COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT OF STATEMENT OF MR. BRACKEN

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct attention to a paragraph which appears in a brief statement on the policy of commonwealth relations which was issued by the Hon. Mr. Bracken last night and which appears in the press of the country to-day. The paragraph to which I wish to direct attention is the following:

> The Prime Minister has said that Lord Halifax asked us to make a "commitment", to fall in line, in any event, with a common policy for the commonwealth in all matters of our external relations.

I wish to say that at no time in any place have I made the statement that Lord Halifax asked us to make a commitment on the lines which are set forth in that statement, and I challenge Mr. Bracken, from wherever he may be—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Don't worry about that. You will know where he is soon enough.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I challenge Mr. Bracken to give to this house, through his deputy the leader of the opposition, if he is his deputy as leader of the Progressive Conservative party, the statement which will justify the words which Mr. Bracken has used. I ask Mr. Bracken and I ask my hon. friend the leader of the opposition now or anyone else on the opposite side of the house to point out, in Hansard or in any public address or in anything that I have said anywhere, the statement that Lord Halifax had asked us to make a commitment with respect to matters of external affairs.

I have read Mr. Bracken's statement. In other particulars the statement or this press release appears to me to be but a belated reproduction of the policy I expressed to this house on January 31 last. I should not be doing my full duty if I did not again draw to the attention of this house and the country the fact that Mr. Bracken's attitude in not entering this House of Commons to debate on the floor of this house the great issues of the day, and to substantiate the statements which he has made outside, amounts to nothing more or less than a contempt for parliament itself and for parliamentary institutions. I hope that in this country through public opinion or otherwise, we are not going to permit indefinitely the affairs of the nation to be discussed in a way that may be taken as official and responsible by individuals who have no seat in any part of the country, rather than as between representatives of parties in the House of Commons who are face to face with each other and have to answer on this floor for the statements which they make.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would say to the Prime Minister that he has strained himself pretty far in trying to find an issue upon which he could again make some reference to the leader of the Progressive Conservative party. He has on nearly every occasion—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: I shall have to appeal to you again, Mr. Speaker, for protection respecting my position as leader of the opposition. I used last night the word "bully"; I hope I shall not have to use it again, because all I am doing and shall continue to do is to demand my rights—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): A mechanical majority!

Mr. GRAYDON: —in putting our position before the country. The overwhelming majority in the house of this Liberal party, and the no less overwhelming minority outside, are totally inconsistent.

An hon. MEMBER: You will find out.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, am I to be allowed to continue or not?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: I did not interrupt the Prime Minister when he made his statement, and he has been gentlemanly and polite enough not to interrupt me as I have been making mine. Perhaps his followers might take an example from him.

Time after time the Prime Minister has attempted to find some inconsequential reason or basis for directing an attack upon the leader of the Progressive Conservative party.

An hon. MEMBER: Who is he?

Mr. GRAYDON: He is doing it again now. I do not know whether the Prime Minister is slipping, but it seems to me that in his really great day as a statesman he would not have attacked Mr. Bracken on quite so inconsequential a basis as he did to-day. Apparently this is the phrase he objects to:

> The Prime Minister has said that Lord Halifax asked us to make a commitment, to fall in line, in any event, with a common policy for the commonwealth in all matters of our external relations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my hon. friend say that that statement is true?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Just keep quiet.

Mr. GRAYDON: The Prime Minister has made his speech.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The third leader is speaking now. How many leaders have you got there?

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps I, too, could get into this debate between the hon. member for York-Sunbury and the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie). But what I want to say is this. The Prime Minister knows very well that the actual effect of the statement he made on a previous occasion was the effect which is conveyed by the statement made here by Mr. Bracken. He is cavilling, as he often does in times of adversity and trouble, at certain words which are used, but the Prime Minister cannot avoid the consequences, either by questioning me, or Mr. Bracken, or anyone else; because there are the facts, and the facts remain to be read by the public from time to time. The public are getting a little tired—

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): —of Bracken.

Mr. GRAYDON: I would say to the hon. member for Northumberland, you people are not so tired but that you want him closer to you than ever.

