Mr. MITCHELL: No. We have reached the point where we have to call six men in order to get one; five of the six are either postponed or rejected.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Then I should like to refer to table No. 11 which the minister placed on Hansard during the course of his remarks. I have before me some of the percentages in class A. We find that in London it is 49 per cent, Toronto 49·6 per cent, Kingston 49·2, Port Arthur 52·8, Montreal 30, Quebec 29·3 per cent—and there are others at 45, 48·8, 51·9, 48·6, 49·7, 55·5 and 56·1 per cent. Is the health of the province of Quebec as bad as that figure would indicate?

Mr. MITCHELL: I cannot express an opinion upon that.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I did not hear the answer.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not think it is fair to express an opinion on that. However, he who runs may read. There are the figures which have come to my department.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Have those figures ever been investigated?

Mr. MITCHELL: There are the figures.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I do not see how there could be that much discrepancy.

I should like to ask the minister a question in connection with the reinstatement of returned men, those getting their positions back upon discharge. I imagine that would come under this item. They return to their jobs, and to positions not worse than they would have had, if they had not enlisted. What is done about that? Is there anything done so that these men are put back in jobs not worse than they would have had, had they not enlisted?

I have several cases here about which I wish to make some inquiry. I do not intend to mention names, but I would point out one or two cases in point. Here is one case—and there is a series of them. I think in some cases there is a lot of buck-passing in connection with taking these men back, and that is very bad for morale in the factories. If anyone should have consideration, certainly it should be those men who have been overseas and are returned again to civil life.

Here is one example. Before enlistment this man was a lead hand in a sheet metal department, and was receiving seventy-five cents an hour. He was wounded at Dieppe, and was discharged on April 3, 1944. Upon application for reinstatement he was told that there were no vacancies. He was later reinstated in the sheet metal department at the rate of seventy-five cents an hour. A good deal of kicking went on. That amount included cost of living bonus. This man has the right at the present time to a wage of eighty-five cents.

Here is another case. This man was employed in September, 1941; enlisted in August, 1942; was discharged in February, 1944, and was reinstated at fifty-five cents an hour as a junior store clerk. The rate is still fifty-five cents, plus cost of living bonus. Employees who started after him are now receiving ninety cents an hour. They are all lead hands.

Those are just a couple of cases, but there are a great many others I could place on record. Could the minister explain just what is being done to see that men who are returned are getting their rights upon reinstatement, according to the laws of the land?

Mr. MITCHELL: Obviously I do not know the details of the cases to which the hon. member has referred. One cannot get down to individual cases in committee, because we are dealing with tens of thousands of men. But we have veteran welfare officers in all the larger centres of the dominion, and it seems to me that if these men have proper cases—and I think they are informed of that fact when they leave the army—

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I might say that these cases have been given to me by the man who represents the legion.

Mr. MITCHELL: We do not know anything about them. We have welfare officers, and the law is clear in the matter. I understand that when these men leave the forces or are discharged they are informed as to their rights, and the machinery that exists for the assistance of men who have served in the fighting forces. Obviously on the floor of the house I cannot say what the facts are in connection with the cases my hon. friend has mentioned. However, of course I appreciate his having brought these to my attention.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I do not think the minister has understood me correctly. I brought up these cases only as examples.

Mr. MITCHELL: I appreciate that.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I want to know what the department is doing in matters of this kind—because these are only two; there are lots of others, and in various places. There is the greatest difficulty in some cases in connection with having these men reinstated in their position, or in a position which would not be worse than they would have had, had they not enlisted. It is all very well to put them back into their jobs, but they must be not worse than they would have been, had they not enlisted. That is my point, and I think it is a serious matter.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend will understand that the mere fact that something is written on a piece of paper does not mean that such alleged facts are as set out. It does not mean that an investigation might not show the facts otherwise. However, if the hon. member will be good enough to turn the correspondence over to myself or to the Minister of Pensions and National Health, I shall be glad to look into the facts.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have a few more cases, but perhaps the Chairman might call it eleven o'clock.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, May 2, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

CANADIAN FORCES

PETITION FOR INCREASED CLOTHING ALLOWANCE UPON DISCHARGE

Mr. A. W. ROEBUCK (Trinity): I wish to present a petition signed by approximately two thousand citizens of Trinity riding, in the city of Toronto, asking for an increased clothing allowance for discharged members of the armed forces.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Minister of Fisheries) presented the first report of the special committee on the defence of Canada regulations, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING ORDERS

First report of the standing committee on standing orders.—Mr. Golding.

FOOD

REPORT OF SPECIAL INTER-ALLIED COMMITTEE ON CONSUMPTION LEVELS

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I table three copies in English and three copies in French of report on food consumption levels in Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States, prepared by a special joint committee set up by the combined food boards.

PRIVATE BILLS

FUNDY AIR LINES

Mr. A. D. LEGER (Kent, N.B.) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 89, to incorporate Fundy Air Lines.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Explain.

Mr. LEGER: This bill will permit a group of men to form a company called the Fundy Air Lines, giving them permission to apply to operate air lines in the maritimes.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

WORKERS BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION OF CANADA

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 90, to incorporate Workers Benevolent Association of Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Explain.

Mr. MAYBANK: This is a bill to incorporate a company that has been carrying on benevolent insurance or something of that sort in the province of Manitoba and in some other provinces. It finds it necessary to be incorporated under dominion rather than provincial laws. There is little more than that in the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

BANK ACT AMENDMENT BILL

On the order:

Second reading of bill No. 91, an act respecting banks and banking.—The Minister of Finance.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before the Minister of Finance moves this order, I desire to point out to him that he has no right to do so. The bill is not printed in French. Furthermore, may I point out to the minister that although I made diligent inquiry from every available source I could not obtain a copy of the bill until ten minutes past two to-day. I do not understand the extreme urgency of moving this bill to-day, when members have just seen the outside of it. However, I am going to surprise the minister by saying that I do not intend to take advantage of the position which is open to me, and if he still, under the circumstances, thinks he must or should go on, notwithstanding the very courteous request I made to him yesterday, I shall not object.

Mr. ILSLEY: I moved the first reading of the bill yesterday, and the procedure is that, after first reading is moved, the officers of the house take steps to have the necessary number of copies printed and distributed. Last evening I was able to get a few copies unbound which I sent to the leaders of the three parties in this house. I understand that the bill was not printed for distribution until this afternoon, and now it is distributed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is not printed in French, and the rule is explicit.

Mr. ILSLEY: The usual procedure has been followed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It should not be proceeded with if it is not printed in both languages.

Mr. ILSLEY: I was not aware that the bill was not printed in French.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I took pains to ascertain that.

Mr. ILSLEY: The bill is a very bulky one. With regard to the point of courtesy, I thought that perhaps the privilege might have been accorded me of moving the second reading at the time the first reading was moved, but the hon. gentleman himself—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why so?

Mr. ILSLEY: —would not consent to that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On a bill as important as this?

Mr. ILSLEY: For the reasons stated yesterday, I think I should go on with the second reading of the bill.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask the minister a question? If second reading is moved today will discussion follow the second reading, or shall we have time to study the bill until Monday or Tuesday?

Mr. ILSLEY: I propose to move the adjournment of the debate at the end of my speech.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yourself?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: Until Monday?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is a matter for arrangement. I thought that Thursday had been decided upon.

Mr. COLDWELL: The point is, as the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) says, that this is an important bill. Some of us are on the war expenditures committee and some on the broadcasting committee sitting to-morrow, while others are leaving the city to-morrow, so that it will be impossible for us to study the bill before the discussion comes on on Thursday, if it is to be discussed on Thursday. Personally, and I believe a large number of other hon. members feel the same way, I should like to see the discussion held over until Monday or Tuesday.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have a suggestion to make which will perhaps clear up the position. The minister might move second reading to-day and make his statement and then give an undertaking that there will be ample time for us to study the bill and his statement as well. I think that is a fair proposal and ought to meet with the approval of all concerned.

Mr. RALSTON: I have been discussing this matter with the leader of the opposition and with the leaders of the other two groups in the house ever since Friday. I have intimated how important we thought it was to get the bill to the committee. May I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the house, that if I had my way, having regard to the importance which I attach to the war appropriation resolution, I would not allow anything to interfere with it. But it seems to me that we must take account of the fact that the banking and commerce committee is sitting and will have a great deal of work to do in connection with this bill. I suggest therefore that in order to expedite public business and keep everything moving along, we ought to get the bill to the committee as soon as possible.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That ought to have been done weeks ago.

Mr. RALSTON: The suggestion was made that the minister should move the first and second reading on Friday. After discussion that did not seem possible, and then the suggestion was made for Monday, but it was felt that unanimous consent would not be given, and so it has come on on Tuesday. I intimated last night that all we hoped to do to-day was to go on with the second reading of the bill and then proceed on Thursday. I indicated also that I had spoken to the leader of the opposition and to the leaders of the other two groups and that they had been good enough to inform me of the number of speakers who they thought would probably be interested in taking part in the debate. With that in mind I hoped that it would be possible to end the discussion of the bill on Thursday so as to get it to the committee. I had in mind the fact that in 1934 we were not more than one afternoon, or at any rate one sitting, in dealing with the bill in order to get it to the committee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We had time to see that bill.

Mr. RALSTON: I am not so sure about that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am.

Mr. RALSTON: I happen to be one of those who took part in the debate. Hon. gentlemen will have an opportunity to see this bill between now and Thursday. I suggest to the house that if at all possible we ought to get on with the bill and get it to the committee. Hon. members will realize that when the bill comes back from the committee it will go to the committee of the whole and will then be dealt with clause by clause, so that there will be ample opportunity then for the house to discuss it. In 1934 the method adopted was that while we were agreeing to the second reading of the bill we reserved the right to make any objections or to move amendments as we thought proper, regardless of whether it was a matter of principle or of detail that was involved. That preserves the rights of all hon. members of the house.

May I close by expressing the hope that the house will cooperate in this respect with the idea which we had in mind of getting on on Thursday. I say to the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) that I shall consult with the Minister of Finance and with my other colleagues to see if any other procedure is desirable, proper or advisable in the circumstances. But I do wish the house would be prepared to take up the bill on Thursday in the hope we may finish with it very shortly and get it to the standing committee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I made a very reasonable suggestion. The bill is not ready to go forward to-day because it has not been printed.

Mr. BLACKMORE: In considering the matter I think what the acting leader of the government has said is correct. I was of the opinion that it might be possible to carry on on Thursday, but since I have had an opportunity to look over the bill, and to give some thought to the intricacies that may be involved, and since the Minister of Finance is about to make a statement on the bill, I believe it would be in the best interests of the country and most satisfactory to all concerned if we were to defer further discussion until Tuesday next. We have enough work to do with the war appropriation bill and other matters, so that we shall be just as far ahead as if we proceeded with the debate on second reading on Thursday of this week. After taking into consideration all the matters involved in this question I think we are justified in asking the Minister of Finance to defer further consideration until Tuesday.

Mr. RALSTON: Mr. Speaker, this is not a compromise, but I am afraid that the next member who speaks may ask for Wednesday and the next one may ask for another week; therefore, I am going to hurry and head that off now by saying that after the Minister of Finance moves the adjournment of the debate, second reading of the bill will be proceeded with on Monday next.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is fair enough.

Mr. SPEAKER: The position is that all objections to the motion for second reading of the bill to-day have been withdrawn?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, with that undertaking.

BANK ACT AMENDMENT

CONDITIONS GOVERNING TEN-YEAR EXTENSION OF BANK CHARTERS

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 91, respecting banks and banking.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary for me to stress the importance of this bill to which the house is now asked to give second reading. It is a bill which extends the charters of the ten commercial or so-called "chartered" banks for another ten years, specifies the types of business which these banks can carry on, and prescribes the regulations and the controls governing the conduct of their operations. These regulations and controls which are probably more comprehensive and in most respects more restrictive than are to be found in the banking laws of any other democratic country, are the product of six decennial revisions by the parliament of Canada of the first banking legislation of a general character passed in the Dominion of Canada, the Bank Act of 1871. That act in turn was the product of a rich background of a half-century's practical experience with, and legislative regulation of, a banking system which had been transplanted from Scotland and adapted to the special needs of the British colonies in North America.

The wisdom of this device of decennial revision of our banking legislation is, I think, obvious. It provides regular opportunities, at reasonable intervals, for a full-dress review of the efficiency with which the banks are serving the needs of the public and for making such amendments to the law as changing conditions seem to require. The sense of responsibility with which parliament has acted in these periodic inquests has been commented upon by foreign observers. Breckenridge, for instance, in his history of the Canadian banking system, was impressed with the natural growth or evolution of our banking system. In his concluding paragraph he had this to say:

> One of the strongest contrasts which this whole record presents to such a history of banking as that of the United States, is in the continuity of the progress. There has been no recurring struggle to establish a great government bank, no epidemic of wild-cat banking, no rejection of one system for experiment with another. A certain continuity, without doubt, can be discovered in the history of any banking system. Men do not wholly break with the past or build on foundations entirely new. But down to the present day Canadians have always held to the plan on which were framed the statutes governing their first banks. Additions have been made, new safeguards against public loss introduced, limits restraining corporate activity have been narrowed in some parts and widened in others, a few arrangements for the advantage of the government have been attached, but never has there been a successful attempt to tear down the fair work of the first builders and out of the ruins construct anew. When defects have appeared in its structure, Canadians have not forthwith condemned the heritage of the past, and petulantly, illogically swept it away to make room for some new, untried affair, arranged on different lines; after study of the trouble they have endeavoured by some slight strengthening, some little alteration, to keep and enhance the certain benefits of what they already possessed.

In an earlier passage, he made this interesting comment:

> In Canada, as in Scotland, the history of banking records singularly few frauds upon the currency, and, so far as their creditors were concerned, the losses inflicted by insolvent bankers have been remarkably slight. In order to reform the system, it never became necessary to maim it; in neither country has banking developed the abuses that, > diseases desperate grown
> By desperate appliance are reliev'd,
> OR not at all.

The present revision comes at a significant and appropriate time. We look forward to a decade which will include at least a number of years of transition from a war to a peace economy, years of readjustment and reconstruction, and years in which we are determined that this young country shall make great strides to bigger and better things. That prospect, it is obvious, will require not only an efficient but a strong and flexible banking system. In 1944, also, we can look back, with some perspective, to the period of the early thirties, a period of widespread distress and general frustration as a result of which the banking system, like other economic institutions and most political institutions, became the target of constant and sometimes bitter attack.

It was perhaps only natural that this should be the case. Human nature tends to over-simplify and one of the easiest over-simplifications is to blame a major depression on the lack of credit. Certainly it might seem to the manufacturer who had to close down his business, say, in 1932, that the cause of his failure was the refusal of his bank to give him unlimited credit, but there were thousands of bankers in the United States in that year who could have explained what would, and did, happen to the banks which left their credits outstanding. The banks, of course, were not blameless, either in respect of the policies they followed in the boom years of the late twenties, policies which involved the granting of too much rather than too little credit, nor in the policies they followed with the onset of depression when faced with the necessity of saving their own institutions they may have aggravated the deflationary process which the antecedent inflationary boom had made inevitable.

But there are two points which I wish to make in this connection.

In the first place it is a travesty of economic interpretation to place responsibility for the great depression upon the Canadian banking system. The world-wide character of the depression and of the fall in prices which accompanied it should be sufficient proof of the absurdity of such a contention. It would probably take a volume to give a clear and satisfying explanation of the causes of this depression, which was unprecedented in its severity, its coverage and its persistence. Its causes were not solely, perhaps not even primarily, financial or monetary, but economic and political as well. It had its roots in the maladjustments in the world economy produced by the first world war and particularly in the wholesale use of inflationary methods for financing that war by all or nearly all the belligerent countries. The consequences of that inflationary finance, in the form of distorted price levels, unbalanced economies, unstable currencies, political instability and resurgence of economic nationalism, posed for the world a series of economic and political problems of difficulty almost beyond the wit of man to solve. Certainly the statesmanship of the leading nations in the twenties showed neither the courage nor the imagination to solve them. On the contrary, many of the policies followed by a good many countries

(e.g., import and export restrictions, quotas, clearing agreements, etc). were such as to aggravate rather than to lessen the evils left by the war.

My second point is that in the twenties and the early thirties the Canadian banking system was subject to a clearly marked limitation which has since been remedied. I refer to the absence of a central bank.

During the period of rapid development of Canada as a nation, our banking system served this country extremely well. That is the universal verdict of foreign observers; it is, I think, the verdict of most Canadians. In this connection, I wish to quote a paragraph from the report of the royal commission on banking and currency in Canada, 1933. The paragraph reads as follows:

> 201. It has been manifest, from what we have previously written, and indeed from much of the information afforded us in the course of our hearings, that in so far as the ordinary functions of banking are concerned, the Canadian banks give admirable evidence of security, efficiency and convenience. In a time of universal economic difficulty, the Canadian banks have stood firm and have continued to render to the people of the dominion the same high quality and the same wide variety of services as in the past.

I wish to associate myself with that tribute to the Canadian banks. Ours has been a banking system of unusual strength; thanks to the protections surrounding the incorporation of banks, the provisions designed to safeguard the note issue, the prohibition of loans upon real estate, and the diversification of risk which is inherent in the branch banking system, the losses suffered by the creditors of Canadian banks, their note holders and depositors, have been extremely small. The importance of this factor of strength or safety should have been brought home to us in the early thirties by the contrast with conditions in the United States where thousands of banks failed, bringing untold loss and hardship to millions of bank depositors and aggravating greatly the severity of the depression. Another merit of our system has been its flexibility and the elasticity of the currency supply which it provided. These virtues were the result of the absence of rigid legal reserve provisions, the issue of notes on the basis for the most part of the general assets of the bank, and the branch banking system which facilitated the automatic flow of credit in accordance with the seasonal credit requirements of various industries and various sections of the country. Their importance was particularly great in a country such as Canada with its wide climatic variations, its emphasis on primary industries, and the very special problem of moving the western grain crop to market each fall and winter.

The only other merit of the Canadian banking system to which I wish to refer is the comprehensive network of banking facilities which it has provided for the convenience of the public. There may be certain areas to-day where we find public criticism of the closing of branches since the early thirties. This criticism in itself is confirmation of the extent to which our banking system at its peak had brought banking services to nearly every hamlet throughout the country. Even to-day Canada is probably still better served with banking facilities than almost any other country. The branch system made it possible to give services to hundreds of communities which could not otherwise have supported a bank, and for many years it was the pride of our Canadian banks that they pioneered the new communities, going in ahead of the railway or indeed of any sizeable population.

These and other merits of our banking system deserve great praise. It will be noted, however, that they relate primarily to the working of individual banking institutions and to the strict or narrow function of commercial banking. In certain respects the system as a whole left something to be desired. Thus up to 1935 the volume of money and credit in circulation in Canada was regulated essentially merely by competition amongst the chartered banks in the granting of loans and the purchase of securities. The banks, however, were private, profit-making institutions and it was only natural that the automatic working of competitive, commercial forces should not always coincide perfectly with the broadest national interest. Fortunately our banks were usually staffed with able, prudent and far-sighted men, and normally their business judgment led them to make decisions and adopt policies which were not only sound for their institutions but also in the national interest. There may be some confirmation for this statement in the reported fact that Canada leads seventeen countries in the number of years of prosperity per year of depression. In an elaborate analysis of business cycles in various countries, published by the National Bureau of Economic Research, New York, under the title "Business Annals", Professors Thorp and Mitchell found that for the period 1888-1924 Canada had had 1·86 years of prosperity for each year of depression, while the United States had enjoyed but 1·79 years and the average for the seventeen countries studied was but 1·14 years.

However, as our economy became more and more industrialized and more sensitive to the rhythm of business fluctuations in other countries, it became more and more obvious that we needed a more delicate adjustment of the volume of credit to real public requirements.

a more effective mechanism for endeavouring to counteract by credit control the normal tendency of business forces to alternate between boom and depression. In the late stages of a boom, as for instance in the late twenties, it was difficult for any individual banker or indeed for the group of commercial bankers as a whole to break away from the prevailing business and public psychology and ruthlessly apply the brakes against further expansion. Similarly when a boom collapsed, it was not always possible for the private banker, interested necessarily in the safety of his institution and the protection of his depositors, to follow an expansionist credit-granting policy which might have tended to retard the process of deflation. One can scarcely blame a group of competing banks for failing to discharge with 100 per cent perfection a function for which they were not assigned specific responsibility by public authority. The fault lay rather in the failure of public policy to provide an institution charged with responsibility for regulating the volume of money and credit solely in the public interest. Such a function could only be performed by a public body interested not in the making of profits but solely in the performance of a public duty.

It was the lack of such an entity which the Macmillan commission found as the one important defect of the Canadian banking system, as a result of their investigations during the summer of 1933. As they expressed it, they were impressed "by the absence in Canada of any single banking authority which while linked by its activities with national finance and commerce, is nevertheless detached by its constitution and the temper of its administration from the ordinary pursuits of commercial banking." In other words, they found no organization charged with responsibility for regulating the volume of credit and currency in the best interests of the economic life of the nation. On the basis of this finding, they recommended the establishment of a central bank in Canada. The following year parliament passed the necessary legislation and on March 11, 1935, the Bank of Canada commenced operations.

This development marked the beginning of a series of reforms, designed to improve our banking system and secure a rounding out and better integration of our financial structure as a whole, a series of reforms which we expect to carry much farther during the present session of parliament. One of these reforms related to the organization of the Bank of Canada itself. The House will remember that as the bank was originally organized, its stock was held by private shareholders, although the bank was subject to strict control by the government. An important amendment to the act in 1938 eliminated the private shareholders and made the bank a government-owned as well as a government-controlled institution. Since that amendment, there can be no question that the control of currency and credit in this country is carried out by a public institution solely in the public interest. Concurrently with these developments and assisted greatly by the Bank of Canada there has come a very much improved organization of the short-term money market in Canada; the issue of treasury bills at public tender at very low rates of interest and the active markets for short-term securities generally are reflections of this development. In 1939 an attempt was made to improve the organization of, and the practices in, the long-term mortgage market, and an act authorizing the setting up of a central mortgage bank was passed by parliament. Unfortunately the war intervened just as this bank was on the point of being set up and action to implement this legislation had to be deferred. In all probability parliament will find it necessary in the not distant future to reenact this legislation in a modified form in order to standardize and make more marketable mortgage credit instruments and thereby make possible more economical long-term credit. The banking and commerce committee has now before it a bill to authorize the establishment of an industrial development bank, which is designed to fill another gap in our financial structure—the provision on reasonable terms of fixed and working capital for small or new industrial enterprises whose needs are not met, or not fully met, by existing financial institutions. Finally, the speech from the throne has indicated that we intend to introduce a bill to authorize the insurance or guarantee of export credits in order to assist in developing export markets for primary and secondary industries in the post-war period.

When we add to the measures which I have listed the significant proposals which we are making in the Bank Act amending bill and in the supplementary legislation to which I shall refer in a moment, the house will agree, I trust, that a very serious effort has been and is being made to build up in this country a well-rounded and highly integrated financial structure which, with the changes still to come, should be able to take care of all the sound credit needs of the Canadian public. The bill which is now before the house represents the results of a thorough and painstaking study of our existing Bank Act and of the changes which should be made in it to enable our chartered banks to meet present day needs. I do not flatter myself that it will meet the views or satisfy the wishes of all groups and individual members in this house. It will not, of course, satisfy those whose doctrines lead them to advocate the nationalization of the banks as a step towards the overthrow of private enterprise, nor those who cannot withstand the temptation of making free credit available in a way which in my view would result in the debasement of our monetary system. The changes I am proposing are intended to improve our banking system and to ensure adequate credit at reasonable rates for all sound and useful purposes. We are suggesting those improvements which can be achieved by legislative means, but in my opinion we should be foolhardy indeed to reorganize it completely along radical lines as a matter of political doctrine or tactics, or to tamper with its integrity and exploit it in accordance with the theories of the inflationist school.

Let me deal first with the demand of one of the parties in this house that the banks should be nationalized. In preparing to meet this argument, I tried to find out just what was the case for nationalization, or rather, what its advocates felt the case to be. As usual, I found a great many vague charges against existing institutions, a great deal of loose and irresponsible indictment, far too much appeal to popular prejudice and a great many rosy promises in regard to what might be expected to happen under a new dispensation, but very little analysis of what was regarded as wrong under the present system and very little in the way of concrete proposals—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Hear, hear.

Mr. COLDWELL: That suits the reactionaries.

Mr. ILSLEY: —indeed little more than a mere beckoning to the promised land with a minimum of specifications as to how to reach it and none as to how our lives would be ordered when we get there.

Trying to put the pieces together, I find that there are apparently four arguments or contentions used by its advocates to support the case for bank nationalization. They may be summarized as follows:

First, the argument that nationalization of banks is necessary in order to make possible the effective control of currency, credit and prices;

Secondly, the contention that nationalization of banks will result in greater economy and efficiency;

Thirdly, the claim that the banks are a monopoly or through the system of interlocking directorates constitute part of a "big business" monopoly; and

Finally, the argument that nationalization of the banks is necessary as the first step in bringing about the end of private enterprise and ushering in the socialist state.

Well, let us see, if we can, what there is in each of these contentions.

Take the first argument. It is, of course, essential that the state—that is the government, responsible to parliament and the people—should have control over the total volume of bank credit, in order that such credit may be regulated as a measure of economic policy in the general interest. But as I have taken pains to point out, we already have that control in the hands of the government, exercised through the Bank of Canada as its agent. This control over bank credit is effected by the Bank of Canada through its control over the cash reserves of the chartered banks. Because of the nature of their business and well-defined practices of long standing, it is necessary for the banks to limit their deposits to about ten times their cash reserves. That is to say, the banks find it necessary to keep about $1 in reserves in the form of Bank of Canada notes or deposits with the Bank of Canada for each $10 which they owe to their depositors. The law reenforced this established practice by prescribing that in no event shall a bank have cash reserves of less than 5 per cent of its deposit liabilities. In fact however, the practical necessity of the ten to one ratio has been so well established in practice that the legal obligation is of comparatively minor significance.

On the other hand, the need to earn interest in order to pay interest on its deposits, meet its other operating expenses and earn some profit on its capital, drives each bank to increase its loans or its investments to the point where its cash reserves come down to the ratio which prudence and well-established practice require. This spur of cost and self-interest therefore ensures that cash reserves do not significantly exceed ten per cent of a bank's deposits, and therefore that total deposits of all the banks closely approximate ten times the total amount of cash reserves which is held by all the banks. (It would of course be more accurate for me to speak of total demand liabilities or total note and deposit liabilities, but as bank notes are now such a small and decreasing portion of their total liabilities, I am, for simplicity's sake, speaking as if bank deposits were the only form of bank credit.)

For the reasons mentioned, the Bank of Canada has effective control of the total volume of bank credit outstanding. It exercises that control through its control over the cash reserves of the chartered banks. These reserves are made up of Bank of Canada notes and deposits with the Bank of Canada. They are watched closely and are expanded or contracted as the public interest may seem to require. The Bank of Canada can reduce them by selling some its large holdings of government securities. It gets paid for such securities by a cheque drawn on a chartered bank, which when presented for payment, results in a reduction in that bank's deposit with the Bank of Canada. Conversely, if the Bank of Canada wishes to expand bank reserves—in order to promote an expansion in bank deposits or bank credit—it can do so very easily by purchasing government securities on the open market. It pays for such securities by a cheque drawn upon itself which is deposited in a chartered bank by the person or business firm selling the security, and when the chartered bank presents the cheque to the Bank of Canada it gets an increase in its deposits with the Bank of Canada—or takes out Bank of Canada notes to hold in its reserves.

This process of control of bank reserves, and thereby of bank deposits and bank credit, is well known to many members of this house, but I felt it should be reviewed here to make clear beyond any doubt that already the government has effective control over the total volume of money and credit. We have the control we need for all the essential purposes of monetary policy. Moreover, we have it in an exceedingly simple form which enables us to exercise over-all control without interference in the granting of individual credits or the transfer of deposits or any of the other business transactions of an individual bank. Any one bank is free to compete for all the business it can get—because it can attract deposits and thereby cash reserves away from the other banks. It is free to exercise sound business judgment in the selection of its risks and the choice of its customers. Hence the credit control we exercise is a sensible form of national economic planning and direction in matters of broad policy, free from the dead hand of bureaucratic interference in private affairs. I only wish such simple and effective mechanisms of national control and stimulus were available in other equally important fields of economic activity.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

It should now be clear that the need for public direction of monetary policy does not necessitate nor justify the socialization of all our banks. It requires only socialization of central banking—and that of course we have already achieved.

Now if there is no justification for nationalization in the first argument used by its advocates, is there any in the second, the possibility of greater efficiency and economy as a result of state operated banks? There are few, I think, who would seriously charge that our chartered banks are inefficient. The various departments and agencies under my direction have had a great deal of experience in dealing with the chartered banks—the Department of Finance with its enormous disbursements and receipts; the national war finance committee in the sale and handling of victory bonds; the foreign exchange control board in the carrying out of our external transactions, public and private; the wartime prices and trade board in the complicated business of ration coupon banking; as well as the Bank of Canada in its operations as a central bank, and the inspector general of banks in his intimate audit of all the banks. All this experience with chartered banks and knowledge of their detailed working confirms the general belief in the efficiency of the chartered banks in carrying out the normal functions of commercial banking. Certainly I think there would be few who would honestly contend that the banks would be operated more efficiently or more economically as one great department or agency of government. Like other large organizations they must have their own problems of bureaucracy, must face the same difficulties as we do in reconciling central control with local initiative. It is absurd to assert that these problems and these difficulties would be solved and greater efficiency and economy promoted by a far greater centralization under direct public or political control and with neither the lash of competition nor the spur of profit possibilities.

The third argument of the nationalization advocates rests on the charge of monopoly, the allegation that the banks themselves are a monopoly or form part of a larger group which in some way or other constitutes a monopoly and exercises control over the industrial and financial institutions of Canada. I am sure that we shall hear the changes rung on this contention and that long lists of the company connections of various bank directors will be presented. The argument has a certain specious appeal. It is easy to make. It can be made in vague terms and embellished with innuendo. It can be used to stir prejudice against mere bigness and successful achievement. But the only point which should interest a responsible member of this house is whether or not it is true.

No one, of course, will wish to deny that most bank directors are also on the boards of other financial or industrial corporations, in a number of cases on a good many other boards. I suppose the quality which above all others the banks desire in their directors is sound business judgment and it seems only natural therefore that they should seek their directors amongst men who have proven they possess that quality by the success they have achieved in other businesses. If the community's banking needs are to be efficiently served, we need men of large vision, constructive imagination, sound judgment and wide experience to assist in formulating the general policies which are to be applied by the senior executive officers of the banks. It would, I think, be very unfortunate if the day ever comes in this country when demonstrated success in one line of business, proven capacity for the direction of large affairs, should debar a man from bringing the benefit of his judgment, foresight and experience to the assistance of bank managements or the management of any other business or, I may add, to the direction of public affairs. Canada has great natural resources and will have adequate capital, but the speed of her future growth and development will depend as much as anything on the adequacy of her supply of managerial talent, of business leaders who possess the qualities which I have mentioned. As a nation we should encourage that kind of talent, not discourage it or decry its success.

Let no one mistake my position. I am not arguing for a widespread use of interlocking directorates but merely for a rational approach to this problem. I have no brief for the man who spreads himself thin over a long list of directorates, and I often wish that the banks and other business corporations would search more intently for suitable directorship material in other walks of life—such as in small business, agriculture and labour—and also that the banks would use to a greater extent the device of regional advisory committees in order to obtain the benefit of as many points of view as possible in working out their policies. These suggestions are merely personal, but I think their adoption would do a great deal to bring about a better public understanding of bank operations and policies and should remove even the appearance of any grounds for the charge that banks are run by a monopoly of big business men in the interest of big business. I suspect that bankers themselves will feel their own consciences clear in this respect and may not see the need of any such devices as I have suggested. They will resent, and rightly so, the insinuation that because they have directors from this and that corporation on their board they allow themselves to be dominated by them, particularly to the extent of restricting credit to the competitors of those corporations. That is a very serious imputation and I do not for a moment believe it has any foundation. No director is allowed to be present or vote at a particular meeting when loans or advances to himself or any firm or corporation in which he is a partner or a director are under consideration, and I am convinced that any director who attempted to prevent the bank from meeting the credit needs of a competitor would receive short shrift at the hands of his fellow directors. If there is any honourable member who honestly believes otherwise, he will have his chance in court. Let him cross-question the bankers when they come before the banking and commerce committee and he will find out how the banks really operate.

After all; there are two tests of whether the banks constitute a monopoly. The first is whether in fact the banks fail to compete with each other in the obtaining of deposit accounts and the granting of credits and thus tend to promote a restriction of credit. The second is whether the banks make abnormal or monopoly profits. Taking the second question first, I am going to give in a few moments detailed figures of the earnings of Canadian banks over a long period. If, after I have disclosed this previously unpublished information, there is any one who still believes that the banks are obtaining abnormal or monopoly profits it will be, I am afraid, because "one convinced against his will is of the same opinion still". On the first point we have the testimony of the volume, "Social Planning for Canada," which according to the foreword written by the late Mr. Woodsworth is "the first comprehensive treatise on Canadian economy from a socialist point of view." I quote the following extract from its discussion of Canadian banks:

> Before answering this question, it is as well to make clear how the chartered banks operate to-day. Their operations are regulated, of course, by a bank act enacted by the federal government, from whom they derive their charters. Perhaps because of this regulation the Canadian banks have been free from the sort of defect which plunged the whole American banking system into panic in 1933. Canadian banks have kept clear of the worst type of speculative loan (e.g., real estate). No bank failure has taken place in Canada since the Home bank closed in 1924. Nothing comparable to the disclosures made with respect to the investment activities of the big banks in the United States has emerged in Canada. At the same time the competition between the banks would seem to guarantee reasonably fair and competitive treatment of all comers.

In general then—and certainly from any superficial point of view—the chartered banks present a picture of a stable, well-ordered set of institutions; a tower of strength in time of trouble, as they not infrequently remind us. There is no doubt that a defective banking system enormously aggravates the inherent instability of the capitalist system; and Canada has been spared that complication.

Most of the current criticism of the chartered banks is picayune stuff. . . .

There can be no doubt about the competition for deposit accounts; even though the banks pay the same rate of interest on deposits there are other ways in which the keen competition manifests itself, including the character and variety of the services offered. Equally there can be no doubt of the competition for lending accounts and an even greater possibility of variation between the different banks in the treatment given and in the services rendered. Business men, both large and small, accustomed to dealing with banks will bear witness to competition that takes place between the banks in attracting accounts. If one talks to such business men one will not take long in finding many instances of switches of lending accounts from one bank to another. Obviously, banks turn down certain applications for loans but the reason is almost certain to be, at least in times other than those of acute depression, either that it was not the type of a loan that a bank should make or that the particular borrower or business was unlikely to be able to repay the loan. In the latter type of case there is always recourse for the borrower to one or all of the other nine banks who may take a different view of the credit-worthiness of the borrower or his enterprise. It is most unreasonable to think that the banks, at least in normal times, should deliberately wish to refuse sound loans or restrict credits when they have the resources with which to make loans. If they cannot get commercial loans, their only recourse is to invest their funds in securities. On such securities they earn less, usually much less, than they could make on sound commercial loans. To-day, and for some years past, their percentage of loans to total assets has been unduly low. The desire to increase their earnings, if nothing else, drives them to seek outlets in loans. The charge of a monopolistic combination conspiring to restrict credit is a figment of the imagination and has no foundation whatever.

The fourth and final point with which we have to deal is the argument that nationalization of the banks is the first step necessary in the liquidation of private enterprise and the ushering in of the socialist state. I suspect that here we have the crux of the whole case. To those who are convinced socialists, it must seem reasonably obvious that control of the banks and other financial institutions is probably an indispensable instrument for the liquidation or slow strangulation of free enterprise and for ushering in the new dispensation. Certainly it will immensely facilitate the task and it is equally clear that a privately controlled banking system would not be consistent with a socialized state.

If we were all socialists, this argument would be wholly convincing. The simple and conclusive answer to it is that the Canadian people are not socialists and do not want to adopt devices, the only valid argument for which is that they will facilitate the coming of socialism. No one can tell me that the Canadian people who have reacted as they have in the last three or four years to the limited controls and partial regimentations essential to the emergency requirements of wartime would ever vote to imprison themselves in a socialist state which would make such controls and regimentations practically universal and perpetual.

If we do not want a socialist state, we do not want a socialized commercial banking system to deaden the initiative of our system of free enterprise. We do not want this government or any other government to have a monopoly of the business of lending for commercial purposes nor even of the business of keeping the people's banking accounts. The relation between banker and borrower, and between banker and depositor is a private, confidential relationship. A large proportion of our citizens would not want any government, even one which they support, to intervene in this confidential relationship or to be privy to it. But a far more important point is the undesirability of having the credit of each of us and of every business throughout the country assessed by civil servants working under political control for a government banking monopoly, rather than by bank managers interested not in the political or other views of the borrower but solely in his ability and trustworthiness as a debtor. The best guarantee of fair lending as well as sound lending is to preserve a number of independent lending agencies, so that a potential borrower can choose his own banker, can deal with the one who is prepared to meet his credit requirements on the most favourable terms and who is interested solely in the soundness of the loan itself. We must, and we do, have control of the cash reserves of the banks, so that the total volume of all bank credit can be controlled—and conditions of depression and crisis avoided. Given that, I think we can trust the enterprise of the banks to lend where opportunities for sound loans are available, because of the incentive to get their loanable funds earning a more attractive return than is possible under the only alternative of investing in securities.

There will be some cases where it would be illegal or inappropriate for the banks to make loans although the loan might be essentially sound and useful in developing Canadian industry and resources. We are proposing to meet this type of problem in two ways. First, we are proposing to establish the industrial development bank in order to assist the financing of small or new enterprises which might otherwise find it impossible or very difficult to get the types of credit required from banks or other financial institutions on reasonable terms and conditions. Here we are using the device of public ownership to carry out a specific task for which it is best fitted. But this government bank will have no monopoly; any potential borrower will be free to go first, or instead, to other banks or to any other source of capital if he so desires. Secondly, I shall be making proposals in a later section of my remarks which will involve assistance from the government to encourage loans to farmers and fishermen of a longer term and different character from those they have been able formerly to make. These two measures, I believe, will be sufficient when coupled with the other legislation announced in the speech from the throne to ensure that adequate credit will be made available for the efficient and vigorous development of our country. They are not intended either to drive the banks out of business or to be a means of gaining financial control over all kinds of business as a step towards socialism.

They do not throw into the scrap basket all the heritage of the past. They build upon it and supplement it in order to remedy any defects it may have had and to enable it to meet fully and efficiently the requirements of our people. Like the nationalization of the Bank of Canada in 1938, they demonstrate the government's willingness to use the agency of the state, even the device of public ownership as well as control, where it is required to serve a useful and specific purpose. The question of nationalization of an industry or a specific firm should not be one of ideology. We should neither shrink from nationalization because of an economic philosophy based on fear, nor embrace it rashly with nothing more in our minds and hearts than mere devotion to doctrine or desire to punish. We should use it only where it alone can serve the public interest or can serve it better than any alternative form of organization. Commercial banking, I am convinced, is not one of those cases. I hold that conviction with greater assurance, because I find that in no other democratic country have the people become convinced that it would be wise to nationalize their commercial banks. In this connection it seems pertinent to observe that even the labour, and avowedly socialist, governments of Australia and New Zealand have not yet seen fit to nationalize the commercial banks in those two dominions.

Summing up this discussion, we find that the several alleged arguments for nationalization of the banks do not stand careful scrutiny. It is not necessary to nationalize the commercial banks to make possible the effective control of currency, credit and prices; we have already nationalized that part of the monetary and banking system which gives us control over currency, credit and prices, namely the central bank. There is no reason, on grounds of operating efficiency, for nationalization. There is no basis for the charge that the chartered banks, whether in combination with other business or not, constitute a monopoly which interferes with the free flow of credit and leads to monopoly profits. We do not want nationalization to promote the liquidation or strangulation of free enterprise or as the entering wedge for socialism. We are providing a publicly-owned institution to provide credit for useful and desirable industrial projects which the private institutions are unable or unwilling to finance, but we do not want to create a huge government monopoly of the banking business which would lead to an enormous increase in centralization, a loss in operating efficiency, a decline in the initiative and enterprise which decentralized and competing private business is best able to supply, and the inevitable intrusion of political consideration and control in the multitude of private transactions which the banks must make. We are confirmed in our point of view by the experience of all other democratic countries.

I would now like to spend a few minutes on what I understand to be the position of the Social Credit party. Their attack on the banking system will be of an entirely different character from that of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party. They, or at least most of them, recognize, I believe, that the chartered banks are efficient in carrying out the ordinary day-to-day functions of commercial banking and would, I imagine, dislike as much as I do the socialist proposal to convert the banks into a huge government monopoly run by bureaucrats. I do not think I need to devote any attention to the main, or shall I say, the original, body of their doctrine, which has been discussed in this house on several occasions and which we seem to hear much less of to-day.

To judge from their more recent utterances, what we may expect from the Social Credit party in this debate is likely to be a proposal that the government should borrow its requirements from the Bank of Canada and that the resulting increase in Bank of Canada notes and deposits will be turned over almost entirely by their recipients to the chartered banks—since the public do not hold deposits in the Bank of Canada and hold only what notes are needed for convenience—should be "frozen" in the hands of the chartered banks. In other words, the chartered banks should not be allowed to use these additional cash reserves as a basis for the usual tenfold expansion of their deposits. Presumably, they will suggest that this policy be carried out by amending the Bank Act in such a way as to require the banks to hold 100 per cent reserves against increases in their deposits beyond a specified figure. The purpose of such a restriction upon the activities of the banks would be to enable the government to borrow its requirements without paying interest except to itself by way of its agency, the Bank of Canada, and without allowing this increase in Bank of Canada money to lead to an unnecessary and very great addition to the loans, investments and deposits of the chartered banks, an addition that they recognize would probably lead to inflation.

Let us trace for a moment in simple terms just how this type of 100 per cent reserve arrangement would work, as undoubtedly many people are attracted by the easy virtues of this apparently costless source of credit. Suppose, then, that we did rule that the banks could not use any additional cash reserve which they obtain, in consequence of government borrowing from the Bank of Canada, as the basis for the usual tenfold expansion in deposits—or what would amount to the same thing, that they must hold additional cash reserves equal to any additions to their present level of deposits. Let us concentrate on the main, simple point and neglect the purely technical difficulties. Armed with this shield against the expansion of bank credit, the government will proceed, we may assume, to borrow, say $1 billion, from the Bank of Canada. With this new fund the government would then draw cheques on the Bank of Canada payable to contractors, civil servants, holders of government bonds and others to whom it must make payments for services rendered. The recipients of these cheques deposit them in their bank account in the normal way, as they do any other cheque—taking in cash from their banks only what they need to have to carry around in the form of cash. The chartered banks will then find that their deposits have increased by almost the whole amount of this billion dollars and in exchange they will have these cheques on the Bank of Canada less the small amount paid out in cash to depositors—which we may safely neglect merely to simplify the argument. The chartered banks then present the cheques to the Bank of Canada and their deposits with that bank increase by $1 billion.

At this stage then the chartered banks' deposit liabilities have increased by about a billion dollars and their cash reserves—their assets—have increased by a billion dollars. While their books may balance they are very much worse off than before because they must pay interest on the additional deposits, so far as these are in the form of savings deposits, and provide services on them which cost real money, and no small amount of money at that as I shall seek to show later. On the other hand, the increase in their assets which is in the form of cash reserves brings in no income at all, as the Bank of Canada, of course, pays no interest on its deposits.

It is in this unfavourable position that the banks would be frozen by the amendment which I suggested the Social Crediters might propose. The banks would be prevented absolutely from following the normal course of using part of their additional reserves to make additional loans or buy additional securities, which is the means by which bank credit and thus bank deposits are expanded on the basis of the additional reserves. It is the expansion made possible in loans and investments under the usual practice that enables the banks to cover the costs of the additions to their deposit liabilities. To block this normal expansion in order to make it safe for the government to exploit Bank of Canada credit more fully, means depriving the banks of the means of meeting the additional cost. As a result, either the shareholders of the bank must absorb these increased costs by receiving less earnings or suffering losses, or the depositors must pay the costs through higher service charges or reduced interest on savings deposits, or other borrowers from the banks must pay more, or bank employees must get less in the form of wages and salaries, or all or some of the four groups must share the burden between them.

It should now be possible to see the proposal in its true light. It is a proposal that the government through the Bank of Canada should force the chartered banks to borrow from the public in the form of deposits which are of course liabilities or debts of the banks, at a cost either in interest or in services rendered, and to relend the funds so obtained to the government interest free. Obviously, such a system favours the government as a borrower. It enables the government to obtain not debt-free money as is contended by its advocates because notes and deposits are liabilities of the body which issues them, but rather interest-free loans. Obviously, also, the system is merely a complicated device for obtaining forced loans from the banks and either the shareholders, the depositors, or the borrowing clients or the employees of the banks must suffer the losses which are the government's gain. This is nothing less than taxation of a most discriminatory and unfair character. There is no reason why the government should seek to escape the cost of interest on its borrowings at the expense of any one or all of these particular groups associated with the banks. The only equitable policy is for the government to pay reasonable rates of interest appropriate to the form and nature of the borrowing and meet the cost from taxation levied by parliament in the way considered fairest and most equitable. If we must for any reason raise forced loans, they should be raised as a general measure applicable fairly to all in accordance with their ability to pay.

Now, I do not think such proposals would be seriously put forward by members of this house, if it were not for the belief which seems to be prevalent in certain quarters that banking is a costless function. We have heard so much talk in recent years about the ten to one ratio and so much propaganda about "fountain-pen money" that some people have come to believe that it costs banks little or nothing to carry on their operations, that it is a very simple business concerned almost entirely with holding a fountain pen upside down and letting the ink run, and that of course the banks must be making enormous profits. The facts are quite to the contrary and something at least of their general signi- finance should, I would have thought, be familiar to certain hon. members who belong to the Social Credit party. They at least should be familiar with the Public Accounts of the province of Alberta which show, if I read them correctly, that the Alberta treasury branches which operate certain deposit accounts had an excess of expenditures over revenue of roughly $390,000 on their operations during the fiscal year 1942-43, and even if we exclude the consumers bonus which was paid, a loss of $246,000.

I am quoting these figures to show that banking is not a costless function.

Mr. JAQUES: They do not create money.

Mr. ILSLEY: Total operating expenditures, after deducting this bonus and, by the way, without including any rentals of office space, were $368,000. As total deposits at the end of that year amounted to less than $6,900,000, this would appear to indicate that the cost to the Alberta government of operating these accounts was something over 5·3 per cent. This seems to throw some light on the cost of operating a deposit business.

While the facts as to bank operating costs and earnings refute some of the views currently held, I am convinced that they must be seen in order to be believed. I have therefore come to the considered conclusion that I should break a long-established tradition of Canadian banking and disclose to this house the essential facts in regard to the operations of the Canadian banking system as a whole.

If therefore the house will permit me, I will place on Hansard at this point a statement showing the current operating earnings and the current operating expenses of the Canadian banks as a group for the average of the fifteen years 1929-43 as well as for the year 1943, together with certain supplementary information relating to the amount of dividends paid to shareholders, the net amount of current operating earnings available for losses on loans, investments and other assets and for general contingencies, the net amount of capital profits including certain non-recurring profits, and the average annual amount required during the 15-year period for losses or specific provision for losses on loans, investments and other assets, less recoveries.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I ask the minister if those figures are disclosed in the monthly or annual returns, or are they confidential figures?

Mr. ILSLEY: They have never been disclosed before.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are not in the returns.

Mr. ILSLEY: They could not be ascertained from anything that has been made public.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The banks are not obliged to disclose them?

Mr. ILSLEY: They cannot be ascertained from the returns.

Mr. QUELCH: Is the minister including the inner and hidden reserves?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. Certain percentage ratios are also given in order to facilitate interpretations of the table. I shall put the table on at this stage and discuss it later.

Mr. COLDWELL: These give the average for each year?

Mr. ILSLEY: I give the fifteen-year average.

Mr. COLDWELL: It is an average?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; then I give 1943 also.

[2] Shareholders' Net Income has been taken as the sum of dividends, net capital or non-recurring profits and net current earnings available for losses less average, annual net amount required for losses in 1929-43.

I will call attention to a few of the more significant points disclosed by this table. The average annual current operating earnings for the 15-year period were $138·7 millions or 4·02 per cent on total assets. These total figures are broken down into interest and discount on loans, earnings on securities and exchange, commission, service charges and other operating earnings, but I will not weary the house by quoting the detailed figures. Current operating expenses (not including losses) averaged $112·3 for the 15-year period which was 3·26 per cent on total assets. These expenses are classified under six headings. When we compare this figure of current operating earnings of only 4·02 per cent of total assets with operating expenses of 3·26 per cent, we have to conclude that there must be something wrong with this fountain pen theory and that the operating margin on which banks have to work is a fairly thin one.

The supplementary information shows that dividends paid to shareholders averaged only 4·6 per cent of total shareholders' equity over the last fifteen years. Even if we take total shareholders' net income which is the sum of dividends, net capital profits, including non-recurring profits, and net current earnings available for losses less the average annual net amount required for losses, we find that it amounted to only 5·09 per cent of total shareholders' equity on the average for the 15-year period. By no stretch of the imagination can a business which produces such results be regarded as a gold mine.

There is just one further point I would wish to make. The table which I have presented shows that after paying dividends which cannot be regarded as high, there was available, out of current operating earnings, for losses on loans, investments and other assets and for general contingencies only an average annual amount of $12·8 million. To this figure are to be added certain net capital profits, averaging $2·5 million a year. This figure includes certain non-recurring profits, among them the profit on gold in the year 1935 and certain profits on securities. In this latter connection it must be remembered that the 15-year period was one in which there was a substantial reduction in interest rates, leading to a corresponding increase in bond prices. Against the sums available out of current operating earnings and from capital profits must be set the requirements for losses or specific provision for losses on loans, investments and other assets, losses which must be expected in the business of banking over a period of years. For the 15-year period, those requirements after deducting any recoveries in respect of losses over-provided for in earlier years average $13·8 million per year. This is the average or "normal" loss experience during this period of good and bad years; everyone knows that the losses in the early thirties were much higher, requiring in certain cases the transfer of substantial sums from published reserves to inner reserves. It is clear from the table that our banking system has fortunately been able to absorb those losses and in addition that it must have strengthened its inner reserve over the last fifteen years by an average annual amount of modest size. Is there any hon. member who will take the responsibility of expressing the conviction that that amount is unduly large for a banking system which is the trustee of the people's savings and which has increased its assets and, therefore, its liabilities by no less than 62 per cent during the period in question.

It is true that interest being paid on savings deposits is now lower than it was on the average during the 15-year period and the total assets and the volume of business of the banks have increased under wartime conditions. On the other hand, the average rate of return on securities and other earning assets of the banks has decreased. The table shows that for the year 1943, total current operating earnings of the banks amounted to $144·5 million or only 2·86 per cent on the total assets of the banks. Current operating expenses, on the other hand, were $114·9 million or 2·28 per cent on total assets. The margin between operating earnings and operating expenses of the banks therefore was somewhat lower than the average for the 15-year period. I am speaking now about the year 1943. Dividends paid to shareholders in 1943 were only 3·3 per cent of total shareholders' equity, and even total shareholders' net income last year was only 6·03 per cent of shareholders' equity. Even in a good year like 1943 the total amount left over out of current operating earnings and capital profits available for losses or specific provision for losses and for general contingencies was only $22·0 million, although there had been a reduction in dividends paid by nearly all the banks, thus retaining for this purpose funds which would normally have been paid out. I have already pointed out that the average annual requirement for losses or specific provision for losses during the last fifteen years was $13·8 million. Under the circumstances and bearing in mind that the losses of bad years have to be met out of the earnings of good years such as 1943, it will be obvious that last year's net earnings were not unduly large.

As Minister of Finance it is my responsibility to exercise general supervision over the operations of the Canadian banks and that is a responsibility which I take very seriously. My considered judgment is that the Canadian banks have not made unduly large profits, that they have come through a most difficult period without impairing the proud tradition of safety which they have built up over a long period of years, that they have reserved an amount of earnings appropriate to take care of the normal hazards of banking but not an amount which responsible and prudent men could say is unduly large, and that their shareholders have been content with a net amount of earnings, both in the form of dividends and left in the business, which is really modest by comparison with the record of other businesses subject to similar risks and managed with comparable efficiency.

Mr. COLDWELL: Has the minister the figures showing the dividends related to the paid-up capital of the banks? I noticed the minister used the words "assets of the banks".

Mr. ILSLEY: No, the equity, the total equity.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The shareholders' money?

Mr. ILSLEY: The total equity. That is not the assets.

Mr. COLDWELL: No, I know it is not the assets. The total equity would include some others, the capital obtained from the public.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right, the rest funds.

Mr. COLDWELL: I want to know the rate on the capital originally obtained from the public.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is easily ascertained. I do not have it here. The figures are well known. It is well known what the capital of the bank is.

Mr. COLDWELL: I know; but to give a fair picture it should be placed on the record with the minister's statement.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, not at all. It would be a very unfair picture. You must take into account the rest funds as well as the subscribed capital.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Dividends are declared on the paid-up capital.

Mr. ILSLEY: Major changes in the Bank Act. Apart from the extension of the charters of the ten existing banks for a further ten-year period ending July 1, 1954, the bill which is now before the house contains a great many amendments to our existing legislation as a result of the very thorough examination we have made of that legislation. Many of these are consequential in character or of minor importance and I shall call the attention of the house only to those of major importance.

First let me deal with the new provisions relating to the issue of notes by the chartered banks. Hon. members will recall that under the existing act the banks have been required to reduce their note issue gradually during the last ten years. As a result of this requirement the legal limit of their note issue in Canada on January 1, 1945, was to be 25 per cent of the amount of their unimpaired, paid-up capital, and what was to happen thereafter was to depend on a further enactment by parliament. During the present year the legal limit is 35 per cent, but the house will realize that in practice the banks must operate somewhat below this legal limit.

We have given very careful consideration to whether we should prohibit further note issue altogether or provide for a further gradual reduction in the legal limit of issue or provide for a continuance of the 25 per cent legal limit which without further enactment would be the law as from January 1 next. We were impressed by the fact that since the establishment of the Bank of Canada, note issue of the chartered banks has ceased to play the important role it formerly played in our economy, and impressed also with the desirability of having all our "money," in the narrow sense of the term (that is to say, coins and paper money) issued by an agency of the state rather than by private institutions. Moreover, from the point of view of the banks I think it can no longer be said that the small amount of notes which they are now permitted to issue can be of any great value in promoting efficiency and economy in the operations of the banks. We have therefore recast the relevant sections of the act to accomplish the following purposes:

1. to preclude any new bank that may be incorporated from having any right to issue notes;
2. to limit the right of existing banks to issue and reissue notes in Canada to the period ending January 1, 1945, and in that period only up to the present limit of 35 per cent of their unimpaired, paid-up capital;
3. to require the existing banks to reduce their note issue in Canada by January 1, 1945, to 25 per cent of their unimpaired, paid-up capital; thereafter until January 1, 1950, to take away from them the right to issue o reissue their notes; and to require them to retire all their notes outstanding in Canada by January 1, 1950; and

4. to allow existing banks to continue to issue notes for circulation outside of Canada but only up to a maximum of 10 per cent of their unimpaired, paid-up capital.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has consideration been given by the government in arriving at this conclusion to the effect of these provisions on the maintenance and operation of country branches? I hold the view that the power of the chartered banks to issue their own notes has a tendency to keep open branches which otherwise might not be maintained.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think the factor now is so small—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is thirty-five per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: —that it would not result in the keeping open of any branches which otherwise would be closed. Whether or not branches are kept open will depend mainly on the possibility of making advantageous loans in volume in the districts concerned. There are other provisions in the bill which I think will help that situation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The charge against the banks was that they took deposits away from the small communities and lent them elsewhere. But the maintenance of the note issue was a factor in keeping open those branches, and if it is to be taken away the branches may be closed.

Mr. ILSLEY: The committee can consider that, but the percentage now is down to such dimensions that I do not think it would have any effect in keeping open any branches.

On January 1, 1950, the amount of unretired notes issued for circulation to Canada and still outstanding must be paid over to the Bank of Canada and the Bank of Canada will then become liable to redeem the said notes. On the passing of the act the Bank of Canada will become the agency for redemption of the notes of any bank that winds up. Notes of those banks which have been wound up in the past will henceforth be redeemed by the Bank of Canada rather than by the Minister of Finance. It will be obvious that as a result of these proposals the Bank of Canada is to become after January 1, 1950, the exclusive note-issuing agency in Canada, and it will also be the exclusive note-redemption agency, first, of the outstanding notes of defunct banks, and by 1950, of any outstanding notes of the existing banks.

I should add that the changes which we are proposing in regard to note issue will require certain other consequential changes. Apart from the necessary changes in the statements regarding note issue required to be made to the minister, there will also be a new subsection providing that the provisions of the Act relating to the circulation redemption fund shall cease to operate in respect of any bank after it has paid over to the Bank of Canada the funds needed to redeem any of its notes outstanding on January 1, 1950.

I might at this point refer to a somewhat related amendment to section 92 of the act. The general principle as to the responsibility of a bank in respect of deposits made with it which has long been in effect in Canada, has been that the claim of a depositor is not barred or lost by reason of any statute of limitations or prescription, the responsibility of the bank being a continuing responsibility. I believe that this principle is just, and fundamental to maintaining confidence in the banking structure. A modification of the application of this principle is proposed by the amendment. If, in respect of any debt owing by a bank and outstanding on its books in Canada by reason of a deposit, no transaction has taken place and no claim has been made for ten years, or if in respect of any such debt owing by the bank by reason of a cheque, draft or bill of exchange issued, drawn or certified by it, no payment has been made for ten years, the bank shall pay to the Bank of Canada the amount of the debt together with interest, if any, to the date of payment. Thereupon the liability of the bank in respect of the debt ceases and determines but it is provided that the Bank of Canada shall, if payment is demanded by the person who was creditor of the bank or by his legal representatives, pay the amount paid to it together with interest, if interest was payable on the debt, for a period not exceeding twenty years at such rate and computed in such manner as may be determined from time to time by the governor in council. After the expiration of the twenty-year period the Bank of Canada will continue to be liable to pay the amount and the interest accumulated during that period, but no further interest will accumulate. The governor in council may make regulations prescribing the time for payment by a bank to the Bank of Canada, the records to be maintained or kept by the bank with reference to a debt with respect to which payment is so made, the manner of payment of any claim against the Bank of Canada and the rate of interest to be paid by the Bank of Canada and the manner of computation thereof. The result of this amendment is that the principle I have referred to, that the claim of a depositor or his legal representative, to repayment of moneys deposited in a bank is not limited in time, is preserved, but unclaimed deposits, which formerly were retained indefinitely by the chartered banks will no longer be retained by them.

Provision is also made that a bank shall not be liable in respect of any act or omission relating to an account kept by the bank, which occurred or which is alleged to have occurred thirty years prior to the making of a claim in respect thereof. At the present time a bank maintains complete records of all its accounts whether they are still open or have closed for many years, because there is no time limit on the liability of the bank to give an accounting in respect of any of these accounts. The amendment is designed to relieve the banks of liability where items in its accounts have not been questioned for thirty years and will permit the banks to destroy records more than thirty years old, the maintenance and accommodation of which are presenting an ever expanding problem, particularly under today's conditions. This provision does not apply to accounts kept by the bank in respect of unclaimed deposits, the provision for which I have already mentioned.

Various changes are being made in the provisions of the act regarding the many statements and returns required to be made to the minister. Former sections 112-114 have been recast and renumbered as sections 112-119 for purposes of clarification and to eliminate repetition. This has permitted the penalty sections relating to returns (former sections 154-162) to be consolidated into one section (section 158). Minor changes have also been made in the form of some of the returns in consequence of other changes made in the act or for other reasons and there have been certain deletions to avoid unnecessary duplication or because the relevant information no longer serves any useful purpose.

Very important changes are being made in respect of section 91. Subsection 1 of this section fixes the maximum rate of interest or discount which may be charged by any chartered bank. In keeping with the decline in interest rates which has occurred in recent years, this maximum rate is now being reduced from 7 per cent to 6 percent per annum. However, we are adding a new subsection which makes a far more radical change in Canadian banking practice and which will, I hope, make a really important contribution to public need. It has always seemed to me highly anomalous that while this parliament has passed an act authorizing small loan companies and personal money lenders to make small personal instalment loans on the basis of a charge for interest and other costs of 2 per cent per month for loans extending up to fifteeen months, nevertheless we have at the same time prevented our normal lending institutions, the chartered banks, from participating effectively or on any considerable scale in this type of business. The loans are for small amounts, the average, I believe, being around $150, they require to be repaid in small monthly or other periodic instalments, and collateral security is inadequate or lacking altogether. The result is that the costs of doing the business are high and the effective rate of interest must be proportionate or the loans will not be made. The only reason, I believe, why this house was convinced that the small loan companies should be allowed to charge a rate as high at 2 per cent per month was the belief that otherwise the necessitous borrowers who need these loans would be driven to pay higher, and indeed much higher, rates to so-called loan sharks. No one liked to approve a charge of 2 per cent a month and yet the alternative was far worse.

After very careful consideration, I became convinced that we should make it possible for the chartered banks to participate on a substantial scale in this type of business. They already have offices in easy access to the public throughout the country and should therefore be able to conduct the business on a more economical basis. I am therefore proposing that where a loan, evidenced by a promissory note, repayable in substantially equal instalments does not exceed $500 and is not secured otherwise than by endorsement of the note or by insurance on the life of the borrower in favour of the bank as the insured, the bank may charge discount or interest at a rate which, having regard to the term of the loan and the frequency of the instalments, does not exceed a rate of interest equivalent to the rate resulting from a discount of 5 per cent on a one-year loan repayable in equal monthly instalments. A 5 per cent discount on such a loan is equivalent to an effective interest rate of 9¾ per cent per annum, which, it will be noted, is considerably less than half the rate allowed to the small loan companies and personal money lenders. No other charge can be made by the bank in respect of such loans except, of course, interest at no higher rate on overdue payments and the actual cost to the bank of insurance on the life of the borrower. This insurance will be term insurance taken out in the form of a blanket policy on the lives of all such borrowers and the cost is very low indeed—I believe about twenty-five cents per $100. I wish to emphasize that the loans covered by the special provisions of this subsection will be unsecured loans and that loans to a borrower who is able to give ordinary collateral security will come under the maximum interest ceiling provided for in subsection 1.

For these new proposals I would like the benefit of very special consideration by the banking and commerce committee and this house. In my desire to keep maximum charges low I may easily have gone too far and I would like the committee to hear evidence from the banks as to whether it is really possible to do this type of business under the terms which I am here suggesting. Furthermore, while in the interest of simplicity and for the purpose of avoiding an odd or fractional rate of interest, I have expressed the ceiling in terms of a 5 per cent discount, it may be that the committee may prefer to express the ceiling in terms of a maximum rate of interest per month or per year. I shall be prepared to welcome the guidance of the committee in this respect also.

An amendment to section 85 is being suggested to facilitate the financing of alterations of, repairs to or installations on ships or vessels. Under the present law a bank may loan money to aid in the building of a ship, taking as security therefor a mortgage, hypothec or lien on the ship. Under the amendment proposed they may take the same security for a loan to assist in the installation of engines or equipment or the repair or alteration of the ship or its engines or equipment.

There is also an amendment to section 75 which gives specific power to the banks to lend money or make advances upon the security of, and take as collateral security for any loan or advance made by it, lien or other notes, conditional sales contracts or any other instruments or agreements made or entered into respecting the sale of goods, wares and merchandise. The object of this amendment is to remove any doubt as to the validity of advances made on this type of security. Practically all notes taken for goods sold on a time basis are either in lien form or supported by lien contracts, and frequently the dealer who sells the goods or the finance company with whom he discounts the notes, desires to obtain bank credit against the security of such notes.

I now come to a series of amendments relating to a category of loans which, in banking parlance, is known as section 88 loans. There are a number of changes in the definitions in section 2 which have the effect of extending the coverage of section 88 and making it possible for certain additional borrowers to get credit thereby. Thus the definition of "grain" is now widened to include "beans, and all kinds of seeds" and the definition of "live stock" is being extended to include fur-bearing animals in order to assist farmers and others who raise such animals for their pelts or for sale as breeders. Similarly, the definition of "manufacturer" has been extended to include bottlers and canners of all kinds. There are certain other important changes in regard to farmers and fishermen which I shall come to a little later.

In addition to these changes, I am also submitting for consideration certain proposed amendments to sections 88-90 and the schedules relevant thereto. Some of these amendments are intended to eliminate repetitions and certain inconsistencies but others are designed to simplify the procedure in giving security which is now complicated and believed to be unnecessarily burdensome on both borrowers and banks. We have received representations not only from banks but also from business firms and organizations requesting this simplification. After careful consideration, the arguments appeared to me to be convincing and I have therefore included the proposed amendments in the bill. However, I would like the banking and commerce committee to give these proposed amendments very carefully consideration and to hear evidence from both business and bankers in regard to them.

Perhaps I can make clearer the nature of the proposed amendments if I say a few words about the working of the present section and the arguments which have been advanced for the suggested changes. Manufacturers constantly process raw materials into finished goods which are sold and new materials are continually being purchased for manufacture. Other types of borrowers likewise find it necessary frequently to turn over the goods upon which security is given. Under the terms of section 88, as it is at present, fresh security must be given every time new materials are acquired. This involves a good deal of needless paper work. By virtue of the new procedure under the proposed amendments the security given at the outset will be security for the payment of all loans and advances made or to be made under the seasonal line of credit granted under the original and any supplementary applications for credit and promises to give security. Property of the kind assigned whether owned or to be owned by the borrower is covered, thus facilitating the operation of a revolving line of credit and covering raw materials as they are acquired and manufactured. The

The result, it is obvious, will be to reduce the great amount of work required of customers who continue acquiring new property upon which they wish to borrow money. At the present time a grain dealer, for instance, who has already applied for and been granted a line of credit for the season and has signed a promise to give security may have to complete and sign daily not only a promissory note but a fresh assignment under section 88, describing all the promissory notes to be covered as well as the property covered and the place or places in which it is located. Under the new procedure an application for credit for the season coupled with a promise to give security will be signed. When funds are required, security in the new form will be given which will suffice for the season and as additional funds are needed all that will be necessary for the borrower to do will be to give covering promissory notes pursuant to the application for the seasons's credit. Consequently it is claimed that what has of a number of branches and it is sometimes previously been accomplished through a most laborious and cumbersome procedure both for borrowers and bank staffs will be accomplished with a minimum of effort and at the same time the banks will not be getting any thing in the way of security that they are not now getting for the same revolving credit as a result of the present laborious procedure.

It will be obvious to the house that these changes while primarily procedural, are nevertheless of real importance. The opportunity which the committee will have of cross-questioning witnesses from both business and banks will, I believe, enable hon. members to determine whether the greater convenience to the business community and the more readily availability of credit under section 88 warrant the adoption of these proposals. I am prepared to be guided by the views which the committee will reach upon the basis of the evidence.

I shall omit any reference to other minor changes and proceed immediately to explain the most important and I believe the most constructive changes which we are suggesting in this banking bill. I refer to the proposals designed to make credit, particularly intermediate credit, readily available on reasonable terms to farmers and fishermen.

In the field of agricultural credit the primary function of the chartered banks in the past has been to provide short-term or seasonal loans to farmers for the financing of current production. The widespread system of branches which our Canadian banks have established has on the whole proved well adapted to a country of great distances and rapidly changing frontiers of settlement. To facilitate farm lending, section 88 has been amended from time to time during the past fifty years, with the result that it is uniquely adapted to Canadian agricultural conditions, there being no counterpart so far as I am aware in any other country. Under this section loans can be made to farmers for any purpose on the security of threshed grain and livestock, and for the purchase of seed, fertilizer and binder twine on the security of the growing crop.

These provisions of the Bank Act have enabled the banks to extend credit on an extensive scale to farmers for the growing, harvesting and marketing of their crops. Nevertheless, there has been criticism both of the banks and of the legislation. The most common complaint is that the banks have been unduly restrictive in their lending policy, particularly during periods of difficulty such as were experienced during the drought and depression years of the thirties. This is a matter of judgment and I hold no brief for the bankers, who will have an opportunity to answer for themselves before the banking and commerce committee. There has also been criticism of the banks as a result of the closing said that with the smaller number of branches the banks are now unable to give adequate service to farmers in certain areas. It seems to me, however, that the credit stringency during the thirties and the closing of branches in rural areas were in the main a reflection of the unsatisfactory situation then prevailing in agriculture, due in part to drought and other climatic hazards and in part to the effect of the world-wide depression on agricultural prices. The government has already done much, and proposes to do more, for the purpose of achieving reasonable stability in agricultural incomes. As a nation, we must, and we are determined to, achieve a better balance between our rural and our urban economies and even without the legislation which the government has announced for establishing a floor under the prices of the major agricultural products, it seems to me that the outlook for the agricultural industry in the years immediately following the war will be more promising than it has been in a very long time. Given any reasonable assurance of stable prices and agricultural prosperity, I do not think that farmers will have any difficulty in securing from the banks the credit they need to finance their short-term or seasonal requirements. It also seems to me the reasonable expectation that the banks will only be too ready to re-open branches in any community where there is any prospect of the branches being self-sustaining.

At the other end of the scale are the long-term credit requirements of agriculture. I need hardly remind the house that the chartered banks are not empowered under the Bank Act to lend on the security of real estate mortgages. This has been a fundamental principle of Canadian banking since confederation and experience has, I think, proved its soundness for depositors, borrowers and shareholders alike. The long-term credit needs of agriculture therefore, must be and are being met by a different set of institutions, namely, the insurance companies, the mortgage and loan companies and government lending agencies which specialize in mortgage lending. In this field the dominion has acted directly not only by making long-term mortgage loans available to war veterans, both after the last war and now under the new and generous Veterans Land Act, but also to other farmers through the Canadian farm loan board. I have already referred to the Central Mortgage Bank Act which was intended to facilitate lending by private agencies in this field, but the operation of which had to be postponed for the time being. Although in the meantime there has been a very substantial reduction in farm debts throughout Canada, it would be a mistake to assume that the need for a central mortgage institution has disappeared and, as I have already intimated, parliament may soon wish to give reconsideration to this legislation, perhaps with an approach somewhat different from that required by the special problems confronting us in 1939.

There remains for consideration another field of farm credit which grows steadily in importance as standards of living rise on the farms and as mechanization of the farm proceeds. This is the kind of credit needed by farmers to increase the efficiency of their farming operations and to add to the amenities of life on the farm. Loans for such purposes would usually be required for from two or three years to eight or ten years and are therefore usually referred to as intermediate credit. Such loans have not ordinarily been available from the banks partly because of the limitations imposed by the Bank Act, and partly because, as the liabilities of the banks are mostly in the form of deposits withdrawable on demand or short notice, it has always been thought desirable that they should keep their assets in rather liquid form. On the other hand, the farmer seldom feels justified in raising money for these purposes from a mortgage institution.

The Canadian Farm Loan Act provided for a system of intermediate credit by making second mortgage loans available for the purpose of consolidating debts, purchasing stock, machinery and equipment and making permanent improvements, but as such loans could be made only to farmers who were also borrowers on first mortgage from the board, these particular facilities were of course available to relatively few farmers. In the main, intermediate credit of this type has been provided to farmers by the implement companies, lumber dealers and other manufacturers and merchants with something durable or semi-durable to sell to the farmer. Financing of this kind is always relatively costly, partly because it is not sufficiently selective and partly because the farmer obtains his credit not directly but at second hand. One of the greatest difficulties was that the good farmer, able and willing to pay his debts on the dot, had to bear the burden of the losses and heavy collection costs caused by the inefficient or irresponsible farmer who could not or would not pay his debts as they came due. I have heard it said that a not inconsiderable portion of the cost of farm implements is due to the loading included in the price to take care of the losses and the high collection costs incurred by the implement companies. The term and method of repayment of these trade credits are also usually standardized and frequently are not adapted to the special circumstances of individual farmers. I think the house will agree that, if we can establish a workable system under which the farmer can pay cash to the manufacturer or dealer for his machinery and equipment and secure from some other source a credit on reasonable terms and with repayment adapted to his probable income receipts, we shall be making a real contribution to the reduction in the price of farm machinery and equipment and to the efficient and economical conduct of the farming industry.

I think also there can be little doubt of the extent of the need. With the shortage of man-power and materials, farm equipment and farm buildings must have been allowed to run down during the war years. When the war ends and controls are relaxed, there will presumably be need for an extensive reequipment programme for Canadian agriculture. Moreover, as part of a programme of post-war reconstruction and in order to improve farm efficiency and the amenities of farm life, we will wish to see a wide extension of rural electrification and widespread activity in the repair, renovation and construction of farm buildings. We will wish to see better houses, as well as better barns, and more bathrooms, more electric stoves, and more electric refrigerators in our farm homes. Finally, there will always be need for intermediate credit for drainage and fencing, for building up herds of live stock and for other permanent improvements.

Granted the need, how is credit for these purposes to be made readily available to farmers? Serious consideration over a long period of time has been given to various aspects of this problem. For a time we felt that we might have to set up a new government institution, perhaps somewhat similar to the proposed industrial development bank, with a hierarchy of offices and agencies throughout the country. The house will appreciate, however, that unlike the industrial development bank which will operate with a relatively few offices and a comparatively small but highly skilled staff, a similar agency to provide intermediate credit for agriculture could only do its job effectively with literally thousands of branches or offices throughout rural areas readily accessible to farmers. Some of the United States farm credit organizations were considered as possible models, but the government did not feel justified in imposing on farm borrowers, or on the country as a whole, the additional burden which the overhead costs of such an extensive organization would involve when the same objective could be attained more speedily and effectively and at a fraction of the cost by a comparatively simple extension of existing lending facilities. Moreover, a new set of institutions would have taken years to build up and to equip with competent and experienced staff. In contrast the solution which we are proposing offers facilities already at hand, ready to start to work to-morrow if we should decide that the public need so requires.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

If the house will bear with me, I shall endeavour to explain my proposals in somewhat greater detail. The enabling provisions in the Bank Act are to be found in paragraphs (f), (g) and (h) of subsection 1 of section 88 and in subsections 2 and 3 of section 89. These provisions enable loans to be made to farmers for the purchase of agricultural implements upon the security of such agricultural implements for the purchase or installation of agricultural equipment or a farm electric system (defined to include all machinery, apparatus and appliances for the generation or distribution of electricity on a farm) upon the security of such agricultural equipment or farm electric system, whether movable or affixed; and for permanent improvements generally upon the security of agricultural implements. Permanent improvements in this sense will include the alteration or improvement of a farm electric system, the erection or construction of fencing or drainage works, the construction, repair, alteration or extension of any building or structure on a farm, and any other works for the improvement or development of a farm for which a farm improvement loan may be made under the companion legislation.

The provisions to ensure that these facilities will be made available to farmers to the fullest possible extent, at reasonable rates of interest and for sufficiently long terms will be found in the collateral measure to which I have referred. It would not be appropriate for me on this occasion to explain in detail the terms of that measure which is not yet before the house. However, to enable hon. members to grasp the significance of the changes being made in the Bank Act, I may be permitted to refer to some of its general principles. It will authorize the Minister of Finance to guarantee a bank against loss up to a specified proportion of the aggregate amount of loans of the eligible category made by a bank; incidentally it is intended that this specified proportion shall be 10 per cent. The bill will specify the types of loans that will be eligible for this guarantee. They will be classified by purpose and type of security to be taken, and the length of term as well as the maximum amount of loan permitted will vary with the class of loan. The maximum interest rate allowed to be charged by the banks will be 5 per cent simple interest per annum. There will of course be a limit on the total amount of loans which may be guaranteed without further enactment by parliament as well as a limit on the amount of loan which may be made in respect of any one farm. Finally, the legislation will permit the guarantee of loans not only to farmers who own their own farms but, also for certain types of purposes, to purchasers under agreements for sale and tenant farmers as well.

It is obvious that this direct and simple approach to the problem of intermediate credit for agriculture has several very important advantages. It avoids delay; the loans can be made available throughout farm areas the day after the legislation comes into effect. It avoids the hazards and the additional costs of building up an elaborate, new and untried bureaucratic organization. It affords a desirable combination of government assistance with business judgment. The banks will be encouraged by the government guarantee to make loans wherever there is a reasonable prospect of repayment, yet they will retain sufficient interest in the soundness of each loan to exercise ordinary business prudence. Any cost which may ultimately have to be borne by the government should not be large in relation to the great benefits which will accrue The principle has already been applied with conspicuous success in the home improvement plan, the banks lending $50 million to home owners, mostly in urban districts, and within a period of two or three years. Under that plan of government guarantee, the losses to date are only about three-quarters of one per cent.

These new facilities for short and intermediate term agricultural credit form another and important part of the government's programme to prepare the way for a high level of employment and income after the war. The benefits will be available in some measure as soon as the legislation comes into effect, but the full value will appear only when wartime restrictions are lifted.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister speaks of short and intermediate term credits being extended with respect to agriculture and some other branches; but has the government closed the door entirely upon this means of financing the type of security that is covered by an industrial development bank?

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes. The needs of small industry will be met by the Industrial Development bank instead of by guarantees.

Mr. GRAYDON: No; the question I asked was this—and I raised it on a debate previously in connection with the Industrial Development bank—whether the existing lending institutions might conceivably be used for the purpose envisaged by the Industrial Development bank in the same way the minister now proposes to do in the case of agriculture.

Mr. ILSLEY: No; that would involve a guarantee on the basis of the home improvement plan, and I think it is better to do it the other way, in the case of the Industrial Development bank. In the case of the Industrial Development bank you only require to have ten or twelve branches all over the country and you can handle it without trouble. But you cannot handle this in that way.

Mr. GRAYDON: The principle seemed to be the same. That is why I raised the question.

Mr. ILSLEY: During the war some farmers will have accumulated funds to pay for their own post-war programmes, but it is essential that such additional financing as may be necessary and desirable should be available on terms that do not place an undue burden on the farmer. This is particularly important in view of the necessary replacements that must take place when supplies of implements and equipment are again available in full volume. I may add that the government is hopeful that these new facilities will be used extensively in the improvement, modernization and electrification of farm homes which, I am convinced, should be one of this country's major post-war objectives.

Our study of the special credit needs of agriculture led to an examination of the credit needs of other primary industries. Facilities of section 88 of the Bank Act have been available for a long time to the logger and the lumber man, and I know of no difficulty in this field which would suggest the need of any special legislation at this time. There are, however, real and difficult problems in the fishing industry.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What about the decision of the privy council in the Royal bank and Port Royal case?

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall have to discuss that, I am afraid, in the banking and commerce committee. I do not know just what the decision is to which the hon. gentleman refers.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I know, to my sorrow.

Mr. ILSLEY: This industry presents problems not only in the credit field but in the economic and social fields as well. Provision of better credit facilities will be helpful but will of course not solve all the problems. Conditions as between the Pacific coast, Atlantic coast and inland fisheries vary considerably, but the need for new capital is probably greatest along the Atlantic coast where fishing is carried on in scattered communities originally adapted to salt fish production which have only recently begun to adjust themselves to modern conditions of freezing and canning. It is significant that ninety per cent of the fishermen on the Atlantic coast work on their own account. Most of these fish in the coastal waters from small boats which cannot put to sea except in good weather. Deep sea fishing is organized on a large-scale basis and is carried on chiefly by corporations owning a number of boats or by co-operative groups, fishermen and others, who join together in the ownership and operation of a vessel. Low prices and relative depression in the industry from 1928 to 1939 prevented individual fishermen from accumulating any surplus themselves. For the same reasons outside funds were not attracted to the industry in any volume. The mortgage lending institutions found it difficult to do business with fishermen because of the lack of substantial collateral. Consequently, fishermen working on their own account have had to rely often on instruments made by hand or on the cheapest type of capital goods such as might be provided by merchants or outfitters on credit. In recent years credit unions in certain districts and the fishermen's loan board in Nova Scotia have supplanted merchants as a source of capital, but the resources of these institutions allow them to make relatively small loans. In only a comparatively few localities have fishermen been doing business with commercial banks. In short, although fishermen are more prosperous now than for many years, the credit facilities at the disposal of the fishing industry are incapable of providing the capital for that improvement and increase in efficiency of boats and gear and processing equipment which will be necessary if the industry is to be reasonably prosperous after the war. Only through such increase in efficiency can our fish resources be exploited effectively and the highly perishable product handled in such a way as to compete with modern food industries.

The Industrial Development bank should be useful in meeting some of the capital requirements of the fishing industry as its powers include the granting of credit for the construction of fishing craft or for refrigeration or other processing needs. In order to permit and encourage the chartered banks to finance at least certain of the short-term and intermediate credit needs of fishermen, we are proposing an amendment to section 88 of the Bank Act which would make it possible for a bank to make loans to any fisherman upon the security of fishing vessels, fishing equipment and supplies or upon the catch itself.

To make these provisions fully effective, it will be necessary, I believe, to enact a companion measure somewhat similar to the Farm Improvement Loans Act which I have already described, which will enable the government to give a limited guarantee in respect of loans made by chartered banks to fishermen. It will probably not be possible to introduce this legislation at the current session of parliament. Other measures will have to be taken by government to enable this industry to become a healthfully functioning industry providing reasonable economic returns and sound social conditions and all these measures must fit together into a well rounded and integrated programme for the industry as a whole. A careful investigation is being undertaken with this objective in view. In the meantime it is proposed that loans made by banks for the renovation or modernization of the homes of fishermen, many of whom in fact combine fishing with farming or logging, may be included under the guarantee facilities to be provided for under housing legislation to be introduced later.

I have now completed this long survey of the major changes which we are proposing in our banking legislation as well as of the considerations and guiding principles with which we approached this decennial revision. I trust that the house will agree that we have made a very serious effort to bring this legislation up to date and to make sure, in so far as it can be done by legislation, that our banking system will meet efficiently and effectively the varying requirements of the different sections of our population and thereby make the maximum contribution to the building and development of the greater and better Canada to which we all look forward.

On motion of Mr. Ilsley the debate was adjourned.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Monday, May 1, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

National selective service programme, $11,002,429.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): At page 560 of Hansard the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) is reported as follows:

The point is that these people object to paying for the war under compulsion. One of these men tells me that if he had consented to pay $2 a week to the Red Cross he could have avoided going to gaol or going into the army.

Mr. MITCHELL: Who made that statement? I never did.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The hon. member for York South.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am not responsible for any statement made by him. You had better ask him the question.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The hon. member asked the minister of defence a question in that regard, and I wondered whether there was any truth in it because a number of people have asked me the same question. Does the minister say that there is no truth in it?

Mr. MITCHELL: I am dealing with a man-power pool of 1,600,000 people. I cannot answer offhand a question of that kind, but I doubt whether there is any substantiation for the statement that a man in exchange for $2 a week to some organization can escape going to gaol. To me it does not ring true.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The statement is, going to gaol or into the army. It is something that should be cleared up.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In this regard, I asked the minister a question about conscientious objectors and particularly the number of conscientious objectors who are allowed to remain on the farms of parents or relatives and do their alternative service on these farms. I have in mind a man who was declared a conscientious objector and who was given certain forms to be executed. In those forms there was a clause whereby, as long as $15 a month was paid to the Red Cross, this man was guaranteed the right to remain on the farm, but if the employer failed to turn over $15 a month, in that event the man was to be sent to an alternative camp. That is as recently as March 21 of this year. The minister said that he did not like to see men sent to these camps because the work they would do would not be necessary to the war effort. I have before me a copy of the agreement which conscientious objectors working on farms are required to sign. One provision is that the employer shall pay for the employee's services in respect of such employment at the rate of farm labour, $40 per month, and the employer shall further provide suitable board and lodging for the employee. The employer shall pay to the employee the sum of $25 per month. The employer shall pay to the Canadian Red Cross Society, or such person as the Minister of Labour may designate to receive the same for the Canadian Red Cross Society, the balance of said monthly payment payable by the employer for the employee's services, namely, the sum of $15 per month.

How many of the 8,000 conscientious objectors now on farms are actually on farms of their parents or brothers? As regards the Doukhobors, the minister says that the problem has been completely solved in Saskatchewan. What it amounts to in their case is the approval of the flouting of these regulations by these people. I should like the minister to give the numbers with regard to these people, and then I have something more to say in that connection.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have not the figures in front of me of the people on their own farms. I shall be glad to look up that information and find out the disposition of these people if it is physically possible. Let me be frank about this; I still hold the opinion that it is far better to have these people working in a productive capacity than to have them tucked away in some camp, provided they comply with the law. If they do not comply with the law they go into a camp. Make no mistake about that.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What it amounts to is this: while alternative service was prescribed and the method of that alternative service was described, the result to-day is that for the payment of $15 a month to the Red Cross these people are allowed to perform service on behalf of others on their own relatives' farms.

There is another matter I should like to ask the minister about because it is of considerable importance. It has not been answered because it has not been drawn to the minister's attention. This information is of great importance in discussing the minister's speech because it has to do with the availability of reinforcements for the armed services. In his speech the minister used these words, which are to be found at page 2445 of Hansard:

> Recently my colleague, the Minister of National Defence (army), made the statement in the house that he would require 60,000 men in the year commencing the first of April. In further correspondence with me, he has stressed the absolute necessity of obtaining these men, particularly bearing in mind the requirements of operations which are in prospect. In the last six months, September, 1943, to February, 1944, there actually have been more than 5,000 men per month who were enlisted and enrolled in the army alone. However, the monthly average has been decreasing, and at times enlistments and enrolments have fallen below the numbers required by the army.

This is a matter upon which the minister must have full statistics. At page 2445 of Hansard I asked him the question as to the months when the numbers enlisted and enrolled fell below the numbers required. As I understand it the difference between the enlistments and enrolments is that enlistment represents volunteering for service anywhere and enrolment represents the recording of a man's call-up in the home defence army. I ask the minister to give the figures as to the numbers that have been asked for by the Minister of National Defence for the army in each of the months beginning October 1, last, and also the numbers required under the call-up scheme from month to month, and the degree to which these requirements have been met month by month to date. The minister said that he had the information available but did not have it before him at the moment. The minister said, as reported at page 2445 of Hansard:

> I can get those figures for my hon. friend, but I think he will appreciate that when you are operating machinery of the magnitude I am, you cannot remember all these little details. I shall be glad to make a note and get those figures at the earliest opportunity.

I ask the minister to furnish that information now.

Mr. MITCHELL: That still stands, Mr. Chairman. I will get the figures. I have them here in a partial way. Since my hon. friend has been talking figures I intend to talk figures. I intend to talk about this phantom army of 390,000 people in respect of which my hon. friend made the headlines as usual this morning.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The minister will make them to-morrow morning.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not think so. The newspapers in which my hon. friend made the headlines are not newspapers that are friends of this government. My hon. friend made the same mistake as was made last year and there is a simple explanation for it. I should like to draw to his attention the situation with respect to the province of Quebec, to which he referred. He said that there were only 8,872 called up when there should have been 39,000.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Called up for medical examination in military district F.

Mr. MITCHELL: Wait until I am through. I think he told only half the story and he put the worst possible complexion on that half. He is assuming the total number called to report for medical examination at Quebec is the total number called in the province of Quebec. He has simply omitted the total number called to report in the city of Montreal. The total for the two places is 81,855, just about ten times as many as my hon. friend mentioned in his speech yesterday.

In dealing with man-power figures I do not wonder that one becomes confused. They are, of course, big figures. May I refer to table No. 7, which was placed on Hansard on April 28 and may be found at page 2451. An explanation of the accounting has been made there and shows a total of 1,665,504. It is not exact. I am frank to admit it is not exact accounting because there is an additional shortage of 49,000 men, and not 390,000 men, as my hon. friend pointed out yesterday. I am confident that when I next make a survey of the man-power resources of this country before this committee we shall have been able to account for the 49,000 men. May I say that there are deficiencies in every country where there is a man-power problem. It is inevitable. People die and you do not know anything about them. In the Dominion of Canada people slip across the border and join the United States army; they go into the mercantile marine, and so on, but I do not think it is in the best interests of Canada to broadcast figures of that kind, because after all is said and done, the 390,000 men of whom my hon. friend speaks constitute almost as big a number as the total of the active forces, army, of the Dominion of Canada. I think the people of this country, and even the hon. member himself, take that figure with a grain of salt. He is simply taking the number of orders to report for medical examination and deducting the number of men who reported. The remainder he calls the "lost men". If you look at the table appearing at page 4039 of Hansard of 1943 you will see that there is an explanation of the difference, and it is a simple explanation.

Then my hon. friend takes order No. 142-A, which shows the result of the military training call-up as of January 31, 1944. This shows 433,453 men called, and it explains just what happened. It admits that 9,274 who were called did not comply, and, in addition, that 4,803 orders did not reach the men, making a total of 14,077 as of January 31, 1944. These have not been located, but we have been tracing them and some of them have, of course, been located since that date. Instead of using the figure 14,077, my hon. friend adds another 5,000, making a total of 19,077. I am afraid my hon. friend did not study arithmetic in the same school that I did.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is true.

Mr. MITCHELL: At page 2498 of Hansard my hon. friend speaks of 22,000 men having been found by commission agents. Actually the figure is 25,710.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The figure given by the minister the other day was 22,000.

Mr. MITCHELL: I said that was an approximate figure. I have a vivid recollection of that; I was very careful about it, because I was making an extended statement at that time. I pointed out very clearly to my hon. friend that the figure was approximate. Again on the same page the hon. gentleman speaks of the total number of prosecutions up to the end of March, 1944, as being 4,214, when actually there were 5,227.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Was that not the correct number up to the end of January?

Mr. MITCHELL: No; the total was 5,227. If I may put it in this way, I do not think it is quite the right thing to endeavour to place other than a proper interpretation upon the man-power situation of this country. It is like the case of a man biting a dog; that is news, while it is not news if a dog bites a man. I do not consider it quite right to let the story go to the four corners of the earth that we have 390,000 men missing as far as the call-up is concerned. Last year it was the man-power muddle; this year I suppose it is going to be the lost battalion. Before hon. gentlemen make statements of that kind, if they are not clear on the facts my office is always open, as are the offices of my officials. If hon. gentlemen want to place the correct interpretation upon any figures dealing with such a vital question as the man-power situation of this country, I am sure my office door always swings both ways, as well as the doors of the offices of my officials provided the information solicited is of a kind that can be made public without being of any assistance to the enemy.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the minister if the figures coming from his office would be at all different from the figures given in the house?

Mr. MITCHELL: Of course not; why should they be?

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not know, but I understood that the hon. member had built his case upon the figures contained in a return brought down in the house.

Mr. MITCHELL: The same mistake was made last year, and I assume that my hon. friends went back to the computation they made at that time. I have sat in opposition in this house; I think I know the duties of an opposition. As I said the other day, when you are asking a question you may spend hours in drafting it so as at least to make it difficult for the government, if not actually embarrassing. So it is when you deal with a set of figures; sometimes when your case is not very good you will not make the sort of computation you would make if you were sitting where I am, and had to give the Canadian people the figures as they exist in my department. I am not going to say more than that, Mr. Chairman, except that I hope the press to-morrow will make the necessary corrections, not necessarily in the interests of any political party but in the interests of this dominion and the war effort it has been making since the outbreak of hostilities.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Now the minister has stated his side of the story it becomes necessary for me to present the figures which I did not place upon Hansard yesterday, and all of which came from the minister's office. I do so because, while the minister has not attempted any explanation of the lost individuals to whom I referred, yesterday afternoon, as reported at page 2501 of Hansard, said:

> My hon. friend spoke about figures . . . I do not want to take him too harshly to task on that, but I think that observation might be made in reverse, and I say that in a kindly way. I mean the figures my hon. friend quoted were all staggered.

I take it that the meaning of those words was that the figures I gave dealt with different periods. The figures I gave yesterday—they are in the returns office and can be checked there—all had to do with the period up to January 31, 1944. There would be no necessity for me to place these figures upon Hansard, if instead of returns being brought down which find their way to the returns office and there remain embalmed, the answers to the questions asked by hon. members in connection wiht such matters were placed upon Hansard itself. Let me begin with the statement by the minister that I was in error when I stated that 22,000 represented the number who had been prosecuted.

Mr. MITCHELL: Not 22,000 prosecuted.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That 22,000 had been picked up.

Mr. MITCHELL: No, not even picked up; traced.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: When I made my speech yesterday afternoon I was relying upon the figures which had been given me by the minister the day before, but they were revised and enlarged after I spoke.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend will admit—

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I did not interrupt the minister.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is all very well, but I do not want to be accused of bad faith. I was making a lengthy statement; my hon.

friend asked me a question and I said that I had not the figures before me but that these were the approximate figures.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Now I am criticized for having relied upon the approximate figures given by the minister. Yesterday the figure was revised up to 25,000. The approximate figure given the day before, upon which I relied, was 22,000, and I am now to be criticized for having used the figures given to parliament by the minister. I think that is sufficient on that point.

Then the minister said I was in error as to the number of prosecutions. In that regard I was relying upon return No. 142F, in which figures were asked as to prosecutions against defaulters under the National Resources Mobilization Act up to January 31, 1944, the last figures available, by provinces or military districts. The answer was as follows:

Prince Edward Island	2
Nova Scotia	25
New Brunswick	89
Quebec	2,443
Ontario	722
Manitoba	324
Saskatchewan	229
Alberta	138
British Columbia	242
Total	4,214

That was the figure I gave yesterday, the latest information available. Then the minister said that the number of dodgers was only about 49,000, or approximately three per cent.

Mr. MITCHELL: They are not dodgers; I would not go that far.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, they have disappeared. Here is what was said by James Butler, chief investigating officer of the Toronto branch of the mobilization board, as reported in the Toronto Telegram of March 4, 1944:

> It is amazing the number of young men who are believed to be dodgers of service with the armed forces.

If three per cent only are missing who are not even dodgers, that would not be amazing. The statement made by Mr. Butler indicates how widespread and how great is the number of those who have disappeared. The record tells its own story. Those records I shall now place before the committee. I shall have to ask the pardon of the committee if I proceed to read these various items. I know figures are tiresome, but I believe it is necessary to refer to them.

First I turn to what the minister said on June 23, 1943, as reported at page 4039 of Hansard, and I have here the statement to which he has just given his approval. It shows the numbers called for medical examination up to April 16, 1943, as follows:

Military district	Location	No. called for medical examination
A	London	74,578
B	Toronto	189,205
C	Kingston	60,008
D	Port Arthur	12,189
E	Montreal	210,245
F	Quebec	107,883
G	Halifax	43,113
H	Saint John	33,303
I	Charlottetown	8,167
J	Winnipeg	67,394
K	Vancouver	72,147
M	Regina	69,000
N	Edmonton	41,243

As I said yesterday, the total is 988,475 called for medical examination.

Mr. MITCHELL: I wonder if my hon. friend would read the prelude to that. That is the explanation.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am reading this.

Mr. MITCHELL: You do not want all the evidence in, that is the trouble.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The records are before the house.

Mr. MITCHELL: But they are not.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: We find that 988,475 were called for medical examination, and the number who reported for medical examination was 608,642. The minister explained the discrepancy to the committee yesterday by saying that in some provinces there is greater industrialization, or greater agricultural activity.

Mr. MITCHELL: Some military districts—not provinces.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: And that explains the reason for the difference? Mr. Chairman, this has nothing to do with the call-up for service; this is the call-up for medical examination. So that as of April 16, 1943, some 380,000 who were called for medical examination did not report for examination. If the records are as perfect as we are told they are—and we know to-day that more than 4,000,000 people in Canada are employed in connection with the war effort—if the record is so complete that the minister can give a perfect break-down as to what all these people are doing, and if all the registrations which have taken place since 1940 are before the department, surely there would be some explanation other than the ephemeral one which has been given as to where the 380,000 went.

Then, coming down to January 31, 1944 we find the information in return No. 142E, wherein I ask the number of men called for medical examination as of January 31, 1944. They are as follows:

Military district	Location	No. called for medical examination
A	London	97,972
B	Toronto	258,878
C	Kingston	91,481
D	Port Arthur	21,018
E	Montreal	283,376
F	Quebec	116,607
G	Halifax	80,243
H	Saint John	58,641
I	Charlottetown	13,114
J	Winnipeg	93,970
K	Vancouver	111,672
L	Regina	118,477
M	Edmonton	103,968
		1,449,417

The number who reported for medical examination were 979,569, or a difference of 469,848 men.

I now pause for a moment to answer a statement made a moment ago by the minister.

Mr. MITCHELL: Where did you get that last figure? It must be from some other return.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is the same return, No. 142E, showing the number of men who reported for medical examination on January 31, 1944. The reason why we have to ask for this information in two different questions is so that we would get the exact figures, of the same date, namely, January 31, 1944. When information on call-ups is given as it used to appear in "Canada at War", we were enabled to analyse the statements as changes from month to month took place. Then a new system of bookkeeping was set up. So that in order to get the information, we have to follow the course of asking questions at different times, but as of a given date—not as of different dates.

I paused a moment ago to answer what the minister had said. He said I had made a statement which was not in acccordance with the facts, so far as district F at Quebec is concerned. The statement I made was that fewer than 9,000 of the number called up for medical examination between June 23, 1943, and January 31, 1944, came from district F, Quebec. I did not mention Montreal. It had a very large call-up for medical examinations. I mentioned Quebec district only, and here are the figures: Military district F, Quebec, number of men called up for medical examination as of January 31, 1944, 116,607. The number called up for medical examination, according to the minister's statement of June 23, 1943, as of April 16, 1943, was 107,883, a difference of less than 9,000. So that the statement I made was entirely correct. And it is borne out by the figures given by the minister last June, and the return, No. 142A.

I now proceed to the next figure. Some of the disappeared group enlisted, on receipt of the order. We may turn to return No. 142A where the minister answered as to the number who enlisted on receipt of the order. The number who enlisted as of January 31, 1944, was 71,545. In addition to that, there must be taken from the roaming legion a total of 9,317 men, being statutory exemptions, et cetera, men who were rejected or in connection with which there was duplication. This is shown in return No. 142A. If the minister will take these figures he will find that the statement I made was entirely correct. In fact, on the figures I gave, after making due allowances for enlistments of which the department has no record, I made an understatement. But that is not the complete picture. Not only did 469,848 men not answer for medical examination, but after those who were medically examined had completed their examinations and the call-ups took place, another large number disappeared. I now give the rest of the picture.

According to return No. 142A, of the 979,569 men who reported, up to January 31, 1944, the number placed in category A was 434,453 men, less than fifty per cent. The calls went out and here is the record of the disappearances. This is found in return No. 142A as of January 31, 1944. In answer to the question, "How many training orders were sent out?" the following answer was given:

Military district	Number
A	25,859
B	81,111
C	26,144
D	6,070
E	109,787
F	29,001
G	21,935
H	16,134
I	3,811
J	23,732
K	37,954
M	22,745

We start off with the fact that 1,449,417 notices for medical examination were sent out and of that number only 979,569 men reported for medical examination. A total of 434,453 military training orders were sent out but only 220,762 men reported. In other words, between the time they were medically examined and the time call-ups were sent out 212,691 disappeared.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is not true; that is not the fact.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am reading from the return.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend is sticking his fist into a pile of papers and pulling out sheets and he gives a different story with each sheet. That is not the fact. Let us get the record straight.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There is not a different story. Those are the records from the department as of January 31. It is surprising the minister does not know of these figures because they came from his department. There were 212,691 men who disappeared. Even putting the best side on the question, all that enlisted was 71,545, as shown by return 142-A. That leaves a further number of 141,000 who are still lost and who still must be accounted for.

Mr. ROWE: How many does that make altogether?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: They can be totalled up. These are not staggered figures; these are figures that come from different returns and they are reinforced by what is shown in "Canada at War". "Canada at War" issued full figures in January and February, 1943, which revealed the situation and showed the trend that was taking place. Men were disappearing and enforcement was falling down. We in the opposition drew that matter to the attention of the country. What happened? Those figures did not appear again in "Canada at War" throughout 1943.

In January, 1944, we had a new set of figures and a new basis of bookkeeping in "Canada at War". It is only by an examination of returns such as I have referred to—I have taken all of the particulars in those returns that have anything at all to do with the matter—that we find out the position of affairs. In spite of the fact that the minister would wave the situation aside there has been no explanation of where these men are, what happened to them or what is taking place in connection with enforcement.

Yesterday the minister stated that he had nothing to do with the courts of this country. That is quite true. I referred to the extremely low penalties being imposed upon men who have been convicted as defaulters under these regulations. It is true that the minister has no control over the courts, but he can alter the penalties that are provided for in the regulations and make the punishment such that those who are minded to default will realize that there is no profit in taking that action.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I think I have now placed before the committee sufficient information from the returns and information furnished by the department itself to establish conclusively that not only were the statements made by me yesterday in accordance with the facts, but that the actual figures disclose an even greater number of delinquents than were referred to by me. I have set out in detail, based on the various sessional papers which have been brought down, the number of men to whom medical notices were sent, the number who reported in pursuance thereof, and finally the number who were called up for military service and the very considerably lower number who reported; and deducting therefrom the numbers shown to have enlisted, and the statutory exemptions, the figures I gave yesterday, I repeat, have been conclusively proven. They cannot be answered by merely saying, "Well, we cannot explain the shortage; or the loss, or the missing hundreds of thousands; they must be around, they must be in the armed services"; for I would point out that the department has very full records to-day. Last Friday the minister showed that the number of people in the armed services of Canada and at work was 5,057,000, being fifty-seven per cent of those fourteen years and over. Last year the figures he gave were that the number in the category fourteen years and over was 8,720,000. The government has the records. The answers regarding man-power given to the house have been summarized by me and brought together in a composite picture; and they reveal exactly the situation to which I referred yesterday.

Another matter to which I wish to refer is that of medical fitness. There is a pronounced difference in the degrees of medical fitness in the various provinces; and I should like to know from the minister whether the Pulhems system for the medical examination of recruits or of those called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act is being used in every province, or whether its application is confined to one or more provinces.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is used in all the provinces.

Mr DIEFENBAKER: So that it is being used everywhere across the dominion? Its application no doubt accounts for the very large percentage of men who are found to be physically unfit. Now that I have the assurance of the minister in that regard I need not pursue the matter any further.

There is just one other point I wish to make. I referred this afternoon to the January, 1943, issue of "Canada at War." I should like to refer to the February, 1943, issue of the same publication, which showed the position of affairs in so far as the call-up is concerned to December 26, 1942. Even at that time it was admitted in the particulars which were given that 87,485 medical examination notices had been undelivered, that 9,345 military training notices had been undelivered, and that in addition there were cases pending and delinquent and otherwise unaccounted for, numbering 98,128. According to the official records, therefore, the number unaccounted for, including cases pending, was then 194,958. To-day the situation is much more serious. The number has rapidly increased until it now amounts to the figures I gave yesterday. What I ask of the minister is the latest figures on the situation. The question was asked yesterday by the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough, who requested a recapitulation of the figures up to date in order to show the proper, unvarnished position so that the Canadian people might know the facts.

I have given the facts revealed by the answers of the minister and the returns brought down in this house. Those figures, startling as they are, cannot be answered by a mere sweep of the arm and a declaration that they are meaningless; they stand as a direct challenge to the government. Yesterday I placed before this house and the country the generalizations based on the information furnished to this house in the returns; to-day I have supported my statements by figures directly and definitely taken from the government's own answers. The responsibility now is upon the government to meet the situation.

I again suggest that enforcement is important and that it can never be achieved while the penalties provided for under the regulations are of so low an amount that they actually operate as an invitation to those who would be delinquent to continue to be so; for if a man escapes for two, three, four or five months and the only penalty imposed upon him is a twenty-five dollar fine, there is an invitation to wrongdoing, for the penalty is not comparable with the offence.

A year or so ago, there were many who did not understand the regulations, and the provisions for the penalties at that time could be justified. Everybody knows the regulations to-day. Every newspaper in Canada has carried advertisements. Not only that, but a check-up has been taking place all the time. In addition, immunity was offered; all who would return would be forgiven. Yet in the face of all these activities Mr. Butler in Toronto was justified in indicating recently that the situation was appalling in its result. And the minister takes my remarks as a personal criticism. Far from it; it is not given in that way. It is a situation which is difficult. The responsibility was placed on him; he started with an inheritance of delinquents, but that inheritance has been increased.

All we ask is that this condition be frankly faced. To-day we are short of man-power: the minister says that his department is scraping the bottom of the barrel. If so, surely now is the time, having regard to the fact that we face the darkest period of the war in so far as prospective casualties are concerned, to secure the mobilization of every available man. Now is the time to have revealed to the country the situation as shown by the returns referred to, to the end that an intensified campaign may be undertaken with a view to securing the necessary man-power. Placing this matter, not on the basis of any hypothesis, not on anything but the figures of the government, I do not think the minister has any right to suggest that the figures I have given are not in accordance with the facts. Every statement I made yesterday has been to-day established on the basis of the government's returns. I have given a composite picture of the situation, and I ask the minister now to explain what appears to be up to the present time, so far as the department is concerned, the inexplicable disappearance of hundreds of thousands of men.

Mr. POULIOT: If the minister will permit me before he replies to the hon. member, I have some observations to make, as one who is in daily contact with the soldiers and with the draftees. My hon. friend the member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) is one of the best debaters in this house and I regret profoundly that the figures he has quoted do not speak as well as he does himself.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Not half so eloquent.

Mr. POULIOT: There are many things to consider in connection with this problem, and I will not insist on his quotation of what Mr. James Butler, the chief investigating officer of the Toronto Branch of the mobilization board, said according to the Toronto Telegram of March 4, 1944:

> It is amazing the number of young men who are said to be dodgers of service with the armed forces.

While quoting Mr. Butler, my hon. friend rendered a service to his colleagues in this house by informing them that the situation is amazing in Toronto and therefore is bad not only in military district No. 5, Quebec.

I have nothing to say in the matter of complaint against what is happening in Toronto, Quebec or anywhere else, but I want to explain to my hon. friend, if he wishes to know, the reaction of the people, and if he is in contact with his own people as I am with mine he will surely agree with me.

In the first place, I am not at all amazed that the number of young men who were found unfit by military boards was so considerable, because all those who have been classified in category E by their family doctor were called again to pass medical examinations before the army board, and they had been declared unfit before by doctors who had followed them probably since their birth. Those men who were physically unfit, were called again, and they were again in a large number of cases found unfit by the military boards.

In the second place, another class of young men were called to pass their medical test before the army boards. They were those who had secured postponement until further notice, et cetera, from the mobilization board. These were not supposed to enlist.

I am not surprised at all that there is some discrepancy in the figures given by the minister, for this very good reason, that most of those officers, especially those who compose the military boards, are not under the Minister of Labour, but under the Department of National Defence, and therefore he gets his information from the Department of National Defence. I know very well that in Quebec city there is very little cooperation between the registrar and the army medical boards, and it takes a very long time to have a file transferred from one office to another.

Moreover, I do not think my hon. friend is quite as fair as he usually is when he blames the minister for figures that appear in "Canada at War," which is published by the wartime information board under the Prime Minister. We have three branches under three different heads. There is in the first place the Department of National Defence, which is supposed to supply figures to the Department of Labour; then there is the Department of Labour, and then there is the wartime information board. Since it is human to err, I am not surprised that there may be some discrepancy in these figures. I could quote to the hon. gentleman the fact I have mentioned in these last days to the Department of Labour about some young men, seventeen or nineteen in number. They were farmers' sons. They had postponements until further notice, and they went to see the employment officer, selective service. They got a permit to work in the forest and they did so. Then, while they were there, they went to the post office, filled in the regular forms, and got receipts. What happened? They were arrested by the mounted police and put on the train. This happened in Ontario. They were put on the train, had handcuffs on them from North Bay to Toronto, and they were sent to various military camps. They were acting in accordance with the law when they were discharging essential duties as farmers and as lumbermen, and it would be impossible for me to argue with my hon. friend if he takes for granted that the army has a priority over essential industry and that those in essential industries are supposed not to do any useful work in this time of war.

That is why I have asked for some detailed information about the essential occupation of men who are not in the army, in order to know what they are really doing for war purposes while working in the forest or on the farm, et cetera, et cetera; and the answers I have received are far from satisfactory.

I will tell my hon. friend more, and my files are at his disposal just as they were at the disposal of the Minister of National Defence. It is that in military district No. 5 the leading officers are not all French Canadian, but I say that in a large number of cases men from my constituency had a raw deal from the army in that district, a raw deal that they would not have had in another district. Is it fair to penalize military district No. 5 for the incompetency of some officers who are always defended by the Minister of National Defence when he is in the house?

I do not want the Minister of Labour to be made the goat of other departments over which he has no jurisdiction. If he were in charge of all draftees, as he should be, the situation would be entirely different, and the hon. member for Lake Centre would be perfectly justified in arraigning the Minister of Labour and asking him to render an account. But at the present time he knocks at the wrong door. All that he has said to-day should have been said on the estimates of the Department of National Defence. Why should the Minister of Labour be made the goat of the medical boards of the army when these men are not under his jurisdiction? Besides that, this afternoon I listened carefully to my hon. friend, and he said something about conscientious objectors and the Doukhobors. There are quite a lot of conscientious objectors; there are quite a lot of Doukhobors. But I make a great distinction between the man who does not take advantage of that law which is stupid and antiquated and should be repealed, and the others.

There is no reason why special treatment should be given to the conscientious objectors, the Mennonites and the Doukhobors. When the plebiscite was before the Canadian people the government asked for a release from all promises made. If the answer "yes" meant that the government was freed of all promises made to the Canadian people it applied as well to Doukhobors, Mennonites and conscientious objectors as to anyone else, and I am one of the very few members who has protested because of such discrimination. It is true that I have in my constituency no Douhkobors, no Mennonites and no conscientious objectors. But if I had I would take the same stand as I do now.

There is something else that my hon. friend should argue on. It is the number of all guests of military age or who have become of military age since they landed in this country from the beginning of the war on. We are told that some of them are called now for their military training. Whether that is true or not, I do not know.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is true.

Mr. POULIOT: No statistics have been given on that point; but this I know, for a time it was supposed to be bad manners to call up any young man who came from some other country and who had reached military age and was in good health. He was not supposed to be called to the army. Here again I ask for the support of the hon. member for Lake Centre. I ask him to support me not only to apply to Mennonites, Doukhobors and conscientious objectors the same treatment as to any other people, but to see to it that every young man of military age when he arrived here or, if he was not of military age, but has become of military age since the beginning of the war and who is in this country, follows the law, respects the law just the same as any other British citizen in this country. I appeal to him for that support.

I appeal to him for another thing. I appeal to him to send overseas as first reinforcements all those pasty youths who are in uniform here in Ottawa, who have never been to any theatre of war and do not intend to go to any theatre of war, who wear the uniform. who have allowances at the expense of the Canadian taxpayers, and who are supposed to be heroes just because they wear a uniform. They should be the first to go. I appeal to the hon. member for Lake Centre to support me in urging not only upon the Minister of Labour but upon the government the necessity of putting all these men in the place where they should be. Why should they wear the uniform like that? Why should they take up so much space on the sidewalks? Why should they get allowances when they do clerical work? The same with women; they wear the uniform, all right. I have been told very often by the Prime Minister that they were brave, that they were shedding their blood for their country. Let them do so. Let them be brave. Here again I ask for the support of my hon. friend.

I will tell more to my hon. friend. I see my old friend the hon. member for York-Sunbury. He must remember that when his past leader was Prime Minister I very often indulged in statistical work to condemn his government. I spent days and nights in working on figures and numbers of every district about exports and imports, et cetera, et cetera, in order to prove my thesis to condemn the Bennett government. That was in peace time. It is a kind of sport in which I would never indulge in war time, and I regret most profoundly that the hon. member for Lake Centre has been doing in war time precisely the same kind of thing that I had a right to do in peace time, because I was doing that for political purposes and the result was good. It is one of the reasons why my hon. friend was defeated in York-Sunbury, as my speeches were read throughout the land with good effect. But now that we are at war the hon. member for Lake Centre is playing a dangerous game; and when his leader, the late John Bracken—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. POULIOT: —comes to the province of Quebec to make love to the Quebeckers, whether they are French Canadian, Scotch, Irish, English or Jew, he goes. And then after he is gone we hear our friend the hon. member for Lake Centre making speeches such as the one he delivered yesterday and the one he delivered to-day. It will have a very bad effect, and it is not because he mentioned what was said by Mr. James Butler of Toronto about people from Toronto that the people of the province of Quebec will forgive the insult that they have received that they are not doing their duty.

May I tell my hon. friend that I represent a constituency which has supplied the army with perhaps the largest number of men that any rural county has given? I shall not quote many names, but not long ago an officer was honoured here on the occasion of the opening of the sixth victory loan campaign; he was honoured not only here but in many other parts of this country. He was a native son of Temiscouata. Then there were many others who were made prisoners at Hong Kong or who were killed at Dieppe, Sicily and many other places.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He left there a long time ago, before you came around.

Mr. POULIOT: What does my hon. friend say?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I said that he left there before you appeared on the scene.

Mr. POULIOT: Would my hon. friend be kind enough to repeat the sublime word?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I will not bother.

Mr. POULIOT: I will tell my hon. friend that when he does for the soldiers what I have been doing in my constituency he will have the right to speak to me, and when Filip Konowal, V.C., kisses his hand, as he has kissed mine, he will have the right to speak to me. Until then he should put live charcoal on his mouth. I will not stand for any joke because the people of my constituency have done their duty. I do not care what is said about me. I attach no importance to what the hon. gentleman might say in a derisive way. I tell him that I will be a tiger to defend my own people as they deserve to be defended. I will tell not only my own people; soon I may have an opportunity to tell the people of this province of Ontario how some Tories jeer when we talk of men of whom the country is so proud, men who have done their duty, who have not been afraid to go to war, and who have better war records than that of the hon. member for York-Sunbury. What is his military record? It is the same as that of Arthur Meighen, the same as that of all the Tories who have never been to war but who preach conscription in order to encourage the big contractors who want to sell more boots, more uniforms and more food to the soldiers. Canada Packers! The hon. gentleman is this sort of imperialist. He laughs, just as the Tories laughed during the depression when I mentioned the case of the poor settlers who had to make soup from maple leaves, our national emblem. They laugh; but when John Bracken comes to the province of Quebec he does not speak as the hon. member for Lake Centre spoke yesterday and to-day. If John Bracken comes again, however, the people of the province of Quebec will remind him of what has been said yesterday and to-day. They will remember that the former leader of the opposition, a man who was honoured with the confidence of his former leader, Mr. Bennett, laughed and jeered when I mentioned the heroes of this war—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not laugh at the heroes of the war; I was laughing at you. You ought to be in Verdun.

Mr. POULIOT: —because they are French Canadians coming from Quebec. That is why hon. gentlemen opposite laugh. I do not know if my hon. friend had the honour of shaking the hand of Major Paul Triquet, V.C.; but when the time came to honour a man who had one of the finest records of the last war, a man who is doing the dirty work downstairs, the only holder of the Victoria Cross under this roof now that Major Gregg is in Brockville, was it the hon. member for York-Sunbury or the hon. member for Lake Centre or the member for Temiscouata who brought that man before the committee on honours and decorations, who wired the victory loan campaign committee that Filip Konowal, V.C., deserved a place on the stand here, and who introduced him to the Prime Minister, the Minister of National Defence and Major Triquet himself? I did it because an older man, a privy councillor, a man with the authority and prestige of the hon. member for York-Sunbury, did not do it. Now let him laugh.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You are a great man.

Mr. POULIOT: Who is a great man?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You are.

Mr. POULIOT: Oh, no; I do not pretend to be a great man. I give others an opportunity to do the right thing, but when they do not take advantage of the opportunity I have to do it myself. We are hearing now about national unity. Hon. gentlemen opposite say, "Let us be one in this country." One with Tories like that? Never; it is impossible. It is all right; they may cluck, but when they are behind our backs they are treacherous. They say things that offend the pride of proud men, things that are most contemptible because they may affect the future of this country. As a party man I feel that I am rather independent; but there are things I cannot let pass; there are things to which any man whose heart is in the right place cannot listen without being offended. There are disgraceful scenes which one cannot witness without protesting very strongly and deeply.

Let me remind the hon. member for Lake Centre, the hon. member for York-Sunbury and other hon. gentlemen opposite who may be more serious, that at times they have voted with the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation in order that the farmers might receive more money for their products; but when the time came to defend the farmer himself, because the farmer is an asset to the country, they always voted as one against us. Then they will tell of their love for the farmer. If they want me to recite facts I can do so. I can tell the hon. member for—well, the constituency which he will no longer represent after the next election—that every time I and other members of this house have defended the farmers and asked for a postponement of their training, hon. gentlemen opposite have always voted against us. How can they be believed, then, when they say that they are the friends of the farmers and that John Bracken is milking a cow every day? That may be true, and perhaps they themselves are all anxious to milk the cow, but their statements cannot be taken seriously.

This concludes the first part of my observations in reply to the hon. member for Lake Centre. I wanted to say these few words before the minister answered the hon. member. Let me tell the minister that when a living being has two or three heads it is a success at fairs; it is considered a monster. I do not believe any single thing can be carried into effect successfully when it is decided by three heads. There should be only one head. It will be impossible to deal with selective service successfully until the Minister of Labour is in full charge of it. That should be easy, provided no one has an inferiority complex in regard to the imperialists, those men without a country, who think that Canada is just an adjunct of the empire and that all our policies should be decided in and by London. It will not be enough to have all these matters under the direct control, supervision and direction of the Minister of Labour; it will be essential also to decide all matters of war, in the broadest possible sense, according to the Canadian spirit. I will not shock any Tory by saying that. Was it not Mr. Bennett himself who spoke of "Canada first", a policy that was never applied by him? It is a very sound policy; theoretically it is beautiful, and brings cheers from all corners when it is advocated by someone other than my humble self. That is nothing; my point is that the policy of Canada first should be carried out in fact rather than by words.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am not going to reply at length to the hon. member for Lake Centre. The points he has raised were covered fairly well in my statement to the house and also in what I might call the basic tables I placed on Hansard at that time. He has arrived at a figure, and I do not know how he arrived at it, of 380,000. One hon. member raised the ante up to, I believe, 700,000, and if we debate this question long enough everybody in the dominion will be missing, before we are through.

I believe in simple things. I know my hon. friend is an able criminal lawyer. I count among my friends, past and present, on both sides of the house many men who were able criminal lawyers, and I may say, in a most kindly way, that there are a good many men in this dominion to-day who are breathing God's pure air only because of the dexterity of able criminal lawyers.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Now, why say that? That has not anything to do with this.

Mr. MITCHELL: I approach this matter in a simple way. The hon. member has raised the figure of 380,000. I speak of a man-power pool of 1,665,504. That is stated in simple language in table No. 7, tabled by myself last week, in which I have enumerated all the different divisions of these so-called missing men. This is found at page 2451 of Hansard for April 28, where man-power is listed according to categories. These are some of the categories:

Men applying and on postponement—Fit men, i.e., "A" category only Unfit men, i.e., "B, C, D, E" category
Unfit for front line combatant duty, i.e., active service, and includes "B", "C", "D", "E" categories and rejections on enlistment
Not yet sent order—military training
Not yet sent order—Medical examination
Sent orders—time limit not expired
Not yet 18½ years of age but born in 1925
Not available, i.e., outside Canada, not acceptable, deceased, in gaol, reserve army, et cetera
Statutory exceptions, i.e., clergy, police, enemy aliens, et cetera
Over age
Not accounted for

I am not going to read all these totals, but I shall give the gross total for each military division, and the number not accounted for. They are as follows:

Division	Total men	Not accounted for
London	111,007	1,794
Toronto	306,386	7,887
Kingston	103,024	733
Port Arthur	24,997	324
Montreal	325,647	18,923
Quebec	136,631	6,252
Halifax	86,178	1,166
Saint John	66,393	889
Charlottetown	13,575	33
Winnipeg	108,607	1,017
Vancouver	125,479	5,063
Regina	135,483	3,235
Edmonton	122,097	1,685

That makes a total of 1,665,504 of which a total of 49,001 are unaccounted for. That is the figure arrived at after all the statistical resources and staff of the Department of Labour have looked into it. It is the official figure for this dominion, notwithstanding a compilation made in a series of returns asked of the ministry of Labour. Those figures were arrived at with the assistance of the bureau of statistics and my own organization. I have a staff of about 450 in Ottawa, and of course I have staffs in every military district across Canada. In addition to that, we have people in the headquarters of the armed forces.

That is the position I am going to take; that is the answer. After all the resources and all the staff we have at our command have been used, that is the picture arrived at.

As I said, I believe in stating things simply. This afternoon my hon. friend read from return No. 142A. He read the first two columns, namely, military training, orders sent out, 433,453. He read the next column: reported, 220,762. He then made a subtraction and got the figure of around 212,000 odd. But he did not go on and read the whole thing. He did not read those enlisted on receipt of orders, amounting to 71,545.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I put it on the record.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL: And "orders returned, 4,803."

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: And I put that on the record.

Mr. MITCHELL: And, "orders not complied with, 9,274."

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is on the record.

Mr. MITCHELL: And industrial workers, and all those who have been postponed, amounting to 117,752. Then there are statutory exemptions which, as I pointed out, include clergy, people in gaol, and so on, amounting to 9,317.

I must insist upon this, that to the people of this country those are the figures. I am frank to admit that at this very moment there are 49,000 people we cannot account for. As I pointed out before, it may be that a great many of them have joined the United States army.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, that is a new thought.

Mr. MITCHELL: It works both ways.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a new thought.

Mr. MITCHELL: No; it is not a new thought, at all. It may be new to my hon. friend, but it is not new to me.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is new to you, too; you never suggested it before.

An hon. MEMBER: Yes, he did.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend went to the United States the other day, and lost his identity, too.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No; I lost my passport, my identification card.

Mr. MITCHELL: And might I say this, that he did not find it again until I gave it to him.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): And he is not sure of it now.

Mr. MITCHELL: And my organization is just as efficient in the bigger field of selective service, in connection with call-up for military service, as it was in connection with my hon. friend's passport.

I am not going to say anything further. I have tried to keep to the point, without trying to build up a straw man, only to knock it down again.

Mr. CHAMBERS: Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the speeches this evening have wandered from the actual subject under discussion, may I crave the indulgence of the committee to start at a point even more remote. In the army time is either hanging very heavily on one's hands, or it is a matter of great immediacy. With that excuse I will, if I may, wander slightly.

It is a long time since I have had an opportunity of saying a few words in this house, and I can do so now only from the point of view of the troops overseas to whom it is to be supposed that these drafts, when they are finally obtained, will be sent. The attitude of a great many of the men overseas toward the question of the drafting and training of men in Canada for the defence of Canada and for fighting overseas is that they are not really greatly concerned with it. The opinion of the men is that fundamentally one either wants to fight or one does not. That may not be a popular thing to say, but that is the fundamental fact which I think all of us on both sides of the house might as well bear in mind.

But there can be no question either in their minds or in ours as to the ultimate result of the policy, however it may be applied. If there are not sufficient men who want to fight, at least those who do must not be let down if it is merely a question of sheer man-power. I must confess that it is a bit disturbing, knowing how well and how magnificently volunteers from the province of Quebec have fought in this war, having been with them, to find that a wrong impression should be created by the passage of a resolution such as was passed recently in the legislature of that province. It does a great deal of harm because it is not explained or understood. It does not lead to that complete understanding and sympathy between our fighting men over there which is what we all seek to achieve. However, it is not a thing I can do anything about; it is not what I rose to talk about.

What I wish to speak about, if I may, is the attitude of the troops, their thoughts, their ideas, their hopes as to what eventually lies before them. I cannot in any sense claim to represent them, but I can at least say with complete truth that I am one of them. I have had some small opportunity of knowing what is going on in their minds. It is a long, far cry from Dunkirk to May 1, 1944. Throughout that time we have managed by means of a volunteer system to build up overseas a large combined air, naval and land force from Canada, a portion of which has been tested in battle and not found wanting, and the remainder of which is waiting to go over into that country to which our fathers went in 1914-18.

Some remarks have recently been made in this house about the part played during this time by the people at home. It is not unusual to find men returning from overeas who become a little bitter on the subject of the attitude of civilians at home. That is understandable, but I just want to say this for myself alone. I have been home only a few weeks, but I have had some opportunity of meeting people in various parts of Canada. I want to pay a tribute to the working men and women of Canada, not only for what they have produced but for the way they have unceasingly and uncomplainingly carried on; and to management for the results that they have produced with the labour at hand. But especially I want to pay a tribute to the citizens of Canada for the way in which they have responded to war loans, Red Cross drives and the many other demands made upon their loyalties and emotions. They have responded month after month and have given vast sums of money to back up in a mute way, the only way that so many of them can, the war effort of this country. This is not a government war; this is not a party war; it is a citizens' war. I am glad that as a soldier I can come home and find my fellow-citizens doing a first-class job on their front. It will be something to tell my comrades overseas.

Now something about them. During the long wait we perhaps came to be termed the Duke of York's Own more than anything else. Hon. members will remember that the Duke of York had 10,000 men; he marched them up the hill and he marched them down again. During that period of the defence of Britain, then in the Mediterranean the fighting in Sicily and Italy and now when they are on the edge of prospects, the hardest burden our men have had to bear, has not been the food conditions; it has not been the living conditions; it has not been even the liquor conditions; it has been something that their relatives here at home are sharing—homesickness. The hardest thing our troops overseas have to bear is the long sustained absence from their home country. But the fact that in spite of that they have been able to retain their sense of responsibility and discipline is, I think, no mean tribute to them.

Somebody asked me the other day what the boys think about the war itself and about the time that is to come after the war. We are encouraged in knowing that all members of this house are united in the ceaseless endeavour which I have witnessed since I have been here, an endeavour which is supported by a tremendous amount of good will through the country, an endeavour which is led by the government, to provide rehabilitation measures which will allow our boys to take their normal places in Canadian life when they come home. They are bucked up by knowing that that is being done, but I would suggest to the government that some direct measure be taken to provide our troops overseas with knowledge of what has been prepared for them and of what as yet is not completed but is under way. Most of us over there are very ignorant on the subject, and it would add to our understanding of what goes on, and also help our morale, if we had a clearer knowledge of what is being prepared.

We know that no matter what measures may be adopted, what laws may be passed in this chamber, what training may be entered into, what money may be provided, unless the general level of employment in this country is high at the time, those measures will inevitably fail of their own weight to provide employment. We know that the basically sound administration by controls and by government direction has ensured the probability of a satisfactory employment situation at the end of the war, and we want to make sure that they continue in so far as it is necessary.

We also feel very strongly that, because our country has made a measurable sacrifice in this war—and it is not by any means over—it would nevertheless be well now to consider the fact that we should also, perhaps in a minor way but at least in a minor way, make our small contribution in after-war international meetings to prevent a war in the future. I think that is fundamental.

Then, too, at the back of the heads of most of us, I think, is the question of a home. Thousands of our men have married overseas; thousands of others are going to, before the war is over. Many of us have been in the army for four and five years; some of us will soon have been in the service for six years; and while I do not know how long the Japanese affair may continue, it is conceivable that many may have been in the services for seven years before they settle down again in this country. In the army there is no home, and home remains still the anchor of the Canadian overseas. Our idea of home is the mental anchor that sustains us. We look forward to having homes when we come back. We want to make sure that the government, the parliament and the people of this country know that.

Therefore it simply sums up then, does it not, to this, that basically we want to take our share in the provision of a general security. We do not ask, I think, anything beyond the opportunity to provide that for ourselves. After all, we are volunteers in a great adventure. We want to take our part in the provision of it for all of us. We want to make sure that we have homes to come back to.

I have personally no great optimism as to the outcome of this war. I do not see abroad in the world any great spirit of tolerance and good will among nations. I have seen in this war, and I know I shall see again, the tremendous value of good will between man and man, and this is a great deal. I have seen the British infantry from Northumbria moving up the line, small, hardy men, as their forefathers were, but great men; I have seen the 51st Highlanders—Scots. I have been alongside the United States troops in this war, and I want to say to you, Mr. Chairman, and the committee and this country, that there are no finer fighting men in the field than the Americans. Alongside the French and the others, from this there comes a great comradeship. I hope that this will be felt, too, between the governments, between the peoples who are represented by these governments, so that there may come out of this, if nothing else, a greater patience, tolerance and understanding among ourselves as peoples and among each other, even here.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I want to bring the committee back for a few minutes to the subject of national selective service and the relationship of employee and employer. I am going to cite a case to the minister, not as a particular instance but to serve as an example for him to give an opinion regarding its solution as applicable to conditions which exist throughout the country. I think it is well understood that in the case of an employee—I am going to refer to the miners because I am familiar with mining conditions in the Drumheller fields—a man who has quit his job without giving the required seven days' notice is liable under the regulations to a penalty. He must comply with that requirement, and if he does not do so he can be prosecuted.

Now here is a situation where the mine management itself did not comply with the government regulation in this particular respect. One of the mines in the Drumheller field closed down without giving the men the required seven days' notice. They were somewhat deceitful in the action they took. They knew they were going to close down—they notified the men that they would give them at least two weeks' work before the shut-down came about; and further they informed the men that they could not qualify for unemployment insurance until they had been unemployed for nine days. As a result, the men in this mine did not apply for unemployment insurance, and when they went to make application they found that they had not lived up to the required regulations. These men complain that they have been wrongly treated, and that they should receive at least the seven days' pay which the mining company owes them. It is suggested that the only recognition these men can get would be by starting a civil action. That, it seems to me, is not quite the proper thing. I hope that my information is wrong and that the minister will correct me when he answers this question. I seems to me that there should be some regulation whereunder the government will prosecute mine owners or mine management and force them to comply with the law, just as they compel employees to comply with the regulations, because some mining companies are deliberately closing down and debarring their men from their rights. I think the minister knows the case to which I refer, because I have communicated it to him by letter, but other cases have been drawn to my attention, and in settling this one we might be able to settle the others. Would the minister tell us what can be done in a case of this kind with the mining companies?

Mr. MITCHELL: On the question of unemployment insurance, of course, the employees have the right to appear before the referees in the district. On the other question, I should like to point out to my hon. friend that it is not a one-way street; if the workman has to give seven days' notice the employer has to do likewise. You cannot have one law for one group of individuals and a different law, dealing with the same subject, for another group; that kind of thing leads to revolution. While I am not intimately acquainted with the case mentioned by my hon. friend, if he will turn the whole matter over to me I shall have our people investigate it and see if we can do anything for these men.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I did write the minister, and I have his acknowledgment signed by himself. Since I wrote about this case, two others have been drawn to my attention. One was up in the Edmonton district, where a mine deliberately closed down without the men receiving any notice at all, and I am informed by some of the employees who have written to me that they are advised that their only recourse is to take civil action. That should not be so, because presumably the mining companies are subject to some regulation in these matters.

Mr. MITCHELL: We have an enforcement branch which deals all the time with cases like that. All that men in that position have to do is to write to us, and that sets the thing in motion. I shall be glad to get the details, and if the cases are well founded, the necessary action will be taken.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Just as a matter of information, I should like the minister to explain what appears to be a duplication in table No. 7 to which he referred earlier. In item 2 there is listed a total of 138,497 men as unfit in categories "B", "C", "D" and "E". In the next item, unfit for front line, there are included "B", "C", "D" and "E" categories. Does that imply that the 138,000 men in the second item are also included in the third?

Mr. MITCHELL: Some men are classified as 'B", but in the final examination they turn out to be "A". There are two sets of cases; one is positive and the other doubtful.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Are those "B", "C", "D" and "E", included in the third item, men who have been reexamined and are not included in the first, found to be of a lower category later? Just what is the point of giving two sets of figures for the same category?

Mr. MITCHELL: One is on postponement, and the other is not.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I was very much interested in listening to the excellent speech of the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Chambers), and later on I shall have something to say with reference to some of his remarks. We have had a lot of talk about call-ups, but when we hear the Minister of National Defence speak about our volunteer army one wonders why we have the call-ups. We are all proud of our volunteer army and what they have done, but we no longer have a volunteer army. What we have now is a call-up for the purposes of forced volunteering. That is really what it amounts to. The minister the other day said that he had never heard anyone either in the house or elsewhere suggest that the volunteer army was not a desirable thing. I agree with him; I think it is a very desirable thing. But this is a modern war, as the hon. member for Nanaimo says, and there are no heroics of the old kind that appeal to the people to-day. It is a business, and it is not practical to have volunteers altogether.

The minister said, "I have repeatedly indicated my preference for a volunteer army, and I think most Canadians will agree with me." He says he has "never heard anyone suggest that the volunteer army is not a desirable thing", and that is perfectly true. On the other hand there are a great many people in this country who think the voluntary system as it is to-day is not fair. There are many people, the legion, members of the opposition, members of the Liberal party, and many others, who have asked for the full operation of the N.R.M.A. for service anywhere in the world. The minister says he thinks most people in Canada agree with him about the volunteer army. That is beside the point. What about the voices of the people in the plebiscite? That certainly called for something different from a volunteer army Those voices called for conscription anywhere in the world, there is no doubt about that, and we have not got it yet.

Just what is wrong with conscription? What is wrong with that method of getting men? The way it is looked on to-day and talked about by ministers suggests a slur on many of those fellows who are drafted, and it is not fair to them. Too much slur is cast on them. Whether you like it or not, to-day you have coercion for volunteering, and why should that slur be cast on those fellows? What is wrong with conscription in the United States or in Great Britain? There is nothing much wrong with it.

Mr. GIBSON: What is wrong with the volunteers in Canada?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Members of the army in Canada in the last year or so had to go around the place wasting their time in making speeches urging on draftees the necessity for volunteering because they could not be taken overseas otherwise. That principle is wrong. Why do they talk so much about the volunteer army and not about having conscription? As I see it, from now on there will not be a volunteer army, because we know very well that we cannot get men without calling them up first and forcing them to enlist, and to my mind it is simply a whim of this government, who are so spineless that they will not put into force the N.R.M.A. to the full extent.

The hon. member for Temiscouata a few minutes ago talked about the unity of Canada, but he said, unity with the Tory party, never. As far as I see it, this whole question of the N.R.M.A. is not a question of the unity of Canada, if the provisions of that act are to be enforced; it is a question of the unity of the Liberal party in this country. This brings me to another point which was suggested to my mind by the hon. member for Nanaimo. We have in Canada to-day some 60,000 men under the N.R.M.A., and of these in the active army, not liable without further government action to service overseas, 34,950. Some of our men in the active army overseas have been there for a long time, men like the hon. member who spoke a little while ago, and yet we have here 34,950 in Canada in the active army who cannot be sent overseas at the present time. The men overseas have been there for four or five years. Could these men here not be sent over to replace those fellows who have been there for four or five years, so as to give them a few weeks' furlough in Canada? Could we not have some proper system of leave whereby those fellows could have a chance to get back?

As the hon. member for Nanaimo said, one of the worst things facing the troops overseas is homesickness. The United States have made an arrangement for leave for their men coming from the front from different quarters. They have been only three and a half years in the war and we have been in from the beginning. It does not seem fair to have these men over here and the others overseas for so long.

Mr. MITCHELL: If I might rise to a point of order, I have been on deck for nearly three days now and we have not got the first item through. I have no objection to sitting here until the resurrection, but I think most of the hon. members have. I have no objection to answering questions that affect my department particularly, but I object to wandering all over the lot. The hon. member for St. Paul's is wandering off into the Department of National Defence. I do wish that the hon. member would stay within my department so that we may at least get some of the other departments that have to do with the war appropriation bill before the committee in the not very distant future.

[Mr. Douglas G. Ross.]

The CHAIRMAN: The point of order is well taken in connection with the questions that have been brought up by the hon. member for St. Paul's. I gave readily—I was going to say joyfully—a certain amount of latitude to the hon. member for Greenwood and the hon. member for Nanaimo because it was the first time they had spoken in the committee for years. I believe the time has now arrived when we should get down to the item that is before the committee and stay with it, if possible. I think we should undertake to avoid the multiple repetitions that we have had since the beginning of the discussion. I sincerely appeal to the hon. members of the committee.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I bow to your ruling. I would not have spoken in this way were it not for the fact that this matter is uppermost in my mind, and in the second place I listened to the hon. member for Temiscouata talking about everything in the world outside of this particular item. I know you, Mr. Chairman, are fair in these things, but I think if you had held the hon. member for Temiscouata a little closer to the subject it might have been a great deal better for everybody.

My speech has been interrupted by a point of order. I have only a few more words to say. As far as this is concerned, I like to see fairness in these things, and if the hon. member for Temiscouata is going to occupy the time of this committee by wandering all over the place, as he did to-night, then I think he should be called to order immediately.

The only other thing I have to say is that in all fairness to the men overseas—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have said I have a few remarks to make—

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member should be allowed to finish his short statement.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I say in all justice to these men overseas—and I mean it—we should do something about it, if possible. Instead of having these fellows who are sitting back here in the forces in Canada doing nothing, it seems to me that the government might put into full force the N.R.M.A. and send them overseas and let the men overseas have a chance to come back.

Mr. MARSHALL: I have one or two questions I should like to ask before the item carries. First of all I do not think we have had a break-down of the sum of something over $11,000,000 submitted to us. I find from previous reports that these figures can be broken into (a) the various sections of the department such as the office of the director, headquarters in Ottawa, administration; (b) mobilization division; (c) the man-power records, and (d) the amount set aside to be spent by the unemployment insurance commission for work performed on behalf of national selective service. I should like the minister to explain the difference between the figure as set out on page 396 of Hansard of February 11, which shows that the appropriation for the year 1943-44 was $8,680,225, whereas this amount is $9,845,948. Would the minister be good enough to explain that? Then I have one or two other simple ones that I should like to ask.

Mr. MITCHELL: I will give my hon. friend the breakdown of the $11,000,000 odd. It is as follows: Labour supply, $811,879. There is a decrease of $4,496 there. Mobilization, $3,250,000. There is an increase of $157,000 there. Unemployment insurance commission $6,275,150. There is an increase of $900,000 there. Man-power statistics, $223,200. There is an increase of $55,200 there. National registration administration, $442,200. There is an increase of $48,776.63 there.

Mr. MARSHALL: The minister has not explained the reason for the difference between the figure set out on page 413 of Hansard and the figure of $9,845,948.37 on the sheet which has been supplied to us.

Mr. MITCHELL: There is a general increase in staff all the way through. That is the answer.

Mr. MARSHALL: In the morning edition of the Ottawa Citizen of a few days ago there appeared certain advertisements, presumably from the national selective department. I should like to draw this one particularly to the attention of the minister. It reads as follows:

> Special representative wanted. A leading life insurance company requires special representative in Cornwall and district. He must be a man of character and ambition, a real worker, age thirty to fifty. The position offers an attractive life career, with opportunities for advancement. Other benefits include sickness and pension provisions. Previous experience not necessary. The right applicant will be given a special training course to fit him for his responsibilities. Apply in writing, selective service, F.M. 374.

What are the circumstances surrounding such advertising, and why does national selective service go to the expense of advertising for a leading life insurance company that could well afford to pay for its own advertising?

Mr. MITCHELL: Of course, one cannot advertise in this country except for very few categories, namely, household help and things like that. What is done is, we route all these people through selective service so that we know where everybody is and have the measure of control that we have. That particular company would pay for the advertising. The individual would be routed through our office, and then of course we would have some say whether the individual could go into life insurance or whether he should not be in some other priority.

Mr. MARSHALL: Would it be possible for the minister to give me the figures with which I can compare table No. 1 with the figures for Great Britain, South Africa, Australia and New Zealand? Table No. 1 is a rather complicated one, and I should like to break it down if I may into the figures as I see them. This is the way the figures appear in the table:

Population class	Aug. 31, 1939	Dec. 1, 1943
	Per cent	Per cent
Armed forces	0·1	8·7
Industry	29·7	38·0
Agriculture	24·5	19·2
Students	7·6	5·4
Unemployed and all others	38·1	28·7

I should like particularly to direct the attention of hon. members to the tremendous contribution being made by agriculture. In spite of the fact that the percentage of men and women engaged in agriculture has dropped from 24·5 to 19·2 we are producing more foodstuffs and agricultural supplies that ever before. The minister stated, I think on two occasions during the present debate, that Canada's figures are exceeded only by those of Great Britain. Would the minister place on Hansard, on some future occasion if he so desires, the figures for the other divisions of the British Empire, Great Britain, South Africa, Australia and New Zealand? Would it be possible to get those figures?

Mr. MITCHELL: I know the British figures; but they are secret and confidential; they are not published, I suppose for very good reasons best known to themselves. I cannot speak for the United States; I do not know whether or not they publish their figures.

Mr. MARSHALL: I am not interested in the United States; I am talking about the other parts of the British empire. Could we have those figures?

Mr. MITCHELL: I could not give the British figures, but I can try to get the figures for Australia, New Zealand and South Africa.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Under national selective service in the west, if a man is called up to take his medical and makes application for exemption on the ground that he is a conscientious objector, his case is left entirely to an alternative service officer appointed under order in council. In most cases single men who make application on these grounds are asked, I think quite justly, to take service in some other effective work in Canada. If they are put into agriculture they are asked to take employment under contract, under which they are paid the going wage, which I believe is $40 a month. One of these men is allowed $25 for his own expenses and is asked to pay the balance of $15 to the Red Cross, which I think is quite justifiable. Recently, however, my attention was drawn to the case of a man married in 1937, with a wife and two children, living on a quarter-section of land. He did not make application for exemption on the ground that he was essential to agriculture; he claimed exemption because he was of the Doukhobor faith, and acting in good faith he made application on these grounds. His contract calls for him to employ himself at the rate of $40 a month. Of this total he is allowed $25 for himself, and apparently for his wife and two children, and he is required to pay the balance of $15 to the Red Cross. This man claims he is unable to carry out these instructions, and he wrote asking if this was considered fair treatment. I should like to know whether there is any method by which this man could obtain redress from the alternative service officer with respect to his dependents.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think the channel is there. My hon. friend has stated the facts, but this man can appeal to the associate director, who is in charge of that phase of my organization.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The alternative service officer?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, the director in Ottawa.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: He can apply to the director in Ottawa?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Who is that director in Ottawa?

Mr. MITCHELL: Mr. Westman. If my hon. friend will send the application to me I will see that it gets to the right man.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I wrote the minister about this case. It seemed to me that in spite of the minister's letter to the effect that the alternative service officer has a staff to investigate these cases, in this instance something was done which had not been properly investigated, and I was wondering whether there were many other similar cases.

[Mr. Castleden.]

Mr. MITCHELL: No.

Mr. WHITE: I should like the minister to deal with the point I raised yesterday in regard to the young men who have been given postponements because they are working on farms, and who are being called to the district depots for reexamination. Yesterday I asked the minister if there was to be any change in the procedure, and I wonder if he could give an answer to-night.

Mr. MITCHELL: We have to know where people are. We may give a man a postponement because he is essential to agriculture, but if we are not careful he may pop up in some industry in Toronto or Montreal or Quebec or some other city. We have to keep our fingers on everyone, at least to know where they are; so that I cannot give my hon. friend the assurance that there will be any change in that policy in the immediate future.

Mr. WHITE: Am I to take it from the remarks of the minister that any young man now working on a farm who has a postponement will be granted a further extension after May 1 or June 1, when his postponement expires?

Mr. MITCHELL: Absolutely.

Mr. FAIR: Does it make any difference whether that man continues to work for someone else or if he starts out on his own?

Mr. MITCHELL: As long as he is engaged in agriculture; that is the essential point.

Mr. POULIOT: I was in the gallery when the hon. member for St. Paul's spoke. I wondered if my memory was good, so I looked in the "Parliamentary Guide" and confirmed my recollection that he had graduated from the military college at Kingston. He is strong for conscription, although he never volunteered during the last war and was then of age. When I see him looking as imposing as usual I think he must be a major-general, but I am surprised that a man educated at the military college at Kingston should be so strong for conscription though he did not himself volunteer during the last war; and I make that statement as a civilian.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. When the hon. member for St. Paul's was speaking the Minister of Labour raised a point of order, which I upheld, because at the time the hon. gentleman was not speaking to the item under consideration.

Mr. POULIOT: I agree with your ruling, Mr. Chairman, and I shall speak of a more interesting matter. The question now before the committee is undoubtedly one of the most important we shall have to discuss during this war, namely, the question of selective service. I regret very much that some facts have not been recorded by the registrar's office, or by national defence headquarters in each military district. For instance, I asked the following two questions, which may be condensed into one:

1. Since 1940, how many requests for leave or postponement of training have been submitted by the army to the mobilization board of each of the military districts other than the military district of Quebec for soldiers or conscripts who were farmers, farmers' sons or farm helpers?

2. In how many of such cases did the said boards (a) recommend leave; (b) refuse to recommend leave?

Here are the answers that were given to-day:

1 and 2. The army does not maintain records on the number of applications for leave referred to mobilization boards nor on the number of those recommended or not recommended by such boards. To ascertain this information it would be necessary to examine the personal file in the district records office of every soldier.

Application for postponement of training is made direct to mobilization boards by the individual concerned before his enrolment into the army.

The matter is of great importance, and I know that since the thing has not been done before it would take some time now to gather the information. But there was no excuse for the registrar, and there was no excuse for the headquarters in each district not gathering that information, because each case was submitted by the army to the mobilization board. It is within my knowledge that in very deserving applications for leave the rulings of the mobilization board supported the contention of the army. Very seldom did the men get justice before mobilization boards, when their cases were submitted to those boards by the army.

I see some hon. members opposite who have spoken loudly of their love for the farmer. There is a small number of members of parliament who have done something for the farmer by succeeding in having national war service regulations and mobilization regulations amended. I, for one, have done my share in that work, because I know very well the usefulness of the farmer on the farm. It is a great mistake to tell farmers that their first duty is not that of cultivating the farm, but that it is to enlist in the armed forces. Where would the army be if it had no food? Some country-wide reforms were gained for the farmer by the small group of members who were fighting for him last year, and whose claims are on record in the Votes and Proceedings of this chamber. They have got something for the farmer. They have tried to secure recognition of the importance of his work on the farm.

For instance, the former chairman of the Quebec mobilization board had the feeling that all those of military age who did not join the army were slackers, and unworthy of British citizenship. He once wrote me:

You must understand that we cannot postpone the farmers' service indefinitely.

In his view, a postponement was a favour, not a right in virtue of the law. He and his brother colleagues of the board did not understand either the letter or the spirit of the regulations, and we have had to put up a struggle for the farmers; for everyone will realize the loss that must result when the farmers are taken away from their farms. It is disastrous.

I had the unpleasant duty of reporting him to his minister, who entirely agreed with me, to the effect that the farmers had the same rights as others occupied in seasonal and essential industries, and were entitled to postponement. The staff of the board had to be changed because of their refractory turn of mind.

Now, when we hear some people saying that the farmers are exempted from service, it is untrue because there are a good many farmers who went to their training in good faith but they were kept in the army by men who are not expert in agriculture. There are many farms that cannot produce as much now as they did before, and that is exactly the reason.

The first reform was to secure postponements of six months instead of four for all those engaged in an essential industry. The second reform was that instructions were given to all the national war services boards in accordance with the statement made in the house on November 11, 1941, by the then minister now Mr. Justice Thorson. These were his words:

Mr. Thorson: My answer will be in reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) and the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White). No postponement can be for longer than six months, but when that six months period is over, another postponement may be granted. The jurisdiction of the board is not confined to the second postponement; the board may grant one or more extensions of the original postponement, but each postponement must be for a period of not longer than six months. In each case the board looks at the application from the point of view of the national interest and deals with each case upon its merits. It has complete jurisdiction in granting or refusing an application for a postponement order.

The ex-chairman was a judge, and he had had the distinction of having four of his judgments reversed at one term of the court of appeal. Under his chairmanship the jurisprudence of the board was that all farmers who worked as lumberjacks during the winter were not bona fide farmers. He always refused a postponement in such cases.

I succeeded at last in having him remove that from the picture, but he was responsible to a large extent for the otherwise inexcusable farm and labour shortage in the Quebec district. The representative of the farmers was a former wood-scaler of the Power Lumber company of St. Pacôme. Both the ex-chairman and he were the choice of the Minister of National Defence for Air. Originally the third member of the board was a former mayor of Quebec city, and the father-in-law of the D.M.O. of military district No. 5. He died and was replaced by a labour leader who was so silly that I had only to mention in the house a long distance telephone conversation I had with him to have him replaced by another man whom I do not know, and whom I have not yet called over the telephone.

It was quite a feat to get rid of those people whom Ottawa seemed to consider more indispensable on the board than the farmers on the land, the lumberjacks in the forests, the firemen and the brakemen on the trains, and so on. And there have been advertisements appearing in the press with pictures of the Minister of Labour. I had so much trouble with the board in Quebec city that I had to write them to the effect that if they did not consider seriously the cases of some farmers' sons who were working in the forests during the lumbering season, I would have to write to the papers and ask them if they were really authorized to publish the minister's picture, or if it was just an April fool joke. The picture of the minister was put alongside the statement that those who were working in the forests would be considered as working in an essential industry. It is not surprising that these things happen when we consider the point of view of the imperialists, those who are blind and who do not realize the importance of having men in all the various fields of endeavour.

I complained about the office of the Quebec registrar. There have been some changes, but the clean-up has not gone far enough. I commend the minister for having put out one of the assistant registrars. I complained about him three years ago and it has taken that long to get rid of him. What did he do while he was there? What did the incompetent judge do while he was chairman? Many applicants suffered injustices and many farmers have been placed in the position of producing much less because of the stupidity of these men. I want the minister to understand that I have no grievance against anyone. When I complain about some one on these boards I do so because I know there is inefficiency. I try to help him by giving him information which he could not secure otherwise. Many people are afraid to tell the truth because they fear they will be penalized. They fear that rulings will be given by these men if they denounce them to the minister. It is not a question of carrying tales, to use the popular expression; it is a question of informing the minister of what is going on.

The proper way to secure the right information as to how the law is being administered is not to write to the guilty parties for a report. I know this man is incompetent because I know this is not the only occasion mistakes have been made. What happened? Most of the time he was asked to report on my complaint and it is not surprising that his answer was his own justification. Things got so bad that two years ago I had to assign as a witness the very man who had been fired by the minister after three years of complaints. An investigation was carried on in court before a district magistrate. I asked the selective service to secure a copy of the reporter's notes, but I do not think this has been done. I gave my services free and I did not feel like paying to have the stenographer's notes transcribed for the government. I expected the department to do that. I do not know if it has been done yet, but many months after the case was over, the notes had not been transcribed by the court stenographer. This inquiry showed the incompetency and inefficiency of that man who had the power of life or death on draftees.

I read what was said yesterday and I have listened to what has been said to-day about military district No. 5. A clean-up is needed in the army headquarters and national selective service in Quebec city. I should like to say a word of praise for the representative of selective service on the mobilization board in that city. The hon. member for Quebec West and South (Mr. Parent) says that I am right in complaining about the army in military district No. 5. French Canadians are getting a raw deal from French Canadian officers who have never been at war. I do not say that it is only French Canadians who are treating my compatriots in the province of Quebec in that way because at headquarters in Quebec city there are people from all over the country. But French Canadians are not getting a fair deal from the medical corps of the army. I think I have given enough instances of the trouble they have.

Mr. McNEVIN: Mr. Chairman, you ruled that this debate should be confined to the Department of Labour. We are now getting into a discussion of army matters.

Mr. POULIOT: My answer is quite obvious. The minister gave figures which had been provided by the army. All day yesterday this was the subject matter of the debate, which resumed at five-fifteen this afternoon until six o'clock, and then from eight o'clock until the present time. I complained that the minister was not the boss of his own department, that he had to rely upon figures over which he had no control. I am ready to help him to the limit, although I do not know what the limit is. Even though we are at war we should have reforms at and from general headquarters.

As my hon. friend knows, these farmers are called up for medical examinations. They receive these notices from the registrar who is under the minister. Then the mobilization boards which are under the Minister of Labour decide upon matters submitted to them by the Department of National Defence. How is it possible to discuss the operation of this law under the Department of Labour without mentioning what happens in the Department of National Defence? It is all the one and the same thing. It is not a question of being prejudiced; it is a question of seeing that Canadian people do their best in producing war materials on the farm, in industry and everywhere else. There has been a complete ignoring of the importance of the work being carried on by men in essential industry.

At this point I should like to ask the minister a most important question. What is the arrangement between his department and Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway company regarding the calling up of men to the camps? There is one man in the C.N.R. and another in the C.P.R. who have the power of life and death over railway men. These men are located in Montreal and they decide whether a man is essential in his own district. To my own knowledge men have been recommended by their own divisional superintendents and this recommendation has been reversed by these men who are in Montreal. It is Mr. Edge in the C.N.R., and there is another man in the C.P.R. If a man does not have a recommendation from either of these gentlemen he goes automatically to the camp, no matter how essential he may be as a railway man.

There are essential positions in the railway business. Is an old man who is past the superannuation age, who can be seen at the same hour every day at the news-stand in the Chateau Laurier, to decide whether a man is essential? That old man has outlived his usefulness and yet he has the power of life and death over other railway men. As I say, he is located in Ottawa and the other two are located in Montreal. These men have the power of sending to the training camps men who have had long experience in railway work.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): My hon. friend is stating that these men must have a recommendation from either the Canadian Pacific Railway company or the Canadian National Railways that they are essential. I thought, Mr. Chairman, we were discussing the labour question and not men for the army. No doubt the minister has had difficulties in choosing these men, but I am pretty sure that he would not have chosen them unless he had had recommendations from the essential war industries, like the C.P.R. and the C.N.R.; and if he receives the recommendation that somebody should be taken on, even though he is over-age, it is reasonable to assume that under present conditions the Minister of Labour and the selective service board will accept the recommendations of those who say that certain men are essential to their operations. I think we are going beyond our scope when we try to discuss military matters under this item.

Mr. POULIOT: In reply to the hon. member for Skeena, who will not be a member after the next election—

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Thank you. Mr. Chairman, I have just as good a chance, I think, if I decide to stand, as the hon. member for Temiscouata.

Mr. POULIOT: We can decide that between ourselves.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: Here we are discussing, precisely, national selective service, and I have been speaking in the first place of a man who was an appointee of the Department of Labour. I wonder why I should not have the right to discuss the case of a man who was not appointed by the C.P.R. or the C.N.R., but by the Minister of Labour himself. That is the first point. In the second place I mentioned the name of one of the other men merely at the request of one of my colleagues, and I have said nothing uncivil in that respect. I complain of the fact. I do not complain of these two men; I complain of the fact that they are given the power of life and death over railway men who are essential to the war effort but who cannot resume their activities as railway men because Mr. So-and-so does not want to recommend them on account of an arrangement which has been made between the Department of Labour and the railway. If this condition does not affect the hon. member in his constituency of Skeena, because he has not a large number of railway men in his riding, it may affect the transportation of his constituents or of their goods. We need good men, men of experience, to carry on their work as railway men, and it is because I realize the great importance of the railway business that I am asking some questions of the minister. I would tell the hon. member for Skeena that I was in the house a long time before he arrived, and I have been—

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): I have been here for fifteen years; and as far as the constituency of Skeena is concerned, just about one-third of the population is either dependent in the matter of transportation on the railway or on coastal shipping.

The CHAIRMAN: If I may be allowed to refer to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Victoria, Ontario, surely after three full days of discussion we should come down at some time to work on the definite item before the committee. I appeal to all hon. members to realize that, with all the speeches which we have had for the past two days and more, this item is not yet passed. The Chair must take some responsibility and insist that speeches must be relevant to the matter before the committee. Surely, after nearly three days' discussion, so much repetition is unnecessary. Much of the discussion is out of order.

Mr. POULIOT: I regret that I have to repeat things, but it is at the request of the hon. member for Skeena. This matter has not been brought before the house during this session, and it is the time to ask for some information from the Minister of Labour about the arrangement that has been made between his department and the railway companies. I have been told that there is an arrangement whereby those who have had one month's training go automatically to the army as soon as their leave has expired and that further postponement is granted to those who have never done any training. I would ask the minister to be kind enough to give us full information about the arrangement which has been made between his department and the railway companies regarding the status of men of military age who have railway experience.

Mr. MITCHELL: Mr. Chairman, it is simple. It is an arrangement which exists in every big corporation in this country, and it is that the personnel managers of these particular railroads—I think Mr. Edge is one of them and Mr. Brydon-Jack is the other—are responsible for any recommendations made to the mobilization board with respect to the postponement of men engaged in these companies. That is the general procedure. A man applies for postponement; it is either supported or not supported by the employer. These two gentlemen happen to be the chiefs of personnel of these two great railroads. In some other organization it would be someone else. It is just as simple as that. There is no secret about it. They speak for the company.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: If my hon. friend permits me a minute, I will ask the minister if he will be kind enough to table the correspondence between the railways and the Department of Labour regarding this matter.

Mr. MITCHELL: I shall be glad to do that. Anything for peace and quietness.

Mr. FAIR: May I ask the minister whether the national resources mobilization board is supreme in each military district, or whether there is any authority or board above it to which an appeal may be directed?

Mr. MITCHELL: The board is supreme. There is no appeal.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I feel it is my duty to say a few words on these estimates, although I am anxious that the debate be concluded with all possible speed. But first, I may be allowed to heartily congratulate the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Chambers) for the splendid speech he delivered to-night. His stand proves that his patriotism is not of the parlour variety but of the staunchest kind; it is the brand of patriotism professed by those who love their country as we do, and who are willing to risk their lives for the defence of the endangered fatherland. In my own name and on behalf of all those who feel as I do, I wish to congratulate him from the bottom of my heart, on his stand and his sentiments.

We have entered this war because we really thought that the country was in danger. The great majority of the hon. members of this house, in 1939, supported the government when they declared war on Germany. If the elementary principles of philosophy I learned in my student days have any value and one of which is that common sense is a test of truth, I believe that the great majority of the members of this house, having supported the action taken by the government when they declared war, we must have been right. We realized that our country was in danger. We have felt that it was worth risking all that we hold as most valuable to defend what our fatherland, Canada, means to us. As for me, Mr. Chairman, such were my feelings and such they have remained. After France, like other European nations, was overrun in June, 1940, I felt that if Great Britain had been crushed at a time when, following the Dunkirk evacuation, neither Canada, England nor the United States were prepared to meet the onslaught, this would have been the end of our liberties, of everything worthwhile in Canada. Therefore, since every patriotic citizen who really loves his country must be anxious to defend it at the risk of his life, and since every worthy citizen is naturally patriotic, we must realize that the youth who have voluntarily enlisted for overseas service or are still willing to do so when circumstances permit, deserve our admiration and are worthy of the pride we feel for them. Those who do not enlist, even though they would be most anxious to do so, have been prevented from taking that course by the selective service. In a great majority of cases, young men brought up on farms have been prevented from enlisting because it is as if each of them had been told: "Young man, in spite of your desire to fight for your country overseas, it is our duty to prevent you from going there because we want you to produce foodstuffs for those who are going to fight over there." Therefore, a great majority of farmers' sons have been, as it were, frozen on the land. The same thing may be said about those who are called upon to work in war industries. If what I say is true, I submit that farmers' sons have not enlisted in larger numbers because they could not do so or because it was thought that their immediate duty lay in the production of foodstuffs for our soldiers and the armies of our allies. My hon. friend the member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond) told us last night how terrible it is for a farmer to inform against his son. However, I do not know any bona fide farmers in my constituency, or elsewhere whose sons have been refused a postponement. Therefore, as I know very well the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie, I was rather puzzled by the statement he made last night about farmers' sons. He knows as well as I do that not one bona fide farmer's son has been called up and that, if he has been called he was granted a postponement. Therefore, the father has not been forced to inform against his son since it is the duty of both the father and the son to produce more and more.

There is another matter broached by the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie about which I would like to offer some explanation, not with the intention of lecturing him, but at least so that the citizens of our province may know that if a member protested against that order in council while all others kept silent, it was not because anyone wanted to admit the accuracy of the statement made by the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie, and which had reference to the order in council he mentioned last night as reported on page 2534 of Hansard. He said that the government had been unfair to Canadians of French extraction when they passed order in council No. 1355, dated March 4, 1944, which contains the following provision:

> The minister, upon being informed by the Department of National Defence that a specified number of men are required for military training, may instruct any registrar to apply these regulations to a specified number of men from his division, and may inform a registrar how many French-speaking men are required.

And the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie said:

> I ask the minister why he has inserted in this order in council a special provision relating to French-speaking Canadians. I thought that in this country of ours we were all Canadians and that when men are called into the army there should be no distinction between French Canadians or English Canadians or Canadians of any other race, because we are all Canadians. I fail to see the object of this special distinction applying to French Canadians.

Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to answer on behalf of the minister. The hon. minister can well take care of himself. If I bring the matter up, it is only to state humbly that the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville differs from the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie in his interpretation of the order.

Mr. FAUTEUX: Hear, hear.

Mr. DUPUIS: My hon. friend knows perfectly well, or at least should know, that in the very first year of the war, in 1940, when the National War Services Department was set up, the hon. Minister of National War Services and the other ministers of the crown decided in their wisdom—and we congratulate them for it—that English-speaking Canadians would receive their military training in the English language, and that the French-speaking Canadians would get theirs in their own language. And then, as officers were not in sufficient number—the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier), a former officer himself, knows it very well—officers' training schools were set up throughout Canada and particularly in the province of Quebec. Thus a great many officers were trained and formed, so that, since the beginning of the war, any young French-speaking Canadian, whether he enlists voluntarily or is called up for home defence in Canada or in Canada's territorial waters, is directed to a training centre where he is instructed in French by French-Canadian officers. The hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie must be aware of that. Since 1940 every member in the house and every army training centre have received a pamphlet, "The National War Services Regulations, 1940" (Consolidation 1941). And if the hon. member for Portneuf who is presently, I suppose, the representative of the party headed by the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie, cares to look up page 7, paragraph 9, of that pamphlet, he will note that this same paragraph of the order in council exists since the beginning of the war. I shall not quote the whole paragraph, but merely the part which deals with French-Canadian recruits. Subsection 2 of section 9 reads as follows:

> The minister shall inform each divisional registrar concerned of the number of French-speaking men who are required to report for military training to an indicated place or places and at an indicated time.

Since then, and precisely on account of this section, these instructions are followed by National Defence and mobilization officials. When the number of French-Canadian recruits who report for military training is known, they are immediately sent to training schools staffed by French-Canadian officers who teach them in their own tongue. More than that, they are supplied with French textbooks. So that when my hon. friend from Beauharnois-Laprairie attempted to take the hon. Minister of Labour to task for this section of the order in council which he quoted last evening, he afforded the other hon. members of this house who are of French descent the opportunity to look up the National War Services regulations and to tell our hon. friends, the members of the Bloc Populaire, that the purpose, the motive, the reason why this clause was inserted,—and is still in the regulations—was exactly to give fair play to Canadians of French descent who wish to do their duty and defend their country.

(Text) Mr. GILLIS: I am just as anxious as the minister to see the item pass, but this is about the only chance we have to get information on certain matters about which we receive inquiries. I wish to try to get some information from the minister on the unemployment situation, and I rise for that purpose. So many complicated statements are made that I am beginning to wonder whether anyone knows exactly what the employment requirements of the country are. Since the minister has presented his estimates he has stated that he could use 160,000 people if he could find them. Notwithstanding that statement one finds statements in the press and statements emanating from national selective service that would lead one to believe that either those in selective service who are directly responsible for the problem have very little knowledge of it or the minister is out in his estimates. It is to clarify that, in my own mind at least, that I want to get some information. For example, on March 23 the Ottawa Citizen carried the following statement:

> Mr. Redvers Pratt, local manager of the office of employment and selective service, said to-day he called on contractors unaware of the surplus of workmen to begin operations immediately.

That is, in the building trade, and he goes on to point out that he has listed in his office some 121 carpenters out of work, also a great number of bricklayers, lathers, painters and a considerable number of heavy labourers and so forth. That is right here in Ottawa from one of the main offices. You find the union of carpenters, bricklayers, painters and labourers in Toronto writing in and protesting against the fact that employees in the building trades, old men who were unfit for, or not eligible for military service are being replaced by able-bodied Royal Canadian Air Force personnel. They are taking over the regular employment of those men who must earn their own living in that way. I am not going to elaborate on that. It has many ramifications. There is waste in several directions there. I am absolutely convinced of the trustworthiness of the sources of the information. It has been a matter of controversy for some time between the Department of Labour and the unions concerned.

I hold in my hand correspondence of as recent a date as April 18. The fact of the matter is the R.C.A.F. personnel are replacing civilian personnel in that trade. More serious than that is a circular letter issued by the office of the manager of selective service at Dawson Creek, British Columbia. According to this letter it would appear that there has been some change in the rates of pay of employees employed on the Alaska highway. A new schedule was posted which in effect changed from an hourly basis to a monthly basis most of the employees employed on that project in a maintenance capacity. This change is looked upon by the employees as a reduction in wages of approximately $125 a month.

That is a substantial reduction in the change-over. Coinciding with the posting of the new schedule we find the manager of employment and selective service in that area issuing a notice which is certainly not in line with the statement made by the minister on the matter of employment. I shall quote a couple of paragraphs of it, because if the minister is not aware of it he should be. The notice reads as follows:

To: All Canadian employees employed by United States engineers department.

I regret very much that due to pressure of business I am unable to call upon each and every camp individually and give a talk regarding the proposed set-up for Canadian employees on the maintenance of highway flight strips and airports and the conditions pertaining thereto.

However, Mr. McDonald of the labour relations, U.S. government, who is a Canadian, has kindly consented to give a talk on such conditions which have been posted in each and every camp.

I want the minister to take notice of this statement:

There is one thing I would like to impress upon you. As no doubt some of you are aware, conditions outside at the present time are not of the very best meaning by this there has been heavy lay-offs of workers throughout Canada as a whole and in many centres where there has been war projects of various descriptions the wages have lapsed back to those that were paid prior to the war.

It is the intention of both United States and Canadian governments at the present time to retain in the neighbourhood of five to six hundred individuals for the fore-mentioned maintenance work.

There is no indication at the present time of any new projects being opened up in Canada with the result there will be a difficult matter to absorb in Canadian industry the hundreds that are now idle throughout the prairie provinces alone and I would suggest and advise that those of you who are desirous of having employment for the duration of the war plus six months thereafter at a still fair wage schedule as quoted by Mr. McDonald, would consider very seriously of making their intentions known immediately to their superior official.

I cannot understand a letter like that going out from a national selective service office. I do not imagine the central office in Ottawa would have any knowledge of it, nor that it would have their sanction, because that officer is giving a wrong picture of the employment situation, if the minister is correct, and is using his office to coerce the men concerned into accepting a very substantial reduction in wages. In the light of press statements emanating to a large extent from selective service officials, and the minister's statement that he could find employment for some 160,000 people if he had them, I should like him to tell the committee briefly just where this employment is available, because in the province from which I come a large number of men are unemployed. I receive letters from them from time to time, and I should like to be able to advise them where they might find employment. I am not going to take up any more time on this subject; one might speak on it for hours, but I should like the minister to make a brief statement indicating the sections of Canada where there is a shortage of labour, and of course I should like him to make some comments on this letter. What I am principally concerned about, of course, is to discover where in Canada there is a shortage of labour in any given industry, so that when we receive inquiries we may be able to advise people accordingly. Certainly, men are not needed in the building industry.

Mr. GARDINER: They are needed in every packing plant in Canada.

Mr. GILLIS: That is good. Then, as a matter of labour relations, I should like the minister to tell me whether it is the policy of his department under selective service to permit regular members of the building trades, mechanics and so on, to be replaced by service personnel and thrown on to unemployment insurance. This is an old difficulty which, to my knowledge, has been encountered for the last eighteen months; it has been a matter of controversy between selective service and the service departments, and I think the time has come when the Department of Labour should decide exactly what is to be done, since it is the prerogative of this department to look after such matters.

Mr. MITCHELL: I was speaking in round figures the other day when I mentioned the 160,000 people who were needed. In the A, B. and C priority industries there is at the present time a shortage of 103,659 males. There are vacancies for 15,709 loggers and for 51,475 females in all occupations. This is the latest return.

Mr. GILLIS: Could the minister give us any idea of the sections of Canada where these people are needed?

Mr. MITCHELL: I am trying to get that break-down now. In regard to the letter read by my hon. friend I can only say that in a large organization such as we are administering, letters like this do go out sometimes. As soon as we had knowledge of this letter it was suppressed; that is as far as I can go in that direction. In regard to people being unemployed, the hon. gentleman knows as well as I do that there will be pockets of unemployment. That is inevitable in a country with seasonal employment like Canada; for short periods, at any rate, there will be unemployment, particularly in the building trades, let us say. The men engaged in those trades understand it; in fact the wage structure is predicated upon that fact. I am not going into the history of the development of the wage structure in the building industry or any other industry, but that fact is understood. In regard to the information requested by the hon. gentleman as to where labour shortages exist, as I said in connection with another matter naturally we who are engaged in the central control deal in the large numbers while the local offices deal with matters in the field. I shall endeavour to give my hon. friend the figures he desires; they are available any time he wants them. I can send them over to him, unless he would like them on the record.

Mr. GILLIS: I believe they should be on the record.

Mr. MITCHELL: Very well, but my hon. friend can see what I am up against.

Mr. GILLIS: It is not necessary to read them.

Mr. MITCHELL: This is a pretty big proposition.

Mr. GILLIS: Table them.

Mr. MITCHELL: I shall be glad to do that, but I do not think they should go into Hansard; they would cover several pages. My hon. friend wants an indication of where there are vacancies, I suppose particularly in his own province.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL: I shall be glad to give my hon. friend these figures. With reference to competition in the services, particularly in the building trades, that is an old story, and it is pretty hard to draw the line between where the functions of the armed services end and where the work of the building trades begins. I was not aware that we were having any serious difficulty at the present time, I mean in a large way. That condition might exist somewhere temporarily, but I know we maintain liaison with the service departments, and any protests or complaints or representations are taken up with the other departments expeditiously. I think that is as far as I can go. I know of no specific instances at the moment of complaints of competition between men in the services and those engaged in ordinary, everyday labour.

Mr. GILLIS: I have in my hand a list sent me by the national union of carpenters and bricklayers of Toronto. The complaint is that at No. 1 equipment depot twelve civilian carpenters have been laid off and replaced by R.C.A.F. personnel. The matter is now being adjudicated, I understand, by two or three different departments.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is in the day to day administration of the department; there is nothing new about that.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Mr. GILLIS: You take a boy into the air force, and the country goes to great expense in order to train him. Then when you have him trained, when he might be able to make a real contribution from a military point of view, you make use of that boy to replace a civilian carpenter, who is forced back upon unemployment insurance. I cannot see the sense of it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I would ask the minister to answer a question I had placed on the order paper, giving the figures as to the number of persons, both male and female, registered as unemployed, and the number of persons placed by the unemployment service. The figure came up to January 27. Would the minister bring it up to the end of April?

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member wants the figure for unemployment insurance?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): No; the number registered at employment offices as seeking employment. If I remember correctly, on January 27, the figure was 67,000.

Mr. MITCHELL: I shall be glad to have that information to-morrow.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I was listening a little while ago to the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Dupuis) who, outside as well as within this chamber has become a most powerful champion of an all-out war effort in the province of Quebec. I rise at this moment not for the purpose of answering his speech but rather in an attempt to put things in their proper light. Since he spoke of the declaration of war, and though he was out of order, I shall take the liberty of following in his steps so as to straighten the facts.

