISASTER—OBJECTIONS FROM MINERS

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. Has his attention been drawn to a telegram sent to him by miners from Springhill, Nova Scotia with regard to a proposed program announced by the CBC about the 1958 mine disaster and their strong objections associated with this program? If so, has the Prime Minister taken any action on the subject?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not have any notice of that telegram and I will look into the matter. However, even if I have received it, I do not suggest that I would make any attempt to control the CBC. I would merely refer the matter to the Secretary of State for consideration and perhaps transmittal to the CBC.

INDIA—REQUEST TO SEND DRIED POTATOES TO AID IN FOOD SHORTAGE

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture who, according to the roster, is here today. In light of the serious marketing difficulties of the potato growers of eastern Canada and considering the terrible food shortage among Pakistan refugees in India, is the minister considering taking some initiative in assisting in a crash program to provide vast quantities of dried instant potatoes to the people in dire need in India as requested by Oxfam of Canada?

Mr. Muir: The minister is still in Assiniboia.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member's question, I can assure him that all foreign aid is extended through the External Affairs Department. However, if the hon. member is asking the Agriculture Department to supply potatoes to any one, as he is suggesting it, we will be pleased to comply with his request since there seems to be a surplus on the market at this time.

ENERGY

ALLEGED PROPOSAL BY UNITED STATES TO CONTINUE EMBARGO ON ENRICHED URANIUM FROM CANADA

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the recently announced policy proposal of the United States Atomic Energy Commission to continue the embargo on enriched Canadian uranium for the United States market to the late 1970's from the previously announced date of July, 1973, does the Canadian government intend to formally protest this policy proposal to the United States Atomic Energy Commission?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this temporary embargo—and I underline temporary—was established in 1964 and still exists. We have protested, as a government, on a number of occasions. The protest I remember most vividly is the time three ministers of the Canadian government gave a note to the ambassador of the United States in Ottawa saying that this measure was a "non-GATTable" one, if I may use that word. We have repeated these views since, and we are preparing to make them known again to the United States Atomic Energy Commission.

GATT NEGOTIATIONS—ACCESS TO UNITED STATES MARKET FOR CANADIAN URANIUM

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Can the minister say if access to the United States for Canadian Uranium market is one of the items on the agenda of the mid-November GATT talks, and if so can the minister say if all reasonable pressure will be applied to have the United States market open to Canadian uranium in mid-1973 as was previously provided in the United States policy?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I think I have mentioned before, Mr. Speaker, that this is one of the items on which we have strong views to express to the United States.

Are all subventions paid by the water transport committee to coastal steamer services being terminated as of the end of the year or is it only the service on the west coast of Vancouver Island which is being singled out for this action?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I do not recall any general withdrawal of subsidies, Mr. Speaker. I know there have been some in different parts of the country. Perhaps the best thing I could do is advise the hon. member that I will get details for him from the Transport Commission.

POSSIBLE DANGER FROM DAMAGED TANKERS BEYOND TERRITORIAL WATERS—GOVERNMENT ACTION—RESPONSIBILITY FOR DECISION TO ACT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I have a question for the Minister of the Environment arising out of the statement at the bottom of page 13 or 14 of his recent speech to which reference has been made. He referred to action taken beyond our territorial limits. In view of the fact that the minister has indicated legislation will not be introduced, I should like to ask whether it is his view and the view of the government that this kind of action is now authorized by the government?

• (2:50 p.m.)

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the action to which the Leader of the Opposition refers is one in self-defence or self-protection taken in the event of a tanker breaking up or in the event of a ship containing toxic chemicals being in difficulties near our shore but, conceivably, outside our territorial limits. I stated that it would be essential for Canada to act in its best interests and, indeed, the best interests of all countries and to deal with that kind of situation at once.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have just about run out of time. The Leader of the Opposition may ask a supplementary, after which the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Témiscamingue.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether he proposes to exercise his judgment and make a decision as to when this kind of intervention should be made beyond our territorial waters?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that if that action were taken, it would be only taken with the support of the government as a whole.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act—Mr. Benson—Mr. Honey in the chair.

On Clause 1—section 28—Farming Business

The Chairman: When the committee rose earlier, section 28 was being considered. Shall section 28 carry?

Mr. Burton: Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose at one o'clock, I was in the process of asking the parliamentary secretary some questions about the group of sections we were discussing. I wish to pursue a couple of matters that I feel have not been dealt with adequately. Specifically, I wish to ask the parliamentary secretary to clarify what the situation will be if a farmer carrying on a cattle and grain operation decides, for a variety of reasons, to go to an accrued accounting system, which would apply to his cattle operation. For instance, it may be better for him to do this. Is he then forced to make his calculations with respect to his grain operation on an accured accounting basis, or would it be possible for him to deal with his grain operation on a cash basis.

I ask this because there are special problems facing many grain farmers in Canada who, by force of circumstances may be circumstances in which, since one portion of their operation may be in livestock, it would be of benefit to them if they could switch over to an accrued accounting basis. My question is this: In a situation like that, can they use the two systems?

Mr. Mahoney: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Chairman, is the government giving further consideration to bringing in changes in this regard? Has it received representations on this matter. What is the situation? Is any change possible? Why can the government not consider allowing both types of accounting procedure to apply to the type of operation I have described?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, the right of farmers and fishermen to report on a cash basis is regarded as an option that is beneficial to them. So far as I am aware, there have been no serious representations to the effect that we should allow them to pick the accrual method of accounting for any particular aspect of their operation where it is to their tax advantage to do so and, at the same time, allow them to retain the general benefit under section 28 with respect to reporting on a cash basis. I am not aware of any serious representations in this regard. Actually, I am not aware of any representations like these, other than those that the hon. member himself may be making now.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Chairman, I think the point has been raised earlier. Of course, I am not sure what the definition of "serious" might be.

Mr. Mahoney: I am not suggesting the hon. member is not serious.

Mr. Burton: I was under the impression that this matter had been raised, and that it had received some consideration. I know there may be complexities in dealing with this matter. However, it deserves further consideration and I hope the government will give it that further consideration.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I certainly was not trying to imply that the hon. member was not serious in his suggestions at this time. I ought to say that we have received, during the course of the whole tax reform debate, literally tens of thousands of letters and it is quite possible that some such suggestions came forward. However, there is no instance of such a representation standing out, so far as I can recall.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Chairman, I still cannot understand why the government thinks it would not be possible to make some provision like that. If there is an explanation, I would be interested in hearing it. It seems to me that the problem here ought to be considered in the light of some of the points I raised before the noon adjournment. I think the government should bear those points in mind in framing sections of the act that specifically affect the agricultural industry.

May I briefly move on to section 31, which I had mentioned to the parliamentary secretary before lunch. The section deals with losses derived from farming operations and the right to write those losses off against income derived from another source. I want to mention to the parliamentary secretary the problem involving farmers who are just starting up their operation and who are incurring heavy losses, or some losses at any rate, in the initial years of the operation. I mention a hypothetical situation which I think can easily be translated into reality.

Let us say a farmer is starting up in a manner which would certainly meet the requirements of the government and the Department of National Revenue; in other words, he is a bona fide farmer. In the initial years of his operation he incurs losses. Since the averaging provisions are weighted over a five-year period, the incidence of his income in future years may be such that he will not gain much benefit from the averaging provisions. I just want to ask, first, whether a farmer starting up his operation and incurring losses, and at the same time engaging in other work which he must often do in order to survive and in order to be able to carry on his new farming operation, can qualify under the provisions of section 31. Also, how will this situation fit within the framework of the time period that is involved. How will this provision work in that period before the farmer can put himself in the position of actually earning an income, as defined for taxation purposes?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member will appreciate that perhaps the term "qualify" under section 31 is not proper because section 31 is a limiting section rather than a section that offers any particular advantage to a bona fide farmer. What it does limit is the opportunity for people only dabbling in farming to offset their losses against other sources of income. There is no reason why a person entering into farming for the first time cannot avail himself of the opportunity of offsetting his losses not only against farm income, but against other sources of income. The whole question of fact revolves around whether or not his chief source of income is a combination of farming and other income as a lump or whether, really his chief source of income is whatever profession or business he is carrying on elsewhere and his farming activities are a hobby arrangement.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the comments made by the parliamentary secretary on this matter. I am glad to have the assurance he has given us, although some of the problems involved in averaging still exist, particularly as they apply under the new rules which were under discussion earlier, and with regard to the basic herd problem.

There is one other area which I want to explore briefly with the parliamentary secretary. It has to do with section 28 of the bill. This concerns the question of cash accounting and accrual accounting. As I understand it, section 28 provides an opportunity to farmers to use a cash accounting basis when reporting their income. At the same time, there is a provision that a farmer can switch over to accrual accounting only with the concurrence of the minister, and only upon such terms and conditions as the minister may prescribe.

I note there is a general rule under which the minister can lay down terms and conditions for any switch-over to accrual accounting. Does the taxpayer have any rights? Does the taxpayer, who may either find it to his advantage or feel he is being forced to switch over from cash accounting to accrual accounting, have any rights in the field now before us in terms of any transitional rules? I raise this because obviously the switch-over from one system of accounting to another can pose some real difficulties for the taxpayer. In view of some of the provisions of the bill, the government must feel there is some advantage in some cases to an accrual system of accounting. They have written into the bill in a number of places transitional rules which allow a time period to make adjustments or changes.

Unless I missed some point with regard to any change-over that farmers may wish to make from cash to accrual accounting, I see no provision which will give the taxpayer any rights in terms of being able to take advantage of any transitional rules in order to make the adjustment and the change-over more easily. I would like to have the comments of the parliamentary secretary on this matter. Are there any such transitional rules within the act that are not subject to discretionary authority in the hands of the minister and, if there is no such provision, is the government prepared to give any consideration to changes along this line?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, in this particular case there is no provision for transitional rules. The hon. member is quite right. However, the point he is missing is that the switch from cash to accrual accounting would be voluntary as far as the farmer is concerned. It has not been considered particularly appropriate to provide transitional rules that will take care of that situation because presumably he would not make the decision to switch unless it was to his advantage to do so.

On the other hand, when we talk about accrual accounting that professional people have to do from the beginning of the new tax system on, we are talking about a situation where we are requiring them to change from cash to accrual accounting and where this is being imposed upon them by a change in the law rather than a voluntary act on their part. It does seem appropriate to have transitional provision in this situation.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Chairman, I wish to comment on what the parliamentary secretary has just said. I recognize the point he has made that the matter of changing over from cash to accrual accounting by a farmer is a voluntary proposition, whereas in fact it is being required for some other occupational groups. At the same time, it still leaves open a question which, as the parliamentary secretary indicated this morning, is still under debate. While there is no provision under the proposed law that will force a farmer to change over from cash to accrual accounting, in fact there may be provisions in the law where the practical consequences of the provision, and I refer to the basic herd provision, will be that the farmer has no choice or finds in the long run that is the only way out for him, to make a switch-over from cash to accrual accounting.

The parliamentary secretary indicated this morning that he did not quite follow the argument being made by some people in this regard that this would be the effect of the proposals, particularly as contained in section 29. However, he wanted to have section 29 stand so that the government could give the problem raised further consideration and try to gain a better understanding of some of the objections raised. In light of this situation, the matter of transition from cash to accrual accounting for farmers requires and deserves further consideration as well. I commend such an approach to the parliamentary secretary. I hope he will follow a course of action similar to that which he followed this morning.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I really do not think the hon. member wants us to stand this section. I am sure he would want to leave the option open to farmers to report on a cash basis. Transitional provisions, where appropriate, are contained in Part III.

Mr. Burton: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman. I do not know whether the parliamentary secretary was implying this or not, but I want to make it clear that there was nothing in my remarks that could be interpreted as suggesting that I do not want farmers to have the option open to them of staying on a cash accounting basis.

Mr. Mahoney: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman. I understood the hon. member to suggest that we should treat this section as we did section 29 and stand it while we consider his suggestion. I was simply saying that I do not agree that standing this particular section will serve the purpose, because I am sure we all want to pass this section. The transitional provision are comprised in Part III of the bill rather than in Part I. That would be the appropriate place to introduce transitional measures such as the hon. member is suggesting.

Mr. Burton: Could the parliamentary secretary tell us whether he is prepared to give consideration to this question of transitional provisions?

Mr. Mahoney: The only thing I can say is that we are continuing seriously to consider all representations. As to what disposition will be made, I cannot forecast, but I really doubt that in this particular case transitional provisions will be permitted. However, we shall study the matter. As the hon. member is aware, the representatives of the Canadian Cattlemen's Association have been visiting various Members of Parliament and officials in the Department of Finance for the past few days trying to persuade them of the validity of this argument that somehow or other something in this bill will impel ranchers to switch from a cash to an accrual basis. Up to now, the validity of their argument has escaped me, but it is before us and we are listening to the representations very seriously.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Chairman, I think all of us recognize the important place the farmer occupies in this country. When we look into the future we see that the population will be doubled in the year 2,000. Today, over half the population of the world is lacking in either quality or quantity, and in many cases it is quality. In Canada in the year 1900, one man was able to produce enough food for one other person. Today, a farmer produces enough food to feed approximately 40 people. I mention this because it shows the extent of the increase in the productivity of the farm sector in Canada.

Over the years, Canadian agriculture has been built up to the place where we have been a net exporter. Particularly is this true of certain classifications. Our cereals have been in demand in many countries in the world which would have run short of food if they had not had the granaries of Canada to supply that grain which we can produce cheaper than anyone else in the world, with the exception of the United States. The farm unit of 1900 has come from the binder and reaper to the huge combine of today which threshes as it cuts. From the farms, the grain goes to the elevator to be stored for shipment elsewhere and in grain alone we were able to reach close to $1 billion in exports. This will underline the importance of the farm sector.

On the dairy farms of Canada, cattle are being shipped to many of the nations of the world. Our cattle are in Japan, Australia, Mexico, South America, Italy, almost any country in the world. The Canadian farmer deserves a pat on the back for what he has done in the breeding of cattle. I am pleased to know that the section containing the basic herd provision has been allowed to stand because a farmer who was able to build a basic herd has reaped tremendous dividends. From these herds came the cattle which were exported. I am sure the Minister of Finance knows of many farms that have been brought up to a high standard as a consequence of this provision, with the result that breeding cattle was shipped from them all over the world. If these cattle were not exported, they were used to upgrade the breed in Canada. So today we have cows of the Holstein breed producing upwards of seventeen to twenty thousand pounds of butterfat per year and the world average is about six thousand pounds. This is an illustration of what a terrific job the Canadian farmer has done.

I well recall one farm operation. It is a very interesting farm operation which is carried on today by the sons of the original owner, and the basic herd was started with cattle obtained from the sale of the Mount Victoria, just outside the City of Montreal. Those of you who have been in the cattle game will remember that one of the herd's sires which was sold was the Emperor of Mount Victoria, and the other one was Marksman. These two animals left their imprint across the whole of the Holstein field, not only in Canada but in the United States. The same thing can be said of beef cattle produced, and I regret very much that similar procedures will not be possible under the new bill so that a young man could start to build his basic herd as a previous generation could do.

To make myself clear, in establishing a basic herd you buy your cattle and can add to them from time to time. If you have to borrow you pay interest on that money. If you have earned it, you pay income tax on it. In any event taxes are paid on the investment, so the government can not have it all its own way.

After the herd is established and producing, the farmer will upgrade that herd, knowing that he will get a higher price for his animals if they are more desirable and will produce more. This is an incentive for every farmer in the purebread livestock field. Take the Purina people who are one of the big animal feed companies on the North American continent. They have developed a herd from grade cattle. The production of this herd went up from somewhere around 8,000 to over 14,000 or 15,000, pounds of butterfat annually if I remember correctly. All these cattle grew in value over the years.

Now, I want to congratulate the minister and the parliamentary secretary on allowing this basic herd provision to stand. It is interesting to note that in the early days of the budget our understanding was, and it was made clear across the country, that estate tax would be wiped out when capital gains tax came in because it was to take its place. Now, there seems to be some hedging on this principle and the government is saying: Well, if four provinces come in then we shall collect the tax. This is like saying: Boys, come and get the taffy; all you have to do is walk across the floor. It is my contention that this section of the bill should be set aside until the government has consulted with the provinces and knows what the provinces are going to do. Otherwise, you are going to have one province taxing more than another province and we will end up with the same hodge-podge tax structure that we had before. If this does not turn out to be the worst jumble when you are through with it that you have ever heard of, I am missing my guess.

Farms are being abandoned across Canada at a rapid rate. I am sure the parliamentary secretary knows this. You ask the government if it is their purpose to drive the farmer off the land and in his place put the large food operator and chain stores. Well, this would be a great combine, wouldn't it? They would set prices at whatever figure they required in order to obtain a profit. It is my belief that in many cases we should try to encourage more farmers to stay on the land and raise their families. I think it would be to the benefit of all Canadians to accept the principle of subsidizing these farmers on small farms up to a certain rate of production on their cattle, pigs, sheep and other livestock so that they could stay on the farm and raise their families there. From a social standpoint, this would be very desirable when we consider that at present there are 600,000 unemployed in this country. This would allow the farmer to raise his family on a farm, rather than having to move them off the farm to become a statistic on the unemployment rolls in some city.

• (3:20 p.m.)

If you ask why it is that many boys and girls leave the farm today, the answer is perfectly obvious. During their young lives they have seen their father and mother working and struggling to make ends meet while their counterparts in the cities are well dressed and have all the material advantages. So, is it any wonder that when the opportunity comes the young people leave, especially when the government does away with those incentives that are needed so badly in the farming industry today?

President Nixon has stated that United States farmers will not be forgotten in the period of adjustment and surcharge, and he promised to provide price support levels for farmers in order to permit the free movement of commodities in world markets. These include direct payments to bring returns up to a specified goal. This is a vital matter both in Canada and the United States, inasmuch as many of our products have to be exported and compete in markets of the world. This indicates that if the door to world trade in agricultural products is allowed to slam shut in the months ahead, the consequences to the Canadian economy will be disastrous. Where would we be today had we not sold $1 billion worth of grain two years ago? If hon. members review the financial picture that year they would soon discover where we would have been.

The Minister of Agriculture seems convinced that market prospects are bleak indeed—

The Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I have been listening to him carefully and I was hoping that fairly soon he would deal with the three sections now before the committee, section 28, which deals with the method of computing the income of a taxpayer engaged in a farming business, section 30, which deals with expenses incurred in clearing land, levelling land and laying tile drainage, and section 31, which deals with losses incurred by farming where the chief source of income is not necessarily from farming. Essentially, these are all matters concerned with the calculation of a farmer's income. I hope the hon. member will try as much as possible to keep his remarks relevant to these sections.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, may I speak to the point of order? I was listening to the remarks of the hon. member for Simcoe North, and I thought he was trying to take a rational approach to the problems confronting farm operators in Canada. I am a little at a loss to know whether we should hold ourselves strictly to the exact wording of the sections before us or whether we should not be allowed to carry on a debate on legitimate matters of tax reform. That is a big question for the Chair to answer, but it was my understanding when we embarked on our study of individual sections or groups of sections that we would be allowed to range reasonably far so long as we stayed within the general confines of the measure before us.

I thought the hon. member for Simcoe North was discussing taxation in terms of the problems it creates for farmers, which I should have thought was hardly ranging over the whole waterfront of taxation reform. If that is the case, then I think he should be allowed to continue his remarks. I think Your Honour would have to agree that he is not a member who strays wide and far, but generally keeps within the very narrow limits. I would hope Your Honour would be inclined to be reasonably generous—indeed, I must say Your Honour has been so in this whole debate and I make no criticism whatever of the Chair—and allow a certain latitude of debate.

[Mr. Rynard.]

Mr. Horner: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, there is a moot point in which I think the Chair might be interested. Section 29 deals with the basic herd. If the government now decides to change it, then the transitional period in section 28 will have to be changed, too. Section 28 provides that where the income for a year shall be deemed to be an amount equal to—and then a computation follows. In other words, it might be beneficial for a man in the livestock business who does not have the advantage of establishing a basic herd to go on the accrual system. Once he does that, he cannot revert to the cash system because under section 28 he is locked in. Therefore, since section 29 has been stood, section 28 would appear to be interrelated. That point may not have caught the attention of the Chair up to now.

The Chairman: Is the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar rising to the point of order?

Mr. Gleave: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I should like to point out that I raised this question yesterday evening. The parliamentary secretary said, as reported at page 9444 of Hansard:

> In the spirit of the debate we are entering into I am quite prepared to try to range over the field of taxation of agricultural enterprises. I do not think there has been very much in the speeches we have heard until now to indicate that we are dealing strictly within the terms of the four sections before us. I suggest, on the basis that the points are important, that they must be dealt with at some point during consideration in committee of the whole. Perhaps if we deal with them in the context of these four sections being our opportunity to deal with agricultural matters specifically, we will not have to re-cover the same ground when the particular sections involved come up for discussion.

The parliamentary secretary then went on to point out that we had dealt with and agreed to the averaging provisions, but that this should not necessarily preclude our debating them again. I did not disagree with the parliamentary secretary at the time. In fact, I intervened on the point of order only to try to establish how we should proceed. I have to agree with the parliamentary secretary that there are matters outside these four sections that do come within the ambit of our discussion. Even though one subclause has been allowed to stand for discussion at a later point in time, I think we must still refer to it from time to time in order to relate other proposals that we shall be making to that particular provision.

The Chairman: The Chair only wants to comment that I interrupted the hon. member for Simcoe North, not with the intention of trying to hold the hon. member or any other hon. member closely within the confines of the three subclauses. However, I want to say to all hon. members that the Chair does have a responsibility. Notwithstanding the opinions of the parliamentary secretary and the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar, both of whom I respect very highly, the occupant of the Chair from time to time is the one who has the responsibility to make such decisions.

• (3:30 p.m.)

The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants and the hon. member for Crowfoot are very good advocates. I have no intention of attempting to limit the debate beyond what is reasonable. I must say I thought I should draw to the attention of the hon. member for Simcoe North that he might have been going a little wide of the subject when dealing with export markets. This, I believe, does relate to agriculture but I think the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar has pointed out it might be reasonable to confine references to taxation to those relating to the farming business. I think if we did that, no one would be confined too closely.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Chairman, I realize the bind you are in because this is a very complex bill. I would say immediately that it should be referred to the committee on agriculture because it is so complex. If we are to be limited to any one point in it, then we will not have sufficient field, as the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar has pointed out, in which to do what we must do. We must try to cover the field on it or we will have to come back to it again and again.

I suggest without hesitation that it be referred to the Committee on Agriculture. I want to thank those members who have helped define how far this debate should go and along what lines. I am sure, Mr. Chairman, no one understands better than you the complexities of this bill, because you were raised on a farm and grew up in a farming community. You know what I am speaking about when I say that agriculture in Canada has developed to the point where we are proud of it. We do not want to sacrifice it through some bill which would tax everything which comes along. It was my distinct understanding that when the capital gains tax came in the estate tax was to go out. Now, we find there is some hedging on this which disturbs me because I feel most members thought this would be the case. Now, there would seem to be an attempt to have both types of tax because if the estate tax is established in four provinces it will likely spread across Canada, either in that form or in some other form which will be substituted for it.

Because I believe it is very apropos, I want to say that between the years 1949-1970 the average disposable income of the Canadian people after taxes and deductions has just about tripled, whereas food prices are about one and one-half times what they were in 1949. I am talking about the good deal the consumer gets in buying food. This does not take into account either that Canadians are eating more meat, poultry, fruits and vegetables. Putting it another way, it took the income from 20 hours of work in 1949 to buy one week's supply of food for a family of four. In 1970 just about half the number of hours were required. One may ask why this is so, and why the farmer has had such a small increase in the price of the products he grows. It simply means that each man in agriculture today is producing far more than his predecessor. With his machinery and the available technology, he is growing new grains and is using fertilizers. As a matter of fact, for every man engaged in agriculture a job is created for four other people. It is probably worth-while to note that the machinery and equipment which the farmer buys today costs him two to three times what it cost in 1949, and he receives less than 50 per cent of each dollar spent as compared to 60 per cent in 1949.

These are the points I wish to bring to the attention of the parliamentary secretary. The tractors, trucks and machinery used by the farmer have all been produced in industry where there have been strong labour unions to bargain for the increases in wages. As hon. members may have noted, nothing like this has occurred in the farm sector, nor has there been any special benefit or shorter hours for the farmer over that period of time. It comes back full circle to the point that if the farmer is not going to be viewed in the light of what is transpiring, is not to be given the opportunity to build up, develop and obtain something for his labour and, in the final analysis, be able to accumulate an estate which will not be taken away by estate taxes or capital gains taxes, he will have no incentive to keep on farming.

There is another point with which I should like to deal. This is the matter of the hobby farm which involves perhaps the millionaire who makes his living in some other line of work but establishes a farm and brings in thoroughbred cattle to the area. I could name dozens of these people. They improve the breed of cattle. Some of these people actually live on these farms. I want to ask the parliamentary secretary what is proposed in respect of this type of farmer, and how it is proposed that he be treated. Some of these people, as the parliamentary secretary knows, have sold animals valued at $50,000 or $60,000. I could name these people. They have provided bulls and other animals to the small farmers in the community. This has helped the other farmers upgrade their animals. In the long run, this is of great benefit to the farming community. I would ask what the thinking is on this whole matter.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, we propose to continue to treat hobby farms exactly as they have been treated in the past. They can offset their farming expenses against farming income and then take any net loss and deduct $2,500 of that from their other income and then take half the difference of the balance of loss up to an aggregate of $5,000. I am sure if the hon. member for Simcoe North had had an opportunity to do his own research rather than rely on the notoriously unreliable research department of the Progressive Conservative caucus, he would not have misrepresented as he did the position of the government on the offered, collection agreement in respect of succession duties with the provinces which choose to go into the death tax business.

The hon. member suggested that the federal government somehow was reneging on the commitment contained in the June 18 budget, and in this bill, to discontinue the collection of estate and gift taxes. That is simply not true. It could not be further from the truth. The federal government has said that in four provinces which do not presently have the machinery to collect these taxes—and this excludes the provinces of British Columbia, Quebec and Ontario—if those provinces adopt for themselves a fairly uniform succession duty system, the federal government, through the Department of National Revenue, will for a fee collect those taxes for the provincial governments. But it is very clear it would be the provincial governments that would be levying the taxes and it must be in respect of provincial governments which are not presently levying taxes of that nature. This, of course, is the result of a request from certain provincial governments who have expressed an interest in possibly levying that sort of tax.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Chairman, I thought the parliamentary secretary would have learned by now that people in glass houses do not throw stones. He talks about research. I want to refer him to the research the Department of Finance did when the minister was out a half billion dollars on a couple of occasions. He should not bring up the matter of research now. He should be ashamed to do it, sitting alongside the Finance Minister. I would like to ask whether it was the intention of the government to say to the people of this country and to members of this House that they were abolishing estate taxes and were replacing them with a capital gains tax. This was my understanding of it. Now, they come along and say, "if you boys want more estate taxes, we will collect them for you". I leave it to the judgment and to the wisdom of hon. members here to decide if that is not coaxing them into collecting more taxes. They misled the public.

• (3.40 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gleave: I have a few remarks to make regarding what the parliamentary secretary pointed out, namely, that there is nothing in the bill that would force a farmer to operate on the accrual system. This reminds me of the old army gag which was, "we cannot make you do it, but we can surely make you wish you had". That is about the size of it, because if no change is made in the section which was set aside for the time being, then many farmers who have a combined livestock and grain production would probably find some problem in using the accrual system for livestock, for beef and dairy herds, for swine, sheep and so on. If they did that, it would compel them to do the same for the grain part of their operation. The difficulty with the accrual system arises in the west particularly in connection with the grain or cash crop, because farmers might be in the position of having to put a value on the inventory and pay taxes on the sale. They may have to borrow money to pay the tax on a yearly basis. I want to make this point again, since it seems to have been overlooked.

In considering these sections, one sees that there are some other factors which should be taken into account. Another matter is the capital gains tax. In the first section with which we are dealing, we find that a fairly simple method of declaring income is to use straight-line depreciation, and the standard practice on most farms is to use the straight-line method in setting up depreciation, sometimes an old machine is traded in for a new machine, and the new machine is paid for. In this type of transaction, the capital recovery method will be used, that is capital gains, and under this method, when the deal is made any difference between depreciated value and trade in value of the used machine is deemed to be an actual income, half of which will be taxable. Those who favour the capital gains tax will ask "why not, since the individual made a capital gain?"

However, I would like to call to the attention of those responsible for drafting these provisions to the fact that these sections will have the effect of changing to a considerable degree the method of buying and selling machinery in western Canada. I suppose that this would also apply to eastern Canada and to other parts of the country. There is no actual cash gain in this transaction. Generally, the farmer will be forced into a position where, instead of following the general practice of trading in old machinery, which gave him the advantage of setting it off for depreciation, he will be purchasing new machinery at the best discount price that is offered. He will not be trading in the old machine but will rather auction it off and half of whatever money he makes on it will be subject to tax, or else he will leave the machine on the farm and not bother with it. This provision will drive down the market value of machinery. I certainly expect this to happen if no provision is included allowing farmers to operate as they have been doing in the past.

It may be the considered opinion of those responsible for drafting the bill that a change should be made. If that is their opinion, then perhaps they may be willing to say so, but I wonder whether the full effect of the proposals have been thought through and considered by those who are making changes in this act. I may say, for the information of those responsible, that a major dealer in western Canada has suggested to farmers that if they want to purchase a machine for cash he will give them a handsome discount and if they want to bring in their old machine he will call an auction sale and sell it for them. This is one way of doing business, although it is not the general practice. It results in some inconveniences and in some serious adjustments in the methods of farmers purchasing machinery and of dealers selling machines to farmers.

So I bring this to the attention of those responsible. I do not know whether or not they wish to consider it. Perhaps they do not give a damn. If that is so, then let us forget about it, but the farmer will care what this does to him because I know very well that farmers trade in their machines and thus recover in book value some amount on the old machine on which they will have to pay tax. But they will not have any cash money with which to pay it. Actually, no money comes into his pocket as a result of the deal, and so he will not be very happy. It is an added cost to his operation. There is actually no real profit.

You get back to the same thing as you do with grain on the accrual system. If you make money, you can pay some tax on it, but if you do not make money, and a profit is merely imputed to you and you have to pay tax on that because of some bookkeeping procedure; it is pretty rough on you. As I say, I do not really know whether those responsible have considered this, whether they have bothered to go to machinery dealers and farm organizations, and listen to how these deals are made.

I know that the farm organizations have made representations to the minister. At least I have a letter saying that they made representations to him, and they have complained bitterly that he, and the others responsible, ignored their submissions. Whether this particular matter was discussed and the people concerned did not understand it, or chose to ignore it, is something I do not know.

If this section is allowed to stand today, I hope that those responsible will use part of the weekend to talk to some of the dealers and farmers, and as a result become better prepared to deal with the section and make some adjustments to it. I really cannot see how a capital gains tax could apply to those kinds of operations. Essentially, in those cases it is not really a capital gain in the same way as a capital gain is realized when one purchases a piece of real estate, sells it a number of years later, and makes $2,000, $1,000 or $500 on the transaction. There is quite a difference between the two.

With respect to the cash accounting system and the accrual system, it seems to me there should be no question about the farmer's right to choose. If we are going to follow the provisions made for the basic herd, then there should be a provision that if a farmer or rancher wants to put his cattle herd on the accrual system he may leave the rest of his operation to be accounted for on the cash system. This is a situation which has to be recognized, and steps taken to deal with it. I hope the minister will give these matters some consideration.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Chairman, I think that a discussion on section 28 dealing with the assessment of a farmer's income for income tax purposes opens up the whole subject of taxation of the farming industry in Canada. As I understand it, primarily section 28 has been lifted from the old income tax act, but when we consider the way in which it will be amended in the future, we must examine it carefully.

In my opinion, this new tax bill will bear heavily on the farming population. It will change their mode of farming, change their manner of living, and change the whole taxation structure as it relates to farming. Provision for a capital gains tax applicable to farming is the main feature added to section 28. Up to the present, capital gains have not been a factor in the farming industry, but now substantial tax payments must be made on them.

It has been said that over the years, as a result of ministerial discretion and taxation rulings, capital gains have largely been included in income, the exception being with respect to farming, some property income, and stock market gains. Now, stock market gains will be taxed, but for the stockholder the value of the dollar with which he will have to pay his capital gains tax will be reasonably related to the investment he made. But this will not be the case with farming.

Due to the low liquidity of farming over the years, due to the tendency for an individual to be a farmer for a certain period of his life, say 20, 30, 40 or 50 years, capital gains become more important to a farmer. I really do not see how you can have an estate tax as well as a capital gains tax applied to the farming industry. You can have one or the other, but I doubt that you can have both. If you have both the result will be a tax jungle because a number of provinces have indicated they are going to retain and even increase estate taxes. Premier Schreyer of Manitoba, my home province, says he feels that the estate tax should stay. He has said that $5 million would be lost to the province if it were eliminated. This is not an enormous amount of money, but considering that the average Manitoba gain from estate tax is around $3 million, it appears that he hopes to retain that tax, and probably increase it.

If a farmer should die without making some provision, his estate may well be faced with a substantial tax burden and a capital gains tax on the land. All his depreciated property will revert to its original cost, so that the $15,000 tractor which had depreciated to $5,000 may very well be valued at its original price. In other words, the depreciation has been recovered. In addition inventory on the farm will automatically become cash income so far as the government is concerned. It could easily happen that 15,000 or 20,000 bushels of grain would be sitting on the farm because there would be no market and no quotas, yet the estate must settle on the basis that this is readily turned into cash. Similarly, with livestock. Even though it is not readily saleable, the estate will be faced with the problem of turning it into cash. Then, the farm estate is faced with the considerable problem of capital gains.

The problem of taxation in farming deserves much more importance than it has been given. We have to consider the competition of the Canadian farmer, and so we must look at our overseas markets. In grain, we are in competition overseas with the biggest producer of grain in the world, the United States. Some of the sales that the United States has made since 1967 have been phenomenal, and our farmers must meet this competition. For instance, the dollar value to farmers in the U. S. of soy beans crushed and exported increased by 60 per cent. In the past ten years, per capita consumption of vegetable oils in the United States increased by almost one half. Exports of wheat, corn and milo to Japan increased by 650 per cent in the past ten years. All of these products are in competition with ours. The United States government has repeatedly warned their farmers that agriculture is regarded as a growth industry, and the means by which rural America can share in the nation's growth. Most of United States agriculture's potential for market growth is in world trade, not in the home market. If the United States were to quit fighting for export markets it would have to cut back sharply in its production. Every year perhaps one-third or more of the acreage in the United States is lying idle or growing reduced crops. This becomes most important when considering the tax structure of our own industry. Further statistics show how important the United States regards its agriculture exports. Last year the record was $7.5 billion and this year the goal is $10 billion. We have to ask ourselves how we can help the farming industry in the export market.

We must look at the growth potential of the market here and in the United States. The population increase has dropped substantially and the growth rate which was 2.5 per cent a few years ago is now 1.5 per cent. In the United States, it is one per cent or less. Technology in agriculture enables us to grow increasing amounts of food, but if we have less mouths to fill the surplus will have to be exported to the other markets in the world. Our main competitor here is again the United States, although in meat products we have the continental North American market.

To return to taxation, the farmer is faced with more taxes than he has paid in the past and, as a result, the farming industry cannot expand and will support fewer people. It will be less able to meet the export challenges. If it were not for the grain export industry, Canada might be a major importer of agricultural products because there are some things we cannot grow in this country, such as citrus fruits. In 1968, there was actually a net agricultural deficit.

Now, I propose to deal with taxation as it applies to income earners and farmers throughout Canada. Most farmers operating small farms operate on a cash basis, and the more one sees of it the more attractive it becomes in many ways. The Income Tax Act offers such things as the accrual basis or the unincorporated farm, but all of them have disadvantages. The advantage for the small, unincorporated farm of a reduced rate of taxation was evident in the old legislation, but this has been partially wiped out by raising the tax from 21 per cent to 25 per cent and by the projected decrease of the corporation tax to the end of 1972 back to 43 per cent and the proposal to drop it in the future to 46 per cent. There is no doubt in my mind that in coming years it is likely that corporation tax will decrease, thereby making the unincorporated farm less attractive.

In the future, the farmer will have to get his money from savings, from what is left after his personal income tax is paid. Through farm credit and so on, governments have been providing money for farmers to expand and buy new equipment but many people believe that this has created an unhealthy situation. Many farmers are burdened with a government loan and are faced with problems when the market drops. The government is the landlord. I do not think the government should own the bulk of the land. Often a farmer will spend a lifetime paying off a mortgage to the government. This is one area where we will have to consider the matter of farm income. The vast amount of money lent to farmers on farm credit has, on the whole, been beneficial but after certain changes perhaps these loans should not be made. I think this is a very onerous tax structure.

Most farmers need money to pay for their land, their house, and their living expenses. The amount that will be left to them after they have paid their taxes will not be greater than it was before. The new personal tax rates are no better than they were previously and, after farmers have paid their income tax, they will not necessarily retain more income out of which they can carry on farming and save as well. That, I think, is cause for concern. In days when farm costs were relatively low, and when farm capitalization was low, personal income tax rates did not matter nearly so much. These rates, however, will become increasingly important in the future as it becomes more and more costly to farm and as farm capitalization rates increase. A tractor costing $15,000 is commonplace these days and a half section, three quarter or even complete section in western Canada is considered minimal as a farm unit. These units must be paid for out of the income an individual can generate. However, the progressive rate schedules in the income tax legislation militate against an individual's being able to put away money in an orderly way so that he can meet his debts.