So far as the public are concerned they believe, and I think properly so, that the job of prime minister of this country is, as my right hon. friend told us so eloquently and forcibly on a previous occasion in this house, in the midst of the war-time period to keep his eye and the government's eye on the ball, as Mr. Churchill suggested. If he does this he will have a large enough job on his hands: perhaps so much of his time will be occupied with the war that he will have to keep both eyes on the job of winning the war, and not one eye on trying to make plans for John Bracken or anybody else. I rise at this time only to say to the Prime Minister that I am amazed and appalled that he should pick such an inconsequential thing as this, the matter of mere wording in a statement as an excuse to make another attack on the floor of this house upon a great Canadian, who—and I say this without unnecessarily reflecting upon the Prime Minister—will measure up to the stature of any living Canadian.

INCOME TAX

QUESTION OF EXTENSION OF DATE FOR FILING OF 1943 RETURNS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): I desire to direct to the Minister of National Revenue a question of very urgent importance, particularly in the riding which I represent. In order to explain it more fully I shall, if I may have permission, read this letter:

> We would ask that you endeavour to obtain an extension in connection with the filing date of T-1 General 1943 income tax forms. As it stands at present, the last day for filing this return is April 30.

This office is swamped with clients, who are unable to complete their returns, and with experienced help unobtainable, it is impossible to handle the rush by April 30 with our present staff. This condition is general.

I have similar letters from a number of other people in Peterborough. It is impossible for them to run down to Kingston, over seventy-five miles away, and secure advice from the income tax office there; and Peterborough, being a large industrial city, contains a great number of income tax payers. I wonder if the minister could extend the time for filing this return?

Hon. C. W. G. GIBSON (Minister of National Revenue): The date for filing the returns is set by statute at April 30. Every year we get requests from people who have left to the last minute the completion of their return and find difficulty in preparing the return in the last few days. Individuals have from January 1 to April 30—four months—in which to get their return completed and filed. Nearly always, no matter what date is set, there are requests for extensions. But there is no intention of extending the time for filing the return, although an extension has been granted until August 31 for the payment of the balance owing on last year's tax.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): In regard to that, may I say just a word. The minister has said that these people have had since the first of January. I wish to correct him. Many of those who have to pay income tax have not had their proper returns from the firms until a few weeks ago.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

QUESTION AS TO CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON REVISION OF STANDING ORDERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the Prime Minister has recovered his lost temper, may I venture to ask him a question on the business of parliament and the house. There has been on the order paper since March 7, under the heading "Motions", the following item:

Further consideration in committee of the whole of the report of the special committee on the revision of standing orders.

I had intended to ask before the Easter recess as to when this item was to be disposed of, but, hoping that the government would call the order, I refrained from doing so. I am now impelled to do so because of the leading editorial in yesterday's Ottawa Journal, in which, I think it is fair to say, the writer commends at least three of the major recommendations of that special committee and calls attention to the failure to implement the report of the committee. I now ask the Prime Minister if he will be good enough to designate a day when we can discuss this important matter. I do not like to feel that the labours of that committee have been lost.

I desire to say, sir, if I may be permitted, that under your able chairmanship this committee did a lot of good work. It did not go so far as many people thought we ought to go, but the reason is quite plain—that we desired to protect the rights of certain minorities in parliament, and therefore we could not bring ourselves to recommend to the house that substantive rights which it has taken generations to acquire should be taken away. But we have, I think, brought down recommendations which are of great value and of vital importance, and I am therefore asking the Prime Minister if he would be good enough to arrange for a date when we can dispose of this report.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Before I answer my hon. friend's question, may I say just a word with respect to what he said in introducing it. My hon. friend was not in the house last night, or perhaps I would not have to repeat what I am about to say. I drew attention last night—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I was home ill last night.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend will realize that I should be the last not to understand why he would not be here in the evening. However, in a moment he will see the point I am making. I find it necessary at times to call attention to what I would describe as the tactics of the official opposition, and a part of their tactics is to create the impression that from time to time I lose my temper in this house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Perish the thought! We did not have it this afternoon!