His speech would lead us to believe that most of the members of the house have voted in favour of participation in this war, though ne did not expressly say so. His remarks might give the impression that the members actually voted on this question, while no vote was taken on the declaration of war. If the hon. member wishes to refer to Hansard of that year, he will note that the declaration of war was agreed to on division, following an observation made by the then leader of the C.C.F. party, Mr. Woodsworth, who said that several members opposed the motion. The speaker having said: "Carried", an hon. member added: "On division." That is how the declaration of war was agreed to. Two days later, we were called upon to vote on the question of participation, that is on a motion of the Minister of Finance asking for an appropriation of $100,000,000. Sixteen members voted against participation, and the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville was not one of them.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): I am proud of the fact that I was not one of them.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Translation): The hon. member for Chambly-Rouville has talked about farmers' sons. He has made an effort once more. Last year the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot)—I would not compare him with the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville when it comes to helping farmers' sons, as that would not be a mark of favour or of praise—made a motion to get exemptions for farmers' sons. I wonder if the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville voted for that motion.

Mr. DUPUIS: (Translation): The government had already decided that farmers' sons were exempted.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Translation): Certainly, and Le Canada and Le Soleil published headlines six inches high that read: "Farmers' Sons Are Exempted". Since when are they exempted?

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): They still are.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Translation): They are not. They get a postponement, and they have to lose hours and days of work every time it must be renewed. If the hon. member thinks that is right, I do not.

And when the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy) last year moved an amendment to the address dealing with farmers' sons, and when we of the Bloc Populaire presented an amendment to the amendment in which we asked that farmers' sons be exempted, the hon. member voted against it. He had once made an effort that had been too much for him, he did not try to repeat it.

The hon. member finds that the member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond) goes too far, that he is too critical. But the farmers' sons who have volunteered were certainly not compelled to enlist for overseas service. One of my fellow parishioners who had volunteered has just returned from overseas. But in regard to those who were called for home defence, it frequently happens that farmers' sons had to remain four months and even six months in the army before their release could be secured.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): There are not five per cent of these in your constituency.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Translation): I repeat that in several cases farmers' sons were compelled to remain a long time in the army before obtaining their release.

(Text) Mr. MITCHELL: If I might just interject a word: I think my hon. friend is discussing the position of employees in agriculture, under the national selective service regulations. I think I had better read the regulations, so that they may be on record. This is the law. It is not an opinion; it is the law, and it says:

> The board shall, upon the application of a person employed in agriculture, grant him a postponing order until further notice, until it is established to the satisfaction of the board that such person is not an essential worker in agriculture or that such person has at any time since March 23, 1942, ceased to be a person employed in agriculture; but any postponing order made on such grounds may be cancelled by the board, if it is satisfied that the person has, at any time since March 23, 1942, ceased to be a person employed in agriculture.

So that it is automatic.

Mr. GAUTHIER: I was just telling the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville that we have cases where farmers' sons were called to report to the army, or to pass their medical examinations; and sometimes because they have delayed in filling out their report they have been kept in the army for from four to six months. These were farmers' sons, bona fide farmers' sons, and I can give the cases to the minister, if he wants to have them. That is what I was saying; I was not speaking generally. I was telling the minister that there were cases where farmers' sons were obliged to ask for delay, and when they wanted to obtain that delay they had to use hours and sometimes days to attend before the commission in Quebec, before a decision was given. I think I am right in saying that.

Mr. MITCHELL: I should like to see the facts in the case before expressing an opinion. That farmer may have had more sons; I do not know.

Mr. GAUTHIER: This is a special case, and I will give the information to the minister. This boy was kept in the army for four months.

Mr. DUPUIS: One man in the constituency!

Mr. GAUTHIER: Wait a minute; my hon. friend is braver than he was in Stanstead. This is not the only case I have, and I am positive I am not the only member who could give cases to the minister where farmers' sons have been kept in the army for months. That is not an opinion; it is a fact.

Mr. MITCHELL: They may not be essential; it is a matter of opinion.

Mr. GAUTHIER: When a farmer has only one son, do you say he is not essential?

Mr. MITCHELL: It may not be a producing farm.

Mr. GAUTHIER: This time it was a producing farm.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is what you say; the board might not think so.

Mr. GAUTHIER: If the minister does not wish to take my word, all right; I am honest enough and polite enough to take his.

Mr. WEIR: Was he late in applying for postponement?

Mr. MITCHELL: I would be glad to look into the case for my hon. friend.

Mr. GAUTHIER: There are cases like that where farmers' sons are still in the army and the minister knows about them. There are cases where men did not report right away. I know of one or two cases where the men did not report for a month or two. One man came in himself and the other was brought in by the mounted police. Are these men being kept in the army as a penalty because they did not report right away?

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not know the case. My hon. friend knows all about it.

Mr. GAUTHIER: A farmer's son was called by selective service to report and—

Mr. DUPUIS: He fails to do so.

Mr. GAUTHIER: —he fails to do so, as my hon. friend says. But he reports to the army, and I want to know if he is being kept there as a penalty because he delayed reporting.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have told my hon. friend that I cannot say. I cannot sit in judgment in this House of Comomns on 1,600,000 people; it is a physical impossibility. If my hon. friend will give me the facts and the numbers of the cases I shall be glad to look into them. The other day I parked my car where I should not have parked it. I got a ticket because I had broken the law. It is just as simple as that. These men were ordered to report and they did not; they broke the law.

Mr. GAUTHIER: But I am asking if this man is being kept in the army as a penalty. Here is another case. Suppose a man is a specialist in agriculture and was working on a poultry farm as an employee before being called up. He had studied for a number of years and when in the army he endeavoured to get a deferment, which was refused.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is another instance where I would have to get the particulars. My hon. friend cannot turn this House of Commons into a tribunal. I assume that the board is located in Quebec city and that there would be representatives of agriculture to advise that board, as well as the different agencies interested in the man-power problem generally. A judge of one of the courts acts as chairman, the same as in every other part of Canada. I do not know the particulars of these cases. It may be that this man is the only one in Canada who claims he is a specialist. A man may say he is a farmer and be the only man in Canada who thinks so. Because a man says he is a farmer does not mean a thing until he is proved to be a farmer by these different agencies.

Mr. GAUTHIER: This man was in British Columbia and he had attended agricultural college for two years before taking this position. He asked for a delay which was refused on the ground that he was not related to his employer. A man who has studied for two years must be a specialist.

Mr. MITCHELL: It often happens that a man will not tell his commanding officer the same story as he tells his family.

Mr. GAUTHIER: He does not need to tell me his story because I know him personally. I know where he has been working and all about him.

Mr. MITCHELL: There are lots of men who tell their commanding officers an entirely different story from what they tell at home. Many of these men want to stay in the army when the people back home think they should be home.

Mr. GAUTHIER: He does not want to stay in the army. He asked for a delay and they refused it on the ground that he was not related to his employer.

Mr. DORION (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I was in Quebec last night when I read in the newspapers that entirely unfair attacks from a member of this house against Quebec district had again unfortunately been launched. I was glad to find to-night in L'Action Catholique of Quebec, a rejoinder concerning the gratuitous assertion made yesterday in this house by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). At page 2498 of Hansard of May 1, I read the following:

> In Quebec military district, division F, they called up 8·6 per cent of the total population, or, in that period of time, only 8,724 out of some 460,000 men.

I wonder why some members take pleasure in making such exaggerated statements which invariably refer to the province of Quebec. They afterwards circulate such falsehoods in the English language newspapers of this country. To-night, I read in L'Action Catholique of May 2 a statement from the Quebec district registrar, Mr. Paré. Here is what he says:

> It is absolutely untrue that, in Quebec district, only 9,000 out of 460,000 "callable" men have been called up, as was alleged by Mr. John B. Diefenbaker, Progressive-Conservative member for Lake Centre. In the first place, in our district, there are but 180,000 "callable" men, not 460,000 as Mr. Diefenbaker has asserted. Moreover, to date, all these men have been called up and have complied with the law. A certain number have been sent to military camps, others have been found physically unfit, while a third group, after having complied with the law, have been granted postponements under the regulations exempting from military service farmers' sons, lumbermen, fishermen and persons employed in an essential war industry. One must not forget that our district is not like an entirely urban district. On the contrary, the Quebec division might be said to be an essentially rural one, which explains that many potential recruits are momentarily exempted from compulsory military training. One must, however, emphasize the fact that these men have complied with the law and have been granted regular exemptions.

I was anxious, Mr. Chairman, to make this correction to-night so that the falsehoods published yesterday in the English language newspapers might be rectified to-morrow.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned until Thursday at 3 o'clock p.m., pursuant to special order made Monday, February 21, 1944.

Thursday, May 4, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES—TABLING OF ORDERS IN COUNCIL

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I wish to table order in council P.C. 2911, being an agreement with the province of Ontario, and order in council P.C. 3062, an agreement with the province of British Columbia.

Mr. GRAYDON: Are there any other provinces in a position similar to these two?

Mr. MITCHELL: I expect in the not distant future to have agreements negotiated with all the provinces.

TRANSPORT ACT

AMENDMENT TO REMOVE COMMERCIAL AIR SERVICES FROM JURISDICTION OF TRANSPORT COMMISSIONERS

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Transport) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 101, to amend the Transport Act, 1938.

Mr. GRAYDON: Would the minister explain the purpose of the amendment?

Mr. MICHAUD: This bill is a companion bill to the one to be introduced later by the Minister of Munitions and Supply, based on a resolution, now on the order paper, which provides for the establishment of an air transport board. The provisions of this bill remove commercial air services from the jurisdiction of the board of transport commissioners.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

INCOME TAX ARREARS AND PROSECUTIONS

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury):

1. What are the arrears of income taxes uncollected for each of the years 1932 to 1942, both inclusive?
2. How many court or other legal actions have been taken by the income tax division looking towards the collection of arrears of income taxes since 1932?
3. What have been the results, (a) in amount of taxes collected; (b) in how many cases have such actions resulted in failure to collect; (c) in compromise of arrears, if any?
4. How many prosecutions for infractions of the Income Tax Act have been instituted during the past ten years ending March 31, 1943?
5. How many of such prosecutions have resulted in convictions, and how many in dismissals?

Mr. GIBSON:

1. (a) Transferred to head office as uncollectible since the inception of the act to date	$ 2,467,368 29
The following statements (b) to (f) in response to question No. 1 are in respect of the accounts as at Mar. 31, 1943:
(b) Outstanding more than five years and still under process of collection...	1,017,129 34
(c) Claims against members of the armed forces which are held in abeyance, pending their return	436,778 54
(d) Bankruptcies not wound up as at the said date, subject to some further collection	174,797 40
(e) Untraceable taxpayers..	217,004 30
(f) Uncollectible accounts not yet transferred from district office records..	442,229 77
(g) Total of (a) to (f) inclusive	$ 4,755,307 64
(h) Collections by the income tax division for all years up to and including the fiscal year ended Mar. 31, 1943...	$ 4,018,400,395 00

Percentage of (g) to (h)—approximately 1/10th of 1 per cent.

The information for the ten years and for each of the years mentioned is not available in the form requested, but the foregoing contains the information most proximate to the apparent intent of the question.

2. (a) Exchequer court actions—1,727.

(b) 5,903 through legal agents at various points throughout Canada, which agents have taken action in some cases in various local courts when the lawyers' letters demanding compliance with the law have failed to bring proper response.

(c) 29,287 actions by way of taxpayers' creditors being required to pay, not to the taxpayer, but to the crown, sometimes referred to as garnishee actions.

3. (a) (1) $1,484,074.93 through Exchequer court action. (2) Amount unknown of collections through local legal agents—records not maintained. (3) $1,278,567.57 through garnishee proceedings.

(b) (1) 480 through the Exchequer court. (2) Number through legal agents unknown—records not maintained. (3) Number through garnishee proceedings unknown, but believed to be nil—records not maintained.

(c) Compromises have arisen when other creditors of the debtor have compromised their claim or where it appears that compromise will collect more than legal action. A summary of such cases is not maintained.

The answer to paragraph (3) of (b) and to (c) above is believed to be, on the best evidence available, less than 100 in number.

4. 937.

5. (a) 214 convictions. (b) 723 were either dismissed or withdrawn on compliance with or satisfaction of the law, and upon paying our legal agent fees and the court costs incurred. The number dismissed is not kept separately from the number withdrawn. The record is the number of cases concluded. The number of cases dismissed is believed to be under 50.

ALBERTA TAR SANDS

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River):

1. Was a quantity of Alberta tar sands sent to England?

2. If so, for what purpose?

3. In what year was it sent, and what quantity?

4. Who was the sender?

5. What was the total cost to the government of Canada?

6. What report, if any, was received by the government?

Mr. CRERAR: I have the answer to this question, but perhaps a word of explanation would be in order. At the time the shipment of tar sands was sent to England there were two departments of government dealing with it. They are now combined with the Department of Mines and Resources. There was considerable correspondence at the time, which has not been included in the answer to the questions, but certain reports that were made by officers of the department have been included. I may say there was no expense to the government in connection with this shipment of tar sands. I think the information that is relevant to the question is all here.

Department of Mines and Resources (from the standpoint of the Department of the Interior):

1. Yes.

2. Experimental purposes.

3. 1920 and 1922—21·2 tons in 1920; 20 tons in 1922.

4. General W. B. Lindsay.

5. All expenses in connection with shipments of this material from Edmonton to England were borne by General Lindsay.

6. Reports were received from the following and copies were attached:

(a) General W. B. Lindsay—dated October 31, 1923, and April 16, 1924.

(b) Dr. Charles Camsell, deputy Minister of Mines and Resources, who visited General Lindsay's plant in England in 1922 and again in 1923—dated November 30, 1923.

(c) Mr. John McLeish when he was director, mines branch, Department of Mines, after he visited General Lindsay's plant in 1925—dated October 20, 1925.

Department of Mines and Resources (from the standpoint of the former Department of Mines):

1. Yes.

2. For testing purposes in response to a request from the British Petroleum Department of the British Government, 2 Queen Anne's Gate Buildings, S.W.1. This Department wrote to the Deputy Minister of Mines on February 10, 1921, in part as follows:

"I have no doubt that considerable attention has been given to this problem and that you have had under review various suggestions as to the best means of extracting the oil from the sand. If you think that there would be any advantage in this problem being investigated in this country, which has had some experience in retorting of shale, coal, cannel, etc., it could probably be arranged for the necessary research to be undertaken at Birmingham university or elsewhere. For this purpose a bulk sample of a few barrels of the tar sand would be necessary. I shall be glad to have your views as to whether you consider it worth while for us to proceed with the matter on these lines which of course involves a solution by retorting methods rather than by pumping down steam, channelling, or otherwise extracting the oil in situ."

3. Shipment was sent in 1921 and the amount was 300 pounds. The shipment was addressed to professor Madgwick, The University, Birmingham, England.

4. The shipment was made at the direction of the Department of Mines from a quantity held in Edmonton, Alberta, by the Department of the Interior.

5. There is no record of any charges in connection with this shipment being debited to the Department of Mines.

6. There is no record of any report being received by the Department of Mines.

Wednesday, October 31, 1923.

The Right Hon. Charles Stewart, M.P.,
Minister of the Interior,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Mr. Stewart,

Reference is requested to my letter of October 16, 1922. Since that time my progress has been delayed by a continuation of the combination of circumstances therein depicted.

The plant was brought into operation in September 1922 and owing to faulty material provided for the packing of the joints, experienced a disastrous fire. Repairs were made and the plant brought into operation again. As was only to be expected, numerous defects were found both in the plant and the operation of the process. Therefore the operation of the experimental plant for the past year has resolved itself into the carrying out of test runs for short periods and the shutting down for relatively long periods for the design of new apparatus, placing of contract for the construction of new equipment, alterations and repairs. Costly delays have occurred, due to strikes and the bad labour conditions existing in this country generally, and in this part of the country particularly. The main delays have been due, firstly to a prolonged local strike in the works where we are operating, and secondly, to the failure of contractors to live up to their contracts and deliver materials as and when agreed. The difficulty of carrying to a conclusion under the trade and labour conditions existing in this country a proposal of this nature can hardly be realized by anyone who has not attempted it here.

Notwithstanding these handicaps, very considerable progress has been made in the solution of the problem. It has not been solved, but we feel we are very near it, and my experts advise me the difficulties are not chemical but are purely mechanical. The work has been very costly, and our expenditure for the past year has been approximately $85,000.00. As soon as the books have been audited a certificate from Sir W. B. Peat & Co., our auditors, will be forwarded.

Mr. Charles Camsell, Deputy Minister of Mines, visited the plant in operation last week and will no doubt report to you upon the subject of the results achieved to date.

I would respectfully call your attention to the adverse change in the situation, as regards the establishment of a commercial plant for the development of tar sands at the present time, due to the over-production in California and the consequent slump in all oil propositions.

Under the circumstance noted above it is respectfully requested:—

(a) that I may be granted an extension of one year from November 30, 1923, for time within which to erect a commercial plant in the McMurray district.

(b) that the large expenditure already incurred—as certified by Sir W. B. Peat & Co. up to July 31, 1922, and to be certified by them for the past year—be accepted in lieu of rentals for the next year.

In connection therewith reference is made to your letter of January 4, 1923, and favourable consideration is requested.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
(Sgd) W. Bethune Lindsay.

Memorandum

Re: General Lindsay's Plant for the treatment of bituminous sands.

This plant is situated near Swansea, South Wales, and was visited by me in September 1922. A memorandum embodying my observations of the operation of the plant was submitted to the Minister on September 28 on my return to Ottawa last year.

I visited the plant again this year on October 27 in company with General Lindsay and in reply to a request for information cabled Mr. Cory on October 29 as follows:

"Saw Lindsay's plant Saturday. No progress made on tar sand separation since last year but has concentrated on new method of refining oil. Cannot say if treatment of sands will be successful."

This cable requires elaboration in order that the situation may be clearly understood.

The process being tried out by General Lindsay consists of two operations namely: (1) the separation of the bitumen from the sand, and (2) distillation of the bitumen and separation into its different fractions by an entirely new method.

Both operations are carried out with superheated steam at high temperatures and under considerable pressure. The oil is vaporized with the steam and when the temperature is lowered condensation takes place of one fraction after another, the heavier first of all and the lighter fraction last. In this respect it is a reversal of the ordinary process of destructive distillation now used.

When the process was first tried out in this plant in September 1922, the packing and joints in the pipes were found to be incapable of withstanding the temperatures and pressures developed and a serious fire broke out, which caused a long delay.

As stated in a previous memorandum of mine on the subject of these bituminous sands, the question of distillation of the oil obtained presents many difficulties and is still an unsolved problem. Lindsay claims that his process of distillation, when perfected, will solve this problem, but of that I cannot speak authoritatively. In consequence of this he has devoted all his attention during the last year to perfecting his process of distillation, and there is no doubt he has made very good progress and appears to be within sight of success.

For this operation he has been using crude oil supplied him by the Auglo-Persian Oil Co., and has been putting through the plant an amount ranging from 150 to 300 barrels a day. His plant has a maximum capacity of about 500 gallons per hour.

He claims to have done sufficient work on the separation of the oil from our sands to feel that his process will perform this operation successfully, but he argues that he dare not use up the 40 tons of sand supplied him until he has the second and more important operation of distillation completely worked out. Looking at the whole process broadly I think he is quite right in this respect.

There is no doubt that the cost of these experiments have run into a great deal of money, and he states that he has expended during the last year some $85,000. An audit of his books will be made by Sir W. B. Peat & Company and a copy of this furnished to the Department of the Interior.

Charles Camsell,
Deputy Minister of Mines.

[Mr. Crerar.]

Ottawa, Ont.
April 16th, 1924.

The Hon. Charles Stewart, M.P.,
Minister of the Interior,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Mr. Stewart,—

With reference to my recent application for permission to alter the selections of tar sand areas originally made by me to others which explorations completed since that time, have indicated to be more desirable, I feel it may be useful if I advise you of the conclusions I have reached after a further study of the situation as regards the development of these tar sand areas.

Until oil can be produced from tar sands and sold in competition with oil derived from wells it does not appear to be feasible to develop these deposits economically. The present tremendous excess production of oil in California has necessarily retarded this. It will be recognized that it is hardly practicable to induce capital to enter this field until assured of a successful process, leases which can be developed profitably and a reasonable market for their products. All of this will take time.

My original selection was based on imperfect data available in 1920. This information has been, I understand, largely supplemented by new exploration work but the results will hardly be available for some time.

The original selections consisted of, if I remember correctly, something like 16 blocks. At the request of the Department this was reduced in 1922 to 9 blocks. In accordance with the last request of the department the section has been still further reduced to 4 main blocks and one small block near MacMurray, which is necessary, on account of its situation, for the preliminary work on a small scale.

I feel however that the potential effect of this arbitrary reduction in number and location of leases is not fully realized for the following reasons:—

(1) Surface indications are very unreliable as to the value of a lease. While I understand a great deal of information has been collected regarding surface indications, this will not be available for a long time. No information is available as to the depth or nature of over-burden, the continuity of deposits, or the value of deposits. A glance at the diagram given below will make this clear.

(Diagram).

(2) Under these circumstances a company might expend a large sum of money in the development of a successful process and find they had leases which could not be operated successfully. I may, therefore, have discarded leases of greater value than those now applied for.

(3) The value of these deposits cannot be determined until they are prospected by core-drilling. As far as I know there is no core-drill as yet available which will operate successfully on these deposits.

In view of the large sums of money already expended by us and the fact that I was the first to take up this question, I feel that it is only reasonable that:—

(a) The selections now made should be considered provisional;

(b) If the detailed exploration work planned for the future discloses better tar sand areas, I should be accorded permission to change and priority of selection.

(c) Every help should be given to ensure exploration and prospecting by core-drilling.

It is understood that some of the areas recently prospected and considered of value have not yet been placed within the tar sand reserve. It is respectfully suggested that this should be done as the information is gathered.

Thanking you in anticipation, believe me, sir,

Yours very truly,
W. Bethune Lindsay.

London,

Report Respecting Experimental Plant for Treatment of Bituminous Sands and Refining of Oils Erected and Operated under the Direction of General W. B. Lindsay at Landarcy, Near Swansea, South Wales.

This Plant was visited by Dr. Charles Camsell, deputy Minister of Mines, in September 1922, and again in October 1923, and reports were submitted thereon to the minister on September 28, 1922, and November 1923.

Pursuant to the request that a further report be made in the matter as to the progress that had been made in these investigations since Dr. Camsell's visit to Swansea in October 1923 the undersigned met General Lindsay in London on two occasions September 4th and October 1st and in addition visited the experimental plant at Landarcy near Swansea, South Wales, on Thursday, September 24th, 1925, in company with Mr. Herbert W. Wagner, who had been Technical Engineer in charge of operations under General Lindsay.

The experimental work on the refining of persian crude oil referred to by Dr. Camsell in his report dated November 30, 1923, was continued till June 1924, at which time, owing to the exhaustion of available funds, experimental operation of the plant ceased, and has not since been resumed. It may be inferred from the mass of detailed records of the experimental work done, that good progress had been made in improving the plant operation and in gradually securing better and better results in respect to the refined products secured; though for final demonstration it appeared desirable to try some further additions to the plant which, while simple in principle, would be quite expensive to install.

Unfortunately General Lindsay and his associates have been having difficulty in securing United States patents, and the delay in securing these, it is claimed, is militating against the immediate securing of further capital for experimental work.

In the meantime Mr. Herbert W. Wagner is undertaking some small scale laboratory investigations at Cardiff on the oils actually derived from the bituminous sands, a small portion of the 40 tons of bituminous sand originally sent to Swansea having been transferred to Cardiff for that purpose. This work had been in progress a few months only at the time of my visit.

In reviewing the work that has been done by General Lindsay to demonstrate the Cafftoo process and its applicability to the treatment of Alberta bituminous sands, the following appear to the undersigned as being important points:—

1. The experimental plant at Landarcy which is on the property of the Anglo-Persian oil company, is on a substantial scale requiring a throughput of from 150 to 300 barrels of oil per day for its operation.

2. No actual tests of bituminous sands have been made in this plant for the reason that it would be impractical to supply a sufficient quantity of the sand for that purpose. The quantity of 40 tons supplied for experimental use would be used up in a few hours, and would not supply a sufficient quantity of oil for practical test in the plant.

3. General Lindsay is strongly of the opinion that if he can successfully demonstrate the application of the Cafftoo process to the refining of such oils as persian crude, he will have comparatively little difficulty in adapting the process to the treatment of the bituminous sands. On this latter assumption I am not prepared to offer an opinion.

4. Assuming the successful demonstration of the Cafftoo process for the treatment of persian crude oil, another experimental plant would require to be constructed at a point convenient to an adequate supply of bituminous sand in order that a full demonstration could be made in respect to the treatment of such sands.

5. Prior to June 1924, a very large amount of money—the evidence in respect to which is, I believe, already on file with the interior department—has been expended in the effort to solve the problem of the treatment of the tar sands.

6. Actual experimental work at Landarcy ceased in June 1924.

7. General Lindsay is endeavouring to enlist further capital in the project, but is being delayed through difficulty in securing U.S. patents

Respectfully submitted,

Director: Mines Branch.

INVENTIONS BOARD

Mr. HANSELL:

1. Is there an inventions board or committee within the government of Canada? If so, what are the names of the members, and who is the chairman?

2. How many inventions or suggestions have been made to this board since the commencement of the war?

3. How many have been accepted as useful and are at the present time being put to use?

4. When inventions or suggestions are received by the board, what is the procedure in dealing with them?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

1. Yes. There is an inventions board composed of the president, national research council, chairman; a deputy minister of national defence (army); the deputy minister of national defence (air); the deputy minister for naval services; and Mr. Lesslie R. Thomson of the Department of Munitions and Supply who is secretary of the board.

2. 13,548.

3. Precise numbers are not available. About four-fifths of the proposals received deal with ideas which have been previously considered by the board or that are of slight technical interest but no military value. About ten per cent of the proposals have some evident merit which warrants reference being made to military consultants. Data as to the number of these actually put into use cannot be released.

4. All inventions and suggestions received by the board go in the first instance to one of four sub-committees of the board. These primary committees are the civilian consulting committee, the army consulting committee, the naval consulting committee, and the air force consulting committee. The duties of these sub-committees are to receive and to screen all suggestions and inventions received from the sources which their respective names indicate. Upon receipt of any suggestion or invention an acknowledgment is immediately sent to the inventor to thank him. The suggestion or invention is then referred to the appropriate technical consultants within either the armed services or the national research council. Occasionally other consultants are used. Upon receipt of the technical consultants' reports, a letter is then sent to the inventor setting out the essence of what has been ascertained. If the suggestion has been appraised as of no value, the author is so informed. If the suggestion is useful but refers only to administrative improvements and the like within any one of the services, the consulting committee of that service deals finally with the suggestion. If, on the other hand, the proposal has been appraised as useful in itself but of no particular value to the war effort, permission is likely to be given by the inventions board to the inventor to exploit the particular invention to his own advantage. If the invention or suggestion is believed to be of value to the war effort, the matter is then referred to the board's main examining committee which meets monthly, and makes recommendations to the board regarding patent application, further development work, or other courses of action.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—LEASE OF PROPERTY TO ALPHONSE LEDOUX

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. Have the Canadian National Railways leased to one Alphonse Ledoux a property in the Oka district, county of Two Mountains, province of Quebec?

2. If so, what is the amount of annual rent paid by Ledoux?

3. Does Alphonse Ledoux perform any duties or work for the Canadian National Railways?

4. If so, does he come within the jurisdiction of the local administration office at Montreal or that of Toronto?

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. Yes.

2. This concerns a detail of railway administration which is not of public interest.

3. Yes.

4. Reports to regional right of way agent, Toronto.

PRICE CEILING—GRAPEFRUIT JUICE

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. Did the wartime prices and trade board authorize the importation during the past fiscal year of grapefruit juice and secure release of American exchange for payment of same?

2. What amount of subsidy was paid in order to keep the selling price under the ceiling which had been set for this product?

3. Was the purchase and importation of the grapefruit juice made by the board, or by private interests under permit of the board?

4. If by private interests, what person, firm or firms, received the authority to import, and to whom was the subsidy paid, and how much to each person or firm?

Mr. ABBOTT: Importations of grapefruit juice were declared ineligible for subsidy consideration as of May 11, 1942. As the price of grapefruit juice has increased sharply in the United States since the inception of the price ceiling, importation by private concerns for sale at domestic ceiling prices is virtually impossible.

However, under the authority of a minute of the wartime prices and trade board, dated June 16, 1942, the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation Limited bulk purchased grapefruit juice to meet the requirements of the Department of Munitions and Supply, and a further minute of the board, dated August 25, 1942, authorized the corporation to purchase a specified quantity for the Canadian Red Cross Society. Sales to these purchasers are at cost, therefore no trading loss is incurred.

In the fall of 1943, due to the fact that a large percentage (38 per cent) of the 1943 pack of tomato juice was to be retained for priority claimants, and there was an anticipated shortage of tomato juice for civilian users, it appeared advisable to make available a supply of grapefruit juice.

There had been, in the United States, a release of 2,700,000 cases of 1942 pack for civilian use, together with an additional supply of approximately 3,000,000 cases of 1943 pack over and above the 1942 pack. This increased the availability of the commodity, and on November 9, 1943, wartime prices and trade board authorized Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation Ltd., to bulk purchase for resale, grapefruit juice for civilian consumption in Canada.

In order that grapefruit juice may be sold in compliance with the maximum prices regulations, the corporations selling prices are necessarily below cost. On total purchases of some 700,000 cases the trading loss is expected to be approximately $1 per case, but it is felt that the nutritional value and high Vitamin C content, so necessary to the Canadian diet, justify the cost to the government.

The corporations purchases are distributed through the normal trade channels on the basis of the importers' 1941-42 average purchases. Shipments are made against the allocations of the administrator of imported grocery items of the wartime prices and trade board, who has completed arrangements with the Food brokers association for equitable distribution throughout Canada. For the corporations actual selling prices to the first distributor, reference may be made to administrator's order A-1073. In the case of U.S. grapefruit juice, prices are f.o.b. U.S. shipping point, actual importation being completed by the first distributor. In the case of Trinidad grapefruit juice, prices are on a delivered basis at central distributing points in the maritime provinces.

WARTIME PRICES AND TRADE BOARD—NORTH BAY AND SUDBURY

RADIO TUBE SHORTAGE

Mr. BENCE:

What steps, if any, is the administration taking to relieve the radio tube shortage in this country?

Mr. ABBOTT: The production of radio tubes is under the Department of Munitions and Supply, therefore most of the Canadian production of tubes is necessarily absorbed by the radio and radar requirements of the armed services.

The only supply of tubes which can be made available for civilian use arises from those which can be produced over and above the requirements of the services.

The same shortage of radio tubes prevails in the United States, but through arrangements made between the war production board and the wartime prices and trade board, a normal share of the American production is being secured for Canadian users.

It is also hoped that during the last half of this current year, increased supplies will be available from the Canadian manufacturers.

OLD AGE AND BLIND PENSIONERS—LIENS OR REGISTRATION NOTICES

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. Has the practice of filing liens or registration notices against the property of old age and blind pensioners been discontinued by Prince Edward Island, Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, or Saskatchewan, since the time of the last dominion examination of the provincial pension accounts, referred to by Mr. Abbott, on page 1742 of Hansard for March 23, 1944?

2. In any of the above-noted provinces, where this practice has been discontinued, have liens or registration notices previously filed been withdrawn?

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. ABBOTT:

1. The province of Saskatchewan has recently informed the Department of Finance that it has discontinued the practice of filing caveats in cases where the net estate is less than $2,000. The department has not been notified of any change of procedure in connection with the filing of liens or registration notices against the property of old age pensioners in the provinces of Prince Edward Island, Quebec, Ontario and Manitoba.

2. The province of Saskatchewan has not stated whether caveats previously filed have been withdrawn.

NAVAL SERVICE—TRANSFER OF VOLUNTARY RATINGS TO PERMANENT FORCE

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Is there a naval monthly order, No. 3383, dealing with the transfer of volunteer ratings to the permanent force?

2. If so, does this order specify that all applicants must be of the "white race"?

3. If all applicants must be of the "white race" what racial origins would serve to disqualify Canadian citizens from making application?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City):

1. Yes.

2 and 3. Yes. In March, 1943, naval order 2653 was promulgated, repealing the provisions of article 144, Canadian naval regulations, as regards racial origin in respect of enrolment of personnel for hostilities only.

When naval order 3383 was drafted the terms of article 144, Canadian naval regulations, were used instead of the terms of naval order 2653. An amendment is now being prepared to rectify the matter.

PARK STEAMSHIP COMPANY—CARGO SHIPS

Mr. REID:

Of the seventy-five cargo ships turned over to the Park Steamship Company Limited, how many of these have been placed under manager controls, and what are the names of the various individuals or companies who are acting as manager operators, showing the number of cargo ships under each management?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

(a) Seventy-five ships made up as follows:

Tankers	15
10,000-ton cargo ships	51
4,700-ton cargo ships	9

(b) and (c)

No. of ships	Manager operators
	Tankers
2	—Shipping Limited
3	—Shell Canadian Tankers Limited
10	—Imperial Oil Limited

10,000-ton Cargo Ships

5 —Elder-Dempster Lines Limited
4 —Canadian Pacific Steamships Limited
5 —Canadian Australasian Line Limited
8 —McLean-Kennedy Limited
4 —Furness-Withy & Co., Ltd.
1 —Constantine Steamship Line Limited
6 —Canadian Transport Co. Ltd.
6 —Anglo-Canadian Shipping Co. Ltd.
2 —Empire Shipping Company Limited
2 —North Pacific Shipping Company Ltd.
1 —Furness (Pacific) Limited
3 —Cunard White Star Limited
2 —Canadian Shipping Company Ltd.
2 —Seaboard Shipping Company Ltd.

4,700-ton Cargo Ships

1 —Pickford and Black Limited
6 —Canadian National Steamships Limited
1 —Union Steamships Limited
1 —Montreal Shipping Company Limited

CORBY'S DISTILLERY—EXCISE OFFICERS

Mr. NOSEWORTHY:

1. What are the names and grades of excise officers employed by the government at Corby's distillery at the port of Belleville?

2. What were the amounts paid to them for March, 1944, for travelling allowances, and what was the actual mileage in each case on which these amounts were based?

3. What is the treasury board's ruling as to rates per mile for travelling expenses when privately-owned automobiles are used by these officers continuously in government service?

4. Does the treasury board ruling as to rates per mile in this case provide for the payment of a higher mileage rate to second officers than to junior officers?

5. Did second excise officers employed at this port receive in March a higher rate for actual miles driven than did junior officers?

6. If so, is this in accord with the treasury board ruling?

Mr. GIBSON:

1 and 2.

Name—rank	Travelling allowances March, 1944
W. J. Cook, special exciseman, grade 3, class "A"	$22 40
Frederick Cooke, customs excise examiner	18 00
G. M. Miller, special exciseman grade 1	15 60
G. A. Moon, customs excise examiner	.....
W. A. G. Pennylegion, customs excise clerk	16 20
F. W. Sprague, special exciseman, grade 2	21 60
S. A. Sword, customs excise examiner	16 20
J. M. Tufts, customs excise examiner	15 00

3. Treasury board's ruling does not apply to these officers as they are not granted an automobile allowance, but a travelling allowance to proceed from their homes to Corbyville and return each day.

4. Answered by No. 3.

5. The chief officer and his assistant are granted a higher per diem allowance than the junior officers in view of being subject to call before and after regular hours and on Sundays and holidays.

6. Answered by No. 3.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT

Mr. NEILL:

Under the Soldiers' Settlement Act of 1919:
1. How many returned soldiers were placed on land?

2. How many soldiers have completed payment and received title to their lands?

3. How many are still on their purchases but haven't yet completed payment?

4. How many purchases were abandoned or rescinded?

5. How much has the government lost under this act due to reductions made in prices of land or stock, rebates of interest and loss by land reverting to the crown, and the cost of the department having charge of this transaction? (A reasonable approximation only is required.)

Mr. CRERAR:

(As at March 31, 1944.)

1. Including 224 Indian soldier settlers, 25,017.

2. 4,130. In addition, in 1,003 cases settlers liquidated their equities by selling their lands to other persons on time sale agreements and assignments.

3. 6,153.

4. 13,731.

5. Legislative reductions by amendment to the Soldier Settlement Act (live stock reduction, interest exemption, 1922, estimated land revaluation, 30 per cent reduction, interest remission, 1933, dollar for dollar bonus, reduction of loans under P.C. 10472) ..... $ 39,388,642
Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act 7,906,161
Losses on resale reverted property 25,787,210
Estimated administration cost.... 27,000,000

$100,082,013

MOBILIZATION ACT—PERSONNEL NOT ATTESTED FOR OVERSEAS SERVICE

Mr. LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency):

1. Are the men called under the National Resources Mobilization Act who have not signed for overseas service, and who are presently stationed in Canada, now under the jurisdiction of the said act, as amended by Bill No. 80?

2. If so, since when?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax):

1. Yes.

2. Since the date the act came into operation, namely, June 21, 1940.

INTERNMENTS—ALOIS N. SCHNEIDER

Mr. BENCE:

1. Was one Alois N. Schneider interned under the defence of Canada regulations since the commencement of this war?

2. If so, on what date was he so interned?

3. Why was he so interned?

4. Was the said Alois N. Schneider subsequently released from internment? If so, on what date?

5. On whose recommendation was he so released?

6. Was the said Alois N. Schneider subsequently reinterned? If so, on what date?

7. Why was he so reinterned?

8. Is the said Alois N. Schneider still interned under the provisions of the defence of Canada regulations?

9. If not, when was he released, and upon whose recommendation?

10. Was he released upon the recommendation of a committee under the provisions of the defence of Canada regulations? If so, was the decision of the committee unanimous?

11. What change has there been in the conditions with respect to this man since the date of his reinternment which would justify his release?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. Yes.

2. 5th September, 1939.

3. Because the Minister of Justice was satisfied at that time that, with a view to preventing Schneider from acting in any manner prejudicial to the public safety or the safety of the state it was necessary so to do.

4. Yes, about 21st December, 1939.

5. Representations were made by his solicitor, an inspector of Hudson's Bay Company, the secretary of a Board of Trade, two clergymen, and others, including a petition containing 53 names from the St. Walburg district, where Schneider resided. It is not in the public interest to disclose names of persons making representations in connection with the cases of persons detained or recommended for detention under the defence of Canada regulations, it being necessary that persons supplying such information should know that it will be treated as confidential.

6. Yes, 10th June, 1940.

7. Because, owing to conditions existing at that time, the Minister of Justice was satisfied that, with a view to preventing Schneider from acting in any manner prejudicial to the public safety or the safety of the state it was necessary so to do.

8. No.

9. Shortly after February 21, 1944, on recommendation of an advisory committee after hearing at Fredericton, N.B., of this case, amongst some fifty-four others.

10. The answer to both questions is, Yes.

11. The information which was before the advisory committee must be treated as confidential, but in addition to that which concerned Alois N. Schneider himself, it was publicly known that he has two nephews in the Canadian Army overseas, and his own son, who is not old enough to join the army, is serving in the home defence force.

CATTLE AND HOGS—MANITOBA

Mr. BRYCE:

Under present regulations, can a farmer in Manitoba have his cattle and hogs killed at a licensed abattoir and government inspected, then sell to whom he wants to?

Mr. ABBOTT: Under present regulations a farmer in Manitoba may have his cattle and hogs killed for him at a government inspected abattoir (but there is no obligation on the abattoir to do such slaughtering unless it was customarily engaged in such business in the year of 1941). The resultant meat may be sold by the farmer to neighbour farmers and to household consumers, but not to anyone else, unless the farmer is the holder of a slaughtering permit issued by the wartime prices and trade board or unless his farm is located in a deficiency production area in Manitoba which is defined as follows: "All territory north of the 53rd parallel".

*SALES OF WHEAT, DOMESTIC AND EXPORT

Mr. PERLEY:

1. How much wheat, and at what price, basis No 1 northern, was sold by the Canadian wheat board for domestic purposes since 1st August, 1943, and what subsidies have been paid on same?

2. How much wheat has been sold by the Canadian wheat board under the mutual aid agreement since 1st August, 1943, (a) at what prices basis No 1 northern; (b) to what countries?

3. How much wheat has been sold by the Canadian wheat board since 1st August, 1943, and at what prices basis No 1 northern, Fort William, to, (a) United Kingdom; (b) United States; (c) all other countries not included in the mutual aid agreement?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, the member for Qu'Appelle is undoubtedly aware that the Canadian wheat board is not required by law to make public its sales on a current basis. In any event, in disposing of wheat to the mills and shippers, the board is not necessarily advised at the time by the shippers of the ultimate destinations of the wheat. It is sufficient for the board's purposes to make sales to the shippers on the basis of a division between class I, or mutual aid and domestic wheat, and class II, or non-mutual aid wheat.

To give the member for Q'Appelle, however, some guidance in finding an approximation to the information he is seeking, I might say that the domestic sales and the official export figures of Canadian wheat and flour, together with the known prices which are paid to the board for wheat going to these various destinations, will serve in large part to answer his question. I shall be glad to make this material available later as an order for return.

MONTREAL LIGHT, HEAT AND POWER COMPANY—TAXES TO DOMINION GOVERNMENT

Mr. GAUTHIER:

1. Before its expropriation by the government of the province of Quebec, did the Montreal Light, Heat and Power owe the dominion government any taxes?

2. If so, since when, and in what amount?

Mr. GIBSON: The provisions of the Income War Tax Act prohibit the giving of the information asked for by the hon. member in this question.

CANADIAN FORCES—LEAVE AFTER LONG SERVICE

Mr. RAYMOND:

1. Is the government aware of an article published on March 14 last in the Eighth Army News as to the complaints of Canadian soldiers now in Italy who are refused applications for leave to visit their families in America after four years absence?

2. Has the government taken into consideration the complaints and applications of Canadian soldiers who have been thus serving in Europe for a long time and who are refused an application for leave to visit their families in America?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax):

1 and 2. Please refer to statement of Minister of National Defence on page 1513 of Hansard, dated Mar. 16, 1944.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

HOUSING—TORONTO—AID BY MILITARY FORCES

Mr. CHURCH:

What is being done with regard to the housing emergency existing at Toronto in the way of aid to civil power there by the military forces, (a) to provide temporarily building space there to store temporarily household goods of those suffering; (b) temporary loan of motor vehicles to move household goods in this emergency, to May 1?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): Return tabled.

RADIO BROADCASTING—NATIONAL WAR FINANCE COMMITTEE

4. Is there any rule in the Civil Service Act of Canada defining the status or classification of a person giving a fifteen-minute broadcast over the C.B.C. and under the auspices of the war finance committee and who is paid a stipend out of the public treasury for the same?

5. Is there any limitation to the amount that either of the aforementioned bodies may pay to a person for broadcasting as indicated in question 4?

6. What is the basis upon which the value or merit of a broadcast by an individual is determined?

COAL—COMMISSIONS OF INQUIRY

Mr. HANSELL:

1. How many royal commissions have been set up to investigate the subject of coal and related subjects since 1914?

2. What was the name of each commission, who was its chairman, and when was each set up?

3. What subject did each commission deal with, and when did each make its report?

4. What was the total cost of each commission?

5. Have there been any other inquiries made on coal and relative subjects by any other government-appointed bodies other than royal commissions?

6. If so, how many? What was the subject, and when was each report made?

CUSTODIAN OF ENEMY PROPERTY—GERMAN AND JAPANESE COMPANIES

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. Have any amounts of money been received by the custodian of enemy property from the Bayer Company of Canada, Limited, and placed to the credit of the I. G. Farben Corporation and Farbenfabriken Vorm Fried Bayer and Company of Germany, since the outbreak of the present war? If so, what is the total?

2. Have any other sums of money been received by the custodian of enemy property and placed to the credit of the above companies during the same period? If so, in what amounts, and from what companies in Canada, or from what sources have such other sums been received?

3. Have any other German companies had amounts placed to their credit by the custodian of enemy property since the outbreak of the present war? If so, what is the total amount in each case?

4. Have any Japanese companies had amounts placed to their credit by the custodian of enemy property since December 7, 1941? If so, what companies, and what is the total amount in each case?

5. Is any interest being paid on or added to amounts placed to the credit of German or Japanese companies by the custodian of enemy property?

6. Where and how are these funds held?

7. Has the government taken any steps to obtain profits made in Canada by German or Japanese companies since the outbreak of the present war?

Mr. McLARTY: Return tabled.

SYDNEY AND LOUISBURG RAILWAY—SUBSIDIES OR OTHER ASSISTANCE

Mr. GILLIS:

1. How much money was paid to the Sydney and Louisburg Railway for the years 1942-43 by way of subsidy or other assistance?

2. How much money was paid them under the Maritime Freight Rates Act?

POTATOES

Mr. ROWE:

1. Are potatoes being imported into Canada at the present time?

2. What is the present duty on imported potatoes?

3. What is the present stock of Canadian potatoes still available?

4. What is the retail price of, (a) new imported potatoes; (b) old crop Canadian potatoes?

DAIRY PRODUCTS—PRODUCTION SUBSIDIES

Mr. GAUTHIER:

What amount has been paid by the dominion government to farmers of each of the provinces of Canada, since 1939, in subsidies for the production of, (a) butter; (b) cheese; (c) milk?

CANADIAN FORCES—CIGARETTES

Mr. O'BRIEN:

1. What system exists to make cigarettes available to the Canadian forces overseas?

2. Are Canadian brands of cigarettes plentifully available for all units and at unit canteens?

3. What arrangements exist to provide cigarettes for soldiers, airmen and sailors whilst away from units on leave or furlough overseas?

[Mr. Knowles.]

4. Do such arrangements prevail at the Beaver club and similar service organizations?

5. What prices are charged for Canadian cigarettes of standard brands at unit canteens and elsewhere for purchase by our Canadian armed service personnel during leave overseas?

PUBLIC SERVICE—HOSPITALIZATION OR MEDICAL CARE WHILE IN OTHER COUNTRIES

Mr. MacKENZIE (Neepawa):

1. During the past fiscal year, was hospitalization or medical care, or both, paid by the government for Canadian civil servants or employees injured or taken ill while serving in or passing through a foreign country?

2. If so, how many, and in what departments of government?

3. Was payment for medical care or hospitalization refused in certain cases? If so, why?

ALDERSHOT CAMP—DESTRUCTION OF BUILDINGS BY FIRE IN 1940

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. Were certain buildings at Aldershot camp, Kentville, Nova Scotia, destroyed by fire on or about the 25th day of December, 1940?

2. If so, how many buildings were destroyed, and what was the value?

3. What other property was destroyed, and what was the estimated value?

4. Have any claims for damages been submitted on behalf of officers or other occupants of buildings, stating the total value of such claims and the amounts allowed for reimbursement?

5. Were any tools and personal effects destroyed in such fire which were owned or being used by civilian carpenters or workmen employed by the Department of National Defence or by contractors on construction work, and what was the estimated value?

6. What moneys were appropriated for payment of such losses, and to whom were such moneys advanced or paid?

7. What are the number and amount of additional claims?

8. How did the fire originate?

EXTERNAL TRADE

INQUIRY AS TO CONSTITUTION OF ADVISORY INTERDEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I have a question I desire to direct to the acting leader of the government. I understand that a committee representing various departments of government has been constituted to deal with Canadian trade arrangements. If such a committee has been set up by the government, by what name will it be designated, what will be its functions, who will be its chairman and who will comprise its personnel?

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): May I be permitted to answer the question? On April 27 last there was adopted on the recommendation of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie King) an order in council setting up an interdepartmental committee which will be known as the external trade advisory committee. It was represented that the war has reached a stage at which prompt decisions have to be reached on many questions of export and import trade policy which concern several departments and agencies of government, particularly in relation to their effect upon the volume of supplies available for Canadian civilian or military use, or for alternative urgent external requirements, including relief and rehabilitation. It was thought desirable that an agency should be established for prompt consultation between departments and other agencies of government on such matters.

The membership of the committee is to consist of persons to be nominated as follows: One member by the Secretary of State for External Affairs; one member by the Minister of Trade and Commerce; one member by the Minister of Munitions and Supply, to represent the Department of Munitions and Supply; one member by the chairman of the mutual aid board, to represent the administration of that board; one member by the Minister of Finance to represent the Department of Finance; one member by the Minister of Finance to represent the wartime prices and trade board, and a third member by the Minister of Finance, to represent the foreign exchange control board; one member by the Minister of National Revenue, and one member by the Minister of Agriculture.

The functions of this committee are: (a) to serve as a medium for consultation between departments and agencies of government on questions concerning export and import trade; (b) to make recommendations and reports to ministers, departments or agencies of the government on matters relating to wartime export and import trade, or to trade during the period of transition to peace; (c) in appropriate cases to refer questions bearing upon import or export trade to other interdepartmental committees or boards for consideration; (d) to investigate matters concerning export or import trade in war time or in the period of transition to peace, and to obtain information thereon from departments and agencies of the government; (e) without restricting the generality of the foregoing, to investigate, consider and make recommendations concerning the supplying by Canada of goods and services for relief and rehabilitation purposes.

The members of the committee have been appointed. I shall lay on the table a copy of the order in council, which is being published in the publication containing such orders in council; and annexed to it is a list of the persons appointed to the committee and of alternates to act in their absence.

The committee had a meeting on the second instant, and Mr. Sydney Pierce was chosen by the members of the committee as their chairman. Mr. Pierce is the director general of the Washington office of munitions and supply, on loan to the Department of External Affairs; he was chosen by the Secretary of State for External Affairs to represent that department on the committee. The list of members of the committee and their alternates is quite long, and if I may be permitted to do so I shall table the list together with a copy of the order in council.

Mr. POULIOT: Pierce is a puppet prime minister.

Mr. GRAYDON: Was my hon. friend going to ask a question?

Mr. POULIOT: No; I just said Pierce was a puppet prime minister.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am quite sure my hon. friend will not expect me to comment on that statement, but I should like to ask the Minister of Justice if it is proposed that in due course this committee shall report to parliament.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No; it is an interdepartmental committee which has no executive function whatever. It is set up for the purpose of having one committee where the repercussions on the affairs of other departments of decisions which might be taken in connection with exports may be considered and brought to the attention of such other departments before such decisions are reached and carried out. The committee itself makes no decisions; it will afford a forum where the effect of a project to export a certain quantity of a certain commodity may be considered in regard to the requirements of other departments and brought to the attention of the appropriate ministers before any decision is arrived at and carried into effect.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

DISPUTE AT THE PLANT OF FORD MOTOR COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Minister of Labour to give the house the present position of the labour dispute in the plant of the Ford Motor Company of Canada Limited at Windsor, and also to indicate the steps the government is taking to ensure a settlement of this dispute in order that war production may be resumed.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The leader of the opposition was good enough to give me notice of this question, and I should like to make the following statement. The Ford Motor Company of Canada Limited, Windsor, Ontario, had contractual relations with local No. 200 of the United Automobile Workers of America. The two parties signed an agreement in December, 1942, and renewed it with some slight changes, in January, 1944. Under this agreement provision was made for a procedure whereby stewards would handle and investigate grievances. This procedure specified that stewards might leave their regular duties for a reasonable length of time, subject to the approval of their foremen and subject also to a maximum absence from their regular duties of two hours per working day and not more than three hours in any two consecutive working days. However, if the foreman was of the opinion that more than a reasonable period of time had been taken by a steward he could decline to approve payment to the steward for such excess time.

It was the contention of the union that a practice had arisen over the last two years under which stewards serviced grievances without any of these restrictions and because the company decided to adhere to the written terms of the contract representations were made to the wartime labour relations board, that is the national board, for an interpretation or clarification of the grievance procedure in the light of the current practice. The board had arranged to hear the parties on April 25, but in the meantime the company issued misconduct slips to stewards who were considered to be violating the terms of the agreement. Later four stewards were suspended for six days, and this culminated in a stoppage of work on April 20. There was a clause in the agreement which provided that if a strike occurred the agreement could be terminated immediately, and pursuant to this provision immediately the stoppage took place the company served notice on the union that it considered the agreement at an end.

The wartime labour relations board (national) invited representatives of the company and the union to Ottawa, and for four days last week made an effort to conciliate the dispute. On Saturday the company and the union accepted a proposal drafted by the board. It was an important condition of the proposal that the wartime labour relations board (national) would determine the procedure applying to representation and the settlement of grievances for the period during which the parties would be in negotiation for a new contract, and that in the event of a dispute as to the interpretation or application of the provisions of the settlement or of the grievance procedure established by the board, it would be submitted to arbitration under the direction of the board.

The board submitted the grievance procedure to both parties on Monday of this week and immediately appointed one of the senior conciliating officers of the Department of Labour as an interim impartial umpire to facilitate the application of the grievance procedure and the final adjustment of disputes arising in connection therewith, his decision—and this was agreed to—to be final and binding on both parties. On Tuesday, May 2, it developed that the union objected to the grievance procedure as laid down by the board and at a mass meeting decided on a further stoppage of work which became effective at midnight of that date. According to newspaper reports the decision of the union to strike on midnight of May 2 was taken against the advice of the president of local No. 200 of the union, Mr. Roy England, and of the Canadian director of the union, Mr. George Burt. Two of the experienced officers of the department are now on the ground and are in contact with representatives of the company and the union.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

NEGOTIATIONS TO REDUCE PENSION AGE TO SIXTY-FIVE YEARS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. R. MACDONALD (Brantford City): This morning's newspapers carried a Canadian Press dispatch, and I refer to the item which appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail, with respect to old age pensions, dated at Quebec yesterday, reading as follows:

> Premier Godbout announced in the legislative assembly to-day that the provincial government had started negotiations with the federal government with a view to having the age for the start of old age pensions reduced from seventy to sixty-five.

Will the Minister of Finance advise the house as to the nature of the negotiations, that is, whether they have been by correspondence or by conference, and would he also advise as to the present position of the negotiations?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): The only representations from the government of Quebec of which I am aware are by correspondence. Last summer we had some correspondence with the provinces in regard to increasing the maximum pension payable, which is $25 a month; and more recently we have had considerable correspondence with reference to amendments to other regulations. In the course of that correspondence it was stated by or on behalf of the government of Quebec that the government of that province would favour a reduction in the eligibility age from seventy to sixty-five.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am not so much interested in what the government of Quebec favours as in what this government favours. Is this government in favour of a reduction to sixty-five years of age?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is a matter of policy which will be announced in due course; the hon. gentleman is fully aware of that fact.

Mr. GRAYDON: Well, I thought "due course" might be now.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

COAL

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF ROYAL COMMISSION ANNOUNCED MARCH 21

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply of which I sent him notice a couple of days ago. On March 21, when the minister presented his estimates to the house, he announced the appointment of a royal commission to inquire into the coal industry, with the end in view of mapping out a post-war fuel policy. Mine workers across Canada are inquiring whether the personnel of that commission have been appointed. They are preparing their case, and would like to know when they might expect to meet the commission. Can the minister give them some idea as to when the commission will begin to function?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I regret to say that the members of the royal commission have not been appointed as yet. There has been some difficulty in obtaining agreement as to the personnel of the commission. However the matter is being pressed forward, and I hope to be able to make an announcement shortly. I am not sufficiently familiar with the matter to give even an approximate date at the present time.

WORLD TRADE UNION CONFERENCE

CANCELLATION OF LONDON MEETING—POSSIBILITY OF HOLDING CONFERENCE IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a further question to the Minister of Labour. An Associated Press dispatch, bearing a Philadelphia dateline of yesterday, states that Sir Walter Citrine, internationally known labour leader, has to-day called off the world trade union conference scheduled for London in June, and the dispatch further indicates that the meeting may be held in Canada. Is the minister in a position to inform the house of the date and the place in Canada of such meeting?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I read the news dispatch to which the leader of the opposition has referred. I think the answer is that pending events in Britain made it inadvisable for the proposed world trade union conference to be held as planned in London in June next.

Arrangements for the proposed conference are in the hands of Sir Walter Citrine, general secretary of the British Trades Union Congress, and it is apparent he feels the conference could be held more conveniently on this side of the Atlantic. That is particularly so in view of the fact that a number of delegates are now attending the International Labour Office conference at Philadelphia. I am sure everybody in Canada will be glad to have the conference meet here. No doubt Sir Walter Citrine will be making arrangements with the labour leaders in the dominion as to the time and place of the conference.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I suggest that the government extend to the conference an invitation on behalf of Canada?

CANADIAN ARMY

CORRESPONDENCE WITH RAILWAYS RESPECTING DRAFTEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, the other day the Minister of Labour said he would table correspondence exchanged between his department and the railways regarding draftees. Will he be good enough to do so to-day?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I will do anything that is physically possible. I am not working twenty-six hours a day, because there are only twenty-four hours in a day. I think I got a good going-over on Tuesday—if I may use the language of the street. However, my hon. friend may rest assured that as soon as physically possible the return for which he asks will be tabled.

ROYAL AIR FORCE

CRASH OF LIBERATOR BOMBER IN MONTREAL ON APRIL 25—COMPENSATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. P. HEALY (St. Ann): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence for Air. What arrangements has the government been able to make to compensate relatives of those who were killed in the aeroplane crash in Montreal? Also, what will be done for those whose homes were destroyed by fire and who, on account of the accident, are left homeless?

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of National Defence for Air).: The hon. member for St. Ann (Mr. Healy), in whose constituency this unfortunate accident occurred, was good enough to give me notice of the question, and I have prepared an answer.

As the house is aware, a Liberator aircraft en route from Montreal Airport for delivery in the United Kingdom crashed in Montreal on 25th April, 1944, resulting in the death of a number of residents as well as the aircraft's crew and injury to persons and property.

The aircraft was under the control and direction of the Royal Air Force and the question of paying compensation for the pecuniary loss suffered as the result of the crash rests with the government of the United Kingdom and not the government of Canada.

I have been asked by the United Kingdom authorities to state that this question of compensation has been given careful and sympathetic consideration by the Air Ministry of the United Kingdom and that, without going into the question of legal liability, the ministry is anxious and is prepared to deal with this question of compensation on the same basis as would be adopted in the event of a similar accident in Canada in which an aircraft of the Royal Canadian Air Force had been involved.

In order that the United Kingdom Air Ministry may have full and complete information in each case where such pecuniary loss has been suffered, so as to assist it in determining what would be fair and reasonable compensation, and to implement its desire that compensation be dealt with as I have mentioned, the Canadian government is taking immediate action whereby those persons who have suffered pecuniary loss as a result of the accident will be able to have their claims in respect of such loss appraised on a fair and reasonable basis.

The circumstances are such as to make it desirable to have the matter dealt with with the greatest expedition and the house may rest assured that this will be done and that every facility will be afforded those persons who have suffered pecuniary loss to have the same appraised on a fair and equitable basis.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE—MARKETING OF GRAIN AND MEAT PRODUCTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): Mr. Speaker as it is apparent that at least for the present the government has no intention of calling either war or civil estimates of the Department of Agriculture, and as there are serious conditions existing in connection with the marketing of both grain and meat products, matters which hon. members are anxious to have discussed immediately, will the government call the committee on agriculture at once so that these matters may be brought before it?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Acting Prime Minister): I shall take the question my hon. friend has asked into consideration, and discuss it with my colleagues. I may say that the passing of the items in agriculture would, I think, do about as much as anything to expedite the matters to which he has referred.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

RESTRICTIONS ON THE MANUFACTURE OF MEN'S CLOTHING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Munitions and Supply. As restrictions have been taken off the manufacture of men's clothing in Great Britain, will similar restrictions in Canada be lifted?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I do not think that is a proper question to be asked when the orders of the day are called. I suggest it is not within the rules of the house.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Tuesday, May 2, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

National selective service programme, $11,002,429.

Mr. POULIOT: The only way to understand the scope of the problem of national selective service is to consider it not from an electoral viewpoint, but rather to study it objectively. The question is not that of pleasing the farmer or pleasing the army, but simply that of doing what is right, not being afraid to do so, and speaking accordingly. It will be impossible to discuss the problem of selective service so long as it is engulfed in politics, so long as it serves as a political platform for the jingoes or for those who hold the opposite views. The question of man-power is one which concerns the future of this country to the utmost. It cannot be onesided; it must be well balanced. The Minister of Labour should be the regulator as between the requisitions of the army and the needs of industry; he should act as a pendulum. At no time should he be a stoker for the Department of National Defence.

It has been customary for certain club men, men who have never been in a theatre of war, men who may be graduates of military schools and possess some technical military knowledge but who have never won their spurs in a theatre of war, to say that it is a good thing to establish conscription of others for the waging of war. Conscription should be preached only by example. I deny to any one who has not been in a theatre of war, even though he has studied in a military college and may wear a uniform, the right to uphold conscription. That is one point. I concede the right to those who have been in a theatre of war to hold the wrong view, but we have the right to discuss the matter without being told that we are what we are not.

A jingo is a man who beats the drum, a man who thinks that all farmers should be in the army, that those who are not in the army are not doing their duty. They think that it is the duty of every man in good health and of military age to be in the army. That point of view is encouraged by talks sent over the C.B.C. at certain hours and it is encouraged also by the wartime information board and in a different way by the censorship regulations. News of what is said in the house is curtailed by the censors and does not reach the people who have a right to know what is being said in their defence.

Some half-truths are being uttered. When the Minister of Labour and his deputy wrote to the government of Quebec that conscription would not be applied to farmers, that was true to a certain extent. It is true to a certain extent because of the fight that has been waged for the farmers by a small group of members of parliament who have the courage of their convictions and who can speak louder than any jingo can beat a drum. But it is essential that every hon. member of the committee should know what happened. If an hon. member asks the Minister of Labour to supply him with the same information that was requested by the premier of Quebec he will be told that the farmers receive special consideration from the mobilization boards. I admit that that may be true with regard to farmers who have never been in a military camp, but as soon as a man enters a military camp it is altogether different. That is why I have been asking questions about the postponements granted by mobilization boards in connection with draftees who are farmers' sons or who have worked on farms. When farmers have been in training for a month, these boards, which act under the Minister of Labour, consider it their duty to turn down most of the applications. They act simply as rubber stamps; they do not give due consideration to those farmers who are needed on the farms.

This condition dates back a long time. At one time the treatment accorded by the Quebec board to draftees who were farmers—and the same was true of other places—was rotten; it was an abomination. This condition was corrected to some extent, but many farmers who are indispensable are being sent to the training camps. The fact that they were farmers was not considered at all. As soon as these men received regimental numbers they were considered as belonging to the army and it was impossible for them to get back to the farm.

In how many cases have there been injustices? These people believed in the good faith of the government. They were at first told by every minister that the training would be for one month only. They did not ask for postponements, because they believed the statement that their training would be for one month only. The first training period began in November, 1940, an off season, and these men took the training believing they would be free for the rest of the year. Then they were called back for four months and finally had to stay there. They found it impossible to get leave after they were in the army.

I have a number of meritorious cases represented by the many files before me, some large and others not so large but just as deserving, covering men who have been placed in these camps under false pretences or because of the ignorance and stupidity of the members of the boards. Who suffers for this? In the first place it is the old father who cannot look after his farm alone, and it is also the country.

The jingo conception of conscription is that every able-bodied man should be in the army, without any consideration for the consequences of an unbalanced war effort. I will tell you, Mr. Chairman, how I would like things to work. In the first place there should be a campaign of information to educate the Canadian people and help them to understand what are the needs of this country. The farmer, the railway man, the miner, and all others who are working in essential industries should be rehabilitated in the minds of Canadian citizens who are not aware of the degree to which these occupations are essential to the state. That campaign can be carried on by the wartime information board and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. That would be much more useful than the pamphlets we receive and the little stories that are told over the C.B.C.

Next, the scissors of censorship must not be allowed to cut the reports of the two news agencies, the Canadian Press and the British United Press but must give an opportunity to the Canadian people to inform themselves about the work that is done for them here in this house.

Next, Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Labour should be the boss of all draftees. I do not see why the Minister of National Defence is considered as holding a job more important than that of the Minister of Labour. Undoubtedly the job of the Minister of National Defence is important, but why should he have a priority over the Minister of Labour so that his requisitions for men must be filled at the expense of the lifeblood of the nation? This I cannot understand. It is a jingo policy when the Minister of Labour has to say "yes" to all the requistions which are made upon him by the Department of National Defence. The Minister of Labour has no information about the actual needs of the Department of National Defence. He has to take the word of its minister. What is the word of the Minister of National Defence? It is the sequel to the commitments he made when in London. The Minister of National Defence went to London and said: I will send you so many divisions. He has told us himself that he sent men to Italy who were not requested by the British government. And we call that a fine gesture. But on account of that so-called fine gesture, which was probably inspired by international finance, Barclay's bank—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I know that the hon. member realizes that I wish to be very tolerant, and he has been allowed considerable latitude. We have been over three days considering this one item, and in my opinion international finance should be left out of this discussion and the hon. member should come down to earth and discuss the item before the committee.

Mr. POULIOT: Your mind is too quick, Mr. Chairman. I hope you will let me finish my argument, and then you will see that it is closely related to the item before us. However, I will leave aside international finance and all that, and say this. The Minister of National Defence has told us himself that it was not at the request of the British government that he sent our men to Sicily or Italy. But it is precisely on account of commitments of that kind made in the name of the Canadian people that the Minister of Labour is called upon to pay the bill by calling up Canadian citizens who would be better employed in the industries where they are working.

I want to say to the Minister of Labour, in all earnestness, I would like to see him in a position where he could decide these matters as a real minister in charge of man-power. I would like to see him able to say to a man who is needed in industry and wants to enlist: No, your place is not in the army, it is in the industry where you work, and you are helping the war effort best by continuing to work in that essential industry. But the Minister of Labour has not this information that he should have. How can he decide between the needs of the army and the needs of industry if he has no figures on the needs of industry and the needs of the army? He has no information on those needs. He receives a requisition from the Department of National Defence for ten thousand or one hundred thousand men. It is a requisition in bulk. But does the Minister of Labour know to what extent he will deprive industry of man-power which is urgently needed in industry if he fills the requisition of the Department of National Defence? He cannot know because he has not the figures. Very often I have made a test. I have asked the Department of Labour for figures that should be on the desk of the Minister of Labour and his deputy, and it was not possible for me to get those figures. It was not because they were secret. Those figures should have been there. It is essential for the Minister of Labour to have them if he is to know what is the man-power reserve, if any, in this country.

There are other jingoes who sing the same song all the time—we must get reinforcements for our troops overseas—we must have so many divisions—we must have so many recruits, so many men for reinforcements, and so on. It is very easy to say: Just disband one division and then you will have reinforcements sufficient for the others, for the time being. How can the Minister of Labour decide between the needs of the lumber industry, for instance, and the needs of the army? I say that in all earnestness and in the best possible spirit of friendship for the minister, who has my full sympathy. I think his job is an intolerable one. He is not the boss. He is like the office boy of the Minister of National Defence or a clerk of the minister. The Minister of National Defence tells him: We need ten thousand or one hundred thousand men. Then the Minister of Labour writes to the various boards and tells them: The army needs so many men, and we must get them. But what does the Minister of Labour know about the actual needs of the lumber industry or about the needs of the farmers, for example?

What is the difference? It comes back to what I said a moment ago. On the one hand there is a requisition from the Department of National Defence for a definite number of men. But agriculture is different. The farmers are scattered all over the land, and it is impossible for them all to reach the Minister of Labour and tell him of their needs of man-power as easily as his colleague the Minister of National Defence can. What farmer in any province sits in council with the Minister of Labour and has the opportunity to speak to him every day, as often as he wishes every day, as the Minister of National Defence has? The Minister of Labour is in an impossible position. That is why I said to the Minister of Labour the other day that he deserves the consideration and help of his colleagues—for what? For reform. We must make it easier for the Minister of Labour to do the things he should do. He should be the minister of man-power, with full authority over draftees, whether they are in uniform or not, provided they have not volunteered. He should be in a position to answer back when the Minister of National Defence makes an exorbitant demand upon him for men. Would it not be for the good of the nation were he to tell the Minister of National Defence: "Please keep quiet and I will see to it, and after I have examined the situation carefully I will tell you whether I can give you the men or not"? He should not be bound to say "yes" to all the requests he receives from the Minister of National Defence; if he does, the future of this country will be unbalanced. It is simple to say these things, and it is precisely because these things are so simple that it is so hard to get them accepted.

What happens? We write to the Department of National Defence regarding the case of a farmer who is needed on the land, and what does that department answer? The answer is that the mobilization board has not granted the application of the father to have his son back with him on the farm, and the blame is put by the army on the mobilization board, which is under the Minister of Labour. That is ingratitude. The mobilization boards cater to the army and then get the cold shoulder as a reward. That is the way it is done. In most cases it is useless to bring before the mobilization board, which is under the Minister of Labour, the cases of soldiers who have already had some training and who are in the army now. It is a most difficult thing.

I will tell the minister more than that. There are some intriguers on the board, not all of them, but some of them who want advancement and who try to intrigue to place people in the army at the expense of justice, at the expense of the right application of the regulations. That is the way it is done, and I could tell him a sad story. But my idea was to try to bring the committee back to fundamentals, back to a basis of discussion which would be different from what has been heard before in certain quarters, a basis of discussion that would satisfy the minds of the people of any province in Canada, even if they do not all agree with it. That is my view.

I have spoken of the farmers. They enjoy a certain consideration because they are numerous and because in many counties the election is decided by the vote of the farmers. If I believed the farmers' sons did not deserve postponement from training or leave from the army I would never advocate their cause, but I do so because I believe they do not receive fair treatment, to which they are entitled, and they are led into error by the false statement that conscription does not apply to them. We have conscription in this country; undoubtedly so. The sons of farmers of military age who are on the farms now have not had any training; ninety-nine per cent of those who have had training for a month or two have been kept in the army. That is the difference, and to be honest with the people, to be honest with the leading citizens of any province, this is what should be said to them if they inquire for information.

And now with regard to the railway business, I shall have a lot to say later on. But there is a distinction also between draftees and volunteers. The other day the Minister of National Defence was non-committal regarding what had been said by Major General Pearkes in British Columbia. Here however I have a statement made by Brigadier Macklin in Vernon, according to a Canadian press dispatch of April 7. He blamed recruits for refusing to enlist in the active army when he spoke in favour of the sixth victory loan, and he did not give them an opportunity to walk in parade on the occasion of the loan, those who had not been willing to sign for overseas. That is a great humiliation to put on the men, because they were acting in accordance with the law. There is nothing that forces them to go overseas unless conscription for overseas is established now, and the only thing that is needed to send these men there is a stroke of the minister's pen, and he knows that very well.

What I regret very much is the fact that it is impossible to discuss these matters without being called personal or being told that we are wasting the time of the house. It is most unfortunate that we have reached the time when legitimate criticism is considered a personal insult by certain members of the cabinet. It is not a matter of personal pride; it is a question of the good of the country. Is it better to continue saying that all men of military age should be in the army, notwithstanding the needs of industry? If the majority of the house takes that view I will say nothing further about it in this chamber, though I will do so outside. On the other hand, if it is regarded as being for the good of the nation that the Minister of Labour should be the boss and should have the right to decide what shall be done by young men who are draftees, whether they should be in the army or not, that is another point that deserves the best consideration.

There should be only one boss. The Minister of Labour should no longer be the office boy of the Minister of National Defence. That is my point and I hope it will be well understood. I referred a moment ago to the differences between the mass requisitions that he gets from the Department of National Defence and the single applications that he receives from farmers with respect to their sons. How could the minister know the need of the farms in all Canada every week if the boards do not report to him the number of requisitions that have been received and how they have been dealt with? Even then there is no organization to inform the minister about the needs of the farmers. The only thing that is done is by members of parliament who voice the protests of the farmers in this committee. I hope that all this will be taken into consideration. I am very anxious to see the reaction to a little bit of reflection and thought not only from the Minister of Labour but from all his colleagues as well in order to correct a situation that is going from bad to worse.

Mr. CHURCH: I do not wish to add to the difficulty of the minister and his deputies in their calculations. I wish to point out what I mentioned in the house before the present minister and his deputies were in the position they occupy to-day. When the war started in 1939 we were not ready for it. I am not very much interested in the battle of wits on mathematics that has been going on. I am interested in reading the various reports and records galore of counts made on man-power in this war. It is now getting near to Woodbine time. We are in a man-power pool that is nearly as bad as the Woodbine pool. The battle of wits has been going on. Let us get down to the facts. When war broke out we had the old system of records in the three forces. Each of the forces was running its own department, so to speak. We then came along to the time when the Minister of Agriculture was the head of the national resources department and a card system of registration was established. It took months and months to count up the results of that registration. Finally, they were all counted. What was the result? The count was carried on the way the census returns are dealt with, and it took nearly a year to get the returns. I admit it is a difficult task that the minister has undertaken and it is rather difficult to straighten it out. I sympathize with him in that respect. When the war broke out in 1939 I was asked by three or four municipalities if I could do something for them in this committe and that is the only matter I wish to raise to-day. I was asked to see if there could be some change made in the system of recording man-power. The records system was a relic of the South African war. When a man enlists he signs attestation papers. The system was just copied from the one used by the mother country in the other war. They have a similar system in Washington.

We have had numerous counts, and it has been a run-around, a merry-go-round, since the war started. It is not the fault of the present minister. He is the victim of the system. Where are these returns? I received five or six returns under the first system, the registration card affair. I received returns showing that so far as the records go they could not tell how many men enlisted from Toronto, St. Catharines or the minister's own riding of Welland. There was no place where we could get the figures. This is a changing war, Mr. Chairman. Do not forget that. The war is changing from week to week, from month to month, and from year to year. What was the result? They added certain formations. The artillery was in Winnipeg and Petawawa; the infantry were parcelled all over Canada. Then, there were different branches of the air force all over the country, with the result that the municipalities got all twisted up. You could not tell how many men came from Lake Centre; you could not tell how many men came from Orangeville, the riding of South Simcoe; the minister could not tell how many came from St. Catharines, or any centres like that. What became of all these figures on the three counts that were made? My point is this: in the victory loan campaigns they have a system whereby they can tell to-morrow the amount of money collected all over Canada to-day. It is a very good mathematical system yet we cannot do it in man-power. I do not know how they do it in the victory loan, but it is being done.

An attempt was made to enforce the registration card system. Officers in Toronto would walk along the street and ask you to show your card. The municipalities are helping the minister and his deputies. I have seen it happen at public meetings in the city of Toronto. Under the administration of the present deputy the police walk into a hockey match—I have not attended a professional hockey match since the war started—and ask some spectators for their registration cards. I read in the papers that the Toronto police are going all over the city requesting individuals to show their cards. They are trying to help the minister in his work.

Under the first system you had your registration card. I fail to see how that helped at all. There were returns made to orders of the house of prosecutions all over Canada for failure to register. They show a total of 150. Of that number 97 were in the city of Toronto and the remainder were in the military districts all over the country. The military districts have been changed. Take No. 10, Winnipeg; a large portion of that includes your constituency, Mr. Chairman, and part of northwest Ontario. Take No. 3, Kingston. That district includes the city of Ottawa. You find the same condition all across Canada. You find city of Toronto soldiers all over Canada in the air force. When I asked for a return in the house they could not tell me the number of men from Toronto who enlisted in the air force. The present Minister of National Defence for Air gave a return for the city of Ottawa. One was given for the city of Toronto but it did not go very far. One or two municipalities wrote me about it. I brought it up in 1940 and 1941.

Then we had the 1941 census, the national registration, and the plebiscite. What has happened to the returns in these cases? Are they all counted? They ought to be. Are they shown in the returns? So far as I can see, those returns might have been invaluabie to the armed forces, but they were not used and we have now this system. Some use might have been made of them if they were available. We then have the unemployment insurance and the insurance books. Then you have the Canada Year Book which gives the results of the last war and last census. Then we have Mr. Lash on the radio. He was engaged on the radio to show that Ontario was falling down in recruiting as compared with Quebec. I have the greatest respect for all provinces. I have never raised the question of the differences between provinces in this committee. I believe in the principle of the old Cornish battle-cry, "all for each and each for all."

May I refer to table 7, which was printed in Hansard? Regardless of what appears in that table in my opinion a battle royal has been going on here. The number missing, 300,000, has been referred to, and has been going up and down. It puts me in mind of the lost tribes of the children of Israel. We started census-taking away back in 1871 and it has been continued from that day on. The Canadian people are not mathematically minded. We have never been able to count the total number of people in this country, or where they came from. I know in one census half of one of the districts that I formerly represented in this house was left out altogether. Mistakes like that are made in counts all the time.

My comment is not against the present minister's department. I am trying to justify the necessity of utilizing all the money that has been spent on the census, registration cards, by the wartime prices and trade board, the plebisicite, and all other bodies, and coordinate it all to give Canadians the real facts. We should harmonize all the different counts and checks that have been made on man-power in this country since the war started. Where is all this information, and why is it not used? I was in the house before this department was created. I have raised the point before. I believe that each municipality should be entitled to know how many soldiers went to the front from that municipality. Men of the city from which I come have enlisted as far away as Vancouver and Victoria, and the city gets no credit for it. It does not want any credit, of course, except for helping to win the war. This is not a political matter; far from it. I have never tried to obtain any political advantage from it; I think that is a very poor argument at the present time, because as far as I can see the officials are doing their best along the lines I have suggested. But we are back to conditions similar to those of 1066, when the Domesday book was drawn up, in the time of William the Conqueror. They counted the number of doctors, the number of workers, artisans, pigs, and all the rest of it, and put them down in that book. Now, in the fifth year of this war, all this money has been spent and we are not getting the results we should. We had several gentlemen use the radio in order further to becloud the situation, and others have done the same thing. I have read Hansard for the last few days, and this present debate reminds me of the battle of Dundee. I am not very good in the Scottish language, but according to the history books some say we won, some say they won and some say nobody won.

Surely there could be no objection to giving the figures of enlistments by provinces, by religions and all that sort of thing. It is done in the United States and in England and it is done here in connection with enlistments. When a man signs his attestation paper he says whether he is a Baptist, a Presbyterian, a member of the United Church or whatever he may be. The heads of some of these bodies have written me in this connection. As far as table 7 goes. I believe something should be done to harmonize that table with the various figures obtained through the registrations, the monthly pamphlets, the plebiscite, and so on. It may take a long time to do that. Only two or three years ago the present acting Prime Minister said he was changing the system followed in the records office in order to be able to give some of this information. When the war is over, each municipality will have to know how many enlisted from it in order that it may help the government in the post-war problems. I have had many municipalities of the province from which I come write me in connection with this matter, saying that from the records they cannot tell where their men are scattered, what has become of them or anything else.

Mr. ROSE: The estimates now before the committee are among the most important to be considered by this house, because whatever the Labour department does affects the morale of a large section of the population of Canada. It also affects the relationship betweeen various classes in the country, and the whole structure of national unity necessary both for victory and for a stable post-war period. Unfortunately I find that labour problems have been rather sidetracked in favour of a discussion of missing people, and the press have taken up this matter and made it a key problem. This house has become practically a missing persons bureau, with people wanting to find out exactly how many have not reported for military service. It has become a battle over figures. I hold no brief for men who do not report for army service, but I rather detect an attempt to slur the province of Quebec in this connection, and I say that is unworthy. Whom should we blame for the fact that certain people do not report? All parties in the past have carried on an agitation in Quebec, stating that our young men would not have to go to war.

Mr. LALONDE: They never said they should not go to war.

Mr. ROSE: No; that they would not have to go.

Mr. LALONDE: Speak for yourself, then.

Mr. ROSE: It is true just the same. The hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay some time ago quoted extensively from the press of Quebec to prove that the anti-war agitation in that province had been carried on by all parties. I agree with that.

I noticed that apparently very few hon. members of this house took any notice of the figures in regard to the number of men in the province of Quebec who are not fit for military service. I believe that is something about which we should think. In the city of Montreal only thirty per cent of the men were in category A, while in Toronto the figure was 49·6 per cent. In Kingston it was 49·2 per cent, while in the city of Quebec it was 30·6 per cent. Then let us look at those in category E. In Toronto the percentage was 21·1, while in Montreal it was 30·6. I believe this is something which should interest every hon. member. What are we going to do to change that situation as far as the people of my province are concerned? It is disgraceful that such a high percentage should be unfit for military service. These figures tell a story closely connected with the problems of labour, wages and working conditions, with which I want to deal.

I should say that the lengthy report of the Minister of Labour was slightly complacent. It is true that at the present time the department has a much better name in the ranks of organized labour—and I am not speaking in an abstract sense, since I am in daily contact with people connected with the trade union movement—than it enjoyed some time ago. There has been a change for the better in the actions taken by the department and the government in regard to labour problems, and for that I want to congratulate both the government and the department; but I should say much more needs to be done in order to bring about the necessary changes. Because I want to see these changes and improvements brought about I intend to deal much more critically with the labour problem than the minister has dealt with it.

I do not know whether or not it is an accident, but the words "trade union" appear only once in the very lengthy report made by the minister. Why? Surely the trade unions have done their share in this war effort. They have shown their willingness; they have even fought to have themselves accepted as an equal partner in it. Trade unions are among the most powerful of democratic institutions. In Great Britain and the United States they are given much more recognition than they receive in this country.

At one point in his speech the minister informed the house that in December, 1943, gainfully employed persons numbered an all-time high of 4,288,000. Prior to that he told the house that in 1943, 1,944,026 placements were made by our employment service offices. In fact he quoted those figures with pride. I would say there should be more than pride; there must be something radically wrong when we have so high a turnover in one year. Out of more than 4,000,000 workers we find nearly 2,000,000 are placed in one year. Why the turnover? Why do certain people leave industry? There must be a reason. Maybe it is low wages; maybe it is working conditions; but certainly it is something for us to go into. We must find the reasons for and a solution to the problem.

The minister rightfully speaks with satisfaction about wartime labour relations regulations, and particularly P.C. 1003. I fully agree that P.C. 1003 is a great improvement on previous labour legislation; but we all must admit that it came too late. It was introduced only in the fifth year of the war. Had it come sooner perhaps we would not have had a situation in respect of which the minister had to report to the house 400 strikes and lockouts in one year, involving 218,404 workers, and causing a loss of 1,041,198 work days. I believe strikes should not take place at this critical stage of the war, and organized labour takes the same stand. But the absence of legislation in the past, and even certain deficiencies in the present legislation, added to provocation on the part of certain employers—and I wish to make clear that I do not include all employers—have forced workers to go out on strike. Certain employers still insist upon fighting trade unionism, and that fight very often leads to provocation through which workers are forced to go out on strike.

Because a labour code is so important to industrial peace, to uninterrupted production and to the post-war period, I would point to certain weaknesses in P.C. 1003. First, it is too limited in its application. In that connection I would quote the opinion of Mr. J. L. Cohen, former member of the national war labour board, and a man who, I would consider, is an authority on labour problems. This is what he says:

> It is a matter of regret, certainly surprise, that the dominion government did not legislate at least to cover all employment directly, or indirectly, connected with the war effort. Certainly their war-time constitutional authority goes that far. This is exemplified by the fact that the wage control order governs all employment whether war industry or otherwise. The constitutional authority of the federal government as to the scope or coverage of the labour relations order is as broad as, and not one bit narrower than, the jurisdiction it has already exercised in respect to wage control.

No, it is not broad enough. For instance, it does not take in one very important key industry in Quebec, namely the textile industry. In that connection the minister told us:

> The primary textile industry received special attention. An officer was loaned to the industry to survey the mills and to direct the recruiting campaign for labour.

This evidently shows that the government considers the industry an essential one—but not essential enough to be brought under P.C. 1003. It is this failure on the part of the government to put the textile industry under that order in council that makes it possible for some employers to make a football out of the very just grievances of the textile workers. Now some of the textile magnates say, "We will solve this problem in Quebec." And they will try to solve it, of course, in the same way they have solved it up to the present time, whereby the wages in the textile industry are a disgrace to the country.

Let us see what the wages are. According to a bulletin from the Department of Trade and Commerce, males operating in cotton yarn and cloth earn $17.62 a week in Quebec, and those in Ontario earn $21.61. Females in Quebec earn $12.06 a week, and in Ontario they earn $15.44. I would say there is no justification for such differential—no justification at all. French-Canadians work in textile plants in Montreal, while other French-

Canadians work in similar plants at Cornwall. Why should those employed in the Quebec plants receive less than those employed in Ontario?

We are told, of course, that wages have to be low, because of competition. I have before me a report in the Montreal Gazette of a speech delivered by Mr. E. C. Fox, President of Canadian Cottons Limited, on March 8, 1944, in which he says:

> If Canada is going to have a high standard of living, then she cannot expect her manufacturing industries to compete on level terms with countries of lower living standards.

By that he means that wages have to be kept very low if we are to be able to compete. That sort of attitude has to be changed. It is the kind of attitude which is not going to bring us a prosperous post-war period.

Then, what about competition from the United States? Before preparing my notes I had before me a file showing wages paid in textile mills at New Bedford, Massachusetts. There are many French Canadians down there, people who left their own province because they could get much more in wages than they could get here. They had a forty-hour week—although recently there has been a change to a forty-eight hour week. However they receive overtime for anything over the forty hours.

What other competition are we looking to? What about the far east—Japan? Oh, no; the world in the post-war period must never return to coolie wages. That is no reason for lower wages in Quebec. Not only are the wages low in the textile industry in our province, but an examination of the 1941 census showing average earnings in Quebec and Ontario for wage earners showed the following:

	Average male income	Average female income
Quebec	$ 922	$429
Ontario	1,119	577

The figures for Ontario are low enough, but there is no reason in the world why they should be even lower in Quebec. I found that there were 603,312 male wage earners and 211,315 female wage earners in Quebec. If they had got the same wages as were paid in Ontario our income would have been $159,000,000 higher than it was. That would have meant a lot to the people of Quebec, and had they received that money perhaps we would not have found so high a percentage of people who were unacceptable to the army. That is something to think about for the future. Many people ask: How will you increase buying power? This is one very simple way of increasing the buying power of the people.

P.C. 1003 opens the door to company unions, and the unions will not be satisfied until they feel that company unions have been banned once and for all. I have before me an article which appeared in the Financial Post in reference to P.C. 1003, and which states:

> Consistent with our democratic way of life—

It is peculiar how people can play with phrases.

> —independent employees' associations are recognized and protected under the regulations.

I do not believe company unions have anything in common with the democratic way of life. And no one can tell me or anyone who has been in the labour movement for any length of time that a company union is something which the workers cry for as a baby cries for castoria; it is something imposed upon them. P.C. 1003 permits lockouts in industries where there is no collective agreement. In the same article in the Financial Post we read:

> An employer is only restrained from locking out his employees if there is a collective agreement in force.

If there is not, he has the right to lock out his employees.

Mr. MITCHELL: You are just quoting the opinion of an individual. It is like all your other stuff—just quotations from what somebody else has said.

Mr. ROSE: I read this through, and I am sorry to have to say that I agree with quite a number of the things I find in this article.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend claims to speak as a trade unionist. I should like to tell him that this order in council has the approval of the parent bodies of the largest labour organizations in Canada. I know the hon. member intends to send this speech back home, and I hope he will forgive me for interrupting. There is a definite penalty provided in the code for the fostering of company unions or what my hon. friend refers to as company unions. The mere fact that the Financial Post says a thing does not mean that it is true. This order is being administered by a board made up equally of men nominated by labour and by employers' organizations. I do not think my hon. friend speaks for the trade union movement in this country.

Mr. ROSE: I have not considered myself as speaking for the trade union movement of this country, I am too modest for that.

Mr. MITCHELL: Any more than you spoke for the Canadian people in 1941.

Mr. ROSE: That is all right; there is no sense in getting hot under the collar about it. I congratulated the minister; I said it was an improvement on what we had before. I believe that an hon. member has the right to point out certain weaknesses. In the past we have had a long struggle for improvement and we have got improvement, but I think I have the right to point out certain weaknesses which exist. The interpretation given in the order to employees' organizations is too broad. I would say that it could include company unions.

There is the question of certification which I should like the minister to explain. Would it not be possible to arrange that in all factories where there are collective agreements there shall be automatic certification? That would avoid going through this procedure which can lead to confusion and which may be taken advantage of by certain employers. These are a few of the things I want to say about order 1003.

Then there is the problem of labour-management relations. I am afraid that here I shall have to be more critical than I have been about order 1003. The other day I received a booklet pointing out what labour-management committees have done in the United States and in Great Britain, but it could not say much about labour-management relations in Canada. We are in the fifth year of the war and there should be many labour-management committees throughout this country. We have heard a lot of talk about them, but there has been no move by the government to help organize these committees.

This affects not only production, which is important, but also lay-offs. I am not saying that lay-offs may not be necessary when changes in production are made, because they are. Because of war conditions a plant making one thing to-day may be asked to make another thing to-morrow. A shift in production must be made and a labour-management committee could discuss the problem. The workers would feel that they had been consulted and perhaps would be ready to go somewhere else if that were necessary.

Surely labour and management can get together to discuss ways and means of using their equipment for post-war production. They should be able to work out what they can produce instead of cannon and tanks. Labour people also have brains and they should have a chance to make proposals. That is why I say we should follow the example of other united nations. In Great Britain there are 4,000 committees in the metal industry alone, and they have done wonders. In the United States many committees have been set up, but we have very little of that in Canada. Something more than pamphlets is needed here. It should be the task of this committee which has been reorganized to go to town in helping in the organization of these labour-management committees.

Before sitting down I should like to say a few words to which some hon. members may take exception. I think they should be said in fairness to the people of the city of Montreal, the people of the province of Quebec and the people of all Canada. In saying what I intend to say I do not want to minimize in any way the heroic efforts of the men in the armed forces and the tough job they are doing. I refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey), who is reported on page 2455 of Hansard as follows:

> In the last three or four weeks I have seen, I frankly admit, only three Canadian cities, Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto, but what I have seen in those cities is to me as alarming as it is tragic. If I may generalize from these local observations I would say that Canada at the moment is not so much a nation motivated by a full-out war effort, but is on the other hand, it would seem, in many ways a nation enjoying the greatest prosperity in its history. These days appear to me to be as gilded and as giddy as those of 1929.

I think that is an unjust statement to make about the people of Montreal. Many people in Montreal live away from St. Catherine street and the centre of the city. Had the hon. member gone to see some of the huge war plants where men and women, young and old, work under conditions which are not the easiest; had he visited a night shift and seen men working who in some cases had not seen their families for days; had he visited a shell-filling plant or one of the acid-mixing rooms and seen people working under the most difficult of conditions; had he known how the people had subscribed to war loans, how they were living in poor homes, how they were giving their blood and doing everything they could, he would have arrived at a different conclusion.

Yes, the workers may drink a little more beer or whisky; for an extra glass of beer is appreciated by the working man after a hard day's work. But that by no means indicates prosperity. There is far from prosperity in Montreal at the present time, and I think the hon. gentleman should have lectured some of the members of his own party, especially a new recruit who had been given an honourable job under the government where as chairman of the national labour board he could have done something for labour. He was in a responsible position. But he left that job. He did not put victory first. He left the job and went into politics. We hear a lot of sermons and preaching, and the trouble is that we too often apply them to the other fellow instead of to ourselves.

I did not want to make these remarks, but I was in Montreal over the week-end and I know that quite a number of people were insulted by the remarks that were made. The workers of this country are willing to do everything to help the war effort, and with the improvements that have already been made—I said that at the beginning and I want to emphasize it—and with the further improvements that will be made in the Department of Labour as they become recognized as necessary, we the workers will make our full contribution to victory and towards solving the post-war problems.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of privilege in connection with a statement made in the house by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay as reported at page 2588 of Hansard, where he quoted a statement made by M. Paré, registrar of military district F. M. Paré's statement was as follows:

It is absolutely untrue that, in Quebec district, only 9,000 out of 460,000 "callable" men have been called up, as was alleged by Mr. John B. Diefenbaker, Progressive Conservative member for Lake Centre. In the first place, in our district, there are but 180,000 "callable" men, not 460,000.

The statement arises by reason of a misapprehension of the words that I used and their removal from the context. I never said that 460,000 "callable" men were in Quebec district F. I never said that only 9,000 men out of 460,000 "callable" men in Quebec district F were called up for service. What I did say is to be found at page 2497 of Hansard, and I feel that any misapprehension caused by failure to read the entire paragraph should now be removed. What I said was:

The number called for medical examination to January 31, 1944, was 1,449,417.

Then I paused to remark that I was not referring to call-ups for service at all but to call-ups for medical examination. I went on:

In other words, 469,942 have been called up for medical examination since June 23, 1943—

Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury): To January.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Up to the 31st of January, as the hon. member for York-Sunbury says. Here is how they called them up. They called up a total from the various military districts of the number I have given. In Quebec military district, division F, they called up 8·6 per cent of the total population, or, in that period of time, only 8,724 out of some 460,000 men.

[Mr. Rose.]

My remarks were removed from their context. The 460,000 men referred, in round figures to the 469,942 called up for medical examination throughout Canada since June 23, 1943. What I said had no reference to call-ups for military service. The call-ups referred to there were the call-ups for medical examination.

Mr. HANSELL: I should like to say a word or two about conscientious objectors; but before doing so, in view of an observation that was made the other day, may I ask the Minister of Labour one question in order that I may understand just what the regulations are? Is any difference made in the treatment of conscientious objectors who are Doukhobors and conscientious objectors who belong to other religious faiths?

Mr. MITCHELL: No.

Mr. HANSELL: I am afraid then I am seriously confused. I understood that conscientious objectors who were Doukhobors were given some little confinement in camps, sometimes in the Rocky mountains, which some members have described as a nice little holiday, but that conscientious objectors belonging to other religious beliefs were sent to other camps for some considerable time, and in fact were not released. The minister can correct me if I am wrong. In anything I have to say in this connection I do not want the minister to think I am harshly criticizing his department or his administration. I know the Labour department is one department that has perhaps a good deal of grievance because it is dealing with the public, with the working people of our country, and I appreciate the minister's difficulties and want to help him if I can. I am not going to criticize him severely.

May I say, now that I am speaking on behalf of conscientious objectors, that I am not a conscientious objector myself. I take the stand that if a country is worth living in everybody should plunge in and fight for it if the necessity arises. I have not very much sympathy with conscientious objectors. Nevertheless, I feel that someone needs to come to their rescue and present their case, because I believe they have a case. Let us analyse it for a moment.

If the principle of imprisonment and the consequent putting into work camps of conscientious objectors is adopted, it seems to me that the principle should apply to all conscientious objectors. But as a matter of fact it does not. It applies only to those who come within a certain call-up range. If they are within that age range and are called up for service and refuse to come they are prosecuted, and, if convicted, are ultimately sent to prison or to some work camp. But if one is a conscientious objector and does not come within that age group, no notice is taken of him even though he is a conscientious objector. I make that observation because I believe there is a real principle involved.

A conscientious objector is one who objects on religious grounds, and I believe that generally speaking religious people are good living people. I do not think anyone will deny that. There may be the odd one whom somebody knows something about, but generally speaking religious people with high ideals are good living people and good citizens. The conscientious objector, however, is penalized for being conscientious. There is a vital principle there. He is penalized for having certain convictions. Now one thing we need in a strong Canadian citizenship is people with strong convictions, even though they may differ in their convictions. These people are not penalized for robbing or for stealing something or because they are lawbreakers in the sense of coming under the criminal code, but they are punished—I say punished because that is what it amounts to—or penalized, simply because they have religious convictions and refuse to kill. That is true.

Therefore the principle on which the government is working with respect to conscientious objectors is wrong. The government could treat these people in a fair manner, compatible with their convictions, by giving them some work such as farming or in munitions factories or in some place where they could fit into the general war scheme, while overcoming that element which is described as conscientious objection.

It might be said that if this were done many people might claim to be conscientious objectors.

Mr. MITCHELL: We are doing what my hon. friend is suggesting.

Mr. HANSELL: I am glad to hear the minister say that. I should like him to comment a little on some correspondence I have had. If that is what the government are doing, I wonder how long these particular regulations have been in effect. Since I have taken some interest in this matter I have received reams of correspondence from one end of the country to the other. I am going to read a few of the observations contained in some of these letters. This is a little different from what the minister has informed me. This is with respect to the treatment given to dependents of these men. I am willing to table the letters or give the names of these people; I do not suppose they mind at all.

Here is a letter from a Mrs. Alphonse Vaillancourt of Timmins:

Dear sir: The reason why I am writing to you is due to the fact that my husband has lately been convicted like some of the worst criminals just because he does not want to disobey his Heavenly Father, which would mean to him eternal destruction.

There is nothing to be alarmed at in that statement. These people are religiously conscientious about what they do. The letter goes on:

It may be all right that we get a little relief, but nothing to clothe ourselves with. As it is, my husband is working very hard; he should be paid good wages, but what he gets is 50 cents a day and he has to clothe himself with that. I have experience of how much it costs for clothes to work in the bush, so that what he gets is not too much for himself. I want to remind you that we have three children and they are poorly clothed, so is myself. While he was with me he at least saw to it that we could get the principal things. Would you be kind enough to try and help him.

I do not know whether these people think I am the minister. That is one letter. Here is a letter from Mrs. Ernest Jutras of Kirkland Lake, who says that there is no allowance for herself and family, and she explains certain things her husband would not do on account of his religious beliefs. Then she goes on:

By taking such a stand toward Almighty God, he was prosecuted and sentenced to gaol after which term he was escorted to Chalk River (by an order of the court). There he works in the bush, where he receives only $15 a month to pay for his clothing and personal expenses.

At the present time I have a young baby which is five months old. Due to the lack of necessities, he has been sick for more than two months, and is now seriously ill. I have tried (but in vain) to get support from the authorities, causing me to descend to mendicancy.

You can readily realize the position that I am in. There is much seriousness attached to this, and I ask for your fair consideration and assistance.

Here is another from Mrs. McKnight of Timmins:

Because of our Christian beliefs, in this democratic country are my child and I to starve? My friends are tired of keeping me in groceries and rent, and I am unable to go out to work.

Here is another from a Mrs. Lane of London, Ontario:

I have since December been left without any means of support, due to the fact that my husband Mr. Gordon Lane has been classed by the government as a conscientious objector and sent to the Petawawa forest experimental station at Chalk River.

In the past two years I have undergone two serious operations and it is almost impossible for me to do sufficient to support my family, not to mention outstanding doctor's bills, et cetera.

Most of the ready cash I had went to buy warm clothing to outfit my husband, as none was supplied to him, and this leaves me in a rather critical position.

These are some of the letters I have received and I have no doubt the minister has received a good many more than I have. I suggest that at least when these men are picked up in what we like to regard as a Christian democracy we should not penalize their wives and children. We are penalizing them for their religion. It would not be so bad if they were troublesome criminals and lawbreakers, but I do not think they are.

I would ask the minister to give some consideration to really helping the wives and dependents of these men who are picked up. It is not enough to put that on to the Red Cross by some little agreements which have been made. The fact of the matter is that we are spending billions of dollars on the war. What would a few paltry dollars mean to help out the dependents of these conscientious objectors? The position is that these men have convictions. Generally speaking I do not find the complaint that they do not want to go to goal or do not want to be interned. As a matter of fact a man does not mind going to gaol for his honest convictions. I do not think I would care a button whether they put me in gaol or not if I had honest, Christian convictions. So far as that goes I would not care if they shot me. But the complaint and the principle involved are that the dependents of these conscientious objectors are penalized to the point of destitution and almost starvation.

I believe that the government would benefit themselves by embarking on a principle whereby they would feed and clothe adequately for the time necessary these unfortunate women and children. What would be the result? Let me put myself in their position. I would say this: "Well, my husband was put in gaol because of his religious convictions, but there is one thing I can say for the government, namely, they were certainly Christian in their attitude toward me." That would be the position I would take if I were the unfortunate wife or the dependent, if the government treated me properly. I do not believe the country would lose anything; I do not believe the government would lose anything by seeing that these people are adequately provided for.

I should like the minister to make some comment on that, but before he does, may I touch on another matter? The minister knows about the case to which I am about to refer. I wrote to him about it and he answered kindly. I refer now to the case of Dietrich Remple, a conscientious objector, who had been working for a certain farmer in my constituency in the province of Alberta. They took him away from Alberta, I suppose because his home was in Saskatchewan. He came under the Saskatchewan authorities, and the result is that while this farmer wants to employ this man he cannot do so because the man must remain either in Saskatchewan or in the camp at Seebee, or something like that. I may not have full knowledge on that part of it. Would it not satisfy all concerned if conscientious objectors were taken up, examined and perhaps put in gaol for a time—I do not know that I favour that—and if the authorities are convinced that the man, though being a conscientious objector, is still a reputable citizen, would there be anything wrong with his being able to go to the place of his choice? I know that the particular farmer to whom I referred is well pleased with this particular man's work. He says he has worked for him before. He says:

I knew he had conscientious convictions along that line, but he caused me no trouble. He was a good worker. He kept himself to himself and did not bother anybody at all.

Yet, in this case, that farmer is unable to employ the man whom he wants. I wonder if something could not be done in cases such as that? Once again may I ask the minister if he could not readjust the regulations governing these conscientious objectors so that at least their dependents are well provided for? I plead for consideration for the unfortunate women and children, who are the victims, and willing victims too, of what can be termed the conscientious convictions of men who want to do right!

Mr. MITCHELL: I wish to thank my hon. friend for the manner in which he has approached this problem of conscientious objectors. I think, as he indicated, he will agree with me that it is a difficult one. Like himself I believe people have to fight to win the war. What these people fail to remember is that if it were not for people who are prepared to fight the powers of aggression and dictatorship there could not be any conscientious objectors. They would just have to do what they were told. We would have that kind of government and my hon. friend and I would have to do what we were told. I think that is fundamental.

It must be remembered that we are dealing with one particular brand of religious people, namely, Jehovah's Witnesses. It is very difficult to deal with them. May I say this in a kindly way? Many of the letters that are received in my department are of an emotional character like the people themselves. The steps taken in dealing with conscientious objectors are comparatively simple. A man comes before the board, and if the board decides that that man is a genuine conscientious objector it is just a question of moving him into alternative service. But these people who go to gaol—and rightly so, in my judgment—will not even go to alternative service. Therefore, what we have to do is to prosecute them as we would have to do with a person who for some reason or another will not comply with the regulations governing those people who are conscientious objectors.

I do not think the condition of conscientious objectors is as bad as those letters would indicate. I think my hon. friend lives in a rural community. You can walk up and down a country road and you will find the same kind of land on each side of the road; the sun shines the same way and there is the same amount of rainfall; but here you see a good farm; the next farm may not be quite as good, and the third one may be much worse. The third farmer may be like ten per cent of the people that one meets in every walk of life.

Mr. HANSELL: All farmers are good.

Mr. MITCHELL: I know they are, but you get my point. May I say very frankly that my department treats these people, whether they be Japanese prisoners of war or conscientious objectors, in a humane way and I contradict any statement in opposition to that. With regard to the people my hon. friend speaks about, we are closing down the camps; we are moving them as far as we can into agriculture, except that we are keeping skeleton crews in certain camps for the people who will not comply with the law.

With reference to the maintenance of the wives and children of conscientious objectors I would say that they are treated just as fairly as the men in the fighting forces. Where the family is large enough there is no deduction from the monthly rate of wages. In the case of the single man any amount over $25 a month goes to the Red Cross. Where there is a family and where it is warranted no money is payable to any organization; it all goes to the dependents of the conscientious objectors concerned. In addition to that, arrangements have been made with the provinces where need is shown, as indicated—and I am not suggesting my hon. friend is not correct in his statement—to be correct, the province in which that family resides will take care of those people and we bear all the expense. The reason for doing it in that way is to decentralize it. I am a firm believer in decentralization. I think the people of Alberta know their own problems far better than I do, particularly those of a very personal nature.

The other matter mentioned by my hon. friend was the case of the man who wanted to work in Alberta but who, unfortunately, came from Saskatchewan. I am not like Solomon; I would not cut this man in two. There is a shortage of farm labour in Saskatchewan, so that that division of my department decided that the man should work in the province of his origin. That is all there is to it. I hope I have answered all my hon. friend's questions.

Mr. HANSELL: I think so, but I do feel that some further consideration could be given to the question of the maintenance of these wives and children, and I hope the minister will do his very best in this regard. Are these cases dealt with individually, on their merits?

Mr. MITCHELL: Oh, absolutely.

Mr. HANSELL: Some cases must be more deserving than others.

Mr. MITCHELL: As soon as we took over the conscientious objectors we set up special offices in all military divisions in Canada to deal with nothing else. In addition, we have a division of the Department of Labour here at headquarters which is continually in touch with these men in the field.

Mr. HANSELL: I mean with respect to the dependents.

Mr. MITCHELL: Oh, yes. We do not deal with these people en masse; we deal with them as individuals.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: How long has this arrangement with the province been in effect?

Mr. MITCHELL: Three months.

Mr. WHITE: When the Department of Labour receives a requisition from national defence for 12,000 men, we will say, to be called up, how is this number divided between the different administrative divisions across Canada? How do they decide how many are to be called from the Halifax district, how many from the Kingston district, how many from the Vancouver district and so on? Do they take into consideration the number of men who have enlisted voluntarily, the number already called up, whether it is an industrial district or a farming community, and matters of that kind?

Then I should like the minister to answer the question I asked on Monday, as to whether he would be good enough to place upon Hansard a table which would give a complete picture of the men who have been called up, to some particular date in 1944, in order that we might bring some order out of the confusion that now exists in reference to this loss of 300,000 men. I should like the minister to say whether this table could be placed upon Hansard while his estimates are before the committee, so that hon. members may have an opportunity to examine it and compare it with the various returns already brought down, and then make any further comments they may wish.

Finally I should like to ask the minister what further steps, if any, his department intends to take in order to locate the very large number of men who are missing. In his reply to the remarks of the hon. member for Lake Centre on Monday the minister outlined in a brief and sketchy way the procedure followed at present, but I think the committee is entitled to some further information as to whether the minister intends to take any additional action to locate and prosecute these missing men. One has only to pick up any daily newspaper to read of prosecutions conducted by the wartime prices and trade board in connection with food, gasoline, rentals and so on, as a result of which citizens have been fined perhaps hundreds of dollars for minor infractions of some of the thousands of regulations which have been passed by this government. Compare that with the situation under the minister's department, in which we have thousands of young men disobeying the law with apparently very little being done about it. I should like the minister to tell the committee what cooperation he receives from the Department of Justice and what their view is in regard to this flagrant flouting of the law by these young men, and in that connection whether the minister feels he is now doing everything that can be done to locate them. If he is not satisfied with what is being done at present, what steps does he propose to take?

Mr. MITCHELL: I have tried to memorize all the questions asked by my hon. friend, but if I should pass over any of them, I hope he will forgive me and bring them to my attention. The first point he raised was, I think, how we make the call-ups, whether or not they are staggered in the various districts; I thinks that was the import of his question. As I pointed out the other day, we are scraping the bottom of the barrel in this country as far as man-power is concerned. I think I indicated to the committee that we had to call six men to get one into the armed forces. The direction is given all the military districts in Canada. There is no quota; they call them up as fast as the medical boards and other machinery can handle them. It is a straight call-up; we have got away from the idea of allotment.

Mr. WHITE: Do I understand, then, that as soon as a class of young men become eighteen and a half years of age they are automatically called up, all of them?

Mr. MITCHELL: They are cleaned up in the first few days of the month.

Mr. WHITE: How many young men become of military age each year?

Mr. MITCHELL: Approximately 100,000.

Mr. WHITE: Would that not more than take care of all the requirements?

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend must remember that the majority of young men volunteer. In addition, there are students, those on the farms, those who are physically unfit, and so on. The hon. gentleman asked me for one figure; now he asks for a break-down, which it is pretty difficult to give off-hand. That is the situation. Many volunteer; many are unfit; many go on to school and many are postponed because they are farmers' sons, or on compassionate grounds, and things like that. With reference to the figures my hon. friend asked for, I did direct the officers of my department to get those figures, but I think if the hon. gentleman studied table No. 7 he would find a break-down of the man-power pool in this country. I cannot promise that I shall be able to get the figures he wants before my estimates are through, but I suggest that if he would use that table rather than a multitude of tables from which different deductions may be drawn, which have confused the thinking of some people, he will get most of the information for which he is looking.

Then the hon. gentleman asked if we were doing everything possible to trace those men who should report for military training. I would say, without fear of successful contradiction, that we are doing everything physically possible to trace those people who should comply with the law. I do not know whether I can say more than that. If my hon. friend has other suggestions to make I would be glad to listen to them.

Mr. WHITE: After practising law for twenty years in Ontario I know that if anybody in this province commits any offence the police never have any difficulty in locating that person; and it seems to me very strange that, according to the minister's own figures, there could be at least 49,000 men roaming around the country, men who have committed a breach of the law and who cannot be located. I may say in passing that the figure 49,000 is open to dispute. Surely, with the machinery in the minister's department, along with the machinery of the Department of Justice, something could be done about this matter.

May I refer to what the minister said about table No. 7 which he filed on Friday. This table is prepared on a basis different from that used when the ten or twelve returns were prepared and filed; and it is impossible to use table No. 7 as a comparison, or to get the information one is seeking, when he compares this table with the returns which have been filed. I would especially ask the minister to bring down a new return which would follow the manner in which the other returns were made.

For instance, I would point out to the minister that table No. 7 does not give the total number of men available. It does not tell how many were called up. It does not tell how many refused to report. It does not tell how many did not report after medical examination. I do not think we can have any clear picture, unless the minister will bring down a table having reference to one particular date in 1944, so that we may compare that table with these ten or twelve returns. Will the minister bring down such a table?

Mr. MITCHELL: I will not get into an argument about this table. The hon. member knows what he wants the table for, and I know what the table is for. This is a basic table compiled by the department. The hon. member said that we do not know how many men are available. I would direct his attention to table No. 7, where it says, "Not yet sent order, military training, 619." That is the figure for London, and the figures are given for Kingston and other districts. However, if my hon. friend wishes to have the figures I will try to get them.

Mr. WHITE: I must confess I cannot understand the table. Would the minister tell me, from the table, how many men out of the 1,665,504 refused, neglected or failed to report for medical examination? How can one get that information from the table?

Mr. MITCHELL: The contention of those who prepared the report is that there are 49,000 people we cannot trace.

Mr. WHITE: Please explain how you get it from this table?

Mr. MITCHELL: There is the figure, right in the tabie.

Mr. WHITE: Where?

Mr. MITCHELL: Under the heading "not accounted for"; that is all.

Mr. WHITE: That is just the point; one cannot take this table and compare it with the other returns because, as pointed out the other day by the hon. member for Lake Centre—Monday, I believe it was—it is shown in one return that there are at least 300,000 who did not report. However, I am quite willing to leave the matter the way it is, if the minister has agreed to bring down the table as I have suggested.

Mr. MITCHELL: I want to be cooperative with my hon. friend, but he thinks in one direction, while some other hon. members try to reach another conclusion, and some others are trying to reach another. We all come back to the figure of 49,000. The hon. member for Lake Centre went off the track when he got so many returns to prove a certain point that he got mixed up in the maze of his own figures—and I say that in a kindly way.

Mr. WHITE: The return would clear that up.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend may be the only man in Canada who thinks so; that is the difficulty. I want to be cooperative, but—

Mr. WHITE: If there has been any confusion it has been due to the minister's department—

Mr. MITCHELL: No, no.

Mr. WHITE: —because his department has followed a certain procedure in bringing down various returns, in which certain information has been set out. But now in his department, for some reason known only to those who prepared what is known as table No. 7, a different procedure is followed. Whether it is to conceal or to mystify, I cannot say. Apparently the minister has decided that table No. 7 was a better way of setting out the information than the method followed by his department in the past four years. I do not disagree with the table, because I cannot check it.

Mr. MITCHELL: Just to get the record straight, may I say that civil servants do not get out tables to conceal. I did not get the table out; I gave directions to have it prepared. Let us be clear on that point. What the hon. member has said is a reflection on the people who acted under my direction. They do not do those things. We had to have a standard of approach to this matter. The hon. member speaks of certain returns. In those returns we gave members what they asked for; we have always endeavoured to do that.

There were probably a dozen different approaches to the man-power problem in a general way. We are not responsible for those approaches. The hon. member who asks the question is responsible, and that is how hon. members get mixed up. We cannot have a dozen different approaches to the problem. We have to have an absolute approach, one which must be based on the best information we can obtain. That is how table No. 7 comes about. I think it is a simple table; I can understand it, and I think if I can understand it every member in the house can understand it.

Mr. WHITE: The minister has agreed to bring down a table in the way I want it, and I am prepared to wait.

Mr. ROY: A certain group of people seem to be worried about the question as to whether or not we have conscription in Canada. That matter was discussed only a few minutes ago when the hon. member for Macleod referred to conscientious objectors who, because of their refusal to answer the military call-up, have been placed in gaol. That would seem to be a sign that there must be some kind of compulsory law in Canada compelling men to serve in the army.

There are other signs of conscription, too. In my constituency many farmers and fishermen have been called up, and have been under arms for four years. Others, too, under the national selective service branch have been granted postponements. In the past, some draftees in the army were granted deferment, or leave of absence. But for a while many have been refused by national selective service or, rather, by headquarters at Ottawa.

It was stated properly only a few moments ago by the hon. member for Temiscouata that the Department of Labour is the agency of the Department of National Defence. I should like to learn from the Minister of Labour which branch it is that refuses applications for leave filed by men who have asked permission to help their fathers to fish. Is it the headquarters of national defence, or is it the headquarters of the Minister of Labour to which reference is made?

Mr. MITCHELL: When a man gets in the army it is a case of "abandon all hope ye who enter here." He is no longer under my jurisdiction; he is in the army. An application for leave must be made to his commanding officer. At this moment there are 2,317 fishermen on postponement from the army.

Mr. ROY: Why should national selective service, which is under the Department of Labour, have a board sitting in Quebec city, which is military district No. 5, to consider these requests for leave? This board rules upon these requests, and I emphasize that it is a board under the Minister of Labour. According to what has been told me, this board is unable to reach a decision because it does not seem to know that the fishing industry is essential to our war effort. We know that it is, to the first degree. Requests for leave are sent to headquarters at Ottawa, and we do not know what headquarters they mean. It would appear that the Department of Labour, through this national selective service board, is able to grant leave to a soldier who is in the army. That is contradictory to what the minister has just said.

Mr. MITCHELL: I thought I made that clear to my hon. friend. The impression I get is that he is jumping from one thing to another. National selective service cannot grant leave from the army; get that clear. A man makes application to his commanding officer, who may refer it for an opinion to a national selective service board. He may do that, but he does not have to. The board gives an opinion; it does not make a recommendation. As I pointed out on Tuesday, sometimes a man may not want to go home. His parents may want him back home, but, as has happened on numerous occasions, the boy wants to stay in the army. Quite often that causes some difficulty. Parents may write to my hon. friend requesting that a boy be given leave to come home again, but, as I say, in many instances these boys have told their commanding officer that they do not want to go, that they want to remain in the army. Once a boy is in the army he makes his application for leave to his commanding officer, not to me or to any organization under my jurisdiction.

Mr. ROY: That may be, but there is a point I do not understand.

Mr. MITCHELL: I just told you.

Mr. ROY: The minister just stated that when a soldier asks for leave it is up to his commanding officer to recommend or refuse it. I should like to know how a national selective service board proceeds to judge whether that man is essential to a war industry. That is one thing I cannot understand.

As I said at the outset of my remarks there seems to be some doubt as to whether we have conscription in this country. However, there would seem to be signs that we have conscription. A few days ago the Minister of National Defence made a statement in the house to be found on page 2383 of Hansard. He said:

> It was thought highly advisable that the army should do its duty with regard to the raising and maintaining of the volunteer army overseas of which Canada is exceedingly proud; and I have not heard anyone in this house or anywhere else suggest that the volunteer army was not a desirable thing. I have indicated repeatedly that I prefer a voluntary army, and I think most Canadians will agree with me. In that connection the army has its duty to maintain, if it can, that volunteer army; and for that purpose the army has engaged in recruiting activities for the last three years.

We have that statement by the Minister of National Defence which is bound to give the impression that we have no conscription in this country.

The CHAIRMAN: I would point out to the hon. member for Gaspe that we are not discussing the question of conscription. The discussion should be confined to the item before the committee.

Mr. ROY: I will abide as closely as possible to your ruling. The reason why I got away from the item was that I heard a lot about conscription and the calling of draftees since this debate started. People are wondering whether we have conscription, and that is why I referred to the statement of the Minister of National Defence. Men are called up by the Department of Labour.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): The Minister of National Defence was speaking about conscription for overseas service when he stated his preference for a volunteer army; he was not referring to call-ups for Canada.

Mr. ROY: In answer to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence I would say that there is only one law which empowers the government to call up men. It does not say that it is for Canada. I think we can take it in a general way—

Mr. MITCHELL: I rise to a point of order. I think I have been pretty patient as I have been sitting here for four days. If my hon. friends are going to start a debate on conscription—

Mr. ROY: Not exactly.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend says, "not exactly," but I know the kind of speeches he is making in the eastern part of Quebec.

Mr. ROY: The minister does not know the kind of speeches I am making in Quebec. I have not made any on that question at all.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member is the first one who has not. I think we should stay strictly within the rules of order. Let us be sensible about this thing. We have a large legislative programme before us; yet we are in the fourth month of the session and the war appropriations are not concluded. I suppose next week we shall have a long debate on the Bank Act. Let us be rational and sensible men about this thing. We have spent four days on one item. I am not objecting, provided we stay within the item, but for goodness sake let us stay within the rules of order.

Mr. ROY: I will try to keep within the item, but I should like to ask the minister a precise question and I hope it will be possible for him to give a categorical and definite answer. If we have no conscription, why is the minister calling up men to serve under arms at the rate of 9,000 a month or approximately 100,000 a year?

Mr. MITCHELL: Who said that we are calling up men at the rate of 9,000 a month?

Mr. ROY: It was in a report tabled a few days ago. I am sorry; I should have said 5,000 a month.

Mr. MITCHELL: Only fifty per cent out.

Mr. ROY: Hon. Leon Casgrain, attorney-general in Premier Godbout's cabinet, declared in the Quebec legislature a few days ago that we have no conscription in Canada, and similar declarations are being made all over the country, that we have a volunteer army, and this and that. I ask the Minister of Labour this question: If we have not conscription, why is he calling up men at the rate of 5,000 a month? Let me quote from part 1 of "Instructions to Employers and their Male Employees." It says—

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend is a member of this House of Commons, and he knows that those regulations were prepared under my direction. There is no secret about them. My hon. friend went to school like myself, and I suppose he looks at the dictionary occasionally. Yet he insists on asking me simple questions. I do not know officially what a member of the Quebec legislature said the other day; I did not read about it. My hon. friend has asked me a hypothetical question, a question of a character on which I am not even clear myself. I do not know just what he is driving at. If he has any question to ask of my department for information I shall be glad to give it, but I cannot give him a lift in his efforts out in the country, back at the little red schoolhouse.

Mr. ROY: I apologize for not knowing the language of the minister very well, Mr. Chairman. Perhaps that is why he does not understand me. I will try to be so clear that he will understand me. I was going to quote from part 1 of his "Instructions to Employers and their Male Employees". To be brief, I shall quote only the latter part of paragraph 1, which defines "employer":

> The dominion government, the governments of the provinces, as well as municipal institutions are employers for this purpose. The term "employer" includes also any farmer operating a farm, who has working for him a male employee, even though such employee be a son or other relative.

My question is this: If we have no conscription in Canada, why are men called up to serve under arms in Canada by the Department of Labour? My question is: Have we conscription in Canada, yes or no?

Mr. MITCHELL: I will tell my hon. friend what we have. We have the military call-up for the defence of this country. If my hon. friend wants to call that conscription, that is his business, not mine. If it is any advantage to him politically to use that language, he is entitled to it. But this is still a free country because men have the courage to go out and defend it.

As to the other point my hon. friend raised, I know that a big play has been made over that in certain parts of this country. The hon. member for Lake Centre and the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough spoke of the men we have not traced yet. It is in our effort to trace these men that we have laid down the principle that before a man can be employed he must show some credentials, either that he was discharged from the army, the navy or the air force, or that his call-up for military service has been postponed. There is nothing wrong about that. If I may speak personally for a moment, both my sons are in the fighting forces. I have raised my children to tell the truth and obey the law, and I know what I would do when the instructions to employers from which my hon. friend has quoted came to my attention. I would say, "Son, have you got your clearance?" Would that not be the natural thing for any father or mother to say to their children? It is just as simple as that. To suggest that this is the most despicable thing there ever was—I read that language the other day—just does not add up, and my hon. friend knows it. If he wants to know the attitude of the Minister of Labour I will repeat what I said this afternoon, that it is my duty to trace these missing men, and this is one of the simple procedures we have adopted in an endeavour to trace them. The hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough was complaining that we did not have enough machinery or that it was not as good as it should be. But the procedure from which my hon. friend quoted was adopted by us in an endeavour to locate these men. We laid down the rule that before a man can get a job or retain his employment he has to be able to show some document from the armed forces or from some other organization proving that he has complied with the law with respect to the military call-up.

Mr. ROY: I suppose that is because we have conscription? The minister has not yet answered my question.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend is not going to ram his sixteenth century opinions down my throat. Let that be clearly understood. He is not going to put that kind of language in my mouth, not while I can stand on two feet. He may get away with that kind of language in other places, but not here, in the presence of his peers. This is still a free country, thank God, and it is a free country because our young men from every province in Canada are prepared to defend our institutions, which we have had handed down to us after much bloodshed and struggle. I have been to countries where you do as you are told or you do not live. I hope never to see the day when that will be the way of life in Canada. Let us be clear about this: If we do not defeat this man Hitler in Europe; if we do not defeat this other chap in the Pacific, there will be no House of Commons in Canada. There will be no languages, no religion, no racial culture in this country at all. I was in Berlin when Hitler put over his revolution. I saw it happen, and there was no more commotion on the main street of Berlin than there is on Sparks street to-day. Germany had the most powerful labour and trades union movements, and only yesterday, you might say, they were running that vast country. To-day they are not even a memory. Unless we destroy this tyranny everything that my hon. friend and I hold dear will be swept by the board. Let him go out and preach that gospel to the people whom he represents.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at 8 o'clock.

Mr. DORION: I should like to ask the minister a few questions, but before doing so I wish to say that we are not here to receive any lessons in loyalty, because for my part my military record of 1918 in the Royal Air Force compares with that of anybody else. I think it is much better to discuss the subject on its merits. I have P.C. 1355 with regard to the national selective service mobilization regulations 1944, dated March 4, 1944, section 6, subsection 1 of which reads:

> The minister, upon being informed by the Department of National Defence that a specified number of men are required for military training, may instruct any registrar to apply these regulations to a specified number of men from his division, and may inform a registrar how many French-speaking men are required.

My first question is, why is this proviso made regarding French-speaking men called to the army? On April 20, as appears at page 2177 of Hansard I asked this question:

> Has the Minister of Labour given instructions to registrars under order P.C. 1355, section 6, subsection 1?

The one I have just read.

> If so, (a) to whom; (b) at what date; (c) what were those instructions?

The answer given by the parliamentary assistant to the minister (Mr. Martin) was:

> No. The Minister of Labour has not found it necessary to act under section 6, subsection 1, or order P.C. 1355.

Mr. MITCHELL: That answer given by the parliamentary assistant stands; it is not changed.

Mr. DORION: I wish to ask another question. I have here sessional paper 142G tabled on Thursday, April 27, 1944. It came after a question I asked, which read:

> Has the Minister of National Defence, since the 4th March, 1944, reported to the Minister of Labour that a definite number of men were required for military training? If so, (a) at what date was this information supplied; and (b) what did such information contain?

The return shows that in April and May, 1944, 292 men were called daily in April and 236 men were called daily in May.

My second question is: If the answer given on April 20 is right, in virtue of what regulation were these men called, as shown in this return tabled on April 27, 1944? This return, 142G, shows that in April men were called as follows, daily: for the district of London, 17; Toronto, 48; Kingston, 22. That makes a total of 87 in Ontario. In Quebec: Montreal, 55; Quebec, 31. That gives a total of 86. In May, men were called as follows, daily: London, 14; Toronto, 39; Kingston, 18. That is a total of 71. Montreal 44; Quebec, 25. That is a total of 69 for the province of Quebec. In another answer that was given me, as will be seen at page 2375 of Hansard, it will be noted that the military district of Kingston, district No. 3, comprises counties in the province of Ontario and in the province of Quebec, and the figures given show that the population of the district of Kingston in the province of Ontario is 753,863, the total population according to the 1941 census, and the counties of the province of Quebec in the district of Kingston give a population of 183,125. That is, about twenty per cent of the total population of the military district of Kingston, come from the province of Quebec.

If we take the figures I have just mentioned and deduct this twenty per cent from the military district of Kingston, coming from the province of Quebec, we get a figure of eighty-three men called daily in the province of Ontario during the month of April and sixty-seven in the province of Ontario called daily during the month of May; and in Quebec we get a figure of ninety men called daily in the month of April and seventy-two called daily in the month of May. That is, a proportion of thirty-one per cent in the province of Quebec and twenty-eight per cent in the province of Ontario. I mean that these are the percentages of the men called to the army. I have here a booklet called "Canada 1944" and certain figures are given at page 53. We see the total population of the dominion in each province, and it shows that between the ages of nineteen and forty-five there are in the province of Quebec 612,396 men, while in the province of Ontario there are 736,486; that is to say, a proportion in Ontario, in relation to the total population of the dominion of the same age, of thirty-five per cent, and twenty-eight per cent in the province of Quebec; I mean the proportion of men of the same age in the dominion. We come to the conclusion that in the province of Quebec we have twenty-eight per cent of the men between the ages of nineteen and forty-five, and the return I have mentioned shows that in April and May there were called thirty-one per cent of these men, while in Ontario there were called only twenty-eight per cent.

My third question is this: Why is the number of men called in the province of Quebec greater than the number called in the province of Ontario?

My fourth and last question is this: Is it not true that during the last war not a single man called to the services under the conscription law reached the battlefields of Europe, and that to-day we have many men overseas who, before going there, were called to the army under the mobilization act of 1940?

Mr. MITCHELL: I will answer the last question first. As my hon. friend knows, many men who are called up eventually volunteer. That is the natural thing for young people to do who have some regard for their country. I think that is the answer to that question. What my hon. friend has been trying to point out to the committee is that you can break down patriotism of this country on a percentage basis. It cannot be done. I know it is probably convenient at times. My hon. friend spoke of the province of Ontario. If he will look more closely into the question he will find that our call-ups do not always coincide with military districts. Take as an instance that great patriotic district—if I may use that term—of Port Arthur and Fort William. They come within the purview of the military district centred on Winnipeg, which my hon. friend overlooked. He spoke of military district No. 3, based on Kingston. It does not go across the Quebec border. While the military district goes up the Gatineau and north of this community, it does not come within the jurisdiction of Kingston; it comes within the jurisdiction of Montreal. My hon. friend is making the same mistake—

Mr. DORION: May I ask a question?

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member told his own story and made his own deductions to suit his own convenience. As I pointed out before, my hon. friend is trying to work out the patriotism of this country on a percentage basis and apparently by what he thought previously he has not his facts right. He talked about Ontario, but he forgot about that great northern part of the province which comes within the jurisdiction—and quite naturally—of the mobilization board of the city of Winnipeg, because it is more convenient.

As I pointed out before, we call up people at the present time as fast as the various military districts can handle them. There is no quota. We are all Canadians, whether we come from British Columbia or Nova Scotia, or wherever the case may be. What my hon. friend tried to do was to break them up into compartments. He is trying to label us all as different Canadians. In our approach to the problem we say there are so many men that we require, and as fast as the medical officers and other officers that are necessary can handle the men in the military districts they are called up. That is the simple answer to my hon. friend's question.

[Mr. Dorion.]

Mr. GREEN: There are three or four questions in connection with national selective service that I should like to place before the minister. My first question has to do with the sources from which he proposes to draw man-power from now on. I thought he did not make that quite clear in his original statement. He used these words, which are to be found at page 2444 of Hansard:

> Even with the utmost effort, it has been increasingly difficult for some time to obtain the number of men required by the Department of National Defence each month.

This afternoon he stated that we are scraping the bottom of the man-power pool. I think these statements disclose a very serious situation. I suggest that we are entitled to know just how the government proposes to meet that situation. The minister said in the course of his summary on April 28:

> . . . that we will soon have to rely largely upon those at present deferred and the young men coming of age.

He has said here to-day that there are about 100,000 young men who reach the age of eighteen and a half each year in Canada; and then he said, and I think quite properly, that a large proportion of that number either will be going active, joining the navy or the air force, or will be found unfit for military service or will be deferred because they are farmers or for various other reasons. I ask him to tell us how many he plans to get during the present fiscal year from the eighteen and a half year old group, and then give us information regarding the other source which was given as those men who are now on postponement. He should tell us what particular type of man will be called up. That is only fair to the young men who will be affected.

At page 2453 of Hansard hon. members will find table No. 10, which gives the details with regard to the men on postponement. The total number is 252,625. They are divided into ten different groups. I wish the minister would tell us which group or groups will be called upon to make up the necessary number for the call-up. The first group listed is farming, and the number 145,529; the next is fishing, numbering 2,317; the third is lumbering, 5,382; the fourth is mining, 2,562; the fifth group, essential industries and services, 52,341; the sixth group, students, 14,497; the seventh group, conscientious objectors, 8,285; the eighth group, merchant marine, 2,729; the ninth group, compassionate, 2,443, and the tenth group, all others, 16,540. I should like to know from which of these classifications the men will be drawn. The minister will realize that many of these men who are on postponement are older men; they are not in the younger groups, and probably the number that can be drawn from the whole 250,000 is comparatively small. I would also ask the minister to state whether the government has in mind calling up the lads as they become eighteen rather than at eighteen and a half. I would not want to be taken as advocating that that should be done. I think actually it would be a crime to call up those young lads while we still have in our home defence forces in Canada 50,000 fully trained men not fighting, who could, if the government saw fit, be sent to fight overseas. I ask the minister to tell us what the policy is with regard to the eighteen year olds. As I understand it now, they are liable to call, but they do not actually get a notice to report for medical examination until they reach the age of eighteen and a half years. Then I ask the minister to tell us the next source from which he plans to get the men; that is, after the supply of young men who become eighteen and a half years old has become exhausted, and all men on postponement have been used up; what sources does the government plan to draw from at that time?

Mr. MITCHELL: I wish the hon. member would ask me these questions individually. If I miss any I shall be glad to answer them later. I shall take the last one first, the question of calling boys eighteen years of age. I cannot tell what the future may hold in store for the free peoples of the world. At this moment there is no intention of calling boys eighteen years of age. I do not know what may happen during the course of the next twelve months, but I would point out to my hon. friend that in the United States young men of eighteen are called and that in Great Britain the callable age is seventeen years and six months.

Mr. GREEN: But neither of those countries has a home defence army.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am talking about calling up people, no matter what kind of army it is. My hon. friend asks who compose the manpower pool. First, there are the men coming of age, the 100,000 a year whom I mentioned this afternoon; then there are the men on postponement, and in addition we are continually reexamining those men who have been turned down, particularly by individual physicians. At this moment, and for some considerable time past, we have what I might call a staff of industrial engineers combing the industrial structure of this country for able-bodied men for the armed forces. That is going on continuously. As I pointed out a couple of days ago, in order to get one man we have to call up six.

Mr. GREEN: According to the return you are trying to get five thousand a month now.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am not talking about figures; any fool can figure.

Mr. GREEN: It was a fool in the department who gave this figure.

Mr. MITCHELL: What I am concerned about is getting men for the armed forces. You give me a man with a stack of figures, and look out. Figuring is the easiest thing to do.

Mr. GREEN: I do not want the minister to be in error on this. I referred to the return requested by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay, which stated that the army had called upon the Department of Labour for 5,000 men during each of the months of April and May.

Mr. MITCHELL: I was talking about figures; so many people can play around with them. As I indicated to my hon. friend, we have to call six to get one, which is an indication that we are just about at the bottom of the barrel. As I stated the other evening, I could put 160,000 men at work to-morrow if I had them; that is, for the essential industries of this country. Does that not indicate that we have just about reached the saturation point, if I may call it that, in connection with production and men for the armed forces? After all is said and done, we are dealing with a continent, not a nation. If we had 160,000 men out of work it would be a reflection upon the Canadian people. But here we have the largest fighting force in our history; we have built an industrial structure which, on a per capita basis, equals or surpasses that of any other nation in the world; with much less labour available, our farmers have produced the greatest crops in their history. All these things are to the credit of the Canadian people. This is a democracy, where we have to be more or less cautious about pushing people around. The fact that we have reached that point is an indication that this nation—not this government, but this nation—is not only pulling its fair weight in this war, but pulling a load equal to that of anyone else engaged in the war, and in my judgment that is a condition of which the opposition, the government and the country might feel rightfully proud. I do not know whether I can say anything more.

Mr. GREEN: The minister has made quite a speech, but as yet he has not answered either question. I asked how many men the minister expects to get from the lads who will become eighteen and a half years of age during the present fiscal year. The other question which he has not answered was, from which class of deferred men will he call the remainder who are required? Will it be from the farmers, from the miners, from the loggers or from the men who are working in industry? I am not asking that information for myself, but I think the men who will be called should know what they may expect, and surely the government knows which of these groups of deferred men will be called.

Mr. DUPUIS: The first group to be called should be the imperialists, if they are willing to go.

Mr. GREEN: They would be the first group to go.

Mr. MITCHELL: Of course I do not know the physical condition of these young men or of the other people who will be called, so that any figure I give will have to be a guess; but we estimate that about 50,000 of those 100,000 will be in the armed forces, while the rest will come from the other classifications.

Mr. GREEN: Is there any policy as to which of these deferred groups will be called? In other words, is it the intention to call upon the farmers who have been deferred, or upon the miners, or upon the men in industry?

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not know. I am very close to this problem; I live with it every day in the week, and my personal opinion is that we cannot deplete the manpower on the farms of this country. Notwithstanding the opinions of armchair critics, three things are basically necessary in a war. The first is sleep—I am not talking about the House of Commons now, but about the men who are fighting—the next is food and the next is equipment. These are the three fundamental needs. I know that many times during the last war I was so tired I wished a bullet would come the right way, and I am sure my hon. friend has felt the same way; that was why I put sleep first. I do not think we can take any more people from the farms of this country and hope to meet our obligations to those people in Europe who are in dire need of foodstuffs in order to carry on the fight against the enemy.

Mr. GREEN: Then may we take it as probable that the group to be called first will be the men who are in essential industries and services?

Mr. MITCHELL: I think so, on a basis of priority.

Mr. GREEN: They are given as numbering about 52,000?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Then has the minister given any thought to where the men would come from after that source has been exhausted?

Mr. MITCHELL: I think when we are through with essential industry we are at the end of the road, except for those just coming of age. I do not want to inject the theme of conscription into this debate, but I consider it fair to say that without conscription this country is as well organized as any country on the side of the united nations. Let us be clear about that.

Mr. GREEN: It is the only country that does not have conscription.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not want to discuss the principle to-night; we discussed it long enough two or three sessions ago, but that is what the figures would indicate. Any place we can find a man we will go after him, but you have to keep men in the basic industries. You cannot fight a war without steel or nickel or copper or lead or zinc.

Mr. JAQUES: What about gold?

Mr. MITCHELL: I shall leave my Social Credit friends to talk about gold. I am not a fanatic in regard to gold, but we may be thankful for the gold we have when this war is over. However, we are watching the situation very closely, to keep within the framework of democracy and to keep the balance equally divided between the requirements of the industrial, agricultural and commercial structures and the fighting forces. In a big way I think I can say we have been reasonably successful.

Mr. GREEN: Then am I fair when I say that at the present time there is no policy with regard to what source will be tapped after the men who are on deferment have been used up?

Mr. MITCHELL: I am not going to admit that; I am not going to allow my hon. friend to go throughout the country and say we have no policy.

Mr. GREEN: If the minister can explain it, that is all I ask.

Mr. MITCHELL: I would say that this is a day-to-day problem, and the administrative board of selective service meets regularly to survey conditions. In the light of changed conditions we alter our policy on the distribution of men and women between the armed forces on the one hand, and the industrial, agricultural and commercial structure of the country on the other.

Mr. GREEN: That is a very indefinite policy.

Mr. MITCHELL: No, it is not indefinite.

Mr. GREEN: Perhaps that is as far as the minister can go.

Mr. MITCHELL: If my hon. friend were sitting where I am sitting he would not say that is an indefinite policy.

Mr. GREEN: I might be worse.

Mr. MITCHELL: That may be true, too. Last session we heard a great deal about the man-power muddle. Not long ago I was in the United States, and some people over there are talking about a muddle in that country. Under free institutions, such talk is inevitable, because there is a right to criticize the government. Up to now, however, free institutions have proven more successful than dictatorships, because under that type of government every man goes where he is told, or does not live. When one sees the results of free institutions, the number of aeroplanes in the skies to-day, and the number of ships at sea, he has confidence in those institutions.

Mr. GREEN: We all agree with that.

Mr. MITCHELL: You get my point. I wish I could get it over to some other people in the house. Despite what is believed to be confusion, with our ingenuity we are going to free those people in Europe and in the Pacific—and make no mistake about it.

Mr. GREEN: I have a further question respecting the calling up of aliens. In the national selective service mobilization regulations provision is made for what are known as non-declarant aliens. I understand that it does not apply to enemy aliens. If the non-declarant alien does not choose to answer the call or to join the forces of Canada, he may make a declaration which appears in the schedule to the regulations, and contains the following, among other paragraphs:

> I make this declaration with full knowledge and understanding that I am thereby deprived forever of all rights and privileges to be naturalized in Canada as a British subject, and that I thereby become liable to deportation from Canada whenever such deportation may be practicable.

I presume the aliens who would come under that provision would be, for example, Swedish people, Turks and Spaniards, because another section provides for nationals of the united nations. Will the minister tell us what the experience of the department has been with respect to the calling of aliens, and in connection with their taking this particular declaration? I did not know, in fact, that there was authority to take a declaration of that type. How is the authority derived, and approximately how many men of each nationality have been affected by these provisions?

Mr. MITCHELL: We have had no great difficulty. Some of them sign the declaration for deportation after the war—and I do not see why that should not be.

Mr. GREEN: I am not questioning that. But under what authority is it done?

Mr. MITCHELL: Under the authority the hon. member has just read.

Mr. GREEN: Where do we get the authority for a provision such as that?

Mr. MITCHELL: Under the War Measures Act.

Mr. GREEN: Can the minister tell us approximately the number of aliens called up under this regulation?

Mr. MITCHELL: My opinion is that when they get into the army we lose track of them, and they are good Canadians.

Mr. GREEN: Has the minister the figures?

Mr. MITCHELL: There are 9,867 who have signed the declaration that they are prepared to be deported after the war. I hope I am Minister of Labour then.

Mr. GREEN: What is done with these men? What sort of work are they put at?

Mr. MITCHELL: They are subject to compulsory transfer. They come under the civilian regulations of selective service.

Mr. GREEN: Can the minister tell us of what nationalities they are? I had no idea there would be that number who would take the declaration. That is nearly 10,000 who have asked that they be sent out after the war, rather than serve.

Mr. MITCHELL: I cannot break it down into nationalities.

Mr. GREEN: Has the minister the list of nationalities, or can it be obtained?

Mr. MITCHELL: If you give us enough time, after the session is over.

Mr. GREEN: Well, that is long enough.

My next question has to do with men wanting to go to the United States to work. On the Pacific coast that has become an important question. There has been a rumour with respect to lay-offs, although, fortunately, there have not been many so far. As a result, however, quite a number of men have been anxious to go to work in the United States. I understand in practically all cases permits have been refused. What is the government's policy in connection with such applications, and is the policy applied in the same way in all provinces? Are men from certain provinces allowed to go across, while others from other provinces are kept in Canada?

Mr. MITCHELL: There is no differentiation between provinces. The man in that category has two hurdles to jump, the military and the civilian; and I would say that the civilian hurdle is probably more rigid than the military. It is only common sense that, in view of the tremendous amount of man-power required at the present time, the number of permits to go to the United States is very small. The guiding principle is health.

Mr. GREEN: They are allowed to go only for reasons of health?

Mr. MITCHELL: I can assure my hon. friend that exit permits are rigidly controlled. Very few are permitted to go to the United States, in view of the extreme importance of man-power in Canada.

Mr. GREEN: Then, for all practical purposes, the government policy is that of prohibiting anybody going across to work in the United States?

Mr. MITCHELL: That is correct.

Mr. GREEN: And this final question: I understand there have been seven compulsory transfer orders issued. The minister said the other day that there had been about 15,359 transfers. Is it the intention to issue any further compulsory transfer orders?

Mr. MITCHELL: I would say yes. And I would add that while 15,000 is not a very large figure in the man-power pool, yet it is an indication that nearly everyone in this country is in the place where he or she should be. I believe that is a fair observation to make. As the position gets tighter, we are insisting upon compulsory transfers. May I pay tribute to the Canadian people for the manner in which they have accepted the principle of compulsory transfer. There have been very few complaints about it.

Mr. GREEN: Is the minister free to give us particulars of the further compulsory transfer orders that are expected?

Mr. MITCHELL: Much as I should like to, I cannot do that. I may have opinions of my own. However, it is the keystone of selective service policy to have nothing done affecting the lives of the people of this country without first having consultation with the national selective service advisory board, composed of representatives of various departments, including the Department of Labour and representatives of the fighting services and of employers and labour. We never set in motion any policy unless it is approved by that body. I hope we never shall—although we may have to; one cannot tell.

Mrs. NIELSEN: Mr. Chairman, before this item passes I should like to discuss briefly some questions which come under the jurisdiction of the Department of Labour and which are of special concern to women. I make no excuse for holding up this item while these matters are being discussed. Perhaps one of these days, instead of just having women sitting in the galleries of this chamber, we shall have dozens of them occupying benches here, and then I hope that the problems of women will be more adequately discussed than I can possibly discuss them alone. But there are certain matters which I feel should be brought before the minister for his consideration.

When the minister was introducing his estimates he gave the latest figures of the employment of women in industry, and they were really astounding. He told the committee that it was estimated that on October 1, 1943, no fewer than 1,075,000 women were gainfully employed in Canada as compared with only 638,000 in August, 1939. We all realize the tremendous number of women, both English and French speaking, who have taken their places in industry because of the war. Most of these women had no previous industrial experience, yet they are filling places which it was thought that women could never fill in our gun factories, shipyards, steel mills and other industries.

I understand that to-day women are performing over seventy per cent of the operations necessary in the manufacture of machine guns, and more than eighty per cent of those working in the instrument factories are women. We have heard of the large number of people who have left the farms and of the women who have replaced them. According to the minister's figures this number is 750,000. I should like to say something about women working on farms, but that is not the matter with which I want to deal to-night. I intend to refer more particularly to those who are working in industry.

It has been recognized by employers in this country that wherever it is a question of dexterity or accuracy or patience or pride in work, women are not second to men. They become good trade union members too, once they understand the democratic functions of trade unionism. I have spoken to large numbers of women who recently have been enlisted in trade unions, and I found them enthusiastic about the necessary work of trade unions and the carrying out of democratic procedure within their shops and work places.

Not only do the women in our armed services not receive equal pay for equal work, but all women in employment have suffered this liability. I am not the first to raise this question, nor is this the first time I have raised it. It has been brought up in this chamber by other hon. members. I want hon. members to realize that in urging the government to make it the law of the land that there shall be equal pay for equal work, to accept this principle, I do so not only to protect women but to protect the employment of men as well. If employers find that they can employ women to do work just as efficiently as men and pay them less, we shall find, when the war is over, that perhaps they will use these women as a reservoir of cheap labour and thus deny our working men opportunities for employment. I bring this to the attention of the committee because I believe many hon. members are already aware that, since this principle has not been embodied in our statute books, this discrimination exists in a great majority of our industries.

This principle has been acknowledged by the great trade union groups of this country. They have asked that it be embodied in our labour code. We have had a ruling of the national war labour board on this issue, and I should like to quote from the Montreal Gazette of March 15. Decisions in two cases had been given by the board, and this paper had this to say:

> The national war labour board in decisions given to-day went on record supporting equal pay for equal work for men and women on a basis of efficiency.
> Dealing with appeals involving two Niagara district companies—the Electric Metallurgical Company of Welland, Ontario, and Welland Chemical Company of Port Robinson, Ontario.

And later on:

> Mr. Justice C. P. McTague, giving a unanimous decision by the board, said that wage control regulations made no distinction between male and female workers. The principle of equal pay for equal production was not dealt with in orders in council and the board felt the time had come when it should declare its policy.
> Equality of pay should be based on efficiency and support of the principle did not necesistate a general revision of pay to all female workers, but only to those on jobs similar to those held by men.

In the United States it has been the policy of the war labour board to accept the principle of equal pay for equal work. I urge strongly upon the minister that he recognize the necessity of having in our labour code definite authority whereby employers will be forced to put this principle into effect. I endeavoured to get some information about this matter of equal pay for equal work. Hon. members may remember that I placed a question upon the order paper a while ago. I asked if, from the material collected by the war labour board, figures could be given with regard to the number of larger industries in this country that were giving equal pay for equal work. The parliamentary assistant to the minister stated that he would try to get this information for me, but he assured me that it would take at least six months and would cost a tremendous amount of money. For that reason I was willing to drop the question for the time being. However, I would ask the minister to try to get from his officials statistics which will give us some idea of how far employers in Canada are accepting the principle of equal pay for equal work.

The government is not giving a lead in this matter in its own contracts. In government contracts, where the government itself is an employer, there is no provision for equal wages to women who are doing the same work as men. I understand that under P.C. 7679 covering government contracts women may be paid twenty-five cents an hour, while men receive thirty-five cents an hour. If the government recognizes the principle of equal pay for equal work it should put it into effect in its own contracts.

I think I am correct when I say that women to-day are doing a tremendously difficult job in taking care of their own homes and families to the best of their ability in addition to helping in the war production of this country. But they are wondering what their position will be when the war is over. They are wondering about their right to continue to work. This concerns not only industrial workers but professional women and women in other groupings. They want to know what attitude the government will take. Are the government and our employers going to say to these women, "Well, girls, you have done a nice job; you looked very cute in your overalls and we appreciate what you have done for us; but just run along; go home; we can get along without you very nicely." Is that the attitude that will be taken, or shall we realize that the prosperity of Canada after the war will depend upon our ability to develop our natural resources, to maintain our industrial development, to expand our national income and to give employment to all those, whether they be men or women, who can help to add to the general progress of this country?

We should rid ourselves of the old Victorian idea or perhaps the idea that we had in the depression years that women, when they want to work in industry and elsewhere, are usurpers in taking men's places. Women would like to have a definite understanding that this government recognizes they have a place to fill in the years of peace just as they had a place to fill in the years of war. As regards all those young women who are doing war work, those in the armed services and in industry, young girls finishing school and soon to become young women, I do not think I would be incorrect if I say that their one great hope and desire is that very natural desire to marry, to have a home and children. That is the foremost hope of all young women, provided, of course, they have some idea that their home will not be a slum or a tenement, and provided they have a fair justification for believing that if they have a little family they can bring up their children with health, pleasure, and a certain degree of education. But there is this, too, to remember. Canada has not yet paid the price for freedom. Before this war is over we may have lost part of a generation of our young men. There may be thousands of young Canadian women who, having worked during the war to help win the victory, may be engaged to a boy overseas, and there are young women who hope to marry some boy now overseas. But many of them may be denied the privilege, the natural right of all women, to have a home, a husband and children. We must not forget these things.

I can remember that during the last war I had a sister, quite a few years my senior, who was married to a man fighting in the armed services of England. He was killed in the month of the armistice. My sister had her first and only child one month after her husband died, and I have often wondered in the long years since who paid the greatest price, who made the greatest sacrifice, whether it was the man who died or the woman who went on living.

At least we as a nation can guarantee to our women the right to live, work and make a home for themselves if they are not in a position to have the advantages which would naturally be theirs by marriage and a home and children of their own.

We must also realize that during the war many women have developed skills and a knowledge which they did not have before the war. They will feel, having developed a certain degree of skill, frustrated if they are no longer able to give of their skill and use it in the interests of their country and in the interests of their own living and building for themselves a better and happier home. There are these women to consider.

[Mrs. Nielsen.]

There are also the women to consider whose husbands may come back from the war disabled, with a pension, of course, we hope; but these women will nevertheless feel that if they can go out to work they can greatly add to the finances of the home and to the opportunities they can provide for their children and their children's education.

These various things women are thinking about, and they are wondering to what degree the government of this country is going to safeguard their rights in having the opportunity to work without being regarded as usurpers of men's places. They also want to know whether the government will guarantee to them the right to have equal pay for equal work. Some hon. members may have read the report of the subcommittee of the government's committee on reconstruction which had to deal with women's problems in the post-war world. I should like to quote briefly from a summary of the findings of the committee because, after a considerable period and quite a little research work with respect to women who are working, the committee arrived at some very decided conclusions.

The subcommittee expresses the following opinions:

1. To women in each group—

That is, whether they happen to be industrial workers, professional workers or workers in some other lines.

—the right to choose what occupation she will follow must be conceded as a right to which every citizen is entitled. She must also have the right to equality of remuneration, working conditions, and opportunity for advancement.

We believe that the right to choose is not going to operate to make every woman, or even much larger groups of women want to leave their homes for the labour market. It is the right to choose which is demanded. Happier homes, and, therefore, a happier democracy, will result from the recognition that women choose or do not choose marriage as their vocation. It must be remembered that for many single women marriage will be an impossibility because of the casualties of the war.

Many women in all three groups will find their situations changed in the post-war years. A large proportion of the women now working, both married and single, have been earning money for the first time, or the first time since marriage. They have gained an entirely new realization of their skills and capacities. Many will return gladly to home life. Others will feel a sense of frustration if they have not the opportunity to exercise these abilities. For some public activities will serve, others will wish to be gainfully employed.

For those women who want to continue working, facilities which have been developed during the war should be continued and expanded. For example, war-time day nurseries should be continued on a peace-time basis. The subcommittee to the advisory committee on reconstruction suggests that day nurseries should not only be used for the children of working mothers, but should be developed as nursery schools and should become part of the educational system. The subcommittee lists their advantages to the children as follows:

(1) Supervised play.
(2) Space and adequate play equipment.
(3) Companionship.
(4) Consistent routine.
(5) Careful supervision of health.

I would suggest that there are women already who are working who do not come within the provisions of the various forms of insurance which are given to men. Women teachers and women nurses do not come under the employment insurance benefits which are open to men and I feel that a grave injustice is done to these women in that regard.

For those women who feel that they have not the ability or the education or the skill or the liking for other occupations, there is of course a very large demand that they should work at domestic service. But there again, in that field of women's work, I believe we have to do a great deal to make it attractive to them and to safeguard them. A little while ago I received an interesting letter from a young woman, who addressed her letter from the Y.W.C.A. in Edmonton, Alberta. It was a well written letter, such as would indicate that the writer was an intelligent and well educated girl. I should like to read the first two paragraphs of her letter:

Two or three of us who are in domestic work here are hoping to work up some interest in a union for domestics. We should greatly appreciate your advice.

I have been interested in this work for a number of years, though I have not been able to work at it steadily. I have been working for some months as cook general at the home of Lieutenant-Governor J. C. Bowen and lost my position a few days ago immediately on their becoming aware of my union activities. I was given no notice.

That is not perhaps indicative of the usual way in which capable and good domestic servants are used by their employers, but it indicates that there is no protection in a case such as this for a young woman who has loyally and faithfully served her employer as a domestic servant, and who yet expresses the desire to belong to a union of her choice to protect her rights.

These women wish to protect their rights, hours of labour, pay, the length of time they should be given by way of notice before leaving employment, and so on. I would say there is great need that we should protect women in domestic service. The committee to which I referred a little while ago, the subcommittee of the government's committee on reconstruction, has the following to say regarding the employment of women as domestic servants and in household work:

(1) A standard of proficiency should be set by a training programme financed by the dominion and provincial governments. The cost of training should be borne by the government, but the student should carry her own living expenses with the help—if necessary—of government loans at low interest rates.

(2) A signed agreement made between employer and employee, made through national selective service, would protect both by providing a definite statement regarding wages, termination of employment and other working conditions. Any dominion or provincial labour code should include household workers.

(3) Labour legislation should be amended to include household workers under the minimum wage acts and related legislation.

(4) Occupational branches of social insurance should be open to household workers, that is, unemployment insurance, workmen's compensation.

(5) An organized supply of trained part-time workers should be made available to fill the need for various types of household service. This kind of service is particularly required in homes of moderate income where it is impossible for the housewife wth several children to have full-time assistance.

I realize that the women of this country have not as yet formulated their wishes with regard to these particular problems, but I noticed in the Montreal Gazette, in March of this year that the women of Australia had been far ahead of their Canadian sisters in working out for themselves a certain code embodying their wishes and desires and the demands for which women in Australia will consistently fight until they are successful. I should like to commend the women of Australia for the progressive steps they have taken, and I only wish the women of Canada would see the wisdom of themselves doing something along the same line. From the Montreal Gazette of March 22 I quote the following:

An Australian women's conference here prepared a women's charter which they managed to compress into a mere 5,000 words, but it took them a long time to do it. Further compressed, here it is:

Woman as citizen: No discrimination in respect of the responsibilities and rights of men and women as citizens.

Mother and homemaker: The indispensable service rendered to the community by mothers demands special consideration of fullest maternity services, nursery schools and opportunity for creative work; and, as dependent economic status denies liberty, opportunity and justice to the homemaker, and that economic independence strengthens character, we recommend a personal endowment of a minimum of 30 shillings ($5.50) a week be paid to her by the commonwealth, operating on the same system as child endowment which shall continue.

Woman as voluntary worker to be recognized for her great contribution to the community, and have opportunities, and be given expert training in the social services that she may attain professional status.

Woman in the services be granted the same status, pay, dependents' allowance and other benefits and opportunities offered to men.

Woman in the country be afforded facilities in rail transport, telegraph services, water conservation, special mobile health and baby care services.

Woman in public life to be given opportunity to go forward and stand as candidate for national and international delegations, legislative bodies, diplomatic posts, responsible administration, and as members of boards, and commissions, in order that their potential capabilities may be developed and utilized for the national good.

Woman as peacemaker: The part women have played in their country's struggle to win the war justifies that they be given wide representation at international peace table.

I wish the women of Canada would urge that the same liberties and freedoms, the same justice be accorded to them in this country and that they, too, have the right to represent a part of Canada at the peace table when that happy time comes.

In what I have said to-night, I am of the opinion that were we to grant these further privileges and rights to the women of Canada, it would not mean that they would wish the more to forsake the home. They would rather, I believe, feel that motherhood was their primary duty, and as long as marriage and motherhood was not the only avenue open to them they would, I believe, embrace it with all the more love, feeling that they had chosen it because it was the thing that was nearest and dearest to their hearts. When women do have all the free pursuits of a great nation open to them they will, I believe, become better citizens and, because of that, better mothers, and they will bring to the home the feelings of equality and devotion as the basis for happiness to a far greater degree than they do at the present time.

Before closing I would ask the Minister of Labour to indicate whether or not he is prepared to press the question of equal wages for equal work being made a part of the labour code and enforced in the country.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am afraid my hon. friend is a little out of date. As a matter of fact, it was twelve months ago that I was chairman of the national war labour board, and while I was so acting the principle of equal pay for equal production was laid lown by the board. That in itself was a revolution. I think we were the first free nation that laid down that principle.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What has been done about it?

Mr. MITCHELL: A great deal has been done about it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What, for example?

Mr. MITCHELL: I am not going into the 45,000 cases that come before the board dealing with the employment of men and women in the industrial structure, but as minister I am saying this and it should be enough for my hon. friend, that the principle was laid down by the national war labour board when I was chairman.

Mr. BLACKMORE: One or two examples will be enough.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not carry all these decisions around in my pocket. If my hon. friend is ever unfortunate enough to hold this portfolio he will find it rather difficult himself.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Has the government applied the principle in practice?

Mr. MITCHELL: Not the government but the national war labour board. They are the people who adjudicate on the wage structure. No one knows that better than my hon. friend. Let me pay this tribute to the women. The other afternoon when introducing my estimates I said that without the assistance of the women we could not successfully wage the war. The contribution made by the women of Canada has been magnificent. When I point out that 1,043,000 women are engaged in the industrial structure and that the women in the armed forces number 32,000 and on the farm, 760,000, according to the figures of September last year, hon. members will get an idea of the part played by the women of this country.

As I pointed out before, I was in Great Britain late in 1942, and I vividly remember speaking to the general council of the British trade union congress. I made the observation that the women were doing a better job than the men, and I suppose that is instinctive. In the family circle the women will fight harder for the children than will the average man. Therefore, when the nation or state is in jeopardy it is instinctive that our womenfolk will fight just as valiantly, and perhaps a little more valiantly, for the survival of the race and the state. My hon. friend can rest assured that this government—and I think I can speak for every government in this country and every party in this House of Commons—have just as much interest, and might I say real interest, in the progressive affairs of the womenfolk of this great dominion as anyone else. What my hon. friend said is quite true. Basically, I suppose, it is as old as history itself. Men chase the good-looking girls. That is instinctive. The most natural thing to do, I suppose, as my hon. friend pointed out is settle down and see that there will be someone here two thousand years from now to call this country Canada. That is as old as history itself.

I appreciate the constructive suggestions made by my hon. friend this evening. She can be sure that not only this government but, as I have said previously, every government, whether provincial or municipal, will share the same views as my hon. friend with reference to the rights of the womenfolk in this broad dominion.

Mrs. NIELSEN: I wish to ask one more question. The minister has stated that the national war labour board and the government acknowledged the principle of equal pay for equal work. What happens then when a group of women in a certain factory are not receiving equal pay for equal work? Must they bring their case before the national war labour board?

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend knows this as well as I do. There are ten war labour boards in this country. They are the boards that adjudicate on the question of wages, whether they be men or women for that matter. Any individual engaged in any civilian pursuit has the right as an individual to place her case before either the regional board or the central board. If my hon. friend were engaged in a civilian pursuit she would place her case before the regional board in Saskatchewan, since that is her own province, or if she were engaged in a national industry, before the national board. That is the machinery and that is the mechanics of it. While it is comparatively new, I suppose in the course of time it will develop a greater degree of supervision and will create working standards for men and women in this country.

Mr. LOCKHART: I do not wish to delay the committee very long, but I have one or two questions I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. There have been special medical boards set up in certain industrial areas. I want the minister to pay attention to this inquiry because it is of paramount importance. Medical boards were set up in certain industrial areas outside the regional centres. They were established to examine men in the plants instead of their having to go to the regional district officers or boards. As a result of the tapering off in certain industries recently, a great number of men were examined. In other words, as intimated by the hon. member for Vancouver South, there was a definite move on the part of the army to get thousands of men from industry into the army. That has been accomplished in part. Men hav been examined and moved into the army, men who have had complete mechanical training on all types of machine practice during the whole course of the war. A considerable number of these men have moved into the army because they were in certain types of industry which have tapered off their war production. Would the minister indicate what is to happen to these men who have been trained. It has cost industry a considerable amount to train them. They are going to be extremely useful because the Minister of Munitions and Supply has now demanded that certain types of munitions go back into peak production. Are these men to remain in the army, or will provision be made to have them go back to industry? The minister is probably aware of what I am saying and that it is correct. I wonder what it is proposed to do. Are these highly skilled men to remain in the army, or are they to be brought back to industry to help meet the requirements of the Minister of Munitions and Supply, of which he gave information a week ago? I should like some indication of what is to be done in this case.

Mr. MITCHELL: There are special places where we have boards, places like St. Catharines, Fort William, and so on.

Mr. McIVOR: It has worked well.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, I think it has. I assure my hon. friend that these highly skilled men such as toolmakers, coppersmiths, and so on—I could go on and give a list of these highly skilled trades that take many years to master; it takes years to make what we call a tradesman—will be moved to higher priority industry.

Mr. LOCKHART: They are in the army now.

Mr. MITCHELL: Let me come to that. If my hon. friend will wait for a moment I shall cover that. Do not forget that this is a mechanical war. I think my hon. friend and I sometimes make the mistake of thinking of this war in terms of the last war. This is an entirely different type of warfare. The number of mechanics required to-day is out of all proportion to the number required in the last war. That applies to the army, the navy and the air force. I can assure my hon. friend that any man with mechanical ability or training will find his proper niche in the three fighting forces of this country. As I pointed out earlier, these highly skilled tradesmen, such as toolmakers and coppersmiths, will be transferred to a higher priority industry. It takes many years to produce a toolmaker; but we are seeing to it that they are transferred to a higher priority industry.

I do not think my hon. friend was in the house this afternoon when I made the observation that we have a group of industrial engineers going through the industrial structure of Canada and working in cooperation with employers in an effort to comb out those industries in order to supply the necessary man-power for the fighting forces. There is nothing new about that. That policy has been undertaken in Great Britain for at least the last three years. Of course, they are under the influence of the blitz and the nearness of the enemy, and for that reason a much more rigorous and vigorous campaign is being carried on there than here. I can tell my hon. friend that due regard is being given to the needs of the industrial structure of this country. As I said earlier this evening, there is a limit to our man-power. It is my department that has to make the decision; and in this stage of the war I would say this, outside of those highly skilled trades the needs of the armed forces must, by the very nature of things, come first, unless in the light of future events another policy may seem more expeditious.

Mr. LOCKHART: I wish to ask one more question. Then I am to gather from what the minister says that the very men who have been making munitions of war for four years and have become highly skilled and proficient are now to be taken from those industries and put in the army, navy or air force, and will remain there and that we shall have to go back and train other men or women to do exactly the same job and make exactly the same munitions as were being made in certain plants throughout this country before. I draw that deduction from what the minister says.

Mr. MITCHELL: You are not going to draw that deduction from what the minister says. I am not going to let you get away with that. It is not as simple as that. We are not a gang of waifs and strays or trained seals.

Mr. LOCKHART: Well,—

Mr. MITCHELL: That is all right. Wait a moment. My hon. friend was somewhat vigorous in the question he put to me. I want to try not to be as vigorous as he was.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Mr. LOCKHART: You are talking about trained seals.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is all right. We have a degree of common sense, I think, and that is the yardstick. The men who are going through these plants are sensible men. They are not like ships that pass in the night; they do not just pass through the plants without saying a word to anyone. They are talking to the management of these plants, sizing up conditions in the various industries across this country.

That is that side of it, but there are always two sides to a medal. At the present rate, for various reasons approximately sixty thousand men a year are being discharged from the armed forces, so that we shall have those sixty thousand men coming into our commercial, industrial and agricultural structure with these other men leaving the three important structures in the life of this dominion to take their places. That is the balance.

Mr. LOCKHART: But only a small percentage of the men returning go back into industry, and they are not skilled.

Mr. MITCHELL: I pointed out while my hon. friend was not in the house—

Mr. LOCKHART: I was in the house all afternoon.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think I mentioned previously to-day that I could put 160,000 people at work to-morrow morning if I had them. There has been no serious difficulty up to the present in placing every man who has been discharged from the armed forces. I will go further in that regard. We have a rehabilitation and training plan for men discharged from the armed forces. Notwithstanding the many thousands who have been discharged, up to this date—and I am speaking now from memory—only three thousand have availed themselves of the training facilities made available by the government, which is an indication that all the other tens of thousands have found their way through selective service back into the industrial structure.

Mr. GREEN: It may be that the allowance offered them was not large enough.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am not talking about that now; there will be a time and place to argue that matter. They have found their way back into the commercial, industrial and agricultural structure of this country.

Mr. WHITE: Before the dinner recess I asked the minister a few questions, and we were talking about table No. 7, which the minister explained had been prepared under his direction and which was a complete breakdown of man-power distribution, totalling some 1,665,504. If the minister will look at that table, which appears at page 2451 of Hansard, he will note that the first item gives the total number in the armed forces. The second item refers to men applying for and on postponement, men in "A" category only. Item 3 applies to unfit men, "B", "C", "D" and "E" category, totalling 138,497. The next item covers men unfit for front light combatant duty, namely active service, and includes "B", "C", "D", and "E" categories and rejections on enlistments, and totals 456,185. It appears to me that the men in item 3 have been counted twice, because they also appear in item 4, which distinctly says, "and includes 'B', 'C', 'D', 'E' categories and rejections on enlistment." Therefore, instead of having a total unaccounted for of 49,001, we should add the number appearing under item 3 of this table, or 138,497, which gives a total of 187,498. I wonder what explanation the minister has as to that. I was assured that this was an accurate table, prepared under the minister's own direction.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend is making an after-dinner speech now; I thought we had solved the problem of the 49,001 men.

Mr. WHITE: I am not making a speech at all; I am trying to pry a little information out of the minister.

Mr. MITCHELL: There may be some indication of duplication in those two figures, but there is not any duplication.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend is trying to prove a point but he cannot do so. It so happens that these figures deal with the "B", "C", "D" and "E" men, men on the farms and men in industrial life. Different boards have different ways of approaching this problem, but my hon. friend may rest assured that there is absolutely no duplication.

Mr. WHITE: If the minister does not mind, let me put it in this way. Am I to assume from this table that item 3, which reads, "unfit men, that is, 'B', 'C', 'D', 'E' category," covers all men in those categories in all the administrative districts across Canada. Is that correct?

Mr. MITCHELL: Probably I did not make myself clear. That is item 4.

Mr. WHITE: No; I am dealing with item 3.

Mr. MITCHELL: Those are unfit men on postponement. It is a fact that certain boards give postponements to unfit men. I think there are three boards following that practice, the boards at Montreal, Quebec and Winnipeg.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Are "E" men called up?

Mr. MITCHELL: No, they are not called up; it is just the policy adopted by these boards. They place them on postponement; that is the way they do it, because they are on the farms.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Are "D" and "E" men put on postponement?

Mr. MITCHELL: No; but that has been the policy adopted by these three boards.

Mr. WHITE: In the second item you use the word "postponement" in showing the number of "A" men, but the word "postponement" does not appear in item 3 or 4. I do not see how the minister can place any other interpretation upon it than that item 4 includes all the unfit men in categories "B", "C", "D" and "E."

Mr. MITCHELL: That is right. I have explained about the three boards. The total number of men on postponement is in item 2; that is, fit men in "A" category only, while the unfit men in "B," "C," "D" and "E" categories are in the next two items. The third item covers the number of men actually on postponement; I have told the hon. member about the three boards which leave these men on postponement notwithstanding their medical categories. The fourth item covers men unfit for front-line combat; those are the men coming under the other ten boards. Of course those men are unfit and are not liable to call.

Mr. WHITE: Then do I understand that in "B", "C", "D", and "E" categories there is a number of men on postponement who are unfit for something?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. WHITE: Then there is a second category of "B", "C", "D" and "E" men who are unfit for front line combatant service. Is that right?

Mr. MITCHELL: Item 4 covers men who never applied for postponement but who are unfit.

Mr. WHITE: I must confess that I cannot follow the minister's reasoning, taking it at its face value.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am not reasoning at all; I am stating the facts.

Mr. WHITE: This is the statement to which the minister referred me. He mentioned the confusion I was trying to create and referred me to this statement. Accordingly I examined the statement carefully, and now I am trying to point out how impossible it is to arrive at any correct conclusion from this statement which has been prepared under the supervision of the experts in his department. I still maintain that these 138,497 men are being counted twice, as this statement is prepared.

Mr. MITCHELL: I cannot help the deductions drawn by my hon. friend, but to begin with it would be dishonest to do what he suggests is being done. I may sometimes speak in ignorance in this chamber, but I have never tried to mislead it. Let that be clearly understood by my hon. friend.

Mr. WHITE: What is the difference between a man in category "B" under item 3, and a man in category "B" under item 4?

Mr. MITCHELL: I tried to explain that. What I shall have to do is get a blackboard, I suppose. The answer is that the man in item 3 applied for a postponement and the man in item 4 did not.

Mr. WHITE: Does the minister know what categories are exempted from military service? Does he call only the "A" group?

Mr. MITCHELL: Everything below "A" is exempted.

Mr. WHITE: Then it is not misleading to show that men in "B," "C," "D" and "E" are on postponement? What are they postponed for, if they are not eligible for military service?

Mr. MITCHELL: I have to keep on with this repetition. I think I pointed out that these three boards had that way of dealing with it.

Mr. WHITE: Who gave them authority?

Mr. MITCHELL: And they still have. We just put it in there because they still have that method of procedure. Now, it may be right or wrong.

Mr. WHITE: Where are those three boards?

Mr. MITCHELL: Winnipeg, Montreal and Quebec.

Mr. WHITE: The minister will notice that under items 3 and 4 there are figures for all the administrative districts across Canada, with the exception of Port Arthur. So that now, if the minister is correct when he explains that there were some three boards which exempted men under item 3, how do they appear under all the military administrative districts across Canada?

Mr. MITCHELL: There is an answer to that, too. They all used to do it, and item 3 still does it.

[Mr. White.]

Mr. POULIOT: I do not wish to be misunderstood by the minister, but he will remember that on Tuesday I asked him to table the correspondence between his department and the railway companies regarding draftees with experience as railwaymen?

Mr. MITCHELL: During the dinner recess I got that correspondence. I shall hand it to him now.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the minister for tabling the correspondence, and I shall look into it in due course. I regret it was not tabled before, because I note that it is all mimeographed, and therefore it should have been in the department. The minister was not fair to me when he said that he would have to work twenty-six hours a day to table that correspondence when, in fact, it was mimeographed. I do not believe that the minister does that kind of work. I admit he works hard, but not at that kind of work.

Mr. MITCHELL: Let us get the record straight. I do not think it is mimeographed; if my hon. friend will look at it he will see it is typewritten.

Mr. POULIOT: Even if it is typewritten, it was not the minister who worked at the machine to write it. I will play the game with him; I will be fair with him; but when I ask a question I mean to get the information in time, and especially when it is promised by the minister. I am sure there was some negro in the woodpile who told the minister not to table the correspondence at three o'clock this afternoon, but to wait until late to-night, until after 9.30 in the evening, to let me have it. It could not take a whole year to copy a few letters. The first part is mimeographed, and the second part is probably typewritten. But with the staff the minister has under his direction, it would be very easy to prepare this information. I do not wish to impose work upon him which he is not supposed to do. Everyone knows the minister has not time to do the work of transcription, and I do not expect him to do it. But he has paid officials who are there to do it, at the request of members of the House of Commons, and when information is asked for and is required for discussion, the tabling of that information should not be delayed.

In case I may be told that I do not know what I am talking about, and that the minister is a former railwayman—probably he still belongs to his union—let me say that when I speak of railway employees I do know what I am talking about. In case that is denied, however, let me say that I hold in my hand the most serious railway publication printed on this continent, namely the "Railway Age", published in the United States. This is an old periodical, dating back to 1856, and I find in the recent issue of February 19, 1944, the following editorial respecting new employees and accidents:

Reports of recent accidents continue to emphasize the serious and frequently fatal results that come from mistakes made by new employees. Brakemen and firemen with less than a year's experience continue to prove, beyond any question, that a railroader cannot be made overnight, and that, regardless of the alertness and competence of these men, there is no substitute for experience in railroading.

This situation places an enlarged responsibility upon railway officers and older employees. Increased vigilance is demanded of them to prevent the new men from making tragic mistakes. They must keep everlastingly at the teaching of new men, acquainting them with the complexity of railway operation. They can never assume that a new man knows the railroad, merely because he has been over it several times.

The intimate knowledge of every switch, siding, station and signal that is so necessary to prevent accidents cannot be attained suddenly, and no one except older employees and supervisors make good this deficiency.

While there is much that railways can and should continue to do to meet their needs for competent labour, the final solution to the difficulty lies in the hands of selective service boards. The withdrawal of experienced manpower has reached an extent which cannot be corrected by makeshifts and expedients.