Under the new personal income tax rates, a man earning $8,000 per year or so will pay as much as or perhaps a little more than he paid in the past. The report on the white paper proposals for tax reform by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce had this to say at page 17 of that report:

—your Committee is gravely concerned that the White Paper proposals would increase the burden on married couples with incomes ranging from approximately $8,500 upwards, thereby including those taxpayers who are generally described as the middle income group. In addition, the proposed rates schedules do not give effect to the fact that all of the provinces will probably not adopt a uniform tax rate of 28 per cent of the new federal taxes so that the effect on the middle income group will therefore be more extreme because there will be more taxpayers in that category and closer to the top levels of that category. This middle income group is the group in Canada that must be relied upon in the main for skilled technical training and executive and managerial ability.

I am sure that many will agree that a farmer today must exercise technical, managerial and executive abilities.

We should also consider our middle income groups and see how they will fare as compared with middle income groups in the United States. The report I alluded to, goes on to say at page 18:

The increased tax rates applicable to the middle income groups would increase the already existing adverse disparity between rates applicable to such groups under the Canadian and the United States tax systems, and would have the inevitable effect of contributing to the gradual emigration of skilled workers and those with executive talent from Canada.

The committee could not agree with certain statements made in the white paper which compared Canadian and United States income taxes. Since we are dealing with taxation, any such comparison is significant.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to say that the hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, may I suggest that the committee may be agreeable to allowing the hon. member to complete his remarks. His is a reasoned speech.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Ritchie: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. May I say, in closing, that these progressive rates of income tax are especially important to farmers who must, out of income retained after taxes have been paid, find the money with which to pay for farm operations.

I ought to have mentioned that in the white paper the question of income splitting is discussed. We are told that income splitting in the United States brings certain advantages. I am reminded that in North Dakota, the state which is just across the border from my province, a man earning $30,000 a year who splits his income will pay only about $5,000 in taxes, whereas in Manitoba a man earning a like amount would pay considerably more, around $12,000. When you consider the difference in taxes paid, it is small wonder that people across the border who can save their money can cross over to Manitoba and buy up almost half a section every year.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman, at the outset I wish to disassociate our research department from anything I have to say, so that they will be absolved of any blame and will not bear any discredit for my remarks. In view of the remarks made by members on the other side of the House, I agree with the comments made by my colleague, the hon. member for Simcoe North. I agree that probably our own research department is not too deficient, especially when one considers the inaccurate and optimistic statements that have emanated from the research department of the government side and their failures to conform to economic reality.

Having said that, I wish to address myself briefly to a couple of subsections of section 28 dealing with aspects of administration, and then to some of the other subsections related thereto. First, may I ask the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance whether, for the purposes of section 28(1), the government intends to include fishermen? That is, when we speak of the possibility of people in the farming business being able to make use of the cash method of accounting, are we to include fishermen as well?

Section 28(1) reads in part:

For the purpose of computing the income of a taxpayer for a taxation year from a farming business, the income from the business for that year may, if the taxpayer so elects, be computed in accordance with a method (hereinafter in this section referred to as the 'cash' method)—

I am wondering if the government intends to give fishermen the benefit of this type of privilege that is given to farmers. If so, I suggest with deference that this should be specifically spelled out in section 28(1). I also wonder, when we consider subsections (4) and (5) of section 28, whether there may be difficulty in determining especially in the case of subsection (5), what type of income is being referred to. Probably the difficulty may be resolved if one looks at some of the definitions of income in sections 5, 9 and 56 of the act. Possibly there may be an onus there on the taxpayer as there is with respect to subsection (4), when we talk about the value of certain items that might be included in inventory.

It seems to me, when we consider these particular questions, of onus that we must, of necessity, consider the important step that the government has taken with regard to section 163(3), namely, introducing for practically the first time in this legislation, so far as I am aware, the concept that the burden of proof, at least for the purpose of assessing penalties, is on the department. If I am able to stay within the rules of relevancy, it seems that this is something that has not been dealt with to any extent so far in this discussion. I feel this is a very important point. The Income Tax Act, as well as the proposed legislation, are very complex. They will affect most Canadians very directly.

• (4:20 p.m.)

In connection with the philosophy of permitting the taxpayer to put down the burden of proof to a limited extent, I think the government is to be commended. However, I suspect it would be far better if this philosophy were carried on throughout the act. For example, as opposed to the Criminal Code, it is not in the spirit of the philosophy of section 163(3) that a provision be permitted that gives an information laid under the Income Tax Act a pre-eminence over the same or related type of information under the Criminal Code.

Section 244 refers to an information or complaint. It reads:

An information or complaint under this Act may be laid or made by any officer of the Department of National Revenue, by a member of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police or by any person thereunto authorized by the Minister and, where an information or complaint purports to have been laid or made under this Act, it shall be deemed to have been laid or made by a person thereunto authorized by the Minister—

This is the part to which I object:

—and shall not be called in question for lack of authority of the informant or complainant except by the Minister or by some person acting for him or Her Majesty.

This is not in the spirit of the very commendable attitude shown by the government in section 163(3). I question whether it is a good provision to have because it permits the government, through its agents in the department, to take away a defence that would be available under the Criminal Code. I do not think the Income Tax Act should be pre-eminent over the Criminal Code.

Section 243 is also interesting. It states that if a person has the unfortunate experience of running afoul of the Criminal Code and the Income Tax Act, and the criminal courts assume jurisdiction as the result, and I quote:

—the court has in any prosecution or proceeding under this Act, no power to impose less than the minimum fine or imprisonment fixed by this Act and the court has no power to suspend sentence.

This is repugnant as well, and should be looked at. I do not say this in criticism only, but in good faith hoping the parliamentary secretary will take it under advisement. In considering this bill as a whole, it is a fair comment to say that this is not so much tax reform as a tax revision. Although there is a need for a substantive and complete revision, we should not neglect the area of administration, and the attitude and procedures adopted by the departmental officials. There are some quite rough procedures involved in the provisions of this act, section 231 and following. While they may be necessary in some cases, they should be carried out with the greatest possible respect for the rights of Canadians. With this in mind, I raised this particular point.

There is another matter of more than ordinary interest. I do not think it has been dealt with, although I may have been absent for part of the time. In addition to the points raised by my colleague, the hon. member for Simcoe North, there is another factor that affects the well-being of the farmer, any land owner or taxpayer. He seems to get "whipsawed", not only because of the fact that estate taxes are being contemplated or retained by the provinces and capital gains are being imposed by the federal government, but we are told by knowledgeable tax accountants when having property appraised and making elections under this so-called tax free zone how taxpayers will value their property. Waiting patiently in the wings is the municipal assessor. He takes a considerable bite from the savings or revenues of most Canadians. The average Canadian does not care to whom he pays the tax. He only knows that when he pays, it hurts.

I can readily see the case of a tax appeal in a municipality. A man may obtain the services of a professional appraiser and have his property valued for his own particular purposes as high as is fair and reasonable for the concept of capital gains. When appealing his taxes at the municipal level, he will be asked whether he has had his property appraised recently. Being under oath, he will naturally have to say yes. The municipal assessor will probably thus get information that will completely destroy this man's chances of having his property appraised for taxation purposes on the same basis as those in that particular district.

We have imposed upon the Canadian taxpayer a rather cruel dilemma right from the bottom to the top as far as taxes are concerned. Unless the federal government is prepared to take administrative steps to give an abatement to a taxpayer or to avoid some of these rather obvious difficulties, the person with much real estate will be jeopardized to a very great extent. I realize that much of what I could say has already been said by those more able than myself, but I did wish to bring these points before the committee. I thank the committee for its attention.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, with regard to these four sections, the government has received considerable advice from farm organizations. It is now receiving considerable advice, unwelcome though it may be, from the opposition members concerning a very specific problem. The problem is, how to properly tax rural agriculture and at the same time not put the agricultural industry out of business, particularly as a farm unit, and the role that a farm unit has in a community. Bill C-259 may create disparity between communities and the rural sections that make up the rural way of life in our nation.

The government has not been prone to take advice. In this field, many in the opposition who are offering advice do not have the latest word on the subject. We have seen the government proven wrong before. They were certainly proved wrong yesterday in Assiniboia. At a late date they took their bill to the farmer in western Canada and he gave his answer. The answer was not the one the government sought. It has almost destroyed the credibility of the minister responsible for the Prairie Grain Stabilization act. Therefore, the government should be very cautious about bulling through a piece of legislation, particularly as it affects farmers.

The parliamentary secretary has agreed that further consideration should be given to subsection 29. I ask him to agree to stand the other three sections which affect farmers, and I ask him to do this in order that these matters be referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture. The cattlemen have expressed to Members of Parliament a number of fears present in their minds with regard to the future of their industry, fears which are applicable to other segments of agriculture as well. The parliamentary secretary has told the committee that he does not understand these representations, that he does not understand the basis of their objections. I can sympathize with him. I myself have some knowledge of this subject but I do not profess to understand it, or how it works. The government has shown that it does not know everything about agriculture. Frankly, I would think the late J.C. would be hard-pressed to understand all the facets of Canadian agriculture. The agriculture committee is the forum at which these subsections would secure the attention of all the organizations which are interested. Their representatives would appear before the committee and make representations.

Surely, Mr. Chairman, the point of tax legislation is to raise revenue without at the same time killing the golden goose, or taxing one segment of the economy along lines which it cannot support. I have always found farmers to be in a totally different position from anyone else when it came to finance, when it came to getting what they believe they deserve from governments, when it came to their ability to pay taxes or their ability to provide a product whose price in many cases does not cover the cost of the operation. The mere fact that they have been able to stay in business is proof of their ingenuity. I suggest we should apply some of the ingenuity of the farm community to devising a tax structure so that we can get out of the agriculture industry a fair tax return for the Canadian public while at the same time maintaining both the rural economy and the level of food production that the nation requires.

Maintenance of the rural economy is an important consideration; I shall not go into all its facets now, but it includes preservation of the environment, the quality of the lives of the people who live on the farms and of those in the communities they sustain. We should bear in mind that it would be a serious thing indeed to jeopardize the national food supply. And we should be thankful that our food is presently produced at a very reasonable cost in a nation where incomes are fairly high and where a high standard of living is enjoyed. We have done very well and I suggest that the bureaucrats should not suddenly declare that they know all the answers, and know how to extract taxes from this industry, without taking into account all the other considerations involved. It is very nice, no doubt, to get an accrual income out of agriculture. They sure as hell should have tried to get that out of agriculture in western Canada when for five, six or seven years, grain was lying in the fields. Nobody could have liquidated their grain because it was not a saleable commodity. Farmers can remember when they burned grain because it was cheaper than cutting wood—and all they had to do was to supply an axe and some muscle to cut the wood.

It is all right for a doctor, for example, to say that the extra money the government wants to collect can be considered as income. Most doctors today have decided that instead of following the medical scale of returns for visits as set out by colleges of physicians and surgeons they will follow their own scales. Most of the money, anyway, is paid by the federal government in conjunction with provincial governments under various medicare schemes. Compare the situation of professional people with the situation in which farmers often find themselves. They may have large stocks of a commodity on their premises but they are not able to sell it.

In the case of grain, a government agency has been set up to dispose of it, and when the government itself has not been able to sell a product it seems foolish to me that the Department of National Revenue should say to a farmer: You have an accrual income from the products you have on your farm and now you must make a cash payment to us. Mr. Chairman, that is one heck of a good way of socializing agriculture in Canada. I heard the parliamentary secretary say he was against socialism. Yet here is a way of socializing farms. Look back over the last 15 years of the history of western Canada. Had we enforced payment of taxes under an accrual system related to what was produced by those farms we would today own most of the farms in Canada, including those which have oil wells under them.

Mr. Mahoney: What are you complaining about?

Mr. Peters: I am not that kind of socialist. Maybe supporters of the Liberal party are. I do not believe we have to steal from the farmers by means of the tax structure, by establishing an accrual system which makes them pay on the commodities they produce before they sell them. That is actually what the subsection before us will do under the guise of providing equality for the farm taxpayer when compared with others who have been forced into adopting the accrual system.

The parliamentary secretary asked what I was complaining about. Mr. Chairman, in Saskatchewan they elected a CCF government which was a pseudo-socialist government. One of the first acts of that government was to pass a law providing that no farm could be foreclosed for non-payment of taxes. I am sure that had there been an accrual system in effect, the law would have applied to income tax as well. No true socialist, no one who has socialistic leanings, would approve a tax structure whose main purpose was to get control of the land into the hands of the government. Surely, we would pay for the land, we would make concessions, we would do a number of things. But we would not steal it by imposing an unfair tax structure.

I don't know all the answers. I have never been able to determine how a basic herd was established in the first place or how it can be increased. The income tax authorities did not understand it very well, either. I remember my father discussing it with them. At one time he was in charge of the economics department of the federal Department of Agriculture in Ottawa, on loan as an economics adviser from the government of Ontario, so he did have some knowledge about this. Yet he ran into continued difficulty with the income tax department over this complex question of a basic herd. He educated them for some days and I dare say he came out of the discussions very well. Although some of the farmers in my area had not established a basic herd, they were not on an accrual basis, either.

I am reminded of a problem that I once had with the Ontario government over a blind pensioner. Walking down the street one day the pensioner met the welfare officer. He told the welfare officer that he had just sold a cow and a calf, and when he was asked how much he received for them replied he had got $275 for the cow and $60 for the calf. Whereupon the welfare officer returned to his office and cut off his pension, reporting to Toronto that he had received $260 for the cow and $60 for the calf and that this should be regarded as income.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You have just lost $15.

Mr. Peters: My arithmetic is of no help, but the story is the same.

Mr. Horner: He was selling a capital asset.

Mr. Peters: I found it very difficult to persuade the department of welfare in Toronto that just because this pensioner had received this very substantial sum for the cow and the calf the money was not all profit. He had had to feed the cow for three years; he had to clean the stable, provide a barn and do everything else necessary to provide sustenance for the cow, including cutting hay and planting grain. I explained that the calf happened to be a by-product of the energy he had expended, and that if the farmer received as much as $20 or $30 clear profit on the transaction he was doing real well. After lengthy telephone calls, the welfare department finally agreed that the amount received was not a profit, that it was not similar to getting a job at a factory and being paid for your labour. Many factors were involved in the production of a cow and a calf and only a small part of the payment was profit.

The same is true of accrual income. After all, how is a farmer going to be fair to the tax department and to himself? I am sure the Minister of Finance understands the problem. Rich farmers in Kingston must have come to see him occasionally when he was an accountant to ask him to prepare their books. I suggest that with the limited amount of information with which they would provide him, he would be very hard pressed to do an honest job of accounting on their behalf.

After all, farmers have not had an accountant's education. Their bookkeeping is sloppy. Whenever they sell an animal the proceeds are put in the bank and they make payments when they have to. Then, at the end of the year, they know whether they have made a profit and they supply the income tax department with information that satisfies them. Normally, most farmers do not pay very much tax because at the end of the year they do not have very much income.

In view of the provisions in this bill, the farmers are going to need specialized assistance. Is the minister suggesting that he will accept Farm-Can figures or is he going to accept only the Department of Agriculture figures? I see the adviser to the minister indicating he does not know what that is. The government has been trying to get a uniform accounting system and have asked the farmers to send in all their bills and receipts each month so the government can compute a farmer's income. They come up with a profit or loss figure rather than an accrual figure and the two systems are totally different. The Ontario government is working out the same kind of system with the agricultural college at Guelph, because they realize that farmers often do not know whether or not they are making money.

I remember talking to a farmer who had a herd of pigs. He told me the price of feed had gone up, that things had happened to the market and that he was going to lose $10 on each little pig. I asked him why he didn't go to the stable with a hammer and hit them over the head before they cost him $10 each, and he looked at me as though I were crazy. He was not sure even after he had sold them whether he had lost $10 or made $10. It is not so much a question of farmers cheating; they simply do not know what is their financial position. This is why they require specialized help in preparing their accounts. This will allow the government to collect the proper tax. If the farmers are overly generous with the government, they go broke. If they are not, the Minister of Finance squeals for more money. This is why special consideration must be given our farmers.

I am not talking about industrialized farms or vertically integrated farms. I am talking about the bulk of the farmers in our rural economy who run a farm with their families and who wish to leave the farm to their sons. The sons stay on the farm instead of getting an education or a large income in industry.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Peters: Are you sure my 20 minutes is up, Mr. Chairman?

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40 to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Simcoe North—health; the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton—education; the hon. member for Selkirk—public service.

The hon. member for Meadow Lake.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, may I rise on a point of order. I do not think the hon. member for Timiskaming was trespassing beyond his time or over-stretching the patience of the committee. I am sure we would all like to hear him complete his speech, if Your Honour would be pleased to recognize the hon. member for Meadow Lake afterwards.

The Deputy Chairman: I must have the unanimous consent of the committee to let the hon. member continue his remarks.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Mr. Peters: I will not abuse the privilege. I was only making an impassioned plea on behalf of the farmers who I believe have a different type of problem from that of other people. They have never budgeted for lawyers fees, for accountants fees or for bookkeeper's fees. They are really not in a position to establish an accrual accounting system at this time. The minister is here, and I know he comes from a municipality which is surrounded by a rural area. I only suggest to him that we stand these other three sections and refer them to the Agriculture Committee for study. I mentioned that the Canadian Federation of Agriculture had made representations. Other farm organizations also have made representations, all of which have hinged on these two or three particular problems. The solutions suggested have not been identical in each case but the representations have been sincere. I therefore ask the minister to give consideration to some study of the problem by the agriculture committee. We will be with this legislation for a long time. I am not suggesting we will be with the income tax bill as such for a long time, but that we will have to live with the income tax act for a long time.

I realize the government believes we should have larger, more economical farms. I also realize there is an advantage in having large, easy to understand units. I am sure, however, the government will also agree there is a large number of voters in this country who are either one generation removed from the farm, or who may even still be close to the rural economy, who believe there is a way of life in Canada in ownership of land which does not involve only the hobby farmer but which involves a way of life which is to be protected. I therefore make the plea that the minister consider referring this to a committee where we can specifically hear people on the particular subjects of concern. It would even seem to me that if this section were omitted when the bill is passed that would not be too bad. We could use the exceptions which are already there and, for a period of time, give consideration to what the best method is to solve this problem. The minister may have a better suggestion, but I make the plea that at least he give consideration to our obtaining some information from the farm organizations themselves concerning what might be a more equitable farm tax structure, without at the same time making it more difficult and more expensive for people to carry on in medium and small-sized farms in Canada today. We should make it possible for those people to continue the normal way of life they have chosen.

Mr. Cadieu: Mr. Chairman, I listened to this debate with a great deal of interest. I could not help but note the manner in which the parliamentary secretary, who comes from that great cattle country in the Calgary area, answered the hon. member for Crowfoot this morning when he was speaking on the very important topic which we were debating at that time. I am sure that when he goes back to his constituency he will have a little explaining to do to some of the cattlemen in that great area where cattle have been produced for so long and so well. I believe the hon. member for Crowfoot made a very important point when he referred to the situation of the Canadian cattlemen as compared with the position of the cattlemen to the south, and the problems our cattlemen face which are not faced by cattlemen in the United States. He referred to climatic conditions and many other conditions such as population. We must be on a competitive basis. I certainly think that the hon. member for Crowfoot got right down to the meat of the problem which these cattlemen face.

We must have competition. I am glad we do have competition among the livestock people. This is what the livestock men have fought for through the years. This is what they want to see continue. I believe the government was very lax in studying the situation of the United States cattlemen with regard to the basic herd. Since the government has not looked into this, I think that instead of standing only section 29 we should stand also sections 28, 30 and 31. If we stand one section, I believe we should stand all four sections because they are all very much connected. If we are to scrap the basic herd concept—and this has been talked about—then we might just as well scrap a good many of the livestock men because they will be forced out of business altogether. We might stop and think about the amount of money the various provincial governments have lent, for the purpose of setting up young farmers in areas which are adaptable to livestock production. For the life of me I do not understand, when we have the provincial governments trying to do something about keeping these boys and girls on the farms and providing them with a low rate of interest in order to get set up, why the federal government should be putting on this squeeze.

I am sure many of these people would not be very interested in continuing much further because it is already very difficult for them to become established on a farm. After taking a good look at the situation, I cannot understand why this government would come in with such a bill. I do not think the government is listening to the people or is paying attention to what is going on in respect of the farm population. I would have thought the government would have given much more study to this matter. When one looks at the farming situation today, it is evident that farmers have not been able to pay the minimum wage. I think this is a shame.

I do not understand why farmers should not be able to pay the minimum wage and thereby be in line with those enterprises which they have been instrumental in establishing in the first place. For instance, why should not the livestock man or the farmer be able to pay the same wages that are paid by telephone companies, power companies and highway construction companies. The farmers are the people who were instrumental in bringing about these developments. Now, they find themselves in a predicament. We talk about unemployment. It is terrible to think of the number of people who are unemployed.

If you go to a farm or to a ranch and try to hire a man you will see what you are up against, because in some provinces what farmers are getting for their produce does not even provide them with a minimum wage. I think this is a shame and the government should take a good, hard look at these provisions before they talk about what they will do with the basic herd concept.

Farmers find themselves in a predicament. I made a check on this in my own district very recently—and it is a pretty good district. In certain sections of that country I could scarcely find a farmer who could make a go of it unless he was subsidizing his holdings through some other method—his wife was teaching, nursing or working in other ways to help subsidize the farm or the farmer was moonlighting, driving a school bus, doing construction work or some other work in order to keep his farm together. If the government does not know this, it should take a look at the situation. Very few small farmers today can make a go of it without subsidizing their farms. This should not be the case.

If this bill passes, farmers will be driven off their farms, and I think this is a shame. I have taken a good look at what is going on in the farming community and I find that the trouble lies in the fact that farmers are forced to produce at lower prices than have prevailed for years. You get 60 cents for barley, 40 cents for oats and $1.20 for No. 3 wheat. This is what the farmer is up against. This government will make it utterly impossible for him to stay on his farm. I cannot for the life of me understand why the government does not listen to the people and find out what is going on. People in Saskatchewan made their opinions known last night. The government should take a good look at the situation before coming in with a bill such as this.

I believe that the basic herd concept has been set up by regulation. I am not sure that it has been set up under the act. I think the four sections should be stood. They should be sent back to the committee on agriculture for further recommendations. It is a waste of time for us to sit here and debate such a bill, and it is almost impossible for the House to pass these provisions on farm taxation. If these sections are sent to committee, the committee might come up with a sound report and we might find out what the basic herd concept really means. Many of the basic herds that have been set up are registered herds. Many young people who in the past few years have been starting out in the farming business have not been able to establish a basic herd, and they will be very disappointed. I do not know why they should want to carry on and I do not understand why the government would not want to do something about this problem. They will find that these provisions will destroy many pure-bred herds.

I should like to make a few remarks regarding the capital gains tax on used machinery. We must take into account the cost of new machinery now as compared with what it was three or four years ago. If a farmer has to pay capital gains tax when he trades old machine for new machinery, at a time when he must pay almost twice as much for a new machine, I do not see how he will ever be able to buy machinery for farming.

We do not need to confine ourselves to the Prairie. Let us consider any rural area and we will see how disappointing it is for the sons and daughters of farmers to be unable to carry on the family farm. It is next to impossible and I do not know how many will be able to do it. Several provincial governments are trying to help out farmers in this situation, but here we have the federal government wrecking the whole works in trying to bring in a bill such as this.

I do not see any point to standing only section 29. I believe the four sections should be stood because they are related to each other. I do not know where the government thinks it is going with this kind of legislation affecting the farming population of Canada.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Would the hon. member allow a question?

The Deputy Chairman: This can only be done with the permission of the hon. member who has the floor. Does the hon. member for Meadow Lake allow the hon. member for St. Boniface to ask a question?

Mr. Cadieu: I did not hear the question, Mr. Chairman.

An hon. Member: It has not yet been asked.

The Deputy Chairman: The Chair was only seeking the acceptance of the hon. member.

Mr. Cadieu: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I would ask the hon. member for Meadow Lake a question with reference to the basic herd. What is the difference between a young couple who are being helped by the provincial government and his own situation on the farm, where he has a large herd of cattle? In other words, the hon. member has a large stock of cattle, while the young couple has not yet established one. Could the hon. member explain the difference between his case and that of the young couple?

Mr. Cadieu: Yes. There is no difference, because my farm could not carry on if it were not for my sons whom I want to set up. There is no difference at all between the young couple who get a loan from the provincial government and my sons who receive my assistance in setting up a farm.

Mr. Howe: I do not want to take up too much time today because yesterday I made some comments with reference to these items. However, there are one or two matters on which I should like to seek the advice of the parliamentary secretary. One of them arises from the brief of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture which contains a section headed "Guidance to the farmer". It reads:

> The problems for the farmer in dealing efficiently with the problems he faces in the period of transition to the provisions of the new bill will be very real, and it is important that he be as fully aware as possible of what he should do to set his records in proper order, and in all other respects arrange his affairs to his best advantage. The problems involved in establishing valuation day records of assets, and valuations on them, are one example here.
> We very much approve the government's intent to prepare working guides to aid taxpayers in such problems. These should be clear in layman's terms and widely distributed.

• (5:10 p.m.)

I hope the government takes note of the words "These should be clear in layman's terms," because that is the difficulty with this bill. It is very complicated for the ordinary individual, and in fact many of us in the House of Commons have great difficulty with it and are not sure that we understand it.

> One should be prepared, we believe, directed to the specific problems of farmers.

I presume this one has been prepared, but I wonder whether during its preparation the farming organizations were asked for their advice. They are the representatives of the farmers. I would think that before a pamphlet such as is described here is sent to farmers, the farm organizations should have an opportunity to examine it and determine whether it does the job it is supposed to do.

Although section 29 has been stood, there are one or two questions about it that still perturb me. There are matters the government should take note of when deciding what to do about the section. Earlier today the hon. member for Simcoe North talked about people who raise special breeding herds to be sold for breeding stock. From time to time we hear about people who have developed outstanding animals. I have a particular interest in this matter.

One of my constituents has been breeding Charolais cattle—in fact two people have been doing so—and just the other day one of those cattle was sold for $53,000. No doubt the income tax people have already heard about it. I wonder what the provisions in this bill would do to an individual like that, who spends a lot of time raising pure-bred stock and eventually has the satisfaction of going to a sale and getting a price—not always as high as the one I have mentioned—for an animal to which he has given great attention, keeping records of blood lines and doing all the things that lead to good breeding. This is a special case. There is another special case that should be considered. As I mentioned yesterday, there is the case of the junior farmer or 4-H club member who is given an animal each spring to rear and who sells it at a fall fair. Representatives of packing companies attend the fall fairs and bid on such animals. Generally the young person gets more than the market value of the animal. But there is one particular case that has come to my attention.

[Mr. Cadieu.]

Young people have won what we call the Queen's Guineas at the Royal Winter Fair in Toronto. I am not sure how much that amounts to in cash, but I well remember that some years ago a steer that won the Queen's Guineas at the Royal Winter Fair was sold for about $5 a pound on the hoof. Such animals are bought by firms such as Simpsons, Eatons or meat packing companies, for promotional purposes. Sold at that price, the cash realization, taking into account the value of the prize, was around $7,000 or $8,000. Such things have to be taken into consideration when examining this bill.

My hon. friend from Meadow Lake and other hon. members have argued that all these sections dealing with agriculture should be stood. Personally, I do not know why this voluminous bill was brought in at this time and why a deadline was set to get it through by the end of this year. After all, it will affect the lives of practically everybody in Canada. It is important to a great many people. So far as many of us can see, only those people who will receive increased income tax exemptions and who will be taken off the income tax rolls will benefit from it. But probably by the time the bill goes through and is enacted the cost of living will have increased to such an extent that their so-called savings will have melted away.

Therefore I would add my voice to those who are suggesting that not only should these sections be stood for the time being and sent to a committee for further consideration, but I think more time should be taken to examine all sections of the bill to ensure that when it is passed it will represent the best job that can be done on tax reform.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, for the next few minutes I will not engage in small talk on farming but deal with large philosophical questions. That will give Canadian Press a chance to go out and have a glass of water until approximately 5.27 p.m., since I became dead in their eyes as the result of a speech I made last week in this debate.

I would like to make one remark and raise several questions regarding this part of the debate. This arises out of the fact that as I travel through part of my constituency I am struck by the number of small farm places that have been vacated. In other words, I am struck by the death of small farming operations in my part of Canada. I believe that this sort of thing is also happening in other parts of the country.

To establish the bona fides for my remarks let my say that none of my ancestors for at least two generations of which I am aware, nor I myself, has been qualified to run a farm—and if we attempted to do so we would immediately find ourselves in great peril. So I am not posing as an expert on the death of the small farm, but I am posing perhaps as a philosopher on the question of why this sort of thing should happen. In East Hants one can see a prosperous community of farms and also many farms that have been vacated. Therefore we know that the institution of the small farm is imperilled.

Mr. Chairman, it is very difficult to gather one's thoughts when there is such a babble from the backbenches on the other side, even though it does not appear on the record. There is one question I wish to ask the parliamentary secretary. Granted that a new income tax act should not only be a document of reform to overcome some of the problems I have mentioned on about 15 or 20 occasions in this debate—it should also be a document to point the way to the future.

• (5:20 p.m.)

From the philosophical point of view, I wonder if the parliamentary secretary or the minister could tell us whether there is anything in this document which tends to save the small farming operation in Canada. Frankly, I do not think there is. But perhaps there was some good intention which was lost in the discussions and which would show that our children and grandchildren could adopt farming as a way of life. I think I should have first put the question: Is there any way that one would be encouraged to establish a farm? The second question would be: Will there be any incentive to operate a small farm unit?

These are basic questions and I do not think we have the answers. We have been dealing with questions regarding farming operations of monumental size, but if we are to establish some sort of equity in taxation we should also establish a policy with regard to what we want to build in Canada. When I drive down the highway for about 20 miles in East Hants and see 40 or 50 vacant farm buildings, I must ask the question here and I think I should have an answer.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, a number of questions have been raised by hon. members. I am sorry that the hon. member for Central Nova was not able to remain, because he asked some of them. However, most dealt with appeal, enforcement and administration sections of the bill rather than those currently under consideration, so perhaps an opportunity will arise to respond to the hon. member when those sections are before us. I do not think I should take the time of the committee now to respond to them, since he is not here. However, I should like to congratulate him on the fruits of his own research as opposed to that of the research department referred to earlier.

During the afternoon there have been a number of suggestions that something could be accomplished by referring these sections—not just section 29 but others—to the Standing Committee on Agriculture. I think hon. members opposite are doing a disservice to committee of the whole which is charged with the responsibility of dealing with this bill, and also to the work of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. Over a long period of time the latter committee heard representations from agricultural organizations and individuals concerned about agriculture and had the opportunity to report and make recommendations.

The hon. member for Battle River was very active in this regard, as was the hon. member for Dauphin and the hon. member for Regina East who served full-time on that committee. They are men with an agricultural background. In addition, on a number of occasions we were honoured with the presence of the hon. member for Kent-Essex, and on one or two occasions we even had the hon. member for Crowfoot join us when matters of particular interest to him were being considered.

Mr. Horner: When time permitted.

Mr. Mahoney: Hon. members opposite, as well as those from this side of the House who served well on the committee, had opportunities to advance the views they are now advancing. The Finance Committee has done its work and nothing useful would be served by agreeing to the suggestion that has been made.

The hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo was not able to remain for the answers to his questions, but perhaps he will read Hansard. I should point out that the area of information services to which he was alluding is the function of the Department of National Revenue which will be bringing forth various publications for the guidance of taxpayers under the new system. Accordingly, the hon. member might wish to raise that matter with the Minister of National Revenue, but I seriously doubt that the Department of National Revenue will be in a position to finalize the material until Parliament has passed Bill C-259 and it has become law.

The question of the desirability of this information getting into the hands of taxpayers might impress itself on all members of the House. I very much agree with the hon. member that it is desirable that taxpayers be informed very soon, and in layman's language, of the best way to adapt, where necessary, their business practice to the requirements of the new system. Until that time comes I think it would be regrettable if many taxpayers who do not already find that their business affairs require them to rely on professional tax advisers paid money to people currently advertising their services in anticipation of the forthcoming tax system. Until the tax bill becomes law, those tax advisers are not in a very good position to give concrete advice on matters of real application under the forthcoming law.

I reiterate that I hope the general body of taxpayers does not take the bait of the many advertisements that are appearing on a "scare" basis inviting them to spend money in anticipation on a bill that has not passed Parliament. The Department of National Revenue will be making a real effort to give explanatory material in layman's language which will, hopefully, eliminate the necessity for professional tax advice for all but the small minority of taxpayers who now find themselves in need of that kind of advice. I thank the hon. member for giving me the opportunity to put that comment on the record. The hon. member went on to raise the question of breeding stock which had also been raised by the hon. member for Simcoe North. Rather than repeat that answer, and as he is absent, I would refer to the answer I gave the hon. member for Simcoe North.

The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants invited me to participate in this debate on a philosophical basis. Mr. Chairman, I have enough trouble trying to do what I think I am competent to do without discussing agriculture on a philosophical plane.

Mr. Horner: You are wise there.

Mr. Mahoney: Accordingly, Mr. Chairman, I must decline that very wise and thoughtful invitation.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Chairman, I would like to pose a few brief questions with regard to section 28. The parliamentary secretary tended to reject the concept of referring section 29 to the Standing Committee on Agriculture. I do not know whether he was going to refer section 29 or all these four sections to that committee, but he seemed to reject that idea. Perhaps when he rises again he could give the committee a preview of exactly what study will be given to section 29 now that it has been stood.

Surely they did not just stand it in order to enter it again in the same form. Surely they would like to convince us that they will thoroughly examine it to see whether it is detrimental to the industry. I would not like to see it entered first thing tomorrow and our debating the same thing again. The parliamentary secretary should give us a preview of the government's thinking now that we have agreed to stand section 29. Will they be soliciting the advice of stock breeders and cattlemen? How will this apply to breeding stock in hog production? This is a very important point, because pathogenetic pre-breeding stock in the hog industry is an important facet of that industry.

Could the parliamentary secretary also outline for us, briefly, the purpose and meaning of section 28(4) which concerns with changes in residence and tax payable by those who are no longer resident in Canada? Could he tell us what implication this subsection has with respect to the computation of one's income tax, whether on a cash or accrual basis?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has invited me to indicate what is the nature of the consideration that will be given to section 28 that was stood at the suggestion of the hon. member and with the agreement of hon. members on this side of the House.

An hon. Member: The committee stood section 29.

Mr. Mahoney: I would simply say that it seems appropriate for us to be given the opportunity to study the record of the debate on that section and the remarks made yesterday and today. As the hon. member is well aware, representations from the Canadian Federation of Agriculture have recently been received and the Canadian Cattlemen's Association has been bringing its views forcibly to the attention of Members of Parliament. Obviously, I am not in a position to indicate, nor do I intend to convey the impression that I can indicate, what if any changes may result. Nor may I indicate any timing as to when possible changes might be expected.

The hon. member asked a question regarding section 28(4). I did not have the opportunity of reading that rather lengthy section while the hon. member was asking the question. I will take the opportunity to look at it and will try to respond to his question before six o'clock.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, I have in my hand the brief of the Canadian Cattlemen's Association. What strikes me about this presentation—and I am sure the parliamentary secretary will agree with me—is the very reasonable argument it puts forward. The cattlemen of Canada, among whom we may include mixed farmers who are in the beef industry, enjoy an enviable record. They have never come to the government hat in hand and asked for special consideration.

If you read this brief carefully—I am sure the parliamentary secretary has, although it was addressed to the Minister of Finance—you will see that it is couched in the typical and modest understatements of the best cattle breeders and mixed farmers of Canada. They are not asking for special consideration. If you read the brief, however, it is plain that they are not overly happy about Bill C-259. I would put the last paragraph of the brief on record for the convenience of those who wish to refer to it. It reads:

> However, this brief itself is not enough. We believe this issue is so important to agriculture that we herewith request an opportunity to meet with the proper authorities to discuss these matters and to offer more information if requested to support our case.

I do not hold myself out as an expert in the field of cattle breeding although I have had experience as a ranch-hand and was raised on a farm. I have lived with these people all my life. They are worried about the implications of Bill C-259. They are particularly concerned about those sections of the bill that affect agriculture. They ask, in which direction is agriculture going and what is to be the future of cattlemen and farmers in general?

Cattlemen are not confined to western Canada. I suggest that as many head of cattle are produced in other parts of Canada as are produced in western Canada. This question affects vitally the cattle breeders of Ontario, Quebec, the Maritimes and British Columbia. Thousands of cattle are raised in the Fraser Valley. If they are not raised, they are fattened. When you speak of the cattle industry you speak not only of the raising but of the fattening, improving, marketing and selling of cattle.

The Cattlemen's Association is worried about some of the implications of this bill. The question of the basic herd was thoroughly discussed and I was pleased that section 29 was stood. I hope it will be stood long enough to permit consultation to take place between those concerned and the government. We want no more short cuts, no matter how well meaning they may be. We want no more talk about ministers being ready to go to jail, and all sorts of horrible consequences that may follow if one breaks the law. We want to make sure that the law as passed has been brought into being through full consultation with people whose living and future depend on our doing a good job with this bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bigg: Nothing is more serious to the people of Alberta than any infringement upon the rights of cattlemen and mixed farmers to stay on their farms and run them in their own way. I say what Mark Antony said to the crowd: If I am wrong, I apologize: however, I am sure I am right.