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was going to say that I mentioned last night that on any occasion when the opposition take exception to what has been said by the government and begin to lecture the government they become very sensitive if we reply, they seem to feel that while they have the right to criticize, we have no right to take exception to their criticism, and when we do take exception to their criticism it is suggested that I have lost my temper. I just want to make it clear, because I hear this phrase repeated over and over again, each time I begin to reply to hon. gentlemen opposite, "It is too bad, but the Prime Minister has lost his temper." That is part of their stock in trade. It is a pretty low order of stock at that. I am going to make it clear that when the press of hon. gentlemen opposite quote in headlines these expressions about the Prime Minister losing his temper, when there is no possible ground for a statement of the kind—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That's good.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —except it be so to exaggerate as to make a situation ludicrous, while it may be all right to make these statements for the entertainment of the house, I do hope the public will not be misled by manoeuvres of the kind.

As to the more serious part of my hon. friend's observations, I am not sure whether the last part was really what his utterance was intended in the main to convey.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I give you my assurance it was.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thought perhaps he hoped he was getting in a shot for his party when he used the first expression on getting up.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would not be without guile in that respect.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is the most guileless creature in the house. But may I say that, with regard to the rules of the house, I share his view that we ought to take advantage of the work done by the committee, which I think was efficient and helpful, and have its report considered at a very early day. I would suggest Monday of next week.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am afraid I cannot be here.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then I should be very happy to suggest—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Any day following.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Tuesday, then. And please now do not ever afterwards say that I have not tried to meet the wishes of the opposition.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): True co-operation.

HOUSING

QUESTION OF EXTENSION TO WINNIPEG OF HOUSE CONVERSION PLAN—MAY 1 EVICTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question either to the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) or to the Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). I do so by request of the Winnipeg city council, made to me last Friday at a meeting of the council's committee on housing conditions. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that I was asked to raise this matter in the hope that it might obviate the necessity of the Winnipeg city council sending a delegation to Ottawa to wait on the government. My question has to do with the government's house conversion plan. In view of the serious shortage in houses in the city of Winnipeg, is consideration being given to extending to Winnipeg the benefits of this plan? Further, may I ask if the government will reply to the representations of the Winnipeg city council in this matter at an early day?

Mr. D. C. ABBOTT (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): My hon. friend, I assume, did not have an opportunity to give me notice of the question. I shall have to ask him to let it stand as a notice and I will endeavour to reply on Thursday.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): May I direct a question to the Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance? In view of the critical situation in Toronto and other cities, so far as housing is concerned, seeing that thousands of families there face eviction in a short time—and the situation is getting worse—will the government immediately, or as soon as possible, bring in its low-cost housing legislation so that something can be done to meet the emergency in that city with the least possible delay? Will the government also arrange for priorities in man-power and material to correct the situation?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know whether that is a question or not. It is matter of government policy which will be announced in due course.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

WARTIME LABOUR RELATIONS REGULATIONS—ARRANGEMENTS WITH PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. ROEBUCK (Trinity): May I direct a question to the Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour? In the wartime labour relations regulations there is provision for an arrangement with the provinces, and I understand that negotiations have been in progress with regard to the adoption of these regulations by the provinces. Will the parliamentary assistant make a statement as to the progress accomplished?

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): The hon. member for Trinity was kind enough to give me notice of the question, and I am in a position to answer it.

To date, an agreement with one province, the province of Ontario, has been negotiated by the Minister of Labour for Canada providing for the administration of the wartime labour relations regulations, P.C. 1003, with respect to the certification of bargaining representatives for employees in industries covered by section 3, subsection 1 (b) and (c) of the regulations. Under the terms of the agreement a provincial labour relations board has been established to administer the regulations, the board being composed of a chairman, three representatives of labour organizations and three representatives of employer organizations.

In respect of the remaining eight provinces, negotiations of agreements are being very actively pursued. We are assured by all provinces, with three exceptions, that agreements will be completed bringing non-war industries ordinarily within provincial jurisdiction under the regulations. In the case of Alberta and Nova Scotia, I think I may say we have every reason to believe that the same course will be followed.

In the province of Quebec a provincial board will be established on a representative basis to administer the dominion regulations with respect to war industries; non-war industries will continue to be dealt with under the provincial legislation enacted prior to the coming into force of the wartime labour relations regulations, P.C. 1003.