Note the word "expedients."

The selective service board which calmly told a railway in a vital area that a good man could be taught telegraphy and made a train dispatcher in six months presents a typical example, rather than an isolated case, of the sort of ineptitude—

And mark that word.

—that is ruining the railways' ability to maintain their vitally needed transportation.

I am pleased to quote this, because while it was printed in the United States, it deals with similar problems. The article goes on:

Perhaps the railways themselves have contributed to such misunderstanding on the part of those responsible for recruiting men. They have cooperated wholeheartedly with selective service authorities, and have given freely of their best officers and men to the battalions of the military railway service—perhaps inducing the opinion that they had plenty of personnel to spare. This cooperation is laudable—

And I agree with that.

—but it is now even more patriotic to resist the further depletion of the ranks of skilled railway labour.

I agree with that.

Colonel Johnson of the interstate commerce commission merits wholehearted cooperation from the railways in his efforts to awaken the authorities to the grave national danger in depleting railway forces below the point adequate to maintain the nation's war-time transportation.

And then on page 397:

B. & M. Advertises Against Man-power Losses.

Asserting that "you can't run as hazardous and as complicated a business as a railroad with a majority of green men," the Boston and Maine has begun what it terms an "out" in the open approach to the question of man-power deferment. Its answer to those who attack army-age trainmen for being out of uniform, and who charge them with being slackers, comes in the form of an advertisement which now is being run in all newspapers along B. & M. lines.

Entitled "Who says, 'You Can't Fight with a Lantern?'", the advertisement describes railroading as a "tricky business"—"where safe things to do are learned only by experience."

May I remind the minister that this is not a joke; it is a serious matter and this is not the time for him to laugh. The article continues:

For the benefit of the uninformed, the message points out that there are now 3,053 of the 16,000 regular B. & M. employees now in the armed services. Moreover, many of the younger men have sought their release from the railroad, asking that the draft board be notified to cancel their deferments. The railroad reply, it is explained, has been "no," because "if all of them went, it would mean that there'd be chaos—accidents, delays in moving the many important things for fighting men which are being manufactured in New England's war plants."

Is that not what has been said by many hon. members in this house, especially by the member for Temiscouata. I continue:

The advertisement argues that "an experienced trainman on a passenger train isn't just a fellow who opens the door and yells 'Swampscott' and then waves a lantern". He must be familiar with scores of rules, signals and train schedules, that trains can speed with precision and safety. Nor can the experienced trainman on a speeding freight train, who performs his task with unnecessary delay and without accident, be spared. "It's far too important a job to trust entirely to inexperienced men, and it's a job that must have the alertness and the quick judgment of seasoned employees."

So, requests the Boston and Maine, "the next time you see one of our younger employees doing his most important part in the fight to win the war, we ask that you ponder a bit before you say, or think—slacker". "He's in fighting uniform right here at home", says the railroad.

I have this large file containing letters between Mr. Coleman and the Minister of Labour. It starts with a letter from Mr. D. C. Coleman and Mr. Vaughan, the presidents of the two large railways, dated March 31, 1943, addressed to the Minister of Labour, and reading as follows:

Since the outbreak of war in September, 1939, there has been a steady and progressive decrease in the number of trained personnel available for essential railway occupational classifications The calling up of men for military service irrespective of the essentiality of their occupations and the exercise by numerous employees of the right to leave railway service to volunteer for the armed forces have combined to produce in railway ranks a shortage of qualified man-power that has assumed serious proportions.

Is that not what the member for Temiscouata has said repeatedly This is over the signatures of the presidents of both the large railroads. The letter continues:

Efforts of the railways to train replacements have only partially alleviated this condition and it is now clear that any further aggravation of the situation will have such effect upon the operating efficiency of the railways as may in the near future curtail or render impossible maintenance of certain railway services essential to the national war effort.

With a view to formulating a practicable and comprehensive plan to ensure the continued operation of rail transportation services at the maximum efficiency for the duration of the war, representatives of the railways conferred on several recent occasions with officials of the national selective service, mobilization section, at Ottawa. The suggestions made by the railways were sympathetically received and officials of the national selective service, mobilization section, cooperated in every way possible. They pointed out, however, that a permanent solution of this very urgent problem involves a radical departure from the current governmental man-power policy and suggested that the factual data presented to them together with the railways' recommendations thereon should be placed before the government for its consideration and decision.

The railroads were trying to keep their men, and it was a departure from the government policy to take men from the railroads.

The letter continues:

Pursuant to this suggestion there are submitted herewith analytical statements designed to illustrate the magnitude of the existing shortage in essential occupational classifications and the crippling additional drain on railway man-power the current system of call up for compulsory military service will inevitably entail.

At February 28, 1943, there were 24,832 employees of the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific railways in the armed forces of Canada serving at home or abroad or in the merchant navy. Of this number a substantial proportion were engaged prior to enlistment or call in essential occupational classifications. In addition, 33,406 employees now actively engaged in railway work are in the age groups subject to compulsory military call, of whom 21,417 are in essential occupations, and the remainder must be replaced if and when called.

It is the considered view of the railways that any further loss of employees in the essential occupational classifications cannot be sustained without a serious and perhaps disastrous impairment of vital transportation services, and that this threat of a further drain on their already limited man-power should be removed once and for all by governmental action. It is, therefore, respectfully suggested that the government should adopt with the utmost dispatch a policy that will ensure definite deferments of compulsory military service for all railway employees engaged in essential occupational classifications.

The loss of man-power to the armed forces, however, is only one aspect of the situation.

Not only have the railways been faced with the problem of securing suitable replacements for those in military service but owing to the unprecedented war-time demands for transportation they have also had to secure and train large numbers of new employees. Some conception of the magnitude of this task may be gathered from the fact that in 1942 the average number of employees in both the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific totalled 150,623 as compared with 123,671 in 1939, an increase of 26,952 or 21·8 per cent. This compares with an increase of 90·9 per cent in traffic in the same period as measured by the increase in the combined traffic units of the two railways.

Another factor which has contributed to the difficulties attendant upon the maintenance of the high standard of efficiency of Canadian railways during war time is the strain placed upon experienced employees as a result of having to work side by side with inexperienced employees. This places upon the experienced men additiona responsibility especially during the training perod when the new employees are unfamiliar with their duties. Employees such as locomotive engineers, locomotive firemen, conductors, trainmen, yard switching forces, telegraphers, track forces and others, upon whom the safe operation of trains depends, are thus required to labour under most trying conditions. The railways view with increasing concern the consequent impairment, at this time of heavy war-time traffic, in the efficiency of these experienced and essential employees.

Mark that.

The railways view with increasing concern the consequent impairment, at this time of heavy war-time traffic, in the efficiency of these experienced and essential employees.

It goes on:

In addition to the loss of experienced men in the essential occupational classifications the railways have sustained a further depletion in qualified personnel due to the loan to the government either on a full-time or part-time basis of a substantial number of officers and other employees for special war work, and to the transfer of a large number of officers and skilled men to munitions work. These officers and men have been made available regardless of the inconvenience to the railways.

The urgent need for conservation and utilization to the fullest degree of the existing supply of available man-power is recognized by the railways and every effort in that direction has been consistently made since the outbreak of hostilities. A number of men physically fit and willing to continue working are being retained in service after reaching normal retirement age, and likewise in some cases retired employees are being reemployed for the duration. The hours of service in essential occupational classifications have in many instances been extended and certain positions usually reserved for men are now being filled by women. It is the intention to extend these practices as conditions permit. As far as possible the railways are prepared to further extend the transfer of employees to territories where due to fluctuation of traffic temporary shortages exist. However, with the uncertainties involved in traffic fluctuation as between one territory and another and the man-power situation in its present critical stage, the transfer of employees, except as a temporary expedient to meet some particular local emergency, no longer offers the opportunity for full utilization of man-power that it did in the first few months of the war.

Railway officers in conjunction with representatives of the employees are constantly exploring every possible means of making the fullest use of all available man-power in the essential occupational classifications.

The factual data contained in the attached analytical statements have been prepared with the object of presenting a clear picture of the man-power situation of the steam lines of each railway, with separate statements for each of their affiliated activities. Employees have been divided into two classifications: namely, essential occupations and other occupations.

The railways are of the opinion, as already indicated, that in the interests of the national war effort the continued drain on essential railway man-power should be immediately and effectively stopped. Railway employees now serving with the armed services in Canada should be given leave to return to their former essential employment if they so desire.

It is impossible to get them out of the army. Moreover, they are taken from the railway and brought into the army, but when a request is made to get them out of the army and back to the railways it is impossible to get them out.

It goes on:

The only workable and practicable solution of the problem appears to be the adoption of a governmental policy in respect to compulsory military service that will ensure automatic deferment of calls of all railway employees engaged in essential occupational classifications on March 31, 1943.

In view of the seriousness of the situation and the urgent need for remedial action, it is respectfully requested that this matter be dealt with as promptly as possible.

Yours truly,

R. C. Vaughan,
Chairman and President,
Canadian National Railways.

D. C. Coleman,
President,
Canadian Pacific Railway Co.

This letter gives matter for thought. The Minister of Labour then took the right course. He sent a copy of this letter to the three defence ministers. There was an acknowledgement from the minister for the navy, some correspondence from the air ministry, and a memorandum from the Minister of National Defence. Here is what the navy minister had to say in reply, on April 14. I shall not read it all because I have not much time. I shall read a paragraph. If the minister wants the rest put on Hansard I shall be glad to do so. This is what the navy minister had to say:

It is suggested that your department should set out definitely what are considered to be essential services, and instructions could then be issued to the armed forces to the effect that no men employed in any of these occupations shall be taken into the services. As far as the naval service is concerned, any men applying for entry into the service, when formerly engaged in farming, fishing, mining, lumbering, et cetera, are to be fully questioned, and if it appears likely that they will ever need leave to return to their previous occupation, they will not be entered in the service. Furthermore, any men released from the navy to return to their former essential occupation will be discharged, and not reenrolled unless there is a change in the general situation.

If it is desired I shall consider whether instructions shall be issued to the effect that no railway men shall be enrolled in the naval service, and that railway men now in the service may be discharged to resume their former occupation.

Very good. I would not have thought the navy minister would have written a letter like that about this matter to the Minister of Labour. It is a good letter. Now let us see what the minister for air had to say. In the first place, he replied on April 12 that the suggestion was being explored. Then on April 29 he sent a memorandum from his department through the air secretary, as follows:

In answer to your memorandum dated April 12, in regard to railway employees now enlisted in the service, it will be a considerable job to determine the numbers of service personnel with previous railroad experience and investigate the practicability of releasing them to civil occupations.

In view of the fact that the average age of air force personnel is approximately twenty-three years, it is not anticipated that many would fall into the category mentioned in the above letter from the two railroads. The service has already invested a considerable amount of money in the training of any railroad employees of mature years, and their release at the present time would effect an appreciable loss.

Under the new policy now being put forward for the minister's approval, any particular individuals required by the railroad and whose services can be spared will be eligible for discharge to return to civil employment.

That is very good. Now let us see what the Minister of National Defence wrote. He sent the Minister of Labour a memorandum, dated April 26, which reads as follows:

I have your letter of April 6, concerning man-power demands of the railways. I am in general agreement with the terms of your reply to the presidents of the two railway companies but wish to add the following comments.

Demands for exemption of essential workers are becoming daily progressively more numerous. We have discussed miners; the requests of fishermen, railroad men, teachers et al are put forward.

But the point is that, as you know, machinery already exists for postponement of essential workers (section 10 (8) N.S.S. Mob. Regs.).

That is the mobilization regulations. It goes on:

Regarding the suggestion in your penultimate paragraph concerning the setting up of a board: I myself do not see any need for a special board for railway men or any other occupation. Your mobilization boards can dispose of these questions pretty soundly if the evidence is placed before them. In any case, if you have some technical body to advise these boards regarding railway applications, such a body would not be complete without having among its members a representative of national selective service and a representative of the district officer commanding as well; otherwise the board would be entirely one-sided.

I fully recognize the importance of the railroad problem, but I very much doubt whether the army has drawn disproportionately upon the railroads for man-power. The fact that there are still 33,406 employees subject to call indicates that the mobilization boards are acting with due consideration of the transportation demands.

As regards effecting a return to the railroads of ex-employees now in the army, I must point out that personnel in the army here constitute potential reserves to assist in the maintenance of the army programme overseas and it would for that reason be detrimental to the success of that programme to sanction the release of personnel.

What programme? The army programme overseas, precisely the commitments that the Minister of National Defence made while he was in England—what I spoke of this afternoon.

Recognition must also be given to the fact that such personnel have received army training costing time and money and, furthermore, the army is now organizing railway troops for overseas.

Talk about training costing money! How much does one month in the army cost compared with years of salary paid to experienced men in the service of the railways?

May I add this further word purely by way of suggestion because it is out of my "line of country".

There are possible avenues of relief open to the railroads, other than by drawing on the army or taking men who are eligible for service, viz.,

(a) Drawing on civilian industries to which railway employees have gone;

(b) Increase of employees monthly mileage limit;

(c) Reallocation of surplus personnel between east and west as seasonal traffic fluctuates;

(d) More energetic consideration of the retaining of personnel beyond normal peace time superannuation age.

Thank you for calling attention of the railways in your forthright letter to the shortage of men for the armed forces.

Respecting railway employees now in war service: I am led to believe—

1. That most of the former employees now in the armed forces come from the casual or part-time employees of the railroads, and

2. that a substantial proportion of the 25,000 former employees now in war service are from the marine divisions of the companies and serving in the R.C.N. or mercantile marine.

"I am led to believe." Who told him that? What is the proof? It is signed J. L. Ralston. This is the letter of a jingo, and I have read enough to make the mouth of every member water and to make every member anxious to get the whole story. I thought the ministers for the navy and the air were at one with the Minister of National Defence in insisting upon getting men from the railways into the army, but it is not that. Their letters are most reasonable; the only unreasonable letter comes from the head of the Department of National Defence, and that was written last year. Here is the answer that was sent before by the Minister of Labour to the heads of the railways:

I have before me your joint letter of March 31, which was presented in person by Messrs. F. W. Edge and H. D. Brydone-Jack, relative to the man-power situation as it affects the railways.

The problem of the man-power situation as it affects the two major employers composed of the railway systems of Canada is a matter which has been giving the department great concern. We have been aware of your difficulties through reports we have been receiving from our employment offices across Canada. Since the mobilization activity was taken over by the Department of Labour, we have been giving some study to the question of postponements from service for employees in "key" positions. For these reasons I was very glad indeed to have the opportunity of discussing the situation with your chief personnel officials.

I feel that it will not be out of place for me to, at this time, express my keen appreciation of the work the railway companies are doing and despite the considerable expansion in personnel, with a minimum of labour relations difficulties. Many of the labour policies of the government are made possible by the fact that this is so. I wish to go on record and thank you and your officials.

Coming to the question of mobilization of railway employees, we stand ready to give you every possible cooperation in this regard, and the representations will be given most careful study.

There are one or two brief comments I will make at this time.

In the classification of essential positions there are a few occupations which might, in the minds of the members of the mobilization boards, be doubtful. Those of "helpers"; "assistants"; "coal men"; "instrument men"; "work equipment firemen"; "section men" and possibly waiters on dining cars.

Your officials know your requirements better than we do, of course, but it does seem wise at this time to explain that we are terribly short of men for the armed forces.

The second point I wish to make is that in respect to getting new employees which you mention on page 2 of your letter, I would like you to feel that the full resources of the chain of employment offices across Canada are available to you.

The third point I would wish to make is the question of identifying "essential men in essential occupations". Your officials stated that, while section men were listed, it was not the intention that all section men be considered as essential. How are we to identify the essential men from the non-essential? It did occur to me that a board composed of officials of the railways and possibly representatives of the labour organizations might be set up and doubtful cases could be referred to this board.

The last point I would mention at this time is the question of allowing men to return to their occupations who are already in the armed forces. There was some suggestion that older men now in the armed forces be exchanged for younger men in railway service. This idea, if workable, appeals to me; however I will confer with my colleagues who have the responsibility for the armed forces, in respect of this particular point.

Yours sincerely,

Humphrey Mitchell.

"This idea, if workable". The Minister of Labour was reasonable. The only one who spoke like a jingo was the Minister of National Defence. Copies of this letter were sent to the three defence ministers.

I have nothing to withdraw from the praise I have given the minister. I have said that, and I am in full sympathy with him. I think he has the treatment of a dog from the government. It is most unfair to put that responsibility on him, to hear complaints that come from your left, sir, when we know very well that the Minister of Labour does his very best to settle the matter in an amicable way, in a way that would not prejudice the country. It is just because we have one man who has no Canadian feeling, who has priority over his colleague, that it is impossible for him to do his job. We see letters written by two men who are not supposed to be disciples of any nationalist in the province of Quebec or anywhere else, two men who are highly considered by the government, men who have been praised by the veterans themselves.

Why are we complaining so much and fighting the cause of the employees as we have been fighting the cause of the farmers? Why are the brotherhoods and unions dumb now? Why do the unions not do their duty in fighting this case as we do not only on behalf of the men, but on behalf of the railways? I do not know. I have no consideration at all for the leaders of brotherhoods who do not do their duty by fighting for the men and by fighting for the railways, as the chiefs of the railways themselves have done. To-day we poor people have to do that. How many times did I say in the house last year, the year before and in 1941, exactly what is said by both Mr. Vaughan and Mr. Coleman in their letter written last year to the minister? I have never seen that letter before. Is it not a justification of what I have been saying here in the house, justification to which there is no reply at all? I have been doing my duty. I have been fighting for the railways and sometimes I have been abused. I have been called a bad Canadian. I have been told that I do not understand the duty of the country to move reinforcements overseas all the time at the expense of the railways. It was not so long ago—it was yesterday or the day before—that we saw a dispatch in the press to the effect that in Australia man-power had reached rock bottom, that there was no more man-power. It is enough to listen to the letter written by the heads of the railways, men who are in an independent position to speak about this very matter. Then, due to the suggestions—I will say "suggestions"—made by the Department of National Defence there are men who had a month's training, who were brought from the railway to the army where they are rendering much less service than they could render in the railway business. Is that good government? I sympathize with the Minister of Labour. Someone forced his hand; and I deeply regret the importance that is given to the imperialists. I regret it the more because the Minister of Labour has judged the situation as a former railway man. He has understood it and he has put the facts before the war minister.

According to democracy we must have the rule of the majority. In that case they were two against one. They should have decided according to the decision of the two and the one should have been left aside, because the country should not be responsible for the dangerous commitments that he has made in London. They should be disapproved and he should be fired. That is what I have said many times. I cannot stand for it. Here I have as a testimonial two witnesses, the two heads of the two largest railways in this country.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think I should say just a couple of words, not in full reply to my hon. friend. He spoke for forty minutes; I expect to speak for just a couple of minutes.

There is nothing unusual about the letter written by the railroads to myself in connection with the labour situation of these important undertakings. I suppose not a day goes by but what I get a letter couched in a similar vein. There is nothing new in a difference of opinion between individuals; that is why this House of Commons exists. But I wish to say this, Mr. Chairman: if everybody had their way about the withdrawal of men from the armed forces we would not have any armed forces. Let us be clear about that. Again, we have set up the machinery between the railroads of this country and the Department of Labour in order that there might be an orderly withdrawal of man-power from the industry that is necessary under the present conditions.

Notwithstanding what is being said at this very moment, the railroads are moving more freight this very day than they have ever moved in the history of this country. Why are they moving that freight? In the great majority of cases because there is a war on across the Atlantic, because they are supplying the forces that are engaged in this conflict. I want to pay just this tribute to the two main railroad systems of this dominion, a tribute to both the management and employees on the contribution they are rendering at the present time. It is a difficult situation; of course it is. Everything is difficult in war time. There is not an industry in this country that is not going through a difficult period. When I say, "industry" I mean industry in its broadest sense. It includes the farmers and those in commercial life. But it can be truthfully said, notwithstanding the criticism offered by my hon. friend—and I do not have any objection to that—that the railroads and their employees have carried on in what I might term a magnificent way, along with all the other industries; and whether we like it or not, this tightness in the man-power situation will continue until Hitler and that man in the Pacific are defeated.

Mr. CHOQUETTE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I wish to say just a few words before this item is carried. I would not have risen at this time had not the hon. the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) stated on May 1 that a man who works on the farm has only to state that fact in order to obtain a postponement automatically. It is not as simple as that. In the first place, applicants must state the facts in an affidavit, and those who have been granted a postponement are told a few months later that such postponements are no longer valid, and that they must file a new application.

We are told that postponements for farm work are readily granted. I know that such is not always the case. Besides, here is what the minister said on April 28 last, as reported on page 2445 of Hansard. I quote:

> We are now finding it more difficult to fill the army requisitions. As the war progresses it is evident that we will soon have to rely largely upon those at present deferred and the young men coming of age.

And the minister placed on Hansard, at page 2452, table No. 9 from which I take the following figures. From March 20, 1941 to March 31, 1944, 245,443 applications for postponement filed by agricultural workers have been examined; out of that number, there were on the same date, that is on March 31 last, 145,529 postponements still valid. What about the other 100,000 applications which include the postponement applications that were denied and the applications for renewal which were not granted? Therefore, less than three-fifths of the postponements for which applications were made are now valid. This proves conclusively that it is not so easy as he has intimated for farm workers to obtain a postponement.

Now I wish to say a word in regard to the order which was signed on January 28 last and in regard to the Employer's Guide published at the same time, which require every employer to report to the registrar any of his employees who are not in good standing under the mobilization act. This order and these regulations are inhuman, for they compel a brother to report his brother, a father to report his son. The employer is compelled to play an odious part, and if he fails to do so, he is liable, upon summary conviction, to a fine of not less than $25 but not exceeding $1,000 or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years and a day, or to both fine and imprisonment.

I say that this order and these regulations must be repealed because they are antisocial and inhuman.

Mr. Chairman, we cannot be misled any longer, we have overseas conscription in disguise. On March 6, 1944, the government, in reply to a question asked by a member of this house, stated that men who had been called up for home defence, and who had not volunteered for overseas service, were sent to Newfoundland (including Labrador), to the British West Indies, to Bermuda, to Alaska, including Kiska. This is quite clear to anyone with an open mind.

Why does not the minister say to the house and to the country that the man-power pool is being depleted and that he is endeavouring by every possible means to attract men to the armed services?

(Text)

Mr. MICHAUD: In order to complete the record concerning the treatment of railway employees under the mobilization act, I wish to add something to what has been said by the hon. member for Témiscouata. The hon. gentleman has related the first chapter of the story; I should like to take a few minutes to relate the last chapter, which from the point of view of the railways and the railway employees is the most important.

I may preface what I have to say by stating that until the presidents of the two railways made representations in writing to the Minister of Labour, as related by the hon. member for Témiscouata, there was no central office of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company or the Canadian National Railways organized to ask for postponements for railway employees called up for military service. Circular letters had been sent by the Canadian National Railways to district officers from one end of the country to the other, asking them to support applications for postponement when the men called up were considered essential in the operation of the railway. As might be expected, with several divisions and many more subdivisions, there was no uniformity in the interpretation of such essentiality on the part of local or district railway officials. As a result, in some districts railway employees who made application for postponement had their applications endorsed by their superior officers, while in other districts the superior officers would consider people employed at the same work as non-essential. So that dissatisfaction among the railway employees came to the attention of the heads of the railways, and representations were made to the Minister of Labour.

As a result of those representations, national selective service mobilization regulations were given an interpretation, and on June 14, 1943, circular memorandum No. 858 was forwarded to all chairmen and registrars. It has to do with applications for postponements by railroad transportation employees engaged by the Canadian National Railways or the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and the consideration thereof, pursuant to subsections 7, 8 and 10 of section 10 of the regulations. In order to bring about uniformity and afford the railways some relief, the Department of Labour recognized the necessity of giving consideration to employees who were essential in the operation of the railways, instructed the registrars and officials of the mobilization boards to give consideration to representations made on behalf of the employees by representatives of the railways, and for that purpose asked the two railways to set up a committee of responsible men who would pass upon the applications and decide as to the essentiality of the applicants in the operation of the railways. As a result, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company nominated Mr. Brydon-Jack, acting manager of the department of personnel, and the Canadian National Railways nominated Mr. Frederick W. Edge, director of labour relations.

This regulation was put into effect on June 14 and became operative on July 1, 1943. From that date to December 31, 1943, some 2,807 employees of the Canadian National Railways who were called up made application for deferment because they thought their employment was essential. Their applications were passed upon by Mr. Edge and the other members of the committee, and of all those applications for deferment only sixty-eight were not approved by the committee because those men were not considered so essential that they could not be replaced by men not of military age or not subject to military call. This indicates that the new interpretation placed upon the mobilization regulations and the centralization of the consideration to be given by the railways have worked out very satisfactorily at least as far as the Canadian National Railways are concerned. I have not the figures for the period from January 1 to date, but I have been informed that the same proportion of applications have been approved. So that since July 1, 1943, relations between the Department of Labour and the two great railway systems of Canada have been most cordial, and applications for deferment for employees of military age who were considered essential in the operation of the railways have been approved by the board.

Mr. BURTON: After sitting here for a number of days listening to the discussion that has taken place, I have finally grasped something of the enormous task confronting the Minister of Labour, and at this late hour I have no wish to delay further the passing of this item. I should like, however, to mention a few matters to the minister. I am quite prepared to admit that I know very little about his problems and those of labour in the large industrial centres, though, as I say, I have come to realize that those problems must be enormous. But I do wish to draw to his attention the fact that the selective service board does not seem to function to the best advantage in the smaller centres. I shall not go into detail or belabour the point to any great extent, but shall mention only a few cases to show that it is not working satisfactorily in the smaller places.

I have in mind a man in my constituency. This man is beyond military age, and yet he is anxious to do whatever he can. For over a year he has been in correspondence with the national selective service board, but that man still has not had satisfactory placement. Then I know of a young woman who had been in an egg-candling plant. After she had been in that plant for a considerable length of time the work slackened off. She then was laid off for the time being. As a young married woman she proceeded to attend to her household duties. Later on, the manager of the plant asked to have her return to work. She left her home at seven o'clock in the morning, and at one o'clock in the afternoon the selective service officials in that city had not yet prepared the necessary authorization for her to resume work in the plant in which she had been working formerly. I could mention quite a number of cases like that where men and women have suffered the loss of hours of work, through seemingly unnecessary red tape. The loss would be great, if totalled.

Another matter I would draw to the minister's attention is unemployment insurance. In some parts this, too, does not work to the satisfaction of the people in the smaller communities. I shall give one or two examples. For instance, an elevator man receiving only a very small wage contributes to unemployment insurance. He has a family to take care of. Then the elevator is closed down, and he has no further possibility of earning money for several months, until the next crop season comes along. If that man accepts the terms laid down by the unemployment insurance officials under which he must accept employment at some other place, very often he would be working at a rate of pay which would leave nothing for him or his family, after the necessary amounts for living expenses away from home were deducted.

Some other cases were drawn to my attention during the Easter recess. People who had been working at comparatively small wages could not take advantage of the unemployment insurance to which they had contributed, when they were laid off for short periods of time.

I draw these points to the attention of the minister, realizing that his problems are great. The industrial and larger centres may have a more orderly way of working out the details, but I must point out to him that in the smaller centres it is far from satisfactory.

Item agreed to.

National war labour board and regional boards, $522,960.

Mr. GRAYDON: I should like to say something by way of suggestion rather than criticism. It is my view that there should be some better way of distinguishing between the two boards over which the department has control. I refer to the national war labour board and the wartime labour relations board, and make the suggestion that their names are too much alike to permit of a general understanding of their respective functions and duties. I suggest that the minister consider, for public convenience and the convenience of hon. members, and others who may not do business daily with the boards, that a different nomenclature be adopted. They handle entirely different matters, so far as the labour field is concerned. It would be a great help to the public generally if the boards had names which distinguished their duties and functions more accurately than do the names now employed.

Mr. MacNICOL: What are the specific functions of both boards?

Mr. MITCHELL: One deals with labour relations, and the other with wages. The same principle is adopted in the United States. One deals specifically with the recognition of unions and working conditions, and the other deals with wages.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is there any reason why one could not be called a wages board?

Mr. MITCHELL: I shall give thought to the matter, and I thank my hon. friend for the suggestion.

Item agreed to.

Wartime bureau of technical personnel, $200,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: What are the duties of the bureau?

Mr. MITCHELL: That bureau is the selective service for the professional people, such as engineers, technicians and people of that kind. As a matter of fact it was the guinea-pig for selective service. The engineering and professional societies came to see the then Minister of Labour, and the old national labour supply council, and made the suggestion that with their cooperation we might try out the bigger principle of selective service among the professional people.

Mr. MacNICOL: And the officials are located where?

Mr. MITCHELL: In Ottawa, and right across Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: Toronto, Montreal, and so on?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: In selective service offices?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes; and we have an advisory council with representatives of leading societies in Canada.

Item agreed to.

Payments to the provinces in connection with training for aircraft manufacturing, the training of ground mechanics for the R.C.A.F. and providing educational refresher training for R.C.A.F. aircrew personnel, including undischarged commitments of previous years, $1,800,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does "payments to the provinces in connection with training for aircraft manufacturing" refer to technical schools? For instance, in Toronto in the last few years many students have been trained for various work in reference to aircraft production, and have then been sent out to aircraft manufacturing plants.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is correct. The war emergency training programme was a big programme. We spent upwards of $20,000,000 on it, and trained between 330,000 and 350,000 people. We could not have done that without the assistance of every province. In a large degree we used technical schools, and the resources of the various provinces for that purpose. The army, navy and air force use them for basic training in mechanics.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would the students who train at the Toronto technical school, for instance, be paid while they are training?

Mr. MITCHELL: Oh, yes, they are paid.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the school paid for the cost of teaching and other materials supplied?

Mr. MITCHELL: We paid out-of-pocket expenses to all the boards of education across Canada that cooperated.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should like to ask a question with regard to men who had training and the necessary experience in the air force who rose to the rank of commissioned officer and then were found unfit for further operational duties, after which they were eased out of the force. The minister will remember that on Tuesday the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) asked what was being done with commissioned officers who were found medically unfit. I wondered if any provision is being made under this item to give men such as these training which will enable them to fit into other activities.

Mr. MITCHELL: Provision is made under the rehabilitation section, and men discharged from the armed forces can receive training under this plan.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Suppose an officer discharged from one of the armed forces decides to enter one of these schools; would he then be exempt from call-up while in the school?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, absolutely.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I was talking to-day with some boys who are greatly disturbed about the whole situation. It looked to them that the only course which would be open to them would be to enter some other activity in life, wait a few days and then be called into the armed forces and have to go through all the drudgery and misery which an ordinary recruit goes through and then probably not be able to rise to the rank of sergeant. They would thus suffer loss of money and loss of dignity and prestige.

Mr. MITCHELL: If a man has been discharged medically unfit from the army he has a right to enter a training class.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am thinking particularly of the air force.

Mr. MITCHELL: From the army, navy or air force. There is nothing undignified in being a private in the army, navy or air force. I was one myself in the navy during the last war.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Did you go through it twice?

Mr. MITCHELL: I was there all the time, but there is nothing undignified in being a private.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What is bothering these boys is the possibility of having to go through it all again. They have gone through the misery of being a private once and they rose to the commissioned ranks. They are faced with the possibility of having to go through it all again. That sort of thing does not make these boys feel very good and I was just wondering if there is not some way out.

Mr. MITCHELL: I cannot imagine a situation developing such as that to which my hon. friend refers. If a man is discharged as medically unfit from one of the services I would think he is out of that service. As I said earlier this evening, we do not know how this war is going to develop or what may be necessary a year from now. I should not like to project my thought so far into the future. As I said before, however, I cannot conceive, once a man is medically unfit and discharged from the forces, that he will be called back again; that is under normal circumstances.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The minister will remember that when the matter was being discussed on Tuesday the question arose of a man being colour-blind to an extent to render him unfit for operational flights. That might result in his discharge, but it would not unfit him for duty in the army, and the result is he would be called up as soon as he got out of the air force.

Mr. MITCHELL: I would say that it is every man to his own last. I am running the Department of Labour, not the air force, navy or army. They have their own departments to worry about. Giving my own opinion only, I can see many reasons why a man might become unfit to operate an aeroplane or carry out some specialized task in any one of the services, although he might be perfectly efficient for some other job. I think I referred to seasickness the other day. I suffered from it myself and I know what it is like. I can quite understand where a man would be discharged from the navy because he could not stand the motion of ships. There are many admirals in the British and other navies who suffer from seasickness. If such a man were discharged from the navy he might prove to be A1 for the air force or the army.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The difficulty arises from the fact that he may have risen in the ranks beyond the rank of sergeant. Then he is discharged and he finds he has to start all over again. I wonder if there is not some course of training he could take so that he would not have to go through that drudgery again.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have tried to be as plain as I possibly can. I understand that the air force have personnel advisers to advise their men as to what vocations they should follow when they leave the air force, and that there are developments along similar lines in the other arms of the fighting forces. We have to train them.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I understand the implication of the minister's remarks to be that where a man has entered one service and has done his bit, he ought to be entitled to go home and enjoy a bit of peace.

Mr. MITCHELL: I agree with that.

Item agreed to.

To assist in meeting the extra costs of universities in accelerating courses in medicine and dentistry and to provide financial assistance to students who are ineligible for assistance under-dominion-provincial student aid plan, $300,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does this apply only to professional men who are going into the armed forces?

Mr. MITCHELL: We have some control here. It applies to medicine, dentistry and the sciences. When the courses are completed the men who are fit have to go into the services. If they are not fit to enter the services we have the right to direct them where they will be most necessary, to industry or to other forms of endeavour in the war effort.

Mr. BURTON: How many students are involved in this plan?

Mr. MITCHELL: I have not the statistics in front of me, but I shall be glad to give them to my hon. friend to-morrow.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Vocational training for discharged members of Canada's armed forces, including undischarged commitments of previous years, $780,000.

Mr. PERLEY: I should like to have a little information with respect to this item. How many of these vocational training schools have been established, particularly in the west? How many are taking courses at the present time? There seems to be some misunderstanding with respect to these courses. I have had some correspondence with the superintendent of vocational training in Ottawa and also with the district rehabilitation board at Regina. They started one of these schools in my home town, so that I know whereof I speak. Under the arrangements made with the man who took on the job of giving this training, provision was made for eight men. Six turned up to take the course, with the understanding that when they had completed a four months' course they would be given some assistance in becoming established and starting up. The course was in shoemaking, harness-making and repairing. Quite a lot of expense was gone to in changing over the premises and equipment, and then when one of the men who were taking this course was ready to start up for himself, he rented a place at Whitewood and prepared to start. Then he was informed that he could get no assistance. Of course it came to the attention of the others who were taking the course that possibly they would not get any assistance in starting up when they had completed the course. There evidently must have been some misunderstanding, in which the man in charge of the school shared, because it was understood by them all that they would get assistance in establishing themselves once they had completed the course. What are the arrangements made with those taking these courses? Also, how many of these vocational schools are being set up in Saskatchewan? I have correspondence here between the men and the department, but it is late and I shall not read it. It is, however, evident from the correspondence that there must have been a misunderstanding. The department says in one of its letters that it is surprised that the man in charge of the school had the impression that the men were to receive assistance in starting up. I presume the facts as to what was paid for turning over the establishment are confidential. I repeat my question. What arrangements are made with the men who are taking these courses? Are they to get any assistance when they are ready to start up for themselves, or are they not? I hold in my hand a bulletin entitled, "Post-war Planning Information," got out, I presume, by the minister's department, and it is clear from this pamphlet that the men taking the course were to get assistance, not only so much a day for their keep and expenses while taking the course, but other assistance. How many similar courses have been started in Saskatchewan?

Mr. MITCHELL: We do the training and the placing of the men. Any further assistance would be under the jurisdiction of pensions and national health.

Mr. PERLEY: I will read the last paragraph on page 2 of this pamphlet, "Post-war Planning Information". It states:

> The reestablishment orders provide six types of maintenance allowances, plus other financial assistance, to ex-service men and women. . . .

And so on. Then it gives the rates for a single person, for a married person and so on, and it says that assistance will be given when they have finished their course.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The six types of maintenance referred to are the benefits under the order in council. My hon. friend is probably quoting from one of the regulations with reference to benefits while the men are undergoing the training courses, so much for a married man, so much for a single person. I have not the exact figures, but approximately three thousand men who have been discharged from the forces have taken these courses. I shall be able to give my hon. friend the exact figures when my estimates are before the committee, also information as to the nature of the courses given and the places where they are being taken. We also give vocational guidance. The Department of Labour does the actual training for us. The benefits are given by the Department of Pensions and National Health, and the counselling is done by our expert advisers.

Mr. PERLEY: I have the correspondence here and I am prepared to pass it over to the minister. I know some of the boys who are taking these courses, and in view of the misunderstanding, I think they should be given some assistance in starting up for themselves. One fellow has finished his four months' course, and if the others are to be told that they will not get the assistance which they were promised in starting up after completing their course, it would hardly be fair to them because they certainly understood that they were to get such assistance. Even the man in charge understood it that way. Therefore I ask that special consideration be given to these men. I make the suggestion that the men who have finished their course be given assistance in establishing themselves, with the understanding that it shall be repaid, if necessary, after a certain given time, perhaps so many months. One fellow who has finished his course has a good chance to start up now in Whitewood. I make the plea that these men be given this assistance.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Will my hon. friend send me over that circular?

Mr. PERLEY: I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. FAIR: What percentage of the men who took the training have found employment?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): A very high percentage. I have not the exact figure with me, but I shall be glad to get it for my hon. friend.

Mr. GREEN: Is there any provision for giving this vocational training to men who are in pensions hospitals? The suggestion has been made to me that men in pensions hospitals are unable to get different types of courses such as educational courses, training in handicraft and work of that type.

Mr. LaFLECHE: As soon as my estimates are before the committee I have a statement to make which I am sure will satisfy my hon. friend that the men in the hospitals of my colleague the minister of pensions do get the benefit of the Canadian Legion educational services. I speak with assurance because I have been inquiring into that matter for the past two days.

Mr. GREEN: I am referring to vocational training, which is a different matter from educational training. What provision is made for giving vocational training to men in hospitals?

Mr. MITCHELL: We just train in the field, not in institutions. I would assume that my hon. friend's question should be directed to the Minister of Pensions. We are training thousands of people, but we do not go into institutions.

Mr. GREEN: Is there any reason why vocational training could not be given to men in hospitals?

Mr. MITCHELL: No. I quite agree with my hon. friend. They may be doing it now; I do not know.

Mr. GREEN: Can the minister find out about that and let us know to-morrow?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is this money paid to the individual who is being trained or to the people who are training the individual?

Mr. MITCHELL: It is paid to the provinces, as follows: Nova Scotia, $30,000; New Brunswick, $30,000; Quebec, $127,000; Ontario, $225,000; Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, $67,500 each. That is a tentative allotment.

Mr. FAIR: That is, $67,500 to Alberta and each of the other western provinces?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

CANOL PROJECT

DEVELOPMENT OF OIL RESOURCES OF NORTHWEST AND YUKON TERRITORY

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): I wish to table an order in council relating to certain changes that are being made in the present arrangements with the United States government and Imperial Oil Limited with respect to oil development in the Northwest Territories, and in doing so to give the house a somewhat lengthy statement of the whole matter as it stands at the present time.

In tabling a copy of an order in council that has been passed relating to the development of the oil resources in the Northwest and Yukon Territories, I wish to make for the government the following explanatory statement. The members of the house will recall the exchanges of notes between Canada and the United States in reference to the Canol project. They were the following:

1. Exchange of notes June 27-29, 1942.

2. Exchange of notes August 14-15, 1942.

3. Exchange of notes December 28, 1942-January 13, 1943.

4. Exchange of notes January 18, February 17, March 13, 1943.

May I point out that the Canol proposals were first considered early in the year 1942. Less than six months before, the United States fleet had suffered heavy losses at Pearl Harbor; the disastrous losses of Hong Kong and Singapore followed, and the menace of Japanese submarines appeared on the west coast of North America. Shipping losses were heavy and tankers scarce. Japanese forces were in the Aleutians. The prospect of intensified submarine warfare and the possibility that it would be concentrated in an attack against coastal tanker shipments became a vital and primary consideration. In the circumstances the Canadian government readily acquiesced in the proposals of the United States government.

Under the first and second exchanges of notes approval was given to the United States government to:

(a) enter into contracts with a Canadian company to be selected by it, to drill wells on the leases and permits the company held or might later acquire, in order that the necessary supply of oil might be found;

(b) construct a pipeline from Norman Wells to Whitehorse in the Yukon, capable of carrying 3,000 barrels of oil daily;

(c) erect refinery facilities at Whitehorse:

(d) erect oil storage at Prince Rupert and construct a pipeline from Skagway to Whitehorse.

Under the third and fourth exchanges of notes approval was given to the United States to carry out an extended exploratory and drilling programme throughout the Northwest Territories and Yukon for the purpose of endeavouring to find additional sources of oil capable of producing from 15,000 to 20,000 barrels daily to supplement the supply from Norman Wells.

I have only briefly summarized the exchanges of notes as they are available to any member who may wish to read them.

The members of the house are familiar with the oil development that had taken place at Fort Norman. A number of petroleum locations were staked in 1914 some fifty miles below Fort Norman on the Mackenzie river and leases of certain of them were acquired by the Northwest company, a subsidiary of the Imperial Oil Limited. During the period between 1920 and 1925 that company drilled wells on its leaseholds and oil was discovered in commercial quantities. Owing to the distance from markets these wells were capped and remained closed until 1932 when they were opened to meet the demand for fuel oil and gasoline created by the mining of radium-bearing ores at Great Bear lake. An increase in consumption also arose from the opening of the Yellowknife mining field and as a result the company drilled further wells and installed additional refinery equipment.

At the beginning of the year 1942, five wells had been drilled and a refinery capable of processing 800 barrels of oil a day had been installed. By that time the company had expended approximately $1,500,000. The average production from 1932 to 1942 was about 20,000 barrels a year, or approximately 340 barrels a day during the summer season.

Following the understandings reached by the two governments, the United States War Department entered into contracts with Imperial Oil Limited. These contracts required the company to deliver 3,000 barrels of oil daily at stated prices, the United States government financing under certain conditions the costs of developing the additional deliveries of oil.

To facilitate the carrying out of the terms of the contracts, an area within a radius of fifty miles surrounding Norman wells was reserved and new regulations for the disposal under permit of petroleum and natural gas rights were established to apply to the reserved area. Subsequently, for the purpose of facilitating the search for the additional supplies of oil, the scope of the new regulations was extended to cover all of the Yukon Territory and that portion of the mainland of the Mackenzie district, Northwest Territories, lying west of a line seventy-five miles east of and paralleling the Mackenzie river from its mouth to Fort Providence and thence south to the northern boundary of Alberta. In view of the special nature of the development that was contemplated under the new regulations, provision was made that one-half of any location upon which oil was discovered, and any improvements thereon, would remain in or become the property of the crown.

In order to carry out its extended program of drilling and search for additional supplies of oil, Imperial Oil Limited acquired under these special regulations permits covering in all about 140,000 acres in the vicinity of the original discovery wells. An intensive drilling programme was carried out in the area immediately adjacent to the producing wells and as a result a proven field of oil has been delimited, comprising approximately 4,500 acres, estimated to contain from 30 to 60 million barrels of oil. The opinions of geologists differ as to the amount of the recoverable oil. The actual size of the pool will only be determined as further wells are drilled and it is found how much of the oil lying under the Mackenzie river can be recovered. Since the commencement of the Canol project, 40 wells have been drilled and of these 33 are producing oil. The present daily output of the field is about 3,900 barrels, which will be increased as additional wells are drilled.

Approximately one-third of the proven field is included in the old leases held by the company and two-thirds in the permits acquired under the special regulations, in which the crown has a one-half interest. Considerable exploratory work was carried out on the permit area outside the proven field. Some drilling was done on one likely structure but no oil was found.

While the drilling programme and the search for oil was going on, the United States War Department proceeded with the construction of the pipelines from Norman and Skagway to Whitehorse and also the supplementary pipelines and, as well, erected the refinery at Whitehorse and the storage facilities at Prince Rupert. During last summer an extensive geological exploratory programme was also carried on around the Norman wells and elsewhere in the Northwest Territories. The United States War Department has reported that $134,000,000 has been spent on these projects.

The above is a brief summary of the situation as it existed a few months ago when the United States government informed us that it desired to modify the original plan it had in mind for the finding and development of large sources of oil in northwestern Canada. Representations were made that because of the change in the military and strategic picture in the north Pacific—in fact in the whole eastern Pacific—the project from a military point of view had become of less importance. The pipeline from Norman Wells to Whitehorse had only a daily capacity of from three to four thousand barrels. It was suggested there were now no military considerations which would necessitate increasing its capacity. It was further suggested that there was no justification for the United States government continuing the exploratory and drilling programme, other than the drilling necessary to maintain the supply of oil for the existing pipeline. The proposal involved the withdrawal of the United States from the exploratory programme and a renegotiation of the contracts with the Imperial Oil Limited. The United States government considered that in view of the very large expenditures that had been made, it should be entitled to obtain from the company an option to purchase after the war at a fixed price a substantial amount of oil from the proven field and from new fields to be found by the company.

The company was prepared to renegotiate the contracts and to grant the option, but first wished to reach an understanding with the Canadian government as to the method by which the respective shares of each in the proven field and the area under permit would be developed and, as well, to ascertain the terms of the regulations to be established for the development of the oil resources of the rest of the Northwest Territories and Yukon.

It has already been pointed out that the present pipeline has a capacity of from three to four thousand barrels daily or, in other words, not more than one million barrels a year can be transported to market. It is obvious that a much larger pipeline would be required to make a commercial operation feasible. In view of the difficult country through which it passes, the costs of operation and maintenance will undoubtedly be very high. For the same reason the cost of constructing a larger pipeline will be great. It has been estimated that it would cost at least $60,000,000 to construct a pipeline of the size required to permit commercial operation. It is also estimated that a reserve of not less than 300,000,000 barrels would have to be found to warrant such a large expenditure.

It therefore became necessary for the government to consider what regulations should be established for the exploration and development of the oil resources of this hitherto little developed part of Canada. There are approximately 100,000,000 acres of land warranting exploration for oil. May I remind the members of the house that Fort Norman is near the arctic circle, more than 1,100 miles by air and nearly 1,500 miles by land and water north of Edmonton. The closest outlet for oil is across the mountains to the Pacific, 700 miles away. Even when it reaches the coast it will have to be transported by tanker as far south as southern British Columbia before it reaches any substantial market and then it will come into competition with the oils of southern California. Because of the remoteness of the region from markets, the climatic conditions, and the difficulties of transportation, very much heavier expenditures will have to be incurred in exploring for and developing new fields than in the more settled parts of Canada. Regulations should therefore be established which will encourage exploration and development on a sound economic basis. Canada is dependent upon the outside world for more than 85 per cent of her requirements of oil. It is therefore important that new sources should be discovered. To the extent that the oil of the Northwest Territories can meet the requirements along the Pacific coast, so it will assist in easing our dependence on supplies from the United States.

The order in council which has been tabled sets out briefly the arrangement proposed to be made with the Imperial Oil Limited in regard to the proven field and the rest of the area now under permit. It also briefly summarizes the conditions to be imposed in the new regulations which will be passed immediately for the future development of the oil resources in the Northwest Territories and Yukon.

The agreement with the company will fix the share of the dominion in the proven field at one-third. The field shall be developed by the company as a unit operation, the company to furnish all the funds necessary therefor and the government to pay its one-third share of the actual direct cost of producing the oil, plus a management fee of 10 per cent. In addition to receiving a one-third share of the oil, the government is entitled to a royalty of 10 per cent on the one-third share included in the old leases. For accounting purposes it was decided to make the royalty applicable to the company's two-thirds share and the rate therefor was fixed at 5 per cent.

The government also has agreed that the company may give an option to the United States government to purchase for its own use but not for resale at cost plus 20 cents a barrel, an amount up to one-half of the oil recovered from the proven area, not exceeding 30,000,000 barrels, and that, in making up this one-half, the company may draw upon the government's share to the extent of one-third. The option is to be subject to the prior and preferred supplying of all the local requirements for oil and oil products. It should be mentioned that under the option the United States government will be required to take its oil currently as the field is produced, at the rate of 20 per cent of the total amount currently produced from the proven area for export.

The option is also subject to the condition that if the United States government does not desire to take its share currently, then the company shall be entitled to sell such oil on its own account, in which case the United States government would be entitled to any difference between the cost of production, plus 20 cents per barrel, and the average sale price received by the company for oil sold by it during the period in question.

In respect to the balance of the permit area, it is proposed that the company shall be entitled to exchange the permits now held for a new exploratory permit to be issued under the proposed new regulations. Such permit shall be subject to the terms and conditions thereof, except that in addition to paying the royalties to be provided for therein, the company will pay to the government 10 per cent of the net profit derived by it from any operation carried on within that area, the profit to be computed as part of the royalty before the payment of income tax.

The government has also agreed that the company may include in the option to the United States government the right to purchase 10 per cent of any oil that may be found in the remainder of the permit area or in any other areas that may be taken up by the company under the new regulations, until a total of 60,000,000 barrels is reached, including that to be obtained from the proven field. The same conditions as stated above will apply to the United States government taking the oil at the rate of 20 per cent of the total amount currently produced. The total option, therefore, is limited in time; that is, it will expire approximately twenty years after a commercial pipeline has been constructed.

In respect to the new regulations to be established, the order in council sets out briefly some of the more important conditions that will be imposed. It is to the general advantage of Canada that an active program of exploration and search for oil should be carried out in order that new sources may be found and developed. The regulations will make available to all companies and individuals the opportunity of exploring and developing these resources.

In drafting the regulations it was necessary to keep in mind the remoteness of the country and the difficulties of operation. They must be sufficiently attractive to encourage exploration and development but at the same time the interest of the crown must be protected. Provision is being made for exploration permits of substantial size, provided a real effort is carried out to search for oil and to develop it when found. Very large expenditures will have to be made before a sufficient quantity of oil is found to warrant the building of a commercial pipeline to the nearest market. It may be many years before there will be any return on the capital invested. Further, there is no definite assurance that the required reserve of oil for the larger pipeline will ever be found. The rate of royalty, therefore, is being fixed on a somewhat smaller scale during the initial period of the development, the rate for the first five years being 7½ per cent for the second five years 10 per cent, and thereafter 12½ per cent.

The regulations will also provide for development being carried on in accordance with the best conservation practices. In addition, provision is being made to control the prices to be charged for petroleum and petroleum products sold for use in the territories.

The right is given to any lessee to construct and operate pipeline to the nearest market and for the purposes thereof a free right of way will be granted over crown lands. All pipelines shall be operated as common carriers under such regulations as the governor in council may impose.

Finally, the government will reserve the right to take possession at any time of all or any part of the areas held under permit or lease, together with the improvements, buildings and equipment thereon, including any pipelines that may be constructed, compensation being paid to the owner. Failing an agreement as to the amount of compensation it will be fixed by the exchequer court.

In conclusion may I say that now the urgency for finding new supplies of oil in the northwest for immediate military purposes has diminished, there are reasons why we should facilitate the withdrawal of the United States from those activities which were commenced when the urgency was critical. We are fully compensating the United States for the expenditures on the airfields constructed in the northwest which were made use of in connection with the Canol project. Upon the completion of the arrangements I have just outlined the participation of the United States in the exploratory and drilling programme, except in the proven field, will be terminated. The United States will still be interested, with the company, in maintaining the necessary supply of oil from the proven field for the existing pipeline and, as well, will operate and maintain the pipelines, refinery and storage facilities. All these operations will probably continue until the end of the war, when they will be dealt with in accordance with the conditions set out in the exchanges of notes.

I would like to add one further word. The government appreciates its responsibilities in doing everything possible to augment the supplies of petroleum on the north American continent. A country such as Canada which imports 85 per cent of its oil must energetically carry on the search for new sources of supply. I have confidence in the prospects of finding additional large fields in the northwestern part of Canada. While it is unfortunate the field developed at Fort Norman is too far away at present to supply the needs of central Canada and particularly the needs of the prairie provinces, there is reason to expect that favourable structures may also be found in the vicinity of Great Slave lake, close enough to justify the construction of a pipeline to the south. So far as this government is concerned, we propose to assist and facilitate the development of these resources in every way possible.

Mr. COLDWELL: Under what authority was this order in council passed? Was it passed under the authority of the War Measures Act?—because I think it is of sufficient importance to have been the subject of ratification by statute in this house, when such a tremendous asset is being given away, and largely to one very large corporation. I realize the necessity of making an agreement with the United States government, but I object to anything of this sort being done by order in council when the house is sitting.

Mr. CRERAR: May I say in reply that my hon. friend does not state the facts correctly—although it may make a good impression in the country—when he says we are giving away these large resources.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is exactly what you are doing.

Mr. CRERAR: No; we are providing for the development of the resources, and providing for it under conditions which we think adequately protect the public interest.

Mr. COLDWELL: But the house should decide that.

Mr. CRERAR: The government has power to do it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. CRERAR: Oh, yes.

WAR LABOUR BOARD

INTERNATIONAL RAILWAY SERVICES—AUTHORITY TO APPROVE WAGE ADJUSTMENTS

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I lay on the table a copy of P.C. 3277, passed on May 4, 1944. This is an order which gives the National War Labour Board authority to approve adjustments of wages paid to persons in Canada engaged in international railway services.

STANDING ORDERS

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Mr. W. H. GOLDING (Huron-Perth) moved:

That the first report of the standing committee on standing orders, presented to the house on Tuesday, May 2, 1944, be now concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS

WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH OF AMERICA IN CANADA

Mr. G. J. McILRAITH (Ottawa West) moved the first reading of bill No. 92, to incorporate Wesleyan Methodist Church of America in Canada.

Mr. GRAYDON: I should like to ask the hon. member who is introducing this bill to explain it. Apparently it relates to church affairs and perhaps the house should have some explanation.

Mr. McILRAITH: Mr. Speaker, this bill provides for the incorporation of the Wesleyan Methodist Church of America in Canada. The church has been in existence in Canada since the latter part of the last century, and has some fifteen branches in Ontario and three or four in Quebec. In matters of organization, discipline and doctrine they are affiliated with and come under the Wesleyan Methodist Church of America conference. I understand that this church was not one of those that came under church union. I do not know that there is much I can usefully add.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PATENT APPLICATION OF CLAUDE H. PETERS

Mr. G. J. McILRAITH (Ottawa West) moved the first reading of bill No. 94, respecting a certain patent application of Claude H. Peters.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the hon. member to explain the purpose of this bill?

Mr. McILRAITH: The purpose of the bill is to relieve the applicant, Claude H. Peters, from the prejudice caused to him by the failure of the registered Canadian patent attorneys through whom he filed his application to carry out their duties in connection with the application. In April, 1939, Mr. Peters' United States attorneys sent to the Ottawa office of a firm of Canadian patent attorneys, duly registered as fit to practice before the patent office, all the papers and a cheque for the fees required to enable the filing of an application for a Canadian patent. The attorneys in question acknowledged the papers and cashed the cheque, but instead of filing the application at once, as they should properly have done, they withheld filing until nine months later.

The Canadian application corresponded to a United States application filed in January, 1938. The patent on this application was issued in May, 1939, and under section 26(2) of the Patent Act, 1935, barred the grant of a patent on any subsequently filed Canadian application. In December, 1940, the patent office rejected the Canadian application on the ground of the previous issue of the corresponding United States patent. The Canadian patent attorneys in question neither reported this rejection to Mr. Peters nor to his United States patent attorneys, nor did they make any answer to it within the statutory period provided by the Canadian act. Mr. Peters' application accordingly became abandoned in June, 1941.

If the Canadian patent attorneys in question had fulfilled their duties towards Mr. Peters and had filed the application, neither of the present objections to the issue of a patent, namely, late filing and abandonment, would have existed. The bill goes no further than is necessary to overcome these two objections. It provides that the application shall be deemed to have been filed on the day before the issue of the corresponding United States patent and to have been duly prosecuted within the statutory time limits. It directs the commissioner to consider and act on the application accordingly. If, as a result of such consideration, the commissioner finds other objections to the grant of a patent on the application, the bill does not affect his authority in this connection. I might add that the firm of patent attorneys concerned were subsequently stricken from the list of registered Canadian patent attorneys.

Mr. GRAYDON: On these grounds?

Mr. McILRAITH: Yes.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

THE EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN AUGUSTANA SYNOD OF NORTH AMERICA

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre) moved the first reading of bill No. 95, to incorporate the executive board of the Canada conference of the Evangelical Lutheran Augustana Synod of North America.

Mr. GRAYDON: I know that my hon. friends wants to explain this bill, and he should have an opportunity to do so.

Mr. MAYBANK: I have no desire to rise to explain this bill, because there is very little explanation to be given. The bill is to provide for the granting of a charter to a church organization which needs such a charter in order to carry on its evangelical work in the best manner possible. This bill has had numerous counterparts in days not so far past. Every once in a while a bill similar to this is presented to the house to provide for a charter for some religious organization to permit the carrying on of its work. That is all there is to it.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FIRST READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 93, to change the name of The Discount & Loan Corporation of Canada to Personal Finance Company of Canada.—Mr. Boucher.

Bill No. 96, for the relief of William Cowie. —Mr. Hill.

Bill No. 97, for the relief of Nita Marjorie Hammerich Ward.—Mr. Casselman (Grenville-Dundas).

Bill No. 98, for the relief of Margaret Kirsen Brown MacRae.—Mr. Casselman (Grenville-Dundas).

Bill No. 99, for the relief of Margaretha Cronauer.—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City).

Bill No. 100, for the relief of Henry Rattigan. —Mr. Fulford.

HOUSING

EXTENSION TO WINNIPEG OF HOUSE CONVERSION PLAN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Some questions were asked me a few days ago about the extension of the housing conversion plan to the city of Winnipeg. I may say that an order in council has now been passed adding Winnipeg to the list of cities eligible for the application of this plan.

SHELL FILLING PLANTS

CHERRIER MUNITIONS—DEFENCE INDUSTRIES LIMITED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I should like to ask the Minister of Munitions and Supply a question with regard to a press reference to the fact that the Cherrier munitions plant, heretofore operated under the management of Canadian Car Munitions Limited, is about to be turned over for management to Defence Industries Limited. Is the minister in position to explain the reason for this change?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): The change is simply a redistribution of management. The Canadian Car and Foundry company are operating a number of munitions plants. Recently they have been called upon to open shell capacity that has been closed and they have also suffered the loss of their general manager by death. Canadian Car Munitions asked to be relieved of the operation of this particular plant. The other shell filling plant is operated by Defence Industries Limited and after some pressure Defence Industries Limited agreed to extend its responsibilities to the operation of the Cherrier plant. The advantage of the new arrangement of having all shell filling plants under one management is that the allocation of work to the plants will be simplified.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Thursday, May 4, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

Vocational training for discharged members of Canada's armed forces, including undischarged commitments of previous years, $780,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: In regard to the latter part of this item, "including undischarged commitments of previous years", may I ask why these commitments of previous years were undischarged?

Mr. MITCHELL: The undischarged commitments amount to $30,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: Then this item of $780,000 consists of one item for $750,000, and an item of $30,000 for undischarged commitments of previous years—is that it?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes. Yesterday the hon. member for Qu'Appelle asked a question as to assistance being given to shoemakers taking a course in his province. While this matter comes under the Department of Pensions and National Health, we thought it would be just as well to give an answer to the question to-day. Such assistance is available under section 7 of our post-discharge order, which authorizes the minister to pay a weekly maintenance grant to veterans engaging in an enterprise of their own and awaiting returns from it. No provision exists at the moment for the advancement of capital to enable them to set themselves up in business, but this question is at present under consideration by a subcommittee of a general advisory committee. The member for Qu'Appelle wanted to know if any promises had been made to the particular soldiers to whom he referred last evening as to giving them assistance in setting themselves up in business.

The hon. member for Battle River asked what percentage of the returned soldiers who have taken vocational training have found employment. The answer is that there is not the slightest difficulty in finding employment for those who have been trained. The training is objective in character and directed towards specific employment opportunities.

The hon. member for Vancouver South asked about vocational training in the hospitals. Vocational training in the full sense of the term is not and never has been given in active treatment hospitals. Occupational therapy, including handicrafts, is provided by the department for the restoration of lost or impaired functions. When the men reach the stage where they are physically capable of undertaking a course in vocational training, they will be ready for discharge to convalescent or reconditioning centres, where adequate provision is being made for training courses. In the meantime they can learn the principles of the trade in which they are interested through the medium either of correspondence courses available through this department or Canadian Legion textbooks. I stated that 3,000 have availed themselves of training; it should be 3,091.

The hon. member for Humboldt asked a question with reference to assistance to students, and with the permission of the committee I would ask to have this table printed in Hansard.

The CHAIRMAN: With the unanimous consent of the committee.

Mr. PERLEY: The minister has replied to one of the questions I asked last night with reference to assistance to those taking a particular course. I have a letter here from one of the vocational training superintendents in Ottawa, which states that depending on the length of service it may be possible to give assistance to trainees who start up their own business, under benefit No. 3. I have not the pamphlet under my hand from which I quoted last night, but I assume that under that benefit they would be eligible for the assistance in setting themselves up in business which they certainly understood they were going to get.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes. I understood my hon. friend to say that this course was only a four months' course. They are entitled to a total of fifty-two weeks, and if they do not exhaust all the benefits of vocational training they are then entitled to benefit No. 3 while they are awaiting returns from the enterprise. That is the additional assistance my hon. friend referred to last night.

Mr. KNOWLES: Has the Minister of Labour secured the information I asked for a week ago to-day, when I suggested that the statistics on page 799 of Hansard as to the total applicants registered at employment offices be brought up to date?

Mr. MITCHELL: I have those figures here, if my hon. friend would like to have them.

Mr. KNOWLES: Can they not be placed on the record?

Mr. MITCHELL: They would fill up nine or ten pages of Hansard.

Mr. KNOWLES: The information given on page 799 of Hansard covers six different periods and takes only one page of Hansard.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have a summary here which I shall be glad to have printed in Hansard, with the permission of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN: With the consent of the committee.

Mr. MITCHELL: The summary is as follows:

Total applicants registered at employment and selective service offices by provinces as at March 2 and March 30, 1944, were as follows:

	March 2, 1944	March 30, 1944
Prince Edward Island	287	219
Nova Scotia	2,233	2,098
New Brunswick	1,778	1,602

Mr. PERLEY: The minister did not answer my question as to what other vocational courses are being given in Saskatchewan and how many men are taking the courses. How many schools giving courses of any kind have been started in military district No. 12?

Mr. MITCHELL: We keep those records not by military districts but by provinces. We have the gross enrolment in each province but not the number of schools.

Mr. PERLEY: How can you have the gross enrolment without knowing the number of schools?

Mr. MITCHELL: That is quite true, I have not got it broken down by schools, but I have the gross enrolment.

Mr. PERLEY: Let us have the enrolment.

Mr. MITCHELL: It covers every province in the dominion. Perhaps my hon. friend would prefer that I should put it on Hansard.

Mr. PERLEY: I think it would be all right to have it now. It may be interesting to other hon. members.

Mr. MITCHELL: The total in the dominion is 2,056, distributed as follows: Nova Scotia, 38; New Brunswick, 49; Quebec, 547; Ontario, 359; Manitoba, 233; Saskatchewan, 182; Alberta, 309, and British Columbia, 339.

Mr. LOCKHART: Would the minister indicate to what extent the rehabilitation grants, whether in his department or in any other, have progressed as regards giving further aid to men who, having taken vocational courses, are prepared to set themselves up in business if they could obtain a small grant similar to that received by the soldier who is being rehabilitated? I think that such a grant might be accorded to men who have taken these vocational courses. I know that the Minister of Pensions and National Health is conversant with this matter. Only to-day I received another letter of the kind that I handed to the Minister of Pensions and National Health when in private conversation with him. The writer states that if he had around $100 it would enable him to finance a little project which he has in mind in a line for which he has become trained. I know that the Minister of Pensions and National Health is familiar with the arguments for this proposal, because we have discussed it. In this letter the writer points out that thousands of dollars will be available to veterans who start on the land, and he asks, "Is there any possible chance that I could get $100, or $200 at the most, to finance a little venture which I want to undertake?" Will some small amount of assistance be given to men who are vocationally trained?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If I may intervene once again: as the minister said a few minutes ago, the only assistance given now is what you might call maintenance benefits. No individual advances have been made so far. The whole situation is now being reviewed by a subcommittee. We are looking into what is being done in New Zealand or Australia along the lines suggested by my hon. friend. What the ultimate policy will be I am not prepared to state at the moment, but the matter is being looked into.

Mr. BRUCE: May I ask the minister a question arising out of the statement he made last evening, as reported in Hansard, page 2625, when, speaking of call-ups, he said:

. . . we are continually reexamining those men who have been turned down, particularly by individual physicians.

I am aware of the fact that, for many reasons which we need not enter into, family physicians have been placing certain men in a lower category; can the ministers tell us how many of these men were raised to a higher category as a consequence of further examination by boards?

Mr. MITCHELL: May I point out that the item to which the hon. member refers is passed and gone. I do not want to be too sticky about it, but I do not want to get into a general discussion such as we have had for the last four days.

Mr. BRUCE: The minister need not answer to-day.

Mr. MITCHELL: I shall be glad to have it looked up and the information given to my hon. friend.

Mr. PERLEY: I think the minister is going to give us the number of those schools and where they are.

Mr. MITCHELL: I can get that for my hon. friend.

Mr. PERLEY: According to the figures cited by the minister, three provinces have the greater share; one in particular has more than twenty-five per cent of these students. It would be interesting to know what courses they have been given, and the number in each province.

Mr. MITCHELL: I shall endeavour to have those particulars for my hon. friend before the close of this afternoon's sitting.

Item agreed to.

War emergency training programme, administration, $40,460.

Mr. MacNICOL: Are these administrative costs applied to the expenditure of the $4,000,000 in item 4, the $1,800,000 in item 5, and the $780,000 in item 7?

Mr. MITCHELL: These administrative costs are the costs in my own department in Ottawa, the costs of the division. As my hon. friend will appreciate, the war emergency training programme was decentralized and most of the money was spent in the provinces.

Mr. MacNICOL: And included in the other provinces?

Mr. MITCHELL: That is right.

Mr. MacNICOL: This applies to Ottawa only?

Mr. MITCHELL: That is so.

Mr. MARSHALL: Is the minister in a position to give the total expenditure in respect of administration for the whole dominion?

Mr. MITCHELL: I understand we have not the information complete from the treasury, but I hope to have it before the end of the afternoon.

Item agreed to.

Stabilization of longshore labour (Halifax), $450,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: Will the minister explain?

Mr. MITCHELL: This item is in connection with the loading and unloading of ships at the port of Halifax. As most hon. members appreciate, Halifax prior to the outbreak of war was largely a seasonal port. Owing to conditions, particularly on the St. Lawrence, since the outbreak of war it has become largely an all-year-round port, and what we had to do for the continual operations was to lay down a policy which we thought best fitted to serve the needs of a port as important as the port of Halifax. After investigation, we established a hiring hall, rather than the old system of what they call "look and see"; and in addition to that we established a guaranteed weekly wage in the port of Halifax somewhat similar to what they have in other parts of the world. We also built accommodation for a labour pool there to house approximately, I think, 750 men who when not engaged in longshore work are put to work at any employment which is available at that particular moment. Also recently we have established there what we call a port battalion, somewhat similar, I understand, to what they are using in the United States.

All these arrangements were made in conjunction and after consultation with the longshoremen's organization in the port of Halifax. May I in passing, Mr. Chairman, pay a tribute to Mr. Joseph Ryan, of New York, international president of the longshoremen's organization, and also the longshoremen's organization in the port of Halifax and the stevedoring companies, for the degree of cooperation which they have shown in our policies in organizing the port of Halifax so that it can carry the added burden of the number of ships which have to be loaded and unloaded in that important port at this time.

Mr. ISNOR: I was indeed pleased to hear the Minister of Labour refer in such glowing terms to the splendid work being carried on by the stevedores at the port of Halifax. Last year I raised the question of the value of the labour pool and the minister was good enough to say that a pool had been organized in which he hoped to employ 750 men not only to provide labour but to expedite the handling of freight at the waterfront, and also to provide emergency labour for other purposes. As I said before, it is good to hear the minister refer so appreciatively to the fine work being carried on by longshoremen at the port of Halifax. Would the minister be good enough to let us know what this labour pool consisting of 750 men has cost, the number of men actually employed, the amount of money that is paid through the labour pool, and the revenue derived from individual firms or private concerns who make use of those men?

Mr. MITCHELL: I have the figures here. The total amount of wages paid to the longshoremen last year by the stevedoring companies and the amounts guaranteed by the government for the weekly wages are $3,111,482.47. The cost of the guarantee was $465,367.58, which represents 14·9 per cent of the total wage bill. May I say that we anticipate with the more smooth running of the organization, after it has been established, there will be a much larger figure to report in the next financial year.

Mr. ISNOR: I am not sure whether the minister gave a full answer to my question. What has been paid by private firms for the use of those men?

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Mr. MITCHELL: I thought I gave that figure. It is $2,646,114.89.

Mr. ISNOR: The difference would be—

Mr. MITCHELL: $465,367.58.

Mr. ISNOR: Have you made use of the port battalion?

Mr. MITCHELL: The arrangement is to the effect that the port battalion does not come into operation until there are no available longshoremen. It has been used on a number of occasions. I want it clearly understood that we did not put the port battalion in there until we had consulted the employees and the employers.

Mr. MacNICOL: The labour difficulties have been eliminated?

Mr. MITCHELL: I think they have been.

Mr. MacNICOL: At Halifax?

Mr. MITCHELL: I went down to Halifax two years ago and looked over the situation. I do not know whether I should use this language or not, but I think the longshoremen were treated like sheep. That is my honest opinion. It was just a question of organizing a building and hiring hall. I am not blaming anybody. I think it was something that had grown up largely because of the seasonal nature of the operations down there. They have now a hiring hall, and we have built canteens for the labour pool which has accommodation for 750 people at the port of Halifax.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am convinced that someone deserves credit for eliminating any labour troubles that there were in the port of Halifax, particularly in war time. As the minister said—

Mr. ISNOR: There was never any real labour trouble there.

Mr. MacNICOL: We did have some trouble there a year or two ago. Ships were held up in the harbour. Does the hon. membor for Halifax not remember that?

Mr. ISNOR: Yes, I remember that. There was a slight difference but there was no real labour trouble.

Mr. MacNICOL: Do not say there was no labour trouble when I say there was.

Mr. ISNOR: There was no real labour trouble.

Mr. MacNICOL: Because I want to give the department credit for eliminating trouble there. We just heard the minister say that some $400,000 odd were paid out, as I understand it, to eliminate the trouble and give the men proper treatment. It was only foolishness to expect men to stay there if they were to remain unemployed waiting for ships to come in or go out. Personally I think a good job was done down there, even if it cost the country some $400,000 to get munitions loaded on the ships. Am I not right in that?

Mr. ISNOR: Right. Would the minister touch on the contracts with respect to the handling of Canadian National Railways freight? Does that come under the minister's department?

Mr. MITCHELL: No.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I read an address delivered recently by one of the directors of man-power in the maritimes. It had to do with the matter of assisting the longshoremen. It went on to point out that a soldier labour battalion of 350 men had been set up and it was now being utilized at that port. Was this labour battalion recruited for overseas service, or is it a battalion of home defence men to be used in Canada?

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not know the status of the battalion except that the men are in uniform and under military discipline. Whether they are home defence men or not I could not say; I do not know. I have been down there and seen them. I did not make any inquiries. What I was most concerned about was to turn ships around.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am wondering whether they are overseas men or not.

Item agreed to.

Wartime labour relations board, $175,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: Without adding to the minister's difficulties I would ask him to give us a complete picture of the work that is to be done by the wartime labour relations board and the personnel of it; whether they move around the country from one place to another or whether they are located here in Ottawa.

Mr. MITCHELL: The wartime labour relations board has recently been established. It arose out of representations made by both employers' organizations and labour organizations before an inquiry made by the national war labour board. The code deals with the contractual obligations between employers' organizations and employees' organizations, but not with wages. Arising out of the report of the board a meeting was held with the representatives of the ministers of labour, or those responsible for the departments of labour, of all the provinces of Canada, which resulted in an agreement upon the principle of compulsory collective bargaining by law. Following that meeting a code was drafted in my department, having in mind the various viewpoints expressed by different organizations with respect to the matter. That code was then sent to all the provincial governments in Canada, and to the dominant labour organizations and employer organizations, and resulted in the present code. We thought that we had done a pretty fair job with the original code; and having sent it to all these different organizations I may tell this committee that a total of 170 amendments were suggested by the respective organizations. I do not need to tell this committee the difficulty of trying to bring some form of harmony out of so many varying points of view, and to the credit of the draftsmen I say that after this was done the code itself received the acclaim of the general public and also of the responsible trade union labour organizations. The board has been set up, composed of equal numbers of representatives of employers and employees, with a chairman and vice-chairman. The chairman is Mr. Justice G. B. O'Connor, Edmonton, Alberta, and the vice-chairman is Mr. Justice J. N. Francœur, of Quebec City. Representatives of the employees are Mr. A. R. Mosher, of the Canadian Congress of Labour; Mr. Fred Molineux, of Hamilton, representing the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada; Mr. W. L. Best of Ottawa, representing the railroad brotherhoods, and Mr. R. Harmegnies of St. Joseph d'Alma, Quebec, representing the Canadian and Catholic Federation of Labour. Representatives of the employers are Mr. W. H. Browne of Toronto, representing the Canadian Chamber of Commerce; Mr. Albert Deschamps of Montreal, representing the contractors; Mr. A. J. Hills of Montreal, representing the railways; and Mr. Harry Taylor of Toronto, representing the Canadian Manufacturers Association. The chief executive officer is Mr. M. M. Maclean, director of industrial relations, Department of Labour, Ottawa.

In addition provincial boards are being set up, on a basis somewhat similar to the wages control policy. As hon. gentlemen know, constitutionally the jurisdiction in these matters is provincial; and in a country as large as Canada by the very nature of things, if you are to be successful, you must decentralize your operations. So that at the moment agreements are being negotiated with six of the nine provinces, with the end in view of putting the code into operation in those provinces. Already we have negotiated an agreement with Ontario—I think I tabled the order in council yesterday—where a board will be set up somewhat similar to the national board, on which there will be a chairman, three representatives of labour and three representatives of the employers. British Columbia has approached the problem from a somewhat different angle, in that there the minister of labour will administer the code. In six other provinces agreements are in process of negotiation at this moment, and I am hopeful that they will be concluded within the next two or three weeks.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is this the board which is now sitting in Windsor?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Then in addition to the officers mentioned by the minister I read in the press yesterday that there is an umpire, and I was very glad to see that the umpire operating in Windsor is—

Mr. MITCHELL: Your old friend.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes, I like to call him a friend of mine; I have always known him to be very competent in labour matters. I am referring, of course, to Mr. Bernard Rose, K.C., of Montreal. Is that an office in addition to those mentioned by the minister?

Mr. MITCHELL: No, and I will tell the committee how that came about. Normally this dispute would have come under the jurisdiction of the Ontario regional board, but those negotiations have not been finalized by order in council. It was necessary to have an act passed by the legislature and then for the government of the province to pass an order in council under that act setting up the board; we had to do something the same here in Ottawa. That was the constitutional procedure. In the case of the Ford dispute we made available through the national board to the company and the workers an impartial umpire whose findings would be final after the decision was rendered.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to say a few words in connection with the set-up of the wartime labour relations board under P.C. 1003. I appreciate the statement of the minister that this labour code represents a step in the right direction and something long overdue in this country. I also appreciate the difficulties under which the government labours in view of the fact that in peace time at any rate labour matters thus far have been assigned to the provincial governments. However, while expressing approval of the attempt that has been made to establish a labour code, I do feel that there are two or three points in the order in council which will need to be watched very closely. If I may refer to the points I have in mind, my feeling is that the wording of the order in council is neither sufficiently strong nor sufficiently clear to guarantee that the rights which it is desired to have and to protect will be secured.

First I should like to refer to the matter of compulsory collective bargaining. It does seem to me that in this day and age it ought not to be necessary to argue that the full implementation of the principles of democracy in a country such as ours calls for the establishment of the principle of collective bargaining. As the minister can very well point out, sections of this order in council would seem to indicate that it has that purpose, and that the order guarantees collective bargaining. For example, I refer to subsection (2) of section 10, which reads:

> The parties shall negotiate in good faith with one another and make every reasonable effort to conclude a collective agreement.

I am trying to be as fair as I can about this matter. The fact that the word "shall" is there does seem to give a good deal of force to that section, and might seem to answer my question as to whether or not compulsory bargaining is provided by this order. Then there is paragraph (e) of subsection (1) of section 25 which reads:

> If a question arises under these regulations as to whether—
> (e) an employer, or certified bargaining representatives of employees, is negotiating in good faith; the board shall decide the question and its decision shall be final and conclusive for all the purposes of these regulations.

Again I say that would seem to indicate that it is the purpose of this order to guarantee that there will be collective bargaining, and the wording might seem to imply that it will be carried out. However, as the minister knows, lawyers have ways and means of finding loopholes in orders like this and of getting around the clear intent of such orders. I would direct his attention to the fact that sections 19 and 20, which list unfair practices, do not contain any reference to the refusal of an employer to enter into collective bargaining.

If I may refer back to the several sections grouped under the heading "Negotiation of Collective Agreements," including sections 10 to 14, I would remind the minister that although there is the subsection which says that parties shall negotiate in good faith, that subsection is followed by a number of subsections and by further sections which, to my way of thinking, provide for considerable delay. It seems to me that opens a loophole for employers to avoid the obvious intent of the government in bringing down this order, namely, that collective bargaining in industry should no longer be a pious hope, as we used to say it was, but a reality.

Perhaps I should not go too far in putting words in the minister's mouth, but I imagine one of his replies to me may be that this matter is in the hands of an exceptionally good board which can be counted upon to interpret these regulations in the best possible manner, having in mind the purpose of the order. I must remind him, however, as he knows perhaps even better than I, from his longer experience in this field, that employers are adept at finding ways and means of avoiding collective bargaining. If there are loopholes such as I have suggested, particularly the delays provided for in sections 10 to 14, and the lack of any mention of refusal to bargain collectively under "unfair practices," it may be found necessary in due course to amend the order with that point in mind.

I feel there is no necessity for my arguing with the minister that we should have collective bargaining in Canada, and that it should be not just a pious hope but a compulsory provision. I am urging the minister to-day to watch very closely the operation of the board which controls the administration of the order to see to it that if there is any failure to realize the purpose of the order, it is corrected in those respects.

Another matter I would mention to the minister is that of the outlawing of company unions. Here, too, I feel that the order is not clear enough; it is not ironclad. As a matter of fact I cannot help feeling disturbed as I go through the order and see repeated time and again the expression "a trade union or employees' organization." Those terms always appear side by side. We need not waste any time arguing over the fact that there are many legitimate independent trade unions. I realize that in the order there must be a phraseology to protect the rights of such legitimate and independent trade unions. Yet I have the fear that the language which runs through this order is an open door to the organization of the company unions. In fact it seems to me that the only way to avoid encouraging the organization of company unions is definitely and conclusively to prevent and to prohibit their organization as a part of our Canadian industrial organization.

There are several sections, in this connection, to which I wish particularly to refer. I would direct the attention of the committee first of all to paragraph (i), subsection 1 of section 2 of the interpretation section, which defines an employees' organization as an organization of employees formed to regulate relations between employers and employees. Something ought to be done to that section to make sure that company unions cannot meet that definition.

Mr. MITCHELL: What would my hon. friend call a company union?

Mr. KNOWLES: A union dominated by employers in various ways. I know that under the unfair practices provisions there is section 19, subsection 7, which states that no employer shall dominate or interfere with the formation or administration of a trade union or employees' organization.

Mr. MITCHELL: What more can you get than that?

Mr. KNOWLES: Let me read another section under the same unfair practices division. I direct the attention of the minister to section 20(2), which states:

> Except with the consent of the employer, no trade union or employees' organization and no person authorized by the union or employees' organization to act on its behalf, shall attempt, at the employee's place of employment during his working hours, to persuade an employee to join the trade union or employees' organization.

My contention, for example, is that right there you have the possibility of an employer refusing consent to the organizers of a legitimate union to carry on their organizational activities on a company's property, but giving that consent to the organizers of a union subservient to the employer, even though that subservience is kept in the background.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend cannot read that into the section. I cannot let that go. I do not wish to interrupt him, and I am not going to try to read a lecture on trade union practices, but I must say he is reading something into the regulations that just is not there. He is building up a straw man. I know how difficult it is when you are in the country, talking the troops up. In the country you have to do that sometimes—but not here. I cannot just let that statement go. Those who prepared these regulations know something about trade union practices, just as well as my hon. friend. They have agreed to this. We know all about employees' organizations. My hon. friend agrees there may be some good employees' organizations. But what more could be put down on paper, under these unfair practices regulations, which must be administered by employers and trade union representatives? What more could we put down on paper in connection with a question dealing with company unions and unfair practices? Let us be honest about it.

Mr. KNOWLES: To use the minister's expression, if I were talking to the troops outside I would not be talking with the same restraint, nor would I be using the appealing language I am using in talking to the minister this afternoon. I have already pointed out that this order, and the attempt behind it, evokes a certain amount of appreciation. I have already admitted, in advance, his argument that the matter is in the hands of a well-chosen board, and that a good deal depends upon administration. But I am trying to suggest to him that if I can find little loopholes, such as those I have pointed out, then surely others who are anxious to avoid the government's intention in the order will find not only the loopholes I have pointed out, but will find others, perhaps even in section 19(1). I am asking the minister to watch very closely the operations of the board, and to see to it that they do not result in the increase of the organization of company unions in Canada.

There are only two other matters to which I would refer. I would first go back to sections 10 to 14, which come under the general heading of the negotiation of collective agreements. It seems to me that these sections offer the possibility of a great deal of delay occurring. I think I know what the minister's answer will be. He will say that it is war time and that if at all possible strikes must be avoided. To that we say, "hear, hear," but when you are trying to lay down a labour code that carries out the principles of democracy, a code to which the government ought to be able to point with pride, a code about which they should be able to say to the troops overseas, "This is what we have done for you; this is the kind of industrial organization you will come back to after you have fought for us on the other side," you should try to endeavour to avoid too long delays. As I say, I am afraid that will be the result of the applications of sections 10 to 14 of the regulations.

There is one other point to which I should like to refer, and about which the minister may say that I do not understand what is being done. I am concerned about the operation of section 5, subsection (2), particularly the latter part, which states that for the purposes of the section an employee shall be deemed to be a member of a trade union if he has requested the trade union in writing to elect or appoint bargaining representatives on his behalf. I should like to know whether that section makes it possible for bargaining representatives to be chosen by the open circulation of a petition which the men would sign, everyone knowing who has signed it, and so on. The employer in particular would have this information. That would seem to me to be not as desirable as the selection of bargaining representatives by secret choice. If this section permits the employer to know who is joining a legitimate union or what employees are refusing to join what is substantially a company union, it seems to me that it should be amended.

The minister and I could have a hot argument about this, but I am trying to avoid that to-day. I am rather taking the position that there is good in this order, but despite the acclaim and approval with which it has been received I feel that there are some points which are weak and which may result in the purpose of the order not being achieved. I am asking the minister, under whose supervision this board functions, to watch very closely these points and any others that may arise during this discussion.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend apparently thinks that there is a lot of good in the order, but it is hard to find. That seems to be the attitude he has taken. I do not profess to be as expert on trade union negotiations as my hon. friend.

Mr. MacNICOL: You are practical.

Mr. MITCHELL: May I say to my hon. friend that the best men in this country have applied themselves to this. Let me pay a tribute to the provincial governments for the cooperation they have given, and also to the trade union leaders and employers' organizations. We may not be as perfect as my hon. friend; we are just plain, everyday practical people who like to face up to things in a practical way. I am sorry that we are not quite as far-seeing as my hon. friend. I often wonder what kind of world this would be if certain people were charged with the responsibility of drafting legislation and directing the affairs and destinies of this or any other nation.

This is an imperfect world in which we live. By this document we have endeavoured to give something that will fit the needs of the employers' organizations, the employees and the government of the dominion. I am not going to interpret the code, because that is not my business; that is the business of the national wartime labour relations boards and the other boards which have been set up for the purpose. If there are any defects they will come to life in the application of the order by those directly in charge of it and in no other way.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister was responsible for the code coming into effect.

Mr. MITCHELL: I will take the responsibility; you do not need to worry about that. I know a lot about the company union story. I know how I was speared by certain people at one time when the going was pretty tough in this department. Let me say that I have never believed in company unions and I hope I never shall. We have endeavoured to fashion this document in order to avoid if humanly possible the old company union conditions of years ago coming into the present labour picture in this country. As I say, the code will be administered by these different boards and in the light of its application it may be found to require amendments. I do not know of any legislation that has ever been passed that did not require amending at one time or another.

Mr. RAYMOND (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I wish to direct some questions to the minister. Is it within the powers of the board to enforce the fulfilment of the conditions of collective bargaining agreements entered into by employers and employees? Could the minister answer that question?

Mr. MITCHELL: The boards will look into that. We always are careful about that.

Mr. RAYMOND: There was some trouble a short time ago at the Aluminum company at Shawinigan Falls. A number of employees were discharged even though there was a collective agreement between the company and the employees. Has the minister received any complaint from the employees to the effect that one of the conditions of their agreement was not lived up to? Section VII of the collective agreement reads in part as follows:

> The right to employ, dismiss, transfer, suspend, promote, demote and otherwise deal with the employer's employees belongs exclusively to the employer but the exercise of such rights shall be with due regard for character, ability, family status, length of service and place of residence.

Many employees were dismissed without that section being considered. Their length of service and place of residence and so on were not considered. The newspapers reported that a national selective service man was located at the factory to see that as these men were dismissed they received their calls for training. I should like to know if the board has endeavoured to see that this section is respected.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think my hon. friend is referring to the dispute at Shawinigan Falls with the Aluminum Company of Canada.

Mr. RAYMOND: The lay-off there of employees.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes. In conjunction with the province of Quebec we set up a commission, the chairman of which is Mr. Cyprien Miron, who is one of the senior officials of the Department of Labour of the province of Quebec. The other two members are Mr. Paul Fournier, the president of the Montreal trades and labour council, and Mr. Tellier who represents the National Catholic syndicate. We are expecting a report from the commission within the next few days. I might point out that this dispute took place before the code was put into operation.

Mr. RAYMOND: The minister has no further information to give the committee?

Mr. MITCHELL: No. As soon as the report comes in it will be made public.

Mr. MAYHEW: I do not want to make a speech, Mr. Chairman, but I want to bring to the attention of the department and the members of the committee an organization we have in Victoria that I believe would serve as a pattern for good relationships between labour and management, a pattern that might well be followed in labour relations generally throughout the country. The organization is know as the Vancouver Island joint labour conference. It is a loosely knit group of some forty unions of different jurisdictions, but it is gaining good will for the workmen on the Pacific coast. It represents some 9,800 members in different unions, under the American Federation of Labour, the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, the C.I.O., the Canadian Congress of Labour, the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, as well as independent groups including white-collar and civil service workers. The conference has been in existence since 1941. It holds regular monthly meetings and constitutes committees which keep in touch with developments in the region generally. It lays down one definite principle, that there shall be no jurisdictional disputes among the members. As I said, this organization has been in existence since 1941, and we have found it to be very helpful not only amongst the labour men but to the community at large. It is bringing respect for labour organizations, and it makes it a great deal easier for employers to find workers when they want them. Primarily the conference was organized for the development of their own best interests, but they have developed considerably beyond that point and they are now interested in community affairs. Last winter when shortage of fuel was imminent in the district, the conference organized themselves and went out and cut several thousand cords of wood, which was the means of relieving distress in a good many homes. They have become interested in a number of the activities of the community, as well as in their own affairs. I believe that if similar organizations were set up in our different communities, that is, an organization linking up all labour unions under one head, the result would be an organization that would be very beneficial to the community, and I can assure the minister that it would lighten his work. The conference I speak of is interested at the present time in nurseries, in creches, as we call them out there, and in the housing problem. It is also studying post-war work. I assure the committee that it is giving very valuable leadership in many of these projects, and I would recommend that such an organization be in existence wherever possible in Canada for the benefit of the whole community.

Before I sit down I would like to say that I consider that the Department of Labour has gone a long way in this war, and I congratulate the minister and his officials on the work they have done. I feel that out of this department will come an organization that will be most beneficial to both labour and management. I congratulate them particularly on the work they have done in the past year.

Mr. MacNICOL: I do not want to say a word about the Windsor strike, but I want to ask a question. I am hoping, as I am sure every hon. member is, that the labour relations board now sitting in Windsor will be successful in ending the strike, which has now continued for four or five days, affecting some 14,000 men, and costing roughly $100,000 a day, outside of what is spent by the labour unions themselves to compensate the men who are on strike. That is altogether apart from the effect on merchants and business generally in Windsor. What procedure has the department available for preventing a strike from taking place? Is there some board or some official of the department that could have been called in when it was known that a strike was imminent, to prevent the strike from taking place at all? The objective of all of us, and particularly of the department, is to eliminate the causes of strikes.

Mr. MITCHELL: As my hon. friend very well knows, negotiations are in progress for the settlement of the strike at Windsor, and I join with him in the earnest wish that both the employers and the employees will cooperate with the national labour relations board and the officers of my department in arriving at a settlement satisfactory to both parties. I would not want to say one word beyond expressing that earnest hope, because as my hon. friend knows, in industrial disputes a word that may be said here one way or the other may go out over the wires and be interpreted in quite a different sense. I think the less I say about the dispute the better, except to enjoin both the management and employee organizations to do their utmost to arrive at a satisfactory settlement of the dispute.

Mr. GILLIS: I expressed my opinion briefly on this dispute a few nights ago and I have no intention of extending my remarks much further. I think the minister this afternoon was rather unfair to the member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not want to be.

Mr. GILLIS: I definitely think he was. The member for Winnipeg North Centre I thought was bending over backwards in order to put as nice a face as possible on this order 1003. Personally I think if seventy-five per cent of the verbiage in this document were eliminated it might be workable. If you were going to get any cooperation from the employers of this country in carrying out the principles which those who drafted that order had in mind, this order would not be necessary; No. 2685 would have done the trick. On the outbreak of war the government appealed in a realistic way to the employers with respect to labour relations, and I do not think they got any response. The hon. member for Davenport wanted to know just now the cause of the dispute in Windsor. I appreciate the minister's position and understand why he does not wish to make any observations while the matter is still being adjudicated, but I would say, as one member of this house, that the basic cause of the dispute was that the employers abrogated their signed agreement. It may be difficult now to have the men at Windsor accept the word of employers who have placed as little honour in their signed word as they showed in that particular dispute. This is the class of people the government are dealing with in implementing the terms of this order P.C. 1003 and in labour relations generally, and unless the terms are clear and specific beyond the shadow of a doubt, the fears expressed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will be justified by the attitude of employers.

When I read this document I thought of it in this way. When a crime is committed and a detective is called in, the first thing he probes for is a motive. When I read this order in council the first thing that struck me was, what is the motive? In my opinion it can be found largely in the past attitude of employers to the organization of labour in this country.

However, I rose at this time because the minister disagreed with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre with regard to the matter of unfair labour practices as defined by P.C. 1003. I find that it does not define unfair labour practices; it appeals again to the fairness of the employer. The code is subject to many interpretations. In the winding-up clause, which is the meat of the whole thing, it is stated:

> . . . but nothing in these regulations shall be interpreted to affect, otherwise than as expressly stated, the right of an employer to suspend, transfer, lay off, or discharge employees for appropriate and sufficient cause.

It boils down to this, that under that clause the operator is allowed to continue as he did previously. The minister will remember that that is the wording of section 502A of the criminal code. For the last four years organized labour endeavoured to use that provision, but it has never been able to prove absence of justification, as defined by that clause, on the part of the employer. That is the meat of unfair labour practices. Right now, in the operation of the code, although it has been in effect for only two weeks, men from British Columbia are complaining that employees are idle because of union discrimination, and are endeavouring to have selective service adjust the matter. That is the contention of the steel workers; I corresponded with the board recently in the case. The matter of certification is becoming twisted; I cited two cases the other evening; yet the order is brand new.

As I said before, if there had been no quarrelling on the principle of the matter, P.C. 2685 would have done the trick. But any lawyer in the country can sit down and make a case for the operator if he wants to defeat the purpose for which this code is intended; they can keep you for months and months wrangling about the interpretation of this order. To me the matter is very plain. If the employees in a given plant want to form a union it is a matter of taking a vote, for the right to ballot is a basic principle of democracy; and if, when a secret ballot is taken, a majority of the employees decides to join a certain union, the Minister of Labour should have the authority to certify that union without any more fooling about it. It is then up to the employer and employee to get together in the matter of working out a collective agreement. But unless both parties are honest it will not work. There is no mystery about all this and no necessity for all the ramifications to which it gives rise. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said, in trying to make this thing work you are throwing it back in the lap of the old conciliation machinery, which involves running around for months and months. I do not want to quarrel with the minister over the regulations, but I am sure the time is not far distant when many changes will be necessary, and I hope that the minister and his department will be prepared to make them. I have not much hope for the success of the provisions as they stand; there are too many loopholes.

While I am on my feet may I tell the minister that his department did one thing for which I should like to compliment them. They instituted in Nova Scotia, for the first time in the history of this country, a system of apprenticeship in the coal mining industry. The minister is fortunate in having secured some capable people to make the system work. It is the most practical thing his department have done since it has been my privilege to be a member of this house. I hope it will not be considered as merely a war emergency measure.

Mr. MITCHELL: If I am here after the next election it will not be.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Alberta has been doing that for some time.

Mr. GILLIS: I think it is a good set-up and I hope it will not be considered a war emergency proceeding. All these things are done under the War Measures act and by order in council, and when the war ceases they can all automatically disappear. I should like to see the minister continue this particular measure.

I rose at this time only because I thought the minister was taking an unfair advantage of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who in my opinion made a very fair analysis of this order in council. I shall wait with a great deal of interest until the board begins to hand out decisions in this matter.

Mr. McIVOR: I have gone through this labour code in a study group and I have tried to find every possible weakness. Of course I was looking for constructive ways of healing sores among the workers; and I have been agreeably surprised that we can have a production like this from any house of commons in any part of the British empire.

There are two reasons why I think the measure is a good one. President Marshall made a number of suggestions, I think about twenty-eight in all, and they are fairly well incorporated in this document. Not only that, but Mr. Marshall himself went on the board to see that they are put into practice. Therefore I think the measure can be made to work. The other reason why I think it is a good code is that the premier of Ontario, who, while he has little love for the dominion government, is willing to take anything good from any source where he can pick it up, has taken this code for Ontario and wishes to apply it to all workers in that province.

I should like the minister to state in no uncertain terms whether or not the collective bargaining regulation is compulsory, because a speaker in the city of Fort William said it is not. I wish to have assurance from the minister as well as having it in the code as interpreted.

Mr. MITCHELL: The answer is yes.

Mr. GILLIS: Would the minister mind explaining in what way it is compulsory?

Mr. MITCHELL: I say it is, but I do not want to take up the time of the committee in enlarging upon it. I have been very close to this thing. My hon. friend remembers the famous Governor Allen of Kansas who in the days of the late Sam Gompers thought he could make collective bargaining compulsory in the sense to which my hon. friend has referred.

Mr. GILLIS: They have collective bargaining in the United States under the Wagner act.

Mr. MITCHELL: Not in that sense. The position of the three dominant trade union groups in this country is that they were opposed to the principle of compulsory arbitration up to the point where the agreement was finally negotiated. That is the official position of the three national groups. It does not matter what we think in public life about these things—

Mr. GILLIS: Would the minister not say that compulsory arbitration and compulsory collective bargaining are two entirely different things?

Mr. MITCHELL: Of course they are. I understand that. And the trade union movements of this country are opposed to compulsory collective bargaining up to the point of the negotiations of the final agreement. Let us be clear about that. They are in agreement that once an agreement is arrived at there shall be compulsory arbitration. I think I know the mind of the labour organizations of this country and the code follows the point of view they express.

Mr. GILLIS: What machinery have you to enforce the decision of this code even after going through all the slow motions?

Mr. MITCHELL: I would not say it is altogether slow motion. I will tell you where I differ from many people. I think a trade union agreement is not based on law; it is based on character.

Mr. GILLIS: Certainly it is.

Mr. MITCHELL: And good faith.

Mr. GILLIS: Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have had some experience. I know there are lots of employers with whom I should not like to bargain, and the reverse is true. I know lots of representatives of employees with whom, if I were an employer, I should not like to bargain. After all is said and done, you sit down and write a contract, one, two, three, right down the line. If you have reasonable people on both sides—and most men are reasonable—the contract can operate. It is like prohibition. All the laws under the canopy of heaven cannot make a thing work unless men have a desire in their hearts to be fair. That is my own view, and that is a view I have gathered out of my own experience in the movement. That is the general view of the leaders of the trade union movements of the country. I think there are lots of what I call the overnight revolutionaries who suddenly come into the movement and who think that by the stroke of the pen everything can be quite all right. They say that all you have to do is to write a law; that is all. It is not as simple as that. The relationship between employers and employees is a matter of gradual growth. Take as an example the British Trades Union Congress and the position they occupy in the life of the nation as well as the statesmanlike attitude they have taken toward the present war. That was not born overnight. That is the result of tradition and experience over a good many years.

I sympathize with both sides occasionally. All the angels are not on one side of the street. Sometimes they lack experience and judgment in their approach to the problem of industrial relations. Take the railroad organizations of this country. They have had a case before the national war labour board for the last six or seven months. The case has been developed by both sides. They have gone through the channels and negotiations as they always do. You do not see them walking out on the street. You understand, I am not taking sides in this question, but it is the result of long-standing tradition. I can remember—and I am not an old man, or at least I do not like to think I am—when the relationship between the railroads and the trade unions was not as good as it is to-day. As I say, it is a question of gradual growth and good faith on both sides. I do not know that I should say any more, Mr. Chairman. I could go on and trace the development of trade unions and the position of the American federation of labour, the British Trades Union Congress and the Trades and Labour Congress, the Canadian Congress of Labour and the other congresses, but I do not think it is necessary. It is sometimes a very difficult problem and I do not want to take up the time of the committee just now.

Mr. GILLIS: I was concerned about the minister's answer to the hon. member for Fort William. The hon. member's question was definite and specific and was to the effect whether or not the collective bargaining regulation is obligatory or otherwise. I think everyone will agree that the one thing the code does not do is to make collective bargaining compulsory or obligatory on the part of anyone. It is still a matter of negotiation. I do not agree with it on that basis, because after you go through all the machinery of the code it still depends upon whether the employer is cooperative or otherwise in putting the wishes of the employees in the concern into operation. I do not think there is any use in writing a law unless you are prepared to enforce it.

Mr. MITCHELL: May I say this to my hon. friend? I know he agrees with me that it is a matter of opinion. Let me say that no legislative bodies of the trade unions of Canada are prepared to allow any board to write the terms of their contracts.

Mr. GILLIS: This has nothing to do with that.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, it has.

Mr. GILLIS: Not a thing.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. GILLIS: This is just determining the bargaining—

Mr. MITCHELL: This says that they shall bargain in good faith, and it is supported by law that they shall bargain in good faith. It does not enjoin the board to write the contracts.

Mr. GILLIS: Certainly not; I would never agree to that. It is a matter of whether they are to have bargaining agencies or otherwise. After that, the business of working out the agreement is their own.

Mr. MITCHELL: This provides, beyond any doubt, for the bargaining agency.

Mr. KNOWLES: What is the penalty if the employer refuses to bargain in good faith?

Mr. MITCHELL: It is in the act. If my hon. friend wishes to read it he will find it there. I thought he had a copy in front of him.

Mr. KNOWLES: I have. I want the penalty to support the answer given by the minister to the hon. member for Fort William.

Mr. MITCHELL: I remember we had some penalties in a previous order in council and many people objected to them.

Mr. GILLIS: They were all one way.

Mr. MITCHELL: No; it was a fifty-fifty proposition.

Mr. KNOWLES: Fifty-fifty—one horse and one rabbit.

Mr. MITCHELL: No. I shall not argue that now, since it is not under discussion at the moment. Sections 38 and 44 are the governing sections.

Item agreed to.

Removal of enemy aliens including Japanese nationals and other persons of the Japanese race from the protected areas in British Columbia, $2,750,000.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister bring us up to date with regard to the location of the Japanese removed from the evacuated areas, where they have gone within and without the province of British Columbia?

Mr. MITCHELL: This is a break-down of the province of British Columbia: Interior housing centres—this is as of April 1, 1944—11,214; road camps, 418; self-supporting projects, 3,162; miscellaneous, 1,188. That makes a total of 15,982. Those in the other provinces are as follows:

Alberta	3,483
Saskatchewan	146
Manitoba	1,043
Ontario	2,558*
Quebec	394
Maritimes	1
Total	7,625

* 431 interned.

In the Yukon and northwest territories there are twenty-nine, giving a total for Canada of 23,636.

Mr. STIRLING: The first figure the minister mentioned was 11,214, which I think he said were those in the settlements?

Mr. MITCHELL: That is the interior housing centre.

Mr. STIRLING: Has the minister the number in Tashme by itself?

Mr. MITCHELL: 2,488.

Mr. NEILL: Did the minister give the number of Japanese born in Canada?

Mr. MITCHELL: I will get that figure.

The CHAIRMAN: I know the committee realizes how difficult it is to have hon. members speak in their proper order in connection with an item of this kind. If hon. members are agreeable I shall call first the hon. member for Vancouver South, then the hon. member for New Westminster and then the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. I got into trouble the other day over this matter, and I do not want to get into trouble again.

Mr. STIRLING: I suggest that an hon. member be allowed to carry on with a few questions which are interlocked; it appears to me that we would make better progress in that way.

The CHAIRMAN: The committee will realize the difficulty which faces the Chairman, in that I have no list of speakers. I have to make my own list as I go along, and already several hon. members have asked if they could be placed on the list. Generally I try to alternate between the different parties, and I have found that to work well for over a year now.

Mr. NEILL: Certainly it would facilitate the work of the committee if after an hon. member has started to ask questions he could be allowed to go on and finish them.

Mr. STIRLING: In British Columbia a certain amount of work is going on in connection with several road schemes, such as the Hope-Princeton road. I understand there are sixty-eight Japanese working at the Hope end of it and 120 at the Princeton end, and of course it is the very great hope of all those living in the southern portion of British Columbia that this work will be carried forward as quickly as possible. I realize that those in charge of the work are dependent for their road machinery upon what they can get from the government of British Columbia and from the parks branch, but I should like to know from the minister whether it is proposed to endeavour to get additional Japanese into these two camps in order that the work may be hastened. I am given to understand that these sixty-eight Japanese at the one end and 120 at the other are principally single men who were collected from other settlements and camps within the province, who were ready to go and work on that road. Close by you have the settlement of Tashme; in fact the Hope-Princeton road passes by Tashme, where the minister says there are 2,488 Japanese, no doubt including men, women and children. I should like to know whether the minister has any hope of strengthening the gangs working on that road from the inhabitants of Tashme.

Mr. MITCHELL: At the present moment there is no intention of strengthening those gangs, though something may be done next winter.

Mr. STIRLING: Then what is the policy of the government for the coming summer?

Mr. MITCHELL: As I indicated in my statement to the committee, the Japanese come within the national selective service regulations in regard to direction; and in view of the demand for labour, particularly in the summer months, we intend as far as possible to move these people into those industries where it is necessary to fill the gap in relieving the man-power shortage during the summer months.

Mr. STIRLING: Even to the extent of taking them from that province to another one?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, I would say so.

Mr. STIRLING: Then would the minister tell the committee the arrangements in regard to pay for these men who work in the road gangs?

Mr. MITCHELL: The pay for labourers is twenty-five cents an hour, and there are special rates for foremen and so on. The basic rate is twenty-five cents an hour.

Mr. STIRLING: With deductions for board?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, a deduction of sixty cents a day for board.

Mr. GREEN: This item covers the sum of $2,750,000, and is described as being for the removal of enemy aliens including Japanese nationals and other persons of the Japanese race from the protected areas in British Columbia. I take it—and if I am wrong in any of these statements I would ask the minister to correct me—that practically all this money will be spent in connection with the Japanese.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: And that it is really not for the purpose of removing them from the protected areas, since they have been removed from those areas already, but rather for their maintenance in other parts of Canada where they happen to be at the present time or to which they may be sent. Then I think hon. members should realize that this is only one of the votes with respect to those people of the Japanese race in Canada. For example, there is another item to be found at page 397 of Hansard, under the Department of Mines and Resources, in the amount of $1,000,000, which is described as being for the employment of persons of the Japanese race and/or Japanese nationals. I presume there would be a vote also under the Department of Justice for the cost of maintaining the Japanese who are interned, who according to the minister number some 431, and there may be other items as well. So that the Japanese problem is now costing the federal government and through the government, the people of Canada several million dollars a year.

In addition to the cost to the Canadian people, it is now quite clear that the federal government has assumed full responsibility for the movement and welfare of the Japanese people in Canada. I would point out that in most cases a Japanese cannot go from one part of the country to another without obtaining a permit. They are strictly under the control of the federal government at the present time. This means also that the federal government will be responsible for the disposition of all people of the Japanese race in Canada after the war, and will be solely responsible for finding some solution of this Japanese problem, because the government now is in the position that it cannot abandon these people, nor can it pass the responsibility on to any other government. That responsibility rests exactly where it belongs; that is, with the federal government. That is a fitting place for the responsibility to rest, because the federal government, as distinguished from the government or people of British Columbia, was responsible for allowing the Japanese to come to Canada.

Federal governments, one after another, have refused to heed the pleadings and the warnings of the people of my native province, and of members of all parties, with the exception of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, who have come here from that province. Time and again the Canadan government has even refused to heed the action of provincial governments of British Columbia, which have gone as far as to pass a provincial immigration measure which would base the test as to whether or not people should be admitted to British Columbia upon the applicant's ability to speak an European language. So that throughout the whole picture British Columbia has been the catspaw, and it does not propose to remain in that position any longer.

I suggest to members from other parts of Canada that this is a far-flung country. There are some things which affect one portion of the country far more acutely than they do another. People of all parts of Canada, including those who happen to live in my own province, are intelligent, sensible and idealistic. Perhaps in British Columbia they are even more so than in other parts of Canada! But I do suggest that where one part of the country is affected by a question of this type, representations made by Canadians living in that part of the country should be heeded. Failure of Canadians east of the Rockies to help out in respect of this Japanese problem during a period of decades—in fact ever since the turn of the century—has caused more bitterness in British Columbia against eastern Canada than any other single issue. And if that problem is not faced now by the Canadian government it will, in the future, cause even more bitterness.

There will be many other Pacific problems arising from time to time. British Columbia is the only Canadian province facing the Pacific. I hope Canada will pay attention to British Columba in the future, when Pacific problems have to be considered by the nation as a whole.

But, to get back to my subject: This Japanese problem is the federal government's mistake. There has never been a real federal policy in the matter, and I am afraid that is the position to-day. The federal government is just drifting.

Mr. MITCHELL: What does my hon. friend mean by "drifting"?

Mr. GREEN: The Minister of Labour was in the navy during the last war; he should know what is meant by drifting. I repeat that the federal government seems to be drifting in respect of this question, although it is costing Canada millions of dollars a year, and it is perfectly obvious that the solution must come from the federal government.

In the debate which took place last year about the end of June, I outlined something of the history of the Japanese problem in Canada. I do not purpose repeating that to-day, but intend to deal only with what has happened since last year's debate. Since that time several hundred more Japanese have come east of the Rockies. Only a few minutes ago the minister gave the figures to the hon. member for Yale, but for the purposes of the record I propose going over them again. They show that as of March 31, 1944—not quite six weeks ago—there were in British Columbia a total of 15,982 Japanese. That is still more than two-thirds of the total number in Canada. That group is divided up as follows: 11,214 are in interior housing centres, and of course they are being kept there at the expense of the government; 418 are in road camps; 3,162 are in self-supporting projects, and 1,188 are described as miscellaneous. Most of those Japanese in British Columbia came from the protected area at the coast; they have been dammed back, so to speak. In the Yukon and Northwest Territories there are 29.

Then, coming east of the Rockies we find that in Alberta there are 3,483; in Saskatchewan, 146; in Manitoba, 1,043, and in Ontario, 2,558; although of that number 431 are in internment camps, as dangerous to the state. In Quebec there are 394, and in the maritime provinces, only one. How he or she managed to get down to the maritimes, I do not know; but the fact remains that there is one person of the Japanese race in the maritimes. This makes a total number east of the Rockies of 7,625, or less than one-third of the total of 23,636 Japanese in Canada.

In the United States the great bulk of the Japanese were concentrated on the Pacific coast, just as in Canada they were concentrated in British Columbia. Our neighbours have succeeded in moving away from the three Pacific coast states all but about one-sixth of the Japanese who were there prior to the war. I believe that those who remain are in California, some of them in the camp at Tule Lake, where there has been so much trouble, and which I believe is occupied by Japanese who are strongly anti-American, and the rest are in the camp at Manzenar. The Americans have left only one-sixth in their Pacific coast states, while Canada still has two-thirds in British Columbia.

Mr. MITCHELL: But they are still in concentration camps in the United States.

Mr. GREEN: No; the Americans are putting them out to employment. As I have said, several hundred have been moved east of the Rockies in the last year.

Mr. MITCHELL: They still have a larger percentage than we have in concentration camps.

Mr. GREEN: That may be. There have been several hundred moved back east in the past year. So that the government has made some attempt at dispersing the Japanese across Canada. That has been done largely by persuading or by coercing individual Japanese to come east, and then trying to reestablish them here on a permanent basis. The result of that movement has been that the brightest young Japanese have come east—and they deserve credit for so doing, for coming back and trying to begin life anew in eastern Canada. Of course that means that the group which remain in British Columbia are going to be just that much more difficult to assimilate.

Then, some have been brought east of the Rockies under the selective service organization, and I believe a few family groups have been moved east by the government—but very, very few. Probably that is the reason that the numbers who have come east have been so small. The Japanese are a people who stick together in families, and it is difficult to persuade families to allow individual members to move away. I think they will be taken out of British Columbia in large numbers only when arrangements are made by the government to take them in family groups.

The action of the government in the past year may be described as a half-hearted attempt at dispersing Japanese across Canada. Actually it has only scratched the surface. If the problem is to be handled in this way it will take years and years to remove the Japanese from the coastal province.

Another feature is that practically all these Japanese who have been moved east of the Rockies have been placed in other provinces, on the basis that if those provinces do not want them to stay there after the war the government will remove them. That was a clause that was put in the agreements which were negotiated originally between the British Columbia security commission, which was the agent of the government, and the respective provincial governments. I believe that is the position to-day.

Furthermore, no Japanese are being placed in a town or district where there is any objection to them. For example, a few days ago we saw a report of a complaint by Forest Hill village against any Japanese domestics being employed. I believe a protest was made by the city of Ottawa against any Japanese coming here, and no Japanese have been brought to this city.

There is a provision that after the war they are to be removed on request, but no one knows where they are to be moved to. That is one question the people of British Columbia want answered. Is it the intention of the government to take all these Japanese back to British Columbia? Is it the intention to send them to Japan? Is it the intention to negotiate with the provincial governments to permit those who have been settled in the east to remain? Just what is to be done? Probably the federal government does not know what it proposes to do, but these are questions that will have to be answered.

Another factor is that the Japanese in British Columbia continue to hold back; they refuse to go east. I suppose they know a good province when they see one, but in any event it is quite difficult to get them to move from British Columbia. That complicates the situation considerably. A commission was appointed by the government a few months ago to investigate the welfare of the Japanese in the interior settlements. Its report, dated January 14, was tabled in the house, and in referring to the question of dispersing the Japanese it states that much more can be done in this connection when the British Columbia security commission has more cooperation from the Japanese. It is a good deal like the calling up of men for the army. It is a sort of half pleading and half coercive proposition; it is a half and half policy that really is not getting results.

Another difficulty is that the Japanese who come east are not allowed to lease land or business premises. The minister will correct me if I am wrong in this, but I believe that that is the situation. The Japanese themselves have suggested that some provision should be made by the government to subsidize the reestablishment of families who move east, but apparently there have been no arrangements made for that at the present time.

I have been unable to get the exact figures, but I understand that between 1,000 and 2,000 Japanese have asked to be sent back to Japan.

Mr. MITCHELL: You have not been able to get a boat for them.

Mr. GREEN: That is the responsibility of the minister. When the ss. Gripsholm went back last fall she took sixty-one Japanese who had requested to be sent home, and now many more have asked to be sent to Japan. Hon. members should realize that those who ask to go back are not all Japanese nationals. You cannot divide the Japanese in Canada on the basis that the Japanese national is disloyal, while the Japanese who is a naturalized Canadian or who has been born in Canada is loyal to Canada. All those who went from British Columbia on the ss. Gripsholm were either naturalized Canadians or Canadian-born Japanese.

I think the minister will admit that the fact that a Japanese is naturalized means very little in so far as his loyalty to Canada is concerned. Generally naturalization is acquired for economic reasons, to obtain a fishing licence or for some similar reason. I have here the January 8 issue of the New Canadian, a weekly paper published by the Japanese in British Columbia in which they refer to what I have just mentioned, that naturalization or place of birth means very little. They say:

> Equally well known is the fact that some, though born or naturalized in Canada, are not interested in their citizenship and would welcome the opportunity to go to Japan. Some have already done so; and others have signified their intention by applying for repatriation.

No attempt has been made by the federal government to ascertain what Japanese are loyal or what Japanese are disloyal. For example, I do not see how you can expect a Japanese who is a shintoist to be loyal to Canada, because part of his religion is the worship of the emperor of Japan. Such a man or woman could not be expected to place Canada first in his or her loyalty. In the United States they have tried to find out who is who among their Japanese. I have here volume 90, number 35, of the Congressional Record of February 23, 1944, and on page 1999 is shown the question they asked their Japanese, as follows:

> Will you swear unqualified allegiance to the United States of America, and faithfully defend the United States from any or all attack by foreign or domestic forces, and forswear any form of allegiance or obedience to the Japanese emperor or any other foreign government, power or organization?

A total of 5,333 Japanese said, "No." The record continues:

> In other words, they were not willing to swear allegiance to the United States, and they were not willing to forswear allegiance to the emperor of Japan. One thousand five hundred and fifty-five answered the question in a qualified manner or did not answer it at all. Therefore, we have this situation: we have 6,888 people in these camps who refused to unqualifiedly swear allegiance to the United States.

The United States house passed a law on that date, February 23, which permitted a person to renounce his United States nationality. The following section was added to their nationality act:

> (i) making in the United States a formal written renunciation of nationality in such form as may be prescribed by, and before such officer as may be designated by, the attorney general, whenever the United States shall be in a state of war and the attorney general shall approve such renunciation as not contrary to the interests of national defence.

Nothing of that kind has been undertaken here.

Mr. MITCHELL: What is the use of it when you have it?

Mr. GREEN: When you have what?

Mr. MITCHELL: Under present conditions I do not think that would be worth the paper it is written on.

Mr. GREEN: You suggest that these people should be left here whether they are loyal or not?

Mr. MITCHELL: The mere fact that they sign such a thing as you speak of is no indication of their allegiance to the United States.

Mr. GREEN: You mean it would not be any indication of whether they would be loyal to Canada?

Mr. MITCHELL: I would not think so.

Mr. GREEN: Then why does the minister have this declaration in his national selective service mobilization regulations:

That I make this declaration with full knowledge and understanding that I am thereby deprived forever of all rights and privileges to be naturalized in Canada as a British subject and that I thereby become liable to deportation from Canada whenever such deportation may be practicable.

That is a declaration put out by the minister's own department in connection with aliens who are called up and do not want to serve. They have that option.

Then the attitude of the Japanese government continues to be what it has been from the start, namely, to take a direct and active interest in their people who are in Canada and in other countries. If the Japanese government would only leave these people alone, things would not be so bad; but right from the start, in every nation to which they have migrated, the Japanese have been under the direction and control and have received the active support of the home authorities. That very fact has constituted and still constitutes a sinister threat to any nation that allows the Japanese to settle within its borders. For example, the Japanese government sent on the S.S. Gripsholm a lot of Japanese books and Japanese food to be distributed among the Japanese in Canada. A few years ago it took a census of all the Japanese in Canada and the United States; on January 28 of this year there was a significant broadcast from Tokyo; I have a report of it here; the heading is "Tokyo claims interned Japs being persecuted." The broadcast said:

The fact that our brethren, who have been making strenuous efforts on the front lines of overseas expansion—

Mark those words: "on the front lines of overseas expansion".

—are faced with all kinds of persecution in enemy nations, is truly beyond mere words of sympathy.

That had reference to the Japanese in Canada and the United States.

Another development during the year has been the inquiry by the royal commission to which I referred, which found that by and large, the Japanese in the settlement camps were living under better conditions than they had been before the war, that they were being well treated and that they had really no cause for complaint whatever.

Another thing that has happened during the last year has been that a final report has been published by the United States general who had been in command of the removal of Japanese from the west coast states, Lieutenant-General John L. Dewitt. He pointed out in his report many things with regard to the Japanese in the United States. The report was quoted as saying that invariably Japanese communities on the west coast flanked strategic installations, while there were no Japanese in nearby available farming sections. The report says:

It was difficult to explain the situation by coincidence alone.

Another paragraph from the report said that the west coast Japanese were "a tightly knit, unassimilated racial group", which constituted "a potentially dangerous element" from a military viewpoint and "military necessity required their immediate evacuation to the interior".

Incidentally, in my riding, just three months ago certain vacant property which had been held for years was sold by the custodian of enemy property; that property was found to belong to interests in Japan; here they were holding several vacant blocks in the middle of a residential district of Vancouver, and the significant fact was that the property lies on a hill overlooking the city, from which hill the whole city of Vancouver could have been brought under fire.

Another fact to be remembered is that all ties of the Japanese in the protected area have been cut. Their fishing boats have been sold, their properties have been sold—all their ties have been cut. It is not as though they were firmly rooted there.

Then, finally, I think the committee must give some consideration to the attitude of the people of British Columbia on this question. They do not propose to be left with the problem any longer. British Columbia faces the Pacific and the people of that province do not want the Japanese out there where they can be in contact with Japanese merchant vessels plying in and out of our harbours. There is the same feeling among the lads who have gone overseas from our province. I have here a statement made by one of these lads writing from overseas. He says:

It is just about time—

That was in February of this year.

—the people in eastern Canada realized that we will not stand for the Japs coming back. I think if the federal government allows them to return to British Columbia there will be serious trouble. All the British Columbia lads here feel very strongly about it.

I think the great majority of the people of British Columbia feel that if the Japanese cannot be resettled on a permanent basis in eastern Canada, then one term of the peace treaty should be that the Japanese in Canada should be returned to Japan in exchange for Canadians who are under Japanese control. Or if not to Japan, it might be possible to make arrangements for them to be reestablished in some territory in the Pacific under the control of the united nations.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Send them to Toronto.

Mr. GREEN: The hon. member for Fraser Valley will have to speak for himself. They could be properly reestablished in some of the territories that are being taken away from Japan and should be given full compensation. This may seem drastic and yet it has been done before. For example, shortly after the last war there was trouble between Turkey and Greece, and several hundred thousands of people were moved at that time; Turks were removed from Greece and Greeks were removed from Turkey. I have here a book entitled "The Lost Peace", by Harold Butler, formerly secretary of the International Labour Office of the League of Nations. At page 229 he describes that exchange of population. He says:

> The process of interchange would be difficult and often painful, but experience has shown it to be practicable. Nearly four hundred thousand Turks who had dwelt for generations in Europe were uprooted and transferred across the Bosporus, while a large number of Greeks whose forefathers had for long lived in Asia Minor were brought back to Hellas. Their absorption took time and money. I saw some of the Greeks in Euboea and the Peiraeus, where they were beginning to make a new life under very hard conditions. But they were no longer surrounded by alien and often hostile neighbours, and by degrees they found their niche in Greek national life. In the long run they and their children would come to enjoy greater happiness and security among their own people. A source of endless friction between the two races had been cut out by a drastic but salutary surgical operation.

He points out that the Germans followed this principle of avoiding racial conflicts by forcibly removing their compatriots from the Baltic states. He says:

> What they did brutally and ruthlessly can be done with much greater success by friendly agreement under international auspices. The segregation of races with strong mutual antipathies is one of the conditions of peace in eastern and southeastern Europe.

I ask for a clear-cut announcement of government policy on this whole Japanese problem. Let me place these questions before the minister. Is it the plan to remove all the Japanese from British Columbia, or are some to be left there, and, if so, how many? Are they to be kept out of the province of British Columbia for good? Can the minister give us assurance that they will not be sent back to British Columbia?

Are any plans under way for returning any of these Japanese to Japan? If so, what group or groups?

What does the government propose to do with those Japanese in other provinces if the government of any province requests their removal after the war?

These are questions which should be answered by the minister. I would urge upon him to realize that the problem is not yet solved. We have not begun to solve the Japanese problem in Canada. Further, the problem will not solve itself, nor is it of the type that can be forgotten, and so evaporate; it has to be worked out, and it must be worked out by the Canadian government. I hope that when the minister has a chance to speak on this matter he will give us an answer to the various questions I have asked him.

Mr. MITCHELL: I will answer my hon. friend in a few words. I cannot tell him what is to be the after-war policy with respect to the Japanese. This dominion is not the only pebble on the beach. I suppose all these questions will be decided at some international gathering charged with laying down policies with respect not only to this question—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What is the minister's opinion?

Mr. MITCHELL: That is all right, but—

Mr. GREEN: May I point out to the minister that not one of these questions has to do with after the war. I asked: Is it the plan to remove all Japanese from British Columbia? Are they to be kept out of that province for good? Can the minister give assurance that they will not be sent back to British Columbia? Are any plans under way for returning any to Japan; if so, what group or groups? What does the government propose to do with those in the other provinces if the government of any province requests their removal after the war? Not one of these has a thing to do with an after-the-war programme.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am making my speech.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Answer the questions. We do not want speeches.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have said there is a body of public opinion, particularly in British Columbia, favouring the return of all Japanese, whether nationals or born in this country. That viewpoint has been expressed. As I have indicated previously, I do not know, and I do not think anybody knows at the present moment what will be the policy of this government or any other. When all is said and done, let it not be forgotten that we have not yet won the war. Unless we do win it, we shall not have much say about the matter.

I know something about the difficulties and complexity of this Japanese problem. I am not going to tell the committee the conditions under which I went to British Columbia or surveyed the war in the Pacific and the Atlantic, the problems of Hong Kong, Singapore and the Dutch East Indies. I am not going to tell that story because it cannot be told at the present time. But when hon. members talk about the movement of Japanese, let me ask, how can you expect any agency, whether governmental or private, to accomplish the free movement of these people in face of the objections which my hon. friend has in his mind when he casts doubts upon the Japanese as individuals? Remember the conditions which have been built up. We must face the fact that many people in eastern Canada feel that every Japanese is walking around with a knife in his hand.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Why are you sending them back to British Columbia after the war?

Mr. MITCHELL: Nobody has said that we are going to.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Why do you not answer the hon. member's questions?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Your agreement says that you will send them back to British Columbia.

Mr. MITCHELL: The agreement does not say anything of the sort, and my hon. friend knows it.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: It certainly does say it. Table the agreements. You are afraid to.

Mr. MITCHELL: I cannot say any more than that. The problem has been made more difficult by the expressions of some hon. members and some other people in this dominion. I feel that our achievement up to date in connection with the Japanese problem in this country is as good as that of any country which has to deal with this very difficult problem. We have endeavoured to—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: —keep them in British Columbia.

Mr. MITCHELL: —move the Japanese to productive employment rather than keep them in camps. My hon. friend spoke of the financial commitments. I believe that the labour department estimate is correct. The fact that the Department of Mines and Resources contemplate an expenditure of a million dollars for this purpose during the coming financial year cannot reasonably be charged to the Japanese problem as undertaken by the Department of Labour, because it is productive employment. I do not know, but I assume that they want to build roads, and that sort of thing. If the Japanese were not to do that, other people would have to be paid to do it.

I think I have answered pretty well all my hon. friend's questions.

Mr. GREEN: You have not answered any yet.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Not one.

Mr. GREEN: If the minister will take the trouble to read from the transcript of Hansard the questions I asked him about five minutes ago—

Mr. MITCHELL: I think I answered them all. As to one particular question my hon. friend asked me, what will be done, whether now, to-morrow, and after the war, frankly I do not know.

Mr. GREEN: I have noticed that when the minister is dealing with his estimates, instead of answering the questions, in many cases he makes a speech. That is what he has done on my questions.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not think there is any law against making a speech in this chamber. My hon. friend has just made a forty-minute speech.

Mr. GREEN: I will just repeat these questions. Is it the plan to remove all Japanese from British Columbia? Are they to be kept out of that province for good? Can the minister give assurance that they will not be sent back to British Columbia? Are any plans under way for returning any to Japan; if so, what group or groups? What does the government propose to do with those in the other provinces if the government of any province requests their removal after the war?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Hear, hear. Straight questions.

Mr. MITCHELL: If I may be permitted, before six o'clock—it is almost six o'clock—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You can answer them before six o'clock.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend does not need to be clever.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: It is not necessarily being clever at all. We want an answer.

Mr. MITCHELL: When I endeavoured to answer the hon. member for Vancouver South I was told that I should not make a speech, and he has just made a speech for forty minutes. I suppose this discussion will go on this evening. At this time I should like to place on the record the figures asked for by the hon. member for Camrose; the subject is, the number and percentage of men whose categories on reexamination were raised to "A" and "B". With the permission of the committee I shall be glad to put that on the record.

On the other question, raised by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, as to the number of training centres in the dominion, with the permission of the committee I should be glad to place them on the record too.

The CHAIRMAN: With the consent of the committee.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. REID: Under this item of $2,750,000 for the removal of enemy aliens including Japanese nationals and other persons of the Japanese race from the protected areas in British Columbia, I have some questions I should like to ask the minister regarding the Japanese who are in the interior; but before doing so I wish to make certain remarks, following those made by the hon. member for Vancouver South this afternoon.

The hon. member for Vancouver South pointed out that all hon. members from British Columbia with the exception of those of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation are unanimous in their views on this very important question. May I say at the outset that I take the strongest objections to any person or party accusing me, when I speak on this subject, of speaking from a racial point of view. There are those who are always looking upon the world from a theoretical or idealistic point of view. Then, there are those who have idealism but who never forget the realities of life that are facing the country. And, of course, there are those who, when facing questions, have no idealism at all. May I say that I am one of those who, while having quite a lot of idealism, likewise endeavour to face the facts. It is most unfortunate indeed that this question, which is now becoming something of a national one, should have in British Columbia become a political question. I say without fear of successful contradiction that the cause of this lies entirely with the leaders of the C.C.F. party, because up until 1933 or 1934, the Japanese question in British Columbia was never a political question. The entire population and all political parties in existence at that time were unanimous in their opposition to the encroachment of the Japanese. Before 1933 no one would have thought of getting up on a public platform or going around lecturing regarding the Japanese; because it was understood among the people of British Columbia that this question was an economic one, although British Columbia had borne the brunt of the Japanese problem without any sympathy or support from any other province.

But when the late respected leader of the C.C.F. rose in the House of Commons and said that if he and his party were elected they would grant the vote to the Japanese, the question then for the first time in the life of our province became an active political question. I challenge anyone to examine my own political activities and say that I ever during any election mentioned the Asiatic question or the Japanese. My views, however, have been long known, and have been frowned on by some. Those in higher circles and some theorists said: "This man Reid, hates the Japanese." I refute that. I do not know what can be done to bring them to our viewpoint, but we who hold this view do so dispassionately and without hatred. What we did was from a sense of duty, because we realize, and have realized throughout the long years, the grave danger that faces this country, and the fact that if this problem is not solved by the people of Canada it will ever occur and reoccur as time goes on.

I shall not have time in the forty minutes at my disposal to deal with every aspect regarding the question; but the one danger we feared in British Columbia if the Japanese were given a vote was this, that they do not look upon the vote as we do, nor would they vote individually. If the Japanese were given the vote I feel sure that in whatever province they were located they would vote en bloc. It is my personal view that if they were voting in any province that would permit them to vote, other than British Columbia, everyone of them would vote C.C.F.

Mr. NEILL: Why not?

Mr. REID: It is strange that that party has taken unto itself the job of supporting the Japanese 100 per cent; and the Japanese support the C.C.F. 100 per cent. The minister may if he wishes to do so, refute the statement I am about to make, but it has been seriously said and never refuted that before the Japanese met the British Columbia security commission and had a conference with them they met the leaders of the C.C.F. party and discussed their position with them. I have no personal knowledge of the truth of it, but that statement has been made publicly and, so far as I am aware, has never been challenged.

I came to the House of Commons in 1930. I can well remember the resolutions introduced by myself on the Japanese question, and how I was laughed at when I pointed out the encroachments that they had made, how they controlled the British Columbia coast with their fishing boats, and that their maps were better than the Canadian government maps and likewise our admiralty maps. Those statements were admitted in this house by Lord Bennett, who was then Prime Minister.

Members from the maritimes and from the other provinces have said to me in the corridors here: "Oh, we are tired of hearing about the Japanese." I want to say to these people in all kindliness that I still hold those views and that in taking the stand I am taking I am taking it not altogether on behalf of British Columbia—although primarily that is true—but on behalf of all the Canadian people. I challenge any member inside the house or any individual outside the house to refute the statement which I am about to make, namely, that the Japanese in Canada are an unassimilable race. I have made that statement all through the years in which I have been protesting against them. Is there an hon. member who will rise in his place and say they can be assimilated in this country by marriage? I know I have heard it advocated by those idealists, but who in all seriousness would do it? These theorists do not want the experiment tried in their own family, but they are perfectly willing to have the experiment tried in some other family. They do not want the Japanese to marry into their family, or their family to marry into a Japanese family.

If the Japanese are unassimilable, would any hon. member rise in his place and argue the contrary? If so, I would like to hear him. Are we then to allow 23,000 of them to live here and grow and grow? For, mark you, the reasons for their coming here were not, as many think, like those of the Chinese. The Chinese came to Canada in the early days when there was a labour shortage here and at a time when our railways were expanding. But the Japanese did not come here under the same auspices. The Japanese came here later under a definite plan. I could quote article after article going back to 1900 and even earlier than that to show that there was a great plan for the conquest of the Pacific coast, if not the world, a plan laid down by the Japanese hierarchy. They set out in those days to encircle with Japanese the countries surrounding the Pacific ocean. The Japanese came here with the help and under the auspices of the Japanese government, and settled on the Pacific coast. That is one reason why they did not settle inland. The Japanese government wanted them on the coast. Had we not taken their boats away from them and taken them inland when war was declared, no one could have foretold what action they might have taken.

I intend to read one article, Mr. Chairman, and I do so in order to link it up with the statement I have made that they are here under a definite plan or understanding with the Japanese government and assisted by the Japanese government. May I point out that in 1937, according to the Japanese government records, some $45,000,000 were returned to Japan from Japanese immigrants on the Pacific coast; that is from South America, the United States and Canada. The sum of $45,000,000 was returned as part of the loan which they received. The Japanese government went further in its long-headed scheme for world conquest. It saw to it that the Japanese immigrants coming to this country and other countries on the Pacific were equally divided as between males and females. You will find that the number of males and females are very nearly equal, though that is not so in regard to the Chinese or the Hindus. Of course that was part of a definite plan; the Japanese government realized that there had to be women here with the men if the Japanese population in Canada were to increase. In the case of the Chinese, only about ten per cent are women, while only about one per cent of the Hindu population are women. As a result, these two races have not caused any great problem in this country. On the other hand, the Japanese, if left alone, in time would present a very difficult problem. Here you have people who have sworn allegiance to the emperor, even though they may have been born in Canada. The Japanese are people whom the government of Japan looks upon as Japanese citizens. If you were to look up the blue papers that have been issued by Japan you would find that in counting the number of fishermen employed in Japan before the war, the government had included the Japanese fishermen on the Pacific coast.

I repeat, for the benefit of those who have given little heed to our warnings, that in this country we have some 23,000 people almost equally divided as between males and females, who have been allowed to live their own lives, speak their own language and practise their own Shinto religion which, as the hon. member for Vancouver South has said, requires them to own allegiance to the emperor. May I give the committee an interesting statement made to me by a prominent Japanese, to whom I was speaking just before war broke out with Japan. I said, "I suppose the Japanese people are much like the people in Germany, and that the common citizens have little to say in regard to war?" He replied, "Mr. Reid, when the Japanese emperor speaks we must not even think in contradiction of his decree." I said, "Does that apply to the Japanese in this country?" And his answer was, "It does." Time and again we have made the statement that Japanese, whether born here or coming to Canada, owed allegiance first to Japan, and I should like any hon. member to tell me how one can be a citizen of two countries at the same time. I am very sorry that the hon. member for Vancouver East is not present this evening. I am not going to say anything about his views, but I wish he were here to take part in the debate. He is perhaps as emphatic and dogmatic in his views in favour of the Japs as I am in mine, only on the opposite side. The hon. gentleman has been lauded in some quarters as having taken a brave stand, but I do not know that it has been any braver than the stand some of us have taken. My name was passed on to Japan at one time as public enemy No. 1, and knowing the strong-arm methods of the Japanese I do not know which was the bravest stand.

The hon. member for Vancouver South spoke of what was taking place across the line. We are not holding the minister responsible for this problem; we all realize that it is not his doing and that he cannot help it. It is a matter for the government itself, but it is important to mention these matters even at this time, and with a war on. For many years we endeavoured to get the federal government to act in the matter, but no action was taken until war was declared. Now we are just afraid that when the war is over and the War Measures Act is repealed, the whole problem will once more be left on the doorstep of the people of British Columbia. We are going to fight against that every inch of the way. Those are my views, and I think the minister will agree that my statements have been very reasonable. I am wondering if the minister can tell us whether any approach has been made by the British Columbia security commission to the Japanese, asking if any of their number will renounce their Japanese citizenship and their allegiance to their emperor. Some take the stand, "We should do something more for the Japs." I take the stand that the Japanese, and all other races, will have to do something more for themselves. Some may say, "Well, the mere signing of a paper or taking of an oath does not mean very much," but it is strange that up to the present not one Japanese, either native born or Canadian born, has offered to renounce his allegiance to Japan and swear allegiance to this country. I doubt very much whether in the strictly legal sense a man can be given the rights of this country while he owes allegiance to Japan, and to the emperor. You do not have to take my word for that; it is in evidence. In 1934 the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and I went before the committee considering this matter, where we had an opportunity of asking some questions of the Japanese who appeared there. I asked one of the Japanese professors this question: "In the event of war, to which country would you consider you owed allegiance?" Without hesitation he replied, "Japan." He was appearing before that committee, saying that he was a Canadian and a British subject, and asking for the vote. I am very glad I took part in those proceedings, and so helped prevent those people from being allowed to vote. As I say, the right to vote in British Columbia would be but the first step, for the Japanese would not vote as other people do; they would vote as the No. 1 man Jap told them, who in turn would take orders from the Japanese council.

I must hurry along; my time is going, and there are a few questions I should like to ask the minister. I wanted, however, to place my views before the committee to-night in the hope that the minister would carry them to the government and that they might be considered seriously. We all realize that the matter cannot be solved at this moment, with the war on. The minister has pointed out that we do not know how the war will end or what the peace terms will be. We realize that what he has said is perfectly true; nevertheless we would like the most sympathetic hearing we can possibly get from the government. I stated last year, and I repeat now, that I am just a little perturbed because I know that close to the government is a group of these higher officials who have no practical sense at all, who are thinking in theoretical terms and whose type of mentality has helped to bring the world to this pass. They refuse to face facts; and knowing that this group is around here, I am just a little afraid of their influence when the time comes to settle this great problem.

It has been suggested that we should soft-pedal the whole question because there may be repercussions in Japan. It has been said that the Japanese will pick up the things we say here and perhaps use them to inflame racial hatred among the people of India. That may be; but in my practical mind I sometimes wonder how the people of India can discern between what is true and what is false in all they have been told by the Japanese, because I do not suppose bigger liars than the Japanese leaders ever existed, and certainly they are peddling a lot of lies throughout the world to-day.

However, to support what I was going to say a little while ago regarding the menace of leaving them there, let me read this to the committee—and I am not going to weary hon. members with a lot of reading. An article by John W. White in the Saturday Evening Post of June 27, 1942, regarding 300,000 Japanese in Brazil, who came there in a period of ten years, states in part:

> If any doubt remained as to the political motives behind the Japanese government's keen interest in forcing these colonies on to the South American countries, it was dispelled in April by Tokyo itself. The spokesman was Montonoa, a former administrator of one of the colonies in Brazil, who, significantly enough, had been called home to take a position in the emperor's government. In a belligerent interview in the newspaper Asahi he warned Brazil that any restriction of Japanese "rights" in the Amazon valley would be considered a hostile act against the imperial government. The Amazon zone, he said, "morally" belongs to Japan, because the Japanese colonists have spent ten years reclaiming it from the jungles. After charging Brazil with having done nothing to develop the resources of the Amazon, he enunciated the interesting theory that natural resources, wherever found, belong to those who develop them. And this apostle of Japanese culture stated further that he considered this Japanese colony as a province of Japan.

I leave that for the serious thought of hon. members from other provinces, who perhaps have not before given much serious thought to this question. I ask them to think about the problem. And might I remind them that after this war, if we are to take an active interest in the affairs of other countries, I do not see how much progress will be made in thinking about other countries if other provinces in this country refuse to take stock of problems which exist in their own country.

I have some questions to ask, and some comment to make about the first one. I note at page 13 of the report of the British Columbia security commission that the commission who are handling the Japanese are holding back $250 per adult Japanese, and $50 for each child, as a rehabilitation fund. This raises some misgivings in my mind as to why there is a rehabilitation fund. What is the motive behind it? What is the idea behind the British Columbia security commission's gathering a rehabilitation fund? Where are these people to be rehabilitated? It is true that they are spread out now in some of the other provinces. Members from Alberta can perhaps say whether or not this is correct, but some people from Alberta have told me that many people in that province are beginning to be worried lest the Japanese are there to stay—and they do not want them. A few people in the other provinces, when spoken to, will say, "Yes, they are splendid workers." But I pointed out to them that when the Japanese came to British Columbia in the early days we did not see the hidden hand of Japan. We did not realize that they were an arrogant race. We thought the Japanese were similar to the Chinese, and would be more cooperative. But the moment they became powerful they almost captured the fishing industry, and other business as well; and it was then that the arrogance of the Japanese became apparent.

Therefore I say to the minister that we are perturbed. We want this matter to be taken seriously, because I believe that if this problem is not solved now, and that we leave 23,000 of them, fifty per cent men and fifty per cent women, the strength of that group in twenty-five years from now will be enormous. It will lead to trouble. No one can tell what can happen to Japan, and we cannot annihilate a complete nation. They can rise again—who knows? No one can foretell. But leaving them here, with their allegiance to Japan, whether born in this country or not, using their own language, and obeying the laws of Japan, is something which will lead to trouble, and should not be tolerated in this country any longer than we can help. That is one question I want to ask the minister.

Then I would ask this one: The British Columbia security commission says it was found that the procedure at present followed is to release assets of the Japanese, when requested to do so. Reports are prevalent—I have no way of proving them—that the Japanese are taking these assets and buying property again through the medium of Canadian citizens. In British Columbia tracts of land are being bought, obtained by the Japanese through the release of these assets. It is said that certain white Canadians—and I use the term "white" in contrast to the Japanese—are acting as agents. It is stated that these sales are proceeding apace, and that when the war ends, all the Japanese will have to do will be to come back to British Columbia, and these properties they have bought, or are buying at the present time, will be released to them. I should like a statement from the minister on that point.

I also notice that the minister in his speech said that some 21,000 Japanese had been evacuated. I wonder where the other 2,000 have gone?—because there were more than 23,000 of them. That is something further which perturbs me. The rehabilitation fund looks to me like a move by the British Columbia security commission to make provision now so that the Japanese will not be moved, but will remain here. I do not know whether the government has given assent to that policy; but a full explanation is due this chamber as to why it is being done.

One could go on at greater length, but I do not wish to cover the ground discussed this afternoon by the hon. member for Vancouver South. I have endeavoured to touch upon other aspects of the problem, and I have pointed out that in so far as the people of British Columbia are concerned this problem is looked upon as a very serious one indeed. I repeat it is most unfortunate that one party has taken the Japanese, so to speak, under its care, and has become their champion. I know that all members of that party do not agree with them, but I did notice that—

An hon. MEMBER: What party is that?

Mr. REID: It is the C.C.F.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The great humanitarian party!

Mr. REID: The idealists and theorists of this country are probably leading the people along the wrong path.

Mr. MacNICOL: Not the idealists—the theorists, probably.

Mr. REID: Like many others, especially those among us who know what we are talking about in this connection, I have been endeavouring to speak from a practical point of view. We reiterate the statement I made that if the Japanese are left there the problem will recur. The reason I speak to-night is that we want to keep this issue alive, and to warn the government of our feelings. We are pointing out that after the War Measures Act is withdrawn the Japanese question might be left to the provinces again, and there is no doubt in my mind where they will go—because the Japanese government wants them on the coast.

I am very sorry the hon. member for Vancouver East is not in his seat at the moment; I will not use his name by way of criticism, but I would say this to him: If you are going to reinstate the Japanese in British Columbia and to give them the vote, then you cannot, after having done that, say to them, we are not allowing you to work here, there, or elsewhere. And I want one of the C.C.F. party to rise in his place in the house and say they will put the Japanese back in the fishing business. I want a statement on that question. In 1934 I was one of those who took steps to get them put out of the fishing business. That was long before 1939 or 1944. I fought the matter all the way through, but I was only laughed at. I take strong exception to anyone who says that I have done this because of racial hatred. I did it from a practical point of view. I tried to take a lesson from what has occurred in other countries. Let the C.C.F. say they will give the Japanese jobs and they will find the Japanese will get back in the fishing business. If they give the Japanese the vote and they become full-fledged citizens of the province, will my hon. friends take the stand that they cannot go here, there or anywhere. They will be able to go where they like. Let them again get a foothold in the fishing business and the other fishermen of British Columbia will find out what will happen. As the representative for New Westminster I feel that I should fight for the heritage which rightfully belongs to the people of this land.

My time has about expired, but I wanted to put these questions to the minister. Here are some more questions I should like him to answer. What has been paid for hospital accommodation for the Japanese? Would he explain the rehabilitation plan and the plan for employment? How many are still being maintained and how many are employable? Is maintenance being withheld from Japanese who are employed? We hear a great deal about the shortage of men. If they are all that they are claimed to be by some members of the government and by the C.C.F., why do we not take steps to make them work instead of maintain them? That is, if they are Canadian citizens, if they are as good citizens as the minister sometimes says he thinks they are, why are they lying back and not working during this period of man-power shortage?

Here is another question I should like the minister to answer if he can. I received a telephone call the other night from a newspaper reporter in Toronto. He asked me a question for which I have not as yet found an answer. He wanted to know if the Japanese who are under the control of the mounted police come under the price ceiling regulations with regard to wages. I asked him why he wanted to know and he said that a friend up the street had a Japanese working for him for $65 a month; she was working around the garden and doing things like that. She left because someone else offered $100 a month. The reporter wanted to know if everyone in this country was under a price ceiling regarding wages. I think this point should be cleared up, perhaps not by the Minister of Labour but by some other minister. Are these people under these regulations, or are they being protected and allowed to do things which ordinary Canadian citizens are not allowed to do?

I have endeavoured to deal with this matter with as little heat and in as reasoned a manner as possible. I feel very strongly and believe that we in this country should not allow other groups of people to stay as Canadians and still own allegiance to other countries. If that is allowed to continue we can never make a great country of Canada in the future. That is my belief and I have always held it. As long as I am going into this question may I point out this other fact. I hold the view that if we had had two or three languages throughout the length and breadth of Canada the peaceful and harmonious relations with our neighbour to the south would not be as close and friendly as they are at the present time. I hold to the belief that the turmoil and trouble now taking place in Europe are due, in part at least, to the many languages spoken on that continent. I am against groups coming from other lands and attempting to perpetuate their own languages and carry on as they did in the country they came from. At a later stage of the proceedings I shall perhaps enunciate my views more fully on this.

I thought it my duty to-night to join with the hon. member for Vancouver South and other hon. members from British Columbia in pointing out that this is a national problem which cannot be settled just by brushing it to one side. I consider it to be my duty to let this committee and the country know the feelings of the majority of the people in the constituency I represent. In closing, I again ask the minister to give me answers to the questions I have asked.

Mr. MITCHELL: Mr. Chairman, I think I can answer both the hon. member for New Westminster and the hon. member for Vancouver South who have asked me several questions with regard to policy. The first question had to do with immediate policy, and in reply I would say that the government will take such action from time to time in regard to the removal and transfer and movement of Japanese as may be consistent, prudent and advisable in the light of existing circumstances.

With regard to post-war policy, I think I expressed our opinion this afternoon. May I say to my hon. friends that I have definite views on this question, views just as strong as those expressed by the two previous speakers—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Do you agree with them?

Mr. MITCHELL: —but they are sitting there and I am sitting here, which is an entirely different matter. In view of changing conditions on account of the war I am not in a position to forecast government policy. But I do thank hon. members for taking it for granted that we shall be sitting here when the war is over. May I say to my hon. friends that when the opportune time arrives, and there is a question of timing in these matters, I think they will find that the policy of this government will be in conformity with the broad interests and ideas of the Canadian people.

The hon. member for New Westminster has been a close student of this question and he lives in close contact with the problems which have arisen in British Columbia. He raised a question about something in the report of the British Columbia security commission with regard to the rehabilitation grant or assets of $250 for grown-ups and $50 for each child. The purpose of this is not to rehabilitate in the sense in which that word is generally understood. Where there are assets, those assets are reduced to that point before they receive any assistance from the Canadian government in the way of maintenance.

Another question raised was that of our own people buying farms on behalf of Japanese in a surreptitious way. This matter has been investigated on a number of occasions by my department and up to this point we have not been able to ascertain that such a condition exists. It may be that it does exist, but it has been investigated by the mounted police and no evidence has been forthcoming that would warrant such an assumption.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is there a law in British Columbia that prevents the Japanese from holding land?

Mr. MITCHELL: At the present time, absolutely, by order in council under the defence of Canada regulations.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is only temporary.

Mr. MITCHELL: As to the payment of maintenance in the camps, no maintenance is paid to any Japanese who is employable; let that be clearly understood. My information is that there is no one in the settlements who is unemployed and that those outside are employed in gainful occupations. As I indicated this afternoon, they come under the national selective service regulations, and the committee can rest assured that where these people can meet the needs of labour in parts of the dominion, where direction is necessary, the regulations will be put into force.

Before taking my seat I wish to thank the hon. member for New Westminster and other hon. members for bringing the viewpoint of British Columbia on this problem to the attention not only of myself but also of the house and the country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Under the defence of Canada regulations are the Japanese considered as alien enemies? If so, how can it be that they come under the regulations of national selective service?

Mr. MITCHELL: They are persons of the Japanese race.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, we are at war with Japan. The government declared war against Japan with great acclaim, although we have not been fighting against them very much.

Mr. MITCHELL: Seventy-five per cent of the Japanese in the dominion were born here.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That does not make them Canadians.

Mr. REID: Will the minister answer the question I asked as to a discrepancy in the figures, and also as to the Japanese language being taught to the children?

Mr. MITCHELL: The discrepancy arises in this way. One figure deals with the Japanese evacuated from the protected areas, and the other figure deals with those outside the evacuated areas. The two together give the total.

Mr. REID: What about teaching the Japanese language?

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Mr. MITCHELL: As far as my department is concerned, no teaching is being given in the Japanese language. But we cannot stop the parents from talking to their children in Japanese. However, no official recognition is given to the Japanese language in the matter of teaching.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Are they not teaching Japanese in the schools right now?

Mr. MITCHELL: Not officially.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Oh, well!

Mr. MITCHELL: Not in the schools that we are operating.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You are supplying the school and they are teaching the Japanese language.

Mr. MITCHELL: No, they are not. My hon. friend will have to take my word for it.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You take my word. You are wrong, and I know it.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am not taking your word for it. I know, and you do not.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, any remarks I make with regard to the Minister of Labour and his policies will not be addressed as criticism of him. I have watched with great interest his career since he first came into the house as an independent member and I think he has done well under very difficult circumstances. Perhaps it would have been better for his reputation and for his conscience if he had not been in the position he is in to-day, for he has almost admitted that while he possesses one set of views he is compelled, by the principle, I suppose, of cabinet solidarity, to do something that is against his conscience. All I can say is that I sympathize with him, but I do not admire him for that.

Mr. MITCHELL: Is a man in public life supposed to have a conscience?

Mr. NEILL: It was said by a member of this house a few days ago that after his experience in Ottawa he viewed all men as crooks until he found to the contrary. I do not subscribe to that idea at all. I deprecate it. I want to say that in the 245 men in this house there is not one bit more crookedness than anywhere else.

Mr. MITCHELL: I agree.

Mr. NEILL: I was going to say that the form which this debate has taken to-night illustrates a point that came up when we were held up to reproach on the ground that we were delaying the house by debating the proposed changes in the rules, and finally were charged with holding up the war effort and hurting our boys in Europe. I have spoken only three times in this long session, and what I was doing the other day when we were debating the proposed changes in the rules was to preserve for our boys on the other side when they come back a right which would have been taken away from them if that thing had been railroaded through as was intended. But for that unreasonable fight, as it has been called, that we put up, the members here to-day would have found themselves checked, for, if the proposed change in the rules had been put through, the hon. member for New Westminster and the hon. member for Vancouver South would have found themselves limited to speaking for only twenty minutes, or half what they did, and they would have found that they could speak only once. The result would have been this. The minister would have had two courses open to him. He could have heard what the members said and then just sat tight and laughed off our criticism and have felt that he did not need to answer it because the rules would have said that we could speak only once in committee. Or he might have taken another line. He might have said in reply to some member who had spoken, "Your statements are false," and the member to whom he addressed himself could not have replied because he would have had the right to speak only once. That is the right, the right to speak, that we were fighting for the other day, and it will be seen to-night what a good thing it was that we did fight for it.

I appreciate the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver South. He put the case clearly and with not the slightest suggestion of appealing, as the hon. member for Vancouver East always says we do, to racial jealousy and racial ill-feeling. Even the hon. member for Vancouver East could not possibly say that the hon. member for Vancouver South injected any element of ill will or racial feeling or anything of that kind, because he was most temperate in his remarks.

If ever there were a time when a member should feel impelled to express the views of his constituents, I feel that it is now. I have never in all the many years that I have represented my riding seen such a unanimity of purpose, such a grim, black determination along the lines that we have advocated here this afternoon, of removing the Japs from Canada at the close of the war. Almost every public body—the legion, the city council, boards of trade, labour unions, the I.O.D.E., for even the ladies have a share in it—has expressed itself, and in no measured terms, and without qualification, that they want the Japs removed from Canada. They want that, and they want nothing less.

The Minister of Labour said just now that 75 per cent of the Japs in Canada were born here. I saw that somewhere else some time ago, but it is simply not so. I have the figures here, and after I sit down, if anybody wishes to challenge my statement, I can quote them. But it is not seventy-five per cent. I admit that he might be bewildered as to what figures he should use, because all kinds of figures are put out for the asking. The hon. member for Westminster talked about a little inside clique which was on terms of friendship with the Japanese. I do not know where the friendship comes in or who professes it; I do not think it is shared by the Minister of Labour, but the fact remains that you can get any kind of fake figures you like. I have a statement in my hand showing a difference of six thousand between the number of Japanese at a certain time and six months later. They do breed, but they do not breed as quickly as that. However, I have not time to go into that.

The hon. member for Vancouver South suggested that there were only twenty-five thousand of them and that it should not be such a terrible job for the government to deal with them, and he gave a very good illustration based on what happened in one of the European wars, where they traded Greeks for Turks, or Armenians, and four hundred thousand people were transferred. The scheme worked well and benefited all parties to the deal; ultimately it made for their peace and good will and happiness. There is a long difference between twenty-five thousand and four hundred thousand. But let the door be opened, and they will have to be counted not in hundreds of thousands but in millions, because the Japanese like the western part of Canada. There is an idea that Japan is being crowded out of its own lands. That is nonsense. They have a large island—I think it is Hokkaido—where there is plenty of room for them, but they do not like the climate; they much prefer to come here, where they find a more congenial climate.

The hon. member for Vancouver South also asked, if they are not expatriated where will they go? I would ask the minister that question; he ought to have some idea what he proposes to do. Apparently that is a forbidden subject. We can spend a large amount of time on discussions looking to the post-war period; are we going to do nothing with this question, the most burning question in British Columbia? Apparently it must not be dealt with. The Mexicans have a word "manana", meaning to-morrow, and apparently it is in that spirit that we are asked to deal with this matter.

The Japanese have to be taken away. Where are they to be shipped, or where are they to go when they are taken away from the other provinces: I hold in my hand an agreement which bears the minister's signature, or which, at any rate, he sanctioned. It was made between the British Columbia security commission and the province of Alberta. Let me read one sentence:

> The commission agrees to remove or to have removed from the province—

And this applies to other provinces.

> —upon the termination of the state of war now existing between Canada and Japan, the Japanese temporarily placed or maintained within the province pursuant to the terms of this agreement, as requested so to do by the province.

The other provinces—Alberta, Manitoba, possibly Saskatchewan, and I am not sure about Ontario—would not allow the Japanese to be admitted until this agreement was signed. They are to be taken away from those provinces at the end of the war. Where are they going? To British Columbia? Why unload them on British Columbia? We did not bring them into existence or bring them to our province, and we did not sign an agreement of this kind because it was from our province they were taken away on account of the war. Why unload them on us? Why should our wishes not be respected? Our objection should be the more readily regarded, because we know them from long experience, whereas Alberta knows of them only from what it has heard from us.

It has been suggested that they might be left where they are, say a couple of thousand in Alberta, the same number in Ontario, and so on; that it would not matter so much if there were a few Japs here and there, rather than twenty-five thousand in one area, and that by and by the whole thing would sort of simmer down, for people are very forgetful. As a British Columbian I would not mind an arrangement like that, but as a Canadian let me say that this would only be spreading the evil. If you put your hand on a pool of water it spreads; it does not disappear. It is very much as though we discovered three hundred cases of smallpox in Canada, and instead of segregating them all in one place and providing doctors and nurses to attend them, we spread them over a number of different towns and said, nobody will notice a case of smallpox here and there, and everything will be lovely. On the basis of that theory we are going to start clusters, centres, cancers if you like, of this alien pagan race in every province, all reaching out and spreading out like some evil pool of poison in the province, and by and by they would unite.

Remember that, by the law of the dominion government, if any provinces gave a Jap the right to vote in a provincial election the dominion will follow suit. The Prime Minister said himself in this house that he would adhere to that, and that if British Columbia or any other province allowed them to vote in provincial matters he would allow them to vote in dominion elections. They did vote recently in the Ontario election and they can vote in a dominion election in other than British Columbia. They vote in the other provinces, because ours is the only province which has withheld the vote from them, it being the only province really interested. If you allow them to spread all over the dominion, it may well happen that some man who has got in by a close vote, and has reason to believe that two hundred Japanese voted for him, would be likely to favour them when he is elected. Once let them get the vote and that is what will happen.

Some people have the idea that it is only a small matter because only twenty-five thousand are involved. It is only twenty-five thousand because we got legislation passed preventing their entry. I have been here since 1922, and I have piles of speeches which I made on the subject, and with some results. We got an act passed in 1924 cutting down Japanese immigration. They were coming in at the rate of eighteen hundred a year and we got the immigration reduced to one hundred and fifty. The United States government out of a clear sky passed a law in, I think 1924, prohibiting altogether the entry of Japanese. It was at that time we made a fatal mistake. I begged the Prime Minister almost on my knees to put into the law the word "oriental". He excluded Chinese, but he did not exclude Japanese, though the number was cut down to one hundred and fifty.

The hon. member for Westminster said something about Brazil. When the Japanese were shut out of the United States they made advances to Brazil, and negotiated one of these cursed gentleman's agreements, which only binds one side, to allow them to come in. This happened around 1925. Some years ago—I cannot recall the exact year—Brazil abrogated that gentleman's agreement, repudiated it lock, stock and barrel, and prohibited the entry of any more Japanese. They found that the gentleman's agreement worked there just as it had done here. The Japanese ran railroads through it and came in by hundreds and thousands, until Brazil got its fill of them and passed this prohibition law. That is a fine illustration of a race which had had no previous intercourse with the Japanese, finding from bitter experience what it amounted to.

I tried to put a bill through in 1938, and if it had passed perhaps things would not be quite as bad as they are now. But I prophesied, even at that time, what would happen, and before that, as I say, I got the immigration rate cut down to one hundred and fifty.

Here we are in the middle of a ghastly war, confronted on every side by evidences of the atrocities of this enemy, and we are here discussing, with our fingers in our mouths, what further privileges we can grant the Japanese. Someone said that the soldier would not recognize us here. What would the soldier think if he knew that we were trying to let more Japanese in, and to keep them here, instead of providing for our own men, so that they would have a place to go fishing and somewhere to live under the sun when they came back. Are they sitting in the diet in Japan discussing what further privileges we can have in their country? I wonder how many white men vote in Japan under any circumstances. What is sauce for the goose is certainly sauce for the gander.

The minister left out one of the stock government phrases; I will give it to him for what it is worth because he may find it useful. I have heard it so often that I have almost forgotten it. Oh, yes: "That, of course, is a matter of policy which will be disclosed in due course." Well, he did not bring out that one, I admit, but he rang all the changes on the rest of the political evasive gags.

I heard this years ago from another cabinet minister. He said: "It will be time enough to talk about removing Japs; I will attend to this after the war." If you do not do it now you will not do it later. It reminds me of a story about the devil. The devil was holding a committee meeting in hell one time. He had been approached and told that there was an evangelical revival taking place on the earth. He was afraid that it might succeed in ruining his power, and so he said to his assembled devils: "I will give great privileges and honour to anyone who can stop the thing. Have any one of you anything to suggest or a plan to stop this revival of which I am afraid?" One devil said one thing and one another. One said: "Send me; I will tell them that there is no hell." The devil said, "Oh, you are a fool; everyone knows there is a hell. A lot of people are living in a hell right now." One suggested one thing and one another, and finally one little old devil in the corner said, "Send me; I will tell them there is a hell and there is a heaven, but—there is lots of time yet." The devil said, "You are the man, you go." He went and the revival was killed. Lots of time! Those are the words we are to get to-night from the government, to-morrow and to-morrow. Let me tell the minister that to-morrow it will be too late. After the war is over, after you make peace, you will not be able to approach on this question any nation that has been at war. We presume we shall give them decent terms, but you cannot at that time say to them: "We want to export, deport or expatriate your nationals," because a lot of them are British subjects. You cannot do that after the war. They could refuse to take them. This has to be part of the terms of peace. That is why we are so insistent that it should be made part of the terms of peace when the nations meet to work out the terms.

The minister said, and I think it was uncalled-for, that some of the speeches made in this house to-night and others made along that line recently actually make it more difficult for the government to settle this matter. He did not use the word "war", but the government always end up every reply to criticism like that. It does not matter if it is the question of the collection of garbage. They will end up by saying: "You had better be careful now or we shall accuse you of trying to hold up the war effort." The minister did not use the words "war effort", but he said something very nearly approaching that. I should like to know why the elected members of this house should be criticized for making some definite effort to find out what the government is going to do at the peace table with a bunch of people like the Japs. It will be too late to do it after that.

What we want from the minister, and I make no bones about it, and what the people want, is a pledge that a demand of that kind will form part of the peace terms, and that the government will use their best efforts to see that it is carried out. Of course I admit, as the minister said, that we are only one among a lot of nations, and what the other nations want will certainly have to be considered. No one says anything else. Why twist our statements? Why put words in our mouths? What we do ask is that the government declare their policy on this question. What we ask them to do is to declare that this will be the policy of the government, which the minister speaks for, when they come to discuss the terms of peace, and that the Prime Minister will stand up, advocate, demand and press for that policy, and that he will do his best to see that this is carried out.

Canada has been great in war; she will be great in peace and at the discussing of the peace terms. She will not be thrown down. Other nations may not be sympathetic, but she will not be thrown down. A demand couched with the ability, eloquence and force of the Prime Minister behind it will not be thrown down. That is all we ask. If the minister cannot pledge that just now, why not adjourn the debate? All that we have been doing for a while has been to adjourn things anyhow. Let the minister adjourn the debate until Monday and then tell us to what extent he can meet us in that regard. Above all, do not tell us that we are holding up the war effort because we want a statement. We are entitled to a statement. What is the speech from the throne? Is it not a policy, a programme and an enunciation of views and matters of policy that will never be passed this session? Before the Prime Minister went to London he unloaded a whole lot more, some additions and some just reiterations of what he was going to do this session, things that will take quite a long time. It is not a statement of policy for the session; it is a statement of policy of the party, and I would expect that the government will be going to the country on it.

If you glance through the speech from the throne and what was unloaded on us the other day I think you will admit, if we can do all that, surely the minister can do something about formulating a policy for the future. Some of the stuff in the policy is a chart for the next twenty years. It will not hurt to go a little farther with this policy and reassure the people of British Columbia in this respect. Does he not want support; does he not want help? With the exception of the hon. member for Vancouver East and a few people whom he represents, there are very few people in British Columbia who do not want the Japanese treated as we have suggested; and I do not say that with any ill will toward the Japanese. I say in all kindliness that it will be in the best interests of the Japanese themselves, because if they return to their fishing boats and so on and our men come back from overseas and hear of the atrocities that have been perpetrated against our men in the east, it will be bad for the Japanese, not for the whites alone. There will be blood shed. We want to avoid that. It would be far better for the Japanese. Let them go their way and let us go ours.

I have not said anything about race or creed. I have not attempted to raise that issue at all. But we say, as the hon. member for New Westminster said, that these people will not assimilate and cannot assimilate. They do not want to assimilate. The real test of assimilation is marriage. You cannot get anything else without that. They simply do not want to do that. They approach you and say it makes their heart bleed on election day when they see white men going to vote and they cannot. That is all poppycock. When the war broke out we had to close sixty-nine Jap schools, entirely Jap staffed, where they taught the Japanese language, Japanese culture and Japanese doctrines. We got some of their stuff. It was all written in Japanese, of course. We got some of their textbooks translated. It was anti-white man stuff. They used to leave the white schools where they got all they could out of our culture, and go across the road to their own schools, and where there were not enough pupils to run a school they had travelling teachers going around spreading their propaganda or what they call the Jap culture. These are the people we are asked to accept.

We are then told: "Oh, but you are talking about the first generation. Of course, they are more or less attached to their own country, the same as we would be." That is not so. In the committee that the hon. member for New Westminster talked about we had some very clever Japs as witnesses. One was a professor; another was a dentist; another was a teacher, and there was another man. They told us all about why they wanted to vote. I said to the one who was a college professor: "You have a habit of registering your child with the Japanese consul, and therefore he remains a Jap; yet at the same time he is born in Canada and claims all the rights and privileges of a British subject." He said: "Yes." I said: "That is a pretty good thing for you." He said: "Yes, we find it quite a convenience." I said: "What about those schools? Do you think it is a good thing to have these schools where they teach the very opposite to what is taught in our schools?" He said, "Of course, it is a pity, and we older ones wanted to do away with them, but the third generation, or the younger generation thought we had better keep them on." So much for that. It is the third generation that want them. It is currently reported by those in a position to know, such as the secret intelligence officers of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, that the third generation is the one that has to be watched, because they are better educated and they know how they can work acts of espionage and things like that. They give the information, and so on. He is a trained man. He may appear perfectly fair in many respects, but he is a spy for all that.

I ask the minister not to evade the issue, but to be honest and frank. He did evade the question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver South. He said that these things are to be considered. It is the same old reply. For heaven's sake, take a definite stand. Give us a definite understanding so that we can go home and tell our people exactly why we were turned down. Let us know, and then they have the remedy in their hands. Do not let us go home and say that we were handed a lemon, and a very sour lemon at that. If we are to have this Jap love feast, let us say so. The hon. member for Vancouver East, whatever his feelings, at least is the spokesman of the C.C.F. and he never misses an opportunity to speak for his oriental friends. If the minister would pledge his government to fight for the repatriation and exclusion of these people, that is all we ask; and all we want is a definite statement. If there is any doubt about it, leave it over until Monday.

With regard to the other nations, I have spoken of that already; I know the other nations must be consulted. The Prime Minister might go to the peace conference and be turned down, but we would not hold that against him. I will take his word for it if he gives this House of Commons the pledge that he will do his best at the peace conference to get this thing put over. That will be all right as far as I am concerned, and I think the people of British Columbia would take him at his word. But we will not be satisfied with anything less, any subterfuge, any sidetracking, any "to-morrow". Those things are not for us; we want a definite pledge. I am not talking now in the interest of votes, for I am not going to run again; that is well known. But if it were the last thing I could do I would still fight for that policy. It is the thing for British Columbia, where our children and grandchildren have to live. It will be only a few generations until the Japanese will overrun western Canada, unless we do something about it. For that reason I join with the other hon. members who have spoken, and I believe that every hon. gentleman coming from British Columbia, with the one sad exception, is of the same opinion.

Mr. RALSTON: I wonder if I might intervene for a moment, just on one subject. The committee is discussing an item under the Department of Labour dealing with the removal of enemy aliens from protected areas. Quite naturally the committee has drifted into a debate on a much broader subject which I know is extremely close to the hearts not only of members from British Columbia but of members from all over Canada. However, what the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, with his usual crispness and, I if I may say so, his usual irony and, if I may add, his usual forcefulness, has discussed to-night is a matter of government policy with regard to the post-war period, a matter which does not come under this item at all, but which has to do with the Department of External Affairs, and which involves one of the most serious and grave considerations with which we have to deal. I submit to my hon. friend that no other domestic question can be of any greater importance, as affecting our external affairs, than this question of the Japanese, and I say that any declaration of policy made in respect of that question must be made after the most serious thought and study, and with every word of the statement carefully weighed. I make that statement because, as we all know, at the present time there are Canadians in Japanese hands. I am perhaps more interested in that angle of it from the point of view of my department than any other hon. member, and I suggest that you cannot have responsible ministers simply rising in their places and, right off the bat, declaring what are going to be our post-war policies with respect to the Japanese, in view of the situation in which we find ourselves. I am not timid; if it would do the slightest good to make a declaration to-night I would, if necessary, communicate with the Prime Minister, who is the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but I do not think there is any necessity for that, for that question does not arise under this item. I know the Prime Minister has had this matter under his personal consideration; I know he realizes the gravity of it, and I know that when the time comes a statement will be made.

My hon. friend, of course, will say that this is "to-morrow" of which I am speaking. I am speaking of to-morrow, but a to-morrow perhaps not as far away as my hon. friend may think. I believe I can promise the committee that a full statement will be made this session with regard to this matter of policy, in so far as it can be forecast at this stage. More than that I cannot say; more than that I do not think the committee ought to ask. The estimates of the Department of External Affairs will be under consideration. Those estimates will afford ample opportunity to discuss this whole matter and for the Prime Minister, as Secretary of State for External Affairs, to deal with it. I ask the committee to accept this statement, made in all good faith, not simply for the purpose of putting off, but because the matter is serious and one on which, I quite frankly tell hon. members, neither I nor, I think, any of my colleagues in the government here feel qualified or in a position to make a declaration, in view of the gravity with which this particular question is surrounded.

Mr. NEILL: If I might say just another word, personally I would accept that suggestion. If we can get a definite statement like that this session I think that is a reasonable proposition, though I am speaking only for myself.

Mr. ESLING: Perhaps I might offer a few words in connection with the internal situation in which we are very much interested locally. The federal government accepted the responsibility of evacuating the Japanese, and the policy was to decentralize them. That policy was carried out largely by centralizing about one-third of them in Kootenay West. Therefore you will see that we have considerable interest in the matter, particularly in view of the fact that we also have seven or eight thousand Doukhobors, so that we have quite an interesting community. Anyone who reads the report of the royal commission must conclude that the Japanese are very well cared for; in fact, in many respects it must be admitted that they receive more consideration and care than our own people are given. They are granted an allowance if they are unable to earn a living; they are provided with shelter and all conveniences, and I think they are quite satisfied. There is not very much cause for grievance on the part of the Japanese.

In that connection I should like to cite one instance. In my district there are four or five small communities totalling about five hundred people, and the nearest doctor is thirty-eight miles away. The fee for coming to that settlement is $1 a mile. I am not disputing the fee; I am pointing out that greater consideration is given to the Japanese, because in the Japanese settlement they have a thoroughly modern hospital, with everything right up to the minute, with a well paid attendant physician, nurses, orderlies and so on.

I do feel, and all my people feel, a very keen interest in what is to happen to the Japanese at the conclusion of hostilities. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni just read the agreement by which, on the conclusion of the war, these Japanese are to be removed from the interior settlements. The other day, in order that the appropriate department of the government might have ample opportunity for consideration, I placed this question on the order paper:

Will the Japanese be removed from the settlements in Kootenay West on the conclusion of hostilities?

The reply was that this is a matter on which the government had not yet arrived at any decision. Naturally that is a matter of interest to our people. They want to know if they are going to have the Japanese in Kootenay West for all time, or whether any effort is to be made to remove them. For instance, there is a method of allocating family groups to practically every community in Canada. Well, thus far out of about 8,000 settled in my district, it is indicated in the answer to a question placed on the order paper that in the course of three years they have been able to remove 700. At that rate it will be eight or ten years after the conclusion of the war before they are removed.

The government preaches—we hear it over the radio—the spirit of cooperation in aid of the war effort. I cannot conceive of any greater spirit of cooperation among the various provinces than a willingness to accept a percentage of these Japanese. But when we talk about sending them to Toronto, or to a city in any other province, there are always resolutions in protest saying, "We do not want them; we are perfectly satisfied to have them remain in British Columbia." But we in British Columbia are not satisfied, and we hope that that matter will be given some thought.

Now, as to disposing of them, it makes no difference whether they be native-born, naturalized or nationals. The same disposition will have to be made of them. They cannot remain very well in British Columbia because we have taken their agricultural lands and turned them over to the soldier settlement board. That is an indication that there is not much prospect of putting them back on the coast—and the coast has indicated that it will not have them. May I assure the government that we in the interior think we have had enough of them. Certainly we shall have had enough by the time the war is concluded.

I would ask hon. members to visualize what would happen in any community in this dominion if there were planted alongside that community either 6,000 or 7,000 Doukhobors or 6,000 or 7,000 Japanese. It would not take long for those Japanese to enter all the fields of industry and business. Then there would be further trouble.

I am not going to ask the minister any questions connected with external affairs, but I am going to ask him one question, and give him plenty of time to answer it. This is not a difficult question, but it is one which very seriously and closely affects the community in my district. Regardless of the defence of Canada regulations, which permit a certain amount of leniency toward Japanese, and regardless of any other measures, I want to ask the minister if he will not assure the people of British Columbia in Kootenay West that the Japanese shall not be permitted to purchase land, and that they shall not be permitted to engage in business. I am asking the government to do that, in cooperation with the provincial government.