Every part of this brief is couched in the typical understatement of outdoor men, men who are not self-conscious, who are not worried about petty things but who are worried about their basic freedoms and their right to remain free and independent. They do not like coming to the government and asking for special consideration. These men believe—I say this with great conviction—that every Member of Parliament believes in supporting their basic freedoms. They expect to be treated as fairly and as equitably as every Canadian expects to be treated.

These people are capable of producing the finest beef cattle in the world. They are a great credit to their profession and to their personal integrity, ambition and labour. They know their profession—and beef raising in Canada can qualify as a profession. These men are not merely entrepreneurs; they are experts. They do not dabble in this field. They produce the finest range cattle in Canada. They will put on your plate the finest beef that is to be found anywhere—good Canadian beef steak. In their own mild way they say they want to be consulted. They do not say, "We demand this." They want to be consulted, as they have a right to expect. As far as every member of my party is concerned, we will make sure that they are consulted.

As I said, I am not an expert on beef raising. Those in the Canadian Cattlemen's Association are experts in this field. They have taken the trouble of consulting among themselves in order to bring forward the short and concise document we have before us. This must be considered if common sense is to apply to sections of the act relating directly to this association. If we do not do that, we are delinquent.

The hon. member for Crowfoot is to be congratulated on making such a strong presentation that the government has seen fit to stand section 29. This brief should be carefully read—the last paragraph in particular—because it contains very detailed and precise information which the government requires before these sections of the bill can be included in a permanent income tax act which will be equitable to cattlemen. In the brief they say their concern about Bill-259 derives from insufficient evidence being given to the unique and special nature of farming. I have said this before and the hon. member for Crowfoot and others on this side of the House have said it in no uncertain terms.

Farming is not just another business. It is a way of life. On the farm you do not punch a clock or count the hours. Anyone not engaged in the process of raising beef does not know how many unpaid hours a cowboy works. If a cow becomes sick in the middle of the night or is having a calf, the cowboy is up all night. He must act as a midwife and a nurse. His hours are not cut off by a union time-clock. If he is worth his salt—and he normally is—he is on duty 24 hours a day. You cannot define that in terms of union wages.

The whole family is involved in the process of raising cattle. I have seen a housewife wrap her coat around a calf, put the calf behind the stove and feed it with her child's bottle. She cares for it until it is able to stand and return to its mother in the barn. What in this act gives recognition to this different and special nature of farming? Is it a capital gain when you raise a small herd and produce the finest beef in the world? Is it a capital gain, or is it a question of deferred wages for the whole family? The housewife on the farm often rides out on the range to help her husband round up the cattle. She has no relief from taxation. The husband has no relief from taxation in the normal sense of the word.

Today we are all involved in seeking security and perhaps rightly so. Where does the family farmer and rancher stand with regard to the Canada Pension Plan? As the Minister of Finance and all members know, you cannot join the Canada Pension Plan unless you show a net profit on your farm or ranch. How many small farmers or ranchers have the know-how or can afford to keep proper books? Of these, how many earn $800 after expenses are paid? That is the minimum amount necessary to join the Canada Pension Plan. Even the maximum pension is not magnificent, yet you have to show at least $4,700 net profit. That would be an exception.

It is true that some ranchers in western Canada show considerable profit, but we are talking about averages. We in this House make rules for the average Canadian, the small farmer, the small rancher and the average person who started off with a quarter section of land and no money. After a lifetime on the land, they may have built up a big spread. I repeat, this is only deferred wages.

An hon. Member: You don't know what you are talking about.

Mr. Bigg: Someone has said I do not know what I am talking about. I have the scars of labour on my body to show that I know what I am talking about. I worked on a homestead. It required a great deal of work.

In western Canada there are many broken farms and broken lives. These people have put 20 or 30 years into working hard on the farm. They have received very little in the way of monetary return. They receive some reward, the freedom of being their own boss. They have received a reward by changing a bog, sandhill or a piece of stony ground into a viable farm. This is not capital gains; it is deferred wages—small wages at that.

Some couples have worked hard for 40 years on a quarter section of land which is stony, bony and full of stumps. They have drained it, cared for it, fertilized, seeded and harvested it. They had to borrow the money and had to pay excess prices for freight rates on farm machinery. They have received depressed prices for their product. An improvement from a $10 quarter section to a $50,000 viable farm is not a capital gain. That is utter and ridiculous nonsense. I do not know how anyone could say this is all wages or all capital gains. I would hate to have to do that job. This is unfair to those who took a raw quarter section of land and made it into a viable farm. They have already paid for it with blood, sweat and tears. They spent many hours of long, hard work during the cold Canadian winters. They put their lives into this investment, yet there are those who say this is a capital gain.

The members of the Canadian Cattlemen's Association are heroic people. They do not want to be called heroes. They want to be left alone to run their operations. When they pay for a farm with labour and deferred wages, they want the right to leave it to their children or grandchildren, unencumbered by unnecessary taxation.

My friends to the left, who are avowed socialists, say that this bill is too socialistic for them. It has an air of compulsion about it that they do not like. They are to be commended for this. This is a form of compulsion by taxation. In a great many cases it is confiscation by taxation. The Canadian Cattlemen's Association does not shriek independence or secession. They have thought about it but that is not the way they behave. They spend too much time working to sit around and talk about revolution. They want evolution. They want us to work out a square deal for them. Even if they do not say what is equitable, it is up to us to determine this for them. Many provisions in this bill are not equitable. It is not equitable to treat farming like every other profession in this country. It is not the same.

Farmers do not have union hours or fair employment practices. They do not have equal treatment of women. I should like to see the women of this country get up and talk about that. I should like to see them get behind the housewife on the farm and ask for a fair deal for these women.

Would you like me to talk about child labour for a while? Have you any idea of the kind of labour a child often puts in on the farm, unpaid except for bare grub? And they are leaving the farms in droves. Not only are their parents incapable of making a living under present conditions, but when a greedy government comes along intent on treating deferred wages as a capital gain, saying, "We want our share," it is no wonder they decide not to continue as their parents have done, breaking their backs to improve stony land. I do not think the government should have any part of it.

But I go along with the brief the Canadian Cattlemen's Association has presented. They ask to be treated as gentlemen. There is no word in their brief of revolution or secession. There is just a plea for equity. It is not equity to take deferred wages and call it capital. The farmers have paid with their labour for every dollar which has gone through their hands. They have paid in higher freight rates, in a lower standard of living, in their employment of other people, in their production of the finest food of any country in the world. I am thinking now about beef, although I might say the same about wheat and about a great many other Canadian agricultural products. As I say, we have been asked to consider a gentlemanly and mild brief from this organization. The plea it contains is: Do not act further until you have held the kind of consultations which this government has always claimed to support.

The government opposite is not the first which has consulted the people. But if this is their boast, and if they intend to put it into action, I beg them to take this brief and give it the consideration which has been requested. There is no rush. Canadian cattlemen and ranchers have been in existence for 100 years. There is no rush to get this bill through in the next three weeks. These people will not be satisfied unless they are consulted. It will not be good enough for us to sit down in the absence of consultation and make rules to govern members of the Canadian Cattlemen's Association, tie up their assets, take away their land and restrict their ability to build up basic herds. I remind the committee that the record of these people is excellent.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I do so because his time has expired.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I undertook to respond to the question asked by the hon. member for Crowfoot regarding section 28(4). That provision applies where a farmer who has reported his income on a cash basis leaves Canada and becomes a non-resident. It operates, in effect, to put him on an accrual basis at the time of his departure so that cash receipts attributable to his period of operation of the farm business prior to giving up residence become taxable. Under the general Canadian tax law personal taxation is levied on the basis of residence but cash receipts after the farmer has left Canada attributable to business operations carried on while he was resident here are properly taxable.

Mr. Horner: Are they charged against the land he left, or would the government search him out wherever he might be?

Mr. Mahoney: I do not think other countries would necessarily enforce the act for us, but any taxes due would be chargeable against whatever assets he left in Canada including any interest he might have in any land.

Mr. Horner: If he had sold the land, would the new owner have to discharge the liability for tax?

Mr. Mahoney: No, there is no lien on the property of anybody else but it is possible, of course, that there might be a balance payable to him under a mortgage, and that could be attached. But nobody else would be called upon to pay the revenue department any money which was not owed the taxpayer.

Mr. Gleave: I notice the parliamentary secretary said it would be the same as the accrual method. According to the section as I read it, the assets which this individual possessed in terms of land or livestock or grain, particularly under the accrual method, would go into inventory. Would the total amount be taxable in that year?

Mr. Mahoney: To the extent that it was inventory it would be income for the year. But there are, of course, provisions for reserves. Is the hon. member speaking of the non-resident in this case?

Mr. Gleave: No.

Mr. Mahoney: Then we are not dealing specifically with the person who has given up Canadian residence.

Mr. Horner: Six o'clock.

Mr. MacEachen: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman, to indicate to the committee that after consultation we have agreed to return at eight o'clock to the grouping of sections we were dealing with before this present grouping, beginning with section 74 and continuing that group. When we complete that group tonight or tomorrow we will call division I, sections 150 to 168 and division J, sections 169 to 180 and part 15, sections 220 to 244.

If these clean-up sections are completed we can return tomorrow to the grouping of sections we have been dealing with up to this moment, namely, 28, 30 and 31. On Monday next we can begin discussion on the capital gains section. I have already indicated the sections we will deal with under that heading—they are to be found at page 9251 of Hansard for November 2, 1971.

Mr. McCleave: This is the understanding which has been agreed upon as to the orderly disposal of the bill.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is our understanding also. Is it likewise clear that we shall go to the capital gains section on Monday, no matter where we are at six o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. MacEachen: Right.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the suggested program agreed to?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Chairman: Order. As the committee will recall, on Friday last the Chair raised a question as to the procedural acceptability of the motion proposed by the hon. member for Edmonton West to amend section 74. It might be helpful if at this point the Chair mentioned that at the time of the adjournment at six o'clock this evening it was agreed, by special arrangement made earlier this day, that the committee would proceed to the consideration of sections previously under consideration. If hon. members would like me to put them on the record, the sections the committee now has before it are 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 81, 126, 144, 145, 148, 149, 198, 199, 200 to 207, 248 to 252 and 254.

As I have said, when the committee last considered this grouping the hon. member for Edmonton West proposed an amendment to section 74 in respect of which amendment the Chair expressed some doubt as to its procedural acceptability. Unless other hon. members wish to be of assistance on the question of its procedural acceptability, the Chair is prepared to make a ruling now on the amendment.

I took under advisement the amendment moved last Friday by the hon. member for Edmonton West. The effect of the amendment, if passed, would be to shift the incidence of taxation from one taxpayer to another. It seems to me that it would little matter that the financial initiative of the Crown permits it to initiate a taxation proposal if it were then open to any hon. member to propose, by way of amendment, a different substantive scheme of his own. In his argument on the procedural aspect of the amendment, the hon. member for Edmonton West referred to the altering of the balance of ways and means. I indicated that my concern was whether the amendment would shift the incidence of taxation and later the hon. member for Edmonton West was kind enough to direct his remarks to that point.

At the outset I should mention that an alteration in the balance of ways and means has not been a factor in decisions made to date in this committee. It seems to me that in modern day practice it is impossible for any hon. member to move an amendment on a taxation matter that would not affect the balance of ways and means. If this were the only consideration to be applied in determining the procedural acceptability of a motion, I would think that in this day and age no motion could successfully pass the test. Here I should like to refer to Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, citation 268, and read it into the record:

> Though it is the function of the committee of ways and means to impose rather than to repeal taxes, example of the repeal of taxation effected in this committee are to be found upon the journals. Proposals for the variation or modification of taxation can therefore be made in the committee; but these proposals must be grafted upon the financial scheme submitted by the government, and must not affect the balance of ways and means voted for the service of the year. Amendments, therefore, can be proposed to substitute another tax, of equivalent amount, for that proposed by the government, as an alternative duty, the necessity of new taxation, to that extent, being already declared on behalf of the Crown.
> (2) An amendment proposing to substitute probate and legacy duty on real property, as an alternative for inhabited house duty imposed by resolution has been admitted.

• (8:10 p.m.)

Hon. members who are familiar with this citation will know that the authority quoted for that statement dates back to 1852 and 1853, and also the next statement, "See also similar proposal to substitute a duty on soap for a duty on newspapers". It seems to the Chair that the authority on which this citation is founded pre-dates confederation. I emphasize the latter part of the citation because it seems to me that it is an authority which must be of importance to us in considering the matter before us. That authority, in the latter part, reads as follows:

> According to modern practice such an amendment is out of order. Even if the exact equivalence in the amount of the yield could be guaranteed (which is manifestly impossible), the objective that the incidence of the tax proposed would be extended to persons previously exempt would be fatal to such an amendment.

On October 25, 1971, at page 9013 of Hansard, in considering the amendment then proposed by the hon. member for Portneuf I stated that the Chair must first preserve the principle of the financial initiative of the Crown. On two or three occasions during the proceedings on this bill the Chair accepted amendments which purported to reduce taxation across the board in a general way.

On those occasions citation 265, paragraph (1) of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition was used as an authority. On the other hand, the proposed amendments which have been disallowed by the Chair, including the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Portneuf, were proposals which on the one hand reduced taxation but which on the other hand attempted to shift the incidence of taxation. It was the latter aspect, in these cases, which the Chair was unable to reconcile with the principle of the financial initiative of the Crown as stated in paragraph 2 of citation 263 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition. That citation reads as follows:

> The principle that the sanction of the crown must be given to every grant of money drawn from the public revenue, applies equally to the taxation levied to provide that revenue. No motion can therefore be made to impose a tax, save by a minister of the Crown, unless such tax be in substitution, by way of equivalent, for taxation at that moment submitted to the consideration of Parliament; nor can the amount of a tax proposed on behalf of the Crown be augmented, nor any alteration made in the area of imposition. In like manner, no increase can be considered either of an existing, or of a new or temporary tax for the service of the year, except on the initiative of a minister, acting on behalf of the Crown; nor can a member other than a minister move for the introduction of a bill framed to effect a reduction of duties, which would incidentally effect the increase of an existing duty, or the imposition of a new tax, although the aggregate amount of imposition would be diminished by the provisions of the bill.

It seems to me that the hon. member's proposed amendment would inevitably shift the incidence of tax as between spouses and undoubtedly in many cases would increase the tax of one of the parties. I should like to assure the hon. member for Edmonton West that I have carefully reviewed the ruling of Mr. Speaker on December 11, 1969, as the hon. member asked me to do and to which he referred in his argument. With respect, that precedent is not analogous to the situation now before the committee. It seems to me that what the hon. member for Edmonton West attempted to do on that occasion was to introduce a flat fee basis for a transportation tax which would provide an equivalent return to and in lieu of the tax provided for in the bill.

In the case before the committee, I suggest no equivalency in return is being sought. But here again, as in the precedent cited, there would be a shifting of the incidence of taxation. In the case before us the hon. member would initiate or increase a tax for persons not now subject to tax. I realize, of course, that there would also be a decrease in taxes for other taxpayers. The decrease in total might well be greater than the increase. In any event, there is no suggestion that they would be equivalent. Having made the distinction, it seems to me I do not need to consider at this time whether the citation in May is based on a well founded precedent.

With respect to the comments of the hon. member for Peace River on the proposed amendment as it applies to subsection (5), it seems to me that the Crown has set forth in that subsection a proposal to impose taxation in certain cases. This is a statement of the financial initiative of the Crown. If the purpose of subsection (5) is to provide the Crown, through a minister, a method of imposing taxation in certain cases, it is open to an hon. member to make an across the board reduction in the rate of taxation, but it is not open to him to initiate a proposal which would shift the incidence of taxation which is implicit in the proposal of the Crown as set forth in subsection (5). For these reasons I must regretfully decline to put the motion moved by the hon. member for Edmonton West.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, of course I accept your ruling, although I am, if I may say so with respect, reserving my opinion with regard to its exact effect. With regard to whether Your Honour's ruling, I shall re-examine whether it conforms with the authorities, not Beauchesne—which I suggest is limited and somewhat dangerous on these particular points—but May where perhaps there are many authoritative sources of reference.

In any event, having established this point I will now look at the substance of the whole of section 74. My only regret in putting the amendment as I did is that I had not included subsection (4) of section 74 because that too is affected in part by the principle I am against. Outside of the fact that this has been a so-called rule—not quite from immemorial days because the Income Tax Act goes back to 1917 and I doubt very much whether this particular provision was one of those at that time—I wonder why in this day of changing social concepts with regard to this question, apart from, we might say, an ethereal sphere of abuse, there is the insistence at this point, with the consequences which I have raised, that in very legitimate cases for which the child care exemption, incidentally, was designed to provide, there is now to be a denial because of non-qualification or disentitlement under section 74(3) and the arguments I advanced the other day.

[The Chairman.]

• (8:20 p.m.)

I would like to hear from the parliamentary secretary, since the whole thing is back on the table for re-enactment, why there is this particular insistence or objection to the points that I have raised and why the government would disentitle those people whom I have enumerated from the benefits of the child care provisions and the workers allowance.

Mr. Mahoney: This question has been answered two or three times, obviously not to the satisfaction of the hon. member. The problem here involves opportunities for income splitting, which would not be equitable to taxpayers who are not self-employed and do not have that opportunity. In the opinion of the government it would be most unfair to open up this opportunity to self-employed people when it will be denied to people on salaries or wages.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): May I point out, with the greatest respect, that the parliamentary secretary is comparing apples with oranges. We are not concerned here with people who are employed by others. I find the answer absolutely incomprehensible. This is no case of a wife who is an employee of her husband who is an employee of someone else. Why bring these people into the act? It is totally irrelevant to compare these people with those who are self-employed.

Take the case of the person who is the principal owner of a limited company, no different from the man across the street in the same type of business. Yet in the one case the wife who comes to work for the business—quite legitimately so—will be allowed all the advantages under the Income Tax Act that I have pointed out, while if the business is not incorporated the law says that the wife is not only not considered as a separate taxpayer but she is not a worker and is not entitled either to child care benefit or to workers allowance.

If the parliamentary secretary can say that there is no justification for that comparison, then he is welcome to it, but these self-employed people whom I have mentioned are no different from the man who owns three shares which control the small company, the other share being held by the lawyer to make it a private corporation. Remember that some of them are getting the benefits, and the individual who works as an employee suffers because his wife cannot get these benefits. If she is working for someone else, she will certainly be getting the benefits whether she is working in a company or a private business. She will get these benefits so long as there is not this husband and wife relationship.

What is even more nonsensical, if they are not husband and wife but have a common law relationship—the woman is the man's mistress—she will be entitled to collect whether the business is incorporated or whether it is a sole ownership. There again I wonder why this particular advantage should be granted. Or is it that this time the state does go into the bedrooms, because it certainly has gone into the bedrooms and it vouches for the credentials.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, we have been discussing this point for some time. This is one reason why the bill has been discussed for so long. This is a matter that will mean a great deal to small businessmen. It is incomprehensible to me why the parliamentary secretary should say that this will open a great door to misuse and that these people will do something very bad. Let him go down and meet some of these people. They are not crooks; they are people who are interested in paying their own way and in being good citizens. Did he discuss this provision with any small businessmen? I wonder whether any discussions have been held with the people who are involved.

Earlier today we were talking about the basic herd concept with regard to agricultural matters and we found that not too much discussion had taken place with agricultural organizations. Here we have a similar situation. I cannot see why the government cannot give in a little once in a while and make it possible for the small businessman or the small farmer whose wife works hard to keep him in business and off the welfare rolls so that he can be independent and run his own show in our free enterprise system.

I cannot for the life of me see that this would make much difference to the amount of money that this government would take because, after all, if a man pays his wife a wage he cannot claim her as an income tax exemption. I cannot see any reason for the stubbornness of the government in not giving in on this small point which could be so important to a great many people.

Mr. Downey: I should like the parliamentary secretary to tell us the estimates of the department regarding the amount of revenue that this possible loophole would create. I am wondering how much research has gone into the preparation of this section. Was it the type of research that was so evident this morning when the hon. member for Crowfoot was discussing the basic herd concept and the parliamentary secretary, with the Minister of Finance and with all the high-priced help they have around them—as was pointed out so well this morning—had not looked into the simple matter of comparing the ranchers' situation in Canada with that of our friends south of the border who are our competitors?

We heard the parliamentary secretary tell the hon. member for Crowfoot to keep his ears open as well as his mouth, but ten minutes later he came back to apologize to the House for having made a mistake. I was wondering whether the same kind of thought and research had gone into the section which we are considering so far as concerns the amount of revenue that this supposed loophole would create. It was certainly adequately pointed out the other day that this is merely a piece of legislation on morality, or immorality if you prefer, which would not allow a man and his wife to work as a team and to adjust their income in any way they see fit, to their advantage. This is a very important concept and I would like the parliamentary secretary to come forward with some estimate. I would like to find out what the department has done with regard to revenue estimates.

• (8:30 p.m.)

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, the matter, as I explained a number of times on Friday and no doubt will have the opportunity to explain a number of times before this evening is over, is not one of revenue: it is a matter of equity. I suppose a casual observer of this procedure—particularly referring to the very active part the hon. member for Battle River took in the deliberations of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs—could not help but remark on the amount of time being devoted during this procedure to matters that are carried over verbatim from the old act and do not involve changes or reform at all. It is really quite interesting to me to witness this particular procedure.

However, the question in this case is not one of revenue at all. It is simply one of equity and of not—I know the hon. member for Edmonton West appreciates the point—affording to self-employed people an opportunity for income splitting that is not available to other taxpayers.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is a lot of nonsense.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, is there such a difference between employing one's wife, son or daughter in any business? I think that the point raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) is perfectly valid. Why should employing the son or the daughter be different from employing the wife in a business run by the husband? Then why not exempt from tax the wife on the same basis as the daughter, the son, the nephew, the niece or any other relative?

Where is the difference? I would like to hear the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney) tell us how one can manage to be fair in income tax matters.

The hon. member for Edmonton West was perfectly right to raise that point and the parliamentary secretary ought to consider it. Why does he not consider it?

[English]

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Chairman, I also want to ask a brief question of the parliamentary secretary, dealing with the same point. It appears that if there are two businesses operating side by side in a small town, and in each case the husband wants to employ his wife, her wages will not qualify as a business expense deduction for income tax purposes. But if two men decide to swap wives for business purposes, with each man hiring the other's wife, they will be money ahead because they can then have their wives file their own income tax returns. This is a ridiculous situation. I recognize that this is not a criticism of the legislation that is proposed but is a criticism of the law as it exists.

The government should give serious attention to this promotion of wife swapping for business purposes. It is an outrageous situation. I asked the parliamentary secretary a question the other day and he did not answer it. I asked him, was it correct that so far as the income tax laws are concerned the wife is really a nonentity. She is not considered as a human being when she works in her husband's store. She is in the class of a machine which fulfils a function but does not qualify for recognition as an employee. That is a very reprehensible kind of rule, one which any decent individual in a position of authority would be anxious to improve.

I would like some explanation from the parliamentary secretary of how he thinks this provision is more equitable. I cannot see anything equitable about it. It seems to me that in the interests of progress, of removing our income tax rules from the medieval era in which women were not recognized for their efforts, in order to modernize the situation and give the legislation a truly progressive appearance, this kind of simple change would go a long way toward that end. I wonder if I could have an answer from the parliamentary secretary.

I want to point out, Mr. Chairman, that the parliamentary secretary was not even listening to the question and has made no effort to get up and answer it. I would like an answer.

Mr. Mahoney: I did listen long enough to ascertain that it was entirely fatuous.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Chairman, the charming parliamentary secretary has reached a conclusion and I was prepared to listen to his reasoning until he introduced the word "equity." This is where he hung himself. The hon. member for Edmonton West gave a very telling example of what could happen with the section as it now stands. A small businessman can take advantage of the act of incorporation, with his wife playing an important part in the business and able to receive income. The businessman, through the devious means of incorporation, would be able to charge off his wife's wages in computing his income.

Here we are talking about a husband and wife situation. But let us deal with another situation to which this principle has equal importance, that of man and wife in a common law union. I ask the parliamentary secretary not to bring in the red herring of what is a common law union.

Mr. Mahoney: Give us the ground rules.

Mr. Alexander: You are the one who has to answer the questions. You are the one who is in government. I am throwing out these propositions in order to impress upon the parliamentary secretary that the use of the word "equity" was in error. A common law union is recognized in many instances in law as a valid union. I am not talking about paper and marriage certificates but about a union which is recognized in law. Reflecting upon the example given, the husband and wife involved in an incorporated company, and comparing that with the man and woman in a common law union, would the parliamentary secretary be prepared to admit that the word he used was wrong and that he should not have used the word "equity"? In fact, if he is going to talk about equity perhaps he should be amending that section to include the common law union.

I know that the government has wisdom, expertise and brains enough for its purpose with respect to this bill to defend it, and living under a common roof would be a good start. If we are to talk about equity, let us not be fatuous; let us be honest and change the section so that we have equity. As long as the situation remains as it is now, and as long as we and the parliamentary secretary can bring in the type of situation we have referred to, we can no longer talk about equity.

[Mr. Yewchuk.]

• (8:40 p.m.)

I would hope that the parliamentary secretary would use another word. I see the hon. member from St. Catharines wagging his tail and I don't know why.

An hon. Member: Because you are barking.

An hon. Member: That's a flipper; it isn't his tail.

Mr. Alexander: Maybe the problem is money rather than equity. Would the parliamentary secretary be prepared to say that he used the wrong word, or is he going to stick with what he says here and what he is giving to the Canadian people and say that this is a situation of equity?

An hon. Member: He doesn't understand it.

Mr. Mahoney: No, Mr. Chairman, I am not prepared to withdraw my suggestion that this is a question of equity. However, I think the government would be quite prepared to entertain any definition that the hon. member might care to propose—

Mr. Alexander: I gave you a start.

Mr. Mahoney: —anything which would place common law relationship in a position relatively comparable to the family unit in more conventional circumstances. So far, achievement of that objective has defied our ingenuity, but I am sure the hon. member would be able to advance suggestions.

Mr. Alexander: I am glad the parliamentary secretary dragged me into this debate by my heels, because I think he said it was beyond the government's ingenuity. That leaves me cold. As a matter of fact, it does not surprise me.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: I would suggest, in all sincerity, that working in concert and in a spirit of co-operation with all the brains and expertise there is on the other side of the House and with the co-operation of this side of the House, it might be wise to stand this section. I know we are not playing games, Mr. Chairman.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: There they go.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Chairman, I do not know who prevents members of the government from speaking. That is not my business, but I will have the opportunity to be on that side soon and I will find out. But surely when we try—

An hon. Member: Come on over.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Things are better over here.

Mr. Alexander: I will, any time you want to give up the reins of leadership. Your side of the House is extremely poor, so the Gallup poll says. We are prepared and have been prepared to take over. Let us get back to the subject. I was trying to make a good point. We have a responsibility here, gentlemen, and you are just wasting my time, your time and the time of the people of Canada.

Now that the parliamentary secretary is interested in equity, as we are, and is so interested in taking us under advisement, in a spirit of co-operation, and in view of the fact that he seems to have dug a hole from which he cannot escape, I ask humbly and in all sincerity—

An hon. Member: Don't overdo it.

Mr. Alexander: I am not overdoing it. Would the parliamentary secretary be prepared to say that I have a point? Would he be prepared to sit down and look into it further so that we might come up with an amicable and truly equitable solution? As he will not withdraw the word, would he be prepared to stand the section?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, it is not the hon. member whom I would take under advisement—I did that some time ago—it is his ideas that I would like to consider, since he obviously has been giving a great deal of thought to this question in the several days it has been under discussion in the House. As a prerequisite to his request for standing a particular section I think he might wish to outline in detail the extent to which his ideas have developed.

Mr. Ricard: Are you prepared to accept them?

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Chairman, I do not believe the parliamentary secretary is taking me or members on this side of the House very seriously.

An hon. Member: How can he?

Mr. Alexander: I am trying to show to him, in all sincerity and honesty, that what we have here is not equity.

An hon. Member: Right.

Mr. Alexander: If he is prepared to accept my argument, then rather than being facetious—

Mr. Mahoney: I was trying to take the hon. member seriously.

Mr. Alexander: I suggest that we should be serious and stand this section. The parliamentary secretary should not attempt to embarrass me by saying he would like to hear me develop my arguments. In the two or three examples which I gave, the parliamentary secretary should see that they show conclusively that there is no equity. If he is prepared to accept that, then I withdraw what I said about having him withdraw the word. Let us say there was some doubt, and I think there is. Would the parliamentary secretary be prepared to go that far? He is extremely difficult to convince but I know, Mr. Chairman, that he has compassion and understanding. I have seen him operate here in the past week and a half—

An hon. Member: Don't make us cry.

Mr. Alexander: —and when things become tough he is always prepared to say that we should stand this thing down and have another day to discuss it. I do not know why the parliamentary secretary cannot at least give us that courtesy. This section bothers members on both sides of the House, and notwithstanding the fact that those on the government side have not spoken I know they are as sincere as we are. All we want is an opportunity to look into it further and see if we cannot work out a solution which we can call equitable. We may fail, but at least we would have given it the old college try. That is all I am asking and this is the last time I shall be on my feet regarding this matter. If the parliamentary secretary has at least some doubt he will agree we must stand it down until we look into it further. That is all I ask.

Mr. Paproski: He had a heart when he was an ordinary member, but not any more.

Mr. Thompson: He never had it then, either.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I think I raised this matter originally about seven or eight days ago, and I am surprised that the government has decided, in the glowing words of the Prime Minister, that sex should be kept out of the bedrooms of the nation but it should not be kept out of the income tax law. I think members of the committee, including the parliamentary secretary, will recall that I said that the law which we have is so much hypocritical boloney, and I gather that the answer the hon. member for Hamilton West received tonight simply reinforces that point.

I shall make my points briefly. All we were trying to do in the opposition, and all we are trying to do now in regard to the amendment of the hon. member for Edmonton West, is to bring a little justice into the lives of very small people. These small people, in a sense, are the backbone of Canada, if you want to equate us with a nation of small people instead of large people and will a people who are prepared to work miserably long hours for miserably small returns and not feel that there is any economic bondage or servitude attached to that work.

The fact is that the section the hon. member for Edmonton West is trying to remove through his amendment is holding in servitude those people who earn less than $4,000 a year. It is as simple as that. I spoke a couple of days ago on this matter. I spoke on joint incomes—not on individual incomes but on joint incomes—which together come to less than $3,650 a year. We cannot bring justice to that group by passing the law as it is, yet the government's and the parliamentary secretary's intransigence prevent justice and the benefits of income tax reform being available to all Canadians.

We have somehow drawn a great big line and said that when two people live together and are married—and circumstances might be different if they were not married, but I will not go into that situation at this point; I will talk strictly on the amendment—and run a little business that does not earn enough to make it worth their while to incorporate, they will not get justice from the Parliament of Canada.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. McCleave: Is that something we can be proud of? Can we hold our heads high? When I go home and talk to my kids I can say that if I have done nothing else this week, at least I have tried to do something in this area. I am not sure that we shall be successful, but at least I can hold my head high. At least the hon. member for Hamilton West and others on this side of the House can say, "We tried." However, since it is difficult to administer section 74(5) of the Income Tax Act we must all bow our heads before the great god of efficiency and say "On division" when we are asked to pass this subsection.

I submit that the failure, in the circumstances I have outlined, to give tax relief is a criminal abuse of responsibility. If we had any guts at all we would stand this section. The parliamentary secretary told me last week—I say this in all justice to him—that this is a matter that has bothered the income tax people for years and years and they were asking for a solution. If it bothers them that much, let us stand this section for another couple of weeks, pass everything else in the bill before us, in this 5-pound package of cure-all, and give people a chance to work on it We should tell some bright soul to work on this question on a 24-hour basis until he can come up with a hard answer. If we do not do that, we are not worth our salt as parliamentarians.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words on this issue. Members of the opposition have made a heart-rending plea for this section to be stood and to let somebody work on it on a 24-hour basis until a solution is found.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kaplan: It may be that this problem came to the attention of certain hon. members just this afternoon even though they were active members on the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs at the time these problems were considered.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): But they were not considered.

Mr. Kaplan: If they were not considered—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): They were not considered.

Mr. Kaplan: —I ask whether hon. members opposite felt that they had general responsibility to discuss this matter as long ago as 1952 or 1953 when this provision was first introduced into the act.

Mr. McCleave: Let us discuss it as it now is.

Mr. Kaplan: It has been alleged that the government's failure to propose some sort of solution to the problem constitutes a criminal abuse of responsibility. What about the responsibility of the opposition? They are not proposing a solution.

Mr. McCleave: Yes, they are.

Mr. Kaplan: So far as I have heard, they are not offering any formula for dealing with the very real problem of income splitting, which I admit raises problems of equity. I grant that there are inequities in the administration of the Income Tax Act. It is not a divine law, far from it. We all know that. But do opposition members honestly feel that if another 24 hours were spent on this section we would come forward with any solution?

The same argument applies to the other matter they have raised about the backbone of our country. I admit that there is a problem in the area of people who are living common law. I wish there were some way to define the common law relationship so that it would be possible to give extra exemptions and benefits to people living in that state. But how is that to be done?

An hon. Member: You are against those people.

Mr. Kaplan: The hon. member for Hamilton West has suggested that if we had any heart we would stand this section for another 48 hours and consider the matter. Does he think that in another 48 hours we could solve a problem that people have been thinking about for two decades without being able to solve? I do not think a further 48 hours will make much difference. I think people who suggest this are building up false hopes—

The Chairman: Order, please. Is the hon. member for Athabasca seeking the floor?

Mr. Yewchuk: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman. I thought the hon. member for Don Valley had concluded his remarks. I wanted to speak. However, since he still has the floor I will say no more.

The Chairman: It was obvious to the Chair that the hon. member still wanted to speak. With respect, I think another hon. member should not seek the floor until the hon. member speaking has finished.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Chairman, I should be glad to hear from the hon. member.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Athabasca.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Don Valley has accused the opposition of not coming forward with a solution. Obviously, he did not listen to what hon. members said during the past hour or so. It is equally clear from the answer the parliamentary secretary gave me that he was not listening either. He suggested that if you ask a fatuous question you will get a fatuous answer. I therefore want to explain in a little more detail, for the benefit of those on the other side of the House who have not been listening, what the situation is and what the solution ought to be. I hope they will co-operate.

The situation is this. If a man employs his wife, the tax structure penalizes him in that the wife cannot fill out a separate income tax return and declare her own income. She can only do that if she works for someone other than her husband. Let me give an example of what I mean. I will use round figures to make this simple. Suppose there are two businesses operating and they are across the street from each other. Let us say that they are not incorporated and that each business brings in a taxable income of $25,000 a year. In one case let us say that a man employs his wife and pays her a salary of $5,000 a year. You would expect that he would pay taxes on $20,000 and that she, in theory, would pay tax on the $5,000 that she has earned. However, the husband must complete his return to show that his income is $25,000. This means that the tax on the wife's $5,000, the income that is added to his income, is in the 50 per cent bracket.

Let us now suppose that through agreement these two businessmen employ the other's wife in their business. When those wives fill in their income tax returns they will pay income tax at the rate of 15 per cent or 17 per cent, or whatever the case may be, on the $5,000 they earned. In each case there is a saving to the business of over $1,000. It is easy to see that this kind of provision has not been included in the legislation.

Mr. Horner: The government is not concerned about equity.

Mr. McCleave: Nor with tax reform.

Mr. Yewchuk: Why is that so? Would the parliamentary secretary explain it to me? I am not an expert on taxes—but I am greatly concerned about the ordinary man who is trying to make a living, and about his wife who may be interested in helping him get ahead and make progress—

An hon. Member: In a family enterprise.

Mr. Yewchuk: —in a family enterprise. Why does he think it is more equitable to make the woman who prefers to work for her husband pay tax of 50 per cent rather than 15 or 17 per cent, the rate which would apply in the example I have used? I do not think there is anything fatuous about that question.

• (9:00 p.m.)

Mr. Horner: Mr. Chairman, I rose rather slowly. I expected the parliamentary secretary to rise and answer the very clear, straight-forward question posed by the hon. member for Athabasca. The government worked for two or three years on this legislation. It brought in a white paper which was debated across the country. The main theme of it was equity. In fact, the whole concept of it was equity. The Minister of Finance has taken little part in this debate. Can he not understand it? Can he not defend this bill? I pose those two questions. Why is he not defending the equity that he so proudly boasted was the concept and purpose of the white paper?

Why could we not have a simple answer to the question posed by the hon. member for Athabasca? It was a simple, fair question. Where is this government that has concern for the average man? In 1968 they campaigned across Canada. They said there would be a just society for every man, woman and child, no matter what their financial status might be. The government has now dragged out the worn-out phrase that it is administratively difficult. Have they not heard of the computer? You feed in a question and you get an answer.

Mr. Mahoney: Is that the way it works?

Mr. Horner: We are now getting a smart remark from the parliamentary secretary. They tried to project the administrative impossibility after the grain stabilization bill. That is an amazingly weak case they are building. When the minister in charge of the grain stabilization bill appeared before the Standing Committee on Agriculture he said it would cost $1.5 million a year to administer the program. Where can they stand on this question of administrative impossibility?

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member will agree that his last remarks do not relate to the section before the committee. His opening remarks were preliminary but he is now referring to another piece of legislation that was before the House. I do not think it relates to the bill before us and the sections being studied.

Mr. McCleave: I rise to speak on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I and my colleagues would like to more fully understand the purport of Your Honour's ruling. Section 74(5) reads:

> Where a husband and wife were partners in a business, the income of one spouse from the business for a taxation year may, in the discretion of the minister, be deemed to belong to the other spouse.