UNITED NATIONS

RELIEF AND REHABILITATION ADMINISTRATION—IMPLEMENTATION OF AGREEMENT OF NOVEMBER 9, 1943

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of bill No 84, for carrying into effect the agreement for united nations relief and rehabilitation administration between Canada and certain other nations and authorities.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Any measure whereby Canada can help in the rehabilitation of the devastated areas of the world, on as equitable basis as possible, will receive the full support of this group; nevertheless we do view with alarm certain suggestions that are being made—and I am not referring to mere rumours—that UNRRA is being used for the purpose of imposing undesirable economic conditions upon the nations benefiting under this measure. That mistake was made after the last war, and if it is made after this one it will be breaking faith with those people who have made the supreme sacrifice in this war. I say that for this reason: The winning of the war is not the final objective. It is a major objective that will have to be attained in order that we may go on to the final objective, which is the introduction of a peace that may have some permanency attached to it. The only type of peace that can have any permanency attached to it is one based upon Christian principles, one that will make it possible for the peoples of the world to live in the greatest degree of security and freedom from fear. If this is not done, if we allow discontent and poverty to exist in any part of the world, we are allowing an ember to smoulder that may in time burst into flame, thereby enveloping the world in another conflagration.

I wonder if we still stand by the declaration of principles known as the Atlantic charter. Do we still stand fully by sections 4 and 5 of that declaration? I wish to quote them now and to refer to one particular item of these sections. Section 4 is as follows:

> They will endeavour, with due respect for their existing obligations, to further the enjoyment by all states, great or small, victor or vanquished, of access, on equal terms, to the trade and to the raw materials of the world which are needed for their economic prosperity.
> Fifth, they desire to bring about the fullest collaboration between all nations in the economic field with the object of securing, for all, improved labour standards, economic adjustment, and social security.

Section 4 states that this objective is to apply with respect to nations great or small, victor or vanquished. Apparently the agreement known as UNRRA has to a certain extent departed from that principle. While the agreement may not have departed from it, the resolutions passed at Atlantic City apparently have done so; because I read a statement in the United States newspapers the other day to the effect that at Atlantic City the British delegates, supported by the delegates of the United States and China, moved a resolution to the effect that enemy territory should pay for relief to the fullest possible extent. That motion was defeated, and the motion that Germany should pay to the full extent was passed. I notice that the Parliamentary Assistant to the Prime Minister (Mr. Claxton), stated yesterday that a resolution was adopted at Atlantic City providing that countries which are able to pay for relief would pay for it. Then one immediately comes to the conclusion that those nations that cannot pay will receive it as a gift; but on the other hand, according to the resolution that was passed at Atlantic City, we now find that Germany will have to pay in full.

I am not one who is easily swayed by emotion about the rights of defeated nations. However I believe we must all agree that if in Germany after the war there is mass starvation amongst the people, amongst the women and children of that country, all they can do is to pay to the fullest extent possible; and if they are unable to provide sufficient relief for the people by paying to the fullest extent possible, then apparently we are going to deny them the necessary relief to take care of these people. It appears to me that that is a departure from the declaration of principles known as the Atlantic charter.

There is another matter connected with the resolutions passed at Atlantic City that has caused me a great deal of concern. It seems to me that some of these resolutions definitely limit the scope of the agreement known as UNRRA. UNRRA stands for the international relief and rehabilitation administration. The words "relief" and "rehabilitation" are used. According to resolution 12 I understand that the second "R" has in reality been struck out of UNRRA. I make that statement because I have read words to that effect in a number of United States periodicals. I should like to quote some of the statements that have been published. In the Christian Science Monitor of March 16 reference is made to resolution 12 passed at Atlantic City, and the following statement appears:

> The task of rehabilitation must not be considered as the beginning of reconstruction. It is co-terminous with relief.

The Wall Street Journal of March 20 made this statement:

> As defined by UNRRA and Congress, rehabilitation does not signify reconstruction.

The Economist of Dec. 4 said:

> The decision has been reached to take the second "R" out of UNRRA.

Therefore apparently UNRRA now merely stands for relief. It does not stand for rehabilitation of the devastated areas. According to the press, forty-one resolutions were passed at Atlantic City. Hon. members of this house have not been in a positon to find out what is contained in those resolutions. The statements in the press regarding resolution 12 show that the powers of UNRRA have been definitely curtailed. It seems to me that before the house is asked to pass upon this bill, the members should be given a chance to see what is in the resolutions passed at Atlantic City which definitely curtail the operation of UNRRA.