In other words, continue to let the permits be given out either by the selective service branch, or by the wartime prices and trade board, but in connection with that let it be known that the provincial government must also issue a business licence. It is not fair for these Japanese to be placed in a district so that they may open various lines of business —not so many just now, perhaps, but they will soon be growing. It is not fair to have them engage in business in competition with merchants who have been in business trying to eke out an existence for the last forty or fifty years. I am making a simple request, and if the minister will just give us the assurance I ask, we shall trust to the future, so far as having the Japanese removed from that district is concerned.

Mr. MITCHELL: With reference to the Japanese owning any property, may I say that that cannot be done without permission of the Minister of Justice. To my knowledge I do not think any permission has been granted to Japanese, whether nationals or otherwise, to purchase property. My hon. friend may rest assured that the representations he has made this evening will be kept in mind by myself and passed on to the Minister of Justice.

Mr. ESLING: May I interrupt the minister? We have had this matter before the Department of Justice and before the Department of Labour, because there are indications that the Japanese are engaging in business. It would be a simple matter for the minister or the government just to assure the people of Kootenay West that the government is not going to permit those Japanese to go into business, either by licence, by purchase of land, or by the rental of premises for business purposes. Having endured the Japanese and the Doukhobors for all this time, the people of Kootenay West are entitled to a break, and to a little consideration.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I am one British Columbia member who, as yet, has not had an opportunity to put his views on the Japanese question before the committee. I have listened to what the Acting Prime Minister said as to the appropriateness of this discussion on this item. It is my intention to speak entirely within the item.

The attitude of British Columbia members toward the Japanese question cannot be laid to war hysteria. For forty years British Columbia members of parliament have come to this House of Commons and have said the same thing. Very early they realized that the Japanese could not be assimilated into their province, and they have said so. Year after year after year they have received these nebulous assurances that the matter was being studied, and that some policy would at some time be brought down. In the discussion to-night in which British Columbia members have taken part there has not been a single word of racial antagonism. There has been no mention of the horrors of Hong Kong, or of what the Japanese have done to United States and Canadian prisoners, or to the British prisoners they have taken. We have put it to-night as British Columbia members have put it for the last forty years, on the ground that Japanese do not fit into British Columbia, to begin with, or into Canada, secondly.

I am in the very happy position to-night of representing a coastal constituency in which there is not one Japanese—and that for the first time in forty years. I hope, and the people of my riding hope that that condition will continue after the war. I believe all the people of British Columbia, with the exception of the leaders of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, are agreed that the Japanese must go—the veterans, the trade unions, the womens' organizations, and, above all, the soldiers, sailors and airmen who are fighting for this country.

We hear about the problem of sending 23,000 Japanese back to Japan. Right to-day I am told that in this country we have over 30,000 German prisoners of war, and we all know that they will be hustled back to Germany very quickly and easily after the war is over.

Mr. REID: We hope so.

Mr. SINCLAIR: So that I can see no difficulty at all in getting 23,000 Japanese who are still Japanese—and so long as they are Shintoists and worship the emperor, they are all Japanese—back to Japan. However, the time perhaps is not opportune to discuss the removal of Japanese from Canada to Japan after the war, but certainly this is the opportune time and it is appropriate under this item to discuss the removal of the Japanese from the protected areas in British Columbia to the rest of Canada.

For forty years British Columbia members have come to Ottawa and talked about this Canadian problem. The rest of the members have regarded it as a British Columbia problem. But, put 23,000 Japanese for the duration of the war in the other eight provinces, and it will become a Canadian problem, and we shall hear the hon. member for Temiscouata, the hon. member for Regina, and the hon. member for Cumberland raise their voices, as we have raised our voices all these years. And for the first time they will decide that the Japanese have no place in our Canadian life.

There has been a problem of defence. When the war is over we shall still have to think about defence. When Japan is beaten there will still be millions of Japanese who will stay on and breed again as they have done in the past—because they breed like rabbits. Twenty years from now, and they will again be looking for living space; let us not misunderstand that. We must have a white bulwark built up through which the Japanese cannot pass.

The Japanese who are interned must be well treated, and they are well treated. Our own standards of decency demand that and we do not want reprisals upon our boys who are prisoners of war. The only suggestion of persecution that has come from any Japanese has come from the 8,000 who have been transported east of the Rockies. There are many good Canadians who live east of the Rockies who do not regard that as any special persecution.

The people of British Columbia want answers to these questions, not necessarily from the Minister of Labour because, after all, he is the head of only one department. He has indicated to-night that no matter what he may think as a cabinet minister, as a private member he thinks as we do. In British Columbia we have heard another cabinet minister say that the Japanese shall not come back to British Columbia after the war. But the people of British Columbia want answers from the government to the four questions asked this afternoon by the hon. member for Vancouver South, which cover purely domestic matters and which should be settled right now even though we are at war.

The people of British Columbia would also like to hear some members from other provinces speak on this issue. For too long this has been considered to be only a British Columbia issue. We were all pleased early this session to hear the hon. member for Davenport speak learnedly and well about the problems of the west. The eastern members should consider some of the problems facing British Columbia on account of the Japanese and the Doukhobors. The people of British Columbia would like to hear from C.C.F. members from other provinces whether or not they are going to welcome the Japanese with the same open arms as the hon. member for Vancouver East.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Chairman, I have listened to a number of British Columbia members speak about the Japanese. The hon. member for Vancouver North who has just taken his seat said that no member from the east has ever spoken on the Japanese question. I would draw his attention to the fact that a couple of years ago when the Japanese question was so pressing I was attacked by labour unions of one kind or another in Ontario for saying that we would take the Japanese under supervision if nothing else could be done with them. We did that and to a certain extent we relieved British Columbia of their problem. But we do not want them after the war and we took them on a definite understanding.

I have known the Japanese for a great many years since I am connected with a company that has done business with them. I do not want to see the Japanese put in the same category with the Chinese. You cannot trust a Japanese. I admit that we have not raised our voices enough about this matter, but if hon. members will cast their minds back they will remember that every time the Japanese were referred to in this House of Commons the ambassador from Japan would be sitting in the gallery. The next day we would have the Prime Minister or somebody on the opposite side saying, "Hush, or they will declare war on us."

We do not want the Japanese and that is all there is to it. If we have to take them as internees under supervision we are quite willing to do so, but we do not want them competing with labour in Ontario. In listening to what has been said to-night, I was struck with the thought that if bill No. 37 were in operation and these things were said outside the house, we would all be in gaol. Let the C.C.F. tell us the reason for this bill.

Mr. REID: I am pleased to hear the hon. member say that he does not want the Japanese, but where will he put them?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): As the hon. member for Vancouver South has said, the same problem has been handled before by the Greeks and the Turks in times gone by. I do not think we shall have any difficulty in handling it. The hon. member for Vancouver North has said that it will not be a very great job because we have 30,000 German prisoners who will have to be sent out after the war.

Mr. NEILL: What is the name of the bill to which the hon. member referred, and who introduced it?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It is bill No. 37 and it was introduced by the hon. member for Vancouver East. It is to amend the criminal code and perhaps I should read it.

The CHAIRMAN: I think we would be going too far in the discussion to read a bill which has nothing to do with the item.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What party is that?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I do not know. As I say, I do not want any slurs and aspersions cast upon the Chinese during this discussion. There are some very fine Chinese in my riding in the city of Toronto; in fact I think I have one of the finest in Canada. His name is Chung Hong, and there is another one by the name of Ernie Marks. I am very much interested in the Chinese and I happen to be a patron of their patriotic society. I like them and I do not want them mixed up with the Japanese. They have done a wonderful job; that is all there is to it. I hope I have made my position clear as far as the Japanese are concerned. All hon. members have to do is to read some of the things said about them by Admiral Nimitz. It is such things as these that let us know just what the Japanese are.

Mr. O'NEILL: Mr. Chairman, after listening to the remarks of the acting Prime Minister who referred to matters of policy, I am not perhaps so enthusiastic, but I think I would be remiss in my duty as the member for Kamloops if I did not say something with respect to the Japanese question. The hon. member who has just taken his seat has said that he is quite prepared to have the Japanese in Toronto for the duration of the war.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I did not say in Toronto.

Mr. O'NEILL: But he does not want to have them after the war.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I said in Ontario, under supervision. We have some of them now.

Mr. O'NEILL: In Ontario, but they are not going to have them after the war. Where are they going to be?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Back in Japan.

Mr. O'NEILL: That is quite all right, but we do not know whether they will be back in Japan or not.

As the hon. member for Vancouver North has said, this is not a question for British Columbia alone; it is a question that concerns the whole Dominion of Canada and it should be so treated. Before the Japanese were moved from the restricted area on the coast there were none in Kamloops, and now North Kamloops looks like little Tokyo. There are about seven or eight hundred of them there. In June, 1942, we were given an undertaking that the Japanese would not be permitted to have any gasoline or to own cars or trucks; they were not to be permitted to have cameras or radios and so on. I want to tell you, Mr. Chairman, that the white people around Kamloops have no gasoline to take their families out joy-riding on Sunday. Some of the newest, finest, biggest and best cars in the district are owned and operated by Japanese, and they are out joy-riding on Sunday in those cars. Naturally, when the white people see that, they want to know what the government intends to do about the Japanese after the war, and I think they have a perfect right to ask that question.

The loyalty of the Japanese has at times been questioned. Some people have said that there has never been a case where it has been shown that there was any disloyalty by the Japanese, and certainly no sabotage. I am not in agreement with that statement. When the Japanese had to be moved out of the restricted area at the coast, a chain of the finest camps I ever went into was built for them around the Yellowhead pass from Jasper to Blue River, and two thousand Japanese were moved in there to work on that road. Immediately the Japanese started to stage sit-down strikes and what have you, until finally they had to be moved out of there. Their principal grievance was that they were not permitted to live with their wives and families. Well, what about our soldiers, our sailors and our airmen? They are not permitted to live with their families. They have to go to the fighting front. But when the Japanese come along, you have to provide them with accommodation where they can live with their wives and families. After they were moved out of the Jasper district, they were taken to South Slocan. I have here photographs of one of the camps. The government spent hundreds of thousands of dollars putting up buildings to house the Japanese, while many of the wives and children of our fighting men could not get a place to sleep. Yet we did all that for the Japanese! Then we have the leader of the house rising in his place and asking us not to ask the government what our policy after the war with respect to the Japanese should be. Well, Mr. Chairman, if the employees of the Department of Labour would not make the statements they do in public, perhaps members of parliament from British Columbia would not be making the statements they are making on the floor of the house. But a Mr. Trueman of the Department of Labour made this statement in Toronto. He said:

> The reason for mass evacuation of Japanese from Pacific coastal areas was not because of the Japanese but because of the white residents. The problem was one of mass hysteria and race prejudice.

Mr. NEILL: Who was Mr. Trueman?

Mr. O'NEILL: He is one of the employees of the Department of Labour. He was put in there to handle the Japanese question.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: A scab.

Mr. O'NEILL: In my judgment, he is a Jap. A man who would make such unforgiveable statements and display such ignorance of our Japanese question should not, I submit, be left in that position. That is one man who keeps the people of British Columbia believing that this government intends to keep the Japanese here when the war is over—and we certainly do not want them.

Many more things could be said about the Japanese, but I am going to close my remarks to-night by asking this question. What does this government—not the Department of Labour but this government—intend to do about the Japanese who own short-wave radio sets in Canada? They are operating short-wave radio sets in Canada right to-day, and when they can have a short-wave receiving set, it is not unreasonable to suppose that they have a transmitting set as well. They have them right in my district now. They get more privileges than anybody else in Canada. It is commonly said that the restrictions on butter and sugar do not apply to the Japanese. I do not know whether that is true or not. But certainly the restrictions placed on white men in getting gasoline and in getting lumber to use around the farm do not apply to the Japanese. There are no restrictions of that kind with respect to them. The Japanese get all the lumber they want, and there is a lot of activity going on. These Japanese are presumed not to be buying that land. Then who is buying the land for them? Surely we are entitled to know who the men are who are acting as agents for the Japanese. There must be somebody there who is doing that, because nobody will move off his land and let a Japanese take possession until he gets paid for his land—and the Japanese are moving in there. There are some five hundred to six or seven hundred Japanese right at Kamloops now. Before the war they were not there. Our position is just the reverse of that of the hon. member for Vancouver North. He has not any Japanese now, and he hopes it will remain that way. We have the ones he had before the war, and we hope that they will not be around Kamloops after the war. We do not say they have to go back to Vancouver North. It would be considered unparliamentary if I were to tell you, Mr. Chairman, where they should go. But at least I can say that they should go back to Japan.

Mr. BURTON: Mr. Chairman, I wish to express my appreciation of the addresses we have heard this afternoon from members from British Columbia, starting with the hon. member for Vancouver South and on down the line. They have presented their case very well. They have kept the bitterness of racial hatred out of it, especially after the Minister of National Defence gave the committee some reasons why we should not carry this debate to any great length, for the safety of our own in other places.

As I listened to hon. members from British Columbia presenting their case to-day and sensed the intensity of their feeling on this question, while I am not intimately acquainted with the Japanese problem, I have considerable sympathy with the hon. members. I spoke to this house just a short time ago on another matter and pleaded then with the house to be tolerant so far as the racial origins of Canadian citizens were concerned. Since that time the request has been made that someone from this group should speak. I am not the leader of this group, nor do I take it upon myself as the youngest member of it to speak for the group. But I have always felt with respect to any group of people that we welcomed to these shores, so long as they endeavoured to become true and worthy citizens of Canada, there should be no discrimination against them. I have held that view all these years, and I appreciate the fact that hon. members from British Columbia, in discussing the case of the Japanese, refrained from bringing racial hatred into the discussion, although as the debate progressed I fear the tone became worse because of the fear or hatred some members had of the political party to which I happen to belong.

In my opinion this question is too important to be used as a pretext for stirring up the feelings of the people. Yet some hon. members could not avoid dragging in references to the party to which I belong. They could not practise the tolerance which they displayed to what is certainly a far greater danger to the country than the C.C.F. They could not refrain from the opportunity of playing a little politics on a question of such vital concern to them and to the rest of Canada. One hon. member even brought up a reference to bill No. 37. It was entirely beside the point; but he did not tell the committee that his own leader in Ontario passed a similar bill last session; he refrained from mentioning that his own dominion leader, while premier of Manitoba, and with the support of hon. gentlemen of the opposite party, passed a similar measure. It is all right when the Liberals do it; it is all right when the Conservatives do it, but lo and behold—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I brought to the attention of the hon. member for St. Paul's when he was speaking that a discussion of bill No. 37 was out of order, and I must apply the same principle to the hon. member for Humboldt.

Mr. BURTON: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, to have gone beyond the limits on this question. I bow to your ruling and acknowledge that it is correct. May I ask, however, why, when questions like this are under consideration, some hon. members seize the opportunity to indulge in little party bickerings for the sake of partisan advantage. To my hon. friends from British Columbia I would say that, if the issue is as serious as they have represented it to be, and I do not doubt their word, it behooves them to try to engage the good will of all of us to have it properly settled. In making my plea for racial tolerance and good will, I had primarily in mind those who are prepared to become true and worthy citizens of Canada. If the people to whom the hon. members refer refuse to become true and worthy citizens, that is another matter, but they must still be regarded as human beings. Whether British Columbia or any other province wants them or not, we have to find some way of dealing with the problem in a truly Christian manner. That is my reply, as far as I am concerned, to hon. members who wanted to hear an expression of opinion from the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation group.

Item agreed to.

Transfer of ex-coal mine workers back to the industry, $250,000.

Mr. HANSELL: Before this particular item carries I wish to bring one or two observations to the notice of the minister. As he knows, my constituency includes quite a large coal mining area known as the Crowsnest pass, and I believe this item interests the coal miners there. May I refer the minister to the case of the transference of a coal miner back to the Crowsnest pass from the Pacific coast. He will recall the case to which I refer, and of course it is an individual one, but I have promised my people that I will take up their individual grievances, and I have tried to do so. I told them that their problems would be my problems, for I believe that is the right attitude for a member of this house to take if he desires to serve his constituents.

This particular miner, desiring to be transferred back to his previous locality, which he calls home, refused, it is claimed, to take a medical examination by the doctors prescribed by the selective service board, preferring, if he had to undergo an examination, to go to his own union doctor in his home town. By the way, he had already been medically examined by his own doctor before he went to the coast. Because he did not submit to examination by the doctors prescribed by the selective service officials, he found, upon returning to his previous employment, that he would not receive his travelling expenses. I took the matter up with the department. I believe the deputy minister handled it; and the reply was, in effect, that because he did not go to the doctor whom the selective service board chose for him he could not get his expenses. I should like to know from the minister if that is the final word on the case. If it is, I suppose that all I can do is to launch a protest. I recognize, of course, that a man cannot do just whatever he wants. I know the minister desires that there shall be a certain amount of freedom, and of course the Department of Labour and the selective service officials could not permit everybody to do as he chose; if they did, they might as well not be there. But I want to ask the minister if there is no hope of this man getting his expenses. He transferred his family; in fact he had to sell his furniture to obtain the money to move, and since he is not able to go into the mine as regularly as some others, his earnings are appreciably less. The result is that he is hard pressed.

While I am on this subject, Mr. Chairman, I may point out to the committee that this particular item of a quarter of a million dollars and the previous item: "General labour transference in war labours and agriculture"—I fancy some coal miners may be included in that item—amount to $500,000. Here is a total of three-quarters of a million dollars for expenses of moving people around. Having that in mind, I do not think the government should be too miserly in investigating a man's expenses just because he does not meet every tiny detail demanded by some imperious selective service official.

I should like to say another word, because I have been waiting for this item. I have not discovered the subject in any of the other items. I refer now to coal miners' wages. We recall that last fall the coal miners went on strike because they did not feel they had been getting a high enough wage in comparison with their work. I believe that work is highly specialized. It takes a great deal of time to train a coal miner. His work is extremely hazardous. Believing that they did not receive sufficient pay they went on strike. We all know what happened. They received a rise in pay and this was passed on to the public. I am not going to disagree with that. I recognize that in the coal mining industry, particularly in my constituency, as I have said many times before, they have been running on a shoe-string for a good many years. Just because the operator may have a nice big automobile it does not mean that he is a millionaire. I do not blame the government for passing on the rise in pay to the consumer of coal. May I point out that during that campaign a good deal of advertising went on, and some of the advertisements attempted to show that coal miners were excellently paid men. Those advertisements did not give the entire picture. I should like to give a little picture that most people do not see.

Here is the pay-sheet of a coal miner. I have a whole raft of them here. While this man earned $78.99 in two weeks which may sound to some people to be a fair wage, there were certain deductions. I shall read some of those deductions:

Cardox	$ 7 70
Fines	25
Wash house	50
Lamps	79
Doctor	6 00
Special assessment (burial fund)	1 00
Check weighman	97
Union	2 50
Bus	6 00
Community chest	39
War savings certificates	2 00
Unemployment insurance	72
Tax	12 81
Workmen's compensation board	09

That is a total of $41.72. Therefore the coal miner actually received $37.27 for his two weeks' work. Here is another one. I shall not read it all. His pay was supposed to be $45.51 for the two weeks. But he had deductions to the amount of $37.90, which left him only $13.02.

Mr. GERSHAW: How much did the doctor get out of the second one?

Mr. HANSELL: I do not believe that it is—

Mr. GERSHAW: The amount of $6 for the doctor in two weeks seems very high.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not know what it comprises. I do not think it would mean that the doctor was paid that amount for visits to the coal miner. I think it is paid into a fund and the doctor is paid a certain salary.

Here is the case of another man who is supposed to have earned $66.76 in the two weeks, but by the time all the deductions were taken off he actually received $32.50. I have a lot of them here, but I shall give the committee only one more. The total credit for this man's work amounts to $67.80; but after the deductions were taken off, which amounted to $40.49 there was a balance left of $27.31. Therefore the coal miner receives much less than the public thinks he does. I should like to put these on Hansard. I want the committee to recognize this because I believe we have a case for these coal miners. As I said, this is highly specialized work. It is dangerous, hazardous and very hard work. It is not very healthy work. The result is that very often these men become, shall we say, burnt out before they are able to apply for old age pensions.

There is another matter I should like to bring to the minister's attention. It does not come under the minister's department, but I mention it because I want him to try to influence the Minister of Finance along this line in his next budget. I refer to the present system of taxation, which penalizes the man who wants to produce more. We had the matter discussed at the last session. It was brought out by one or two able speakers, including my friend, the hon. member for Bow River. I think it was satisfactorily shown that the coal miner could earn up to a certain amount, and because his wage then comes into a certain bracket he is subject to a higher income tax, which means that when he earns over and above that amount he is working for very little. This has caused some absenteeism in the coal mines. I think if you approach it from the common-sense angle, the more a man produces—for, after all, during time of war it is production we need—the more he should get, or there should be some arrangement whereby, if he had any time that is considered to be overtime, he should not pay tax on that overtime. Some arrangement could be made whereby the desire on the part of the coal miner to produce a little more would not mean that he is to be penalized, because he goes to a higher bracket and is subject to higher taxation. I leave that thought with the minister. I think we all feel that as far as he is concerned he wants to do the proper thing for the workingman. Here is something that he can do if he and his government can influence the Minister of Finance to make some readjustment in that respect. I believe that the minister has wrestled with this thing before, and I did hear some inkling that he had some policy which he might propose in this respect, but it did not come to fruition. Perhaps what I heard was only a rumour. I wish that he would remedy that situation.

May I mention one other matter which I think is vital to an item of this kind? The other day the Minister of Munitions and Supply made a statement to the house to the effect that it was the intention of the government to set up a royal commission on coal. The other day an hon. member asked when this commission would be set up, and the minister replied that some difficulty had been encountered in getting suitable men to sit on it. When the minister announced that the commission was to be appointed I wondered, though I do not suppose this is very much in point, why the announcement should be made by the Minister of Munitions and Supply. I have been in this house now for well on to ten years, during which time I have been interested in the subject of coal. I have always understood that the actual mines came under the Minister of Mines and Resources; of course, we all know that the labour situation and labour legislation come under the Minister of Labour, and if it is a matter of selling coal, particularly to other countries, that comes under the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I was wondering where the Minister of Munitions and Supply came in, though I do not suppose it makes very much difference. I do not know if the minister stated the complete terms of the reference to this commission, but I hope there will be enough coordination between the various departments of government, so that when the commission is set up to determine a national fuel policy for Canada it will take into account the question of labour, the coal miner, the man who digs the coal from the ground, because, after all, in my opinion that is the most important phase of the coal mining industry. I should like to suggest that a coal miner should be on that commission, and when I say a coal miner I mean a man who can really represent the labourer who goes underground and gets out the coal, a man who understands the problems of the coal miners, so that whatever coal policy is decided upon will not leave the miner holding the bag and feeling that he does not get what he is worth, for eventually that feeling will cause dissatisfaction and the first thing we know we shall have strikes on our hands.

This is not my yearly speech on the coal mining industry, but I thought I might offer these few observations in passing and bring these matters to the attention of the minister. Perhaps at some future time I shall speak more elaborately on the coal mining industry. Would the minister just answer my question in respect to the Moutegani case? Is this case closed as far as he is concerned? Is there no hope for that man and others who may be in a similar position in regard to getting their transportation?

Mr. MITCHELL: I have knowledge of that case. I say to my hon. friend that I think we were as reasonable as we possibly could be in these regulations. They were laid down by order in council for the guidance of those who were responsible for carrying them out. This man apparently went out of his way not to comply with the regulations; I believe that was the position when I last dealt with the case. I should be glad to have another look at it and see if anything can be done for this man, but I could not go any farther than that.

Mr. HANSELL: I appreciate that.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend mentioned the coal commission. The war emergency coal production board comes under the jurisdiction of the Department of Munitions and Supply; that has to do with the production of coal, and that is why the Minister of Munitions and Supply made the announcement to which my hon. friend referred. If I remember correctly, the minister said that the terms of the reference were being studied and that in the not very distant future he hoped to be able to announce the personnel of the commission.

Mr. HANSELL: Would the minister say that he will urge the appointment to this commission of a coal miner, or someone representing the coal miners?

Mr. MITCHELL: Oh, absolutely; my hon. friend may rest assured of that.

Mr. GILLIS: I wish to compliment the hon. member for Macleod upon his presentation of the case. He is a man of the cloth, and if more such men took the interest in these matters that he has shown, the welfare of the miners might be better looked after. I do not understand the deductions he mentioned, though; they are far beyond the realm of anything sensible, to my mind, but since I am not familiar with them I am not going to comment upon them. I have no intention of making a speech on the subject of coal, because I fully realize that it does not come under this item.

Mr. HANSELL: Just to keep the record straight, I hope the hon. member means the deductions on these pay slips and not the deductions I made in my argument.

Mr. GILLIS: That is quite right; I meant the deductions on the pay slips.

I was glad to see the Department of Munitions and Supply take over the matter of coal. It had remained stagnant under the Department of Mines and Resources for seventy-five years, and I was glad to see it put where it might be viewed with a new perspective.

I wish to make two points bearing specifically on these estimates. The first has to do with the matter of transferring a miner from some other essential industry back to coal mining. A few nights ago I cited a case of this kind in a general way. I think some of the government's under-officials are getting the thing badly mixed up. I mentioned the case of an ex-coal miner working in Windsor who was called in and routed out to Alberta, then sent from Alberta back to Nova Scotia. In the regulations, as the minister has said, definite rules are laid down in regard to matters of transportation; but the time this man lost in transit also should be taken into consideration. That has not been done in this case. This man was rejected for underground work by the medical board in Nova Scotia; now he is back in Windsor working at the Ford plant, whence he started. This is not a new case; it has been in the slings and a matter of negotiation with the department for a year. This man figures that in the shuffle he lost approximately $800; his family are still in Nova Scotia while he is living in Windsor, which is a double expense. However, the deplorable feature of the whole thing is that when the matter was finally sent back to Alberta, Windsor and Nova Scotia, as the department ruled it had to be, for a decision by the offices through which that man was routed around, as to whether that expense was legitimate or otherwise, the decision reached by the Windsor office, by the man who uprooted this workman in the first place, was that he was not obliged to make the shift, that he came in and volunteered to go back to coal mining, and that as far as the official in Windsor was concerned this man should receive no recompense for the time lost and the extra expense incurred. The man himself, the worker, submits a declaration to the effect that he was called in. And we know he must have been called in, because under the regulations that is the procedure.

The matter is now in the hands of the Department of Labour, and I trust that the minister will stick to the regulations, when he is deciding as to whether that man should be reimbursed for the time he lost in being shifted from one part of the country to the other, and that he is able to take his family back to Windsor, whence they were uprooted.

The second point I would bring to the minister's attention concerns the soldier who was released from the service and routed back to coal mining. Under the regulations that soldier-miner was granted $15 as a clothing allowance. Many of them coming out of the service did not know they were entitled to that $15. They purchased clothing and went to work. I took the matter up with the deputy minister, and he saw that it was corrected, in so far as he was able. He advised me that the treasury branch of the department were notified to see that those who had come out under the regulation were granted that $15, as per instructions.

That happened about a month ago. A large number of men have been affected along this line, particularly men in the mining industry of Nova Scotia. I had a letter only to-day from a district president of an organization advising me that they had checked on selective service offices in that district, and that the selective service officials there know nothing about the instructions sent out by the deputy minister to take care of that situation. There seems to be some laxity.

Let it be understood that I am not quarrelling with the selective service set-up in Nova Scotia. It has been my experience that it is working efficiently and well. I have visited the centre at Moncton, and most of the offices in the maritimes. But there is something wrong upstairs, right here. Those instructions do not get through to the officials in Nova Scotia. Had they got through, the matter would have been looked into. This is a sore spot, and there has been a good deal of controversy over it. This matter is all mixed up, and I hope that the minister will make a check and see that it is taken care of.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am familiar with the McKay case. It is a lengthy matter, and if my hon. friend would like to have a look at it to-morrow or next week, he may do so.

Mr. GILLIS: I have read it so often I know it by heart.

Mr. MITCHELL: And I have read it, notwithstanding the reading I have to do. If my memory serves me correctly, I believe I indicated to my hon. friend that the other matter is receiving consideration, and he may rest assured that where the claims are in order they will probably be paid.

Mr. WOOD: I would direct the attention of the committee to the administration of selective service in local offices. I must say, however, that I cannot agree with the hon. member for Cape Breton South when he says that many of the regulations made here in Ottawa do not get through to the local offices. I am inclined to take the view that it would be much better if there were a little more local autonomy in connection with applying some of the regulations.

As the hon. member has said, in the main, selective service is doing a very good job. I was pleased to hear the hon. member say that, and on that point I can agree with him.

Mr. GILLIS: I said that was so in Nova Scotia.

Mr. WOOD: Well, what is characteristic of Nova Scotia might very well apply to Canada, because the same regulations go out to each locality. Each locality has a local situation, and those who happen to administer that local situation are probably in a better position to apply the rules than those who would make a blanket ruling here in Ottawa.

In war time, regulations have to be made, and they have to be applied universally. I sometimes think, however, that a certain leniency should be extended to local offices. My attention was called recently to the case of a farmer who sold his farm last fall. He had been suffering from an impairment of health. As hon. members must know, this job of farming is not meant for a physical weakling. The health of the man in question had been impaired to the extent that he could not farm successfully, but he was still able to contribute in other walks of life which require the expenditure of less energy and physical effort. This man went to the city and worked for a firm which was servicing farmers' products. Only the other day he got notice that because of the freezing order with respect to farms he would have to go back to agriculture. This man had moved to the city, and had taken his family with him. He had been a farmer, and had never worked for any other farmer, having always worked for himself. It seems to me that while we should have as many men as possible back on the farms, yet the man who has served his day in producing food at reasonable prices, even for the coal miners, for a period of years, should not be treated in that way. He had produced food at reasonably cheap prices, and had produced purchasing power of which the hon. member for Macleod has been speaking. Yet this man was asked to go back to the farm and accept $2 a day less than he had been receiving in the city.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The hon. member is speaking with respect to selective service. I would point out that that item has been passed.

Mr. WOOD: Perhaps what I am saying should have been said before, but the same principle applies. Both the hon. member for Cape Breton South and the hon. member for Macleod emphasized the difficulties in their particular walks of life, and I thought it only fair to draw attention to the fact that there have been farmers who have gone from the farms. Whether they went to the coal-mining industry, or to other industry, the principle remains the same.

The point I make is that the department should give a little more leniency to the local offices, because they can treat local cases. I have seen men with tears in their eyes when they have been ordered to transfer. Those transfers meant that they had to uproot their families. I believe selective service could give even greater help if it were permitted to give a little more consideration to particular cases.

I am not speaking critically, because I believe selective service has done a wonderful job. Canada's war record could not have been as good, had there not been some regimentation of industry. Despite the fact that our hon. friends across the way refer to a manpower muddle, I do not think it has been muddled, because our people have been able to give the greatest contribution per capita of any people in the united nations. But, after all, there is nothing so good but what it might be even better, and I would ask the minister to give consideration to the point I have raised.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I should like to support the representations made by the hon. member for Macleod and the hon. member for Cape Breton South with respect to the administration of this vote. There are two coal fields in my riding, one at Springhill and the other at River Hebert-Joggins. All things being considered, the production from these fields since the beginning of the war has been gratifying. However, I was disappointed that the production in Cumberland and in Nova Scotia last year was not larger than it was. I believe, if a clear indication had been given at the beginning of the war as to what was to be the duty of the miners, the production would have been much more satisfactory.

At the beginning of this war, as in the last war, the miners of Nova Scotia enlisted freely. They considered this to be their patriotic duty. Many skilled men left the mines to enlist and the output was reduced. There has been dissatisfaction and uncertainty because of the more recent order which took men from the services from the call-ups and from industry and placed them in the mines.

Some men have complained that while they were classified as coal miners they had never been down in a mine. They may have done some casual labour at the pithead or in handling coal, but they could not be classified as miners since they had no such training or experience. This is unfortunate from the point of view of morale of the miners generally. In many cases men have been taken from important work and sent to the mines against their wills. Coal mining is a hazardous employment requiring great skill and experience and the department is assuming serious responsibility when it takes men against their will and sends them into the mines.

The miners of Nova Scotia are anxious to serve where they can be of the most use to their country. That is why they enlisted so freely in the last war and in the present war. I should like the minister to give us a breakdown of this appropriation of $250,000 now being considered by the committee. I should like to know how the money is being distributed, how much is being spent in Nova Scotia and how much in other parts of Canada.

Mr. MITCHELL: We have not a breakdown in front of us. I suppose the hon. member refers to Saskatchewan, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Yes. How much of this is appropriated to the coal mining industry in Nova Scotia, and under just what headings?

Mr. MITCHELL: This is for the new fiscal year and we do not just know where the money will be spent. It is to cover transfers and the guarantee of a minimum weekly wage to those who are transferred, and to pay expenses connected therewith.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): How was this same amount expended last year?

Mr. MITCHELL: I have not that before me, but I shall be glad to get it for my hon. friend.

Mr. MARSHALL: I do not intend to hold up the passing of this particular item. I had intended to say something on the sundry services item, but I shall leave that until the civil estimates of the minister are before us. I should like to suggest to the minister that a little more care be taken in setting out his estimates. These estimates are given on page 396 of Hansard of February 11 and they show a total appropriation for 1943-44 of $21,558,192. According to the statement in Hansard it would appear that the estimates this year were increased by $2,450,000, whereas the statement submitted by the minister shows a decrease of $283,011.

If the minister will check the statement which was given to us a few days ago he will find that no fewer than seven items do not correspond with what is to be found in Hansard. For instance, at the top of page 2 of the statement we find an item covering stabilization of longshore labour at Halifax. No amount is shown in Hansard, while an amount of $600,000 is shown on the white sheet. Item 13 provides for assistance to the provinces in recruiting, transporting and placing labourers on farms. A statement in Hansard shows an amount of $250,000, whereas the white sheet shows $920,000. Item 15 covers the transfer of ex-coal mine workers back to the industry. Nothing at all is shown in Hansard, but an amount of $250,000 is shown on the white sheet. There may be an explanation for this and, if so, I should like to have it before the estimates are passed. There may be two or three items included under sundry services, but I shall leave a discussion of those until the civil estimates are up later on.

Mr. MITCHELL: Since the items were drafted in the department there have been some changes made by the treasury board. I have not been able to put my hands on the Hansard to which my hon. friend referred. He says that nothing is shown to cover the transfer of ex-coal mine workers, but I think he will find that an amount of $250,000 is shown.

Mr. MARSHALL: Possibly the minister is looking at the 1944-45 column.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is right.

Mr. MARSHALL: I am talking about the estimates of last year. According to Hansard this year the minister is asking for an increase of $250,000. In reality there is a decrease of $283,000 in the estimates. To me that does not show a true picture.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am informed that we did not use all the money that was made available to us a year ago and that it was turned back to other departments which had overspent their estimates.

Mr. MARSHALL: That is not the answer, because these are only estimates; they are not actual expenditures. It is a different thing to show estimates and to show actual expenditures.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I would ask the minister, in connection with this item of $250,000, how many men were drawn from the armed services and put back in the mines of Nova Scotia during the last fiscal year. Also how many were taken from other industries and put back in the mines of Nova Scotia, and how many, if any, were taken from the farms and put in the mines? I should also like to know how many men who were called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act for military service, were assigned to the mines, work in the mines, being given priority over the military service they would otherwise have undertaken.

Mr. MITCHELL: We have not the figures broken down in that form, but the number of ex-coal miners returned from the armed services to the coal mines to March 15, 1944, was 2,144; the number of ex-coal miner workers returned to the mines under P.C. 4092 to March 15, was 2,276; the number of persons directed to mines under P.C. 4861 and P.C. 6077 to March 15 was 485.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Are those figures for Nova Scotia mines?

Mr. MITCHELL: We have not the figures broken down by provinces. I would be glad to get that for my hon. friend.

The net result was this: Number of coal mine workers on payrolls June 1, 1943 was 24,864, and at March 15, 1944 was 27,816, an increase of 2,952 workers, or 12 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Sundry services, $179,805.

Mr. PERLEY: Mr. Chairman, we took a long while on item 12 and then items 13 and 14 were passed so quickly I did not have an opportunity to ask a question. May I be permitted to revert back to item 13?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Ask the question on this last item for sundry services.

Mr. PERLEY: Would the minister state what amount of assistance was given to each province in farm recruiting, and what was the nature of the services performed, and the amount paid for transportation?

Mr. MITCHELL: Here is a summary of expenditures under "assistance to provinces in recruiting, transporting and placing labourers on farms" to March 31, 1944.

Nova Scotia	.....
New Brunswick	$ 3,626 17
Prince Edward Island	2,030 67
Quebec	8,982 63
Ontario	130,970 88
Manitoba	20,187 31
Saskatchewan	78,314 37
Alberta	12,613 89
British Columbia	.....
Transportation of farm workers (general)	181,320 70
Total	$438,046 62

Mr. PERLEY: How many were placed on the farm in Saskatchewan under this assistance?

Mr. MITCHELL: I have not the information under my hand, but I could get it for my hon. friend.

Mr. KNOWLES: I have been looking over the items to find the appropriate one on which to ask a question with reference to labour-management production committees.

Mr. MITCHELL: That comes under this item.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am sure that the minister will agree with me that the most satsifactory kind of labour-management arrangement is that which is effected by collective bargaining. Yet there are cases where collective bargaining is not in effect and where the next best thing is to have a labour-mangement production committee. Would the minister make a brief statement as to the activities of his department in encouraging these committees and as to what success he has had? He might also tell us whether the Department of Labour maintains any liaison with other departments of government to encourage government-owned enterprises and government controllers to adopt this principle.

Mr. MITCHELL: Speaking from memory, I believe a committee was set up under the chairmanship of Mr. Goldenberg of the Department of Munitions and Supply. Mr. H. J. Carmichael, director of war production, is also a member of the committee; Mr. Percy Bengough, President of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada; Mr. Pat Conroy, of the Canadian Congress of Labour, and Mr. J. A. Parent, representing the National Catholic Syndicates, are among the members of the advisory committee. That committee has this matter under its advisement. There are also permanent officials in the Department of Labour appointed since I have been minister, whose duty it is to foster the development of these committees. I agree with my hon. friend in the principle of labour-management committees, but the feeling even in the labour movement and among employers is not unanimous about such committees. Even in Great Britain they have not been set up by law; there is no compulsory cooperation. At the present time in the mines of Nova Scotia an attempt is being made through my department to establish these committees in conjunction with the employers and employees there. I tabled a return, I think it was last session, of the number of committees that were operating in the Dominion of Canada; there now are 160. My hon. friend can rest assured that as far as the Department of Labour and other departments of government, and the parent bodies of the labour organizations in this country, are concerned, they are moving with expedition in the direction to which my hon. friend referred.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I say a further word in connection with the latter part of my question? Perhaps I can put the matter more clearly by bringing to the minister's attention a case with which I am familiar. I shall not give the name of the firm because I merely want to quote the circumstances as an example. I know of a private firm which happens to be under the direction of a government controller. The firm has no collective agreement with its employees, although the employees have sought it. When they found that there was delay in arriving at a collective agreement, as a second best they made inquiries as to whether the management, namely the controller, would consider the setting up of a labour-management committee. To my knowledge, to date that has not been done in this particular firm. My reason for quoting that case is to ask the minister whether his department takes any particular pains to bring to the attention of government controllers the desirability of labour-management committees where collective agreements are not arrived at.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not know whether my hon. friend is asking for information or wants to make a speech. I do not know the company. If my hon. friend would give me the name of the company I should be glad to look into the matter, but he can see the position I am in. He has talked about somebody who wants one of these committees and somebody who does not want them. I should be glad if my hon. friend would give me the name of the organization, and I will look into the matter and see if there is an opportunity of establishing one of these committees, if there is agreement on both sides.

Mr. KNOWLES: I will give the minister the name of the company privately. My reason for not mentioning it here is that I wanted to be informed on a matter of policy and principle rather than to name a particular firm, at least for the present.

Item agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING

Bill No. 109, to incorporate the Alberta Provincial Bank.—Mr. Blackmore.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

PRIVILEGE—MR. LACOMBE

REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN LE CANADA OF MAY 8, 1944

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a question of privilege. In its edition of to-day, May 8, 1944, the newspaper Le Canada, has the following caption:

Mr. Victor Trépanier states that Mr. Maxime Raymond is a yes-man, a rubber stamp and a haggler.

The same newspaper also quotes Mr. Trépanier as follows:

Mr. Trépanier has condemned the 65 yes-men, the 65 rubber stamps, the 65 hagglers we have in Ottawa, and he has added that they were no longer "fit to represent the people."

I protest against the statement of Mr. Trépanier, who sweepingly impugns the reputation and the stand of the 65 members from the province of Quebec.

I, for one, am neither a "yes-man," a "rubber stamp" nor a "haggler." I was the only member from the province of Quebec, with the exception of the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix), to oppose, through amendments, our participation in the war and the mobilization act.

SELECTIVE SERVICE

MEASURE TO AMEND INSTRUCTIONS TO EMPLOYERS AUTHORIZED DECEMBER 31, 1943

Mr. J. SASSEVILLE ROY (Gaspé) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 110, to amend certain instructions of the national selective service of the Department of Labour.

Mr. POULIOT: Explain.

Mr. ROY: The paragraph to be amended at present reads as follows:

1. Definition of employer: For this purpose, every person, partnership, company, firm or corporation in Canada, employing any male person normally regarded as a full-time employee, regardless of the method of payment of such employee for his services, comes under the definition of "employer." The dominion government, the governments of the provinces, as well as municipal institutions are employers for this purpose. The term employer includes also any farmer operating a farm, who has working for him a male employee, even though such employee be a son or other relative.

The purpose of the amendment is to strike out the definition of employer, a "farmer operating a farm," so that a farmer would not be compelled to act as informer against his son or other relative.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

CANADIAN ARMY—MAJOR GENERALS, BRIGADIERS AND COLONELS

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How many major-generals, brigadiers and colonels are there now on the active list, (a) overseas; (b) in Canada?

2. How many were there at the beginning of the war?

3. How many were there on the 11th of November, 1918?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax):

1. As of 30th April, 1944:

	Major-Generals	Brigadiers	Colonels
Overseas	9	72	99
In Canada	17	56	143
Employed with other government departments or agencies	5	5	5
On leave pending retirement	3	2	6

2. On 1st September, 1939: Major-Generals, 7; Brigadiers, 14; Colonels, 24.

3. Canada and Overseas: Major-Generals, 29; Brigadier-Generals, 59; Colonels, 148.

EXPORT AND IMPORT OF HORSES

Mr. HANSELL:

1. How many horses were exported to the United States during 1943?

2. Through what ports did these horses pass, and how many through each port?

3. How many horses were imported into Canada from the United States in 1943?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

1 and 2.

Exports of Horses to the United States, calendar year 1943.

Province	No.
New Brunswick	900
Quebec	6,593
Ontario	4,167
Manitoba	68
Saskatchewan	726
Alberta	4,380
British Columbia	180
Total	17,014

Exports by ports not available.

3. Imports of horses from the United States: Calendar year 1943—331.

EMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN IN WAR CHEMICAL PLANTS

Mr. GAUTHIER:

How many women are employed, in each province of Canada, in war chemical plants?

Mr. MITCHELL:

Employment as at April 1, 1944

	Total employees	Women employees
Quebec	17,148	6,049
Ontario	12,886	5,142
Manitoba	2,337	493
Alberta	407	42
British Columbia	133	6
Total	32,911	11,732

CANADIAN ARMY—GRANTS AND ALLOWANCES ON DISCHARGE

Mr. HAZEN:

1. What clothing allowance is paid to officers of the Canadian army on discharge?

2. What rehabilitation grant is made to officers of the permanent force?

3. Are such grants in addition to the pension of such officers of the permanent force?

4. What rehabilitation grant is made to the officers of the Canadian army who are honourably discharged as being over age?

5. What rehabilitation grant is made to the officers of the Canadian army who are honourably discharged on grounds of medical unfitness?

6. What rehabilitation grant is paid to such officers who are honourably discharged for any other reason?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax):

1. None, except those officers of the force who have been cashiered or dismissed from the service and who are entirely without funds, and who have no balance of pay standing to their credit which may be used for the purpose of purchasing civilian clothing, who may, on the specific authority of the district officer commanding, be given a grant of $65 for such purpose.

2. Thirty days' pay of rank or appointment and one month's dependents' allowance, provided they have completed 183 days continuous service. Dependents' allowance is paid to the dependent of the officer concerned.

3. Yes.

4, 5 and 6. See answer to 2 above.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. COLDWELL:

What was the total number of persons registered as seeking employment under the selective service, but not actually placed in employment, as of April 1, 1944, (a) in Canada; (b) by provinces?

Mr. MITCHELL:

	Number of persons registered as seeking employment at employment and selective service offices but not actually placed in employment March 30, 1944	Total applicants referred to jobs March 30, 1944	Net registrations in process of placement March 30, 1944	Requests for employees in process of being filled March 30, 1944
Prince Edward Island	219	91	128	199
Nova Scotia	2,098	802	1,296	5,956

PATROL CRAFT—PALMER AND WILLIAMS, SUMMERSIDE

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. Has the firm of Palmer and Williams Limited, of Summerside, P.E.I., a contract for the construction of patrol craft for the government?

2. If so, how many of these patrol craft were turned out by the Palmer and Williams company during the years 1941, 1942, and 1943?

3. What is the amount which was paid for each of the said patrol craft so constructed?

4. What was the nature of the contract with the Palmer and Williams company; was it, (a) a contract by competitive bid; (b) a cost-plus contract?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes.

2. 1941, none; 1942, partial work on nine craft transferred from E. A. Chappell; 1943, ten.

3. The prices paid to Palmer and Williams Limited for the completion of the nine craft transferred from E. A. Chappell varied in accordance with the amount of work which remained to be done on each craft. They were as follows (sales tax extra): one at $1,700; one at $1,750; two at $1,755; one at $4,450; four at $4,625. The prices paid to Palmer and Williams Limited for complete work on an additional ten patrol craft were as follows (sales tax included): seven at $8,000 each; three at $9,450 each.

4. None of the contracts were cost-plus. Two were let on a competitive basis and four were negotiated.

CANADIAN FORCES—ENLISTMENT OF ALIENS

Mr. ROY:

1. In what Canadian regiments and units have United Kingdom subjects who were not nationals of Canada, and aliens in general, enlisted?

[Mr. Coldwell.]

2. What are the figures for each regiment and unit?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): This information is not available. It is only recently that attestation papers called for answers which would furnish any part of this information.

CANADIAN FORCES—ENLISTMENT OF ALIENS

Mr. ROY:

1. How many subjects of the United Kingdom who were not Canadian nationals have enlisted in the three Canadian armed services, and how many in each service?

2. How many aliens of every origin have enlisted in the three Canadian armed services, and how many in each service?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): So far as the army is concerned, this information is not available.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

IMMIGRANT REFUGEES

Mr. RAYMOND:

1. Since the 10th day of December, 1943, how many persons were granted a permit by the government under the provisions of order in council 9440 concerning the status of immigrant refugees?

2. Among the persons who obtained such permit, have any been employed by the dominion government or commissions or undertakings of said government since their arrival in this country, or are any employed at present by the dominion government or commissions or undertakings of said government?

3. If so, (a) what number; (b) what are their names; (c) what were or are their duties; (d) what amounts did they or do they receive?

NATIONAL COUNCIL FOR CANADIAN-SOVIET FRIENDSHIP

Mr. DORION:

1. What is the set-up of the "National Council for Canadian Soviet Friendship"?
2. Has this council been legally organized? If so, how, and when?
3. Is this council controlled by the government? If so, in what manner?
4. Has this council obtained from the government the authorization to import from U.S.S.R. soviet films, photographs of life in the U.S.S.R., posters being used in soviet factories, books and pamphlets about all aspects of life in the Soviet Union? If so, has it been authorized to deliver to Canadian labour unions these films, photographs, books, etc.?

HON. J. G. TAGGART

Mr. NICHOLSON:

What has been the total amount paid to Honourable J. G. Taggart by the federal government since the outbreak of war?

LABOUR CONDITIONS—FIXING OF SALARIES OR WAGE RATES FOLLOWING DISPUTES OR STRIKES

Mr. RAYMOND:

1. Since December 16, 1940, has the government passed orders in council fixing salary rates in specified industries or concerning specified classes of workers following industrial disputes or strikes?
2. If so, (a) how many; (b) on what date was each of such orders in council passed; (c) what industries and classes of workers were affected by such orders in council?

Mr. MITCHELL: Return tabled.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

MOBILIZATION ACT—DIVISION "E", MONTREAL

Mr. LACOMBE:

For a copy of all telegrams, correspondence and other documents exchanged between all persons and the registrar for division "E", Montreal, since the first day of August, 1940, as to persons in the county of Laval-Two Mountains called under the mobilization act.

Mr. MITCHELL: I would ask that this motion be dropped, because it is not possible to supply the material asked. The files of the registrar's office are noted in numerical sequence, and according to their call-up number. There is no grouping or recording by electoral districts. However, if the hon. member wishes information respecting any particular case I shall be glad to make an effort to get such correspondence.

Mr. LACOMBE: I will submit to the minister particular cases.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

BARRIEFIELD MILITARY CAMP—BILINGUAL SECTION

Mr. POULIOT:

For a copy of all letters, memoranda and reports, (a) for the establishment, and (b) for the abolition of the bilingual section at A-21, C.O.C.T.C., Barriefield, since September, 1941.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): No recommendations have been made and no submissions received at National Defence headquarters for the establishment of a bilingual section at A-21, C.O.C.T.C. Barriefield.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

Mr. POULIOT: Might I be allowed to amend the motion by substituting the words "a course in French" for the words "the bilingual section"?

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion can stand, and the hon. member can take it up with the parliamentary assistant.

Motion stands.

PUBLIC RELATIONS OFFICERS, ETC.

Mr. CHURCH:

For a return showing the total number of persons employed by each government department and all outside boards and control boards and government commissions in what is known as, (a) public relations officers; (b) press agents; (c) liaison officers; the return to show the total number of such persons in, (i) civil work; (ii) war work, so engaged.

RADIO BROADCASTING—MISS CLAIRE WALLACE

Mr. ROSS (Souris):

For a copy of the contract between the war finance committee and/or the C.B.C. and Miss Claire Wallace, together with all correspondence relating thereto, and a report on discussions regarding salary or stipend for broadcasting by the said Claire Wallace on behalf of the war finance committee; also a statement showing the total amount of money paid as salary or stipend, and any and all expenses, including travelling, hotel expenses, honorariums, etc., during the year 1943 and down to date in 1944.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Justice McTague's order.

GASPE OIL-BEARING FIELDS

Mr. ROY:

For a copy of all letters, memorandum, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the dominion government and the government of the province of Quebec since 1940 concerning the oil prospects of the Gaspe oil-bearing fields and matters related thereto.

FREIGHT CHARGES ON WESTERN WHEAT TO QUEBEC FARMERS

Mr. GAUTHIER:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the government of the province of Quebec and the dominion government or the federal Department of Agriculture concerning the payment of part of the freight charges on western wheat to farmers in the province of Quebec, from 1935 to 1944 inclusive.

FARM LOAN BOARD—S. T. SHABBITS

Mr. NICHOLSON:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and other documents in possession of the government in connection with the resignation of S. T. Shabbits, an employee of the Canadian farm loan board, in 1944.

WESTMINSTER HOSPITAL, LONDON, ONTARIO—DISMISSAL OF HERBERT SIMPSON

Mr. NOSEWORTHY:

For a copy of all correspondence between the Department of Pensions and National Health and Westminster hospital regarding the dismissal of one Herbert Simpson, together with a copy of any reports of any investigation held in connection with said dismissal.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I take objection to this motion. Mr. Simpson, who had been employed by Westminster Hospital, London, Ontario, was dismissed for cause. Westminster hospital is a departmental institution, and its staff are members of the Department of Pensions and National Health. It is not the practice, and it would not be in the public interest, to table any correspondence or report from departmental employees to their superior officers in the same department.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

CANADA STEAMSHIP LINES

DAMAGE TO MONTREAL FREIGHT SHEDS BY FIRE

On the orders of the day.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I have a question I should like to ask the Minister of Justice, under whose jurisdiction comes the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Is an inquiry being instituted into the cause of last Friday's costly fire which damaged the freight sheds of the Canada Steamship Lines on Montreal's waterfront, with the object of ascertaining whether or not factors of sabotage entered into the matter? One reason for asking the question, in addition to that of public interest, was that one eyewitness was alleged to have stated that the fire seemed to have started at three different places at the same time.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): Notwithstanding the fact that these freight sheds were private property, and under the control and in the custody of Canada Steamship Lines, as the owners thereof, because of the extent of the damage and the nature of some of the commodities destroyed, the inspector of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police at Montreal immediately initiated a full investigation of the circumstances surrounding the fire. He has reported to the commissioner that there is no evidence whatsoever that would be grounds for suspicion of sabotage.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does the minister know whether inquiries have been instituted by either the municipal or the provincial authorities?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I did not inquire as to that. This was an investigation conducted by the inspector of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police at Montreal. He reported that he investigated all clues or indications and that there were no grounds for any suspicion of sabotage.

INTERNATIONAL FINANCE

BANK FOR INTERNATIONAL SETTLEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. The Montreal Gazette in its news columns to-day reports:

> War or no war, the Bank for International Settlements will hold its 14th annual meeting on May 22 at its headquarters in Switzerland.

The report states that representatives of the allied nations will attend the meeting, as well as banking representatives of the axis group. I desire to inquire of the government if the Bank of Canada is a member of the Bank for International Settlements and, if so, is it the policy of the government to have the Bank of Canada, under the present circumstances, represented at this meeting. I would further like to know if the Canadian government or the Bank of Canada has any deposits or any financial interest of any kind in the Bank for International Settlements.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I would like to ask my hon. friend to let this question stand and I will give him an answer to-morrow.

CANADIAN FORCES

CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS—FORT OSBORNE BARRACKS, MILITARY DISTRICT NO. 10

On the orders of the day:

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence, and in order to do this I should like to give some information which has been sent to me by way of telegram. I have received a number of telegrams to-day from Winnipeg alleging that serious assaults have been perpetrated upon persons in military district No. 10, at the Fort Osborne barracks. The persons alleged to have been assaulted are said to be conscientious objectors of the sect known as Jehovah's Witnesses. I would ask the minister if he is already informed as to these allegations and whether he can at the moment make any statement with respect to them. If he is not informed, will an investigation be made and a statement given later?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I may say that I have had several communications, probably from the same sources as those from which the communications to my hon. friend emanated. I think several of the telegrams referred to the same individuals. I immediately gave instructions to the adjutant general to have a full inquiry made, to work by telephone if necessary, and to carry on whatever investigation might be required in order to probe to the bottom the allegations which were made in these communications.

MOUNTED POLICE

KILLING OF MAN CHARGED WITH CONSPIRING TO COMMIT AN INDICTABLE OFFENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, this morning a news item appeared in all the papers to the effect that a draftee or conscript was killed by a member of the mounted police in the county of Levis, near Quebec city. I should like to know if the government has been informed whether this conscript was armed at the time he was shot and, if so, what was his weapon? If the government cannot give this information to-day, I shall be thankful if they will give it to-morrow.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): As soon as this matter was brought to my attention I asked for information from the commissioner of the mounted police and I was informed that this man was being pursued because he had been charged with conspiring to commit an indictable offence under section 573 of the criminal code. They had been searching for him for several months and having obtained information that he was in the vicinity of St. Lambert, a patrol was sent out to locate him at 3 a.m. yesterday. Upon arrival at the spot it was found that he was not there, but when the patrol returned about 5.30 yesterday morning he was found in bed. When they proceeded to the chamber he jumped out through a window and started to run away. The constables pursued him and fired four or five shots in the air without his slowing down his pace at all. They then fired twice at the ground to one side of the fleeing man, and they saw him fall. They ran up to him and found that unfortunately a bullet had richocheted and struck him. They immediately called for transportation to take him to the hospital but before they reached the hospital he died.

Mr. POULIOT: But he was carrying no weapon at that time?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I did not inquire into that point. I presume that had he been found in possession of a weapon it would have been mentioned in the report. There was nothing in the report to indicate that he was carrying a weapon.

Mr. POULIOT: Will the minister be kind enough to secure that information?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Certainly.

HOUSING

QUESTION AS TO PLAN FOR CONSTRUCTION OF LOW RENT DWELLINGS IN WINNIPEG

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance, of which I gave notice earlier to-day. In view of the telegram sent to the minister on Saturday by the clerk of the council of the city of Winnipeg will the minister indicate whether a plan for the construction of low rent dwellings, such as has been announced for Montreal and Toronto, will be available for Winnipeg? Will the minister see to it that details of the Montreal and Toronto plans are furnished to the Winnipeg city council?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I know of no plan which has been worked out in Toronto. However, a plan has been worked out in Montreal by a group of public spirited citizens there. If a similar group in Winnipeg will do the same thing and make such suggestions as they see fit to the Department of Finance, they would of course be considered. I want to say that it is hard to answer yes or no to the question asked by the hon. gentleman because the Montreal plan is adapted to conditions in Montreal and it might be very misleading if I were to say that if exactly the same plan were suggested for Winnipeg the reaction of the Department of Finance would be favourable. Certainly a plan following the general principle of the Montreal plan would receive consideration, I would hope favourable consideration, but it would depend upon the particulars of the plan itself.

With regard to the particulars of the plan, I may say that I received the telegram from the city clerk of Winnipeg referred to by the hon. gentleman. I have prepared a somewhat long letter which I propose to send which gives or directs him to all the necessary information about the Montreal plan.

HOGS

CONGESTION AT WINNIPEG PACKING PLANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. WILLIAM BRYCE (Selkirk): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture which affects the production of food in Canada. Our farmers are striving to produce the best select hogs, but the present congestion at the Winnipeg packing plants forces the farmers to hold back their hogs with a serious loss in grade due to overweight. What steps are being taken to overcome this difficulty?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the question has to do with the present heavy run of hogs and beef cattle to packing plants. The statement made by the hon. member for Selkirk would suggest that there is some difficulty in getting these hogs and cattle through our packing plants, and there is.

For the information of the house, the number on the payroll at the packing plants in Winnipeg on January 1, 1944 was 3,450, and on April 22, 1944, the number was 3,684. In other words there were over 200 more employees in the packing plants at Winnipeg on April 22 than there were on January 1 of this year. That is a very unusual condition. In the past it has been usual for hog deliveries to be low at this time of the year as compared with the earlier period. But as a result of the great production of live stock upon farms this year as compared with any previous year, the run through the plants both of hogs and cattle is unprecedented. There were about seventy-five per cent more hogs going through the plants weekly in February and March of this year than were going through the plants a year ago, and they are still running about forty per cent over the same period a year ago. While we were not processing any beef for export a year ago, we have up to date purchased for export what would amount to about 105,000 head of cattle, to be processed and shipped to Britain. That will give some idea of the increase in the food production and in live stock from the farms and of the greatly increased work which the processing plants have had to do in getting this meat through the plants and on its way to Britain. The Labour department was appealed to some weeks ago to assist in providing labour for these plants, and the Department of Labour and the Department of Agriculture have been in contact with the farm organizations of western Canada and the western governments and have at present the cooperation of the three western governments and the farm organizations of the west in securing all the labour possible for these plants.

It would appear that this is not a temporary condition but one which will continue to exist, owing to the very high deliveries of live stock to the plants. An attempt is therefore being made, and I think successfully, by the labour department to secure the necessary labour to keep the live stock moving through the plants just as rapidly as possible.

Mr. PERLEY: May I follow up with a question the minister's statement that there is difficulty in the marketing and processing of live stock. Is he considering setting up a board of live stock commissioners? I think there is a need for it. Would he make a statement on that?

Mr. GARDINER: The last question refers to a matter of government policy. The matter has been under consideration for some time and is still under consideration.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The minister admits that there is congestion at Winnipeg. Has consideration been given to increasing temporarily the weight limits on hogs and cattle to prevent a loss to the farmer as a result of this congestion?

Mr. GARDINER: There are no weight limits on cattle. There are, of course, weight limits on hogs that enter into the production of bacon and ham. I do not think it would be wise to change the limits. As a matter fact, we are making an effort to get the hogs through the plants at the present weight limits, and we are hopeful that we shall be able to do that in due course.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: In the meantime the farmer is taking a loss.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

LEASE OF PROPERTY TO ALPHONSE LEDOUX—ANSWER TO QUESTION ON MAY 4

On the orders of the day:

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Michaud). Recently I asked him the following questions as reported at 2594 of Hansard for May 4, 1944:

1. Have the Canadian National Railways leased to one Alphonse Ledoux a property in the Oka district, county of Two Mountains, province of Quebec?

2. If so, what is the amount of annual rent paid by Ledoux?

The hon. the minister answered as follows:

1. Yes.

2. This concerns a detail of railway administration which is not of public interest.

Will the minister tell me why that question is not of public interest?

BANK ACT AMENDMENT

CONDITIONS GOVERNING TEN-YEAR EXTENSION OF BANK CHARTERS

The house resumed from Tuesday, May 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Ilsley for the second reading of bill No. 91, respecting banks and banking.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, aside from the budget the bill now under discussion is the most important non-war measure to come before parliament at this session. In fact I would say that any bill relating to the decennial revision of the Bank Act is an important measure and therefore demands from the members of the house and from parliament the best consideration that we can give to it.

There has been banking legislation before parliament since the early days of confederation. The first general Bank Act after confederation was passed in 1871, and thereafter at regular intervals, not always adhered to rigidly, there has been a revision of the banking laws of this country. From the very earliest times, from 1871 down, very large powers have been granted to the chartered banks, and those powers were extended from time to time until, shall I say, the revision of 1923, when a change of policy took place. Because of a series of events more or less unrelated to present-day conditions, public opinion and the wisdom that comes from experience in operation then indicated that more limitations on the powers granted to the banks were necessary in the public interest, and that has been the trend of banking legislation from that time down. The most drastic of these limitations came in the revision of 1934. In that year the principle of a central bank and of central control of credit and currency was adopted by parliament. The revision and limitations then imposed were of a nature consequential upon and in a degree co-extensive with the establishment of the Bank of Canada.

Prior to the 1934 revision and the establishment of the Bank of Canada there had been set up in Canada a royal commission on the banking situation in this country known as the Macmillan commission. Hon. gentlemen are familiar with the findings of that commission, which were referred to briefly by the minister in his statement the other day. I commend to any intelligent student of our banking system a reading of the report of the Macmillan commission. I do not propose to repeat any of its findings now. Suffice it to say that the commission found, and I agree, that assuming that we are to continue the established capitalist system of commercial banking in Canada under private ownership, our banking system had served the country reasonably well. I concur in the minister's observation that during the rapid development of Canada the system has served Canada reasonably well. I do not imply, nor I suppose does the minister, that it is by any means perfect; nothing is perfect in this world of ours. But the system amply demonstrated its strength and stability in the hectic days of 1933. There was no bank holiday in Canada then; and there were two reasons for that. The first was the strength of our financial institutions themselves, and the second was the fact that in that time of financial stress and strain this nation had great leadership, leadership of strength and courage, the kind of courage necessary to meet emergencies. As a result the people's savings were held secure, and I may say that the achievement was a matter of pride to the people of Canada. Contrast that with the situation which was exhibited in the United States, of the actual suffering which took place as a result of the closing of so many of the smaller financial institutions. The banks themselves, I think, gave a reasonable degree of leadership at that time.

What I have to say about this bill to-day will be, I hope, of a constructive character. Whatever criticism I make, both of the subject matter and of the minister himself, is not motivated, I assure the house, by malice. I desire to approach the whole position in as judicial a spirit as I can summon. That does not mean that I shall not have some political allusions to make in the course of my remarks. I hope to be forgiven if I do that. But speaking generally, I trust the debate will be conducted in a judicial spirit, to the end that, when the bill finally passes this house, there will emerge a measure calculated to give the people of Canada a law tending to create a high standard of living, to preserve freedom of enterprise, conserve the people's savings, and redounding to the lasting benefit of the public, and especially the commercial life of the nation.

At the same time the banks, along with individual enterprise, supported by wise government policies and active assistance on the part of the government, must see to it that there shall be no return to the conditions which prevailed in 1933, so far as that is humanly possible. We all have responsibilities in that regard. I am satisfied that there is not an hon. member in this house, of any party, who seeks to shirk these responsibilities. The banks themselves have a large measure of responsibility in that regard, because they enjoy great advantages. The very statement of that fact brings with it the corollary of the proposition: because they enjoy great advantages there is upon them a large measure of responsibility for preventing depression in the future. The control of credit and currency is in the Bank of Canada, but the control of the practical application of credit itself is in the hands of the chartered banks, and it must be used wisely and in the national interest.

Having said that, may I now direct your attention to the bill itself and to the minister's statements. It is impossible, in the short space of time which I desire to take up this afternoon, to go into any degree of detail with respect to either. The bill is voluminous; I have not yet completed the first reading of it, and I doubt if many hon. members have. Before discussing it, however, I must say to the minister that his statement of Tuesday last was exactly what I feared it would be—not a factual, objective statement, but rather a passionate piece of propaganda calculated to stir up debate and invite reprisals. Then, there is the delay in introducing the measure. We are now on the eighth day of May, well into the fourth month of this session. This bill is of major importance, and I suggest to the minister, as I did the other day, that notwithstanding difficulties which of course I appreciate must have stood in the way, this bill should have been brought down long before. It ought to have been brought down, at latest, concurrently with the introduction of the bill to incorporate the industrial development bank.

May I now for a moment refer to the minister's statement of May 1 when he was moving for leave to introduce the bill. In that statement he indicated that the bill constitutes three important things: first, the basis of the decennial revision of the Bank Act; second, the extensions of the charters of the banks for another ten years or until July 1, 1954; third, generally speaking, it provides for such changes in the present act as the administration has decided are advisable, governing the operations of the banks, their powers, and the limitations of the controls to which they are subject. The statement of the minister and a subsequent statement indicated that the changes are numerous. That is correct. But I do not think they are very important. In principle there is nothing revolutionary about them; they do not establish any principles which are not already embodied in the legislation now on the statute book. I suggest that this is a better description—that they are an extension of existing policies and principles.

First, there is the change in the right to issue notes on the part of the chartered banks. That is not a new principle; it is a principle which was established in the act of 1934 and was consonant with the establishment of the Bank of Canada and the rights given to that central institution. Of course it is important in a limited sense, because it takes away from the banks one important function and a very valuable franchise. I may say in passing that there are not many provisions in this bill which impair the powers of the banks. I believe that hon. members, particularly a few who sit on the right of you, Mr. Speaker, will be disappointed, upon an examination of this bill, in the character of the changes. However, that is merely an expression of my personal opinion, and I have no doubt that they will be vocal enough when the proper time arrives to express their own views in that regard. The banks have been left pretty well alone so far as shearing them of important powers is concerned. The function of the note issue was given to the commercial banks of Canada a long time ago. It served a useful purpose, and since it was not transferred to the state until 1934, it was an important function in the commercial and business operations of the country. Of course I agree, as we all do, that it was a profitable function to the banks, upon which the various governments from time to time in the past have imposed taxation and received for the public revenues a substantial increment.

I know of only one argument against completely taking away from the chartered banks the right of the issuing of notes, and it is this. Because the function has been profitable in the past, it has greatly assisted, in my view at all events, for what it is worth, the establishment of a chain of branch banks which covers the country from east to west; I doubt very much if many of the branches which were established in rural communities in days gone by, and which served the public, well or ill, according to one's opinion and experience, would ever have been established had it not been for the fact that the banks enjoyed this profitable franchise. Well, it has been taken away in large measure, and while it is not the only cause for the closing of many small branch banks, I do suggest to the minister and the house that it has been a substantial contributing factor to the closing of branches.

My understanding of the position is that in order to make a branch bank pay it is necessary that it receive substantial deposits, and on those funds, employed in the branch or elsewhere as the case may be, mostly elsewhere I think, the banks, together with the franchise of note issue, have been able to maintain these branches. But since 1934 we have seen a change, which in part at least, I suggest, has been brought about by the restriction imposed upon the banks in connection with the note issue. Take my own community, for instance. In 1934 we had four branches, one for each of the big banks, in the city of Fredericton, and we had in the rural communities eight or ten, I think ten, branch banks in the two counties of York and Sunbury. To-day there are only six.

Mr. MacNICOL: Altogether?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Six branch banks outside the city of Fredericton in the two counties, and it cannot be said that the people are overserviced with banking accommodation in that community. I do not say they are underserviced, but the closing of four, perhaps only two, in that period of time has not been of advantage at least to these particular communities, but rather the reverse. And so, with that principle, there comes some reaction. I think this position could be illustrated in almost every constituency in Canada from east to west. Right in the minister's own constituency there was closed not so long ago a branch bank in the little town of Middleton, which has had a bank for some considerable time.

So that these things happen, and although I am not dogmatic about the cause, it seems to me that the taking away of the right to issue notes has had a substantial effect upon the service to the community by the banks. That may not be correct, but that is my belief at all events.

The second important principle to which the minister alluded—I may not have them in their right order—is the provision of making the Bank of Canada the exclusive agency for the redemption of notes, both of defunct banks and, by 1950, of existing banks. I suggest that is not revolutionary by any means. It is merely a change in existing machinery to perform a function that has been performed hitherto by provisions under the Bank Act. And I do not see any harm in it. I think it is a useful provision for centralizing in the Bank of Canada this function, which may or may not be important. But it is a natural evolution following the establishment of the Bank of Canada by a Conservative government in 1935, and, I suggest, one of that government's greatest accomplishments was the establishment of the Bank of Canada.

Then there is a third suggestion or provision which may stir up some controversy, and that is the transfer of unclaimed balances, and liability to pay them, to the Bank of Canada after ten years. This is not a new thought by any means. Those who were present at the bank revision of 1934 will recall that Mr. Irvine, then member for Westaskiwin, had a resolution before the banking and commerce committee—an amendment, I believe it was; I have not been able to look up the citation—calling upon the powers that be to declare that seventy-five per cent of these unclaimed balances should be transferred to the crown in the right of the dominion. The Minister of Finance of that day, Mr. Rhodes, rejected the suggestion. I have here a reference to it in the Canadian Bar Review, Volume 21, No. 7, page 546, of August and September, 1943. In an article entitled "Some Legal Problems on Banking," the author of which is Mr. Arthur W. Rogers, K.C., who is to-day the secretary of the Canadian Bankers' Association, a man very well versed, I should judge, in banking problems and the legal problems of banking, he has the following to say in reference to that suggestion:

> On the occasion of the last revision of the Bank Act one of the members of the banking and commerce committee suggested that provision should be made to vest these unclaimed balances in the crown in the right of the dominion. The Minister of Finance, however, stated that such a step would be unconstitutional on the ground that the provinces were entitled under section 109 of the British North America Act to such of these unclaimed balances as were really ownerless and therefore bona vacantia—

That is what is known in Quebec, I believe, as vacant property; is that right?

> —coming within the meaning of the term "royalties" in the above section.

I looked up section 109 of the British North America Act and I really do not think it could be justified on that ground. But I suggest to the minister that it is a violation of provincial rights, that it is a violation of the British North America Act, section 92, which provides that property and civil rights function only within the jurisdiction of the provinces; and I suggest to the house and the country that the proposal savours of confiscation on the part of the crown in the right of the dominion. I believe there is good authority for that suggestion. I hold the view that this provision is unconstitutional; the matter is at present the subject of litigation. The matter is sub judice.

I want to return to that aspect of the matter in a moment, but to me this looks like the legal violation of a contract on the part of this parliament; and just why the move is made is not quite clear to me. This is either in one jurisdiction or the other. I am informed that during recent years a suit was taken by the provincial authorities of Quebec against the Bank of Montreal, I believe as a test case; the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) will know much more about this than I do. If I am correctly informed, and I must confess that I have not been able to get hold of the report of the court of appeal, the superior court declared that these unclaimed balances were vacant property within the meaning of the laws of that province, and the court of appeal sustained that decision, which in effect, I suggest, is an affirmation of provincial rights under the constitution, in relation to property and civil rights. I believe my hon. friend the Minister of Justice has intervened in that litigation, which is on its way to the privy council, where there will be a contest over the constitutional issue raised. The matter is sub judice, and I suggest that such legislation as this should not be introduced until the matter is finally decided by the highest judicial authority. Then I believe, though I have not been able to get the report, that in a recent case in Manitoba involving somewhat the same principle, or so I am informed, the provincial courts have upheld the right of the crown in the right of the province with respect to certain matters of property and civil rights—I am not sure just what the rights were, because I have not read the report—and that the decision was appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada, which reaffirmed it. A friend of mine communicated with the clerk of the Supreme Court of Canada, but I understand the report has not yet been printed, so that I do not speak dogmatically as to what that court actually found.

I ask the minister this question. On the basis of the theory or principle of "pith and substance"—which must have a familiar ring to some hon. members of this house who have read the privy council decisions on the litigation relating to the so-called new deal—this is not banking and commerce at all; it is property and civil rights and, as such, this is an attempt on the part of the federal authority to change something which in my view, at all events, for whatever it may be worth, should be left as it is. Those of us who are lawyers know the law of the land in connection with what they term vacant property. I believe that is dealt with in the province of Quebec under a special act, and in the other provinces under the common law. When a man dies intestate, without issue, heirs at law or next of kin, the crown in the right of the province takes the property I remember in my very young days as counsel being startled when I heard of the case of a man in my own practice who was in that position. Unfortunately he did not make a will; he had no next of kin, and the crown walked in and took over several thousand dollars in bank deposits. That was the law of New Brunswick, as I believe it is in all the common law provinces. These unclaimed balances are vacant property. They are property; they are there by virtue of a contract between the bank and an individual or corporation, as the case may be. Under what principle should the federal authority step in and claim those unpaid balances?

Mr. McGEER: Piracy.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, I call it confiscation; that is not quite so strong a term. I suggest to the minister that this legislation is premature, at all events, until the decision of the privy council has been handed down. That will decide the issue, and his legislation may be good; but he would look pretty silly if the privy council should decide against him. I think he is taking a long chance. I know the minister has an inflexible mind; he always thinks he is right and that no one else is ever right.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, but I have a good answer.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, perhaps you have, but the answer will not be given by my hon. friend but by the privy council. It is fortunate in these days of regulations and controls that we still have access to the courts.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Have we?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a point; the hon. member for Lake Centre asks, "Have we?" Even that has been taken away from the citizenship of this country, in some measure at least, of course with the approval of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance.

Now I pass from that to the proposed amendment to section 91, reducing the maximum rate of interest and discount to six per cent. That is an old friend. I recall that substantial efforts were made to have this done in 1934, and I shall be perfectly honest and say that perhaps it should have been done at that time. It is proposed also to limit the rate on instalment loans to five per cent. I doubt very much if instalment loans can be operated on a five per cent basis, but that is not my funeral, and if they cannot, it will not be my loss. The banks will be able to speak for themselves. But in this connection I should like to refer the house to the minister's statement at page 2555 of Hansard. I never before thought the minister was so egotistical; I do not know how many times he used the pronoun "I". It was reminiscent of the days of an old Nova Scotia statesman.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Bennett.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, older than he. I hope I may not be guilty of the same thing.

Mr. ABBOTT: This is not a case of the pot calling the kettle black, is it?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think so. I think the parliamentary assistant had better keep his seat, because if I understand the situation correctly he was responsible for a tactical error made by the minister on Tuesday last, when he made a vicious attack on my hon. friends to my left, I suppose in the hope that he would curry a little favour with St. James street. Well, let me tell him that was a vain hope, because he is sitting in this house for the last time. That ought to hold him for a while.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am completely cowed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, I suggest that the parliamentary assistant should not interrupt me when I am trying to make a reasoned argument; that is all.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Who said that? Some other man who has not an idea in the world, I suppose.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): There is no greater interrupter in the house than my hon. friend.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I direct the minister's attention to page 2555 of Hansard, the first column, where he is reported to have said:

> I would like the benefit of very special consideration by the banking and commerce committee and this house. In my desire to keep maximum charges low I may easily have gone too far and I would like the committee to hear evidence from the banks as to whether it is really possible to do this type of business under the terms which I am here suggesting.

I pause here to say that before the minister put this provision in the statute the policy should have been thoroughly examined. That language does not indicate it. Then he goes on to say:

> Furthermore, while in the interests of simplicity and for the purpose of avoiding an odd or fractional rate of interest, I have expressed the ceiling in terms of a five per cent discount, it may be that the committee may prefer to express the ceiling in terms of a maximum rate of interest per month or per year. I shall be prepared to welcome the guidance of the committee in this respect also.

That is the first time I ever heard the minister asking for an honest-to-God suggestion from anybody in the house, because his mind is so inflexible that he never accepts a suggestion.

I do say that a start was made in this direction in 1934, and it is the natural result and evolution of the easy money policy that was established in 1934, when we got the banks either voluntarily or involuntarily to reduce the rate of interest on savings deposits, which was a sine qua non to the policy of easy money and the downward revision of bank rates and bank discounts in Canada. A very good start was made then, which might have possibly gone further at that time.

Then, the minister has referred to the provisions of section 88, which, to every lawyer in the house, is of course an old friend. He says that the amendments are designed to make it possible for additional types of borrowers to obtain bank credit under this section, and to provide what is said to be a simplification of the procedure now necessary to take security for loans under this section. Well, that is merely an extension of an already existing principle—and a great privilege to the banks; make no mistake about that. In no other jurisdiction in the world that I know of is there anything comparable to section 88. How long it will live I know not. I am not asking for its repeal to-day, because I know is is a valuable adjunct to our financial machinery. But it is not a new principle. The changes are designed to clarify the position, and perhaps to make it simpler. That ought to be welcomed by everybody. On the whole, while it is a special privilege—and have no doubt about that—let us admit that it has served a useful purpose.

But in days gone by these liens were secret. They were statutory liens created and authorized by the Bank Act. They were secret liens, and in principle that was bad and unjust to many parts of the commercial communtiy. It gave the banks preferred positions over ordinary creditors, and often, being secret and taken without notice, caused hardship and loss to the commercial public. I know something about that. I have been through this mill in days gone by. Let me illustrate. Up to 1923 the banks could take a lien as security for a loan on standing timber on freehold land, and nobody knew anything about it. They had a preferred first, secret mortgage, by the execution of section 88 hypothecation forms. No doubt that was a great advantage to the banks, because it placed them in a preferred position, and it may have been of some immediate advantage to the borrower. But once it was known it absolutely destroyed the credit of the borrower with all the rest of the commercial community It was inequitable, unjust and an abomination to the business community. It was the supplier of materials who usually got pinched. Standing timber might have been growing on granted land, a man might be operating that granted land, and might go to the bank and get an advance under a lien. At the same time he might buy from me, a wholesale grocer, his goods and supplies. As a result the grocer, the man who supplied food to feed the men, would wake up one day and find that there was a lien ahead of him. That is not a pleasant situation, but it has actually happened.

In 1923 I had the privilege of bringing this position before the banking committee. I must say I got a great deal of support from the then Minister of Finance, Mr. Fielding, and there was very little opposition from the banks, the position having been stated to them clearly. I succeeded in having a reform made. It was not all I could have wished, but at least there was some amelioration of what I considered a difficult and unjust situation. What was done then was that a form of notice had to be given—inadequate, I think, but still a form of notice. I ask the minister if the government has considered, in revising the Bank Act, whether any further action should be taken in connection with this matter of secret liens, because, per se, secret liens should not be tolerated in the commercial world. As I recall the act of 1923, and the slight amendment in 1934, notice of intention to borrow has to be given. But the notice in respect of granted lands—and in law it is described as a constructive notice, not an actual notice—does not have to be registered in a registry office, where the ordinary business man would naturally expect to find it.

Has consideration been given to strengthening that principle of constructive notice? I have no further observations to make on that point. When we come to the sections themselves in the banking committee, and after I have had an opportunity to study them, I may be able to evolve some further suggestions in respect of reform in that regard. At that time I may ask that such changes be given consideration.

Then we are informed that sections 88 and 89 are to be amended, on the theory that more credit will be extended to farmers and fishermen. This is known as intermediate credit. I hope that the thought behind this gesture will mature into action. But I believe I may be pardoned if I express some degree of scepticism as to the results which would flow from these new proposed revisions. I do not see any long line of farmers and fishermen leaving the offices of the chartered banks with their pockets filled with money borrowed from those banks on a ten per cent guarantee. I should like to add that I do not think there will be any easy loans on that basis. However, I desire to make this observation, that a charitable and judicial view to take is to await clarification of the whole position before the committee. I do not condemn it at all; I am open to conviction, and I hope it will be successful—but I am just not at all sure about it. We would all like to see more credit extended to farmers and fishermen in times of stress. That has not been their position in the past. The position of farmers and fishermen in the maritimes has not been a very happy one. I happen to have been born among them on the bay of Fundy. I know that they have had periods of great prosperity, but they have also had periods of dire distress. I think that is true of any fishing community on the Atlantic coast. In my view these proposals might be strengthened. However, let us see what we shall see in the committee.

It seems to take a war to bring us to a realization of the plight of these two classes of our citizenship. To-day the position is reversed; there is no doubt about that. To-day the fisherman is getting a worth-while return, especially the man in the fresh fish trade in the maritime provinces. I am glad he is getting it. In a measure the same is true of the farmers of this country. At last they are getting something approaching parity in connection with their production. They are carrying on that production under the most adverse conditions. All praise to the farmers of Canada, who after all are the backbone of this country. I have always believed that. Their position to-day is due to the war and the war alone. We must see to it that they are not allowed to lapse into a position after the war which would be in any degree comparable with what they went through during the dark days of the depression. My view is that to-day the farmer does not want credit so much as he wants to be left alone to work out his own salvation. That is what my farmers tell me. They want to be free from regimentation and controls. Above everything else the farmer is an individualist, although he is beginning to learn the value of cooperation in certain of his activities. But on the whole I think it is axiomatic that he desires to manage his own affairs and plan his own economy.

I was greatly struck the other day with an item in the Ottawa Journal which had been quoted from the Hamilton Spectator. It contained the utterances of a farmer of the province of Quebec. I am sorry I have lost it, but he gave expression to views somewhat like these. He said: I do not want to be told what I shall plant or sow, where I shall plant or sow and when I shall sell it; I want to be allowed to manage my own farm. I do not want subsidies or bonuses, but I do want a fair price for my products. Above all—I think this is in the mind of every farmer—I do not want some white-collared young man sitting behind a mahogany desk in Ottawa, a man who never worked on a farm or who perhaps never saw a farm, telling me how I shall reap and sow, how I shall manage my farm and what I shall do with it.

That is the attitude to-day of the farmer of Canada. He resents a little group of white collared men in Ottawa sitting down with blue-prints and statistics and figures before them and telling him what he shall or shall not do. Those people do not know anything about his problems except what they can glean from statistics and charts and blueprints and figures.

Mr. GLADSTONE: The farmer wants markets and wider markets.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree with that; he wants to know where he is going to get them after the war. Shall he be able to find them in an improverished Europe which cannot even feed itself? He certainly wants outlets for his products because he has demonstrated that he can produce. I agree most heartily with that expression of opinion of the farmer in the province of Quebec, notwithstanding the fact that I personally recognize that some controls are necessary. But we should not have the huge system of controls and regimentation which has had such a mushroom growth in Canada during the immediate past years—founded not so much on reason as on expediency or on a hit-or-miss or trial and error system.

I now desire to turn briefly to the long and laborious statement which the minister read into the record on Tuesday last—and which he read very badly, may I say, or so it seemed to me. I cannot characterize that statement as a speech, because it was not a speech. To my mind it was an essay prepared by the group of economists and brain-trusters who surround the minister. I listened to it carefully and thoughtfully, and I later read it in Hansard, but I had a feeling of amazement—of course not at the whole speech.

I have listened to two ministers of finance introduce bills relating to the decennial revision of the Bank Act. I recall the judicial and unprejudiced speech of Mr. Fielding in 1923, and I recall the speech of Mr. Rhodes in 1934, which was characterized by dignity and fairness. As I recall them, both were models for such an occasion, and I recommend a rereading of those speches to the Minister of Finance and the membership of this house. Then hon. members can contrast those two judicial utterances with the platitudes uttered by my hon. friend on Tuesday last. On the one hand you have fair, impartial, judicial and dignified utterances, and on the other you have an almost passionate defence of the banks and the Canadian banking system by our present minister in this year of our Lord, nineteen hundred and forty-four.

My immediate reaction was that the bankers upon reflection will say: Deliver us from our self-constituted defender. My hon. friend is a king's counsel; he is a member of parliament; he is a privy councillor, and I now suggest that he add to his name some more initials, F.D., fidei defensor, defender of the faith. Hon. members will remember that our old friend, Henry VIII, had a medal struck in his honour with those words on it.

For some reason best known to themselves, my hon. friend and his advisers went a long step out of their way to defend the banks and the banking system of Canada before they were under attack. Let me say to him that he wet his powder before the battle was even on. Portions of that speech were almost provocative and in my view were better left unsaid at this stage. They are bound, and it would appear to me that they were calculated, to bring reprisals from the two groups to my left. The minister expressed anxiety to get this bill to the committee with the least possible delay, but I suggest to him that his ill-timed observations will have just the opposite effect and will call for and produce a long debate in this chamber. Contrast that with what took place in 1934. The present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) was financial critic of the opposition in those days and as I recall it he made a speech just fifteen minutes long, in which he did not challenge the principle of the bill, but reserved the right to question many of its proposals.

Personally I have a high opinion of our commercial banking institutions, but I do not imagine anyone will assert that they are immaculate or wholly free from fault and abuse. The bankers themselves, I am sure, will hardly lay claim to all the things that were said about them by my hon. friend. After all, the affairs of our commercial banks are being run by human beings. To err is human, and these gentlemen are neither perfect nor omniscient. They will admit that.

My memory of the political life of this country goes back for nearly fifty years. I recall as a boy in the year 1896 standing on the lawn of the courthouse at St. Andrews, New Brunswick, and listening to a political debate on nomination day and an indictment delivered against the Conservative party of that day by an ancient member of the Liberal party who a long time ago went to his heavenly reward. He was a friend of my family, the Hon. Arthur Hill Gillmor, whose name is still held in respect. The gravamen of his charge was that the Conservative party were the tools and servants of the big interests of Canada. How many times have we heard that from every platform in this country, on the hustings and in the party press of the Liberal party! It is a charge that has been always levelled against the Conservative party.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: And now you are being supplanted.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We have never been supplanted, because we never were the tools of the big interests of this country—I can tell you that. But all down through the years I have heard that charge iterated and reiterated by our political opponents. As I sat and listened to the Minister of Finance on Tuesday last I asked myself this question, and I ask this question of the house and of the country: Who are to-day the self-constituted champions of the big interests in Canada? The Minister of Finance and his followers; and he is just following out the line of his illustrious predecessors. I well remember when the Hon. Charles Dunning came down here from Saskatchewan, the Napoleon from the west, the gentleman who was to take charge of things and become the heir apparent of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). He was a vigorous personality—make no mistake about that—and a very able man; but where is he to-day? He has ingratiated himself into the seats of the mighty. To-day he is the president of the Ogilvie Milling company, a director of the Canadian Pacific Railway company, a director of the bank of Montreal, and God knows what he is not a director of. Where are the principles that he brought with him down from Saskatchewan in the early nineteen-twenties? I look across the floor and I see my good friend the Minister of National Defence. He, too, in the days that are gone by has smelt the fleshpots of Egypt—that is all he did, I think, just smell them. He went to Montreal under the aegis of his friend Mr. Dunning, but it was not very long before we found him in the employ of the federal government. I want to say this to the minister, that from the thousands of dollars that he put into his jeans as a result of his efforts on the wheat report, very little eventuated to the people of Canada. I am going to forgive him all that, because when duty and his leader called him he came back to give national service to the people of Canada. You may not approve everything he has done, but there is no doubt in my mind that he is a much poorer man to-day than he would have been had he stayed in Montreal. I am just wondering if the hon. Minister of Finance has it in his mind, after that gush that he dished out to us the other day, that he too, with the reputation he is seeking to establish, will some day ingratiate himself into the hearts and the pocket books of the so-called big interests.

Mr. ILSLEY: I had not thought of it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then it is a new thought for the minister. I know he has an inflexible mind, but he may be receptive to that idea.

We of the Progressive Conservative party believe in rational and orderly progress. I do not think that the Liberal party, represented by the Minister of Finance, should rush into the arena and passionately defend our financial institutions before they have been actually attacked. I think we should take a judicial attitude towards this question, to do justice, to do that which is in the national interest, rather than rush to the support of people who have not asked us to rush to their support. I cannot believe that the bank executives ever asked for the passionate recital of the virtues of the banking system that was given to us by the minister, or even contemplated such a position.

The banks of this country for seventy years or more have had a position tried by experience which has proven reasonably useful and as good at least as systems in other capitalistic countries, and better than is to be found in some countries. I do not for a minute agree that it is an ideal system. We should seek to attain the ideal.

An hon. MEMBER: Currying favour now.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, I am not currying favour. Who said that, anyway? I suggest to the young gentleman, whoever he is, that he just keep his peace while I am trying to make an argument.

Mr. GARDINER: He is not in the house at the moment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not pretend to be in the confidence of the banks. I believe they are quite capable of defending their own position if given the opportunity to do so, but I do say that it is our duty to see that they get that opportunity at the proper time and place, and that is in the banking and commerce committee. Why deliberately raise an issue over the banks in this house which may conceivably, probably will, in the days to come, become a political issue?

I recall with some degree of satisfaction the position in 1934, when I had the responsibility of presiding over the deliberations of the banking committee, when the act was last revised In those days there were the usual charges of monopoly and abuse and all the other charges that were heaped upon the banks. Some of those charges were made in the house, but chiefly before the committee. The case against the banks at that time, if it could be called a case, was made by the same opponents and the banks had full and free opportunity to make their defence. That is the place they should have allotted to them to make their defence, and they should be given that opportunity. I believe that 1934 was the first time in our history that they had a full and free opportunity to make their defence. They did so, and I think it was the universal opinion that they made a defence that was convincing at all events, and they came through with their colours flying.

That ought to be the position taken to-day. But by reason of the ineptitude of the minister and his advisers, the banks to-day are put on the defensive in this house without having anybody to speak for them, except possibly by proxy. The minister's defence and his championship of the banks was ill-timed and uncalled for, and will undoubtedly have repercussions which he has not foreseen. I could page the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) at this point, but he will speak for himself.

I desire to refer for a moment to one of the questions to which the minister referred, namely, the proposal put forward by our socialist friends to nationalize the banks and other financial institutions.

I desire to express my views as a proponent of the principle of free enterprise. I do not think that the policy of our socialist friends is either sound or wise. I prefer the present system, controlled and guided as experience and the wisdom that comes from experience will dictate. I believe that the proposals of the socialists carry with them the most sinister threat to individual freedom and liberty, and therefore to the privilege of democratic living in a free country. Why do I say that? For the reason that commercial banking in Canada permeates every section of business activity and affects practically every form of economic endeavour. Government control of loans—that is what it would come to, and we may expect that if the socialists gain their way—could be used as a weapon of political patronage by a political party to enforce compliance with its doctrines. Does anybody challenge that position? If my premise is correct, such political control over loans would deny to many the privilege of exercising their franchise from conviction. If a man is threatened with the loss of his loan, dare he vote otherwise than as the lender suggests? In my humble view it would be to all intents and purposes a system of coercion. Let us be frank. We all know political conditions in Canada. We have political patronage even in war time. Does anyone believe that the socialists would not use that weapon if they were once in a position to do so? I do not believe anyone thinks that they would not. Does anyone imagine that if the banks of this country were brought under government ownership they would be administered free of political control, in the best interests of the business community and the nation as a whole? To contend otherwise, Mr. Speaker, is to be intellectually dishonest, especially in the light of present conditions.

I know our friends assume a very lofty, holier-than-thou-attitude. I have seen it on many occasions; it has been exhibited towards myself. But I suggest that they are not free from guile or political strategy. Often their strategy misfires; I admit that on their behalf. But evidences multiply that they are very worldly-wise. They seek to employ and do employ many of the methods used by the rest of us in the old political parties whom they deride and seek to hold up to scorn. But their holier-than-thou attitude deceives no one but themselves. It is as hypocritical as Uriah Heep or any other charlatan of history or fiction that one may summon to memory.

Business often depends upon bank loans for the financing of its operations. It is quite evident, to myself at all events, that the threat of withholding loans at a crucial time could be used to coerce borrowers into falling in line with the views, political or other, of the controllers of the banks. That has been the position in Germany; it has even been true in Russia, where there is only one political party. In these countries, and in this country if the socialists have their way, you will support the dominant political party, or else! Make no mistake about that. Is that democracy? Is that the freedom for which we are fighting and giving our treasure, for which our sons, perhaps, are dying?

I cannot pause to follow this thought further. The battle will probably have to be fought in Canada, but not to-day. Personally I have no fear of the result. There were as of October 1, 1943, 4,462,100 separate saving bank depositors, and $2,000 millions of notice deposits. I do not think that the people of Canada who are represented in that huge accumulation are going to vote for revolution. I have great faith in our people. I do not believe they will do anything to impair their position; they are too much satisfied with the security they have to-day to intrigue with things they know not of.

I do not desire to take very much more time, but I want to deal a little more with the minister's statement. I suggest that the historical part of the narrative he read may be found in any textbook on banking. I have no doubt that the various ghost writers—whoever they were, and I think I could name some of them—made full use of the well-authenticated material dished up to us by the minister on Tuesday last, and which is available to anybody who knows where to look for it. Go to any of the editions of Maclaren on Banks and Banking, and you will find it. The whole symposium had a reminiscent sound, at any rate to my mind, and it is over forty years since I first read that textbook. In any event there was nothing new in what he said about the banking history of Canada. He failed, and markedly, to give any credit for the advances which were made in this respect in this house in 1934.

The statement naturally divided itself into four or five main divisions: (1) the historical review (2) the defence of our present system (3) the attacks on the socialist position and the Social Credit theories (4) an analysis of the proposed changes—which after all are by no means radical or revolutionary and are really not of great or major importance.

The banks have lost nothing in this revision; make no mistake about that. It is fair to characterize all these proposed changes as extensions of present principles and policy. The banks have lost no major powers, save the two points to which I have already alluded, namely, the note issue—which they were going to lose anyway—and the switching of the unclaimed balances.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

The minister's statement must have been disappointing to some of his friends across the way who hold advanced views on this subject. I mentioned a moment ago the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard. I cannot but think that he will be greatly disappointed with the minister's statement. I will not pause here to anticipate his feelings or the language he will use. Rather I await with interest the expression of his views. I think we all do, including the minister.

This bill is a far cry from the views on monetary reform advocated so unctuously by the present Prime Minister in the election campaign of 1935. I have no doubt that hon. members from western Canada remember the views expressed by the Prime Minister at that time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Noble hero!

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How short the memories of some people are! How short the memory of the Prime Minister is! Then we were to have real monetary reform, dressed up to suit the people of western Canada—and if my memory serves me aright, he was aided by the present hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard. Yes; we were to have real monetary reform—whatever that connotes. It did not connote much in the mind of the Prime Minister, for what did we witness. It helped win the election. Once he came back from the west and was comfortably settled in the old quarters in the east block, he conveniently put his fervid promises into cold storage, and there they have remained ever since. There are many other observations I could make in regard to this bill, but I prefer to wait until the bill goes to the committee. I do not propose to offer any amendment at this time, but while we do not now propose an amendment, I do not want this house or the country to take the view that we are giving a blanket endorsation to all the provisions of the bill. Far from it. We think the bill can be improved by constructive suggestions in committee.

I expressed the hope that the minister's mind is not so inflexible that he will refuse to consider constructive proposals from whatever source they may emanate. This bill as presented will leave the fundamentals of our banking laws very much where we left them in 1934. No new or radical principles have been introduced. There has certainly been no revolution. On the contrary, this bill is in the main a reaffirmation of legislation of previous years, particularly that of 1934, refined and extended if you will, and improved as experience, changing conditions of commercial life, and the trend of events indicate as desirable.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I do not propose this afternoon to enter into a controversy with the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson). I think his references to us will be dealt with by some other member of our group. I have not unlimited time, as the hon. member for York-Sunbury has, in replying to the statement made to the house by the minister, but I want to say to the minister at the outset of my remarks that his speech was both provocative and political. To that extent I agree with the hon. member for York-Sunbury. May I remind the minister of a piece of advice that was given a good many years ago by one great jurist to another, Sir Francis Bacon to Sir Edward Coke, when he said, "one should not so much labour what to speak as to find what to leave unspoken." That was a piece of advice the minister might have taken before this debate began, because I believe we were all ready to facilitate the sending of this bill to the banking and commerce committee. We did not anticipate the kind of debate which the minister introduced, but since he has seen fit to introduce a debate of this description into the house, and to open attack, as he did, we shall not let the statements the minister made go unchallenged.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That is what he wants.

Mr. COLDWELL: I presume the statement the minister read in the house, as the hon. member for York-Sunbury said, was made in cooperation with persons whose principal effort seemed to be to defend the present financial system rather than to justify the minor changes proposed in the Bank Act. I shall therefore this afternoon devote my attention to the argument advanced by the minister, and I shall reserve constructive proposals in relation to the Bank Act and to financial policy until the bill is in the committee, where we can consider it and, when necessary, amend it clause by clause.

Even if we agreed that the present banking system is safe, sound, prudently managed, and all that the minister claimed it be in these respects, we would not be content with it. From the viewpoint of broad national interest, the banking system must be judged by its ability to provide a national economy with the financial arrangements needed to maintain the real income, capital equipment, and material welfare of the Canadian people. This it has not done in the past. Its failures are made apparent by the war, which has proved beyond all doubt that what is physically possible ought to be at the same time financially possible.

It is, then, on these fundamental grounds that we criticize our banking system. Our banks have not done the job which they were supposed to do and which provides them with the only justification for seeking renewals of their charters. For fifteen years at least, from 1929 until war-time necessity established full employment and a high national income, we suffered depression, unemployment and excessive loss and wastage of human labour. To some degree the blame for this situation lies with the banks themselves.

As the minister himself pointed out, they decided what credits were to be extended and to whom, and thus had the power to expand or contract the volume of purchasing power, or, in other words, to carry out a policy approved by the Bank of Canada, or, equally important, to nullify that policy.

In the heyday of the twenties they made loans to stockbrokers whose securities were sometimes so questionable that, when the crash came, government action was taken to prevent the undermining of public confidence in at least one of our great chartered banks. On March 21, 1933, the present Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) questioned an order in council, No. 2693, passed on October 27, 1931. This order in council enabled the chartered banks to publish incorrect statements as to the value of their securities, and in reply to that question Mr. Bennett said this:

> There was a run on one of the chartered banks in Canada. It was a run predicated entirely upon the failure of one of the great brokerage firms of this country. It was thought by many people that the bank might be a failure; ten million dollars in deposits were withdrawn. No assistance was given by other banks, and there was no question of the government being asked for assistance.

The bank to which this reference was made was of course the Royal Bank of Canada. It is also true that a similar order in council, No. 3871, was passed on December 31, 1931, to prevent the public from knowing the great loss in value of stocks in which a great insurance company had placed its policyholders' savings. Of this order in council the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) said, on March 8, 1932, as reported at page 939 of Hansard—and I quote it from the record—that it:

> . . . enabled the life insurance companies of Canada to place a false valuation upon their investments, so that there would be no danger of two or three of our insurance companies being declared insolvent.

But apparently the minister himself had forgotten something. There was an interchange between us—and incidentally, my memory was not altogether correct either—and the minister, on January 31 of this year, overlooked this order in council enabling the banks to do what he had said the insurance companies were permitted to do. Hence we contend that a banking and financial system owned and controlled by the nation and supported by all the resources of Canada would give greater safety to the savings of the Canadian people than institutions whose self-perpetuating directors are responsible to none but their own shareholders, whose associations have sometimes in the past jeopardized the savings of the people, and whose policies on occasion have brought to the verge of ruin thousands of farmers, workers and business men. No man can foresee the future, but the causes which brought about the crash in 1929 are inherent in the present system, which, as long as it continues, may be subject to the same kind of disastrous fluctuations. Such a system cannot, in my opinion, be accurately described as completely safe, completely sound or completely prudent.

But criticism of our banking system rests also on other and perhaps broader grounds. We criticize it because its deficiencies are so closely associated with the failures of the system miscalled free enterprise; and we link with that, criticism of the present Liberal and past Conservative administrations for their failure to take steps from time to time to provide for economic expansion and employment until, as was admitted this afternoon at least by inference by the hon. member for York-Sunbury, they were forced to do so by the necessities of war. Neither in this bill for the renewal of the charters, with its minor amendments—which incidentally, we welcome—nor in other legislation proposed by the government or urged by the official opposition do we see anything sufficiently comprehensive to indicate that the conditions we knew in the thirties will not bedevil our people again sometime during the post-war years. Adequate expansion, nation-wide employment, require a planned use of our resources, our human power, our capital equipment and our financial instruments. In such a setting the nation's banks should accurately reflect the nation's demand for credits and for funds. Where private enterprise and governments both fail to use the financial resources available, the economic structure verges almost permanently on a state of entire collapse. A publicly owned central bank alone cannot prevent this, for the actual granting of credits—again as the hon. member for York-Sunbury indicated—rests with privately owned, profit-motivated institutions.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

It is on these grounds, then, that we call for the national ownership and control of the financial system, and particularly the banks; not, as the minister suggested, on some doctrinaire theory that their socialization will destroy the present system. We urge the nationalization of the chartered banks on exactly the same grounds as those advanced by the minister himself as the justification for the establishment of the central Bank of Canada. On May 2 of this year, at page 2542 of Hansard, the minister spoke of:

> . . . the failure of public policy to provide an institution charged with responsibility for regulating the volume of money and credit solely in the public interest. Such a function—

That is what I want to bring to your attention:

> —could only be performed by a public body interested not in the making of profits but solely in the performance of a public duty.

We say it is equally true that the day-to-day provision of credits for desirable public policies, such as the maintenance of full employment and of purchasing power, can be performed only by public institutions interested not in the making of profits but solely in the performance of a public duty. The case for socialization could rest there, for it could not be put much better than in the minister's own phraseology. Because of this I wish to move the following amendment:

> That all the words after the word "that" in the said motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> "this bill be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that consideration be given to the national ownership and complete public control of the chartered banks with a view to the promotion of the peace, order and good government of the people of Canada."

That amendment expresses a desire and a policy in sharp contrast with the bill and the principle of the bill. It deals with no details of the bill, but suggests an alternative principle upon which our banking system should be organized.

The minister criticized the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation on other grounds. He denied that the banks exercised a monopoly because, he said, they competed for loans. But who will deny that the present Bank Act gives power to a comparatively small group of bank directors to control institutions which this very act safeguards against competition from private initiative, except under conditions so difficult to fulfil that no new bank has been given a charter for very many years? It is true that they may compete in the lending of money, but they pay the same rate of interest on deposits; they charge the same rates of interest to the same classes of borrowers, and the same bankers' association lays down the general rules to which they all adhere. They even agree to prevent competition by closing competing branches in many parts of the country, and thus in many respects conduct themselves as though they were indeed one instead of ten. We do not argue, as the minister charged us with having argued, that because banks have directorates which are interlocked with certain business firms, they deliberately favour such firms or prevent possible competitors from getting funds. We do not say that; but, as a part of the system, they have driven some pretty hard bargains to get rid of publicly owned institutions which they dislike or fear. With the compliance of a federal Conservative government, of which the hon. member for York-Sunbury was a member at the time; with the weak acquiescence of a former provincial premier, Mr. Bracken, who now leads the Progressive Conservative party, and with the help of a carefully planned scare campaign, the Manitoba savings offices were closed in 1932. Nor do we, particularly those those of us from the western prairies, forget this: that, having given the western wheat pools certain advice in 1930, they drove such a bargain subsequently, that but for the guarantees given by the prairie governments this great co-operative venture might have been brought to ruin.

The attitude of the minister is surely inconsistent with respect to the social ownership of the banking system. He deplores the lack of representation on the boards of directors of the banks of the small business man, the farmer and the industrial worker. We deplore that, too; but instead of indulging in pious wishes, as the minister did and does, we propose something. We propose social ownership of these institutions, in order that just such people as the minister named, through their own chosen representatives, shall have some say in the vital financial and economic policies of this nation. That is what we mean by socialization—that those in control of financial policy shall not be merely the representatives of big business or the directors of powerful, privately owned, monopolistic institutions, some of which are parts of great international cartels.

The minister recognized the existence—he did not recognize the evil—of interlocking directorates among banks and other institutions when he said that no doubt they would be criticized on that account in this debate. When most of the savings of the people of Canada are channelled into the hands of the chartered banks and insurance companies, we certainly have an obligation here to appraise their influence upon our entire economy. Four banks—the Royal Bank of Canada, the Canadian Bank of Commerce, the Bank of Montreal and the Bank of Nova Scotia—control more than seventy per cent of all the bank assets in this country. Indeed four banks and six insurance companies—Canada Life, Sun Life, Great West Life, London Life, Manufacturers' Life and Mutual Life—control over seventy per cent of all the banking and insurance assets in Canada.

And who controls these banks and insurance companies, whose assets play such a vital role in the life of this country? The seventy-two directors of the six insurance companies hold a total of 356 directorates in dozens of corporations in all the principal fields of industry and commerce in Canada. Similarly, ninety-four officers of the three leading banks, namely the Royal Bank, the Bank of Montreal and the Bank of Commerce, hold a total of 799 directorates in 484 corporations in dozens of our major industries, including such giants as nickel, aluminum, cement, chemicals, steel, oil, railways, electrical concerns, packing plants, processing plants and a host of others. Consciously or unconsciously the policies of industry and of the chartered banks were governed by the same anti-social considerations in the highly speculative period of the late twenties and the depressed period of the thirties. Their policies, let me remind the minister, were not those of institutions actuated solely in the performance of a public duty but, as our own price spreads report stated, they tended to follow the same path of economic restriction.

And may I suggest to hon. members that from time to time we should look into the price spreads report, which was tabled in the house, because it gives one a clearer view of the economy of the country as it was and, indeed, warns one that we are reaching still greater depths of control, and by comparatively few organizations, than obtained even when that report was prepared.

The report stated that their policies tended to follow the same path of restriction of output in order to maintain their prices and to maximize their profits. Thus, during the depression we had virtual starvation in this country in the midst of potential and, indeed, often actual plenty. But the minister pictured the nationalization of the banking system as involving, to use his own words—echoed this afternoon by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson):

> . . . the undesirability of having the credit of each of us and of every business throughout the country assessed by civil servants working under political control for a government banking monopoly, rather than by bank managers interested not in the political or other views of the borrower but solely in his ability and trustworthiness as a debtor.

Those are the minister's words. Are we to understand from them that the nationally owned Bank of Canada is now run by persons working under political control? Does it guide its activities by the political or other views of the borrowers—in these cases the banks, which, as we have known from their statements published in the newspapers, have political views?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): And from their broadcasts.

Mr. COLDWELL: And from their broadcasts, delivered almost daily, which, incidentally, are so ludicrous, because of the past record of the banks, that they bring a smile to the faces of people who listen to them.

Are we to understand from the minister that the proposed Industrial Development bank, the agricultural bank—if it is set up—the farm loan improvement bank, and the mortgage bank are to be run by the present government on some such discriminatory principles? And, incidentally, all these proposals in connection with the setting up of these various financial institutions and banks, publicly owned, are testimony of the failure of the private institutions to meet our current and expected needs.

In fairness to the minister I think he would be the first to deny that there is any political control in the Bank of Canada. He will be the first to deny that any political control is contemplated in the other organizations I have named. But his opinion regarding the desirability of wider public representation on directorates of the banks indicates that, despite what he has said, he feels that wider public control is possible, without discriminatory political control. And may I just say to him and to the house, that if I, too, did not believe that I would not be making this speech this afternoon.

Socialization of the banking system involves two main steps: First, control over the direction of credits and the investment of bank funds—and this is already occurring, in actual fact, as I shall show in a minute; for private enterprise has failed to provide outlets for the investment of bank funds. Consequently banks invest more and more in government loans and government securities.

Second, the directorates should be based on the principle of public representation, and not upon stock ownership. The minister has approved this principle. And when he approves it why does he consume the major portion of his address in attacking the C.C.F., because we propose the principle which he accepts? I can only conclude that as a member of a capitalist government his obligation is to defend the capitalists when they are under attack. But the minister says that he opposes any suggestion of socializing the banking system because, to use his own words:

We do not want a socialized banking system to deaden the initiative of our system of free enterprise.

First, I should like to quarrel with the statement that we have a system of free enterprise. How free is the ordinary man to enter the banking business and own a bank? How free is the ordinary man to turn out the things which are monopolised by a few large business corporations of this country? As for a centralized banking system deadening initiative and our system of free enterprise, what the minister fails to see is that our system of free enterprise is deadened by its own policy. Indeed to-day our chartered banks depend upon socialized business, national business. It is not private enterprise but public borrowing and investment which has kept them going ever since 1929. I can place figures before the house to show—I have the figures and will be glad to use them in the banking and commerce committee—that in 1930 the percentage of loans to the general public was 64 per cent of the total assets of Canadian banks. By 1939, before the war, they were only 34 per cent, having dropped to almost one-half. In 1943 they were slightly less than 25 per cent. I should like to have my figures checked. I have taken them from the Bank of Canada statement for 1943, and from the Bank of Canada statements for each year since 1936. Other figures will be found in the "Canada Year Book" of 1941 at page 816.

The decline of bank loans to the general public in those days resulted from the breakdown of private enterprise. On the other hand, the banks' investment in long term government securities increased from 15 per cent in 1930 to 50 per cent in 1940. It is ironic that the chartered banks have become dependent upon long term investment in government securities for the major part of their income to keep them going and to pay their profits to their shareholders. May I say to the minister that when he places the profits of the banks before the house he should give those profits on the basis of the paid-up capital of those banks, the investments that have been made by the owners in the banks, and not on the pyramiding of profits that they have taken from the people. According to the minister's way of estimating, their profits will have been figured at least twice in the computation if we count those additional profits as capital and then estimate their profits on that capital which they have extracted from the public. To my mind the only proper way under the present system for a business institution to expand is to go to the public and get the money for that expansion. Otherwise, what you do is to concentrate the power of the growing institution in a few hands and never distribute the ownership of that institution across the country itself.

Even in their dealings with private enterprise the banks have demanded and received public support. Talk about private enterprise; talk about the risks they run; in 1932, for example, the government guaranteed loans of $60,000,000 to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and later on the government itself made interest-free and low interest loans to the same company. This was done either because the banks could not or would not undertake to do so or because the government of the day was more friendly to the Canadian Pacific Railway company than to some other business interests.

In any event, free enterprise was unable to cope with conditions of its own making, as it has been unable to cope with war necessities or, as we believe, with post-war reconstruction. Our main case, therefore, against a renewal of the charters of the private banks—and that is the principle of this bill, with a few minor amendments—rests primarily upon our belief that only a socialized financial system can make possible effective control of currency and credit in terms of public need. Only such control can secure a proper balance and a proper relationship between the prices paid by our citizens for the things they use or the labour they render and the commodities they purchase. In other words, it is the only way, in our opinion, to secure proper parity and balance in our economy.

Second, we urge our policy on the ground of greater efficiency and public economy. The history of this country, indeed of all the capitalist world since 1929, indicates that governments, not private enterprise, both in peace and in war, have had to carry the ball in relation to financing such relief and economic expansion as has taken place. Banks and private business in general have had to be subsidized in many ways in order to survive. During this war we have seen the government setting up new institutions and spending hundreds of millions of dollars to do a job for the nation which private enterprise would not undertake, in fact I will say could not undertake. We have seen other hundreds of millions of dollars written off in special and accelerated depreciations because private enterprise could not carry the load.

For the minister to say, as he did, that the C.C.F. alone among the democratic socialist parties in the world is urging socialization of banks and other financial institutions is quite incorrect. The British Labour party includes such a policy in its platform. True, the New Zealand government, the only Labour government except the more recently established one in Australia that has ever held power within the British commonwealth, has not socialized the so-called private banks in that country. But if you read their literature and talk to their people you will find that they have made up their minds to do so, at least when the war ends. But they are not finding the necessity that we find. Why? They have a much more complete control over their banking system than we have or than we contemplate by the Bank Act or by this amending bill. They have an efficient central bank, but in addition the government of New Zealand has majority representation on the board of directors of the largest of their so-called private banks, the Bank of New Zealand. The government of New Zealand appoints three of the five directors of that bank. They have done this for a good many years. They got the power to do this when the Bank of New Zealand came to the government because it was in such a bad state long before the Labour government took office. As I say, to-day the New Zealand government has a greater control over the financial system owing to its having not only an efficient central bank but also majority control of the greatest bank of that country, the Bank of New Zealand. So that the comparison made by the minister between our proposals and those of New Zealand obviously falls to the ground at that point.

There are many other phases of this question with which my colleagues will deal. As I said to the minister at the outset, our original intention, which I expressed to the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Ralston) when this bill was about to be introduced, was to make one or two short speeches and to facilitate the sending of the bill to the committee in order that it might be dealt with there as quickly as possible. But, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for York-Sunbury, an attack on our whole position has been made in this house and, as I once said, we never consider ourselves to be on the defensive; we are on the offensive, and when an attack of that sort is made we shall act upon the offensive so far as our opponents are concerned. Consequently, any understanding that we had with the Acting Prime Minister that we would confine our remarks to one or two speeches is definitely off and we intend to give as good at least as we expect to receive.

Mr. GRAYDON: Do you expect to be any better off by that?

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, I do.

May I say in conclusion that we urge this policy because it is the right one. We urge it because we believe, in the memorable words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), spoken, as the hon. member for York-Sunbury said this afternoon, in western Canada, in Edmonton, Alberta, of course immediately before an election:

> Once a nation parts with the control of its currency and credit, it matters not who makes the nation's laws. Usury once in control will wreck any nation. Until the control of the issue of currency and credit is restored to the government, and recognized as its most conspicuous and sacred responsibility, all talk of the sovereignty of parliament is idle and futile.

It is because we believe in the sovereignty of the people, that we urge the restoration to parliament of the control of the nation's currency and credit. We urge the government to do what the Prime Minister promised to do in 1935. Since we believe with the lawyers of the house that possession is nine points of the law—

An hon. MEMBER: You are in bad company with the lawyers.

Mr. COLDWELL: Well, we may be in bad company, but I say that we believe with them—not that we are with them. So that we contend that the only effective method of control is that of the public ownership of this nation's banking and financial system. Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, we have moved the amendment in the words which you have before you.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, there is another way than by the nationalization of the banks whereby effective control over currency and credit can be established. I propose to deal with that other way with some measure of care.

Before I proceed farther may I refer to the minister's provocative remarks—I will not call them attacks—on social credit. Probably he put his finger on the two essentials of the contentions that social crediters would make at the present time when he said that in the first place we would advocate debt-free money. From the time that this group came into the house right up to the present moment it has never ceased to urge that it is possible for a government to create money debt free, and to use that money in building up conditions which are conducive to the economic well-being of the land. This group has consistently urged, further, that the amount of such money which can be safely created depends directly upon the productive and consumptive capacity of the country which the government is governing at the time, and because it so depends on the productive and consumptive capacity, then the amount of money which is available to a government at any time depends upon something which may be governed, not by a dead thing like gold, not by an elusive thing like the amount of money which bankers are prepared to lend or individual men are prepared to borrow, but by a tangible thing which can be controlled and governed, namely, the production of the country, and the consumption of that production.

The minister, I think, meant to imply at one stage of his remarks that social crediters had in a way modified their stand since coming here. If in any degree it may appear that social crediters are not expounding the same doctrine which they did when they first came here it is because we ceased to stress the importance of debt-free money and the dangers of debt when the government and some of its menials all over the country began to whine and whimper that our contentions were impairing the effectiveness of the victory loans. That is the only reason.

Let us turn to the question of debt-free money. The all-important question that we need to ask ourselves is this: Is there a possibility of debt-free money? The minister spoke as though the only source of money in Canada to-day would be the Bank of Canada. What was the source of government money in 1933 and 1934 before the Bank of Canada was formed? We had in those days Dominion of Canada one dollar bills. That money was printed by a government agency, and to that agency it was unquestionably debt free. Granted, there was supposed to be gold behind it to guarantee its value. But in 1933, on April 10, by order in council, the gold redemption clause was rescinded or suspended. What then gave value to Dominion of Canada money after that date? The Dominion of Canada money did not lose its value. That money was debt free and was created and issued by the treasury board, or an agency for the treasury board, with the Dominion of Canada exercising its supreme and unchallengeable right to coin money and to determine the value thereof.

May I use two or three illustrations? For centuries the king minted the money; it was the king's money. Will anyone say that the king owed anybody for the money after he minted himself? Could the king in England, or let us say in this dominion, ever have owed anybody for the money which was created in his name by his government? Never! The major error that was made in the financial history of this nation and of the British people was that of allowing somebody else to print the king's money and causing the king to borrow his own money.

Take as an illustration to-day the fifty-cent piece in Canada. That is debt-free money. It costs something for the silver, something for the workmanship, but when that money is stamped by the Royal Canadian Mint, does it not belong to the Royal Canadian Mint, to the government of Canada? Who will contend for a moment that it does not. Suppose the money were gold coin; would that not be debt-free money? If coins are debt-free money, are not bills debt-free money just as well? Actually this nation printed $26 millions of bills during the last war and spent them for government purposes and they were unquestionably debt-free. They were supposed to be backed by gold, it is true, but all demand for the gold backing was rendered abortive by the suspension of the gold redemption clause. I wonder if the minister can find an answer to that?

Now, suppose a credit and currency commission were established in Canada to act much as the treasury board did before the Bank of Canada was formed, and that commission created the new money in Canada just as the Bank of Canada now does; it would own that money. Then, if it saw fit to put the money into the Bank of Canada to be recorded there, so that an account could be made and rendered to parliament, and a check established so that the people would know whether or not the government were exercising this power with probity and integrity; if, I say, the money were put into the Bank of Canada, recorded there, and taken out, the process would be debt-free both ways.

Let not the minister try to deceive the people of Canada into thinking we cannot have debt-free money.

The argument will be used, as I frequently find it used, that any money is a debt by the issuing body to the person who owns the money. If I, for example, have a one dollar bill which was issued by the minister, the minister owes me one dollar because I hold a bill which was issued by him, just as, if he were the Bank of Canada, and I had the one dollar bill, the Bank of Canada would owe me the one dollar, and in that sense the money would be debt money; and when I came to ask that that money be redeemed, the Bank of Canada or the minister—whichever case we are using—would have to redeem the one dollar bill.

Let us consider this matter of redemption. Let us assume that the minister acting in his capacity as finance minister in Canada issues a one dollar bill. I get the one dollar bill, and I come to him asking him to redeem the one dollar bill for me; what will he say? "What do you want?" "Well," I say, "I want a dollar." "Well, you have one. What more do you want?" "All right," I say, "I want a one dollar bill." The minister says, "Very well"; he opens a drawer and brings out another bill. "Give me the one you have and I will give you this one. This is a nice clean one. If you want a dollar bill, there it is." Now the minister has redeemed the dollar financially, has he not? And every dollar bill issued by the Dominion of Canada agency can be so redeemed as the law now stands. It is impossible for anyone to obtain gold to-day in exchange for a dollar bill; consequently the only possible redemption of a dollar bill is another dollar bill.

Now suppose I say, "I am not satisfied with a dollar bill; I want a dollar of something else." The minister says, "What do you want? Coal? Or do you want sugar, or do you want oranges, or do you want a haircut, or a ride on a street-car?" If I say, "yes" to any one of these he says, "Hand me your dollar bill." He immediately turns the dollar bill over in payment for the particular commodity I want. I have the commodity; he has the dollar bill. The dollar bill is then redeemed in goods and services.

That simple process is an illustration of what can be done with debt-free money in a national way. Let this country learn that fact, and let the nations of this world learn that fact, for the whole success of the post-war world, the establishment of peace and amity among nations and freedom from want and fear, depend upon the simple fact of the use of debt-free money. If that fact is not understood we might as well prepare ourselves for another war, and start right now. That is a warning, and I want it sufficiently solemn.

The only thing which needs to deter the minister, acting for the Dominion of Canada, in redeeming the money which is issued, is this: are there enough goods in Canada; is there enough coal, or street-car rides, or theatre tickets, or whatever else people want, to redeem the dollar bill; that is, to buy with the dollar bill? I am using simple little childish illustrations. Some people need childish illustrations to get things into their heads. It is time these things were being learned now by the members of the government. They have been taught long enough in this country, and we are suffering a terrible war because they were not learned by this government and several other governments similar to this one.

The important thing to remember is that the simple fact that the dominion has the power of legal tender, and the simple fact that there are plenty of goods being produced in Canada to supply a redemption for all the money which might be used, within reason, constitute the guarantee that the debt free money created can be redeemed.

Mr. GARDINER: What caused the wars before there was any money?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Well, we would have to know what war it was. Of course, if you are talking about the war in which Gustavus Adolphus was engaged you would say "religion?"

Mr. GARDINER: Wars came first.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am not sure that they did. What men fought for in the days before there was money was goods, and fundamentally to-day what they are fighting for is goods and the means of producing goods. On another occasion when the time is opportune and I have plenty of time to answer the minister back and forth on the floor of the house he can ask all the questions he likes to ask about causes of war, and I think he will have to grant that he is answered, because I have given the matter a little thought, as the minister has.

I think we can safely leave the question of debt-free money. It is a possibility and a feasibility.

Now let us turn to the question of 100 per cent reserves. The reason why social crediters have come to advocate the 100 per cent reserve system is this, that every time they have advocated debt-free money the government has hidden behind the bogey of inflation. From the redoubtable Dunning down to the present minister they have all said, "If you have debt-free money you will have inflation; the banks will expand money." The only way to prevent the banks from expanding money, so long as you have the mentality prevailing in the dominion government to-day, is to bring in the 100 per cent reserve system. If the banks expand the money and cause inflation they must be checked by the introduction of the 100 per cent reserve, and if they do not like it they have the comfort of knowing that they brought it on themselves. Personally I believe there are other means of dealing with the situation than the 100 per cent reserve, but since the matter has been introduced let me discuss it.

The minister argued that if the dominion required the banks to carry 100 per cent reserve there would be a great deal of money in the hands of the banks which the banks would have to pay good money to take care of, to service and so forth, and they would not get any returns from it, with the result that there would be a levy, a great deal of cost to the banks, bank managers, bank clerks, and the people who deal with the banks, because prices would have to be greater, and all the rest of the sob story.

If that is granted, and suppose we do grant it for the sake of the argument, let me point out that if the banks are occasioned a loss by reason of the 100 per cent money arrangement it is perfectly possible for the Dominion of Canada to reimburse them their loss with debt-free money, and the only limit to the amount of the debt-free money the government can have is the goods and services producing and consuming power of Canada. That is all. The minister may not understand that. If he does not, it is time he did, because he is Minister of Finance in an extremely important time in the world's history and he ought to know these things.

It was hinted that social crediters may have changed their position. May I restate the social credit position. Always it has been this. There are three fundamentals of social credit. The first is the creation and issue of money to represent unconsumed surplus goods. That is not inflation, and that is a thing the minister needs to learn. His deputy and other men behind him in his department need to learn it.

The second principle of social credit is the use of that money first of all to bring about fair prices by compensation or subsidy or both, so that the economy of the country can be balanced, so that there can be what people have in mind in a vague sort of way when they speak of price parity. It is impossible at the present time, I fancy, to have real price parity in Canada without the use of the social credit technique of obtaining fair prices by compensated discounts and subsidies.

The third principle of social credit is the distribution of consumer purchasing power in whatever forms may be found best for the people as a whole.

We have advocated the dividend. We have not receded from the principle of the dividend—not by one syllable or a dot of an i. But it may be found that under certain circumstances it is better to distribute the dividend in other forms. The principle of distributing consumer purchasing power holds, distributing that money in whatever amount may be found sufficient to balance consumption with production.

The fundamental idea of social credit is that when there is production in the country that production should be consumed. Production is brought about for consumption, and if consumption is not going forward at the rate that production is bringing goods into being, then the whole economy tends to fall out of alignment, tends to become bogged down, so to speak, and the situation must be remedied by injecting into the economy additional consumer purchasing power which will enable the people to consume the goods that are being produced, in order to balance production with consumption.

There has been some discussion regarding the exact technique that social credit would use. There are several different ways of doing most things in the world. There are a good many more ways than one of making an aeroplane; there are a good many more ways than one of doing almost anything; so that there is more than one technique of introducing social credit. Some people have advocated the use of the central bank, the Bank of Canada, and the creation of money by the Bank of Canada and the bringing it out as interest-free loans which need not be repaid. Others have favoured the idea of a credit or currency commission creating money and putting it into the Bank of Canada, having it registered there and recorded and taken account of, and bringing it out free of debt and spending it wherever it is necessary to spend it.

That is why there seems to be a slight difference in wording in the stand that certain social crediters take. I think probably I have dealt with that aspect of the question. May I now turn to the question of inflation.

On page 2543 of Hansard the minister seemed to imply that social crediters belong to the inflationary school. Let me assure him once and for all that social crediters know what inflation is just as well as he does and a little better maybe, and I tell him now on my responsibility that social crediters are not inflationists in any sense of the term. They simply maintain that when there are more goods in the country than the money in circulation is buying, then the government must increase the purchasing power in the country to equate production. That is not inflation. That does not cause a rise in prices; it simply equates consumption with production.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Before the house took recess, Mr. Speaker, I had been discussing the remarks of the minister in regard to social credit. He stated that social crediters believed in debt-free money, and I endeavoured to show that debt-free money was entirely sound and feasible. He suggested that social crediters believed in the 100 per cent system of reserves and would advocate such, and I pointed out that probably they would do so because every time social crediters advocated debt-free money the government insisted that this would cause inflation, and that the 100 per cent system was simply a means of avoiding inflation. I had turned to the question of whether or not social crediters are inflationists, and had said that they were not. As my reason for saying that I had given this simple fact, that social crediters believe that where there exists a surplus of goods not being consumed the state is at liberty to create debt-free money to the extent necessary to consume that surplus, and that such creation will not cause inflation because it will not cause a rise in prices.

May I say again that social crediters are neither inflationists nor deflationists. One thing that is most surprising to any one informed on the matter is that the orthodox government spokesmen never talk about deflationists. Hon. gentlemen who sit on the government benches to-day are deflationists, every single one of them; and deflation is a more disastrous thing than inflation. During the depression in the United States deflation, I have read, destroyed two hundred billion dollars worth of wealth; that is what deflation does. Social crediters are neither inflationists nor deflationists; they believe that an economy can be so managed that booms and depressions can be avoided, and they propose so to manage it as to accomplish that end. Social crediters believe that the record of orthodox finance in the matter of prosperity and depressions is simply reprehensible and wholly inexcusable. In the course of his speech, at page 2541 of Hansard, the minister quoted from an analysis prepared by the National Bureau of Economic Research of New York, to the effect that from 1888 to 1924 Canada had 1·86 years of prosperity for each year of depression, and he seemed to think that was a very good record. That is an absolute abomination to think of in a country like this—only 1·86 years of prosperity to one year of depression! It is one of the most preposterous things the mind of man could conceive. Any system that cannot manage an economy like Canada's any better than that certainly has discredited itself beyond any possibility of regaining the confidence of the people. The minister goes on to point out that in the United States during the same period only 1·79 years of prosperity had been enjoyed for each year of depression. By those figures the system in vogue in the United States and Canada must stand condemned in the mind of every reasonable man. Social credit maintains that it is not necessary to have a condition like this, that both booms and depressions can be avoided, and it proposes a method whereby that end may be achieved.

Then the minister went on to say, at page 2546 of Hansard, that the house would agree that when the changes proposed by the minister were introduced Canada would have a fairly well rounded, effective and satisfactory financial system. I am unable to turn to the exact words, but if my summary did not convey the minister's meaning he will correct me. I am going to ask two questions in this connection. What is the purpose of a financial system? Why do we have a financial and economic system in a country? There is only one answer. We have a financial system in Canada, or in any other country, first of all to bring about enough production, and second to have that production consumed. Any financial system which provides only for production and does not provide adequately for consumption is faulty and ineffective. The financial system of Canada is to be condemned right on this point. We have a banking system which provides for production, and the minister is devising other financial methods of bringing about more production. His industrial development bank bill and various other measures are all designed to increase production; but in all the measures proposed by the government this year one seeks in vain for a single measure designed to increase consumption, to increase markets within the country or to increase distribution. The fundamental flaw in the economic system all over the world is that it has not learned how to distribute the goods. Obviously, then, the government is simply going about the problem wrong end first.

Production requires that people be able to get the money with which to produce. Men have always borrowed in order to produce. We expect them to use the banking system in order to produce. They require security of the right kind to enable them to borrow money; they require interest rates such that they may manage them, and they require long term loans in order that they may carry on. All this is perhaps fairly well provided in the bank measures. Consumption requires that people be able to get the money with which to buy. For consumption it is all important that prices be right, that wages or fees be right, and that there be an adequate effective demand or market for goods. These are vital matters. The financial system must enable people to get money with which both to produce and to consume.

Where does the minister propose to get the money to put into the hands of the people to enable them to consume? That is the vital question for the minister to answer. That is the question the Dominion of Canada has a right to expect him to answer at this session of parliament. There is no hint of an answer. Where is the minister to get the money with which to provide fair prices for agricultural products and for manufactured products? If farmers cannot be assured in the post-war period of fair prices both for the things they sell and the things they buy they cannot carry on; and if farmers cannot carry on, the rest of Canada cannot carry on.

The minister has not shown us where the money is coming from to provide such prices. Where is he to get the money to give Canadians a fair return for the goods they produce? Where is he to get the money to put in the people's hands to enable them to consume? Where is he to get the money to enable them to buy the great output of Canadian post-war industry? He will reply that he will not need money for such purposes. Does he not realize that depressions are the result of a shortage of purchasing power, of underconsumption? In other words, the Dominion of Canada could have only 1·8 years of prosperity for every year of depression because it was not able, through its financial system, to get enough money into the hands of the people to enable them to buy the goods which industry was prepared to produce. That shortage of purchasing power is the fundamental evil; yet all the proposals of the minister are designed to increase production. Not a word is said about increasing consumption.

I maintain, Mr. Speaker, it is utterly impossible for the minister to carry on and do the things which he dreams of doing, to make this country have a stable and prosperous time after the war unless there is a fundamental change in the financial system.

I therefore beg to move a subamendment as follows:

That all the words after the word therefore be struck out and the following be substituted therefor: That the bill be not now read a second time, but, that this house is of the opinion that the government should bring down such measures as will take from the chartered banks their power of creation of currency and credit, and restore those powers solely to parliament.

Mr. Speaker, the minister will urge that the banking system is not responsible for the depression. He said that on page 2541 of Hansard, in passages which I shall not take the trouble to read. I contend that the banking systems are solely responsible for depressions. I will not say the Canadian banking system alone is, but the Canadian system as one of the banking systems of the world undoubtedly was jointly responsible for the depression; because the depression was the result of a shortage of purchasing power, and purchasing power under the present system comes only out of banks. If there is a shortage of purchasing power the banks are unquestionably to blame.

All orthodox banks of the world have virtually the same ideas as Canadian banks have, and all of them are just as faulty as Canada's are. The minister lists the causes of depression, and among them he mentions two rather vague causes. One of those is unbalanced economy. I do not know what the minister means by "unbalanced economy." He speaks about resurgence of economic nationalism. I am going to point out to the minister that he has entirely omitted the main cause of this last depression, which was machines. They introduced plenty with a shortage of labour for men and greatly decreased amounts of wages going out into the hands of the people. As a result of the introduction of machines the shortage of purchasing power which has been existent in our system for perhaps fifty years or more, was greatly aggravated in our time and thus brought on the disastrous depression of the thirties.

If the minister will only learn and ponder the fact that the depression did not commence to lift until 1933, just exactly when the world began to rearm, he will begin to realize that there was a fundamental fallacy somewhere, a fundamental weakness in our economic system, which only war could set right. After the nations began to rearm, money was put into circulation; ready markets were found for many of the goods which were produced. Let him bear in mind that we were still virtually in a depression in Canada when the war broke out in 1939. Around 500,000 men were unemployed; wages were low; prices of primary products were low. Only war restored prosperity. Why did war restore prosperity? First of all, because war put money into circulation, because it provided plenty of markets at remunerative prices for manufactured goods, and reasonably good prices for primary products. Wages became fairly good.

These are the four elements that are necessary to restore prosperity, but there was an appalling debt being created as well. We must learn how to bring about the four conditions of prosperity without the debt and the war. We must have money in circulation; we must have markets; we must have reasonable prices; we must have good wages for all. These must be accomplished without debt. I maintain that it is absolutely impossible to bring about these conditions which I have indicated, these four essentials to prosperity, without the use of debt-free money.

Let everyone remember that the choice now before the Canadian people is not the choice of the old laissez-faire way of doing things before the war; it is not a choice between that method of doing things and socialism. The Liberals are going rapidly to socialism. They will not need to talk of a socialist government if they continue in office for two more terms. Every move they are making is socialistic, which indicates clearly that the country is being driven to socialism. There is only one alternative. There is only one way of guaranteeing security with freedom, and that is through the use of debt-free money as advocated by social crediters.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, the remarks I wish to make on this measure will be purely extemporaneous. I have not the advantage of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) who read a carefully worded essay on to the record the other day. I do not know by whom it was prepared.

As was said this afternoon by the leader of this group we had intended to have merely one statement from this group in order to facilitate the passage of this measure to the banking and commerce committee as quickly as possible. But the minister took a strange attitude in introducing this important piece of legislation. He reminded me of nothing so much as of a man out on the butts doing bayonet practice on straw men. After having a little bayonet practice, the minister felt that he had succeeded in knocking down on the ground the three or four straw men that he set up.

He set up four basic arguments for the socialization of the banking system, and then proceeded to demolish them to his own satisfaction. I would ask the house to look at those four arguments.

First of all he said that those who urged the nationalization of the banking system did so on the ground that it would give more effective control of currency, credit and prices. The minister argued that since the country now owned the Bank of Canada we now had effective control of currency and credit, on the theory, as stated at page 2543 of Hansard, that since the banks must base their loans on their cash reserves, and since these cash reserves are controlled by the central bank, the government has power, by either expanding or contracting those cash reserves, to control the amount of credit which is in existence at any given time.

What I would point out to the minister is that, while it is true that under the Bank Act the federal government has power to prevent undue expansion of credit, it has no power to prevent undue contraction of credit. That is, it has power to create extra cash reserves but it has no power nor the machinery to see to it that the extra credit is placed in the hands of the consuming public. So that while it is true that the Bank of Canada serves a useful function in being able to prevent undue expansion of credit, it has no power to prevent a rapid contraction of credit such as we had during the early thirties.

The minister argues on page 2543 of Hansard that what he calls "the spur of cost and self-interest" will force the banks to lend to the full capacity of their cash reserves. May I point out that the spur of cost and self-interest was present from 1929 to 1933 and that during that period there was a tremendous deflation in the Dominion of Canada, because there was nothing the government could do to prevent the banks from calling in their loans. It could prevent the banks from extending their credit beyond a certain point, but it had no power to prevent them from calling in their loans. The minister's argument is upset by his own remarks at page 2540 of Hansard, where he says:

> The banks, of course, were not blameless, either in respect of the policies they followed in the boom years of the late twenties, policies which involved the granting of too much rather than too little credit, nor in the policies they followed with the onset of depression when faced with the necessity of saving their own institutions they may have aggravated the deflationary process which the antecedent inflationary boom had made inevitable.

Again, on the opposite page, 2541, dealing with the banks during the depression, the minister says:

> The banks, however, were private, profit-making institutions and it was only natural that the automatic working of competitive, commercial forces should not always coincide perfectly with the broadest national interest.

There is the complete demolition of the minister's own argument. When the safety of the banking institutions was at stake as compared with the national interest, the minister says it was only natural that they should think in terms of their own safety and their own shareholders; and if the banks again find that, in order to safeguard their own interests, a period of deflation must take place, there is nothing in this bill and nothing the minister has suggested that would prevent such a deflationary process from taking place.

Mr. ILSLEY: Except the central bank.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The central bank has no power to prevent contraction of credit. It has power to make available to the chartered banks cash reserves, but there is no guarantee that they will use them except "the spur of cost and self-interest", and if that is not strong enough there is nothing at all to guarantee that the banks will make their cash reserves available.

Mr. GARDINER: It is the only way in which they can make any profits.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The Minister of Agriculture says it is the only way in which they can make profits, but they may prefer to make less profit as they did during the early years of the depression, or they may prefer to make no profit at all rather than to take the steps which may be necessary at a particular time when deflation is threatened. At page 2556 of Hansard the minister says:

> The most common complaint is that the banks have been unduly restrictive in their lending policy, particularly during periods of difficulty such as were experienced during the drought and depression years of the thirties.

Here we have the same story. The minister himself admits that the complaint laid against the banks during the year of drought and depression was that they followed a deflationary policy. There is nothing in this bill to guarantee that the same deflationary policy will not be repeated.

The second argument the minister set up in order to knock down was that those of us who argue for nationalization of banking do so on the ground of greater economy; whereupon the minister waxed eloquent on the efficiency and economy of the banking system. It all depends on what the minister means by "efficiency" and by "economy." If the minister looks upon the banking system as an institution for the purpose of treating credit as a commodity, something to be kept scarce so that its value will be high, something to be loaned out when its value is low and to be called in when its value is high, something on which to make a profit; if the minister is thinking of the banking system in terms of a commercial institution engaged in selling credit as a commodity for the purpose of making a profit, then there can be very little improvement in the efficiency and in the economy of the banking system. Perhaps it is operated, as the minister said, safely and soundly in the interests of the shareholders and of the depositors.

But is that all that a banking system is for? From our point of view the banking system is to provide, not credit as a commodity, but credit as a medium of exchange whereby it is possible for people to exchange goods and services. We look upon a financial system not merely as an institution for the purpose of making profit out of selling credit as a commodity; we say that a banking system ought to be geared to our economy in such a way that whenever we create a dollars' worth of goods we create the purchasing power with which to buy those goods, or, in other words, that a banking system ought to function as a medium of exchange by which the goods created by the people of a nation may be consumed by those people or so that they may consume goods which they get in exchange for goods they have produced.

The minister's own quotation on page 2541 of Hansard is the worst indictment he could possibly have made of his own argument, when he quotes Professors Thorp and Mitchell to the effect that from 1888 to 1924 Canada had 1·86 years of prosperity for each year of depression. Remember that is before the great depression. Add to that ten years of depression from 1929 to 1939 and see what the ratio is. The best that the minister can say for an economic system which is capable of producing the tremendous abundance of good things of life made possible by the ingenuity of man and the inventions of science is that it gives people about one year and ten months of so-called prosperity for every year of depression. If that is what the minister means by efficiency and soundness, then the banking system is sound and efficient. We believe that the banking system has a much higher function, namely that it ought to be geared as an instrument of national policy to our economy in such a way as to enable the Canadian people to exchange the goods which they have helped to create.

Another argument which the minister put up and then proceeded to knock down was when he said that we wanted the banks nationalized because they constitute a monopoly. The minister went on to say, of course, that they were not a monopoly, and that even if they were a monopoly there was nothing to prove that the directors of those banks who are also directors of corporations showed any particular favouritism to their own firms. Then, I thought, the minister for a few moments let the mask slip and uttered a little wistful plea. He said, at page 2545 of Hansard:

> I often wish that the banks and other business corporations would search more intently for suitable directorship material in other walks of life—such as in small business, agriculture and labour—and also that the banks would use to a greater extent the device of regional advisory committees. . . .

Here is the minister admitting what everyone knows, that the banks have become a series of closed corporations, that the great mass of the people of Canada—workers, farmers, small business men and professional men—have little or no voice in the councils which shape the economic destiny of this country. When the minister talks about having representation on these boards of directors, what does he think we mean when we talk about nationalization? Just that. When we talk about nationalization we have two things in mind: one, that the banking system shall be geared to our economy so as properly to facilitate the exchange of goods and services; and, second, that farmers, workers, business men and professional people, people in all walks of life, shall have representation on the boards of directors that guide the economic destiny of the nation. After all, that is economic democracy. In this country we have political democracy. None of us, I am sure, would belittle it. Many of our forefathers laid down their lives that we might have the measure of political democracy which we now enjoy, and brave men across the seas are laying down their lives to preserve it in the world. What we are asking is that we shall move one step forward and shall add economic democracy to our political democracy, so that the workers through their trades unions, the farmers through their cooperatives, and the business men through their various business organizations, shall be given a place and a voice in the economic councils of the nation. That is something which the minister's statement admits we have not at the present time.

Mr. GRAYDON: Would that not approach the corporate state?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): No, it would not approach the corporate state. I would not think it would be corporatism for the workers and farmers of this country to have some representation on the directorates of this country. I am sure that would be a much more democratic approach than having the same men who sit on these boards of directors now and who think exclusively in terms of big business and vested interests.

The last argument which the minister puts up and then proceeds to push over is that we of this group want socialization of the banks not for any particular economic function that is beneficial to the community, but because it is a sinister way of destroying private enterprise and bringing in the thin edge of socialism. I say to the minister that we do not believe in socializing anything just for the fun of socializing it. There can be only one criterion as to whether or not anything should be operated by the public, and that is whether it can thereby be operated to the better advantage of the community as a whole than by leaving it in private hands. What is the minister's objection to the public ownership of the banking system? On page 2556 of Hansard he says:

It seems to me, however, that the credit stringency—

I am reading from the wrong page.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): It doesn't matter.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It certainly does not matter. There are a lot of bad spots in it.

At page 2546 of Hansard the minister says:

But a far more important point is the undesirability of having the credit of each of us and of every business throughout the country assessed by civil servants working under political control for a government banking monopoly, rather than by bank managers interested not in the political or other views of the borrower but solely in his ability and trustworthiness as a debtor.

That is the most damning indictment any man ever made of his own mental processes; the minister is father of a piece of legislation brought down in this house a few weeks ago which proposes to set up a publicly owned bank in which the persons seeking to borrow will have their trustworthiness assessed by civil servants. Is the minister now giving notice in advance to would-be borrowers that their trustworthiness will be measured in terms of their political stripe? Is the minister now saying that the Industrial Development bank is to be operated on the basis of political favouritism? Is that what he is saying? Because it is what he says about the banking system, if it were run by the same people. The minister himself is setting up a small socialist bank. Granted it is only going to handle about $100,000,000, but it is the people's money; it is a socialist bank, and if the minister's argument applies to the socialization of all the banking system, it applies equally to the bank which he proposes to set up. He cannot have his cake and eat it too.

Personally, I do not believe the minister is as bad as he makes himself out to be. I do not think the Bank of Canada has been run on a political basis. I have enough faith in the minister not to believe that, because I have a high respect for his personal integrity, and I do not believe that he will allow the Industrial Development bank to be operated on the basis of political considerations. I do not believe that Canadians who come to borrow money from the Industrial Development bank will have their political opinions investigated before they are lent money. But if the minister believes that, then he had no right to bring in the bill; and if he does not believe it, he had no right to say what he said last week, because he does not believe it. He cannot have it both ways. He cannot believe that there would be political considerations and bureaucracy in a generally socialized banking system and not believe that there will be bureaucracy and political considerations in his own socialized Industrial Development bank. The minister therefore will have to take one or the other. He ought either to withdraw the Industrial Development bank bill and conduct that bank in the same way in which he will conduct farm loan improvement, handling industrial development loans through the chartered banks and guaranteeing their losses, or he ought to go all the way and socialize not only the Industrial Development bank but the whole banking system.

The minister said another interesting thing on the same page, page 2546:

> No one can tell me that the Canadian people who have reacted as they have in the last three or four years to the limited controls—

I call attention to that word "limited".

> —and partial regimentations essential to the emergency requirements of war time would ever vote to imprison themselves in a socialized state which would make such controls and regimentations practically universal and perpetual.

If the minister says that, he misunderstands two things, it seems to me. First, he fails to recognize why the public object to the regimentation and controls contingent upon the war emergency. I do not think the people object to regimentation and control as such. I think they object to them because they have not been partners in the imposition of those controls and that regimentation. There are two kinds of control; there is control from the top and control from the bottom. So far the control has been mainly from the top, imposed by dollar a year men, imposed by crown companies set up by the government, with men on the directive boards, who have no authority to speak for the public and do not reflect its opinions. There are controllers set up all over the country, advisory boards on which the farmer, the labourer, the small businecs man, the retail merchant and the professional man have, in the main, been conspicuous by their absence.

There is a great deal of difference between that kind of control and control in which the people themselves have some part; a control in which the workers, the farmers and the general public of Canada have representation on the various boards, representatives appointed by themselves and selected from among themselves by virtue of their occupation, geography or the particular industry in which they happen to make their living.

I suggest to the minister, therefore, that his fears are groundless when he talks about regimentation and control in connection with a nationalized banking system. A nationalized banking system which had become an instrument of national policy, in which the people themselves had some representation through their various organizations on boards of directors, which would not be controlled from the top, but would enable the people of Canada to feel for the first time in our history that they had some voice in the operation of the economy which controls their daily lives.

May I point out to the minister that while he answered many questions which we had not asked, there was one very important question he did not answer. I expected, when the minister brought down the bill, that he would try to make a case, not for the bankers' association but for our banking system, because I believe that most people who are thinking at all about social and economic questions these days are conscious of the fact that our banking system was built in the latter half of the nineteenth century. It was based on the experience of banking in Europe in the three preceding centuries.

Our banking system was built to meet the needs of a pioneer economy, and based largely on a system of free enterprise. Since that time the world has passed through two social revolutions, whether the minister is aware of it or not. Since that time the technological progress which mankind has made, the tremendous powers of mass production, the scientific development which has produced all kinds of new commodities and made them desirable to the general public, if the general public had the purchasing power to secure them—all these things have come into being since our banking system was devised. I was waiting to hear the minister tell the house how this banking system in Canada, if these ten banks were granted their renewals, could serve the economic needs in the twentieth century. I do not think he has made a case for it. I do not think he has shown that our present banking system can relate consumption to production. I do not think he has shown that in the period following the war our banking system can give the people of this country sufficient purchasing power to maintain full employment, to provide markets in the cities for farm produce and in the rural areas for industrial commodities.

At page 2557 of Hansard the minister cited all the things the farming population need: electrical equipment, buildings, fences, machinery, radios and so on, and I agree with him. But the minister has not made any case to show that this obsolescent banking system has been brought up to date sufficiently to meet the needs of this mass production and monopolistic age. As a matter of fact, if one takes the trouble to look at the patches which have been put on the banking system in the last few years, that in itself shows what a miserable failure it has been in meeting the needs of the situation. The minister mentioned the central mortgage bank; then there was the home improvement scheme, and the national housing scheme. Now we have the Industrial Development bank and the farm improvement loan scheme which the minister has outlined, to be followed later, I understand, by credits for the fishermen. Each of these schemes stands as an eloquent monument to the fact that the present banking system is not fulfilling the functions which a properly constituted system is intended to fulfil.

I want now to say just a word as to how this legislation affects the farming population. As I said before, I agree with what the minister has said as to the need for increased agricultural credit. I agree with the minister when he says that the farming population need money with which to improve their homes, to buy fixtures and utensils, just as soon as the war is over and we are back in peace-time production. Not only is that necessary for the farming population; it is necessary if the great industrial sections of Canada are to have markets for much of their production. How does the minister propose to make this credit available to the farming population? He proposes to do it through section 88 of this bill, and, I believe, through the farm loan improvement scheme. This is a long way from the agricultural bank which was moved at the Liberal convention in 1919 by the late Doctor Motherwell, and, I believe, adopted unanimously by that convention. This is a long way from the industrial development bank recommended to parliament by the Oliver commission on which Hon. C. A. Dunning sat. This is a long way from the agricultural bank that has been promised repeatedly to the farmers of western Canada. When the minister was speaking the other day the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) interrupted to ask a pertinent question, to which no direct answer was given. At page 2559 of Hansard the hon. gentleman asked: —whether the existing lending institutions might conceivably be used for the purpose envisaged by the industrial development bank in the same way the minister now proposes to do in the case of agriculture.

I imagine the leader of the opposition was thinking from the opposite side of the question. He is wondering, I imagine—and he will correct me if I am wrong—why the Industrial Development bank cannot be handled in the same manner that the minister proposes to handle these farm loans.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was just seeking information, not attempting to express an opinion.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am interested in the matter from the opposite side; I want to know why the farm loans cannot be handled in the same manner as the Industrial Development bank. Why is there to be different treatment for agriculture from that for industry? This is not to be a government bank for farmers; let us not delude ourselves. This is merely to be a scheme under which the banks will lend their money at five per cent interest—which is a very good rate of interest these days—the government will guarantee the losses, and the banks will make the profits. That is what it amounts to. This scheme is very similar to the home improvement scheme, under which a man could go to a bank and, if he could convince the manager that he was a good risk, he could borrow the money. The government guaranteed the losses of the banks up to a certain percentage.

Mr. McNIVEN: Was it not a good scheme?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I would ask the hon. member for Regina City how many farmers he knows in Saskatchewan who came under the benefits of that legislation?

Mr. McNIVEN: Well, $50,000,000 was lent under it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That is not an answer to my question; I am asking how many farmers in Saskatchewan came under it. I know $50,000,000 was lent, during two or three years, spread over the entire Dominion of Canada. That was a mere bagatelle. It did not begin to meet the situation. In a speech just before Christmas the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) was reported in the press as having said that we needed 1,200,000 homes in Canada. Are they to be procured under a $50,000,000 home improvement scheme?

Mr. McNIVEN: We are still financing the war.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): But the $50,000,000 was spent before the war, as the hon. member knows very well. The home improvement scheme was introduced before the war, at a time when the government could have put out $500,000,000 instead of $50,000,000; when it could have employed many of the four hundred thousand men who were wandering around this country looking for jobs; when it could have employed some of the farmers on the prairies who were on relief, and who were only too anxious to earn some money.

Mr. EVANS: Were they carpenters?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Many of them were very good carpenters if one may judge from the work they have done on their own farms. The government could have trained them as carpenters, if they were not carpenters already. It would have been a good deal cheaper to train them as carpenters than to have them doing nothing at all. I noticed, when the war broke out, how quickly we were able to train men to be carpenters, electricians, machinists and everything we needed, but during the period before the war we could not train them at all. The home improvement plan operated on exactly the same principle as the plan now before us; and it touched only the fringe of the problem. It was another case of the government guaranteeing the losses and the banks taking the profits, and now that policy is being applied in the case of the farmers. What will happen under this scheme is exactly what happened in the case of the home improvement scheme. The man who will be able to get a loan under this scheme will be the man whose credit is good enough to get a loan anyway; the man who cannot get a loan now is not going to be able to get it under this scheme; make no mistake about that.

If we are going to discuss the question of regimentation, I would suggest that any hon. member who is interested should look at subsection 3 of section 88, which is on page 47 of this bill. Here is a provision which will allow the banks to go on a man's farm, take away his crop and thresh it for him, or take away his live stock or equipment. We talk about the dead hand of bureaucracy; just read what the very live hand of the banks is going to be doing to the farmers who come under this scheme. Therefore I say to the minister that if section 88 is all he has to offer the farmers of Canada as a solution of their credit needs after the war, it is indeed a lamentable disappointment.

I wish to say in closing that we in this group stand for the nationalization of the banking system. We supported the sub-amendment of our hon. friends to the left, because in our opinion if you take from the chartered banks their power to create currency and credit and restore it to this parliament, as their sub-amendment suggested, you have nationalization of banks. We contend that you cannot take the power to create currency and credit from the banks without nationalizing the banks. In our opinion, the only way you can have social credit is out of a socialized banking system. The government of course, with its great majority, will pass this bill. The government will renew the charters of the ten chartered banks; but Canada will rue the day that this decision was made by parliament.

The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) said that the government was becoming a socialist government. I am sure his fears are quite unwarranted, but the fact does remain that the inevitable logic of economies is forcing the government more and more into public ownership and control of those things that are essential to the welfare of the country. Before another ten years go by, whatever government is in power at that time or before that time, will be compelled to take over the ownership and control of the banking system of Canada, first of all, to finance consumption and to make it possible for the people of Canada to consume the goods and services which they create; and, secondly, to give to the common people of Canada some voice in their own economic destiny.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I have voted in support of the amendment to the amendment, but I shall vote against the amendment. I am opposed to the establishment of any monopoly, and the worst one is the putting of our public utilities under state control. We already have state control in the case of radio and spirituous liquors, which is the underlying cause of the worst abuses and the most glaring discrimination. Public opinion as voiced through the press and expressed in protest meetings and resolutions, has many times condemned state control, which is a form of objectionable socialism. Let us have facts showing the so-called advantages of state control. Who will claim that the setting up of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the liquor control has been a boon and an act of justice? The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is an all-powerful bureaucracy in the hands of the party in power, and so it will be in the hands of any government. The same thing may be said about state control over the sale of liquors. In both cases, people who enjoy the favour of the party in power are invariably those who reap the benefit.

Besides, it is already enough that we should have the Bank of Canada, the twin of the Bank of England.

The advocates of state ownership should tell us what has become of our chartered banks' gold reserve, which the Bank of Canada has taken over. Where is our gold? Where has it gone? We have produced billions of dollars worth of that metal during the last thirty years. It has taken the same direction as the annual billion-dollar gifts. Has the nationalization of the Bank of Brazil been a success? Yes, for high finance, but not for the people, whose money was devalorized by more than 500 per cent. Finally, if the chartered banks were to be put under state ownership the lion's share of victory loans would no longer be taken by wealthy people, companies and great industrial and financial institutions, but the workers and farmers would have to assume a still larger share of them.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) in moving the second reading of this banking bill is asking the house to endorse the principle of a debt-creating system. Before that is done, I think we should consider very carefully the consequences of this system on the economy of Canada in the past, and what the actual consequences will be in the future.

The minister, in his remarks, emphasized the fact that in his opinion the banks had operated efficiently in the past. I would ask, efficiently from whose point of view? If we regard the banks as manufacturing money, lending money at a substantial rate of interest, returning to their shareholders a substantial profit, then no doubt from the point of view of the shareholders we may say that the banks have operated efficiently in the past. And when one remembers that during the depression years, when practically every other concern was showing a loss, the banks were still able to pay an average return of around eleven to twelve per cent on their paid-up capital, then they did not do so badly. If, on the other hand, we regard the banks as institutions to serve the people in order to maintain the optimum development of the resources of the nation, then I do not think it can be said that the banks have operated efficiently in the past, so far as the people of this country are concerned.

It is true the minister has said that in the past the banks were hampered by certain limitations. To a certain extent some of those limitations were removed when the Bank of Canada was instituted. Many people believe that there are still limitations that should be removed. Therefore I feel at this time, before this bill is passed, that the necessary changes should be made so that the banks may serve the people efficiently in the future.

The minister has said that it is not fair to blame the Canadian banks for the depression that was of a world-wide nature. I would agree that it is not fair to blame the Canadian banks for the depression throughout the world; but I do think that the banks of all countries alike, with international finance, will have to take a very large responsibility for the conditions that existed in this country and in the world in general from 1930 to 1939. I would say that the financial policies carried out in the various countries of the world during that period were largely to blame for that situation.

It will be remembered that during the years 1926, 1927, 1928 and 1929 there was a fair degree of prosperity throughout the world. By 1929 some of those prosperous nations had started to have an unfavourable balance of payments. From 1923 to 1928 Canada had a favourable balance of payments, but in 1929 Canada had an unfavourable balance of payments of $65,000,000. In 1930 that unfavourable balance of payments had increased to $159,000,000. It was then decided, apparently, to impose a deflationary policy, not only in Canada, but in other countries that were in the same condition. For instance, we have the example of the Otto Niemeyer mission that was sent to Australia in order to try to bring about a balance of payments in that country. An ultimatum was placed before the Australian government, demanding that they take the necessary action to bring about a balance. They were urged to balance their budget and to curtail their general expenditures, and that largely was the policy which was adopted in this country. In other words, we attempted to bring about a balance of payments by a policy of restriction. Fortunately, I think it is generally realized to-day that when there is an unbalance of payments, a balance should be brought about by a policy of expansion. That is to say, we should try to expand the production of the debtor nations and expand the consumption of the creditor nations instead of doing as we have in the past, reduce the consumption of the debtor nations and reduce the production of the creditor nations. In view of the fact that that seems to be generally understood to-day I was surprised when the Minister of Finance criticized the chartered banks for not having put on the brakes sooner than they did, criticized them for waiting until 1929 before they started to restrict credit. I suggest to the Minister of Finance that had the banks started to put on the brakes prior to 1929 the only difference would have been that we would have gone into the depression in 1926, 1927 or

The Minister of Finance has also suggested that part of the problem that arose during 1930 to 1934 was owing to the fact that there was no central bank in Canada. An interesting point to note is that Australia had a central bank and their depression was every bit as serious as the depression in Canada. England had a central bank also. Central banks were not able to prevent the depression, and I doubt very much whether it would have made any difference to Canada if we had one. Probably the only difference would have been that through the services of a central bank we would have been able to organize our deflationary policy a little quicker than we did.

In 1936 the government established majority control over the Bank of Canada. We were told then most emphatically by various ministers of the government that we had established in this country effective control over the issue of currency and credit. The people expected that the government would then put into operation the policy that had been declared by the Prime Minister during the election campaign of 1935 when he stated that a nationally and publicly controlled central bank was needed in order to maintain the issue of currency and credit in terms of public need to meet the domestic and social requirements of the Canadian people.

I doubt very much if the Minister of Finance would try to argue that from 1935 to 1939 that policy was maintained. The minister surely will not try to argue that currency and credit were made available in terms of public need during those years. It is only necessary to remind the house that during those years we had in the neighbourhood of half a million unemployed and a million people on relief. Industry was operating at less than fifty per cent of its capacity and at the same time we had an average favourable balance of payments of $218,000,000.

The minister will also recall how during that period the members of this group continuously urged upon the government the necessity and desirability of issuing money for the purpose of maintaining and developing the resources of this nation in order to give employment so that the money paid out in that employment would help to create demand against the goods that could be produced by industry working at full capacity; or, on the other hand, the money could have been used in payment for the imports that could have been brought into this country, using our favourable balance of payments abroad. I do not think it is necessary for me to remind the Minister of Finance of the kind of criticism we ran into during that period. We were always told by the former Minister of Finance, the Hon. Charles Dunning, that no money was available for the purpose. When we suggested that national money should be issued we were told that such a policy would be inflation. I have here an extract from Hansard of 1938, and I shall quote the words of the then Minister of Finance so that no one will be able to say that I am trying to distort them. We were discussing the action that should be taken to develop the natural resources, and when it was proposed that a certain amount of national money should be issued for that purpose the then minister had this is say on March 8, 1938, as reported on page 1152 of Hansard:

> Inflation may look like a scheme by which governments can get something out of nothing. It is not so. The mind of man has not yet solved that particular problem, and never will. Governments have only one source for the funds which they use, and that is the pockets of their people.

Does the minister agree with that statement? During the period 1935 to 1939 the resources of this country were systematically sabotaged while Germany was aggressively preparing for war. That was especially so in 1938 when the then Minister of Finance made that statement. We allowed men to remain unemployed, we allowed our resources to remain undeveloped, and we made no attempt to build up the defences of the country. Why? Because the then Minister of Finance told the country that there was no money available to put the unemployed to work. We are told that finance is largely a matter for experts to deal with, that it is impossible for a layman to understand the intricate details of finance. I think our past experience demonstrates clearly that in the future the people will have to be more interested in the financial policy of this country than they have been in the past. I do not think I am exaggerating at all when I say that had the people who were responsible for the financial policy of Canada during that period been the paid servants of Germany they could not have maintained a policy which would have been of greater benefit to that country.

Then came the war and, strangely enough, we had a very quick change in the attitude of the government on this question of money. Where as the pleadings of the people had failed to get the government to issue the money that was needed to maintain full employment, a new motive was able to spur on the government. That motive was fear. I have seen a man run faster than he ever ran before when machine gun bullets played around him, and the same motive caused this government to act when the pleadings of the people in the past had had no effect.

What happened? Within six weeks of the declaration of war the government hired the chartered banks to create $200,000,000 of money for the purpose—let me quote the present Minister of Finance who was then Acting Minister of Finance as to why it was necessary to have a certain amount of credit expansion as soon as war was declared. I quote from a speech made by the minister on September 12, 1939, as reported on page 140 of Hansard, as follows:

All this is not to say that a small and carefully regulated amount of credit expansion may not be desirable in the early stages of the war in order to assist the increase of production and employment. It must be small and carefully controlled because its effects which may not appear immediately are cumulative and otherwise might get out of hand. If at the beginning of the war there are unemployed resources, some credit expansion may give an impetus to their prompt utilization. If it is carefully controlled, the expansion of production may prevent any abnormal rise in prices, confidence may be maintained and the initial impetus may be carried on and accelerated by the insistent demand that exists for supplies.

I could agree with a great deal of that statement. What puzzles me, however, is this. If six weeks after the declaration of war it was necessary to have monetary expansion in order to provide full employment so that we might develop the resources of the country, why was it not just as sound to have that expansion two months before war was declared when we had exactly the same situation? Why was it not possible to have that credit expansion in 1938, 1937 or 1936 when we had large undeveloped resources in this Dominion? We had to wait for war before the government would make a move.

During the fall and winter of 1939 there was not very great activity in Canada. It took Dunkirk to really waken this government. Fear then became more prevalent throughout the country, fear as to what might happen if we did not wake up. We then had a declaration from the government that no financial restrictions would be allowed to impede our war effort, that the only limit to our war effort would be the men and materials necessary to produce a total war. On several occasions we have asked the government to make a similar declaration regarding the post-war period, but so far that declaration has not been made. I think the Canadian people have a right to ask that this government shall assure to them at the conclusion of hostilities whatever money is needed to maintain the full development of the resources of this country. We have been able to find it in war time and there is no reason why we cannot find it in peace time.

[Mr. Quelch.]

Let me continue the quotation of the remarks of the Minister of Finance on September 12, 1939, as follows:

However, as soon as the expansion of employment and production gets well under way and certainly before it approaches its limits, further expansion of the supply of money and credit must be stopped if the danger of progressive inflation is to be avoided. With an economy at full production and employment, the only result of expanding money and credit is to raise prices without increasing production.

The minister must have changed his ideas to-day, because we know that last year employment was at a very high level and we were told that we were rapidly approaching the full development of the resources of the nation and that our main difficulty was to find the people required to develop them. In spite of that fact we created $980,000,000 of new money last year through the chartered banks and the Bank of Canada. Yet in his speech in September the minister stated that as soon as we approach full employment no more money must be created because it would not expand production. Last year, although we were warned that we had reached the peak of the development of the resources of the nation, nevertheless we created $980,000,000 of new money. Why? To maintain a total war effort. I suggest that in the future, even when peace time comes, if we are to maintain the full development of the resources of the nation it will always be necessary from time to time to have an expansion of money. I think this is endorsed by the governor of the Bank of Canada. Last year, on April 4, 1943, I participated in a broadcast with Mr. Graham Towers and asked him this question:

After the war the need will be to encourage private spending. Heavy taxes and public borrowing will be contrary to the public welfare. Will the government finance all desirable public projects by credit expansion when necessary?

Mr. Towers replied:

In circumstances such as Mr. Quelch describes, I would say there would be grounds for government not meeting the entire cost of its programmes by taxing and drawing on public savings. The desire would be to encourage private spending and make government investment more of a residual item. If part of the necessary money had to come from credit expansion—and the projects were sound and in the public interest—then I should say go ahead.

Mind you, the governor of the Bank of Canada does not say that the only money that can be obtained for the government is out of the people's pockets. He says that money can be created. Yet in 1938 we were told that the government had only one source for its funds. I think that after the war the minister will agree that it will be necessary from time to time to create new money in order to maintain the full development of the resources of this country. The question then becomes mainly one of, where shall the money be obtained from? Will it be obtained from a national agency or from a private money monopoly, the chartered banks? This group has always urged and insisted that the money should be made available through some form of national agency, and then no debt need be incurred, or if it is incurred it will be a debt to ourselves and will never have to be repaid.

The minister has argued in the past that money issued by a national agency will expand the reserves of the chartered banks and thereby make it possible for them to bring about inflation. That merely proves that up to the present time we have not established effective control over the issue of currency and credit. The minister says that we have controls by which the amount of money in circulation can be regulated. But when these controls are put into operation, the result is that the country goes farther into debt. You cannot call that type of control an effective one, when its result is an increse in debt.

Of course I realize that the minister may pride himself on being a student of what some people call the modern school of thought, that school of thought which argues that the national debt is a national asset and the greater the debt the greater the asset; so why worry about the size of the debt? I do not know whether the minister agrees with that or not, but it is the stand that has been taken by the governor of the Bank of Canada in the past. I do not want to be accused of misrepresenting what he said so that I will quote his words. Before the banking and commerce committee in 1939 Mr. Graham Towers, at page 80 of the committees' report, was asked this question:

> Is it possible for you to imagine any way by which we are ever going to pay the debt we have got?

Mr. Towers replied:

> As the debts of the government are an asset of the Canadian people, I do not see much point in the thing; except that, to the extent that the government thinks that the distribution of those assets of the Canadian people—which are its debt—is unsatisfactory, it may take steps to remedy that distribution in any way that lies within the legislative power; in fact, in any way, I suppose—by income tax or succession duties or any other action it cares to take.

Further on, at page 235, he said:

> So that all I can say would be this, that in a country where the sum total of public and private debt was decreasing you have a country which is going backward and which is becoming more poverty stricken. Generally speaking, in a country where you find there is no public and private debt you have a country resembling darkest Africa; there is nothing else.

That apparently is the idea of the governor of the bank of Canada, that we do not need to worry about the debt because it is a debt owed to the people of this country; we need not worry about it so long as it is not owed externally. I mentioned the fact that the people who support that philosophy like to look upon themselves as belonging to a modern school of thought. But I would point out that there is nothing modern in it at all. It is very, very old. It is a type of philosophy that has been propagated throughout the world by banking institutions for centuries. Just to show you how old it is, I should like to quote a statement made in 1813 by Thomas Jefferson. It is to be found in a booklet entitled, "Out of Debt, Out of Danger," by Jerry Voorhis, where at page 15 I find this:

> The American people would have avoided a great deal of misery and difficulty had they taken to heart Thomas Jefferson's exposure of the "art and mystery of banks." Here is what he wrote on one occasion.

This was in a letter written to John W. Eppes, November 6, 1813. I continue the quotation, giving what Jefferson wrote:

> At the time we were funding our national debt, we heard much about "a public debt being a public blessing"; that the stock representing it was a creation of active capital for the aliment of commerce, manufactures and agriculture. This paradox was well adapted to the minds of believers in dreams, and the gulls of that size entered bona fide into it.

It looks as though to-day we have plenty of gulls, gullible enough to believe in that type of philosophy which is deliberately propagated by banking institutions to-day. I must congratulate the Minister of Finance upon following that philosophy energetically, for in the last year we have an increase of two and a half billion dollars in the national debt and if the war lasts much longer we shall have a national debt of from fifteen to sixteen billion dollars, which will require $450,000,000 to $480,000,000 in interest charges alone.

I do not agree with some people who say that we can never have prosperity so long as we continue under the present financial system. I believe that even if we continue under the present system it would be possible to maintain prosperity just so long as we absolutely ignore the size of the national debt and then borrow from the chartered banks the money necessary to pay the interest on that debt. If we are willing to do that, we can pile up the debt to astronomical figures, to the point where ultimately the debt charges will be greater than the total revenue of the nation. But long before that time comes the confidence of the people of the country would be destroyed, and once the confidence of the people starts to waver it would be impossible to maintain full employment and prosperity in this nation. I believe that there is a sound alternative to that dangerous type of policy.

I should like to quote from a book written by Stuart Chase entitled, "Where's the Money Coming From?", in which he states at page 105:

> If the government borrowed solely from its own central bank without interest, there need be no interest burden at all. There would be amortization of the principal, and the fundamental prohibition not to pump too many new dollars into the system would still stand. The national resources planning board has said, "Should the day arrive when the carrying charge on the federal debt becomes oppressive, serious thought should be given to the creation by our modern banking and treasury institutions of non-interest-bearing debt."

What seems strange to me is, why wait until you reach a crisis before adopting an alternative which may save the situation? The national resources planning board says, "When the crisis has developed we may have to use non-interest bearing debt." Surely, when you see you are heading for a precipice you do not wait until your front wheels are over it before you change your course; you change your course long before you reach there. And when you realize, as all people who study the economic system to-day must realize, that a continuation of the present method of financing can lead only to disaster, surely it is time to adopt a policy of utilizing non-interest-bearing debt; I would say, non-interest-bearing debt in the sense that money could be borrowed from the national institution, the Bank of Canada, without any obligation to repay it.

This group has always stressed that it is necessary to maintain absolute and effective control over the banking system. In the past we have suggested that one way to bring this about would be the 100 per cent reserve system. I want to emphasize the fact that the Social Credit group has never stated that the 100 per cent system is the only way by which such effective control can be established. In view of the fact that our amendment has been voted on and disposed of, I suppose it would be hardly in order to continue that line of discussion at the present time. But, without referring to the 100 per cent system since it has been already dealt with on the amendment, I might deal with one of the statements which the minister made in that regard. He stated that it would be altogether too great a tax on the chartered banks if such a system were adopted; if over a period of time several hundred million dollars were issued, that money would eventually become deposited in the chartered banks, with the result that the chartered banks would have to service it without any compensation.

I think the minister's own statement which he placed before the house the other day showed that it would be no great handicap on the banks if they had to do it. On page 2550 of Hansard we find this statement regarding the chartered banks: during their operation for the fifteen-year period from 1929 to 1943 their current operating expenses amounted to 112·3 million dollars, and in 1943 those operating expenses had risen to 114·9 million dollars, an increase of 2·6 million dollars. Then we find that during the fifteen-year period the average of the amount deposit liabilities was 2,936·9 million dollars. In 1943 the amount of the deposits had increased to 4,606·9 million dollars, or an increase of 1,660 million dollars. So that concurrently with an increase in deposits of 1,660 million dollars you have an increase of only 2·6 million dollars in operating expenses. It is true that there was a reduction in operating costs owing to the fact that the interest payments had been reduced; but if the actual cost of issuing credit was in reality around two or three per cent, as was suggested by the governor of the Bank of Canada before the banking committee in 1939, when he said that it was three per cent including interest payments on deposits and two per cent without them, you would have had an increased operating expenditure of $48 millions, so that even with a decrease of expenses of $10 millions representing interest payments, you would still have had an increase of $38 millions in operating expenses, yet all you had was an increase of 2·6 million dollars. I mention that fact to prove that evidently there is a very large fixed overhead cost in banking; therefore you can increase or decrease the amount of deposits without altering very much the operating expenses of the banks. It would be possible, for instance, to increase deposits by $500 millions without involving any great increase of expense on the part of the banks, because they have had surplus capacity for taking care of increased business. I think the minister's statement proves that conclusively, showing as it does an increase of $1,600 millions in deposits with an increase of only $2,600,000 in operating expenses.

The minister made another point. He showed that the shareholders' net income amounted to only 5·09 per cent of their total equity on the average of the fifteen year period 1929-43, and 6·03 per cent in the year 1943. Personally I do not think that is a fair basis. I think the only fair basis is to take the paid-up capital. For instance, if I bought a $100 bond bearing an interest rate of four per cent, and I purchased it for $60, the interest rate on that bond would still be four per cent. The interest on my investment, it is true, would be more than that, but the interest rate on the bond would remain at four per cent. The same would apply if I paid more than $100 for it. I think this principle applies to the paid-up capital of a bank. The actual dividend is declared on the paid-up capital. In 1941 the dividend of the Bank of Toronto was twenty-five per cent. True, there is a big variation in the dividends of various banks. For instance, we find that in 1941, the percentage of net profits to paid up capital, after deductions for income taxes and appropriations for bank premises, pension funds and other published allocations, was 8·16 for the Bank of Montreal, 12·34 for the Bank of Nova Scotia, 18·69 for the Bank of Toronto, 6·04 for the Provincial bank, 8·03 for the Bank of Commerce, and 10·06 for the Dominion bank. These, I think, can certainly be regarded as substantial profits.