In the preceding section we were dealing with husband and wife businesses which are not incorporated and where income is deemed to be joint in the hands of one person or another. I think this is what the hon. member for Crowfoot was talking about. If I and my party are wrong on that, we should have some elucidation. This is an important principle. We thought we were squarely within the subsections of section 74.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I do not think the hon. member can ask the Chair to interpret the remarks of the hon. member in relation to a subsection which is being studied at this time. It was the impression of the Chair that the hon. member was referring to another piece of legislation. Perhaps I misunderstood.

In any event, the Chair has to make its own decision. I invite hon. members to stay as close as possible to the debate on the section before the committee. That is the only way the committee can make progress on this legislation. The hon. member for Crowfoot.

Mr. Horner: I think the hon. member for Don Valley is rising on the point of order. We want to kill as much time as possible. Let's hear him out.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The Chair intervened to interrupt the hon. member for Crowfoot. If the hon. member for Crowfoot wants to complete his remarks, he may do so. It was not the impression of the Chair that the member for Don Valley was rising on a point of order.

Mr. Kaplan: I am not rising on a point of order, Mr. Chairman; I want to continue the debate.

Mr. Horner: Then I still have the floor. The hon. member for Don Valley has contributed much to the debate. There will be ample time for him to contribute and lend his wisdom to the debate when I have completed my brief remarks on section 74(5) with regard to unincorporated small businesses. I was dealing with the situation that was outlined very clearly by the member for Athabasca. Since that time the Minister of Finance has entered the chamber. He has not witnessed much of the debate and has contributed very little to it.

Mr. Benson: You, too.

Mr. Horner: Well! We have a brilliant remark from the Minister of Finance. The minister wants to have this legislation passed by Christmas. A few more remarks like that and it may be next Christmas.

Mr. Benson: Are you threatening Parliament?

Mr. Horner: Am I threatening Parliament?

Mr. Benson: Yes.

Mr. Horner: I am trying to elicit a sensible comment from the Minister of Finance. Who am I, a lonely backbencher in the opposition, to threaten Parliament? How could I threaten Parliament? That was a ridiculous remark by the Minister of Finance. He could not threaten me with anything.

I was referring to the clear and simple example stated by the member for Athabasca. He referred to two businesses operating across the street from one another. Both were earning in the neighbourhood of $25,000. The wives worked for their husbands. The husbands could not deduct their wives' wages. They each have to pay income tax on $25,000. If they exchanged the work of the wives and paid them accordingly, they could each claim a deduction of $5,000. I am not explaining it as well as the member for Athabasca. I could take more time but I want to hear the reply of the Minister of Finance. He has now entered the Chamber and has shown a preparedness to make a contribution.

Before the Minister of Finance entered the chamber I said that he went across the country with the white paper. He said that equity was the principle of tax reform, to bring about equity was its purpose. The hon. member for Athabasca suggested that section 74(5) would not bring about equity for an unincorporated, small business. Surely the Minister of Finance cannot stand on the defence that it is administratively difficult or that it is not administratively efficient. We have had many things that are not administratively efficient, one of them being the Canada Pension Plan. Medicare may be another.

I referred to the grains stabilization bill but before I could get the words out of my mouth Your Honour cut me off in a way that suggested I should not get into that question. Far be it from me to get into a debate on that matter. The government admitted that the administrative costs would amount to $1½ million.

The Deputy Chairman: Again I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member but I must remind all members that the committee is dealing with specifics. This is not the time for hon. members to engage in general debate. I realize that hon. members may have all kinds of opinions as far as these subjects are concerned, with respect to which hon. members might wish to question the policies of the government. The purpose of the intervention by the Chair is to help hon. members and to help the committee.

Mr. Horner: I assure you, Mr. Chairman, that I shall not refer again to the grain stabilization bill. I had no intention of taking part in this debate until I heard the example set forth so clearly by the hon. member for Athabasca. The parliamentary secretary would not rise and say yes or no. It was a simple question. This bill is presented on the basis of equity. The hon. member for Athabasca showed that there were inequities produced by this legislation.

After I had risen the Minister of Finance suggested I had threatened the committee. I am surprised, Mr. Chairman, that you did not rise to caution him that this was not parliamentary language. I said, "Answer the problem. Answer the equation set forth by the hon. member for Athabasca."

[Mr. Horner.]

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Wait until you get the "blues."

Mr. Horner: Only cabinet ministers and the parliamentary secretaries get the "blues," Joe. You and I don't.

Mr. Barrett: Oh, you may soon, when you take over from Baldwin.

Mr. McCleave: The whole country gets Benson's blues.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: Yes, the whole country suffers from Benson's blues. While I am speaking about the Minister of Finance may I say there have been rumours around that he is not going to run again, that he does not want to face the people after this tax bill. I do not know whether there is any truth in these rumours, but there are rumours that he will not run in the next election and that the Liberals will not have him as Minister of Finance after the next election, on any basis.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I do not wish to intervene unduly in the debate, but I think the hon. member should try to co-operate as much as possible. The committee is studying one specific section of this legislation and the Chair invites the co-operation of hon. members. I am sure the hon. member for Crowfoot would not want other members of the committee to disregard directions from the Chair, so I hope, again, he will accept my invitation to address himself to the section before us.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. I will simply say that the hon. member opposite has tried to inpute motives to me. I have no motives. I am in favour of having good tax legislation in Canada, the best we can possibly have. I like to listen to members such as the hon. member who has the floor. I will simply say that what he says is not relevant; it does not mean very much. He tries to shout very loud and it is often said to me that people who shout loudly really do not have much of an argument.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Here again, the Chair must say that this is not a question of privilege. These are only matters of opinion. I think the hon. member for Crowfood should be allowed to complete his remarks.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Chairman, I apologize. I did not intend to get into this debate.

Mr. Faulkner: I have heard that one before.

Mr. Horner: Somebody said, "I have heard that before". I did not intend to impute any kind of motive to the Minister of Finance but I heard the remark he made imputing motives to me, first, and Hansard will bear me out. He felt I had no right to reply, no right to retort. I say the Liberal party will not have him as Minister of Finance when they go to the people in the next election because they cannot go to the people with this bill, a bill which is full of inequity, including this section 74(5).

The hon. member for Athabasca posed a simple question in a sensible, pleasant, quiet manner, one which exemplifies the character of the hon. member.

Mr. Paproski: And of our party.

Mr. Horner: But the smug parliamentary secretary is afflicted with the dreaded disease of tunnel vision.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Horner: I see you frown at me, Mr. Chairman, and wonder what this disease is. Perhaps I might be allowed to explain. Tunnel vision comes to those who have risen to such a position so important that they see only straight ahead; they do not see to the sides.

Mr. Benson: On a point of order—

Mr. Horner: This tends to bring about a narrow view—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The Minister of Finance.

Mr. Benson: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I think the comments of the hon. member for Crowfoot have little to do with our debate. If he wants to criticize individuals he can do so outside the House. I do not think he should impute motives to the parliamentary secretary, to myself or to other members of the House. I respect the hon. member very much. I have always listened to his point of view and I think the government has listened to his point of view. We may not agree, but on a point of order I think he is not right in doing what he is doing.

The Deputy Chairman: The Chair is finding itself in a difficult position. Points of order are being raised which are not points of order. Hon. members are aware that the rules of the House can only be effective if they are respected by those who participate in the debates. They too have a responsibility for maintaining order in the Chamber.

• (9:20 p.m.)

I do not think we will make much progress by having these exchanges between members on one side and the other. I would invite hon. members to assume their responsibilities and to maintain the standard of debate in this House. The hon. member for Crowfoot.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Chairman, I do not feel very good about the degeneration of the debate. The exchanges between the Minister of Finance and myself lend nothing to the debate, I agree, and I find the situation regrettable.

Mr. Benson: Very well. Then talk about the bill.

Mr. Horner: I am quite upset by this situation. The minister again interjects and tells me to talk about the bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: I intend to talk about the bill. I intend to talk about the bill for as long as I can or until the minister or his parliamentary secretary assure me that the question raised by the hon. member for Athabasca will be answered. Both the minister and his parliamentary secretary sit in their seats without answering the question. This is why I rose and said the question needed answering.

We are debating equity. We are debating the concept contained in the white paper. This bill is a by-product of the white paper and the discussion on the white paper. If we cannot get an answer in the House of Commons to a simple question, then where can we get an answer? If we cannot get an answer in committee of the whole, with the tax experts before the representatives of the people, then where can we get an answer in a representative democracy?

Mr. Thompson: Do not call them experts.

Mr. Horner: I am being kind and perhaps the good Lord above will forgive me for being too kind, but one has to be generous in this business. Since the amendment of the hon. member for Edmonton West has been ruled out of order, surely the Minister of Finance and his parliamentary secretary can admit that there is a train of thought here that leaves a doubt in the minds of many citizens and should be resolved.

I want to see clause 74 pass as quickly as possible so we cam make progress, but in order to make progress we must have answers. That is a simple fact of life in a democratic society. In a totalitarian state where rule is autocratic, no one gets any answers; but in a democracy we should get answers, particularly when this House is in committee of the whole and the minister's two tax experts are before the people's representatives.

I shall say no more at this time, but I hope that the Minister of Finance or his parliamentary secretary answer the simple question put by the hon. member for Athabasca and answer it in a straightforward manner. Then I am sure we will make some progress. But if we start indulging in cat-calling we will never make progress, and I regret the Minister of Finance involved me in this sort of thing.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I should like to note for those who are statistically interested that we started discussion on this particular section at 2.45 on Friday afternoon and carried it forward until four o'clock. We have been dealing for almost an hour and a half with the same section, which is a carry-over from the previous bill—

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

Mr. Mahoney: I answered this specific question twice on Friday.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond on a point of order.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, the Chair has been very quick this evening to call to order members on this side of the House. If the parliamentary secretary is going to start lecturing the committee on the time spent on sections of the bill, I think it is the duty of the Chair to call his attention to the fact that he himself is out of order.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The Chair appreciates the remarks of the hon. member and has nothing to add.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, as I was saying, this is a provision that has been carried forward from the existing legislation and does not involve any change or reform. The particular question posed by the hon. member for Athabasca was asked a number of times on Friday and he will find it answered at pages 9385 and 9386 of Hansard. I have answered the question twice already tonight, I note from my "blues". I do not know on which page my answers will appear in today's Hansard; however, I would be delighted to send him the page references as soon as it is published.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Those answers are wrong.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I think the obvious riposte that comes to any sensible person on this side of the House is: No matter what the answer is, is it government policy? If it is, is it going to be changed? Whether this policy has existed for 10, 20 or 30 years, is it policy that is not capable of change? Are we stuck with the law of the Medes and the Persians which varies not and oppresses forever? That is really the essence of the question of the hon. member for Athabasca and the hon. member for Crowfoot. Before I died at the hands of the Canadian Press at three o'clock last Tuesday afternoon I can remember asking that question myself.

No matter what the law is, is it fair or unfair? The Minister of Finance is now in the committee and I would direct the question to him specifically so as not to waste time beating about the bush. The parliamentary secretary is simply trying to shore-up injustice or explain it away. I ask the Minister of Finance this question: Has the government reconsidered the position of husbands and wives within the framework of section 74 of the proposed Income Tax Act?

If it has, has the government decided that the old law should be carried on, or is it prepared, in light of some of the vigorous representations that have been made—though some of them were presented mildly and clemently, as in my case—to look again at the situation? Those are questions that I hope the Minister of Finance will answer. I do not want to hear the old phonograph record played back by the parliamentary secretary; let me hear the voice of the government speaking to this matter.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, I would simply say that this is a very difficult problem with regard to which I have a great deal of sympathy. However, there is no way to deal with it unless you move to a family unit concept of taxation, and the government has freely admitted it is not prepared to so move. The reason is that it does not know what would happen and has not looked it through far enough. We admit that it might be possible to resolve the problem if we were to move to a family unit concept, but we are not prepared to do so because we do not know all the implications of such a move or whether we would be able to look at it in the future.

I said in my white paper and also in my coloured paper that was published afterwards that we wanted to study the problem further and deal with it some time in the future. I do not know how to deal with it at the present time, but I would very much like to hear some suggestions from hon. members opposite as to how to deal with the problem without creating great loopholes in the taxation system as presently constituted.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word or two on this question of administrative convenience. This is a concept that it is unpleasant for a government to put forward as a defence but I think one or two things can be said for it and perhaps should be said at this time. I should like to remind hon. members opposite that when the white paper was first introduced—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Benson: He has 20 minutes too.

Mr. Kaplan: —objections were taken to the capital gains proposal. I cannot remember whether it was the hon. member for Edmonton West or the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants who said that this was a proposal that would make this country into a nation of thieves or tax evaders. Because how would the government know whether a capital gain had been realized until it was reflected in an income tax return? There would be an irresistible temptation to exclude it when reporting tax.

Mr. MacInnis: A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond on a point of order.

• (9:30 p.m.)

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, my point of order arises from the fact that no member of this House can get up and interpret remarks of someone on the other side of the House and put that forward as being—

Mr. Mahoney: Certainly you can't.

An hon. Member: Old blabbermouth is at it again.

The Deputy Chairman: Will the hon. member state his point of order?

Mr. MacInnis: I have made my point of order, but the yakking from the other side of the House is something I do not have to put up with. I can stand here all evening. If it is killing time they want, I am prepared to co-operate. No member of this House, whether or not he had expert advice over the dinner hour, can interpret the remarks of hon. members on this side of the House.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, in spite of the filibuster going on on the other side of the House members on this side have a right to say something. We are equal in this House and if we try to interpret what others are doing we have every right to do this, as my hon. friend has a right to interpret what members on this side say. It is a matter of debate. If there is to be a filibuster in this House, bear in mind that members on this side have every right to participate.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The point made by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond would seem to me to involve a restriction on the rules to prevent members commenting. I did not see the point he seeks to make. It is difficult for the Chair to judge. I had the impression that the hon. member for Don Valley was more or less making a very general statement.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, further on this same point of order and on the point of order raised by the minister, I would draw your attention to the fact that the hon. member for Don Valley was interpreting the remarks of hon. members on this side of the House. To my knowledge, members on this side of the House are only trying to interpret the legislation and are seeking explanation from the government in order to arrive at a proper interpretation. Therefore, a member on the government side should not stand up and place his own interpretation on the remarks made on this side of the House, whether he or we had expert advice over the dinner hour.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I do not think the hon. member has a point of order. He is opening the debate further at this time. It is already difficult enough for the Chair to keep the debate within the confines of the bill and relate it to the sections which are being studied. I would ask for the co-operation of all hon. members. I am not passing judgment on the interpretation of hon. members on either side concerning how far they can go in this debate, but so far as the Chair is concerned the hon. member for Don Valley was close to the subject and no further away than other members.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, the minister referred to my remarks and I would ask him if on Monday next he would make available to me—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member should not ask a question of the minister because he did not have the floor. He rose on a point of order when the hon. member for Don Valley was speaking. The floor belongs to the hon. member for Don Valley unless the hon. member has another point of order to raise.

Mr. MacInnis: The point or order arises from the co-operation made available to members of this House. I ask the minister this question, with regard to his point of order: On Monday next will he make the tax experts available to me over the dinner hour?

Mr. Benson: Any time. You need lots of experts.

Mr. MacInnis: Thank you.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. MacInnis: I hope you get—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sure the hon. member knows that this is not a point of order. He could have asked such a question at any other time. The hon. member for Don Valley.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Chairman, I was seeking to develop a concept of administrative convenience. I was using the analogy of the property of the taxpayer with a small capital gain. It is quite true that if a taxpayer has a small capital gain it is very tempting not to include it in his income. The point, however, that this might create a temptation to evade taxation is well taken. The answer finally put forward in the revised tax bill is that the ceiling for capital gains was raised so that 90 per.cent of the capital gains—

An hon. Member: What section is that?

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Chairman, I said—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I would hope the hon. member would try as much as possible to co-operate with the Chair and the committee and relate as quickly as possible his comments to the section before us. The hon. member is opening debate on the question of capital gains. Although we are looking at a very specific section, he has taken advantage of an answer that was given by the minister to the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants and has pursued it a little too far so far as the Chair is concerned. I think he should return to the subject matter before the committee.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Chairman, the example I gave illustrates that the imposition of an arbitrary floor on that kind of exemption is an administrative convenience which works for the benefit of the taxpayer as it does for the revenue department. The temptation is removed, the consideration of eligibility is removed, and so on.

I developed that illustration because I think exactly the same principle applies to the question of income splitting between husband and wife. In effect, this bill and its provisions provide a floor on the splitting of income between husbands and wives. It will help to prevent taxpayers seeking tax avoidance. It will make it convenient for them and it will remove the consideration of determining what the appropriate income for the spouse is—and the spouse might as well be husband as wife—how many hours the spouse actually devoted to the business and what benefit the business achieved from those services. This is a simple instrument of administrative convenience with an element of equity. In the broadest sense it provides equity.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I think it was long back that I raised the question originally or that the Minister of Finance raised the question with me. He asked what we on this side would do. The answer simply is that we would have accepted the amendment presented by the hon. member for Edmonton West. However, that issue is finished and he wants an answer. I say simply that what the government apparently has decided to do is to consider husband-wife transactions. Probably the amount of income tax that one could raise from that source would be very small.

I do not know how many husbands and wives would be in what I called earlier the mamma and papa proposition. On average, the type of transaction set forth in this section could not be too common. I would suspect the amount of revenue we are dealing with is under a couple of million dollars a year. For that we have taken the extraordinary step of condemning husband and wives to economic servitude as a unit. I do not think there is any common sense in the measure that was passed before. I do not know what Prime Minister was in office when it was passed. I am not pointing blame in that direction. All I do is look around and ask, why cannot we do better than this? Why can we not put a little sense into the laws that will not cause any problem to the national revenue department but will make life a little easier for people who run a business?

As I have said before—and I can prove it—these are businesses which on average earn less than $3,650 a year. That is not much of a return when one thinks of the return of the great taxpayers of the country. I do not think the country gets much revenue as a result of keeping this type of provision in the law and I do not think we get much of an answer when it is said that it is administratively difficult to change the law. I am sure that it is administratively difficult to change anything.

• (9:40 p.m.)

Heavens above, a thought came to my mind but I suppose I should not follow it up. The point I make is that we hit the small people with this, yet we could take some of the load off their shoulders. We will not take anything great from the national revenue and I really cannot see why the government does not at least take a second look at the situation and try to do something about it. I would hope that that would be the case.

Mr. Kaplan: I judge that my earlier argument did not find much sympathy on the other side of the House. Let me try one other. There is no spouse in this country who does not contribute in some measure to her husband's earning process, whether he is on salary, whether he himself is employed or whether he is the owner of a business. If they live together and love each other and if they work together, she does something to contribute to his income-earning process, and this even applies to Members of Parliament—in fact, particularly to Members of Parliament.

If that self-evident fact is conceded in the House, then we come to the question of where to draw the line. Are they not arguing, then, on the basis of equity for an extra deduction for everybody who is married, because whether you are on salary, whether you own your business, whether or not it is incorporated, whether you work in the city or in the country, if your wife contributes to your income-earning process why should she not get a deduction for it? Then we come back to the point that I made earlier. If we do not put a floor on the deduction which we will permit, which is in effect what we do through the requirement for incorporation, we get everybody into this act justifying deductions.

We would expect our bureaucrats, the employees in the Department of National Revenue, to look into every one of these relationships, to assess it and determine whether or not some benefit is justified, what the value of the benefit is per hour, how many hours are spent and what result is achieved. These are all questions that I think hon. members, however much they would like to see this deduction, must surely admit defeat the equity of their proposal.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, the problem is certainly one of equity under section 74(5). We are trying to find a solution, along with the government, to a very troublesome problem. The income group that we are talking about is not composed of the $25,000 a year man; they are not Members of Parliament and their wives but they are the small people who are running little entrepreneur businesses such as hot dog stands and small fruit stands where the husband and wife are of necessity forced into 24-hour service to the public. They have little or no savings with which to buy into the Canada Pension Plan which, everyone will admit, has some merit. They are not able to benefit from the Canada Pension Plan because, in a great many cases, between the two of them they do not have $800 clear profit from their small business. They are eating off their own hot dog stand and they are feeding their children fish and chips out of the family bin. Those are the people about whom we are worried and for whom we want equity. They are in the thousands.

[Mr. McCleave.]

Look at the figures of Statistics Canada and you will find how many thousands of people in Canada have an income of between $3,000 and $5,000 a year which today, according to Canadian standards, is below the poverty level. Those are the people about whom we are worried. They do not benefit from the Canada Pension Plan but they are under the aegis of this act. They pay very small income tax, if any, it is true. But when you have a net income of $3,600 a year an extra $100 in income tax constitutes a serious problem. It may mean nothing to the $30,000 a year man. Perhaps he can afford to pay 46 per cent of his income to the three levels of government, but when you are below $5,000 a year and with a family you cannot afford to pay taxes of any kind to anybody.

This is the small but very significant group of people about whom we are worried, and sarcasm will not help nor will comments back and forth across the House. Passing this 707-page document will not help them either. Under section 74 (5) we have an opportunity to pool our common sense, if any, and to come up with a sensible, agreeable and equitable amendment. I assure you that it would not take ten minutes to receive approval from the House. There would be unanimous consent from this side of the House if the government gave some kind of relief to this group of people earning between $3,000 and $5,000 a year. It is these people, who have no net profit and who cannot benefit from the Canada Pension Plan, about whom we are worried. We have a problem here.

There is no one in the galleries and I do not suppose the press will bother to put this in the papers, but the members of this party are worried about the problem. I have been sitting here during the debate of the last two or three days and most of the remarks I have made have been relevant. None of them has been sarcastic and I hope some of them have been to the point. The people of Canada are fed up with the time we are wasting here at $25,500 apiece per year, plus expenses. We sit around here and waste the time of the country on a document which, it is admitted, needs more than 100 amendments. Let us on this side of the House who have the interest of the small people at heart get together and put forward an amendment.

Do you have all the wisdom over there? Let us have a bit of co-operation. Let us have some participatory democracy. I myself did not come from the upper class. I came from the working class and I have achieved this pre-eminence in the House through the support of people who now ask me, "What have you accomplished?" We have absolutely nothing in the way of co-operation from the other side of the House in respect of Bill C-259. Personally, I am ashamed of myself but I am not nearly as ashamed of myself as I am of sitting here with 150 government members who are not budging one inch. All we hear from them is sarcasm and loud remarks. I would have thought that in the great Liberal Party two or three members would have had the courage to say that perhaps there is something in what we say.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Horner: The hon. member for Don Valley was on his feet, Mr. Chairman, and we were prepared to let him speak. If he does not want to speak, a member on this side of the House is ready to do so.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, do not close your eyes to what is happening in the committee.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Chairman, I hesitate to speak again because of the poor reception my remarks received on a previous occasion, but there is one point that I believe has not been emphasized sufficiently with regard to the implications of section 74(5). I am referring in particular to the exemption that a working mother can now claim in respect of her children. If a married woman is a wage earner she can receive exemptions, which in essence are benefits, when computing her income tax. But if she is working for her husband, under the provisions of section 74(5) she may not be able to claim her wages as an exemption. I agree that this is a debatable question, but she also loses out through not being able to claim exemptions for care for her children.

A second look must be taken at this matter. In answer to some of the questions I asked, the parliamentary secretary said that this provision is the same as in the old Income Tax Act and has been in the legislation for years and years. But, Mr. Chairman, there is a provision in this bill whereby working mothers can claim exemptions when they hire what in essence are caretakers to look after their children. A working mother can claim so much per child as an expense when she hires a caretaker. This changes the complexion of section 75(5) to some extent from that contained in the old Income Tax Act.

In our society we have gone to great lengths to educate men and women. Up until now the Income Tax Act has encouraged highly skilled, married women to stay at home. As a result we lose the benefit of the money spent on providing them with their skills. Now this bill encourages those people to contribute to society through the use of their skills, and I wholeheartedly thank the minister, his parliamentary secretary and those involved in drawing up the bill for providing a basic exemption on a per child basis for day care. This may be claimed by a working mother or a working widow.

Our argument concerns the husband and wife situation. If they are in an unincorporated partnership the wife cannot claim the child care exemptions provided in this bill. But if their business is incorporated the husband can pay his wife a salary and she can get the basic exemption for child care expenses. Also, she can contribute to the Canada Pension Plan and become eligible for unemployment insurance. The question is: Are we striving for equity? Is it good enough to say that it is too complicated to achieve? I see the hon. member for Don Valley shakes his head negatively. That is not good enough for him, and it is not good enough for me.

Mr. Kaplan: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I would be reluctant to give the committee the impression that I agreed with anything that the hon. member just said.

Mr. Horner: I did not hear the hon. member, but it is not important. The whole purpose of the bill is to create equity. If the business is incorporated, the wife can claim the exemption. If it is not incorporated, she cannot enjoy many of the benefits that the bill will provide. This bill is providing for forced incorporation of small business, of the small, corner grocery store, the small laundry or drugstore, in the same way as it provides for forced incorporation of farming operations. Are we attempting to destroy family enterprise? Is that the aim? Through this legislation are we attempting to destroy family enterprise in the running of the corner grocery store, the delicatessen, the laundromat and the drugstore? Is this the purpose of the legislation?

Mr. Mahoney: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Horner: Is this the aim, just as it is the attempt to destroy the small family farm? Does the government really mean to destroy family enterprise? These are the questions Canadians will ask all across the country. Having listened to the hon. member for Athabasca and to many other hon. members who have asked questions about this section, I can only conclude that that is the intention of the government.

Mr. Kaplan: Then vote against it.

Mr. Horner: It is a regrettable situation. I did not hear that remark, so I will ignore it. I would not want to accuse the hon. member of having tunnel vision once again.

Mr. Kaplan: I can live with your accusations.

Mr. Horner: That is a clear symptom of one afflicted with the dreaded disease of tunnel vision. I see it is ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

HEALTH—SHORTAGE OF CANADIAN-TRAINED MEDICAL DOCTORS AND PERSONNEL—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON GOVERNMENT PROPOSALS

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, over and over again during the last four years I have drawn the shortage of doctors to the attention of the House. On June 28, 1971, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) stated in the House that he expected there would be a meeting of the provincial Ministers of Health and that he would be making a full statement to the House on this matter.

On November 3, 1971, I asked the minister if he would make a statement to the House assuring the Canadian people that the government was prepared to do something about the shortage of doctors and the importation of foreign doctors. In reply to my question he advised me to obtain copies of his statements outlining the very meritorious things that the government has done. This is why I have become concerned, because I have been receiving more and more correspondence outlining the difficulty people experience in finding a family doctor or getting medical attention of any kind. I have even had many members of this House speak to me about the problem.

The minister is reported as saying that it is the consumer, medical and health services, who are to call the shots for the doctor. Surely to goodness, Mr. Speaker, if that statement is correct it is time he got off his seat and did something about it. At another meeting he went further and said that health care was a clear citizen's right; in our society no citizen shall go without medical and health care because of his incapacity to pay or because of geographic location. Those are two statements that he made. The Minister of National Health and Welfare on another occasion stated that the shortage of doctors was a myth. What, really, does this government think? One day they have a shortage and the next day they have not. This was a headline in "Canadian Labour" in 1969. In "World Affairs" in March, 1970, it was stated that in 1961 there was one doctor for every 800 people. The article went on to state that the ratio is slipping and Canada now ranks twentieth in doctor-population ratio.

In the previous answer to my question on the "late show" the government said the situation was improving all the time. No consideration was given to the point that only half of the doctors in practice are general practitioners. Many are in administrative posts. I would like to know how many are employed by the government. Dr. Roberts, president of the CMA, and Dr. Evans and Dr. Creary of the CMA have pointed out the gravity of the situation in medical manpower.

Ask yourself if the government realized its responsibility when it introduced national medicare. The responsibility was to build medical schools, to supply teachers and equipment, to educate all those who wanted to pursue a career in medicine and a responsibility in foreign affairs to stop bleeding the poor nations of the world of their MDs. It is criminal that underdeveloped countries—poorer by every standard—who struggle to educate their young people to be doctors find them enticed away by rich countries such as the United States and Canada. India, Iran and Turkey have tried to put a stop to this practice and other countries will have to follow. What will Canada, who is currently using 50 per cent of the import doctors, do to fill the shortage each and every year? If this supply were shut off tomorrow, the condition of medical manpower would become very critical.

We have young men and women dedicated enough that they want to practise medicine. Over 600 fully qualified students were refused entrance to our medical schools because of lack of space to train them. We could not even train the most outstanding students. It is clear we have to step up our enrolment to take in students who are dedicated but who may not have grade B marks. It has been pretty well proven that grades have little to do with the performance of the doctor after graduation. It is the person and his dedication that counts. Let us quit being hypocrites and robbing the underdeveloped countries of their doctors and at the same time piously proclaiming the foreign aid we give to them.

Why has not the government followed the Hall commission report to supply the necessary manpower? The report was quoted long and often when the national medicare debate was before the House. Why has not the government brought in other measures to help? When will the minister listen to the advice of experts? It is obvious that he does not know, he wanders in the wilderness, because one day we are short of doctors and the next day we are not. I hope the minister is never in the position of having to wait a long time in an emergency ward of a hospital for medical attention. It would certainly give him time to ponder, if the occasion arose, to contemplate just how overworked are the doctors in the emergency wards.

Two-thirds of the people seen do not have serious or acute illnesses but are there because they cannot get an appointment to see a good practitioner. Some people require immediate care but often they do not get it. This does not lead to good preventive medicine. The seriousness of some cases is missed and the doctor is simply being pushed mentally and physically, his work suffers and the treatment of the patient is not as good as it should be.

What, then, do we do to correct this situation? The government could, under the health resources fund, immediately make funds available to the universities and provinces in order to provide the medical centres that are required to train the doctors we need. If possible, 2,000 medical students each year should be trained. This ought to be a first priority.

A manpower survey of the incentives required for a doctor to spend his first five years in general practice should be carried out. Staff should be provided with which to run our expensive medical schools all year instead of only three-quarters of the time. If this is arranged gradually we will be able to provide the doctors and facilities needed to give a high level of preventive medical care, which would cut down on hospitalization care and prevent or delay the onset of many chronic illnesses. The Canadian people deserve no less from this government than the ministerial implementation of the provision of adequate medical care for all Canadians.

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the remarks of the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard) about the shortage of doctors, I will say that the government's efforts to increase the number of doctors graduated from our medical schools in order to meet the ever increasing needs of health services have often been discussed in this House.

As the hon. member pointed out, he has brought this subject to the attention of the House many times in the past.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) has often said that the doctor per capita ratio in Canada is one of the highest in the world; we believe that the ratio recommended by the Royal Commission on Health Services should be passed soon.

The number of graduates or undergraduates in medecine in Canada cannot be as low as the hon. member for Simcoe North claims. We are looking for means of improving access to and availability of medical care for all Canadians. For instance, the Department of National Health and Welfare finances studies in order to find various ways of relieving doctors of some tasks by giving them to medical personnel able to perform those services. Moreover, projects are set up to have nurses accompany doctors in order to provide the population with mobile health services. Recently, a special committee prepared a program to improve the training of nurses working in northern Canada where they are responsible for many duties normally performed by doctors. Furthermore, following recommendations of the national conference of paramedical personnel, a committee has been established for the purpose of setting up policies regarding recruitment and training of nurses to work in doctor's offices and contribute to offering improved services.

Those are examples of tasks which can be carried out by persons other than physicians, and this is likely to improve services to the public.

The matter is a complex one, involving problems of training, of recourse to professions related to the health field and of issuing of licences, all of which are being attentively considered by the department, as mentioned repeatedly by the Minister of National Health and Welfare and an increase in the quantity of health services does not depend exclusively on the number of physicians. Furthermore, many professional organizations are studying the problem in Canada. There is agreement on the necessity of resorting to supporting medical personnel, on the best use of the staff in related fields and on improved use of the technology made available.

Both at federal and provincial levels and within professional health organizations, there is a constant concern with improvement of medical services in Canada.

EDUCATION—DECREASE IN NUMBER OF GRADUATE STUDENTS FROM UNDERDEVELOPED COUNTRIES FOLLOWING CHANGES IN RULES RESPECTING CERTAIN GRANTS

Mr. D. Gordon Blair (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I propose to ask a question about the problem of graduate students from underdeveloped countries studying in Canada at the present time. Canada has had a good record in admitting graduate students from underdeveloped countries, principally from Africa and Asia, and we have made a good contribution. At the same time, our country and universities have benefited from having in our midst these foreign students representing, as they do, the cultures of the developing countries.

At present, and unknown I think to most Canadians, a series of unrelated decisions by various levels of government has brought about a serious reduction in the number of graduate students from underdeveloped countries presently studying in Canada. I will enumerate three of the decisions of which I have been made aware. Perhaps there are others of which other hon. members have knowledge. First, by recent decisions both the National Research Council and the Canada Council have determined that no grants will be made to students unless they are landed immigrants of at least 12 months standing in Canada. This, of course, automatically rules out grants to any student except one who decides to become a landed immigrant and, presumably, is electing to become a Canadian citizen.

Second, the Canadian International Development Agency has shifted the balance of its activity. The number of scholarships which it is offering to graduate students from underdeveloped countries has been reduced. The purpose is to concentrate more on assisting education in underdeveloped countries and to encourage students, both undergraduate and graduate, to complete their university work at home.

The third factor is one which prevails in the province of Ontario and which I have no doubt exists elsewhere in the country. At the present time, provincial regulations limit the payment which any university in Ontario may make to a graduate student to $1,800 per year. As a matter of general policy our immigration department advises all intending student visa applicants that they must have at least $2,500 to support themselves while in Canada. For students coming from Asia or Africa there is a further expenditure for air fare which will perhaps amount to $1,000.

As I said before, these students who might otherwise work in universities in Ontario cannot hope to share in any research grants from either the Canada Council or the National Research Council. The result of the three separate types of decisions which have been made in Canada in the last year is that there has been a drastic reduction in the number of graduate students from Africa and Asia studying in Canada. I have some unofficial figures from a university in Ontario. They indicate that the student visa component of the university population in the present year has dropped over-all by only 2 per cent. In fact, in this particular university the number of graduate students from the United States has increased by 50 per cent and the number of graduate students from the United Kingdom has increased by 100 percent. The over-all reduction has occurred at the expense of graduate students from the underdeveloped countries of Africa and Asia.

As I said at the beginning, the rather catastrophic decline in the number of graduate students presently in Canadian universities arises from a series of unrelated decisions. However, it seems to me that it is of such a character that it invites the serious consideration of all levels of government. This is my reason for raising the question in the House of Commons.

Mr. John Roberts (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Blair) for having raised this question. From the information he has presented to the House it seems that there is cause for considering whether the joint effect of several of these isolated decisions, taken no doubt for the best of reasons in isolation, may have some over-all undesirable results.

I cannot speak this evening for all the agencies mentioned by the hon. member, but I can say that as far as the Canadian International Development Agency is concerned there has been little essential change in the rules covering the requirements leading to the granting of awards for graduate studies in Canada to students from developing countries. However, in recent years there has been a de-emphasis on the standard fields of study, for example, the general arts degree, as universities in the developing countries increase their capacity to absorb more students in traditional areas of study.

On the other hand, there has been an increased emphasis on the granting of awards for training in specialized studies, some of which are not given in Canadian universities but, for example, in technical colleges, teachers' colleges and mining schools. I am sure all the other agencies of government will consider very carefully the representations which my hon. friend from Grenville-Carleton has made to the House this evening.

PUBLIC SERVICE—EXPEDITING OF PROVISION OF SEVERANCE PAY TO LAID-OFF EMPLOYEES

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, on October 20 I asked two questions respecting severance pay for government employees who had been laid off through no fault of their own. The questions resulted from a meeting I held in Gimli, Manitoba, attended by some 60 former employees of the Canadian forces base there. Most of them, if not all, were encountering severe difficulties. Practically every one of them had been faced with problems concerning severance pay in one way or another,. I therefore asked the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) the following question:

Has the minister taken any steps to ensure that severance pay owing to former employees of the federal government who have been laid off is being provided to them much more rapidly than has been the case in the past in the light of the fact they must live on severance pay for a number of weeks before they can get unemployment insurance?

In reply, the President of the Treasury Board said:

My colleague, the Minister of Supply and Services has been conducting a review of pay operations in his department and one of the objects of it is to speed up this process to which reference has been made.

That reply is not good enough. It has been taking up to three months in some cases for employees of the federal government who have been laid off to receive severance pay. At present they are not eligible to draw unemployment insurance until a certain portion of this pay has been used up. This being the case, it is necessary that they receive severance pay immediately upon termination of their services if they are to have anything upon which to live.

I have suggested to the minister in a letter that perhaps a percentage of the severance pay could be paid immediately on severance, leaving the complicated calculation as to exactly how much individuals are to be awarded until later. I hope this suggestion is being pursued. However, that is not the main reason for my question tonight. My reason for speaking has to do with a related question which I addressed to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey), that question being as follows:

Is the minister giving consideration to removing the regulation which treats severance pay as income for the purpose of calculating unemployment insurance benefits in light of the fact that a number of inequities have arisen from that situation?

In his reply the minister said he was not considering removing the regulation. I was glad to learn from the answer, though, that the department has recognized at least a small portion of the problem which has resulted from this regulation and is moving to correct it. I refer to the possibility that if a person lives on severance pay for more than 32 consecutive weeks he might be disqualified from drawing unemployment insurance for reasons which are too complicated for me to go into now. Once again that action, however welcome it may be, is simply not good enough. Severance pay should not be considered as income for purposes of calculating unemployment insurance benefits.

• (10:20 p.m.)