Unless devastated countries can get supplies of raw materials and machinery with which to start their industries they will continue to need relief for many years. Apparently UNRRA does not make any provision for providing the raw materials and machinery necessary to enable industry in those devastated countries to provide exports in return for their imports. One may well ask how the devastated areas can ever produce the necessary exports to pay for their imports. Is it to be a condition of receiving help under UNRRA that these nations shall become a party to the proposals for an international currency? It might be said that that is one way by which these nations can receive the necessary help. In that regard it is interesting to note section 4 of the Canadian proposals of the tentative draft proposals—

> The establishment of an international monetary organization is no substitute for the measures of international relief and rehabilitation which will be required as the war draws to its conclusions and afterwards; and in the view of the Canadian experts any monetary organization which is set up should not be called upon to finance transactions of this nature.

Therefore according to the Canadian experts these international monetary proposals will not be a method by which the devastated areas can be rehabilitated or by which reconstruction can be put into effect. Again I ask, by what means are those nations to receive the necessary help to put themselves on a self-supporting basis? Apparently the only alternative left to them, since it is not to be done under UNRRA, is long-term loans. When we recall the history of that type of policy, when we remember how for sixty years before the last war England made large and long-term loans to foreign nations and lost in the neighbourhood of sixteen or seventeen billion dollars as a result of those loans being repudiated; when we recall—and I am speaking from memory now—that the United States lost in the neighbourhood of eleven billion dollars on foreign loans between the two wars, I think we should agree that that is not a sound policy. Moreover, a policy of that type can result only in international friction. When money is lent to a nation to build up its industries, the policy works fairly satisfactorily until the time comes when the debtor nation seeks to repay the loan. When it attempts to ship its imports in payment of the interest and principal, the creditor nation immediately objects to receiving those imports because it brings about unemployment within its own country; indeed a high tariff barrier is erected in order to make it impossible for the debtor nation to ship its goods in. The result, of course, is international friction and repudiation. I think most people will agree that to a very large extent this policy was responsible for the war of 1914, and to a certain extent for the war we are fighting today. If we are not going to use long term loans; if we are not going to use the international monetary proposals to provide this help, and I insist we should not, then I think the only sound and logical way to provide it is either under lend-lease or mutual aid. I believe the mutual aid bill should become a definite part of UNRRA, so that help may be given to bring about the rehabilitation and reconstruction of the devastated industries.

In the past this group has always given full support to the principle of mutual aid, and similar measures. We have given that support entirely on moral grounds. We have taken the stand that we are in this war with the other united nations and that it is our moral obligation to pool our resources in order to unite them against the enemy. We feel also that these policies should be continued after the war to extend help to those nations which have suffered as a result of enemy action. If such assistance is not given; if we allow those nations to remain on a standard of bare subsistence, in a state of relief, then I do not think it can be said that we are laying sound foundations for a world peace. Certainly it will not be a peace based on Christian principles. Therefore I should like the minister to explain just to what extent the resolutions passed at Atlantic City have made UNRRA a relief proposal.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I find myself to a very large extent in agreement with the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), who has just taken his seat. I do not follow him in all his arguments, but I think we should go very carefully into the principle of this measure both now and when it is in committee. We are quite prepared to give not only full but enthusiastic support to the united nations relief organization in so far as it will assist in the rehabilitation of the nations now under the heel of Hitler or suffering from the extremities of war, and in placing the world on a saner, sounder footing than we have known in the past. Before we finally adopt a measure of this description, however, which is so wide in its implications, I believe we should have full discussion and a clear understanding of it. Since the war began it has become somewhat customary in this house to take for granted that Great Britain, the United States, and latterly Russia, the great powers, would more or less decide most matters; then we would get the decision and to all intents and purposes fall in line with what had been decided. I think that policy is wrong. We should give the great powers all the cooperation we can, but we should not forget that there may be circumstances in which the interests of the smaller nations may not be altogether the same as those of one or more or all of the great powers.