Mr. JACKMAN: The hon. member might check that Bank of Toronto figure.

Mr. QUELCH: I gave the figure after allowance had been made for taxation, pension funds and bank premises, as 18·69.

Mr. JACKMAN: Earnings or dividends?

Mr. QUELCH: This is the net profits, after published provision for dominion taxes shown in column one and payment for pensions and bank premises. If you take the net profits after the published provision for merely taxes you have a dividend of 25·6 per cent. So that I think the minister has given a totally wrong figure when he quotes 6·5 per cent.

I would point out to the minister that if, in the early days of the operation of the banks, before their shares had risen, the government had allowed only a profit of five per cent and had made the banks turn over the balance of their profits to the government to be set aside as a reserve to take care of possible losses in the future, I do not think the value of bank shares to-day would be anything like the value they are. The only reason they are at such a high value is on account of the profits which they have made in the past.

I have pointed out on other occasions that I believe that the 100 per cent system would work effectively, provided the banks cooperated fully with the government. Unquestionably this system will take care of inflation. I have never been satisfied that it will effectively take care of deflation. You can prevent the banks from inflating, but you cannot force the banks to issue money so long as they are privately owned. That is why I have stated on many occasions in the past that I feel that in order to have absolute and effective control over the banking system, the only sound way would be to nationalize the banking system.

I want to point out to those monetary reformers and some social crediters who do not agree with that viewpoint, that the social credit movement has never taken a stand against the nationalization of the banks; they have merely pointed out that nationalization in itself means nothing unless you are going to change the policy.

Just to straighten some people out on this matter, I should like to quote from a pamphlet written by Major Douglas, entitled, "The Use of Money". I do not want to be charged with having extracted a sentence from its context, and therefore I will read a paragraph or two:

> There are two ways by which the problem can be attacked, and one of those ways has to do with the fact—which I honestly believe—that 95 per cent of the personnel of the banking system are just ordinary, every-day hard-working business people like anybody else. You can make it clear to that 95 per cent that they are engaged in a very anti-social business as carried on at the present time, and you can—and I say this with a full appreciation of the implications to be put upon it—drive a wedge between the 95 per cent and the irreclaimable 5 per cent (not situated in New Zealand).
> That has been done to my certain knowledge in many countries of the world, and there is no doubt at all about it that this cleavage in opinion in regard to this vital question is penetrating into the very highest quarters of financial circles at the present time, and a great deal of pressure is being placed in very high places indeed to get that 5 per cent to see sense.
> I speak with some knowledge of what I am talking about: but I do not believe they will ever make that irreclaimable 5 per cent see sense. Then the answer is that they have got to be put out.
> If they cannot be put out by the pressure of their own associates and subordinates, backed up by an increasingly firm and powerful public opinion, then they have got to be put out by constitutional means: by which I mean they have got to be put out by bringing the powers of politics to bear upon them. That I put second amongst the methods by which this matter can be achieved. But I would like to say in regard to this second method that it has a vital bearing on the inadvisability of pressing too quickly for the nationalization of banking. I do not say that something like the nationalization of banking will not have to come. I think it probably may have to come. But what I am perfectly certain of is that if you unite the powers of governments with the powers of banking before you have changed the banking system, you have got a problem which is doubly difficult to solve. So that what you have to do, if necessary, is to set the government against the banks.

I agree that if you nationalized the banking system to-day, with the present type of government remaining in power, the public would not benefit very much by the transaction. But this bill we have before us is for the next ten years and an election is not very far away. Before the end of that ten-year period there will likely have been two elections; I am optimistic enough to hope and to believe that long before the end of those ten years the present type of reactionary government will have been put out and a more progressive type of government put in, and when the progressive government do come to power I should like to see them with a Bank Act at their disposal which will make it possible for them to introduce a financial policy that will serve the needs of the country.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): As I am a member of the banking and commerce committee and shall have an opportunity of discussing the bill in that committee I shall not speak at great length to-night. In fact, I had not intended saying anything on the second reading of the bill. I would not have done so but for the nature of the minister's speech delivered in the house a few days ago. That speech in defence of the present banking system must, I am sure, have gladdened the hearts of the members of the bankers' association. It would have done credit to any bank president or to the president of the association itself, and I am quite sure that the speech should stand the minister and his party in good stead when they come to bid for the support of the bankers' association in the next federal election.

The minister in his speech gave us a number of apparent contradictions. He deplores, for instance, the public criticism of the banks for their share of responsibility in the depression. He tries to exonerate the banks by saying:

> In the first place it is a travesty of economic interpretation to place responsibility for the great depression upon the Canadian banking system.

He goes on to blame the statesmen of the great nations of the world.

> Certainly the statesmanship of the leading nations in the twenties showed neither the courage nor the imagination to solve them.

He refers to these problems. I presume he does not include Canada as one of the great nations of the world and consequently does not include such statesmanship as was to be found in the Liberal party at that time. He does, however, in another sentence say, at page 2540 of Hansard:

> The banks, of course, were not blameless, either in respect of the policies they followed in the boom years of the late twenties, policies which involved the granting of too much rather than too little credit, nor in the policies they followed with the onset of depression, when faced with the necessity of saving their own institutions they may have aggravated the deflationary process which the antecedent inflationary boom had made inevitable.

In other words, in one breath he exonerates the banks and blames statesmen for the depression, and in the next he includes the banks in his condemnation. He eulogizes the banks for their strength, their flexibility, their efficiency, their economic operation; and I believe that no one, certainly no one in the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, has ever criticized these particular features of the banking business. I have no doubt that a government operating the banks might find it difficult to operate a banking system at a lower cost than the present banks are doing it, for one reason. Any government operating a banking system to-day would be under some public obligation to pay the employees of these banks wages that would give them a standard of living commensurate with that in the general economic life of the country. It is, I think, notorious that bank employees throughout the years have been among the lowest paid employees of any group shouldered with the responsibilities and the type of work that bank employees are called upon to undertake.

The minister pointed out in his speech that this efficiency, this strength, this flexibility on the part of the banks are not creditable to the banks themselves but, as he points out in his speech, are based on restrictive measures which parliament over the years has placed upon the banks. It is that very control exercised by parliament, which he deplores in government-owned banks, that he admits has made our banking system as efficient as it is to-day. He assumes the position that the central bank is now meeting all the deficiencies that existed previously in our banking system. It has been pointed out already that many deficiencies still exist in that system which are not met by a central bank. As the minister has pointed out, and as every hon. member knows, a central bank does not lend directly to the public. Apart from loans to the government, it lends only to the chartered banks. This means that it can make credit or money available to the chartered banks, but it has no control whatever over those banks to see that they in turn lend that money, or over borrowers to see that they borrow it. There have been times in our history, and not so far distant at that, when the chartered banks were afraid to lend the funds they had and borrowers were afraid to borrow them, even at fairly low interest rates. That condition actually prevailed in the thirties. The central bank has no control over the direction of the money which it makes available, even if that money actually is lent by the chartered banks to industry. Quite properly, in their own interests, the chartered banks will lend that money where it is most profitable to do so. Private profit and public interest do not necessarily coincide. They often conflict. What may be profitable from the point of view of the community and the national need may be unprofitable and undesirable to the private capitalist or bank with money to lend.

Furthermore, as has been pointed out in this debate, no central bank in any country has ever been able to stop a boom except by starting a depression. The reconstruction committee of this house has had numerous briefs presented by various privately owned industries. They all recognize that neither the central bank nor the chartered banks, nor the two together, can be depended upon when the war is over to create full employment. In all their briefs they call upon the government to be ready to spend vast sums of public money to augment the sums which private enterprise will spend in the post-war years. If the minister will read the debate which took place in April, 1934, when certain members of this house proposed that the central bank should be publicly owned as well as publicly controlled, as it is to-day, he will find that many hon. members were opposed to the public ownership of that bank, and that they advanced exactly the same arguments that have been advanced by the minister against the public ownership of the chartered banks, including the argument of political patronage. The bank presidents who opposed the establishment of a publicly owned central bank, and the members of this house who joined with them, are the men who to-day try to tell us that the central bank, publicly owned and controlled, is sufficient to meet all the needs of our economy.

It is probably true that a minister of a Liberal government—and I presume it would be equally true of a minister of a Conservative government—cannot conceive of a government enterprise operated without political patronage. Over the years in this country it has been the practice that when a Conservative government goes out of office, practically every position that is at the disposal of the government reverts to a Liberal, and vice versa. We are seeing that happen in Ontario every day. Under a new Conservative regime all available positions at the disposal of the government are being taken from those of Liberal affiliation and passed over to Conservatives.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Have you proof of that?

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Yes, I have.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I think you are absolutely wrong; in fact I know you are.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Can you disprove it?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I certainly can.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: You will have your chance to do so later on. That is the history of both the Liberal and Conservative parties in this country through the years. It is known all across the country; it is no secret. It would appear to be the opinion of the minister that any government, Cooperative Commonwealth Federation or otherwise, operating a system of government-owned banks, would staff those banks with political appointees. Any government that followed this procedure would be committing political suicide; and I believe any government, C.C.F. or not, that undertook the operation of a government-owned banking system would be sufficiently intelligent to see that a procedure which might be followed when dealing with the appointment of a game warden or a dog-catcher would not apply in the appointment of officials to run a bank. I noted that the minister did not condescend to use the argument which I have heard used by others against a publicly-owned banking system; that is, that the money of the depositors would not be secure in a government-owned bank. I do not think that argument is worthy of consideration in this parliament, and I was pleased that the minister did not use it.

In his eagerness to support the present banking system, in my opinion the minister went out of his way to undermine the confidence of the public in much of the work being done to-day by some of his own departments. His tirade against government control, against government bureaucracy, cannot assist the officials of many of the departments that the minister is entrusted with administering, cannot assist them in the administration of their duties and serve any good purpose except to undermine public confidence in the work of these officials of his own department.

I think the minister's speech, and the provisions which the government proposes to bring into effect, show much more clearly than I can those spheres in which our present banking system have failed society. As has already been pointed out, the government now finds it necessary to institute an Industrial Development bank. The government finds it necessary to go to the aid of the farmer, the fisherman, the exporter and other classes of society, who for one reason or another, will not be able to find funds available from the banks and other lending institutions. It looks very much as though the taxpayers are to be saddled with all the unprofitable part of the money-lending business and that the banks, under the minister's department and direction, are to be left with the profitable part of that business. I wish to assure the minister that the people of this country are not half as much concerned about maintaining the profitable part of their business under the control of the banks as he himself appears to be.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) dwelt at some length upon the extent to which the profitable part of the banking business is now the lending of money to various governments, federal, provincial and municipal. If the minister is determined to maintain the present banking system, and if he is proposing to introduce certain amendments, in order to provide means whereby credit can be made available to new industries, to fishermen, farmers, exporters and others, might I suggest that he consider at the same time making credit available at a lower rate of interest to the municipalities. The municipalities have been fleeced by the banks and financial institutions for many generations. Many of our municipal laws are such that they work to the advantage of the banking system. For instance, we have municipalities which have funds available in one department, but they cannot use those funds to cover the expenses of another department. They must borrow from the banks to finance those obligations until such time as current taxes are collected.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Is that not provincial law?

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: If the municipalities are to bear their share of reconstruction and embark upon housing and other programmes there is need for the federal government to make funds available to them at the interest rate at which the federal government can borrow, without requiring the particular municipality to pay twice the rate at which the federal government can secure those funds. Some such adjustment is needed.

In conclusion, I wish to say that the test of a successful banking and financial system, as I see it, is not solely the test that the minister gave. When the war ends, our financial structure must become an instrument for waging total war in this country against poverty, insecurity and fear. I am satisfied that even under the Bank Act, with amendments proposed by the minister, that function will not be served, cannot be served, without the nationalization or the socialization of the banks.

Mr. FRED ROSE (Cartier): I had not intended speaking on this bill—

Mr. ROSS (Souris): You do not have to.

Mr. ROSE: —but somehow it has been speeded up a bit. I shall therefore make a few remarks in order to explain why I voted the way I did. I voted against the sub-amendment for the plain and simple reason that I believe to place all the ills of the world on money is a bit childish. We are told that the crisis of 1930 was due to money. Everything is money. All that we have to do is to allow a lot of paper to flow and we shall be all right. Some hon. members spoke very nicely about international finance, a phrase which some of them borrowed from Major Douglas, who, of late, has improved the phrase of "international finance" and now calls it "international Jewish finance." I would say, therefore, that no responsible person in the labour movement could try to solve all of the problems of Canada with money.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Because of what you have just stated?

Mr. ROSE: Just a moment. We had a crisis because capitalism failed; there was overproduction and people had nothing, and could not buy goods.

Mr. BLACKMORE: They needed more money.

Mr. ROSE: Just a moment.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): You are getting in a bad spot.

Mr. ROSE: No, I am not. The people could not buy because there was no work anywhere. There were no international markets.

Mr. BLACKMORE: They had no money.

Mr. ROSE: I shall come to that. There was nothing. They had no work at home. I would agree with a number of speakers who put the issue squarely before the house. They said that we must have jobs. I agree. We must have jobs guaranteed to everybody after the war. That is problem No. 1. The workers say: "Give me a job." The worker does not give a hoot where the money comes from. He does not care whether it comes from a private bank or from a central bank. He wants a job and he wants it at decent wages. That is problem No. 1. Let us not try to run away from that problem by finding some magic solution, by playing around with money, paper money or any other money.

We come now to problem No. 2. One of the hon. members used the phrase, "Nationalization of banks"; another hon. member used the phrase, "Socialization of banks." Let us not play with phrases. On the basis of those phrases people are supposed to stand up and vote. When I did not stand up to vote a neighbour to my right turned to me and said in effect, "What has happened to you?" I am no abstract dogmatist. I contend that jobs come first, and that is the big problem. To use the issue of socialization of banks at this time is all wrong when the vast majority of the Canadian people have indicated by a recent Gallup poll that they are not willing to accept such banks.

The key issue at the present stage of the war is not to play into the hands of those who want to make an issue of socialism in order to oppose reform. Let us stand up for reform in this house; let us collaborate. That is the issue to place before the people. The issue is not socialism or the socialization and nationalization of banks; it is a question of reform.

An hon. MEMBER: Is that not a reform?

Mr. ROSE: That is a drastic one. The Labour party of Great Britain have been speaking of the nationalization of mines for how many years? They have still to nationalize the mines. I would say that the problem of the socialization of banks is somewhat similar to the nationalization of mines as it was promised by the British Labour party. The fact is that they have not gone very far.

Reference has been made to New Zealand. That country does not have a very highly developed capitalist system. It has a population of about a million and a half people. They have not as yet nationalized the banks and the fact that some of the people there are saying that they will do something does not mean that they will. Let us be realistic about the problems.

If there is something wrong with bill No. 91, I should like to see my hon. friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation show where improvements can be made. That would be a much healthier approach to the problem. Instead of talking about farm loans, we should have a bank for agricultural loans. If that were suggested, I would be one of the first to vote with my hon. friends to my right. If they will bring forward a concrete proposal in connection with the industrial bank I will support it. In that bill on the industrial bank it is suggested that loans will be given to shipbuilders, but I do not consider them as being small industrialists. Loans should be available for small storekeepers. It should be possible for men in the army to come back and open up little stores. I would be 100 per cent for that. I have heard nothing said about how these men will be able to get easier credit. To put out propaganda slogans about socialization of banks at this time will in the long run tend to divide the people.

Some will say where are you to get the jobs? I admit it is going to be a hard problem. Others will ask, where will you sell the goods? I should like to refer to a clipping which I had in my office.

An hon. MEMBER: What is it, more propaganda?

Mr. ROSE: It is much more realistic than talk of easy money. This clipping is from the Montreal Gazette of Saturday, and it contains a story written to the New York Times by C. Daniel, pointing out that the United States bank had underwritten 2½ billion of goods to be sold to the Soviet Union. That is a lot of money. I believe that the yearly total of United States exports before the war were valued at about $3 billion, and here are 2½ billion being underwritten by private banks to one country. If they want to do that, let them go ahead.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Who is guaranteeing it? It is the working people of the United States.

Mr. ROSE: Have you any objection? It is the men who will get the jobs and they have no objection.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I object to your giving credit to the banks under this new party line.

Mr. ROSE: The party line is a different problem and we will discuss that later. The article says that the British are also interested. Where do we come in? Here is what War and the Working Class, a Soviet journal, has to say:

> Trade with the Soviet Union can doubtlessly be profitable for England, the United States, Canada and other countries.

Yes; we can do something. I need not mention only the Soviet Union. What about China? Let us help to industrialize China. There was a labour representative from India at the International Labour Office convention at Philadelphia. He said, "Help us to industrialize ourselves; help us to gain freedom, and you will see what it will mean to you from the point of view of work for your people." Let us be realistic; let us not run away on the question of the issue of money.

I do not vote on the basis of catch-phrases or propaganda slogans; I vote on the basis of what is realistic. If there were an amendment that would bring about improvements, I would be in favour of it, but when you talk only of socialized banks or national banks I am not prepared to vote.

An hon. MEMBER: What is your alternative?

Mr. ROSE: If the bankers want to carry on, let them carry on. But if they fail, let the government step in. The government has started with an industrial bank and we should have other similar banks to make credit easier in order that the people may carry on. That is a problem. If private enterprise fails, let the government step in. The government should not be merely a passive bystander. The people are not prepared for socialization of banks at this time, and they can be scared by slogans used by reactionaries and be turned against those who mean well. People like Gladstone Murray and others can still turn the people against those who may mean well, and the result will be that the people will go to the other extreme.

I did not vote either for or against the sub-amendment because I could not understand this sudden wedding of two parties. The one had just got up and attacked socialism while the other wanted socialism. If it is merely a question of opposition for the sake of opposition, then I say that is not in the best interests of the people at the present time, nor is it in the best interests of the people in the near future.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, it is refreshing to know that the Liberal party are gaining some support.

Mr. ROSE: Why should the Conservative party have a monopoly?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Also the banking monopoly.

Mr. HANSELL: The hon. member for Weyburn says, "Also the banking monopoly". I had not intended speaking to-night and many of us seem to be riding in the same boat. This debate which promised to be lengthy is apparently on the verge of folding up. I was not rushing myself in preparing for this, thinking there would be other long-winded speakers desiring to speak between now and the end of the week, and I would, therefore, have plenty of time to gather my notes together. But here I am having to explain myself extemporaneously with a few little pieces of scrap notes.

I feel it is necessary for me to say something before the amendment is voted on. I should like to say something which my hon. friend who has just preceded me may think rather illogical. To all intents and purposes I do not believe in nationalism, but I am going to vote with my hon. friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. I think it was the speech of the hon. member for Weyburn that convinced me that he was gradually becoming a pretty good social crediter.

Mr. McNIVEN: He was in 1935.

Mr. HANSELL: I understand that the hon. member for Weyburn was rather charmed with the social credit philosophy a few years ago. I have always maintained that when once a man becomes a social crediter by conviction, he will always remain a social crediter. It is something that gets within his blood and becomes not merely an economic philosophy but a philosophy of life.

I said that I was going to vote for the amendment, Mr. Speaker, because, as I said last year, I really do not believe that it matters very much who owns the banks. The big question is, who is to control the banks? The passing of the ownership from one party to another or from one corporation to another or from the hands of the bankers to the government does not alter the policies of the banking system, and it is the policies of the banking system that we need to change. Therefore it would seem to make no particular difference to me personally whether the banking system is nationalized or not. What I want is effective control over the banking system for the issuance of currency and credit in terms of public need. That is something which our Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) promised a few years ago but which he has never seen fit to accomplish. I am going to quote Major Douglas in connection with the nationalization of the banks. He made a speech at Oslo, Norway, in 1935, in which he said:

> The institution and keeping of the national credit account does not require any nationalization of the banks. As a matter of fact, such nationalization would be a great mistake. I am not myself, for instance, an advocate of the nationalization of banks. I believe this again to be one of those misapprehensions so common in regard to these matters, for the nationalization of banks is merely an administrative change: it does not mean a change in policy, and a mere administrative change cannot be expected to produce any result whatever in regard to this matter. A change in monetary policy can be made without interferring with the administration or ownership of a single bank in the world.

I regard Major Douglas, notwithstanding what the hon. gentleman who preceded me said, as one of the greatest economic minds of the age. As the hon. member for Acadia

(Mr. Quelch) said to-night in quoting Major Douglas, he did say that the day may come when it may be necessary to nationalize the banks, but he suggested that before they are nationalized there must be a change in the banking system itself and in the policy of banking. That is quite reasonable because, if there is no change in the policy of banking, it does not make any difference who owns the banks. The chief function which I believe is required of the banking institutions of a nation is to see that the national income, or shall I say the money in the hands and the pockets of the people, is sufficient that it is able at all times to buy all the goods and services that are available in the nation. The thing I want to know in connection with the banking institutions, and what concerns me in connection with their nationalization, is this: Are we to have any more money? That is the thing. I will answer in a moment the hon. gentleman who preceded me and said that nobody wants a lot of paper floating around as money. But what I am pointing out now is that we want to know whether the banks are going to provide the nation with money enough to buy all that the nation produces. The nationalization of the banks is the same as the nationalization of anything else. A gentleman asked me on one occasion why we did not nationalize the oil fields out in Alberta. The important thing I told him was: Are we to be able to buy the gas and oil when the oil fields are nationalized? Let me picture it for you, I said. A man who believes in nationalizing or socializing the oil fields comes along and says: "We will socialize all the oil fields. I am a good socialist and it will be an extremely fine thing to know that the people own the oil fields." So the oil fields are nationalized. He comes along and sees the oil men drilling for oil and says, "It is great to know that the wells belong to the people." Then later on he sees the oil going to the refinery which has been built out of the people's money, and perhaps he had to pay a little in taxation for the building of the refinery. He sees the oil being refined and the oil and gas coming out and transported to a gasoline station. He says, "That is great. Just think; all this belongs to the people!" The next day he drives his car to a gasoline station and says to the attendant, "Fill her up. It is great to know that all this gas and oil belongs to the people." The attendant fills the car with gas and the man starts to drive away, but the attendant shouts after him, "Hi, mister, come back here; you have forgotten something." "What did I forget?" asked the man. "You forgot to pay for your gas", said the attendant. "Oh", said the man, "why should I pay for it? I thought it belonged to the people."

I give that only as an illustration. The point is that it does not make any particular difference to me particularly who owns the means of production or who owns the banking institutions. What we want is the wherewithal to buy what the nation produces. What we want is the wherewithal, which can only come from the banking institutions. We claim, and I think rightly so, that we must have consumers' purchasing power if we are to consume all the goods that our nation is able to produce.

My hon. friend talked about the false philosophy of printing money. He may, if he wishes, disagree with the logic of some hon. members, but I am going to suggest that when he comes to deal with monetary technique he certainly has need to study it more deeply. I am going to read something from a book published by Major Douglas, entitled, "Warning Democracy", in which he says at page 133:

> There is such a remedy. It is not the easy one which might at first occur to you of merely printing more bank notes, since unfortunately that is a method which defeats its own end. The method is a technical one. It consists in a simple adjustment, by the use of the technique of credit, of the relation between the average price level and the available purchasing power; and, under existing conditions, the responsibility for making this adjustment most undoubtedly rests with the banking system.

I quote that to my hon. friend to show that the highest authority perhaps on the philosophy of social credit does not advocate the printing of more money. What he says is that there must be a credit relation between the average price level and the available purchasing power. He further says that under the present banking system the banks have that responsibility.

I say to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) that I see no great change in the new bank bill. I agree with the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) when he stated this afternoon that the bill includes no vital change. If that is so, the responsibility of equating consumption with production by issuing enough money and putting it into the pockets of the people must rest with the present banking system.

A year or so ago I was at a meeting at which representative social crediters of Alberta were present, including the members of the legislature and the ten members of parliament, and we devised a series of resolutions which we thought would give us a picture of our post-war needs. For the purpose of financing post-war reconstruction we passed a resolution from which I will read. For the sake of brevity, I will omit the "whereases", the description of the present system and the failure of the banks. The declaratory portion of the resolution was as follows:

Therefore be it resolved that the entire programme of post-war reconstruction, covering all spheres of the national life, should be financed in accordance with the following provisions:

(a) The control of the monetary system and the issue of all currency and credit shall be vested in a national monetary commission responsible to the people through parliament.

I claim that if that proposal were adopted it would not be necessary to nationalize the banking system.

(b) All government expenditures, whether for capital development, social services, security measures or any other purpose shall be financed by the issue of money by the national monetary commission without debt to the nation. Taxation shall be used for the sole purpose of withdrawing surplus purchasing power.

May I digress to say that, even though this bank bill should pass, and we know it will, no fundamental change will be made in the present banking system. I say to the Minister of Finance—and he knows the truth of what I am going to say, for a schoolboy could say it—that so long as a high rate of income taxes and, if you will, corporation taxes exists, there will be less money in the people's pockets wherewith to buy the goods which are available. That is one reason why in that section of the resolution we claim that taxation should be used for the sole purpose of withdrawing surplus purchasing power.

(c) Adequate monetary supplies shall be made available for financing construction programmes, with due regard to maintaining a proper relationship between capital production and the production of consumers' goods.

(d) Proper and scientifically adjusted safeguards shall be instituted to avoid both deflation and inflation, to ensure an orderly price structure, and to provide an adequate and equitable distribution of purchasing power.

(e) All the foregoing shall be carried out without interference with the freedom of the individual citizen.

It seems to me that if that were adopted the banking institutions would not have to be nationalized, but they would have to be willing to take instructions from what is known here as the monetary, or credit, commission, which would investigate yearly and report to parliament all the intricacies of the financial system as it is operating from day to day.

According to the law the revision of the Bank Act takes place only once every ten years. A lot can happen in ten years, especially while we are moving in a very fast, progressive age. If a monetary commission were set up to deal with monetary matters, hearing at all times and any time cases which came to them from any financial expert who wished to give evidence, the necessary instructions could be issued from time to time. That would keep the banking system in such a state that it would progress with the general progress of the years. Personally I believe that would be a far better proposal than the nationalization of the banks.

My hon. friend who preceded me suggested that we were inclined to blame money for everything, and said that the one thing which is essential is that everybody shall have a job. I do not criticize the idea of everybody having a job; I like to see people doing the things they wish to do, but there is one fundamental principle of monetary technique of which my friend is evidently not aware. It is this, that out of the process of production, from the time the raw materials are gathered together until the finished article is on the shelves for sale, there is never enough money coming into the hands of consumers to buy back all the goods at the prices at which they are for sale. Even though there were no profit there still would not be sufficient money, because there are production loans fed to the producer which have to be paid back. He has to pay depreciation costs, certain taxes, interest, and a lot of other things, and by the time all these are paid there is not enough money coming from the process of production to buy back all the goods produced. It does not make any difference, therefore, if everybody has a job; if that is the only way you have of putting money into the people's pockets, eventually your goods will pile up and people will be thrown out of work again. That is the particular technique which my friend did not realize.

When the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) kept telling him that you had to sell your goods and that you could not sell them unless people had money in their pockets, my hon. friend said, "I will tell you where to sell your goods. You will be able to sell them to a foreign country", and he cited Russia. No one wishes more than I do to have an equitable balance of trade with Russia, with China and with any other country. But my hon. friend evidently thinks that when you export a couple of billion dollars' worth of goods to another country that country immediately sends us a couple of billion dollars which we can then spend to buy our own production. That is not so. My hon. friend must know that the only way in which one country can pay another for the goods it receives is to ship goods in return. If goods are received by us in payment, some of our own people are going to be out of work. So that his philosophy of jobs is a wrong philosophy. I should like to see everyone at work, but in addition to that you must put into the pockets of everybody a further amount of purchasing power to buy back all that you are able to produce. If that social credit technique were followed you would have the highest standard of living it is possible for a nation to have, the highest standard of living that your productive capacity is able to give you.

The other day I was talking with a gentleman who was in the banking business—well, I should not say that he was in the banking business; he worked in a bank. I asked him one question: What is the purpose of an economic system? Well, he stumbled for a while. I do not suppose he had ever asked himself that question. I said, "It is very easy to answer that question. The purpose of an economic system is that people may live, and the purpose of a right economic system is to give people the highest standard of living." He said, "What do you mean?" I said, "Is there any reason why people should not own their own homes?" At once he replied, "You do not mean that every one should own his own home, do you?" I said, "Why not?" He said, "Do you mean that we should give everyone enough money to buy his own home?" I said, "I did not suggest that we should hand it out exactly in that way, but if there were an additional amount of purchasing power coming to all workers, to the aged, the sick or whoever it might be who was in need, there would be that additional purchasing power which would give us the highest standard of living, homes and everything else." He did not understand that it was possible for everybody to have his own home and, in fact, anything that the country is able to produce.

That is the purpose of an economic system. Why should we live in scarcity, with thousands of people in the bread-line; why should we live in apparent poverty, all because we do not manage properly our economic system, all because we do not bring proper arrangements to bear upon our banking system, all because we do not say to the banker, "This is your responsibility and if you do not meet it we shall have to change the system"? That is something that our governmen seems reluctant to do. The Minister of Finance, when speaking the other day—I have not the exact words, but I think I am quoting him correctly—said that the depression of the thirties was the result of the last war.

Let us see if that is so. I do not know whether he can answer that point to satisfy me; but with this nation's shelves stocked high with goods, with storekeepers standing at their doors waiting for customers to come in, not being able to sell their goods, and with thousands of people in Canada going to the relief offices, and if they wanted an extra pair of shoes going to the Red Cross, are you going to tell me that a peculiar anomaly of this sort was the result of the war? Personally, I cannot see that it is.

It seems to me to be a very simple problem. What these people wanted is money. We all recognize this, and it has been mentioned a good many times, that when this war broke out there was money. Why should not money have been produced before, in order that people might be able to buy the goods on the shelves? To tell me that it was the result of the last war seems perfectly futile. If the depression of the thirties was the result of the last war, the minister comes along now and does not change the Bank Act materially, and therefore the question arises, what is going to happen after this war? Surely if the condition I have described was the result of the last war, and if the system is not changed, the same thing will be true following this war. Indeed, as the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hlynka) and the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) say, it will be four times worse. It cannot help being four times worse.

These are the things we have to face. This parliament is here to change the legislation. We know it is of no use for any private member or any group in the opposition to bring down legislation, because it has not the ghost of a chance of being passed. The government is the only body of people that can bring down legislation, and it is the responsibility of the government to change the existing legislation, so that the banking system will fit into that new legislation in order to bring about the desired effect. If the government is not going to change the legislation, then the banking institution will go on as it has done throughout the years.

There is the alternative which my hon. friends of the C.C.F. propose, namely, to nationalize the banks. It does not make any difference who owns the banks; the government could simply say, "We are going to control the policy of the banks and set up a commission in order that the policy of banking in Canada shall be such that this Canadian people will get the results they desire."

I am going to vote for the amendment, although under existing conditions the government is responsible for the entire monetary policy of Canada.

On motion of Mr. Nicholson the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

The house met at three o'clock.

ELECTRIC POWER

TABLING OF NOTES RESPECTING WATER DIVERSION AT NIAGARA

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table some notes recently exchanged between the governments of the United States and Canada with respect to diversion of water at Niagara for power purposes, and to make a short explanation to the house with regard to the present state of Niagara diversion arrangements.

Notes between the Canadian government and the government of the United States were exchanged at Washington as of May 3, to provide for an additional diversion of 4,000 cubic feet per second of water at Niagara for power purposes. Prior arrangements providing for the production of additional hydro-electric energy at Niagara for war purposes are embodied in a series of agreements which were evidenced by exchanges of notes.

The earlier notes thus exchanged were tabled in this house from time to time. All these increased diversions of water are subject to reconsideration on the first day of October in each year. The previous arrangements also provided for the construction of remedial works. Accordingly the United States-St. Lawrence advisory committee and the Canadian temporary Great Lakes-St. Lawrence basin committee prepared recommendations, which were approved by both governments, regarding the exact nature and design of the remedial works.

The Canadian government arranged with the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario for the latter to do the actual construction work, and it is now nearing completion. It has been even more effective than had been expected, both in adding to the efficiency of the power developments and in preserving and improving the scenic beauty of the falls. The new exchange provides that this additional diversion, for power purposes, of 4,000 cubic feet per second shall be made on the Canadian side of the Niagara river. Most of the additional energy will however become available for use in the United States. There is no new question of export of power involved, as this additional electrical energy will come under the provisions of the previous arrangements.

The new diversion arises out of a request from the United States government, but, as the diversion is on the Canadian side, the arrangement takes the form of a note from the Canadian Ambassador to the Secretary of State and a reply constituting an agreement.

Copies of the notes exchanged in English and in French are now tabled for the information of the members of the house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to ask the minister why a major portion of the power is going to the United States, and just what is the executive authority to enter into an agreement of this nature without the consent of parliament.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There is no agreement entered into by this government with the government of the United States with respect to the use of power. As a matter of fact the power is developed by the Ontario hydro-electric power commission. It has export permits for power—not continuous power, but power that is not being used on the Canadian side.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): For off-peak load.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The situation on the American side is that they have steam plants wherein they produce power by the use of coal; but they can at any time use whatever electrical energy is available, and thus conserve coal. Under the arrangements evidenced by the notes, the government of the United States will make no objection to the diversion of 4,000 additional cubic feet per second of water which will flow through the machines of the Ontario hydro-electric power commission.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And they get the power.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It will make the power available, and if it is in excess of what is actually being used on the Canadian side it will be absorbed in the boilers on the American side. The only pecuniary or financial interest of the federal government is in the fees paid for the export permits on the measured quantity of power that goes out.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is only a bagatelle.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is only a bagatelle. Whatever financial benefit there is will be derived by the Ontario hydro-electric power commission as vendors of the power not actually in use on this side.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am glad to notice that the minister seems to know a great deal about diversions. Is this 4,000 cubic feet per second in addition to the previous 5,000 cubic feet per second allowed the Ontario hydro-electric power commission as a result of the diversion of waters from the Ogoki river?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is in addition to the quantity already being used by the hydro-electric development to compensate for additional water brought from the Hudson bay basin to the great lakes basin.

Mr. MacNICOL: Before we were allowed to divert that, we permitted the United States to divert an additional 5,000 cubic feet, so that they are going to get 5,000 and 4,000 cubic feet?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: They will not get an additional diversion. The additional diversion will flow through the hydro-electric plant on the Canadian side.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is the 4,000 cubic feet per second?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Out of that they will get such power as is not absorbed by whatever load the hydro in Ontario may have on its system. They get this, sometimes for very short periods and sometimes for longer periods. When I say "very short periods" I refer to the fact that during the lunch hour they would get power not being required for the operation of the Toronto tramways system. That off-peak power flows into the boilers and saves other fuel.

PRIVATE BILLS

VANCOUVER, VICTORIA AND EASTERN RAILWAY AND NAVIGATION COMPANY, THE NELSON AND FORT SHEPPARD RAILWAY COMPANY AND GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster) moved the first reading of bill No. 102, respecting Vancouver, Victoria and Eastern Railway and Navigation Company, the Nelson and Fort Sheppard Railway Company and Great Northern Railway Company.

Mr. GRAYDON: We ought to have an explanation.

Mr. REID: This bill arises out of an agreement entered into between the Vancouver, Victoria and Eastern Railway and Navigation Company and the Nelson and Fort Sheppard Railway Company and Great Northern Railway Company. The Vancouver, Victoria and Eastern Railway and Navigation Company and the Nelson and Fort Sheppard Railway Company were set up under provincial charters long years ago. Following that they were declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada and so came under dominion statutes or regulations of the federal parliament. That was back in 1893 and 1897. Following that the Great Northern Railway Company obtained a ninety-nine year lease from both these other railroad companies, as well as some running rights over the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific railways. Later on they acquired and now own all the shares of both the first mentioned railroads. The bill proposes to ratify the leases and to allow the Great Northern Railway Company the right to effect total ownership. The bill also provides for an agreement covering running rights over some small sections of railroad belonging to the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific Railways.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FIRST READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 103, for the relief of Margaret Millar Short.—Mr. McIlraith.

Bill No. 104, for the relief of Mary Annesley Iverson.—Mr. Factor.

Bill No. 105, for the relief of Annie Drewniak Sonberg.—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City).

Bill No. 106, for the relief of Celia Zlatkes Azeff.—Mr. McIlraith.

Bill No. 107, for the relief of Louisa O'Tool Shelley.—Mr. Factor.

Bill No. 108, for the relief of Miriam Schwartz Silcoff.—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City).

SIXTH VICTORY LOAN

ADDRESSES IN CAMPAIGN OF MEN ON OPERATIONAL LEAVE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JAMES SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Defence for Air or his parliamentary assistant. This question is of immediate importance to quite a number of very gallant airmen who are now on operational leave in this country. One of the most gallant of these is Wing Commander Bill Swetman, D.S.O., D.F.C., a veteran of over sixty operational flights over Germany. He is now making speeches in the Toronto area in connection with the victory loan campaign, and he is reported yesterday as having said that "he wasn't trained to give fancy speeches but to fight. When he and others like him came home on leave after a tour of operations—they get thirty days—they wanted to spend it with relatives—not making speeches to persuade people to buy bonds." If people have to be persuaded to buy victory bonds perhaps it is better that we use men like this, who have fought actual battles in the air over Germany, rather than painted actors and actresses who fight their battles on the screen or in the divorce courts. I should like to know from the minister or his parliamentary assistant if men like this who are home on operational leave and who speak in victory loan campaigns will get extra leave to make up for the time they give.

Hon. CYRUS MACMILLAN (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence for Air): An airman's leave period is not curtailed by reason of the fact that he gives some time to victory loan committees or to other patriotic services. His regular leave period is extended by the length of time given to such services.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): May I just say one word about actors and actresses? The impression given in the paper was that these ladies and gentlemen receive pay for their services in Canada. That is not the case. They give their services free, and so far as my experience goes they are more than anxious to do something to assist the war effort.

Mr. SINCLAIR: So they should.

Mr. ILSLEY: I deplore any remarks that depreciate their services, because they are voluntarily given, in a way in which they can best contribute to helping the war effort of the united nations.

INTERNATIONAL FINANCE

BANK FOR INTERNATIONAL SETTLEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the leader of the opposition asked me a question about the Bank for International Settlements. He asked specifically whether the Bank of Canada is a member of the Bank for International Settlements and, if so, whether it is the policy of the government to have the Bank of Canada, under the present circumstances, represented at this meeting. He asked further if the Canadian government or the Bank of Canada have any deposits or any financial interest of any kind in the Bank for International Settlements.

The Bank of Canada is not a member or shareholder of the Bank for International Settlements and has no deposits with that institution. Accordingly, the Bank of Canada will not be represented at the annual meeting of the Bank for International Settlements.

As a result of the so-called Young plan, an agreement was reached in 1930 for the definite settlement of the reparation liabilities of the German government. Under the agreement the various governments that were creditors of Germany appointed the Bank for International Settlements their joint and sole trustee to receive, manage and distribute the annuities payable by Germany. To remunerate, in part, the Bank for International Settlements, these creditor governments agreed to leave on deposit with the Bank the sum of 125 million reichsmarks without interest. The share of the British empire of this deposit was 26,587,500 reichsmarks. Canada's share of the British empire's interest in reparations is 4·31089 per cent. There was therefore deducted in 1930 from the amount that Canada would otherwise have received in reparations the sum of 1,146,159 reichsmarks ($272,785.84 @ 1 reichsmark equals 23·8 cents), being Canada's percentage of this non-interest-bearing deposit.

BANK ACT AMENDMENT

CONDITIONS GOVERNING TEN-YEAR EXTENSION OF BANK CHARTERS

The house resumed from Monday, May 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Ilsley for the second reading of bill No. 91, respecting banks and banking, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I think it was unfortunate that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) made the type of speech which he did when introducing this bill a week ago. The member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) attached some blame to the minister's parliamentary assistant for advice that was given, but I was inclined to think that possibly the minister's associations with friends south of the border while he was on holiday might have been responsible for his change of attitude. I think I speak for members of the house when I say that no member of the government has grown in stature to the same extent as the minister has since taking over his very important responsibilities, and certainly no minister of finance has ever been able to capture the imagination of the Canadian people to the same extent that the present minister has done. I think all he needed to have said last week was that his government had not been elected to socialize the banks; that if the people of Canada wanted to have legislation of that sort enacted they must elect a C.C.F. government in this dominion, but that until that time came he proposed to follow the traditional methods. Then he could have proceeded to outline the unimportant changes that are to be brought about by this bill. But for him to take time out to speak as he did, in the midst of the victory loan campaign, did not in my opinion serve any useful purpose or the public interest.

There are many people in this country who certainly do not share the views which the minister expressed last Tuesday.

The Minister of Finance has introduced some very unorthodox ideas in war finance since the war started, and I think he was right in doing so. Price controls, rationing, priorities, the foreign exchange control regulations are all very unorthodox. Those who believe in free enterprise would not expect that a free enterprise government would interfere with personal liberties as the Minister of Finance has done. I know that he had to overcome a good deal of opposition before he could put some of these measures into operation. Let me remind the house of the views that were expressed by the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen when he was leader of the Conservative party in the other chamber. He was complaining of the excess profits tax, and said:

> Human nature is the same in war time as in peace, and instead of helping the war effort you are defeating it by stripping people of the stimulus to toil and run their business right. Leave the incentive and make the reward greater, the greater the toil and the greater the success. You do not do it under this bill.

Then listen to this:

> I do not exaggerate at all when I say that I have had business men by the dozen tell me that they are leaning on their oars; they have nothing to work for. They say: "We might just as well take it a little easier now, for we are only working for taxes anyway."

But in spite of this opposition the Minister of Finance felt that if Canada was to make her greatest contribution in prosecuting the war, the opinions of Mr. Meighen and his friends must be ignored. I think it would be a great calamity if at this stage the minister should soften and decide that those who would like to make greater profits should be given greater freedom, that we should have no price controls, that the sky should be the limit. So that having already introduced unorthodox methods in the carrying on of the work of his department I think it was unfortunate that the minister made some of the remarks he made the other day. His attack on the bureaucrats will, I am sure, give to a great many people the idea that in the wartime prices and trade board political pressures were being brought to bear to get special consideration. I think it would be unfortunate to let that impression get abroad, or the impression that after the minister has tried his best to get the Canadian people to cooperate in maintaining the price ceiling and avoiding black markets, in the administration of these controls political affiliations are taken into consideration by men selected by this administration. It would be unfortunate if the impression should get abroad that when a letter comes to the board from, let us say, Swift Current, Donald Gordon has to ask the Minister of Finance whether the writer is a Liberal, or a Conservative. I am sure that that does not happen, and it was unfortunate that the minister should imply that if we were to have public ownership and control of the banks in this country we could not expect to have them administered in a way that would be in the best interests of the largest number of people.

A good deal of time was taken by the minister in attempting to defend the banking system in this country. He pointed out at page 2540 of Hansard that it was a travesty of economic interpretation to place responsibility for the great depression upon the Canadian banking system. I do not think anyone in this house has ever placed the blame on the Canadian banking system. But I think it also is obvious that the banking system that was in operation in Canada was not able to prevent the depression, and that the governments in office at that time in Canada were not able during the depression years to organize our economic life so that every able-bodied person would have a chance to work and so that the resources of the country could be developed by the people.

More recently the minister has announced—and this is a revolutionary theory so far as governments in this country are concerned—that as long as the war lasts, whatever is physically possible is going to remain financially possible. I think to a very large extent that policy has been acted upon. But before the war neither Liberals nor Conservatives were able or willing to carry out that sort of policy. In passing, I should like to hear from the Progressive Conservative party some more constructive suggestions than were heard yesterday from the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson). He spoke at considerable length, but I think few members of the house had any clear picture when he finished as to what might be expected from the Progressive Conservatives if they were in office. Possibly they are hoping that they can ride into office, with John Bracken milking cows across the country, on the unpopularity of the present administration, but I think they misjudge public opinion if they expect to get back into office on the mistakes of the present government in war time.

As prime minister during the early thirties we had the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, a man who had made an outstanding success in business and professional fields, and in Saskatchewan, where I lived, we had a Conservative administration; but we found it impossible in those early thirties to get the banks to make available currency and credit so that we could have full employment. We found it impossible to get our governments to launch policies which would make sure that those who wanted to do useful work should have the chance to do it.

I have some returns which were supplied to me by the Department of Labour on June 26, 1940, showing the amount of credit which was made available to some of the farmers who went north while Mr. Bennett was prime minister of this country. Federal and provincial funds were used, and the banks were asked to cooperate in solving this unemployment problem. I have selected the cases of three men because they happen to be veterans of the last war, men who fought for freedom. They had committed no crime. They happened to be carpenters, living in the city of Regina, who did not wish to be on relief, and they were encouraged to go north. The total expenditures which could be made by Mr. Bennett's government and the Anderson government to reestablish a family in one year were $300. One of these settlers has also served in the present war, having gone overseas twice in his lifetime. He was obliged to live in a house which cost $47.85. The items are broken down here: $5.45 for the windows; $5.85 building material, $31.55 lumber, $5.27 for tar paper. His groceries for a year cost $10 per month. As for his stock and implements, he was given a mower and rake which cost $25, fifteen hens costing $7.50, a horse, $25; and three bales of hay, $2.25. During the entire year this veteran of the last war received from federal and provincial funds and the chartered banks of Canada $265.15. Another returned soldier got $285. Another one, with a larger family, did a little better; he received $308. I should have thought it would have been recognized in the early thirties that it was in the public interest to feed, clothe and shelter the citizens in all parts of this country. Two of the boys who were living on the allowance of ten dollars per month are now in the armed services. It is not any wonder that since they joined the army, dentists had to be assigned to them to put their teeth in order, and that they had to have extra food so that they might be built up to do their job.

I mention these cases to indicate that during the thirties the banks of this country were unable or unwilling to make credit available to enable settlement programmes to be carried out so that the people participating would have proper houses, decent food and medical and health services.

So that in peace time it was proved pretty conclusively, I think, that there was something radically wrong with a system which should be expected to make available to people currency and credit so that they could have goods produced and services performed. In war time, also, our banking system did not meet the test. It was not until the federal government was prepared to guarantee the banks against any loss that they were willing to make large loans to companies which were prepared to go into the production of ships and tanks and guns and planes. Those who believe in free enterprise should have argued that those who were going to make these tanks and guns and other commodities of war should take the risks, but those who were manufacturing thought otherwise, and the government of the day made it clear that those who would take contracts on government account could not lose money; they were guaranteed that they would have every cent they invested and profits on their investments.

The C.C.F. feel that, such large payments having been made to the chartered banks of this country, the time has come when the banks should be taken over and owned, controlled and operated as a public utility. We have never given the impression that we can solve our problems by taking over the banks and printing and circulating large quantities of money. I have never told the house before, but I had the experience of being a millionaire at one time.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Shame.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It was really a very simple matter. Any person who had a Canadian dollar could become a millionaire in Austria when I was there, after the last war. When I cashed a $20 traveller's cheque I became a multimillionaire, possessing the equivalent of twenty million dollars. But one million had to go for my breakfast the first morning, and by the time I left Vienna I had quite a large volume of money but it would not have bought me a fountain pen. The people of Austria found themselves at that time in a very difficult position.

The members of this group sympathize with the Minister of Finance in his efforts to try to save the people of Canada from the confusion and distress which were occasioned through various parts of Europe during that inflationary period. An old couple who had saved and saved for a lifetime, and who had perhaps five or ten thousand dollars put away for the evening of life, found, when inflation had done its work, that the accumulations of their lifetime would not buy a toothpick. We have been anxious to avoid in Canada any policy which would result in those who work for their wages having to buy in a very uncertain market and having to sell their labour to those who would be able, through inside information available to them, to anticipate demand. We have always urged that the government should have complete control of our currency and credit so that at all times we would have sufficient available to produce the goods necessary for civilian consumption in Canada, for the prosecution of our war effort, and to exchange in the markets of the world for goods which we want but which we cannot secure here.

It has been said by those who have criticized our policy that under a system of government control of currency and credit there would be no guarantee that savings would be safe. I ask you, what greater degree of security could you expect than the security offered by the entire country? For a number of years I have kept a small amount of money in the post office savings bank. I do not think anyone can argue that your money would be safer in the Bank of Commerce or in the Bank of Montreal. The post office savings bank gives you a better service for savings than any of the chartered banks. You can withdraw or deposit money in practically any post office in Canada between eight o'clock in the morning and six o'clock at night without any identification papers, without payment of exchange, and without any stamp on your cheque. All you do is to present your post office savings book with your signature and your registration card and you are given the money you wish to withdraw. If you deposit money you receive an official receipt in due course by mail. It would be quite a simple matter to extend the service which is now being given by the post office to serve adequately the savings requirements of the entire country.

The hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman) asks about the poor bank clerks. The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) will say something about them; otherwise I would take time to do so. The poor bank clerks have not shared in the prosperity of the banking institutions. The banks of Canada have been able to show very favourable balances at all times. They have been able to build expensive head offices and branch offices; in nearly every community in Canada the most expensive building is the bank. Take the bank of Commerce, with a paid-up capital of $30,000,000. They were able to pay dividends of eight per cent, according to the last return I have, and even during the depression years, in 1932 and 1933, they paid ten per cent, and from 1929 to 1932, thirteen per cent. The Bank of Nova Scotia did a little better, because during the depression they paid fourteen per cent and twelve per cent. The Royal bank did very well during those years, having paid fourteen per cent before the depression and twelve per cent up to 1932.

The bank clerks, however, did not fare so well. I recall a conversation I had with an air force officer some time ago. When he found that I was a member of this house he was curious to know what plans were being made so that when the war is over he might have a chance to do useful work in society. He told me that when he finished high school he wished to be a civil engineer, and he tried to borrow money, but the banks were not interested in lending money to enable a student to go to university. However, he found employment in a bank, and after a considerable period he received $80 a month. Then he wanted to marry, but the bank regulations would not allow him to do so until he received $100 a month. Since he has joined the air force; the taxpayers of the country have spent $25,000 training him to be a pilot, and he is now receiving over $200 a month. He told me he could not understand how it was possible for the taxpayers to raise $25,000 to train him to be a pilot when a few years ago he could not get enough money to go to university to become a civil engineer.

I think the minister might have taken time to offer some justification for the low salaries which have prevailed in the lower brackets among bank employees. He did take time to defend the bank directors of the chartered banks in Canada, and he said that it would be an unfortunate thing if the successful men of the country should be barred from taking part in directorates. I have the Financial Post directory of Canadian directors for 1944, and it is really difficult for me to understand how some of the gentlemen listed here can take an active interest in the different companies they are supposed to direct. Here is Morris Wilson who is:

> President and managing director, Royal Bank of Canada; vice president and member of executive of the Montreal Trust Company; director and member of the executive of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company; director of: Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada, Ogilvie Flour Mills, Limited, Dominion Bridge Company, Limited, Dominion Engineering Works Limited, Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company of Canada Limited, British Columbia Power Corporation Limited, Canada Cement Company Limited, Consolidated Bakeries of Canada Limited, Canadian General Electric Company Limited, Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, Shawinigan Water and Power Company; chancellor of McGill University.

How can any one person give careful consideration to the very complex problems that are considered by so many of these companies?

Here is Leighton McCarthy, our ambassador at Washington, who is a director of the Bank of Nova Scotia, among other things. One would imagine he would have a full-time job in Washington, but it does not appear so, because in 1944 he is listed as:

Member McCarthy and McCarthy, barristers; chairman of the Canada Life Assurance Company; National Trust Company Limited; vice president and director of: General Canada Loan and Savings Co., Toronto Savings and Loan Company, Aluminium Limited, Saguenay Power Company Limited, Union Carbide Company of Canada Limited, Canadian National Carbon Company Limited, Prest-O-Lite Company of Canada Limited, Dominion Oxygen Company Limited, Electro Metallurgical Company of Canada Limited; director of the Bank of Nova Scotia, British American Assurance Company, Western Assurance Company; member of: Board of Governors, University of Toronto, Board of Trustees, Toronto General Hospital, Board of Governors, Ridley College; trustee: the National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis of the United States of America, the Georgia Warm Springs Foundation.

There are a number of others whose names might be mentioned. Let me cite, the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. He is:

Chairman, president and member exec. comm. Canadian Pacific Railway Company; chairman of: Associated Screen News, Canadian Pacific Air Lines Limited, Canadian Pacific Steamships Limited, chairman exec. comm. and dir. Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company of Canada Limited; president of: Canadian Airways Limited, Canadian Australasian Line Limited; Quebec Salvage and Wrecking Company Limited, Scottish Trust Company, Seigniory Club Community Assoc., Limited; vice pres. Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railways; (alternately) pres. and vice-pres. of: Northern Alberta Railways Company, Toronto Terminals Railway Co., Vancouver Hotel Company; director of: Bank of Montreal, Canadian Arena Company, Canadian Pacific Express Company, Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, Minneapolis, St. Paul and Sault Ste. Marie Railway Company; member Canadian comm. Hudson's Bay Company; chairman executive comm. Bishop's University; governor of McGill University, Montreal General Hospital, Royal Victoria Hospital, Notre Dame Hospital.

I think that many of these well-known Canadians must be used as window dressing for many of these companies. Take a farmer from Saskatchewan like Charles Dunning—and by the way, I think the cruelest barb of all hurled at the minister yesterday came from the member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) when he expressed the fear that the Minister of Finance was going the way of Charles Dunning.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Which way did Dunning go?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I will tell you in a minute. He is:

President Ogilvie Flour Mills Company Limited; chairman Allied War Supplies Corporation; member Canadian Comm. Hudson's Bay Company; dir. of Canadian Investment Fund, Consolidated Paper Corp., Consolidated Bakeries of Canada Ltd., Steel Company of Canada Limited, Bank of Montreal, National Liverpool Insurance Company, Liverpool and London and Globe Insurance Company Ltd., Liverpool-Manitoba Assurance Company, Globe Indemnity Company of Canada, the Consolidated Mining & Smelting Company of Canada Limited, the Royal Trust Company, the Bell Telephone Company of Canada, Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada, Canadian Pacific Railway Company, chancellor Queens university.

I do not think it is very convincing to say that because Mr. Dunning is a director of all these companies we have the best possible banking system that can be devised by Canadians. I suggest that the minister would be better advised to carry on along the general line he has been following in his department with a view to having those policies acted on in Canada which will guarantee the greatest production of consumer goods in peace time as in war time.

In the report of the Bank of Canada for the present year the governor of the bank outlines views that scarcely coincide with those advanced by the minister in his argument the other day. In discussing the adjustments which must be faced in the immediate future the governor of the bank points out that in 1939 we had about 4,000,000 Canadians gainfully occupied, and that at least 300,000 who were available for work were not employed. He goes on to say:

By the end of 1943 the gainfully occupied population had risen to approximately 5,100,000 but about 1,900,000 of these were engaged in the armed forces, in supplying the weapons of war, or in producing the food required for special war time exports. The number available to meet civilian needs had therefore fallen to about 3,200,000, but at the same time the average standard of living had risen materially and was probably higher than it had ever been. This increased output of consumption goods by a smaller working force can be accounted for in part by longer hours of work, favourable crop conditions and the abnormally small number now employed in private capital development and maintenance work.

After the war, some of those who are now employed will voluntarily withdraw from the working force, and the armed services may be maintained at a level considerably above their pre-war strength. It seems likely, however, that at least 4,700,000 workers will be available for employment in civilian jobs, or at least 1,500,000 more than the number employed in that sector of the economy at the present time.

The question that all Canadians must be worrying about these days is this: Have we the machinery to guarantee that the nearly two million who are now in the armed services and war industry can come back and find useful employment? It is our opinion that we cannot give any such guarantee unless we are prepared in peace time as in war time to plan our production so that the resources which are here will be developed as a part of a national plan.

I have been told that a company like Canadian Industries Limited employed about 4,500 in the pre-war years. They have been employing about 45,000 during these war years; but their reconstruction plans call for the employment of about 6,000. That will mean they will be employing about one-third more than they did in the pre-war years; but what of the 39,000 who have been employed and who will be turned into the ranks of the unemployed? Similar figures may be cited to describe what will happen in the shipbuilding industry and aircraft production in a great many industrial areas in this country. I hope the minister will, if he is in charge of his department when the war is over, be willing to have as his slogan, "Whatever is physically possible must be made financially possible."

It has been suggested by some who have taken part in the debate that we cannot look for prosperity in Canada unless we have a very large export trade. The members of the C.C.F. party look forward to international relationships so that the nations of the world will trade extensively; but I submit that Canada can provide a higher standard of living for her people than we ever had before, regardless of her foreign trade. Therefore I think it is imperative that the resolution moved by the leader of this group be supported by the house so that we shall have plans afoot when the war is over to enable the government of this country to be in a position to control the development of our resources, and have available at all times the currency and credit necessary to guarantee full employment and to maintain the highest possible standard of living.

Mr. G. G. McGEER (Vancouver-Burrard): I rise to speak to this bill not so much because of what it contains, but more because of what it lacks. While I fully appreciate that the details of this measure are the primary consideration of the banking and commerce committee, yet I do want to address a few remarks to you, sir, upon the general problem as I see it, and upon the attitude that we should take in approaching the solutions that are far from easy to find.

It is pretty well known that my stand upon the issue of currency and credit is fairly strong; but I am not alone in that attitude. I should like to recall to the house the remarks of Thomas Jefferson, the third president of the United States, remarks which he made in 1800. He said:

> I believe the banking institutions are more dangerous to our liberties than standing armies. Already they have raised a moneyed aristocracy that has set the governments at defiance. The issuing power should be taken from the banks and restored to the people to whom it properly belongs.

Seventy-five years after that statement was made by Jefferson, the Lord Chief Justice of England said:

> The issue which has swept down the centuries and which will have to be fought sooner or later is the people versus the banks.

Other men of genius to-day are realizing that conflict still remains. Sir Frederick Gowland Hopkins, the discoverer of vitamins, recently said:

> I confess that I see more present danger in the case of money versus man, than danger, present or future, in that of the machine versus man.

Sir Alliott Verdun-Roe, the man of whom it may be said that he has probably made the greatest contribution in teaching the world to fly, the inventor of the Avro flying training machine, as recently as April 23, 1944, made this statement:

> We are on the threshold of wonderful inventions. The most far-reaching is our ability to travel through space and into the stratosphere. Aircraft will alter the whole future of travel; for to-day more people are engaged in building and operating aircraft in Britain than in any other activity. Yet I cannot help but remember the way in which my early experiments in aviation were received. With a few other British pioneers I saw Mr. Haldane, Secretary of State for War, in 1909, and he informed us that the government could offer us no encouragement, "as they saw no possibility of using aeroplanes for war purposes."
> It is exactly the same to-day when I find myself ahead of my time in emphasizing the incalculable benefits that could come from a revision of the money system, now completely out of date. As Henry Ford said recently: "Money is just part of our transportation system to move goods from man to man; it breaks down so often that it is time our engineers developed a new model." But the "engineers" are hardly likely to improve a system that forces those who do the work to take risks on money that is borrowed—yet which has no tangible existence beyond book entries.

Lord Wavell, certainly one of Scotland's greatest contributions to the empire's fighting generals, and one whose administrative statesmanship was recognized by Churchill as fitting him to take over in India at the moment of that part of the empire's greatest danger and crisis, said this:

> It has always seemed to me a curious fact that money is forthcoming in any quantity for a war, but that no nation has ever yet produced the money on the same scale to fight the evils of peace—poverty, lack of education, unemployment and ill health. When we are prepared to spend our money and our efforts against them as freely and with the same spirit as against Hitler, we shall really be making progress.

I know that the remarks I shall make will not find a happy echo in either St. James street or Bay street. But I do feel rather happy to be able to travel in the company of the men I have quoted this afternoon.

We live, Mr. Speaker, in grim but inspiring times. Our day of decision in this parliament must follow and be complementary to the D-day of invasion. For upon our decisions in parliament will depend, not the success of the invasion that is coming, but the success of the fruits of the victory which we hope is not far off. The great crisis of the war for us is close at hand. The day nears when the weight of the fighting power of the United States and the British empire, accumulated in years of determined preparation, will be thrown in all its force against the enemy.

We have good reason to be confident that the declining strength of nazism may be soon overwhelmed. Germany, we trust, will not be able to survive another winter of war. Japan has already lost control on the seas and in the air. Before this summer passes no ship flying the flag of Japan will be able to move with safety on any part of all the seven seas. Many now competent to express an authoritative opinion are predicting that the Japanese war machine may collapse in a welter of hara kiri, even before the disillusioned and defeated nazis throw down their broken arms.

We await anxiously the day of the grand attack, and when it comes we regret that the shadow of sorrow will pass over the doorstep of many more Canadian homes. But the day of unconditional surrender will not be denied. Let us hope that we at home, in safety, have already been given the light to appreciate the nobility of the character which the fighting men and fighting youth of our generation proved was theirs in the darkest days of freedom's danger. Let all of us, particularly those of us who are in our war parliament, remember that our men on the seas and in the fighting lines, and the boys in the air who are crusading as youth never crusaded before, are fighting for the institutions that have flourished under the flag they love. They have gone forth with daring and courage, and with dauntless hearts and matchless fortitude not to conquer but to save. Fighting to protect the security of their homes and loved ones, and to preserve free enterprise as the greatest of all their liberties, in victory they will gladly offer all the liberties which they enjoy and cherish to enslaved mankind, wherever oppression and aggression rule. They are adding new lustre to the glorious traditions of our race; they are writing new pages in the records of our long and valiant service in the cause of freedom. No reckless ambitious pride or buccaneering selfishness tarnishes the escutcheon of the armies of liberty that they are bearing with unconquerable valour. When men struggle in the clash of arms in that spirit, their war is holy. The blood spilled in that cause is sacred. The lives laid down in sacrifice on that altar of service are forever consecrated to immortal glory. Ours is not only the justifiable pride of those closely associated with the heroes who are enacting the greatest episode in our glorious history. Ours is not only the tender memory of the loved and lost. Ours is the solemn duty so to fulfil the purpose and opportunities of our lives that the victory they fought and died to secure will not have been won in vain. It is for us to dedicate our lives to the preservation and advancement of all they gave their lives to save. Out of their sacrifice so freely offered and gladly given, and out of the welter of human carnage which has drenched so many lands with the blood of innocent millions, may there come to us new understanding. Yes; may we be given the understanding that will bring us under the guidance of the golden rule and release us forever from the alluring selfishness of the rule of gold.

Until we in parliament win that great battle against the selfishness of privileged monopoly, all the tragedies of revolution and war will be repeated over and over again. Wars are won on the battlefields, but they are born of the misguided action of men in parliaments. Until parliament dominates and subdues the blind greediness of privileged monopoly, the lot of our own and future generations will be but a repetition of the dismal past, its envies and its hatreds continuing, its false gods prevailing, its poverty, squalor and misery enduring, its revolutions and its wars beclouding the future and turning every horizon that beckons mankind onward and upward into the bitter anguish of illusion and disappointment.

It is ten terrible years since parliament approached the revision of the banking laws—ten years of depression and of war. And while I know it is easy to say that things are so bad they cannot be worse, I have always believed it was better to remember that things can never be so good but what they might be better.

I remember appearing before the banking and commerce committee back in 1934, advocating some very heretical doctrines against orthodox finance. I came under the guidance of the like of Lincoln, and I laid down his programme with regard to the approach to national currency, when he said back in 1839:

We say that no duty is more imperative on the national government than the duty it owes the people of furnishing them a sound and uniform currency.

To achieve that, as our objective, we went before the banking and commerce committee; and the Liberal party coined the great expression, "Liberalism stands for the issue of currency and credit in terms of public need, not private gain." My hon. friends do not think that we have gone far enough, but let me say that the picture to-day is very different from what it was then. Liberalism has achieved much.

In 1934 we advocated a publicly-owned national bank that would become the centre of Canada's greatest public utility, her monetary system. That has been accomplished. We advocated the removal of the gold reserve limitation in the issue of full legal tender and national paper currency. That has been accomplished. Some of my hon. friends will laugh when I say that we have ownership of the Bank of Canada. Not only have we ownership of that bank; to-day there is in issue from that bank $1,400,000,000 of national currency serving this nation in war. We advocated the control and regulation of the international movement of currency, credit and investment. That has been accomplished. Our foreign exchange control board has proved to be an institution of tremendous power and invaluable service to the nation in this crisis.

We advocated then, not the rigid regimentation and controls necessary in war time, but that wages and prices and production and distribution and rents should be kept within the bounds of reason. We have proved that with the cooperation of the people these things can be controlled, and those controls are now in operation. We advocated also the use of taxation to aid in the regulation and circulation of the medium of exchange and to avoid inflation. It has been proved that that is a practical administrative power of government. All these reforms have taken place under a Liberal administration, and I venture to say that there are few nations to-day in the world that have a sounder foundation of finance upon which to approach the period after the war than Canada has under Liberal government.

Let me go just a little further and point to some of the other lessons that we have learned as a result of our experience in this war. We were always told that once we were a young country, and had not accumulated the money wealth that older civilizations possessed with which to build railways, canals, harbours, cities, villages and industries, we must conform to the rate of progress and the standards of government expenditure and taxation that would satisfy the money lenders in Berlin, Paris and London. It was there and there alone that money for capital investment was available. We were told that we must keep our credit good in the lending financial centres of the world. Well, we borrowed; we went into debt for everything we did, and we came out of the last war the most heavily indebted people in the world in proportion to our wealth and population. We carried an international debt which was proportionately greater than that of Germany.

What happened in this war? Of course our financial experts told us that we could finance only a hundred million-dollar war at the start. When we took on the British empire training scheme we were told we would have to cut down a portion of our other war work. Because of that bad advice by the financial experts of this country the preliminary war effort was crippled beyond measure. Following the retreat from Dunkirk, the collapse of France and the terrifying exposure of England's weakness, we came to the conclusion that Canada must defend herself, and our government wisely declared that no monetary consideration would stand in the way, that no limit would be placed upon the resources and energies of the people of Canada in this war effort.

What happened? We lifted our war budget from a hundred million to nearly a billion, then to two billion, then to three billion, and this year and last year it ranged in the vicinity of five thousand million dollars. What about these older centres that were supposed to possess the money wealth that we did not have? We lent England seven hundred million dollars and then found a billion dollar's worth of goods and services which were created by Canadian finance and energy. We did not borrow in Berlin because they had closed their door, and the Bank of France crowd in Paris had collapsed. We could not borrow in London because London did not have anything to lend us. Is anybody going to say that out of that experience Canada has not found her financial independence? Are we to go crawling to some international banker for money to put our people to work after this war for a better Canada? I think that would be just as ridiculous as to suggest that we might finance this war by issuing the five and a half per cent tax-free bonds that came from that banker Minister of Finance, Sir Thomas White, during the first war. That practice was during the years when the orthodox financiers ruled and it was said to be the soundest money that Canada ever issued; certainly the most expensive.

That kind of nonsense will never be repeated. Let us hope that no government will ever say that we have to borrow abroad to finance Canada's development when this war is over.

I am disturbed however because I am not so sure that what I think is excellent advice by our chief fiscal adviser, the governor of the Bank of Canada, has found the right kind of hearing in the ears of our Department of Finance. Let me quote what Mr. Towers has said to this government, which will be found in his annual report covering the work of the bank last year. He said:

> I do not wish to suggest that public debt could be increased at the present rate for an indefinite period without placing intolerable strain on our economy. I do feel, however, that the war debt, and the increases which will inevitably take place for a time after the war ends, can be handled without serious embarrassment.

The governor is taking in a fairly wide range of territory, because no one can predict with certainty when this war will end or what its repercussions will be when it does end, or what their cost will be. If we are able to handle an increase in our debt of anywhere from seven to ten billion dollars, why was it that we could not handle a debt of four billion dollars without bankruptcy and unemployment in 1935 and 1939? He goes on to say:

> A vastly increased volume of consumption and capital development will be necessary if this output is going to be fully absorbed and high employment maintained.

But here is the warning:

> The adjustments required will clearly be of unprecedented magnitude, and bold planning on the part of labour, farm and business organizations, as well as governments, is urgently needed.

Just why he left out the banks I do not know; for it does seem to me that their responsibility is just as great as that of the others mentioned.

Let me put the problem as I see it. We now face a world with tremendously improved capacity to produce consumers' goods. We now face a nation with a burden of debt unprecedented in history. Our cities are overtaxed and moving with difficulty under a debt load of one billion dollars; our provincial governments are carrying another debt load of two billion dollars; our federal government carries already a debt of eleven billion dollars, making a total of fourteen thousand million dollars of debt, which is the first fixed charge upon the payment of the taxpayers' money into the consolidated revenue. I have no hesitation in saying that if we are going to sustain full employment or high employment after the war and avoid the disastrous consequences of a post-war depression, government spending must continue on almost as large a scale in the period of adjustment as during the war years.

What are the programmes so far put forward? There is the $25,000,000 industrial development bank. I disagree with that, because I do not believe that a bank of that kind should be formed to go into competition with our commercial banks or private financing organizations. I do believe that we can repeat the experience of the United States in the establishment of a government agency—not a government bank—like the Reconstruction Finance Corporation which can give to this dominion the same tremendous assistance that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has given to the United States. When I look over the unprecedented changes in our proposed revision of the Bank Act to-day, the only fundamental change, Mr. Speaker, that I can find is the raising of the rate of interest to small borrowers from 7 to 9¾ per cent. Here again you have the old doctrine of making the poor pay for the service of the rich. If that provision comes out of the banking and commerce committee, it will come out only after I have given to it all the opposition that I can give. These provisions of finance fail to conceive, fail to apprehend and fail to present to parliament financial adjustments described in the language of the governor of the Bank of Canada as of unprecedented magnitude.

Let me indicate some of the things which we might do to meet the coming situation. There is a causeway to build across the straits of Canso, connecting the great industrial area of Cape Breton with Nova Scotia. There is a canal to build between the bay of Fundy and the gulf of the St. Lawrence. There is a tunnel to build between New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. There is a great St. Lawrence river to develop. There is Beauharnois already in action, and not supplying the needs. The St. Lawrence waterway and the powers of the Ottawa river have been crying for decades for development. Down our Canadian rivers flow in waste countless thousands of horse-power energy. Yes, Mr. Speaker, we can electrify our railway system and from that electrification distribute electricity to the rural areas. In the electrification of our railways, in the streamlining of our tracks, in the rebuilding of our railway equipment, obsolete for years, we can find employment for that vast army of highly trained technicians and artisans who have made a contribution in this war that has given us an industrial revolution we could not otherwise have achieved in probably a hundred years of peace.

If we are to move forward and live in this new world that is to come, it is the financing of expansions of that type, of unprecedented magnitude, that our Department of Finance and our monetary system will be called upon to do.

I want to say this in conclusion. When we were before the banking and commerce committee we advocated, in addition to the things that have been accomplished, something more. We advocated that the Bank of Canada should be the national bank, that it should be responsible for financing the federal government; but we also advocated that a suborganization of that bank should be established in every province, and that the responsibility of that suborganization would be the financing of our provincial and municipal governments. We did not propose to take over commercial banking or to socialize private finance, but we did ask for a complete segregation as between public finance, the financing of public enterprise, and the financing of private enterprise and acting as custodian for private money.

We have made, of course, great progress. But we can go farther. We can finance the building of a Canada that will stand out as one of the foremost nations of the world, because our twelve million people, Mr. Speaker, are I believe the richest twelve million people anywhere in the world. We have more in our possession and more work to do than any other people in the world, and unless we allow ourselves to be hobbled and fettered as we have been in the past by the bad advice of our financial experts and by the misguided theories of orthodox finance, we can not only give a lead to our own people but make Canada an example for the whole world to follow, and make it one of the brightest parts of the world of English-speaking people.

Let me say, on social services and taxation, that with a proper management of our national currency and our monetary system we can give the government more power and we can impose less taxes on the people. We must have peace with progress; we must have peace with progress and prosperity. We can do away with things like the cost of living sales tax. We can eliminate the need for taxing wage earners to the point where they have not enough left to maintain a decent standard of living. We can raise the wages of our school teachers. We can raise the wages of our postmen and of our policemen. Yes; we can finance these things with the same ease with which we have financed the war; we can bring about progress and prosperity for Canada through the budgets of our federal, provincial and municipal governments, and keep our economy moving forward on an even keel. It is along these lines, Mr. Speaker, that I feel we can approach with safety the revision of our Bank Act and monetary laws.

I do not think that I have by any means all the answers, but I believe the answers are there to be found, and that if we approach this great problem freed from the spirit of partnership, and uniting together, not in any spirit of critical antagonism to the Department of Finance, but more in the spirit of cooperative good will, we shall find the answers, we shall produce solutions, and we can look forward to the avoidance of that pitiable disruption which has swept over so much of the world in which we live.

But let me give you this warning. This land has no special dispensation against revolution or class conflict. Its seeds are already here. We have to face a world which is on the march forward, and if democracy as we know it is to survive, it will only be because it serves mankind as well as if not better than any other system of government.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): I congratulate the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) upon his very fine speech, and I should like to say a few words about this bill. Looking at it, one sees that the proposed changes are not numerous. It is not so long ago that the Liberal party included in its platform the proposal to establish a national central bank to control rediscount, currency and credit. Some time afterwards the then prime minister, Mr. Bennett, stole that plank from the platform of the Liberal party and himself established a central bank, which was the Bank of Canada. The leader of the opposition at that time, the leader of the Liberal party, complained that Mr. Bennett had stolen the banking programme of the party. Mr. Bennett was gifted as a speaker, and his imagination gave him lots of opportunity to find rich metaphors of speech, but when it came to constructive ideas for the building of this country or the improvement of business he often fell short. When the matter came before the Liberal party I was opposed to it, but finally I bowed to the majority of my colleagues who were in favour of that bank.

So many views have been expressed about credit that it is time to say what is usually meant by the word. Credit is not money, though money is often called credit; nor is it currency. Both money and currency are not principals; they are accessories to a transaction which is no less than a barrier. In the old times when there was no money, rich men exchanged camels, cattle, et cetera, for services or goods. Afterwards carved stones or other objects came into use, but there was something to offer in exchange for goods or services rendered. So many things have been said on this subject that people are under the impression that there is a spontaneous generation of credit, and that, for instance, when a man goes to the bank to secure a loan, an entry is made in the books and it is called credit, when in fact it is a debt of the bank to the individual, and the asset which the bank has to cover that debt is the guarantee which is given by the customer for the amount that is advanced to him by the bank. Therefore there is a transaction which is made by the bank in favour of a customer; but it cannot be extended indefinitely. It is done in certain cases.

One thing to be praised in banking is the decentralization of responsibility. There are managers located in various places, and they know the people; they know what their needs are, and they try to help them as much as they can. I will never say that the banking institutions which we have now are perfect, but they can be compared favourably with those of any other country, particularly with the banking system of the United States.

I have here a quotation from what was said by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) not so long ago, on March 3 of last year:

> There is no doubt that society as it is organized to-day does enable those who are economically strong to become stronger, and at the same time does have the effect of causing the economically weak in many of the great struggles of life to become weaker. While the wealth of the world has vastly increased, its distribution has become increasingly disproportionate.

On the same occasion the same gentleman spoke as follows:

> And if, as a result of the institution of private property, whether it be ownership of land or of capital, a special condition may develop which is inimical to the community as a whole, that institution has either to be modified in some particulars, controlled in some dealings, or make way for some other system.

On February 21, 1941, I mentioned in the house that there was considerable intrigue to bring about a union government in order that the rich might become richer and the poor be poorer. Two years later the Prime Minister declared that society as it is organized to-day does enable those who are economically strong, et cetera, to become stronger and has the effect of causing the economically weak to become weaker. The raison d'être of the Bank of Canada was to control rediscount, currency and credit. Was it not established ten years ago? If it failed of its purpose, why is it not abolished?

Here I have some remarks to make about the right of ownership and the distribution of wealth. It will be very difficult to establish a proportionate distribution of wealth, but the suggestion that wealth should be distributed in a certain proportion to all necessarily implies the right of all to ownership. It is clear that if no one has the right to own, no one would have the right to own any proportion of wealth, and if it is true that the distribution of wealth has become increasingly disproportionate, it is not because the wealth of the world has vastly increased, but precisely because the wealth of the few has vastly increased. Such a condition is due not to society as it is organized to-day but to society as it is disorganized to-day. Society as a whole should not be impeached for the excessive greed and unruly ambition of a few. If society is so much disorganized to-day, who is responsible for the fact that the greed and ambition of a few have not been checked in time? Who also is responsible for the fact that the strong became stronger and the economically weak, weaker, and if it was society that enabled them to become respectively stronger and weaker, how was it done? What was the length of the process in each case?

It is not the institution of private property, whether it be ownership of land or ownership of capital, which might develop into a social condition inimical to the community as a whole. It is the abuse of the institution of private property by the few which could do it. Therefore it would be illogical and unjust to conclude that the institution of private property must "be modified in some particulars, controlled in some directions, and should make way for some other system." The matter is too serious. It cannot be left like that. One should be ready to answer other pertinent questions with regard to the institution of private property, whether it be the ownership of land or of capital. First, in what particulars should it be modified and by whom? Second, in what direction should it be controlled and by whom? Third, for what other system should it make way?

There should be no mental reservations, no demagogic appeals. Social security will never be artificially established, it will never exist unless the causes of social insecurity are suppressed. This is a most important point. If there is something wrong in our banking system, what is it? It cannot be only the increase of interest on small loans. That is unfortunate, and I hope it will be corrected, as my hon. friend who has just spoken said. But there are other things. We must go to the source of the evil. We must see what is the best that can be done with regard to banking.

At the present time the Bank of Canada is apparently independent of the Minister of Finance as well as the House of Commons. When the question was up before, the Minister of Finance said, on June 2, 1941—time passes very quickly—that the Bank of Canada is independent of the finance department and of the House of Commons. Sir, I regret very much that I cannot agree with such a theory. I find it unsound, and for the information of the minister I will quote Hansard, page 3376, 1941:

Mr. Blackmore: Do I understand the minister to say that the Bank of Canada is not directly under the control of the Department of Finance?

Mr. Ilsley: Correct.

Mr. Blackmore: That it is independent of the finance department, and therefore independent of this house?

Mr. Ilsley: Correct.

Mr. ILSLEY: But I modified that later in a very careful statement. I answered Mr. Blackmore a little hastily that day.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes. But on the other hand, when I asked the minister's predecessor—not his immediate predecessor, but the one before, Mr. Dunning—for some information on the Bank of Canada, I was denied that information. I was told that it was none of my business to know about the expenses of a Bank of Canada doorman who travelled around the world. I do not know what are the relations between the Minister of Finance and the Bank of Canada. It is impossible for a member of parliament to attend all the sittings of the house and to read Hansard from the first page to the last, but there was something abnormal in the condition under which the Bank of Canada was created and left on an ivory tower.

I hope the minister will make clear what are the relations between himself and the Bank of Canada, but at the present time he should not be the only intermediary between the Bank of Canada and the House of Commons. He should have control over the Bank of Canada and he should submit to the control of the House of Commons.

We hear about the nationalization of banks. It is often mentioned in public that our banking system should be nationalized. When the Bank of Canada was created. it was created under private ownership and Mr. Bennett gave the reason for establishing it in a way contrary to the system that had been operating for years. The capital was privately owned, and the policy of this government afterwards was different; they made it publicly owned. The government purchased the shares and we were told that the Bank of Canada was a public, a national institution. It is a mushroom. It is impossible to know what is going on there, and those people are not in contact with the House of Commons at all. We must have certain information from them, and also from the Minister of Finance, but in the present stage it is impossible to get information. How many times did I ask questions about the Bank of Canada and was told that, as in the case of the railways, the government did not have to answer? This is the old story. So long as the capital stock of the Bank of Canada was privately owned, while there was not exactly a raison d'être there was something like a raison d'être for establishing it; but as soon as the government bought the private stock and made it government owned, then the Bank of Canada had no longer a raison d'être and we should have dispensed with it. It could be easily done. It is done in other countries. The government has control over banking in other countries. The position of the Chancellor of the Exchequer with the Bank of England is an example to follow in this dominion. In England they would never stand for a system such as the one we have here. Their policies are not made by experts; they are made by the government. This government may consider the suggestions that are made to them by the experts of the various departments, but, sir, is it not essential that the policy itself be made not by these experts but by the government? At the present time we can see where it differs from the past. In the old days when a member went to see the minister, the minister used to call the official in charge and ask him what was his answer to the complaint of the member, and then the minister decided what had to be done. But now conditions are entirely different. The same official is called and the minister asks him to decide what to do. The minister is there just as an intermediary between the member and the department, and the one who is always right and makes no mistake is the official in charge. I do not believe that the Bank of Canada will serve any purpose so long as we have that system of irresponsibility.

I should like to have the gift of speech of my friend the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) to describe the future as I should like it to be for the boys and the girls in the armed services, as well as for all our fellow citizens. But there were two things he said that seemed to be contradictory. He said that we have a burden of debt unprecedented in this country, which is true. He then expressed the desire that we should impose less taxes in the future. How can it be done with such a heavy burden of debt? Then he said that the Bank of Canada should be a national bank. So long as it is constituted as it is now, the Bank of Canada will never be a national bank. Even if the Bank of Canada is an international bank, our credit should be controlled by the nation. That is why it is important that the Minister of Finance should have a check on the Bank of Canada, and that he should be responsible to parliament for the general policies that are followed by that organization.

It would be a great mistake to put into the heads of our fellow citizens the thought that they will be given as much credit as Santa Claus distributes in Christmas gifts if a certain party comes into power. Those things are most dangerous. We should not expose our fellow citizens to disillusion. I recognize the sincerity of all my colleagues, although I do not agree with many of them. They want the redressment of wrongs. Wrongs will be redressed when the supremacy of parliament is recognized as the medium to correct the evils. Canadian citizens have a right to petition parliament for the redressment of a wrong. How can they petition parliament for the redressment of a wrong done by the Bank of Canada when there is no link between parliament and that bank? There may have been mistakes in judgment, and even mistakes of policy, on the part of some banks at certain times; but what is the remedy? It is easy to say to anybody: we will see to it that you will get unlimited credit. It was done in France. It was done at the time of the French revolution, and assignat fell down to nothing. It was done in Germany after the war, and the mark fell to next to nothing. It was easy to be a millionaire in Germany, to have a million marks. You could get them for a few cents. We shall not expose our country to such depreciation of money.

I may have some questions to ask when the committee sits, and I shall ask my good friend, the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Moore), who is the chairman of the committee, to afford me the opportunity of asking some questions of the witnesses when they appear. But let us be very careful about making a change in what has been going rather well. When there are not too many complaints it is dangerous to make a change. It was dangerous to change the rules of the house. Would it not be dangerous to make too many changes in the banking system?

Let us not forget, sir, that the so-called prosperity which the Canadian people are enjoying is superficial. There are expenditures in large brackets, but sooner or later it will have to be paid. It cannot go on like that all the time. There are high wages paid and contracts are let here and there, but we are in a very precarious situation. There are many people who worry about the future, and who ask themselves what will happen when the war is over. It is time to think of that and to be very careful about the adoption of new schemes, whether they are proposed by financial wizards or others. When I speak of "financial wizards" I speak of the experts who are the advisers of the government. Sooner or later the day will come when the huge amount of taxation that is increasing will have to be paid, and it will not be a service to render to the boys who are fighting now in all corners of the world to welcome them with financial embarrassments as soon as they are discharged from the army. That is a matter for serious consideration, and I hope, sir, that no one will forget that the burden of taxation will be harder to decrease so long as the Canadian people are not told the truth in very simple language.

Mr. F. D. SHAW (Red Deer): In approaching the subject of banks and banking practice I am not at all unmindful of the extraordinary human characteristic which renders it virtually impossible for some apparently reasonable human beings to approach a new idea without a good deal of prejudice and hostility. I think this unusual characteristic was very well dealt with by Sir Grafton Elliot Smith in his introduction to "Human History". I propose to read a short extract from his publication. It is as follows:

> The vast majority of mankind thus accepts without question the guidance of tradition, and by sheer inertia loses the ability to observe or interpret evidence in any sense other than the conventional one that has been instilled into them by custom. Everyone who has ever called attention to facts, or inferences from them, that came into conflict with fashionable doctrines must have been made to realize how little influence the experience of the scientific developments of the last three centuries has had upon men's readiness to make even the simplest observation, or to admit the truth of the most obvious principles.

He goes on:

> Most men, even without being consciously dishonest or wilfully stupid, seem to be unable to examine heterodox views with understanding and impartiality.

And one final sentence:

> The inertia of tradition and the lack of courage to defy it when new evidence fails to conform to it seems to be potent to blind all to the most patent facts.

Any approach to the consideration of financial policy must be made with a clear concept of the relationship of finance to the national activity and human welfare.

Early in his speech the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) read several quotations, statements of persons whom I believe it is possible for us to look upon as experts in their field. It is my purpose to make reference to several other statements of leading statesmen with respect to the relationship of financial policy to the whole life of a community.

It was the Right Hon. Ramsay MacDonald, twice Prime Minister of Great Britain, who said:

> Finance can command the sluices of every stream that runs to turn the wheels of industry, and can put fetters upon the feet of every government that is in existence.

President Woodrow Wilson of the United States spoke in rather emphatic terms when he said:

> The greatest monopoly in this country is the monopoly of big credits. A great industrial nation is controlled by its system of credits. The growth of the nation therefore and of all our activities are in the hands of a few men who chill and check and destroy genuine economic freedom.

Then, coming a little nearer to our own day, we have read of President Roosevelt saying:

> He who controls the money wields sovereign power.

His Holiness Pope Pius XI asserted in even more emphatic terms:

> Control of financial policy is control of the very life-blood of the entire economic body.

Then, as was pointed out last night, the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) asserted in part:

> Until the control of currency and credit is restored to the government and recognized as its most conspicuous responsibility, all talk of the sovereignty of parliament is idle and futile.

Those, added to the quotations of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard will, I believe, suffice to indicate to us the extreme importance of whatever type of financial system may be functioning at any given time in any country.

We have had one government succeeding another, here and elsewhere, and it is interesting to note the situations which confronted various governments upon their attaining office. First in this regard I may refer to Mr. Gladstone, a great statesman of other days, who said:

> From the time I took office as chancellor I began to learn that the state held, in the face of the bank and city, an essentially false position on finance.

The hinge of the whole situation, he said, was this:

> The government itself was not to be a substantive power in matters of finance, but was to leave the money power supreme and unquestioned.

President Woodrow Wilson, referring to the situation with which he was confronted, asserted, in part, that he discovered that the banking system of his country, which was not engaged in the production of anything, wielded a tremendous power, in fact a power exceeding that of government.

Mr. Chesterton, the writer, commenting upon the situation from his point of view, is reported as having said:

> The main mark of modern government is that we do not know who governs de facto any more than de jure. We see the politicians and not his backer, still less the backer of the backer; or—

What is most important of all.

—the banker of the backer.

He continues:

> Throned above us all, in a manner without parallel in all the past, is veiled the prophet of finance, swaying all men's lives by a sort of magic and delivering oracles in a language not understanded of the people.

In Canada we did, in the early thirties, enter upon a depression. I know it has been argued in most vehement terms that banking policy and banking practice were neither responsible for nor had any influence upon those conditions. I hardly subscribe to that view. I think there is enough evidence for any man to draw sensible deductions. We know, for example, that between 1929 and 1933 the volume of purchasing power in Canada fell by approximately fifty per cent. In other words, credit and currency available to the Canadian people with which to purchase those things which they were capable of producing had vanished. I use the word "vanish" with considerable emphasis. It is true that very early in the thirties most of our banking institutions anticipated slumps. They were quite bold about making known that fact. Because of that anticipation they curtailed their loans drastically. All one had to do was to go out among the people who had not previously experienced any difficulty in borrowing. They were suddenly cut off. Is there anyone who will argue that when those institutions, in anticipation of such a situation, curtailed their lending policy it did not add immeasurably to the difficulties which were fast approaching? It is interesting to note what the late Hon. Michael J. Savage, former Prime Minister of New Zealand, had to say with respect to this. The annual report of the reserve bank of that country was being examined; certain projects of a national character had been advocated, and the reserve bank had recommended the holding up of public works in anticipation of an economic slump. Mr. Savage referred to that decision in the following words, in which I concur:

> It is the orthodox point of view, but it is one which I do not hold. It is based on the theory that slumps are inevitable, but I prefer to think that bad times should only arise from famine or from some similar natural cause. There is no evidence that our production is breaking down.

I think that was also quite true of Canada. He goes on:

> Therefore the only way in which a slump can happen is through people being unable to buy what they are able to produce. With adequate purchasing power spread over the community and production maintained, there is no earthly reason why any section of the community should suffer distress.

I think we all witnessed that situation during the depression. Governments were drastically curtailing their activities, including public works. Men who had been employed found themselves without adequate incomes, in some cases without any. They discovered themselves unable to produce and the production of others was therefore curtailed or discontinued. And all the while the banking institutions, whose sole interest was the making of money out of their operations, were making no endeavour to pump money or credit into the stream of purchasing power to assist in alleviating the distress.

I have always laboured under the impression that the original intention of our medium of exchange was to assist in the movement of those things which we are capable of producing to those places where a demand exists. We fear that under the set-up as we know it, what I will call the monopolistic banking system, we have lost sight completely of the real function of our medium of exchange. Back in 1934 and the early days of 1935 there were established across this country relief camps in which boys were paid twenty cents a day. A government which was dependent upon taxation of an impoverished people or borrowings from the chartered banks could not find any more than twenty cents a day. At that the Conservative government was better able to handle the situation than the Liberal government, because when the Liberals came into power they closed the camps; they could not find the twenty cents a day.

Under the system of financing which we have known, not only have we failed to maintain a stable economy, not only have we failed to make provision for willing and capable people to meet the demands for what they themselves are capable of producing, but we have built up a colossal debt, oftentimes referred to by myself as an eternal debt. I know it is true the governor of the Bank of Canada has gone on record as asserting that a national debt is an asset; I know Doctor Cyril James has gone on record as saying that the debt will go on increasing for a hundred years; I know the Minister of Finance has indicated that they have hidden somewhere a scientific scheme or plan for taking care of it, but I still say that I fear the growth of that debt. The previous speaker has indicated that the service charges on that debt will be the first claim against the treasury. If we are not intending to; if we are not by force of circumstances placed in a position where we must disillusion the boys and girls of our services, then it is most essential that the finance minister make known that scientific scheme which is supposed to be lurking somewhere.

That debt is the real enemy of our future. I would go farther and say that it is the real robber of our economic freedom. Let us go back for years, to about 1880, and note the growth of our national debt. To-day it is in the neighbourhood of $11 billion. Let us consider what the interest charges alone on that debt will mean in taxation after the war. If we realize also that there will be certain other fixed charges to be met before we shall be able to provide for the ordinary everyday responsibilities of government we shall have a picture of the taxation structure which will have to be maintained in this country after the cessation of hostilities.

I cannot subscribe to the idea that there will be a drastic reduction in taxation after this war. Every time that is suggested to me I reflect back upon the introduction of the income tax act and remember how it was presumed to have been an emergency measure to be dispensed with after it had served its purpose. In the way it has grown and multiplied and developed since it was first introduced would put bacteria to shame. As I say, I shall not try to delude anyone by suggesting that under the present system of financing there can be any drastic reduction in taxation after the war. The hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) cautioned us against disillusioning the people in our services. The greatest disillusionment they can ever be faced with will be that disillusionment which will meet them when they come back and discover that the government cannot finance even those projects and rehabilitation measures which it has promised it will put into effect. Nothing, Mr. Speaker, will render that programme null and void sooner than a continuation of the system of financing which we are and have been using. The hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) indicated that the government had not offered in its proposed amendments very much more in the way of a revision of the Bank Act than was offered in 1934. Putting two and two together I would suggest, then, that we cannot hope for much more under this revision than we have had in the years from 1934 onwards.

I said in my opening remarks that one is always met with hostility when one undertakes to discuss those things which over a period of years have been made most mysterious. Those responsible for the present financial system have developed a strange kind of double talk; we know that. We are looked upon with a sort of sympathy when we dare to discuss the matter. I know that in Alberta, when we undertook in the early thirties to teach even the elementary truths of finance, we were ridiculed and condemned. I recall saying in 1934, for example, that the banks create credits. Even the banking institutions were ridiculing us for saying that. We stated that ninety per cent of a bank's business is done on credit of its own creation. Yesterday we voted on a subamendment in this house and no one rose in his place and said that the subamendment was out of order because the banks do not create credit. So that we see that one truth has now come to prevail.

I remember, too, declaring that to tie our money to gold was a fantastic procedure, and at that time the supporters of this type of orthodox finance went about the country saying to the people, " Ladies and gentlemen, if you take away gold from behind your money and credit it will of necessity become valueless." But we have seen that fallacy exploded. We have seen our gold reserves completely removed and placed apart from our financial system, unless of course you tie in your foreign exchange control board with the financial system; but so far as the relationship of gold to money is concerned, there is not even a forty-second cousin relationship.

Again, about ten years ago, we pointed out that the chartered banks were primarily concerned with improving and strengthening their own positions regardless of the welfare of the people. These same institutions, through the Canadian Bankers' Association—then hired one by the name of Vernon Knowles—I do not know whether he is related to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—to travel back and forth across western Canada telling the farm people how poverty stricken those banking institutions were. He did not tell the people that the banks which had moved out of those non-profit areas moved out because there were no profits left. The people's welfare did not matter. He did not tell the truth to the people in those communities: We cannot make enough out of you any more, and that is why we are leaving. But he managed to concoct some other explanation for it. At the same time the bankers carried full-page advertisements in all our newspapers telling the people how poverty stricken they were. From that day to this the banks have been on the air with little playlets like "John Farmer and his Wife": John Farmer got a loan and thus has been able to do this and do that, and improve his status materially. I am almost tempted to ask them to base their next ten serials upon what happened when most John Farmers did not get loans.

In 1940 the Canadian Bankers' association became so fearful of the growing feeling among our Canadian people from coast to coast that there must be something wrong with our financial system, that it became active in politics. Oh, not openly, I grant you, but I am reasonably certain, at least certain to my own satisfaction, that in 1940 that organization poured substantial sums of money into the "Independent" coffers in Alberta after bringing about a wedding of the Liberals and Conservatives as an "Independent" organization to oppose the government which had enlightened the people of Alberta on monetary matters.

I was surprised that my friends of the Progressive Conservative party voted as they did last night on the subamendment. I quite understand that that was their prerogative. Yet they have come out before the country as progressives, and there was a possibility of a number of seats in Canada for them. But after last night I must withdraw any suggestion of that possibility so far as the western half of Canada is concerned. But there the people have become a little enlightened with respect to the machinations of the present financial set-up.

It is not my purpose even to try to go into details upon the second reading of this bill. The measure will go before the banking and commerce committee, where I am sure our Social Credit representatives on the committee will have a great deal to say about the lack of consideration which the government has given to necessary amendments.

As to the amendment which we are now debating I must express this view. If we undertake to unite the government and the present financial system, the present financial system will swallow the government. My personal feeling is that it is most essential that we make basic changes now in this revision of the Bank Act. But if the Bank Act is left almost intact, practically as it is now after this revision, a government coming into power within the next two or three years and determined to put into effect a democratic financial system will find itself confronted with a situation where, if it endeavours to take over the banking institutions, the banking institutions will swallow that government. I contend that it is most essential that we concentrate our attention upon the most necessary changes in the act at the present time. There is plenty of time to take other steps should further action become necessary. We never know what to-morrow holds.

Last evening the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Rose) referred to our party. I am sorry he is not in his place at the moment. I thought it was just too bad that a man who is presumed to have a good deal of understanding and who represents such a fine constituency gave evidence of such colossal misunderstanding of the matter of money. As he spoke last evening I could not help thinking how he and his party have been playing to the government for the past year. I should like to ask him, and maybe, if he reads Hansard, he will answer me, why is that party playing to the government, particularly when in 1940, alluding to the same government with whom they are endeavouring to work up a romance, they referred to them as "dictators", "robbers and plunderers", "capitalist war-mongers", "Canadian imperialists", "bare-faced liars"—I am only reading, Mr. Speaker, from one of their own publications—"violators of solemn treaties"—

Mr. TUCKER: What is the hon. member reading from?

Mr. SHAW: I am reading from the 1940 election manifesto of the communist party. They were "war profiteers", they were "parasitical ruling classes", they were "supporters of a bloody criminal war, a ghastly crime against humanity, plunderers and killers of the common people", and to end up, "thieves".

Mr. TUCKER: Is that all?

Mr. SHAW: That is all; and if that is not found in this publication I will condescend to eat the platform, although I am sure it would give me violent indigestion.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That pretty well covers it, though.

Mr. SHAW: I merely point out to the hon. member who assails us that throughout the session he and his party have supported a government which only four years ago they characterized as being any one or more of these fourteen or fifteen things. Is there a subtle purpose?

I have practically concluded my remarks. I had one or two other things to say with respect to this situation, but the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) and the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) have intimated by inference that my statements would not be parliamentary, and therefore I shall not say what I was going to say.

After the last war the Right Hon. David Lloyd George, in speaking of the conference which settled the Dawes reparation pact, made this statement:

The international bankers—

In a moment I am going to make this read "national" bankers.

—swept statesmen, politicians, journalists and jurists all on one side, and issued their orders with the imperiousness of absolute monarchs who knew that there was no appeal against their ruthless decrees.

I wonder whether after this war we shall have to face the people of Canada, including our boys and girls of the service personnel, men of the merchant marine and all those associated with war industry, and confess that "we have failed in granting to you those things for which you have been prepared to make the supreme sacrifice, all because our national bankers have swept our statesmen, politicians, journalists and jurists aside", in making decisions which rendered impossible the doing of those things which I think we all feel in our own hearts that our fighting personnel and others have earned for themselves.

Mr. FREDERIC DORION (Charlevoix-Saguenay): I should like to say a few words in order to make as clear as possible the reasons why I am going to support the amendment moved by the leader of the Canadian Commonwealth Federation party. I will admit very frankly that I am not at all an expert in financial matters, but during my twenty-three years of law practice I have seen so many cases in which the banks were involved in one way or another, that I think it my duty to say that I am in favour of the nationalization of the banks.

I sometimes wonder why the banking system is practically the only thing which has not been the object of direct control by the government since the outbreak of the war. Boards and commissions of all kinds have been created to control almost every kind of production, but we have not yet seen any board to control the production of credit. Must we come to the conclusion that finance is something sacrosanct, that it is above all human beings, that it is so strong that no government can touch it, that it is so powerful that no government dares to control it? Would it not be true then that we are only the serfs of finance, that we are only permitted to pay tribute to it? The manpower of this country is under the direct control of the government. Every means is taken to ascertain that all our young men are called under arms. We even see orders which oblige fathers to hand their sons over to the country, to denounce them. Why do we act altogether differently when we need money? Why not submit this money power to the will and the needs of the government, as we do for the manpower. We know that at this very moment, on the eve of a most gigantic struggle, which will cost thousands of lives and the greatest suffering humanity has ever known, in Switzerland financiers of high rank representing United States, British and German finance are quietly seated at a table studying methods of bettering the position of international finance. Must we resign ourselves to the conclusion that we cannot get rid of this powerful organization? Must we understand that all our miseries, all our sacrifices, are only a tribute to satisfy the appetite of this monster? I believe, Mr. Speaker, that it is our duty as representatives of the people to do our utmost to correct this state of affairs, and one of the means would be the nationalization of the banks and their control by the representatives of the people. There may be better means, but I do not know of them.

Every day we hear about reconstruction, rehabilitation, social services, and the rest. My contention is that we shall never do anything good unless the government gets absolute control of the financial system. We often hear, as we did this afternoon, about tremendous public works which should be undertaken after the war. But where are we to get the necessary money to execute these works under the present financial system? Are we to continue borrowing millions and millions every year? This is possible at the present time because the people who lend their money want to get the war over as soon as possible, but after the war will they be ready to lend their money to the government as they do now? And even if they do, can the public debt continue going up at the rate of over two billions a year? Everyone must admit that the taxpayers are overtaxed. Can we expect to be able to draw from them so much money every year without any hope of any reduction?

Let this question of credit be settled and a great many of our problems will be solved at once. Let me remind you, Mr. Speaker, that during the depression period, from 1929 to 1939, hundreds of bankruptcies were forced by the banks. I could give you a great number of names of merchants and businessmen who could have survived if the banks had not forced them to reimburse at once and on very short notice the moneys that had been advanced to them. I think the saying is quite true that the banks make loans when business is good and refuse to do so when business is not so good. The people demand that this system be corrected. The banking system is essentially a public service and should be dealt with accordingly.

Mrs. DORISE W. NIELSEN (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, speaking on the bill now before the house, I must admit that my chief interest is, of course, as you would expect it to be, in the proposed changes in the Bank Act dealing with the question of agricultural credits. When I spoke in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne I was one of those, I believe I was one of the first of those who rose to speak, who mentioned the necessity of legislation being brought down during this session to provide for our agricultural needs facilities such as were to be provided by the industrial development bank. The proposals we find embodied in this bill do not in my opinion meet with any degree of adequacy the needs of our farming people.

I shall be able to deal with the proposals later when the bill is under consideration clause by clause. At the moment it is enough for me to say that the proposals, first of all, to allow farm implements and equipment to be used as security for loans issued by the chartered banks, and, second, with regard to the passing of a farm improvement loan act similar to the home improvement act by which the government will guarantee loss on such loans up to ten per cent, as a measure to provide intermediate credits to the farming people, cannot in my opinion possibly fulfil the requirements.

As the bill stands, I would feel it incumbent upon me to vote against it, but fortunately it is not at present before us in such a form as necessitates a definite vote against it. It will be going before the committee, where I sincerely hope the members of the committee from farming communities will do their utmost to see to it that under the act a different form of bank credits will be set up to deal with the farm situation. As the measure now stands, I think it leaves the farmers completely at the mercy of the chartered banks, as they have been for many years. In fact, throughout the whole period of western development, particularly during the last decade, western farmers have learned to their great cost and sorrow what it means to have no other resource than the chartered banks when they are in need of loans for carrying on their farming business, which is their means of livelihood.

This bill definitely does not go far enough to meet the credit needs of the west. There is need for farm credit. I would go so far as to say that the production of food has been marvellous when we consider the fact that we have lost so many people from our farms. In the neighbourhood of 350,000 people have left our farms, and yet the production of food has gone up forty per cent. That is a marvellous achievement. But had the farmers of the west been able to have their agricultural credit or loan requirements satisfied for the purpose of equipping themselves with the various things which are necessary to enable them to increase their food production, we should have had an even more marvellous production than under the present circumstances.

There is and will be in the post-war years need to have easy credit for farmers, because all members will agree that, great as are the demands on the nation for the production of food during the war, those demands will not cease with the cessation of hostilities, and the continued increase in food production will be one of the most gigantic tasks that will face the country. Definitely, therefore, our farmers will have to have help in this direction.

In the discussion of a bill such as this, I have to be guided in my attitude by certain factors. First of all, Mr. Speaker, I must impress upon you that I represent in this house very broad sections of people from the North Battleford riding. I do not represent any one small narrow section of people there. In fact, I would remind you that roughly about 11,000 of those people in that northern riding sent me to this house to uphold first, of course, democratic principles and then to work on their behalf for all measures, whoever might advocate them or give them to the people, which would increase the living standards of Canadians, particularly of our farmers and those in the small towns and villages who depend upon the farmers for their living.

My duty—and I view my work in this house very seriously and honestly—is to vote for such concrete measures of reform as the great majority of the people in North Battleford are ready and willing to work for and to support, and I would say this again to the members of the house that in my opinion no society can move forward more rapidly than the majority of its people are prepared to move. That must be the guiding principle to those of us who are in the position of guiding and directing the policy and legislation of the country.

One thing I must make clear and it is this. Those who voted for reform and for progressive measures to make better the living conditions of the farming community belong to various political parties. People of all shades of political opinion supported the farm programme which was my guide when I came here. I, too, have ideas of my own. I myself do not hesitate at all, nor have I ever hesitated, to say that I am a socialist, and I believe that socialism will be the successor of capitalism just as capitalism was the successor of feudalism, but only as the people understand socialism, and when the great majority of them are ready to adopt it. Public ownership of banks will be a necessary part of the socialism of this country when the people are prepared and ready for it. I am one of those who believe definitely that no minority of any country can impose socialism upon the majority who are not ready for it; for that definitely would mean civil war. It would mean chaos; it might mean bloodshed, and no one who is interested in the welfare of the people can hope that social advancement has to come by suffering in that way. Suffering is something which all of us who have seen it through the years of depression would hope to prevent, not to bring about.

The majority of the people will be ready to accept socialism only when capitalism shows definitely that it is not capable of providing them further with the necessities and comforts of living which they desire.

Mr. WRIGHT: What happened in 1930?

Mrs. NIELSEN: When capitalism fails to provide employment, when it can no longer provide a living, that is the time when people begin to turn to other means and to find a way out and a solution. We have already had a period in which capitalism did show such signs of a break-down. That was during the years of depression when capitalism did not provide employment, when it did not give even the necessities of life to thousands. But it is wrong for us to-day to base our arguments upon the premise which existed in the years of depression. I would say we are foolish, and we are more than foolish, we are blind if we refuse to acknowledge and to accept the fact that this war of such gigantic and global proportions has changed the picture of the world. This war has made its impact upon all countries. It has strengthened capitalism in Canada. I do not know how anyone would disagree with me over that.

Here we are emerging after those years of war, not as a somewhat small and backward country relying almost entirely upon agriculture, but as a great industrial country. We are emerging as the third world trading nation and the fourth largest producer of the united nations war supplies.

Some people who want to socialize Canada may perhaps feel, in seeing this changed condition in Canada, that their hopes are receding; but there is emerging from this war one other factor, which those of us who are realists will have to acknowledge. We have to see that emerging from this war is something new in world relationships, something which is vast and far-reaching in consequence, a condition which might yet sound perhaps to many people as being unbelievable. There is now a recognition by the great powers that a new alignment of world forces has taken place, which may possibly continue, namely, an alignment between the capitalist nations of the world and the one great socialist state of the world, in which they not only fight unitedly against a common enemy, but where they say definitely that there is a prospect and a new horizon where they can work and cooperate together in the future for the good of them all.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mrs. NIELSEN: Mr. Speaker, before recess I was speaking about the changing pattern of international relationships brought about by the war. The three great leaders of the united nations have agreed that they, and the nations for whom they speak, are, as they put it, friends—in fact, in spirit and in purpose. This is something of great significance to the peoples of the world.

I once heard a man try to describe a giraffe to a little boy who had never seen one. After the man had tried to describe the animal to the boy, he looked up and said, "Why, there is no such animal." And so it is with this new world concept of socialism and capitalism living in peace together. Many people say that it will not work. But, Mr. Speaker, my contention is that it does work, and that it is working right now. We are fighting together, fighting for our very lives, and the blood of our boys will mingle with that of Red army boys, British boys, Tito's men, boys from the United States, Chinese—in fact men of all the nations and all peoples who are fighting with us to destroy fascism.

Afterwards, we who wish to see a better world rise out of the ashes of the old, will continue this cooperation that we have achieved during the war. Why? Because it is apparent to all of us that it is to our mutual advantage. The Soviet Union, China, the European countries, India, those countries which have borne the brunt of war to a greater degree than we have, will need to be rebuilt. They will do it more quickly if they have materials from us. Of course we should understand that the Soviet Union can rebuild her economy alone. It would take her longer to do it, but she is not nearly so dependent upon us as we are upon her. That is a fact which Canadians should remember. We need the cooperation of the Soviet Union. We know that the Soviet Union will be one of the greatest buying nations in the world after the war, and it is imperative for us that we have markets in order that our farmers can continue, and even increase the production of food; so that we can have increased employment on our farms, and better living conditions on them; so that industrial workers and returned men can have employment, and so that our national income can be kept at high levels, or even increased. This is the changing pattern of world relationships in which Canada has a place and where, for the sake of our own future, we must be one of a family of world nations.

It may be that in such a world as this it will take much longer than some of us have thought previously to achieve socialism for Canada. But it will be a world where the nations are at peace, where peace is something which we can hope will continue for many years into the future, a world where we can all within the democratic framework work for more and better reforms, a rising standard of living and an increase of home markets. For the first time in the history of the world there is the possibility now before us, a perspective of achieving socialism, slowly perhaps, but peacefully, though over a longer period of time.

I want to see social advances achieved peacefully. I disagree with those who to-day persist in saying that socialism is the economy we must have now, or immediately after the war. I disagree with those who say that immediate socialization or nationalization of the banks is imperative, and has to be brought about. If socialism is made an issue now, the forces of reaction in this country—and they still exist and are very active—will take up the challenge. Large numbers of people in Canada fear socialism because they do not understand it, and they will turn to the support of a party which leads in its denunciation of socialism, namely, the Progressive Conservative party. But if reaction in Canada—and I do not necessarily mean all those who are members of the Progressive Conservative party, but refer rather to a group headed by the old Tory gang—ever gets into the saddle again, it means imperialist policies once more for Canada. It means power blocs being once again formed in the world; it means once again that trade will be limited to within the confines of the British empire, or perhaps a small periphery of nations around it. And, despite Mr. Bracken's clever hedging on the question, we would then necessarily have unemployment; we would have a lack of markets for the product of our farms; we would have stagnation and, finally and inevitably, we would come to world war No. 3.

If the leaders of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation persist in making socialism an issue now, and refuse to see the changing pattern of the world, they would lead the people into the arms of such a catastrophe and would have much to answer for as time goes on. I have lived and worked among people who belong to the C.C.F. They are friends of mine. I know that all those who belong to the C.C.F. do not agree with this idea of insisting upon socialism now, under changed world conditions.

I should like to quote from some of the Gallup polls recently brought to my attention. I am not going to say that a Gallup poll is 100 per cent correct; it is not. But it is an indication of public feeling, and possibly is accurate within a margin of four per cent one way or the other. For that reason I believe it is a fairly safe indication. A while ago a Gallup poll was taken in Canada, and the result was published in the Montreal Star of February 23. The question asked was this:

> Which of these men do you think would do the best job of representing Canada at the peace table—Mackenzie King, John Bracken, M. J. Coldwell or some other?

I direct the attention of the house to the fact that of those people who were part and parcel of the ranks of the C.C.F. only sixty-two per cent wished to see the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) at the peace table. In my opinion they are afraid of the tendency which he is now showing, one which is not necessary and not right. We find that thirty-eight per cent of the rank and file of the C.C.F. wanted some other person. Some wanted Mr. King; some wanted Mr. Bracken, and some wanted somebody else.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have allowed the hon. member to go far afield, but I must call her attention to the fact that we are discussing the Bank Act. I hope she will confine her remarks to that subject.

Mrs. NIELSEN: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that you have thought I am going too far from the Bank Act, but I must point out that we are discussing an amendment offered by the C.C.F. to the measure now before the house. I would add further that the C.C.F. are asking for the nationalization or government control of the banks. I am against that, and I want to make it clear why I am against it. I must ask Your Honour's leniency in this matter, and would point out that a Gallup poll was published recently on this very question, which I believe is relevant to the debate. This is an actual question which was asked of the people.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am afraid the Gallup poll has nothing to do with the Bank Act.

Mrs. NIELSEN: I would point out that the question was, "Do you think the government should own or operate the banks of Canada, or should we continue with the present system?"

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carry on.

Mrs. NIELSEN: Among those Canadians who say that they would vote for the C.C.F., not quite half agree to government-owned or, shall we say, socialized banks in Canada. The actual figure of those C.C.F. people who want government-owned and controlled banks stood at forty-nine per cent. Those supporting the present system totalled forty per cent, and there were eleven per cent undecided.

When I consider as to how I am going to vote on this question I find that not even all members of the C.C.F. support their leader's proposals. And I have far wider sections of my people at home to consider. Not only members of the C.C.F. sent me here.

I want to make this very clear. I am not against the socialization of the banks now because I am satisfied with the banking system as it exists. I am not. There has been too much exploitation of our farmers for me to be in complete agreement with this bill as it stands. The banks have failed dismally in time of need to provide credits for our farm people.

In my opinion the greatest need of this nation to-day is for unity to win the war. That should be the overriding consideration of everyone; nothing should come before that. Unity to win the war is our first duty, and then there should be a unity of all forward thinking people after the war to build the good life for Canadians, to give jobs and security on the land and to provide peace. The issue of socialism now splits and divides our people and prevents that national unity which is necessary for the winning of the war and the peace.

Suggestions with regard to an agricultural bank have been made to the minister in the past by certain bodies, which I imagine he regards as being made up of responsible people. I should like to quote from the report of the royal commission on banking and currency in Canada which sat in 1933, the so-called Macmillan report. I do this in order to show that away back in 1933 it was considered that certain changes with regard to agricultural credits were necessary. I quote from paragraph 241 of the report as follows:

> In the first place, the fact that the provincial governments decided to engage in these experiments (e.g. making loans to farmers through provincial institutions) may well be taken as indicating the necessity of agricultural credit at lower rates of interest than prudent banking practice might seem to warrant, particularly in certain areas where agricultural production is attended by certain hazards or requires loans of a length which militates against the affording of credit by commercial banks.

And paragraph 242:

> The following is an extract from the evidence submitted on behalf of the united farmers of Ontario, as to the problem of short term credit in Ontario—"Generally speaking, within the last two years the banks have ceased to function in regard to Canadian agriculture. Agriculture is taken to be an activity, or an industry, that is not worthy of credit, and from the banking point of view I am not blaming them."

And again from paragraph 245:

> A memorandum on rural credit submitted to us by the Canadian bankers' association referred to the matter of intermediate credit in the following terms: "Assuming that the need for credit in this form is clearly a matter of sufficient national importance to warrant some action being taken by the authorities, consideration should be given to the creation of an institution financed on the public credit and to the placing upon it of the responsibility for meeting all legitimate demands."

I would stress again the farmers' need for credit. Credit should be provided for agriculture the same as it is being provided for small business enterprises. I cannot under any consideration support the proposal put forward in this bill for agricultural credits as it now stands.

When this bill goes before the banking and commerce committee I would strongly urge that that committee consider agricultural credits in the light of what has been said regarding this matter and recommend the setting up of an agricultural bank similar to the industrial development bank which is already a part of the legislation before this house. I would suggest that the committee on banking and commerce have before it delegations from farm organizations. I am of the opinion that those farm delegations would be overwhelmingly in favour of such a bank in preference to extending the coverage and power of the chartered banks as is proposed by this bill.

This is definitely the place where the government can step in in the interests of the Canadian people. Private and commercial banks have been playing a far from active role in the economy of this country. We have had to have other government agencies provide credit when the banks have failed to do so. We have already had to set up such bodies as the farm loan board, the provincial credit institutions and the central mortgage bank. The setting up of an agricultural development bank would be just one step further. This is an immediate and concrete issue upon which I believe every western member and all western people can agree. I do not think the question of the nationalization of banks is a correct matter to be discussed at this time because it tends to split and divide the unity of the people. But as we go forward I shall under changing conditions be prepared to fight for further changes, possibly when the time comes to fight and press for complete government control of the banks. I shall have plenty more to say when the bill comes before the house after having been to the committee, but at present I think this is all I shall say.

Mr. A. G. SLAGHT (Parry Sound): Mr. Speaker, I have on earlier occasions made my voice amply clear with regard to the problem of the so-called socialization of our chartered banks, the nationalization of our chartered banks as it is called, or, as I choose to put it to my hon. friends across the way, if they had their way it would mean the C.C.F.-erizing of the banks of Canada. That, to my mind, would be nothing short of calamity.

I did not have the privilege of hearing the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), which I regret, but I have read his recent address. It may not be a secret to him that in some respects I differ with the views he put forward with regard to the government borrowing of money for government needs. He indicated more than once in his remarks to this house that he desired the committee on banking and commerce to look very closely into several of the problems involved in the bill. He invited a close scrutiny and, as I understood him, the friendly criticism of members of that committee, of which I am one. I propose to avail myself of that invitation and endeavour briefly to give to the house, for the consideration of the committee, two or three constructive suggestions, which I believe or which I am hopeful he may succumb to if he is not watched too closely by his expert advisers behind the scene. I believe these suggestions would be greatly to the good of Canada and our economic system.

My first proposal is that the right to issue currency and credit shall be revested in the Canadian people and not in the chartered banks where it at present rests. The second proposal is that the Minister of Finance and the government of Canada shall not borrow for government needs by the use of debt-bearing securities sold by them to the chartered banks. In other words, new money which requires to be created, as is the case when the minister goes to the chartered banks with bonds or loans, should be spent into existence and not borrowed into existence with the debt burden incident thereto.

The minister, apparently in advance of criticism which might be offered in this debate, deprecated the course that I have just outlined. As I understood him, he was solicitous about the small or meagre profits the chartered banks have been enjoying in the past. Let me here say that I have no fight with the banks. My advocacy in this proposal is that the banks render good service and are entitled to a fair profit. My proposal is in favour of the private banks and is to help them to remain private. Because of the monopoly they enjoy at the expense of the taxpayers, it may turn the people of Canada C.C.F.-wards, and they may have the feeling that the only relief is to nationalize the banks and take them over.

The bankers are doing a splendid patriotic job in our war effort. They are among the finest and best citizens in every community. Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I am sure you will feel that my quarrel is with the system and with the monopoly the bankers enjoy, and not with the banker as an individual.

Let there be no mistake about the fact that the business of our chartered banks is a profitable one. Going back over a period of ten years, from 1928 to 1938, the ten chartered banks paid dividends on their capital at rates of 14 per cent, 16 per cent, 13 per cent, 9 per cent, 13 per cent, 13 per cent, 14 per cent, 12 per cent, 10 per cent and 13 per cent. The rates differed slightly. These dividends have been decreasing gradually, until for the six-year period from 1937 to 1941 they were 8 per cent, 12 per cent, 10 per cent, 8 per cent, 8 per cent, 10 per cent, 8 per cent, 10 per cent and so on, and it will not be forgotten that two of those years were war years.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Those are not profits, but dividends?

Mr. SLAGHT: I so stated. They are the dividends paid, and as we know, the dividends are paid on the basis of the capital of the banks. I shall come to that in a moment.

[Mr. Slaght.]

Let us see what their capital is. The original capital invested in the ten chartered banks is 145½ million dollars—no more.

I quote now from their own statements, from the statistics furnished each month from their statistical bureaux. These statistics show a reserve piled up, on top of their original capital, of 133 million dollars. They show further that the banks own, free from all charge and encumbrance, some 3,000 bank buildings spread across Canada, and their real property is valued by them at 70 million dollars. We also know that the banks enjoy the privilege of turning the crank and printing their own private bank currency. We have reduced that privilege gradually, down through the years, so that they have left now 40 million dollars of this type of their own money.

The total of these figures which I have just given is 388 million dollars, and it is my proposal that, of course, the banks should be entitled to lend and invest their capital, their original capital and their increment which they have piled up by careful management. Anybody who desires to interfere with that would be guilty of almost confiscation.

On top of that the banks borrowed from the people of Canada at what is thought to be 1½ per cent, but I am told that it actually works out at something under one per cent. They borrowed $1,600,000,000 more, and that, with the $388,000,000 gives them in the neighbourhood of two billion dollars in real wealth, which I think they should be entitled to lend at five or six or seven per cent, according to the risk. But there, Mr. Speaker, I ask that we shall call a halt, because under section 59 of the Bank Act the chartered banks have enjoyed what I call a monopoly. There is no fancy term about that. Most bodies of men if they secured a monopoly fifty or sixty years ago would be loath to part with it. The monopoly the banks enjoy is a very simple one. If they have in their strong box or in their vaults or on deposit with the Bank of Canada a $5 Bank of Canada bill, they are then entitled to lend twenty times that amount, if they keep that $5 bill there. In other words, they are entitled to lend $100 which they do not possess at all. What I object to is that we should have given or that we should permit to stay given to a favoured body of people the right to lend on the basis, as the Minister of Finance put it in answer to a question of mine to which I shall refer in a moment, of ten times more money than they have. The minister said that the orthodox recognized business of private banking is to lend ten times more money than you have. Think of it! Take a man in the garage business with ten cars. He wants to arrange to let them out next Sunday. If he charges 100 people $2 apiece for the right to go to his garage and take away a hundred cars when he has only ten cars, you would not be surprised if he were almost indicted for fraud when you found that he walked away with money in that way. Lest my hon. friend the Minister of Finance may have forgotten what he said, may I, Mr. Speaker, indicate to you just what happened on that occasion. I quote from Hansard of July 15, 1942, when the minister said:

> Everyone familiar with the working of the banking system knows that the moment the banks get their hands on additional cash—I mean by that Bank of Canada notes, or deposits by the Bank of Canada which are convertible into Bank of Canada notes—when the banks get those reserves in their hands powerful forces are set in motion to get the banks to buy securities themselves, to make loans themselves, so that the deposits of the chartered banks will be seven, eight, nine or ten times as great as their cash reserves. That lies at the base of their whole profit-making activities; the way they make money is by lending more money than they have.

Let us ponder that.

> What they have is their cash reserves; and unless a bank has out several times—six, seven, eight, nine or ten times—its cash reserves, it is not being profitably, or from a banking point of view, properly conducted.

Does that sound like a monopoly, almost a racket? I do not use the term "racket" Is it not a monopoly?

The total volume of money employed in Canada as a medium of exchange consists, of course, of credit and currency, copper and silver—no gold or very little now, some fifty or sixty million dollars. They have paper money running, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) told us this afternoon, up to $1,200,000,000 or $1,300,000,000, issued to the people to do business with. That is Bank of Canada currency. Other new money by way of national currency is created by the banks themselves, although under the British North America Act, which is our constitution, by section 91 the dominion parliament was given jurisdiction over public debt and property, currency and coinage, banking and the issue of paper money. But we have peddled the privilege out to somebody else. We have made a concession of it, and we have done it in the Bank Act which is now to be revised.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is not peddled out; it is given away.

Mr. SLAGHT: My hon. friend's phrase is perhaps more dignified. I should not have said "peddled" because, after all, there were no competitors. A man came along for ten bank charters, and he must have smiled because he simply walked away with the ten charters and with this tremendous monopoly to do something that nobody else in any other kind of business can do, namely, take money for pretending to lend to somebody something that he has not to lend. That is the situation.

If the Minister of Finance wants to get $2,000,000 he has these courses open to him. He can walk down to Wellington street to the Bank of Montreal with a bond, a twenty-year bond with coupons at three per cent, which means $600,000 which the taxpayers will have to pay in interest before the bond is redeemed, put it through Mr. Spinney's wicket, and be credited in the Bank of Montreal with one million dollars. That is that transaction. Or he can go over to Mr. Graham Towers in the next block, take the same Canadian bond, put it through Mr. Towers' window and be credited with one million dollars. In the one case the taxpayers pay $600,000 over a period of twenty years; in the other case they pay nothing, because, as we know, the Bank of Canada, receiving interest, receives it for the people and the Dominion of Canada.

Somebody says, "That is so simple that surely it cannot be true." Of course it is true. There are only two reasons I have ever heard advanced why we ought to perpetuate that monopoly, and I will give them to the house one at a time. The first is, as I have said, that the Minister of Finance is solicitous about the revenue of the banks. He says, "Surely that is not too much money they are making." Well, I gave it to you, Mr. Speaker, that for ten years one bank was paying dividends on its capital amounting to sixteen per cent: in six years they got all their money back and had "velvet" for the rest of the time. Let that go if you like; but just take the minister's figures which he put on Hansard, at page 2550, in the statement of current operating earnings and expenses, and let me recall to the house what the banks' story for last year shows, and then see if we should be too solicitous about taking away this monopolistic privilege which never ought to have been given to them. The minister's statement shows that they earned or made in revenue last year $60 millions, because that is the intake they had on money they lent out to their customers—the commercial banking business earned $60 millions. The next and second item of revenue was $48 millions of interest on securities which they held, and that carries a good deal, because tucked away in the strong boxes are securities of the amount of $2,000 millions of the Dominion of Canada, and on those securities part of that revenue of $48 millions was received by the ten chartered banks. The third and only remaining item of revenue is $35 millions which they received, if you please, for commissions and service charges. Service charges and commissions! And we have had a bugaboo put forward by the bankers' advocates, "Oh, if you take this God-given monopoly away from them they will begin to charge you service charges."

I had occasion to revise a little grocery business in a small town at the request of some friends; I had no financial interest in it. It is a small town and a small business, and that business had occasion, in order to carry on business, to borrow on good securities some $6,000, as liquid capital, on which they pay the bank seven per cent. For three years that business has been paying ten dollars a month, $120 a year for what are called service charges. I did not count the cheques; but I do not suppose that, including payments to their wholesale houses and their help, they have issued over twenty-five cheques a month; yet they pay $10 a month in service charges. That, in part, is how the item of $35 millions is made up in last year's banking business.

The total of those three sources of revenue is $144,500,000. That is gross revenue—just about, strange to say, the total capital of the banks—received by them in one year. But you say, "You cannot look only at that; you must see what it costs them to earn that money." Let me tell you that the profit on that revenue before taxation is $47 millions on a capital of $145,500,000. How is that made up? You will find from my hon. friend's own figures that their total expense of doing business last year, including $15 millions of taxes, was $114,900,000. Deduct that from $144,500,000, and you have a profit of about $29,500,000. But they paid our government in taxes $15 millions, and then there is a further $2 millions of revenue shown in the statement. So that if you add $29,500,000, $15,000,000 and $2,500,000—for the moment I want to see how they are doing in business before they meet the tax-gatherer—you have $47 millions of profitable revenue from the needy people of Canada on a capital of $145,500,000. I cannot shed any tears over a business which gets along at that rate of going. Now, $47 millions on $145 millions would be what? It would be about thirty or thirty-one per cent. And they are getting away with it.

I do not know about the taxation of banks; I have not studied the structure, but that is the straight picture of how these ten chartered banks carried on last year, and my authority for it is the Minister of Finance, at the page I have cited in Hansard.

[Mr. Slaght.]

I believe that, instead of having in their strong boxes $2,000 millions of good Canadian government interest-bearing securities, they ought not to have a dollar. I have shown you where they get the $2,000 millions: there is the $388 millions of their own and the $1,600 millions that they borrowed. Note that people who have saving accounts must give notice before they withdraw their deposits. I contend that the banks should not have a dollar of debt-bearing certificates. If you analyse their own statements you will find—I asked this on the 9th of March—that they do not disclose how much of provincial and how much of dominion securities they hold. The answer I received was, "We cannot tell you because they do not separate the provincial and dominion securities." But the minister will tell the house, I am sure, that the great bulk of the securities held by the chartered banks are dominion securities and that less than one-fourth are provincial securities. I have worked out the interest at three per cent on the long date securities. There are $700 millions of bonds over two years maturities. Three per cent on that is $21 millions. Then I have worked out on the balance at three-quarters of one per cent making $7 million. There is $24 millions rolling into the chartered banks last year because they took a pen and a ledger and made a bookkeeping entry in it. Nothing more or less did they do.

But my hon. friend the minister says, "Oh, you are forgetting; when I went to the chartered bank with my million-dollar bond and got a credit of a million dollars I immediately began to check that out to the John Inglis firm and the farmers and so on, using it for government needs, and then the people getting these cheques would go back to one or more of the ten chartered banks and deposit it in there, and the bank had to service that amount." My point is this. The banks should certainly receive remuneration for servicing accounts, but please do not let the taxpayers and the little fellows pay out of their taxes for the servicing of the accounts of great firms like the John Inglis or the T. Eaton or others with all this enormous checking business. I daresay that there are some people in Canada who never had a bank account in their lives, either savings or current, and I venture to say that the great majority of the people, farmers and industrial workers, do not go to the bank with cheques or use a checking account more than five or six times in a month. So that over the year the service the little follows get is very slender indeed. But they are paying the piper just the same through this monopoly.

Let me endorse every word my good friend the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) said to the house this afternoon about an optimism for the future. I agree with him and with the gifted lady (Mrs. Nielsen) who just sat down that the winning of this war is the important thing, first, last and always. But we have reached the stage in our economic picture where, if all our concern about looking to the future and raising the morale of our people is more than empty language, I think I may suggest that the small man in this country is grossly overtaxed. The unmarried man with an income of from $660 to $1,200 has paid in practically $100 a year in taxes on the average. There are some 300,000 of them in last year's tax brackets who paid in a total of $32,000,000. These are approximate figures. There are 300,000 little fellows, not getting $100 a month, who paid in $32,000,000 in personal income tax of a total revenue of $882,000,000 which we derived from that source. I am leaving out the corporation taxes. That is to say, of $882,000,000 of personal income tax received last year, the little fellows, numbering 300,000 and receiving between $660 and $1,200, furnished $32,000,000.

Take the married man who earns from $1,200 to $1,800. He does not begin to pay, when married, until he receives $1,200. In that group there are 650,000 taxpayers, married men, who pay on incomes ranging from $1,200 to $1,800 a year, a total revenue of $55,000,000. So that there are two groups of small fellows, one group numbering 300,000 and the other numbering 650,000, or 950,000 altogether, from whom under our system we exact the amount of taxation I have indicated. Of all the wicked taxes—well, let me say that of all types of taxation that men resent most, this form of taxation is the hardest, although our Canadian people have had splendid fortitude and courage and have "taken it" because they regard it as necessary for war purposes. In the personal tax columns there are only 2,100,000 taxpayers, so that 950,000 small taxpayers, nearly half the total in Canada, contribute in personal income tax $87,000,000 to the treasury, out of a total of $882,000,000 paid in.

I beg the Minister of Finance to raise the morale of the people of Canada by cancelling all taxes in these brackets. He can do so if he will only finance through the Bank of Canada and not through the chartered banks with debt-bearing securities. He can do it and lift the morale of the people and improve the financial position of the country in a way that will put fresh courage into everybody.

I have spoken longer than I intended and I must draw to a close.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister says that will be inflationary. What has the hon. gentleman to say to that?

Mr. SLAGHT: I am glad the hon. member asked that. I might have forgotten it. I will give the minister's own words. The minister has admitted, in Maclean's magazine, in November last, in a considered article, answer No. 16 of a number of answers, that if you take away this monopolistic privilege to which I have referred, the privilege of lending money you do not have, and just change one word in section 59 of the act making it 100 per cent of current account holdings instead of five per cent, there is no more inflationary effect in borrowing money from the Bank of Canada than there is in borrowing from the chartered banks. Let me put him on record now for that answer.

Mr. ILSLEY: I admit it.

Mr. SLAGHT: That is refreshing. There were some doubting Thomases across the way. The minister, however, is too good a lawyer and too sound an economist to try to tell us anything else. But let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that many people have gone up and down the country for many years trying to stuff us with the statement that if you borrowed money from the Bank of Canada you would boost prices until you blew the lid off. But what did he tell me two years ago from his seat in the house? I proposed on that occasion that we might borrow a billion dollars from the Bank of Canada, and we had outstanding then only $400,000,000 of Bank of Canada issue. "Oh", he said, "it would blow the lid off."

Mr. ILSLEY: It certainly would with a five per cent ratio.

Mr. SLAGHT: But it is the minister's government and they can strike that five per cent ratio out to-morrow morning with the aid of the banking and commerce committee, and that is what I want done. I appeal not only to hon. members opposite, but to the government of which I am a supporter, to do that. What is the harm in doing it? Let the minister tell us when he replies to me. Of course, the banks would lose a little money; but do you not think they will wiggle along on the figures I have given you?

Inflation is a bogey that has helped to keep this monopoly linked around the neck of the taxpayer of Canada all too long and I think we ought to explode it. I propose to join with my hon. friend in the banking and commerce committee if we have to stay here all summer to try to see to it that that bogey goes down the Rideau canal where it belongs.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): And all those who oppose that effort.

Mr. SLAGHT: My hon. friend is bloodthirsty.

One more quotation and I am through. I had a little difference—well, not a difference, because my hon. friend could not say anything to me to make me really differ from him, but in 1942 we had a friendly agreement to differ in discussing this topic. I was urging him then, rather against a stone wall, to do his borrowing from the Bank of Canada and leave Mr. Spinney's bank alone, for government purposes. He said, "No, we will not do that because it might cause inflation"; and he says to-night that if this government were ready to strike out the five per cent and put in 100 per cent it would not cause more inflation in borrowing from the Bank of Canada than in borrowing from the Bank of Montreal.

A strange miasma comes over financial experts. I do not think it has come over the brow of the minister, but I think some of those behind him possibly have become so wedded to banks and bankers and a bad banking system that they cannot give it up, because this is what the minister told the house on July 15, 1942, as reported at page 4606 of Hansard:

> We would borrow from the chartered banks before we would borrow from the Bank of Canada even though we had to pay a little interest to the chartered banks but not to the Bank of Canada, or if we did pay interest to the Bank of Canada we would be paying interest to ourselves.

Let him tell us why. That is a courtship of the chartered banks that I do not understand in the Minister of Finance. There is no rhyme or reason behind it. He told me that it would blow the lid off if we borrowed a billion dollars. The lid has not even quivered. He has had splendid controls in his price control and his foreign exchange control. He has done a magnificent job, putting Canada, as my hon. friend said, in the first rank of nations in that regard. But should we be fools any longer and submit to a monopoly of this kind when we could show the people of Canada how to create new money when we have to? War causes us to have to create new money, and I think in peace time we shall have to create some new money too. I beg of you all to examine into this question. Somebody says, "funny money". There is no funny money about this proposition. That is another red herring that is drawn across the trail. I would ask you to look into it, examine it; and then I do suggest that when we meet in the banking and commerce committee we shall take the scales from our eyes at least on this bugaboo of inflation. If we do that we can use the national credit of Canada as the Prime Minister, the leader of my party (Mr. Mackenzie King), said in 1933 it should be used, for the public need and not for bankers' greed.

Mr. HOWDEN: Before the hon. member sits down I should like to ask him a question to elucidate the problem. Would the hon. member for Parry Sound follow through the million dollar transaction to its ultimate end?

Mr. SLAGHT: Certainly. There were two. I will take the one of the chartered bank first, the bank of Montreal. They lock up the bonds. The principal was $1,000,000, with $600,000 in coupons over twenty years.

Mr. HOWDEN: What happens to the principal?

Mr. SLAGHT: The principal is never repaid, has not been since confederation. A new bond is issued for twenty years. When that new issue comes out the old bond is turned in and a fresh one is taken with a fresh set of coupons for another twenty years.

Mr. HOWDEN: That is an outstanding debt?

Mr. SLAGHT: That is an outstanding debt against the government.

Mr. HOWDEN: You have to pay it some day.

Mr. SLAGHT: Of course it ought to be paid some day, but I may tell my hon. friend that it has not been paid since confederation. We have had a steady increase in our debt. It is now $14,000,000,000 when you add the provincial and municipal debts.

Mr. HOWDEN: What I want to know is this: that million dollars stands as a debt against the dominion?

Mr. SLAGHT: Yes.

Mr. HOWDEN: For all time, until it is paid?

Mr. SLAGHT: Certainly.

Mr. HOWDEN: When it is paid the banks receive one million dollars for which they have given nothing but service transactions?

Mr. JAQUES: When it is paid there will not be any money.

Mr. SLAGHT: May I say to the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden) that his statement is not correct. When they credit the account of the finance minister with one million dollars he cheques against it all around, as I indicated, and ultimately those cheques all come flowing back into that particular bank, or nine others, and therefore the banks as a whole. We have to look at the ten of them as one, for this purpose at least. The banks as a whole have on their books a promise to pay another million dollars, and that is an obligation of the bank. Therefore they have done something. They have agreed to pay, and if it was ten dollars and you walked in with a cheque they would cash your cheque and you would go away with the money—the same would apply to a thousand—

Mr. McGEER: You never do that.

Mr. SLAGHT: I do sometimes, I am afraid. Does the hon. member wish me to follow the second transaction?

Mr. HOWDEN: No. It was the first transaction I had in mind.

Mr. SLAGHT: It creates an obligation. Suppose the finance minister chequed that whole borrowing of one million dollars to the one firm, the John Inglis company, and they dealt with the bank of Montreal, and that cheque is chequed in the next day and deposited in their current account in the bank of Montreal; the finance minister is then debited with the million dollars. He has nothing, but the bank owes one million dollars to the John Inglis company, and they could come in and take that in currency if they wanted to. That is the transaction.

Mr. HOWDEN: I should like to ask another question. The bond is taken to the bank and exchanged for an entry in the books of the bank for one million dollars—

Mr. SLAGHT: And they give you a little passbook too.

Mr. HOWDEN: Who owns that money?

Mr. SLAGHT: The bank owns the money. The bank has given you as their customer nothing more than a promise by them to pay you a million dollars when you come and ask for it, and they pool your million dollars with everybody's else million; it goes into one pot, and you do not own it any more. You have exchanged your million for a promise from the chartered bank to pay you a million dollars the minute you come in and ask for it. That is all there is to it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They give you credit.

Mr. SLAGHT: It is bank credit; and ninety-five per cent of the business of this country is transacted with cheque money, bank credits, just in that way.

One word more; I thought I had finished. The owners of the stock of the chartered banks—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's time has expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. SLAGHT: Thank you. I will not trespass. I shall be but a moment. It is an interesting reflection to know that the owners of the stock of the ten chartered banks of this country numbered on December 31, 1942—I have not the figures for last December—51,071. That is the number of individual shareholders, corporations and different shareholders. Fifty-one thousand shareholders owned all the stock of the ten chartered banks and, as hon. members will see, that number constituted one-quarter of one per cent of the people of Canada. The other 99¾ per cent of the people of Canada have not and probably never did have in their lives a bank certificate or a share of bank stock. I venture to say that if a poll of the House of Commons were taken on how many hon. members owned a share of bank stock in their lives, not more than six men would stand.

Mr. JACKMAN: Who wants one?

Mr. SLAGHT: Therefore, one quarter of one per cent of the people of this country is in possession of that tremendous monopoly and the taxpayers of the country are paying the shot.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does my hon. friend suggest that the stockholders of the bank paid only par for their shares when he is figuring out the money? I suggest that the present shareholders of the chartered banks paid very much more than that.

Mr. SLAGHT: That may well be so. I am taking the picture of a business that has a certain amount of real money in it, and the rest is gravy or velvet, or whatever you want to call it. The only real money in the chartered banks that anybody ever put in there is $145,500,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No; some paid a premium of 100 per cent to the banks after they started or before they started.

Mr. SLAGHT: I would be glad to know the figures of some of them, and who they are.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I shall try to get them.

Mr. SLAGHT: That being so, my statement would have to be amended to that effect.

Mr. COLDWELL: And just to that effect?

Mr. SLAGHT: And just to that effect.

Mr. JACKMAN: Plus reserves.

Mr. SLAGHT: But, I suggest, you will not get the amount of $145,500,000 up to anything like the figure of two billion dollars.

Mr. D. C. ABBOTT (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): I think I will follow the tradition established by many of the speakers who preceded me and preface what I have to say by stating that I really had no intention of taking part in this debate, but I cannot resist the temptation of making a few comments on the views which have been expressed by my good friend the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght). I shall not be able to do so in the picturesque and colourful manner in which he has presented his views, but I am going to try to set forth as well as I can what I conceive to be the true basis on which the banking system of this and most other countries that I know of operate.

I do not want to offend my hon. friend, but I wish to say at the outset that, in my opinion at any rate, the views which he has expressed as to the function of a commercial bank and the way in which it operates are complete nonsense.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not quite as bad as that.

Mr. SLAGHT: Forgive him; I do.

Mr. ABBOTT: Thank you. I am going to try to set out how I believe a commercial bank operates. In the first place, when a commercial bank brings new money into existence by granting a loan or by making a new investment, either of which automatically creates a new deposit, it does not acquire any ownership in the deposit. It merely increases the volume of money which is owed by one section of the community, the borrowers, to another section of the community, the depositors. That, I think, is a statement which cannot validly be contradicted. That, I submit, Mr. Speaker, is true. When a bank makes a loan, brings into existence new money by making a loan or by making an investment, either of which, of course, automatically increases its deposits, it does not own the new money; it merely increases the volume of money owed by one section of the community, namely the borrower, to another section of the community, namely the depositor.

The whole banking system is subject to the same laws as those to which any other business operation is subject. Its transactions yield a margin of profit over and above its cost of operation. The bank, in fact, is not any different from the merchant who makes a profit on the sale of goods or merchandise. What the bank deals in is money or credit. Its net profit is the difference between what it receives on its loans, or on its investments, and what it pays in interest on its deposits, or what it incurs for expenses and overhead charges.

The contention is made that the public cannot create credit for itself, but that the banks can and do create credit, and having created it they lend it to the public at terms which involve repayment to the banking system. That is not true. That overlooks the fact that the banks cannot create credit for themselves, although they can, and of course do create it for the service of the public.

Mr. SLAGHT: Will the hon. member permit a question? I will read to him what Mr. Graham Towers said on that subject—and it is covered in eight lines. At page 238 of the report of the banking and commerce committee for 1939 this is what we find:

> Question: When $1,000,000 worth of bonds is presented (by the government) to the bank, a million dollars of new money or the equivalent is created?
> Mr. Towers: Yes.

Mr. ABBOTT: I said that. The volume of money in circulation is increased. What happens with the case which my hon. friend has given is this: A commercial bank buys a million dollars worth of securities from the government. It then acquires an asset in the form of a million-dollar bond. It pays for that bond by issuing its cheque on itself to the government, or by placing to the credit of the government in its books a credit of a million dollars. Therefore the liability on the one side is a million dollars to the government, which it has placed to its credit, and on the asset side of the ledger is the million-dollar bond which it purchased.

What happens to the million dollars which is placed to the credit of the government? The government takes it out to meet payments—payment of our indemnities, or possibly to pay a contractor. And what happens to that money when it is received by the contractor? It goes back into the banking system again, as a deposit, that is to say as a liability of the bank. The only effect of that transaction is that the bank's creditor then becomes you or I, or some other hundred or thousand people, to whom proceeds are paid out, instead of the government. In other words, there is always a liability for the asset which the bank has. The bank in that case is merely acting as middleman to enable the government to borrow a million dollars from the public.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the hon. member permit a question? Will he concede that the million dollars that is used is new money?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am endeavouring to make as brief a presentation as I can, of what I consider to be the operations of a commercial bank.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The hon. member is trying not to be confounded.

Mr. ABBOTT: I would be glad to answer any questions after I have finished.

I wish to illustrate the point I have made by tracing the life history of a simple bank loan. I shall not talk about large amounts, like my hon. friend, but shall take just the ordinary case of a borrower who wishes to borrow a thousand dollars from a bank. I have in mind the small business man who has to borrow a thousand dollars. His credit is good, and he says to his banker, "I want to borrow a thousand dollars." His banker says, "I am prepared to lend it to you."

What happens when that transaction takes place? The borrower gives his note to the bank for a thousand dollars. It then becomes an asset of the bank, and of course a liability of the borrower. At the same time the bank places to the credit of the borrower in its books the sum of a thousand dollars, against which he may draw cheques. Now, if the transaction did not go any farther than that the position of the bank would be simply this: Its profit would be the difference between the interest which it received from the borrower on his note for a thousand dollars, and the interest which it paid to him if he put it in a savings account, and the general cost involved in overhead.

But of course that is not what happens in the ordinary transaction. What happens is this, that the borrower makes use of his credit to the extent of a thousand dollars to pay accounts, or payrolls, or to purchase materials which he wishes to acquire. Let us take a simple case: Supposing this man, Jones, pays a thousand dollars to the man Smith, to whom he owes a thousand dollars because of purchasing materials or supplies. What is the position of the bank at that time? The bank still has the asset in the shape of Jones' note for a thousand dollars, representing the loan which it has made. And its creditor is now Smith, instead of Jones, to whom the loan has been made. In other words, it is acting as a middleman between Jones as the borrower and Smith as the lender. Instead of the bank being the lender, in effect Smith, to whom the cheque has been made, and who has deposited the proceeds of the cheque either in the same bank or in another bank, then becomes the creditor. Of course, what actually happens in practice is that instead of checking out the whole proceeds of the loan to one creditor, the borrower will issue perhaps ten or twenty or a hundred cheques to different persons to whom he owes money, and from whom he wishes to obtain credit. Those cheques in payment go into the banking system, and the persons who receive them become depositors with the banking system, and are thus substituted as creditors in place of Smith, the original borrower.

The reason, of course, why the banks insist upon adequate security for their loans is that they have to assure themselves that the borrower is going to be able to complete the circuit of the deposit, and pay back his loan when it becomes due. What actually happens in connection with the sample loan I have been describing is that in due course the borrower—Smith, if you wish—who has borrowed the money from the bank in order to pay Jones, Brown and Robinson, eventually collects from some of his own debtors to whom he sold goods, or otherwise, and brings the proceeds back to his bank. He then extinguishes the debt of a thousand dollars which he has contracted towards the bank.

In other words, one can look on each bank loan as having a positive and negative element. The negative element is the liability of the borrower to the bank for the amount of the loan, and the positive element is the deposit credit which the bank gives him for the proceeds of the loan. When the negative and the positive come together again the loan is extinguished, and the money which was circulating up to that time passes out of the flow, out of circulation. That, briefly and sketchily is the history of a small bank loan.

The next point I wish to make is that neither by bringing a unit of credit money into existence nor by cancelling it does a banking system ever gain or lose an asset which is not balanced by a liability similarly gained or lost. I think I demonstrated that point by the example I gave a moment ago. Throughout our banking transaction, the banker benefits only from the circumstance that as a dealer in credit he charges more for the loan which he makes than he pays to his client for the amount which he borrows from that client by way of deposits, or which he has to pay out for his salarial or other overhead charges.

The difference between the amount he receives as middleman on the loans which he makes, and the interest which he pays on his deposit liability—because, remember that every loan means an equivalent deposit—is the difference between what he charges on a loan which he makes, and which he has to pay on his deposit, and what he has to pay out for the cost of operating his bank, or for other purposes.

It seems to me that the clear conclusion to be drawn from that is that the action of the commercial banks in issuing and in retiring credit money does not create any community debt except the one which is owed to the community itself. The balance of assets and liabilities, both on the side of the banking system and equally on the side of the public, remains undisturbed. The only effect of this operation is to increase or decrease the total volume of money which is circulating in the community. The real fact of the matter is that the only justifiable criticism which can be levelled against the banks in this matter of creating new credit is that they are able to increase their business with little or no additional use of their own capital. As has been so often pointed out in this house by the Minister of Finance and others, the central bank is in a position to control the extent to which the banks are able to increase the amount of loans and therefore the amount of deposits which they are able to carry.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What about this debt-free money from the Bank of Canada? Let us hear you on that.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will come to that in a minute. I am just trying to outline the general process of commercial banking, and that leads me to the point I was just going to make. At any given moment the debts which are owed by the community as a whole to the banks are exactly balanced by the claims which the community has against the banks. The function which the banks perform in effect is nothing more than a recording of claims by one part of the community as creditors against another part of the community as debtors.

The hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) dealt with the purchase of securities by the banks. I touched on that a moment ago. It is sometimes urged that the banks obtain securities for nothing. Of course they do not do anything of the kind. When they purchase securities and pay for them by cheques drawn on themselves, as is done in ordinary cases, those cheques return to the banking system as deposits, and the system as a whole has gained an asset, the investment, but has incurred a liability, the amount of the deposit.

Mr. McGEER: There is the toll-gate of interest.

Mr. ABBOTT: There is a difference in interest, in what the bank receives on the investment and what it pays on the deposit, or what it incurs in operating its services as a bank in the way of payment of salaries and so on. I do not think the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard will challenge that statement.

Mr. McGEER: I say that is the toll-gate.

Mr. ABBOTT: It boils down to the question of whether the profit which is earned by the bank is excessive. I think the minister demonstrated pretty satisfactorily in his statement the other day that that margin of profit is not excessive. If it were excessive then I ask myself why it is that the banks have not paid larger dividends than they have, or why they have found it necessary to reduce their dividends as they did not so long ago.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is easily answered; because of taxation.

Mr. ABBOTT: If the banks could manufacture money, manufacture cash as some people seem to suggest, they would be completely independent of the central bank. They would not have to provide themselves even with shareholders' capital. They would be able to secure whatever profit they desired, regardless of what their business losses might be. Our common sense tells us that that is not the case. I repeat what I said at the outset of my remarks, that the operation of a bank is in its essence no different from the operation of any other business. They are dealing in money, in credit, and they make a charge for their services, which charge is somewhat greater than they are obliged to pay in operating expenses or in interest on their liabilities. The difference between those two items represents their margin of profit.

I want to conclude after this rather brief summary of what I conceive to be the ordinary operation of a commercial bank with some reference to this question of borrowing from the Bank of Canada, what the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) referred to as debt-free money.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): So-called; I did not call it debt-free money.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Who called it debt-free money?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ABBOTT: The hon. member for Parry Sound put forward the suggestion that the govermnent should borrow a million dollars or $100 million or whatever it needed from the Bank of Canada instead of borrowing from the commercial banks. Let us see just what that would involve. The government would go to the Bank of Canada and would hand the Bank of Canada a treasury bill or a promissory note or whatever you like for the $100 million. The Bank of Canada would place $100 million to the credit of the government. The government would proceed to draw cheques on it and pay it out to various people, contractors, farmers and others throughout the country. As my hon. friend suggested, that $100 million would in very short order be deposited in the various chartered banks.

It would then become a liability of those banks and either they would have to pay interest on it, or if it went into current account, which does not carry interest, they would have to provide all the services which go to the operation of the account, including chequing privileges and the like. As I understood his argument, it seems to me that he suggested that there should be pretty close to 100 per cent reserve, that with respect to this government borrowing the bank should be required to hold 100 per cent reserve against it. When they received cheques on the Bank of Canada from their various customers throughout the country and deposited them with the Bank of Canada they would then receive a credit on the Bank of Canada's books on which they would get no interest. Therefore they would earn nothing on that asset, although if it all went into savings account they would have to pay back interest at the present rate of one and a half per cent. Obviously there would be no inducement to the banks to accept deposits of that kind.

Under the existing system, with that $100 million deposit with the Bank of Canada their cash reserve would be increased by that amount, which would enable them to lend and thereby create additional deposit liabilities legally up to twenty times, but in practice ten times. The result would be that they could expand their loans and their corresponding deposit liabilities by one billion dollars, upon which they would earn whatever rate of interest they might be entitled to receive, two, three or four per cent. That would be the ordinary operation.

As I understand him, my hon. friend suggests that instead of doing that they should be required to maintain that $100 million in Bank of Canada money upon which they would earn no return. He says that that is perfectly all right because the banks are making so much that they can afford to do that anyway.

Mr. McGEER: Or pay a service charge.

Mr. ABBOTT: I can see no difference between paying a service charge and paying interest, as we are doing with treasury bills to-day, of three-quarters of one per cent.

Mr. McGEER: The people who get the service would pay for it; the rich man would not receive services paid for by the poor.

Mr. ABBOTT: Who would pay the service charge?

Mr. McGEER: The man who got the service.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend is suggesting, I suppose, that the banks could charge twenty-five cents for each cheque that is cashed.

Mr. McGEER: Why twenty-five cents?

Mr. ABBOTT: The hon. member for Parry Sound did not suggest any service charge. I am simply pointing out that his suggestion was that $100 million should be retained by the bank as a non-earning asset as a deposit with the Bank of Canada. That is nothing more than saying that we are asking the banks, their depositors, shareholders and the people who are using them to make a forced loan to the government of that amount. That is all it is; it is a forced loan for that amount from a particular class of the population. If we are going to make forced loans—

Mr. TUCKER: Just to clear up that point, I should like to ask one question.

Mr. ABBOTT: I wonder if my hon. friend would let me finish and then I will try to answer him.

Mr. TUCKER: If my hon. friend does not want to answer it now, all right, but I think he is proceeding on false premises. The 100 per cent reserve presupposes that you can lend the amount you have. If you have $100 you can lend $100 and no more. Is that correct?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not want to get into a ring-around-a-rosie discussion on lending $100. But, for example, start with a $100 credit with the Bank of Canada. That is checked out to my hon. friend the member for Rosthern, we will say. He receives a cheque from the government on the Bank of Canada for $100 and he then takes it to his own bank, whichever it may be, and deposits the cheque with that bank. Let us say it is the Royal Bank of Canada. The Royal Bank of Canada then becomes the holder of the $100 cheque on the Bank of Canada. It presents that cheque to the Bank of Canada and is credited on the Bank of Canada books with $100. What is the position of the Royal Bank at that moment? It has an asset in the form of a $100 credit with the Bank of Canada, and it has a liability to the hon. member for Rosthern in the form of his deposit of $100. The transaction must stop there. The bank cannot lend to somebody else the $100 deposit which it has in the Bank of Canada because it needs that $100 to offset its liability to the hon. member for Rosthern. So that if that is all there is to it, the transaction must stop there. It has a liability to the hon. member for Rosthern of $100 on which it may be paying him one and a half per cent interest in a savings account, and it has a corresponding asset of $100 with the Bank of Canada on which it would be earning nothing. That is the way I see it.

I think I have concluded what I had to say. I was saying that the suggestion which has been made of borrowing from the Bank of Canada our credit needs and allowing that to go out into the banking system, with the banking system holding that credit with the Bank of Canada and not able to use it, would be nothing more or less than asking the shareholders of the banks, the depositors of the banks and the borrowers from the banks to make a forced loan to the government of Canada, and I was going on to say that if we are going to ask for a forced loan, let us ask it of all classes in the community. My belief is that since the burden has to be borne by somebody, that is better done by a system of taxation where you can impose the burden on the basis of an approximate equality, in accordance with ability to pay. That is my view. This system of asking the banks to receive a non-earning asset, and yet on the other side of the balance sheet to have to incur liabilities either for interest or otherwise, I can see no justification for on any basis you want to take it, and that is exactly what this proposition means. It may be because of four or five generations of New England Yankee ancestry behind me that I am always suspicious of the idea of getting something for nothing. I have usually found that you get it at the expense of somebody else, and this proposition seems to me just one way of trying to get something for nothing.

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, during the course of his speech the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) remarked that we did not hear much about social credit these days. But after listening to the speeches of some hon. members during this debate, I think the members of this group have every reason to be proud of their pupils in this house.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Last winter it was my privilege and pleasure to spend two or three weeks in Scotland with the founder of social credit, and during the course of our conversations I jotted down a number of his remarks with regard to social credit. Among other things he said:

Our opponents always try to label social credit as a "funny money" stunt. We reply that social credit is the enemy of monopoly. We are builders, not wreckers. We aim to establish every man in his own right. This is the antithesis of the totalitarian state.

We hold that the state is not above the individual. The Left take the line that if they get control they will have divine right. We did not dispose of the divine right of kings in order to set up the divine right of an abstraction called the state, and it is of no use to set up to do better with a totalitarian policy.

This fallacy is illustrated by a story of McKenna. "If he was to be the governor of the Bank of England he wanted the powers of the governor to be strengthened. If not, he wanted the governor to be deposed."

Political power never disappears. If I lose it, somebody else gets it. Power is also transferred to the centre, and if you get a state of affairs where all power is transferred, then you have only to get control of one sanction and you can appoint an administrative bureaucracy outside of which nobody counts at all. There is only one way of dealing with that. We have got to decentralize power, to get back to the point where the individual is the focus of policy. All are to have enough power to prevent the individual next to them from taking it away from them.

Broadly speaking, we are not planning a new world but to confirm everybody in what they have got and want and like. Present financial policy is to transfer from private to so-called public holdings. By a stroke of the pen all private possessions could be taken away. Social credit defends profit but attacks interest—usufruct against pen and ledger. We want a dividend of facts not of figures. The conflict is not new, it is very old indeed. Kings having been disposed of, big business is planning to get control of bed, board and clothes and make no mistake about it, by a system of crown leases, the internationalization of big industry, and a pseudobureaucracy of big business officialdom. There is to be no competition, but a system of rigid control. As Lord Lothian said, "Peace comes from overwhelming law supported by overwhelming power."

It is commonly said that the government is going to do this, that and the other thing. Fundamentally that is not social credit, which is to place at the disposal of the individual the power to chose one thing at a time. Here in Scotland there is complete freezing of building; fifty licences are required to try to get done what is in practice refused. We believe that if a man has a good proposition, and you agree with it, let him have the money to carry it out, but—you cannot do business collectively. We social crediters are anti-centralization and anti-supreme state.

These are some of the remarks which I jotted down and I think are worth recording, since they are the words of the founder of social credit himself.

While I was in England last winter I attended several sessions of the House of Commons and talked with a number of members of the house, mostly Conservative. I think it would do some of the Conservative members of this house good to hear what Conservative members of the British house had to say about the necessity of monetary reform. To-day, standing in the central lobby at Westminster one can look through a glass window at what was formerly the chamber of the House of Commons before the blitz. All that remains to-day are the bare walls: there is no ceiling, no roof, and no floor. While I was speaking to some of the members, they remarked to me that the rebuilding of the chamber would be a simple problem; the danger was to the preservation of the House of Commons itself, in view of the threat of totalitarianism which is being exerted and felt everywhere in the world.

The Minister of Finance in his speech the other day referred to the treasury branches in Alberta and used them as an example of the cost of banking, comparing them unfavourably with the chartered banks. I received this evening a statement on this question from the premier of Alberta which I should like to put on Hansard. It is as follows:

The Minister of Finance is reported in the press to have held up the treasury branches of Alberta in his defence in parliament of the present banking and financial system. He quoted the cost of operating the treasury branches specifically to prove that the banks do not make excessive profits for their shareholders.

In quoting the Alberta treasury branches in support of his argument, Mr. Ilsley omitted to mention some important points relevant to the matter. These are:

(a) The Alberta treasury branches are limited in their operations to lending only a portion of their deposits; whereas the chartered banks create the money or credit they lend. This means that the treasury branches cannot increase the volume of money or credit in existence. It means also that whereas the banks obtain revenue from practically the entire amount of their deposit liabilities—which are merely the result of the loans they make or their purchases of securities with the money they create—the treasury branches derive revenue from only the proportion of the deposits which they lend.

(b) The so-called "loss" of the Alberta treasury branches represents the cost of these services to the people of Alberta after the individuals using them have each contributed a fair payment for the services they receive. For the balance of the cost borne out of public revenue taxpayers not using the treasury branches are receiving more efficient service at reduced charges from the banks than they were getting before these institutions had to meet the competition of the treasury branches.

(c) Normally a bank, with all the advantages it enjoys, would expect a branch to operate at a loss for a period of seven or eight years. The Alberta treasury branches have been in operation for less than six years, and the entire province-wide network of branches and agencies had to be built up from scratch. Despite this fact the treasury branch services are already nearing the point where their earnings at reduced rates to the public will cover the entire cost of their administration and maintenance.

However, the real issue is not whether the banks make excessive profits for their shareholders or not. Mr. Ilsley knows perfectly well that the threefold issue on which Social Crediters have taken a stand for more than the past ten years in Canada is:

First, the sovereign power to control monetary policy and through this all economic activity, which is exercised by the private banking corporations through their power to issue and withdraw money, in the form of financial credit, in a manner which places the nation in perpetual pawn to them and their satellite financial institutions. This is a sovereign power which, in a democracy, should be under the effective control of the people themselves through parliament.

Second, the operation by the banks of a financial system which is inherently defective in that it results in a chronic insufficiency of purchasing power in the hands of the consuming public, with consequent trade stagnation, economic insecurity, mass unemployment, social unrest and international friction, leading to recurring wars and revolutions.

Third, the degradation, on the one hand, of democratic governments in having to go cap in hand and place the nation in perpetual pawn to the private financial corporations in order to finance public services; and on the other hand, of the constitutionally sovereign people in having to submit to the dictates of a minority group under a system of wage slavery which forces them, under the threat of destitution, to accept the standards of living and working conditions imposed upon them.

These are the features which stamp our present financial system, of which Mr. Ilsley appears to be such a staunch champion, as vicious, undemocratic, and a menace to the future of our nation. Moreover, Mr. Ilsley's assertion that the government now exercises effective control over monetary policy, when the private banking institutions have the power to issue some ninety per cent of the nation's money as they please, is so ludicrous that he cannot expect anybody to treat it seriously.

The Minister of Finance cannot side-step these issues either by putting up straw men for the purpose of knocking them down, or by any questionable argument such as he advances when he attempts to show that if the Bank of Canada created the money for financing government expenditure, it would impoverish the banks by leaving them without any revenue with which to pay interest on their deposit liabilities. He argued further that it was much fairer to the banks for the government to borrow from them and tax the people to pay the interest.

The following simple action by parliament would soon reveal whether the banks are in danger of being impoverished. The banks should be required to surrender all hidden reserves as at December 31 last to the federal government. This would constitute no hardship as these represent acquisitions over and above the profits both distributed to shareholders and placed to their disclosed reserve funds. These hidden reserves should then be monetized by the Bank of Canada and the proceeds used to provide for our returned men after hostilities cease, in recognition of their services to the nation.

It will be useless for Mr. Ilsley to plead that the amount would be negligible. Let us have a full and proper investigation which will reveal the true facts. I predict that the result would stagger the nation.

I might say with regard to these treasury branches, in the small town in which I live in Alberta we have no bank, and before the establishment of one of these treasury branches it was necessary to travel ten miles in one direction, or fourteen miles in the other to do any kind of banking business. I am not blaming the banks. I suppose the place is not important enough. But luckily for the people, the Alberta government established a branch of the treasury, and it now does the greater part if not all of the banking business for the whole community and is a great convenience and a great service.

Our opponents in the province, some of the press, are very fond of comparing the chartered banks with the treasury branches. They make the comparison in this way. They say that the chartered banks are able to make profits so that the services cost the people of Alberta nothing. They not only provide a service but make a profit at the same time and so they even confer a profit upon the people of Alberta, whereas the treasury branches have to be charged up to revenue. They do not even appear to know that the profits of the chartered banks must come out of the people. I feel safe in stating that the relative cost of the treasury branches of the people of Alberta is less than the cost of the chartered banks.

May I make one remark on an aspect of social credit which may not have been much in evidence since the war started, and that is the social credit dividend. Time was when the proposal to pay a dividend of $25, as we put it rather crudely, $25 a month, was ridiculed. But will any member of this house estimate the dividend that we are paying at the present time to the enemy? I cannot carry the figures in my head, but the Canadian people are paying to the enemy a dividend of well over fifty per cent of the total national production of the country, and we ask nothing in exchange. More than that, in spite of the fact that the cream of the nation is either in uniform or in munitions factories, so that the production of the country is carried on by the very young and the very old, the standard of living in Canada to-day is higher than it was before the war. I put it to any hon. member that had we paid a dividend to ourselves instead of maintaining so many millions destitute, the state of prosperity in Canada to-day would have been even better. I will go so far as to say that had any civilized country instituted social credit, such would have been the resulting prosperity and happiness in every country that the war would never have taken place.

The minister objected to the amendment, which is under discussion and which I have not mentioned, as being a key to the total socialization of production. I am quite willing to agree with the minister on that point, but I would ask him a pertinent question, if he is listening. It is this. How comes it that all his financial experts, or nearly all of them, are the products of a socialist training college, the London School of Economics? That school was founded by Fabian socialists. It exists to-day only for the purpose of training the bureaucracy of the future world socialist state. How is it that the experts of the Department of Finance not only in this country but in every dominion of the British empire, and in some countries outside the empire, including the United States, are all men trained in a socialist college founded by Fabian socialists and endowed by funds of international German financiers? That is a fact which I shall be interested to hear the minister explain when he next speaks on the bill.

Let me quote a statement of Major Douglas which he made quite a few years ago. It appears in his book "Warning Democracy":

> In my opinion there is no fundamental difference between "rationalization" as sponsored by Lord Melchett and Sir Herbert Samuel and nationalization as sponsored by the socialist party. I believe that the propaganda in regard to them comes from the same source. They are both of them policies for reducing the individual to an impotent unit in an overwhelmingly powerful mechanism.

I say that that influence comes, and has come for years, from the London School of Economics. I can name offhand a number of the economists, the financiers, who at the present time are shaping the financial policy of this country. There is Doctor James, the chairman of the committee on post-war reconstruction. He is a product of the London School of Economics of which the communist, Laski, is one of the shining lights. He is professor of political history at the present time. Another is Doctor Marsh; another is Mr. Sandwell, whom I hear mentioned as next chairman of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Another one is a gentleman named Rasminsky. He is a product of the London School of Economics. All of them are internationalists; all of them are in effect, international socialists. The purpose of the London School of Economics has been to send out to the universities of the British empire a stream of socialists professors, and gold-plated economists. I am not going to speak about that matter to-day, but when we come to discuss the scheme of international stabilization of currency I shall deal with the subject of the gold standard and with the ownership of the gold at the present time.

The hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) made a brief speech yesterday, very much to the point, and I should like to congratulate him upon it. He asked, where is our gold? On the very last day of the session last year I asked who owned the gold of the United States. I shall not go into that now, but I shall certainly do so at a future date. Where is all this gold? Who owns it? Nobody knows. Holding the views which I have expressed, may I repeat that we Social Crediters are anti-centralization and anti-supreme state. While I have every sympathy with our hon. friends to our immediate right, the C.C.F., and I am willing to believe that they are inspired by the highest motives, yet holding the views which I do, the result of a long and deep study of this subject, I cannot honestly vote for their amendment.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I should like to facilitate the passage of the bill to enable the minister to get it to the banking and commerce committee, but there are a few remarks that I feel I must make. Like many others who have preceded me I do not pose as an authority on banking and currency. As I see the matter now, after this long debate—and I have learned something from listening to it—the question before the house is whether the membership thereof is prepared to accept the bill and the construction placed on it by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley); or whether they are prepared to take one step to amend it as proposed by the Social Credit party. However, that has been disposed of as the house voted against it.

The matter that is immediately before the house is the amendment to the main motion, which was proposed by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party. Many opinions have been expressed. As one member of this group, who has spent the last twenty years in Canada struggling to get along, I am personally of the opinion that the banking system of this country requires revision. I shall not go into the mechanics of it because I believe the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) did a first-class job on that in a general way. He made the main criticism of the minister's arguments, followed by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas). I think they made the position of this group crystal clear with regard to the proposal now before the house.

The thing that I am concerned about—and I think the thing that most members are overlooking—is the fact that once this bill goes to the banking and commerce committee —and the principle of the bill is accepted when it gets second reading—there is no doubt about what will happen to it in that committee. Most of us are overlooking the fact that this is the only time for the next ten years that the members of this house will have an opportunity to amend the Bank Act. In listening to most of the discussion, particularly from this side of the house, one would be led to believe that this is something that can be done every afternoon when the house meets. I am concerned with not only the mechanics of banking, the purpose it serves and all those angles of the question, but with those who are employed by the banks. I think they have a definite place in the picture in so far as the members of this house are concerned. I do not suppose that there is a class of workers in the Dominion of Canada who have the same disabilities as the employees of the banks. For example, the statistical branch of the Department of Labour has absolutely no statistics on the wages, incomes and so forth of the employees of the banks. Second, while the great majority of the other workers of this country have machinery and the privilege of organizing themselves and bargaining through government machinery to increase their standard of living, those rights are denied the employees of the banking institutions. As administered to-day, in my opinion it is anything but a democratic institution.

Most of the members of the house will recall that in 1941, two years after the outbreak of war, there was difficulty with the Banque Canadienne Nationale set up in Quebec. The employees of that bank were forced to strike; and when employees of the chartered banks are forced to take that action there is something radically wrong with the institution that is supposed to give them the means of livelihood. About the only statistics one can get on the set-up with respect to their conditions are some which were compiled by the employees themselves, through the medium of a union formed at that time. For the information of hon. members I should like to place some of this on the record, because I suggest that we should be thinking in terms of bank employees when we are talking about amending the Bank Act.

What I am about to read is set out in a little pamphlet prepared by their union representatives at that time. This is to be found at page 3, in connection with wages:

> They made a survey of the actual salaries, position and years of experience of employees in the majority of the Banque Candienne Nationale's sixty-five branches in Montreal. For the year 1941, two years after the war began, two years in which the cost of living index had risen 14·6 per cent, they found that junior clerks and stenographers were starting in the Banque Canadienne Nationale at the munificent sum of $8 a week.

Remember, this is 1941.

Tellers handling thousands, often hundreds of thousands of cash daily earned a weekly wage of $17.50 per week. After an average of nine years' service assistant accountants, averaging thirteen years' service received $22 a week.

Some in another group received $26.

Some stenographers with fifteen years' service received only $700 a year. An accountant of twenty years' experience earned $25 a week.

Those are the wage rates in a section of the bank set up in the province of Quebec, concerning which I have been able to get statistics.

In his speech the minister criticized severely the C.C.F. for suggesting that there should be some measure of government control over institutions of that kind. I suggest to him that this is an angle of the problem which should be given consideration. If we guarantee certain profits to the chartered banks; if we are going to set up an industrial development bank; if we are going to guarantee profits, then I say there should be an examination of the standard of living provided to the employees of these banking institutions. There is a good deal of information in this little pamphlet, and it certainly does not show a very nice record, nor does it reflect much credit on the organization to which it applies, so far as its relationship with its employees is concerned.

I shall not discuss the matter further. I have made this short quotation simply because I think it will be the duty of the committee on banking and commerce, when considering a revision of the Bank Act, also to consider some regulations which would extend the principle of democracy to employees of the banking institutions, to the degree enjoyed by other sections of labour in Canada.

The hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) expressed the fear that the steps now being taken by the minister would eventually add up to the corporate state. I also have that fear. I have said time and again that the state supreme was not my idea of a solution of the problems of the people of Canada. Unless the people themselves are fully utilized and work into the whole fabric of the country, there is a danger that we may be marching in the wrong direction. When we are dealing with the banking institutions of Canada we are dealing with the whole economic set-up. As was pointed out this afternoon by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson), in view of the interlocking directorates which exist to-day in banks and in industry, the banks are really driven by those who control industry. The set-up behind the scenes, including war-time boards, are largely staffed by the same people who occupy positions on the directorates in both industry and the banking institutions. In my opinion we have just about arrived at the corporate state.

I am afraid that when we place complete control in the hands of one group, and that group represents financial capital, we are heading for the very situation against which our boys overseas are fighting. There is only one way to off-set that situation, only one way to balance it. There is only one way to obtain democracy, namely, by giving the different sections of the population equal representation on the controls.

In his speech the minister deprecated the fact that more regional controls were not developed in connection with the banking set-up. I believe he is correct in that regard. If we are to have a democratic society, then in my view every section must have the same representation and the same say in the machinery which is directing the economic forces of the country. Otherwise we shall have a straight financial approach to everything and, by virtue of the power exercised by these groups, we shall have direction from the top and eventual dictatorship. Certainly it leads in that direction; there is no doubt in my mind about that.

Anyone to-day who fears the development of the corporate state in Canada should examine very carefully the machinery which is now developed under the pressure of war. Under that pressure there can be no doubt that it has been overlooked. The minister and others have tried to make a case for the banks by saying that it was easy to get money in the twenties and the thirties. Well, I know that is not true. In the section of the country in which I lived it was just impossible to get money in those years. By and large the workers in Canada were not working sufficient time to have credit from the chartered banks. As the minister well knows, we attempted to solve that problem among ourselves. In the thirties we developed a system to take care of our own community needs. We had to do that. Our action took the form of local credit unions. And in the small loan field to-day I believe that the average fisherman, farmer or industrial worker in that province is taking care of his own credit needs, possibly to the extent of building a home. We were forced to take that action because the chartered banks were not in that field, and had no desire to enter it. I am reasonably sure it was pressure from that movement which forced the chartered banks to introduce the home improvement plan. It is my view that they feared complete loss among the income groups which were beginning to form around credit union organizations.