The first point to make in this regard is that severance pay is not specifically referred to in the act. Its inclusion as a type of income is the result of a regulation of the department interpreting the act. Those members of the House committee who studied the new Unemployment Insurance Act with whom I raised this question have expressed astonishment and concern that it should be so considered, and they said the idea that it might be so considered had not occurred to them. This suggests to me that in drafting the regulation which includes severance pay as income for purposes of calculating unemployment insurance benefits, the department may have gone beyond the expressed wishes of Parliament or, at least, misinterpreted them. That is point one.

Point two: In the case of the former employees of the Department of National Defence the new regulation contravenes the manual which sets out their conditions of employment—the "A and A Manual". It is specifically stated in that manual that severance pay is not to be considered as income.

Point three: Severance pay is available to Department of National Defence employees as a result of an agreement negotiated between the employees and their employer. The regulation thus, in effect by the unilateral action of one of the parties, the government, deprives de facto the other party to the agreement, the employee, of one of the fringe benefits mutually agreed upon.

Point four: Severance pay was obviously designed to compensate persons laid off for such effects of the lay-off as lost sick leave, reduced pension benefits, lost furlough leave and to help compensate for the dislocation which inevitably results from being laid off, and so forth. If recipients of severance pay must now exhaust all or a portion of that severance pay before they become entitled to unemployment insurance benefits, then it no longer constitutes such compensation. It no longer constitutes such compensation unless, of course, the person finds another job immediately, in which case he has the severance pay free and clear. Surely the discrimination which results from this situation—the difference in treatment which is in fact meted out to those who immediately find work and those who do not—is sufficient reason to get rid of the regulation.

Point five: If the severance pay is to be considered income, and if the Unemployment Insurance Commission is to consider those in receipt of severance pay as being employed—and all have been notified to this effect—why should not the time they are living off their severance pay be considered pensionable time, for example? It is not, and that fact is simply another example of the discriminatory aspects of the regulation and another reason for its being repealed.

One final fact. In March, when the employees of CFB, Gimli, were being acquainted with the action the government would be taking on their behalf once they were laid off, officials of the Department of National Defence promised them both severance pay and unemployment insurance to assist them over this period. They now find it is an either/or proposition—either severance pay or unemployment insurance benefits. I know they were not deliberately misled but they were misled none the less, and the lack of deliberation does not diminish in any way their resultant difficulties. Let us just get rid of the regulation in question.

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I shall reply only to the question put by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland) to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), as found at page 8859 of Hansard, and not to the one he put to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey). I quote:

—Has he taken any steps to ensure that severance pay owing to former employees of the federal government who have been laid off is being provided to them much more rapidly that than has been the case in the past, in light of the fact they must live on severance pay for a number of weeks before they can get unemployment insurance? I mention in particular over 40 people from the Canadian Armed Forces base, Gimli.

The President of the Treasury Board gave the following reply:

Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the Minister of Supply and Services, has been conducting a review of pay operations in his department, and one of the objects of it is to speed up this process to which reference has been made.

[English]

I am informed that the process is that the employing department, in this case National Defence, is required to requisition final pay cheques, including severance pay. The Winnipeg office of Supply and Services was able to get out final pay cheques within 48 hours of receiving requisitions. There were some instances where the employing department failed to include severance pay in their cheque requisitions but these omissions have now been corrected.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

COMPETITION BILL

REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I would ask unanimous consent to make the following motion concerning the Competition Act which involves substantial changes in Canadian law and the regulation of trade and commerce and deals in several sections with matters of provincial jurisdiction. It is imperative that the question of constitutionality be tested before the bill is passed and implemented. I would therefore ask unanimous consent to move as follows:

That the Competition Act, and in particular Parts 3, 4, 5 and 6, be referred forthwith to the Supreme Court of Canada in order that the Court may give an opinion as to whether any parts of the said act are ultra vires.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Peace River under the terms of Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The motion cannot be put.

POST OFFICE

FORMER G. LAPALME EMPLOYEES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I wish to move a motion. Considering that it has become urgent that the public be informed of the truth with regard to the conflict between the former employees of G. Lapalme Inc. and the government, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin):

That the House refer the matter to a parliamentary committee so that the two parties may be heard, and, consequently, that everything pertaining to this conflict, which has already lasted too long, be brought to light.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member for Joliette. This motion, moved pursuant to Standing Order 43, requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: As there is no unanimous consent, the motion of the hon. member for Joliette cannot be put.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT GOALS AND CONTINGENCY PLAN—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent importance. On the basis of the unemployment figures released today, reflecting the persistent lack of confidence of the business community in the economy, and judging by the fact that part-time jobs created exceeded the total jobs created by 14,000, and because of the fact that unemployment with its multifold social and economic implications continues to increase, I would therefore like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That this House request the government to make a full and definitive statement to the country on its economic goals and expectations for the remainder of the fiscal year, and declare, as well, its contingency plans to alleviate hardship on all people and families who will not find jobs this winter.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is no unanimity and the hon. member's motion cannot be put because of the dispositions of Standing Order 43.

SUGAR

TABLING OF REPORT OF TARIFF BOARD AND TRANSCRIPT OF PROCEEDINGS

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as required by section 6 of the Tariff Board Act, Chapter T-1 of the Revised Statutes, I am tabling today the report of the Tariff Board on sugar, reference No. 146, in English and French, and a copy of the transcript of the proceedings.

Questions

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

NEW FOUNDLAND—AGREEMENT FOR FEDERAL ASSISTANCE FOR THE CONSTRUCTION OF SHELL-TYPE HOUSING

Question No. 1,337—Mr. Carter:

Has the Government of Canada or any of its agencies entered into a written agreement or given a written commitment to the Government of Newfoundland or any of its agencies that funds will be provided during the present fiscal year for the construction of shell-type housing units in the province and, if so (a) what is the amount of funds to be provided (b) for how many such housing units?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Although Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has not entered into a written agreement or given a written commitment to the Government of Newfoundland or any of its agencies for the provision of funds during the present fiscal year for the construction of shell-type housing units, there is an understanding with the Government of Newfoundland that financing by way of loan to individual home owners, builders and in some special cases the Newfoundland & Labrador Housing Corporation, will be provided for up to 300 such units. At an average of approximately $10,000 per loan, the aggregate amount to be loaned would be approximately $3,000,000.

PARRSBORO, N.S.—CONSTRUCTION OF NEW FEDERAL BUILDING

Question No. 1,633—Mr. Coates:

1. On what date will tenders be called for the construction of a new federal building at Parrsboro, Nova Scotia?

2. What federal offices will be housed in the new federal building and what is the proposed amount of office space provided by the new construction?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): 1. It is not intended at this time to call tenders. The Department has under consideration a proposal to lease space in a privately-owned building.

2. This space, after suitable renovations could accommodate the Post Office and the Department of the Environment.

CHARLOTTETOWN AIRPORT

Question No. 1,667—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. What is the present seating capacity of the waiting room at the passenger terminal of the Charlottetown airport?

2. Does the Department of Transport consider this adequate?

3. How many parking spaces are provided in the parking lot at the airport?

4. Will more parking facilities be made available and, if so, (a) by what date (b) how many additional automobiles will this accommodate?

5. What improvements in the facilities of the Charlottetown airport are projected for the fiscal years 1971-72, 1972-73, 1973-74?

6. What is the expected date of the installation of an instrument landing system?

7. What were the estimated number of passengers making use of the Charlottetown airport terminal during the months of June, July and August, 1971?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Sixty five.

2. Yes. The number of seats provided is in accordance with the standards used for Ministry Terminals.

3. Seventy five.

4. (a) November 30 (b) 50.

5. 1971-72—Instal ramp lighting, further expansion of car parking area; 1972-73—Expand aircraft parking ramp (1971-72 and 1972-73), instal ILS system, instal VASIS system, instal High Intensity Approach Lighting; 1973-74—Nothing presently programmed.

6. 1972-73.

7. June—6,326; July—11,666; August—12,670, These figures are for arriving, departing and connecting passengers.

CULTURAL GRANTS MADE TO INDIAN BANDS

Question No. 1,685—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. Were any cultural grants made to Indian Bands during the fiscal years 1969-70, 1970-71 and 1971 to date and, if so (a) what were they (b) which bands received grants in what amounts?

2. What is the criteria for the award of such grants?

Mr. Judd Buchanan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Yes.

(a) 1969-70 $ 87,560.00
1970-71 $219,745.00
1971 to July 21, 1971 $334,102.57

DATA ON BANK LOANS OUTSTANDING

Question No. 1,737—Mr. Burton:

1. Is the Bank of Canada giving consideration to the collection of data on the volume of bank loans outstanding and total money supply by region?

2. Is Statistics Canada giving consideration to the development of a system of regional accounts?

3. What statistical series are now prepared on a regional basis?

4. Is there a study group or task force in Statistics Canada concerned with the development of comprehensive regional statistics?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Bank of Canada and Statistics Canada as follows:

1. The regional domicile of the bank loans and bank deposits of nation-wide enterprises which deal with nation-wide banks is not meaningful; loans arranged in one region are frequently drawn on for use in other regions, and similarly deposit balances carried in one region may arise from operations in, or be destined for disbursement in, other regions. Consequently, collecting or estimating figures for total money supply and bank loans on a regional basis would not provide information useful for the analysis of regional economic problems. However, the Bank of Canada is examining whether there may be some sub-categories of chartered bank assets which might be collected to provide meaningful regional data.

2. No. However, Statistics Canada is working towards an enlarged regional economic data base which, when developed further, would be useful in constructing regional accounts.

3. Statistics Canada is preparing an increasing number of statistical series on a regional basis. A large number of series are now published in the demographic field, the labour field, in industrial areas and others on regional basis and further efforts are being made in this direction.

4. Yes.

Mr. JEAN-PAUL MATTE

Question No. 1,748—Mr. Matte:

1. Has Jean-Paul Matte, the assistant to the Minister of Indian Affairs, taken any holidays during the summer or at any other time during the year and, if so (a) what are the exact dates (b) were these paid holidays?

2. (a) How many hours a day does Jean-Paul Matte spend in his Ottawa office (b) at what time and on what day does he begin?

3. Does he go home during the weekend and, if so, on what day and at what time does he usually leave his office in Ottawa to go home?

4. Does Jean-Paul Matte have any accounts or travelling expenses and, if so (a) what are they (b) must these accounts be approved by the Minister himself (c) what have been the total and detailed amounts for these accounts since Jean-Paul Matte has been in the office of the Minister?

[Mr. Buchanan.]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Yes. (a) The beginning of August, (b) Yes, in accordance with the Managerial and Confidential Exclusions Regulations.

2. On most days, Mr. Matte's hours of work begin at 9:00 a.m., but the end of the day varies from 6:00 to 10:30 p.m. depending on the Minister's needs.

3. As and when required by the Minister, Mr. Matte is also available during week-ends. Times of departure vary from week-end to week-end.

4. (a) Yes, in accordance with Government Travelling Regulations. (b) This approval has been delegated to the Minister's administrative staff. (c) From Nov. 1968 to March 31, 1970, Mr. Matte's total expenses were $2,443.45 and from April 1, 1970 to March 31, 1971 they were $2,811.70. Details can only be obtained by searching the travel expenditure files, which costs in manpower and time would be exorbitant or prohibitive.

PARRSBORO, N.S.—FEDERAL BUILDING SITE

Question No. 1,758—Mr. Coates:

Has the government purchased a site for the new federal building that will be constructed in Parrsboro, Nova Scotia and, if so, from whom was the site purchased and at what cost to the federal treasury?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): No, the Department has under consideration a proposal to lease space in a privately-owned building.

EMPLOYMENT OF TEACHERS BY DEPARTMENT OF INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

Question No. 1,813—Mr. Orlikow:

1. How many teachers are employed by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development?

2. What are the minimum qualifications (academic) required for teachers hired by the Department?

3. (a) How many teachers working for the Department have more than the minimum academic qualifications required (b) how many have a Bachelor of Arts, Bachelor of Science or Bachelor of Education degree?

4. Is the Department giving consideration to the payment of a bonus or an allowance similar to the $1,000 bonus now being paid by the Ontario Department of Education to teachers in isolated northern schools?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. In 1970-71, 1,372 teachers were employed by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

2. See answer to Parliamentary Question No. 1,105 tabled in the House of Commons on March 4, 1970;

3. In 1970-71 (a) 1,212; (b) 338.

4. See answer to Parliamentary Question No. 1,105 tabled in the House of Commons on March 4, 1970.

RE-EXAMINING OF PROPOSAL OF ADDITIONAL NEW BRUNSWICK-P.E.I. FERRY SERVICE

Question No. 1,853—Mr. MacLean:

In the light of the plans for a new national park in New Brunswick, and the cancellation of the Prince Edward Island causeway project, is the Department of Transport re-examining the proposal that a summer ferry service be instituted between the vicinity of this new park and West Point, Prince Edward Island, to relieve the pressure on the Borden-Tormentine Ferry Service, and to provide direct access from this new park to Prince Edward Island and, if such a re-examination is being made, when is it expected a policy decision on the matter will be reached?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): No.

EMPLOYMENT OF TEACHERS BY DEPARTMENT OF INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

Question No. 1,875—Mr. Orlikow:

1. How many teachers were employed by the Indian Affairs Branch of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in the fiscal year 1969-70?

2. Of this number, how many of the teachers were in the classification of (a) teacher aide or unqualified teacher who had no professional teacher training (b) the sub-level who had only junior matriculation education and one year of teacher education (c) level 1 who had senior matriculation and one year of teacher education (d) level 2 who had senior matriculation and two years of teacher education (e) level 3 who had senior matriculation and three years of teacher education (f) level 4 who had senior matriculation and four years of teacher education (g) level 5 who had senior matriculation and five years of teacher education (h) level 6 who had senior matriculation and six years of teacher education?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. 1,645.

2. (a) 73; (b) 94; (c) 554; (d) 355; (e) 182; (f) 252; (g) 97; (h) 38.

DEPARTMENT OF INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT—NUMBER OF PLACEMENT OFFICERS

Question No. 1,881—Mr. Orlikow:

How many Employment Placement Officers does the Indian Affairs Branch employ in each province and how many of these are of Indian descent?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): In 1970-71, the Indian-Eskimo Affairs program employed the following placement officers by province:

Provinces	Placement Officers	Placement Officers of Indian Descent
Maritimes	4	3
Quebec	7	0
Ontario	7	0
Manitoba	1	0
Saskatchewan	10	6
Alberta	12	2
British Columbia	9	3

HIGHWAY SAFETY—STUDENT TRANSPORTATION

Question No. 1,898—Mr. Mather:

Is consideration being given to encouraging, with the co-operation of the provinces, highway safety standards for pupil transportation involving procedures on establishing uniform school bus markings, colour and lighting systems across Canada, driver training, periodic student instruction in safe riding practices and drills in emergency evacuation, semi-annual inspection of school buses and the mandatory wearing of seat belts by drivers and students?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Regulations regarding the safe transport of pupils to schools are incorporated in provincial highway traffic acts. Therefore many of the provinces have given serious consideration to the most desirable method of ensuring the safe transport of students in their provinces. The Department of Transport is also concerned about the safety features incorporated in vehicles used to transport students and in the methods developed to promote safety among the young passengers and for this reason the Department does intend to encourage and co-operate with the provinces to see that the most desirable methods are used universally across Canada.

LOAN GRANTED BY CANADA TO MALAYSIA

Question No. 1,911—Mr. Rodrique:

1. What was the amount of the loan granted by Canada to Malaysia when the Prime Minister of that country visited Canada?

2. What is the duration of the loan?

3. What is the rate of interest of the loan?

4. What are the reimbursement terms?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Canada has agreed to make available to the Government of Malaysia a Loan in an amount which is not to exceed $46,500,000.

2. The duration of the loan will commence from the first withdrawal of principal and terminate on the date to which final repayment is complete. Final repayment of principal is to take place on or before March 31, 2001.

3. The rate of interest of the loan is to be calculated at 3 per cent per annum on the principal amount of the loan drawn by Malaysia and outstanding.

4. Reimbursement will be made in 46 equal semi-annual instalments of the principal amount of the loan which is utilized by Malaysia, due and payable on the last day of September and March in each year commencing on September 30, 1978 and ending March 31, 2001. Payment of interest will similarly be made in semi-annual instalments due and payable on September 30 and March 31 in each year commencing from the first withdrawal of principal. Payment of interest will be calculated on the outstanding balance of the principal. The principal of and the interest charges on the loan are to be paid without any deduction whatsoever and in particular will be free from any taxes, charges, or other restrictions imposed under the Laws of Malaysia. The loan will be utilized on the basis of contracts won by Canadian suppliers in international competition. Consequently, the exact amount of the loan which will be utilized cannot presently be determined.

CONSUMER ADVISORY COUNCIL—AGE OF MEMBERS

Question No. 1,926—Mr. MacDonald (Egmont):

What is the lowest age of members of the Consumer Advisory Council appointed by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs?

Questions

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): The ages of members of the Canadian Consumer Council are not included in our records.

PRICES AND INCOMES COMMISSION—STAFF COMPLEMENT

Question No. 1,927—Mr. MacDonald (Egmont):

What is the full staff complement of the Prices and Incomes Commission?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I have been informed by the Chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission as follows: The number of full-time staff of the Commission on October 18, 1971 was 86.

*PRINTING OF INCOME TAX RETURN FORMS

Question No. 1,936—Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

Were income tax return forms, guides and any other materials for the year 1971 printed prior to October 14, 1971 and, if so, will such materials have to be re-printed because of the tax changes announced on October 14, 1971, and what is the total cost of the forms, guides and other materials to be discarded?

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

INDIAN POPULATION

Question No. 1,984—Mr. Robinson:

How many Indians are there in each province?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): As of December 31, 1970, the registered Indian population by province was as follows:

Province	Indian Population
Newfoundland	0
Prince Edward Island	435
Nova Scotia	4,652
New Brunswick	4,423
Quebec	27,671
Ontario	55,342
Manitoba	35,658
Saskatchewan	36,326
Alberta	29,086
British Columbia	48,259
Yukon Territory	2,491
Northwest Territories	6,438

NATIONAL DEFENCE MANPOWER STRENGTHS—MEMBER SERVING IN VARIOUS WARS

Question No. 2,003—Mr. Robinson:

1. How many Canadians served in (a) the Boer War (b) the First World War (c) the Second World War (d) the Korean War?

2. How many Canadians served in more than one of the above-mentioned wars?

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. It is not possible to give an accurate reply to this question as it is impossible to state precisely how many Canadians served in each of these wars because Canadian citizenship was not established until after the Second World War. Many Americans and others served in the Canadian Forces, some concealing their nationality to do so, and many others resident in Canada travelled to the United Kingdom to join the British Forces. However, as far as can be determined, the numbers were as follows: (a) 7,368 including those who served in the South African Constabulary; (b) 626,636; in addition, a large number, probably between 15,000 and 20,000 was recruited in Canada for the British Air Services; (c) 1,086,343; (d) 25,583.

2. The number of Canadians who served in more than one of these wars can only be ascertained by reviewing the records of all who enlisted in the services between 1897 and 1954. The necessary staff to undertake the large amount of work that this would entail is not available.

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE UNDER THE VETERANS' LAND ACT

Question No. 2,005—Mr. Robinson:

1. How many veterans of the Second World War used the establishment credit under VLA?

2. Do any veterans still have the option to obtain benefits under VLA?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): 1. To September 30, 1971, a total of 125,787 eligible veterans of World War II and the Korean Special Force had received financial assistance under the provisions of the Veterans' Land Act. Separate records have not been maintained as to how many of this number served only in the Korean Special Force.

2. Approximately 142,000 veterans who obtained a certificate of qualification by October 31, 1968 remain eligible to apply for VLA benefits up to March 31, 1974.

VETERANS' LAND ACT—TOTAL AMOUNT OF ASSISTANCE TO WORLD WAR II VETERANS

Question No. 2,006—Mr. Robinson:

What was the total amount loaned to veterans of World War Two under the VLA program?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): To September 30, 1971 the amount of $1,065,903,853 has been loaned under the provisions of the Veterans' Land Act. In addition, grants totalling $16,368,667 have been made to veterans of World War II and the Korean Special Force settling on Dominion and Provincial Lands and on Indian Reserve Lands. Separate records have not been maintained as to how much of these two amounts relates to veterans who served only in the Korean Specail Force.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

CONFERENCES HELD AT SEIGNIORY CLUB, MONTEBELLO, QUEBEC

Question No. 1,760—Mr. Schumacher:

Further to the reply to Question Number 1,500 at page 8063 of Hansard, did the Canadian International Development Agency hold meetings or conferences at the Seigniory Club in Montebello, Quebec during February 1970 and, if so (a) what was the duration of such conferences or meetings (b) who sponsored them (c) who attended them (d) were any payments made to the Seigniory Club in respect of such conferences or meetings (e) what was the amount of such payments (f) who was responsible for such payments?

Return tabled.

NORTHERN MINERAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Question No. 1,935—Mr. Robinson:

1. How many applications under the Northern Mineral Assistance Program have been approved?
2. Who were the successful applicants?
3. What amount was allotted to each applicant?
4. Where is the head office of each successful applicant?
5. What kind of work will the financial assistance cover in each case?
6. Where will the work be carried out by each of the applicants?

Return tabled.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON GOVERNMENT GOALS AND CONTINGENCY PLAN TO PROVIDE JOBS

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): I should like to put a question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the unemployment statistics released today, will the Acting Prime Minister undertake to make a statement to the House and the country indicating the goals and expectations of the government for the economy and unemployment and employment this coming winter in order to alleviate the uncertainty in the business community and in view of the fact that of the total increase in jobs reported today 77,000 were part-time jobs, reflecting the uncertainty of the business community?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the House and the country should be encouraged by the fact that there has been the largest increase in employment ever recorded for any October.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lundrigan: Recognizing the fact that 6.7 per cent of the labour force are unemployed compared with 6.5 per cent last October, I wonder if the Acting Prime Minister would announce to the people of the country a contingency plan to help those people who will not find jobs this winter inasmuch as 40 per cent of the total number of unemployed people in Canada have been out of work for more than four months which is an increase of 4 per cent over last month and 4 per cent over a year ago?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, it may have been while the hon. gentleman was absent in Newfoundland but the Minister of Finance did bring forward a program for just that purpose.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should either rephrase or restate my question because the minister, who appears to be in a pseudo-gloating mood today, has not understood my question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member might ask the supplementary.

Mr. Lundrigan: I am not talking about the red tape program which was announced; I am talking about the fact that today 40 per cent of the 447,000 people who are unemployed have been out of work for more than four months, 40 per cent of the total of those unemployed—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has been recognized to ask a supplementary question. Perhaps he would ask it now.

Mr. Lundrigan: Can the Acting Prime Minister indicate whether the government has any contingency plan to bring forward now or at the November 15 meeting of the first ministers to help the provinces and the municipalities in one way or another to assist unemployed Canadians who will not find work this winter?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister will be bringing before the conference of first ministers the proposals announced by the Minister of Finance that require provincial co-operation.

Mr. Baldwin: An election and a new government.

UNEMPLOYMENT—PROGRESS IN IMPLEMENTING GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS—AVAILABILITY OF SPECIAL LOANS DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM GUIDELINES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Although there was a decline in unemployment in October from the previous month, and in view of the fact that unemployment in that month was the highest for any October since the inception of the labour force survey I should like to ask the minister whether he can tell the House what progress has been made in getting under way the various programs to relieve unemployment which he announced on October 14 and, particularly, can he tell the House whether the guidelines are now available with respect to the special loans development program which offered $160 million in loans to the provinces?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, first of all, my colleague the Minister of Manpower and Immigration is in close contact with the provinces—

An hon. Member: Where is he?

Mr. Benson: —in order to get the programs moving ahead as rapidly as possible. With respect to the loan program, we are in discussion with the provinces. The general outline of the rules I gave in my statement and, indeed, when I spoke to the provinces, at the meeting of the Ministers of Finance. We are ready to proceed forthwith. The guidelines generally are the same as they were last year except that there is a forgivable feature in the loans program involving 75 per cent of the labour cost incurred during the winter months.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF WORKING PAPERS RESPECTING ALLOCATION OF SPECIAL LOANS TO PROVINCES—DECREASE IN AMOUNT FOR BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Some time ago the Minister of Finance promised to table the working papers on the basis of which the special loans fund will be allocated among the various provinces. Is he prepared to table those working papers and, particularly, is he prepared to explain to the House why the allocation to British Columbia this year has dropped from $39.8 million to $21.7 million, since its unemployment situation certainly does not seem to warrant that?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to carry out my earlier undertaking with respect to the working papers. The reason that the allocation to British Columbia has decreased this year is that, relatively, their unemployment position is better vis-à-vis the other provinces than it was last year. However, this will be shown by the figures which I am quite willing to table.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members will recognize that perhaps eight or ten hon. members are seeking to ask supplementary questions. We will have to limit supplementaries at one point or another. For the moment the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands is recognized.

UNEMPLOYMENT—SPECIAL MEASURES TO PLACE HARD-CORE UNEMPLOYED IN JOBS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance one other question. Since the figures released today show that nearly a quarter of a million of the unemployment have been in that state for more than four months and that we are developing a hard core of unemployed, is the government taking any special measures to see that this particular group are put into a position where jobs will be available to them?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the unemployment figures will show that a large part of the increase in unemployment has arisen from married women and from people under the age of 25. We are looking particularly at these problems. Indeed, in our programs which we announced last month our aim is to try to do something about this particular problem. There still is, as my hon. friend will know if he looks at the figures carefully, a rather strange or alarming increase in the participation rate in the labour force. It is more than we forecast—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Baldwin: Alarming, the minister says.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Benson: I am not looking—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The minister's attitude is the alarming part.

UNEMPLOYMENT—CONSIDERATION OF SPECIAL MEASURES FOR THOSE UNDER 25 AT FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question to the Finance Minister.

The question of increasing unemployment will be on the agenda of the federal-provincial conference, as he just informed us. Can he tell us if the federal government will then bring in special measures dealing with unemployment among people under age 25?

[English]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, of course this matter will be discussed at the first ministers' meeting. We have indicated what our program is for the coming winter and of course we are urging the provinces to co-operate with us and accept some of the responsibility they must accept in order to create jobs this winter, which I am sure everyone in this House wants to see happen.

UNEMPLOYMENT—CONSIDERATION OF GUARANTEED ANNUAL INCOME AS MEANS OF EASING POVERTY

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. As the government has been aware for some time of the recommendation of a guaranteed annual income contained in the report of the Special Committee on Poverty, which is to be tabled in the Senate today, is the government considering the implementation of a guaranteed annual income as a means of easing the burden of poverty caused by unemployment?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Perhaps I might answer that question, Mr. Speaker. We indicated in the white paper on income security that we were considering the concept of a guaranteed annual income. However, we had a couple of reservations, principally concerning the effect on incentives, which I understand is a concern of the Senate report also. We are also concerned, in the short run, about the cost involved and how we would raise the money necessary to finance the program. In the meantime we have indicated that we are prepared to finance pilot projects in a general way in the various provinces across Canada and in fact one or two provinces have already responded.

UNEMPLOYMENT—LOAN FUND ALLOCATION AVAILABLE TO ONTARIO—TARGET DATE FOR AGREEMENT

Mr. Murray McBride (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance. Since approximately $25 million is now available under the loan program to the province of Ontario, can the minister indicate a target date when an agreement may be entered into with the province of Ontario so that this money will be available for employment opportunities?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure whether that is strictly a supplementary question. Of course, the question has been asked and the minister might be allowed to reply.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we are willing to move forward just as fast as possible. Last year, as you will recall, the province of Ontario was the slowest of all the provinces in taking advantage of this particular program.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: Don't you know the election is over?

Mr. Woolliams: That is not what the people said.

• (2:20 p.m.)

UNEMPLOYMENT—ADDITIONAL MEASURES TO DEAL WITH PROBLEM

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. In light of the fact the pattern of unemployment this fall is higher than that of a year ago, can the minister inform the House whether the government believes that last month's economic moves will be sufficient to prevent unemployment from going higher this winter than was the case last winter?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is inviting the minister to express an opinion. The question as asked is not in order. Perhaps the hon. member might rephrase the question.

Mr. Coates: In light of the fact the figures are higher this year, is the government contemplating any steps additional to those taken in October?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Not at this point, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again I have to invite hon. members to consider the fact we will be running out of time eventually. If we spend half the question period on the first question, a number of hon. members may be disappointed when we approach the end of the question period. In any event, we will continue on the same subject for a while. The hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North.

Mr. Coates: In view of the fact that last month several government ministers questioned the accuracy of the unemployment figures, does the minister question the accuracy of this month's figures and, if so, is a statement going to be made?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker I do not think I have ever questioned the accuracy of the figures.

UNEMPLOYMENT—ATLANTIC PROVINCES AND QUEBEC—REAPPRAISAL OF REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION PROGRAMS AND AMENDMENT OF ACT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I wish to direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the figures released today by DBS indicating that unemployment is up substantially in the Atlantic provinces over this time last year and is also up in the province of Quebec, does the minister intend to reappraise or re-evaluate his present regional-economic expansion programs and is he prepared to give consideration to amendments to the Regional Development Incentives Act making it possible for added incentives to be provided this winter?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member's question is based on wrong facts. The seasonally adjusted unemployment rate declined in Quebec, and there are at least 31,000 more jobs than last September.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, either the minister has not read the DBS statistics or has not read the breakdown of them or else he is trying to convey the impression that he does not know.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. would the hon. member ask the supplementary.

Mr. McGrath: I repeat my original question. In view of the fact there are more people unemployed in the Atlantic provinces than there were at this time last year and in view of the fact there are more people unemployed in the province of Quebec than at this time last year, is the minister now prepared—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows it is irregular to repeat the same question. I wonder how often that should be allowed. The hon. member asked a question and he is not satisfied with the reply. Then he seeks the floor to ask a supplementary and simply repeats the question he asked in the first instance. I do not think that is proper procedure. The hon. member might like to rephrase the question.

Mr. McGrath: I will rephrase the question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the unemployment figures released today, is the minister prepared to bring in amendments to the Regional Development Incentives Act in order to provide additional incentives for areas such as the Atlantic provinces which are faced with severely high unemployment this winter?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, we shall continue to do everything we can to improve the employment situation in the Atlantic provinces and eastern Quebec.

[English]

UNEMPLOYMENT—LACK OF FORMS FOR ON THE JOB TRAINING PROGRAM

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I wish to direct my supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister. Will the Acting Prime Minister inquire of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, who is supposed to be here today but is not, and find out why, at a time when we have the highest level of unemployment for these months in the history of Canada, the forms for the on the job training aspect of the programs announced about a month ago are not yet available to Canadians?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will make those inquiries.

UNEMPLOYMENT—EXPEDITING OF NOVA SCOTIA ECONOMIC EXPANSION PROGRAM TO PROVIDE JOBS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): My question is supplementary to the question asked by the hon. member for St. John's East. I direct it to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In light of the continuing difficulties which exist in the maritimes, particularly in Nova Scotia, would the minister be prepared to have his departmental officials bring on the final five-year DREE program for the province of Nova Scotia so that we might have an indication of those areas in which work might be provided this winter?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member undoubtedly knows, we have just signed an agreement with Nova Scotia on the matter of roads. Now, all agreements have not been signed, but we do have in mind a program to promote economic development in Nova Scotia.

[English]

UNEMPLOYMENT—ACTION TO MAKE JOBS AVAILABLE KNOWN TO UNEMPLOYED

Mr. Jerry Pringle (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, my question could be directed to the Acting Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the statement issued yesterday that some 10,000 jobs are now going begging in the city of Montreal, and similar statements issued in other centres of Canada, including press reports in Ottawa, is the government taking special measures to bring this information to the attention of those who are unemployed so that they may be able to take advantage of these thousands of jobs and thereby be able to remove themselves from the unemployment lists?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): It is one of the phenomena that we have been dealing with that there is obviously a shortage of labour for many jobs in Canada. We have been studying the situation and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration has undertaken a special task to find out why it is that these jobs and the unemployed do not match.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will try to recognize the hon. member for Hamilton West later on this subject but for the moment the Chair will recognize the right hon. member for Prince Albert.

HUMAN RIGHTS

DISMISSAL OF RON HAGGART BY TORONTO "STAR"—INVESTIGATION BY LAW OFFICERS OF POSSIBLE VIOLATION OF BILL OF RIGHTS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, two or three days ago I asked the Minister of Justice whether he would refer to the law officers of the Crown the cavalier treatment of Ron Haggart by the Toronto Star. Has he done so, and what is the result?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I did so, Mr. Speaker. The law officers of the Crown have examined this case and it is their view that matters relating to a contract or the negotiation of a contract fall within provincial jurisdiction and are not covered by the Canadian Bill of Rights. In the circumstances they have not been able to conclude that any violation of the Canadian Bill of Rights has occurred. I wish to stress, as I did on Monday when the right hon. gentleman put this question to me, that the views I express are not binding on Mr. Haggart who has his own legal recourses open to him should he desire to exercise them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I heard some of the hon. members on the back seats opposite who do not believe in freedom applaud that statement. I could identify them if necessary. I would ask the minister—as I cannot under the rules get into an argument with him during the question period—whether there is anyone in his department charged with looking into violations of fundamental freedoms that come within federal jurisdiction?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Yes, indeed, Mr. Speaker. The right hon. gentleman is aware that we tried to persuade the provinces—and succeeded to a limited extent—to convert some of the provisions of the Canadian Bill of Rights into a constitutional charter. Had that charter been declared, the situation might well be different.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It happened to be Liberal provincial governments that refused.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): You know better than that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would ask the minister whether freedom of the press and of speech has not been declared by the courts to be, except for libel and slander, within the jurisdiction of the federal Parliament?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That is correct. The Supreme Court of Canada has held that to be true, but the primary matter at issue here is either negotiation for a contract or a contract, and that is a matter of civil law within the jurisdiction of the province.

GRAIN

CONSULTATION WITH FARM ORGANIZATIONS AND PRAIRIE GOVERNMENTS TO FORMULATE POLICY ACCEPTABLE TO FARMERS—ACREAGE PAYMENTS

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): In the absence of the minister in charge of the Wheat Board I will direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the clear rejection of the government's grain policy and its grain stabilization bill—

• (2:30 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As much as possible the hon. member should ask a question.

Mr. Gleave: In view of these facts, is it now the intention of the government to initiate a meeting with the farm organizations and representatives of the three prairie governments in order to work out a grains policy that is acceptable to prairie farmers?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when the government has made a decision in this matter it will, of course, be made known to the House.

Mr. Gleave: I am very pleased to hear that the government is considering its decision, but may I ask whether the government will now make the acreage payments to farmers to which it committed itself in letters to permitholders as of last July, while the remainder of the proposals in the grain stabilization bill, as the minister has suggested, may receive further consideration?

Mr. Sharp: If it had not been for the opposition, Mr. Speaker, I think those cheques would have been sent out already.

CRIMINAL CODE

DATE OF DEBATE ON ABORTION AND INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Justice.

In view of his recent announcement that there would be a debate on abortion in the near future, could he tell us whether such a debate will take place during the present session or early in the next one? Will it follow a motion calling for a special debate or the introduction of a bill?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give an exact date. It depends on the business of the House. In reply to the second part of the hon. member's question, I believe it would be best to obtain the opinion of the House before introducing a bill.

SPECIAL EMPLOYMENT PROGRAM—NUMBER OF PROJECTS APPROVED AND JOBS CREATED

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question was intended for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration but in his absence would the acting minister or the parliamentary secretary inform the House how many projects have been approved and how many jobs have been created by the government's special employment program?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will appreciate, I am sure, that normally this kind of statistical information is always sought by way of a question on the order paper. However, if there is urgency or there is some other way in which the question can be asked, perhaps the hon. member might seek the information through another method.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, I asked the question because of a commitment the minister made to the House last week. In view of the arrival of winter for most of Canada, can the minister inform the House how many projects have been or will be approved and how many jobs will be created prior to Christmas?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration has informed me that he anticipates being back in the House before the end of the question period. I am sure that this information, which is very detailed, can be obtained at the earliest possible opportunity.

An hon. Member: Where is he?

Mr. Mackasey: The minister is away on important business involving this type of legislation, but he does intend to be back in time to answer questions.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

ENERGY

OFFSHORE OIL AND GAS DRILLING—USE OF CANADIAN SHIPS AS SUPPLY VESSELS

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the Sable Island discoveries and the probable increase in offshore oil and gas drilling, is the government satisfied that Canadian regulations regarding offshore drilling vessels are adequate to ensure for Canada all the benefits of Canadian resources development?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this question requires a complex answer and I will not try to answer in detail. I will say that no, we are not satisfied that the present regulations are adequate to ensure that Canadian ships get as much of the supply business as possible, and I am moving to close as many of the holes in existing regulations as possible.

Mr. Bell: Accepting the fact that oil drilling vessels are in a special category, can the minister say whether the vessels that service these oil drilling rigs are required to be of Canadian registry?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, it was the latter part of the question to which I addressed myself. They are required to be if the drilling is taking place inside the three-mile limit, but there is some question, which has not yet been resolved, as to how much we can exert authority over vessels servicing rigs on the high seas.

NATURAL GAS—APPROVAL OF APPLICATIONS TO EXPORT

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister a question in the absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In light of order No. G.H.-1-71 of the National Energy Board, and in light of the fact that natural gas drilling rig companies in Alberta are either going into liquidation or closing down operations, can the minister tell the House whether the National Energy Board has approved five applications to export approximately 2.5 trillion cubic feet of natural gas, thus creating thousands of jobs not only in western Canada but in eastern Canada?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer the question directly other than by saying that these reports of the National Energy Board have not yet reached the cabinet, so I assume that the National Energy Board has not yet made its decision.