The principle of this bill, as I see it, and it so states, is to enable the government of Canada to give effect to an agreement for the establishment of a united nations relief and rehabilitation administration; and the method proposed in this bill is to empower the governor in council to do whatever may be proper and expedient in order to give effect to that agreement. Although when the bill was brought down the house was more or less under the impression that it was mainly for the purpose of authorizing an interim payment of $10,000,000, the adoption of this measure will in effect give the government very wide powers in regard to the agreement and the policies to be carried out thereunder. I followed with some interest the remarks of the hon. member for Acadia, and I want to emphasize what he said in regard to the purpose of the bill. As I see it, when this relief and rehabilitation organization was first set up most people thought it would be not merely a temporary relief organization but quite largely a reconstruction body. As the hon. member for Acadia has already pointed out, however, and as has been pointed out in certain newspapers, we seem to have departed from what many hoped to be the basic idea behind this organization. For example, President Roosevelt sent a message to congress last November, I think on November 15, in which he said that the agreements provided only a framework for giving first aid to the liberated areas. This work would be only a beginning of the tremendous job of aiding the war victims; the liberated peoples themselves would have to assume the greater part of this task. Other machinery and measures would be necessary to solve the long-range problems of reconstruction, but UNRRA could only lay a foundation for reconstruction. The latter part of what I have just said was the interpretation placed upon the remarks of President Roosevelt at that time in an editorial appearing in the London Times of November 16, 1943. The purpose of UNRRA, as I understand it, is definitely limited; I quote the words:

> . . . provide assistance in the resumption of urgently needed agricultural and industrial production, and the restoration of essential services.

It seems to me that the desire is more or less to limit the activities of this organization to urgently needed industrial and agricultural production; and various statements that have been made would seem to indicate that this now has become the main purpose of the united nations relief and rehabilitation organization.

Mr. MARTIN: The director himself said so.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think that is quite right. I am not sure, but I believe some slight amendment was made to the original proposal last autumn which also conveyed the same impression. In fact clause 11 of resolution 12, which was passed at the conference, says:

> The task of rehabilitation must not be considered as the beginning of reconstruction—it is coterminous with relief. No new construction or reconstruction work is contemplated, but only rehabilitation as defined in the preamble of the agreement. Problems, such as unemployment, are important, but not determining factors. They are consequences and, at the same time, motives of action. The administration cannot be called upon to help restore continuous employment in the world.

So that this has a limited effect. But while criticizing the limited effect of the organization I do not wish for a moment to convey the impression that in any respect we are opposed to Canada's participating to the fullest extent in this great relief and rehabilitation project. My prime purpose in drawing this matter to the attention of the house is to urge that, so far as Canada is able, we endeavour to widen the scope. I believe that is what the hon. member for Acadia had in mind. I would urge that we endeavour to widen the scope of this measure, so that it may be applicable to a larger number of people and lay a framework for comprehensive international planning.

Unlike hon. members to my left, I am not so much alarmed by some of the rumours that are going around. I feel that an organization in which we have associated powers with such diverse economic ideas and economic aims as have the United States and the Soviet Union, affords a measure of protection to those of us who might otherwise feel that an attempt would be made to use this relief and rehabilitation organization as a club to impose upon the world any particular type of social, financial or economic system. I readily agree that such a danger might lurk within some such organization. But it seems to me that when we find associated within the organization, and participating in its activities, nations with such diverse economic and social views, adequate protection is ensured.

I should like to make one further statement about the widening of the powers of relief afforded under this measure. The settlement of peoples and the assistance given to peoples are largely confined to certain groups. For example, as I read the agreement, Chinese refugees will not participate to the same extent as will refugees from Europe. I believe we should see to it that so far as possible we treat all peoples alike, and bring all within the benefits of this measure.

Canada's contribution to UNRRA, amounting to one per cent of our national income, would, if our income were the same as that of last year, amount to about $90,000,000. Is that about the correct amount?

Mr. CLAXTON: The amount is not known. It may be $75,000,000.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am making my estimate from last year's figures.

Mr. CLAXTON: It is for the year ending June 30, 1943, and that makes the calculation rather difficult for us.

Mr. COLDWELL: For purposes of this discussion we will say the amount, mainly in goods, would be a maximum of $90,000,000. During the war we have given to Great Britain, and latterly to the united nations, a gift of a billion dollars' worth of supplies a year. The amount may be less this year, but it will still be a substantial sum. I have always felt that we in Canada have an obligation to the peoples who have been under Hitler's heel and who have endured the scourge of war. That was brought to my attention as it was never brought before when the parliamentary party visited Great Britain two years ago. Only this morning we heard a lady say how tired of blackouts, and of the other conditions which caused them great misery and distress, the people of Britain were becoming.