As one who never had very much money, and never expects to have much, I can say that the chartered banks in my lifetime, in the community in which I lived, never meant a thing to the group or section of society to which I belonged, except that they did force us to take the action necessary to solve our own community credit problem, through the credit union movement.

My hon. friends to my left, the Labour-Progressive party, rather surprised me last evening when they rose in their places and voted against the proposal of the Social Credit party to take one step forward, at least to pull the teeth of the banking institutions. The important thing about that amendment is that it was not advocating any bureaucracy set-up outside the house. Parliament was to control the credit and finances of this country. They were asking that that power be taken back by the federal government, that the House of Commons be made supreme in this field, that the elected representatives of the people be the ones to determine the credit needs of the country and to issue currency. My hon. friends to my left were not prepared to take that step and they endeavoured to salve their consciences for the position they have taken. They rose in their places and made an attack on the C.C.F. party and on the Social Credit party.

I speak from memory, but, as I remember, the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Rose) made the statement that no sensible person in the labour movement of Canada would take the position at this time of wanting to socialize the banks. I want to tell him that there are 14,000 organized miners in Nova Scotia who have taken that stand officially, and some of them are fairly sensible. There are some 9,000 steel workers in that province who have also taken that stand. There are some 22,000 organized trade unionists in Ontario who have officially taken that stand. These people have taken this stand through their local units; it was not fastened on them from the top. They discussed it; they examined it and they understood the step they were taking. In addition, the Canadian Congress of Labour at its last convention in Montreal, a convention headed by people who sit on government war boards, advised their constituent locals to take that step. They were people with long experience in the labour movement of this country.

Our hon. friends base their case on the necessity for jobs for returned soldiers in the aftermath of the war. If we are to have employment in the aftermath of the war, control and responsibility on the part of the elected representatives in this house constitute one prerequisite to having those jobs available. I should like to make one remark which the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McNiven) may not like. I want to show how this will work out when we come to think in terms of employment in the aftermath of the war. The Premier of Saskatchewan made a presentation to the reconstruction committee on behalf of his government. It was a good presentation; it was a realistic presentation. He pointed out that some 70,000 people from his province were in the armed services. A survey had been made of all possible employment conditions in the aftermath of the war, and it was found that with present employment conditions there would be some 30,000 for whom employment would not be available.

Mr. McNIVEN: Excluding the farms.

Mr. GILLIS: Just a minute. He brought in a long programme of public works and stated that if those public works were made available possibly that situation would be cured. But the point was that the public works programme as presented by his government, and by each of the provincial governments, was contingent upon the federal government making available the necessary finances. If the chartered banks have control in the field of finance and credit; if they serve the purpose the minister says they serve or thinks they serve, why should the provincial governments not go to the banking institutions and present their public works programmes for the aftermath of the war and arrange for the financing of those programmes in order to guarantee employment?

The banks of this country are not prepared to take any risks to establish new industry or to carry on necessary public works in order to provide employment. If the federal government is to have the responsibility for the development of industrial enterprises and the carrying on of public works programmes in order to create employment, there is no reason why the control of currency and credit should not be taken back under the thumbs of the House of Commons and the people of Canada benefit by the initiative and ingenuity of their elected representatives through the proper development of this country in the future. Apparently the banking system is not prepared to do anything.

I think every member of that committee was interested in trying to arrive at the premise upon which my hon. friend of the L.P. party built his case last night when he salved his conscience by voting for the banking institutions of this dominion by giving them control for another ten years. I think I have given proof positive that if jobs are to be provided in the future for our returning service personnel and those who will be let out from war industry, this is where control in this field must be if we are to develop Canada in the future. I cannot see how the people who allowed us to wallow in the depression of the ten years prior to this war are to solve our problem in the future. Now is the time to examine this question because, as I said when I started, we shall not have another chance for another ten years.

I cannot understand our two hon. friends to my left. I have had a considerable association with that kind of people in the past and I have been listening to them for twenty-five years. They have so many lines it is pretty hard to know where to draw the line. I should like to draw to the attention of the house some of the arguments advanced this afternoon by the hon. member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen) with respect to the establishment of socialism. I have in my hand the election manifesto which that party issued in 1940, and I should like to read a brief paragraph on page three, because it relates specifically to the remarks of the hon. member this afternoon. They pose here as social reformers, but this is what they had to say in their election manifesto in 1940:

> Again, as in 1914-18, the leaders of the "reform" parliamentary parties have deserted the people and joined the imperialist war camp, lining up with the monopolists, bankers, militarists and war profiteers. The ruling class relies upon these lackeys in the C.C.F., in the Social Credit party and in the trade union movement to help lead the masses to the slaughter under the fraudulent slogan that this is a "just war". Their role is the most despicable one.

That was the opinion in 1940; there was no possibility of reforming the system. All through that manifesto runs the statement that capitalism had decayed and was dead, without any possibility of reviving it. To-day the lady shows a great fear of socialism. The capitalist system that was dead in 1940 is now going to solve the problems of the future. One would be led to suppose that if the C.C.F. part were elected at the next federal election, then immediately everything as it exists in Ottawa now would be thrown out. The banking system would be destroyed; everything would be uprooted, and all that kind of nonsense.

I came into the C.C.F. party in 1938. I came into it after about twenty-five years of experience in the labour movement, where it was my business, because I had to earn my bread and butter, to examine carefully everything that anybody had to offer me. We examined the C.C.F. very closely before we came into it and we did not come into it as individuals. When the C.C.F. came into Nova Scotia, it had absorbed a labour party that was a going concern and it took in the entire miners' organization. Many of these bodies had had many years of experience and were composed of sensible men. We believed that the C.C.F. was and is the solution of the problems of the people of Canada. There is no doubt in my mind about that. If there is one thing that our hon. friends to the left are wrong in, and 100 per cent wrong, it is in their new adherence to the capitalist system as being able to solve the problems of the future.

Mr. BLACKMORE: To whom is my hon. friend referring?

Mr. GILLIS: I mean our L.P.P. friends. One thing I am convinced of is this. The war in Europe exemplifies the last struggle of a dying system. I am certain of that, and you will not be able to save it by any transfusions. Fundamental changes are required in this order of society in which we are now living. If we are to be realistic and have something for the boys when they return from this war, the boys who are fighting against the conditions which they left behind them here in Canada, fundamental changes are necessary. Thinking in terms of maintaining the present system as it is, with all its ramifications, can lead only in one direction; I am convinced of that. You cannot reform a rotten egg, and you cannot reform this order of society, because it is dead. I am honest about this, as I think every member of the house is. The difference between us is simply a matter of not studying the problem with the same degree of care or of having interests that do not require changes to be made in the future. Unless we are prepared to sit down and honestly discuss the whole set-up, examine its disabilities and endeavour now to correct them, then when this war is over somebody is going to correct them for us in a way that we shall not like; I am convinced of that. I cannot visualize the programme and policy that I have heard mapped out by different people in a leading position in the field of employment in Canada for the period when this war is over ending up in anything but chaos and upheaval. When provincial governments present their reconstruction programmes they are all contingent upon the money being made available. Where is the money coming from? The federal government. They all come back to that. They want the federal government to give them the money, guarantee the contracts, set them to work and let them make a profit.

Mr. TUCKER: Is there anything wrong with that?

Mr. GILLIS: Why do they not do something themselves?

Mr. TUCKER: Because the federal government has control of banking and currency and credit. That is why the provinces look for help to the federal government.

Mr. GILLIS: You have the only chance now that you will have in ten years of getting the necessary control.

As I said, they all want the federal government to provide the money. You see, the industrialists do not believe in government control. Instead of getting busy and doing something to rehabilitate this country, they come here and throw the whole load on the lap of the federal government and expect the taxpayers of Canada to guarantee them their profits. The people of this country are not going to stand for that. When you question the industrialists as to their plans in the profitable field which they dominate, they have only one, namely, that when the war is over, every crown agency must cease production and the whole field be thrown open to private enterprise. Those were the conditions in 1939. Private enterprise had the field to itself then—and there were one and a half million people on relief. What is to happen to our 800,000 service personnel when the war is over, and to the 40,000 girls who are in the service and are now experiencing a little security for the first time in their lives? What is to happen to the million and a half workers in the war industry? Ask the industrialists and they will tell you that this is not their problem, but the government's. But they want to dictate to you what the economy of this country shall be immediately upon the cessation of hostilities. That is their field, the profit field. They want you to accept their lead when the war is over and to guarantee them profits in any new projects, with the taxpayers paying the bills. I would be a private enterprise myself on that basis.

Take the case of the premier of Saskatchewan. I am not blaming him individually because he is caught in a trap. The only thing I would blame him for is that he has not the courage to fight it out. He claims to have sent out over 2,000 questionnaires to private industrial firms in Saskatchewan asking what they could do in the field of employment when the war was over. Fifty per cent replied to the questionnaire and the other fifty per cent did not acknowledge it at all.

Mr. McNIVEN: Give the complete explanation if you are going to mention it at all.

Mr. GILLIS: I did.

Mr. McNIVEN: Not by any means.

Mr. GILLIS: That was in his brief.

Mr. McNIVEN: Not by any means.

Mr. GILLIS: I will tell it over again. The premier of Saskatchewan sent out a questionnaire to over 2,000 private enterprise firms in that province. From fifty per cent of these firms he received a reply to the questionnaire, and from fifty per cent of them he did not receive a reply. That is what he said when he presented his brief here about a month ago.

Mr. McNIVEN: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. GILLIS: You can make your speech after I am through.

Mr. McNIVEN: If the hon. member is going to give an explanation of what occurred in the reconstruction committee, let him give the whole of that explanation.

Mr. GILLIS: If the hon. member had waited a moment he probably would have got it. But he has heard it already. He knows the statement which the premier of Saskatchewan made in the reconstruction committee, but if he wants me to take up the time of the house I will read it to him. I do not want to occupy the time of the house in reading that into the record. The premier of Saskatchewan received a reply from fifty per cent, and from fifty per cent he received no reply. The point I want to make is this, as it was made in the brief by himself—

Mr. TUCKER: Will the hon. member explain why the premier of Saskatchewan said that he had to have assistance from the federal government to carry out his plans?

An hon. MEMBER: Order. Make your own speech.

Mr. TUCKER: I submit that the hon. member is out of order in repeating what was said in the reconstruction committee, but since this matter has been brought up we have the right to explain why the premier of Saskatchewan took that view. He took the view that the recommendation of the Sirois commission should be carried out, namely, that the provinces should receive the financial help necessary to discharge their constitutional obligations to their people.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) is speaking on a point of order, and the point of order is that no member of the house has a right to divulge the proceedings of a committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) is referring to proceedings before a committee, and that is clearly out of order.

Mr. GILLIS: Far be it from me, Mr. Speaker, to quarrel with a decision given by yourself. But this report is public. The reconstruction committee's report has been sent all over Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not a report which is before the house.

Mr. GILLIS: I realize that. At the same time it has a bearing on the question we are discussing at the present time, the control of currency and credit in this country. This is the last chance we shall get to discuss it for the next ten years, or at any rate the last chance there will be to do anything about it. It involves the possibilities of financing your reconstruction programme, which is very important to all the citizens of Canada. I merely wanted to mention an example, and I thought it was a good one, where the premier of a province—

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It is too good for them.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I rise to a point of order. No hon. member may discuss the proceedings of a committee until the report of the committee is before the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member for Cape Breton South knows that, and I will ask him not to refer again to it.

Mr. GILLIS: Oh, yes, it has been published. I have read it myself in half a dozen newspapers.

An hon. MEMBER: That does not make it in order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GILLIS: I am through with it. I am rather sorry, however. We sit here for hours on end and we take everything that is thrown at us, but we are at least courteous enough to remain in our seats while others are speaking and to make our debate when we rise in our places.

Mr. McNIVEN: Since when?

Mr. TUCKER: And you never attack anybody else!

[Mr. Ian Mackenzie.]

Mr. GILLIS: The minister, during the course of his remarks—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Is that your time or their time?

Mr. GILLIS: Their time.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I have listened for three or four days to this debate, and the other day I listened to the minister when he read his long brief to the house. To-day I listened to speeches made from the government side by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) and the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght), and if anything I think one is more confused than he was right after the minister made his statement.

I have not taken up much of the time of the house this session. It seems to me that a great deal of time is wasted in debate on some of the questions which have been under review, and I intend to occupy only a few minutes in making a few observations and putting a question or two to the minister.

The purpose of this bill is, of course, to extend for another ten years the charters of the banks, and it is understandable that there should be a few amendments, because when a bill of this kind is revised only once every ten years conditions arise, especially in these changing times, which make certain amendments necessary.

I was a member of the banking and commerce committee in 1934 and I have the honour of being on that committee again this year. The bill will go in due course to that committee, and I shall say very little about it at this time, reserving to myself the right when it comes before the committee to discuss in some detail the questions it raises and the information we may get from some of the witnesses who will be called. On the previous occasion we had some splendid witnesses. The general managers of the different banks attended, as I assume they will do again, in order to explain their points of view.

As I say, when the bill goes to committee I may present a few amendments which seem to me worth while. I made an amendment or two on the last occasion and supported some amendments of other hon. members, but we could not get them adopted at that time, and I venture to say that we shall have no better success this year. The bill is the same as the measure we had in 1934. The then government was strong enough to put it through in the form they wished, and this government is strong enough to do the same. We shall have to acquiesce and I venture to say that some of the amendments will not get very far.

The revision is more or less routine. The changes are not of much importance, and they do not go so far in certain respects as I should like.

I wish briefly to review the banking situation as it has prevailed in western Canada from 1900 to the present time. I divided it into three periods of fifteen years.

First, the period from 1900 to 1915. It is during that time that the banks opened up, one may say, in western Canada. The country was new and the banks rushed in and established themselves. Their main offices were in the bigger cities, such as Winnipeg and Regina. Considerable competition took place in opening branches in the towns and even in some of the villages, and they were really after business. While apparently there was plenty of money to lend, in many cases the interest rate was exorbitant, and beyond all reason. I might mention a little experience of my own. I got my first loan from the bank in 1900, when I had taken up a homestead and preemption, and, wanting some money to buy horses in the spring of the year, I went to the bank and got my loan on a basis of ten per cent, discounted. Before I got through paying that loan, renewing it every three months, I had paid between twelve and thirteen per cent.

We then come to the period from 1915 to 1930. At the close of the last war there was a depression with respect to prices and serious conditions prevailed in western Canada. The banks were in some difficulty; they were not free to lend money, and that part of their business was taken over by the loan companies. It was later in that period, in 1927, that we had the farm loan board established, which has been referred to in this debate. It was established because the government found it necessary to come to the rescue of some of the loan companies and provide a certain class of loans which neither the loan companies nor the banks would touch.

Then we had the period from 1930 up to the present time. We have a situation to which it is hardly necessary to refer. In recent years land values have declined. The loan companies will not make loans to the same extent that they did formerly; the banks have tightened up, and now the minister is proposing amendments to the act to meet the conditions that have been referred to in this discussion. The minister himself admits that changes are necessary and is endeavouring to meet the changing conditions by certain amendments which he is proposing, but I do not think those amendments meet the situation.

There is certainly nothing in this measure which in any way forces the banks to do anything different from what they have done practically since their establishment in western Canada. They are still allowed to be their own judge with respect to loans, and I have no fault to find with that. I think they should have that right. But they are given greater powers than before, because they are empowered to take certain security which they have not been allowed to do up to the present time.

Under this bill ten per cent of certain loans will be guaranteed under certain conditions and the interest rates are reduced by this amendment. There is a reduction from seven per cent to six per cent, and I am in accord with that. I think it should have been a little more. If you will look up the records for 1934, when the Bank Act was before the committee, you will find that the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) at that time made a motion that interest rates be lowered to six per cent. I recall that some of the members sitting in the house at that time opposed us when we tried to put that through. I supported the motion. The hon. member who moved that motion proposed that the banks should not be allowed to charge more than that, and that if they did so the borrower would not be liable for principal. I propose to move something similar in connection with this bill, but of course I cannot do so to-night, this not being the proper place.

There is nothing in the amendments proposed by the minister that further assists in the marketing of the crop. I have opposed the system with respect to interest, which reacts unfavourably on the farmer in connection with the marketing of the crops in the west. Before the wheat board came into operation and took over the whole situation so far as crops are concerned, the elevators were doing business and I was in the elevator business myself, as I have been since 1906. I know, therefore, something about this matter. I know what advances were made to the farmers. The elevator companies charged a good rate of interest. In many cases it was eight per cent and sometimes a little more, but in recent years they have been charging seven per cent. The banks financed the elevator companies. They advanced that money to them at a much lower rate than the elevator companies charged the farmers, and we had the banks guaranteeing elevator accounts. Now the wheat board is handling the matter and the government backs the board in financing the elevators.

We have, therefore, an exorbitant charge in that respect, and there is no provision in this bill to take care of the situation when the war is over and we get back to what some hope will be a normal state of affairs in connection with the marketing of crops. The Bank of Canada should finance the wheat board, and through it we should have full control of all marketing and financing and do away with the method that I have indicated.

The banks have not taken any risks. They have always been able to pay nice dividends. They have set up reserves, and we have listened this afternoon and evening to a discussion with respect to matters of that kind. I will not go into details at this late hour, but there is one point to which I should like to refer, which was mentioned by the leader of the C.C.F. party. The provincial governments in 1930 had to guarantee the accounts of the wheat pool in Saskatchewan. The hon. gentleman was right in saying that they did that. Prices had dropped considerably in 1930 and the wheat pool was in difficulties. They had made advances to farmers. The price was very good when they made the advances, but there was a severe drop and the provincial governments had to come to the assistance of the banks. The banks refused to carry that load when it got below the advances that had been made and security was not so good. True enough, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) said, the provincial governments guaranteed the account, but they in turn, when they were expected to come through, refused to do so and came to Ottawa to get the government here to take over that guarantee. I am going to say that if any one person is more responsible than another for the fact that the wheat pool is in business to-day and is in a good financial position—and it is to its credit that it has been taking on a considerable amount of the victory loan—that person is the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, as he was then. He does not happen to be in this country now, but he is the one who is responsible for the fact that that concern is doing business now. The credit goes to Viscount Bennett. I can recall when they came to get the government of that day to take over the account, which the government did, some of the members opposite me, who at that time were sitting over here, opposed the move and made trouble for the Bennett government in making that guarantee. Mr. Bennett, however, did have it made, though they endeavoured in every way possible to raise every difficulty in his way. I know for a fact that the elevator companies thought matters had gone so far that the wheat pool would become insolvent and the elevators would be divided up among the other elevator companies. I was close to a number of elevator companies at that time and I knew what was going on. They practically sat down at the table to divide up the pool elevators, and it is to the credit of the government of that day that they took over the guarantee which the provincial governments could not carry through in order to keep the company in business. Prices came back, and eventually there was not a loss but a profit when the present government took over in 1935. They tried to carry on and sell the 560,000,000 bushels that had accumulated. They tried to sell at a loss. We have heard of the fire sale, and they could not sell it fast enough.

I am proud of the fact that I was one of the members from western Canada who, in the face of great difficulties, persuaded our colleagues in the east, on our side of the house, to support the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett in what he did at that time. There is nothing in this bill that will assist very much in that regard. However, as I have said, we shall have interesting witnesses before the committee.

I wish to ask the minister one or two questions. Why did he not introduce the farm improvement loan bill at the time he introduced the industrial development bank bill? In reply to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) the minister said to-day that the bill was ready to be introduced and would be introduced as soon as possible and be sent to the committee. I wish to ask the minister why he did not introduce the bill at the same time if it was ready?

Mr. ILSLEY: It was not ready then.

Mr. PERLEY: Quite a lot of time has elapsed since the industrial development bank bill was introduced. If the farm improvement loan bill is ready now, the minister certainly could have given us some indication of what the bill contained at the time he spoke of the amendments to this bill.

Mr. ILSLEY: I did.

Mr. PERLEY: The minister did not go far enough. I think we should have that measure now, and we should know what is in it in order to make a fair appraisal of the value of the amendments to the Bank Act and to make a comparison. I say that because if the other bill does not go a lot farther and do more for the western farmers than the amendments to this bill the minister will have quite a lot of trouble when the bill is brought down to get it through. I warn the minister that if the bill when it is brought down is not what we think it should be and what we hope it will be, then he is going to have a little difficulty.

There will be some criticism and possibly some amendments made by hon. members on this side of the house. I was glad to hear the minister in reply to the leader of the opposition to-day say that he was going to bring the bill down as soon as he could. I warn the minister to-night that it must be something worth while and that it must go a lot farther in the way of assistance to the farmers of western Canada than the amendments to the Bank Act that we are now considering. I agree with the statements made by some who have spoken, that the winning of the war is the all-important thing. That is the one thing we must consider now. We know the difficulties the government may have with that. We are all possessed of that idea. We all believe that the winning of the war is the main thing and we should approach all these questions from that angle. In the few remarks that I made to-night that is what I wanted to express. But I reserve the right to go a little more fully into it when this bill is before the committee. There is not time to do that now. I hope the bill to which the minister has referred will meet the requirements and conditions of the people of western Canada.

On motion of Mr. Hlynka the debate was adjourned.

At 10.58 p.m. o'clock the house adjourned until Thursday, at three o'clock p.m., pursuant to special order made Monday, February 21, 1944.

Thursday, May 11, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

THE LATE EUGENE DUROCHER

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I regret to have to announce to hon. members the passing of one of our members since the house adjourned on Tuesday last. Mr. Eugene Durocher, the member for St. James, died on Wednesday, May 10, after an illness lasting two weeks. Had he lived, Mr. Durocher would have been sixty-three years of age on August 27 next. It was such a brief time since Mr. Durocher was with us in this house, seemingly in good health, that his death comes with an unusually sudden shock to many hon. members who were unaware of his illness.

He was first elected to the House of Commons at a by-election in December, 1939. He was returned in the general elections of 1940, receiving what was I believe the largest majority won by any member of the house. Our friend brought to the House of Commons a breadth of experience gained in a successful business career, both in his profession as a chartered accountant and later in the business of insurance. He had already served his fellow citizens in the post of alderman of the city of Montreal for two years preceding his entry to the house. Earlier than that, in 1939, he served as a member of the Montreal metropolitan commission. His activities in fraternal and community and philanthropic organizations were many and helpful and as a citizen he could be depended upon to give his assistance to any activity for the betterment of conditions of the less fortunate.

Mr. Durocher was not a frequent speaker, but when he did take part in debates he was listened to with attention, and always made a genuine contribution. In private discussion he was noted for being vigorous and outspoken and, at the same time, sane and clear-headed in his presentation of his views.

Mr. Durocher was faithful in his attendance in the house, and followed the proceedings carefully and keenly. He was extremely well informed, and he served with great acceptance and benefit on the radio committee. I think I can say that no member of the house possessed greater charm, was more amiable and at the same time better informed or better able to present the point of view which he had in mind than our friend who is gone. He possessed the quality of being agreeable and, at the same time, forceful and impressive. He was a living exponent of the bonne entente, not by obtrusive declarations but in the quiet neighbourly kindness and the sincerity and friendliness of his character.

Our friend was the possessor of that estimable quality, a fine sense of humour. Perhaps one of the most distinctive traits of his character was his zest for life and his enjoyment of the simple things and the little things which make up happiness of living. His early going out is I think all the more tragic because of his satisfaction in the associations with which God had blessed him.

I should like to add this personal word. It was my good fortune to meet and talk frequently with Mr. Durocher in connection with his interests in matters affecting his constituents, and I was impressed by his personality, his tolerance and his moderation. So that I myself, while expressing the deep regret of the house at his untimely ending, can say with sincerity that I feel that in his going out I have lost a valued personal friend.

The hon. member has left to mourn him a widow, three sons and a daughter. I know personally from his own talks with me that he took great joy in his family and he spoke of them frequently. One of his sons, Lieutenant Claude Durocher, is overseas with the Fusiliers de Mont Royale. I am sure it will be the wish of all hon. members of the house that you, Mr. Speaker, should convey to Madame Durocher and her daughter and her sons—I am sure we will join in remembering particularly the soldier son overseas—an expression of the very deep sympathy which we have for them in their great bereavement.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as we pause on this occasion to mourn and to pay tribute to one of our members who has gone from us, we cannot help recalling that since we have been members of this house many of our membership have passed away in the midst of their parliamentary careers. All of us will recall these sad occasions; since I first came into the house in 1936 no less than thirty-four members of the House of Commons have passed away, twelve of them since the election of 1940.

I was privileged to know Mr. Eugene Durocher from a close acquaintance with him, meeting him both in the House of Commons and outside. What the Acting Prime Minister has said is only too true. Mr. Durocher was friendly, well-disposed, and a man of good character. I always enjoyed meeting him and passing the time of day with him. I shall miss him, as will members of the house generally. He took the place of a very important man in the public life of this country who sat in the house from 1920 until he died in 1939, the late Hon. Fernand Rinfret, who I think the members would also like to recall at this time.

I want to associate myself with the words of the Acting Prime Minister, and to extend to the government our genuine sympathy in the loss of an honoured and most respected and esteemed colleague. At the same time I should like to join with the Acting Prime Minister in suggesting to you, Mr. Speaker, that a message from this house should go to the widow and family who have been bereaved. It is for this reason that I rise, to couple this party, the official opposition, with the words which have been so eloquently and so appropriately uttered by the acting leader of the government.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, we too would associate ourselves with the words of sympathy of the leader of the opposition for the members on the government side of the house, and would join with the Acting Prime Minister in his expression of sympathy for the family in their susdden bereavement. Mr. Durocher was a member of the radio committee and I knew him there perhaps better than elsewhere. He was a courteous, kindly gentleman whom we all mourn. This sad occasion once again brings home to us in this house, shall I say, the wear of public life, as evidenced in the occasions on which from time to time we have to mourn the loss of one of our members. We join, Mr. Speaker, in the expressions of sympathy that have already been uttered.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, the members of our group desire to associate themselves with the eloquent and fitting words of the Acting Prime Minister and of the leader of the opposition in their expressions of appreciation of this man who has just left our midst. We desire, sir, that you convey to the bereaved ones our sympathy in this time of trial.

Mr. FRED ROSE (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to associate myself with the words of the Acting Prime Minister in the passing of Mr. Durocher. He represented the constituency next to mine, and I found him very helpful to me coming here as a new member. A new member always appreciates a kindly word from those who have been in the house for some time. I had occasion to meet Mr. Durocher from time to time coming here on the train from Montreal, and I always found him kindly and helpful. He was a man who was able to forget the differences of party and to meet a member of another party on a friendly footing, as a human being, with kindness and consideration. I should like to add my personal word of sympathy to the bereaved widow and family.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

ANNOUNCEMENT OF CHANGES TO BE EFFECTED BY NEW LEGISLATION

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as the house is aware, the government expects to introduce as soon as practicable a bill which will embody the government's recommendations in regard to housing legislation. This will be a comprehensive measure covering all phases of the housing problem and while, of course, it cannot be fully operative until the end of the war or at least until the period of acute material and man-power shortages has ended, nevertheless it is expected that some activity will take place under it in the immediate future. It is obvious that, even if this bill could be introduced tomorrow, it would be several weeks before the measure would become law.

However, it has come to my attention that with the knowledge that there is in the offing housing legislation which may provide assistance for house-building on more liberal terms than are now provided for, there may be a tendency for builders and prospective home owners to defer proceeding with the construction of urgently needed new houses. It would be unfortunate if such an attitude should lead to a smaller volume of house-building at the present time than the maximum which would be possible with the supply of materials and labour available, limited as that supply is. Under the circumstances, the government has become convinced that the only way in which we can meet this problem is to announce publicly a few, at least, of the fundamental changes which will be incorporated in or result from the new legislation.

Part I of the present National Housing Act deals primarily with loans made to assist the construction of individual dwellings for prospective home owners. Certain general principles and conditions governing such loans are laid down in the act itself but the details are incorporated in our agreements with approved lending institutions. For instance, the act gives authority to the minister to approve the rate of interest to be charged to the borrower and also the period for which loans shall be made and the terms of repayment. Under that authority, it was originally provided in the agreements with the lending institutions that the rate of interest should not exceed 5 per cent and that the loans should normally run, in effect, for a term of twenty years. Actually the loans usually run in the first instance for ten years but are renewable for a second term of ten years, and the schedule of repayments provides for complete amortization of the loan over a period of twenty years. The time has now come, it is believed, for a reduction in interest rates, and we had intended that when the new legislation was passed the maximum rate to be charged to borrowers would be reduced to 4½ per cent. In view of the tendency to wait and see what provisions the new legislation will contain, the announcement is made now. Furthermore, we are immediately advising the companies that in respect of all loans under part I of the present act made after today's date, that is to say, loans for which the mortgage contracts have not yet been signed, the interest rate charged to the borrower must not exceed 4½ per cent. It should be noted that 4½ per cent is the rate to be charged to the borrower; as the dominion advances 25 per cent of the amount of the loan at its normal rate of 3 per cent, the effect is that the lending institutions receive 5 per cent on their 75 per cent share of the joint mortgage loan.

Another feature of the new legislation in which there will be some public interest is the length of the term for which a loan may be granted. It is our intention to ask for authority to make loans up to a maximum of twenty-five or thirty years, but loans will be made for so long a period only in communities where we are satisfied that the community has adopted adequate zoning ordinances and where there is an adequate community or regional plan governing the future development of the area. If, therefore, municipal authorities wish their citizens to receive the benefit of such long-term loans, they should promptly take the steps necessary to provide for adequate community planning and for zoning ordinances which will protect the owners of homes from suffering serious depreciation in property values as a result of the development of nuisances or other adverse influences which tend to create blighted areas and destroy the values of residential properties in the particular area. If the municipalities are to give this protection, provincial governments should see that there is enabling authority on the statute books, where such enabling authority does not now exist, to allow municipalities to take the necessary steps to develop and enforce strict zoning ordinances and sound community plans. Officials of the National Housing Administration will be prepared to assist municipalities in their planning to the extent of explaining to municipal officials and the general public the principles of community planning, but the provincial governments are or should be in a better position to encourage and assist their municipalities in connection with specific planning projects.

While we are hopeful that the cooperation of all governments in such a programme, with the full support of an informed public opinion, will produce very great economic and social benefits in stimulating housing construction, lowering the over-all cost of housing to the public and improving the efficiency and the amenities of urban communities, nevertheless it is obvious that it will take a good deal of time, perhaps two or three years in some cases, before effective results can be accomplished in this field. I hope that no time will be lost by our municipal authorities in getting the programme under way. Nevertheless, no one who is in urgent need of a house should wait merely in anticipation of the new legislation, as the present provisions, allowing amortization over a maximum period of twenty years, will continue to apply in ordinary cases and at least for the duration of the war.

There is one other point which should be made in respect of loans under part I of the act. Building costs have risen since the outbreak of war and I understand that there is a demand, in certain communities at least, for houses with more bedroom accommodation than it is now possible to build under our present restricted lending limits. At present we are working under a statutory authority, in the form of an item in the supplementary estimates, which limits the maximum size of National Housing Act loans to $3,200. On houses with a lending value of not over $3,200, a 90 per cent loan may be made, but the maximum percentage of loan on houses with a lending value of over $3,200 gradually declines, on the basis of a sliding scale, until at $4,000 only a loan not exceeding 80 per cent, or $3,200, can be made. There is, however, an unused balance of approximately $380,000 in the appropriation provided originally by the National Housing Act itself. The funds so appropriated could be used to finance the construction of houses with a lending value in excess of $4,000. We are therefore proposing to utilize these funds for the making of loans on houses having a lending value of up to $5,000, with a maximum loan of 80 per cent in the case of $4,000 to $5,000 houses. As the dominion finances only 25 per cent of the amount of a loan under part I of the National Housing Act, it will be noted that the funds we have available in this appropriatoin will make possible a total amount of loans of $1,520,000—that is, four times $380,000. If this amount should prove insufficient to carry until the new housing legislation is enacted, it could be supplemented temporarily by an allotment from the War Appropriation Act. It will be noted that we do not propose to raise the legal limit for 90 per cent loans. In view of the present level of building costs, I do not think we are justified in urging people with small incomes who can only afford to put up a few hundred dollars, to invest all their savings in a 10 per cent equity in a house costing, say $4,000 or $5,000, and assume the obligations involved in a 90 per cent mortgage on such a house.

I have been speaking thus far of changes that will be made in respect of loans under part I of the Act. The new act will contain three or four other parts, dealing with such matters as rental housing, housing in rural areas, repair and modernization of urban homes, and certain other matters. It is not necessary to refer to all these parts at the present time, but I would like to state that part II of the new act will include provisions making it possible for the dominion to make 90 per cent first mortgage loans, carrying an interest rate of 3 per cent, on low rental housing projects along the lines of the large project of this type recently announced in the city of Montreal. What we wish to accomplish by this type of legislation is to encourage groups of public-spirited citizens in communities where there is an acute shortage of low-rental housing to raise at least 10 per cent of the funds required by organizing a limited dividend housing corporation, to study objectively the housing conditions of the particular community and develop suitable plans and specifications for projects designed to meet the ascertained need, to supervise the construction of the project in order to assure sound construction at the most economical cost, and to provide continuing and efficient management for the project throughout its life. I would like on this occasion to pay tribute to Mr. Spinney and his associates for the valuable public service which they have rendered in working out the Montreal project, and to express the hope that similar leadership may be found in a good many other communities.

An enterprise of this character is one primarily for public service rather than one for private profit. In the case of the Montreal project, for instance, the dividend has been limited to 3 per cent, at the express wish of the sponsors themselves—I do not think we could have objected to a 4 per cent dividend. All the shareholders can expect to receive is this reasonable but modest yield on their investment, the return of their capital over a period of years, and the satisfaction of having made an important contribution to the solution of an important economic and social problem in their own community. After the dominion's loan and the shareholders' equity capital have been retired, title to the property will vest either in the dominion, or in the municipality if the latter gives suitable assistance to make a low level of rents possible under present conditions. Since the Montreal project was announced, great interest has been expressed on the part of other communities and we hope that a number of similar projects will go forward. The dominion is ready to cooperate on a similar basis in any community where there is a real shortage of low rental housing accommodation—subject, of course, to the limited supply of building materials and of labour available for all types of housing construction at the present time.

It is hoped that these measures will promote house-building now to assist in relieving the congestion in urban centres to the maximum extent consistent with the war effort. It should be emphasized that they are in addition to the measures already in operation or announced. Thus, the government will continue to press forward with its house conversion plan which now extends to fifteen cities and towns throughout Canada, and, as the Acting Prime Minister indicated last week, Wartime Housing Limited is initiating a programme for the building of additional houses for the relief of dependents of members of the armed forces urgently in need of housing accommodation and for whom housing accommodation is not otherwise available.

In closing, I think I should say once again that I have not attempted to describe or outline all the provisions of the housing legislation which we shall be introducing; but I feel I should make this announcement now, so that there will be no holding back by persons who fear that if they went ahead immediately their position would be prejudiced by the provisions of the housing act.

Mr. GRAYDON: In view of the need which is well exemplified by what the minister has said, will there be any change, or the need of any change, so far as priorities are concerned, in materials, or in connection with the man-power situation, which of course is one of the things which has been holding back some of the development?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): In answer to the question of the leader of the opposition, the matter of priorities for small house building is being met in as effective a way as possible having regard to the requirements of war. There are certain higher priorities than house building, but house building is placed in a very high priority after immediate war requirements have been met. An attempt is being made to step up production of fittings such as bathtubs, furnaces, stoves and other fixtures for small houses, and we hope to keep up with building in that regard. So far we have been able to do so, and we hope that we can continue; but I cannot promise my hon. friend that priorities for small house building will be on a level with the high priorities of war production.

Mr. GRAYDON: What about the question of man-power? Has national selective service been working in cooperation with the two ministers in connection with the house building programme?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am afraid I cannot answer that question. The appropriate minister, of course, is the Minister of Labour, but I think the answer would be probably the same as that given by the Minister of Munitions and Supply with respect to materials. There is a higher priority there as well, I think.

Mr. GRAYDON: If the bottleneck is in man-power or priorities or both, then of course the solution which the minister now provides will not necessarily be a solution of the problem.

Mr. ILSLEY: We have to carry on the war.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOTION TO FACILITATE CONSIDERATION OF BILL NO. 110—NATIONAL SELECTIVE SERVICE INSTRUCTIONS

Mr. J. S. ROY (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to move, seconded by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion):

That private members' notices of motions be now taken up, in order that the one standing in my name for the suspension of the resolution passed by the house on February 11, giving priority to government measures, be now considered so as to facilitate the passing of Bill No. 110, "an act to amend certain instructions of the national selective service of the Department of Labour."

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member gave me a copy of his motion before I came into the house. I have been considering it and I find that there is established in this house a precedent which would bar the discussion or consideration of such a motion. As will be seen at page 856 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, a motion was ruled out of order because all motions referring to the business of the house should be introduced by the leader of the house. I quote:

Mr. Church, seconded by Mr. Garland (Carleton), moved: That on Friday, June 1, Bill No. 63, "An act to amend the Railway Act" (Investigation of subsidiary of telephone or telegraph companies) now under public bills and orders, be given precedence over all (a) private bills, (b) public bills and orders (1) during the hour devoted to private bills and (2) over all other business until disposed of on that evening.

Hon. Mr. Lapointe took objection to this motion on the ground that it was unfair to other measures which had precedence over this bill.

Mr. Speaker said: The motion is out of order. The other day I ruled that according to May and Bourinot any motion concerning the order of business of the house should be made by the Prime Minister or the leader of the house. . . . I have so decided and I now so rule.

The hon. member has on the order paper a motion, No. 20, succeeding nineteen others that have been on the order paper for some considerable time. In the words of the Hon. Mr. Lapointe, it is unfair that precedence should be given to this motion over others that have been on the order paper for this length of time. In view of the authorities that have been cited, and following the established practice of this house and the decision given by Mr. Speaker Lemieux, I must rule the present motion out of order.

Mr. ROY: May I be permitted to submit to Your Honour that although this procedure is not quite in the ordinary course, but—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ROY: —there are no other means whereby private members can have their motions considered or public bills given second reading. We are all aware that the resolution which was passed on February 11 gives priority to government measures and that motions of this kind should be moved only by the leader of the house. But—

Mr. SPEAKER: I have ruled, in accordance with the practice and, as I should think, in accordance with the law of the house, that it is not competent for the hon. member to move his motion in the terms proposed.

Mr. ROY: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I must appeal from your ruling.

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

Moved by Mr. Roy, seconded by Mr. Dorion: I move, seconded by Mr. Dorion, that private members' notices of motions be now taken up, in order that the one standing in my name for the suspension of the resolution passed by the house on February 11, giving priority to government measures, be now considered so as to facilitate the passing of Bill No. 110, "an act to amend certain instructions of the national selective service of the Department of Labour."

I have ruled the motion out of order and the hon. member has appealed from the decision.

The house divided on the question: Shall the Speaker's decision be sustained? And the decision of the Chair was sustained on the following division:

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CONTRACTS TO EASTERN WOODWORKERS

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. How many contracts have been let to the Eastern Woodworkers since January 1, 1940, stating whether by public tender or private contract for, (a) wartime housing or other buildings; (b) shipbuilding, scows and barges; (c) special work or materials?

2. What is the total value of all such work and material, and what value has been completed or delivered?

3. How much money has the government advanced for plant, supplies and materials?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. (a) Ten contracts: 2 by tender, 8 by negotiation.

(b) Two contracts by negotiation.

(c) Fourteen contracts were allocated to Eastern Woodworkers in 1940 and 1941 at prices set by the timber controller.

2. (a) Total contract value: Wartime Housing Ltd., $2,110,032; shipbuilding, $2,791,000; lumber and millwork, $22,855.

(b) Total value of completed work: Wartime Housing Ltd., $2,098,262; shipbuilding (approx.), $1,634,000; lumber and millwork, $22,855.

3. The Department of Munitions and Supply has only one contract with Eastern Woodworkers involving capital expenditure. The amount of the commitment is $29,400 of which $8,375 had been advanced as of March 31, 1944, for plant and equipment.

SCRAP IRON—MOVEMENT FROM SASKATOON TO VANCOUVER

Mr. FAIR:

What was the cost per ton of moving scrap iron in carload lots from Saskatoon to Vancouver, (a) in 1938; (b) in 1943?

Mr. MICHAUD: The freight rates were as follows: (a) $12.50 per ton of 2,000 pounds; (b) $12.50 per ton of 2,000 pounds.

ST. ELEANORS, P.E.I., AIRPORT

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Was there an airport constructed at St. Eleanors, Prince county, P.E.I.?

2. If so, what was the cost of the original heating plant installed at the airport at St. Eleanors?

3. Did this heating plant prove satisfactory?

4. Was the said heating plant removed and a new plant installed? If so, at what cost?

5. What firm installed, (a) the first heating plant at No. 1 G.R.S., St. Eleanors, and (b) the second heating plant at St. Eleanors?

Mr. MACMILLAN:

1. Yes.

2. No heating plant as such, was provided. All buildings were individually heated, including five hangars. Total cost of heating approximately $132,000.

3. Yes.

4. No. When the school was converted from an SFTS to a GRS, additional buildings were constructed and a small central heating plant was designed and installed to accommodate these new buildings. Provision was made in the new central plant to extend the system to include some of the original independently heated buildings if and when it became desirable to do so. Seven of these buildings are now being incorporated in the central steam system.

The heating units removed from these seven buildings are being used in heating other miscellaneous buildings in eastern air command.

The cost of the heating plant for new buildings $46,000.

The cost of extending the above to include seven original buildings $18,575.

5. Independent heating of various types supplied and installed by General Steel Wares Ltd., Toronto, (Space heaters); Canadian Comstock Co. Ltd., Toronto, (Hangar heating); The Enterprise Foundry Co. Ltd., Sackville, N.B., (Warm air furnaces); Connolly and Twizell, Ltd., Montreal, (Independent steam). The central steam system, by W. E. Emerson & Sons, Ltd., Saint John, N.B. The addition to central steam system, Connolly and Twizell Ltd., Montreal.

CHARTERED BANKS—PROFITS, 1930-43

Mr. FAIR:

What is the percentage of profit of each of the ten chartered banks in Canada each year from 1930 to 1943 inclusive?

Mr. ABBOTT: In his speech on the second reading of bill No. 91, an act respecting banks and banking, the Minister of Finance gave the average annual rate of shareholders' net income to total published shareholders' equity for the banking system as a whole for the fifteen financial years 1929-43 and for the financial year 1943. Shareholders' net income was taken as the sum of dividends, net capital, including non-recurring profits, and net current earnings available for losses, less average annual net amount required for losses in 1929-43. These figures were based on confidential information obtained from the banks by the Minister of Finance. It is not in the public interest to disclose this information for individual banks.

Based on the annual published profit and loss statements of the individual banks it is possible to calculate for every bank the percentage of published profits to published shareholders' investment or equity, namely, capital paid up, reserve fund and undivided profits. It should be pointed out that all banks have not published such statements in precisely the same form, not being required to do so by the general terms of section 53(8) of the Bank Act. Certain of the banks formerly disclosed in their published statements provision only for dominion note circulation tax and income tax (and in the case of one bank dominion note circulation tax only), but from about 1934 to 1940 all banks, with one exception, followed the practice of showing provision for both dominion and provincial taxes in annual statements to shareholders. Since 1940 provincial taxes have not been a factor because of the dominion-provincial agreement on taxation. Municipal and other taxes, however, which have always totalled a substantial amount, have never been specified in annual published statements.

In view of the foregoing and to provide more uniform information for comparative purposes net profits figures have been used after allowance for taxes in all cases and after published allocations to pension funds, bank premises depreciation and for other purposes (which likewise have not been treated in a uniform manner by all banks) as these amounts are definitely provided out of earnings and consequently decrease the amount finally available to shareholders.

The 1934 percentages in the case of several banks, namely Provincial, Commerce, Royal, Dominion and Canadienne Nationale, necessarily reflect reductions made in the published rest or reserve funds of these banks in 1933 for transfers to inner reserves, as publicly announced at that time and which came to the attention of the banking and commerce committee of the House of Commons when the Bank Act was reviewed in 1934.

The statement does not include any figures for The Weyburn Security Bank, which was purchased by Imperial Bank of Canada, effective as of May 1, 1931.

Commerce: Fiscal year-end changed from November 30 to October 31, beginning 1938. Percentage for 1938 relates to 10-month period only.

Dominion: Fiscal year-end changed from December 31 to October 31, beginning 1939. Percentage for 1939 relates to 10-month period only.

Canadienne Nationale: Calculations based on net profits figures before provision for annual statutory payment of $125,000 to the Province of Quebec—provincial statute, 14 Geo. V, chapter 3.

Barclays: Commenced operations September, 1929. No profits reported until 1932 and no annual profit and loss statements published, although one is sent to the minister under section 53 (9) of the Bank Act.

WARTIME PRICES AND TRADE BOARD—PERMITS FOR PURCHASE OF TRUCKS

Mr. DORION:

Since the 1st of January, 1942, how many permits, in each province, have been issued each month by the wartime prices and trade board for the purchase of new trucks?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

Permits issued for the release of trucks are not recorded by provinces, by months, but are classified in essentiality groups. The production of trucks for civilian purposes was discontinued in March, 1942. At that time there were a number of trucks in dealers' inventories in various parts of Canada which were released without permit, and these new units, together with used trucks diverted from non-essential to essential usages, fairly well met the requirements for 1942.

Following is a record of permits issued for the periods January 1, 1943, to December 31, 1943, and January 1, 1944, to March 31, 1944, divided into the various essential categories.

WINNIPEG HYDRO-ELECTRIC—SLAVE FALLS PLANT

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. Has the city of Winnipeg hydro-electric system applied to the construction controller of the Department of Munitions and Supply for a permit to commence preliminary work on the extensions of its Slave falls plant?

2. If so, on what date or dates?

3. Has the above application been supported by communications from any other organizations? If so, from what organizations?

4. Has the application been granted? If not, is it being considered?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. Yes.

2. Application No. 45869 dated March 14, 1944; application No. 47115 dated April 20, 1944.

3. Yes, the Winnipeg board of trade.

4. Application No. 45869 dated March 14, 1944 was not granted. Subsequent application No. 47115 dated April 20, 1944 is still under consideration.

PREMIUMS ON HOGS

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. Are packers entitled to make a discount or deduction of three dollars on the purchase or price of overweight hogs?
2. If not, when was the practice of doing so discontinued, and under what circumstances?
3. What premiums are now payable on the various grades of hogs?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. No.
2. On April 10, 1944, at which time a simplified schedule of carcass grades and payment by warrant of the new dominion quality premiums became effective.
3. The dominion government now pays a premium of $3 per head on grade A and $2 per head on grade B1 carcasses. The former packer's premium of $1 on grade A carcasses is now embodied in an increased price for both A and B1 grades.

PRODUCTION OF ALCOHOL

Mr. TUSTIN:

How much alcohol was produced in Canada in each of the months, January, February, March and April, 1944?

Mr. GIBSON: January, 1944—2,547,383·46 proof gallons; February, 1944—2,805,524·37 proof gallons; March, 1944—3,185,409·08 proof gallons.

Figures for the month of April, 1944, not yet available.

2. If so, for what amounts during 1939, 1940, 1941, 1942, 1943 and 1944?
3. What kind of work have they performed for the government?
4. What is the total amount of payments made to them up to the present in connection with said contracts for each of the years abovementioned?

FARM CREDIT

LIMITED GUARANTEE OF BANK LOANS FOR IMPROVEMENT AND DEVELOPMENT OF FARMS

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a bill to encourage the provision of intermediate term and short term credit to farmers for the improvement and development of farms through bank loans, guaranteed with limitations, by the crown; moneys payable under the act including expenses of administration to be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

POST-WAR CIVIL AVIATION

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT BY LORD BEAVERBROOK IN RESPECT TO CANADIAN DRAFT CONVENTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I should like to direct certain questions to the Minister of Munitions and Supply in connection with a Canadian Press dispatch of to-day's date in reference to a statement made by Lord Beaverbrook in the House of Lords yesterday with respect to post-war aviation. Lord Beaverbrook stated that the united nations would hold a conference, possibly this year, to decide on the post-war international regulation of civil aviation, and also that Great Britain had rejected or abandoned the Canadian-sponsored plan covering this field. The questions I should like to ask the minister are these. Will he inform the house as to whether or not Canada will be represented at a united nations conference, as mentioned by Lord Beaverbrook; also whether he had any knowledge that the draft Canadian convention that was submitted to this parliament was unacceptable to both Great Britain and the United States, and whether the Canadian government intends to submit any convention or plan on civil aviation alternative to the convention already submitted to this parliament.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Since the statement of Lord Beaverbrook in the House of Lords has been referred to it may be well to place the exact statement on Hansard. I happen to have it here in a letter from His Lordship dated April 26, 1944, as follows:

The United States delegation proposed that we should go forward to an international conference on the following lines. That there should be an international authority to lay down standards for technical requirements and for rates of air carriage and to interchange information. The proposed authority would start on a non-executive basis with no power or means of enforcement of its regulations—at least, during an interim period.

The United Kingdom delegation presented for consideration the Canadian draft convention which has been laid on the table in the Canadian parliament. This draft convention lays down a detailed plan for an international regulatory authority with powers of enforcement. Its provisions include the allocation of frequencies of air services and national quotas for international air traffic.

This Canadian proposal was considered by the Americans to be too rigid as a basis for talks at the proposed international conference. After discussion it was agreed, therefore, that we should go forward to the conference on the basis of proposals for international handling of civil aviation evolved at the commonwealth conversations. These proposals are in some respects open to varying interpretations and were considered by the Americans to be flexible enough to provide a more satisfactory basis for an international conference. The broad purpose would be to draw up an international convention on air navigation to be implemented by an international transport organization which would evolve standards, seek to eliminate uneconomic competition, work out for each nation an equitable participation in world air transport and maintain broad equilibrium between air transport capacity and traffic offering. On these general principles the United States and Great Britain are in agreement. The powers of enforcement of the provisions would be open to further discussion.

In his preamble my hon. friend referred to the Canadian proposals, as laid on the table of this house, as being rejected. May I point out that the Canadian proposals were not presented to the United Kingdom-American conference for acceptance or rejection. They were prepared in Canada as a basis for the discussion of international problems. It is rather interesting to note from the statement I have just read that the draft convention as tabled here was presented to the bilateral meeting in London as the view of the United Kingdom government. It then would appear that the United States took the view that its provisions were too rigid, and for that reason another draft upon which the Canadian convention was founded is to be put forward for discussion when the international conference is held.

The first question was whether Canada would be represented at a united nations conference. Canada certainly will be present. I was then asked if I had any knowledge that the Canadian convention submitted to this parliament was unacceptable, both to Great Britain and to the United States. Lord Beaverbrook's statement makes it perfectly clear that the United Kingdom were quite prepared to accept the basis proposed by Canada. The United States simply stated that in many particulars the convention was too rigid. I think I may say that the position of the United States was known when the statement was laid on the table. It was simply tabled here as Canada's proposed basis for a discussion of an international agreement.

The third question was whether Canada intended to submit an alternative convention or plan. May I say that the Canadian convention is the first attempt by any nation to put forward a detailed plan for the regulation of post-war civil aviation. The amazing thing to me is that the Canadian proposal has received such widespread study. It has been the subject of comment in aviation circles in a good many countries. In my opinion it served a most useful purpose and has become the focal point in the discussion of civil aviation problems. I stated in the house during the course of the debate that no one would be more surprised than I if the convention should be accepted without many changes as a basis for international agreement. It has proved a most useful basis for discussions of post-war civil aviation, and for that reason I think it is a useful document. Canada will not at this time attempt to prepare another document.

Mr. COLDWELL: Since this convention has not been approved by two of the major powers, will Canada continue to place such a convention before the international conference, at which many other nations will be represented? In other words, will Canada continue to press for a solution of the problem along the lines suggested?

Mr. HOWE: The views tabled in this parliament are the views of Canada for a solution of the civil aviation problem. Our views may be modified as a result of discussion, but we will continue to press them in any conference to which we are invited. I believe it is proposed that a number of bilateral conferences will be held before the general conference, and at those discussions Canada will present the document tabled here as the views of Canada.

Mr. GRAYDON: Will the minister, following the usual procedure in a matter of this kind, table the letter from Lord Beaverbrook to himself from which he has quoted?

Mr. HOWE: It is not a secret letter, but it is a personal letter. That letter contains the agreed statement that Lord Beaverbrook said was to be made after the discussions in London. I am not going to table this letter; it is personal.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then you should not have read it.

Mr. HOWE: I did not read the letter.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You read part of it.

Mr. HOWE: I read the official statement given in the House of Lords which happened to be conveyed with the personal letter from Lord Beaverbrook to myself. I read the official message, and I am not going to table a private letter.

Mr. GRAYDON: I rise to a point of order. I think the rules of this house provide very clearly, and it has been many times decided, that when a minister of the crown reads a part of a letter or the whole letter—

An hon. MEMBER: He did not.

Mr. GRAYDON: —or an official document, he must table that letter or document. That is not only the custom and the practice; it is in accordance with the rules of this house. If the minister had said that he was reading only the document that was produced to the House of Lords, it would be an entirely different matter. I listened carefully to what the minister said. As I understood him, he said that he had either received the letter on or the date of the letter was April 26, and he then attempted to quote from the letter. There was nothing in what he said to indicate that he was quoting only part. From where I sit I could see that all the letter was not being quoted by the minister. I rise now to indicate that the rules of the house, which I think must be clear enough, provide for the tabling of the letter itself.

Mr. HOWE: I am going to surprise my hon. friend. I will read this personal letter in full.

Mr. GRAYDON: Table it.

Mr. HOWE: It is dated Gwydyr House, Whitehall, S.W.1, April 26, 1944, and reads:

My dear Clarence,

Many thanks for your cable of 10th April and your letter of 11th April. By this time you will have had the detailed summary of our discussions with Berle which was sent by cable.

So far the Russians do not seem to have arrived in Washington. I shall look forward to an account of your meeting with them. Three points emerge from our discussions with the Americans:

(i) The Americans have accepted, as a basis for negotiation, the subcommittee report on international control, which resulted from our commonwealth conversations.

(ii) The subject of air bases and their post-war use has yet to be discussed.

(iii) We are agreed on the principle of colonial cabotage. That is, a nation has rights of cabotage on all airlines to and within its colonies and dependencies.

We had hoped to carry the Americans with us on the structure of your draft convention. We went through it with them line by line, but they felt that they had so many reservations to make that it could not be taken as a basis. Instead we adopted the commonwealth report which, as you know, contains the same general provisions in a flexible form.

Berle has agreed with me a more detailed statement which I will give in the House of Lords in answer to a question on the conference. The agreed statement runs as follows:

You will not ask me to re-read the quotation which was the official statement?

Mr. GRAYDON: All I asked the minister to do was to table the letter.

Mr. HOWE: I had better read it now.

Mr. GRAYDON: All right.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It can go on the record and you can table it.

Mr. HOWE: The letter continues:

Your version of the Douglas DC-4 with Merlin engines should make a fine transport. I imagine it will show its heels to its American-built cousins across the border. A Canadian-built product of this sort should create an excellent impression. Adequate numbers of commercial aircraft will be the crux of the immediate post-war period in civil aviation.

I am delighted to see that you are going ahead with plans for construction. I hope that we shall be able to make further progress with building civil aircraft here before long.

I look forward to seeing the Prime Minister in London shortly, although I do not know to what extent civil aviation will be discussed at the prime ministers' conference. I will not raise it.

Yours ever,

Max.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, may we now get down to earth and have the document tabled, as it should have been at the very beginning? I have no objection to the minister's reading the letter. In fact, I welcome it, because it contains information that is very valuable to the house and the country. I am surprised at the minister refusing to follow the ordinary rules of the house and not tabling it in the first instance.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Speaker, may I speak on a point of order? I am no expert on the rules, but it seems to me that this would be stretching the rules beyond all reason. The Minister of Munitions and Supply read to the house an announcement that was made in the House of Lords.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is not what he said.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He did not say that.

Mr. CRERAR: Oh, yes; he did.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The record will show.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Speaker, I would like to have a little order when I am speaking decently and civilly in this house, but very often I do not meet with it, and I could name certain hon. gentlemen, too, from whom I do not meet with it.

The case before us is exactly as if the Minister of Munitions and Supply had said: I have an announcement which was made in the House of Lords and is enclosed in a private or a personal letter. That is exactly the case. One must look at the pith and substance and sense of the rules. The rule about tabling a letter is to prevent part of a letter from being read to the house when there is something in the context that alters the meaning of the part that is read. That is the principle underlying the rule. But when an hon. member of this house reads an official announcement it does not make any difference whether he takes it out of a letter or whether it was an enclosure with a letter. It does not carry with it the obligation of reading a personal letter in this house, and the hon. leader of the opposition is attempting to stretch the rule beyond any bounds of common sense when he says that that should be done. We are on an academic point, because the letter has been read to the house and made public at the instance of the leader of the opposition. It would be an irresponsible attitude for the leader of any party to take to press for the reading of a personal letter in the house when all that the member who was speaking was doing was giving to the house the terms of an official announcement.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think the error that has been disclosed—

An hon. MEMBER: There is no point of order in that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There was a point of order raised by my hon. friend here arising out of an error on the part of the minister, who announced that he was reading from a letter from Lord Beaverbrook when he intended to read from a statement enclosed in a letter from Lord Beaverbrook. That emerged afterwards. There is no doubt that the minister said that he was reading from a letter from His Lordship, and I assumed at the beginning that it was an official letter and therefore that it was entitled to be tabled in this house. But the actual position seems to be this, that Lord Beaverbrook prepared a statement for the House of Lords, and then enclosed a copy of it in a letter to the minister. The statement which he made in the House of Lords was properly read by the minister to the house. I do not think he was called upon to read a personal letter. What happened was that the minister fell into error in the first place and thereby led us into error, and then later corrected the position. I conceive the rule to be this, that any official communication read to the house should be tabled, but personal letters should not be tabled and should not even be referred to.

May I be permitted to say a word on one other point arising out of the minister's statement? I understood him to say that the British government in the first instance had accepted the Canadian proposal. My question is based on a statement in a Canadian press dispatch which appears in the Ottawa Journal this morning entitled "U.K.—"

Mr. SPEAKER: This has gone beyond what is before the Chair. As I understand it, the leader of the opposition raised the point of order that the letter read by the minister should be laid on the table. If there is any other hon. member who wishes to speak on that point, I shall be glad to hear him.

Mr. RALSTON: Mr. Speaker, I should like to follow what my colleague said, with this. I think the hon. member for York-Sunbury has in a general way cited the rule correctly. The rule as mentioned in the third edition of Beauchesne, at page 111, reads as follows—and I quote it now because this point frequently comes up and there is a great deal of misunderstanding about it:

> It has been admitted that a document which has been cited ought to be laid upon the table of the house, if it can be done without injury to the public interest. The same rule, however, cannot be held to apply to private letters or memoranda. On the 18th May, 1865, the attorney-general, on being asked by Mr. Ferrar if he would lay upon the table a written statement and a letter to which he had referred on a previous day, in answering a question relative to the Leeds Bankruptcy Court, replied that he had made a statement to the house upon his own responsibility, and that the documents he had referred to being private, he could not lay them upon the table. Lord Robert Cecil contended that the papers, having been cited, should be produced; but the speaker declared that this rule applied to public documents only.

That same rule was laid down by you, Mr. Speaker, last session in connection with a document which was read by the hon. member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen). I support what my colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has said, that the reading of a public document enclosed in a letter does not compel for a single instant the laying on the table of the private letter in which that public document was enclosed.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I add one word, Mr. Speaker? Whatever may have been the argument against tabling this document, the minister quickly and strangely surrendered to the request I made, and I can only hope that in the public interest he will continue to surrender. My point is that once the minister had read, as he said, the full letter to the house, he took away any possible argument against tabling it that there was from the government's point of view on the ground that it was a private or personal matter. He could not possibly say that of a letter which had been read; therefore I am going to ask that the letter be tabled. If I am not permitted to do that under the rules, I am afraid there is nothing I can do about it, but certainly I think I am right in my request.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I think this is a point which should be cleared up. I ran into the same difficulty in this house on March 27 last, when I was reading from a personal letter and the Minister of Munitions and Supply, at page 1879 of Hansard, asked that the letter be tabled. I then asked whether the rules of the house obliged me to do so, and the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) said: "They certainly do." And the Minister of Munitions and Supply said: "Oh, yes." I then laid the letter on the table under protest, but the next day received it back from the Clerk of the House, who told me that the rules of the house did not permit me to lay the letter on the table.

Mr. CHURCH: Is this motion debatable, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no motion before the house. With respect to the point of order raised by the leader of the opposition in regard to the letter read by the Minister of Munitions and Supply, it appears to me that there is nothing for me to decide, because the house has taken cognizance of the letter. Objection was taken by the leader of the opposition regarding this letter, and the Minister of Munitions and Supply replied to that by reading the letter in full into Hansard. We are not dealing with a departmental report. As Bourinot so aptly says, at page 243, "No document can be regularly laid on the table unless in pursuance of some parliamentary authority." Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, page 145, paragraph 385, says with regard to papers which are laid before the house:

> Papers are laid before the house in pursuance of > (1) Provision of an act of parliament;
> (2) An order of the house;
> (3) An address to the crown;
> (4) The command of the crown;
> (5) Standing orders of the house.

The letter in question does not come within any of these categories, therefore it need not be laid on the table as a parliamentary paper. It may be tabled for information during a debate, but there is no motion before the chair at this moment. It is true that it could have been said, and it was so stated by the Minister of Finance, that the document need not be laid on the table of the house if it be against the public interest. Paragraph 278, on page 111, states:

> It has been admitted that a document which has been cited ought to be laid upon the table of the house, if it can be done without injury to the public interest.

If there was a debate and that debate contained some reference to a document which was cited by a minister of the crown, undoubtedly that letter would have to be placed on the table of the house, according to the well-known principle that you cannot in a court of law seek to supply evidence from a document without producing the document. But there is no debate before the house, and therefore the position is, I take it, that I have nothing to decide. The letter has been read; it is part of the record, and there it must stand.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask Your Honour—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am not going to submit to that kind of thing. If Mr. Speaker asks me to sit down I will sit down, but I am not going to be told to do so by a lot of people across the floor. Your Honour referred to the letter having been read in full. I should like the minister to state whether what he read is the letter in full?

Mr. HOWE: It is, with the exception of one sentence.

[Later]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I ask the Minister of Munitions and Supply a short supplementary question arising out of his reply to the hon. member for Lake Centre? Did I understand him to say that in the first instance the United Kingdom government, or the Beaverbrook committee—whichever he may designate—had accepted a Canadian-sponsored plan regarding post-war international regulation of civil aviation? Had they actually accepted it, and if so, is it not a fact that they have now abandoned it? I would think that that is so, from the Canadian Press report, but I want to know if they had actually committed themselves to the plan. I am not sure that he made that clear.

Mr. HOWE: I have tried to make it clear that the plan has not been presented to anyone for acceptance or rejection.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It was a basis—?

Mr. HOWE: It was put forward as a basis for discussion. It has neither been accepted nor rejected. But I think my hon. friend will see, if he reads Lord Beaverbrook's letter which I put on Hansard, that the conference was interested in it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: This matter is a most important one. The minister in his answer to the question as to what took place yesterday in the House of Lords, referred me to a letter dated on April 26. This press dispatch dealing with what took place in the House of Lords yesterday states that Lord Beaverbrook, the Lord Privy Seal, disclosed that last year's commonwealth discussions provided for an all-red route, presumably an air route girdling the globe and operating entirely on an empire basis. The question I wish to direct to the minister is this. Did Canada come to an agreement with the empire countries at the commonwealth conference for an all-red route? That question, Mr. Speaker, arises directly from the discussion which took place in this chamber when the convention was before the house, and I ask whether or not Lord Beaverbrook properly set forth the facts in that regard in the House of Lords yesterday.

Mr. HOWE: I have not seen Lord Beaverbrook's statement in the House of Lords. I have seen the official statements of all the conferences which have been held to this date. I gave the house the official statement, that is the agreed statement issued from the conference recently held in London, and I find no reference to any such discussion. It is well understood in discussions of this type that the agreed statement is the only information which can go forth from the conference.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Does the minister say there was no agreement on an all-red route?

Mr. HOWE: There was no agreement resulting from any of the discussions. All meetings have been for the purpose of exploratory discussions. They resulted in discussions, not agreements.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Proposals?

Mr. HOWE: As I say, I am bound not to give any more information about these discussions than was contained in the agreed statement.

FISHERIES

TIE-UP OF HALIBUT FISHING FLEETS ON PACIFIC COAST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I should like to direct a question to the minister who is acting on behalf of the Minister of Fisheries: it has to do with the halibut fleet on the Pacific coast. That fleet should have commenced fishing operations after April 16, but so far no boat has gone fishing. What steps, if any, have the government taken or do they contemplate taking to deal with the difficulty which exists in connection with the tie-up of the halibut fleet?

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Acting Minister of Fisheries): On behalf of the Minister of Fisheries, and in reply to the hon. member for New Westminster, I may say the information which is laid before me is as follows:

Although halibut fishing was permissible from April 16, the entire United States and Canadian halibut fleet on the Pacific coast has remained tied up. The United States fishermen are not satisfied with price ceilings announced by the Office of Price Administration. The halibut fishery is an international one, and the Canadian fishermen have decided to remain idle in sympathy with their United States friends. Despite continuous negotiations between the United States fishermen and O.P.A. no agreement has been reached, and, as far as it is possible to ascertain at this time, there is no immediate prospect of reconciliation.

There is no relation of employer and employee between the Canadian government and the fishermen, and it is only by persuasion that the Canadian fishermen could be induced to resume their fishing operations. So far they have been adamant to any representation made by the Canadian government.

THE PRIME MINISTER

QUESTION AS TO PUBLICATION IN "HANSARD" OF ADDRESS TO UNITED KINGDOM HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. ROEBUCK (Trinity): May I direct a question to the administration through the Acting Prime Minister? I think it is fitting that the attention of the house should be called to an historic event which took place this morning, when the Prime Minister of this country (Mr. Mackenzie King) addressed the combined houses of parliament in Great Britain. I ask not only that we take notice of that historic event, the first time I believe in the history of the Dominion of Canada that a prime minister of this country has addressed the combined houses of parliament in Great Britain, but I would inquire whether his address, and the various speeches accompanying it, since they will be printed in the British Hansard, will also be printed in the Hansard of this house.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Acting Prime Minister): This matter was brought to my attention from another source just before three o'clock. At that time I wanted to have a word with my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, but I was not able to get him at the moment. Since I came into the chamber the hon. member who asked the question mentioned the matter to me privately. I have considered it, and my view, as representing the government at the present time, is that probably it is not in order to print, either in Hansard or as an appendix to Hansard, an address made outside the house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is no doubt about that.

Mr. CRERAR: It will be printed.

Mr. RALSTON: I realize of course that it is printed in the British Hansard. It appears as a matter of courtesy, in the same manner as the speeches of Mr. Churchill and Mr. Eden were printed here. My suggestion, as to which I wanted to speak to the leaders of the opposition and of the two groups, is that I should get copies of the speeches made by Mr. Churchill, by the Lord Chancellor, and by the Honourable the Speaker of the House, along with the speech of the Prime Minister to which my hon. friend has referred, and that they should be tabled in this house, because I think all will agree, regardless of party, that it was an historic event. The house can then consider whether or not they desire to have the speeches printed either in Votes and Proceedings or as a house paper. I shall speak to my hon. friends the leader of the opposition and the leaders of the other two groups, with reference to the matter. In the meantime I simply wish to indicate what my views are, first, with regard to the printing in Hansard and, secondly, with regard to the procedure that might be adopted, having regard to the significance of the occasion.

HOUSING

BUILDING OF WAR-TIME HOUSING IN TORONTO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I wish to ask the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) a question arising out of an insufficient return to an order of the house on war-time housing. I refer to return 112A which states, in an answer, that no war-time houses were built in Toronto. My question is this. Is the minister arranging for the building of 500 war-time houses in Toronto? Who will administer them, and will the rents be collected by the municipality? I may say that 250 new war-time houses are to be built in Windsor, according to my understanding. Will the same practice be followed in Toronto and, if so, to what extent?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): While it is technically true that no war-time houses have been built in Toronto, it is in fact hardly correct to say that. It was decided by the mayor of Toronto and myself that the purposes of that city would be better served by building war-time houses outside the limits of Toronto, and that has been done. Two hundred houses have been built at Malton, and also a men's hostel to accommodate 422 persons and a women's hostel accommodating 422 persons. Two hundred houses have been built at Long Branch together with a women's hostel to accommodate 416 persons. That is really housing for the city of Toronto, which could just as well have been built inside the city limits, had those concerned in that area not felt that the houses could be better built to better advantage outside. War-time housing has been instructed to study further the needs of the Toronto area and I hope shortly to be able to inform the house as to what arrangements are being made for additional houses. I am not able to do so to-day.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

RELEASES TO THE PRESS—TIME OF ANNOUNCEMENT IN THE HOUSE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH: I wish to ask a question of the acting leader of the government. Is it not the practice in the British House of Commons, with regard to such war announcements to-day concerning the three services such as the air, for such announcements to be made in the house on the same day on which they are given to the press? We had a premature announcement on civil aviation about a month ago in connection with Washington. This parliament ought to be informed first on any conventions or agreements. Are we to have all these announcements made, against us or with us, and binding on Canada, without the house having anything to say or do about it?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Acting Prime Minister): I do not know to what announcement my hon. friend is referring, but speaking for the department I represent, I have always said it did not seem to me that this house should be a bulletin board and that matters of news, the usual statements as to matters going on in the department from time to time, should be published in the regular way in the newspapers for the benefit of members and everyone else. Matters of policy, when the house is sitting—it is, I think, almost the invariable rule—are announced in the house at least concurrently with publication in the newspapers, if not prior thereto.

VICTORY LOANS

QUESTION OF ACCEPTANCE OF BONDS IN PAYMENT OF DOMINION SUCCESSION DUTIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. JACKMAN (Rosedale): I wish to ask the Minister of Finance a question on the basis of a statement by the provincial treasurer of this province, to the effect that victory bonds of the sixth series will be accepted at par and accrued interest in payment of Ontario succession duties in every estate liable to such duties if the bonds were the property of the deceased during his lifetime. Will the minister also accept victory bonds in this series at par value in payment of dominion succession duties if the bonds were held by the deceased during his lifetime?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): The answer is that the bonds are not so accepted. The question, as a practical one, has not arisen, because bonds have not gone down. If anything they have gone up, and we hope and believe they will not go down. For reasons I have repeatedly stated throughout the country, we have felt that we could not as a dominion give special—

Mr. JACKMAN: Ontario did it.

Mr. ILSLEY: But we do not follow all precedents set by the province of Ontario.

Mr. GRAYDON: It might be better if you did.

Mr. ILSLEY: It was felt that the dominion government could not give a special value, or guaranteed value, to bonds held by certain persons, namely, those whose estates will be subject to succession duties.

Mr. COLDWELL: If such a policy is considered, will it be extended to all the people of Canada and not merely to a few estates?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Anyone who dies and is liable to succession duty.

Mr. ILSLEY: The question which the hon. gentleman asks is objectionable on two grounds. In the first place, it is a hypothetical question, and, second, it would involve a matter of government policy which would be announced in due course.

Mr. LOCKHART: Would the Minister of Finance be good enough to indicate to what extent the bonds of the fourth and fifth victory loans subscribed to by those who are overseas have been issued? Are they still in process of being issued? I have received inquiries from boys overseas whose next of kin have not received bonds paid for some time ago and I was wondering to what extent the issuing of these bonds had been carried out.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is obviously a question which I cannot answer without notice—

Mr. LOCKHART: Would the minister be good enough to consider it and answer later?

Mr. ILSLEY: —nor is it one which, in my opinion, should be asked on the orders of the day. In order to answer it correctly, one would have to have an extensive investigation carried out with reference to dates. I am fully aware of the problem and under great pressure of work, in spite of lack of staff, we are trying to get them out as promptly as possible.

BANK ACT AMENDMENT

CONDITIONS GOVERNING TEN-YEAR EXTENSION OF BANK CHARTERS

The house resumed from Tuesday, May 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Ilsley for the second reading of bill No. 91, respecting banks and banking, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. ANTHONY HLYNKA (Vegreville): Bill No. 91, an act respecting banks and banking, contains provisions which will govern the conditions of the extension of bank charters for the next ten years. It may well be said that economic conditions in Canada for the next ten years will be governed by this bill. For these and other reasons, I consider the bill to be of extreme importance. I regret to say, however, that to me the bill looks more like a charter for a new depression than a new lease on the economic life of the nation.

The stand of the Social Credit movement on monetary and economic matters should, I think, by this time be well known across this country. During the past nine years the Social Credit members of parliament have placed upon the record of this house, time and again, some of the most enlightening material on the subject. The hon. members for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), Acadia (Mr. Quelch), and Wetaskiwin (Mr. Jaques), have gained for themselves prominent recognition in this field. We may also include in this group three or four members from the Liberal ranks, the leading two of whom are the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) and the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght). Disappointing, however, is the fact that the Liberal monetary reformers talk monetary reform but always vote with the government in support of reaction.

I would say that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) achieved the object which he aimed at by his speech of May 2. His twenty-one page provocation drew out the opposition groups to speak along the lines which he charted for them. This arrangement smothered a considerable amount of anticipated attack. As was said the other day, the minister took the offensive and in my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the results so far show that he has had a measure of success.

The minister certainly showed courage when he undertook to divert the attention of the house from the inefficiency, shortcomings, and inadequacy of the government's policy, and to unleash a projected attack upon what he considered to be the unsound stand of opposition groups. In other words, the minister placed the opposition groups on trial before this house and the country, and he assumed the role of the prosecuting attorney. In my humble opinion the positions should have been reversed.

I should like to make only three or four references to the minister's speech of May 2. In the first place, the minister unloaded the blame for the last man-made depression on the first world war. No doubt his successors, by the same process of reasoning, will blame the next depression on the present war. In the second place, the minister quoted Professors Thorp and Mitchell as his authorities for Canada enjoying 1·86 years of prosperity for each year of depression. I am prepared to take the minister's word for the correctness of this statement. But would the minister mind explaining to the house and to the country why a nation as rich as Canada is should have one year of depression for every 1·86 years of prosperity? Why should there ever be depression in the midst of plenty?

Mr. ILSLEY: May I say a word at this stage about that? The professors who made the study had the years divided into years of prosperity, revival, recession and depression, which were defined in accordance with their own principles. When that fact is taken into consideration the picture is certainly different from the impression given by me. Moreover, the period covered was from 1888 to 1924, and was before the establishment of many central banks, and certainly long before the time when central banks had developed and perfected techniques for controlling savings from prosperity to depression. But it must be admitted that in the period between 1888 and 1924 there were business cycles. The point of the quotation was, of course, to show that Canada's position was better in that respect than that of all other countries or at least seventeen other countries.

Mr. HLYNKA: An argument to the effect that Canada has had more prosperity in decimal points than some of the other countries in the world does not prove to me that we should have any depression. Of course, if we think along the lines of reaction it would seem to indicate that for this nation to enjoy 1·86 years of prosperity as against one year of depression is quite an achievement. But, as I said, the situation is one that cannot be justified.

The third point that I wish to refer to in the minister's speech is to me a significant statement which appears at page 2549 of Hansard of May 2. In defence of the government's policy the minister states:

> There is no reason why the government should seek to escape the cost of interest on its borrowings at the expense of any one or all of these particular groups associated with the banks. The only equitable policy is for the government to pay reasonable rates of interest appropriate to the form and nature of the borrowing and meet the cost from taxation levied by parliament.

I believe that the shoe should be on the other foot. The minister says "Why should the government seek to escape the cost of interest on its borrowings at the expense of any one of those particular groups associated with the banks?" May I ask the minister this question: Why should the banks escape with the privilege of the issuing and withdrawing of credit which rightly belongs to the people? The minister further explains that he finds four objections to the social credit proposals, and they appear in Hansard to this effect: (1) That if the Social Crediters had their way the shareholders of the banks would have to suffer losses; that is, if the right to expand credit were restored to the people; (2) That the depositors would pay higher service charges; (3) That interest rates would have to be reduced on savings to depositors and, (4) that bank employees would get less in wages and salaries. May I state frankly that the four arguments advanced by the minister cannot hold water. Just as the inflation bogey became worn-out, threadbare, until the minister was forced to give up that argument, so will these four gems of wisdom eventually fall by the wayside.

The minister built up his whole argument on the premise that there was little wrong with the government's policy. However, he failed to explain to the house and to the country why the old status quo policy has failed so miserably in the past. Instead of devoting so much time to suppositions why the new proposals of opposition groups would not work, the minister would have rendered a service to the country had he confined himself to an explanation of how his policy will be made to work. This is one question, among others, that should have been answered by the minister. However, he sidestepped many important questions, and went on to build up his case against the new proposals. For this reason I desire to ask the minister a few questions, to which I should like categorical answers.

1. Would the minister tell this house and the country by what method he intends to repay the staggering debt of this dominion? Does he consider it necessary to repay it and, if so, when does he intend to begin?

2. Would he tell us how he proposes to meet the interest falling due each year on our huge national debt? Is he aware of the fact that 44·04 per cent of our national income in 1934 was swallowed up by interest charges on our national debt, leaving only 55·96 per cent of the national income to take care of all other expenses? That was the situation when our national debt was only $3,141,042,097. What will be the situation when our national debt reaches the fifteen billion dollar mark after the war?

3. Will the minister give us the assurance that no money consideration will be permitted to stand in the way of our post-war reconstruction? He did give us this assurance as far as the prosecution of the war was concerned. Will he now give us the same assurance in respect to the peace-time requirements of this nation? I feel that the people of Canada should have this question answered.

4. The minister did not explain by what manner of means he intends to place sufficient purchasing power in the hands of the people of Canada to enable them to buy the goods and services they require to maintain a decent standard of living. This standard of living should be commensurate with the wealth of this nation, which we can give our people in goods and services.

I will make this statement, that if the government continues to pursue its present financial policy it will put an end to private enterprise in Canada. Socialist critics at the present time are using the argument that private enterprise is to be blamed for the many ills from which the people of Canada have suffered in the past, and I can tell the government that there seems to be a considerable number of willing listeners to that unsound argument. These critics refuse to admit that it was the monetary system which failed to distribute the goods that private enterprise was ready to produce. I believe in private enterprise for the farmer, for the business man and in other pursuits, but I wish to make it clear that I oppose any and all monopolies, government or private. It is my considered opinion that all economic reform is based on monetary reform; and unless the government is ready and willing to give the Canadian people real monetary reform, all talk of reconstruction, housing schemes, rehabilitation schemes, old age pension schemes, health schemes, educational schemes, a floor under the income of the farmer and so on will remain idle and futile, in the words of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King).

Social Crediters have two main slogans which I believe express at least in part the social credit philosophy. The first is: "What is physically possible must be made financially possible." May I illustrate the point? If in time of war we had men and material, would we refuse to manufacture the weapons of war because there was no money? I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that no government would dare advance this "no money" argument in time of war so long as men and materials were available. That has been amply proven during this war. Now let us take a peace-time period. If we have materials which the people need, shall we continue to tell them that we cannot feed and clothe them because there is no money? Any government permitting such a condition to exist after the war will have no place in Canada. Our second slogan is: "Security with freedom." Not only do we propose to give our people security; we will assist them in guarding jealously the hard-won freedoms for which our forefathers laid down their lives. At the present time we hear men prominent in our public life stressing in their speeches and in written articles the material and economic side of life. I agree that the economic side of life is most important. I agree that the people of this rich nation no longer should tolerate anything which would resemble the pre-war years. I believe the Canadian people should be enjoying the highest possible standard of living. At the same time, to become purely materialistic, we hear theories advanced along these lines: promises made to the people that all they have to do is give up part of their freedom, give their consent to certain amounts of regimentation, and they will be guaranteed security. I feel that the time has come when hon. members should rise and declare their stand on this important point. We must draw a distinct line between those proposals which would land us eventually in a totalitarian set-up, and those which would guarantee the people national economic security and freedom.

Therefore I repeat that the Social Crediters have two main slogans. The first is: "What is physically possible must be made financially possible," and the second: "Security with freedom."

If this bank bill is the best the minister and the government can produce then I personally feel that the people of this nation will demand that the minister and the government guarantee to them the results which they want and the things which they need. As I pointed out, 55·96 per cent of our total national income in 1934 was left to discharge our obligations, to pay old age pensions, to pay our civil servants and to take care of all other expenses that enter into government. Our national debt has now risen until it is in the neighbourhood of $15 billion. I say then that the people of this country cannot expect any improvement along economic lines unless our money system is changed. I for one am disappointed to find that the best the government can do, after the heroic achievements of the men and women in our armed forces, is to bring down a bill which, as I said, reads more like a death warrant than a new lease on the economic life of this nation.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, as the first member supporting the government to speak this afternoon I should like to express our pride and gratification at the eloquent, moving and statesmanlike speech of the leader of this house, the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King), before both houses of parliament in London this morning. I feel that it was a most historic occasion, and the speech of the Prime Minister was worthy of the great occasion and our great country which he so ably represents at the present time.

At the outset of my remarks I wish to commend the Minister of Finance for the able and thoughtful speech he made when he introduced this bill with respect to banks and banking. It was alleged to be provocative, but the thought occurred to me that surely the minister had the right to defend the system of regulated free enterprise in which he believes, just as anyone else has the right to attack that system. It seems to me that there has been growing up in the country on the part of some people a strategy of making violent attacks on the honesty of purpose and the integrity of motive of other parties. Then when those parties defend themselves, the parties who had made the first attack play the martyr and pretend that the others are the aggressors. It reminds me of the strategy which was employed recently by a certain man in European affairs. It enabled him to gain certain initial successes, but they are not remaining very permanent.

I commend the minister particularly for the information he gave in regard to the operations of the chartered banks. In order properly to understand and deal with these matters of laws regarding banking we must have this sort of information. The giving of such information recognized that these banks are administering a valuable franchise granted to them by this parliament on behalf of the people of Canada—and the people of Canada have a right to know how and in what manner they, the banks, are discharging the obligations which were placed upon them by the granting of this franchise.

This bill will renew the charters of ten banks for the period from 1944 to 1954. The decision we shall make and the bank charters which we shall establish will be, in my opinion, one of the most important pieces of legislation passed in this parliament. We shall be legislating for a decade which should see us win final victory over the aggressor nations of the world. That decade should see the return to this country of our gallant men and women of the armed services and their re-establishment in the civil life of the country. It should see, we hope, a period of the greatest prosperity that Canada has ever known. Most economists believe that such a post-war era of prosperity is possible if certain basic and now admittedly essential steps are taken.

The primary step which most economists seem to agree will have to be taken is to permit the free flow of international trade in this post-war era. Anyone who has studied the causes of the depression which started in 1931 will, I think, admit that the main cause, not only in the case of Canada but throughout the world, was the loss of export markets. This was owing to the chaotic conditions in Europe and the trade restrictions and other interferences with trade imposed by European nations in an attempt to prepare themselves for war if it should come.

Then in the case of Canada there was an additional reason in that there was a period of almost ten years of most extensive and almost continuous crop failure in western Canada. This period extended from 1930 to 1938 inclusive. An attempt has been made to attribute the ills from which Canada suffered during that period to our present economic system, but I feel that the majority of our people, after they study the facts which have been and will be laid before them, will reject decisively this attempt to mislead them. All countries experienced a depression during that period. In one socialist country which suffered no crop failures such as we had in Canada millions died of starvation during that period.

In this connection I should like to quote a well know western editor, I believe now deceased, Mr. Charles W. Peterson. He was editor of the Farm and Ranch Review of Calgary from 1912 on. In an article published not long before his death he said:

> I have never been able to see how socialism would help the farmer in any substantial way. The crisis of the 1930's which is solely responsible for the existing political revolt on the prairies had nothing whatever to do with our "free enterprise" economy. We had a series of crop failures in the west which no political action could have prevented. And we had almost complete demoralization of prices solely due to conditions in Europe. The only useful thing any Canadian government—socialist or capitalist—could do was to help the farmer by way of public subsidies and relief, which, as we all know, was promptly done. Whether we had had Liberal Prime Minister King or High Commissar "Comrade" King, in command, the situation would have been neither better nor worse.

In approaching the revision of our banking system there seemed to be two points of view among the parties in Canada. I am not quite so sure about the present attitude of the Labour Progressive party, but leaving them out of the picture we have the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation advocating a gigantic state owned and operated banking monopoly. All other parties, as I understand their present attitude, wish to retain our present competitive banking system and to reform it in a greater or lesser degree.

I suggest that the purpose of a banking system should be to provide credit to a people, individually and collectively, to the extent that is in the best interests of this country, that it should be supplied as cheaply as possible, and without taking away the fundamental rights of the people.

In what way will a state-owned monopoly do this better than our present system? In the first place, will more credit be provided? Apparently the banks have taken more chances in regard to lending money than I had thought they had, until I heard the figures given by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). According to those figures the average losses during the past fifteen years and up to and including 1942, less recoveries, averaged $13,800,000 a year. A more generous lending policy obviously would have entailed heavier losses and increased the cost of credit. One of the things that the advocates of socialist operation of banks would have to answer is this: Would a bank operated by government employees be more ready to take chances on sustaining losses than operators of private enterprise, who might be induced to take a chance in order to gain some profit? My experience of those in government positions is that they will not take chances because they have nothing to gain if it works out right and they have everything to lose if it works out wrong. So that I think the chances of getting a freer credit policy from a state-operated banking system would not be great.

Second, would it lead to cheaper credit? Institutions run in competition with one another are likely to be more efficient than any giant monopoly. This is even admitted by the leader of the C.C.F. party himself, when he says that if he took over the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, as he says he would do, he would operate it in competition with the Canadian National Railway. If it is a good thing to keep the two railway systems operating in competition with each other, why in the world would it not be a good thing to keep the banks operating in competition with one another? The answer of the C.C.F. is that they would create one state-owned banking monopoly.

It may be argued that a state-owned bank would operate at lower rates because it would not need to operate at a profit. I would suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, from what I have seen of state-operated institutions, that the chances are that if they charged the same rates as the present banking institutions do they would probably have no profit. But, as it is, we do tax that profit at a heavy rate and leave only enough to give a reasonable return on the capital invested, plus compensation for risks run and efficient management, plus a certain amount to cover possible losses in the years which might not be so prosperous.

It may be that the banks, on the basis of present interest rates, are making a higher profit than they perhaps should. The answer to that is that the rates have been coming down ever since this government came into office in 1935, and I feel that that process should be continued. You do not have to socialize the banks in order to reduce bank profits to a fair level.

There is, however, an overriding consideration which I think at this time is most important, particularly now when we are spending the precious lives of our sons to protect our democratic and free institutions.

[Mr. Tucker.]

I submit that the more you extend the field of government action, the more you endanger our present democratic system. When everyone is working for the government, the government becomes master of the people and the people become servants of the state. Indeed this is the avowed purpose of the leader of the C.C.F. party and of the C.C.F. in socializing the banks. To prove that, I should like to read from an article by the leader of the C.C.F. party which appeared in Maclean's magazine of September 1, 1943. Here is what he said:

> However, there are certain key industries control of which automatically brings about control over the economy as a whole. The financial machinery, transportation, electric power and large monopolies are such key industries.

Then in the C.C.F. book, "Make this Your Canada", written by David Lewis, national secretary of the C.C.F. party, and Frank Scott, national chairman of the C.C.F., with a foreword by M. J. Coldwell, national president of the C.C.F. and member for Rosetown-Biggar in this house, which publication was issued August 16, 1943, the Regina manifesto of the C.C.F. party is given, and I quote the second plank, in part:

> Socialization of Finance.
> Socialization of all financial machinery—banking, currency, credit, and insurance, to make possible the effective control of currency, credit and prices, and the supplying of new productive equipment for socially desirable purposes.
>
> Planning by itself will be of little use if the public authority has not the power to carry its plans into effect. Such power will require the control of finance and of all those vital industries and services, which, if they remain in private hands, can be used to thwart or corrupt the will of the public authority. Control of finance is the first step to the control of the whole economy.

I emphasize the last sentence:

> Control of finance is the first step to the control of the whole economy.

It goes on to say what their ultimate objective is:

> No C.C.F. government will rest content until it has eradicated capitalism and put into operation the full programme of socialized planning which will lead to the establishment in Canada of the cooperative commonwealth.

It might be objected that the present C.C.F. does not adhere to that manifesto; but the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), writing in Maclean's magazine of September 1, 1943, said this:

> Question (1) is wrong in seeming to assume that there has been any confusion between the original Regina manifesto and any later pronouncements either by myself or by the party as a whole. The manifesto was and remains a statement of the basic principles of the C.C.F.

The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas), speaking in this house the other day, said, as reported at page 2731 of Hansard:

> I say to the minister that we do not believe in socializing anything just for the fun of socializing it.

The pronouncements of the Regina manifesto on behalf of the president and the secretary of the C.C.F. party, endorsed by the leader of the party, are more authoritative on that point than any pronouncement by the hon. member for Weyburn. I submit that the hon. member for Weyburn should not in this house or in the country pretend that their policy is not socialization when it is the admitted policy of their party. He went on to say, still on page 2731 of Hansard:

> There can be only one criterion as to whether or not anything should be operated by the public, and that is whether it can thereby be operated to the better advantage of the community as a whole than by leaving it in private hands.

There is another criterion and it is a more important criterion still. Admittedly at times a benevolent autocrat might operate our state more efficiently for a period of time than we can under our democratic system. But is this all we care about in this country of ours? Is our democratic system worth so little that we would barter it away in order to get a benevolent autocracy that might be able to administer the country more efficiently for a time than our democratic system? Are we to sacrifice our freedom and political democracy for an alleged improvement in our economic lot? I say "alleged," because it is the history of mankind that after peoples have placed themselves in the hands of an all-wise dictator they generally find that he ultimately makes a big mistake which does more harm in one year than he has done of good in all the previous years of his government, and if he manages not to make a mistake he is invariably followed by somebody who does. In other words, Caesar Augustus was followed by Nero.

The danger is great. So-called democratic socialism of the sweeping type advocated by the C.C.F. is bound, in my opinion, to lead to dictatorship in the long run, and maybe not so long either.

The Liberal party favoured the Bank of Canada as a nationally owned and controlled institution, and brought it into existence as such, because it was deemed that on balance it was in the best interest of the people to bring it under government ownership and control and that by doing so there was no great threat to the democratic liberties of the people of Canada as a whole. I submit that, if ever the question arises, if it could be shown that monopolistic government banking would operate somewhat more cheaply, if it would endanger the fundamental democratic liberties of our people, we would not want it. We want no dictator in Canada, no matter how smart he may be, no matter how wonderful the promises he makes of how much better off we shall be if we place ourselves within his power.

Therefore I believe the present competitive and controlled commercial banking system is better than the gigantic monopolistic banking system proposed by the C.C.F. I know it can be improved so as to serve the people better than any state-owned monopoly could or would, and since the object and result of government ownership and control of the whole banking system by any party is admittedly the dictatorial control of our nation, I shall oppose the amendment.

I stated at the outset that all other parties than the C.C.F. believe in improving our present banking system. I believe our party has accomplished real reforms in the years it has been in power. The first great reform was to establish full ownership and control of the Bank of Canada by the people of Canada as represented by this government and this parliament. Anyone who understands the nature of the powers of the Bank of Canada realizes that the government, by being in control of it, in the last analysis has absolute control of the issue of currency and credit in this country, as to the volume to be issued, not of course as to who individually shall receive it.

What has been the record since control has been taken by the Bank of Canada of the financial system of this country? I should like to give the house figures indicating the decrease in the cost of money to our government since 1936.

On March 31, 1935 the average rate of interest paid on direct governmental borrowing was 4·15 per cent. If you take into account the $14 millions which was returned by the Bank of Canada to the consolidated fund, the net cost—the interest on—our governmental borrowing had been reduced to 2·45 per cent per annum on December 31, 1943. On March 31, 1935, it was 4·15 per cent per annum; on December 31, 1943 it was 2·45 per cent per annum. That is a reduction of 1·70 per cent per annum in that period of time, a reduction of over 40 per cent in the interest rate paid by our government on its direct borrowings. That was achieved in a period of nine years, and if the same rate of reduction were maintained in the next ten years the rate would actually be cut down to ·17 per cent per annum, or $17 interest for the use of $10,000 for one year. This indicates the rapid progress which has been made in reducing the interest burden of our borrowings since the central bank was placed in charge of our financial system. As far as I am concerned I am favourable to continuing the present process of reducing the cost of governmental borrowings to a point where it will amount to only a small service charge. I am convinced that if we are to carry out the great reform programme which we intend to carry out and maintain a programme of full employment, we shall have to get the cost of governmental borrowing down to a level where it will represent only a small service charge, and we have been proceeding in that direction very rapidly. I earnestly commend the government for the progress it has made in that direction.

One of the means by which the Bank of Canada has effected this result is by the heavy purchase of government bonds and securities. Since March 31, 1935, it has increased its holdings of government bonds and securities from $152,100,000 to $1,345,900,000, an increase of $1,193,800,000. This credit costs the government nothing except the extra cost of operating the Bank of Canada in consequence of the purchase of these securities, because the income made by collecting the interest on them is turned over to the consolidated fund, less cost of operation. These operations have another and most important effect: they load the banks up with cash reserves on which th y must pay interest to depositors, and since, according to the figures given by the Minister of Finance, the average rate of interest on all bank deposits was ·53 per cent per annum, if all that billion dollars were taken by the people who received it and deposited in the banks, it would lead to an extra cost in interest to the chartered banks of this country of $5,300,000 per annum. This, I think, accounts for the willingness of the banks to buy short-term treasury bills. If they cannot loan their credit to private enterprise, rather than have it lie idle they must find some means of using it, and the system of treasury bills and deposit certificates has been resorted to. It is interesting to compare what we pay in interest to the banks of this country for these short-term loans with what the United States and Great Britain pay. On the last issue of treasury bills we pay ·387 per cent per annum. Concurrently the United States is paying ·375 per cent, almost the same, while the United Kingdom pays ·999 per cent, over twice as much. As of December 31, 1943, there were over one billion dollars of treasury bills and deposit certificates outstanding. This substantial item indicates that almost all the extra money issued by the Bank of Canada has had to be reinvested by the banks and financial institutions in these low interest-bearing treasury bills, on which the last rate of interest was ·387 per cent per annum, and the highest rate paid since March 31, 1943, was ·498 per cent per annum, less than one-half of one per cent per annum.

Naturally, the banks would gladly lend at higher rates of interest if they could find borrowers, but the farmers of the country, for example, are paying off their loans as rapidly as possible. The figures in this regard are quite interesting. Bank loans on October 31, 1939, as compared with October 31, 1943 were: Farmers loans, cattle and fruitraisers' loans, October 31, 1939, $57,000,000, and in 1943, $49,800,000, a reduction of $7,000,000. Manufacturers' loans, however, owing, I suppose, to the war, increased from $192,600,000 on October 31, 1939, to $302,-800,000 on October 31, 1943. Naturally, after the war there will be great expansion of industries to produce civilian goods, and the banks will be anxious to lend as much money as possible at a higher rate of interest than less than one-half of one per cent per annum. This will be particularly true of loans of intermediate credit under the proposed agricultural improvement act, because those loans will be in effect guaranteed by the government. I understand that an aggregate amount of 10 per cent of loans will be guaranteed.

That brings up a point which I wish to press on the attention of the minister. I feel under these circumstances that these loans should bear a top rate interest of 3 per cent per annum, and I say so for this reason. The cost of money to the banks, according to the figures given by the minister, which includes cost of paying interest on deposits, remuneration of employees, provision for taxes, contribution to pension fund, depreciation of bank premises, and all other current operating expenses, is 2·28 per cent of their total assets for the year 1943. The average total operating earnings are 2·86 per cent of total assets. If the average total earnings of the banks is 2·86 per cent, I submit that this money, used to assist farmers in getting labour-saving machinery and in building better homes for themselves, should be given to them at approximately the average rate of the bank's income. In other words, I suggest 3 per cent, and since their average cost of operation is 2·28 per cent of their assets, on these loans, which in effect are government-guaranteed, they would still be making, roughly ·75 per cent per annum, or more than their average rate of profit.

It is important that the farmers be given this consideration, because of their past difficulties and the present great contribution they are making to our war effort. Many of them are working long past the age at which they should be working. They are making a really tremendous contribution to the war effort of Canada, and they should therefore, in my opinion, receive special consideration after the war in order that they may obtain labour-saving machinery as soon as possible and be in a position to build for themselves homes with modern conveniences just as good as those which the people in the cities have. The government, I repeat, in making loans available at 3 per cent will not be putting a burden on the banks, because the banks are actually making on their assets an average of less than 3 per cent per annum.

That raises another point, namely, the top limit of interest on ordinary loans. I submit that the top limit should be five per cent and not six per cent as proposed in this bill. At the time when the government was borrowing money on long-term bonds at 5½ per cent, the top rate of legal interest chargeable by the banks was seven per cent. Now we are paying only three per cent on long-term loans. We have reduced the interest paid by the government on long-term loans by 2½ per cent, and I submit that we should reduce the top rate of interest chargeable on private loans by at least two per cent, making five per cent, the legal rate of interest in this country, the limit which banks can charge.

Undoubtedly competition will tend to reduce the rate of interest, but it does not operate so much in favour of the small borrower as it does in favour of the large borrower. It was found in recent years that the banks were charging six per cent in city districts and particularly in Ontario, while they were still charging seven per cent in western Canada and in the maritimes. A top rate of interest would protect the little man who is not able to bargain. The big man can bargain and get a rate of five per cent or less, but if you have a top rate fixed you protect the little man, because he is generally charged the legal limit. I would ask the minister to consider this proposal very seriously.

I am told that the banks, some of them anyway, have followed the policy of refusing to do business with anyone who has taken advantage of an act passed by this parliament, the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. If that is true; if they have taken that attitude, then they are in effect defying this parliament, because parliament put that act on the statute books for the benefit of the farmers so that they might avail themselves of it; and if the bankers, the people who administer public credit, are doing something they should not do—

Mr. ILSLEY: Is the hon. gentleman quite right about the act to which he refers?

Mr. TUCKER: The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman said the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

Mr. TUCKER: I meant the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. The bankers are administering a public utility, and they should be responsible to some public authority for the manner in which that administration is carried on. If there are such cases or others there should be someone to whom an aggrieved person could appeal and who could look into the matter, and his report, together with the protest, should be submitted to the government and parliament and be subject to investigation, if deemed proper, by the banking and commerce committee or some other public authority. The banks should be made to feel that they have not absolute authority as to persons to whom they may give credit and those from whom they may withhold it, without perhaps being answerable to parliament for any arbitrary act.

The railways cannot close agencies without getting the permission of the board of transport commissioners, and I submit that the banks should not be permitted to curtail the services which they give the people without the permission of some public authority. In all these matters we should bring the banks under more direct control. One of my hon. friends of the Conservative party just now suggested in a very—well, I would not say he sneered, but he said "Wouldn't that be wonderful?" I submit that the banks must be made to realize that they are administering a public utility and are answerable to parliament for how they do it.

Another feature of this government's programme for which I should like to commend them is the foreign exchange control board.

Mr. GRAYDON: My hon. friend referred to someone in our party having said something.

Mr. TUCKER: I did not like to name him. I see him sitting here.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is it on Hansard?

Mr. TUCKER: I do not know whether it is on Hansard or not. I heard it. It does not have to be on Hansard. If they do not want me to refer to it, do not let them say it behind my back. I do not blame the leader of the opposition for not wanting that to appear in Hansard as coming from one of his own party.

I was referring to the foreign exchange control board. This should be continued to the extent necessary to prevent in the future such things happening as have occurred in the past. We have seen instances where men have made large fortunes from developing the mining resources of the country and have then removed those fortunes from Canada. We have also seen cases where manufacturers have made large fortunes under the protection of our tariff policy, and then have taken that money to other countries, sometimes to countries where they pay lower labour rates, to set up industries in competition with the industries which they have asked to have protected in this country.

I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that we must have some form of control so that sort of thing does not happen in the future, and wealth that is built up out of the resources of this country and by virtue of the protection enjoyed under the laws of this country should be kept here in order that it may be subject to our income taxes and our succession duty taxes.

In closing, may I say that when this bill as amended becomes law it will confer a valuable franchise on the banks. It will be giving them the right as trustees to handle a large share of the credit of this country. That trusteeship has been very carefully adhered to in so far as their obligation to their depositors is concerned; but their attitude toward the people of western Canada during the period of 1930 to 1939 makes me feel that it must be brought home to the banks that in handling that great franchise they are not absolute masters, but are answerable to this parliament and to the people of Canada. They must be made to feel that they must handle it in accordance with the best interests of this country. In order to bring that home to them I think some public authority should be established to which they must be answerable and which will then make a report in proper cases to this parliament.

As I said before, this bill is one by which we are legislating for a period of ten years. During that time our troops will return from overseas where they have been defending our country and defending our system of freedom and democracy. One of the things they say over and over again is: "We do not want to return to things as they were from 1930 to 1939"—to depression and unemployment. I am glad this government at this crucial time takes the attitude, as I understand it does in the speech from the throne, that regardless of what happens with respect to matters beyond our control in the way of foreign trade and so on, it will see to it that conditions are not permitted to get in the state they were in from 1930 to 1939—that the individual is ensured real security. I think the government's programme, including such things as a floor on farm prices, family allowances, reduction of interest rates and the other controls that it is setting up, including the farm improvement loan bill and other companion measures that the government has put into effect or will put into effect this session, will introduce such a measure of reform and social security that Canada will, after this war, enter a period of the greatest happiness and prosperity that this country has ever seen.

Mr. H. R. JACKMAN (Rosedale): Bill No. 91 does not call for any lengthy remarks on my part at the present time. On the whole I believe the amendments should be salutary and lead to greater satisfaction of the credit needs of our community. We look forward to the introduction of the farm improvement loan bill to see what further provisions are provided therein, and it is our fervent desire that every possible credit facility be afforded to the farming and fishing industries of this country.

May I say here, however, Mr. Speaker, that the spirit in which those provisions are administered means almost as much as does the actual wording of the provisions themselves. We shall look forward to the particular set-up of the farm improvement loan bill to see exactly what the provisions are before we are able to pass judgment. As it is, the amendments carried out in Bill No. 91, substituting the new Bank Act for the old, do make more forms of agricultural property available for the extension of credit by the banks than heretofore, and to that extent the new bill is an improvement. While it may not be entirely within the province of this parliament, nevertheless I believe that the chartered banks should so further the intention of the provisions which are passed by this house that they will endeavour to make their branch managers not merely judges of the credit worthiness of those who apply for loans, but also salesmen of credit, so that where there is a good business man or a good farmer who can use additional credit usefully and economically the bank manager will not necessarily sit back in his office and wait until he is approached, but will be encouraged and trained by the banks themselves to go out and put the credit to effective use. In that way our whole business and agricultural activity will be greatly stimulated.

I am told by those who have had longer experience than I that there was a time in the development of this country when the bank managers actively sought to get their credits out; but that has to a large extent ceased during the last two or three decades.

I should also like to point out a word of caution to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) in regard to the provisions affecting the small personal loans. If those personal loans are to be extended as far as granting credit by the chartered banks is concerned, it might be that the better ones, the so-called cream of the small loans, will flow to the chartered banks, leaving only the more risky, more troublesome and more costly ones to the ordinary finance companies; with the result that the personal finance companies, which are to-day functioning, might find they will have to refuse the service to necessitous borrowers, a service which they have provided for in emergencies; or the personal finance companies will have to ask to have the rates which they charge at the present time raised. Those rates, as we all know, are regarded by many as extremely high, although they may not result in any undue profits to the companies themselves.

Then again, the minister has said that he would welcome recommendations by the committee on banking and commerce on several specific matters. May I say, however, that this is not the first time he has suggested that the banking and commerce committee make a recommendation to this house and to himself. The last time the recommendations were made—which I may say did carry by a narrow majority—they were simply flouted when they came to the house, and the minister went on his own way and paid little or no heed to the resolution passed by the banking and commerce committee. It is no wonder that in such circumstances the minister deservedly finds attached to himself such words as "stubborn and narrow"; and there is a feeling on the part of a large body of the house that it is not the will of the people's representatives that is carried out in many of the financial measures but rather the will of certain people who are in the confidence of and who advise the minister.

Mr. GIBSON: Who says so?

Mr. JACKMAN: I do not wish to say more about the various sections. Did the Minister of National Revenue wish to ask a question?

Mr. GIBSON: I said: "Who says so?"

Mr. JACKMAN: I will answer that at another time.

Until the banking and commerce committee hears the evidence of the various witnesses who will come before it I do not wish to say anything further about the various sections of the bill, but will confine myself largely to certain statements made by the hon. members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. I should like to refer particularly to the remarks made by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas). He stated that the government proclaimed the complete absence of political influence in the running of the proposed industrial development bank, while at the same time the government claimed that there would be political influence in the running of any nationalized banking system. As the hon. member for Weyburn pointed out, the government cannot have it both ways. They cannot say that there are no political influences in the running of the industrial development bank and at the same time say that under a nationalized banking system there would be political influences obtaining. I would point out, however, that the industrial development bank is not likely to have a great number of customers. It may have a thousand industrial customers, whereas the commercial banks have probably well over a million customers who are also voters. Nevertheless the principle is the same. Once the government gets into the banking business it gets into the business of securing votes willy-nilly and to some extent, perhaps a large extent under certain circumstances, it will find that political pressure is brought to bear, and that banking cannot be carried on free of political influence as long as it is under government administration. With the central bank, the Bank of Canada, the situation is vastly different, because that bank does not deal with the public directly and, therefore, is not concerned with and cannot influence votes one way or the other. I should like to point out that under Sir Adam Beck the Ontario hydro electric system for many years was entirely free of political influence, but after the last Liberal regime in Ontario came into power there came a time when the Ontario hydro electric system became the football of politics.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: It was that, long before then. That is what I said the other night.

Mr. JACKMAN: If the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) wishes to justify his remarks he is entitled to do so at some other time, but for the present I challenge his statement.

Therefore the industrial development bank, like the Ontario hydro electric commission, may very well find itself perfectly safe and free from politics for a number of years; yet almost inevitably there comes a time when the most vital force in our community, namely the political force and the attainment of power, overrides all other considerations. What was the situation in Ontario? For a very short time during the depression we had a temporary excess of power, and the contracts we had with Quebec power companies were cancelled by the then premier and the then attorney general, now the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck). If these contracts had not been made originally; if the power companies had not been developed to the extent they were, our present war effort would have been greatly handicapped. So that it is not only likely but inevitable in connection with some of these public institutions which should be maintained under a private system—true, under government regulation where necessary—that when they come under government administration temporary political considerations will outweigh economic planning which is designed only to serve the people and not to wrest power for some political purpose.

So much for political influences. One fears for the life of this industrial development bank because it is so entirely under the control of the government. But just as the government cannot argue both ways, so the C.C.F. cannot argue that the financial system of this country has battened on its ill-gotten gains—which I do not admit for one moment—and at the same time argue, like the devil citing scripture for his own purposes, that the financial system is no good because in a time of stress the government had to give it assistance. The leader of the C.C.F. made much of the order in council which was passed during the depths of the depression and which established conventional values for certain securities held by some of our large institutions. The purpose of this order in council was, of course, that public confidence should not be lost; and these conventional values which were established, at a level somewhat higher than market values, were more representative of the inherent value of the securities themselves than were the market prices, which were merely the prices in the open market at a particular time. It is very much the same as wheat selling at forty cents, when every hon. member knows that is by no means a fair price for that commodity and does not represent the inherent value of it. As was pointed out in the house the other day, the government also had to come to the assistance of the wheat pools because the initial payment was larger than the price to which wheat subsequently fell. I was amused to hear the statement made that the bankers had wrongly advised the heads of the cooperative pools by telling them to make a larger initial payment than they should have made, and that when the market fell below the amount of the initial payments the bankers drove a hard bargain. I can scarcely imagine that any member of the C.C.F. party would have advised a smaller initial payment than that which was made and which was recommended by the chartered banks, according to what I have heard.

The C.C.F. cannot at one and the same time say that the financial system is an octopus which feeds gluttonously, and then say it is so weak that it needs a blood transfusion. The only purpose of the order in council establishing conventional values was to endeavour to reestablish confidence on the part of the people; and the fact that the order in council was needed merely goes to show that finance suffered during the depression just as much as did business or labour. It has been pointed out also that the people who make up the financial community are drawn from all classes in this country, the same as with most other occupations, and that they are motivated by the same reasons. Indeed I have found little difference in human nature wherever I have come in contact with it. Everywhere there are good and bad; everyone must be responsible to some higher authority, just as parliament must be responsible to the people. I believe I heard the leader of the C.C.F. party quote Lord Acton in these words:

All power corrupts, and absolute power corrupts absolutely.

The banking system is not only responsible to parliament; it is responsible also to relentless and inexorable economic laws.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. JACKMAN: Mr. Speaker, before the dinner recess I had made reference to the order in council which was passed by the Conservative government in 1934 and which established conventional values for securities. Since then my attention has been directed to certain matters concerning that order in council. I was familiar with the effect of the conventional values on the securities held in the portfolios of the insurance companies, but not with the effect on securities held in bank portfolios.

I find that contrary to the inference, if not the direct allegation, of the leader of the C.C.F., that order in council had little or nothing to do with the financial crash of 1929 and 1930. If I recall correctly, his inference was that the order in council had to be passed to save the banks because of the failure of some brokerage house in this country.

The actual facts are that England went off the gold standard and the order in council was passed establishing certain values for the securities held by the banks, which values applied only to government and municipal securities and not to such securities as might be expected to be held in speculative accounts. Furthermore, the conventional values applied only from October 27, 1931, until the following March.

We see that the assistance given at that time by the government to the banking system had no reference at all to speculative excesses, but on the other hand what happened was due entirely to the terrific impact of Great Britain going off the gold standard with its resultant effect on investment values which caused a shattering of investment confidence. I am in the financial business and I well recall the night England went off the gold standard. I was telephoned at two o'clock in the morning by a gentleman who was once a member of the cabinet of this country. Those of us who realized that the financial world was built around sterling credit and the gold standard felt that anything might happen because of the terrific impact this would have upon public confidence. It was solely to restore confidence in some measure that the order in council was passed.

To get back to where I left off in the main body of my remarks. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) stated that bill No. 91 omits to provide for economic expansion and full employment. Undoubtedly it does. According to my thinking, it was never the intention that the Bank Act should be the sole means of regulating our economy and maintaining our national income. There are many other means. Anyone who will consult the Winnipeg charter of the Progressive Conservative party will realize that definite measures are proposed, particularly with relation to agriculture and labour, having to do with the maintaining of full employment and the maintaining of our national income.

The C.C.F. leader suggests that full employment is impossible under the present Bank Act, or even under the proposed amendments now before the house. How then does he explain the present prosperity and the full employment which now prevails under present banking practice? It would seem to me that his argument must fail when one considers the situation which now obtains under the present law. Certainly banking is not the be-all and end-all of our economic regulators. While all of us like to give as much service as possible to the slogan and to endeavour to make "financially possible that which is physically possible," nevertheless we must not confuse that statement, as apparently some hon. members to my left have, with the following statement, namely, that that which is financially possible is also physically possible. The two are entirely different.

Then the members of the C.C.F. have charged the present banking system with being a monopoly. We hear that in practically every speech and we read it in every circular they put out. They say that while it is true that the banks compete for loans, they charge the same rate of interest, pay the same rates on deposits and have an association like any other industry or body of workers. I should like to ask the leader of the C.C.F. if the farmers and business men do not compete when wheat or any other article they may produce is sold at an open or market price? Competition may be on a price basis or it may be on the basis of service. All through the development of industry we have seen the reduction of costs through efficiency and the lowering of the price of the finished article. Nothing could illustrate this better than our automobile industry. Does the leader of the C.C.F. want to have price discrimination between banks and between industries? There is no greater weapon of unfairness than price discrimination when improperly used, the quoting of one price to one man and another price to another man.

The C.C.F. charge that the banks prevent competition by the closing down of branches. I think it is the opinion of most hon. members that the banks should close branches where there is unnecessary duplication over and above the needs of the community. This is exactly what the C.C.F. argue for most strenuously when they say, "Why should there be two, three or four bread and milk wagons covering the same route?" Under their system they are going to consolidate; everything becomes a monopoly; the people are to be served by the one instrument.

Undoubtedly unnecessary duplication means unnecessary waste, but the C.C.F. cannot favour competition and at the same time shout the virtues of state monopoly. State monopoly would do away with all duplication and competitive practices; yet competition has within it the seeds of efficiency as well as apparent wastefulness. If the C.C.F. theory were carried to its logical conclusion, we would find ourselves eating in community kitchens and sleeping in community barracks. Undoubtedly that would be more efficient and less costly and would effect a saving of man-power, but there are things to be prized more highly than a mere material civilization.

The two key speeches of the C.C.F. which endorse the remarks of the minister in regard to increasing representation on bank boards by small business men and agriculture and labour should not give rise to too great exception. No great exception need be taken to that. However, one wonders whether the interests of small business men, farmers or workers are in the least prejudiced by the present set-up, because the men who are now on the boards of the various banks are those who for the most part, probably ninety per cent, started in business in a small way and, because they followed successful practices, grew large and became members of the boards of the various banks. It would seem to me that these men who were able to apply successfully the principles of business in their own field are in a position ably to administer larger affairs. Yet at the same time I think it would be a very good thing if our chartered banks invited representatives of labour, of agriculture, and if you like, of small business too, to sit on their various boards, for nothing tempers power quite so much as responsibility and a clear understanding of the problems of the whole community.

In an endeavour to support his charge of banking monopoly the leader of the C.C.F. says that no new chartered bank is likely to come into existence. But the Bank Act as it now stands, and the amendment also, provide specific means whereby a new bank may be brought into existence. But why, if the ordinary commercial needs of the community are well served by existing institutions under existing law, should there be a further waste of man-power by setting up a new competing organization with branches from one end of the country to the other? If there is room for another bank because it can provide a better service or the same service at less cost, then obviously it will be possible and worth while under our open competitive system to obtain a charter and to set up a new chartered bank. With the imposing array of other directorates held by bank directors, which was so amply demonstrated in previous speeches, it must be obvious that one of the chief sources of revenue of the banks is the interest and service charges paid by the companies represented by the very directors who sit on the boards of the banks. If one were to examine the extent of the directors' shareholdings in the banks as compared with their financial interest in their own companies, which are customers of the banks, one would soon find whether the directors' shirts or their coats were closer to their backs. If these men thought for one moment that their banking needs could be provided more cheaply by setting up a new and competing institution it would be done without another thought. Under a socialized banking system business men would have no alternative. They would have to deal with the state bank irrespective of the charges made or the srevices rendered.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar endeavoured to make a point of the fact that the banks depend now to a large extent on the government to keep them going. Be that as it may, it is little wonder that under a war economy, with the government spending well over half of the nation's income, much of the banks' business is concerned with war production for national account. How could it be otherwise? Production of new civilian goods has been rightly stifled in order that as much as possible may be produced for war. If there is any complaint in this regard it is that civilian consuming standards have been allowed to increase as they have, when further restrictions might shorten the war and save the lives of those who are preserving liberty for us.

The C.C.F. continually raise the point that bank dividends are relatively high in relation to subscribed capital, and they refuse to apply the dividends as a percentage of the paid-up capital plus reserves and ploughed-back earnings. If in the course of the life of a bank its shareholders wish to withdraw in the form of dividends only part of what their investment has earned, and to plough back the remainder in order to strengthen the security behind the depositors as well as to provide reserves against emergency, surely they are as much entitled to an income on those ploughed-back earnings and reserves as they are to an income on the par value of their original subscription. Indeed, if one traces the history of bank subscriptions, one will find that in a great many cases not only was $100 paid for a share of $100 par value but that a premium of twenty-five per cent or more was paid and the shareholder only got back the $100 certificate, the $25 additional that he paid going to constitute a reserve to provide further security for the depositors and for the whole banking system.

There is no guarantee under any system that the money put into a business will be maintained intact. Every new venture faces great economic uncertainties and those which are successful must be used to offset those where—

> The best-laid schemes o' mice an' men
> Gang aft a-gley.

One cannot help being a little amused at the leader of the C.C.F. who says:

> We never consider ourselves on the defensive; we are on the offensive, and when an attack of that sort is made, we shall act upon that offensive so far as our opponents are concerned.

That must be a very comfortable policy of self-deception. Apparently the hon. member feels that there is something in the slogan "on the offensive", even though everyone knows that in the present instance he is clearly and admittedly defending his political theories against an attack by the Minister of Finance, for I hold in my hand a reprint of a recent speech of my hon. friend given in this house entitled, "We are on the offensive." May I express the hope, however, that his party is not still indulging in the mercenary practice followed when his speech on the Aluminum company was reprinted and sold at a profit of not less than 150 per cent.

It is true that the bank shareholder, through his directors, has the right to declare all earnings in the form of dividends, but if he chooses to plough back part of the earnings as a further safeguard for the depositors or as a reserve out of which dividends may be paid during difficult times, that is surely his business.

May I remark here that the banks sometimes find a pressing need for reserves, and in 1933, in order to rebuild their reserves, they wrote off from their published statements no less than $29,500,000 in one year to properly adjust their published reserves. So that in the banking business there is risk to be borne as there is in practically every industrial and commercial business, and it is necessary to have some good years to make up for some of the lean years, to say nothing of those years in which circumstances are well-nigh calamitous.

The contention of the leader of the C.C.F. was that this method of augmenting the capital of the banks by the ploughing back of earnings tended to increase the capital of the banks, and he was against that because he felt that it led to concentration of the ownership of bank shares. But his argument falls entirely to the ground when everyone knows that bank shares are purchasable on any of the leading stock exchanges of this country by anyone who desires so to invest his or her money and become the owner of a bank's stock. The banks are required to file a list of shareholders with the government, and anyone who wishes to see how broadly and in what unconcentrated form the shares are held may do so. Ploughed-back profits and original capital set up as a reserve are properly combined with the par value of a stock when percentage earnings are being calculated. This procedure is not to be compared with the so-called unearned increment which attaches to the increased value of urban real estate or homestead farms, classes of property which are held by a very large part of our population.

I might make a suggestion, however, to the Minister of Finance with regard to the popularization of bank shares and the spreading of their ownership more generally. At the present time bank shares have a par value of $100 and sell for anywhere from $125 to $250. If an amendment to the Bank Act required that these shares, in place of having a par value of $100, were to have a par value of $25 or even $10 they would become much more popular mediums of investment than they are at the present time, and I believe one would find that their distribution would become even wider than it is to-day. There are fashions in investments as there are in everything else, including governments. There was a time when a $100 par value share was looked upon as a standard of investment. That day has long since gone by, and no one but a very well-to-do person wants to buy shares costing $100, much less $200 each; they want to buy a number of shares at a smaller price. It amounts to the same thing in the end; there is no difference; but this happens to be the fashion, and fashions are sometimes compelling. Therefore I suggest to the minister that consideration be given to causing bank shares to be split, so that they will be more available to and popular with a much larger part of our population.

It was not unnatural that the C.C.F. should seize upon the ill-advised and capable-of-being-misinterpreted statement of the Minister of Finance when he said that Canada had experienced between 1888 and 1924 1·86 years of prosperity for every year of depression, as against a slightly less favourable record for the United States. Since he no doubt has the document available from which the figures were taken, together with the supporting information, I hope he will give some further explanation of what was meant by "prosperity" and what was meant by "depression", because I can see that statement being published from one end of the country to the other. We all know that during the period under discussion, 1888 to 1924, there was a tremendous growth in population in the United States and also a substantial increase in material prosperity, and the same conditions applied to Canada. So that I feel that the terms which he used, "depression" and "prosperity", are somewhat technical terms, which mean something to an economist but are by no means the same thing as understood in the popular mind.

It is not to be thought that the Progressive-Conservative party holds any brief for a static system of finance. The Bank of Canada was first established under a Conservative government, and this was a step forward in placing the control of currency and credit under a government-sponsored institution. To learn nothing from experience is to shut one's eyes to all progress. We believe in reform but not in revolution. The Progressive-Conservative party retains an open mind on all questions of national interest, and has only one objective, the common good of all the people. Unlike some other parties, the Progressive-Conservative party has a disposition to preserve what is good in the old as well as a capacity to improve.

Mr. J. J. KINLEY (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, once in every ten years parliament is called upon to consider the law relating to banking and commerce as it refers to the chartered banks of Canada, and with the passage of time we approach another occasion when we must give heed to this duty. Accordingly, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has introduced a bill which is now receiving the consideration of hon. members. Ordinarily we who support the principle of the bill would allow it to go to committee and there discuss its provisions and see to it that the rights of the public are properly protected. But the bill has been seriously challenged by an amendment which would disturb and almost destroy the whole economic set-up of the country, and it therefore becomes my duty as a member of this house to give some reasons why I support the principle of the bill and refer to some of the things which have been said in this debate.

It seems to me that, whatever our opinions about finance, this is not an opportune time to occupy the time of parliament or disturb the people with any serious change in the banking system. Canada, with the united nations, is engaged in a war overseas which is perhaps at its gravest period. We at home should be united in our domestic affairs and postpone changes until such time as we are secure.

I do not believe that any government or any parliament should endeavour to change the Bank Act to the extent of socializing the banking system without a mandate from the people, and I am quite sure that neither the Liberal party, the Progressive Conservative party nor any other party has a popular mandate to make so drastic a change.

The duty which we are now asked to discharge is a recurring one, and to my mind this fact must have a salutary effect on the bankers and must bring confidence to the people, because it shows that always in the minds of those who make our laws finance is regarded as a progressive science, and that changes must come from time to time. Those who came before us made provision for that in seeing to it that a review of the banking system should occur every ten years.

We have heard a great deal of discussion and some criticism of the banks of Canada. Some people think they earn too much money, that they are too prosperous and too efficient. It seems to me that that is one of the penalties of being successful. Power and responsibility come with success, and our great concern should be how the banks use this power and how we as members may see to it that they carry on in a way which is beneficial to the country.

It is generally recognized, I believe, that in the world of finance Canada has a high place and is eminently efficient. We have the admiration of the people of the United States and of Great Britain as well for the manner in which we have carried on, for we have done all those things that were necessary for an all-out war effort, which has been financed so successfully by the people of Canada. In that effort the banks have played a large part, and if there is one thing in which we excel in Canada, in comparison with the great free nations of the world, such as the United States and Britain, it is in our banking system. The Canadian people are proud of the banking system of this country. They look to the United States and remember the things that happened to the banking system there in the not too distant past, and they recall that our banks here carried on, and continued successfully. The Canadian people have paid their obligations, so that at this moment Canada has borrowed no money from anyone outside the country in order to carry on our war effort. No lease-lend comes to Canada. On the other hand, Canada, with a comparatively small population, gives lease-lend to many rich and populous countries.

The banks are closely linked up with the capitalistic system. I am in favour of the capitalistic system. I do not say it is perfect, but it is the best thing that has yet been devised for carrying on in an orderly way the business and the social advancement of the dominion. It is the system that is in effect in the countries of our great allies, Great Britain and the United States; it is the system in countries where there is the highest standard of living in the world, and where the greatest freedom and happiness are to be found.

We are living in a competitive world, and when we are inclined to hold the view that we are not in such a favourable position by comparison with other countries, we have only to stop and think to realize that we are infinitely better off than most people in the world, and for that we should be thankful and give credit to the institutions that helped to bring about that condition.

The virtue of the capitalistic system is that it works. We were told some years ago, when we had a depression, that the capitalistic system would not work, that it was dying. Well, we have gone through nearly five years of war and have made an effort that has surprised our neighbour to the south. It has enlightened the people of our own country, for many of us never thought we could make such an effort. It shows that the capitalist system can work and is now working, and working better than it has ever done. The system has never worked better than it has worked during this war, and it has done so because, with taxation, we have had a redistribution of wealth, whereby the people generally have received much of the money that has been in circulation, a greater proportion than ever before. That has had a great deal to do with the smooth working of the banking system of the country.

Money is not wealth; it is a demand on wealth, and what concerns us is not so much the money, but how much the money will buy. For that reason it must be carefully controlled and its value carefully guarded. In the highest sense, money is the economic blood stream of the nation. It is the force which keeps business alive, the force which creates the transportation of goods and services from one person and nation to another. It is a circulating force that makes for a happy, prosperous and industrious people.

We are told that the love of money is the root of all evil, but that does not mean that money is bad. It means that we have that human characteristic called greed, and it is not money that will ruin a nation but greed, and greed is something which must be and is being controlled and in the future, we hope, will more or less disappear. We do not hear very much about scandals in this war. We do not hear much about people wanting to get rich. They are working for the nation, and the reason is that it is not possible to get rich. We also know the government has so arranged that the money is taken out of circulation for war services so that no one can get rich even if he wanted to do so. Therefore the incentive for greed is gone and, with that incentive gone, so are the scandals that might come in war-time spending.

There is an old proverb, "Heed what men say, but watch what they do." I was interested in the speech of the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson). He said that the Bank Act was a serious and important piece of legislation and that it should be treated in that way, but I think he went out of his way to make a personal attack on the Minister of Finance, who has been working hard and successfully in the interests of the people. I cannot understand why so eminent a member of this house, in a matter of this kind, should make a political attack on the man who is responsible for bringing this bill into the house. He even went into the minister's own constituency and he talked about the closing of banks in Canada. He said:

> I think this position could be illustrated in almost every constituency in Canada from east to west. Right in the minister's own constituency there was closed not so long ago a branch bank in the little town of Middleton, which has had a bank for some considerable time.

What would you take from these remarks? That there was no bank in Middleton, Nova Scotia. Middleton is in the minister's constituency, not very far from my home, and I know that town very well. It is a small town in a farming community, a fine town. I thought it was strange that there was no bank there, and I went to my room and looked up the telephone directory. I saw there the Royal Bank of Canada, Middleton; the Canadian Bank of Commerce, Middleton; then I looked further and I saw that in Kingston, a few miles along, there is another bank, and a few miles further on, in Bridgetown, Nova Scotia, the Royal Bank of Canada.

What was the reason the hon. member wanted to have this house think there was no bank in Middleton, Nova Scotia, right under the eyes of the Minister of Finance? This matter of closing agencies is a business matter. The world is getting smaller. There are better roads, with better transportation, and quicker movements of people from one point to another make it unnecessary to have so many banks close together. I am sure the bank that remains in Middleton will be able to look after the interest of the people there and save overhead for the banks, and the people will be well serviced. I cannot see why this should be made a point of attack on the minister in this house by an hon. gentleman who should know better. However, he will likely vote for the bill. The proverb said: "Heed what men say, but watch what they do. Most of the attack in this debate has been academic and by people who have had very little experience.

However, I think of the party to the left, the Social Credit party, and I realize that they did have some experience. We watched what they did. Not long before they came into power in Alberta they promised the people a bonus of $25 a month, saying that they would pay that amount to every citizen in the province. I must say it is to their credit that, after they were elected to power, they did not do that. Then they did something else: they repudiated their debts. They owed bonds of that province to the people of Canada, and they arbitrarily reduced the rate of interest.

An hon. MEMBER: That is not right.

Mr. KINLEY: If it is not true, I rest on the judgment of the house. Then, after complaining about the banks they came here and a few years ago introduced a bank bill. They are not content to abide by the Bank Act, but wanted special privileges. They wanted to be able to issue currency which was being depleted in the other banks. That bill was not accepted, because they are not willing to come under the general laws of Canada respecting banks and banking. This year they have brought in another bill—a much better one, I must confess. They preach the gospel of social credit. In other words, they would water the money. That is not something peculiar to them alone. Go to St. James street, Montreal, the home of sound business, and you will find corporations which water their stock. There you will find company stock watered. There is no difference between people who water money and other people who would water stock. Both of them want something for nothing, and want somebody else to give it to them.

What would we think if to-morrow morning a farmer, who had a market in town for 100 quarts of milk, found upon milking his cows that he could get from them only fifty quarts, and in that situation said, "Oh, I will put it under the pump, pump in some water, and then I shall have 100 quarts." Yes, he will have 100 quarts but, not only will he be cheating his customers, but, if found out, will be branded a criminal. There the principle is the same. Dilution never made strength. It will make quantity, but not strength. The same is true of money.

While we are talking about the provinces, let me say this: In my view any drastic change in the Bank Act such as suggested by the amendment would affect the property and civil rights of the provinces. When banking and commerce were placed under the control of the federal government, I do not think it was ever intended that its jurisdiction over banking and commerce should affect property and civil rights in Canada. Before parliament enacts any such legislation, of a type which most certainly would affect property and civil rights of the people in every province, we should consult the provincial legislatures.

[Mr. Kinley.]

Then, this thought occurs to me: when we hear talk about the monopoly of banking we should remember that there is no banking monopoly. Any province can start a bank of its own—and I am not so sure it would not be good business for a province to go into the banking business, with the federal government controlling the Bank of Canada and the issue of currency and credit.

Now we come to the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party, the party which would nationalize the banks of Canada, and thereby make of them a monopoly. In my view a government monopoly is just as dangerous as an industrial monopoly.

An hon. MEMBER: Far more dangerous.

Mr. KINLEY: Speaking the other day, the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) said that the minister could not have his cake and eat it too. The hon. member said that the minister had adopted socialism in banking because of his sponsoring of a bill before the house to create an industrial development bank. Well, Mr. Speaker, competition is the life of trade, and we believe in free enterprise. Even the Right Hon. Winston Churchill, speaking over the radio some time ago, said that in the future it may be that we would have two kinds of business side by side, a certain portion of public business and a certain portion of private business. He thought it only natural that we would have both kinds. But when the minister creates an industrial development bank to take up the lag in industry, the uneconomic part of the banking system which needs attention, and may be termed economic research or experiment, he is told that he is tainted with the virus of the C.C.F. I do not think that can be true—although I was always taught that wherever a serious minded body of men got together there was a degree of truth. But there is error, also. I would not say for one minute that everything said by the C.C.F. is untrue, or that everything they say is in error. But truth is mixed with error, and there is so much error that the truth forms only a minor part of their argument.

The hon. member for Weyburn also said that the Bank of Canada did not control the issue of currency and credit. He said that there was no way whereby they could get money into the hands of the people. I say that the Bank of Canada can do this in two or three ways. They can buy or sell securities. If they sell securities they will reduce the amount of money in circulation, and if they buy securities they will put more of it into circulation. Then, they can fix the rediscount rate—and that rate was lowered as late as February of this year. "Canada at War" of April 1944 contains this:

> Bank of Canada rediscount rate charged on advances to chartered or savings banks reduced from two and a half to one and a half per cent, effective February 8.

That is what is called an easy money policy.

But, it is urged, the present system does not get money into the hands of the people. It does. It has been found to work satisfactorily. Furthermore, if it comes to an emergency, the government can set up a public works programme. We may have to do that in the future, to develop and improve the country, and to give work. In that way money can be put into the hands of the people.

We hear talk about the banks being a monopoly. The fact is that there are a number of banks in Canada. And do not forget that there is the clearing-house. Each morning the banks of Canada must face the clearing-house, and show that their positions are secure. If we had a government-controlled system of banking—which would be a monopoly—there would be no clearing-house, and the banks could do almost anything they liked. Let us suppose that I, as a business man, need money. I go to the government bank, and they refuse to let me have any. There is no other place to which I can go. Now I can go from one bank to the other; the banks are competitive, so that I have that freedom, which all citizens enjoy. Who in this house, be he Liberal, Conservative or anything else, would want a bank run by a party he did not support? I would not want the Tories running the banks of this country, and I am sure the Tories would not want the Grits to run them. Our banks should be operated by men not particularly interested in political affairs but interested in business matters, in giving the best possible service and facing the competition which we think is the life of trade.

We believe in free industry; our friends believe in socialism, in state control. I do not object to government industry, but as practised it is not free industry. Every time one of these new ventures is started they want to get free from payment of taxes; every time something supposed to be of the new order is commenced you find them coming to the government asking for privileges; they do not want to met their obligations to this country in the way of taxes. Look at the wheat pools in the west, about which we have been speaking for years. They have so arranged their structure that they do not have to pay income tax. Only the other day the government of Quebec took over a great public utility. I am not discussing the merits or demerits of that action, but as a result the exchequer of Canada will lose millions of dollars of taxes in this time of war. That is the difference between private industry and so-called public industry. We believe in free industry, a free road and no favours, with everyone meeting his obligations and paying his share of the taxes. Then, when that is done, let the best man win.

The other night we heard a speech by a new member down in the corner who said he was not so much interested in where the money came from as he was interested in jobs and wages, and I think that was a good contribution to the debate. I am an employer of labour; I have been associated with labour all my life, and for the life of me I cannot see what labour has in common with C.C.F. socialism. Labour is a part of the capitalistic set-up; labour gets more as industry achieves greater success. Only the other day in the magazine Time I read a warning given by the president of the Boston chamber of commerce, who said that if employers and labour would cooperate and get along together they would be free, but that if they fought one another the state would control them and they would be slaves of the state. That is my conception of capital and labour; we should endeavour to get along together, each doing his part and each getting his share according to his contribution to the success of the enterprise. We have heard so much about the schoolteachers, that they are educated people and are not properly paid. I will admit that schoolteachers are not paid sufficiently in this country; but they work for the public; they do not work for private industry. This is an example of what we would get if the whole thing were mixed up under C.C.F. socialistic control. The community pays the schoolteacher, and he is the lowest paid man of education we have. So that while hon. gentlemen in the corner talk about private industry, here is an indictment against community effort.

The other evening my eloquent and good friend the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) took part in this debate and said that the only fundamental change in this Bank Act was the raising of the rate of interest on loans to the poor men from seven per cent to 9¾ per cent. My hon. friend, who is an eminent lawyer, knew that statement was not fair. He knew that under the present Bank Act the maximum rate of interest is seven per cent, and that under the proposed amendment it will be six per cent. Let me say a word right here to those who think the banks are prosperous and that there should be more control over them. We could bring about all the changes they desire by changing just one word in the act; that is, by changing the "six" to a lower figure. That would change the whole aspect of the situation. My hon. friend knew that the banking and commerce committee had before it at a previous session a bill dealing with small loan companies. After discussing that matter for two years, we came to the conclusion that these companies ought to be allowed an interest rate of two per cent a month in order to permit them to carry on business, and that was made their maximum rate. But we said we would do something to try to meet this situation when the Bank Act came up for revision, and as a result the minister has placed in the bill a provision under which the discount rate on short-term loans is five per cent, which would figure out at 9¾ per cent for that kind of business, which formerly cost the people of this country as much as two per cent a month. And let me say that as far as the cooperatives are concerned, their interest rate is much higher than 9¾ per cent. Nowhere in this country can you do this kind of business at this rate except with the banks; and while I question the advisability of tying the banks up with this dangerous kind of propaganda business, I say that provision was inserted as a service to the needy people of this country, though it is not always the poor people who borrow and repay in instalments.

Then the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght), also an eminent member of this house, had something to say about this bill. He wanted debt-free money and said that the right to issue currency should be taken away from the chartered banks. In the early days of this country, in the Yukon and other places of that kind, the right to issue bank currency was a great help in facilitating business. But we are doing, in a progressive manner, just what the hon. member said should be done; so why make that an issue in this debate? Then he said that we should have inflation. Let me say that inflation never succeeded anywhere it was tried. It was tried in Mexico some years ago, and the situation became so bad that the only money people would take was American cheques. Those doing business had American cheques, which were used as currency, passing from one person to another. That inflation almost ruined the business of that country.

Mr. HANSELL: Who wanted inflation?

Mr. KINLEY: The hon. member for Parry Sound.

Mr. HANSELL: He did not say that.

Mr. KINLEY: Let me tell the hon. member that he said that if the minister went down to the bank with a million dollar bond—he may have mentioned a greater amount—at three per cent, the banker would say to him, "I will give you a million dollars, but you must pay me three per cent for a period of twenty years." The hon. member knows that the Minister of Finance would not do anything of the kind. He would go to the bank with a treasury bill and he would get the money for three-eighths of one per cent. That is less than the cost of doing business, because we are told that the cost of operating private banks is about three per cent. Also the minister might offer a short-term bond which bears interest at one and one-half per cent. It seems to me that that is what he would do because it is the sensible thing to do.

Mr. HANSELL: What has that to do with inflation?

Mr. KINLEY: If my hon. friend will listen perhaps he will find out. I said that money in its highest sense was the financial blood stream of the nation. Suppose the Minister of Finance goes to the Bank of Canada and says, "I must have a million dollars without interest." I think the hon. member for Parry Sound said that he would pay interest to the bank, but he would be paying it to himself so that it would not cost anything. It does not cost the Bank of Canada anything to do business!

If that million dollars is put into the financial blood stream of the country, what happens? A good test would be to ask, "How much will it cost to get it back?" The only way to get it back would be to impose taxation or to issue bonds, long-term bonds at three per cent or short-term bonds at one and one-half per cent. Let me tell the house what would happen. This money would go into the economic blood stream of the country and would finally reached the chartered banks. According to our set-up in Canada they could use that as a means of increasing their credit reserve. Can hon. members say that there would be no inflation because of that? I believe that if the Minister of Finance did that he would seriously impair if not entirely destroy the functions of the Bank of Canada which has been set up to control credit and currency.

Let me give a homely illustration. A man has a store, and he also has a wife and a daughter. His wife and daughter come to the store and they say, "We want this; we want that." Then the wife may go to a neighbour and say, "My husband has a store; I went down there, took what I wanted and it did not cost me anything." It has been my experience that many splendid merchants have been forced into bankruptcy because their families took away goods which they thought belonged to them and which they thought it did not cost anything to take from daddy's store.

Credit is another matter. Credit is a matter of confidence and integrity. It depends upon the confidence you have that somebody else will pay you when you trust him. The average storekeeper is able to give credit many times the value of the goods in his store provided that he has a quick turnover. This all depends upon whether the people pay him. If they do, and the wholesaler trusts him, he is able to carry on and grant credit. As I say, credit is something that depends upon integrity and confidence.

Let us not forget that our banking system has a great deal to do with export trade. The banks act as missionaries in foreign countries. Canadians should be proud to know that Canadian banks are doing business in some of the largest countries in the world, and they are doing it successfully. They are there to help carry on our foreign trade, a trade which will be of great importance in the future. The fact that they are there denotes that they are efficient. I think our banks have proved themselves capable of competing in the markets of the world. They are there as outposts for the future benefit of this country.

There is to be an international bank composed of five principal shareholders—the United States, Soviet Russia, Great Britain, China and Canada. Canada is the fifth partner with the other large nations of the world. These countries are going to deposit so much money in the pool, and the basis of that money will be gold. Canada will deposit gold in order to become a partner in the bank. If we have inflation and our money does not buy very much, it will cost us more to put that gold there. We must not forget that Canada is a gold-producing country and we should be loyal to the exports and products of our country. We in Canada should favour sound money and a condition that prevents inflation, because this country is a producer of a material which will be the basis of credit in the international world when this war is over.

Canada has shown herself to be a big nation financially. She has reached that position because there is confidence in her financial institutions and in the industry of her people. We hear much criticism from people with no experience, people who in an academic way talk about something that must be applied in a practical way in order to see how it works. For the benefit of this country we should travel and improve the road that has made this country great in the past.

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Turner) for granting me this time because I understand he is to speak next. I do not intend to make a speech, but I wish to have a little information on one or two subjects. I think the hon. member for Queen's-Lunenburg (Mr. Kinley) has made a very good speech. I am a member of the banking and commerce committee and I generally listen to the hon. member when he speaks, and sometimes support him. I should like to ask the minister a question in regard to section 89, subsection 4, paragraph (b) of bill No. 91. This reads in part:

> Every sale of live stock shall be made by public auction not less than five days after publication of an advertisement.

If live stock is sold by a bank at public auction there is every likelihood that the minister's department will step in and say that the farmer owes income tax on the proceeds of the sale. Proceeds from sales of livestock are considered to be income under the income tax act. Where a farmer sells cattle at auction, will that be considered income and come out of the farmer's pocket? Or the farmer might have live stock, perhaps breeding stock, which he did not want to sell but which he puts up as collateral to tide him over a difficult time. Then something happens and he cannot meet the note. The bank takes over his stock, sells it and gets $5,000, we will say, on the sale. If they got that much it would mean that the farmer would have to pay some $2,300 in income tax. I think the minister, when he is making his statement to-night, should say something in regard to that and tell us whether that is to be regarded as income or not.

In his speech the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) had this to say, as reported at page 2559 of Hansard:

> In the case of the industrial development bank you only require to have ten or twelve branches all over the country and you can handle it without trouble.

What I should like to know is why the minister did not put it in the bill if we are to have ten or twelve branches of the industrial development bank. How does he know we are to have ten or twelve branches, and if he does know, just where are these branches to be? I feel, and I think I am right in this, that the minister should have told the house about these branches, where they were to be, and what was what. Mr. Towers, governor of the Bank of Canada, in answer to a question, said that the industrial development bank would likely use the managers of the chartered banks as its agents. If that is the case I do not see why we need twelve branches across the country.

Another thing which does not bother me very much personally but which does bother people with poor eyesight is that some chartered banks' notes of different denominations are the same in colour and are hard to distinguish. Take, for instance, a five dollar bill. I believe that the Bank of Canada five dollar bill is blue in colour, but the ordinary five dollar bill of the chartered banks is green in colour and looks very much like the green one dollar bill. The minister would be wise to see that all the banks, the Bank of Canada and the chartered banks, have one colour for one denomination, and that there be not the variations there are at the present time. I know that would help people with poor eyesight very much.

The Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) told us that the industrial development bank would look after financing returned men who were seeking to set up their own private air lines, and that information was sent out by the wartime information board in a bulletin dated April 21, not only throughout Canada but, I understand, to South America, the United States and other allied countries. As I look at it, that information is absolutely wrong and the minister should have it corrected. It is a case where the Minister of Munitions and Supply did not know the set-up proposed for the industrial development bank. However, I believe that the minister should see to it that the industrial development bank, by a change in the set-up, can look after all these loans.

I would ask the Minister of Finance whether he believes in the kind of bank that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation are advocating, what is really called the old-sock bank. According to the Calgary Herald here is a statement from a C.C.F. pamphlet being circulated in the west:

> Your money is not safe in a chartered bank during a depression. During the next capitalist depression you had better hide your money in an old sock. It's safer.

Under the heading "Vicious C.C.F. Propaganda" the Calgary Herald goes on to say that that statement is as false as it is vicious.

Mr. REID: Who said that?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The C.C.F., in a pamphlet being circulated in the west.

Mr. GILLIS: Likely by the bankers' association.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I have been talking to a few people who live in the riding of Lisgar in Manitoba, who were told by C.C.F. men in that part of the country that the sock was the safest place to put their money.

Mr. FULFORD: If I may interrupt the hon. member I have a photostatic copy here of exactly what the C.C.F. said. May I read it:

> During the next capitalistic depression you had better hide your money in an old sock. It's safer.

Is that not fine propaganda to put out? It is undermining the confidence of the people of Canada in their established institutions.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I do not want to be too hard on the C.C.F., because only the other day I was told by a Progressive Conservative member of the Ontario assembly that the C.C.F. opposition in the Ontario house was a model opposition.

Mr. GILLIS: Surely.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): "Surely", the hon. member for Cape Breton South says. I have looked up the definition of "model" in the dictionary and I find that it means an imitation of the real thing.

Mr. J. M. TURNER (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words with respect to bill No. 91 now under discussion, which deals with banks and banking. But before I do so I should like to join with the member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) in saying that I think all Canada should be justly proud of the outstanding address delivered to-day by our Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to the members of both houses of parliament in Great Britain. In my judgment it was a masterpiece that will be remembered and appreciated for many years to come.

May I congratulate our Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) upon his able presentation, on the second reading, of all matters and phases to be dealt with by this bill. This government is to be congratulated upon its financing and upon the banking course that it is following. It is sticking strictly to Liberal policies in that regard by putting through banking legislation of one kind or another designed to help the farmer, the fisherman, the labourer, and the little man. This is Liberal policy in the truest sense and I know it will be welcomed by that great army of people right across Canada generally, particularly by the small man in all branches of our industrial and business life.

I believe, sir, that everybody in this house knows that I am not a financial expert, nor do

I ever hope to be one; neither am I a mechanical expert and I do not ever expect to be. Perhaps all I know about finance is that a dollar has 100 cents. Nevertheless, when I get in my car in the morning to start to drive I can immediately detect if there is something wrong, although I may not know what it is. That is the way I feel when talking on finance. There is something radically wrong with our whole financial system. The way it is set up it is like a gigantic octopus, choking the very life out of our Canadian nation through the interest system we have adopted. This certainly has to be changed.

Just as an illustration, I hold in my hand a copy of a brief prepared in February of this year by the city of Winnipeg to be presented to Hon. Stuart S. Garson, our premier. Attached to this brief is a statement of the interest paid on debentures by the city of Winnipeg from the year 1930 to 1943, a period of fourteen years, and the staggering interest total for that period is $40,319,694.20. This figure does not include the interest on the greater Winnipeg water district, which happens to run right through my constituency. The interest on this alone amounts to $800,000 a year. Now, Mr. Speaker, if I were to stand here to-day and tell the people of Winnipeg that between now and 1957 they are going to hand out again to the money-lenders an amount close to fifty million dollars for interest, they would think I was not stating the facts. Nevertheless, that did happen before and it can happen again. That city is urgently in need of slum clearance, new homes, hospitals, parks and other public projects, and if we could save only half that amount, say $20 millions or $25 millions, for those purposes, I am sure it would be welcome news not only to Mayor Coulter, but to all the citizens of Winnipeg.

The figures I have given for Winnipeg can, in proportion to population, be duplicated in almost every province, city, town and municipality in Canada. Interest has a strangle-hold on governments of all kinds and acts as a hydraulic brake against any district progressing to its fullest extent. How can they be expected to progress, carrying this terrific load?

Let us take a look at our own financial set-up in the dominion. Before the war this nation's debt as of March 31, 1939 was $3,710,610,592.87 and interest charges on same were $127,995,616.75; to-day our national debt is $9,228,252,012.03, as of March 31, 1943, the interest charges being $188,556,249.39, better than $15 millions a month, an increase of over $60 millions a year, or roughly five million dollars a month. That is a staggering figure, and who can tell to-day that the war may not last for two or three years yet and the debt will be just that much greater? We are getting in deeper all the time.

I said before that I am not a financial expert, but I know there is something positively wrong with this whole business, and I envisaged the Bank of Canada as being set up to step in and lend money to public corporations, as I have already indicated, without any interest, but with just an operating charge or a bookkeeping cost. The present system cannot go on indefinitely. We should, therefore, be prepared to try another kind, and force the big banking houses to get out of government business entirely and operate in their own field, namely that of commerce and industry. They are paying too much attention to government financing, and not enough to the commercial field, which, if they did, would stimulate business rather than retard it. I believe that the Bank of Canada is not operating to the fullest extent in the important matter of financing public debt and public corporations.

Is it not a fact, Mr. Speaker, that the largest and wealthiest corporation in Canada is the Dominion of Canada itself? It has some eleven and one-half million shareholders: it has billions of dollars of unseen wealth below the ground, in gas, oil, radium and other minerals, and it has billions of dollars of wealth above the ground. For instance, we own the Canadian National Railways, a corporation worth anywhere from one to two billions dollars, with between seventy-five and one hundred thousand employees. We own the Trans-Canada Air Lines. We own the Bank of Canada and other big public corporations, including twenty-five crown companies which have been set up since this war began. We own some five hundred to six hundred fighting and merchant vessels; in addition, we own some five or six hundred million bushels of wheat in storage in the elevator bins of this country, and in the short space of three months or better we hope to have another four or five hundred million bushels of wheat. We shall own it all, and without it I doubt if this war can be won.

According to the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght), the total paid-up capital of all the banks is $145 millions, an insignificant amount as compared with our own wealth and resources—those of the Dominion of Canada.

The question I should like to ask is simply this: why then should it be necessary for us to put on a bombastic flag-flying display, supported by acrobats, comedians, movie actresses and bands, in order to induce corporations and others to lend us money who obviously are less wealthy than we are, whose resources in fact are insignificant compared with our own? That point has never been cleared up in this House of Commons to my satisfaction. I for one have never believed that a man or corporation is doing an outstanding patriotic service by investing a certain amount of money in victory bonds. What he is really doing is buying insurance and at the same time collecting a little premium. The really patriotic citizen of this country is wearing a uniform, flying over Europe or existing in foxholes in Italy, fighting the submarines on the seas, or risking his life elsewhere in the war. That is what I call real patriotism, and I have yet to be shown that I am wrong.

I find myself, therefore, in agreement with the principle put forth by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) and the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer). As a matter of fact, I told the hon. member for Rosthern, when he spoke in this house away back in 1936 or 1937 on financing public debt—he will remember the incident—that I was of the same opinion in this regard at that time.

I hope the government will give special attention to this important matter of financing public debt and public institutions and projects, before it is too late.

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I welcome the opportunity of hearing a few words from the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Turner). I feel that to-night he has epitomized the position of the Liberal members of this house so far as this debate is concerned. He began by expressing his approval of the policies of the government, and then launched an attack in which he showed the results of those policies gave evidence that there should be drastic changes.

It has been said a number of times during this debate that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) made a most provocative speech if it were the desire of the government to keep this debate short. I might say, on the other hand, that the chances are it is a good thing that the minister made that kind of speech, because by so doing he has produced a longer debate and one in which, I feel, fairly clear statements have been made indicating where the various groups in this house stand. It took some little time to get very much said by the members of the Progressive Conservative party, except for their first spokesman, who started off on Monday, but at least they have said enough to make it clear that they are prepared to defend to the limit the private ownership of the chartered banks of this country.

The position of the Liberal party as it has already been made evident by the hon. member for Springfield is one of definite division. We have the Minister of Finance stating the official policy of the government, which is for a continuance of the present status of the banks with the minor changes which are proposed in the amending bill now before us. The minister in his speech of last week expressed his view that his party and the country as a whole would be with him in the stand he was taking. But during the course of this debate we have had the very interesting speeches of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer), the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght), the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), and now, the hon. member for Springfield. If I have overlooked any others who have been rebellious in their remarks I offer my apologies to them; but it has been made quite clear that the Liberal members of this house do not agree in their views on banking policy. There is one thing on which they seem to be agreed, namely, that they are not going to vote for our amendment, but among themselves there is a wide divergence of opinion.

If I may say so with respect to our hon. friends of the immediate left, the Social Credit group, I feel they have stated their position a little more clearly in this debate than they have done on previous occasions. They were able to express their views in a subamendment which, despite the fact that it did not go far enough, came very close to our position and was such that we were able to vote for their subamendment when that vote was taken the other evening. With the assistance of the hon. member for Parry Sound, I would say that the Social Credit group has made its position a little clearer in the course of this debate. I hope that the house will agree that we in this group likewise have made our position quite clear. We feel that such an important function in our economic life as our banking system should be under complete public ownership and public control so that it might be operated in the interests of the country and the people as a whole.

A good deal of time has been taken already in dealing with some of the arguments put froward the other day by the Minister of Finance, but I should like to make a few comments on some of his arguments, some of which have been supported since by other members of his party.

There is one argument which he made, on page 2546 of Hansard of May 2, which I am sure he will not try to substantiate further when he speaks later on to-night, if he gets the opportunity. I refer to these words which he used:

> But a far more important point is the undesirability of having the credit of each of us and of every business throughout the country assessed by civil servants working under political control for a government banking monopoly, rather than by bank managers interested not in the political or other views of the borrower but solely in his ability and trustworthiness as a debtor.

As other speakers in this group have pointed out, if that were to be the case with banks owned and operated by the people of Canada through their government, then one would expect the same to be the case with respect to the Bank of Canada, with respect to the industrial development bank that is to be set up, and with respect to other matters that are under the control of the government; but this is not so. One feels like asking this question: Does the minister's argument mean that departments of government, such as the Department of National Revenue, deal with cases that come before them on the basis of political interest? Does it mean that the war contracts depreciation board make their decisions on a political basis, on applications for huge depreciation allowances, which have been submitted to them during the course of the war? Does it mean that the government itself, when it has some special application for depreciation, such as that of the Aluminum Company of Canada, deal with it on a political or partisan basis? What about the annuities branch of the Department of Labour? I have a copy of a pamphlet which the annuities branch publishes, urging people to take on this form of protection for their old age. I see nothing in it that indicates anything of a partisan political nature. I see nothing to suggest that there is any regimentation involved or any danger or insecurity if one protects one's old age by purchasing a Canadian government annuity. Rather I find it an attractive booklet, with a picture of the parliament buildings on the cover, and underneath the slogan, "Backed by the whole resources of the dominion".

One might think of other matters of a financial nature which the government handles. Take housing. We had an extensive statement this afternoon by the minister as to further government plans to make possible the building of homes in this country. This kind of thing involves the government stepping in and channelling credit into certain forms of economic activity so that socially desirable goods will be produced. The government does not apologize for these things. It claims credit for them. It insists not only that they are non-political and non-partisan, but that they are marks of the progress that has been achieved while this government has been in power. In fact, I find it interesting to read the minister's speech and find him at one point complaining about the entering wedge of socialism, and at other points claiming credit for the fact that the government have put in the thin end of that wedge. As reported at page 2547 of Hansard the minister says:

> We are providing a publicly owned institution to provide credit for useful and desirable industrial projects which the private institutions are unable or unwilling to finance.

True, he went on to say:

> But we do not want to create a huge government monopoly of the banking business.

The minister warns against the socialist wedge, as he calls it, but takes credit for the thin edge of the wedge for which the government is responsible. Similarly, in another passage, at page 2544, he says:

> It requires only socialization of central banking—and that of course we have already achieved.

"Socialization" is a terrible thing in many purple passages in the minister's speech; but when it comes to something like central banking, when it comes to other measures which the government has instituted in the economic life of the country, such as those to which I have referred, the minister is not only proud of the things the government has done, and claims credit for them, but he does not hesitate to use the very word "socialization" which is suposed to have such dire results.

Similarly, I was interested in listening to the remarks of the hon. member for Rosthern. He started off with one of his chronic attacks on the position of the C.C.F. and quoted from our literature, which we print in as great abundance as we can and make aavilable for Liberals and others to read that they might learn thereby. He quoted to show that we believe the banks and financial institutions of the country should be brought under public control, and then he launched into a great tirade to suggest that public control, as advocated by the C.C.F., would involve dictatorship, loss of democracy and all that kind of thing. When he finished his attack on the C.C.F. and got down to business, dealing with the Bank Act, he, being of the school of the hon. member for Parry Sound, the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, the hon. member for New Westminster, and some others, found some fault with the bill as proposed by the minister. He insisted that the time had come when we must let the banks know that they must be responsible to a public authority.

I would point out that he used the very same words, "public authority", when he asserted what we must have, speaking for the rebel Liberals, as he used when trying to attack the position of the C.C.F. He made some other references to the wealth made in the mining industry and to ways and means whereby that wealth is taken out of the country, and he asserted that there must be established ways of preventing this. The "public authority" must step in to protect the interest of the people of the country as a whole. What I am trying to point out is that the hon. member for Rosthern and the Minister of Finance as well, if they will read their speeches closely will see that they have themselves laid down the basic principles which we really want to incorporate into our banking set-up. In that very interesting passage in the minister's speech, to which the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) directed the attention of the house, where the minister said that it was his wish—and of course he was expressing only his own personal opinion—that the banks would call to their directorates men from a much wider field of our national life, including farmers, industrial workers and the like, he was laying down one of the basic principles which underlies our whole position. In other words, our contention is that the banking set-up, the financial machinery of this country, is basic to the well-being of Canada and her people, that because of that fact it ought not to be under the autocratic and dictatorial control of a few people not responsible to the parliament of Canada and to the people as a whole, but rather that it ought to be specifically and directly under our control in parliament.

I wish again, as I have done before, to deprecate the many speeches made in this house deploring parliamentary control in the economic life of our country. The idea is handed out time and again by hon. members that that involves dictatorship and a loss of democracy. But these hon. members do not seem to face up to the alternative. The alternative to public control by the people through parliament, such as we are advocating, is what we had through the great depression—private control of the things which affect the lives of our people, control of those things by a few individuals outside parliament, and not responsible to this democratically elected body.

I find it hard to understand how hon. members who seek election to the House of Commons to represent their people, and to play some part on behalf of those people in the affairs of their country, can rise in their places in the house and say, "We do not want to run things here; we want to turn the basic and the important things in our Canadian life over to private individuals outside parliament."

In his remarks the other day the minister had a good deal to say about the profits of the banks, and endeavoured to give the impression, and to substantiate that impression with figures, that those profits were not large, and that therefore the claim of this party that the banks should be nationalized must fall to the ground. It seems to me that in arguing about the profits of the chartered banks in that fashion he misses the central point of our whole contention. Our interest in the function of the banks is directed, not only to the fact that they make profit on their banking operations, but primarily to the fact that they are in a position to control production in this country, to determine what kind of production will take place, and what the extent of our economic activity will be. And it is because we want the people, through their parliament, their democratically elected representatives, to have a say in how much production there will be and a say in what kind of economic activity we shall have, that we contend that the basic function of finance should be under the control of the people of Canada, through their parliament.

As I see it—with one drawback to which I shall refer in a moment—we have done that, for the purposes of war. This evening the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman) made some references to the fact that the banking system seemed to be functioning fairly well in this time of war, in that it had made possible a high rate of production of war goods, and a high level of economic activity in the country as a whole. May I point out to him, the minister, and the house, that in this time of war the government has really stepped into the whole picture of channelling credit, and of determining where credit is to be made available. True, the government has borrowed the money in various ways from the people and from the chartered banks and, to some extent, from the Bank of Canada; but the government has taken away from the banks and from private industry the power to determine what kind of production is to be effected. The government has stepped in, through the various war departments, the Department of Munitions and Supply, in particular, and has said, "Air training stations must be built, whether economically or not, in various parts of Canada." They have said, "Munitions, aircraft, ships, guns, uniforms—all these things must be produced. We are going to see to it that credit is made available and channelled in the right direction, so that these goods will be produced for the needs of the war."

In other words, with the one exception to which I shall refer in a minute, in this time of war the government has superimposed upon the private credit machinery of the country a publicly directed system of channelling credit. The only thing wrong with what the government has done—although I want to make it clear that we commend the government for the position it has taken, namely, that goods had to be produced, and that what was physically possible and necessary for the war effort had to be made financially possible—is that much of this credit has been made possible through the old procedure of borrowing at high rates of interest. Under that process it is clear that after the war is over, and in the years that lie ahead, while we may not pay off this increase in the national debt, still we shall have to take out a portion of the wealth we produce in the first decade and in the second decade after the war, and so on indefinitely, and give that portion of wealth to certain people who have a claim against the government, owing to the fact that a large portion of the national debt has been placed in their hands.

The fact is that we are waging war out of current production, out of goods and services we are producing right now. We are using the raw materials we secure to-day, and we apply to-day to those raw materials the power of labour. We cannot wage this war out of work which will be done ten years from now. But because of the system of borrowing from the chartered banks the huge sums of money we need for government purposes, at the rates of interest we have to pay, in the decades after the war, or as long as the present system lasts, we shall have to keep on taking portions from the wealth we produce to pay tribute to those who, as a result of the war, have the national debt in their hands.

Speaking the other day, the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard implied that this would be fairly easy, that we had achieved our financial independence, and have shown that it is no longer necessary for us to go into the money markets of the world. He implied that we have shown we can achieve a high level of production and, if I understood him correctly, his contention was that so long as we maintained this high level of production we shall be able to pay the interest on the national debt, and keep on going, provided that the government is prepared to continue the policy of huge government spending. I would point out to the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, and to others who think along those lines, that if after the war we are to have to borrow more money, so that the government can spend it to maintain our economic activity so that we can pay the interest on the war debt, without its affecting our future economy too drastically, and if in this process we continue the creation of interest-bearing debt, it simply means that the proportion of the national wealth which will have to go to those who hold the national debt will keep on increasing as the years come and go to the detriment of the people as a whole. It seems to me, therefore, that there is no argument at all for delay in this matter. I think those who have emphasized the fact that we get a chance to revise the Bank Act only once in ten years, and therefore should realize the importance of this bill in this year 1944, have done well in emphasizing that point. Bearing in mind the developments of the next ten years, we should be taking steps right now to see to it that we put a stop to this constant increase in the proportion of the wealth we produce that has to go to those who hold our national debt.

Now for a moment I should like to look at another argument advanced by the minister, also appearing at page 2546 of Hansard for May 2, where he spoke about the personal relationship between the potential borrower and his chosen banker. The passage reads very well, unless you stop to consider it for a moment and realize that not all the eleven and a half million people in this country are looking for a financial set-up in which it will be possible for each of us to have a personal banker for the purpose of borrowing money. The other day the hon. member for Parry Sound emphasized that not very many individuals in Canada make extensive use of bank accounts and chequing facilities, which is quite true. If you look a little further and ask how many individuals in Canada ever go in and sit down across the desk from a banker to float a loan and establish this personal relationship the minister talks about, you will realize that really very few are involved in that way. The great majority of the Canadian people want national policies that will result in full employment, in the distribution of goods and services to provide a high standard of living, in the guarantee of social security, protection in times of sickness, accident and old age. As I say, the great majority of people are more concerned about things of that kind than about having a personal relationship with a particular banker who would be very friendly and understanding. Certainly; let us have that kind of relationship in the banks of this country under government ownership as well, but we have a greater task than that, and the purpose of bringing the banks under public ownership is to achieve policies for the control of credit, for directing credit into the production of goods and services that we need, so that there will be a high level of production, full employment, security and a good standard of living for our people.

Actually we have had more than a debate on the banking system itself. The discussion has developed—and I do not regret it; perhaps it is logical and right—into an argument between the ways of life represented by the various groups in this house. Most of the other parties seem wedded to the idea that private enterprise, despite all its failures in the past, despite the low level of living it has forced upon millions of our people, still is the system to which we should hold. We take the position that in this modern age, with all the technological advances we have had, with the tremendous capacity we have for producing wealth, with the way in which economic power has become concentrated in the hands of a few, the only course to follow is to see to it that those things which potentially are so valuable and so important should be in the hands of the people so that the wealth we produce can be made available to us all.

I am satisfied that the people of this country, and those who are fighting our battles overseas, are tremendously anxious that we should really make headway when this struggle is over, that we should really move into the kind of economy under which we shall be able to live a better life, under which we shall be able to have jobs continuously, and under which we shall be able to enjoy the productivity of which we are capable; and beyond everything, to move in the direction of co-operation, wider public control, extending the principle of democracy from the political into the economic sphere. I cannot help deploring the attempts made in this house to hold back the waves; the speeches made again and again in which the people of Canada, who want a better day with the basic things they are counting on—cooperation, public control, continuance of the high level of production we have achieved through the government stepping in as it has—are told that these things must not be, that we must go back to private enterprise and all that it gave us during the thirties.

I am going to draw my remarks to a conclusion, Mr. Speaker; I understand there is still hope that this debate may be wound up to-night, though quite frankly I feel that it has been interesting and worth while. Before I sit down, however, I want to say that when the vote is taken on our amendment, if it is beaten—and from what has been said I assume that it does not stand a very good chance in this chamber—and the way is then clear, I hope some of the Liberal members who have indicated their dissatisfaction with the principles underlying the bill now before us will move another amendment. I am hoping that the hon. member for Parry Sound, or, if he is not here, the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, or perhaps the hon. member for Rosthern, or the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), or the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank), or the hon. member for Springfield, who preceded me, will move another amendment. Someone behind me suggests that perhaps the Progressive Conservatives might move an amendment, but I do not suppose they have any alternative to the bill before us. However, the hon. members whom I have named have made one specific suggestion repeatedly; that is, that the necessary changes should be made so that the government could do all its borrowing from the Bank of Canada. The hon. member for Parry Sound suggested that the five per cent ratio provision should be changed to read 100 per cent in order that the minister's objection to inflation might be ruled out of court. I do not see why one of these hon. members should not move such an amendment. By their speeches they have indicated that they feel free to disagree with their own government on this matter. As a matter of fact, on Tuesday evening I was on the list of speakers, but I was frozen out by others who caught the Speaker's eye; and when it developed into a battle among several Liberals, who was I to interfere? As far as I was concerned it could go on all evening. But I was wondering why we did not get from some of those hon. gentlemen to whom I have referred an amendment to the motion for second reading of the bill, expressing their point of view. It would be less than we are asking; it would be only a step, but it would be a step in the right direction and would give hon. members a chance to express themselves on the idea of making at least that much of a change. No doubt some will say they are going to wait until the bill gets to the banking and commerce committee, where they will try to argue for these changes. If we wait until the bill reaches the committee, those who want the bill to remain as it is will be able to say that the house voted down our amendment, and voted for the second reading, endorsing the principle of the bill as it is without any change. There will not be much chance to do anything in the committee. I suggest that if we had an amendment embodying the specific proposals of the hon. member for Parry Sound, which have received the support of so many Liberals, it would act as an instruction to the committee so that it would have something to work on. I wonder if the reason why hon. members are refraining from moving such an amendment is a fear that it might carry. As a matter of fact, I believe it would.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Why do not you move it?

Mr. KNOWLES: The hon. member for Fraser Valley would like to trap us into moving something which would be less than the position we take. I believe he agrees with the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard and the hon. member for Parry Sound. He knows how to move an amendment. After this vote has been taken, should our amendment be defeated, I hope that he, or some other hon. member, will move such an amendment as I have suggested, so that we may have a division and know where the house stands on this question.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I gave up my time last night so that a vote would be taken, but it was not. I am sportsman enough to allow hon. gentlemen who want to catch the train to get away. I had hoped to make a few remarks on behalf of the industrial workers, but I am willing to waive my right to speak at this time because I do not want to prevent hon. gentlemen from keeping important engagements which they have to-morrow. I wanted to say something about the functions of money and the basis of credit as affecting the industrial workers of this country. I hope when the bill goes to committee their case will be considered. There were other matters to which I wished to refer, but it is now after ten o'clock. I had intended to be absent to-morrow, but I cancelled my reservation and I was ready to wait until the bill came up again, in order to let hon. gentlemen catch their trains. With the understanding that I shall have the right to say, on the preamble of the bill when it comes from the committee, what I had intended to say, I shall take up no more time of the house at the moment.

Mr. GASPARD FAUTEUX (Sainte-Marie) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to delay the debate longer . . . .

Mr. CHURCH: If other members are to speak, I should like to continue with my remarks. I gave way on the understanding that I was to be the last speaker. I think it is only fair that the hon. gentleman who has attempted to follow me should accept my suggestion. If this debate is to continue until to-morrow I wish to say a few words which I think would be of great importance to the industrial district I represent. I did not know the hon. gentleman was on the list of speakers.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. McCann): The hon. gentleman has the floor and if he desires to exercise his privilege, he may speak.

Mr. CHURCH: This is the most important piece of legislation we have had all session. This bill comes before us once every ten years. I am opposed to the nationalization of banks and insurance companies, but I realize that war-time conditions have changed the business of banking. I think the minister has acted fairly with the house in connection with this bill. He said he wanted to have the utmost investigation before the committee, and this puts me in mind of the statement made in order in council 1562, which was passed on July 31, 1933, to appoint the Macmillan commission. The exact text of the reference is:

> That such examination should also include a study of the entire monetary system of Canada, including credit, currency and coinage, particularly in their relation to commodity price movements and fluctuations in international exchange;
> That it is also advisable to consider whether and in what respects the banking institutions and the monetary system of Canada may be modified, extended or developed for the purpose of facilitating intra-imperial and international cooperation in public policies designed to promote the revival of domestic and foreign trade and enterprise and the general increase of employment, and to ensure a greater measure of stability in respect thereto.

I think the committee might consider that report in all its phases and the text of the reference in detail. As I say, very little has been done in the Bank Act and other legislation for the industrial workers. The farmers and fishermen have been considered in different pieces of legislation, but the industrial worker and the small retailer, wholesaler and manufacturer are still left at the mercy of the existing shark loan companies. There are no shark loan companies preying upon farmers and fishermen. This bill has sections to deal with the inspection of our banks. This inspection has not been what it should be, as is illustrated by the Home bank and Farmers' bank failures.

Section 82 deals with loans on real estate, but the fact is that the banks are doing a commercial business in real estate. They have driven a coach and four through the whole section with the active consent of the treasury board. They have built skyscrapers in all the large cities of Canada. They have got around the provisions of this section by appointing holding companies, and I suggest that the necessary words should be added to prevent this, that they shall not directly or indirectly deal in real estate, or it shall, the act says, revert to the crown.

The bill now before the house is not very much different from the bill introduced in 1934 after the Macmillan report. There are only minor changes. The rate of interest has been reduced from seven to six per cent, and there are other small changes. Reference has been made to service charges and currency and credit. These matters are referred to in the Macmillan report. The basis of credit and the function of money, in the way of both public and private investment, have not been changed to any degree. In my opinion the service charges made against the small business or storekeeper, are too high, and should be reduced by the committee. These small business men cannot continue to operate under the strain that is put on them.

In addition, the government has placed a heavy burden on the small retailer and wholesaler in the form of taxation, artificial barriers and other restraints of trade and controls. It is about time that some of these controls were removed. Some were necessary and prevented inflation. I should like to quote what was said by Senator William Duff, a former very popular member of this house. He sums up the situation with regard to the small business man in these words, according to the Globe and Mail interview:

> When I take it up with the minister he tells me he can't interfere with his officials. Can you imagine such an answer? Business men are badgered to death trying to comply with the regulations, which are getting tougher and tougher and which are being issued to responsible men who know their own business, when the officials have often been pitchforked into position without any qualification whatever in the business world or the matters which come up in their own departments.

In my opinion there should be some relief from these artificial barriers and burdens. I cannot understand why these three bills, the one concerning the industrial development bank, the one revising the Bank Act and the one in connection with farm loans should not have been brought in together because they are all correlated. The banking and commerce committee should have an opportunity to consider them. We must remember that this is going to be a desperately poor country when the war is over. We have scattered our resources at a very great rate. We shall have conditions here which will be very difficult to control and meet. The government should have considered many of these matters before and should have protected the people. In Great Britain they are going back to their old trade practices act to give industry a chance. We have the Bank of Canada in this country and now we are to have a subsidiary of it, an industrial development bank, to deal with fishermen and small business men. But they will first have to go to the commercial banks; if those banks refuse to extend credit they will have to come in under industrial development bank system. Security is not much of a factor in this as it is with the commercial banks.

I am opposed to two kinds of currency, one currency for the individual and a different currency for the public, loans and investments.

Undoubtedly the banks have done good work especially during the war and during the depression, but they have not given enough help to the small business man, the retailer, the labourer, the artisan, and especially the industrial worker. A branch bank in one large city cannot lend a dollar without reporting to the inspector at head office. They are too tight in giving credit, especially in the matter of small loans. This industrial development bank is now being created as a subsidiary central bank, which was never envisioned by the Macmillan report. We have trust and loan companies, mortgage companies —we have nearly twenty trust companies in Toronto—and many other commercial loaning organizations as well as the banks, and I fail to see how this industrial development bank will help the small industrial worker.

There should also be more liberal treatment of and better wages and labour conditions for the employees of the banks, bank clerks, bank messengers and so forth. They should be treated in a more humane way; more consideration should be shown to them, especially in pay schedules, since in both wars many of them have enlisted and gone to the front.