RESUMPTION OF DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): In answer to a question recently about negotiations between Canada and the United States on the subject of energy the minister said that talks are not going on at present. Can the minister now tell the House when these talks will resume in light of the fact that so many jobs depend upon this industry?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the fact that talks are not going on with the United States would not prevent us from making decisions on the export of gas when we receive a recommendation from the National Energy Board. Nor would it prevent us from making decisions on any matter affecting Canada-United States relations. There are no formal talks going on at the present time of the kind that were contemplated. It is my understanding, however, that there may be some resumption of these talks in the near future. I believe that a United States official would like to come up to Canada and talk to us about the matter.

Mr. Woolliams: Would the minister briefly tell us who it was brought these talks which had been going on to an end? They were described by the Minister of Energy Mines and Resources as always continuing. Who brought them to an end, the United States or Canada?

[Mr. Jamieson.]

Mr. Sharp: Perhaps indirectly the United States did by putting other matters ahead of oil and gas or energy talks.

Mr. Woolliams: Do you mean the surtax?

Mr. Sharp: That is right.

Mr. Woolliams: Retaliation.

Mr. Sharp: Against Mexico too?

Mr. Woolliams: If you want to go to Mexico, then that is just where you are going to go.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

LOAN PROGRAM TO CREATE JOBS—INFORMATION ON UNEMPLOYMENT BASIS AND METHOD OF CALCULATION FOR ALLOCATION OF FUNDS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of Finance. On Thursday, October 28, the hon. member for York South asked the minister whether he would table the precise method by which the allocations under the $160 million forgivable loan program were calculated. May I ask the minister whether the assurance he gave earlier today to the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands includes this information, and can he say how soon all of it will be tabled?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): As soon as possible, Mr. Speaker.

AIRPORTS

TORONTO INTERNATIONAL—COMPLETION DATE FOR NEW TERMINAL

Mr. Robert P. Kaplan (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Can the minister say whether the new terminal now under construction at Toronto international airport will ever be completed and, if so, when?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): "As soon as possible."

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If it would be of any help to the minister I might suggest to the hon. member that the question as asked is argumentative. I might allow the hon. member to rephrase his question.

Mr. Kaplan: Then, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether he is in a position to tell us when the new terminal under construction at Toronto international airport will be completed?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I assume, under the circumstances, that it will be on the front page of the Toronto Star tomorrow that the first module of a three-module terminal will be completed on April 30 and the remaining two by June 30; and I would invite the hon. member to attend the opening on June 30 as a fixed date.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (2:40 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There is a supplementary by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Barnett J. Danson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might ask the Minister of Transport if he could tell us the year.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: That's good!

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I expect it will be after the hon. member has lost his exalted position and therefore he will not be invited.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

ENERGY

OIL AND GAS—NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES—NECESSITY FOR CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES ON SALES

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, after that interesting by-play from Toronto may I turn to a minister from Toronto and ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question. The other day the Leader of the Opposition raised a question concerning the assertion by Premier Lougheed of Alberta that he wanted Alberta consulted with regard to any negotiations in respect of the sale of energy resources, particularly oil and gas, to the United States. The minister indicated that this is a matter of foreign policy and that foreign policy decisions are made by the federal government. Will the minister tell the House whether he agrees that prior consultation with the provinces with regard to such sales and other matters which may form part of the negotiations with the United States is an absolute necessity, since the federal government does not get one foot of gas or one barrel of oil without the consent of the provinces?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can give the assurance the hon. gentleman has asked for. It has always been the practice of the Canadian government to consult with the province of Alberta or whatever other province is involved in the control of gas and oil. Either the National Energy Board has to approve in advance the export of gas from Alberta or in the case of oil there must be some assurance that the supply is forthcoming. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, may I remind the hon. gentleman that that was not the question put to me by the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I indicated to the hon. member for Hamilton West a while ago that he would be recognized for a supplementary. This might be the time to do so.

UNEMPLOYMENT—INDICATION OF GOVERNMENT PROJECTIONS AND TARGETS TO PROVINCES

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. For a moment I thought you had forgotten. I have a supplementary for the Minister of Finance. In light of the fact that he will be discussing the unemployment situation with the provinces and in view of the fact the provinces have indicated it is difficult for them to plan without any figures from the federal government regarding projections and targets for employment and unemployment, I should like to ask the minister whether there are such figures available and, if so, will there be some indication given to the provinces at the forthcoming meeting as to what those projections and targets are?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have answered this question many times before.

Mr. Alexander: In light of the fact the Minister of Finance of the province of Manitoba has predicted higher unemployment for the winter of 1972-73 compared with this winter, has the minister any figures which would tend to confirm or dispute that statement?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, there are a great many forecasts put out by a great many people and I do not try to dispute each forecast.

DATE OF RESUMPTION OF CONSIDERATION OF FARM PRODUCTS MARKETING AGENCIES BILL

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the President of the Privy Council.

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, it is not possible to say exactly when this bill can come before the House until we have disposed of the tax bill, but it would be possible to have the report stage bills now on the order paper passed after the tax bill has been disposed of.

Hon. John N. PROPOSED JAMES BAY HYDROELECTRIC PROJECT—DISCUSSION WITH QUEBEC GOVERNMENT—CONTRIBUTION TO RESEARCH

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

In connection with the James Bay project, is the federal government holding talks with provincial authorities and, if so, what stage have those discussions reached?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, discussions have been initiated with the provincial government. However, no comprehensive program has yet been devised and no decision has been reached.

Mr. Caouette: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

As to the talks already held, is the federal government now taking part in the research done in that area?

TRANSPORT

REQUEST THAT MINISTER EXPEDITE SHIPMENT OF NO. 2 NORTHERN WHEAT REQUIRED FOR SHIPS WAITING TO BE LOADED AT VANCOUVER

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I asked the Minister of Transport a question regarding a shortage of cattle cars and he acted with speed and effect. I thank him. Now I bring to his attention the serious situation that exists on the west coast. Eight million bushels of No. 2 Northern wheat are needed for ships scheduled to be loaded and the needed trains have not arrived from country elevators on the prairies. Because of the seriousness of this situation, with ships waiting to be loaded and the kind of wheat required not being available, will he use the same diligence at once. We will not be back here until Monday next, and I ask him to bring about a concentration of shipment of this grade of wheat to the coast terminals so that demurrage on ships will not pile up as otherwise will be the case.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will do my best to convey this to the railway concerned. I might say that it is customary about this time each year for me to arrange for spokesmen for the railways to appear before interested members with regard to the whole question of grain shipment and I will be glad to arrange that next week as is the annual custom.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That will be pretty late if we wait until then. Would the minister act immediately in this direction because it seems not understandable, with all the No. 2 wheat that is available on the prairies, that this situation should exist.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Later:]

MOVEMENT OF GRAIN—CONSULTATION BY MINISTER WITH MINISTER IN CHARGE OF WHEAT BOARD

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. Some days ago I asked his parliamentary secretary whether or not the department or the minister had had consultations with the minister in charge of the Wheat Board regarding the situation that was building up on the west coast with respect to grain movement. I was told then that I would receive an answer. Can the minister give it now?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): The answer is yes. The minister in charge of the Wheat Board and officials of my department and myself are, I would say, in daily contact and carry on a daily review with regard to the shipment of grain. It is, of course, a constantly changing situation. This was why I thought it would be useful, rather than trying to answer individual questions from hon. members on both sides of the House, if I had officials of the railway come here next week so that hon. members could find out what the position is going to be over the next few weeks.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

EDUCATIONAL FACILITIES IN NORTHEASTERN ALBERTA—CONSULTATION BETWEEN PRESIDENT OF TREASURY BOARD AND MINISTER TO SOLVE PROBLEM

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board. Has he had an opportunity to confer with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development with a view to reaching an immediate solution to the impasse involving the Indians of northeastern Alberta and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, in light of the difficulties and complaints expressed by members of the Public Service employed at the Indian Affairs regional office in Edmonton arising out of the sit-in being staged there by the Indians?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I think the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has been having discussions with the Indians involved and these have not yet reached a conclusion.

Mr. Mazankowski: I have a supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to direct the attention of hon. members to the fact that there are only three minutes left before the end of the question period. There are ten members waiting to ask questions who have not had an opportunity to do so. I pointed out to hon. members earlier that if during the question period there are two, three or four supplementaries to every question some members will be disappointed. This is what is happening again and I can take no responsibility for that.

• (2:50 p.m.)

Mr. Mazankowski: Thank you very much for your indulgence, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that a telegram was directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development by the employees requesting that the minister either close down the office completely and send the employees home or settle the differences, would the President of the Treasury Board confer with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development with a view to reaching a solution to the problem immediately?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member must assume that his suggestion will be taken into account.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

MANITOBA—POSSIBLE ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW SPECIAL AREA IN NORTH OR EXTENSION OF PRESENT BOUNDARIES

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): My question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. I should like to ask the minister whether any request or representations have been made by the province of Manitoba or whether discussions have taken place between officials of the minister's department and the province in respect of either the setting up of a new special area in northern Manitoba or the extension of the boundaries of the present special area?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): As I have already stated in the House many times, we are in the process now of revising these special areas in Canada as well as the designated areas, but I cannot tell the hon. member exactly what the situation is at the moment with regard to Manitoba.

PROTEST AGAINST MOVEMENT OF FACTORY FROM HAMILTON TO ANOTHER PROVINCE

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Has he received a telegram from the city of Hamilton protesting the movement of a factory from Hamilton to another province, and what does he propose to do about it?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Health and Welfare informed me of the situation, and I received the wire to which the hon. member referred.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Although the minister indicated that he received the wire, can he advise the House what his intentions are with regard to the situation inasmuch as it appears that the minister is creating unemployment in order to create employment in another area of the country?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

An hon. Member: There is nothing new about that.

Mr. Alexander: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In view of the importance of the question may I put it in a shorter form and ask whether the minister would kindly inform the House of his policy? Is it to create unemployment in some areas in order to create employment in others?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. This is a very important question. I received the wire. The hon. member is the one who asked me the question. A company in Hamilton has decided to close its plant. If we do not give a grant to that company to enable it to establish somewhere else in Canada, it will just disappear. I am not destroying any jobs.

POSSIBLE USE OF MARITIME COMMAND OR NAVY TO ENFORCE REGULATIONS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): My question is supplementary to a series of questions asked yesterday and is directed to the Minister of the Environment. Can he indicate to the House whether or not, with respect to the enforcement of regulations, consideration is being given by the government to implementing a recommendation in the white paper on national defence which would extend to the Maritime Command or to Canada's navy the authority to arrest or the civil power of arrest so as to be of assistance in the enforcement of regulations?

CANADIAN ACTION TO SECURE REPRESENTATION FOR GERMAN DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs which is supplementary to the one asked earlier by the hon. member for Oxford. Now that the proper representatives of China have been admitted to the United Nations, would the minister state whether the Canadian government is pursuing with other governments the next step toward universality of membership, that is, the admission of the divided state of Germany?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. We have been discussing this question very actively and we are waiting for agreement between the Federal German Republic and the German Democratic Republic. I believe the Federal German Republic looks forward, as we do, to the time when the two Germanies are represented in the United Nations.

In light of this chamber's expressed desire for the termination of all nuclear tests, can the Secretary of State for External Affairs advise the House as to what new initiatives Canada will undertake toward this goal in multinational disarmament discussions and particularly in the use of its good offices with China and with France?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I am sure the House endorses the sentiments expressed by the hon. gentleman, and I can assure him we will take advantage of all occasions, at the Geneva conference, at the United Nations and bilaterally with all the nuclear powers to see whether we can get an end to nuclear testing.

SNOWMOBILES—PROMOTION OF POWER IN ADVERTISING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): My question is for the Minister of Transport. At the first Canadian conference on snowmobiles and all-terrain vehicles it was charged that manufacturers blatantly promote the power of snowmobiles in their advertising and lead people to use their machines in a dangerous manner. Does the government share this position and, if so, is action being taken with regard to the kind of advertising now employed to promote snowmobiles?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I doubt that the general content of that question comes within my responsibility. However, I can tell the hon. member that within about a week we will be issuing the first report on snowmobile safety as a result of official tests held a number of months ago.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baldwin: I rise on a point of order involving the business of the House. Can the government House leader indicate the business for next week and in particular when the government will be bringing in supplementary estimates to deal with the program outlined by the Minister of Finance on October 14?

Mr. MacEachen: The business of the House next week will be the continuation of the bill now before the Committee of the Whole, and in accordance with the arrangement agreed to in the committee yesterday we will begin on Monday with the general subject of the capital gains tax.

In response to the second question, it is hoped to bring in supplementary estimates next week.

Mr. Thompson: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, for two reasons, first, because of the recent report of Statistics Canada which indicates that there were 22,000 more unemployed last month than there were a year ago, and the plight of many Canadians at this time of the year is desperate. The second reason for my point of order is my inability to obtain an answer which was assured me last week to a question I asked in the absence of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration on a day when he is supposed to be here. I wish to ask whether, tomorrow and the next day not being sitting days, a specific answer will be given next Monday so far as programs and work opportunities are concerned and also whether the government will notify the House of some specific goals so far as timetables for dealing with unemployment in the crucial winter months ahead of us are concerned.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member cannot suggest that this is a point of order. I am prepared to rule that it is not a proper point of order. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed, from Tuesday, November 9, consideration in committee of Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act—Mr. Benson—Mr. Laniel in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: When the committee rose last evening, section 74, with an amendment proposed by the Minister of National Revenue, was before the committee. Sections 16, 67, 69, 70, 72, 74, 76, 78, 79, 81, 126, 144, 145, 148, 149, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252 and 254 had been grouped for the purposes of debate. Sections 16, 67, 69, 70 and 72 were agreed to.

Shall the amendment carry?

On clause 1—section 74: Transfers to spouse.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, there was considerable debate last Friday and again yesterday on the implications of income splitting and I think it might be useful to the committee to appreciate the significance of it in terms of dollars and cents. In the first place one must note that the options that have been advanced by members opposite would not be available to wage earners; they would only be available to the self-employed.

Second, there has been some talk about people being able to resolve this situation for themselves by incorporating. I suppose that is quite true, but the people who do incorporate take the disadvantages of incorporation as well as the advantages. It is not all clear sailing. In the 1969 tax year, for which we have the most recent 1971 edition of taxation statistics, the average self-employed physician or surgeon in Canada reported a gross income of $32,338. The average self-employed business proprietor reported an average income of $6,485. For the convenience of some calculations, and in order to give the benefit of the doubt all around, I have rounded the doctor's figure down to $32,000 from $32,338, and the self-employed business proprietor's figure up to $6,500. The significance here is the difference that this advantage would give to the higher income people.

Basically, assuming no dependent children and assuming that the doctor employed his wife as a nurse in the business and paid her $10,000 of his $32,000 income, the tax instead of being $11,549.85, which it would be on his income of $32,000, would be reduced to $9,636.25, or a saving for that family of $1,913.60. On the other hand, for the self-employed business proprietor—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Is the hon. member for Athabasca rising on a point of order?

Mr. Yewchuk: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I raise the point of order that the parliamentary secretary is attempting to deceive the House by giving an income tax figure for a gross income. I think this is ridiculous. You have to use net income.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I could, of course, have run through the figures for exemptions and standard deductions and brought it down to taxable income, and so on, but I thought since those are matters of record these figures might have served. I have calculated the tax against this income, assuming there were no children and taking the standard $100 deduction in lieu of charitable donations, for medical expenses, and so on. So for the professional man, the doctor who was near the average income for doctors in 1969, and applying table 2 in the "Summary of 1971 Tax Reform Legislation" we have a saving, as a result of that splitting of $32,000 into $22,000 for the doctor and $10,000 for his wife, of $1,913.60.

For the business proprietor whose business income that year was $6,485—and I have assumed here $6,500—we have a tax, after application of the same criteria, of $884.65. If he splits his income in much the same way by employing his wife in the front end of his store, keeps $4,500 taxable income himself and pays her $2,000, he reduces his and his wife's tax to a total of $783.64, a saving of $101.01. So I think the committee will see very obviously, Mr. Chairman, that the advantages hon. members are advocating would certainly accrue not to the small business proprietor but to the high income, professional person.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): This is a lot of nonsense, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Chairman, the parliamentary secretary talks about a doctors' gross income being $32,000. Does he take into account the rooms that are required, often in high-cost areas, all the equipment that is necessary in the carrying on of a medical practice? I think this is a very unfair way to present the matter. There is another question I want to ask him. Supposing a doctor and his wife are practising in the same building, he is an obstetrician and she is a pediatrician—what becomes of that income? How does the minister rate them?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, the income figure, when I used the term gross income, of course is his business income after he has received his fees and deducted all the costs of doing business. This is the figure that is plugged into the income tax return, from which deductions and exemptions are taken off in calculating taxable income.

Mr. Rynard: You did not answer the second part of my question. If a husband and wife are both practising, one is an obstetrician and one is a pediatrician, how do you rate their incomee? How do you apply this principle to them?

Mr. Mahoney: If it is a partnership—

Mr. Rynard: Never mind a partnership. They are sharing offices.

Mr. Mahoney: Then there is no problem. If it is a partnership there would be a problem, but if they are just sharing offices and carrying on independent practices there is no problem.

Mr. Rynard: In other words, you treat those two differently than you would if they were working in a store?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I think during the debate on the proposals in the white paper there was an effort to try to identify business corporations with their shareholders, and so on. That concept was rather emphatically rejected by the business community which made representations to us. There is indeed a difference in the way you conduct your business. There is a tax difference that flows from the way the business is conducted.

Mr. Rynard: There is very definite discrimination here. A man's wife could have been running a business of her own up the street, or could have been running it in the same store and they could both come together. This is plain discrimination, and the parliamentary secretary knows it.

• (3:10 p.m.)

Mr. Bigg: I am very pleased that the parliamentary secretary has sought to enlighten us on this point. I raised it in at least two of my presentations to the committee. This question of net income after taxes is very relevant to low income people. I am not so worried about people with a gross income of $25,000 or $30,000, but I am worried about those with a $6,500 family income. It is all very well to pass the tax off as only $100 or $200, but with inflation and the high cost of living today that extra $100 or $200 in tax is a very serious matter to the low income group.

I am not particularly worried about what happens to the combined income of two well paid professionals. As a matter of fact, I think that the sliding scale of income tax has a great deal to do with this group which is already carrying a large burden of taxation. When one takes into account the years spent at college and the overhead which a doctor, let us say, has to face for clinics, equipment, X-ray material, and so on, the net return for a lifetime of hard work is not as exaggerated as it appears to many people. My emphasis is not on that type of situation. I am concerned with the family that has a gross income of $6,500—the mamma and papa store and many small businesses which require the work and co-operation of the whole family including the children.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I wonder if the hon. member appreciates that in those circumstances the children can be hired and paid. The only effect that has is to reduce the exemptions they are entitled to when claiming the children, because the children have income.

Mr. Bigg: Yes, I understand that there are ways if you seek hard enough. Another difficulty is the bookkeeping that is necessary. I am not against the benefits that we have in Canada, but the bookkeeping that the small income family has to do is hardly worth while. Perhaps we can make it unnecessary to take this $100 away from small income families when there is an inequity in the legislation as the parliamentary secretary admits. It is not merely a case of saying that some higher income groups have to pay the taxes; we know they have to pay on a much higher scale. I am worried about the net income payable to a family trying to keep a small business open when there is very little escape under this tax bill.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Chairman, I should like to comment on what the parliamentary secretary said about income when the husband and wife are partners. I think he should clear up this question. In his example he cited incomes of $6,500 and $32,000. I think he really meant net income before taxes, because for the professional worker gross income usually means all profit before any deductions for office expenses. Probably this is why there was some misunderstanding.

I think the parliamentary secretary should point out the problem of the professional man who spends many years in studying. Sometimes he is 35 years of age before he makes any income. During this period of his professional life he spends a great deal of his own money and savings on furthering his education. At age 50 he is no further ahead than many people who went into the labour force much earlier in life. This is something we must look at in the future. Income averaging may have a little value, but not very much at this time.

Where a husband and wife are partners in business I think this is discrimination against other people in business. I think it is safe to say that the whole thrust of taxation is against people who wish to be in business. Usually they operate on a cash basis and the wife is often involved, working in the corner store. Canada needs this type of business because of our small and scattered population, particularly in rural areas.

I think the government is making a mistake by not recognizing that there are many valid reasons for treating husband and wife as partners in the business, and I think most farms could be classified as a husband and wife partnership to some extent. This section does not seem to be different from the old act and does nothing to help the small business. With the further capitalization necessary in the small business, the progressive income tax takes more and more income and leaving less for capital savings. There is no help for these people in this section of the bill.

Mr. Otto: Mr. Chairman, I have been listening to this debate for nigh on 30 days, on this whole business of taxation and tax reform. It is more obvious every day that the bill has lost meaning and that the opposition is filibustering.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Otto: That is my opinion, and I have been here a long time. It is a sophisticated filibuster, but it is a filibuster. Normally I would not blame the opposition because that is the name of the game but, Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please, I interrupt the hon. member because I do not think that his last remarks were relevant to the section under discussion.

Mr. Otto: Mr. Chairman, I shall be moving a motion that this committee rise. Before I do so, however, I want to say that I do not blame the opposition. In normal times it is a good political game. But an economic holocaust is upon us. I do not have to again mention the American surcharge, the revenue bill and all those things. This is not the time for games. On the government side we are talking about the splitting of income between husband and wife. What income? There might not be any income. We are talking about capital gains. What capital? What gains? Equity? The only equity we may have is how to divide poverty equally.

What we should be dealing with, Mr. Chairman, is a government policy. The Minister of National Revenue should be whipping the Canada Development Corporation. The Minister of Finance should be talking about the IDB and how to get it back into shape so that it will serve the economy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Otto: The Minister of Labour should be telling us how we should deal with labour questions and the rise in inflation. Mr. Chairman, in order to give the government some time so that they may end this lame duck, useless session and begin a new session with good, firm policies that we can discuss and so prepare for the economic tragedy that is upon us, I move:

That the committee now do rise and report progress.

An hon. Member: No progress.

Mr. Mahoney: No, it would not be the truth.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Chairman, I should like to know what progress the hon. member has in mind. I have not seen too much since I have been around here.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I must bring to the attention of hon. members that this motion is not debatable, so I shall put it immediately. Moved by the hon. member for York East:

That the committee now do rise and report progress.

• (3:20 p.m.)

Motion (Mr. Otto) negatived: Yeas, 2; nays, 49.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the motion lost. Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Gray) agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall section 74 as amended carry?

Mr. McCleave: On division.

Clause 1, section 74, as amended, agreed to.

On clause 1—section 75: Transfers to minors.

The Deputy Chairman: May I bring to the attention of the committee an amendment to this section, moved by the Minister of National Revenue on October 22, as recorded in Hansard at page 8941. The amendment refers to some changes at page 178 of the bill. Shall I read the amendment?

Mr. McCleave: Dispense.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Gray) agreed to.

Clause 1, section 75, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 1, sections 76 to 78 inclusive, agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: The committee will now consider section 81. An amendment was moved to this section by the Minister of National Revenue on October 22, as recorded at pages 8941 and 8942 of Hansard. Shall I dispense with the reading of the amendment?

On clause 1—section 81: Amounts not included in income.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I want to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. This question has been sent to some of us and concerns the suggestion put forward by a certain school of thought in Canada. These people suggest that if you have Dominion bonds, they ought to be free of income tax. I understand that on some occasions they are and on others they are not. I think it might be helpful for the record and for those who belong to that school of thought if the minister could tell us briefly why there is no specific reference to these bonds. I admit that they might be embraced by the language of section 81(1)(a).

My other point is this. I thank the minister for carrying forward the provision whereby pension payments arising from deaths and injuries sustained in the Halifax explosion of 1917 are exempt, as are workmen's compensation cases and the like. Nobody wants to take money from the injured and, quite properly, there is an exception here. I thought the minister might like to know that somebody loves him once in a while.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, there is no exemption on government of Canada bonds and the interest on them. There is, in some instances, an exemption with respect to withholding tax in cases where foreign owners have bought a general issue of government of Canada bonds which buyers are not taxable in the countries in which they reside. The general situation is that bond interest from government of Canada bonds is taxable in the hands of the recipient. Tax may be postponed by not clipping the coupons and by holding them to maturity. Quite often people aged, say, 55 buy Canada Savings Bonds and hold on to them for ten years. They may cash them when their income is lower and include all the amount received as income.

They have the option, even though they do not clip their coupons, to take the amount that would be received into account with respect to income if they so desire. However, once you move to an accrual basis, you must do that with respect to all interest earned. The same rules apply to non-government bonds. That is, unless the coupons are cashed they do not constitute part of income.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Chairman, would the minister explain the meaning of paragraph (j) on page 187, entitled "Social assistance payments"? Does this provision cover all social assistance payments made by any government? It does not mention a municipality or a town.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, all that we have done in paragraph (j), really, to change the existing situation is add to the words "the amount of any social assistance payment made on a means or a needs test basis", the words "(i) by a registered Canadian charitable organization". The other part of the subparagraph reading, "(ii) under a prescribed program provided for by an act of Parliament of Canada or a law of a province" is already included in the law. This means, generally speaking, that where payments are made on a needs test, no matter whether they are made by the municipality for the province or not, they are made under provincial law and therefore they are tax exempt payments to the recipient. That, generally, is the case.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment to section 81 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Gray) agreed to.

Clause 1, section 81, as amended, agreed to.

On clause 1—section 126: Foreign tax deduction.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, when getting into technicalities such as we face with regard to the provisions of section 126, I suppose that once in a while we must on grounds of prudence throw the ball to somebody else. The ball I throw to the Minister of Finance or the parliamentary secretary is this. Have representations been received from any group with regard to the new provisions in the law that we are being asked to enact and, if so, what was the nature of the government's reply?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, the answer to this question will be in the category of the answer I gave to another question along the same line yesterday. I am sure that this matter has been alluded to in some of the tens of thousands of letters which have been received on the question of tax reform. I am not aware of any major representations that have come forward, nor am I aware of any forcible and well-reasoned arguments against these provisions.

Mr. McCleave: So those representations are not in the category of the brisk fight that has been put up by the co-operative movement in Canada?

Mr. Mahoney: Distinctly not; nor are they in the category of the cattlemen.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Chairman, recently when I was in New York attending sessions of the United Nations it was drawn to my attention that problems face employees of that organization. Those problems relate to income tax. I am sorry that I do not have all the details before me. However, I wanted to bring the matter to the attention of the minister and the parliamentary secretary because I understand that this problem has made it difficult to recruit Canadians for work in the United Nations or United Nations' agencies.

• (3:30 p.m.)

This, of course, has the unfortunate effect that there is not as high a degree of participation by Canadians in some international agencies, which may be due in part to this particular factor. I understand some of these problems are under study at the present time. However, I would appreciate the comments of the minister or the parliamentary secretary on this matter because I think it is one of considerable concern. Canada as a nation, through the government, has taken a considerable interest in the work of the United Nations and its many agencies. We should ensure that there are no unnecessary handicaps placed in the way of Canadians who may wish to work for the United Nations or some of its agencies.

I would appreciate the comments of the minister. I urge that any problems that exist which may prove to be a handicap to Canadians wishing to work for these agencies be considered and removed.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, the employees of the United Nations are not taxed by Canada. Employees of the Canadian delegation to the United Nations are taxed in the same way as we tax our servicemen overseas and foreign service employees on foreign postings. However, actual employees of the United Nations who are Canadian citizens are not taxed by Canada. If the hon. member can give me more details privately, I will look into the particular case and report to him. On the general basis of the law as I understand it, there does not seem to be any substance to the complaint the hon. member has heard.

Mr. Burton: I will be very happy to take up this matter with the department and the minister. I regret I do not have the details immediately before me. I understand that some of the problems go beyond taxation. I will be happy to follow up this matter.

Clause 1, section 126, agreed to.

On clause 1—section 144: "Employees profit sharing plan" defined.

The Deputy Chairman: On section 144 there is an amendment moved by the Minister of National Revenue, which appears at pages 8954 and 8955 of Hansard. Shall I dispense with reading the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Downey: I request that Your Honour read the amendment.

The Deputy Chairman: Moved by Mr. Gray:

Insert texte no. 1.

That section 144 as set forth in clause 1 of the said bill be amended by adding, immediately after subsection (8), the following subsection:

'Foreign tax deduction

(8.1) For the purpose of subsection 126(1), the following rules apply:

(a) that proportion of the income for a taxation year of a trust governed by an employees profit sharing plan from sources (other than businesses, carried on by it) in a foreign country that

(i) the aggregate of amounts allocated in the year by the trustee under the plan to a particular beneficiary under the plan is of

(ii) the aggregate of amounts allocated in the year by the trustee under the plan to all beneficiaries under the plan shall be deemed to be income of the particular beneficiary for the year from sources in that foreign country; and

(b) a particular beneficiary under the plan shall be deemed to have paid as non-business-income tax for a taxation year, on the income that he is deemed by paragraph (a) to have for the year from sources in a foreign country, to the government of that country an amount equal to that proportion of the non-business-income tax paid by the trust for the year to the government of that country, or to the government of a state, province or other political subdivision of that country (except such portion of that tax as was deductible under subsection 20(11) in computing its income for the year) that

(i) the amount determined under subparagraph (a)(i) in respect of the particular beneficiary for the year

(ii) the amount determined under subparagraph (a)(ii) for the year.'

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I think this section follows pretty closely the recommendations arrived at after a considerable struggle and representations before the House of Commons committee. As one who had a part in that, I am not prepared to raise substantial issues about section 144 and the couple of sections following. However, I ask the parliamentary secretary whether there is a substantial body of Canadians who feel their oxen are being gored by this provision, or whether the government is prepared to live with the recommendation of the committee, a recommendation that I support.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, we have had representations regarding this section, of course. Employee profit sharing plan tax treatment was the subject of considerable representations in the committee subsequent to the publication of Bill C-259.

Mr. McCleave: I ask the parliamentary secretary if the amendment is to meet any substantial point that has been presented.

Mr. Mahoney: Yes, Mr. Chairman. This amendment does meet one of the very substantial points that has been raised. It is to make it clear that the beneficiaries of an employees' profit sharing plan are able to obtain relief under section 126 for any income taxes imposed on that portion of the foreign service income allocated to them by the trustee. There have been other representations to which we have not agreed to date.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Chairman, this section is very important. It was drawn to my attention by numerous letters that I received, especially from the Simpsons company in Toronto which has an employee profit sharing plan which has been in operation for a good many years. I received between 50 and 75 letters from workers of Simpsons who had been notified that the new provisions will directly affect their profit sharing scheme.

When these people retired, under the old scheme they were permitted to take a lump sum payment. There were very generous averaging provisions with regard to income tax. It is my understanding, and their understanding also, that this advantage has been substantially reduced. These people have a perfect right to be concerned about it. There is nothing worse than having a job or position, participating in a scheme with the company in anticipation that when you retire certain moneys will be payable to you, and find when you retire that there has been a change in the rules of the game which was not imposed by the employer but in a taxation scheme of the government. That is precisely what has happened in situation.

I would like the parliamentary secretary to address himself to these questions and give the answers. In my case, the answers will be sent to the people who wrote to me about their problem. First, what changes will take place to the profit sharing plan in which these people participate, as a result of the new legislation? Second, what relief may they obtain from the new provisions of the act? In other words, if a person has to take a lump sum payment and is going to be taxed at the new rate, how can he avoid the heavy taxation he will have to pay?

I think I am aware of some of the answers the minister may give with regard to the increases in exemptions. The personal exemptions may be of some benefit to them. I would like him to go into this question in depth. We have a responsibility to the people who have participated in profit sharing plans and we as a government should take the right steps to protect the security these people have enjoyed.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, section 144 may not be the section to which the hon. member wants to refer. He may be dealing with deferred profit sharing plans which are covered in section 146. Section 144 deals with the share-as-you-go plan where last year's profits are calculated. Payments are made into an employee's account for the year and he pays tax on it at that particular time. It is basically an employment incentive device. Basically, there are no changes applicable to this provision in the new law that are not of a general nature. For example, capital gains realized in the plan will now be taxable, whereas previously they were not. There are changes of that nature.

The hon. member referred to changes in rates and exemptions. These are covered elsewhere. Since the question has been asked, perhaps I can answer it. In drawing out the money when he retires or becomes entitled to it, the employee is entitled to a general averaging provision. He is also entitled to purchase an income averaging annuity under the new law and thereby defer payment of taxes to minimize the taxation.

Under section 36 of the Income Tax Act a very favourable averaging provision exists. The general averaging that has been offered to these employees for the future will not be as favourable as that which they enjoy under present section 36 for payments made into a plan up to the end of the current calendar year. There is no retroactivity in these changes. Payments made after the new system comes into effect on January 1, 1972, will be subject to the new method. Payments to the plan during the current year, while the present law is in force, will continue to benefit from the provisions of the present law.

Mr. Gilbert: I thank the parliamentary secretary for his answer. I did not notice section 146, Mr. Chairman, otherwise I would have raised the question under that section. The parliamentary secretary is quite correct with regard to the problems of the Simpsons' employees in Toronto. The next question is: What period will be allowed employees who will be sharing these moneys, to spread them out so that they can collect their moneys?

• (3:40 p.m.)

Mr. Mahoney: The law permits the plan to provide that all or any part of the amount may be paid in equal instalments not less frequently than annually over ten years. Then the employee in purchasing an annuity may choose one of a term not longer than 15 years certain. I apologize to the hon. member for referring to section 146. This is one of the sections we have already passed, so it will not be coming up later.

Mr. Gilbert: Is a person confined to purchasing a government annuity, or are there other annuities he can purchase which comply with the restrictions?

Mr. Mahoney: It is not required to be a government annuity. It could be an annuity offered by a financial institution with whom he is dealing at arm's length.

Mr. McCleave: May I ask a technical question arising out of section 144? It has to do with the interesting legal phrase "not being dealt with at arm's length". Is this an attempt to differentiate between the owner of a business and a person who manages a business? This wording appears in section 144 (1). The first few lines contain a reference to "arm's length".

Mr. Mahoney: It is not a managerial section necessarily, but certainly it is an ownership section. If the person setting up a profit sharing plan for himself, in addition to being an employee controls a company or is a member of a group, he cannot do it.

Amendment (Mr. Gray) agreed to.

Clause 1, section 144, as amended, agreed to.

On Clause 1—section 145: Definitions

Mr. McCleave: May I ask a question of the parliamentary secretary with reference to this section which deals with registered supplementary unemployment benefit plans? I did in fact ask this question some time ago, but it might be as well to ask it again so that anybody reading the record can find the answer here instead of pages back in Hansard.

Why was it considered that registered supplementary unemployment benefit plans or payment from such plans should be considered as income, when strike pay is not? It seems to me there is really no difference in principle except that such payments may come from different sources. It is true the unions would be expected to save up money for strike pay and that the registered supplementary unemployment benefit plan could be as a result of collective bargaining. I think a brief explanation would be helpful.

Mr. Mahoney: This particular plan is one which is funded by an employer who deducts his contributions from his taxable income. The plan itself pays no tax on income as it earns it; the tax becomes payable when employees derive benefit from it. So there is no element of double taxation. In the case of strike pay, it is often financed from taxed dollars contributed by employees generally belonging to the particular union involved, and the taxation of strike pay benefits paid out of such a fund would involve a significant element of double taxation.

Mr. McCleave: I suppose the answer to the question is that since the people who make contributions to strike pay funds do not claim those contributions as deductions, they are not regarded as taxable.

Mr. Mahoney: I suppose there could be an element of double taxation since un-taxed dollars go into the fund to the extent that ordinary regular dues, or a portion of them, are allocated to the fund. But any strike pay contributions which are identified as such are not a deductible item from the employee making them.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Chairman, prior to the changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act, when a person retired he usually obtained unemployment insurance for a period of one year. As a result of the changes to the act, this is not now the case. If I understand it correctly, a person reaching the age of 65 is now entitled to three weeks' retirement pay. I am wondering whether this amount is taxable, and is it taxable under this particular section?

Mr. Mahoney: Not under this section, Mr. Chairman, but it would be taxable.

Clause 1, section 145, agreed to.

On Clause 1—section 148: Amounts included in computing policy holders income.

The Deputy Chairman: On section 148 the committee has before it an amendment moved by the Minister of National Revenue. The amendment appears at page 8955 of Hansard for October 22 and is designed to correct the French version of the bill. Shall I dispense with reading the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Gray) agreed to.

Clause 1, section 148, as amended, agreed to.

On clause 1—section 149: Employees of a country other than Canada.

The Deputy Chairman: On section 149 there is an amendment moved by the Minister of National Revenue, appearing at the same page of Hansard for October 22. Shall I dispense with reading the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Gray) agreed to.

Clause 1, section 149, as amended, agreed to.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, could I raise a point of order? The parliamentary secretary and I have discussed this matter but it might be helpful, since hon. members are continuing to dwindle away because we will not be here for the next few days, if the parliamentary secretary would make a statement as to which sections in our "clean-up list", as it is vulgarly known among the House leaders, we will be considering for the rest of the afternoon. At that point we would leave the substantial question of capital gains, say, until Monday. Then hon. members will understand exactly what we are being asked to deal with this afternoon.

Mr. Mahoney: Yes, Mr. Chairman. It would be the government's intention, if we finish this group of items relating to personal income tax, to proceed to division J which deals with appeals to the Tax Review Board and the Federal Court, then to division I which deals with returns, assessments, payments and appeals, and then to part XV which deals with administration and enforcement. Those are areas that are generally related to each other in terms of the collection and assessment of income tax and appeals from assessments. If by any chance we finish those items before six o'clock, we would suggest to the committee that we call it six o'clock and not move to a new area of substantial concern.