We in Canada have been probably the most fortunately situated of all the peoples engaged in the war—perhaps, indeed, of all the peoples on earth. We have not within our own borders seen the scourge of war. We have had to make very few sacrifices of any kind. Our rationing has been such that we have had a plentiful supply even of the rationed commodities. And it seems to me that as a Christian and a democratic country we have an obligation to other peoples who have suffered because of the war. I know that at the moment, because of the difficulties connected with sending food to the suffering peoples of Europe, and the danger that such food would be used merely to assist Germany —indeed, might even prolong the war—no attempt is being made to feed many of the starving women and children in Europe. When the war is over we must endeavour to see to it that as a Christian country, in the exercise not of individual but of national Christian charity, we take our proper share in caring for these peoples. In this measure we are doing the least that could be expected of us. I should like to see more being done.

From the earliest possible moment I should like to see this programme administered by the civilian organizations. Provision, it is true, is made for that, but Canada should endeavour to see to it that the programme is not used in any way whatsoever as a sort of military tool for the preservation of order. As I said a moment ago, because of the peoples who are associated under the UNRRA agreement I do not think we need fear that it will be used as a political weapon to promote any particular type of political establishment in countries released from Hitler.

There are other points I should like to advance, but I believe they might be discussed more properly as we proceed with the bill. While we offer these suggestions, we welcome the measure. We welcome the setting up of this organization, in an attempt to feed the distressed peoples, and to do other things for them as well. We believe this measure is a step in the right direction. It is our hope that it may be the foundation of a finer type of world citizenship, in which the world may be considered more of a unit in relation to the production and distribution of the good things with which it is endowed. Canada should feel that she has some responsibility for the nutrition, the social and health conditions of the natives of the islands of the seas, and of other parts of the world, realizing that no nation can be permanently prosperous, happy or progressive unless it joins with other nations in bringing progressiveness, health, nutrition, prosperity and adequate standards of life to all peoples. If we have learned one thing from these two wars, it is I believe that none of us can live alone, that we are all part of a great world community, and that what injures one part of the community will inevitably injure all.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I am not in agreement with the views of the hon. members who have preceded me regarding the discussion of the resolution that is now before us. If the government had taken the necessary action to protect the family, and promote education, agriculture, commerce, civilian industry, and in a word the whole economy of the nation, they would not introduce such a measure today. Despite our warnings and protests, they have disorganized the home, not only in permitting but in encouraging as much as they could the employment of mothers in war industries. That is one of the most grievous mistakes that the government have made. They have struck at the very heart of society, of which the family is the living cell. Through widespread propaganda they have enlisted thousands and thousands of women. They have spent for war more than fifteen billion dollars. They have given billions of dollars of the ratepayers' money to nations which are a hundred times wealthier than Canada. They have, through their action and their mistakes, brought about the great exodus of young farmers toward the cities or kept those young men in the army to the prejudice of argiculture which is so necessary to the army and the civilian population. They now want to spend ten more millions in gratuities and gifts. When will there be an end of such squandering? Taxes and loans cannot go beyond a certain limit. Have we not had a surfeit of broken pledges? War expenditures are reaching terrific proportions. Those who have recently heard the governor of the Bank of Canada have been struck with consternation. That is a bottomless pit in which our whole economic structure is being engulfed. But that does not trouble the government. They keep on spending billions and billions. They launch loans with endless figures. Our economic status would be so easy to maintain, if only the government would administer with thrift, and protect our families, our trade, our agriculture, our industries and our whole economy. It would be so easy if only we stuck to a policy of common sense. You can build up all the departments in the world, all you will do is aggravate the situation, if you are not reverting to a policy based on sound economics and social justice.

At the very moment when the government is ready to squander public funds and to plunder the treasury, as well as to rehabilitate everything, they promote delation in Canada. They have ruled that, under penalty of fine or gaol, I will have to denounce my own son or my employee to military authorities, if my son or employee has not complied with the wartime rules and regulations or the mobilization act. Here is an infamous and abject measure, worthy of spies and traitors. And it is the situation in all its bitter reality. The government is bound to show the citizens how to become adept at felony and treachery. The overburdening debt, the unbearable taxes, the billions that they spend as if it were their own money, the ten thousand million and over loans that are following one another; all that is nothing at all. The government exact the blood-tax, and in the most hypocritical and brutal way. Mr. Chairman, never has the Borden government, which was pilloried for twenty-five years by the Liberals, shown such extravagance. Never did the Conservative government thus pledge the whole economic future of the country. The cost of the last war was slightly over one billion dollars. And I still hear the death sentences pronounced against the Borden government by a howling mob, tragic jokers of whom I find here a few survivors and a few disciples worthy of such deceit.