There are many other matters that should be taken into consideration. For instance, the Midland bank is borrowing millions of pounds from the Bank of England, their central bank, and the day is not far distant when in this country we shall have to apply the well-known principle of economics referred to by A. K. Chesterton and A. Wigglesworth, two great English economists on banking. They point out that in the years to come something will have to be done along the lines I have indicated. Reliance, says Mr. Chesterton, upon 19th century economic doctrine, allied with 20th century sentimentality, is the worst possible guarantee that could be found for the future integrity of the British empire amidst the increasing economic stresses of the modern world. Why should a nation not seek so to balance its economy that it can as far as possible supply its own needs from its own resources? Upon the answer to this question of self-sufficiency will depend the survival of our whole commonwealth.

During the last century, when Britain's prosperity was being built up by supplying the markets of the rest of the world, she had the financial masterdom which enabled her to a very large extent to govern the exterior factors which had become essential to her national life. That masterdom, weakened in 1914, died five years later. The centre of financial power moved westwards, and with it went a good deal of Britain's economic independence, which in turn carried away a measure of her political independence. The other nations in the fullness of time not only set their own people to work as far as they could upon their own raw materials to meet the needs of their own home markets, but were soon driving British goods out of other foreign markets and out of empire markets, and eventually even out of the British home market. During the inter-war period this process was threatening to put Britain out of business as a great power.

While Northamptonshire boot and shoe operatives sought in vain for work, Czechoslovakian boots and shoes flooded the country. Unemployed Leicestershire hosiery workers bought Japanese socks at fourpence a pair. Japanese tires sold at ninepence, while the men of Coventry lined up outside the labour exchanges. And so it was with almost every other manufactured product. The agricultural position was worse. Seven hundred and fifty thousand British acres were withdrawn from productivity between 1931 and 1938, 150,000 acres of them in a single year. Britain's export trade went down twenty-five million pounds in six months. Such was the price paid for 19th century economics applied to the 20th century.

I believe that Britain must get back her export trade and that she must deal with empire countries first. We have vast resources of raw materials within the British empire, and we should have an empire preferential trade policy that would facilitate the flow of goods from one part of the empire to the other. Common sense alone demands that we should produce to our maximum capacity within the empire and secure within the empire the maximum distribution of the goods produced. Whatever was surplus to our imperial requirements could then be exchanged internationally on an ad valorem basis for what was in deficient supply. The opportunities of the home market offered to the dominions would be sufficiently large to induce cooperation without interfering with such of their trade as flowed naturally along other channels. The empire needs to be self-contained up to the point where all available man-power is employed upon all available raw materials to meet empire needs. Unless we do that the British empire will be liquidated; it will have had its day and will go by default. We should exchange goods and services for goods and services, balancing exports and imports.

I am a strong supporter of the mining industry and should like to see it flourish, and it must in Canada. Britain made a mistake in 1925 in going on the gold standard, and we know what happened to the mother country between 1936 and 1938. The gold standard is only a modern affair. It came into existence after the Crimean war. In 1871 Germany was one of the first countries to adopt the gold standard. She exacted so much compensation in gold from France at that time. Other countries began to manufacture goods also and were able to undersell the British in the markets of the mother country, empire countries and foreign countries.

I hope that we shall be very slow to enter upon any more international financial complications without parliament's assent. The banking and commerce committee should consider the whole problem of British preferential trade within the empire, favoured trade relations, and the Atlantic charter, and see if we cannot develop self-sufficiency within the British empire along the lines I have indicated.

I have only taken twelve minutes, Mr. Speaker, and I wish to apologize if I have kept anyone from missing his train. I hope I have caused no inconvenience by interfering with any arrangements. But I believe the time has come when we should hear something from the minister and his department about these matters. I referred at the start to what Mr. Wigglesworth and Mr. Chesterton said as to the international bank and the redemption fund, which in practice take up ninety per cent of direct banking exchange. I quote Mr. Wigglesworth in the National Review:

> Some may ask what guarantee stands behind the issue of money which to-day exceeds £1,100 million in volume, while the whole labour of the country is engaged in gainful employment for war or peace production. Well, behind the so-called fiduciary issue there exists a redemption fund of gilt-edged securities which, incidentally, are dividend earning. If the Midland bank, for instance, require a million one-pound notes it pays to the Bank of England a cheque of equal value. This cheque is instantly invested by the Bank of England in consols or similar high-class securities. As soon thereafter as the Midland bank accumulates redundant notes it returns these and gets from the Bank of England a cheque for equal value. The latter transaction results from a sale by the Bank of England of an identical value of its securities. Thus the redemption fund is the balancing factor. The process is entirely automatic and self-controlled. It is independent of any movement in gold. Money is thus made the servant of industry. It acquires thereby its real status—that of a counter to facilitate the exchange of goods. When the volume of traffic in goods diminishes paper currency flows back to the Bank of England and is destroyed. Thus each note represents the true value of goods of some description. . . . Behind the issue stands not only the redemption fund, which is a mere cog in the wheel, but the whole wealth of the country in its truest sense. This may include not only gold and silver bullion, but every commodity. Surely you have here a currency of infinitely greater value than that based upon a single metal, gold, which is always coveted, and liable to be spirited away by some foreign buyer. . . .

As we know, the United States took nearly all the gold of the world between the two wars and in this one when they had what was also called the cash-and-carry policy.

There is a future for gold. That future will not lie in any such basis of value as currency that it had in the past since there will be an international bank; gold will prosper in a better future in the arts and in industry, for which ninety-five per cent of it is being used to-day, and in connection with which there is a tremendous future for the gold mining industry of this country.

In conclusion, I wish to state that I will support any measures taken by the dominion and provincial governments to aid the mining industry, and to give the commercial banks fair play, but some reform is needed.

Mr. GASPARD FAUTEUX (St. Mary) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to lengthen this debate, but I should feel remiss in my duty if I did not comment briefly on the remarks made yesterday by an hon. member of this house about the salaries paid by a certain bank in the province of Quebec. I may say at the outset that I am in complete agreement with the numerous hon. members who spoke in favour of this bill and that I shall consider it a pleasure as well as a duty to vote for this measure. I wish to take this opportunity to congratulate the hon. members who delivered splendid speeches in which they referred quite aptly to the good work performed by the banks in this country. As was stated many times during this debate, we have before us a bill which will empower the government to renew the charters of our banks. It has been said time and again that a privilege is thus conferred on those financial institutions. I wish to point out in this connection, to those institutions that every privilege implies some obligation, and that it should be part of their responsibility to pay at least reasonable salaries to their employees. The attention of the house was called to the salaries that a certain bank had paid in the province of Quebec, namely $8 a week, for instance, to young clerks who were starting in the employ of that bank. Tellers were paid $17.50 a week even after nine years of service. It has also been stated that assistant accountants of thirteen years standing were receiving $22 a week and accountants, after fifteen years, enjoyed a weekly salary of $26.

I wish to raise my voice in this house to protest against the starvation wages these institutions are shamelessly paying their employees. It would be wise for the banking committee and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) to force these financial organizations, who enjoy a privilege granted by the government to pay better salaries to their employees. If the banks, as many other financial institutions, fear that, in view of the radical movements which seem to make some headway in our country undesirable reforms may be enacted, I feel that there would be less cause to take alarm were such powerful organizations as the bank already mentioned to set the example for others, for commercial and industrial firms in general, in the field of reasonable salaries. Thus, they would promote in Canada the cause of order and economic stability, which have been our claims to greatness in the past.

Mr. JEAN: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether I can finish to-night before eleven o'clock, but I do not think I should move the adjournment of the debate now, because we still have twenty minutes to go. Therefore, probably I had better begin, even if I have to divide my speech into two parts, delivering part to-night and part to-morrow afternoon.

The debate which has taken place on the motion for second reading, and on the two amendments which have been moved, has been to my mind a very interesting and valuable one. It must be borne in mind that the principle of the bill is a simple one, namely, that the bank charters be renewed for another ten years. When renewal is moved, of course the government has certain amendments to the Bank Act to suggest. This year those amendments have been somewhat extensive, although they have been by no means radical or revolutionary.

In this debate it became necessary of course for us to consider certain very important proposals that have been before this house and before the country for a number of years. In the debate I have been criticized because I made what was called a provocative speech. Indeed the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) referred to it as a piece of passionate propaganda. I did not intend to make a provocative or propagandist speech, but I intended to examine what it was my duty to examine, namely, first, the proposal of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party to nationalize the banks and, second, the proposal of the Social Credit party that any borrowing the government of Canada has to make from the banks be made from the Bank of Canada, which would be coupled with an alteration of the five per cent ratio provision to a 100 per cent ratio provision. Those were the very gravamen of the issue. They went to the very heart of the question as to what we should do with the Bank Act in this year 1944. I would have been derelict in my duty had I not met those issues head-on at the outset, and considered and discussed them. If we should nationalize the banks we should not extend their charters, nor should I be introducing this kind of bill. If as a government we should cease to borrow anything from the chartered banks—and I certainly do not wish to borrow any more than can be avoided—and if we were to substitute the Bank of Canada for the chartered banks, as a source of money we need over and above the money we get from the public, and couple with that the 100 per cent ratio provision, it would mean a radical amendment to section 59 of the Bank Act. That is something which should also be considered in the debate on second reading.

Therefore the debate came on in that way, and it has been a valuable one. The C.C.F. party took exactly the position which I said they would take, and which everybody knew they would take, both in the house and out of it. They put their position forward frankly; and I think for the most part—perhaps altogether—their speeches have been fair and direct arguments in support of the position of that party. Their position is that the government should go into the ownership and operation of the commercial banks of Canada.

The Social Credit party also took exactly the position that was foreshadowed in the speech I made on second reading. Their position is that any borrowing which we do from the banks should be from the Bank of Canada; that is, debt-free money, or the creation of new money. And they for the first time I think in this house, together with the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght)—and probably some other members—have implicitly, if not expressly, accepted the argument I have been making for years, that if we were to substitute borrowing from the Bank of Canada for borrowing from the chartered banks, and leave the five per cent ratio provision as it is, the effect would be so tremendously inflationary that it should not be tolerated. Therefore they have done exactly what I knew they must eventually do; they must be driven to the 100 per cent ratio proposal. The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) said that if the 100 per cent ratio proposal placed the banks in a position where they would undergo great loss, then the government should pay the loss. That meant that we would be substituting interest in another form for the interest which we are now paying the chartered banks, and the position so far as the taxpayers of Canada are concerned would be precisely as it is to-day.

Mr. QUELCH: Very much less.

Mr. ILSLEY: No. And I would kindly ask hon. members to let me conclude the debate.

Let us take a few of the arguments advanced, and a few of the objections which have been made. Since I have only forty minutes in which to conclude the debate, I can select only some of the more striking arguments, some of those which have made the greatest impression upon the house.

Applying that principle I do not think it is necessary for me to say very much about the speech of the official critic of the Progressive Conservative opposition, because his speech was a very curious performance. I had made no attack upon him. I had made no attack upon his party. I had made no attack upon his party's policy. His party had no amendment to suggest. His party had no criticism to my bill, except a very minor criticism related to bona vacantia, which we can discuss in committee. Yet we had a long speech from the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), which consisted in an attack upon me, and the manner of my presentation of my case to the house.

With regard to the lessons in taste which the hon. member sought to teach me, I am greatly obliged to him for them, and perhaps will derive some benefit therefrom. But with regard to his attack upon the method of my presentation to the house I contend to him that I had to do exactly what I did in my opening speech, namely, to examine the position of the C.C.F. party and the Social Credit party.

I shall not refer to any other speakers by name, although I may perhaps say something about the speech of the hon. member for Parry Sound, which possibly impressed some hon. members, because of the picturesqueness of the language rather than the soundness of the argument. But I do wish to take up, in the few minutes remaining to me to-night, a few of the arguments which have been advanced against the bill.

In the first place, the most important provision of the bill, that providing a guarantee of loans to farmers and fishermen, has not received the amount of attention in the house which I think it deserves. True, it has been discussed by a few speakers—the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley), the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) and the hon. member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen)—but very few speakers have dealt with that important provision in the legislation. To the hon. member for Rosthern, who made the suggestion that the rate should be three per cent instead of five per cent, I would say that is a matter that can be considered either at the time the farm loan improvement bill is before the house, or in committee on this bill; but my personal opinion—and I give this for what it is worth—is that if the rate is made three per cent instead of five per cent we shall defeat the purpose of the bill and the loans will not be made. We must remember always that we cannot, simply by putting down interest rates, ensure that loans will be made in volume at those low rates. My opinion is that this would be an impracticable proposal.

With regard to the advantage of this provision for credits, some have expressed scepticism as to whether these loans would be made in volume, but my expectation and belief is that any honest farmer who can use the money for fruitful and productive purposes will be able to get a loan under the provisions we have inserted in the Bank Act, and under the provisions of the farm loan improvement bill. That matter can be fully discussed in committee, and by the time that discussion ends I think hon. members will be satisfied that this provision will really result in the extension of useful credit on very reasonable terms to large numbers of the primary producers of the Dominion of Canada.

I have been asked in this debate why we are giving the farmers merely a modified home improvement loan plan while we are giving the industrialists an industrial development bank. The criticisms of our position fall under two heads. It was suggested by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon), though I must say not advocated, that we might have provided for our industrial loans in the same way that we have in this bill provided for agricultural loans; that is, that they should be made by the chartered banks under a guarantee by the dominion government. I want to give a few reasons why I think that would have been inadvisable. In the case of intermediate credit loans for farmers and fishermen, there is a vast number of loans all of a more or less uniform character, and also of the type which the banks are equipped to make. The insurance principle is therefore applicable to them. In other words, it is easy to lump all these similar loans together and apply a guarantee to them based on a stipulated percentage of the total amount of loans made by any one bank. The same thing applies to home improvement loans; there will be a very large number of relatively small loans of a very similar type. But the type of loan that will have to be made by the industrial development bank will be entirely different. The amount of the loan in each case presumably will be a great deal larger than in the case of agricultural intermediate credit loans or home improvement loans, and the number of loans will be relatively small. Each of these loans will present its own special problems; each will be a special case and will have to be considered on its merits. For these reasons the insurance principle is entirely inapplicable.

There are other reasons as well. Partly for the reason just mentioned—that is, the high degree of variability in the character of the loans—it would be extremely difficult to fix a percentage of guarantee that would be suitable. If the percentage were placed at a relatively low figure, such as ten or fifteen per cent, the government could be sure that there would be many loans that never would be made by the banks. A banker might be concerned with the possibility of loss on the particular loan before him, and might not feel that his loss on this loan would be offset by the bank's experience in a multitude of other loans. In practice, as already pointed out, there would not be a multitude of other loans. In the case of any one bank, particularly a small bank, the number of loans made in the course of one or two years probably would be relatively small, and not enough to give the diversification of risk upon which the pool or insurance principle is based. Then the Bank of Canada should exercise an active rather than a wholly passive influence in the type of loan concerned with the initiation of a new enterprise or the expansion of a small enterprise. Loans of this type which are desirable in the national interest, particularly if Canada is to carry out an expansionist policy in the years after the war, might never be made, and the government's guarantee never asked for under the insurance principle; and many of the loans the industrial development bank will be making are not of the type that commercial banks have made in the past, and perhaps in most cases of the type they are not equipped to make.

These are some of the reasons why I think the pool guarantee principle should not be applied to the kind of operations envisaged for the industrial development bank. But then from the other side, from the C.C.F. and perhaps others of the smaller groups, we had the suggestion that instead of providing for guarantees of the loans by commercial banks to farmers and fishermen, we should set up an agricultural development bank; and we were asked why we were not doing that. Well, there is a very practical reason; there are several reasons for not doing it, but one is very practical. It is that an agricultural development bank would mean a bank with perhaps a thousand or two thousand branches. It would mean duplicating existing banking facilities wherever there are farmers and fishermen, and that takes in most of Canada. It would mean great personnel problems; it would mean problems of labour and materials, and, in addition, it would get us into something like commercial banking, which I do not believe and the government does not believe is a suitable field for government enterprise.

Hon. members have attempted to say that we are in an inconsistent position; that we say the government should not go into the field of commercial banking for various reasons, one of which is that political influences might prevail, but that at the same time we are going into the field of industrial development banking, and one hon. member says we cannot have our cake and eat it. I want to point out the difference between the very limited type of banking or loaning that we propose to do in the industrial development bank and the kind of business we would be in if the government went into commercial banking. To begin with, the commercial banks have about thirty thousand employees; the industrial development bank, after it gets going, will have perhaps fifty or a hundred. I presume the commercial banks make several hundred thousand loans a year; the industrial development bank, comparatively speaking, would make only a few.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not want to interrupt the minister; but if that is the case, the whole object of the industrial development bank, as we understood it, which was to help the small people throughout the country, will be negatived, because if you are not going to have more than the number of loans suggested you are not meeting that objective.

Mr. ILSLEY: In his speech to-night the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman) said that perhaps the industrial development bank would have a thousand customers while the commercial banks have a million. I do not know whether those figures were evolved from some discussion that took place in the committee while I was absent; but while such figures cannot be at all exact, at any rate the difference in magnitude and ramifications and contacts, particularly public contacts, between the industrial development bank and the chartered banks is tremendous. The chartered banks have 3,077 branches in Canada. The industrial development bank at the outset will have no branches; it will have nothing but a head office. After that there will be some branches, perhaps one in each province. You have two entirely different kinds of institution. It is the multiplicity of these contacts, these hundreds of thousands, perhaps millions of contacts, that create the political dangers in an institution, the dangers of political pressure, political control and so on. It is where large numbers of people are affected, as every hon. member knows. Not always is that the case. There are public utilities which deal with the public on a standardized basis where the danger is negligible, but in this case thousands of government employees will have to pass upon the honesty and character of the people they deal with. They will have to deal with A to-day on one basis, and with B to-morrow on a different basis. That is the situation in which the impropriety of government operation emerges, in my opinion and in the opinion of the government.

The C.C.F. have attacked that one argument I have made against the socialization of the banks, but they have left the others pretty well alone. I challenge any member of this house, after hearing the eloquent and able speeches by members of the C.C.F., to put in a sentence what the utility would be of nationalizing the banks of Canada. They say, "Oh, well they would deal out credit in terms of public need." Does that mean that loans are to be made on the basis of what would be helpful to the person applying for money, regardless of whether or not the money is to be repaid? I have thought this thing over after hearing the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and other hon. members, and I cannot see what difference there would be in this thing unless they propose to go in for bad loans on a large scale.

On the question of the volume of credit, the loosening up of credit in times of depression and the contraction of credit in times of boom, may I say that that is controlled by the Bank of Canada, as I explained in my earlier speech. One of the speakers for the C.C.F. said, "Oh, yes, the Bank of Canada can force reserves on the chartered banks, but they cannot make them grant loans, or if they do, they cannot prevent the banks from calling the loans in." The profit motive ensures that they will lend if they can safely do so, and it ensures that they will not call the loans in if they can safely let them stay out.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, no.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes; it certainly does. If the C.C.F. proposes that their government commercial banks are to be run without regard to profit and loss, then they are in for a gigantic system of bad loans on the part of the government. Probably in a great many cases they will have to be granted under mass pressure. Perhaps they will say that that is democracy, but that is what would happen if they are going to change the operation of the commercial banks in the way which they propose.

Mr. COLDWELL: Since the minister has asked a number of rhetorical questions, may I say that we regard the banking system as part of the whole economic system.

Mr. ILSLEY: My hon. friend says that he regards the banking system as part of the whole economic system. I think the hon. member for Rosthern proved to the house in his speech this afternoon that the reason why the C.C.F. desires the nationalization of the banks is that that is essential to the socialization of the whole system. In other words, the fourth argument, if hon. members will recall, in my speech which was referred to by the hon. member for Weyburn, is a sound argument. That is the basis and crux of the socialist position in connection with the nationalization of the banks. I should like to move the adjournment of the debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the consent of the house.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think the minister is tired, as is everybody else.

Mr. GRAYDON: Leave it to the minister to say whether he wants to go on.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would prefer to wind it up to-night if I can have unanimous consent. I shall have to keep within my forty minutes. Reference was made to the small loan business by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer), who indicated that he would fight hard against this bill in the banking and commerce committee because it increased the rate from seven per cent to 9¾ per cent to small borrowers. That is not the effect of this bill. The present rate paid by borrowers for small loans on the instalment plan is up to twenty-four per cent. That is what they pay when they borrow from the small loan companies. We thought that the banks should be empowered to make this class of loan, but that there should be a limitation placed upon the rate of interest they could charge, and this has been put at 9¾ per cent. We have put it in the form of a five per cent discount, but it really amounts to 9¾ per cent. This is a special and unsecured instalment type of loan, but it is being made available at a much cheaper rate than is now being paid by the people of this country. I believe this to be one of the most constructive proposals in the bill. It fills a current need.

If the measure comes out of the committee with the borrowings limited to a rate at which they cannot carry on the business in any volume, then I am not sure but that it would be my duty as head of the department of insurance to issue licences to additional small loan companies. If I did not do that and there were no regulated facilities, these people would be driven to note-shavers and loan sharks, as was the case some years ago. I consider this to be one of the most constructive provisions in the banking bill. For two or three years now I have been turning down applications by small loan companies for licences.

Mr. QUELCH: Is the bank of Commerce not making small loans?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, but at rates higher than 9¾ per cent.

Mr. QUELCH: But less than twenty-four per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: But higher than the limitation provided by this bill.

I think that is all I can say about that part of the measure because I must hurry along. Perhaps before I get too far along in my time I should say something about the speech of the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght). The hon. member made an astonishing speech. He used the word "monopoly" in a sense which it does not have. He talked about the monopoly which the banks of Canada have. He used the word in the sense of a holder of a franchise. Apparently it did not make any difference to him whether there was one holder, two holders, ten holders or, as in the case in the United States several thousand holders of the franchise. He used the word in a sense which would make the banks of the United States or the banks of any country a monopoly simply because they were empowered to carry on the business of banking. I think I dealt with the question of monopoly by the banking system of Canada in my first speech.

In dealing with the profit of the private banks the hon. member for Parry Sound denied that the shareholder's equity was the proper basis. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar denies that also, as well as other members of the house. They have said that in working out what would be a fair return to the shareholders of a bank we should take into account the original paid-in capital and nothing else. Let me put this to hon. members. If a farmer as a result of his operations is able to save some money and he buys another farm next to his original farm, would it be fair if we were asked to set a fair return on his farm to take the value of both farms or of the first farm only?

Mr. COLDWELL: The example is not comparable.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is comparable. What does a shareholder's equity consist of. Do hon. gentlemen know? It consists of paid-up capital, reserve funds and undivided profits. I believe that one of these banks has been in existence for 125 years, while other banks have been in existence for many decades. It would be most unfair to take the original investment only, made perhaps half a century ago, and say that it is only on that original investment that the present owners of the bank are entitled to a return. Most of the owners of banks have obtained their shares in more recent years and have paid, not $100 but $150, $200, $250 and sometimes more per share. If they are to be paid a return only on the original investment it would mean the immediate reduction of the shares to something approximating their par value, which would be entirely unfair. The shareholders' equity is the proper basis, and what was their rate? Six per cent. All those great figures we heard, $47,000,000 including tax, sixteen per cent, twelve per cent, ten per cent and so on, all come down to this, that in the year 1943, which was a good year for the banks, when they did far better than the average for the fifteen previous years, for which I have also given the figures, they earned—they did not get by way of dividends, but their net earnings amounted to 6·03 per cent of the shareholders' equity.

The hon. member for Parry Sound says, just as the Social Credit party says, that the borrowing should be done from the Bank of Canada. He recognizes, and I am glad that at last after two or three years apparently he has come to recognize that that would be very inflationary without some change in the ratio provision. Therefore he suggested a change from five to 100 per cent in section 59 of the act. He says that the banks have two billion dollars worth of bonds they should not have. If we were to repossess those bonds and turn them over to the Bank of Canada and borrow another billion from the banks, that would make three billion dollars we would borrow from the Bank of Canada this year. If we did that, it would increase the deposits of the chartered banks by three billion dollars. That is certain. The banks, in order to carry that three billion dollars would have to pay interest on a very considerable part of it, and on all of it they would have other substantial carrying charges. Our best estimate of what the total marginal cost would be, the additional cost by reason of the banks having to carry that amount of deposits under conditions like this, is three-quarters of one per cent. If that three billion dollars were borrowed from the Bank of Canada and we had a 100 per cent ratio provision so that against the three billion dollars of deposits in the chartered banks they would have to keep an equivalent deposit in the Bank of Canada, we would impose an additional charge of $22,500,000 a year on the chartered banks. That is precisely nothing more or less than a tax on the banks. Would anybody in his senses propose a tax of $22,500,000 on the chartered banks in addition to the present taxation? The banks would not take it themselves. They would either liquidate or they would pass it on, and, as I said, there are only four classes to whom they can pass it on—to their depositors. to their borrowers, to their shareholders, or to their employees. They certainly would try to pass it on to one or more of these classes, and would do so. By our borrowing from the Bank of Canada instead of from the chartered banks we would have simply imposed a tax of $22,500,000 or more on some or all of these classes. That is all we would have done. This is a budgetary proposition. It is not nearly as much a banking proposition as a budgetary proposition.

Will it be argued that that is a fair tax, that it is a better tax than the income tax? At last the issue is out in the open. It is not hidden somewhere. It is not on a basis of getting something for nothing or on the basis of the banks getting enormous profits which must be taken away from them. Do we or do we not want an additional enormous tax placed on the depositors, or the shareholders, or the borrowers, or the employees of the banks? That is the issue. I think we should know exactly what we are facing, and that is all it is, because as the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. Abbott) said the other night, you cannot get something for nothing. I do not believe we should do that, not for one moment. I think there is no sense in that tax. I think it is unscientific, illogical, unjust and a bad tax. I think our present system of taxation has much more regard for ability to pay than that kind of taxation would have.

I do not know that there is very much more I have to say. A great many things have been said in this debate which ought to be replied to if one were doing a complete job, and which ought to be replied to sooner or later, but I have not the time in the forty minutes which are allotted to me.

In my opening speech—and I mentioned it this afternoon at the time the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hlynka) was speaking—I quoted two professors of economics in the United States about the years of prosperity and the years of depression in Canada, and that has been mentioned several times. But as I explained this afternoon the impression given by what I said is probably not the impression that should have been given because these professors divided the business cycle into four phases: depression years, revival years, prosperity years and recession years, and in the figures I used they were only comparing the years of high prosperity, coming toward the peak of the boom, with the years of depression. The period covered was not recent. It was from 1888 to 1924. Between 1921 and 1936 twenty-three central banks were established in twenty-three countries of the world. It is only recently that central banks have been established in practically all countries or that central banks have developed a technique to help control swings from prosperity to depression. It would be folly to deny that there are business cycles, that business is better at times than at some other times, and that certainly would be true under a socialist dispensation. Anybody who thinks that by changing the ownership and operation of industry from private to government hands you are going to do away with business cycles or that times are not going to be better sometimes than at other times is very much mistaken.

I am sure I have forgotten some of the things I should have said, but my time has expired and I am therefore concluding the debate on this motion. I am sure that in the banking and commerce committee we shall have a discussion which will be vigorous at least, if not enlightening, and probably it will be enlightening as well. I really think the legislation we are proposing this session is the legislation best suited to conditions as they exist at the present time and to the decade which lies ahead.

Motion agreed to, on division, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

On motion of Mr. Ralston the house adjourned at 11.20 p.m.

Friday, May 12, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

MR. COLDWELL—PRESS REPORT AS TO MEMBERS' ACCOUNTS WITH KING'S PRINTER

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, before the business of the house proceeds I wish to raise a question which affects not only my own privileges but the privileges of the members of this house. Appearing in the Ottawa Journal of last evening was a statement of alleged non-payment of account by me to the king's printer. It was not only published in the local press but went all across the country over the C.B.C. last night. I think other members are in the same position as myself. I was alleged to be in arrears to the amount of $6.25 as of March 31, 1943. May I say that that account was incurred, $3.25 on March 6, 1943 and $3 on March 19, 1943; therefore I was in arrears to the amount of $6.25 as of March 31, 1943. That was unpaid on May 15, but, together with some other small accounts, was paid by cheque in full on July 12, during the session of last year. The impression that has been given to the country is that a large number of members of this house are in debt to the king's printer. I know that some others are in the same position as myself. We owe nothing to the king's printer. We keep our accounts paid regularly as the bills are rendered, and I think, Mr. Speaker, in fairness to the members of the house, the Ottawa Journal, which published the story, and the broadcasting corporation, should make a correction of the wrong impression which was left on the public mind.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to be permitted to clear before the house and the country the name of a very prominent Canadian, who is not in the house at the moment, from any unjustifiable impression that may have been created in the public mind as a result of the reports to which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has referred. I have this telegram from the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, former Prime Minister of Canada:

> Am informed government officials have published statement representing me as owing printing bureau some $171 since 1925. Have never known or heard of this alleged debt until to-day. My secretaries then and since say they similarly had no knowledge of any such claim. All printing ordered by me or on my authority or with my knowledge was paid for. Numerous accounts have been rendered me since by bureau and paid with no claim made for past balance. Under these circumstances consider it an outrage that my name should be blazoned through Canada as a defaulting debtor. Please read this telegram to the House of Commons.
> Arthur Meighen

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, politics makes strange bedfellows. I have not read the Journal of last night; I very seldom read the papers, but when I came up to the house I met charitable friends who were ready to organize a subscription for an amount of $85 that I have allegedly owed to the king's printer since 1925, 1926 or 1927—a long time ago. Well, I am ready to pay all the debts that I owe, but the taxes are so high that we must proceed gradually. Besides that, Mr. Speaker, it takes a virgin soul to be scandalized at such trifling matters. Of course when a man owes some money he has to pay it, as much as he can, but when there is nothing, the king loses all rights. I will tell you one thing, sir, so long as speeches made in the house are broadcast throughout the country through the printing bureau, what is the harm in that?—because the press does not mention them. If the press fulfilled its duty of reporting speeches of members of parliament there would be no accounts standing at the king's printing bureau. It scandalizes me the more because speeches made by cabinet ministers, even by the former leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), and, I think, by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) especially those made on the plebiscite, have been published at the country's expense. I do not see why speeches made by cabinet ministers should be paid for by the country while hon. members are bled white to pay for a small number of copies of their speeches to inform their constituents of the work they have been doing here.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: I have just a word to say, Mr. Speaker, if you will permit me to conclude. It is that we should not view this matter from the point of view of the Pharisee; we must consider it from the point of view of the Publican, the man who sits behind in church and is doing the best he can to worship. What I regret about the publication is that it is aimed to discredit members of parliament, to show they are not fulfilling their duty to the state, and I join the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar in protesting very strongly. If there is something which can be aimed against members of parliament, these people are all ready to take advantage of it.

Mr. W. G. WEIR (Macdonald): I have not been asked to do this, but in the same connection may I say on behalf of the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. McCubbin), who is in the same predicament regarding this publication, that he has advised us and showed us that he had already a receipt for the amount of money alleged to be owing by him to the king's printer.

Mr. GRAYDON: Better revise this list.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Perhaps I should state in the interests of fairness that there is one small difference between the report as published in the press and over the radio. The report which appeared in the press gave the names of some who owed accounts; in the report which came over the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation at ten o'clock last night the fact was stated but no names were mentioned.

An hon. MEMBER: "Party leaders".

Mr. HANSELL: It said "party leaders", but it did not give their names. The reason I owe a little account to the king's printer is that I am a poor man. I have been trying to keep the wolf from the door, and now I have to try to keep the collector from the door.

MR. HANSELL—PROCEEDINGS OF RADIO RROADCASTING COMMITTEE

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege with regard to a news dispatch which appeared in to-day's papers. The matter is related to a discussion which took place the other day in the parliamentary committee on radio broadcasting, and I claim that the dispatch constitutes a charge against my sincerity and integrity as a member of this house. I will not take time to read the whole article. It is entitled, "Protests Remarks by Mr. Hansell."

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I gather from what the hon. member has said that he is taking exception to something which was said about him while in a parliamentary committee. If that is so, I rather think his protest should be made in the parliamentary committee, because it is not before the house.

Mr. HANSELL: Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of privilege affecting not only myself but every member of parliament. It seems to me I am not divulging anything or criticizing anything which went on in the parliamentary committee. I am only rising to a point of privilege because of attacks upon my—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member should first bring the matter before the parliamentary committee. If it appears that some reference should be made to it in the house, they can so direct, but in the meantime the hon. member's first step should be to bring it before the parliamentary committee.

[Later.]

Mr. HANSELL: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order, upon which I would ask your ruling. A moment or two ago I rose on a matter of privilege, I should like to refer Your Honour to standing order 16, at page 45 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, from which I quote one sentence:

> Whenever any matter of privilege arises it shall be taken into consideration immediately.

In note 156 at page 48 I read:

> The house will proceed with the utmost severity against persons who tamper with witnesses, in respect of evidence to be given to the house, or any committee thereof; who endeavour to deter or hinder persons from appearing or giving evidence, and who give false evidence before the house or any committee thereof.

I call your attention, sir, to that notation because the matter of privilege which I wished to discuss was a reflection by the press this morning upon myself with regard to my attempt to bring before the parliamentary committee a matter which I considered important. I cannot rise to a question of privilege immediately, Mr. Speaker, if I have to wait until Wednesday next. I do not wish to discuss the matter of the broadcasting committee. I simply wish to rise to a question of privilege with regard to something directed to me personally.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has quoted a standing order to the effect that a question of privilege must be taken into consideration immediately. The question to which he is speaking is something which was stated in connection with the proceedings of a committee. The first opportunity which the hon. gentleman has to bring the matter before the committee should be taken advantage of, and if the committee decide that something should be done, and report accordingly to the house, then the house can deal with it. But my ruling already given must stand.

[Later:]

Mr. HANSELL: I rise to a point of order, and ask for your interpretation, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Do I understand the hon. member is referring to the ruling I made?

Mr. HANSELL: No, not particularly. I should like to ask for a ruling on another matter that affects the public accounts committee. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) rose on a question of privilege with regard to a number of accounts that were before the public accounts committee. I should like to ask if an hon. member may rise on a question of privilege on a matter that is before the public accounts committee but may not rise on a question of privilege on a matter that is before the radio broadcasting committee?

Mr. SPEAKER: Whatever may have happened the facts as set out by the hon. member are these. A statement was made by him in a committee of which he is a member. An article has been published reflecting upon the hon. member. I have ruled that the house cannot deal with a matter that should first come before that committee. If the hon. member will look at Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, second edition, paragraph 665, he will see that that paragraph reads as follows:

> Until the report and evidence have been laid upon the table, it is irregular to refer to them in debate, or to put questions in reference to the proceedings of the committee.

At the moment the house has no knowledge of what has happened in the committee, and therefore the hon. member is not in order in rising on a question of privilege on a matter that should be brought before the committee.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Was it made clear to Your Honour that the hon. member for Macleod referred to a press statement?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Was it made clear that the hon. member was referring to a press statement?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I have ruled.

MR. HOWE—LETTER FROM LORD BEAVERBROOK READ IN THE HOUSE ON MAY 11

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege on another subject. Yesterday, as reported in Hansard, page 2807, the leader of the opposition asked this question:

> I should like the minister to state whether what he read is the letter in full.

I answered "It is." The answer should have been, "It is, with the exception of one sentence." This came to my attention when I was revising my remarks. I read the statement, and in reading it I omitted a sentence which had no relation to the subject matter we were discussing and which I thought, in a hurried reading, might prejudice further negotiations if it were made public. Your Honour will recall that I was reading a private letter at the insistence of the leader of the opposition. After the debate I handed the letter in full to the Hansard reporter. It quite escaped my mind that in reading it I had left out that sentence. The sentence was typed into the Hansard record, and, apparently by the Hansard reporter, was checked with my verbal statement and the sentence was deleted. When the record came to me, I checked back, again read the subject matter of the sentence. It seemed to me that the deletion should stand, on the ground that it was not in the public interest to place before parliament that particular sentence.

POST-WAR CIVIL AVIATION

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT BY LORD BEAVERBROOK IN RESPECT TO CANADIAN DRAFT CONVENTION

On the order for motions:

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Mr. Speaker, I now have the full text of Lord Beaverbrook's statement in the House of Lords, made on Wednesday, and as it differs slightly from the agreed statement which I read to the house yesterday, perhaps I should place this version on Hansard. It is sent from the High Commissioner for Canada in London to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and is as follows:

> The United States proposed that we should go forward to an international conference on certain lines and I will quote those lines. They were that there should be an international authority to lay down standards for technical requirements and for rates of air carriage and to interchange information. According to the American plan the proposed authority would start on a non-executive basis with no power or means of enforcing its regulations, at least during an interim period. I hope I have made quite clear the position taken up by the United States of America. It proposed an international authority on a non-executive basis with no power or means of enforcing its regulations at least during the interim period. The United Kingdom delegation presented for consideration what is known as the Canadian draft convention, which has been laid on the table of the Canadian parliament. This draft convention lays down a detailed plan for international regulatory authority with powers of enforcement. Its provisions include the allocation of frequencies of air service and national quotas for international air traffic. I hope I have made clear the distinction between the two proposals. The Canadian proposal was considered by the Americans to be too rigid as a basis for talks at the proposed international conference. After discussion it was agreed, therefore, that we should go forward to the conference on the basis of proposals for international handling of civil aviation agreed at the commonwealth conversations some six months ago. These proposals are in some respects open to varying interpretations and were considered by the Americans to be flexible enough to provide a more satisfactory basis for an international conference. The broad purpose would be to draw up an international convention on air navigation to be implemented by an international transport organization which would evolve standards, seek to eliminate uneconomic competition, work out for each nation an equitable participation in world air transport and maintain broad equilibrium between air transport capacity and traffic on offer. On these general principles the United States and Great Britain are in agreement. The powers of enforcement of the provisions will be open to further discussion. There you have the progress towards international co-operation in civil aviation. I repeat the principles, the elimination of uneconomic competition, the setting up of national quotas in international air transport, equilibrium between the transport capacity and the traffic offering on any international air route. These must be the foundations of an enlightened approach to this subject in the future. But make no mistake; we did not give up the Canadian draft convention without reluctance. We would have preferred it. Mr. Howe, the Canadian minister, has produced an admirable document building up his structure for the regulating authority on the principles agreed at the commonwealth conversations.

It is signed by the high commissioner.

Mr. POULIOT: Nevertheless, I was in agreement for once with Beaverbrook on that.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: May I ask a question of the minister arising out of the statement he has made to-day? In the statement of His Lordship there is a reference to the commonwealth proposal which apparently was different, in extent and in purport, from the Canadian convention. In view of the fact that His Lordship referred to that proposal, I would ask the minister whether or not, under that proposal, Great Britain and the other dominions were in favour of an all-empire route.

Mr. HOWE: I have already stated that I am not in a position to discuss the conversations that took place in London. I have already stated that no agreement was finalized and that the purpose of the conversations was not to finalize an agreement but to clarify the viewpoint of those attending the conference.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the minister one question on that point? I was not very clear, in connection with the statement by Lord Beaverbrook, as to what the difference was between the Canadian convention and what is referred to here in the words, "instead, we adopted the commonwealth report". What is the difference between the Canadian convention and the commonwealth report?

Mr. HOWE: The commonwealth report was a draft prepared by a subcommittee during the conversations, for consideration by the assembly. It was a very brief document. As I stated previously, the Canadian convention was founded on that report, but expanded to form what we considered to be a rounded document on the subject.

WHEAT

MAILING OF PRODUCERS' CHEQUES FOR 1940-41 PARTICIPATION CERTIFICATES

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce that the Canadian wheat board is commencing the mailing out of cheques to producers in payment of their 1940-41 participation certificates to-day.

As soon as the mailing of the cheques can be completed on the 1940-41 participation payments, the cheques will be mailed in turn to cover the 1941-42 and 1942-43 payments.

The per bushel payments by grades on the 1940-41 certificates have been fixed at 6·215 cents for No. 1 northern and range all the way from 6·166 cents for No. 2 northern to 20·599 cents for feed wheat and to 26·640 cents for No. 1 mixed grain. The initial advance on this last grade was only 35 cents, basis in store Fort William, Port Arthur.

In general, the rates of payment are higher on the lower grades, owing to the fact that the board was able to realize more on the ultimate sales over the initial advances made on those grades than was realized over the initial advances on the higher grades.

I have in my possession a statement showing the per bushel payments for each of the 1940-41 grades. As this statement is rather lengthy, I do not wish to place it on Hansard, but I have a number of copies available for any of the hon. members interested, and copies are being sent to the press gallery.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Are these cheques being mailed to all three prairie provinces?

Mr. COLDWELL: Or just Saskatchewan?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The cheques are going out in regular order.

Mr. PERLEY: To all the provinces?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): To all the provinces.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is it a coincidence that they are going out about the time we are having the Saskatchewan election?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Just a coincidence.

Mr. PERLEY: Now that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has made a statement which, I suppose, a number of farmers in western Canada will be pleased to hear, to the effect that payment is to be made on participation certificates, and having in mind that the case that was brought against the wheat board was argued before the appeal court of Manitoba on Tuesday last, will the minister tell the house the result of that argument?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I have not heard that the case was argued.

Mr. PERLEY: Will the minister give us a report on the item to-morrow?

AIDS TO HEARING

AVAILABILITY TO WAR VETERANS AND THE GENERAL PUBLIC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. K. ESLING (Kootenay West): May I ask the Minister of Pensions and National Health what steps have been taken to provide hearing aids for veterans who are pensionable for deafness or impaired hearing? May I also ask the hon. gentleman, as minister of national health, whether any arrangements are under way to bring low cost hearing aids within the financial range of handicapped persons in Canada.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): I would tell my hon. friend that arrangements have been completed whereby the department will provide, under appropriate medical supervision, a thoroughly modern and approved hearing aid to discharged members of the forces whose hearing has been affected by war service. A number have already been issued.

An offer has been received from Commander E. F. McDonald, president of the Zenith Radio Corporation, to provide the department with its newly developed radionic hearing device on the same basis as it has been offered to the United States government for members of their armed forces.

I am informed also that this device will be made available to the general public of Canada at the same retail price in Canadian currency as prevails in American currency within the United States. We are deeply appreciative of the generous offer which Commander McDonald has made both to the Canadian forces and the Canadian public at large. Commander McDonald, who is a retired officer of the United States Navy, is well and favourably known in Canada.

May I add that we are also grateful to my good friend, the hon. member for West Kootenay, for his valuable services in this connection.

ALASKA HIGHWAY

OPENING BY UNITED STATES MILITARY AUTHORITIES OF OFFICE IN VANCOUVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): This morning I sent to the office of the Minister of Labour three questions which I intended to ask him; but I see that neither he nor his parliamentary assistant is present. As the matter is an important one perhaps some other member of the government could give me an answer to them. Is it a fact that United States military authorities in charge of the Alaska highway have opened an office in Vancouver, British Columbia, to interview workers to be sent to them by national selective service at Vancouver for work on the Alaska highway? Is it a fact that the Americans are trying to hire at Vancouver 1,200 men for maintenance work on the highway and 300 men for maintenance work on the oil pipeline from Norman Wells to Whitehorse, Yukon? Is it a fact that on February 22 of this year national selective service at Vancouver had 7,200 jobs awaiting men and that on May 1 they had 12,300 jobs awaiting men—all apart from the American attempt to hire 1,500?

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): The questions asked by the hon. member were handed to me just as I was coming to the house. Unfortunately I have not had time to obtain the necessary information. The nature of the questions indicates that it will take a little time to obtain the information. I wonder if the hon. member could let his questions stand as a notice until Monday and I shall see that an answer is given at that time.

RADIO BROADCASTING

ANNOUNCEMENT THURSDAY MORNING AS TO PRIME MINISTER'S SPEECH IN LONDON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. J. O'NEILL (Kamloops): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National War Services. Yesterday morning the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation carried an announcement that an announcement of great importance would be made at 8.55. The secrecy surrounding that announcement by the radio was very disturbing to a lot of people and, may I say, caused some inconvenience. Why did the radio announcement of yesterday morning not specifically state that the Prime Minister of Canada would be on the air speaking from the houses of parliament in London?

Mr. ROWE: He wanted to get a big audience.

Hon. L. R. LaFLECHE (Minister of National War Services): The hon. member for Kamloops was kind enough to inform me in advance that he intended to ask this question. He refers to an historic and most important speech made before the assembled members of the House of Lords and the House of Commons in London yesterday, when the Prime Minister of Great Britain went to very great length to explain what a magnificent war effort Canada had made. He also explained that the Canadian Prime Minister is one of the great war leaders of this war and indispensable to the successful waging of war against our enemies.

Mr. ROWE: You are going to have it all over again now.

Mr. GRAYDON: I thought the leader of the government said yesterday that this was not to go on Hansard.

Mr. LaFLECHE: My hon. friend has asked why more details were not given in advance. May I say that the whole announcement was made at the request of the British Broadcasting Corporation. Negotiations and discussions as to exactly how it should be done went on until the middle of Wednesday evening. At the specific and repeated request of the British Broadcasting Corporation the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation did not, because it could not, say who would be the speaker, for the very simple reason that had the enemy known that the houses of parliament at Westminster were meeting together and that the great war leaders and notable figures were present they might have attempted a bombing expedition against that house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. GRAYDON: I suppose one answer is as good as another.

Mr. TAYLOR: That is a good one.

Mr. ROWE: The public will welcome that.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

DOMINION ARSENALS LIMITED—BRIEF OF UNITED ELECTRICAL RADIO AND MACHINE WORKERS OF AMERICA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply. Has a brief sent to all members of parliament by the United Electrical Radio and Machine Workers of America on behalf of the employees of Dominion Arsenals Limited of Lindsay, Ontario, protesting against their difficulties, come to the minister's attention, and if so, does he care to make a statement?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I have no knowledge of that communication.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Friday, May 5, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. McCann in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL WAR SERVICES

Censorship—
Administration	$ 18,345
Information and records branch	171,900
Postal censorship	1,515,260
Censorship of publications	135,355
Telegraph and cable, etc., censorship	337,040
	$2,177,900

Mr. POULIOT: I have just a few words to say about censorship. In the first place, we asked for a copy of the censorship regulations but it was never tabled. There are, of course, the defence regulations that must be observed by the press, as by any individual; they are for the protection of the country in time of war, as is censorship itself. Lord Macmillan, who was the first British censor, held the view that the news which should be withheld from the public was that which would be detrimental to the war effort, not at all that which was in criticism of the government. It is a great mistake for legitimate criticism to be considered a personal insult by any minister; it shows how far away we are from true democratic principles. The idea of having all heads shaped in the same mould is absolutely totalitarian; for only by constructive criticism can we improve the standard, quality and efficiency of the war effort.

Having said that much, I protest most strongly against the actions of the so-called liaison officers of all departments who prevent the press from publishing news which is of value as well as interest to the Canadian people. I remember that at the beginning of the war the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was crazy enough to carry an address which was delivered by Adolf Hitler in Germany. That was most stupid; it was German propaganda carried by the C.B.C., one agency of government, and passed by the board of censors, another agency of government. Against that sort of propaganda I protest most strongly. There is an old Latin axiom which is well known; it is "errare humanum est"—to err is human. As long as it is the business of the censors to prevent information from reaching the public, in order to create a sanctimonious atmosphere in which our infallible men may sit on the treasury benches, we have no democracy in this country. Emile Fague, a French academician, wrote a treatise on friendship in which he said that two friends may differ at times in order that they may realize that they are two. I am an old timer; I am for public discussion. I admit the right of any hon. member to disagree with me, but on the other hand members of parliament as one should condemn most strongly the propaganda which makes members of the cabinet above criticism. It is to their own benefit that they should be criticized; but to my great surprise I see evidence of scissors having been used in the reports of the Canadian Press and British United Press. The newspapers attach little importance to what is said here in parliament, though they devote full pages to reports of the debates and discussion in provincial legislatures. Take any newspaper published in Ontario or Quebec, or any other province. Its pages are full of what has been said in the provincial house, but sometimes there is just a word about what has been said here in Ottawa. And what is broadcast to the Canadian people? The C.B.C. broadcasts matters of little interest, but when it comes to vital questions the people of Canada are not informed. The private stations are doing a much better job of informing the Canadian people than is the C.B.C. I wonder if it is not the censors who prevent the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation from informing the public about national issues. The people of Canada are anxious to get true information. They want an exact summary of what is being said and done in parliament. That is their right, and one which nobody can deny. At times small news items are given, but when it comes to the most vital questions the people are not informed at all.

For instance, this afternoon the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) spoke with respect to the draft of the international air convention, to which Lord Beaverbrook has given a cold shoulder. If the press had been fair it would have said that in order to save humiliation for the minister two private members rose in the house, the hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. Roy) and myself, to protest against the convention. Other hon. members, too, expressed views that should have been noted. It was precisely to save the Minister of Munitions and Supply the humiliation of a rebuff from Beaverbrook that we took that stand. But the press did not mention it.

Then, the other day the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) moved to secure information with respect to Claire Wallace. Unquestionably that was his right, but it was most strange to find him exercising it, because he belongs to a party, the national chairman of which has decided that Claire Wallace should be paid $200 a week. I cannot conceive how it is that a gentleman whose party will be directed in the next election by the former Justice McTague, the man who gave that order—

Mr. GRAYDON: Are my hon. friend's facts right?

Mr. POULIOT: Here it is, under date of February 17, 1944. I was not going to read this, but to satisfy the mind of the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), the leader of the opposition, I shall read this order issued by the national war labour board, at the time when Mr. Justice McTague was chairman of the board. And it will be noted that this gentleman is now national chairman of the Progressive Conservative party. These are the reasons for the decision:

Re Advertising Agencies of Canada and Mrs. Claire Wallace Stutt.

This part of my remarks is dedicated particularly to the hon. member for Souris. And, by the way, I did not know she was Mrs. Stutt. The reasons continue:

This is an appeal from a decision of the Ontario Regional War Labour Board refusing to authorize an increase in remuneration for Mrs. Claire Wallace Stutt (Claire Wallace) from $170 weekly to $200 weekly.

As we view the matter, the sole question to be determined is the status of Claire Wallace. Is she an employee within the meaning of the wages order, or a salaried official within the meaning of the salaries order, or is she within the class of those persons whose emoluments are not under control at all? In other words, has she similar status to the doctor or the lawyer, and is she subject to the same lack of restriction in so far as war-time controls are concerned?

This is written in judicial language.

Two of the members of this board are quite familiar with her radio programme and her personality—

Ho! ho!

—as reflected over the ethereal waves, and we both approve.

"Personality as reflected over the ethereal waves"!

The other member is prepared to accept our estimation. So much for the principle of solidarity.

Ho! ho!

Having established that background we are all of the opinion that she is an artist, and a very fine artist indeed. As we understand the situation, she enjoys with the national war finance committee a retainer for her services which does not exclude her—

Mark this, Mr. Chairman; you will be interested in this.

—from accepting a similar retainer or retainers with others.

She can get money from everybody.

Her position is rather analogous to that of the lawyer who is free to engage himself in the service of various clients, even though he may for a certain period be engaged in the service of one. Perhaps she could be more closely likened to the portrait painter who can hardly be said to be an employee of the person whose portrait he paints.

McTague has lots of imagination.

Mr. GRAYDON: He has got a lot on the ball.

Mr. POULIOT: It continues:

That being the case, we regret that under our reference we have no control over her destinies—

Ho! ho!

Mr. GRAYDON: Is the "ho! ho!" in the order?

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. POULIOT: I am reading the order by McTague.

And since it falls to our lot to decide whether the salaries board has any control we are unanimous in deciding that if we had any control we certainly would not relinquish it to any other board.

It is a matter of regret to us that we have no jurisdiction whatever over the lady.

Imagine that!

Mr. GRAYDON: That is what I thought the order was, and that is why I asked about it.

Mr. POULIOT: It continues:

If we had, it is likely we would stretch a point or even two in her favour. We can only deal with her case by way of appeal without her personal appearance, a rather unsatisfactory process. However, she should not be left to the whim or caprice of the Ontario regional board without some support.

The support of the national chairman of the Progressive Conservative party.

Mr. GRAYDON: He was working for this government, then.

Mr. POULIOT: I know. But I mention it, and the press should have mentioned how ridiculous it was for a member of the Progressive Conservative party to ask a question as to what has been done by the national chairman of his party.

Accordingly, much as we dislike having no control of her financial destinies, we must conclude that she belongs to the uncontrolled and legally uncontrollable section of the community, not, however, overlooked nor forgotten by the income tax department. Accordingly, in our opinion, if the national war finance committee feels that she is worth $200 a week instead of $170 a week, that is a matter for them to decide; and as far as we are concerned they can make the increased payment retroactive to the extent that they feel the public conscience will tolerate. The appeal is allowed.

And this is dated at Ottawa, Canada, February 17, 1944. In the corner of the notation "R.D. 121."

Mr. GRAYDON: Chairman McTague did not recommend or did not order that her salary be increased from $170 to $200 a week at all.

Mr. POULIOT: The national war finance committee did not give the increase, but it was allowed by the national war labour board.

Mr. GRAYDON: No, it was not. I very seldom find my hon. friend offering anything inaccurate, and I know that in this instance it is only a matter of inadvertence; but when he said that chairman McTague, the former chairman of the national war labour board, had ordered that the salary of Claire Wallace should be raised from $170 to $200 a week, I thought he was obviously in error. My information is that this matter was dumped on the doorstep of the national war labour board, and they refused to do anything with it. Now it is back on the doorstep of the national war finance committee.

Mr. POULIOT: Well, Mr. Chairman, anyone who will read Hansard must decide between the leader of the opposition and myself on this issue. The report is there, and anybody may read it. No one will deny that Judge McTague was chairman of the national war labour board when that order was issued. If that had been pointed out by the press at the time, this contentious issue would have been left aside.

That is only one thing. But the matter is more important than one would imagine at first sight, and I leave aside Judge McTague and Claire Wallace. What I find wrong is that when anybody disagrees with the government on a certain point he is considered unpatriotic, and is said to be unpatriotic by the press and even by the members of parliament. This is contrary to the democratic idea, contrary to democratic traditions and to British institutions as they are observed at Westminster. If we were all to agree with the policies of the government, both on major and minor points, what would be the use of calling parliament together, inviting the members here, only to be told what has been decided? The only thing they would then have to do would be to nod agreement. But such an atmosphere of sanctity has been created that it is considered sacrilegious if not blasphemous to express one's personal views. Any member who expresses personal views that are not entirely in accordance with the policy that has been made underground by the intelligentsia of bureaucracy is exposed to be denounced as a traitor and as a man who is unwilling to cooperate in the war effort and the prosecution of the war.

I know that some agents of several war departments are going to the press and threatening the press if they publish certain news which is accurate and which is in the public interest to be known; or, on the other hand, they try the method of inducement, by promises, so that the press shall not convey to the public a true picture of what happens in the House of Commons. I do not mention the Senate; there is an official reporter for the Senate and their debates are on a level that is different from that of the House of Commons, because the Senators are not in touch with the under-dog, with the man on the street, with the people who have no right to say publicly what and how much they suffer.

Therefore, sir, in conclusion I will ask the minister to see to it that the newspapers are not forbidden to publish or prevented from publishing anything that it is in accordance with the defence of Canada regulations to publish. I know that there are no censorship orders—I mean orders in the sense of regulations—but instructions are given, and instructions that are all wrong and which put the Canadian people under the impression that if they speak out their minds as good citizens who are loyal to the crown and are behind a total war effort they are bad citizens, traitors, because they disagree with some features of the general policy of the government.

In this connection I will mention what has been said in the United States by a great Liberal, by a man who is outside of politics. I refer to Mr. Archibald MacLeish, who is the librarian of Congress of the United States. He made a speech which was reported in P.M. in March last, and he concluded with these words:

> We have before us, if we will raise our heads and look before us, the one great cause which justifies and ennobles everything we have ever said and thought. We have greater right to believe in ourselves and in the victory of the things we fight for now than we have ever had before in our lifetime. If we will believe, if we will act on our belief, nothing, no organization of reaction and ignorance, no political stultification, no power whatever of selfishness and cowardice and doubt, can stand against us.
> To accept the inevitability of reaction at this point in the history of our world and of our cause—to accept and to submit to the swing of the pendulum—to bow our heads to the wind that blows the candles out—to surrender in advance of the attack—is not faint-heartedness alone, but folly.
> What is required of us now is confidence in ourselves and our purpose. Unless we can find the courage of unshakable determination—we and people like us throughout this country and the world—this war will not be won. If we can find it, if we can renew it, there is nothing we can fail to do. Because the hope of every living heart is with us.

Mr. GILLIS: Under the heading of censorship there is one matter I wish to bring to the attention of the minister. It arises out of a Canadian Press dispatch from Sydney Mines, Nova Scotia, dated May 9, which appears in the Ottawa Journal of Wednesday of this week. I have heard a lot of discussion under the minister's estimates as to the maintenance and promotion of national unity, but this type of advertising which I am going to read for the minister's benefit is a type of advertising from which the province of Nova Scotia, and particularly the mining sections, have suffered for the past fifty years. It certainly does nothing to promote national unity. This Canadian Press dispatch reads as follows:

> Their pockets bulging with lump-sum wage increases, coal miners of Sydney Mines and nearby Florence have been on a $160,000 buying spree since the weekend, and neither of the two collieries in the towns has worked since Friday.
>
> Christmas business paled beside this rush to the store counters, merchants reported, as their cash registers tinkled merrily. Saturday night's volume of business was the biggest in years.
>
> Liquor stores did a brisk business Monday, and there were reports that as high as thirty-six dollars was paid bootleggers for a dozen quarts of beer.
>
> The celebration was expected to end to-night, with the miners resuming regular operations to-morrow.
> About fifteen hundred miners shared in the windfall, which came through retroactive pay increases going back to November 1, 1943, under an order of the national war labour board.

Knowing the situation as it exists, I think the Canadian Press dispatch should have been thrown into the wastebasket somewhere in central Canada, because it does not tell the true story. It is distorted, misleading, and deliberate propaganda to prejudice the rest of Canada against the coal miners in that end of the country, and miners generally. The Canadian Press representative who wrote that dispatch has done a disservice to that part of the country and has thrown mud in the eyes of the Canadian people. The statement, made in glaring headlines, that the miners' pockets are bulging with money is deliberate propaganda. If anyone stopped to think about the matter he would realize that. Fifteen hundred miners participated in that retroactive payment of $160,000. That works out at exactly $107 per man. The majority of these men are married. For two years the Nova Scotia miners of this particular group carried on negotiations through their executive board with the war labour board, while their contract was in abeyance; for two years they negotiated for that increase of wages, which was granted in December, 1943, and from then to date they have waited for payment; and I am safe in saying that ninety-five per cent of the money which was received on this account was owed by the miners and earmarked for payment of their debts before they received it.

A little further in the story the writer says that the mines were idle. Reading that statement, the reader who does not know the situation is led to believe that from Friday until Monday every one of those fifteen hundred miners, their families and friends, were around making whoopee and there was no coal being produced. That is not the situation at all. For many years the coal mines of Nova Scotia have not been worked on Saturday. The five-day week was in operation. Not very much coal has been produced on Saturdays since the outbreak of the war, as the end of the week is generally a clean-up time. Friday night is practically the end of the coal-producing week. Saturday is the only day when the miners have a chance to clean up properly and enjoy perhaps a few hours' sunshine. We must remember that these people live half of their lives underground. And Saturday is not the same as it is in this province. There are no beer parlours in Nova Scotia; there is no place in town where one can go and sit down and buy a glass of beer. Intoxicants are sold only by the government liquor store, and on Saturday, the only day when the miner has a chance to get a bottle of beer, the liquor stores are not open. One can get a fairly good idea of how much of this money went into liquor when it is realized that there is nowhere to purchase it. The stores are closed when the men get home in the evenings, and—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Are there no bootleggers there?

Mr. GILLIS: That is the point I am coming to. On Saturday, the day they are home, the store is closed. I am not as bad-minded as the ex-leader of the opposition. Whether the government of the province enacted their liquor laws in the interests of the bootlegger is something I am not prepared to say.

I want to make this matter clear to hon. members, because there is too much of this kind of propaganda. Inquire of the Department of National War Services, and you will find that in the matter of voluntary enlistments no section of Canada surpasses the coal mining districts of Nova Scotia. At the present time these men are frozen to their jobs. If you were looking for voluntary enlistments in that end of the country you could fill your quota in twenty-four hours and close your offices the next day. As regards victory loans, within two or three days the quota for the coal mining districts of Nova Scotia is subscribed one hundred per cent. Never up to date have they gone under; they have always gone over their quota, and they have got it quickly. They have a systematic organization; they know the job has to be done, and the job is done. As I have said, their war record is not surpassed in any other part of this country.

If the man who wrote that Canadian Press dispatch is in Sydney, he knows the facts as well as I do. That is why I am objecting so strongly to this story emanating from that section of the country. You may have ninety-eight per cent of your working force in a coal mine report for duty in the morning, ready to mine coal, but there is a classification of boys who work on the haulages, who grab that coal to the rope, and who represent perhaps less than one-half of one per cent of the employees; but if half a dozen of them are off they cannot be replaced, and the result is that the mine is tied up. If a very few drivers who handle the coal by horses underground are absent from work, the mine cannot operate. The writer of the dispatch would lead one to believe that all the men in the colliery during the one day it was idle were on a drunken spree, forgetting their obligations to the country. The fact is that half a dozen boys who are in good positions, who have special training for a dangerous type of work, and who are the only ones permitted to handle it, can tie up the mine if they are off work. That is exactly what happened.

The writer of that press dispatch deliberately designed it, in my opinion, to create a wrong impression of the miners to the general public with respect to that particular class of people. If anything can cause dissatisfaction or indifference to the war effort in that particular section of the country, it is this kind of advertising, which is designed for the wrong purposes and certainly does not promote national unity. I bring it to the attention of the Minister of National War Services because I think he should check with the Canadian Press, and if there is any necessity for censorship I think it is indicated in the item I have read. The Canadian Press should be checked, and only items which tend to pomote national unity and the war effort and the country's interest in general should be printed in the newspapers across Canada.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I do not know whether the hon. member for Cape Breton South was aware at the time he was speaking that the subject had no relation whatever to censorship. He did nevertheless express opinions about newspaper reporters, and also he gave us food for thought in his remarks about people who work very hard, who are extremely patriotic and are admired by the whole of Canada. Speaking for a moment on the same subject, I think all of us are extremely sympathetic to the man who works hard year after year and then, through some fortunate circumstance, has a few extra dollars in his pocket. I can only say I wish I had been there to see the joy on their faces, men, women and children, because I believe it is good for human beings to have some legitimate and joyous moments in their lives, particularly when they are hard working. I think everyone in this house feels exactly the same way about it. But I must confess that censorship can do nothing about that matter.

In reply to the two hon. gentlemen who have spoken, neither has spoken regarding matters in which censorship may intervene. Censorship exists because a war exists and it is practised by every nation engaged in this war. Unless there were censorship we could not carry on the war. It is essential in warfare. On this occasion, at the beginning of what is believed by all to be the most serious stage of the war, may I remind the house that at no other time is censorship as careful as it is at the present moment. But censorship may operate only in matters affecting the national security, the lives of our young men and women who are fighting for us overseas and for the security of Canada and the allied nations.

Mr. GILLIS: In this item there is an expenditure for censorship and publications of $135,000. It is the prerogative of the minister's department, I understand, to scrutinize and check all publications in Canada and to suppress them if necessary if they are detrimental to the best interests of the country's war effort.

Mr. LaFLECHE: If they contravene the provisions of the defence of Canada regulations.

Mr. GILLIS: That is right.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I submit to my hon. friend that the article that he read would not, even by the greatest stretch of the imagination, be a matter of legitimate interest or action on the part of censorship.

Mr. GILLIS: With this exception. The minister also passed an item, and there was quite a long discussion on it, in connection with the promotion of national unity in Canada, bringing people together, having a better understanding, and so on. I agree with it all and while I am not asking the minister to censor the press I think there should be an understanding with them that reports from one part of Canada to the other by wire should at least be accurate before they are picked up by the general press across Canada and a lot of damage done that cannot be undone. Many times in the past I have sat in my home in Nova Scotia and read this kind of stuff. I know what it made me feel like. I had no opportunity of correcting it. There was no way I could make my side of the story known, and I know exactly how 99 per cent of the men in that section will feel when that is read back to them from the press of Nova Scotia, who also will pick it up and not only pick it up but play it up, as to the injustice done that section of the country by the Canadian press. It definitely promotes disunity at a time when unity is absolutely essential.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not supposing that the member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) suggests that propaganda in Canada, no matter how violent it may be, if unrelated directly to the war effort, should be suppressed by the censor. The situation is bad enough as it is, but propaganda will emanate from certain sources and there is counter-propaganda. I am not defending for a moment what was in that dispatch. Probably it was grossly exaggerated, but I would say that if we are to have censorship of news items of that kind, which may or not be exaggerated, there will be a revolution in this country. There will be no longer a free press in the country.

Mr. GILLIS: There is not now.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I dispute that. There is a free press in the country, but a violent battle will take place if a suggestion is adopted that there should not be a free press in this country, and I would be one of the first to take part in it. I do not rise to comment on the statement made by the member for Cape Breton South. I quite understand his feeling. I dare say the position was grossly exaggerated. I dare say the explanation he has given of the conditions that obtain down there will be appreciated by the public. I do not think it is very much different from what he has said it is. But I want to ask some questions with respect to censorship in Canada, because I have suffered from censorship.

Mr. GILLIS: And so have we.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I recall the day when I made a speech in Prince Edward Island on the question of the establishment in Canada of an empire training scheme, and when it was "on again, off again, gone again Finnigan" in the censor's office, and finally was released in order to give the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence for Air opportunity for a tongue lashing against me personally after it had been decided that the story should be censored and killed. But thank God we have a free press in this country that gave me an opportunity to answer contemporaneously the statement the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence for Air had made. I had a complete answer to them and I carried it in my portfolio day after day, thinking they would renew the attack in the House of Commons, but they never did. It had served their purpose. Control of censorship was in the hands of members of this government. Partisan control was in the hands of this government, and the young man, who was one of the censors, on the floor of this house to-day, was a party to it. I had him over to see me and his explanation was entirely unsatisfactory. I am going to say that in his own presence.

On another occasion my mail was censored when I was leader of the opposition, without any rhyme or reason. A constituent of the Minister of Finance wrote me a letter, and in that letter were certain reflections on the minister. That letter was censored, and I understand that under the regulations copies are taken of the letter and given to the minister in question. I do not say that was actually done, but it is capable of being done under the censorship regulations. Fortunately it did not amount to a snap of the fingers, but that is the significance of the gestapo that we have in Canada to-day, under this censorship under the minister.

I wonder if there has been any change in the regulation? I have on my files references made to censorship in the old country and a statement made by Captain Balfour, Under-Secretary of State for Air, in the British House of Commons relating to matters of this kind. I have sent for it, and if I get it in time before the debate is over I will put it on the record of the house to show how differently they operate over there. Are these regulations still in effect? When a letter is addressed to me or to any other individual, are copies of it made and handed to the ministerial department which may be concerned or referred to? Is that system of espionage and spying going on to-day as it was in 1940 and 1941? Political spying and espionage—that is what it was.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Does the hon. member want an answer now?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes; I will pause for the answer.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I say categorically that there is no political espionage, and for any hon. member to say so in this committee is to say something of which he has no knowledge. There is no such thing. It has happened, and I think I apologized for the department, as I should have done, when a letter addressed to my hon. friend was opened by censorship. I have made inquiries about that, and no copies of the letter were passed on. Why should there be? Evidently on reading it over it was discovered that the letter should never have been opened by censorship.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why was it done in the first place?

Mr. LaFLECHE: It was an error. I ask my hon. friend and all hon. members of this committee to consider the vast volume of work being done by the censors, and the fact that all members of the censorship staff could not be expected to know as much about the public personages of this country as the hon. member for York-Sunbury does. Their regulations are definite. Mail coming to members of parliament from points within Canada is not to be censored. If it should happen—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Was that always the regulation?

Mr. LaFLECHE: To my knowledge, it was put down very rigidly, and rigidly enforced as soon as the situation was foreseen.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): As soon as it developed; but that was not always the regulation.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I think I have explained it correctly; I have certainly explained it to the best of my knowledge. I have knowledge of one such letter addressed to a gentleman in parliament within the last four or five months—perhaps two letters. I have explained the situation, as I am trying to explain the situation now to the hon. member for York-Sunbury. The other gentleman I have in mind sits in another place. I think he is entirely satisfied with the explanation. There is no wilful snooping in regard to censorship. If there were, I would take steps to dispense with the services of any such employee. Since the hon. member for York-Sunbury has made an issue of this, I want to convince him and all hon. members of this committee that I would not tolerate such a thing for an instant. I say again definitely that censorship is exercised in Canada; it is also exercised in all other countries at war. In Canada censorship is exercised for the purpose of keeping Canada and our friends and our fighting forces safe. That is the only reason for it.

I think it is proper for me to acquaint all hon. members of the committee that in so far as the tide of war will permit us or will indicate to us, steps to dispense with censorship as our armies overseas make the situation safe in one respect or another in one country or another will be taken. There is no intention of carrying on censorship a moment longer than it is absolutely necessary for the security of our country. I believe the committee should have that information, and I give it as a gauge of the outlook of those responsible for and engaged in censorship.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With the statement of general principles just enunciated by the minister I am in full accord, and I accept them. As to the present attitude of the department with respect to the fundamental principle of censorship which he laid down, the safety of the state, I am in accord with that. It is the operation of the practice to which I have objected in the past. I expect that because of concrete cases that have come to the attention of the department, the system has been improved. I am prepared to accept the minister's position on that account. But I do say that there never ought to have been in the regulations—if the minister will give me his attention and not try to engage the attention of the censor at the same time, I shall be obliged—a provision that any document transmitted from one point in Canada to another point in Canada could be opened and the information contained therein transmitted to a department. There never ought to have been the power to do what has been done in the past, namely, where it was of a political character to transmit the information contained to the political party that may be reflected on. That is what was done in the past, and that is why I voiced my objection at the time my correspondence was opened and censored. The minister says that was a mistake. I am not sure it was a mistake in regard to the case I had in mind.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Last year?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It was not last year, because I was not leader of the opposition then. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar remembers the occasion, because he has suffered from it too, or so he said, and I believe him. Under what I call political regimentation on the part of a partisan administration and a partisan censor—who are those two young men who are set up as censors? Mr. Charpentier and Mr. Eggleston. I have known Mr. Eggleston a long time. I have not a thing against his character, but prior to his appointment he was a political writer of the Liberal party. That is not the type of man who ought to be the chief censor in Canada. In England they do that sort of thing better. In the last war they set up as censor a man who was afterwards made Lord Chancellor. I refer to Lord Birkenhead. He was the chief of the censors. We ought to have a high judicial officer. The Prime Minister admitted that principle when he put Mr. O. M. Biggar over the head of the censorship staff. He is retired now and we are back to the status quo. I object to it. I think censorship ought to be revised. The head of that branch ought to be a judicial officer. That is my position. I am not prepared to go on with the other angle until I get my file down here, and then I propose to take it up again.

Mr. WOOD: I wish to say a few words because of the remarks made by the hon. member for York-Sunbury. It would be almost impossible to ask any department of government to censor all the news items in the press that do not agree with the particular ideas of a department. I may say to the hon. member for York-Sunbury that I have a high regard for the intelligence of the public mind to filter out the good from the bad. When something fantastic is published in the press it reflects only upon those who are responsible for that particular publication. There may be times when it would be possible to put some particular propaganda across before truth could catch up with it; but in the main I am averse to making an attack upon the press, because they usually have the last word. Nevertheless the press in Canada has served a very useful purpose by transmitting some of the important news, though I do not claim that it has transmitted all the important news, by any means. As was demonstrated by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, it would be very difficult for anyone to write a story or article without colouring it with his own prejudices or philosophies. I believe the intelligentsia of the country realize this, and articles are usually read with the ordinary reservations of common sense that should be applied.

I am just mentioning this in the hope that the press will not get the idea that because it publishes something, the public believes every word of it. Really I have a higher regard for the intelligence of the press than to believe they think any such thing. The hon. member for York-Sunbury should not be too thin-skinned about certain criticism; public men must be prepared to have some things interpreted in a different way from what they had hoped. I have in my hand an editorial published in the Ottawa Journal of April 26 which I believe more or less shocked the public. Not very much has been said about it, but I am sure it has been drawn to the attention of many hon. members. It is headed, "This smearing should be stopped" and is written in such a way that I think it reflects upon members of parilament. It says, "There is—"

Mr. GRAYDON: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman; I know my hon. friend would not want to contravene the rules of the house, and it is a well known rule that such editorials as he has mentioned should not be read in this chamber.

Mr. WOOD: I was not reading the editorial; I was using the text of it to express what I had in mind, because its language is much better than anything I could offer; just as the hon. member for Cape Breton South read a particular item which he said was a reflection upon the miners. Since we are discussing the press I think it must be in order to discuss what the editor of a newspaper has to say; at least I presume this was written by the editor, since it appears on the editorial page. I am like the leader of the opposition; I do not hold the editor of a newspaper to be different from any other human being; he is just an ordinary man giving his opinion. I do not see why we should not quote him just as we quote the leader of the opposition, who is also just a man with an opinion.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is quite true, but this happens to be a rule of the house. If my hon. friend wants to change the rule he knows how that may be done. While the rule remains, however, I think the hon. gentleman should observe it. I have no desire unduly to restrict him; it is only a matter of keeping the record straight. On more than one occasion I have been prevented from reading editorials, and in this instance perhaps I may have a personal reason as well in asking that the rule be observed. I would request the chairman to give a ruling with respect to the point of order, because this rule is always observed, to my knowledge.

Mr. WOOD: I have not started to read the editorial yet, so that I do not know what the hon. member's point of order may be. If he is trying to head me off, that is characteristic of the very thing to which I was trying to draw attention. I do not think anyone should have a gun put under his arm and be told what he may or may not say.

Mr. GRAYDON: My hon. friend says he is not going to read the editorial, but he had started to read it. After the editorial was read it would be too late to raise any objection; then my hon. friend would be guilty of the same sort of smear tactics that the editorial apparently is criticizing. If the hon. gentleman attempts to read this editorial; if he is allowed to do so by the chairman and the committee, probably it will be a reflection against some hon. members of the house. That being so I think my hon. friend, with his usual courtesy, generosity and kindness, would not wish to proceed further.

Mr. WOOD: If there is no ruling I shall proceed. I appreciate the very graceful tribute of the leader of the opposition, and with equal courtesy I must say that I do enjoy his wholesome approach to these matters and I am sure our friendship will not be smeared in any way by anything I have to say to-day.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCann): Is there any further discussion on the point of order? If not I would refer hon. members to citation 306, which reads:

It is not in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or communications emanating from persons outside the house and referring to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member or expressing any opinion reflecting on the proceedings within the house.

Since the hon. member for Brant does not intend to quote the editorial it will be unnecessary to give a ruling on the point of order.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think on reflection the hon. member has changed his mind.

Mr. WOOD: I am sure I should be the last to disobey your ruling, Mr. Chairman, but we are discussing censorship, which applies to newspapers and periodicals. I do not know how we can do that without making reference to certain articles which have appeared in the press, whether in the form of editorials or otherwise. But I might say that a comment was made in the press in reference to the least desirable groups of government supporters, in regard to a campaign that was under way to smear two gentlemen who had held high offices in this government. It referred, I believe, to Mr. Justice McTague and Mr. Borden, who had deserted the war front to become associated with a political organization.

Mr. GARDINER: It would not be out of order to read that.

Mr. WOOD: The point is that no newspaper man should put a gun under the arm of a member of parliament and tell him what he may or may not say in regard to a public servant. An hon. member said there would be a violent battle if we interfered with the freedom of the press, but I think the press should recognize that members of parliament and other citizens have the same rights and privileges, and they should not be accused of smearing because they see fit to criticize the unethical action of certain gentlemen who saw fit to desert the war front at a time of crisis and join a particular political party. My attention was drawn to this article shortly after it was published. I think it contains some reference to being shocked. I am sure the people of Canada were shocked when they learned that this situation existed, but this newspaper saw fit to publish this editorial which said this smearing should be stopped before it even started. It seems to me that the attitude of the leader of the opposition was somewhat coloured with the same weakness when he endeavoured to stop me, before I had even got started. So that I am beginning to think that in consequence of his conduct here he has indicated one of the characteristics of his own particular philosophy of political thinking. It would seem that one of those characteristics is to head something off before it gets started.

Mr. GRAYDON: Your bark was worse than your bite; that is all.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCann): Order.

Mr. WOOD: Something further was drawn to my attention—and I make this statement, not so much for the good of the press, but rather for the good of the country generally. After all, I believe intelligent people do frown upon a certain code of ethics, whether used by the press or by any other person or group of persons.

Following the ceremony in front of this building in connection with the launching of the victory loan campaign, under the guidance of the war finance committee, a picture appeared in the Globe and Mail of April 24. There was a splendid demonstration out here, and we find in the newspaper mention of Mr. George Spinney, honorary chairman. Then appears the name of the man who was honoured with the Victoria Cross, Major Triquet. But the name of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), the man who has been conducting the financial destiny of this nation, did not appear. He sits there, as appears in the picture, in a prominent and conspicuous position. I suppose the average reader of the Globe and Mail would wonder who that distinguished gentleman is, whose name is not printed. However it is only fair to say that the Ottawa Journal, in which appeared exactly the same picture, did honour the Minister of Finance by printing his name, and tendering to him the recognition he deserves.

These may be small things, but they are of importance. These pictures were mailed to me by friends from two different places. What I have said is a reflection of what is being said in the country at large. I am not saying that the minister should supervise all news items and pictures. I suggest, however, that the hon. member for York-Sunbury should not take himself too seriously. He should remember that the general public have ideas of their own, and they do not always agree with his political philosophy.

I had nothing to say against the press, although at times I see things printed which cause me some concern. However, one time I heard a man say that it is much better to worry about what one would say than to wonder why he said it. Sometimes that is the situation in connection with the press. At times I wonder why some articles are printed. Nevertheless I have felt it my duty to draw attention to the attitude of the press.

I believe the hon. member of York-Sunbury has suggested that a censor should be a judicial officer. Well, we had a judicial officer in one high position, but he has deserted that position and returned to the ranks of his own political party, to act as chairman. Surely the argument should work both ways. What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander, and I suggest that the hon. member's argument is not sound.

I do not believe the people generally have suffered a great deal through the censorship regulations. We like to know some things when we should not know them. So far as our war effort is concerned, I believe, while we are making a good job of it, we would do well to suppress our desires for a time, and to accept the censorship regulations with as good grace as possible.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. GARDINER: In order that we may fully understand the rule to which the Chairman referred a few moments ago, I should like to say that the hon. member had a perfect right to read the editorial.

An hon. MEMBER: That is history.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCann): There was a ruling given.

Mr. GARDINER: A ruling was not given, but the rule was read. I wish to read it again.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the hon. member speaking on?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think the hon. member got the right interpretation of the rule.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is there any point of order? What is before the Chair?

Mr. GARDINER: There is a point of order.

Mr. COLDWELL: I had the floor. I was on my feet, and a point of order has not been raised. The Chairman saw me.

Mr. GARDINER: I am raising again the point of order that was raised a few moments ago.

Mr. COLDWELL: Well, if the minister is raising a point of order—

Mr. GARDINER: I should like to have a decision upon it.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCann): Order.

Mr. GARDINER: I think there was a misunderstanding at the time. It was taken for granted that the editorial could not be read. Paragraph 306 in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms says:

It is not in order to read articles—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That was read.

Mr. GARDINER: And I am going to read it again. Apparently my hon. friend does not understand it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I understand it perfectly.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, the point was raised by the hon. member's seat-mate, who apparently does not understand it. The paragraph says:

It is not in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or communications emanating from persons outside the house and referring to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member or expressing any opinion reflecting on the proceedings within the house.

I submit that this editorial, to which reference was made, has nothing to do with any of the matters mentioned in the paragraph.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Absolutely.

Mr. GARDINER: And I should like a ruling upon it.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is the Chairman's job to interpret the rules, not that of the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): But the Minister of Agriculture can interpret what the situation is—and he can do it better than my hon. friend can.

Mr. GRAYDON: You always had a good opinion of your own ability.

Mr. GARDINER: I should like a ruling as to whether or not we have the right to read editorials which do not reflect upon members in the house.

Mr. GRAYDON: This is a debate which is past.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCann): Does the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar wish to speak to the point of order?

Mr. COLDWELL: No.

Mr. GRAYDON: He wishes to speak in the debate.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes; I wish to speak to the item before the committee.

Mr. GARDINER: I should like a ruling on the point of order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is no point of order in that.

Mr. ROWE: Is this a debate on a point of order

Mr. GARDINER: It was raised by your seat-mate.

Mr. GRAYDON: I suggest that we take the expert advice of the two ministers who have just spoken, and that we give consideration to it at another meeting of the committee —but not now.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Speaking to the point of order: despite the attitude of superiority which my hon. friend the leader of the opposition has taken, I suggest that any hon. member at any time may raise a point of order, during any debate.

Mr. GRAYDON: If that is a point of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The point is very obvious.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister did not raise it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The hon. member who was speaking was endeavouring to read an editorial.

Mr. GRAYDON: He had sat down, and another speaker had started to speak.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That has not anything to do with the matter. The leader of the opposition took objection, and the position now taken is that that objection was not well taken and that, according to the rules of the house, the hon. member for Brant is entitled to read the editorial.

Mr. MacNICOL: Suppose we get on with the business of the house.

Mr. ROWE: The government's great war effort!

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): And who is helping?

Mr. WOOD: I am prepared to admit that—

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Who has the floor?

Mr. WOOD: I am speaking to the point of order.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCann): Order.

Mr. COLDWELL: If the point of order is being discussed, all right; but I do not wish the Chair to give the hon. member an opportunity to make a new speech.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCann): The hon. member for Brant is speaking to the point of order. He is the one who is primarily interested in this matter. When he has spoken to the point of order, the Chair will give its ruling.

Mr. ROWE: Is this debate on a point of order?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Certainly; that is always done.

Mr. ROWE: That is unparliamentary.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Oh, no.

Mr. ROWE: Not after a decision has been given?

Mr. GARDINER: A decision has not been given.

Mr. WOOD: I have always been treated with the greatest courtesy by the committee, and I have never tried to encroach upon the good will of hon. members. I am prepared to admit that I am somewhat shy when I stand before this august gathering, particularly when my right to speak is challenged. The hon. member has been reasonably successful in exploding a good deal of the material I wish to convey to the committee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is not on the point of order; it is another speech.

Mr. WOOD: I did not express myself as I should have liked to. My purpose in attempting to read the editorial was to convey the thought contained therein in language better than I was able to use. I am prepared almost to admit that it has been successful to a certain degree in excluding argument. I should like to have your ruling, Mr. Chairman, whether I may quote an article which does reflect upon members of parliament and speaks of the least desirable group of members of parliament.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCann): Does the hon. member wish to quote the article?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not if it reflects upon members of parliament.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCann): The point raised is a hypothetical one and does not call for any decision. If the hon. member had proceeded to read the article I could have decided whether it was in order.

Mr. COLDWELL: If the point of order is decided, Mr. Chairman, I wish to discuss the question of censorship briefly. The hon. member for York-Sunbury is quite right. I have had letters opened in the past, I must say not lately, although my hon. friend the member for Cape Breton South has had two letters addressed to him from his constituency opened recently, and one of them contained a little note from the Post Office Department saying that it had been opened by the censor in error. The other, he tells me, had no note with it or upon it at all.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Where was it mailed from?

Mr. GILLIS: From Sydney, Nova Scotia.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am not going to complain particularly of the manner in which the censorship has been operated by the censors. I believe we have to have censorship during the war. The safety of the state sometimes demands it. But I would be absolutely opposed to any kind of censorship in peace time. I agree with the hon. member for York-Sunbury that any letters which are opened by the censor ought not to be copied or passed on to any department. I have definite knowledge that one letter I wrote was copied and forwarded to department. I happened to find out about it because an official thanked me for a letter that I had written to an individual and told me that it was a very good letter. Then I took it upon myself to forward the letter to which my letter was a reply so that his file and my file might be complete. My letter was addressed to a man whose mail was being watched, so that I think the censorship was justified in opening the letter. But it was copied and sent to a department, and that should not have been done.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We are all watched.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not know whether we are or not. I want to say this, too. When we talk about a free press in this country, let us make up our minds that we have not a free press to-day.

Mr. GARDINER: They are pretty free in what they say about most of us.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think so.

Mr. COLDWELL: Some of our papers operate as a free press; there is no question that most of them do. But I could name papers that do not. The Montreal Star, for example, one of the great papers of this country, will neither publish a report of anything that one political party in this country says outside this house nor take its advertising. Another paper in the province of Quebec that I could mention, L'Action Catholique, does exactly the same. That is not a free press. I can understand a party press confining its columns to its party. In Saskatchewan there is the Saskatchewan Liberal. I do not know where they get the paper to publish this little sheet, which circulates in the thousands. I would not expect to see in the Saskatchewan Liberal a speech of mine published correctly, but that is a Liberal party press. My complaint is against some members of the daily press, which is maintained by the public through subscriptions, and by national advertising. Allegedly, we have a free press in this country, but it is not a free press when we have papers with such a wide circulation as the Montreal Star refusing to publish reports of speeches made by members of one particular party and refusing its advertising. That is the worst kind of financial and economic censorship. So that when we talk of a free press, let us bear in mind that there are exceptions. But in the main the press of this country is a fair and a free press, and I say that very readily.

Mr. GRAYDON: The Montreal Star and L'Action Catholique are very highly thought of.

Mr. COLDWELL: By some people, but I have nothing but contempt for papers which operate allegedly as a free press and then refuse to be free.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They published reports of your speech in parliament last Monday.

Mr. COLDWELL: Did they really? I know they have refused our advertising.

An hon. MEMBER: They refused to take your money?

Mr. COLDWELL: Exactly.

Mr. ROWE: They may not be able to get enough paper.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They integrated your speech with mine, so that when I got through I did not know which was yours and which was mine.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is probably too bad for both of us. I think that as soon as we can discontinue any form of censorship whatsoever it should be discontinued. In the meantime I believe that the policy of the censor and of the department that letters by members of parliament should not be opened is a sound one, and when they are opened inadvertently I think an explanation should be made, as was made in one of the two cases in which letters of the member for Cape Breton South were opened.

Mr. LaFLECHE: An explanation was made?

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, in one case.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What about letters by members of parliament?

Mr. COLDWELL: I think it is worse if they are opened, but I have no knowledge of the opening of letters other than the one I mentioned, written by members of parliament to other people.

So far as the personnel of the censorship branch is concerned, I have confidence in the men who are operating it. I think that gentleman who was named a few moments ago by the hon. member for York-Sunbury and who has a wide journalistic experience, can give fair consideration to matters of censorship, even although he does not belong to a political party to which either the hon. member for York-Sunbury or myself belongs. We have to give credit for breadth of view and fairness sometimes to people who are not associated with us politically and yet occupy positions of trust, and I am prepared to do that in this case.

Mr. REID: Following the remarks of the member for Rosetown-Biggar who has dealt at considerable length with the question of the freedom of the press, I should like to point out to him and this committee the state of affairs that existed in British Columbia. I am not holding him to account for it because I know he has no control over the group of men belonging to his party out there. But in British Columbia we had intimidation of the press by members of the hon. member's party.

Mr. COLDWELL: Read the Saskatchewan Liberal and see what they say.

Mr. REID: Wait till you hear this, and then if there is anything worse I should like to hear it. They went to the newspapers in the Fraser Valley and told them that in their party they had so many subscribers to these different papers, and they said, "If you do not give us an extremely good break we will withdraw all these subscriptions of our adherents."

Mr. GRAYDON: That is pretty nearly blackmail.

Mr. REID: It was serious enough. In Vancouver, the Sun, the Province and the News-Herald were informed that if they were not kindly—not kindly from my point of view but entirely from their point of view—these subscriptions would be withdrawn from those papers.

Mr. COLDWELL: Does the hon. gentleman know that of his own knowledge?

Mr. REID: I know it of my own knowledge so far as the local papers are concerned, and I can tell you this. I have not made any statement in the house but what I can prove. You look over my record in the house, and if you can match it you are going some. I shall probably have more to say this session before I am through about followers of the hon. member's party in British Columbia, regarding intimidation. I know the hon. member is not to blame, because he has no control over these leaders in British Columbia.

Mr. GRAYDON: They are really two parties.

Mr. REID: The hon. member has tried soft-soaping some of them before now, but he has not been successful. I tell members of this committee that intimidation from that quarter is to me just as dastardly as any financial control such as the leader of the C.C.F. mentioned a few moments ago.

Mr. HLYNKA: If hon. members have disposed of the political aspect of this item, I should like to make a few observations concerning censorship. There cannot be two views as to the need of censorship during war time, but there may be differences of opinion as to the type we should have and the degree to which it should be applied. There are two kinds of censorship, the voluntary, and the official type which is governed by regulations. I do not believe that voluntary censorship can work; in my opinion it is no censorship at all. Some people could not keep a secret if they tried. Others have varying opinions as to what is secret and what is not. Then, of course, judgment varies among the various individuals engaged in newspaper work or other types of work in connection with this matter. For instance, a conscientious and cautious editor would leave out a story, whereas an aggressive editor would take chances and dramatize the report to the advantage of his own newspaper. So that there is a definite need of official censorship in time of war, whether it has to do with newspapers, radio, or mail. Official censorship makes for uniformity and consistency.

But, as I said, we should seriously consider how far we should go. My criticism of the government's policy is that there are too many instances of undignified and at times perhaps abusive censorship. Examples have been related to the committee this afternoon. We all know of instances where the mail of members of parliament was opened. Of course that sort of thing should not be permitted.

My other objection is that certain information is refused to hon. members and is later given to the press. We are somewhat at a loss to know what to tell our constituents; we know so little about the policies or intentions of the government that it is not infrequent that the public gets the information before members of parliament do. Also certain information is denied to hon. members, and when we get out to our own constituencies we find that the people already know what we should have known, either through announcements in this chamber or by statements issued to us from time to time. Speaking broadly, it is proper to withhold information which, if disclosed, would have a bad effect on the morale of our troops or the people at home. Information about troops, ships and plane movements should also be withheld and censored. Information concerning strategy and diplomacy should be censored. Information which does not in any way endanger the safety of the state, however, should not be denied.

I have two questions to ask the minister. In the first place I have been informed, whether correctly I do not know, that there are employed in the censorship bureau in Ottawa a number of persons who have not as yet obtained their naturalization certificates; in other words, they are not Canadians and yet they are entrusted with the examination and checking of the mail of Canadians. My second question is, is the minister aware that news cables are being transmitted via New York from Moscow to be published in certain Canadian newspapers? Is there an arrangement in effect between Canadian news agencies and agencies in Moscow? I have seen some of these cables published in Canadian papers. I have seen also copies of such cables. It seems rather strange that a country, even though one of our allies, can send cables to be published in newspapers in another country. How does that come about? I cannot understand what is the purpose behind it.

Mr. REID: The hon. member complains that there are men in this country censoring letters who are not Canadian citizens. I would ask him what he would have done in the province of British Columbia, where we have no Canadians of non-Japanese origin who can read the Japanese language; what would he do as regards the censoring of the letters of Japanese? There are men coming from Great Britain to do that. What would he do?

Mr. HOMUTH: If we had done things right we would not have had any Japanese.

Mr. REID: That is true, but I did not get much support when I urged it years ago.

Mr. HLYNKA: I believe we should have our own men trained for service in such emergency. Had proper preparations been made, there would have been a supply of persons qualified to read these letters. Canada is a country in which many languages are spoken. We should have men who understand such languages, but if we have not, no one is to be blamed but ourselves.

I should like an answer to the two questions I directed to the minister, particularly the one with respect to cables sent from Moscow which are published in Canadian newspapers.

Mr. LaFLECHE: The question of the hon. member for Vegreville relates to cabled news items and articles. There are press associations or news services outside Canada furnishing information in order that Canadians may be well informed. It is not there that the danger might exist, if it did exist. It would be in the publication of that news. That leads me to say this about the press. There is a free press in Canada, and there is not the slightest intention, so far as the government is concerned, of making it less free or not free. I must also pay tribute to the people of the press, those of the fourth estate, for assisting in making it possible to have good censorship in Canada because of their cooperation. The people of the press do much toward censoring or exercising sound judgment in regard to matters that can be published, and to that extent they greatly assist censorship.

This brings me to the two gentlemen who have been named in this house earlier this afternoon. Mr. Eggleston was from 1933 to 1937 an independent journalist writing for newspapers of all persuasions.

Mr. REID: And he did a good job too.

Mr. LaFLECHE: From 1937 to 1939 he was secretary of the Rowell-Sirois commission and he went into censorship in the early stages of the war. I have, and all those concerned with him in censorship have, absolute confidence in this gentleman. As to M. Charpentier, he is doing a very heavy and an excellent job, and it is not fair to criticize civil servants who are honestly filling important positions. Again, it may be said that M. Charpentier enjoys the confidence of those who know him.

A question was raised by the hon. member for Vegreville about using the services of persons who are not Canadian citizens. This is the explanation. At a time when large numbers of freshly caught German prisoners were brought to Canada, there arose overnight the necessity of censoring mail matter addressed by such prisoners of war to a destination outside Canada. The civil service commission were approached and requisitioned for a number of persons properly qualified in the German language. It is to my knowledge that the commission made a nation-wide survey of the possibilities of finding competent persons in that language. They were obliged to name a small number of persons who are thoroughly competent in German but who are not yet Canadian citizens. Those persons, however, were most thoroughly investigated; their past was looked into, and we have it on the authority of several competent individuals and bodies that they are reliable. It was only then that the civil service commission made the appointments. They could not find Canadian citizens properly qualified.

Mr. HOMUTH: There are fifty thousand Canadians of the second and third generation competent in the German language.

Mr. LaFLECHE: The civil service commission might have asked the hon. gentleman's advice.

Mr. HOMUTH: If you had, you would have got some who were worth while.

Mr. LaFLECHE: The German script is, I understand, the reason which makes the reading of the German language difficult. I trust this explanation is agreeable to the hon. member for Vegreville. I repeat, the civil service commission could find no other persons properly qualified. Those who were selected had to be taken because that mail matter has to be looked into. Prisoners of war are treated in conformity with certain international conventions. We cannot hold up their mail, but it is necessary to look into it carefully There is this point to be borne in mind, that the persons whom the hon. member for Vegreville has in mind censored mail originating with these prisoners of war only. They did not censor any mail matter or anything else originating with Canadian citizens.

Mr. GREEN: The amount for postal censorship is $1,515,260, which is an increase of almost $500,000 over the vote for the previous fiscal year. Why has there been that large increase?

Mr. LaFLECHE: That is due solely to the fact that we have fortunately very greatly increased the number of German prisoners of war held by us in Canada, and the service is one that is automatic. The amount of censorship must go up when there is a greater volume of mail originating in that quarter, and when the time comes that it will be no longer necessary to censor that mail matter the number of staff will drop immediately.

Mr. GREEN: Is that item entirely for the censoring of German mail?

Mr. LaFLECHE: The increased number of prisoners of war alone almost accounts for the increase in the vote.

Mr. GREEN: How many are on the staff of the censorship branch?

Mr. LaFLECHE: There are 878.

Mr. GREEN: How many were there a year ago?

Mr. LaFLECHE: There were 613.

Mr. GREEN: Will there be an increase in the staff?

Mr. LaFLECHE: There will be as and when we get a larger number of prisoners to hold in custody in this country. It is automatic. It must rise with the number of German prisoners—or Japs, if you like.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Under the minister's department is there any supervision of telephone conversations?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Yes, where it is necessary.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Are records made of conversations over the telephone—conversations of private individuals?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Not in the sense which I take it my hon. friend has in mind.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Does the minister know of any conversations that have been recorded?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I do not know of any single such conversation.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I do not know why, but there is one case I know of where private conversations have been recorded. I do not know why it is done. The practice of listening to private conversations over the telephone lines and the making of records of the conversations that have taken place should be very carefully looked into. I know of one instance where this happened. I am not going to give the name at the moment; but I do not know why there should be this supervision of the private lines. I think it might be interesting to the committee and to the country to know just how far the supervision of telephone conversation goes. We should like to know how it is done and a little more about it.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I should very much like to speak at length on the question, but if we were to give our methods to the enemies of our country, I am sure the hon. member for St. Paul's would the first to protest. I know it is my duty to give information to this committee and I want to do so. But might I try to reassure the hon. members of this committee by saying that such operations are carried out solely and for no other reason than the safety of the country. I think I can safely go this far and say that such things as have been mentioned are not done unless there seems to be reason for doing it in a particular case. In other words, suspicion has been aroused. If my hon. friend or any other hon. member has misgivings and would care to give me some particulars I shall have the matter looked into, because I do not want anybody in this country attempting to ascertain information unless it is for the security of Canada.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I understand that the minister does not want to give away too much information, because it will disclose methods used; but is there necessity for the supervision of telephone conversations? Does the supervision come under the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, or under what department does it come? Who says that this man's telephone conversation should be censored or tapped, if you like to call it that? Does it come under the Royal Canadian Mounted Police or the military authorities?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I should like to suggest to the hon. member for St. Paul's that it is not in the national interest to give details of who might do this or that; but definitely those who originate the demand for such services are the security officers of Canada. They will be found centred in the armed forces.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I agree with the minister, but it is something that lends itself to abuse and can be abused. I think it should be carefully watched. I happen to know of one case and I cannot understand why that particular telephone line is tapped. That is why I brought this matter up in the committee. I agree with the minister that we must have some supervision over telephone lines because we are at war. I think we should guard carefully the way it is done to see that it is not abused and that it is not used for purposes other than security.

Mr. LaFLECHE: The hon. member for St. Paul's was good enough to agree with me in one respect. May I agree with him entirely when he says that such operations must not be abused? When I know of any possible abuse I shall see that a remedy is found for it immediately.

Item agreed to.

Censorship of publications, $135,355.

Mr. GILLIS: Would the minister give us some indication of the types of publications that come under censorship?

Mr. LaFLECHE: The censorship of publications differs in its organization from the other branches of censorship in that there are at the head of it three chief censors instead of only one. Of the three one is particularly concerned with English language publications, one with French language publications and one with radio broadcasts. Under an order made by the then Secretary of State on July 15, 1940, films generally are censored by the chairmen of the boards appointed by eight of the provinces for that purpose in accordance with directives issued by the chief censors of publications. The only province in respect of which this arrangement is not in force is Prince Edward Island, in which there is no provincial board of censors. With respect to certain films, for example, those prepared by the national film board, the chief censors of publications themselves are consulted. In regard to the press as such there is no restriction—and here is the answer—upon the freedom of the press as such; publishers, like all other individuals, are subject to the defence of Canada regulations, which forbid the communication of certain military information and certain subversive and other communications. There is also provision that newspapers and certain other printed documents must include the name of the individual responsible for their publication and that the Minister of National War Services may prevent or restrict the publication of documents he regards as prejudicial to the safety of the state or the efficient prosecution of the war. Generally that is the purpose of this particular division of censorship. I fear I did not grasp perfectly my hon. friend's question, but perhaps I did guess at it correctly and answer it correctly.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes; you answered it thoroughly.

Item agreed to.

Canadian Broadcasting Corporation—short-wave station, $150,000.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Would the minister make some statement regarding the short-wave broadcasting facilities on the west coast? Could he tell us how many short-wave broadcasting stations there are along the Pacific coast and whether any consideration has been given to establishing a short-wave station on Canada's west coast?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I am not certain that I have the exact meaning of my hon. friend's question. I recall that in another part of this building some mention was made a few days ago of the possibility that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation would either recommend or construct a short-wave broadcasting station on the Pacific coast. I do not know that any concrete action has as yet been taken in that connection. It seems to be in the mind of certain people, and, undoubtedly, if and when there is a development in that situation we shall, of course, hear something about it. As to the short-wave stations on the Canadian Pacific coast, there is none under Canadian control or in Canada.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Does the minister know how many there are in the United States?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I cannot say how many there are. I am informed that on the west coast of the United States they now have two short-wave stations and are building three more.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It would appear to me that in waging war in the Pacific the radio would be a very important instrument, and I should think Canada ought to be making plans to have radio facilities available so that the people in the Pacific will be able to hear the voice of Canada when we become more active in that theatre. Could the minister make some statement as to what plans are now under way with a view to making the voice of Canada heard in the Pacific?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I am not certain that there are many on the other side of the Pacific ocean who would understand the voice of Canada. However, our immediate problem is of course, winning the war, in the Pacific as well as in every other part of the globe. I am afraid that if I attempted to say very much on that point I might encroach upon the strategy of those who have the responsibility of fighting the enemy in the Pacific. To judge by allied successes in that area, due very largely to the United States navy, they seem to have the broadcasting situation well in hand. Canada has no islands in the Pacific ocean far from her shores. The United States has Hawaii and many others. I am afraid it will be necessary to await developments before Canada will be in a position to give consideration to that point, for civilian purposes. I am really speaking without having given the matter very serious consideration. All these would be matters of policy, to be brought down at a later date. I have done my best to answer my hon. friend, and, I hope, have given him some useful information.

Mr. NICHOLSON: If the United States have two stations on the west coast and are building three more it would seem that they attach a great deal of importance to the use of radio in the waging of modern war. Since Canada is at war with Japan it would seem that this is not a peace-time project but a matter of war strategy. The minister suggested that people in Asia might have difficulty in understanding the English language, but I should think it would be quite simple to have broadcasts in languages they would understand. I wonder if the minister can give us any information as to whether anything at all is being done with a view to having short-wave broadcasts sent from Canada to the people in the east.

Mr. LaFLECHE: This matter of short-wave broadcasting on the Pacific necessarily would be influenced by two major considerations. The first, of course, would be the war strategy, including war requirements; the second would be the need or demand for such stations for civilian purposes. The second factor is not one which ordinarily would be given much consideration during the war. The first consideration, that is, the necessity of doing everything possible to win the war, I am sure has received very careful consideration. I am not in a position to go into that matter, except to point out to my hon. friend that the allies are doing very well in the Pacific ocean.

Mr. GREEN: What would be the cost of a short-wave station on the Pacific?

Mr. LaFLECHE: The capital cost to put up the buildings and purchase the necessary equipment certainly would be well over a million dollars.

Mr. GREEN: What would be the yearly cost of operating the station?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I need not try to safeguard myself, of course, by saying it would depend upon the volume of operations, and that sort of thing. I think a fairly good estimate at this time would be about $350,000 a year, and I believe that would be on the low side.

Mr. GREEN: Have any steps been taken by the government to investigate the possibility of establishing a short-wave station on the Pacific?

Mr. LaFLECHE: The matter has received attention by the Canadian Broadcasting corporation.

Mr. NICHOLSON: If difficulty is experienced in getting the equipment to build a million dollar project, could the minister give us any information as to whether any attempt has been made to use available United States facilities in order to express our views?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I would not want it to be taken for granted that there has been proved to be any necessity for that at the moment; I do not think it would be right to take that for granted. I have said this afternoon that the matter has received consideration, though I have not seen any particular report in connection with it. In regard to any necessary broadcasting from Canada to the far east, that has been done and can be done at any time through United States stations, I think particularly in San Francisco.

Mr. NICHOLSON: You are not using any facilities there now, I understand?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I have said that Canadian news is going out over United States Pacific coast short-wave stations.

Mr. MARSHALL: Two years ago the amount set aside for this type of work was the small sum of $10,000, and we are told that this allotment was not used. Last year the amount set aside was $640,000, whereas this year it is $150,000. Would the minister tell us how much of the 1943-44 allotment was used, and the type of work that was carried on?

Mr. LaFLECHE: If I may be permitted I should like to place on record a statement; it is not lengthy, but I think it will give much of the information required by the hon. member for Camrose, and if necessary I can supplement it.

Experimental broadcasting on a short-wave band began almost simultaneously with experimental broadcasts in Great Britain, the United States and Holland in 1926. The technical development progressed rapidly, and in 1932 the British Broadcasting Corporation inaugurated its empire service with a regularly scheduled service in English. The value of this new instrument of international communication was soon recognized, and the thirties saw a rapid growth of short-wave broadcasting, particularly from Europe. By 1937 fifty-eight countries were broadcasting on a short-wave band, on frequencies registered at Geneva. Certain bands in the spectrum were set aside at Geneva for short-wave broadcasting. The frequencies within these bands were chosen by the different countries on a first come, first served basis. The various countries then registered them at the International Telecommunication Bureau at Geneva.

Nazi Germany and Italy were the first countries to exploit short-wave as a weapon of offensive propaganda. Great Britain which had done a great deal of the pioneering in the short-wave field looked upon short-wave broadcasting primarily as a medium for the promotion of international good will, a philosophy well expressed in the motto of the British Broadcasting Corporation. "Nations shall speak peace unto nations." However, the tactics of the German propagandists forced Great Britain to take similar action, though it was not until January 3, 1938, that the first foreign language broadcast was carried by British Broadcasting Corporation.

By 1939 Great Britain was broadcasting a regular service in ten foreign languages. With the outbreak of war the British Broadcasting Corporation foreign service was, of course, increased tremendously. Many new high-powered transmitters were put into operation, and by 1941 the British Broadcasting corporation was broadcasting over several stations more than thirty hours a day in some forty-eight languages.

The development of short-wave broadcasting in the United States lagged considerably behind the service inaugurated by the publicly owned systems of Europe. However, when war broke out, the United States began far-reaching plans for the creation of a comprehensive system of high-powered short-wave transmitters. The short wave-transmitters operated by the American networks were taken over by the United States government through the office of war information. New transmitters were constructed as rapidly as possible, and soon the voice of America was heard in many languages on a large network of short-wave transmitters.

In September, 1942, the government of Canada approved the construction of an international short-wave station. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was instructed to proceed with the construction and operation of such a station as soon as possible. The demand for transmitting equipment was so great both in United States and United Kingdom that even with the high priorities granted Canada inevitable delay was encountered in procurement of equipment. However, considerable progress has been made and it is expected that the first beam will be in operation by perhaps September, 1944.

I do not mean by that an international service. The first beam may be in operation by next September. This is questionable, however; it might be a little later in the year.

The first estimates on the cost of the short-wave station submitted by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation quoted a figure of $800,000 for the purchase and installation of two 50-kilowatt transmitters and the associated antenna system. This expenditure, chargeable to war appropriations, was approved. Owing to changes in design and construction, the result of recent improvements in radio techniques, making for greater efficiency in short-wave transmissions, and owing to the increase in costs of fabrication and construction, it is now estimated that the required transmitters, antenna, associated equipment and construction will involve an additional capital expenditure of $300,000, making a total estimated cost of $1,100,000.

Most of this increased cost is for a new and more elaborate antenna system which it is expected will have the result of providing a signal equal to that which would have been provided by transmitters four times the power operating on the type of antenna originally considered.

I think the hon. member for Camrose had in mind that in the first year the sum of $10,000 was asked for. Undoubtedly that was for preliminary investigation. Last year the house voted $650,000. It was considered at that time that not more than that amount could be expended in the fiscal year 1943-44. I now ask for $150,000. When the estimates were prepared the officials of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation thought that amount would be sufficient to cover what they could do. It may be necessary for me to ask the government to bring down a supplementary estimate, if experience proves that the cost will be considerably higher than the original estimate of $800,000. If it is possible to let contracts, arrange construction, obtain equipment, antenna and transmitters we shall have to pay for them.

Mr. MARSHALL: Is it fair to say that instead of spending about $640,000, we spent about twice that amount in the last year. In the minister's remarks he said that the actual cost of the apparatus was in the neighbourhood of $1,100,000. That is far in excess of the $640,000 asked for last year.

Mr. LaFLECHE: The amount of $1,100,000 was a revised estimate of the cost. The expenditure is an entirely different matter. The total budget must be in the neighbourhood of $1,100,000.

Mr. GREEN: Would the minister give further consideration to the possibility of establishing a short-wave station on the Pacific coast? It would be very beneficial in connection with communications between Canada and Australia and New Zealand. I believe it is only a question of time until Canadian war ships and Canadian troops will be in operation at some point in the Pacific. It would be helpful if the station were established by the time our forces reach that theatre. Would the minister have his officials give further consideration to the possibility of establishing a short-wave station on the Pacific coast? There will have to be one sooner or later; it would also be a great help in peace time.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I shall gladly look into the matter, but may I point out to the hon. member that it is confidently expected that the new station at Sackville, to be in operation this fall, will reach as far as Australia. That does not mean to say, however, that there is no value in the suggestion that we watch the situation carefully. I have already explained to the committee that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is studying the matter, and I shall see that it is followed up.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Why was Sackville selected as the location for the station?

Mr. LaFLECHE: It was selected for technical reasons. In connection with broadcasting the topographical features, and all that lies beneath the surface of the earth must be considered. Those factors have a great bearing upon the receptive or sending qualities of a particular district.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I brought this matter up in the house two years ago. Now we find we are faced with these extra expenditures—at least half a million dollars more than we would have had to spend, had the station been erected two years ago when it was pressed for by the opposition. At that time the Minister of Transport had many different figures as to what the station would cost. At one time he told us it would cost $2,500,000, and at another time $1,500,000. Now we know what it is; and I certainly think the delayed action on short-wave broadcasting has cost the government and people of Canada an extra half-million dollars.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I did not hear it or understand it quite like that. I do not think they could have done it in less time; I am convinced of that. I have spoken to officials and to manufacturers of equipment, and most of the difficulty lies in getting the necessary equipment.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. HANSELL: Mr. Chairman, something was said this afternoon about the short-wave radio station now being built, and some of the questions asked would seem to indicate that perhaps the broadcasting corporation had not done all it could in one way or another. I think that under existing conditions, with the lack of materials and equipment owing to the war, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has done a marvellous job in bringing this short-wave station to the point where it may soon be in operation. I understand that because of the shortage of materials, the technicians of the corporation have had to build certain parts of this station themselves. Realizing as some of us do the tremendous job involved in building a short-wave radio broadcasting station, I think we should compliment the officials of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the minister, under whose department this corporation comes, upon the job they have done so far.

I wonder if hon. members realize the purpose of this short-wave station? I fancy the main purpose will be to tell the rest of the world something about Canada, in a word to sell Canada to the rest of the world. It can be used by the Department of Trade and Commerce, the Department of External Affairs and other departments of government. Taking all these things into consideration, I believe this short-wave station will be a great asset to Canada. While it may appear that we are spending a lot of money, I think it is money well spent.

I referred a moment ago to the purpose of this short-wave station being to tell the rest of the world about Canada. We all know that someone must write what is sent over the air. That is done in connection with our radio at home and it certainly will have to be done with respect to the short-wave station. The messages that go over this station should be of such a nature as to sell Canada to the rest of the world. I mention this because I fear that the broadcasters may eventually find themselves in a position where they will be compelled to accept manuscripts from certain people or organizations.

I have always believed in collective bargaining. I have always believed that men should have the privilege to get together in order to be able to fight for their rights. But if the time should come when we would have such a thing as a writers' union so strong that all articles for press or radio would have to pass through its hands, then I suggest that such an organization would be able to control the thinking of the nation. I am not suggesting that there is such a thing as a writers' union.

An hon. MEMBER: There is.

Mr. HANSELL: My hon. friend mentions that there is such a thing as a writers' union. If that is so, then I suggest that we should be very much on our guard with respect to the type of material that comes forth from such an organization. I can quite understand how a union would be organized to protect the rights of writers, to see that they are adequately paid and so forth, but I should not like to see the day come when one type of thinking only would come from the pens of our Canadian writers.

The minister may be aware that there is an organization in Canada known as the united front—I do not know if that is part of the name—" writers, broadcasters and artists war council," which organization I understand has a communist as its secretary. This man has organized several branches and has brought into the organization some notable communists. I do not know if this is the same organization as the one known as " Writers, Artists, Broadcasters and Musicians Council, Incorporated," but if it is I suggest that they seek to protect themselves lest they become permeated with some one type of thought that will absolutely rule the roost.

I know the Minister of National War Services is a distinguished Canadian. I think he is one of Canada's great men, a man with a distinguished career. I am sure he desires to protect Canadians and the Canadian way of life, but I deplore some of the propaganda which is put over in Canada to-day. When I said I hoped that the short-wave station would sell Canada to the rest of the world, I implied that I hoped it would not sell Canada out to the rest of the world. I see grave danger in that direction, and I ask the minister to pay all possible attention to this matter in order that by this agency the Canadian way of life may be sustained and improved. In times gone by it has not been all that we wanted it to be. Nevertheles there are in our democracy many great virtues, which I should be sorry to see imperilled or impaired.

While I shall be criticized in some places for bringing this matter to the attention of the minister and parliament, I deem it proper to refer to the fact that already this writers' union, the Writers', Artists', Broadcasters' and Musicians' Council, Incorporated, have " regretted exceedingly " any reference made by " irresponsible parties " in parliament to communist writers. If a man is to be named an irresponsible individual because he warns Canada and warns parliament, we have come to a pretty pass. It is a duty of every member of this parliament to protect the welfare of Canada and Canadians, and there is no justification for assailing his integrity and sincerity because what he says does not suit some particular organization. I do not know why I am not entitled to demand some sort of investigation along that line.

In closing, I would impress on the minister that our short-wave radio station will probably be one of the most powerful of Canada's media of propaganda and dissemination of information to the rest of the world. I trust that the messages which go over that station will truly reflect to the world at large what sort of a nation we have, and call upon every one of us to do what we can to make this nation worthy of world publicity. The people of Canada are paying for this short-wave station; they are also paying into the dominion treasury some $3,500,000 in licence fees, and it is not well that they should pay these large sums only to find in the end that they have been "sold out." I know the minister is just as anxious as anyone to have our democratic way of life protected. I am sure he will find every member of parliament supporting his efforts in that respect.

Mr. HLYNKA: I should like to ask the minister a question on this item. As he knows, immediately after the outbreak of war this government by order in council banned all foreign languages from the air. Has the government given any consideration to lifting this restriction? If not, will such consideration be given to language groups in the near future? I have in mind such groups as the Ukrainians, the Poles and others. As the regulations stand, no foreign language can be used on the air except when one of the government departments sponsors the programme. I cannot see why I should not be permitted to speak to some of my older Ukrainian constituents in the Ukrainian language. If I should not I should like to know why.

Mr. LaFLECHE: The hon. member has brought up a point which has been under consideration for some considerable time. I think he will agree with my observation that there is an easing of the situation in this regard; there seems to be a decrease in the severity of outlook on the part of certain sections of the country. I believe it is now possible under certain circumstances to broadcast in languages other than English or French. At the moment I have not at hand the full details, but I understand that some provision has been made for that, although perhaps not on a very wide scale. I think that something like that is possible. I venture to believe that the question raised by the hon. member for Vegreville will continue to receive careful consideration in another quarter where matters having to do with radio broadcasting are under study at the present time.

As regards the observations of the hon. member for Macleod, he will be pleased to learn that there is now in training a small staff to make certain that the new short-wave broadcasting station at Sackville, New Brunswick, will get off to a good start, that we shall be ready for operations when the station is ready for inauguration.

I am not familiar with the circumstances referred to by the hon. member in his remarks concerning the members of some writers' union. But, in general relation to such things as that, I suggest that Canadians as a whole will see to it that the new broadcasting station is not abused, and if it were, there would be a quick, immediate reaction which would take to task the guilty person. What my hon. friend has said is, I am sure, well said in its generalities. I think he can have confidence in the watchfulness of the minister and of public opinion to ensure that nothing untoward shall occur.

Mr. REID: One question with regard to the short-wave staion: will it be powerful enough so that short-wave receiving sets in British Columbia will be able to receive it? I say that because there is not another province where the people are paying more and getting less from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation than the people on the Pacific coast. That so happens because the mountains are not conducive to speeches and programmes going over the air. Those who live on the Pacific coast know perfectly well that most of our programmes there are obtained from the United States, and we have long felt that we have a grievance in being called upon to pay $2.50 when we are limited to a radius of some eighty miles or so. If you had the most powerful radio station in Vancouver it would not get past the mountains. There are some parts of British Columbia where radio will not travel more than sixty miles. Will this short-wave station be powerful enough to meet all requirements? I urge that we have one on the Pacific coast so that we may be enabled to enjoy some of these programmes.

May I say one word with regard to the observations of the hon. member for Vegreville. He has championed the right of people to speak to those of a particular group in their own language. I am one of those who take strong exception to the tendency to build up in this country various foreign groups, representing different races with different languages. If we do not watch what we are doing, I suggest that we are in danger of having another continent of Europe here. I firmly believe that the fewer languages there are in the world, the more closely will people come together. In my district we have people from the old country—and when I say the old country I include Great Britain, Ireland and Scotland—

Mr. GRAYDON: And Wales.

Mr. REID: Yes, and Wales; I thank my hon. friend for reminding me, because they are Celts after all. I should not like to cut off people who come here from their native language, but when one finds people who have been in the country thirty, thirty-five and forty years stating quite frankly, in broken English, "Well, I speak Russian", or "I speak Polish", and so on, it seems to me that there is something wrong. The object of language is to enable us to understand one another. That is what speech is for, and I say without fear of contradiction that if this is a good land to live in it is a good land the language of which to learn. I am not saying anything against the older groups who come here, but I do not think we should encourage the practice of building up a little Ukraine, or Poland or Russia in this country. I am against that kind of thing. The more languages you have, the more trouble there will be.

However, what I rose particularly to ask the minister is this: What about a short-wave radio for British Columbia?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What about Gaelic?

Mr. GRAYDON: There is no answer to that.

Mr. LaFLECHE: It would be unfortunate if, as a result of the establishment of a new short-wave station in one province, each of the other provinces also asked for one. For the immediate present, it will satisfy my hon. friend the member for New Westminster to know I am informed that the new station at Sackville, it is hoped, will reach the residents of British Columbia, though it will be necessary, I am told, to use a particular beam for that purpose. The authorities have it in mind and I can only give him that information, which I hope will turn out to be correct.

Mr. REID: What about cutting our fees in half, seeing that we get only half a radio?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I am sure that at $2.50 per licence the inhabitants of British Columbia are getting a fine programme at very little cost. It works out at five cents a week.

Mr. REID: I am not so optimistic as the minister.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): I wish to say a few words on behalf of the inhabitants of northern British Columbia. We cannot get any reception except from the United States and Alaska. The broadcasting corporation two years ago built a line from Vancouver through the Cariboo up to Prince George. When they reach Prince George, however, they have not served the population in the northern section of British Columbia. The reason why they stopped there, we were told, was that the line between Prince George and Prince Rupert, which is 500 miles, was used by the militia. About three months ago the militia released two wires, and I have asked the broadcasting corporation to connect Prince Rupert, where there is a considerable population to be served, with the ground line. I have been told that owing to the expense this cannot be done. For the information of the minister I may say that they spent $50,000 to reach Prince George, where they had not much of a population to serve, and the rent of the ground wires to complete the connection will cost about $15,000 or $20,000 a year. I cannot see why they should stop at Prince George, before they reach the bulk of the population, and now that the facilities are there to enable them to extend the service to the population in the northern section of British Columbia they do not carry out this work because it will cost $15,000 or $20,000. I should like the minister to look into this matter. I have approached the chairman of the corporation and it seems that for the matter of a few thousand they cannot reach that population. We cannot get any outside service at all. This is a matter that the minister should look into. We have in the vicinity of Prince Rupert a population of 40,000 and the money that has been spent to reach Prince George serves only about 10,000, if that many. I cannot see any sense in connecting up the ground wires through a part of the country where there are no people and stopping short of the population that should be served. I would ask the minister to take this matter seriously into consideration.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I shall certainly see to it. I may be permitted to recall that special action was taken in regard to that part of British Columbia which is so dear to the heart of the hon. member for Skeena. His observations will be looked into.

Mr. GRAYDON: I should not say, perhaps, that I am out of order in discussing the matters which have been spoken to by others in reference to this item. I believe this has to do only with a short-wave broadcasting station and all those who have spoken about other matters are out of order. That being so, I am courageous in following them. However, I should like briefly to make three suggestions to the minister. I will not ask him to answer any questions because that might start a lengthy debate and I do not wish to bring that about.

First of all I wish to support the hon. member for Skeena in what he has said. I know something of the situation in that part of the country which I learned in the brief time in which I visited the Prince Rupert territory a year and a half ago, and therefore I add my voice to what he has said about the poor reception facilities in that important metropolis. May I say further to the minister in all seriousness with every bit of emphasis that I can summon: Do not allow the question of the permanent chairmanship and permanent general managership of the corporation to stand any longer. I have been attempting to impress upon the house and the government the necessity of this ever since the session started. I hope that in the interests of our national radio set-up the minister will not allow the delay to continue any longer. I shall not ask the minister when the new general manager and the new chairman will be appointed, but I trust that whatever is done it will be done quickly.

The third matter I should like to mention has to do with the commercial revenue of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. That revenue has increased from the $500,000, which was mentioned by the Minister of Munitions and Supply when radio came under his jurisdiction, to a top figure of $1,204,000. I am speaking only from memory, but I think my memory is correct on this point. In view of the fact that this revenue has broken through the ceiling which was mentioned by the minister, there is now a very good case for a review of this question by the minister with the object in mind of abolishing, if necessary, the radio licence fee. I do not say that in any desire to embarrass the minister, but the fee is a difficult one to collect.

The Canadian people are concerned about the number of demands for money at this time. The average person on the payrolls to-day is absolutely amazed at what he and his employer have to go through with respect to the various taxes that come off his salary. After those taxes have been collected it is very difficult for him to figure out what is left. The radio fee is another item. It is a small fee, it is true. What the minister said in his answer to the hon. member for New Westminster may in his own mind be appropriate, but I think there is a growing feeling throughout the country that either the radio corporation should bring its revenue into line with the revenue which the minister envisaged in the first place, or it should review the whole position with respect to radio licence fees.

As I say, I have no desire to inject anything that would be of a controversial nature at this time because I am as anxious as the minister to see this item carry as quickly as possible.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to ask a question. If this question is not in order the minister does not need to answer it. What is the radius of the Watrous station?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I am extremely sorry, but the officials have not the detailed information which would permit me to give a correct answer. It is a 50-kilowatt station and therefore of high power and should reach very far, depending, of course, upon the receptive conditions in various parts of the country which it serves. I can get the information and should be very happy to do so if the hon. member wishes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It is a very good station.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does it serve right down to the Arctic ocean?

Mr. LaFLECHE: It is believed that it does. I think the best thing for me to do is to get the proper information and give it to my hon. friend, if he wishes.

Item agreed to.

National Film Board—revolving fund for purchase of supplies, special war film library, $40,000.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Would the minister care to give the committee a report on the work of the national film board? I am particularly interested in the work of the board because of its educational features. According to the act which set up the board in 1939 the commissioner is appointed to give advice upon:

> . . . making and distributing of national films designed to help Canadians in all parts of Canada to understand the ways of living and the problems of Canadians in other parts; coordinate national and departmental film activities in consultation with the board and the several departments and branches of government work.

Will the minister tell us what other branches or departments of government make films and the relation of those departments to the national film board? To what extent does the national film board direct or correlate the work of other departments, and what other departments are interested in making, distributing and showing films?

I understand that the film board now has an extensive theatrical programme. I think there are three series of a theatrical nature, namely, "Canada Carries On", "World in Action", and a series of news items and news strips. Will the minister tell us something about these series and the number of audiences to which they are shown, if he has the information; the countries in which they are displayed and the languages used?

In the non-theatrical field I understand that the board produces films covering a large number of subjects. Could the minister tell us something of the variety of subjects with which the film board is concerned in the non-theatrical field, the languages in which those films are produced and the extent to which they are shown? I see that the sum of $845,000 is included in four items for this board. I presume that is chiefly for war purposes.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Entirely.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I find that there is a sum of $678,000 odd in the minister's civil estimates. I hope that when the time comes the board will no longer be required to devote its efforts to war; that not only the amount now available in the civil estimates will be expended but that we may be able to spend the amount which we are now spending on war to extend more cultural education to our people in peace time. There are many fields in which the board could operate, particularly in the immediate post-war period. There are many ways in which films can help with our rehabilitation programme. I am particularly anxious to see the film board take a much broader and more active part in the educational programme conducted in the schools throughout the land. I know that in that field we immediately run up against provincial prejudices. The minister has already pointed out the work that has been done by the armed forces educational programme and that it has gone far toward coordinating the educational work done in the different provinces. It has done something to stabilize education. I feel that there is an enormous field here for the national film board in the post-war period, just as there is in the field of adult education and in the field of agriculture. I would suggest to the minister that when the time comes for this board to divert its attention from war-time to peace-time activities consideration be given to some more permanent organization. It has been suggested to me, for instance, that the board be incorporated as a crown company, assisted by a grant from the treasury and managed by a board of directors on which the government, labour, farm organizations, educational associations and so on could have representation, in order that we may be able to make much greater use of the work of this board, which has been doing so well in this field up to the present time.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Of course we are now discussing items which come under the war appropriation and not items dealing with what are ordinarily termed civilian activities. The figures with regard to audiences are very interesting. As an example I would point out that about two million persons in Canada see each issue of the series called "World in Action". About two and a quarter million people in Canada see the "Canada Carries On" series. Non-theatrical films in Canada have an average audience of about a quarter of a million persons a month in the factories, and about 350,000 a month in the rural districts. "World in Action" films are shown in upwards of five thousand theatres in the United States. May I be permitted to place on record a brief yet fairly illustrative statement in regard to the activities of the national film board.

During 1943-44, as in previous years since the outbreak of war, the board has devoted a great part of its energies to the service of war departments of the government, and to a continuation of its own very extensive work in the field of wartime information. On the production side, among the departments which the national film board has served extensively are the three departments of national defence, the Department of Munitions and Supply, the national war finance committee, the wartime prices and trade board, the wartime information board and the Department of Labour. Its own programme of war information in the film field includes a continuation on a regular monthly basis of the two series of twenty-minute films issued under the general titles, "Canada Carries On" and "World in Action." These two series have achieved a remarkably wide theatrical distribution in Canada and abroad, and have earned for the national film board an enviable reputation for excellence in its field. Among the subjects issued in the "Canada Carries On" series during the past year have ben such pictures as "Up from the Ranks," "Train Busters," "Target Berlin," "Proudly She Marches," "Coal Face Canada," "Look to the North" and "Thought for Food." The "World in Action" series has included films on "Labour Front," "The War for Men's Minds," "The Fighting Dutch," "The Gates of Italy," "The Battle of Europe" and "Our Northern Neighbour." In additon to the two series I have mentioned, the national film board has continued its extensive service of Canadian pictures to newsreels published throughout the world, and the record in respect of the publication of these stories is a very impressive one. Apart from the French language versions of the "World in Action" and "Canada Carries On" series, a regular service of "Reportages" on matters connected with the war is maintained to French language theatres throughout the province of Quebec.

The distribution systems which have been established for the exhibition of films produced by the national film board and by others among our allies are no less impressive than the production record. The rural circuits, so-called, now serve on a monthly basis some 1,600 communities in the rural areas of Canada with programmes closely related to Canada's war effort, directed particularly, so far as interest is concerned, to agricultural audiences.

The industrial circuits reach more than 1,000 factories every month and, in collaboration with the various labour organizations and the workers' educational association, an extensive service to trade unions is maintained. This is in addition to the extensive film library system which is maintained in collaboration with local authorities throughout the country to serve audiences of every sort.

In the foreign field there has also been a gratifying extension of our distribution activity. The "World in Action" series continues to be distributed widely throughout the United States, the United Kingdom, Australasia and many other countries, and certain subjects in the "Canada Carries On" series considered suitable for international distribution have secured wide circulation in the United States, the United Kingdom, Australia and elsewhere. The newsreel stories released by the film board to newsreel editors have been issued throughout the world.

Early in 1943 the national film board assumed certain functions in relation to the production and distribution of still pictures which had formerly been performed by the wartime information board. This service has been continued and extended with highly satisfactory results in respect particularly of the distribution of still pictures in Canada and the United States. The work of the graphics division stills of the national film board has been considerably extended in response to the requirements of the armed services and other war departments. Services in respect of lay-out of publications, the preparation of photographic exhibits for educational and other purposes and the production of instructional film strips are now available at the national film board to all departments of government requiring these services. They are all being extensively used.

This is a very brief review of the board's activity, but it is enough, I think, to indicate that the work of the board is carried on with imagination and vitality.

Mr. ROWE: Does the film board collect any revenue, other than the estimates now before us?

Mr. LaFLECHE: The board does receive some revenue; the figure I have before me as the revenue from films last year is about $123,000. I trust that is the information sought by my hon. friend.

Mr. ROWE: Has the film board any private contracts with other companies for any service outside? Does it receive revenue?

Mr. LaFLECHE: The national film board does not produce film for other film companies. In that sense it is not in commercial production.

Mr. ROWE: Does it receive revenue from other departments of government?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Yes. Now I understand the information the hon. member requires. The national film board does a very great deal of work for other departments of government.

Mr. ROWE: What amount of work?

Mr. LaFLECHE: To begin with, it is the only producer of film in the government, with the possible exception of a very small occasional operation in one other department. That operation does not amount to very much. With that one exception all the old departmental activities in the film field have been centred in the national film board, and are carried out by it. Therefore it is the proper body to produce films when required by departments of government.

I have before me a table showing figures covering the work done for other departments of government. The moneys referred to were expended by and recovered in the national film board's allotments. This table shows the following:

Film production expenditure for other government departments	$ 683,114
Industrial circuits, other government departments	143,541
Department of National Defence, director of military training, prints	92,500
Department of National Defence, purchases, equipment and so on	105,000
National war savings committee, victory loan publicity	52,000
Graphics division, for other government departments	111,779
	$1,187,934

Mr. ROWE: The minister gave the figure of $123,000 as the amount received in revenue.

Mr. LaFLECHE: That was revenue from rental of films.

Mr. ROWE: That is in addition?

Mr. LaFLECHE: The latter figures show the work done by the national film board for the other departments. This means, of course, that those departments finance the operations.

Mr. ROWE: Is that money from the other department paid over to the film board?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Yes. When a requisition is made to the film board by a department of government it is accompanied by a financial encumbrance—really a passing over of credit to the film board.

Mr. ROWE: Is it then turned in to the consolidated revenue fund?

Mr. LaFLECHE: It is spent in the production of films ordered by the other departments.

Mr. ROWE: I have listened to the minister's brief review of the extensive work done by the board. I am sure we acknowledge the value of most of that work. But from the point of view of accounting it would seem rather misleading to the committee to find that when the general estimates come before the house a certain amount is allotted. Then, in connection with the war appropriations we find a larger sum of money, which is supposedly an amount of money to be spent by the film board.

However, we now find that the board actually collects another $1,187,000. When one tries to reconcile these figures with what appears in the public accounts he finds it even more misleading. No doubt the money has been spent, but we sit here and struggle by the hour to find out how it is spent. It would seem that we are dealing with a lesser amount of money than that actually spent by the board. In other words, more money, of which we hear nothing in parliament, is spent by the film board, than is spent under the estimates we pass. I do not for one moment suggest that it may or may not be properly spent. I believe I am fair when I say that more money is being spent this year than was spent last year.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Yes.

Mr. ROWE: And more money was spent last year than the year before. And if we continue there will likely be more money spent next year.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Depending upon necessities.

Mr. ROWE: I do not doubt but what the necessities will be very great. I realize that the film board can render a great service. I have seen many of the films it produces. I believe some of them we might do without, but others are necessary. Some of it is probably, as we have heard it said, for national unity in this country. We know that expression "national unity" has been hackneyed for twenty-five years.

Mr. HOMUTH: We have not got it.

Mr. ROWE: It is hard to tell whether it is to win the war, or for the unity of a certain political party. Perhaps it is for a certain amount of government advertising—that would be the more courteous way of putting it to the minister. However, in the public accounts of March 31, 1943, we find that vote 201 for the national film board, including the motion picture bureau, amounted to $237,000.

An hon. MEMBER: What page is that?

Mr. ROWE: Page N-5 of the public accounts for the year ending March 31, 1943.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend, but is he not referring to peace-time or ordinary civilian estimates?

Mr. ROWE: No; it is all in what was spent. I mention it only to make my point as to how bookkeeping is done in the department. I am not making any charge in connection with the manner in which the money is spent, but I am saying it would be fair if we could have a clearer picture than we have had presented to us.

Mr. LaFLECHE: My hon. friend will not object if I attempt to keep him from getting more disturbed or more unsettled.

Mr. HOMUTH: Oh, do not worry about our unsettlement.

Mr. ROWE: I would only say—

Mr. LaFLECHE: There is such a thing as courtesy in the House of Commons. I trust the hon. member who has just interrupted will remember that. I am trying to assist the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe, and I am sure he did not resent my attempting to point out to him that he might be more confused by attempting to take out from the auditor general's report that which deals with civilian estimates, when we are discussing war estimates.

Mr. ROWE: I thank the minister for trying to save me extra work. I do not want to hold up the estimates, and I think he will agree that I have not held up the war appropriations very much. But I should like to make a brief reference to this matter. The public accounts show vote 201, national film board, $237,000; also vote 428, further supplementary estimates, $75,000, and vote 417, cost of living bonus supplement, $1,500. The expenditures are shown as $311,456.08, leaving lapsed, $2,043.92. The comments on these expenditures illustrate the point I have in mind as to the manner in which these estimates are presented. They state:

> The following classes of expenditures were incurred: (a) salaries and expenses covering the cost of production and distribution . . .

And again:

> It will be noted that the following lists of salaries, travelling expenses and vendors exceed in total the allotments authorized, the explanation being that this appropriation was credited with the costs recovered from other departments.

I presume that would be an amount similar to the $1,187,000, and we have in the general estimates a vote of around $400,000 or $500,000. We have before us to-night an estimate for national war services amounting to $845,000, but this committee has had no opportunity to consider how this money is being spent. It may be necessary, in time of war, to have a great deal of bureaucracy, a great deal of control, and the passing of orders in council in the east block even when parliament is sitting and the matters covered could well be discussed here, but it does seem to me that we should have before us the total expenditures rather than a small part of them. We have been told what has been collected from other departments, amounts such as $683,000, $143,000, $92,500, $115,000, $52,000, $111,000 and $123,000; these amounts were paid for rental of films and produced a total revenue of upwards of $1,200,000.

The general estimates for 1944-45 refer only to twenty-five people who are paid salaries, but when you look into the public accounts you find that for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1943, there was a total of 375 employees paid from this vote. The comments read:

> The following table shows those who were paid at the rate of $2,400 per annum or over at that date, or at date of separation (shown in bracket), as well as travelling expenses where the amount was in excess of $300.

Unless the travelling expenses paid were $300 or over they were not shown in the public accounts, and only the salaries of $2,400 and over are shown. I do not doubt that the money received from other departments was properly spent and I do not intend to imply that it was not, but I contend that we have the right to discuss those expenditures. Surely we do not have to throw away all our rights of discussing these matters merely because we are at war. As I said before, we have gladly sacrificed many rights and we have accepted many restrictions and are ready to accept many more, but it seems to me that it is too much to expect us to take unnecessary ones without bringing them to the attention of the committee.

Details of general receipts, which I presume are similar to the ones the minister read off, appear in the public accounts. There are items for the wartime information board, $677,000; wartime prices and trade board, $55,000; national defence, $203,000, and so on. I have no doubt that this money was well spent. Then particulars are given only for payments over $5,000. I submit that we as members of parliament and as members of this committee have had no opportunity of knowing what was done with a great portion of this million and a quarter dollars. Yet we have spent hours discussing what we thought were the expenditures of the film board. The amounts in the general estimates are much less than what has been received, and this greater expenditure has been made without this committee giving the film board authority to make it. The payments over $5,000 include Action Film Company, Chicago, $8,530; Associated Screen News Limited, $157,000, and so on through a long list which I shall not read.

I totalled up roughly what was received by the film board and it coincides approximately with the figure the minister gave. It is about $1,200,000, this being the amount received in the year just passed. I presume the figures up to March 31, 1944, will not be out until next year.

Mr. HOMUTH: They will not be here to give them.

Mr. ROWE: The amounts received from the different departments are considerably in excess of what has been paid out. The board received about $1,200,000, and there is a vote for $840,000, or a total of about $2,000,000. As I say, the general estimates deal only with about twenty-five salaried people, compared with 375 that are actually paid. In other words, we have been passing a vote to pay about twenty-five people, whereas the film board has been paying the salaries of approximately 375 people.

It seems to me that the film board should take the money received from other departments, deposit it in the consolidated revenue fund and then ask for a vote to cover its total expenditure rather than ask for a smaller amount and leave it to the committee to guess what kind of inside bookkeeping is being done. As I say, I am not implying that the money received from the other departments is not properly spent, but I claim it is our right to know how the $1,200,000 received from these other departments has been spent. If this money has been received for services rendered by the film board and provided for by the initial vote, then it should be deposited in the consolidated revenue fund so that this committee can deal with it as we deal with other matters.

Mr. MARSHALL: Are we not wandering far afield in this discussion? I do not think I need to come to the rescue of the minister because he can look after himself, but I think we are confusing two totally different votes. The vote here under the heading of war appropriation on page 398 of Hansard, February 11, covers specific items and totals $845,500. There is another vote, 194, in the estimates, under the heading of "national war services (other than war appropriations)" amounting to $678,806. I contend that most of the discussion which has taken place deals with that civil estimate and has nothing whatever to do with the estimate which is before the committee under the heading of the war appropriation.

Mr. LaFLECHE: The hon. member for Camrose has it correctly.

The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe, as best I could understand it, was really speaking about the civilian vote for last year as reflected in the auditor general's report for the year ended March 31, 1943, and the hon. member seemed not to agree or to understand that it is quite in order, although he may recall that for years and years it has been the practice, when circumstances so dictated, that one department would supply another department with a given amount of money to do a certain piece of work. That is not a new practice; it has been operative for years and years and I presume will be for years to come. How else could it be in view of the provision of the National Film Board Act that the board shall be the one organization in the federal government to do film work? The only other way would be that all the departments should ask the national film board to make up a combined budget and to put it through the house in that form. But I wonder whether that would be good accounting practice. As I recall it, that would not have been acceptable to previous auditors general, because those gentlemen have always wanted the requiring departments to show in their estimates the money they want for their own requirements. I suggest to the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe that if he will study the matter in the light of my remarks he may be satisfied in that connection. When a department requires some film work it must place an item in its budget or at least come to this house to get the required financial authority to spend money. But in that case the requirement is a departmental one; it has to do with the Department of National Defence or of Munitions and Supply or of Labour, or whatever it may be. The amounts for which I come to this committee to request its approval have to do rather with national objects. The amounts of money requested by the national film board are not for the requirements of one department but for general national purposes.

Mr. ROWE: They will appear in the public accounts, of course.

[Mr. Marshall.]

Mr. LaFLECHE: The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe took me politely to task for not explaining the details of this vote. Well, I was doing so when my hon. friend rose, and had I been permitted I would have gone on and given him the break-down of the $845,500, and if it pleases the committee I should very much like to do so now.

Mr. ROWE: I do not want the minister to delay his own estimates.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Well, I have answered my hon. friend. I have given him what I think is the proper interpretation, the correct routine, based upon my knowledge of what previous auditors general have wanted. I must say, however, that the auditor general writes and publishes his own report. One knows what is in it only after it is published.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, I have given a correct explanation and I suggest that I have given a very satisfying one.

Mrs. NIELSEN: Before this item passes I should like to say a little about the work of the film board. It is true that we are spending considerable sums of money upon the work of the board; but when we come to consider the importance of the film as a medium for the advancement of our prestige in the world generally, and the part it plays within Canada itself, I believe that these expenditures are well justified.

The minister mentioned the fact that one of the most successful of the series, known as "The World in Action", had been widely distributed. I do not know what the distribution is in Britain, but in the United States it goes to about five or six thousand theatres every month. So good has this series become that the columnist Dorothy Thompson recently devoted to it a whole section of her column. She said that the film board of Canada had set the world an example in supplying national and international information, something for which the board should receive commendation.

I sincerely hope that it will be part of government policy to continue the work of the film board, which has been done so admirably in war, into the peace period; in other words, to carry on the advertising of Canada. Reference was made once this evening to the advertising which will be done over the air by broadcast, and I think we must not minimize the value of the film in this direction. There is no doubt that by influencing public opinion the film is useful in establishing in the minds of people abroad the fact that Canada is a potential market, and it keeps the channels of public information very well supplied. I can look back with some amusement at the ideas I had of Canada before I came to this country; they were quite fantastic, although I was probably quite an ordinary product of the British educational system. All over the world people may still have rather strange ideas, if not quite so funny as were my own; but during the war, with our boys going overseas and by other means, people abroad have a better idea of Canada than I had many years ago. Nevertheless to-day, when Canada is the world's third trading nation, we realize that in the future we shall have competition in Europe from both Britain and the United States. Both these countries will use the film as a very popular medium to press their claims for trade and markets, and in this matter Canada must not be left behind. We must do everything in reason to let the people of Europe, Britain and the United States of America know the potentialities of our country, not merely through government departments and bodies of that kind, but through the medium of the film, which gets right to the people.

But it is not only in the fields of trade and commerce that the film is useful; it has great value in establishing cultural relations with other nations. These associations may be intangible things, but many qualities of the heart and the mind—the love of beauty, the appreciation of art for its own sake—are universal.

A little while ago I went to see the showing of one of the films which are exhibited on Tuesday and Thursday evenings here in the house, and I saw something which stayed in my mind for a long while. It was a little gem in technicolor, called "The West Wind", a small short film to commemorate the life and art of one of our great Canadian artists, Tom Thompson. Films of this kind would link us to the peoples of other countries in very subtle bonds. They would have greater strength, in my opinion, than many material things, and these films also arouse in Canadians a great feeling of pride, to think that they belong to a country which has produced men who loved Canada so intensely and who were capable of reproducing her wild loveliness for the peoples of other nations to see.

There is one other series known as "Canada Carries On", which has done, I believe, remarkable work in bolstering and stimulating public morale in the days of war. The minister gave figures of the people who see these films every week. I should like to see the series carried on in the period of reconstruction, because in that rather difficult time, when many people will have to make adjustments to peace-time living, it will be very necessary to bolster the morale of Canadians and infuse in them a feeling that the period of reconstruction is one in which they have an active part in building up the economy and the happiness of the Canadian nation.

With regard to my own people back in the northern part of Saskatchewan, I would urge that some of the rural circuits which the film board conducts might be stretched to reach out farther into the north country. I know these circuits do go into the southern part of the riding, but my people in the northern areas are the persons who need it more than any others, because ordinary films do not reach them. They do not have so many towns and villages where they can see the ordinary shows, and to have these circuits go into the northern areas would be greatly appreciated by the farmers. Films which deal with farm problems, food and nutrition, cattle raising, implements and all the questions connected with farm work would be very helpful to these people, and it is a pity they have not yet been able to have these films.

The last thing particularly is this. I should like to see the minister take into special consideration the great possibilities opening up before us in the field of education, not only the education of our children, but public education generally.

With regard to the work of the film board at the present time, I know they have a service in which they lend films to clubs and to certain scientific groups, without charge except the cost of postage and so on, but I would envisage something in the educational line far in advance of anything we have now. I should like to see libraries of films for circulation among the rural schools in Saskatchewan. The children in the cities have access first of all to the regular films more often than the children in the rural areas. They have access also to public libraries and to other means whereby they can increase their education. But the rural child is cut off terribly from all these other sources. I should like to see a special department built up within the film board, where we would have educationists whose sole job would be to prepare films in various branches of education, particularly for the use of rural schools. Teachers would find this of tremendous value, and the children would greatly benefit by it.

Having myself taught in rural schools, I know the problems that the rural teachers have. A little group of children in a country school on the prairies of Saskatchewan, learning their first lesson in physical geography, will be told of the source of rivers coming from glaciers and so on. But what conception have the prairie children of these things? Put before them a technicolour film showing the Rocky mountains, showing the source of the Athabaska or the Saskatchewan river, and you have something of great beauty, depicting the great possibilities of Canada. That is ingrained in the children's minds, so that it will never be lost.

I particularly commend the film board for their work in this connection and urge the minister, in the field of education, to go farther than we have done so far.

Mr. GREEN: There is a new vote here in connection with still photographs, the amount being $115,500. Will the minister explain what that covers? What proportion of these films are made in Canada; are any taken outside of Canada, and, if so, to what extent?

Mr. LaFLECHE: This is what is now known as the stills production and distribution branch or section of the national film board. We have in these estimates an item of $115,500 for the purpose. This allotment is intended to cover the cost of certain work produced by the graphics division of the national film board. This division combines the facilities of the former stills section of the national film board and the photographic and art sections of the wartime information board. There has been a fusion of the two. The graphics division makes pictures for almost every government department, illustrating their work and providing information on all phases of their activities. Such work is paid for by the departments concerned.

The following is a brief summary of the work produced by the graphics division in the past fiscal year: Production in Canada of 15,320 negatives; production of 162,565 prints; distribution of prints and mats to newspapers and periodicals in Canada; distribution of 185,266 prints and mats to newspapers and periodicals in the United States, and distribution of prints to newspapers and periodicals in the other nations of the commonwealth.

The subjects covered include the great power dam at Shipshaw, the aircraft industry, research enterprises, tank and artillery arsenals, optical instruments industry, shipbuilding, chemicals and explosives, Sitka spruce and plywood industry, lake shipping, Alaska highway, coal mining production, first Lancaster bomber, the Quebec conference, mutual aid to Russia, Australia and India, rationing and price control, wartime housing, et cetera.

It has developed rapidly into a worth-while section of the national film board. This fusion represents what was taken by the wartime information board from the old public information board, and what they had in the national film board. From this they made this new division of graphic stills. It has done excellent work, and its activities, I think, will be bound to increase in keeping with the demand for its services.

Mr. GREEN: The minister did not explain about the percentage of films taken out of Canada.

Mr. LaFLECHE: These are not moving-picture films. All still photographs taken by this section are taken in Canada.

Mr. GREEN: What about moving pictures? Are any taken out of Canada?

Mr. LaFLECHE: The exception is that of films on labour management which are sent to the United Kingdom. That is the only exception.

Mr. GREEN: All the rest are made in Canada? They are all moving pictures?

Mr. LaFLECHE: They are not moving pictures. They are still photographs.

Mr. GREEN: It is my fault. I asked two questions. My second question really had to do with moving pictures. Are all moving pictures taken by the film board of events that are happening in Canada, or are there moving pictures made outside of Canada, and, if so, to what extent?

Mr. LaFLECHE: With the one exception, the films taken on labour management. They are taken in England. That is the one exception. Let us not forget that the armed forces have their moving-picture cameras. We are very fortunate in receiving the results of their work. Those pictures are turned in to the national film board for distribution; also the cutting and putting together of the news reels and distribution thereof are done by the national film board. If I may express a hope it would be that the work should be increased as much as possible. I know the national film board does take the position that the Canadian public must see more and more of our boys who are away from home, some of whom have been away for a long time.

Mr. GREEN: Are the moving pictures of the forces taken by the national film board or by the respective forces?

Mr. LaFLECHE: By the service personnel, but many of the service personnel have been trained by the national film board in Ottawa.

Mr. HOMUTH: Who pays the bill for the taking of the films by the various active service forces?

Mr. LaFLECHE: The active forces themselves.

Mr. GREEN: That would come out of the army vote, the navy vote or the air force vote?

Mr. LaFLECHE: That is right.

Mr. HOMUTH: When the films are turned over to the film board is there any charge to the national film board by the various branches of the services? In other words, if the taking of the film of the Dieppe raid cost $100,000, is that charged against the national film board, or is there any charge like that?

Mr. LaFLECHE: There is no such charge for this reason: The armed services turn in these films to the national film board for printing, perhaps, but at least for distribution. It is through that medium that the work of the army, the navy or the air force movie photographers reach the public.

Mr. MacNICOL: What effort, if any, is made by the national film board to carry to the people in remote areas pictures pertaining to Canada's part in the war? They could not send movies to the far remote areas, but still pictures could be sent. Are films sent to the Hamilton river in Labrador where we have troops and radio mechanics? Are pictures sent up to Moosonee in northern Ontario where there is quite a settlement of people but no theatre, or to Churchill at the mouth of the Churchill river, or Chipewyan on lake Athabaska, or to Box on the same lake? or to Yellowknife or Great Slave lake, and on down to Aklavik at the mouth of the Mackenzie river? Does the national film board enlighten the Canadians in those remote areas on the wonderful work Canadians are doing?

Mr. LaFLECHE: May I say in a word that all the production of the national film board is available to the Canadian armed forces, whether they be in camps in one part of Canada or in the farthest and most isolated parts of the country. Everything that the national film board has is available to our boys in uniform. The way in which it gets to them is through certain welfare officers of the forces. They organize sports, entertainment and recreation for our young men in these camps. There is such an organization, for instance, in the army in each of the military districts of the country, and the proper officer makes arrangements to get the films that he wants. They are available to him, and in every possible way the showing of these films is facilitated and encouraged. That is the answer in so far as the members of the armed forces are concerned.

Then, there are the rural film circuits mentioned a moment ago by the hon. member for North Battleford. The rural film circuits are, to our knowledge, very much appreciated indeed, and it will please the hon. member for North Battleford to know that there is already under consideration the extension of those circuits far afield which will take in the riding represented by the hon. member.

Mr. MacNICOL: Most of the areas to which I refer are much farther remote than those referred to by the hon. member for North Battleford. In only one area to which I referred, namely, the area on the Hamilton river in Labrador, would there be any troops. All the other places to which I referred are remote areas of northern Ontario and small centres like Chipewyan on lake Athabaska. There would not be over two hundred people there altogether. I have wondered for a long time what means or methods are applied in those remote areas to enable the people to see a picture occasionally.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I take it that the hon. member for Davenport has in mind the civilian population?

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes.

Mr. LaFLECHE: We have already covered this evening the case of the members of the armed forces. The recreation and amusement of the civilians, of course, is left to private initiative. But the rural film circuits, as I said a moment ago, are being increased in number and extended so as to cover the greater part of Canada, in the hope that before very long the time will come that wherever there is a reasonable number of persons it will be possible to send films to them; but it requires the demand and the cooperation of, say, the two hundred persons in the isolated community mentioned by the hon. member for Davenport. There is a desire on the part of the national film board to do that, but it requires the people concerned in those areas to make known their desires to make it possible to have a showing there.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would the films be sent free to them?

Mr. LaFLECHE: The films of the rural film circuits are provided without charge, yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am glad that the committee is giving some attention to the rural films. I know that in my part of Canada, Saskatchewan, the work that has been done by the rural film circuits is greatly appreciated by everybody and the films are of a very high order. Unfortunately I was called out of the chamber a few moments ago and was not present at all the discussion. Would the minister give us the number of projectionists who are undertaking this work in the various rural parts of Canada? While I do not want to ask a number of questions separately because I want to assist in expediting the work of the committee, I should like to ask if the minister could give the committee, if he has not already done so, some outline of the use that is being made of our films in South America, the United States and elsewhere. From time to time in magazines and newspapers, not only those devoted to the film industry but such publications as Time, we have read complimentary references to the documentary and other films that have been put out by the national film board. I was wondering if the minister could give us some idea of the amount of work that has been undertaken, because I believe this service which the film board is rendering, not only to our own rural communities, which is very important, but also to the country at large in making Canada better known in South America, the United States and, of course, Great Britain, is something of which this House of Commons should have greater knowledge and appreciation. After all, the amount of money which is being spent may look very large to some people, but in my opinion the returns the country is getting from this expenditure far exceed the amount of money we are appropriating. I think some of us in this house who appreciate the work that is being done should endeavour to get for ourselves and for the country a clear outline of the valuable work this organization is doing for the dominion as a whole at the present time. To my mind the documentary films that are being made, and the many thousands of feet, I imagine, of film from which these films are being cut, are of great historical value to us.

I have another thought in that connection. Sometimes I wonder as to the wisdom of allowing these valuable documents concerning the war and the war effort to remain in a building which has struck me from time to time as being something of a fire-trap. I think the time has come—perhaps this cannot be done now in the middle of the war, when priorities may be against it—when plans should be laid, with the encouragement of this parliament, for a proper place where these valuable documents may be housed with no danger of being destroyed by fire at some time in the future; and where the facilities for the people who work on the production of these films will reflect some credit upon the country and the orgainzation. Personally, having had some experience in education, I believe that visual education will play a much bigger part in the future than it has done in the past, and that only an organization of the type of which the foundations are now being laid in the national film board can adequately perform the duties that will be necessary in order to supply our educational institutions with the films that will be required in the future. These very films we are discussing to-night, having to do with the war and Canada's war effort, while they are interesting to our people at the present time will be of much greater interest in the years to come. Twenty, thirty, fifty or one hundred years from now the library of films being built up, and the documents being collected to-day by the national film board, will be of supreme interest; and anything we as a parliament can do to assist in this valuable work should be done.

I asked the minister one or two questions, and I should like to hear something in reply if the minister is in a position to give it.

Mr. LaFLECHE: The national film board is now operating a total of eighty-two rural film circuits. There is every desire to increase that number as it can be done properly and efficiently; as I said before, it is hoped to be able in due course to cover much more of the rural parts of Canada.

The number of 35 and 16-millimetre films sent out last year from Canada by the national film board to a number of countries, I believe some thirty in all, was 2,503. The list is quite formidable. It may be interesting if I quickly read the list of countries to which the national film board has sent films: the United States, Great Britain, the U.S.S.R., Australia, India, the British West Indies, Newfoundland, New Zealand, South Africa, Egypt, Argentina, Chile, Brazil, Mexico, Cuba, Porto Rico, Greenland, Iceland, Colombia, Panama, Peru, Dominica, Nicaragua, Uruguay, San Salvador, Costa Rica, Venezuela, Ecuador, Honduras and Guatemala.

Mr. COLDWELL: Any idea how many people see these films or in how many theatres they are shown, both the shorts and the full length films?

Mr. LaFLECHE: We sent these films on request, so that we know they are to meet a demand. We have not a proper report which would enable us to say what have been the audiences to see the different films; I am afraid that would be beyond us.

Mr. COLDWELL: Could the minister give us an estimate of the number of theatres in which these films are regularly shown?

Mr. LaFLECHE: We know that in the United Kingdom our films are shown in over a thousand theatres and in the United States in over five thousand. We believe that the total of such theatres in all countries would be upwards of eight thousand.

Mr. COLDWELL: How many projectors has the film board available now for these rural circuits in Canada which we have been discussing?

Mr. LaFLECHE: We have a sufficient number now.

Mr. COLDWELL: What is the number?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Eighty-two.

Mr. COLDWELL: Eighty-two projectors?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: And they are fully equipped?

Mr. LaFLECHE: They are portable and fully equipped, and there are trained projectionists.

Mr. COLDWELL: How many trained projectionists are there?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Well, we have a sufficient number to run the eighty-two circuits. In some cases, perhaps in twenty per cent of the total number of circuits, the board has the assistance of trained personnel supplied by local organizations. As I said before, this matter is run well, largely because of the good coordination and cooperation of all concerned.

The hon. member said something about safer quarters. I am very happy to say that as far as possible we have removed all fire hazards from the quarters of the film board on Sussex street in Ottawa. The board hopes that some day it will have a proper building for its head offices, laboratories and factory. Of course there is need for that. Making film is a hazardous occupation, and it is not always agreeable to other business houses to have film made in a neighbouring building; I do not believe the fire underwriters like it very much. Nevertheless it is hoped that some day. not too far distant, there will be safety vaults and good modern buildings to meet the requirements of the national film board.

Mr. COLDWELL: Are these projectionists on the regular staff of the film board?

Mr. LaFLECHE: On a particular staff—the rural circuit system staff.

Mr. COLDWELL: Are they equipped by the film board to do the job? For example, have they adequate facilities for servicing rural schools with the necessary electrical power to make satisfactory projections, and are they adequately remunerated for the job they are doing? Do they supply their own motor cars; does the film board supply a van, or how is it worked?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I thought it might have been taken for granted that the units were self-sufficient; otherwise they could not operate. That is made possible by the fact that some of them generate their own electricity. They have a system to do that, and they are self-sufficient. The trained projectionists are paid at trade union rates. They are proficient; they are trained and, as I said before, they work well with the local people who are interested in showing these films.

Mr. COLDWELL: Do they have any trouble in getting gasoline and tires? Are they given good priority?—because this is important in the rural areas.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I have heard no complaints on that score. It is necessary, of course, that they be economical in their use of gasoline and tires.

Mr. CRERAR: As a member of the film board, along with my colleague the Minister of National War Services, who is its chairman, I should like very warmly to support the general tenor of the observations made a few moments ago by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. The Minister of National War Services has given the committee a good deal of detailed information respecting the operations of the board, the countries in which these pictures made in Canada circulate, and approximately the number of people who see them.

Irrespective of our political affiliations I think we can all agree that this is a great service, and that it is well worth while to have Canadian pictures of Canadian scenes, Canadian life and Canadian activities shown regularly in over 5,000 theatres in the United States and over 1,000 theatres in Great Britain, as well as in theatres in practically every country in the world. I know of nothing which will more effectively broaden in every way the information people desire to have about their neighbours than the agency of films. I think, too, it is an important factor in the promotion of international good will. If we have pictures of Canadian life and Canadian activities shown to the peoples of other countries they come to a clearer understanding and a better knowledge of the kind of country Canada is, and what its people are like.

The more I see of the work done by the film board, the more I am convinced of its great utility to Canada. I wish to pay tribute to those who are actively associated in the work of producing and distributing these pictures. While I do not wish to mention any names, I must say we are very fortunate in having associated with the work of production and distribution people with keen imagination and great energy.

Undoubtedly the film can be made a tremendous agency for sound education. After all, people learn readily through the visual processes, and receive impressions that are probably more lasting and more permanent than might be obtained through reading—or even, Mr. Chairman, than they might learn by listening to speeches in the House of Commons. Therefore the value of this agency is disseminating information can scarcely be measured. I look upon it as an important factor not only in the international sphere, but also as an agency for great good within Canada itself.

In the last forty years I have travelled a good deal over this country. There are not many parts of it which at some time or another I have not visited.

Mr. HOMUTH: You missed Waterloo.

Mr. CRERAR: What has struck me is this: I may go to the maritime provinces and find that they do not know very much about the problems or the living conditions of people in Alberta. The people of Ontario know comparatively little about the activity and way of life of, or what the people in British Columbia are thinking about. Newspapers do not circulate much as between these different parts of Canada. I recall being in Vancouver many years ago, and, while there, staying at the Vancouver hotel. I went to the hotel newsstand to buy a Winnipeg paper, but there was not one to be had; nor could I get a Toronto paper.

Mr. GREEN: You went to the wrong stand.

Mr. CRERAR: They may have more since then.

Mr. HOMUTH: Not much.

Mr. CRERAR: But I must say that I could have bought any one of a dozen United States papers at the same news stand. The thought struck me: How are we to hold this country together? How are we to build up this thing we call national unity—for which I believe there is a definite need, to serve a definite purpose.

Through the agency of films a tremendous amount can be done in that direction. We can have films made showing the activities of the fishermen of Nova Scotia. Those films can be shown on the prairies. We can have films made of the activities of the lumbermen of British Columbia, and they can be shown in Ontario and Quebec. Pictures can be made of rural life in Quebec, and distribution could be carried out across Canada. We could produce films—we have produced some—showing the potentialities of our great north land, and give our people an understanding of a part of the country concerning which they know very little.

I apologize for taking up this time, because I know the minister is anxious to have his estimates passed, but as a result of my association with the work of the film board in the last few years I am sure there is no vote coming before the committee which I could more willingly support than the one we are now discussing. I doubt if in the long run, particularly in the educational field, there is any vote the expenditure of which is doing more good.

Mr. HOMUTH: I agree with everything the minister has said. There is nothing better than a picture to build up in the minds of the people something of the potentialities of Canada. I think the greatest disappointment I ever had in my life was when I first saw a circus. I had seen an elephant in pictures and it was nothing new to me to see one in the circus. I had also seen tigers and lions. While I had never seen monkeys in pictures, I had seen some of them in public life. But the fact of the matter is that the whole thing was spoiled because it was nothing new to me.

I think something such as the minister has suggested is the only thing we can do to teach the people in the different parts of this country to appreciate the other parts. They must be shown films of the different sections of the dominion. People have visualized the Rockies who have never seen the Rockies and never will. People have visualized the valleys and farms and the fisheries and shipping of the maritimes when they will never see them in fact. It is a tremendous job that this film board has to do.

But sometimes I wonder if we are just as honest in connection with these estimates as we ought to be. I think it is nearly time we realized that the people love expenditures, provided that they produce dividends. What do we find in connection with the estimates of the film board? A year or two ago Mr. Grierson, the head of the board, received $6,000. He was then made the head of the wartime information board at an increased salary of $10,000. He was then brought back to the film board, and I understand his salary was the same.

I wonder whether in our desire to try to hide expenditures, in our desire to try to tell the Canadian people what we are doing without letting them know the cost, we are not actually doing more harm than good. There is nothing better than giving the people an honest picture of just what is happening in these matters. I believe that if the government said, "We are going to find a man who will be able to publicize Canada to Canadians, who can publicize Canada to the world, and we will pay him $15,000 or $20,000, if necessary." I do not think the public generally would criticize such an expenditure which might bring back such large dividends.

This may be done by our ministers in an effort to avoid criticism, but I do not know. The leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation a short time ago questioned whether projectionists were receiving enough money. I question that also. I know something of their activities. I know something of the good that these films have done in our industries and rural schools. None of these men is receiving anything like the wages that are being paid to many workmen in our factories. If there is any authority in this country that ought to set a standard of wages it is the government. The government should pay salaries sufficiently large to bring from private enterprise the best men available.

I do not say this in an attempt to criticize Mr. Grierson. However, I feel that we ought to be truthful with the people and let them know just what the position is. I commend the minister for the work this board is doing, because I think it is a great work and they should expand it. They could go much farther than they have, but I feel we should be frank with the people in so far as the public accounts are concerned.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I hasten to rise to point out to the hon. member for Waterloo South that while it may be innocence on his part, he has done a great wrong to a valued civil servant. In talking about the present film commissioner, Mr. John Grierson, and about hiding of expenditures, I do not think he could have found a more impossible or extravagant illustration. The gentleman he has named was raised to a salary of $10,000 a year in November, 1941. His going to the wartime information board had nothing whatsoever to do with his salary, because he was receiving that salary before he went to that board. He continued to receive the same salary after he finished his term of office with the wartime information board. It must be remembered that Mr. Grierson was not transferred permanently to the wartime information board; he took on that extra work, stating in advance that it would be only for a certain number of months. I am sure the hon. member for Waterloo South will not mind this correction.

In connection with projectionists I stated to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that they are being paid in accordance with trade union rates or understanding. They receive about $140 a month with cost of living bonus. I agree that this is not a great deal of money, but on the other hand they seem to live well enough. There is no trouble with them and there are many persons who want these positions. It is not a bad life since they move around and see lots of people. I say these things because sometimes a word said in error goes far afield and truth does not catch up to it.

Mr. COLDWELL: While we cannot compete with so-called enterprise in the payment of salaries, I think if we want to get the best people in the public service we shall have to make conditions more attractive than they are. We cannot continue to employ people in the public service if we underpay them, and that is what we are doing throughout the civil service. When the estimates of the Minister of Agriculture were before us we were discussing veterinary surgeons and we found that the salaries paid were simply scandalous.

I am not so sure that these projectionists are getting trade union rates in terms of a yearly salary. From the few of them I have met, my observation has been that while they receive $140 a month and a certain allowance for their cars, they must provide the cars. If my recollection is correct they are paid about seven cents a mile for gasoline, tires, repairs and so on, but I believe sometimes they use the car engine to generate power and I do not know whether they are paid for that. If they are receiving only $140 a month for doing this kind of work, they are underpaid. In order to have people who can present these films in an acceptable manner you must have persons with some education.

From time to time I have listened to some of these projectionists exhibit films and I have been pleased indeed with the type of men who are doing this work. They were able to present the film in a manner which interested the people who were taking advantage of the particular rural show. It seems to me that our ideas with regard to educational and cultural activities are all wrong. While we cannot hope to compete with business concerns in the salaries we pay, we should pay sufficient to maintain these people in adequate comfort. When we consider the responsibility entailed in making these films and then compare the remuneration of the chief of the branch or his assistants with the salaries paid by business concerns, we seem to be paying virtually nothing at all. I am not suggesting that we pay fabulous sums, but in all our cultural activities—in films, in broadcasting, and in the realm of education—we ought to give greater encouragement financially and in terms of security than we are giving to-day. I hope that we may be reassessing these cultural activities and that we shall place them on a better footing than they have been. I do not think we are paying anybody connected with the national film board too much; I have no doubt from what I know that we are paying too little, as we are paying too little in so many of our departments. Take our research council; the salaries of our scientists there are something of a public scandal. We have the responsibility of giving greater encouragement to the able and often brilliant young men and women who might be tempted to go into some private industry but who remain in the public service because they wish to develop it as a life work and do something worth while for the country in which they live.

Mr. ESLING: Are rural circuits proportioned to our province according to population? Also, are slides available for educational purposes for the school children? It is difficult to imagine anything more interesting or of more value to school children than each Saturday afternoon to have a showing of the slides of various parts of the provinces and the dominion, in auditoriums and various local schools, and in community halls in rural districts where they never see such a thing as a film and where nevertheless there are good-sized communities, perhaps of two or three hundred people. A private entertainment concern would never go there. This service could be accomplished very readily and at little expense if a certain number of slides were allocated to each community, we will say for Saturday afternoons, upon request of the principal of the high school or of the public school, so that somebody would be responsible. The educational value would be marked.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I am grateful to the hon. member for Kootenay West, and I am sure he will be pleased to know that these rural circuit projectionists do, as a matter of course, give a showing in the afternoon in the local school for the school children when the projectionists go to a given point to provide displays, say in the evening, for the adult population. The point made by my hon. friend is an excellent one. As I said before, the service is being gradually increased as there is demand and, in the case of rural circuits, provincial cooperation.

Mr. ESLING: For instance, if the principal of a high school made a request for a certain number of slides to fill in a programme for Saturday afternoon for educational purposes, would the board send those slides? Also, are there any rural circuits in British Columbia? I have never seen one. Nor have I ever seen a display of government films.

Mr. LaFLECHE: There are rural circuits in British Columbia; and as for high school principals or school principals obtaining, I do not say prints, but films, they can be had from what we term the national film board libraries, scattered here and there. If my hon. friend has any particular point in view and would care to write to the film board, his request will receive every possible consideration.

Mr. COLDWELL: To what extent are departments of education interested in the kind of thing that the hon. member for Kootenay West has mentioned?

Mr. LaFLECHE: The provincial departments of education are very much interested in this.

Mr. COLDWELL: Are plans being worked out? I think every school nowadays should have a machine. Many schools, of course, with which I am acquainted have them.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I could hardly undertake that the national film board would provide them.

Mr. COLDWELL: Oh, I do not mean that. I do not want to be misunderstood. I mean that every school district should provide itself with a machine.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I agree.

Mr. COLDWELL: Then, perhaps, through the national film board, a series of still pictures, slides, and films could be provided and could circulate like a library from school to school.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Right now the film board is working along those lines. We have already established film libraries; and, to make it practical, if anyone interested would care to write, every assistance would be afforded.

Mr. MARSHALL: I heartily concur in all the remarks which have been made with respect to the educational work of the film board. I believe the time is not far distant when a great deal of our education will be imparted through the medium of the film. I have two small questions to ask the minister. The first is, could he give me the number of schools in each province? The second is, what constitutes a circuit?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I am sorry that I have not the eighty-two circuits broken down by provinces. This may be interesting: The cost of operating the circuits wholly financed by the board is approximately $375 per circuit per month. This sum provides the salary and expenses of the projectionist, shipping charges, print costs, maintenance of equipment, and publicity. If my hon. friend wants to know how many circuits there are in Saskatchewan I shall get the details and send them to him.

Mr. MARSHALL: I am more interested in Alberta than in Saskatchewan. But if the minister would bring down figures for all the provinces, not this evening but at some other time, they might be put on Hansard.

Mr. LaFLECHE: With pleasure.

Mr. MARSHALL: I should like to know the number of circuits in each province, and also the average number of points that are covered in a circuit.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Each circuit comprises at least twenty different points a month. But I shall bring down this information.

Mr. REID: I do not like to delay the committee, but a statement was made by the Minister of Mines and Resources which I do not feel like allowing to pass without contradiction. Speaking of my own province, he stated that he could not find on the news stands any newspapers from Winnipeg or Toronto. Let me tell him that the people of British Columbia know more about the other provinces than the people living in any other province, because people living in other provinces usually come to British Columbia, and show their good sense in doing so; we have that kind of province. As for the minister not being able to get a newspaper from Winnipeg or Toronto, I guarantee that I could take him to fifty news stands which would give him any paper he wants from any province.

Mr. CRERAR: I can assure the hon. member for New Westminster that the statement I made was a correct one. My visit on that occasion was a good many years ago. I am delighted to know that the west coast has made such substantial progress since that time.

Mr. REID: In forty-five years?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCann): Shall the item carry? Carried.

Mr. GREEN: Are we under sundries?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCann): No.

Mr. COLDWELL: I did not quite catch the carrying of that item. I was going to ask about trade union films, because I think we should have some knowledge of what is being done in that regard. I believe a great deal has been done in the past by the showing of films and so on, and I think we should try to get a picture of this both for ourselves and for the country through the record. There have, I believe, been industrial and trade union circuits. What are they, and what do they do?

Mr. LaFLECHE: The film board operates ten trade union circuits and forty industrial circuits. They are in close touch with those immediately concerned, and with their cooperation, these circuits have been formed and, I understand, operate very successfully.

Mr. MARSHALL: How can one get one of these circuits? What has one to do in order to get one of these circuits operating?

Mr. LaFLECHE: The interested party should write direct to the national film board, stating the requirements, the points to be covered, and that will receive immediate consideration.

Mr. MARSHALL: Is there any guarantee—

Mr. LaFLECHE: There should be a correct description and all the necessities should be set out with full explanations.

Mr. QUELCH: Should the proposal be made by some organization, or can it be made by a private individual?

Mr. LaFLECHE: From a school or from some well-known person, a resident.

Mr. COLDWELL: Or a member of parliament?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Yes, of course.

Item agreed to.

Sundry services, $69,080.

Mr. GREEN: There does not seem to be an item in the minister's estimates for what was known as the government office economies control. If the minister will remember, that subject was dealt with rather fully last year in consequence of the resignation of Colonel John Thompson from the position of director of that particular division. Will the minister tell us whether or not that division has been allowed to die out? If not, what is the position at the present time?

Mr. LaFLECHE: During the last year the division has made remarkable progress. It has achieved a very high success in effecting economies in government departments. The director, a capable civil servant, who has been in the service for many years—

Mr. GREEN: Who is that?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Mr. T. P. Murphy. He does it without extra remuneration. He is an employee of the Post Office Department and, working after hours as his war job, he carries out this work. He has had remarkable success and has gained the confidence and good will besides the entire cooperation of a number of civil servants in each of the departments. He has formed an interdepartmental committee. It attends at his office and holds joint meetings, and there is a great interchange of information. There has arisen, I presume, some friendly rivalry, because it is noticeable that those concerned in the several departments have now learned well what can be done by way of economy. They themselves do much of the work which otherwise would have to be done by the director. They follow Mr. Murphy and he gives them full credit for their own success. The situation is excellent.

Mr. GREEN: Is it a one-man show? Is Mr. Murphy the whole division of the government office economies control?

Mr. LaFLECHE: The complete staff comprises: Mr. T. P. Murphy, acting director of government office economies control, no salary; Mr. S. McCartney, estimating and printing adviser, $3,000 a year; Mr. H. J. Joyce, clerk grade two, $1,320; Mr. G. Rheaume, clerk grade three, $1,380; Mrs. Kiely, typist grade two, $1,080; and Miss Pazzkowski, clerk grade one, $780; total salary list, $8,340 with $780 war supplements.