The Deputy Chairman: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the hon. member for Battle River rising on a point of order?

Mr. Downey: No, Mr. Chairman. I have a question relating back to section 149 and I wonder whether it would be possible for the parliamentary secretary to clarify the point. Do I understand that members of a family or servants of an employer who are employees of a country other than Canada are not subject, under this section, to taxation by our internal revenue department? Is that a correct assumption, or have I misread it?

Mr. Mahoney: No, Mr. Chairman, that is correct. This provision deals with the assorted exemptions from income taxation. Paragraph (a) of subsection (1) refers to an officer or servant of a government of a country other than Canada. This would be the employee of a foreign country working in Canada, for example. That employee must be a citizen of that foreign country or have come from that foreign country. This provision would not exempt from taxation a Canadian working as a chauffeur to an embassy here, for example.

Mr. Downey: If at any stage such a person applied for citizenship status, he would no longer be exempt under this section?

Mr. Mahoney: That is correct, Mr. Chairman.

On clause 1—section 198: Tax on non-qualified investments and use of assets as security.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member is aware, I hope, that section 149 has already been adopted. Shall section 198 carry?

Mr. Downey: Section 148.

The Deputy Chairman: No, section 198 at page 483. Shall section 198 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause 1, section 198, agreed to.

Clause 1, sections 199 to 203 inclusive, agreed to.

On clause 1—section 204: Definitions.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I do not think section 204 is really before us, according to the understanding.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member will recall, I believe we were dealing with section 204 under another block of sections and agreed to refer it forward to this one rather than deal with it in the previous block.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 204 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause 1, section 204, agreed to.

On clause 1—section 205: Application of Part.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, since there are several sections here, this one and the ones following, dealing with tax in respect of certain property acquired by trusts, etc., governed by deferred income plans, it might be helpful to deal with sections 205, 206 and 207 en bloc. They fall within the same family and the parliamentary secretary might give us an explanation of them. I gather they are uncontroversial, but an explanation might be helpful for the record.

Mr. Mahoney: Yes, Mr. Chairman. These sections commencing at section 205, being part XI of the bill, deal with certain property acquired by trusts that are involved in deferred income plans. Section 205 describes who will be subject to these special rules. The new rules will apply to a trust for a registered pension plan, a trust for a registered retirement savings plan and a trust for a deferred profit sharing plan.

Section 206 provides that a share of the capital stock or investment acquired after the date of publication of this amendment—this in effect goes back to budget day, June 18—will be foreign property unless it is prescribed otherwise by regulation. Mr. Chairman, we have an amendment to section 206 which will make this clear. Section 206 imposes the tax on the trust for a registered pension plan, a registered savings plan and a deferred profit sharing plan that holds foreign property in excess of 10 per cent of its property, and also defines foreign property. I do not know whether hon. members want me to go into detail on that.

There is an amendment to section 207 which will add a marginal note of considerable impact. Section 207 deals with the filing of the return and payment of the tax that is levied under section 206. I think that covers the whole block of sections.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I suppose this question will be considered to be technical. It arises out of the fact, as the parliamentary secretary said, that the burden of taxation does commence as of a day that has long since gone, June 18, 1971, when the budget was presented. I suppose there must be situations now in which people will be liable for that tax and they will have to know that this particular bill is passed. Am I correct in that? What administrative difficulty arises as a result of this situation?

Mr. Mahoney: That is not quite the situation, because they are quite free to deal with this type of investment during the interval. But if they have acquired it since budget day and still own it on January 1, then it does come into the type of property which will be subject to special taxation. However, they are all on notice that this is the effect, and they are quite at liberty to bring their holdings down before the end of the year to a point where they will not be liable to taxation.

Clause 1, section 205, agreed to.

On clause 1—section 206: Tax payable.

The Deputy Chairman: There is an amendment to section 206, moved by the Minister of National Revenue, which is to be found at page 8958 of Hansard for October 22. Shall I dispense with reading the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Dispense.

Amendment (Mr. Gray) agreed to.

Clause 1, section 206, as amended, agreed to.

On clause 1, section 207: Return and payment of tax.

The Deputy Chairman: There is also an amendment to section 207, moved by the Minister of National Revenue, which is to be found at page 8958 of Hansard for October 22. It is to amend the French version of this section. Shall I dispense with reading the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Dispense.

Amendment (Mr. Gray) agreed to.

Clause 1, section 207, as amended, agreed to.

On clause 1—section 248: Definitions.

The Deputy Chairman: There is an amendment to section 248, moved by the Minister of National Revenue, which is to be found at page 8960 of Hansard for October 22, 1971.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might make a point here because there are at least two definition sections which refer to coming events, namely, the capital gain or capital loss provisions in the bill, which I am sure we will pass since we are in an especially friendly mood now—and heaven only knows what will happen before the day is out. We may all qualify for the Nobel Peace prize. We all receive nomination letters. I will nominate the parliamentary secretary if he will nominate me.

The question I pose is, if there should be substantial changes in the capital gains situation that is to be considered next week, perhaps we should have a gentlemen's agreement that we would open up the interpretation section again.

Mr. Mahoney: That is fine, Mr. Chairman, but I cannot visualize that this will be necessary unless we transfer definitions from one section to another, involving renumbering. However, that is quite agreeable.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a few remarks on this section. I think the hon. member who just spoke has a point which should not be taken lightly. In this section we have all the definitions of phrases used throughout the bill. So if there are to be throughout the bill major amendments or any amendments, this would challenge every definition. As a consequence, if we pass this section now we will find ourselves in a procedural hang-up which would be difficult to resolve.

I think this section should be left open. For example, the definition here of "fishing" is something which naturally catches my eye. It states that "'fishing' includes fishing for or catching shell fish, crustaceans and marine animals, but does not include an office or employment under a person engaged in the business of fishing." Personally, I would challenge that definition. I could give some details why I would do so. However, rather than becoming hung-up on this section now, I think members should take a look at it and make a mental note of places where they might differ with the interpretation. My feeling is that if we become involved in this section after passing it, we could find ourselves in difficulty later. If we are to move on, then I should like to make comments now over and above what I have just said.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, once again we could go back to the old bible in the business of commerce, which is the Canadian Master Tax Guide for 1960. The point raised by the hon. member has been well considered in the law courts. Under one decision a supervisor of a commercial fishing company is held not to qualify as a fisherman. I suspect that anyone who goes down to the sea and throws in some bait could qualify, and that someone who sits in an office watching the fishing fleet could not qualify.

The Chairman: I wish to remind hon. members that there is an amendment moved by the Minister of National Revenue with which we must deal.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Chairman, I noticed a few minutes ago that the Minister of Finance nodded approvingly in respect of the remarks of my friend from Halifax. I wonder, wherever he might be now—perhaps behind the curtains smoking his pipe—if he is in a position to react to the suggestion. We might take capital gains. I do not know what the interpretation is here. However, we are to be involved in a lengthy discussion on that matter. Will these difficulties in any way affect the definition given here? I do not know. I am thinking out loud.

Then there is the definition in respect of "fishing". The danger of the definition here is that it could very well, if it is strictly adhered to, eliminate under this tax legislation 60 per cent or 70 per cent of all the fishermen on the Atlantic or in Canada as a whole, because most Canadian fishing crews are made up of a number of equals in a fishing craft. I do not expect the parliamentary secretary to be able to respond to this now because it is a difficult matter. But most people involved on a fishing craft are equals. There could be five or six people in a small fishing craft, operating in an equal fashion who are in no way subservient to any one member of the crew.

If in calculating or computing expenses for tax purposes they had to be restricted to one individual receiving the nod as being a qualified fisherman under the act, while other people are in an inferior position, it would prejudice these people so far as their taxation position is concerned. I do not know whether I am reading the section properly because, to be honest, I do not understand about 5 pounds, 13 ounces of this bill, but if there is a relevant comment which the parliamentary secretary would like to make, I would be glad to hear it.

Mr. Mahoney: Perhaps the hon. member has not understood the purport of the commitment which I made to the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants. If when we reach the substantive sections of the bill amendments to this section are indicated, we have committed ourselves to reopen it for amendment. The particular definition with which the hon. member is concerned continues in exactly the same language. The definition contained in the present section 139(1)(q), as the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants has indicated, is enshrined in the law and in a great many judicial precedents.

Nothing in this section will change what exists now, and if the hon. member is dissatisfied with the law as it exists I would assume that there are other places in the act than in the definitions section where his amendment would be appropriate. However, if in dealing with the substantive sections of the bill we strike a position where a definition requires amendment, we will certainly reopen the section for that purpose.

Mr. Lundrigan: I will accept the position of the parliamentary secretary if this is in fact the definition under which we have been working. I am quite satisfied. I was not familiar with it. Also, if that is acceptable to my hon. friend I will go along with it.

The Chairman: The Chair will put the motion moved by the Minister of National Revenue. As hon. members know, it appears in Hansard for October 22, at page 8960. Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Gray) agreed to.

Clause 1, 248, as amended, agreed to.

On clause 1—section 249: "Taxation year"

Mr. Burton: I trust that the hon. member for York East and some other hon. members will note that the section which we have just passed covers a total of 16 pages. But coming to section 249 there is one matter of interest that I should like to take up with the government, that is, where it specifies and defines the term "taxation year". It states that for a corporation it shall be a fiscal period, which of course would mean that it could either be a calendar year or other than a calendar year. But in the case of an individual the section specifies that it shall be a calendar year.

The section makes it very specific that when dealing with individual taxpayers we shall deal with taxation on a calendar year basis. The individual has no alternative. A corporation is provided with the option of establishing its fiscal period in a way that will best suit its business operations. I think there is some merit in such a system. I also realize that there must be some control in this area. I am not sure whether the department simply accepts whatever fiscal period a corporation may decide upon, or if it decides upon a change in its fiscal year whether this is automatically accepted by the department.

I would be interested in obtaining that information from the parliamentary secretary. I know there is no option left open to the individual taxpayer. I see no reason why there should not be a provision whereby an individual taxpayer, because of the nature of his business, the nature of his income earning, should not be able to at least have an opportunity to establish his taxation year other than on a strictly calendar year basis.

I recognize that there does have to be some control over this matter, otherwise it would produce a good deal of confusion and difficulty for the department. I would certainly not object to some control being built in either in terms of variance from the calendar year procedure or leaving it to the discretion or concurrence of the minister. This is certainly in line with many other provisions of the act. But it seems to me that in some cases there is a good case for establishing other than a calendar year. I hope the government would find it possible to qualify this section in such a way that the individual taxpayer in Canada can qualify for variance from the calendar year provision in the same way as a corporation. I hope to have a response from the government on this matter.

Mr. Mahoney: The hon. member is quite correct. A corporation is free to establish its fiscal year in the initial year in which it starts business. It requires the consent of the Minister of National Revenue to change that year thereafter. So I do not think there is any significant element of tax deferral, and certainly no element of tax avoidance is implicit in the date selected for the fiscal year. What may be postponed in the initial instance is caught up once the company starts operating on a regular basis. There is no real advantage.

However, the hon. member may be under some misapprehension when he refers to the individual taxpayer engaged in a business. Business proprietors are also entitled to select their own year and determine their income during the year for the business. Then the proprietor himself, of course, includes his income, or the partner includes his share of the partnership income in his personal income for that year and pays tax on it the following April 30.

I do not know how many sections of this bill would have to be amended if we were to give individual taxpayers the option to pick their year. The dates on which quarterly instalments are made by people with significant amounts of investment and professional income would have to be made flexible to meet that situation. The dates upon which penalties apply, and many other dates, would be up for revision and would have to be made flexible. I am not really satisfied that it is a workable solution.

The trauma of having the national tax paying day on April 30 every year is one that the taxpayer seems to have become accustomed to on a regular basis. Perhaps it is the sort of thing that one would just as soon get over once and for all, rather than having various people on the block reporting their income tax on a weekly basis and the matter becoming a topic of general conversation 52 weeks a year.

The Chairman: Is the hon. member for Regina East pursuing this matter?

Mr. Burton: I just wish to deal with the comments of the parliamentary secretary. I recognize, of course, that in the provisions which are set out for a corporation it does not involve tax avoidance or tax deferral in any way to use a period other than the calendar year. Certainly it was not my intention to suggest any such thing. Nevertheless, it is a matter of convenience for many corporations to establish for their own reasons a fiscal period which is other than the calendar year, and as a further convenience for taxation purposes this fiscal period is deemed to be, in effect, the taxation year. But when it comes to an individual, the parliamentary secretary pointed out that some businesses and proprietors of businesses as such are able to use a period other than the calendar year.

• (4:20 p.m.)

I am not clear whether it is possible for farmers, fishermen and other occupational groups engaged in economic activity which is other than a wage earning type of activity, to take advantage of this provision and I would appreciate having this point clarified. The parliamentary secretary also seems to throw up some road blocks in terms of the mechanical difficulties that would be involved in making a change to this section. I am not too impressed with that point. It seems to me it might be possible to work in an amendment along the lines of stipulating that the tax year in the case of an individual is the calendar year or, if the minister gives his consent, a period other than the calendar year shall be deemed to be the taxation year.

I do not pretend to be an expert in drafting law, but it should be a relatively simple matter to make an appropriate amendment if there were the desire or will to do so. I hope we will have some response from the parliamentary secretary beyond what he has already indicated.

Mr. Mahoney: First, Mr. Chairman, I am not aware of any provision that would prevent farmers or fishermen choosing any year other than the calendar year, although I am sure, from practice and custom, that very few of them do so. Before the hon. member seriously suggests that an individual on wage or salary be allowed to select his own tax year, he might like to discuss the matter with the treasurer or controller of the federated co-ops to see how they would handle the issue of T-4 slips, accounting for Canada Pension Plan contributions, their own registered retirement saving plans contributions and the other tax deductions they have made within a 365-day period for their several thousand employees, all of whom no doubt would have exercised the option. So that at least a few of those details would have to be issued daily, rather than as a chore which is faced up to once a year for each employee. I think that the hon. member, on reflection, would agree that this would be a rather horrendous administrative burden to foist upon Canadian employers.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Chairman, I have had experience in doing accounting work for co-operative organizations, and for the information of the parliamentary secretary I do have fairly good knowledge on the matter. In this age of computers and mechanical systems available to undertake such work, I am sure that where there is a will there is a way to solve whatever administrative problems would arise. In fact, I am not sure that this matter has been of great concern in the minds of those drafting some of the other provisions of the bill.

[Mr. Burton.]

Mr. Downey: Mr. Chairman, in regard to this section on the taxation year and the difference in the treatment of corporations and individuals there is a point to be made, because in many businesses there are specific trading patterns, or buying and selling patterns, and the individual in business may not find it convenient to have the calendar year as his taxation year.

I can think of an example that is very common in my own business of farming and ranching. Often, as a result of pressures exerted in the industry due to feed shortages or market fluctuations of one kind or another, there are forced sales where in fact two complete cash crops have to be sold in one year. In this situation we have the individual, rather than paying the much higher tax that he would have to pay if his income were distributed over two years being forced into the marketplace around the end of the year, about Christmas time, and having to make a purchase of livestock. And he may not even take the livestock he purchases back to his place of business; he may leave them in a public stockyard until New Year's Day so that he can qualify for a fairer level of taxation on his business. In such circumstances I cannot see why we cannot treat an individual on the same basis as a corporation.

Maybe we could use the criterion of having 80 per cent or 90 per cent of the shares of a corporation owned by the family or the individual in question. This is a subject we discussed the other day when sections 28 to 32 were before the committee. A brief from the Canadian Federation of Agriculture indicated they thought it would be fair if the family corporation in which 80 per cent or 90 per cent of the shares were owned by the individual in question could be treated the same as an individual taxpayer, taking into account the $1,000 exemption on homes and similar provisions. I think it is only fair that the minister should consider extending this option to the individual so far as the definition of "taxation year" is concerned.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member misunderstood or did not hear the answer that I gave the hon. member for Regina East. Certainly there is no reason why a farmer, fisherman or small business proprietor cannot choose his fiscal year. It is his personal income tax that is due on April 30 each year for the previous calendar year, but for business purposes, if it suits his convenience and if there is some advantage to him, he is entitled—the same as a corporation—to pick any one of the 365 days in a year that suits his purposes and, I suppose, his auditor's convenience.

Mr. Downey: Mr. Chairman, I realize the date can be switched once, but I believe there is some difficulty with the department in shifting the date for the year's end more than once. This is something which would have to be looked at very carefully because of the incidence of tax avoidance. But there should be some leeway provided.

Mr. Mahoney: A businessman is in exactly the same position as a corporation. He may, with the approval of the Minister of National Revenue, change the date of his fiscal year end. The criterion is that it must be for a bona fide business reason. If he were anticipating a very significant amount of income in a particular period, he might have difficulty convincing the minister that his intention in changing his year end is not to defer tax but is for a legitimate business reason. For example, if you propose to merge two companies you can go to the minister and get this permission in order to have all financial statements dovetailed, and start with a clean sheet. There are many legitimate reasons for changing the year end. I suppose "frequently" would not be the correct word, but these changes are not an unusual occurrence.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I should like to be irreverent for about ten seconds and then report an injustice. One distinguished taxpayer was born on February 29 and he annually reports a very substantial income. If the parliamentary secretary's words were to be taken literally, I wonder how much income tax Henri Richard of the Montreal Canadians would pay. He might decide to make his peace with the Income Tax Department every four years instead of every year.

The injustice probably fits in with the general idea of what the taxation year is, and arises out of the circumstances of some Canadians whose income is derived entirely from investment. These investments may be timed through the year so that the first interest payment comes in June and the second in October. As I understand the existing regulations, they can be asked to make four payments a year on those investments. The first payment would take place in March before they had received any income whatever from the investments for that year. I do not want to belabour the point and I only raise it because I think it is an injustice which can be cured by making the regulations more flexible.

These people could be given an option on when the payments start. I do not expect an answer this afternoon but I would expect the parliamentary secretary to say that this question would be looked into.

Mr. Mahoney: Yes, Mr. Chairman, we certainly will look into it.

Mr. Ritchie: I have a question related to the question of the hon. member for Battle River. Am I to understand, assuming that an incorporated businessman has multiple income, that he can select a date, say October 31, for a particular business but still report the following April his personal income tax?

Mr. Mahoney: That is correct. He can select that his business or medical practice operate on a fiscal year basis starting November 1 and ending October 31. The income up to October 31 would be income for that year and he would pay tax the following April 30. The income he earned in business during November and December would be carried forward and not be reported as personal income until the following year, and any tax paid in respect of it until April 30 the succeeding year.

Of course, instalment payments such as the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants mentioned would be paid throughout on that professional income because it is not subject to deduction at source.

Mr. Downey: Mr. Chairman, I wonder what the situation would be if we had a new tax bill reported to be coming in on January 1 and an individual or small corporation with a year end of September 30. Bringing this forward in terms of capital cost allowance, in the depreciation schedule what will the effect be, or how will the taxpayer react to the year end at the end of September and the new system coming in at the beginning of January, in regard to these items.

Will he have to take this interim period and have another tax report filed for those three months? Will the same rules that held under the depreciation schedule hold true until the end of the calendar year so that any item he buys before the end of the calendar year will be recorded under the old tax act? Would the parliamentary secretary clarify this situation?

Mr. Mahoney: For corporations there will be proration and, for example, if their fiscal year runs from July 1 to the end of June they would have to calculate the tax on half their income on the basis of the present act and half on the basis of the new act.

For individuals there is no problem. They move into a calendar year and the individual tax system is applicable for that whole year. For the proprietor who derives his income from a business, if he derives it from a business until October 31 this year, that is all taxable under the present system. In effect, the income he has deferred for November and December this year would be picked up and he would not receive it as personal income until 1972, and it would be taxable under the new system. There is no proration of personal tax necessary under the new system.

Mr. Burton: I noted the parliamentary secretary said that farmers, fishermen and any unincorporated type of business enterprise can take advantage of the provision to have the taxation year on a basis other than the calendar year. I accept the parliamentary secretary's word that such is the case. I believe he indicated that he knew of nothing that would prevent a farmer or fisherman using a fiscal period other than the calendar year.

I have before me a copy of the 1970 Farmers and Fishermen's Tax Guide. I have looked through it quite carefully. I may have missed something, but I see absolutely nothing in it that points out to the taxpayer that he can choose a period other than the calendar year—this would be with respect to starting his operation—or that he can change that time period with the consent of the minister. There is nothing in the guide that points this out.

I am not doubting the parliamentary secretary's word, but if that is the case surely it would be reasonable to have a reference in the tax guide to that effect. It seems to me that this is quite inadequate. I agree that there may be many cases when it would not be used, but there are cases when it would. I think there should be provision in the law that consideration be given to problems facing individual taxpayers just as is the case with corporations.

Mr. Mahoney: I shall certainly refer the hon. member's statement concerning the tax guide to the Minister of National Revenue. I do not have a copy in front of me so I cannot comment on it.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate what the parliamentary secretary has said and I hope there will be some follow-up because I feel this matter deserves further attention. I therefore propose to move an amendment to section 249(1)(b) as follows:

Add after the word "year" in line 6 on page 580 the following:

"except where the minister gives his consent to the individual to use a fiscal period other than the calendar year".

I would commend this amendment to the committee because I think we should at least provide an opportunity for the individual taxpayer to have his case considered if he feels he has a case for using a period other than the calendar year. I might point out that the way I phrase this amendment sets the calendar year as the starting point and then simply opens the door to the possibility of a variation of the calendar year approach. I think it is very important that we should consider this question in terms of treating the individual taxpayer in the same way as we treat corporations.

The Chairman: The committee has heard the amendment moved by the hon. member for Regina East. Unless there are procedural arguments as to why the motion is not acceptable, I think it should be accepted.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment (Mr. Burton) negatived: Yeas, 12; nays, 19.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall section 249 carry?

Mr. Downey: Mr. Chairman, since the vote was close perhaps there ought to be a recount.

The Chairman: Shall section 249 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause 1, section 249, agreed to.

On clause 1—section 250: Extended meaning of resident.

The Chairman: Hon. members of the committee will note that an amendment to section 250 was moved on October 22 last by the Minister of National Revenue, as recorded at page 8960 of Hansard. Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Gray) agreed to.

Clause 1, section 250, as amended, agreed to.

On clause 1—Section 251: Arm's length.

The Chairman: I would draw the attention of the committee to the amendment to this section, moved by the Minister of National Revenue on October 22, 1971, as recorded at page 8960 of Hansard for that date. Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment (Mr. Gray) agreed to.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Chairman, since there may be legitimate dealings within a family that may be at arm's length, and since these transactions may not be always recognized as being arm's length transactions, is there any recourse to appeal or other mechanism for people who wish to establish that the transaction they entered into would come under the purview of this section?

[Mr. Burton.]

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, the section we are considering defines what is arm's length. To answer the hon. member's question I would need a concrete example of the type of transaction he is asking about. This section does not allow or prohibit anything; it simply defines what is arm's length. It is other sections of the bill, such as the ones that were dealt with at some length on Friday, which preclude non-arm's length transactions being entered into without incurring an element of tax. Tax would not be incurred if the people dealing with each other were totally unrelated.

That my wife and I are not at arm's length is not a rebuttable presumption. We are not. The bill precludes us from entering into certain business arrangements without my incurring a degree of taxation that I would not incur if I made the same deal with the hon. member opposite. So without knowing precisely what type of transaction he has in mind so that I may look at the substantive section of the bill and not the definition section in order to see whether the facts of the case fit into an arm's length relationship, I really cannot answer the question.

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Chairman, I have a question to ask, the relevance of which will become apparent as time goes on. I know why these definitions have been incorporated into this particular section. I am curious about the procedures or remedies that will be open to people in cases where there is controversy as to whether a transaction is at arm's length or not. Perhaps I may give an exaggerated illustration to render my meaning clear. If a transaction takes place between me and my wife, it will not be considered as being at arm's length. But if there is a divorce and a subsequent remarriage and a transaction takes place between husband No. 1 and husband No. 2, what is the position? Is that, or is that not an arm's length transaction?

Mr. Mahoney: Yes, that is at arm's length.

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Chairman, I have a further question. That transaction is apparently at arm's length. Yet how will you determine, in cases of controversy, whether such a transaction preceded or did not precede the divorce?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, the time of the transaction is a question of fact and those asserting that it took place at a certain time would have to establish that date. Also, any person suggesting that it took place at another time would have to sustain that position. That is the sort of thing that appeal boards and courts must determine fairly regularly.

Mr. Danforth: Could I be more explicit. How will that determination be made? Will it be through a court action or through departmental regulation? How will the final decision be made?

Mr. Mahoney: The initial determination would be made by the assessor. If the taxpayer does not agree with that determination he can appeal the assessment and take the matter right up to the Supreme Court of Canada if necessary.

Mr. Danforth: Thank you. That answers my question.

Mr. Osler: Mr. Chairman, I have a short question. In some respects this country is still a great big parish and one is often startled to find how many cousins one can run into. Some cousins are kissing cousins and some are not. There are some cousins with whom, according to the laws of consanguinity, you can do certain things and there are cousins with whom, according to the laws of consanguinity, one cannot do certain things.

Mr. Baldwin: They must be kept at arm's length.

Mr. Osler: Of course, there is no personal preference in this. Is there any definition of such relationships? It seems to me that you can legitimately do business with people who are distantly related to you by blood. Is there any definition as to where this blood relationship cuts off, so to speak, and where it does not? You will find such a definition in holy mother church and in other areas. Is there such a definition in the law?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, subsection (6) of section 251 defines the various areas of blood relationship where transactions are automatically deemed to be not at arm's length.

Mr. Osler: Would the parliamentary secretary repeat that subsection?

Mr. Mahoney: It is subsection 6 on page 584 of the bill.

Clause 1, section 251, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 1, sections 252 and 254 agreed to.

The Chairman: In accordance with the arrangement stated by the President of the Privy Council, as recorded on pages 9494 and 9495 of Hansard for November 9, the committee will now proceed to the consideration of sections 150 to 168. Shall section 150 carry?

On clause 1—section 150: Returns.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, there may have been a slight switch in the arrangement. I thought that the part dealing with appeals, which is found in division J between sections 169 and 180, was to be dealt with first and that division I consisting of sections 150 to 168 would be next. Perhaps I could make some brief remarks with regard to division I, if it is the wish of the committee to consider that division first.

• (4:50 p.m.)

We again get into the question, particularly with new law, of estates and capital gains. Can we have an undertaking from the parliamentary secretary—I am sure we will—that should there be other changes when we deal with capital gains proper, we can have the option of reopening this section?

Mr. Mahoney: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Clause 1, section 150, agreed to.

On clause 1—section 151: Estimate of tax

Mr. Downey: Mr. Chairman, under section 150, "Estimate of tax," I note there was an excess of tax collected in prepayments last year to the extent of 10 per cent of the total revenue of the government. It becomes a matter of who is a servant to whom, when we look at the estimate of tax and the way it is collected. When it reaches the point where 10 per cent of the total funds are being returned to the taxpayer, it seems this is overdoing it. I realize that people die during the year, change employment or lose their jobs and become unemployed. A certain amount of tax collection over and above the amount that is necessary then becomes a fact of life.

We should carefully consider who is working for the convenience of whom. Does the taxpayer exist for the convenience of those who are supposed to work for him, or is the taxpayer a servant of the bureaucracy that exists in the department? I would like to hear this concept discussed, because it can get out of hand. Everything must be relevant.

Mr. Mahoney: No, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member's concept is not accurate.

Mr. Downey: The parliamentary secretary says that my concept is not accurate. Are the figures that I quoted with regard to overcollection of taxes or refunds to the extent of approximately 10 per cent in the last year very far out? Which of my comments is not accurate?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I am not aware of the figures the hon. member is quoting. Perhaps he should cite the source. I will be glad to check them against the source. However, his concept that the taxpayer exists as a servant of the bureaucracy is not, I suggest, accurate.

Mr. Downey: I do not have available the figures I was referring to but I can provide the parliamentary secretary with them at the beginning of next week. It was reported publicly that this was the case—that there was a 10 per cent overcollection of taxes and that this amount had been refunded. If this is the case—and I can provide the parliamentary secretary with the document which cited these figures—has the hon. gentleman any comment to make on this situation?

• (5:00 p.m.)

Mr. Mahoney: I think the hon. member will agree that in all fairness I should have an opportunity to see the figures before commenting on their significance.

Mr. Downey: I will provide the parliamentary secretary with the figures next week.

Clause 1, section 151, agreed to.

On clause 1—section 152: Assessment.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: There is an amendment to section 152, to be found in Hansard of October 22 at page 8955, in the name of the Minister of National Revenue. Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Gray) agreed to.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall the section as amended carry?

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask some basic questions which have occurred to most taxpayers. They arise under this section. It is always a matter of concern to taxpayers that when an assessment is made with respect to any delinquency of theirs there are always penalties levied and interest charges exacted against the taxpayer. That is fine. But whenever the government is delinquent in returning an overpayment or an amount to which a taxpayer is otherwise entitled, no such consideration is given. It seems the traffic is all one way. How is this principle justified?

The second question is this. According to my understanding it is possible for the revenue department to go back four years for reassessment purposes unless fraud is involved. Is my understanding as to this practice correct, or not? There is always a question in people's minds as to how long they should keep day to day papers recording business transactions on file, or whether they can be disposed of after a few years. I am not thinking of cases involving fraud or misrepresentation but of papers used for the filling out of ordinary income tax forms.

Mr. Mahoney: First, there is a change in the bill before us as compared with the existing act. The existing act provides that overpayments shall be reimbursed together with interest at 4 per cent. This bill will allow interest rates to be set by regulation from time to time. It is contemplated that the interest payable to taxpayers with their overpayments will be more closely related to the going interest rate in the marketplace than the 4 per cent has been for a long time.

As to the question of reassessment, the hon. member is correct in his understanding that four years from the date of the original assessment, reassessment cannot be carried out except on the grounds of fraud or misrepresentation.

Mr. Burton: I had intended to raise this matter when we came to the interest section, section 161. I am glad to hear there is to be a change in the interest rate payable, because the present practice has been a source of many complaints. If a taxpayer owed the government money, he was charged interest very handily; but the situation was far different when the department was called upon to make a refund. I hope the interest rate which is set in connection with refunds to taxpayers will not only be more closely related to the market rate but will be very closely related to the rate charged to taxpayers when moneys owed to the government are overdue. Action along these lines would remove one of the sources of irritation concerning tax law.

Clause 1, section 152, as amended, agreed to.

On clause 1—section 153: Withholding.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: As hon. members will notice, there is an amendment to this section, in the name of the Minister of National Revenue, to be found in Hansard of October 22 at page 8955. Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Downey: I take it there are no major changes proposed in this section. I wish to raise a point in connection with which a great many complaints come to my office. It concerns the fact that employers are obliged to work for the taxation department in the capacity of bookkeepers and tax collectors. In many businesses these activities cause considerable additional expense. I think it is unfair to ask employers to do this book work involving the collection of taxes from employees, who often have no particular awareness of the terms of the tax legislation. Employees who are relatively uneducated in such matters frequently feel resentment against their employer in consequence of the deductions and collections which the employer has to make. This is an injustice, to my way of thinking.

I find myself wondering who is working for whom. It is something like the parliamentary secretary asking me to provide him with figures relating to the amount of refunds paid to taxpayers. The hon. gentleman has at his disposal the services of the officials of the Department of National Revenue who are well able to provide him with this information. No doubt the figures in my possession are a condensation of an assessment made by the Department of National Revenue. I think there should be some formula, some limit set as a figure of gross business expense below which an employer, working on a net income or a gross income, whatever you wish to call it, or a set number of employees, should not be asked to be a bookkeeper for the government.

There is a marginal area here in which it becomes necessary for an additional employee to be placed on staff simply to look after the bookkeeping needs of the company. This is an expense which is passed on to consumers who purchase the product and I think it is unjust of the government to capitalize on employers to the extent they do in getting their bookkeeping done for them.

Mr. Burton: The amendment before us would provide that deductions shall be made with respect to unemployment insurance benefits and that these deductions shall be made at source. Surely this must be a difficult matter for the department to administer. Before a person draws unemployment insurance he will have an income pattern for the year. He then draws unemployment insurance benefits for an indefinite period in many respects. It is not clear how long he will draw unemployment insurance benefits. Then, after the termination of unemployment insurance benefits, presuming new employment has been obtained, it is not known what his rate of remuneration will be.

I am wondering how the department intends to handle this matter. Since the parliamentary secretary was so concerned about administrative efficiency in organizations such as Federated Co-operatives Limited, I presume he has given consideration to administrative efficiency in the Unemployment Insurance Commission, where I understand considerable problems have arisen in recent weeks due in part to the high number of applicants. I would hope a simple system could be worked out, one which would not add to the task which the Unemployment Insurance Commission has been asked to undertake by statute.

Mr. Mahoney: I understand that the Unemployment Insurance Commission has satisfied itself as to the system it will use to make sure that excessive amounts are not deducted from those covered by unemployment insurance. I will be glad to inquire as to the details because I must confess this is not one of the things I am carrying in my head.

Mr. Ritchie: I have one or two questions for the parliamentary secretary upon which I invite his comments. Suppose a houseowner hires an individual to do certain work involving, say, the cementing of a garage floor and payment for labour and materials. I presume there is a dividing line, a means of determining the distinction between a contract and a wage. How does the department settle problems such as this?

Mr. Mahoney: Is it a contract for service or is it a contract of service? If you hire a man to do a service for you, he is a contractor. If he is hired to work for you on a full-time basis and the relation is that of master and servant, you have an employee and you are obliged to observe many requirements of law in addition to making payroll deductions. The particular instance the hon. member mentioned would suggest a relationship with an independent contractor.

Mr. Ritchie: Another question for clarification. Suppose, for instance, an employer offered a janitorial job, being willing to pay a certain amount of money each month no matter how many hours were worked or when they were worked, as long as the job was done. Is this a contract or is the question of wages involved?

Mr. Mahoney: Again, it really depends on the facts of the case. If the man is in fact working what would ordinarily be regarded as full-time doing this particular job for you, and not working for anybody else, there would be a good chance you would have an employee rather than a contractor. If, on the other hand, he was handling similar work for two or three other establishment, he would obviously be a contractor dealing with all these people.

These are questions of a kind that the Industrial Relations Board or the hon. member's solicitor would be glad to field as they arise. The implications are not limited to income tax law. An employer has responsibilities for workmen's compensation payments, for compliance with the minimum wage legislation and many statutes, most of them provincial in origin.

Amendment (Mr. Gray) agreed to.

• (5:10 p.m.)

Mr. Burton: I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary a question concerning withholding of tax on dividend payments by corporations. As I read this section, it refers to every person—presumably meaning corporations as well—paying salary, wages or other remuneration, or superannuation or pension benefits, a retiring allowance and so on down the list. These persons are required to deduct or withhold therefrom such amount as may be prescribed, and this amount shall be remitted to the Receiver General of Canada on account of the payee's tax for the year under this particular part. Just to clarify the situation, what is the position concerning payments of dividends to shareholders in a corporation?

Mr. Mahoney: The only deduction at source that corporations are required to make is from dividends being paid to non-residents. However, an investor, if he derives 25 per cent of his income or more from investments from which deductions are not made at source, is responsible for making quarterly instalments.

Mr. Burton: If I may follow that up, Mr. Chairman, what is the experience of this in practice? I presume there have been problems and it would be very difficult to chase this matter up with every taxpayer, though I suppose when tax returns are examined this question is taken into account. Has the government given consideration to making any deductions at source when payments are made that amount to more than the amount stipulated?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I am not aware of any consideration having been given to that matter. Neither am I aware of any significant degree of abuse in this area. Corporations are, of course, required to report, through the use of T-5 slips, dividend payments that they make during the year to their shareholders, and these slips are matched up with the income reported by Canadian taxpayer in the same way as T-4 slips are matched up with wages and salary payments reported by employees. There is no abuse of which I am aware, and certainly there has been no indication that a policy change is desirable.

Mr. Ritchie: I have a question on subclause (4) on page 427 which deals with dividends received by brokers. In the case where a broker does not know the ownership of dividends on shares, 25 per cent of the amount is remitted to the Receiver General. If subsequently the unknown owner is found, from the income tax point of view I presume an adjustment is made.

Mr. Mahoney: If the beneficial owner wants to identify himself he can, of course, come forward and claim a refund if there has been an overpayment. The payment under this section is on account of the beneficial owner's tax.

Clause 1, section 153, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 1, section 154, agreed to.

On clause 1—section 155: Farmers and fishermen.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Chairman, I thought it might be useful to draw to the attention of the parliamentary secretary the wording of this particular section in view of some of his earlier comments to the effect that he was not aware of any provision in the bill to prevent a farmer or fisherman from filing his return on other than a calendar year basis. The wording of this section seems to me pretty well to lock in a farmer or fisherman to the calendar year, which means he files his return by April 30. It may not be a total lock-in, but certainly I think it points in that direction.

Mr. Mahoney: Again, Mr. Chairman, there is a distinction between a farmer's individual taxation year, which is the same as the taxation year of every other individual taxpayer in Canada—namely, the calendar year—with the tax return to be filed and tax paid by April 30 of the following year, and section 11 which governs businesses. If he chooses to do so, a farmer can account for his business income from farming on a fiscal year basis that is other than the calendar year.

Since most farms are operating under single proprietorships and the income derived therefrom is that of a single farmer, I suppose there is an element of great convenience in having the business year and the individual tax year coincide. But I repeat that I am not aware of any provision preventing a farmer, if he so chose, from using a business accounting year other than the calendar year.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Chairman, I think it is relevant to point out to the parliamentary secretary the wording of section 155. At the outset it provides:

Every individual whose chief source of income is farming or fishing shall pay to the Receiver General of Canada

(a) on or before December 31 in each taxation year, 2/3 of the tax as estimated by him—

(b) on or before April 30 in the next year, the remainder of the tax as estimated under section 151.

It seems to me that this would pretty well lock in just about every farmer who, as the parliamentary secretary put it, is a single proprietor. It seems to me some different treatment is provided a farmer who is incorporated and whose corporate operation is considered separately from his individual tax situation. There is also different treatment where a corporation carrying on a farming operation separates its actual farming operations from its shareholdings. There is no trouble for the national grain company to carry on its operations in poultry farming; there is no difficulty in their using a fiscal year other than the calendar year. Nevertheless, it seems that an individual farmer or single proprietor is locked in to the calendar year basis.

Mr. Mahoney: I hope the hon. member realizes that without this section a farmer who derives his income from a source other than a source from which deductions are made would be called upon to make quarterly instalment payments. This provision simply recognizes the seasonal nature of a farmer's operation and applies a more practical test to it.

Again I would remind the hon. member that, if he may choose to do so, a farmer may end his fiscal year at other than the end of the calendar year, say October 31, August 31 or May 31. He may assess his income at the end of that year and then carry forward his income from subsequent operations to the end of the next following fiscal year.

Mr. Burton: I appreciate the point made by the parliamentary secretary in regard to quarterly payments, but I was really relating my comments to what was said earlier about a farmer using other than the calendar year for calculating his tax. I hope this matter will be clarified.

Clause 1, section 155, agreed to.

On clause 1—section 156: Other individuals.

The Deputy Chairman: On clause 156 there is an amendment which can be found at pages 8955 and 8956 of Hansard for October 22, proposed by the Minister of National Revenue. Shall the amendment carry?

• (5:20 p.m.)

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, perhaps the amendment could be read and then I should like to make a comment.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The amendment reads as follows:

That section 156 as set forth in clause 1 of the said bill be amended

(a) by striking out line 13 on page 429 and substituting the following:

Other individuals 156 (1) Every individual other than one to

(b) by adding, immediately after line 25 on page 429, the following subsection:

Mutual fund trusts (2) Notwithstanding subsection (1), the amount payable by a mutual fund trust to the Receiver General of Canada on or before any day referred to in paragraph (1)(a) in a taxation year shall be deemed to be the amount, if any, by which

(a) the amount so payable otherwise determined under that subsection,

(b) ¼ of the trust's capital gains refund (within the meaning assigned by section 132) for the year.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, the point I raised earlier regarding the taxation year might have been raised here. I shall not belabour it except to point out that it can happen that people, by reason of the circumstances of their investments, will be receiving most of their income in the latter part of the year but will be still required to make income tax payments, by reason of section 156(a) in the first part of the year as well as the last part of the year.

I have no magic formula to suggest and do not want to try my hand at drafting because I know how tricky these statutes are. Had I thought of it before, I might have asked the person drafting the statute to put forward a provision which would meet my point so that I could try it on for size. I would ask the parliamentary secretary if his legal advisers would mind considering the point I have made. I do not think anyone would quarrel if there should be a change here in order to have this point straightened away.

Mr. Mahoney: I would be glad to look at it, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Chairman, a matter was brought to my attention over the weekend by a professional person who meticulously made his payments for a number of years before the dates mentioned, but who every year was charged a sizeable amount of interest, $50 or $100. I checked into this and found that although he had remitted his money to his local bank on the specified date, he was apparently charged interest because the payment was overdue.

This situation can arise in two ways. If the payment is made to a bank, for instance on March 31, it will not usually be credited to the account until the fifth or sixth of the month. There is a further computation in that apparently many people make payments and although the banks receive the money on March 31 they do not get around to remitting it until five, six or even ten days later. I could provide documentary proof of the case to which I am referring.

It seems to me that there should be no penalty if the money arrives at the bank on March 31, since the banks, as I understand it, are the recipients or are in effect the agents. I draw this matter to the attention of the minister and ask for his comments.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, if the facts are as described by the hon. member, I am rather at a loss to understand how his friend received the treatment he did. If the hon. member would refer the specific matter to me I would be glad to look into it, although of course the matter is an administrative one and he might choose to refer it directly to the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. Ritchie: Thank you. I appreciate this and I shall provide the details.

Amendment (Mr. Gray) agreed to.

Clause 1, section 156, as amended, agreed to.

On clause 1—section 157: Corporations.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: There is an amendment to section 157 which appears at page 8956 of Hansard, in the name of the Minister of National Revenue.

Amendment (Mr. Gray) agreed to.

Clause 1, section 157, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 1, sections 158 and 159, agreed to.

Clause 1—section 160: Tax on income from property transferred between husband and wife or to minors.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: There is an amendment to section 160, in the name of the Minister of National Revenue, which appears at page 8956 of Hansard.

Amendment (Mr. Gray) agreed to.

Clause 1, section 160, as amended, agreed to.

On clause 1—section 161: General.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: At page 8956 of Hansard there is an amendment to section 161, in the name of the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. Downey: Mr. Chairman, would you mind reading the amendment to section 161?

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The amendment reads as follows:

> That section 161 as set forth in clause 1 of the said bill be amended by striking out lines 17 to 21 on page 433 and substituting the following:
> 'Limitation (4) For the purposes of subsection (2), where a taxpayer is required to pay a part or instalment of tax for a taxation year as estimated by him on or before reference to his taxable income for a preceding year or his estimated taxable'

Mr. Downey: Mr. Chairman, I wish to comment on the matter of interest on instalments. In this area I think a great many taxpayers in this country think there is injustice. It would seem that if a person makes an overpayment on his taxes, he is not paid interest on this money, while on the other hand if for some reason he should owe the revenue department money he is charged interest. When the department has the taxpayer's money, no interest is forthcoming to the taxpayer for the use of those funds.

I have no reason to doubt the statement I made earlier in respect of 10 per cent, approximately, of the money collected by the department being refunded to taxpayers last year. When one looks at a figure of this size and realizes that the government has the use of these funds and is not paying interest to the taxpayer, it represents a considerable amount of money and taxpayers begin to ask whether what is fair ball for one is not fair ball for another. In the interests of having people co-operate with the tax department—we all realize that in order for any tax system to be effective there must be co-operation by the people—I think we should be fair and square with them and take a look at the concept that if the taxpayer is charged interest on what he owes, then when the department has his money perhaps it should be paying interest to him.

I would be very interested to know the exact amount of these funds. It would be useful for the committee to know the exact amount of the overpayment of taxes that is made every year, so that we could have a calculation of what the interest on the taxpayers' money would be. I do not expect a reply to this question, but to ensure the co-operation of taxpayers and to increase their faith in the government I think it would be wise for the minister to consider this point.

Mr. Ritchie: My question refers to subsection (7) on page 434. I presume that the provision means that if there is a loss which is carried forward, the taxpayer will not be able to claim any interest—in a sense he will lose his interest under this section.

Mr. Mahoney: That is correct, Mr. Chairman. When the taxpayer takes advantage of his right to claim a loss carried forward, he is not entitled to interest on the overpayment of the instalment that might have occurred in that period.

Mr. Ritchie: This seems unusual. It may be somewhat unfair from the moral point of view. What is the justification for this?

Mr. Mahoney: The government, of course, has no control over whether or not he had a loss, but the government does offer him an opportunity to offset that loss against the previous year's profit. At the same time, the requirement to pay tax by instalment would mean that during the year of the loss he would be making instalment payments related to his earnings of the previous year. There does not seem to be any justification for the payment of interest in these circumstances. Of course, the taxpayer does get a refund of the instalment payments that he made during that period.

Mr. Danforth: I have a question for the parliamentary secretary. Perhaps I missed the implication of this section, but I should like the parliamentary secretary to indicate the amount of the penalty and whether or not a penalty would be assessed. Let me use as an example a farmer who complies with the regulation to forward two-thirds of his estimated tax by December 31 and fulfils the obligation of returning the balance before April 30. If his assessment shows that his computation was far out and he was delinquent in the payment of two-thirds of the amount by the deadline, he is assessed an additional penalty. I am taking into consideration the fact that there are tremendous variances in farm income from time to time and there may be no deliberate intent to defraud. How would the department deal with a situation of this kind?

Mr. Mahoney: He has two options. He can estimate his current year's earnings on the basis of the previous year's, and that would be valid and binding regardless of the discrepancy which in fact occurred, or he can make an honest estimate of it for the current year, as he undoubtedly would if he felt it was going to be somewhat below the previous year's income. If he makes the payment on the basis of what is in fact the situation at that particular time, he will not be penalized; but if he miscalculates arithmetically or if he misrepresents the situation, he would be subject to penalty.

Mr. Danforth: May I carry this further because I am not entirely clear. I am aware of how it is estimated, but taking an exaggerated example so that the parliamentary secretary may get my point, suppose the farmer makes two-thirds of his payment by December 31 as prescribed by law, and then, in formulating the balance by April 30, it is found that due to some circumstance he was delinquent on his payment on the two-thirds amount by, say, $5,000. This could be due to the sale of livestock, or some other occurrence which could not be foreseen in the previous season's estimate of normal income. What would be the process in such a circumstance?

Mr. Mahoney: I do not quite see how the farmer could be delinquent in such a matter, because as soon as you get past the end of the year you are into the next taxation year and the farmer is not concerned with transactions or large profits that come in after the end of December when he is supposed to have made the two-thirds payment. The two-thirds payment relates to transactions of which he should have knowledge when he calculates the amount.

Mr. Danforth: Thank you. I am satisfied, Mr. Chairman.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Gray) agreed to.

Clause 1, section 161, as amended, agreed to.

On clause 1—section 162: Penalties.

Mr. Downey: I believe that the whole area of penalties and the onus of proof is one of the key provisions in the taxation act. When we look at the advent of the capital gains tax on valuation day we realize that advance rulings will become of increasing significance. I would say that with the advent of the capital gains tax, whoever is making these advance rulings will be very busy and I suppose the staff will have to be greatly expanded.

But we run into the inescapable fact that since advance rulings are made here in Ottawa in the taxation period—the parliamentary secretary can correct me if I am wrong—advance rulings will not be available in the district taxation offices, and many small businessmen and other individuals will look twice before they travel the length and breadth of this country to obtain an advance ruling in the interest of their business. The individual who lives in Vancouver, Victoria or St. John's, Newfoundland, would have to incur the expense of travelling to obtain the advance ruling, the expense of his stay in Ottawa and his transportation. Thus we see that only people in a certain income group can afford to make use of these advance rulings.

This aspect makes the legislation biased against people of insufficient means, those whom the reformed Income Tax Act is supposed to help, those at the lower end of the economic scale. They will not be able to get the assistance of these advance rulings that people in the higher income brackets can receive. Organizations like Imperial Oil and Home Oil have tax consultants and accountants at their disposal. They can afford to get advance rulings. I believe that in the interests of equity these advance rulings should be available in all district taxation offices.

People in my riding should be able to drive to Edmonton and get advance rulings through the district office there. The other day when talking about income splitting between husband and wife, the parliamentary secretary referred to the question of equity in taxation. In the interests of equity I repeat that these advance rulings should be available in every district office.

For the most part the onus of proof has rested on the individual, but I know many small businessmen who were too busy making a living to keep sufficient records to satisfy the tax department. Some immigrants to this country have worked hard all their lives from dawn to dusk. I am thinking of the corner groceryman and such people. Some have not had the linguistic ability to understand the tax rules and regulations. Ignorance of the law is no excuse, but I do not think it is right that the onus of proof should be placed on such individuals.

I have had people tell me that sometimes officials of the Department of National Revenue entered their premises and took advantage of their ignorance. Sometimes they were asked questions that in law they were not required to answer. Their files were examined, but they were not told of the protections available to them in law. The officials made things very difficult for them. Grave injustices were committed. If they had had tax accountants they could have arranged their affairs in such a way that they might not have had to pay one cent in tax.

I suggest that there should be some switching of the onus of proof. When departmental officials contact such people they should make an accountant or tax lawyer available to advise them of their rights.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, as the hon. member is aware, the system of advance rulings is of very recent origin and I am sure is a very welcome innovation. Under the system, requests for advance rulings must be handled by mail. If a person wishes to request an advance ruling he must set down in writing the precise details of the circumstances he wishes the ruling on, so such rulings can be quite as readily obtainable anywhere in Canada where there is a mail box as they are here in Ottawa.

The hon. member talked about the burden of proof. I might note that even though we are on section 162 there is a change in section 163 which does shift the burden to the minister where a penalty is being assessed. However, as simple in equity as the hon. member's argument might seem, there always remains the fact that the individual taxpayer is the man who is in possession of the facts and of the evidence to substantiate them.

Right now there are over 7 million individuals who are paying personal income tax, plus several hundred thousand who are paying corporate tax. To suggest that the Minister of National Revenue should require of all these taxpayers the kind of information upon which he can carry the burden of proof is not entirely reasonable.

Mr. Downey: I understand that there may be a mass of documents involved and that the taxpayer is supposed to have them in his possession. But in the case where an assessment has not been made for a number of years and the department requires an individual to produce documents dating back a long time, through carelessness or for other reasons, such as moving from place to place, he may have lost some papers. Once in a while we all lose the odd letter or document. I suggest there should be a shorter limit on the length of time that the department can go back over an individual's records. The parliamentary secretary said advance rulings were available by mail, but I understand there are costs involved in respect of departmental officials.

I think it would be useful for the Hansard record if the parliamentary secretary would indicate the costs inherent in acquiring an advance ruling.

Mr. Thomson: Mr. Chairman, in addition to the comments made by the hon. member for Battle River I would suggest that occasionally the taxation department makes mistakes. I know of two farmers, both with the name Hammond, near the village of Springwater. The tax people had investigated the case of a cattle buyer and had listed one Hammond as receiving a certain amount of income from the sale of cattle. He was assessed a certain amount and asked why he had not listed it as income. He denied having this income.

The tax people were quite insistent, but in this case they were in error. The farmer went to a lawyer or a tax accountant, at some expense, before the issue was resolved and it was discovered that the cattle were actually purchased from the other farmer named Hammond. Why should the burden of proof be on the farmer in this case, since it was a mistake on the part of the tax collector? Why should the department not pay the expenses incurred by the farmer?

I know of another case where hail damage was listed to two cousins who had land listed separately. The income tax department assessed the hail against the wrong man and the burden of proof was on him. My question to the parliamentary secretary would be, is the department prepared to reimburse the taxpayer in a matter of this kind?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I shall have to get the answer to that question from the Minister of National Revenue. It is not within the immediate confines of the bill before us, as far as I am aware. I shall look into the question and report to the hon. member.

Mr. Downey: Perhaps the parliamentary secretary did not hear me because the officials were leaving as I spoke, but I was wondering if he could tell us the costs involved in making advance rulings.

Mr. Mahoney: It is my understanding, Mr. Chairman, that the Department of National Revenue charges a fee for an advance ruling, but rather than attempt to remember it I shall inquire and give it to the hon. member.

Mr. Downey: I gather that it is a reasonably significant amount. Do I not understand that it costs something in the order of $90 a day for officials to study a case? I should like to know if it is a significant amount. The parliamentary secretary must have an idea whether it is $5 a day or $100 a day. Can the average taxpayer afford an advance ruling?

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I think the average taxpayer who is looking for an advance ruling has in mind a transaction which would not render the fee unduly burdensome if he gets the ruling that he wants. Rather than guess, I would prefer to get the exact amount. It is designed to accommodate the general body of taxpayers of Canada for the services of officials who examine the affairs of a single taxpayer with a view to advising him of the tax implications of the contemplated transaction.

Mr. Downey: This is true as things were in the past when advance rulings would only have been necessary for organizations that could well afford the time and expense of travelling, etc. But with the advent of the capital gains tax it should do well for people who own small businesses, and farmers. A man may have a $50,000 farm—and it does not take much land for a farm to be worth that today—and an advance ruling may help him to the extent of $1,000 or $2,000. To him this is a considerable sum. Once this tax act goes through there will be thousands of advance rulings which could be used to the taxpayer's advantage. I suggest it is vitally important that these advance rulings be available to everybody, not just to the people who can afford to ask for them.

Mr. Chairman, I see the hour is six o'clock and I would call it six o'clock.

Progress reported.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. To help the discussion along, perhaps it could be stated on the record that the discussion resumes on Monday on the capital gains provision. I think that was agreed earlier.

Mr. Mahoney: That is correct, Mr. Speaker.

At 6.01 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order, until Monday, November 15.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, November 15, 1971

The House met at 2 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BALDWIN—PUBLICATION OF ALLEGED REPORT TO CABINET ON FOREIGN OWNERSHIP IN CANADA ECONOMY—REFUSAL OF GOVERNMENT TO TABLE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege of which I have given notice to Your Honour under the appropriate rule and which I think affects all members of the House. It deals, of course, with the publication in a Canadian periodical of what is known as the Gray report. Mr. Speaker, the facts appear to be simple and I can be quite brief. We all know that in response—

Some hon. Members: Speak up.

Mr. Speaker: It is a little difficult to hear the hon. member for Peace River. Perhaps we might have silence and the hon. member might use his louder voice so that we can hear him.

An hon. Member: And start over again.

Mr. Baldwin: I was saving that for the moment of outrage, Mr. Speaker.

I will repeat that I rise on a question of privilege notice of which I have given to Your Honour and which affects the rights and privileges of all members of the House. It deals, of course, with the question of the publication in The Canadian Forum of the so-called Gray report. The facts are simple, Mr. Speaker, and I can be quite brief.

In response to growing pressure on and requests to the government to examine the whole question of foreign ownership in Canada a special committee or task force was set up under the guidance of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray), at that time Minister without Portfolio. This fact was well known and from time to time numerous questions were asked in the House about the report which was being prepared and about the nature and time of its release. For example, on November 30, 1970, as found on page 1621 of Hansard, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, talking about the report on the late show, said:

> It is being studied at the present time. As soon as it is printed and available, the report will be considered in consultation with the principals of the industries concerned in Canada and with the provincial governments concerned.

At page 3567 of Hansard for February 19, 1971, in response to a question by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who asked about this report, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said:

> Yes, Mr. Speaker, we are taking such steps—

That is to obtain the report.

> —and I think it is safe to gamble on the fact that we will overtake by far the New Democratic Party and the statement of its policy.

There was a clear indication that it was the intention of the government and the Prime Minister to publish the report. At page 5298 of Hansard for April 27, 1971, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance said:

> The hon. member will be aware that the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray) has under review the whole matter of foreign ownership and that we are anticipating a full and comprehensive report on this subject.

Subsequently, admissions were made that the report was available and was in the hands of the cabinet.

• (2:10 p.m.)

At the end of last week, Mr. Speaker, what purported to be a copy of the report or of some portion of the report at one stage was published by a Canadian magazine, The Canadian Forum. A press conference was held at which Professor Rotstein, a person connected with that publication, indicated that the statement published was in fact what it purported to be and that he felt it to be in the general interest of the country that publication should be made. So far, Mr. Speaker, there has been no official denial that the material published was a true copy of at least part of the documents and reports in the hands of the government. I feel that I and all other members of the House have a justified cause of complaint and grievance which can only be reflected by a question of privilege such as I have raised today.

My argument is reinforced by a statement Your Honour made on October 27 last, as recorded at page 9076 of Hansard. At that time the hon. member for Battle River was attempting to secure the unanimous consent of the House to put a motion under Standing Order 43 and, in circumstances where there was some parallel, Your Honour said:

> I have serious doubts about the hon. member's motion. Basically, I think it is a privilege motion—

I marked those words at the time. Those words of guidance by Your Honour are reinforced by a citation from Blackstone. I am glad to put Your Honour and Blackstone in the same bracket and call upon these authorities for support.

Where governments make public statements about the existence of reports of committees and task forces which inquire into matters the public are concerned with and which are currently the subject of discussion and debate both in the House and outside the House, there is and ought to be, where the taxpayers' money is used for that purpose, an equitable and certainly a moral obligation on the part of the government to produce such a document to the House. I think there is far too much secrecy. Far too many political games are being played with inquiries and reports of this kind and there is far too much hole in the corner skulduggery which is causing the public confusion and anxiety.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that when a matter of this kind has proceeded to the extent to which this has it comes into the public domain and certainly there ought to be an obligation upon the government to publish. It was for this reason that I made a proposal through a private member's bill to this effect. In my view, either the government deliberately allowed the contents of the document to be made public for either domestic or international political reasons, and there is a fair suspicion that this could be the case, or else it was so negligent and so slovenly in its handling of security in this matter that it allowed the document to fall into the hands of the publisher of The Canadian Forum. There was either a theft in the dark of night because of slipshod and slovenly security or we have here the tattletale "Gray" of a deliberate leak.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: It was either nonfeasance or misfeasance. In addition to the precedents I have alluded to may I quote citation 106(2) of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition which says:

> The dignity and independence of the two Houses are in great measure preserved by keeping their privileges indefinite. If all the privileges of Parliament were set down and ascertained, and no privilege to be allowed but what was so defined and determined, it were easy for the executive power to devise some new case, not within the line of privilege, and under pretence thereof, to harass any . . . member and violate the freedom of Parliament.

For those reasons, Mr. Speaker, I suggest to Your Honour that there has been a violation of the privileges of this House and of every member of this House, and I have sought this opportunity to bring this matter, by way of grievance, to the attention of the House.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Peace River has given the Chair due notice under the provisions of section 2 of Standing Order 17. There is little need for the Chair to say that the matter involved in the hon. member's proposed question of privilege is one of general interest. The report itself, to which the proposed motion alludes, deals with problems which are, I am sure, of concern to all hon. members. It seems to me that those conditions or circumstances alone should not be all-persuasive in determining whether the proposal of the hon. member should be judged a prima facie question of privilege.

It would appear that two conditions are set out in the hon. member's notice. In the first instance the hon. member suggests that the Prime Minister has allowed the so-called Gray report to be made available to unauthorized persons. To me, it seems that the release of the so-called report is more a matter of administration which may be brought before the House in due course under the provisions of our well established and recognized procedures for debate and decision.

The second aspect of the matter is the suggestion that the failure to table the report within a prescribed period of time, or at all, is a breach of parliamentary privilege. I know of no authority to support this contention. The House is well aware that in point of fact numerous reports of a like nature never see the light of day—I refer, of course, to parliamentary light of day—and, indeed, successive governments have frequently refused to table them. In the circumstances and on the basis of long-established precedents, it is difficult to agree with the suggestion that there has been a breach of parliamentary privilege which should be further considered by the House or referred to a parliamentary committee.

In the statement he has just made the hon. member suggested that this question was being brought before the House as a matter of complaint or grievance. It may well be so. There may well be a legitimate grievance. I cannot give an opinion on this point but, if I may say so, there is a long way between a grievance and a question of privilege. The Chair has come to the conclusion there is no prima facie case of privilege that ought to be considered by the House at this time.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

FOREIGN OWNERSHIP—NECESSITY FOR RELEASE OF REPORT TO CABINET IN VIEW OF PUBLICATION IN "THE CANADIAN FORUM"

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the necessity for the release by the government of the report on foreign ownership prepared by or under the direction of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray) in view of the publication by The Canadian Forum of a document alleged to be a part of the said report.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair has received due notice from the hon. member for York South of his intention to request leave to move the adjournment of the House to discuss the matter set down in his notice under the provisions of Standing Order 26. This notice has given me an opportunity to give very serious consideration to this matter and to the suggestion that the debates of the House should be adjourned later this day for the purpose of considering the matter alluded to in the hon. member's proposed notice.

As the Chair stated a few moments ago in relation to the question raised by the hon. member for Peace River by way of a question of privilege, the matter proposed for discussion at this time by the hon. member for York South under the terms of Standing Order 26 is undoubtedly one of general interest. It seems to me that a debate on the proposed motion would produce a repetition of the debate on the question of economic and political relations with the United States which was the subject of a most interesting and exhaustive discussion as recently as the third and fourth of this month.

• (2:20 p.m.)

The primary question to be asked before the matter is put forward for debate at this time is whether a new dimension of sufficient import has been added to a question which has been under debate on many occasions during the current session, and which I am sure will be debated again in the days ahead, so as to justify a special debate in this sitting under Standing Order 26. My response would have to be in the negative. The question of whether the so-called report should be released at this time is, to my mind, a matter of administration and not a matter which should be resolved under the provisions of Standing Order 26. With respect, I suggest to the hon. member and to all hon. members that in any event the matter should not be resolved by way of debate under Standing Order 26. As the hon. member knows, there are available to him other methods and opportunities to deal with this question.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

FOREIGN OWNERSHIP—REQUEST FOR RELEASE OF FULL TEXT OF REPORT TO CABINET

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether, in view of the interest and the confusion created by what government sopkesmen have admitted is part of a draft report to the cabinet, the government will now release the full text of this report, generally referred to as the Gray Report, so that the Canadian people can debate the issues with all the information in front of them?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): The answer to that question, Mr. Speaker, is no. The government has made it clear that it does not think cabinet documents should be published. What has appeared so far, as the Prime Minister has said, is an early draft of a study prepared for the government in connection with the whole question of foreign ownership. The government still has this matter under consideration and when it has reached a decision on policy—and, of course, this study is not a statement of government policy—it can then decide what kind of information might at that time be published in connection with its decision.

Inquiries of the Ministry

FOREIGN OWNERSHIP—DISCUSSION AT FIRST MINISTERS' CONFERENCE—SUPPLYING OF REPORT TO CABINET TO PROVINCIAL PREMIERS—POSSIBLE SCREENING MECHANISM

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the subject of foreign investment and the control of foreign investment in Canada will be discussed at the conference of first ministers currently taking place, and, if so, whether the government of Canada will place before the first ministers of the provinces a full copy of the report made to the government so that at least the premiers of the provinces will have before them all available information—all the information which is before the government.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): It is the intention of the government, as soon as it has reached a decision on this very important question, to make its views known publicly. I would think there would also be some prior consultation with the provinces which, I am sure he realizes, would be very much affected by any decisions that might be made. The question of whether this particular study, which is only one of those before the government, should be made public in whole or in part would be a decision to be made later but, as I said in answer to the first question, I would not think that anyone in this House would recommend that secret cabinet documents should be made public. Whatever is to be made public should be a matter for government decision.

Mr. Stanfield: The Acting Prime Minister did not say whether the matter would be placed before the conference of premiers. I should like to ask him whether, in fact, there exists a cabinet document stating: "The main policy approach to the issue of foreign ownership should be the creation of a screening mechanism." Is there any such cabinet document?

Mr. Sharp: This, of course, is a matter of cabinet secrecy and I am bound by my oath not to disclose what goes on in cabinet.

FOREIGN OWNERSHIP—REQUEST FOR PUBLICATION OF STUDIES NOT INVOLVING POLICY TO PROVIDE INFORMATION

Mr. David Lewis: (York South): I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister a question arising out of the answers he has given, from which I would conclude there are studies before the cabinet as well as documents requiring actual decisions by cabinet. May I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the government would seriously consider publishing studies that are not binding on the government, with a clear statement that they are not government policy, so there will be available to Members of Parliament and the people of Canada information on the extent of the problem that Canadians are now anxious to know about?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the dimensions of the problem are very well known. It has probably been the most debated subject in the country. It has been debated by members of the hon. gentleman's own party within which, of course, there are differences of opinion as to how important the matter is.

In any event, what I think would be welcome from the government is a statement of its decisions. Then, of course, studies could be presented to illustrate the nature of the problems and the reason the government arrived at its decisions. I do think that if studies are to be published now which purport, as it has been alleged this one does, to be government policy, it would add not to clarification but to even further confusion.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, no one but the Acting Prime Minister has suggested that this study, alleged to be part of a government study, is government policy; no one has suggested that to my knowledge. In view of the fact that the government, particularly the Prime Minister, have often emphasized the need for people to participate in decision-making, is the refusal of the government to publish this information, which is all I am asking about, that would assist the Canadian people to understand the process of decision-making on this issue and therefore to appreciate better the decisions that may eventually be announced, explainable by reasons other than those the minister has given?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker. I think the reasons are very clear. Since there has been a debate on the issue for so many years during which a great deal of information has been placed before the public, I think it is important for the government to reach a decision.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: When that decision is made, at that time I think the government can also reach a complementary decision as to whether and how it may publish supplementary information. But I repeat what I said, that we have not lacked material on this subject. What we should have now is government decision, and this is what the government wants to proceed to do.

POSSIBLE LOSS OF PRODUCTION AND JOBS BY U.S. PARENT COMPANIES CLOSING CANADIAN SUBSIDIARY OPERATIONS—ACTION TO PREVENT

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to hear that at last the government thinks a decision should be made; that is one important step forward. In view of present United States policies which may well affect jobs in Canada as a result of the export of subsidiary plant operations from Canada to the United States by parent companies that would find it more profitable to carry on those operations in that country, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the government is giving immediate consideration to setting up some machinery that would prevent Canadians losing production and jobs in the near future?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member that that question is not entirely supplementary, though I appreciate it is closely related to the others. As the question has been asked, the Chair will allow the minister to reply and then the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Peace River.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I assume the hon. gentleman is referring in particular to the DISC proposal.

Mr. Lewis: And the job incentive plan.

Mr. Sharp: And the job incentive plan. The problem here is not simply that of subsidiaries in Canada. The DISC proposal and the job incentive plan would affect Canadian-owned companies just as much as those that are subsidiaries of parent companies in the United States.

• (2:30 p.m.)

FOREIGN OWNERSHIP—PARTICIPATION BY PROFESSOR ROTSTEIN IN PREPARATION OF REPORT TO CABINET

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue whether Professor Rotstein participated in or in any way contributed to the preparation of the report to which the Prime Minister has referred as being a secret cabinet document?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): No, sir.

FOREIGN OWNERSHIP—SOURCE OF MATERIAL APPEARING IN "THE CANADIAN FORUM"

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I think we can clear up a great deal with the Minister of National Revenue here, because this looks like Gray's elegy and not Gray's eulogy. I should like to ask him simply whether these quotations which have appeared in The Canadian Forum came from any official document in the possession of the minister, and has he any idea how they were obtained?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I would draw the right hon. gentleman's attention to the statement issued by the Prime Minister's office on Friday which said that the article in The Canadian Forum is based on only one draft of a study prepared for official discussion at one stage in the preparation of documents to be submitted to cabinet. I have no knowledge at this time as to how any information may have reached The Canadian Forum in an unauthorized way.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, it is a strange thing that the minister has to give secondary evidence regarding this matter. I did not ask him what the Prime Minister said or what somebody in his office answered. I want to know whether the quotations that appeared in The Canadian Forum are in any way representative of the recommendations of the task force. That is the question. Can he not answer that or must he have the assistance of the Prime Minister's staff?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, there is nothing I can usefully add to my previous answer.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Témiscamingue have a supplementary?

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I will recognize the hon. member for Témiscamingue in a minute.

[English]

For the moment the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings and then move on to the hon. member for Témiscamingue and reward him for his patience. If hon. members want to return later to this burning subject, they may do so. For the moment the Chair recognizes the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings.

FURTHER RESEARCH INTO ESTABLISHMENT OF SCREENING MECHANISM TO CONTROL FOREIGN INVESTMENT

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Acting Prime Minister. Is the government now giving consideration to or actually undertaking further research into the recommendation contained in the Gray report that the government should establish a screening process to control foreign investment in Canada?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is one of several methods that have been proposed. I think it has come from every side of the House and certainly from many people throughout the country.

Mr. Hees: As the government has had a full six months to consider this matter, would the Acting Prime Minister advise the House when the government intends to break away from the stultifying immobility which it has indulged in for quite a long time and get on with the job of dealing with this matter?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is argumentative.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INQUIRY AS TO ADVERTISEMENTS IN NEWSPAPER "QUÉBEC-PRESSE"

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State.

This week's issue of Québec-Presse—a separatist and probably pro-FLQ newspaper—contains three costly ads paid by the CBC. Is the Secretary of State aware of the fact that federal funds are thus used to finance the revolutionists of Québec-Presse?

Mr. Speaker: This question might perhaps have been placed on the Order Paper, but since it is the first question put on behalf of the party of which the hon. member is the leader, I shall allow the minister to answer it.

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, as I do not read the paper referred to by the hon. member for Témiscamingue, I am in no position to decide whether the allegations he made before putting his question are right or wrong.

As for the ads in that paper, I promise to inquire as to how and why they were put there and for what purpose the CBC has them published, and I shall then be able to forward that information to the hon. member.

FOREIGN OWNERSHIP—AVAILABILITY OF REPORT TO CABINET TO PROVINCIAL PREMIERS AND HOUSE COMMITTEE—CONSIDERATION AT FIRST MINISTERS' CONFERENCE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister which is supplementary to my leader's question. Is the Gray report or a draft copy being made available to the provincial premiers at the conference currently taking place in Ottawa? If so, is the government prepared to make a copy of that draft report available to an appropriate standing committee of the House?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): The answer to this question, Mr. Speaker, is no. As I said earlier, cabinet documents are not made public.

Mr. McGrath: May I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the general subject of foreign investment is on the agenda of the first ministers' conference?

Mr. Sharp: I do not think so, but any provincial premier is free to make reference to it if he wishes. We do not intend to raise the question.

FOREIGN OWNERSHIP—TIME OF STATEMENT ON GOVERNMENT POLICY—TABLING OF REPORT TO CABINET

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in view of the promise made by the Prime Minister and today by the Acting Prime Minister that the government proposes to release to members of the House a white paper or some other form of statement outlining the government's decision in respect of foreign ownership, may I ask whether we can expect such a statement before the Christmas recess?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give a definite answer. I know it is the desire of the Prime Minister and the government to reach a decision as quickly as possible.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask whether the Acting Prime Minister will undertake to assure the House that when such a statement is released the report to the cabinet by the Minister of National Revenue will also be made available at the same time in order that members may have the benefit of the study and the data upon which these decisions have been made?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, there will be several studies put before the cabinet before any decision is made; in fact, there are several before the cabinet now. This is only one study, as the Prime Minister has already said and, as I said before, I do not believe that cabinet documents should be released. I think the government should make a decision as to the publication of a report but that it should not, of course, release cabinet documents.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to hon. members that we will have to try to limit the number of supplementary questions. We have spent a great deal of time on this same subject.

[Mr. Pelletier.]

An hon. Member: As we do all along.

Mr. Speaker: I will return to the hon. member in a moment, but I recognize first the hon. member for Annapolis Valley on a supplementary.

FOREIGN OWNERSHIP—NUMBER OF DRAFT STUDIES

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the purpose of seeking further amplification of the answer given by the Minister of National Revenue to the question posed by the right hon. member for Prince Albert. The minister replied by quoting what was said by the Prime Minister's office on Friday, that this was a first draft of the study. Will he inform the House what stage the study has reached now? Is there a second draft, a third draft and a fourth draft, or is there only one draft?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I think it is clear from the statement issued by the Prime Minister's office—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: What do you have to say?

Mr. Diefenbaker: What a gramophone record!

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I think it is clear from the statement issued by the Prime Minister's office that the document on which The Canadian Forum article is based is not a document which was submitted by me to cabinet.

FOREIGN OWNERSHIP—PARTICIPATION BY "CANADIAN FORUM" PERSONNEL IN PREPARATION OF REPORT TO CABINET

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, the minister said that Professor Rotstein was not involved in the preparation of this report. Can he say whether anyone from The Canadian Forum was in any way involved in the preparation of the Gray report?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again I suggest to hon. members, in spite of the suggestion made a moment ago, that we should not spend the whole question period on supplementary questions, thereby depriving other members of the opportunity to ask their questions which I am sure they are anxious to pose. I will recognize the hon. member for Annapolis Valley on a supplementary.

FOREIGN OWNERSHIP—INVESTIGATION OF POSSIBLE LEAKING OF REPORT TO CABINET

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the Prime Minister carried out an investigation some time ago in respect of a leak involving the B and B commission report, does the Prime Minister or the government now intend to carry out a survey or an inquiry through the RCMP to find out what happened and how this leak occurred?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, inquiries are already being made but whether the RCMP will be involved is still a decision to be made.

FOREIGN OWNERSHIP—STUDIES BEING USED BY CABINET IN ARRIVING AT POLICY

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I wish to ask a question for clarification, Mr. Speaker. The Acting Prime Minister spoke of several studies being before cabinet, but the general understanding we have had from statements made by the Prime Minister is that the Minister of National Revenue was charged with the responsibility of preparing a report for cabinet. May I ask whether the report from the minister is before cabinet and is that report the basis upon which the government is acting, or are there a number of other studies and by whom have they been prepared?

• (2:40 p.m.)

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman knows, for me to review what is going on in cabinet would be for me to break my oath. What he said is right. The Minister of National Revenue was asked by the Prime Minister to see that some studies were prepared. Some of them are before the cabinet. There are also, of course, other studies because this is a very large subject that covers many aspects of government policy including foreign policy.

GRAIN

REGULATIONS TO PROTECT FARMERS WITH CROP STILL IN SWATH AGAINST POSSIBLE LOSS OF QUOTAS

Mr. Craig Stewart (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, my question was for the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board but as he has left the House I shall address it to the Acting Minister. Because of the amount of crop still out in swath in western Canada and particularly in Manitoba, and as this grain will not be combined until spring, and because under the new quota system these farmers will not be able to take advantage of the earlier specified delivery dates, does the government intend to introduce regulations so these farmers will be protected against possible loss of quota under these circumstances?

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of State): Mr. Speaker, I will take this question as notice on behalf of the minister.