Mr. GREEN: What vote does that come under?

Mr. LaFLECHE: It is in the sundry vote. The total is $10,885.

Mr. GREEN: Do they come under order in council?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: The original order in council gave Colonel Thompson drastic powers to control expenditures. I understand from what the minister says to-night that expenses are now saved by cooperation rather than by direction. Is that the case?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I said earlier this evening that Mr. Murphy of the economies control has been an immense success. He has gained the confidence and has a widening circle of convincible public servants who are carrying on the work, not only under instruction but by conviction and by a knowledge of what can be done. The authority here is the order in council so much commented upon last year. It is somewhat painful to go back a year ago—not painful to the department, however, but to a gentleman whose name was brought into prominence, not for his own sake but for other and, I am afraid, not worthy motives.

Mr. GREEN: What does the minister mean by that?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Because they were making a play on him. They were inviting the gentleman—and he is a gentleman—into public notice, with the result that he would make certain statements that would appear as we would read them, and make him unhappy. I am sure it did not assist him in the performance of his duty.

Mr. GREEN: The minister does not refer to any member of parliament? The minister is not suggesting that—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Oh, no.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I have not done so.

Mr. GREEN: I am asking if he is referring to any member of parliament in making that inference?

Mr. LaFLECHE: It was not an inference; it was a statement. I did not say that any member of parliament had done that.

Mr. GREEN: Is the wartime information board under the order in council now? A year ago they were not subject to the government office economies control.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Yes. The wartime information board are doing very good work under Mr. Murphy.

Mr. GREEN: Has the order in council been changed?

Mr. LaFLECHE: It has not.

Mr. GREEN: To make them subject to—

Mr. LaFLECHE: It was not necessary. It depends upon the approach. One cannot legislate men into doing good and one cannot legislate them into being efficient. But the civil servants in Ottawa, if properly appealed to, have always without fail responded in the right way; and they have done so, moreover, in the case of the economies control.

Mr. GREEN: That may be the position now. But the position last year was that practically all government departments were subject to this order in council with the exception of the wartime information board, and perhaps one or two other boards. Has any change been made in the order in council in the interim?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I said earlier that no change has been made in the order in council. Mr. Murphy has been able to interest people in all of the departments.

Mr. COLDWELL: As I understand it, Mr. Murphy is lent to the office of economies control. If that is not so, how else does it work? It seems to me we are, as it were, getting the shadow here, not the substance. If Mr. Murphy is devoting his time to this work and receiving his salary from some other department, then I think that an adjustment should be made and he should be reasonably remunerated under the particular item which covers this office. I agree with the minister that you can get more out of people by cooperation than you can by endeavouring to drive them to something. If, as I think the minister has suggested, Mr. Murphy is trying to do this work after hours, then surely he cannot be giving very much attention to it even in order to get the co-operation of the civil servants involved. Of course the staff is comparatively small when one takes into consideration the billions of dollars that we are spending. I wonder how he can possibly do this job after hours, even to get the cooperation of the civil servants.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Mr. Murphy is a permanent civil servant and works in the Post Office Department. I think he has had forty-one years' service. When I spoke to Mr. Murphy about the possibilities of his coming over to economies control, because I had known of the excellent work of the same kind he had done in the Post Office Department, he undertook to come over when he could. He comes regularly in the morning. He does his work in his own department when he can.

Mr. COLDWELL: In other words, the Post Office Department is practically lending him.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I am very grateful to my colleague, the Postmaster General, for permitting Mr. Murphy to come and get this work going, and for the spirit that he has put into it. It is not particularly hard work when everybody wants to do the same thing. There is a difference between driving and all marching together in the same spirit.

Mr. MARSHALL: I have a matter that I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. In 1941 there was in his department an item which amounted to the sum of $50,000. It was a revolving fund in connection with an organization known as the civilian technical corps. All the expenditures made from the fund were supposed to be guaranteed by the United Kingdom. There was spent from this fund in the year 1941-42 the sum of $27,000. It was not recovered when the auditor general made his report in 1943. A further sum of $7,833 was spent in 1943. Would the minister give a short statement showing the position of this revolving fund at the present time, and what reason could be advanced for the United Kingdom not meeting the amount which had been debited to them?

Mr. LaFLECHE: The civilian technical corps came into being at the request of the British government before the United States entered the war. It was felt that a great many qualified technical Americans would be very happy to go to the British isles and serve there in undertakings requiring technical knowledge and experience. The organization was not a Canadian one. It was a United Kingdom establishment. It was placed under my department nominally. It was in Montreal under the direct supervision of the United Kingdom air mission, I believe.

The Canadian government advanced the moneys and periodically the Canadian government was reimbursed for expenditures made. I do not recall the exact standing of the account as of March 31, 1943; but I know the entire account has been paid. The hon. member has asked, why the delay? Well, it was in putting in the bills and latterly getting them sent over to Great Britain, I understand, for final approval, or something like that. It was a revolving fund. The Canadian government has been reimbursed in full. When the United States came into the war that organization had, of course, to go out.

Mr. MARSHALL: Then I take it that this account has been closed out and has nothing to-day with the sundry services.

Mr. LaFLECHE: No. As I recall it, there was a balance some time last year and I asked why. It was inquired into and not long ago I was told that the account had been settled.

Mr. MARSHALL: What do you do with a balance like that?

Mr. LaFLECHE: It goes back into the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. GREEN: When the minister's estimates were under discussion on the last occasion he promised to bring down a statement showing the number of men taking educational courses in the pension and health hospitals of Canada. Could the minister give us a statement to-night?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I had hoped to begin this afternoon by giving my hon. friend the information, but in the hurly-burly an hon. member rose and I was not able to do so. It will take me fifteen minutes to give it. If the committee wishes to go on to something else I can do it at some other time.

I have made very careful inquiries, and the statement I am about to give reflects what I found after consultation with departmental officials. During the discussion of Canadian Legion educational services estimates on Monday, April 24, and again on the 27th, the hon. member for Vancouver South inquired as to what extent it is possible for a man in hospital to take advantage of Canadian Legion educational services. Since that time I have caused inquiries to be made of the department concerned and have been assured that any patient in a Department of Pensions and National Health hospital may, subject to the approval of the responsible medical officer, commence or resume a suitable course offered by Canadian Legion educational services or commence a more suitable course with an approved correspondence school, and such instruction will, in so far as possible, be directly related to the individual's post-war occupation and any necessary training or education under the rehabilitation programme. These legion courses are reported upon favourably by medical and administrative officers of the department and it is the intention to give further expansion of such courses every encouragement.

I should like to add that at present there are available a series of manuals on arts and handicrafts especially designed to give simple practical information, so that service personnel may learn a useful and interesting handicraft without the aid of an instructor. Manuals which are now in print in both English and French include: woodwork, leathercraft, knitting and needlecraft, wood carving, metalcraft, rugmaking and fibre craft, weaving, photography and handicraft designing, water-colour painting, sketching with oil paints and drawing. In addition to the handicraft manuals, there is a series of manuals designed to assist service personnel in the intelligent choice of their post-war vocation. The first manual in this series is entitled, "How to Choose your Post-War Job," which provides the service man with clear but concise guidance on what sort of jobs are available and what abilities are required to obtain these jobs, together with information as to how he may prepare himself for the particular job he has in mind.

To assist service personnel to procure further information a series of fifty manuals are either printed or in press or are being prepared for press by experts in each particular occupational field. I should like permission to place on Hansard a list of fifty manuals, or is it desired that I should read them? May I place them on Hansard without reading them?

[Mr. LaFleche.]

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCann): By consent of the committee.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. LaFLECHE: They are as follows:

1. Homemaking.
2. Agriculture, including fur farming.
3. Agricultural industries.
4. Forestry and logging.
5. Forest products industries.
6. Prospecting, mining and smelting.
7. Transportation—land, sea and air.
8. Communication—telegraph, telephone, radio and mail.
9. Building trades.
10. Fishing, fisheries, products and marketing.
11. Machinists.
12. Automotive repairing and garages.
13. Stenography, typewriting and clerical work.
14. Steel construction, riveting, welding and flame cutting.
15. Education and teaching.
16. Meals and lodgings.
17. Textile industries.
18. Clothing industries.
19. Retail trade distribution.
20. Salesmanship.
21. Civil service, public administration.
22. Barbering and beauty culture.
23. Plumbing, pipe-fitting, sheet metalwork and tinsmithing.
24. Foundry work—moulders and core makers.
25. Shoe repairing.
26. Meat packing, marketing and butchering.
27. Baking and catering.
28. Electrical work.
29. Printing trades.
30. Patternmaking.
31. Domestic service.
32. Laundering, pressing, cleaning and dyeing.
33. Law.
34. Professional health services—medicine, dentistry, nursing, pharmacy and public health.
35. Boiler making.
36. Blacksmithing.
37. Commercial art and advertising.
38. Accountacy and bookkeeping.
39. Social services.
40. Engineering—chemical, civil, metallurgical, mechanical, architectural, et cetera.
41. Journalism.
42. Scientific agricultural and veterinary services.
43. Librarianship.
44. Photography.
45. Household science.
46. Stationary engineering.
47. Police and fire services.
48. Undertaking and embalming.
49. Pottery work—brick and tile, clay and glass.
50. Personnel work.

It is felt that these manuals, covering as they do the history of the job and the nature of the work, the qualifications required, the training for the occupation, the opportunities for employment, the possibilities of advancement and the compensation, will be invaluable in connection with assisting service personnel with their study of occupations. Hon. members will be interested to know something of the very great care which has been taken in the preparation of these manuals. I should like, therefore, to mention a few of the titles, also the authors, as follows:

"How to Choose Your Job"—E. F. Sheffield, registrar and vocational counsellor, Sir George Williams College, Montreal.

"Accountancy and Bookkeeping"—Mr. Hilmer, commercial teacher in the Stamford Collegiate, Ontario.

"Engineering"—Being prepared by The Engineering Institute of Canada.

"Building Trades"—The Director of Apprenticeship, Department of Labour, Ontario.

"Graphic Arts"—Prepared by the executive secretary of the Toronto Graphic Arts Association.

"Home Economics"—Dr. Grace Hood, head of the Home Economics Department, University of Manitoba.

"The Ceramic Industries"—Professor R. J. Montgomery, University of Toronto, Dept. of Ceramics.

Three books on Agriculture—Being prepared by officials of the federal Department of Agriculture, through the Canadian Association of Technical Agriculturists.

"Automotive Repairing and Garages"—Being prepared by The Ontario Garage Operators' Association.

"Machinists"—Prepared by E. Slade, teacher, Western Technical Commercial School, Toronto.

"Salesmanship"—A. E. Wall, secured under the supervision of the Canadian Life Underwriters' Association.

"Social Services"—Prepared by the Montreal School of Social Work.

"Homemaking"—Mrs. D. S. Rawson, Saskatoon.

"Textile Industries"—Major D. Hallam of the Textile Institute of Canada.

"Wholesale and Retail Trade Distribution"—Mr. G. S. Hougham, secretary, National Retailers' Association.

"Civil Service"—Dr. Moffatt, Civil Service Commission, Ottawa.

"Barbering and Beauty Culture"—By Director of Apprenticeship, Ontario.

"Meat Packing"—Being prepared by Swift Canadian Company.

"Personnel Work"—Being prepared by the personnel division of the Massey Harris Company Limited.

Mr. GREEN: Has the minister figures showing how many men have taken these courses in the pensions and national health hospitals?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I have not the final figures as to the total number of men in these hospitals taking these courses, but that information is being obtained for me and I shall pass it on later, if I may.

I think the hon. member for Vancouver South will find this of some interest. The hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough, on Monday last, the 24th of April, inquired as to the number of certificates issued by Canadian Legion educational services. I might explain that three types of certificates are issued:

1. Certificate for correspondence course completion.

2. Certificate for partial completion of correspondence courses.

3. Certificate of achievement.

1. In this connection I should like to indicate to the committee the procedure which has been set down in order that students may qualify for these certificates. The student studies his booklets and forwards exercises to his correspondence instructor as he completes them. While his first exercise is being marked by the instructor, the student continues with paper No. 2 in order that no time may be wasted. The exercise is marked and is returned to the student, together with necessary explanations and additional instructions as to how he should procure the maximum advantage from the correspondence system of study. When the student has completed the ten papers, that is half a course, an examination is forwarded to the commanding officer who ensures that the man writes it under supervision. It is then returned to the correspondence instructor by the education officer. A similar procedure is following with the remaining ten papers and a final test is sent to him through the commanding officer on the completion of the twentieth paper. This again is written under supervision and is returned to the correspondence instructor. In all these exercises and examinations the standards of provincial departments of education are maintained. The marks gained on each of the twenty papers, plus those gained on the two supervised examinations, are averaged and the student is awarded the certificate which carries academic credit for the subject studied in all departments of education in Canada and Newfoundland.

In addition to this, the standing granted is indicated on sections 4 and 5 of his application form. Section 4 is forwarded to the officer in charge of records at national defence headquarters in Ottawa in order that it may be affixed to his permanent service records here, and section 5 is forwarded to the officer in charge of his unit in order that it may be attached to his unit papers. In this way commanding officers are made aware of the names of service personnel who are interested in advancing their own welfare. Other things being equal, we have no doubt that these are the personnel who will be chosen for whatever promotions will be available.

2. Certificates of partial completion are issued to students who are not primarily interested in academic credit at the present time but who, at a later date, may wish to continue their correspondence studies when the exigencies of the services so permit. In such cases a certificate of partial completion, showing the marks gained on the work actually done, is awarded in order that the student may continue his course with no difficulty at all on the production of the certificate of partial completion.

3. Certificates of achievement are also issued for work done in Canadian Legion educational services classes. These certificates may be evaluated for academic credit in the cases where the duration of the instruction and subjects covered are acceptable to provincial departments of education, but generally they are issued for non-credit purposes. For example, men who have studied the very elementary English course and have achieved a certain literacy in English are very proud to have their achievement recorded on certificates of this type.

Again, many service personnel make use of these classes as refresher courses and as courses to provide them with sufficient background to accept promotion within the services.

I have a table showing the number of certificates issued. It covers a full page, and with the permission of the committee I should like to place it on the record.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCann): By unanimous consent.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. LaFLECHE: The table is as follows:

The house met at three o'clock.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION

TABLING OF REGULATIONS GOVERNING TEMPORARY VISITS AND TRANSITIONAL PASSAGE

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): I desire to lay on the table copy of an order in council passed on May 5 affecting the movement of Chinese into Canada and out of Canada. The house will recall that on April 17 the Prime Minister informed the house that a draft immigration treaty with China was under consideration which would establish on a mutual and reciprocal basis the admission to each country of approved categories of persons from the other. Pending the bringing into effect of this treaty the order in council, which is No. P.C. 3378, has been passed. It covers Chinese persons wishing to pass through Canada in transit to another place, and also Chinese persons who wish to come here for temporary visits. Henceforth the persons involved will be dealt with under the ordinary provisions of the Immigration Act. In addition, the order modifies some provisions which hitherto restricted the position of Chinese residents in Canada who wished to go outside the country for a visit and subsequently return.

I might add that the order in council changes only the regulations governing temporary visits and "in transit" passage, and does not affect the provisions governing entry to Canada for permanent residence. These have been left for settlement in the treaty negotiations of which the Prime Minister spoke.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Are the provisions of the Atlantic charter given effect?

Mr. CRERAR: I am not aware just in what way the provisions of the Atlantic charter would apply to this particular matter—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister had better read it up.

Mr. CRERAR: —but I presume they have been in mind in the discussions which have taken place with the Chinese government in respect to a new treaty governing it.

CHINESE NATIONALS

REMOVAL FROM TRAIN PROCEEDING TO CANADA FROM THE UNITED STATES

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Arising out of the statement which the minister has just made, I desire to ask whether he has seen the latest issue of the New Republic, which renews the controversy with respect to a girl of Chinese origin who was taken off a train at Buffalo. I understand that the question is now put up squarely to the government—not perhaps that the person involved in the commission of this act was a Canadian; the statement of the Prime Minister and of the minister in that respect apparently is correct—but the point now raised is that it was done in accordance with Canadian law. I should like the minister to look into that matter, because the article brings the point up again. I wish the minister would look at the latest issue of the New Republic, which deals with the matter.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Acting President of the Council): I have not seen the issue of the New Republic and the article to which my hon. friend alludes. It was brought to my attention over the telephone this morning by the director of immigration.

Mr. GRAYDON: The article was?

Mr. CRERAR: I am speaking of the article. Of course under the law as it stood—that is, the Chinese Immigration Act—people of the Chinese race were prohibited entry to Canada except under certain conditions. In the incident in question the lady involved was not put off the train or asked to leave the train by a Canadian immigration official—which was the statement made, as I recall, in the original article in the New Republic.

Mr. GRAYDON: That part was correct.

Mr. CRERAR: That is correct. The surmise is that some official, railway or other, in the United States, suggested or asked her to leave the train because she did not have a bond, I assume, permitting her to cross Canada, in accordance with the provisions of the Chinese Immigration Act. The whole incident was very regrettable, and I may say that the order in council which I have just tabled will prevent the recurrence of any such incidents.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

WAR RISK INSURANCE

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. What is the amount of war risk insurance sold?
2. What was the amount of the premiums?

3. What was the cost to the government?

4. Have any claims been made under war risk insurance?

5. If so, what were the claims?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. To March 31, 1944, $3,611,370,271 (preliminary).

2. The premiums paid to March 31, 1944, totalled $7,689,695.

3. To March 31, 1944, $509,070.59 (preliminary).

4. Yes.

5. Three claims have been admitted in the amount of $435.

Note: The answers to questions 1 and 2 do not include insurance on grain or dominion government property.

OLD AGE AND BLIND PENSIONERS—ADDITIONAL PAYMENTS

Mr. RAYMOND:

1. Has the dominion government entered into agreements with the provinces as to additional payments to beneficiaries of old age pensions and pensions to the blind, as authorized by order in council 6367, dated August 10, 1943?

2. If so, (a) with what provinces did the government enter into such agreements; (b) on what date were such agreements entered into with each province; (c) what additional amounts are being actually paid by each province, pursuant to said agreements, to beneficiaries of old age pensions and pensions to the blind, under its jurisdiction; (d) what are such additional payments for each of the two classes of beneficiaries?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Yes.

2. (a) All provinces; (b) The effective date of the agreement with each province was as follows:

British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Quebec, September 1, 1943.

Nova Scotia, P.E.I., October 1, 1943.

Ontario, New Brunswick, November 1, 1943.

(c) and (d) The dominion publishes only the amounts paid by the dominion to the provinces for old age pensions and pensions in respect of blindness.

Order in council P.C. 6367 provides that the amount required to pay the dominion's share of the increase in the amount of pensions paid under the authority of the order in council shall be a charge upon the war appropriation. The amounts charged to the war appropriation for payments to the provinces from the effecitve date to March 31, 1944, are as follows:

Province	Old age	Blind
Alberta	$ 215,632 25	$ 5,614 75
British Columbia	325,234 26	7,849 81
*Manitoba	288,541 49	8,285 86
New Brunswick	39,550 93	9,306 74
Nova Scotia	52,258 72	4,815 32
Ontario	850,558 99	24,532 09
P.E.I.	31,213 58	2,251 22
Quebec	1,135,904 54	56,417 19
Saskatchewan	292,829 87	7,873 09

* Manitoba payments made in fiscal year 1944-45.

CANADIAN FORCES—AGRICULTURAL WORKERS

Mr. RAYMOND:

1. How many agricultural workers were called for a second medical examination?

2. What was the cost of such medical examinations before the boards of review?

Mr. MARTIN: It is not possible to answer this question, as the files of men in the registrar's offices are kept in numerical sequence according to their call-up numbers. There is no grouping from the record by occupation. Consequently the hon. gentleman may agree to have the question dropped.

Question dropped.

CONTINENTAL GLOVE COMPANY—AIRMEN'S GLOVES

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. Did the Continental Glove Company of Montreal receive a contract from the government for the lining of airmen's gloves?

2. If so, was the lining to be shorn lamb?

3. Were the gloves lined with shorn lamb?

4. If not, what substance was used in the lining?

5. Who did the inspection of these linings?

6. Did the inspector that first inspected the linings pass them?

7. If not, who did pass the linings?

Mr. POWER:

1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. No.

4. Imitation lamb skin.

5. The Inspection Board of United Kingdom and Canada.

6. No.

7. As shorn lamb lining was not obtainable in sufficient quantity, the specifications for airmen's gloves were modified by the supply division of the R.C.A.F. to allow the substitution of imitation lamb skin.

PORTNEUF, QUE., RURAL MAIL ROUTES

Mr. GAUTHIER:

1. How many rural mail contracts have been renewed, each year since 1942 inclusive, in the county of Portneuf?

2. How many holders thereof have been changed during said period?

3. What are the names of the new holders, the amount of their tenders, and the designation or number of their routes?

4. How many contracts have been increased in price without change of holders, and what are the designation or number, and the district of the routes therein mentioned?

Mr. MULOCK:

SPIRITUOUS LIQUORS IN BONDED STORAGE

Mr. TUSTIN:

1. What was the total amount, in gallons, each of whiskey, brandy, gin and rum in bonded storage in Canada on March 31, 1944?

2. How many gallons of each were released from bond during the year ending March 31, 1944?

Mr. GIBSON:

1 and 2. The excise division maintains records of the quantity of spirits held in or released from bond, but no differentiation is made in the type of spirit.

MOBILIZATION ACT—MALE CANADIANS IN THE UNITED STATES

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How many male Canadians between 18 and 38 years of age are there in the United States of America who have not become nor have made preliminary applications with a view to becoming United States citizens?

2. Are such persons subject to the provisions of the National Resources Mobilization Act?

Mr. MARTIN:

1. No information is available.

2. Any Canadian who resides in the U.S.A. is not subject to The National Selective Service Mobilization Regulations 1944, nor can he be extradited for an offence under these regulations. If between 18 and 38 years of age and if he resides for a period of three months in the U.S.A., he becomes liable for service in the American armed forces. At that time, he has the option of serving in the Canadian army. If he so wishes, and is found acceptable, he is attested by Canadian authorities in the United States for general service in the Canadian army and is returned to Canada for military duty. Americans in Canada are governed by similar regulations.

HOOPER HOLMES BUREAU—ASSOCIATED CREDIT BUREAUX

Mr. BENCE:

1. In what cities in Saskatchewan do either the Hooper-Holmes Bureau, or the Associated Credit Bureaux, or both, which were referred to in the statement of the Minister of Labour of April 28, 1944, have branches or agents?

2. What are the names and office addresses of such branches or agents?

Mr. MARTIN:

1. Regina (Associated Credit Bureau).

2. Retail Merchants Association of Canada Inc., 504 Kerr Building, Regina, Saskatchewan.

CANADIAN AMBASSADORS—LANGUAGE USED ON LETTERHEADS, ETC.

Mr. DORION:

What is the language used by Canadian ambassadors in the various countries in which they represent Canada, (a) in the case of outdoor signs showing the building or offices occupied by them; (b) on letterheads used in the course of their official duties; (c) on all printed forms used in the course of their duties?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

(a) The outdoor signs are prepared locally on the instructions of each ambassador, and it is left to his discretion to determine what languages should be used having regard to the language of the country.

(b) Both French and English.

(c) English is usually employed on forms for purely internal use inside Canadian embassies. The languages used on other printed forms depend on the language and custom of the country concerned.

PERMITS FOR PURCHASE OF NEW TRUCKS

Mr. RAYMOND:

1. How many permits have been granted for the purchase of new trucks since the 1st January, 1944, in the province of Quebec?

2. What are the names of the persons to whom such permits were granted?

Mr. HOWE:

1 and 2. Permits issued for the release of trucks are not recorded by provinces but are classified in essentiality groups. Please refer to page 2801 of Hansard for the list of trucks released for war work and essential services.

[Mr. Martin.]

INTERNMENTS—ALOIS N. SCHNEIDER

Mr. BENCE:

What were the conditions existing on June 10, 1940, which satisfied the Minister of Justice that one Alois N. Schneider should be interned?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The war situation in Europe and the general apprehension of possible subversive (fifth column) activities extending to Canada.

FLOUR PRICES

Mr. PERLEY:

What was the sales price of Canadian flour, both for mutual aid and other export, (a) per 100 pounds; (b) per barrel of 196 pounds, (i) f.o.b. Saint John, New Brunswick, (ii) f.o.b. Vancouver, British Columbia, as of each week-end since January 1, 1944?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

For mutual aid, per 280 pounds of G. R. flour in 140 pound jute sacks (1).

Month of Shipment from mill (2)	f.o.b. Saint John N.B.		fo.b. Vancouver B.C.
January	$ 80- 9 30	(3)	I8 95
February	9 35		9 00
March	9 40		9 05
April	9 40		9 05
May	9 40		9 05

For other export, no information available, since this is private trade.

(1). No shipments made, and no quotations available per 100 pounds; or per barrel of 196 pounds.

(2). Prices are the same for each month of shipment.

(3). Early in September, 1943, certain mills entered into contracts for January shipment at $8.80. Contracts for January shipment entered into after September 27, 1943, were made at $9.30.

*RADIO BROADCASTING—WALTER WINCHELL

Mr. BRUCE:

1. At whose instance did the American columnist and broadcaster, Mr. Walter Winchell, recently visit Canada?

2. Did the wartime information board furnish him with the material which he has used in recent articles and broadcasts in the United States?

3. What remuneration did Mr. Winchell receive from the Canadian treasury for his services in this connection?

Mr. CRERAR: I can give an oral answer to this question. In regard to part 1 of the question, the government has no information as to when Mr. Winchell was last in Canada, if indeed he has ever been here. It is reported that he stated in a broadcast last night that he had not been in Canada since 1914. In regard to part 2, the wartime information board did not furnish to Mr. Winchell the information upon which he based his article. As the house is well aware, the wartime information board has disseminated pretty widely in the United States information regarding Canada's war effort, and it is possible, probably it may be presumed, that Mr. Winchell obtained in that way the material upon which he based his article. My colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) mentions to me that question 2 deals also with broadcasts. What I have said about information from the wartime information board applies to broadcasts as well. In regard to part 3, the government of course did not pay Mr. Winchell from the Canadian treasury for any service to Canada that he may have rendered in this connection.

May I add this? It is unfortunate that this question was asked.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why? That is not a part of the answer—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): —and it is not in order.

Mr. CRERAR: Mr. Winchell—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Order.

Mr. CRERAR: —voluntarily gave wide publicity in the United States to an article—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Order.

Mr. CRERAR: —which paid a very generous tribute to the war effort of the Canadian people—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The government.

Mr. CRERAR: It was a generous tribute to the war effort of the Canadian people—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): To the government, not the Canadian people.

Mr. CRERAR: —and the implication is quite clearly conveyed in this question that there were ulterior considerations possibly involved in that. I wish to repudiate wholly that suggestion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I submit that that is not part of the duty—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All right; let us have a little quiet for a change. I submit that under the rules the last statement of the minister is entirely out of order

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He is answering a question.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is not an answer to the question asked and should be stricken from the record.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What about the question?

Mr. RALSTON: I would have expected my hon. friend to hang his head in shame at the question—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. RALSTON: —and I suggest, on a point of order, that it is in order for a member of the government, when a suggestion such as this is put upon the record, with respect to a man who has seen fit to pay a generous tribute, and a true tribute, to Canada's war effort—I submit, I say, that it is perfectly in order for a member of the government to indicate that the attributing of ulterior motives is entirely out of order and should not be done.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, now that we have had some discussion with respect to this particular question, I wonder if I may say a word in connection with it. I have not had the opportunity of hearing the broadcast which is mentioned in the question, nor have I had the opportunity of reading the article to which it refers—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GRAYDON: Of course, I am so busy trying to read "Canada At War" and other paid publications that it is difficult to keep up with all these things.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Read Public Opinion.

Mr. GRAYDON: For the most part the cabinet is engaged with it and it is hard to get a copy. May I say that everyone will be in agreement that we should not discourage in any way other nations from praising our war effort, so far as the Canadian people are concerned. I think there will be general unanimity in the house on that point. Our real problem, however, amounts to this, and it is a very simple one, particularly in a year when perhaps, with the heat of elections that are approaching, it is very difficult at times to distinguish between praising of the Canadian people's war effort and praise of the effort of members of a one-party government and its Prime Minister who is running the war at the present moment.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, we may as well be frank about this. There is no desire to be acrimonious on the point at all, but when the leader of the government makes the statement he does, I think it is well to put this on the record, because so far as we are concerned—

An hon. MEMBER: You are ashamed.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps my hon. friend will allow me to finish at any rate. The fact is that in all these things which have arisen from time to time, such as this, it is well for Mr. Winchell and other gentlemen in the United States, and in other countries as well, to know that it has all stemmed not from what they honestly think and say with respect to the domestic situation here, but from the fact that rightly or wrongly, and I think wrongly, the Canadian war effort, because the government has so decided, has been run by a one-party administration. These things stem of course from that cause.

Mr. RALSTON: I think I have a right to say a word on that. My hon. friend has put his finger right on it. If it is going to be regarded as a cardinal principle that we cannot have any praise of Canada's war effort for fear it might possibly enure to the benefit or the credit of the administration, then it has come to a sad pass in this country. If my hon. friend and the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), as well as the hon. gentleman who asked this question, are so thin-skinned about it, then it seems to me it indicates perhaps that they have not a proper appreciation of the responsibilities of public men.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Thanks for the lecture.

Mr. RALSTON: I happen to have in my hand the statement which was made by Mr. Winchell. I had not seen it before, but I have glanced through it. There is not one sentence in it which by the wildest stretch of the imagination could be regarded as giving credit to any particular government. As my colleague the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) has said, the whole statement is with regard to the effort of the Canadian people.

I think my hon. friend will join with me in this. I think we would feel very badly if we happened to praise the United States' war effort, happening to come as it does under the administration of President Roosevelt, and then found ourselves pilloried by questions in the Congressional Record asking whether or not we were in the pay of the United States government or the United States administration. That is the imputation that is cast on Mr. Winchell, and that is the imputation that my colleague the Minister of Mines and Resources properly undertook to refute in the statement that he made.

Mr. GRAYDON: I can hardly think that the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Ralston) was attempting to indicate that so far as we were concerned there was a desire on the part of any of us to prevent discussion or a description of Canada's war effort. I think I made it clear at the beginning that I had not seen the article, and more than that if it were the kind of article that is sometimes put out giving praise not to the Canadian people but to others, then there is justification for criticism on that score. I do not think we are very far apart in this matter, but I do think when it is remembered that we have a one-party administration it is obvious that these questions will crop up. It is difficult at times to avoid them.

Mr. RALSTON: All I can say is there appeared to be an attempt to question the good faith and accuracy of statements made by a gentleman in commendation of Canada's war effort. That was the desire.

Mr. GRAYDON: We did not suggest any such thing.

Mr. COLDWELL: Has this not gone on long enough?

INTERNMENTS—ALOIS N. SCHNEIDER

Mr. BENCE:

1. How many applications did Alois N. Schneider make for his release from internment under the provisions of the defence of Canada regulations?

2. How many of such applications were considered by advisory committees under the provisions of the defence of Canada regulations?

3. On what dates were such applications heard?

4. What were the decisions of the advisory committee in each case?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. Three.

2. Three.

3 and 4.

Date of application—Date of hearing—Decisions

Sept. 23, 1939; Dec. 4, 1939; no recommendation.

July 9, 1942; Sept. 22, 1942; continued detention.

Oct. 16, 1943; about Feb. 16, 1944; conditional release.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

MOBILIZATION ACT—MARRIED MEN

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

How many married men over twenty-five years of age have been called up for military service under the provisions of the National Resources Mobilization Act, (a) since the act came into force; (b) since the 1st day of January, 1944, by (i) military districts, (ii) mobilization districts?

RADIO BROADCASTING LICENCES

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. Have any radio broadcasting licences been applied for during the past year?
2. If so, who were the applicants in each case?
3. What decision has been made in each case?

Mr. HOWE: Return tabled.

SWITLIK CANADIAN PARACHUTES LIMITED—LALONDE AND VALOIS—J. FRANCOIS LEDUC

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. Have Lalonde & Valois, engineers, 606 Cathcart street, Montreal, obtained contracts from the dominion government, and are they associated with Switlik Canadian Parachutes Limited, 3575 St. Lawrence street, Montreal?
2. If so, for what total amount since 1939, and for what amounts in each of the years 1939, 1940, 1941, 1942, 1943 and 1944?
3. Has J. François Leduc, consulting engineer, 354 St. Catherine street east, Montreal, obtained sub-contracts from the dominion government, and is he associated with Switlik Canadian Parachutes Limited, 3575 St. Lawrence street, Montreal?
4. If so, for what total amount during each of the years above-mentioned?
5. How much money has been paid to him by the government up to the present?

FUNDY CONSTRUCTION COMPANY

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. What contracts, extensions of contracts or sub-contracts have been entered into or approved since November 1, 1941, with the Fundy Construction Company Limited by the Department of Public Works, the Department of Mines and Resources (national parks branch), the Department of Transport and the Canadian National Railways, the Department of Munitions and Supply, the Department of National Defence, the Department of National Defence for Naval Services, the Department of National Defence for Air Services or other departments of the government?
2. What were the dates of such contracts, extensions of contracts and sub-contracts, and the estimated costs of each?
3. What payments have been made on account of each such contract, extension and sub-contract?
4. What sums have been claimed by contractor as "extras" on each such contract, extension or sub-contract?
5. What is the nature of each claim?
6. What payments have been made on account of each claim for "extras"?
7. What claims have been rejected?
8. What claims were being considered on April 30, 1944?
9. What is the amount of each?
10. What further sums are estimated as being required to complete each such contract, extension and sub-contract?
11. When is it expected that same will be completed?

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES AS OF MARCH 31, 1944

Mr. McGREGOR:

1. How many government employees, both permanent and temporary, including those working on wartime boards, were there as of March 31, 1944?
2. How many were there on March 31, 1943?

BOARDS AND COMMISSIONS

Mr. DORION:

1. How many boards or commissions were appointed since September 3, 1939?
2. How many orders were made by each of such boards or commissions?
3. How many of said orders were made for each of the federal departments?
4. How many actions were instituted under said orders?

SUNNYBROOK, TORONTO, SOLDIERS' HOSPITAL BUILDINGS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Have tenders been called for the erection of any portion of the new soldiers' hospital buildings at Sunnybrook, Toronto; what progress has been made on calling for tenders; for what part of the new hospital, and at what time is it estimated that actual building operations will be commenced?
2. What has been done to build improved roadways to and on the property; to provide transportation facilities to hospital, and other municipal services such as sewers and water supply?
3. What additional hospital accommodation has been provided at Toronto for soldiers since the last session of parliament in 1943?

HOUSING—TORONTO

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has the government any plans for building houses in Toronto to relieve the scarcity of small houses there?
2. If so, what are such plans, (a) for wartime houses; (b) for small houses for soldiers; (c) for civilians?
3. Are negotiations pending with the city government on any such plan or plans?
4. If so, what reply has the city given, and what action has or will be taken by the government?

MOBILIZATION ACT—EXEMPTION OF ALIENS

Mr. GREEN:

1. What are the respective nationalities of the 9,867 aliens, referred to at page 2627 of Hansard, who have signed the declaration set out in schedule "A" to national selective service mobilization regulations 1944 (P.C. 1355), in which exemption is claimed from the provisions of such regulations?

2. How many of each nationality were in each administrative division?

VALCARTIER CAMP—FIREWOOD

Mr. LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency):

How many cords of firewood were sold and delivered to Valcartier camp from May 1, 1942, to May 1, 1944, showing, (a) names of dealers; (b) date of deliveries; (c) price?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CHERRIER WAR PLANT

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Department of Munitions and Supply and Canadian Car Munitions Limited in relation to the Cherrier war plant in connection with the termination of operation of the said plant by the said company and the placing of said plant in charge of Defence Industries Limited.

WINNIPEG HYDRO-ELECTRIC—SLAVE FALLS PLANT

Mr. KNOWLES:

Mr. HOWE: Return tabled.

HOUSING—WINNIPEG—MONTREAL—LOW RENT DWELLINGS

Mr. KNOWLES:

For a copy of the letter written to Mr. G. F. Bentley, city clerk of Winnipeg, by the Minister of Finance, as reported in Hansard on page 2705; also a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Department of Finance and the group of citizens in Montreal, with reference to the current plan for the building of low-rent dwellings in Montreal.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INQUIRY AS TO THE REOPENING OF THE CORONER'S INQUEST ON THE DEATH OF YOUNG GUÉNETTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent). Has the attorney-general of Quebec communicated with the Department of Justice about the reopening of the coroner's inquest in the case of young Guénette who was recently shot dead under the rule of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

[Mr. Green.]

Hon. LOUIS S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the terms which the hon. member has used in asking his question are not in accordance with the verdict returned as a result of the coroner's inquest. Notwithstanding the terms he has used, I may answer him at once that I have so far received from the attorney general of Quebec no communication whatever in that connection.

ALASKA HIGHWAY

OPENING BY UNITED STATES MILITARY AUTHORITIES OF OFFICE IN VANCOUVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): On Friday the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Black) asked the Secretary of State the acting Minister of Labour certain questions. The Secretary of State said that he would endeavour to have the questions answered to-day. I now have the answers. They are as follows:

The United States military authorities have not opened an office in Vancouver, B.C., to recruit labour for the Alaska highway. The United States authorities have, however, maintained an accounts office in Vancouver for the past eighteen months.

The accounts office referred to is not attempting to hire men in Vancouver for the Alaska highway and no requests for men to work on this highway have been placed with the national selective service office at Vancouver.

The Standard Oil company placed an order for seventy-five men for the Canol Oil Refinery project, which was later reduced to eight men.

The net unfilled vacancies for male and female workers at Vancouver on February 24 and May 4 of this year were 3,618 and 6,486 respectively.

INCOME TAX

DEDUCTIBLE ALLOWANCES FOR UNUSUAL MEDICAL EXPENSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Last week the Minister of National Revenue made a statement in Hamilton to the effect that by a recent ruling of the income tax department deductible allowances for unusual medical expenses provided by the Income Tax Act had been extended to apply to osteopaths and chiropractors, physiotherapists and others registered under any dominion or provincial legislation. Will the minister tell us if this was announced in the House of Commons; and also if chiropodists come under this ruling?

Hon. C. W. G. GIBSON (Minister of National Revenue): When I was in Hamilton I did make an announcement concerning a ruling that had been made under the Income War Tax Act as to those who are entitled to be included under the clause in the Income War Tax Act dealing with unusual medical expenses. The act provides that certain practitioners who are licensed in the provinces come within a certain class. The accounts of these people may be allowed as a medical expense. The ruling includes osteopaths and chiropractors if they are registered in their province and have a licence to practice in that province. I would not want to make a ruling with regard to all branches of the medical profession until details of their qualifications are put before me.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does it apply to Christian Science healers?

Mr. GIBSON: As I have said, I would not want to answer that question without full details of their qualifications

BUILDING MATERIALS

PROJECTS FOR COMMUNITY PURPOSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have a communication from the Board of Education of the city of Toronto stating that they have asked for permits to build an addition to Perth avenue school for community purposes as well as two other capital projects for community purposes in that city. A survey has been made and it is necessary to have this work done for community purposes. Several other schools in Toronto and neighbourhood have been granted permits. I wonder if the Minister of Munitions and Supply could indicate when we may have those permits.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I must advise my hon. friend that the steel situation is very tight at the moment. The situation has varied from time to time. It passed from a period of stringency into a fairly easy position for a few months. It has now reverted to a period of stringency. I suggest that these applications be filed, and consideration will be given to them as soon as the steel situation again eases to the point where the necessary materials can be furnished.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Friday, May 12, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Administration of the defence of Canada regulations, $30,000.

Mr. BENCE: I should like the Minister of Justice to give the committee a review of the general principles now applicable in reference to the release of men from internment camps. Considerable agitation has been aroused in this country by the recent release of three men named Joseph Farr, John Lorimer and Alois N. Schneider. I do not know very much about the first two, who I understand were incarcerated because of their fascist leaning, but I do know something about the last named, who comes from Saskatchewan. I understand that these men were interned because they were believed to be in sympathy with the German reich. If that was the reason for their internment, I suggest that conditions have not altered sufficiently to justify the administration in concluding that they now should be released.

This man Schneider, who lives in the northern part of Saskatchewan, was interned on September 5, 1939; he was picked up by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, presumably because they had information that he was the type of man likely to be dangerous in time of war. Subsequently, after considerable pressure had been brought to bear, he was released on December 21, 1939. I may add that the information in connection with this matter is contained in a question asked by myself and answered by the minister on May 4 of this year, and appearing in Hansard of that date. This man Schneider was out of the internment camp from December 21, 1939, to June 10, 1940, when he was again incarcerated. According to an answer given me by the minister to-day, he was placed in the internment camp on the second occasion for this reason:

The war situation in Europe and the general apprehension of possible subversive (fifth column) activities extending to Canada.

I should like to know whether the minister and the administration believe the situation to be any less tense to-day, so far as Europe is concerned, than it was at that time, and whether or not there is now reason for less general apprehension in respect to possible subversive fifth column activities. This man was returned to the internment camp on June 10, 1940, and remained there until February 21, 1944, when he was released. According to the information I received to-day in answer to another question, he was released after making three applications. The first was made on September 23, 1939, and after a hearing on December 4, 1939, no recommendation was made by the committee. However, as I mentioned a moment ago, he was released some seventeen days later, apparently solely on the responsibility of the administration. On July 9, 1942, he applied again for release; his hearing was on September 22, 1942, and the recommendation of the committee was that he should be continued in detention. On October 16, 1943, he made another application, which was heard about February 16, 1944, and he was granted his conditional release. The question I asked on May 4, as to the reason for his release on the previous occasion, was as follows:

> What change has there been in the conditions with respect to this man since the date of his reinternment which would justify his release?

The answer was:

> The information which was before the advisory committee must be treated as confidential, but in addition to that which concerned Alois N. Schneider himself, it was publicly known that he has two nephews in the Canadian army overseas, and his own son, who is not old enough to join the army, is serving in the home defence force.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I do not know what difference it makes whether a man has nephews in the army, or even whether he has a son in the reserve army. If this man was placed in an internment camp because he was a danger to Canada through his sympathies with the German reich, conditions have not altered in the meantime, I suggest, to the extent indicated by the minister in his answer to these questions. The point is that if this man was properly placed in an internment camp in the first place, in my judgment conditions have not changed sufficiently to justify his release at the present time. If he was improperly placed in the internment camp in the first place, then the administration should be frank with this house and advise us that the man never should have been put in the camp. If that is the proper answer, an explanation should be given as to why he was allowed to remain there for this length of time.

I understand that the same situation exists with respect to the other two men I have mentioned, though I do not know very much about them and am not prepared to debate the point. It seems to me that if this man Schneider was properly interned in the first place because of his sympathy with the German reich, a better explanation than has been given by the minister should be advanced to this house for his release at the present time. It may be that he promised to be a good boy; I do not know. It was suggested in the press the other day that Mr. Camillien Houde might be released from internment if in effect he would promise to be a good boy, and I am just wondering if this is why Mr. Schneider and these other so-called fascists were released, if they have now promised not to do any harm as far as our war effort is concerned.

Mrs. NIELSEN: I should like to say a word about this man Alois N. Schneider, because he happens to live in a town in my constituency. As hon. members know, he was arrested in 1939; then, for what reason we do not know, he was released. I have tried to ascertain from the minister who was responsible for getting him released, but unfortunately I have been unable to get this information.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Do you know what date he was released?

Mrs. NIELSEN: In December, 1939, I believe.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Would it be possible, Mr. Chairman, for us at this end of the chamber to have some part in this discussion of my estimates?

Mrs. NIELSEN: May I proceed, Mr. Chairman? The facts are well known, and I am afraid they are not going to be very welcome to hon. members who sit on the opposite benches. While the Minister of Justice did not tell this house who was responsible for obtaining the release of this man Schneider, people up in the northern part of the country know very well that his release was desired very greatly by the former Liberal member of the house, whom I happened to defeat, Mr. McIntosh, whose organizer he was up in that northern area.

I must say that up in the northern part of my country we have a number of German people, and I believe their position during this war has been very terrible.

Many of them had relatives still at home in Germany. Before the war began these people used to receive letters from their relatives telling them that things in Germany were much better, that there was no depression over there, that they did not have unemployment, and that Hitler was building roads and making employment. They were told that this, that and the other thing was good. I can remember talking to one of these German people on the street of a small town up north. He said to me, "Look at our little town, with all these youngsters standing around the pool parlours, with nothing to do. It is not that way in Germany. We have clubs; we have the youth movement for our children." I can quite understand a person like Mr. Schneider, who was in a position to prey upon the fears of these German people, naturally reaching the point where he would be looked upon by them as a leader. There is no doubt whatsoever that he was nazi in his sympathies, and that he tried to organize in that direction. Then, this man Schneider happened to be land agent and machine agent, and possibly to many of these people he had become a friend. He might allow them a little more time for payment on land, or might make a good deal with them for machinery.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Was he a government employee?

Mrs. NIELSEN: I do not think he was. But possibly he was in a position where he had a hold over them. Then when he suggested that they join the bund, it is possible that they would agree with him, and in this way he would build up an organization in that part of the country.

But the great majority of these German farmers were very poor, with little time to think about politics. All they wanted to do was to get a living from the land, and be ordinary, good Canadian people. I know that. As soon as the war started there was a certain amount of hysteria among some people. Indeed, anyone who had a German name had to be very careful what he said. Many self-appointed vigilante committees were set up here and there, and if anyone with a German name happened to say anything that sounded suspicious he would be reported by the committee. I think a number of German people were arrested at the beginning of the war without any real cause. I had a conversation with the minister's deputy—I refer to Mr. Anderson, the gentleman who now sits in front of him—regarding the release of one of these Germans in my part of the country. This was a young man named Zieglansburger, who had been arrested and interned. I feel certain that inadvertently he had said something that was picked up and reported, but I am just as certain that he had no use whatsoever for the nazi ideology. However, he was a German, and people in that state of hysteria felt that every German should be arrested and put away. I am not in sympathy with that. Many of our German people have no desire other than that of being good Canadians. But when we find a man like Schneider, who was definitely organizing those with whom he came in contact under the nazi doctrine, we must place him in a very different category from the ordinary run of German farmer. I repeat that we should know whether this man has been wrongfully interned for a period of some years. If so, why is it that we have not had his release before this? If he was just a poor, innocent person whose German name was responsible for his internment, we should know it. If on the other hand he was picked up twice, once in 1939 and again in 1940, there must have been some reason for it. And if those reasons justified his internment until now, why was he released just a few weeks before a provincial election?

I have no doubt at all that this man is very busy, working in an organizational capacity for the Liberal party in that part of the country. I say this emphatically, because I believe the people of that north country should be given the facts, and I say the committee would be justified in having from the minister a much more comprehensive statement than we have had in the past respecting this man's activities.

Mr. HANSELL: Mr. Chairman, in days gone by I have been somewhat instrumental in advocating in the house that Canada should set an example to the rest of the world in respect of its attitude in standing for freedom of religion and freedom of worship. In this respect I wish to congratulate the Minister of Justice upon the lifting of the ban from Jehovah's Witnesses some time ago. I believe that was a proper course to take, and that by so doing he has exemplified to the rest of the world the fact that we do give to every individual the right to worship God as he chooses. However, there is another matter I should like to bring before the minister. I would ask him to consider what is done with certain members of the sect known as Jehovah's Witnesses when they refuse to take up arms. I think many hon. members have had correspondence similar to what I received the other day. I might explain, however, that that which I received has to do with certain members of Jehovah's Witnesses who had been taken into custody because they refused to take up arms. The correspondence enclosed certain sworn affidavits from interested people —perhaps other members of the same organization who had visited these men while in detention—and I believe these sworn statements will give some idea of how these men have been treated.

It is my intention to read certain paragraphs from these affidavits, and I appeal to the minister to do what he can in the matter.

After all, we do want to see justice done in Canada. I shall not read the technical or legal part of this document, but only those paragraphs in which the statements are made. The following is from an affidavit signed by Elva F. Patzer of the city of Winnipeg.

I do solemnly declare that:

1. On Sunday, April 23, 1944, I attended at the detention barracks at Fort Osborne barracks in M.D. No. 10 and there in the presence of a guard did interview my brother, Gordon Mark Morrow, above named who is there held in detention, undergoing ninety days detention, because of his conscientious objections to doing military service.

2. At the time his face was swollen, and one hand was bruised across the back of the wrist.

3. My said brother informed me that three members of the army had previously struck him with their sticks behind the ears, on his hands and wrists, and that they had in addition struck him with their fists.

4. My said brother also informed me that previously some soldiers tied a loaded pack on his back, which was secured by a rope fastened around his throat, that he was then violently pushed around, and the rope cut off his breath. That he also had been abused by soldiers, who picked him up and threw him violently to the floor and then jumped on him with their knees. He afterwards complained of internal pain which bothered him greatly, and he believed that he had a broken rib or ribs.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act.

Declared before me. . .

And so on. This is signed by E. F. Patzer, and by J. F. Davidson, a barrister at law.

Then, there is another affidavit concerning another of these men—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member says he has another such affidavit. I wonder if he is under the impression that this has anything to do with the defence of Canada regulations. As I understand from the affidavit the hon. member read, the declarer attended at a military detention camp and received certain information from a person detained there. The Department of Justice has nothing to do with the administration of military district No 10 or of any other military district. If this affidavit covers something which arose in a detention camp of the army there would be nothing under the defence of Canada regulations which my department could do about it. There is nothing under those regulations to justify the maltreatment of any person.

Mr. HANSELL: I am sorry if I brought this up under the wrong department. Now that the minister draws it to my attention I believe he is right. When these men are picked up and interned they come under the Department of National Defence?

[Mr. Hansell.]

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I would assume that they would be men who were called up under the mobilization regulations administered by the Department of Labour. After that they would appear before a board and would be either postponed or turned over to the military authorities, if they came within the regulations. At no stage would they be dealt with under the defence of Canada regulations.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. HANSELL: I am not quite through.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am trying to help the hon. member if he will allow me.

Mr. HANSELL: Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Macleod has the floor.

Mr. HANSELL: I should be pleased if the hon. member for York-Sunbury would help me out after I have finished. If what the minister has said is true, then the matter may have to be brought up under the Department of National Defence. I will not read the other affidavit; it is similar to the one I have read, but applies to another person.

I know that the minister does not want this sort of thing happening within military camps, even though it does not come under his department. All I ask him to do under the circumstances is to appeal to the Minister of National Defence to have this sort of thing stopped. It does not make any difference under what department it may come; it is not justice to persecute a man by physical torture because of his particular religious convictions. I appeal to the Minister of Justice to bring this thing to the attention of the Minister of National Defence and have it stopped immediately.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Chairman, I do not want to delay the committee, but first I should like to congratulate the minister upon having lifted the ban against those citizens who call themselves Jehovah's Witnesses. I think they are very sincere, but in my opinion they are on the wrong track. I was going to say something else, but I shall not. I think that action came a little late because there was a great deal of persecution, not prosecution, of these misguided people. I believe the minister is correct in suggesting that the cases before the committee are those of conscientious objectors who are under detention because of their unwillingness to serve in the army after having been drafted or called.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Or to take alternate service.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Or to take alternate service, as we know is the case. I received two of these affidavits to-day and I read them with a good deal of astonishment. I just cannot believe that these things can be true in Canada in this twentieth century. I may say to the minister that in law these affidavits are only hearsay evidence. They are not the affidavits of the persons detained; they are affidavits of those who interviewed the persons in the detention camp. As the lawyers say, that is hearsay, but inasmuch they have made these declarations on information and belief—that is the way we put it as lawyers—they call for some explanation on the part of the authorities, by way of refutation or investigation.

I should like to read one paragraph of one of these declarations, and then I am going to ask the minister to do what the hon. member for Macleod asked him to do. This is an affidavit by Stephie Klymuik, of Whytewold, Manitoba, being a declaration under the Canada Evidence Act. She visited a man by the name of Adam Remando at the detention barracks at Fort Osborne, military district No. 10, on April 16. The following is not his statement; it is what the declarer says was told to her, and she passes it on by way of opinion and presumably belief. The paragraph reads:

> Remando then informed me he had been put on a bread and water diet for refusing to put on the uniform, that his clothes had been violently torn from him and destroyed, and he was forcibly dressed in a uniform and ordered to pick up a gun, which he refused to do.

Mark this:

> That he was beaten and badly injured and put under an ice cold shower for twenty minutes, and that later on a gun was tied to his arm for several days.

I can scarcely believe that that took place in Canada, It sounds like what would happen under a third degree in New York where Mr. Walter Winchell comes from, the gentleman we heard about this afternoon. That is what they do down there under third degree, but surely it does not happen in Canada. I am going to ask the minister to call the attention of the Minister of National Defence to these allegations. If they are true, then third degree methods are being adopted by the army to force men into the home army. That is what it means. No matter how much we may object to conscientious objectors not doing their duty as citizens as we see it, I do not believe the people of Canada will for one moment tolerate this sort of treatment. I am going to give the department the benefit of the doubt to which they are entitled—this evidence does not comply with the best evidence rule.

These people are people whom we want to make into good Canadians if we can. They have been invited to this country. I presume they came here lawfully, that they had lawful entry. They are not criminals. For their conscience' sake they may be ready to undergo punishment, but certainly they should not have to suffer this punishment, if it is true as charged. Will the minister tell us upon what date the prohibition against Jehovah's Witnesses was lifted, how many prosecutions there were under the defence of Canada regulations, and where they were?

Mr. COLDWELL: May I say that the first of these two cases is not new either to my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) or to myself. We got the first affidavit some few weeks ago, and because we thought the situation warranted it, the allegations being so grave, we turned it over to the Minister of National Defence. The second affidavit was treated similarly. Immediately I received it I sent it by messenger to the minister. I know that in the first instance some investigation has already taken place. Since this matter has been raised this afternoon, if the investigations have been completed the Minister of National Defence might inform the house what the situation is in this regard. I share the view of the hon. member for Macleod and the hon. member for York-Sunbury that if these allegations are true they are an exceedingly grave reflection on our country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are shocking.

Mr. COLDWELL: —and upon the administration of justice in this country. They should be thoroughly probed by the department and a report made to this house, and there should be no sort of inquiry held in secret. Charges as serious as these having been made in this house and read into the record, they should be dealt with openly and an inquiry held, with all the evidence taken, and the various parties to it provided with proper counsel.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In the presence of the subject and his counsel if he so wishes.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is what I mean. We presented this case to the Minister of National Defence some days ago. I see he is in his seat now, and I think it would be wise if he made a statement to the committee.

Mr. RALSTON: I was just informed that there had been brought up in committee the matter of the treatment of a certain number of men belonging to the sect known as Jehovah's Witnesses, in Winnipeg. I am a little surprised that it should be brought up on this particular item under the Department of Justice, because it is a matter for the army and under the jurisdiction of the Department of National Defence. I understand that affidavits have been read—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Statutory declarations.

Mr. RALSTON: —which I have not heard.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I will send them over.

Mr. RALSTON: I assume they are the affidavits which I myself received; and as I remember, all the affidavits are by somebody who said he was told by somebody else—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are hearsay; I made that clear.

Mr. RALSTON: —that certain things took place. I received a wire with regard to it from a relative of a man whose name, I think, is Morrow—

Mr. COLDWELL: That is right.

Mr. RALSTON: —about this time last week, or perhaps Tuesday; I immediately had the adjutant general take the matter up with the officer commanding military district No. 10—that is at Winnipeg—and told him that I wanted an immediate inquiry held into the matter. The indication in the telegram which I received was that certain affidavits were in the mail, and when the affidavits arrived it appeared that they were copies of those which, I assume, have been read into the record. As a matter of fact I myself made extracts from all the affidavits to show the concrete statements which were made with regard to any claims of ill-treatment, and had those sent by teletype to Winnipeg so that time would not be taken to copy them and have them sent by mail.

I have this report from the district officer commanding military district No. 10: it came on Saturday, and is dated Friday, May 12:

> Regarding telegram . . . dated 10th May, 1944, the following interim report is submitted. A board officers has thoroughly investigated the allegations of ill treatment of Martens, McGuire, Morrow and Remando, Jehovah Witnesses, in No. 73 Military Detention Barracks and find that no ill treatment has taken place. These men upon being admitted to detention refused to take off their civilian clothes and their clothes have to be removed. The board is of the opinion that practically no force was necessary in order to remove the clothing and certainly no man was struck in any manner. The board have examined the records kept of medical examinations and find that in the case of Morrow he complained of pains in his side and he was X-rayed twice, results negative. The board have invited the civilians who made affidavits to appear before the board on Saturday 13 May 44 between the hours of nine a.m. and twelve noon. The board is absolutely satisfied that no cold water treatment or anything of that nature has been administered. The proceedings of the board including the evidence of civilian witnesses, if any, should be completed and forwarded air mail 16 May 44. I have carefully examined evidence so far taken by the board and concur in the above findings.

That is from Brigadier MacFarlane, district officer commanding of military district No. 10.

Having had incidents of this kind before, notwithstanding the fact that it takes a long time to investigate I feel it is desirable to go to the bottom. In the case of the inquiry at Windsor we took over three hundred pages of evidence on the court of inquiry.

In order that there may be something more than an examination by the military district itself, as it happened that Major-General J. P. Mackenzie, inspector general for western Canada, who has jurisdiction in Winnipeg, was in Ottawa, instructions were given to him to stop off at Winnipeg on his way west and conduct whatever investigation he might consider necessary to check and verify whatever findings were being made by the board of inquiry. I would expect that Major-General Mackenzie is there to-day; and, with that proceeding under way, I can only say that the matter is having full attention by the department and as soon as the reports are received I shall deal with them. I will not say at this minute that the reports of the board of inquiry will be laid on the table of the house, because that is not generally done. But I feel sure that I shall be able to satisfy the committee and the house that full inquiry has been made and that whatever action is necessary has been taken.

Mr. COLDWELL: In view of the seriousness of these charges—we have had three of them recently, one at Windsor and two from Winnipeg—

Mr. RALSTON: I did not hear of two from Winnipeg.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, two from Winnipeg, I think.

Mr. RALSTON: There are four men. My hon. friend means, the same group?

Mr. COLDWELL: The same group of people, yes.

Mr. RALSTON: I want to be sure what my hon. friend says. I am treating as one group the charges with regard to these four men.

Mr. COLDWELL: There are two separate persons, and there was the case at Windsor. I do not know how these courts of inquiry are conducted, whether the military—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I should have taken up the point of order raised by the Minister of Justice. I realize how difficult it is for members of the committee and for myself to make distinctions between different departments, because at times the margin seems to be narrow. But although the statement which has just been made by the Minister of National Defence comes under his department, I think hon. members should remain within the orbit of the item before the committee; otherwise we shall never get anywhere. There will be other opportunities to discuss this matter, when the proper department is before the committee of the whole.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not want to disagree with your ruling, Mr. Chairman, but I was just going to say something which I think should be said now; and may I suggest that technically I have the right to discuss anything which appears in these war appropriation estimates—anything. We have passed nothing. This is no bill with a schedule; we are dealing with a resolution. I can pick up this resolution at any point and deal with any department I wish, under the rules of this house. That is one of the reasons why, when this appropriation was coming down, I suggested it would facilitate business if we could have a bill and a schedule attached to the bill. I do not want to depart from any understanding we may have reached as to dealing with this resolution, but technically I would be well within my rights even though I spent the whole afternoon discussing subjects other than those pertaining to the Department of Justice.

Mr. RALSTON: I hope my hon. friend is not invoking that, because there is an agreement as to the way we shall proceed.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am talking of my right. I suggest to the minister that, in view of the nature of these charges, if these courts are held in secret, he would be well advised to have an open inquiry into these cases in order that all parties can be satisfied. I am not questioning in any way the integrity of the court of inquiry; I am suggesting to the minister that in the public interest and the interest of the department it would be well to consider the point I have raised.

The CHAIRMAN: On the point brought by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, I know that he would be the last hon. member not to realize what is, I am sure, understood by the committee, that when a minister and his officials attend on behalf of a particular department, it is understood that we will remain within the limits of that department.

Mr. COLDWELL: I know that.

The CHAIRMAN: I am sure the hon. member will realize that it is impossible to have two or three ministers and half a dozen or more officials waiting around all the time, on one particular item.

Mr. FAIR: I had not intended to discuss the question which has just been brought up. I am not a member of Jehovah's Witnesses. There has been a good deal of discussion of the real reason why they were banned, and I think the Minister of Justice should make a statement on the matter which would satisfy the curiosity of the country.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I cannot satisfy the hon. member on that point. When I became Minister of Justice I found certain defence of Canada regulations which had been adopted by the governor in council, and which had been before a committee of the house and had been approved thereby. I had no choice but to apply them until such time as they were modified, and on recommendation I made in October, 1943, the ban was lifted.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How many prosecutions had taken place against Jehovah's Witnesses up to that period?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There had been no prosecutions by the Department of Justice against Jehovah's Witnesses up to that period. Such prosecutions as had been instituted had been instituted by the attorneys general of the provinces or under their control, applying the defence of Canada regulations as part of the law of Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How many had been carried out at the instigation of the Department of Justice?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No prosecutions had been instituted at the instigation of the department against any persons for being members of Jehovah's Witnesses.

Mr. FAIR: May I ask whether all restrictions imposed upon Jehovah's Witnesses have been lifted, or whether only the right to meet at their services has been restored?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Some time over a year ago there had been a modification of the regulations to the effect that no one would commit an offence by attending a meeting for the purpose of religious worship. In October, 1943, regulation 39(c) was amended by striking therefrom the names of "the following organizations", and among them was the name of Jehovah's Witnesses. So that section 39(c) no longer applies in any way to the persons known as Jehovah's Witnesses.

Mr. COLDWELL: Jehovah's Witnesses have a number of subsidiary organizations such as the Watch Tower publishing company and some others. I have been informed that the literature of the organization is still banned. I have also been told—I was going to try to verify this before, but since the matter is now under consideration I will mention it, without any definite knowledge of the question—that all literature emanating from the Watch Tower publishing company is automatically banned from Canada, and that on one occasion not long ago a shipment of Holy Bibles, the King James authorized version, was prohibited from entering this country simply because these bibles bore the name of the publisher. I was told that there was no commentary, nothing but the King James authorized edition of the bible, published by the Watch Tower publishing company, and because it was published by this organization the shipment was prohibited. I do not know whether that is true. Is it true?

Mr. GIBSON: That is correct, yes.

An hon. MEMBER: Were they imported from London?

Mr. GIBSON: No; from the United States.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister says it is true. I think there should be an easement of that provision at once. I do not think anything should be allowed to interfere with the importation of the Holy Bible into this country, even when it is published by the Watch Tower publishing company. I cannot see that it would interfere with the war effort of the country or undermine the principles of any of our people, to have the bible brought into the country even when it bears the imprint of any publishing house, which happens to be in this intance the Watch Tower company.

Mr. GIBSON: The money goes to a prohibited organization. That is the reason.

Mr. COLDWELL: The ban against Jehovah's Witnesses—

Mr. GIBSON: I am speaking of the Watch Tower publishing company.

Mr. COLDWELL: The ban against Jehovah's Witnesses is lifted. If the parent organization is legal, why should a subsidiary be considered illegal and prohibited?

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. BENCE: The defence of Canada regulations committee two years ago recommended lifting the ban from Jehovah's Witnesses and that included the subsidiary organizations referred to, the Watch Tower Bible and Tract Society, and some others. The ban was lifted from Jehovah's Witnesses but not from these societies or organizations through which Jehovah's Witnesses hold their property. This situation exists in my city, where Jehovah's Witnesses as individuals, through the medium of an incorporated society which is banned, own a hall. They are forced into the position where they must go and rent, from the custodian of enemy property, the very hall which they themselves bought with their own money through the medium of this organization which is still banned. I suggest that the administration ought to reconsider the position, because it leaves the matter in an anomalous state. As a matter of fact, first of all, the custodian refused to rent to these Jehovah's Witnesses, though eventually he did. I suggest that the halls should be returned to those who put their money into them.

Mr. HANSELL: This whole subject becomes very much involved when one digs deep into it. It might be supposed that because the Minister of Justice has lifted the ban from Jehovah's Witnesses, therefore they should be allowed to go around and do whatever they wish. I do not agree with that position. I am not speaking for my group, because this is not a party matter. It is a matter of what appeals to one's own intelligence and common sense. I can quite understand that the ban might be lifted from a religious organization for the purpose of giving them the right of freedom of worship, and yet it might not be lifted from a certain publication which might teach things that are contrary to peace, order and good government. I was tempted to ask, when the member for Rosetown-Biggar spoke about bibles, whether there were any comments on them.

Mr. COLDWELL: None.

Mr. HANSELL: I am told that the funds were to be paid to an organization that is still under the ban. I fancy that means that if the Jehovah's Witnesses had ordered bibles from some other publishing house those bibles would have come in all right. That, I suppose, would be the answer. I sympathize with the minister to this extent, that it is difficult to draw the line between what might constitute freedom of worship and what might be taught in certain religious meetings. I believe that people should be free to assemble and worship God according to their conscience.

The scriptures, of course, are subject to a variety of interpretations. My interpretation is that the scriptures teach that we must be subject to the powers that are ordained of God to rule the nations. You cannot very well say, "I will disobey the law of the land," and at the same time say, "I will obey the law of God"; because to my mind to obey God is to obey a law of the land. It is an exacting position. I am an advocate of lifting the ban on Jehovah's Witnesses. I am a great advocate of freedom of worship, but I am not an advocate of permitting anyone to go and do and teach whatever they wish. They may teach truth and truth alone. There again you come up against this difficulty: what one may regard as truth in the bible may not be regarded as a proper interpretation by someone else. If I had time, probably I could convince certain people, but then, the old adage comes in, "A man convinced against his will is of the same opinion still."

I happened to be reading my bible yesterday and I came to a very important passage of scripture which I think is germane to this discussion. It may seem strange to some that I should read the bible in this connection. May I quote just a part of the thirteenth chapter of Romans:

> Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers. For there is no power but of God: the powers that be are ordained of God.

We may not like them. I certainly do not like the Liberal government.

Mr. COLDWELL: You do not think they are ordained of God.

Mr. GIBSON: No, of the people.

Mr. HANSELL: In the development of national affairs I suppose some people have to govern Canada.

Mr. COLDWELL: Even if it happens to be Liberal.

Mr. HANSELL: Then the scripture goes on—

The CHAIRMAN: I like to hear about the Good Book, but I do not just see how it comes under the present discussion, an item having to do with the Department of Justice. Surely we should come down to earth once in a while and keep to the particular item before us.

Mr. HANSELL: I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that you will not prevent me from reading one or two passages. May I say, speaking on behalf of the minister, that I realize these things are exacting and quite a responsibility. The scriptures continue:

> Whosoever therefore resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God: and they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation.
> For rulers are not a terror to good works, but to the evil. Wilt thou then not be afraid of the power? Do that which is good, and thou shalt have praise of the same.

The principle is this. Governments attempt to pass laws for the good and the welfare of the people; therefore we should be subject to those laws. I thought, Mr. Chairman, that I had better bring that out because it does not follow that just because the ban is lifted from an organization they can go ahead and do whatever they wish.

An hon. MEMBER: Does that apply to Protestants and Catholics as well?

Mr. HANSELL: It applies to everyone. I belong to a non-denominational church, but I am quite certain that if I went out and preached something that was going to incite a revolution I would not blame the minister if he put me in gaol.

May I add another word? Some of us receive considerable correspondence over these things. It seems that when one brings up a matter in parliament it means additional work for him, because people read it and then he gets a lot of letters. They seem to think the more you do the more you can do. Some of us have received quite a few letters in regard to the authorities not recognizing those who are said to be ordained by Jehovah's Witnesses. I am not going to criticize that; I mention it only in passing, for the purpose of examination. For instance, an ordained minister is exempt from military service, but the mobilization board does not recognize the organization known as Jehovah's Witnesses. I have received a lot of correspondence along that line. I bring it to the attention of the minister so that he may know how the position stands. It can be looked into, but it does not matter to me what decision is made.

Mr. MARTIN: Does that not arise from a case that was heard in British Columbia, the appeal of which is now pending?

Mr. HANSELL: I could not answer the hon. member's question. I am not informed in that respect.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not think we should allow the statements of the hon. member for Macleod to go by without some comment. I think the age-old principle of democracy is freedom of thought, freedom of association and freedom to think and teach on matters of religion as one may feel impelled to think and to teach. I am not a member of any of those unorthodox sects. I happen to belong to one of the very orthodox Protestant communions, but at the same time I feel that the principle which is being challenged of allowing the free distribution of tracts does strike at the very heart of our religious freedom and our conception of democratic institutions.

I was pretty well schooled years ago in the writings of John Milton, and I have never forgotten his "Areopagitica", the plea for the freedom of the press, the plea for the freedom of the right of a man to issue a tract on any particular subject, no matter how distasteful that subject may be to the powers that be. That principle is sound, and is exemplified in the long struggle for the freedom of the press, the freedom of the sect, if you like, to preach and to teach its doctrines which to-day may be unorthodox but which to-morrow may become very orthodox indeed. I always remember the story of two famous bishops. One asked the other how he defined orthodoxy and heterodoxy. He said: "Orthodoxy is my doxy and heterodoxy is the other fellow's doxy." That is precisely what I think we have to bear in mind.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I think that a statement is due from the minister with regard to the whole situation respecting the defence of Canada regulations. In the main those regulations went through the committee in 1940 at a time when conditions were most serious, and the question of survival as a nation and as an empire was paramount in our thoughts. Great Britain has consistently followed the course of removing those encroachments on democratic rights with the gradual dissipation of the danger to the state. I think that the time has come when these regulations as a whole should be reconsidered. In the past we have had committees from year to year on defence of Canada regulations; but unfortunately the recommendations of those committees, composed of outstanding members of the House of Commons, have not been accepted by the minister. When we come to discuss the question of the freedoms we see that freedom of religion is still not completely existent when we find that the recommendations of the committee have not been implemented. The committee recommended in 1943 that the ban against Jehovah's Witnesses, the International Bible Students' Association and the Watch Tower Bible and Tract Society Incorporated should be removed. There can be only one reason for the maintenance of these regulations interfering with religious bodies—that is, the safety of the state. I believe there have been some five hundred prosecutions of Jehovah's Witnesses, none of which had to do with subversive activities, the entire offence being that of belonging to an organization banned under the defence of Canada regulations.

What excuse is there for interfering with these people receiving the Holy Bible, regardless of by whom it is published? What is there subversive in their teaching doctrines which the rest of us do not accept, as long as the practice of those doctrines does not interfere with the safety of the state? Why is it that the recommendations of the committee of this house have not been accepted in their entirety by the minister? I ask him to deal specifically with this matter; for if we as members of the House of Commons accept without complaint the principle of interference with the freedom of religion we deny the democracy for which we as a country and empire fight. Britain does not deny these people their rights. The United States does not deny them; Australia does not deny them. Why does this government continue to keep these organizations on the banned list? These are matters that must concern hon. members regardless of party allegiance in this house. I think the time has come when the minister should place the whole story before the house and the country. Why are these organizations banned? Why have they not the right enjoyed by all other church organizations to distribute the literature printed by their own corporations? The ban has been removed, it is said. That is theoretical only, unless the ban is lifted from the organizations which disseminate the literature which these people preach. I do not agree with their principles; I have no appreciation of the stand they take in this war, but I cannot understand how the government may assume to believe in freedom of religion and still deny these people their rights. It may be because of the fact that they do not exercise the franchise, and that in this sense they are not true citizens. In any case I think the time has come for the minister to tell us the story, to say what are the reasons for the denial to these people of the opportunity to disseminate their own literature; particularly if it is correct, as I believe it is, that not one case of subversive activities has been brought home to these people.

Mr. HATFIELD: I would point out that the head office of the Watch Tower Bible and Tract Society is in London, England. Their publications are not banned there; why should they be banned in Canada? I should like an answer from the minister.

Mr. ROSE: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think that is a very reasonable request.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Cartier has the floor.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Surely we are entitled to an answer.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am asking this committee to vote the sum of $30,000 for the expenses of the advisory committees which deal with the cases of the internees; that is all I am asking.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, now, the minister won't get away with that.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The minister is not trying to get away with anything. If it pleases this committee to travel over the field of war activities since the beginning of the war, that is its privilege until the chairman sees fit to intervene, but so far as I am concerned I am going to try to stick to the matters with which I have to deal.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister knows as well as I know and as every other member of this committee knows that this is the only item in this war appropriation resolution under which we can discuss the defence of Canada regulations. The fact that this item is for payment of the expenses of the advisory committees does not alter the situation at all; we have a right to know the facts; and the minister ought not, I say with respect—because I have great respect for him—to take the attitude he is taking to-day, that he wishes to deal only with the question of the voting of the money to pay these advisory committees. There are people in this country who want to know why these regulations have not been relaxed, in view of the fact, as stated by my colleague from Lake Centre, that the danger to the state is no longer as threatening as it was. Why should not these regulations be relaxed? I quite appreciate that in the early days of the war, when people were on edge, when there was an imminent threat of invasion, when people had a different attitude towards this sort of thing, there should be strict rules against anything that might be subversive. That day is past. I had the pleasure of sitting in at a meeting of the committee on the defence of Canada regulations when Sir Norman Birkett appeared before the committee and gave a wonderful exposition of the attitude of the British people and of the committees over there in relation to all classes in the community, including communists, if you will. Why should Canada's attitude be so strict as compared with the attitude of Britain and other countries I could mention?

While I am on my feet I should like to know if it is open to us as members of this committee to ask about individual cases of internees who have been released, and the reasons therefor. I will make just one allusion; I refer to the case of Mr. Camillien Houde, who is interned in a community not very far from where I live. The story in that part of the country is that he was offered his release under certain conditions, with which he refused to comply. So far as I am concerned that is hearsay; I do not make any allegations or charges. It may not be open to give me the facts; I realize that they have to be treated with circumspection and that the reports of these advisory committees should be and are in the main secret. We are not very far apart on that principle, but statements are going round the country that the government is trying through these committees to drive bargains with certain gentlemen, and the country ought to know if that is true. If not, it should be denied and the position set at rest. But the minister must tell us what changes have been made in the defence of Canada regulations, what are contemplated to be made, and what is the policy of the government. Do they intend to relax these regulations, and in what direction?

Mr. RAYMOND (Translation): Mr. Chairman, the hon member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) has just referred to the detention of Mr. Camillien Houde, former mayor of Montreal and member of the Quebec legislature. Would the minister say whether he is detained under the defence of Canada regulations or under the mobilization act regulations and for what offence? Is the infraction related to one or the other of the above mentioned regulations? I do not intend to defend Mr. Camillien Houde in particular, but a principle is involved. Being a British subject, he is entitled to fair play as any other British citizen. If he has committed an offence, let him be tried and, if found guilty, condemned to a penalty; but he is entitled to know whether he is to be held indefinitely, without being informed of the penalty he has incurred. I believe the public is entitled to be informed by the minister of the offence committed, the penalty incurred and of whether or not his detention is for an indefinite period.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Cartier has the floor.

Mr. RAYMOND: No; I want an answer. I have asked questions of the Minister of Justice, and I am entitled to an answer.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: A great many questions have been asked, some of which concern the defence of Canada regulations. Others have been dealt with by the Minister of National Defence. It is difficult to determine at what point members in the committee wish an answer that would be pertinent to the item before the committee, and at what point they merely desire to air some grievances with which I am not concerned. If it is proper for me to do so, I shall endeavour to deal with some of the matters relating to the defence of Canada regulations. However I should like to hear what other members of the committee wish to say on that point.

Perhaps I can take up the questions in reverse order to that in which they have been asked. The hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie wants to know under what regulations Mr. Camillien Houde was interned. My answer is that he was interned under regulation 21 of the defence of Canada regulations. The hon. member wants to know what infraction had been committed. Internment is not punishment for having committed an infraction. Internment is an order made by the Minister of Justice, in the exercise of the confidence the house has placed in him, to restrict the liberties of an individual, if he is satisfied it is necessary so to do, with a view to preventing that individual from acting in any manner prejudicial to the public safety or the safety of the state. The order against Mr. Camillien Houde was made because Mr. Houde was acting in a manner which the Minister of Justice then felt constituted something prejudicial to the public safety or the safety of the state. Mr. Camillien Houde was recommending to the public, in a part of this country in which he felt he had support, that there be refusal to comply with national registration regulations. It was felt that that was prejudicial to the safety of the state, and for that reason his internment was ordered. For a long time he was not disposed to ask to have his case reviewed by an advisory board under the authority of the defence of Canada regulations. However, on May 10, 1943, he requested that he be given a hearing. This letter was received by the Department of Justice on May 15, and arrangements were made immediately to have an advisory committee meet and proceed to Fredericton, not only because Mr. Houde had asked to be heard, but because at that time there was a number of applications sufficient to warrant the holding of sittings of the advisory board at that point.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. Houde came before the board at Fredericton in the course of these hearings on May 28 and 29, 1943. As a result of questions put by the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains, it has already been communicated to the house that in the course of its inquiry the committee had to know what Mr. Houde's present dispositions were, and asked him if he would be prepared to sign the usual form of undertaking signed by a great many of those released from internment. This is an undertaking to abide by the laws of Canada, and to do nothing to interfere with the prosecution of Canada's war effort. He asked that a copy of the usual conditions be delivered to him, and said that he would answer the next day. Next day he informed the committee that he was not disposed to sign anything. Thereupon a report was made to the Minister of Justice recommending that his detention be continued.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it a condition precedent to release that an internee shall sign this undertaking?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is not a condition precedent to release. Members of the advisory committee try to make such investigation as will convince them as to whether if he were released the internee would be apt to act in a manner prejudicial to the safety of the state. On their own motion, having received no suggestion whatsoever, from the Department of Justice, they have adopted the procedure of saying to the individual, "Are you sincere in your statement that you are disposed to do everything within your power, with the exception of enrolling in the army, or taking part in the activities of the active army, to further Canada's war effort?" This is asked of a person of enemy origin. A great many of them have declared that they were so disposed. Then they are asked, "Are you so seriously disposed to that end that you would be willing to sign an undertaking to that effect?" A great many have said that they were. And it is after having agreed to sign such an undertaking that in many cases recommendations for release are made, the advisory board holding the view that the individual would not be a danger to the safety of the state.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In practice it is a condition precedent—if not in theory.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I would not go so far as to say that in practice it is a condition precedent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has any man been released who did not sign?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course that is the answer.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes, there were releases before this practice was adopted. But there has been no recommendation to release a person who refused, or who said he was not disposed to sign such an undertaking. If a person were not disposed to sign an undertaking of the kind, such decision evidently influenced the judgment of members of the advisory board, and there was no recommendation for release.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is to show his bona fides.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes, to show his bona fides. Then, in November, 1943, Mr. Houde wrote a letter to Joseph Jean, parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Justice, in which he indicated he would be prepared to sign an undertaking. This letter was communicated to me. I told Mr. Jean that was not the regular way of communicating with the Department of Justice; that if Mr. Houde had any communication to address to that department he should address it to the department and not to a member of parliament who happens to be parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Justice.

I assume that he was given that kind of answer. On December 11 Mr. Houde wrote the deputy minister of the department saying that he was prepared to sign the kind of undertaking that had been submitted to him when the advisory committee had considered his case in May. A reply was made to him that arrangements were being made to have his file placed before the advisory committee which was to visit Fredericton some time in January, and that he might make another appearance before them and allow them to report on the probability or otherwise of his behaving in such manner as would not interfere with the prosecution of our war effort.

Under date of January 10 Mr. Houde wrote the deputy minister of justice that he did not want any further hearing, and a copy of that letter was tabled in this house. Subsequently an hon. member of this house came to see me and said that Mr. Houde, as was stated in this letter of which a copy was tabled, had expressed the view that he had been interned by order in council and that he was going to come out through the big door and there would have to be an order in council passed to let him out. I explained to the hon. member that he was quite mistaken; that Mr. Houde had been treated like any other Canadian or resident of Canada under the defence of Canada regulations; that an order had been made by the Minister of Justice, and if he wanted that order reconsidered—it had been reconsidered once—it could be reconsidered again. He was told that there could not be any special procedure for Mr. Houde, and that unless and until a recommendation was made for his release in conformity with the regulations he would unfortunately have to stay in internment.

I am sorry to take up so much time with this, but apparently there has been a great deal of public interest focussed on this matter and it perhaps justifies the time I am taking. On March 19, 1944, Mr. Houde wrote as follows:

> Mr. Liguori Lacombe, the federal member for the constituency of Laval-Two Mountains, has informed me in a letter dated the 7th instant, of an interview that he has had with the Minister of Justice concerning the early termination of my detention.
>
> Following that interview he advises me to apply for a revision of my case, the reason offered being that I was misinformed when in my last letter to your department I stated that I had been interned by an order in council.
> Considering the untiring efforts of Mr. Lacombe on my behalf I readily comply with what, under the circumstances, seems to be a reasonable request, and I hereby apply for such a revision.
>
> Would you kindly inform me, at your earliest convenience, of any decision in this matter, and oblige.

Thereupon the deputy minister replied to Mr. Houde as follows:

> I have discussed with the minister your letter of March 19.
>
> It is quite true that Mr. Liguori Lacombe did go to see the minister and his object in doing so was probably to endeavour to obtain an early termination of your detention. I do not know what information Mr. Lacombe wrote you, but the minister tells me that his only statement to Mr. Lacombe was that you were entirely mistaken in your previous letter in stating that you had been interned by an order in council; he pointed out that you had in fact been interned by virtue of an order made by the Minister of Justice under the defence of Canada regulations and that if and when you were released it would have to be in conformity with the procedure set up by these regulations.
> In your last letter you "apply for a revision of my case." Am I to take it from this letter that it is an application for a hearing before an advisory committee operating under the regulations? It is intended to have such a committee sit again at Fredericton during the month of May, and if it is your desire to have a hearing before that committee please let me know so that definite consideration can be given to such an application.

On April 17 Mr. Houde replied to the deputy minister as follows:

> In answer to your letter of the 28th last I hereby apply for a revision of my case under the defence of Canada regulations before an advisory committee operating under said regulations.
> For your information I beg to state that Mr. Lacombe, in his letter to me, has simply suggested that I should ask for a revision of my case, and I thought it best in my letter to you to use the same phraseology.

Whatever his reason may have been, on April 17 he asked that his case be reviewed by an advisory committee under the defence of Canada regulations. A committee set up under the defence of Canada regulations is to proceed shortly to Fredericton to consider a number of applications for rehearing; Mr. Houde's file is being handed to that committee, and he will be accorded a rehearing at that time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is Mr. Houde up to date.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That brings the matter up to date. This was not punishment for an offence; it was something done to prevent him from acting in a manner which it was felt would be prejudicial to the interests of the state. Since he has persisted in that attitude up to the present time, no committee has taken upon itself to recommend that he be released.

Mr. RAYMOND: I must say that I am far from satisfied with the explanation given by the minister. We have laws in this country; we have the criminal code and we have other regulations. If a man does not comply with the law, he is prosecuted; if he is convicted there is a penalty, but he knows what to expect. All I am asking for Camillien Houde is that he be given the same treatment as is given to any other British subject, nothing more.

At the beginning of his explanation the minister said that Mr. Houde had been interned because he had not complied with the regulations of the mobilization act. Then at the end of his explanation I was under the impression that he said Mr. Houde had not complied with the defence of Canada regulations. In either case there is a penalty, and he should know to what penalty he is exposed. When a man refuses to comply with the regulations of the mobilization act he is prosecuted before a criminal court. He may be found guilty, but he should not be asked to sign a document such as Mr. Houde was asked to sign. I think it is unfair to say that as long as Mr. Camillien Houde refuses to register in accordance with the mobilization act he will not be released unless he signs some kind of document. The defence of Canada regulations state:

(Translation):

63. (1) Every person who contravenes or fails to comply with any of these regulations, or any order, rule, by-law, or direction, made or given under any of these regulations, shall be guilty of an offence against that regulation.

(2) Where no specific penalty is provided, such person shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding twelve months, or to both fine and imprisonment; but such person may, at the election of the Attorney General of Canada or of the province, be prosecuted upon indictment, and if convicted shall be liable to a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years, or to both fine and imprisonment.

It states distinctly that there is no other penalty. When a man has committed an infraction of the defence of Canada regulations he is prosecuted in the courts and condemned to a fine or imprisonment. In the case of Camillien Houde, he has been there for the last four years. He has not committed any other offence than have people who have been brought before the courts of this country in every province because they have refused to comply with the regulations under the mobilization act, that is, refused to register. That is the infraction which he has committed, and although he has been in detention for four years he is still detained and is to be kept in detention until he signs an agreement according to the pleasure of the Minister of Justice. In my opinion this is entirely unfair. I believe the public is very much interested, because Mr. Houde has not received the treatment which is guaranteed to any ordinary citizen of this country.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am sorry that the hon. member is not satisfied with the explanation, but the fact is that Mr. Houde was not interned because he refused to comply with the national registration regulations; he was interned because he was taking an attitude to encourage people over whom he had influence not to comply with the regulations.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He signed a written statement.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: He signed a statement to that effect, advising them not to comply with that provision of the law; and so long as this country is at war, and so long as I have the responsibility of administering the defence of Canada regulations, I shall not feel it possible to consider that such conduct is not prejudicial to the safety of the state.

Now, to deal with other matters which were raised in connection with the defence of Canada regulations.

Mr. RAYMOND: I understand that Tim Buck has been released. Was he obliged to sign any statement before he was released?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No one was obliged to sign any statement; but before Mr. Tim Buck was released he did declare that it was his intention to comply with the laws and regulations of Canada and to contribute to the best of his ability to Canada's war effort. As an evidence of his good faith he signed a statement to that effect; it was after he had stated his willingness to sign such a statement that an advisory committee recommended to the Department of Justice that he be released, and it was only after he had done so that he was released.

Mr. RAYMOND: I understand that Mr. Houde has written a letter to Mr. Jean to that effect.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Jean is not an advisory committee under the defence of Canada regulations, and Mr. Camillien Houde is not going to be treated any differently from any other resident of Canada who was interned under the defence of Canada regulations.

Mr. RAYMOND: But Tim Buck did not send his statement to an advisory committee.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Tim Buck was heard before an advisory committee; it was before an advisory committee that he made that statement, and it was as agreed before an advisory committee that he signed his undertaking in writing. Thereafter the recommendation of the committee was made to the Department of Justice and an order for release was signed, as recommended.

Mr. GILLIS: Was Mr. Tim Buck interned?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Mr. GILLIS: No.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: He surrendered for internment and was interned, and immediately afterwards went before an advisory committee and succeeded in convincing the committee that it should report that his being at large at this time would not endanger the safety of the state.

Mr. GILLIS: What was the duration of the internment?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Less than a month.

Mr. SLAGHT: How long did he hide from the police?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: From some time in June, 1940, until some time in, I think it was August, 1942. I can get the exact date if the hon. member is interested.

A further question was with respect to the possible danger to the safety of the state in any publications emanating from associations connected with Jehovah's Witnesses, with respect to which the ban was not lifted at the time that it was withdrawn from the organization itself. The reason for that is that, in my view of the defence of Canada regulations—and I am the one who has to take the responsibility of their application—it is contrary to the policy of the state, contrary to the public interest, that the doctrine of not being bound by man-made laws should be taught. There were two points principally upon which publications emanating from this organization were held to be contrary to the public interest and the safety of the state. One, which is very similar to the attitude for which Mr. Houde is still interned, was that man-made laws need not be complied with. The second point was the propaganda to the effect that one could be an ordained minister of Jehovah's Witnesses by making an individual compact with the Almighty, that by doing so one became an ordained minister and not subject to the mobilization regulations. That is something which I look upon as contrary to the policy which this state has to maintain in war time. It cannot be left to the individual to say, "I have by consecrating myself to the Almighty made myself an ordained minister, and thus brought myself within the exceptions provided by the mobilization regulations." Some of the publications which emanate from these associated organizations—I am sorry I cannot say whether the head office is in London, England, but I was under the impression that it is a United States organization—are unnecessary to any of the persons who in good faith assume to satisfy their conscience by the form of worship of Jehovah's Witnesses, to enable them to worship the Almighty in the manner in which they see fit, and they contain material the propagation of which I look upon as contrary to the policy this state has to follow under war conditions.

Freedom to think and to teach is fully recognized, provided what is taught is not in itself subversive. But it is subversive of our order at the present time to teach that individuals are not bound by any man-made laws. It is subversive to teach that any young man can by this private pact bring himself outside the regulations which are required for the purpose of military service in this country.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: By the minister's definition it is subversive to state that one is not bound by man-made laws. Does he set up a different definition of what is subversive from that accepted by Great Britain, the United States and Australia? If so, why?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Perhaps I should not have used the word "subversive". I should have said, contrary to the policy which this state must enforce in war time.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Why are we different from these other countries?

Mr. SLAGHT: It is subversive.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not know what the situation is in those countries. The hon. member said there had been a great many prosecutions of persons who were Jehovah's Witnesses. I know there were a large number of prosecutions for border offences of persons who happened to be Jehovah's Witnesses, because, being Jehovah's Witnesses, they felt they could disregard man-made laws and go into the United States and attend some sort of religious meeting over there, and they were prosecuted for violation of border-crossing regulations. That is something which, in my view, manifests no interference whatsoever with liberty of conscience. There may be a great many people in this country or elsewhere who would feel it would satisfy their conscience to make certain pilgrimages to places which are now not accessible and which would require them to go out of this country, but they would not be allowed to proceed out of this country unless they complied with the regulations set up in that behalf.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But there were prosecutions for delivering tracts in the county of Beauce—a most disgraceful thing.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes, I know. But there are 11,500,000 Canadians; they are not all in the Department of Justice and I cannot be held responsible for errors that may be committed elsewhere. This matter was raised at the last session and I stated frankly that I had seen these tracts and they were extracts from the French edition of the Bible published over the name of l'abbé Crampon, which is a well recognized edition that is used by Roman Catholics of the French language, and there did not seem to be anything else but that. It certainly was a mistake to prosecute anyone for distributing copies of pages of the bible if there was nothing more. There have been overzealous officials in all administrations, and that was certainly something that should not have been done. I may say that it was one of the reasons which made it appear necessary to me to go farther than had first been done in respect of Jehovah's Witnesses.

My first recommendation had been a modification which would allow them to exercise their religion in any way they saw fit; but the fact that they remained banned was something which possibly encouraged overzealous prosecutions that were taking place in different parts of Canada, and I felt, that because of that it would be better to remove the ban in the defence of Canada regulations, and that, if prosecutions had to be instituted, to institute them under the criminal code. It was for that reason that it was done. But, as one hon. member has pointed out in this house, it has created among some the impression that now anything which a person who calls himself a Jehovah's Witness does is legal, simply because the ban has been lifted. That of course is not seriously contended anywhere, and it is an impression which is no more justified than was the impression that because Jehovah's Witnesses distributed extracts from the bible they were doing something illegal.

The other matters dealt with the treatment of Jehovah's Witnesses in military camps. I am sure every hon. member knows that the Minister of National Defence will not tolerate anything of that kind in the camps under his jurisdiction, and whenever anything of the kind is brought to his attention it is carefully inquired into and if what is stated on hearsay evidence is to be disproved it will be disproved. If it turns out that there is some justification in fact for any part of it, the parties responsible will be severely dealt with.

Other matters that were raised had to do with the releasing from internment of Lorimer, Farr and Schneider. John Lorimer and Joseph Farr had been interned in June, 1940, under regulation 21 of the defence of Canada regulations as partisans of the National Unity party of which Adrien Arcand, who is still interned, was the recognized leader. Both Lorimer and Farr had had some connection with it. Lorimer was alleged to have held office as assistant treasurer and Farr was an officer of the organization. He was an organizer. Lorimer had a hearing before Mr. Justice Fortier in 1940; after that hearing it was recommended that his detention should be continued, and it was continued. He had a further hearing before a three-man committee in July, 1942. That committee, after considering all the angles of the case, recommended that he be released. He had succeeded in convincing the committee that he had had little to do with the organization, that he had manifested, even while interned, that he was in full sympathy with the war effort of this country and of the allies, and that he was ready to do everything in his power to further the war effort to the united nations. He had stated that he was quite willing to put his signature to a declaration to that effect, and as a matter of fact he did. They recommended that he be released and he was released on September 1, 1942. One of the conditions of his release was that he should report monthly to the R.C.M.P. and he has been doing so. They have kept in touch with him since; he seems to be the sort of person who found it was at least uncomfortable to have been in the limelight; he wanted to drop back into his original obscurity and he has dropped back.

Mr. GRAYDON: He wanted to go back into private life, did he?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Apart from his monthly reports, nothing further has been heard about him since. Farr had been interned at the same time. He had a hearing in December, 1940, before Mr. Justice Fortier; continuation of his detention had been recommended and it was continued.

In August, 1942, he was again heard before the same committee that heard Lorimer. At that time he was not able to convince the committee that he was then in a frame of mind where his activities would no longer be a threat to the safety of the state. They recommended that his detention be continued. Shortly afterwards he got into very serious difficulties with the nazi elements in the camp and was pretty severely beaten up on several occasions because of the attitude he was expressing in the camp owing to his consideration for the cause of the allied nations. He had a new hearing in July, 1943, and in October, 1943. After the committee obtained further information about him and became convinced—at least so they certified—that his being at liberty at that time would in no way endanger the safety of the state, he also having signed an undertaking to that effect, and having been informed that he would be required to report monthly to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, he was released. He also has been reporting monthly since that time, and other than from his report we have heard nothing about him. He has dropped back into private life. The information we have is that he will never again be in with the kind of party that he belonged to at the time he was interned. One of those releases was made in September, 1942, and the other one in October, 1943.

Some weeks ago I think the PM newspaper heard that these men had been released and compared what had taken place here with the stir that had been occasioned by the release of one Mr. Mosley in the United Kingdom. As a matter of fact these men had dropped back into private life here and had behaved themselves, and no one connected with either the police or in any other connection had found that any inconvenience to the safety or well-being of the state had resulted. Unless and until something takes place which would convince me that it would be my duty, for the protection of the state, to re-intern them, I would certainly not do so. I have received a large number of communications from various parts of the country requesting that these men be re-interned and that an undertaking be given that they will remain interned for the duration of the war. I replied that it seemed to me to be a most undemocratic suggestion to make; that no one could or should be detained unless there was such evidence as convinced the Minister of Justice that it was necessary to do so to prevent them from acting in a manner prejudicial to public safety or to the safety of the state. And to suggest, because one was called Lorimer and the other Farr, that they be re-interned and that an undertaking be given that they would remain interned for the duration was not a procedure that I could contemplate as a proper one.

I may say right here that no one in the Department of Justice makes any suggestion whatsoever to the members of these committees, each one of which is presided over by a judge, as to what attitude they shall take. There has been no change of policy; there has been a change in conditions. In June, 1940, when it became apparent that there had been fifth-column activity to the extent which was revealed by the tactics in the countries which were overrun, all hon. members remember that there was considerable nervousness in this country and that it was easy for any one who happened to be in the office of the Minister of Justice at that time to come to the conclusion that it might be necessary to order such-and-so for the safety of the state. Large numbers of residents of Canada of German and Italian origin were then interned and since that time a great many of them have been having their individual cases carefully considered and have been released. I do not think a mistake was made in interning them. I think one has to look back to the conditions which existed at that time, and at that time the condition was so urgent that there was no opportunity to examine in advance with the care that has been given to the individual cases since. The Minister of Justice could not afford to take any risks at that time. Fortunately, since that time the situation has considerably improved and something which made the change in the attitude of the Department of Justice to these questions is the entry of the United States into the war. The co-operation which has existed since that time between the R.C.M.P. and the F.B.I. is such that as to the facts and the probabilities a different impression has been created.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Would the minister permit a question before he passes on to the next subject? Will he tell us how many residents of Canada are still interned and how many were released during the last year?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is the figure I was looking for. There are still over 300 persons other than persons of Japanese origin.

I segregated them because the Japanese situation is one that arose at a later date and has been dealt with in a separate compartment.

Mr. COLDWELL: Does that include all persons of enemy nationality other than Japanese?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There are about 160 British subjects who are still interned; that is, British subjects by birth or by naturalization.

Mr. SLAGHT: Is it broken down as to racial origin?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There are held as enemy aliens under regulation 25, 141 of German origin. There are held under regulation 21, as residents of Canada, being British subjects by birth and naturalization, but of German racial origin, 120; of Italian racial origin, 2; of Italian origin, naturalized, 4; others, principally because of their connections with this unity national party, 32.

Mr. STIRLING: No Austrians or Hungarians?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: They have been grouped with the Germans.

There was one other case about which explanations were asked; that was the case of A. N. Schneider. As has been stated, this man was first detained in September, 1939, and released in December of the same year. His release, I understand, was the cause of many protests to the department at that time. In June, 1940, when these orders for detention were being issued against a large number of residents of Canada of German and Italian origin, he was again included and interned. He had a hearing before an advisory committee in September, 1942, and the committee recommended continued detention. He was heard again in February, 1944, at which time he was able to convince the advisory committee, which is one that has been functioning since I came into the department, which has had a great deal of experience, to which no suggestion has ever been made by the government, and with respect to which I would resent any suggestion being made by the Department of Justice—

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is the minister free to give the personnel of that committee?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes. The chairman is His Honour Judge M. A. Miller; the members of the committee are Mr. Robert Taschereau, K.C., former chairman of the workmen's compensation board of the province of Quebec, and Mr. W. M. Dickson, former deputy minister of labour. That committee made a report in February, 1944, recommending that this man be released, and the file and recommendation came before me. Of course in many of these cases it would be convenient to be able to give the facts; but it has been felt that it would be improper to give them in one case and refuse to give them in another. For that reason when the question was put by the hon. member for Saskatoon City it was felt that all we could say were the facts which were known. Certainly it does not make a man a safe person to have at large in the country because he happens to have two nephews in the armed forces overseas or because he happens to have a son who has not reached the age when he can enter the army but who has entered the reserve cadet group in his locality. But those facts were notorious; and together with other facts which were brought out in the evidence before the committee they convinced the committee that this man was not now, if ever he had been, a nazi sympathizer, and that it would not be a danger to the security of the state to allow him to be released. Here again, as evidence of good faith, he declared his willingness to sign this undertaking and was released in the ordinary course.

Mr. GRAYDON: Was he interned because he was a nazi sympathizer?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: He was interned at the time all the Germans were being picked up, being interned first in September, 1939, on reports that had been received from the locality in which he lived. Those reports were investigated and found to be not sufficient, so that he was released in December, 1939. Then when the general order was being made, in June, 1940, to pick up all the nazi or fascist sympathizers throughout the country, he was included in the list.

Mr. GRAYDON: If the minister will permit me, while it is hard to know what facts are acceptable and what are not, as the minister knows this Doctor Schneider was alleged to have been very much interested in the election campaign of 1940. It was difficult for the public to understand why he should be picked up and released just before the election; then picked up again after the election was over. When all the parts of this apparent puzzle are put together, of course the public are led to believe what has been stated often in the house and what perhaps will remain in the public mind for a long time.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): He will have a chance to do a better election job this summer.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That explanation does not quite agree with the explanation given by the former Minister of Justice who, speaking in this house on June 13, 1940, at page 745 of Hansard, said:

> In one case, which was in Saskatchewan, the man was released under special circumstances in December.

I point out that the minister now says he was released as the result of a finding in his favour.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Not in December. At that time the system of advisory boards had not been set up. I said after an investigation, but not after a hearing.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The former minister went on:

> I was told by my good friend the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) that this man took part in the election which followed. Well, if he did, it did not serve him very well, because I have since ordered his reinternment and he is still in the camp. I have no qualms of conscience as to that case at all. I cannot give to the house the circumstances, but at least one condition of his release was not lived up to, and this circumstance permitted me to order his reinternment.

Then the minister went on to describe a case in the province of Manitoba, of a man with the same surname; he said he had ordered that man's reinternment but felt that it was unfair to have done so, though he had to do it in the circumstances. I point out, Mr. Chairman, that between January 25, 1940, which was about the time the writs for the election were issued, and March 26, 1940, which was the date of the election, fifty per cent of those interned in Saskatchewan were released. That is why there was a feeling that considerations other than the safety of the state had entered into the equation. At that time the minister assured the house that this was not the case.

I should like to say one thing for the minister. While extraordinary powers are given under the defence of Canada regulations in the matter of internment, since becoming minister the hon. gentleman has seen to it that no one has been kept interned after his release has been recommended by an advisory committee, thereby removing the complaint so often heard that unless the minister acted in that way, too great powers were thereby exercised by him.

Now, with respect to internees who are British subjects by naturalization, men who have endeavoured by subversive activities to undermine this country in a time of war, and whose activities have been designed to assist the enemy, has the minister given consideration to recommending a change in the law whereby their naturalization certificates will be cancelled, and whereby when the war is over such people will be returned to those countries they have actively endeavoured to support during this time of war?

It seems difficult to understand why people who came to this country and accepted the honour of citizenship, but who have endeavoured to undermine the state, should after their discharge be permitted to resume their activities as citizens of this country and receive the protection and the honour that British citizenship carries with it. Some amendment or some change in the law should be effected whereby such people would be sent back to the countries the causes of which they have espoused during this period of war. That is the only way in which that vast number of citizens who have come from alien enemy countries but who have remained true and loyal to Canada will receive proper and fair consideration for what they have done during the period of war. They have supported Canada, and they have the right to ask that those who have acted in a treasonable manner shall receive something more than internment.

I think of a man in Saskatchewan living near the town of Gull Lake, who served in the German army before coming to Canada. His son, while a sergeant-pilot in this war, earned the D.F.M., was commissioned, and is to-day a flying officer. To such men, all honour; but with respect to those others who have accepted citizenship in Canada, and at the same time have endeavoured to undermine this country in a time of war, no consideration, political or otherwise, should be permitted to intervene with their being sent back to those countries they have endeavoured to support, while at the same time accepting the protection of British citizenship.

Mr. BENCE: I have listened with interest to the explanations given by the minister, particularly that concerning the Schneider case. As the evidence will appear, Mr. Schneider was released as the result of a recommendation by an advisory committee. I am not for a moment questioning the integrity of advisory committees, but I urge that they should be careful not to relax their vigilance in respect of people who have been placed in internment camps as a result of investigations instituted by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

It is true that in June, 1940, this country was considerably aroused and concerned about these matters, and that possibly the vigilance was somewhat greater than necessary. Nevertheless the Schneider case was investigated on September 22, 1942, which is some considerable time later. I presume careful consideration was given to it at that time, and that all evidence was before the committee. The result of the investigation was a recommendation that detention be continued. I suggest to the minister, and through him to the advisory committee, that the fact the war is looking somewhat better for us should not cause us to relax our vigilance in respect of these suspects.

These signed documents, under which these people promise to be good boys—I think we may put it in that way—do not amount to much. Hitler made promises and did not keep them; and there are lots of other people who are prepared to make promises, but who are not ready to keep them.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Perhaps it is more significant when one refuses to sign.

Mr. GRAYDON: I doubt that; I should be inclined to think the opposite.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Not always. However, the matter raised by the hon. member for Lake Centre is and has been for some time receiving careful attention. I believe we shall have at our disposal the results of carefully made and independent investigations into the histories of each of these persons. We shall be in a position to make such use of those histories as may be proper under the conditions of any peace treaty which will be established.

At this time I do not think it would be wise to go farther. We are not going to be unfair to anyone, whatever his origin. That has been the attitude of the government, particularly the departments of External Affairs and National Defence. They have insisted upon the maintenance of that attitude. It is one which I believe should be maintained, because we do not want any other country, some citizens of which may be in Canada, to be unfair to Canadian citizens who are held in such countries as prisoners of war or otherwise. We shall have made investigations which will enable us to have the facts, and we shall be in a position to take the action which may be indicated by those facts.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: My understanding is that when a person who holds a naturalization certificate as a British subject is found guilty of subversive activities, such certificate is not automatically cancelled?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No; but that is a matter which is receiving attention. An interdepartmental committee which acts in an advisory capacity has been set up. It will be supplied with all the information, and will have the facts in respect of each case in which action might be taken. I am quite sure the hon. member is not suggesting that a person who is a naturalized British subject and who has been interned should be considered as having against him a conviction for subversive activity. The possibility of subversive activity is all that is required to bring the Minister of Justice to the conclusion that for the safety of the state it is necessary to order internment.

The minister does not attempt to make a conviction. That would mean that the benefit of the doubt would be in favour of the person whose case might be under consideration. Under the defence of Canada regulations it has been and is the practice of placing the benefit of the doubt in favour of the state. If there is any doubt as to a man's being dangerous, such doubt must be resolved in favour of the state. It may be unfortunate in some cases that persons whose intentions and motives and conduct may be innocent should suffer. Nevertheless the rule I have indicated is the one we find it necessary to apply in respect of the administration of these regulations. When it comes to imposing penal sanction—and none could be greater than the cancellation of one's naturalization certificate —we would require the kind of evidence which would justify a conviction.

Mr. MacNICOL: Upon review of a number of cases it has been found that original internment was carried out for no reason other than the one that the internees were of enemy extraction, but were also British citizens. I know of many cases of that kind. Upon review it has been found that these internees have not been dangerous. Is there any move to give them redress for their internment?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, there is not. The regulations were administered for the safety of the state and it has not been felt that any consideration should be given to such cases. Should a case arise where there has been a glaring mistake owing to negligence, that would be another matter.

Mr. MacNICOL: At the time I had reference to there was a certain amount of hysteria in the country. This was quite natural, as the minister has explained, owing to the possibilities of subversive activities, but perhaps numbers of persons were interned who should not have been. I have in mind a man who was a really good citizen, a builder who employed many men. I do not know why he was taken up, but he was sent to an internment camp and kept there for quite a while before he was released. Three of his sons were in the army and the fact that he was interned had broken up his entire family. His wife's health has failed and I was just wondering if in a review of any such case there would be any redress.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I will just make a note of that.

Mr. SLAGHT: My hon. friend says that he knows of a case where an error was made. I have some knowledge of the operations of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the Department of Justice in the earlier, stressful days to which my hon. friend refers. There have been remarkably few cases of error in internment, but the situation has changed and releases have been made after careful and full investigation. However, I should not like my hon. friend—and perhaps he did not intend to—to cast any reflection upon the magnificent record of our secret service as carried out by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in times of great stress, at a time when the mother country had her back to the wall and when there was a growing rumble of subversive activities. In that connection I should like to pay a tribute to the fine work and the few mistakes made in connection with the entire administration of internment operations in this country.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have nothing to say against the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. On the contrary I shall have some fine words to say about them when that matter is before us. That does not come under this item. I was assuming from what the minister said that a large number of internments had been made at a time when there was considerable hysteria, but that to-day only a small number comparatively speaking are still interned. I have known the man to whom I referred for many years, although I cannot say whether he committed any subversive action. He was of Italian origin and his family were highly respected. At that time many Italians were loaded in vans and taken away, and I was wondering if there might not be some redress made in cases like this. Simply because a man is of a certain nationality should not warrant his being unnecessarily, one might say abused, although that is not the right word—perhaps suppressed would be better. We shall never build up a country out of different races, as have our neighbours to the south, unless we have a more human understanding of those different races. This man had a family of seven, all born here in Canada, and several are now in the armed forces. This may be only one case—it is not for me to say—but I merely asked the minister if such cases were being considered. He has said that it will be looked into. I have a very high regard for the Minister of Justice because I have always found him very fair in giving his answers.

Mr. BENCE: I understand that under the regulations a man who is interned cannot run for an election. If Camillien Houde is successful in his application, would he then be in position to stand for election to the various legislative bodies in the country?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I have been warned several times that it is improper for the Minister of Justice to attempt to give a legal opinion from his seat in the house. I shall refer my hon. friend to the regulation and ask him to draw his own conclusion. It is No. 65, which reads:

> Notwithstanding anything contained in any statute or other law, no person who has been detained or interned under the provisions of these regulations, and while so detained or interned, or who has been convicted of any offence against regulation 39C of these regulations, shall be eligible as a candidate for any public office at any municipal, provincial or dominion election, or otherwise.

That regulation creates an obstacle while a man is interned. As to whether or not there would be an obstacle resulting from internment after his release would, I suggest, depend upon the terms of the provincial or municipal statute that governed the eligibility of candidates for election.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

KETTLE VALLEY RAILWAY COMPANY

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale) moved the second reading of bill No. 88, respecting the Kettle Valley Railway Company.

He said: I move the second reading of this bill in the hope that it will be sent to the standing committee on railways. Forty years ago the company had power to construct this branch line, but did not do so, or did so only in part, and the desire now is to continue that construction for another ten miles down to a place called Osoyoos, a little north of the United States boundary, where there is a considerable volume of produce to be picked up. The branch line at present stops thirty miles or so south of Penticton, and if the railway is not continued for the other ten miles, the produce from that area, which is continually increasing, will have to be carried by truck on the highway, at the expense of both gas and rubber. The railway company is of opinion that now is the time to continue the construction to this other point of collection.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

FUNDY AIR LINES

Mr. V. J. POTTIER (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare) moved the second reading of bill No. 89, to incorporate Fundy Air Lines.

He said: In moving the second reading of this bill, I would call to the attention of the house that order in council P.C. 2200, passed on May 18, 1943, provided that "during the present war or until otherwise ordered by the governor in council no further letters of patent under part 1 of the Companies Act as amended be granted incorporating a company having as a principal object or purpose the operation of aircraft in Canada or between Canada and other countries." That same order in section 2 provides that "applicants should be advised, if they desire to incorporate companies with this particular object or purpose, to apply for incorporation by act of parliament."

I wish to emphasize that the proposed bill does not involve the granting of any specific licence or route to actually engage in air operations between specified points or otherwise operate aircraft. The petition is purely and simply for the incorporation of a company which cannot now be incorporated by letters of patent or charter.

Before Fundy Air Lines, if incorporated, can actually operate, it will be necessary to secure a licence from the Department of Transport which, speaking generally, would warrant the airworthiness of their aircraft, and also to secure a licence from the board of transport commissioners to fly between such points and places as may from time to time be named by order in council. The board of transport commissioners, as the law stands at present, have the sole right to grant licences but only between such points and places as have been named by order in council. It is understood that a number of applications are at present pending before the board of transport commissioners but cannot be dealt with until appropriate orders in council have been passed. The powers asked for in the proposed bill are those usually required to set up company machinery with authority to carry on air line services.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not rise for the purpose of opposing the second reading of this bill. What I understand the applicants are asking for is a charter which has been denied them by the order in council referred to by the hon. member who is sponsoring the bill; that is to say, an amendment made under the War Measures Act to the first part of the Companies Act; an amendment made while parliament was in session—be it known to the members of this house—which was made without notice to the public and is an infringement of the rights and privileges of parliament. However, that is in passing.

This bill, I think, should be passed, because it is an evidence that private enterprise is not yet quite dead in relation to civil aviation in this country. It probably is on its way out if the policy of the Minister of Transport is carried to its logical conclusion. I should like to see this bill go to the railway committee, and there the promoters will of course appear to support their proposals and tell the people of Canada just what they have in mind. I think I know what they have in mind. They desire to get a corporate franchise and, if possible, to get authorization to operate certain routes in the maritime provinces; routes, it may be, which have been denied to other private enterprise; I do not know about that. The people who are behind this measure are quite capable financially of entering into this class of transportation business.

I merely rose for the purpose of saying that this bill would have been unnecessary if there had not been an invasion of parliamentary rights on the part of the ministry, and, second, that if these people mean business in the future they should be given encouragement, but if they only mean to get a franchise which will have a nuisance value in the future, it ought not to be granted.

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I wonder whether any member of the government would care to indicate whether the passing of this bill will in any way conflict with the policies proposed by the government in connection with civil aviation. I understand there is on the order paper another bill in the name of the government dealing with this matter. We have already had considerable debate on the subject. I should appreciate it very much if some member of the government, in view of the absence of the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), would say a word in this connection.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Acting Prime Minister): I would anticipate that in committee the matter would be considered, and the last section of the bill, section 10, which provides that the operations of the company shall be subject to the provisions of the Aeronautics Act and the Transport Act, would be suitably amended in order to make the bill subject to the legislation which is envisaged in the resolution which is now in the name of the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), namely an act to establish an air transport board, and possibly other amendments to the Transport Act which are now indicated by a bill which is before the house for second reading. I anticipate that if there is any conflict with regard to policy, having regard to legislation which has been passed or which is envisaged, that would be taken care of by making the bill subject to any general legislation and by other amendments in committee, or possibly on third reading.

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): My interpretation of the legislation brought down by the minister is very much the same as that of the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson). I am not opposing this particular bill, but it appears to me that the legislation which is sponsored by the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) is at variance with the purpose of this company, which seems to be trying to get a charter to exploit the men when they come back, in other words to sell it to them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not say that.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You generally leave out what you want to say and say what you do not want to say.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a new thought.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am going to vote against this bill because I do not think the principle is right. I am not discussing the technical side of it, but this company seems to be trying to get a charter for the purpose, as I understood the Minister of Munitions and Supply to say, of reserving air lines for the men coming back after the war. I cannot see why the company should ask for this charter. Why can they not wait until after the war? We are taking over other lines, or notifying other private companies, such as the Canadian Pacific Railway company, of our intention to take over lines. Why, therefore, should we grant charters to some private companies? I should like to have a further explanation before I can undertake to support the bill.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I ask a question. Is it not true that Mr. William Wendell Rogers, named as an incorporator in this bill, was one of the most famous Canadian aviators in the last war?

Mr. OLOF HANSON (Skeena): This granting of charters to air lines takes me back over the history of Canada a few years ago when we were granting charters to those engaged in the railway enterprise. What was the outcome? We found that after a certain number of years the Canadian government or the Canadian people had to take over a number of roads which were absolutely useless. If the charter which is sought in this instance is granted, should the private company engaged in operating it find it impossible to continue and be compelled to give up the line, the people who will be served by this line will naturally look to the government for a continuation of the service, just as people did in the case of railways that could not be carried on. I suggest that before such charters are granted the matter should be given very careful consideration.

Mr. POTTIER: To answer the question raised by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), Mr. Rogers, one of the five persons named in the bill, was a member of the air force in the last war and had a record of eleven planes. He was given the Military Cross. Two of the other gentlemen indicated were also in the Royal Air Force, and of the other two one was in the army and received the Military Cross in the last war, while the other was also a member of the armed forces. In short, three of these gentlemen had records in the air force and two were in the army. Answering the suggestion that there is an attempt at exploitation of members of the service, I do not believe the hon. member who suggested this really meant it. If he knew these gentlemen he would not have made the suggestion.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: May I ask a question?

Mr. SPEAKER: The debate has been closed.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the second time and referred to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

PATENT APPLICATION OF CLAUDE H. PETERS

Mr. G. J. McILRAITH (Ottawa West) moved the second reading of bill No. 94, respecting a certain patent application of Claude H. Peters.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): By way of interrogation rather than to make any remarks, may I ask the hon. member who is sponsoring this bill whether, to his knowledge, there are any precedents along the line suggested in the bill itself? It opens up an avenue which perhaps may have been opened before. If my memory is correct, and I think it is, when the hon. gentleman introduced the bill he stated that a firm of solicitors was in default with respect to the patent application mentioned in the bill. On a question put to him, as to whether or not the firm of solicitors had been struck from the record because of this particular default, I believe he said it was so. It would appear on the surface as though equity would be done if this bill were passed and the applicant put in the same position as he was in relation to the original application, so as to wipe out any injustice that might have occurred through no fault of his own. Perhaps the hon. member when he closes the debate will answer the question as to whether or not this will be creating a precedent, because after all this is an important matter.

Mr. McILRAITH: The leader of the opposition is quite correct. He deals with the causes that make this bill necessary. It was a firm of patent attorneys, not solicitors, that was in default. The practice under the Patent Act is to set up a registry, and all patent attorneys entitled to practise under that act are registered. By reason of the failure on the part of the firm to which the applicant sent his work, to carry out its duties this bill becomes necessary.

With respect to the question of precedent, I regret I am not able to answer the question asked by the leader of the opposition, but I shall have the information when the bill is in committee. I would point out, however, that even with the bill the applicant is not in as good position as he would have been had the patent attorneys not neglected their duties. It might be pointed out that under the provisions of the bill the rights of other persons which have arisen since the date his patent would normally have been dealt with are fully protected. We do not know what rights may have arisen in the meantime, but any rights that have arisen are protected under the bill as proposed. Therefore, in no circumstances can the applicant be in as good position as he would have been had he not employed this particular firm of Canadian patent attorneys. As was stated by the leader of the opposition, we are considering this bill because of the failure of the firm of patent attorneys to carry out its duties.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps with the consent of the house I might make just one observation with respect to that. By giving second reading to this bill and referring it to the appropriate committee, I hope we shall not be setting up a precedent so that in subsequent sessions we shall be asked to take similar action when an agent or a person who is employed by some other person, whether he be a patent attorney, a solicitor, or under whatever name he may be known, defaults in his duties. I hope it will be recognized that this parliament will have no obligation either morally, legally or constitutionally to make good in the future default to the person who employed the defaulter to act for him. That is the only point with respect to this bill that seems to present itself. This is the first time since I have been in the House of Commons that parliament has been asked to act in such a way. While it is true we are dealing with this individual application at the present time and that we should as a parliament attempt, if possible, to rectify what seems to be a glaring piece of injustice, and one which was wholly beyond the power and control of the aggrieved person, yet, I do hope it will be made abundantly clear both in committee and on third reading of the bill that parliament is not creating a precedent whereby agencies and defaulters of this kind can have their mistakes corrected. After all, we must remember it was not this parliament nor this government nor the committee which deals with it that had anything to do with the choosing of the particular agent, solicitor or attorney employed by this man to carry out his orders. I hope that will be distinctly understood. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that I have encroached upon the time of the house to this extent, but I thought it was important in view of the explanation which the hon. member has made.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the second time and referred to the committee on miscellaneous private bills.

ALBERTA PROVINCIAL BANK

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge) moved the second reading of bill No. 109 respecting the Alberta Provincial Bank.

Mr. GRAYDON: I understood the mover of second reading of this bill was in a position to explain its contents.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It is the settled conviction of the people of Alberta that the various provinces in the dominion should be permitted to have provincial banks. They believe that had that policy been followed from the beginning, the economy of Canada would have been in a far better conditon than it is now. The Alberta government is simply petitioning the dominion government for authority to establish a provincial bank for Alberta.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I am afraid I cannot, on behalf of the government, consent to the second reading of this bill. I will, however, propose that the course that was taken in 1940 with respect to a similar bill be taken in regard to this bill, namely, that the bill be not now read a second time but that the subject matter be referred to the select standing committee on banking and commerce for consideration and report.

I must, I think, give some reasons why I think that is the proper course to follow. I have looked at the bill and I have also examined the bill which was introduced in the Alberta legislature authorizing the formation of the Alberta provincial bank. I have not seen the act which was passed by the Alberta legislature, and I do not know whether the act is in the same terms as the bill that was introduced; but the plan of the Alberta government is to establish a bank called the Alberta provincial bank and that the owners of that bank will be province of Alberta. The $500,000 which are initially subscribed for shares are to be paid by the government of Alberta. It is to be Alberta provincial money. The directors of the bank are the members of the Alberta provincial government. The directors are not to own shares in their own right, as provided by the Bank Act, but are to hold their shares in trust for the province of Alberta.

Then by section 5 of the bill it is proposed that some sixteen sections of the Bank Act shall not apply to the proposed new Alberta provincial bank. Let me refer to a few of these sections. In proposing that sections 11 and 20 of the Bank Act shall not apply, certain minimum requirements are removed in the matter of both provisional directors and the directors who are elected by the shareholders. These two sections require that each provisional director or elected director be (1) a bona fide subscriber of stock of the bank on his own behalf; (2) become the absolute and sole owner in his individual right of such stock, and not as trustee or in the right of another; (3) a subscriber for and pay up not less than $3,000 for such stock in the case of a bank capitalized at $1,000,000 or less, $4,000 in the case of a bank capitalized at over $1,000,000 but not over $3,000,000, and $5,000 in the case of a bank capitalized at over $3,000,000. A further requirement in the case of directors elected by the shareholders is that a majority shall be natural born or naturalized British subjects domiciled in Canada. This bill dispenses with these minimum requirements of the Bank Act, and in doing so the bill would appear to be running contrary to a fundamental principle of that act, which is that bank directors be not mere trustees or nominees of some unknown or impersonal owner of stock, but that they be individuals with a definite personal stake in the business and a personal responsibility for the way in which the affairs of the bank are conducted and the money of the depositors is handled. I referred to the provision of the Bank Act which ensures that a majority of the elected directors must be British subjects domiciled in Canada. This provision is put there for a purpose. Any exclusion of its operation in the case of a particular bank would seem to require the most careful consideration by this parliament.

Then section 12 of the Bank Act is not to apply to the proposed bank. This section provides for the opening of stock books for public subscription after ten days' public notice. A subscriber to stock is required to give particulars of his address and occupation as well as the number of shares subscribed for. Section 33 of the Bank Act is excluded. This section provides that any of the original unsubscribed stock or any increase in stock may be allotted to the original subscribers pro rata at not less than par and, inter alia, for a price payable in money. These safeguards are of the utmost importance to depositors and creditors of a bank. Any exception from the operation of this section should be most carefully considered. In excluding sections 35, 37, 39, 40 and 41 of the Bank Act, the bill removes provisions dealing with the right to call on shareholders to pay up any unpaid amount on their stock. It may be that the committee or this house, after examining the Alberta statute, will come to the conclusion that these sections of the Bank Act have no application in this particular case. On the other hand, parliament may come to the conclusion that the dominion should not enact legislation leaving this matter unprotected and dependent upon the continuation of the present provincial legislation.

The other sections of the Bank Act which are excluded have to do with the transfer and transmission of the shares in a bank. These exclusions have to be examined in the light of the provincial statute, which contemplates a holding of the shares by members of the government of the province, and the cessation of their ownership of the shares when they cease to be members of the government of the province. Here also the question of the continuation of the provincial statute in its present form must be examined. In pith and substance the bill is just what the mover described it to be; it is a bill to make the province of Alberta a bank.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Another department of the government.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It is to give the province of Alberta power to have a provincial bank.

Mr. ILSLEY: It depends upon what you call a province, but it makes the provincial government of Alberta a bank.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Do you call the government of the Dominion of Canada a bank in the case of the Bank of Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Certainly not. The Bank of Canada is a national bank, and the proposed bank will be a provincial bank. To say that the provincial government will be a bank is just as absurd as to say that the dominion government is a bank.

Mr. ILSLEY: But the directors of this proposed bank are to be the ministers of the crown in the province of Alberta. Apparently the whole intention is that these ministers will sit in their executive council chamber one hour, and then go on with the business of the bank. It is the executive council of the province of Alberta functioning as a bank. That was the conclusion of the law officers of the crown with regard to the previous bills introduced to incorporate an Alberta provincial bank, which were submitted to this parliament in 1940 and 1941. On those two occasions the law officers of the crown expressed grave doubts as to the constitutional validity of such a proposal. They have not had an opportunity to give full consideration to bill No. 109 and to the recently enacted Alberta statute, which has a bearing on the question of constitutionality. The terms of that provincial statute would, of course, have a bearing on that question.

Again, until the amendments to the Bank Act have been passed by this parliament, it would not be advisable to give this bill second reading. In bill No. 91, which has just been referred to the banking and commerce committee, the right to issue notes is to be taken away from existing banks as from January 1, 1945, and is to be denied to new banks. The double liability feature of the bank stock is to be amended in accordance with such changes. In reading bill No. 109, I take it that the sponsors had such amendments to the Bank Act in mind, because there is no provision for any liability in addition to the original $500,000. That might not make much difference if the amendments to the Bank Act introduced this year become law, but one never knows whether or not they will become law. If they do not become law perhaps this bill should be changed somewhat, if, indeed, it is considered at all.

For these reasons, because this experiment is something never contemplated by the Bank Act; because it excludes the operation of quite a number of important sections, and because its constitutional validity is at least doubtful, I should think there would be something pretty anomalous about making a provincial government a bank, or a province a bank, to all intents and purposes. That is what this does; it puts them in the banking business.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. BLACKMORE: No more than the dominion cabinet is a bank.

Mr. ILSLEY: We are on the constitutional point now, and constitutionally this is a dominion sphere, not a provincial sphere.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is why we are asking the dominion to give us power to have a bank.

Mr. ILSLEY: The question is whether we have power to delegate that; that is the constitutional point I am talking about. Therefore for these reasons—and possibly there are other reasons as well—I wish to move in amendment:

That this bill be not now read a second time, but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the select standing committee on banking and commerce for consideration and report.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, if my memory serves me correctly, that was the course pursued on a previous occasion.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The bill was not read a second time, but was referred to the banking committee for consideration.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And it is my recollection that on that occasion I took the position that this house might as well deal with the principle of the bill right here and now, without its going to the committee.

The minister's observations opposing a second reading of the bill have a good deal of weight; there is no doubt about that. A grave constitutional principle is at stake. I do not think it is within the powers of parliament to delegate to a province the jurisdictional functions of the federal government, which are comprised within the provisions of section 91 of the British North America Act—and especially in the form in which it is proposed to be done here.

I should have thought the straightforward course would be to deal with the principle of the bill now, under this motion. However, since the ministry is apparently not prepared to do that—although that would be the courageous course, and the course which I think will be followed in the end—I am not going to oppose the amendment. I should think, though, that we might as well deal with this question as it now presents itself to the house in the matter of the principle involved in this proposed legislation. The house has to grapple with this situation sooner or later, and sending it to a committee which already promises to be more than overworked will not ensure for it any better consideration.

I am not going to state any opinion I hold with respect to the proposal, but I suggest it would be much better to deal with the matter here and now, once and for all.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) has said, the house must grapple with this situation sooner or later. But the way in which the house should grapple with it is not, in my judgment, the way in which the hon. member for York-Sunbury has in mind.

If it is not constitutionally competent for the dominion government to grant to a provincial government the right to have a bank, then something was seriously wrong with the constitution of Canada when it was framed.

Mr. STIRLING: That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. BLACKMORE: To tell any sensible individual, anywhere, that the province of Ontario, for example, is not entitled to have a provincial bank, is to say something that commends itself to any ordinary intelligence as being absurd. And to say that this dominion parliament, which is a creature of the various provincial legislatures of this country—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, that is a new theory of confederation.

Mr. BLACKMORE: To say that this parliament, which is the creature of the four original provinces of the dominion, has not the power to give back to one of those provinces the right to have a bank, is to say something that would puzzle the traditional Philadelphia lawyer.

I maintain that the time has come when the house has to face the responsibility of granting to the provinces the right to have banks. Alberta is merely leading the way. Her vision is clear; she knows where she wants to go, and she knows where she will go if the reactionaries who stand in the way of progress in this nation do not block her. The question is clear: Is this parliament going to give a sovereign province of the dominion the power to have some little influence in the conduct of the economy of that province, or is it not? I maintain that it is the duty of this parliament to grant a province of the dominion the right to have a bank.

The minister had several objections. Those objections are caused from the fact that there is an anomalous situation in the dominion. When the constitution of Canada was framed, apparently no provision was made for the granting of a bank to any province, in case such province should wish to have a bank. The result is that new ground has to be broken. Alberta, with the advice of an exceedingly well-informed attorney general's staff, has devised a scheme which, in their judgment, constitutes the best scheme for granting a bank to a province. This would constitute a precedent under which other provinces of the dominion in their turn could be granted banks.

I believe I have said sufficient to justify the house in voting down the minister's amendment, and voting for the second reading of the bill.

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): Mr. Speaker, I was not quite satisfied with the minister's explanation that this parliament cannot constitutionally give a province the right to set up a bank. I am wondering just how it was that parliament was able to grant to private individuals the right to set up banks—a right that the dominion cannot grant to a province.

I understand that the control of credit and finance was, by the British North America Act, vested in the dominion government; and that shortly after confederation the dominion government did delegate that privilege to banks. I am wondering just what the difference is between that concession to the banks, and the concession here asked.

The minister pointed out further in his speech that certain sections of the Bank Act shall not apply. I realize that I may not ask a question at this point, but possibly the minister will clear up the situation. I am wondering whether these same sections now apply to the Bank of Canada, as they do to the private banks; or is the Bank of Canada exempt from the application of some of those sections, as is requested in this bill?

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Administration of the defence of Canada regulations, $30,000.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I should like to revert for a moment to the subject of Jehovah's Witnesses. I realize, from the correspondence and the interviews I have had both with and on behalf of these people, something of the difficulty which confronts the government, and particularly those departments of the government concerned with selective service and national defence, in dealing with them. I am sure that every hon. member will support the government in its position that no single group of citizens should, because of their religious beliefs, be exonerated from bearing their share of responsibility as citizens in times such as these.

I am not sure, however, that all the difficulties which have been encountered in dealing with these people are of their own making. The minister intimated that there are government officials who are a bit overzealous. From what I have seen I have been led to believe that many of these officials are more concerned with the enforcement of regulations for the sake of enforcing them than with the ultimate effect of enforcement upon our war effort.

The minister gave reasons for not lifting the ban on the subsidiary corporations of the Witnesses. My information is that Canada is the only one of the allied countries which places a ban on these corporations. I assume that the United States, and Great Britain and other parts of the empire, are equally concerned for the safety of their particular countries; yet we find that for some reason we alone cannot lift the ban, as recommended by the parliamentary committee some years ago.

I myself am in a bit of a quandary on this point. Reference was made this afternoon to literature which is banned from this country because it is published by the Watch Tower Bible Tract Society of the United States. I, unfortunately perhaps, have in my possession a book which was published by that society. It is the King James version of the bible. It was left with me a couple of weeks ago by one of these gentlemen who was visiting members of parliament. At the time I did not realize that the book was banned and I took it. My question is, what am I to do with it now? If I keep it I am no longer a law-abiding citizen; I have in my possession banned literature. If I give it to someone else I am placing that person in the position I now am in. My religious scruples will not permit me to destroy this book, even though I am not a member of Jehovah's Witnesses. I should like the minister to tell me how I stand in this respect with the Department of Justice.

Mr. REID: Did the hon. member not previously own a copy?

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Wait till I have finished—

Mr. REID: I am astonished.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I did not previously own a copy published by the Bible Tract Society.

Mr. REID: I am speaking of the bible.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: The minister referred to the large number of these people who profess to be clergymen and therefore claim exemption from military service. Here again, I suppose that all of us will agree with the minister that everyone who professes to be ordained by God and thereby claims exemption from military service should not get that exemption. My information is, however, that although these people are reputed to have some thirty thousand members in Canada they are not permitted exemption for a single one of their leaders, although many of them have devoted years of their lives to the full-time work of teaching their doctrines. In this respect too, I understand, Canada is the only one of the allied nations that refuses to grant to those recognized leaders who devote full time to this work exemption on the same ground as is valid for clergymen of other religious denominations.

I have before me the regulations which are in effect in the country of our neighbour to the south, where a considerable number who are able to show that they have been devoting full time to this work are granted exemptions as clergymen. What I should like the minister to explain is, what are the conditions in Canada which make us different from other parts of the empire and the United States and render it impossible for us to grant concessions which these countries have granted?

Mr. ROSE: I was not satisfied with the explanation given by the minister regarding the release of Farr, Lorimer and Schneider from internment. I watched the activities of Farr and Lorimer in Toronto. Lorimer was a dangerous man. Although not officially the leader, he gave instructions to Farr, who was the organizer. Lorimer was the power behind the throne, the man who pulled the strings. Very often Adrien Arcand used to come to Toronto and, instead of discussing important matters with Farr, would discuss them with Lorimer. When the gang, eleven of them, were taken, they went into custody with the hope that they would be out soon. In the camp Arcand told his people, "Six months, and we shall be in power in Ottawa."

When things did not go so well with them, in other words, when Hitler was not doing so well, they naturally started to fight among themselves. This is what happened, and Farr weakened. I know of differences that arose between Farr and Adrien Arcand in Fredericton. I brought the matter to the attention of the authorities and pointed out that Farr was weakening, but not so Lorimer. Lorimer was in the camp very close to the nazis. At all times he lined himself up with the German nazis against anyone who dared to utter a word against fascism or nazism. I cannot understand, therefore, why Lorimer was released even earlier than Farr. If Farr weakened, it was not because he lost faith in the ideals of fascism and became a great upholder of democracy, but because the ship was sinking and the rat was willing to jump off the ship.

I cannot understand why men like these should be released. We are told that the situation to-day is better in regard to the war and that we can give these people a chance.

Mr. DUPUIS: Can you understand why Tim Buck was released?

Mr. ROSE: Let me finish. But the nazis, I understand, who are in the camps to-day are as cocky as ever, and if anyone in a camp raises his voice to utter any doubt about the outcome of the war things are made hot for him. I have heard stories of persons—their own people—being practically crippled because they dared to raise their voices and to express a doubt about the ultimate victory of Hitler. Why should we imagine that, because one of them says that from now on he will be a good man, he meant it? Can we believe that Schneider has suddenly become a good democrat? It pays him to say so and he says it. I repeat, the nazis are pretty cocky and the fascists have not given up their ideas. When we hear reports of some of the nazis already preparing a great underground movement for the post-war period we can believe it.

I do not believe in the theory of softness toward them. If we show softness toward our own native fascists I am very much afraid we shall show it toward the nazi enemies against whom we are fighting at the present time. It is a problem of softness; that is what it is, and I cannot agree that we can afford to be soft with these people.

When these men were arrested, the late Minister of Justice, the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, said that the attorney general of Quebec had sent him a report in the matter—I quote from Hansard of the session of 1940 at page 983:

> The attorney general of Quebec has sent me a report in the matter, accompanied by certain exhibits which show clearly that those people had communications and intelligence with enemies—Germany, Italy and elsewhere.

If that were true in 1940, how can we in this stage of the war, when the toughest battles are being fought, release these people? At the same time the late Minister of Justice, in reply to a question asked by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) as to whether there would be a trial for these people, said, "Yes, there will be a trial." I would say that there should have been a trial. If these people were guilty of treason, the people of Canada should have known about it and no one would have been deceived. Trials are taking place in the United States at the present time. There are thirty seditionists appearing for trial there. The whole story will be told to the American people and their morale will be strengthened rather than weakened by the disclosures of the facts. I do not see why people like Arcand and his friends should not have been tried. On March 8, in Washington, in connection with one of the trials taking place there, the attorney general said: "Hitler had his quislings in the various countries. He had a Quisling in Norway, Laval in France, and he had Adrien Arcand in Canada." That is what the attorney general of the United States says; and News Week of this week suggests that after the release of Farr and Lorimer there is talk of the release of Adrien Arcand. If that were to happen, then I say it would be a crime against the people of Canada. I will go farther and say that we cannot even be satisfied with having taken in the few that we have.

In the province of Quebec, the good name of our people is being besmeared by elements like Menard, who to-day issues a sheet known as Le Bavard, in which he writes a eulogy of Major Scott, one of the fascist leaders, who died in the camp, suggesting that a statue be erected to this great soldier-hero who died in the struggle contre la juiverie, as he describes it—the struggle against Jewry.

[Mr. Rose.]

Menard was not touched, although he was one of the early editors of Le Goglu and Le Patriote. We have Salluste Lavery, one of the old gang of fascists. He was not touched. There are many others who, by means of their agitation in the province, are issuing material of a type which is calculated to do great harm. The other day I picked up "La Prière d'un Juif", "A Jewish Prayer", the most insulting piece of propaganda ever issued in a democratic country, especially at this time of war. It is unsigned, but surely it should not be very difficult for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the Department of Justice, by merely checking the type, to find out where this insulting publication was printed and who was responsible for it.

On the other hand, in regard to certain other elements, the same Department of Justice is not too lenient. I refer to a group of Finns in Sudbury, editors of a paper known as Vapaus, a paper which has always been opposed to the leadership of the Finnish fascist Mannerheim. It is a paper that upholds Canada's war effort. There are a few people at the head of that paper who have to report every month to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, though I do not know of any other Finns who have to report similarly. One of these people has three sons in the armed forces. Such a situation is ridiculous. I should like to know who advises the Department of Justice in regard to these people. They have always been anti-fascist; they have never had anything to do with Mannerheim or his gang; yet they have to report once every month to the R.C.M.P. It is a most unsatisfactory state of affairs and I should like to have an explanation of the matter.

I wish to ask a few more questions. How does it happen that the R.C.M.P. and the Department of Justice are involved in cases of men who have joined the army? I have here a letter of a man who has been in the army. He was proposed for officer training and was suddenly called in by the personnel man and told, "we like your work very much; you are very good, but in 1939 you were a member of the young communist league and a C.I.O. organizer. The R.C.M.P. say you cannot go to the officers training school". Who gives the R.C.M.P. that power? Do we not have a military department that looks after those matters or is the R.C.M.P. a super-government? I should like an answer to that question.

I know a man who wants to go back to Italy. He was a member of the Italian government before Mussolini came into power. He was the mayor of an Italian town. He wants to return to Italy to do his duty to his country, but what happens? The R.C.M.P. tell that man that he cannot return to his own country. I say that is going beyond the duties of the R.C.M.P. and the Department of Justice. I have here a copy of the report of the R.C.M.P. We find a whole section in it on labour, although there is a labour department. What have the R.C.M.P. to do with labour?

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member for Cartier will find an item in the Department of Justice estimates dealing with the R.C.M.P.

Mr. ROSE: Then I shall conclude my remarks. I raise these points not because I want to attack the government or to raise opposition for the sake of opposition, but because the policy of the department appears to me to be a policy that has nothing in common with the policy of the government or the policy of the people fighting against fascism.

Mr. COLDWELL: It seems to me that we have had a good illustration this evening of what many of us feared would occur when the defence of Canada regulations were first adopted by this government and approved by parliament.

I do not believe that it is ever wise to put people in gaol or to incarcerate them without giving them an opportunity to defend themselves according to the principles of democratic justice. I have a good deal of sympathy with the point of view that we may have put into internment camps people who ought not to have been there, and we may have let out of internment camps people who ought still to be in them. The suspicions of the people are aroused. They think there has been either persecution of favouritism. There are no public records to show whether there has been persecution or favouritism. To-day we have the statement made—and I believe that the statement is justified—that the person named Lorimer is the man who with Arcand was regarded as the agent of the nazi movement and of Hitler in this country. Many people are suggesting that. I have had letters, as I have no doubt have other hon. members, and resolutions over the past few weeks, stating definitely that the government is more friendly to persons of that type than to persons with democratic sympathies. I do not believe that statement, but I know such statements are being made and believed. To-night we have had an expression of such an opinion. Of course, the defence of Canada regulations are still in effect and we are still operating under them. I remember very well that when they were brought down early in the war we opposed them, and we have endeavoured to get something in the nature of a proper trial for people who are incarcerated.

I realize, as will all hon. members who have served on the defence of Canada regulations, that there may have been occasions when it might have been almost impossible, because of the war situation and the need of seeing to it that persons who were engaged in subversive activities were not forewarned of the people who were reporting upon them, not to vary to some extent the form of trial with which we have been familiar; but I insist that we have been wrong in this respect. To-day we are raising in the minds of the people across the country the opinion that there is an element of favouritism or undue influence somewhere that is allowing people like the ones we have been discussing this afternoon and this evening to be at liberty without an adequate explanation or without even an adequate trial. I have confidence in some of the people who have headed those committees. Some of us in this house who are aware—as some of us are—of the situation that developed when Italy entered the war, and what happened then, know how dangerous this kind of method of dealing with the problem which confronted the nation can be. I suggest that the minister and the department owe it to the house and the country to give a clear explanation as to why these things are being done at the present time; otherwise the suspicion will continue either that there has been undue poltical influence or that a certain amount of favouritism has been exercised in some of these cases.

I am of the opinion that where you have a man like the person named by the hon. member for Cartier, Lorimer, who was engaged in the kind of activities in which I am told and believe he was engaged, in the early part of the war or before the war, no kind of declaration that he was prepared to act differently would satisfy my mind. I would want some other and more concrete assurances that we would not be subject to the kind of propaganda that these people were engaged in. I know the hon. member for Cartier wrote a very interesting pamphlet a few years ago in which he outlined some of the activities of these people. I remember getting a copy of it at the time. It seems to me that the minister will have to be clear to the committee, and through the committee to the country, as to why these sympathizers with the nazi regime have been let out among us at this particular time.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I want to bring to the attention of the Department of Justice another grievance which has to do with the class called Jehovah's Witnesses. The hon. member for Macleod dealt quite fully this afternoon with some of the accusations that were made against them. He read extracts and affidavits to the committee so that the minister might become better acquainted with some of the things that are happening. Now, as far as—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If the hon. member wishes to refer again to the matter of affidavits, and to how certain persons were treated in military camps, I shall have to raise a point of order. It was clearly demonstrated that that was something which was being investigated by the Minister of National Defence and was something with which the defence of Canada regulations had no connection whatsoever.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): If the minister is going to get all worked up about this I shall have to object. I had no intention of referring to that matter; I just happened to mention it in passing. What I wish to refer to is an entirely different matter. It just goes to prove the contention that I was about to make and I am not one of Jehovah's Witnesses. But let it be clearly understood that I do not stand for any partiality in so far as religion is concerned. I cannot see why any Christian group, so-called, in this Canada, whether they be Catholics, Protestants, Jehovah's Witnesses, or any other group, should be treated differently. The minister seems to get quite perturbed when anyone mentions Jehovah's Witnesses. A great deal could be said on this question of religion and the injustices that have been carried on. I do not intend to go into that, but I should like to bring a particular case to the attention of the minister, since I think it has to do with his department. I have a letter from one Orest Zarysky, a minister of Jehovah's Witnesses. Surely it is not right that any man appearing before a board in this country should have his credentials taken away from him and not given back, but that was what happened in this case. I will read part of his letter, where he says—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I rise to a point of order. The mobilization boards have nothing to do with the defence of Canada regulations, and I do not think it is proper to discuss on this item the procedure before such boards.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am not bringing in the question of the mobilization boards; I am pointing out that when this man appeared before the mobilization board—

The CHAIRMAN: I do not see how that question has anything to do with the item at present before the committee. The point of order has been well taken by the Minister of Justice. I rule this afternoon, and I am going to rule again to-night, that we must keep within the bounds of the item under consideration or I shall have to appeal to the committee.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): But this was a case where papers were illegally taken from a man.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It does not make any difference whether it was a mobilization board or who it was.

The CHAIRMAN: The minister has said, and of course I am bound to accept his statement, that the mobilization boards have nothing to do with his department, so that we must not have any discussion of that kind on this item.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Is it considered just, Mr. Chairman, that the credentials of any individual in this country, whether he be a member of Jehovah's Witnesses or of any other religious group, should be taken from him—

Mr. DUPUIS: Were they taken by some official of the Department of Justice?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Certainly they were.

Mr. DUPUIS: An official of the Department of Justice?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It does not make any difference; they would not have to be taken by an official of the Department of Justice to have the matter come under this department, surely. If a man commits a crime he does not have to be under the Department of Justice before he can be arrested. This man had identification papers taken away from him. It makes no difference who took them; they were taken illegally.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. We are in committee at the present time discussing a special item of the Department of Justice under the war appropriation resolutions. Paragraph 2 of standing order 58 reads:

> Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

I must abide by that rule or be remiss in my duty.

Mr. JOHSTON (Bow River): I understand that we are still on the resolution, and I would refer you, Mr. Chairman, to the statement made this afternoon by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, who pointed out that under this item anything at all could be discussed. I do not think my remarks are out of order, but I do not intend to go into the matter at any length. What I want to get from the Minister of Justice is—

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I rise to a point of order. Surely under this war appropriation we cannot discuss matters which properly come under the civil estimates. If the Department of Justice, through some of its officials, has made a mistake in reference to civil administration, that is another matter; we are now dealing with the war appropriation. I am sure the hon. member for Bow River will agree with that.

The CHAIRMAN: With regard to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Bow River, this afternoon the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar did suggest that technically we might discuss anything at all under the war appropriation resolution. That may be true, relatively, but for the last three sessions it has been understood by every hon. member of the committee that after a general discussion has taken place on the administration item the discussion must relate to the particular items before the committee. I do not believe either the hon. member for Bow River or the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar would want to break this precedent, because we have always found wonderful cooperation in the deliberations of the committee, and this help was certainly given readily by those two hon. members.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I understand that these are the estimates of the Department of Justice.

The CHAIRMAN: A special item of the Department of Justice under the war appropriation resolution.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Yes, the administration item; and Jehovah's Witnesses have been discussed all afternoon and evening.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: And it was precisely because the discussion was out of order, and was made clearly to appear to be out of order, that I raised the point this evening. We went on this afternoon for two and a half hours, but now we are discussing the item that has to do with the defence of Canada regulations. The hon. member has some grievance in regard to something that happened before a mobilization board, set up by the Department of Labour. I suppose it would take less time to let him go ahead and say anything he wanted than it would to get a decision as to whether or not this discussion is relevant to the defence of Canada regulations. Clearly it is not relevant. The hon. gentleman wishes to complain because some papers were taken from some man by some mobilization board. How that can be relevant to the defence of Canada regulations is beyond my comprehension.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I think the minister is trying to exaggerate the situation. It has always been customary to have a general discussion of the affairs of the department concerned on the first item in the resolution.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I rise to a further point of order. I think my hon. friend must realize that any item at all cannot be discussed under the war appropriation; it must have something to do with the war appropriation. You cannot drag in a civil item of the department under the war appropriation resolution, and I think that was what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar had in mind when he made his point this afternoon. We are technically free to discuss any matter relating to the prosecution of the war under this general item, but not a matter relating to the civil estimates.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think the whole trouble is with the manner in which this has been discussed. We have no bill and we have no schedules under which we can discuss matters item by item. I do not think we should take advantage of a technical point, but if you look at the resolution you will see that it says, "that it is expedient to introduce a measure for the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada." I should like to know where anything wider than that could be found.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): There are other estimates than these.

Mr. COLDWELL: I say I do not think we should take advantage of the technicality.

The CHAIRMAN: Yes, the hon. member so stated this afternoon. If I am allowed to speak again, I realize that on a resolution of this kind discussion must necessarily be on a wide scale, but at the same time there must be a limit to the repetition which may be permitted. Every hon. member must realize the impossibility of keeping two or three ministers and half a dozen officials on hand to answer the questions that may be asked. I am sure it is not the intention of the committee to act in that way, and it would not be conducive to effectiveness.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): This department had to do with the setting up of the defence of Canada regulations, which imposed these restrictions upon this particular class of people. It was as a result of these regulations that a great many of these things occurred; and because some injustices were done by these regulations surely this is the time we should discuss them. These things happened as a result of the very regulations that were created by the Department of Justice.

I appeal to the Minister of Justice to see that justice is carried out for all classes of people, regardless of religion. Here is a particular instance in which an individual comes before a certain group of investigators, and he has taken away from him certain papers that prove his identification. Is it to be considered an act of justice that any individual in Canada can have taken from him papers of identification which will never be returned to him? I do not think that is justice, in any sense of the term.

I am not going to labour the point, but in all fairness to Jehovah's Witnesses, or to any other group, some provision should be made, and should be made now, whereby all these injustices would be removed.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister said this afternoon that there were 300 in internment. He then referred to 120 of British origin in internment. Is the latter figure of 120 included in the 300, or an additional number to be added to it?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is included in it.

Mr. STIRLING: How many Japanese are now in internment? Would the minister divide the number into those who are Japanese nationals, those who have been naturalized, and those who are Canadian born?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: As of May 15 there appear to be 430 persons of the Japanese race still interned, of whom 268 were interned under regulation 21, as being British subjects, or treated as such, and of whom 162 were interned under regulation 25 as being Japanese nationals, or treated as such.

Mr. STIRLING: Does that include the naturalized ones?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes. The 268 include the naturalized ones. I have not the division between those who were treated as British subjects because of naturalization, and those who were treated as such because of birth in this country.

Mr. STIRLING: Would it be possible to obtain that figure, and let me have it?

[Mr. C. E. Johnston.]

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think it will be possible, although it will take some little time. However, I shall be glad to have instructions given to have a statement prepared as accurately as we can have it prepared from the records. Our records are fairly complete. It will take some time, because it will involve looking up the pre-war registrations which, as the hon. member knows, were obtained by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. We would have to check the information obtained at that time with the names of the internees dealt with under regulation 21.

Mr. STIRLING: Have any Japanese who were once interned been released, as so many of those of Teutonic origin have been released?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The total number of persons of Japanese race who were interned is 782, of whom 352 have been released. The hon. member will recall that in the 782 there are included some who temporarily refused to accept orders of removal issued against them. I have not with me the break-down as to how many were regarded as British subjects, either through naturalization or through being born here. That is the total number of those who were released.

Quite a large number were interned for only a short time because they had refused to comply with the removal orders issued against them. As soon as they did agree to comply with the removal orders they were removed from the internment camps, under the regulations, but came under the supervision of the British Columbia Japanese commission. They were not given full release, but were merely taken out of the internment camps and turned over to those in charge of housing the Japanese who had been removed from the protected area in British Columbia.

Mr. McDONALD (Pontiac): Mr. Speaker, reference has been made to-night to the imposition of the ban on Jehovah's Witnesses, and criticism was directed against the department for the action taken in that connection. I do not know very much about these people in other districts, but I know something about their activities in my district, where a small group of them is located. Prior to the imposition of the ban they distributed among people of other religions tracts containing most insulting references to the clergy and the religion of those people. More than that, before the imposition of the ban they had the nerve and audacity—and I know this definitely—to say to certain young men subject to call, "If you join Jehovah's Witnesses you will be clear of the call under the mobilization act". The imposition of the ban put an end to that.

Actually there is to-day in my district a young man belonging to that order—or that church, or religion, or whatever it is—who failed to comply with the act. He has been summoned before a court and made to pay a fine. For some reason or another he is still at liberty. The parents of the other young men in that district, who know what has been going on, and whose sons are overseas or are in the army in Canada, come to me and say, "How is it that this man can get off, presumably because he is a Witness of Jehovah?"

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): On a point of order, just a moment ago, Mr. Chairman, you said that I was not permitted to discuss anything about mobilization; however, the hon. member for Pontiac is going right ahead.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): You are not on the right side of the house.

Mr. McDONALD (Pontiac): I am not talking about the mobilization act. I am discussing what has taken place under the act, where action has been taken by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Since this item deals with the mounted police—

Mr. ROSS (Souris): No, it does not.

The CHAIRMAN: The Minister of Justice pointed out that mobilization did not come under his department. There can be no doubt, however, that Jehovah's Witnesses have been the subject of discussion for some time; we cannot get away from that. I think the hon. member for Pontiac should be allowed to discuss that sect, if he wishes.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): He just happens to be on the other side, I imagine.

The CHAIRMAN: That is a reflection upon the Chair, and I would ask the hon. member for Bow River to withdraw it. I do not believe I have been unfair in my statement, because Jehovah's Witnesses have been the subject of discussion both this afternoon and this evening. Surely the hon. member for Pontiac should have the same opportunity to discuss the subject. At the same time I must say that any discussion of the mobilization act would be out of order.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I was not reflecting upon the Chair. I was addressing my comment to the hon. member.

Mr. McDONALD (Pontiac): Action was taken under the defence of Canada regulations. The boy was arrested, and made to pay a fine. For some reason or another he was liberated, and is still at liberty. I want to know why he is at liberty.

Mr. HANSELL: Ask the mobilization board.

Mr. QUELCH: Will the minister reply to the questions asked by the hon. members for Cartier and Rosetown-Biggar in connection with the release of Lorimer? The charge was made that many persons in Canada have the feeling that the minister's department is more sympathetic toward people of fascist tendencies than toward those following the democratic way of life. I think the minister owes it to the committee to reply to that question.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I would ask the hon. member, as well as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, to look at the statement I made this afternoon. It is unfortunate that they were not in the chamber at that time and that the matter has been raised again.

Mr. COLDWELL: I shall be very glad to read what the minister said. After I sat down I found that I had been out of the chamber when the reply was given; I was not aware of that when I spoke.

Mr. GILLIS: I was present this afternoon when the minister made his reply and as far as I am concerned it leaves a lot of doubt in my mind. The united nations are beginning to enter a decisive phase of the war and the international picture is somewhat beclouded and complicated from the political point of view. I listened to the minister very carefully and his reply leaves much to be desired. In her statement this afternoon with respect to the release of this man Schneider, the hon. member for North Battleford in effect accused the government of jeopardizing the safety of the state because of political expediency. That was my understanding of her statement, and the minister's reply did not clarify it.

In connection with Lorimer and Farr, the records of these two men are well known to practically every one in Canada who has paid any attention to national affairs. They were recognized as nationally-known fascists. Early in the war they were tried, convicted and interned as enemies of the state. I am calling a spade a spade; that was my conception of it. During their internment they softened up a little, and because of that the committees which retried their cases two or three times accepted their word that they were not going to be bad any more. One of them had received a licking from his friends while he was incarcerated and the other gave his word he would be good.

How much can you depend upon the word of a nazi or fascist? Mussolini and Hitler have demonstrated to the world that their signed or pledged word does not mean a thing except to gain time in order to serve their own ends. This indicates to me that at this stage of the war we are not thinking realistically. The release of Sir Oswald Mosley in England, and the release of nationally and internationally known fascists in Canada at a time like this should not have occurred.

I am not the kind of person who thinks anyone who does not agree with me should be interned or put in gaol. We have stood for the principle of a fair trial right through the whole process of discussing the defence of Canada regulations. However, I contend that once a man has had a fair trial, is convicted and sentenced, that sentence should be carried out to its logical conclusion. This is based upon the examination being properly made in the first place. This must be done if we are to maintain respect for the laws of the country. If earlier in the war we convicted the men we are discussing to-night of being enemies of the state, they are still enemies of the state. This country is now in a most dangerous stage of the war.

If there ever were a time during the fighting of this war when active nazis or fascists could be effective on the outside, it is the present time when the united nations are taking the offensive. If we are to take this attitude now, what attitude are we to take with international gangsters like Hitler and his satellites? If to-morrow his own people turn against him; if the Russians seem to be getting a little too close and Hitler decides that discretion is the better part of valour, that he should weep on someone's shoulder and throw up his hands, would there be any justification for the united nations withdrawing the slogan of unconditional surrender with which they have been taking the people forward? If we are to deal with the convicted enemies of this country in the way we have been, this trend will develop internationally and we shall lose the objectives for which we are fighting this war just as we lost those for which we fought in the last war.

I heard the minister's statement and I realize that he was depending upon the committees, but in my opinion the release of these three men is sowing discord in the minds of a great many people across this country who are really fighting this war. They are fighting for unconditional surrender and the complete elimination of the philosophy for which our enemies stand. I do not believe that a change of mind can take place overnight. Long before I ever expected to come into this house these people were known to me; I knew their records, their histories and their activities. I was quite satisfied when they were put away, and I believed that the expiration of their sentences would not take place until the war was over and peace was concluded.

They can then be tried without any war hysteria and the proper punishment meted out. We should not get soft at this time. We should not consider negotiating or dealing with people who are known to be enemies of the state until the main issue on the other side is definitely and finally settled.

Item agreed to.

Penitentiaries' branch—Purchase of materials in connection with manufacturers for war departments (recoverable), $200,000.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Will the minister explain the nature of this item?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: This is to provide working capital for the penitentiaries. We are producing a number of articles for other departments of government, particularly the armed services. The amounts paid for these articles go back into the consolidated revenue fund. Up to the war years it was possible to carry on this work by using temporarily in the penitentiaries branch funds voted for other purposes, but the value of the work turned out by the prisoners in the penitentiaries has been increased to such an extent that it is necessary to provide greater quantities of raw materials. As I say, this is to provide working capital to be used in the acquisition of raw materials to be worked in the penitentiaries.

Mr. STIRLING: It is a new departure this year?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: We have been doing this for some time.

Mr. STIRLING: But this provision?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: This provision was put in so that there might be something special for which this working capital could be taken.

Mr. STIRLING: It is the first time this year?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes, the first time this year.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was going to ask the minister what work is undertaken in the penitentiaries for the armed forces. I am very glad to know that some varied forms of work are being done in the penitentiaries, and I seize the opportunity of saying to the minister that I hope that when the regular estimate for the penitentiaries is up he will say something about penitentiary reform and the possibilities of carrying out the recommendations of the Archambault commission. I should be glad if he would be prepared to do that when the time comes.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I shall make a note of the hon. member's remark and try to have information for him as to what has been done and is being done in that respect.

Mr. COLDWELL: Thank you.

Item agreed to.

Royal Canadian Mounted Police—
Salaries, $643,000.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): There is quite an increase this year in this first item. However, before asking a question on that may I offer a few words in recognition of the wonderful service which this force has rendered and is rendering to-day to this country. Great credit is due to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for the splendid work done by the members of the force during these years of war. When the war began there was no force which received such small recognition in the matter of pay and otherwise as the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. They still are rather hampered. They have to serve many years before they are allowed to marry, and they forgo many privileges and freedoms in one way and another. They are highly trained and extremely efficient, and the money we vote to expend upon them on behalf of the taxpayers is one of the best investments to which taxes can be put. In the light of the discussion we have had this afternoon, let me say that if there is any body of men to whom we should be grateful because of the small amount of sabotage which has occurred during these war years, it is the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

I should like the minister to give us some idea of the use to which this extra $100,000 for salaries will be put. Also I would repeat a question which I asked a year ago: in the case of a member of the force who has had meritorious service and a clear record for a period of, say fifteen or twenty years, what recognition does he receive? I think there should be some means of promotion or provision whereby he will receive promotion, or a corresponding financial benefit upon retirement. Is anything like this done or proposed to be done?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am glad to be able to assure the hon. member that we do attempt to give full recognition, because the retirement allowance under the superannuation of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police does not follow the ordinary rule of the civil service; it is based upon the pay and allowances being received at the time of retirement. That is one of the factors of calculation; the other is the period of service. The factor which is taken to be multiplied by the years of service is the pay and allowances at the moment of retirement; and the policy of the commissioner and his assistant commissioners to take care of meritorious service is to make promotions as expeditiously as the retirements in the upper level permit. Since the beginning of the war, because of the urgency of the situation and because the commissioner was authorized to take on 2,500 constable guards and 500 special constables, the releasing of the higher officers upon having attained what might otherwise be the age limits has had to be retarded. It has been necessary to keep in the service all those who were physically able to perform service, and one of the unfortunate incidents of that is that it has slowed up, to some extent, promotions right down through the force. The only hope we have been able to hold out to the men who have not obtained their promotions through the various ranks quite as rapidly as they would have expected to obtain them under normal conditions, is that when the war is over and we are able to dispense with the special men who have been taken on, quite a number of vacancies will occur, and the rapidity of the subsequent promotions will make up for the slowness during the war period.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I should also like to know the reason for the increase of over $100,000 in this first item.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: This increase is required for unforeseen outlays in connection with the engagement of clerks, stenographers, typists and employed civilians. The commissioner, as he has to be, is always very prudent; in looking at the sheet which has been distributed the hon. member will see that the provisions in the estimate have always been quite ample; and although it has not been possible, because of the man-power situation, to find with respect, for instance, to pay and allowances, which are the big items here, all the additional constables or special constables authorized by the order in council, the commissioner still provides for salaries and allowances for the full establishment if he can obtain them. Of course, if the situation became urgent, we would obtain them. There have been authorized, for instance, 2,500 constable guards. We have something like 1,800. We could get the additional 700 if the need for them were sufficiently urgent. We would have plenty of use for them if we could use them in all the work which has to be done. But there is some work for which untrained men cannot be used; and the reason for this provision is that we shall have under this war appropriation sufficient to pay the numbers that have been authorized, although we have not yet found it possible to take them all on.

This increase on the civilian side is because the commissioner has been taking on untrained civilians to do work which was being performed by men who were enrolled in the force. We have not a women's division, but we have been taking on civilians to do work which was being done under normal conditions by men who belonged to the regular establishment. The commissioner prefers to take them out of the kind of service that can be done by civilians rather than engage civilians for constable work.

Mr. MacNICOL: I feel it my duty to bring to the notice of the committee an example of the remarkable skill and ability of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Early last September I was away in a remote part of the Rocky mountains in far western Alberta and I came down the mountain to a place called Rocky Mountain House by train. The train arrived at ten o'clock. I was accompanied by a Mr. Grindly, a member of the Alberta government's engineers, who had been with me in the mountains. We had left our car at the garage on Main street of Rocky Mountain House. As I say, the train arrived at the station at ten o'clock, and after getting our car I expressed a wish to go to see Old Rocky Mountain House, three miles away. We drove over town and I asked a man on Main street whether he could direct us to Old Rocky Mountain House. Following his directions, we drove away and came to the Saskatchewan river. We had to ferry over the river. I asked the ferryman the direction to Old Rocky Mountain House and he said that after crossing the river I should turn left and proceed for a mile and a half. We did so. At the same time, I wanted to find the mouth of Clearwater river. I had passed it by on account of the trees. I had not seen it. When I came back I told the ferryman that I had not found the mouth of Clearwater river, and he said, "When you cross the river this time turn to the right on the top of the hill, and the first bridge you come to will be Clearwater river." I did so, and a few moments later, after retracing our steps, as we came down the road, a man driving a car put his hand out of the window beckoning to us to stop. When we came abreast of his car he said he was a mounted policeman and asked "Is there a Mr. MacNicol in your car?" I said, "Yes, there is. I am John R. MacNicol." He said, "There is an important message for you at the railway station." It happened to be a message informing me that a relative had died. He said that they had received instructions to find me wherever I might be. There was an example of most remarkable ability on the part of the police. How he found me I do not know. I had left the station at ten o'clock, and shortly after the telegram arrived and the mounted police started out to locate me. Within twenty-five minutes he had found me, I will not say in the wilds of Alberta, but in a remote area. I inquired his name, and I believe it was R. A. McMullen. I wish the minister would drop that police official a letter congratulating him upon his ability to find his man, so to speak. As I say, I do not know how he found me. I had not time to ask him, because I hurried to the station to get the wire, and I was speaking to Toronto at ten-fifty-five. They have a skill, intuition and ability that, in my opinion, cannot be surpassed by any police force in the world. They are able to find their man.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Tributes to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are unnecessary. The service they render the country is their own reward.

There is one phase I would take up with the minister, namely, the question of developing the field of forensic medicine. During the past three years there has been developed in Regina a laboratory for the scientific investigation of crime and it has achieved a reputation all over North America. It was founded as a result of the influence of Commissioner Wood. It was placed under the control of the late Doctor Maurice Powers, whose work, I am sure, is known to you, Mr. Chairman, and to all those who appreciate the value of scientific knowledge in relation to crime and its detection.

Doctor Powers met an untimely end during the past summer while engaged in the service to which he was devoting his life. His work, as I have already stated, was known everywhere on this continent. He developed a laboratory that was unexcelled in this country, and I suggest to the minister that in order to increase and widen the influence of the mounted police encouragement should be given a number of young medical students or medical men to enter the field of forensic medicine and continue the work that was so ably carried on during the all too short lifetime of Doctor Powers.

A further matter which I think I should bring to the attention of the minister was mentioned by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross), namely, the regulation that has been in effect for so many years forbidding the marriage of young men in the mounted police until they have served a period of eight years. I have heard numbers of these young men point out that they are devoting themselves to the service of their country, and this regulation, while there may have been meritorious reasons for its existence in former years, is no longer necessary. There is no reason for its continuance beyond the initial three-year period. The removal of that regulation or, in any event, an alteration in it to make it applicable only during the first three years of service would result in the recruitment to the force of many young men who, after the war is over, will desire to continue in a semi-military force, but who feel that to operate under the detriment of inability to marry for a considerable period of years is something they cannot accept. I should like to ascertain from the minister his views on these two matters, both of which I advance with a desire to improve the efficiency of the force, high though it is to-day, in order to ensure that this force in years to come will maintain the high tradition it has achieved in the past, particularly since the beginning of the war, when men of the force, regardless of personal convenience, have made sacrifices which only history itself will be able to record.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The matter which the hon. gentleman has discussed is one in which I felt very much as he does. I discussed it with the commissioner and I was given reasons which appeared to me to be very weighty. The first is that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police cannot afford to have its men incurring debts which they do not regularly pay. Their reputation is such that they must be regarded as good credit risks in the communities in which they live, and it is only after eight years of service that a man can attain the pay of a full constable. Up to the present time, though there has been made within recent months quite a substantial war-time increase in pay, the salaries that are being paid are not sufficient to enable a man to maintain a family until he has reached the time when he receives the constable's wage. That was one reason.

Another reason was that at the present time fifty-eight per cent of the regular personnel of the R.C.M.P. is made up of married men, and with the tight housing situation that has existed all over the country one of the difficulties of the commissioner has been to find a sufficient number of unmarried qualified constables to do work at places where no housing accommodation for families could be found. I hope that is a temporary situation in this country. I hope it will not always be so that the distribution of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police personnel will depend upon the possible housing conditions in the various localities. But during the war period that has been a serious consideration with which the commissioner has had to wrestle, the possibility of placing in barracks a sufficient number of sufficiently qualified men to maintain the standards of service that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police wish to give to the communities in which they are located. I hope that these are two objections that it will be possible to overcome some day. I hope that some day it will be possible to have the men of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police paid, even after only three years of service, a sufficient salary to enable them, like their fellows, to start early the establishment of families. I also hope that it will not be so very long before the acute housing situation can be taken care of and when there will be a sufficient number of the physical things required to make more homes in this country.

The hon. member raised a question with respect to the department which was so ably conducted by Doctor Powers. That is one which is giving us some concern. It has not been possible, notwithstanding applications placed with various medical schools, to find anyone at this time to take over the work that has been inaugurated, and the commissioner has been obliged to resort again to the services, and quite satisfactory services, but not of a permanent nature, of Madame Doctor McGill, the provincial pathologist.

As hon. members know, the distribution of medical practitioners is under the procurement board and the first call on the medical profession, and especially the first call on all those graduating from medical schools, is for the armed forces. It has not yet been possible to find any man who could continue the work started by Doctor Powers. It is the intention of the commissioner not only to try to continue that work but to have it developed, because it is appreciated that it will be of value not only to the reputation of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, but to the Canadian public in the assistance made available for the administration of justice.

Mr. SLAGHT: I rise to compliment my hon. friends of the opposition and all hon. members of the committee upon what I regard as practically a unanimous view of the merits and deserts of this great force. I have been privileged to know something of their work, particularly in the first three years of the war, latterly, practically not at all. May I just make one or two observations. First, I would say that if the minister were to be indicted in connection with this item or with his administration of this force it would be because we are not sufficiently recognizing the magnificent service they are rendering, and because we are permitting them to do it still underpaid. I do not know that I could persuade the treasury board that I was right—there we come again to the treasury board. But let me point out this: the qualifications that a young man must have when he enters this force are very, very high. Then the courses that he must follow make it necessary for him to become efficient in ballistics, in the study of chemistry, in horsemanship, in the driving of all types of motor vehicles and in a knowledge of criminal law. We do not hear very much of the work they do, but on both oceans they are charged with the duty of searching incoming and outgoing vessels to prevent the possibility of the planning of sabotage, and the record of the lack of any attempts at sabotage in this war is a great tribute to this force.

I think I am entitled to pay a personal tribute to Commissioner General Stuart Wood. He is a man of vast experience, an experience which began many years ago with part-time service in Scotland Yard, that great school of training, where the enemies of crime learn how to combat it. I have concluded my task when I say that I believe this committee can properly be unanimous in a tribute to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, a force which has maintained law and order in our country and whose anti-sabotage activities during this war are such that no country in the world can excel.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am always delighted to see that each year as this particular estimate comes before the committee a certain number of members on all sides of the committee find it fitting and proper to say a few words in praise of this magnificent Canadian organization, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I am particularly pleased with the hon. member for Lake Centre who paid a tribute to the late Doctor Powers. I, too, had the privilege of working with Doctor Powers on a number of cases which happened to come within his particular phase of police activities. I formed the same opinion of Doctor Powers as apparently the hon. member for Lake Centre did. It was a great loss to a new and important branch of police work in Canada when Doctor Powers died. I was concerned when I heard the Minister of Justice say that it has been difficult to find a proper successor to a man whose stamp is placed upon that particular type of work which has been carried on by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I realize, as does the minister, that the first duty of medical students and medical men generally is to the war effort. However, in view of the importance of this work to the whole of Canada, an effort should be made to furnish the mounted police with the ablest member of the medical profession that can be found to carry on the work of Doctor Powers, for I believe that is absolutely essential if we are to build up a proper establishment.

As I listened to the debate in regard to internments and the other matters arising under the defence of Canada regulations, it struck me, in looking back over the more than four and a half years we have been at war, that this country owes a great debt to the Minister of Justice, whose integrity of purpose has won the respect and confidence of all hon. members and, I am sure, of the great majority of the people of this country. He has had at his right hand one of the finest police bodies in existence to-day, and they have followed the very wisest policy in that type of work. As it is in medicine, so it is in the world of crime; prevention is much better than cure. I have some personal knowledge of the splendid contribution made by the mounted police during this war period in the very field we were discussing to-day, the field of espionage and of subversive elements in our midst. When I consider the few examples that can be brought forward and discussed, which are but the exceptions to the very general rule of freedom in this country from acts of espionage and uncontrolled subversive elements, in my opinion when the story of this work is written it will be found that this police force has discharged its task in an amazingly efficient manner. Therefore I join with the hon. member for Parry Sound and others in urging the minister, his colleagues and the members of this house to recognize the importance of keeping the traditions of this force up to the highest possible standard. This nation will reap a rich reward in the prevention of crime if we can keep the character and morale of the mounted police at a high level. If we look back on the early days in western Canada and the duties then performed by the mounted police, it is easy to realize the allure that service in that force presented. There was the call of adventure to individuals of a very high type. Perhaps that allure has vanished with the more prosaic duties performed by the police in these days, and we must replace it by some other incentive which will maintain the morale of the men. In my opinion the proper incentive is some recognition by way of salary, social standing and anything else we can reasonably do to make service in the force so attractive that the finest young men of this country will make that service their career.

As I say, I merely wish to add my voice to the many that are raised annually in praise and appreciation of the splendid work this force is doing and has done in the past.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have no desire to enter into any kind of competition in this eulogy to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, so that I shall condense what I think has been meant by everyone who has taken part in this discussion. Having in mind the magnificent job the force has done in this war-time period for such a large number of citizens with such a relatively small number of men; having in mind that they are not very well compensated for their work, I should like to say that in my opinion in the civilian field in this war we can sum it all up as far as the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are concerned by saying that never did so few do so much for so many for so little.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: In acknowledging the tributes that have been paid to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, which all agree are so well deserved, may I ask for one small tribute to the treasury board, which does not receive many tributes. In the month of March I went to the treasury board with a recommendation which contained the following sentence: "It is estimated that if the above temporary recommendation is approved the total cost per annum will be approximately $1,242,368.75." The result was a minute of treasury board at once accepting the recommendation.

Mr. KNOWLES: I rise to join in the tributes that are being paid not to the treasury board but to the men of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I am sure the opinion is unanimous that the men of this force deserve the tributes that are paid them annually on the floor of this house. As the minister knows, and as hon. members know, these men have certain grievances, such as those which have been mentioned this evening. Some of us from time to time bring these and other matters to the attention of the minister or the commissioner of the force; and when we pay our tributes to the services performed by these men we do so in the realization that they give their services loyally and wholeheartedly, despite some of the grievances they hold quite justly. I hope that step by step some of these matters may be adjusted, and that when the war is over, full consideration may be given the claims of these men.