The Borden government had set up in all constituencies of the country exemption boards for essential farm workers. Not a single one was enlisted against his will. To-day, notwithstanding the deferments granted, the farmer is called over and over again to appear before medical revision boards. This is how the money intended for the prosecution of the war is spent, in part, either in gifts to wealthy and powerful nations or in useless appeals by certain classes of men called up by the armed forces and in medical examination fees, or for the maintenance of the most incompetent bureaucracy and the most haughty and ignorant boards of all times. Let the government continue on the rock-strewn path where they have ventured and they soon will have to answer to the people whom they have betrayed.

I said a moment ago that during the last war not a single farmer was enlisted against his will. What has happened under the present government?

As early as the late summer of 1940, all young farmers were required to report to military camps for one month of training. This period was later extended to four months. Heaven knows how many of these youths are still in the army. There are thousands and thousands of them. Let us not compare the present conscription set up to that of the last war. I know something of it since I was conscripted during the previous armed conflict. The Borden government was more sincere and more honest than the present administration. When they enacted conscription, it was not in a disguised and dishonest manner as the government of to-day has done. Our present government have violated all their promises and undertakings. Therefore, although I may be favourable to certain parts of this resolution, I can neither vote for it as a whole, nor for a single cent of the ten million dollar appropriation requested.

Mr. GASPARD FAUTEUX (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, on January 6 last, Mr. Eugene Staley, member of the staff of the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration, made a statement in such eloquent and at the same time concise and expressive terms, that I feel I cannot do better than open these remarks by quoting it:

> More than five hundred million men, women and children are under the despotic rule of the axis in the occupied areas of Europe, Asia and the islands of the sea. Some are starving; many more are suffering from serious malnutrition. Malnourished people are an easy prey to disease. Supplies of clothing, and soap, both essential not only for comfort but also for the prevention of disease, are seriously depleted in the occupied areas. Millions of people—refugees, prisoners of war, labourers forced to work for the axis war machine, are separated from their homes. Estimates of the number of such "displaced persons" run to twenty million in Europe alone, and to forty million in China.

A little later, at the end of February, Mr. Abraham Feller, general counsel of the same organization, said:

> When the guns cease firing in Europe and in Asia, the world will have before it an appalling spectacle of human misery and material devastation. There is little need to paint this spectacle for this audience, to marshal the statistics of horror, or to pile adjective upon adjective in the attempt to describe what is really indescribable. You know full well that the hunted, and the homeless, the refugee, the forced labourer, the men and women in concentration camps, the mothers who witness the gradual starvation of their children, that all these hostages of the enemy must be freed and redeemed.

The reactions of men and women to such statements as these can be divided into three broad general classes: "How awfully sad," "So what?" and "What can be done about it?"

The first group I should be inclined to dismiss once and for all as hopeless. I may be wrong in that, as I may very well be terribly wrong in regard to many other things. Still, feeling as I do about group No. 1, I will set them aside. If anyone else knows what to do about them, I shall be glad.

The second group is perhaps at the present time the biggest, and it is, as I will try to show later, our greatest difficulty and our biggest task to convince those people that this is a matter which intimately concerns them in their business, in their jobs, in their private family life.

The third group may be subdivided into those who ask, "What should they do about it?", those who ask "What should we do about it?", and the perhaps rather limited number who at once begin to wonder, "Is there anything that I can do about it?" In the latter category were the men who put their heads together and burned their last ration of midnight oil, devising the programme which is to be carried out, if all goes according to plan, by the organization now generally known by the shortened title of UNRRA. Most of us, however, are still young enough to remember vaguely what our professors in logic and philosophy told us about the dangers of reasoning from the particular to the general. As UNRRA is definitely a particular phase of a very general problem, I think, therefore, we would be well advised to take a brief glance at the general problem first, and then with that in view, give detailed attention to this particular phase.

UNRRA is destined to be a sort of connecting link between what we are at the present moment doing to win the war and what we hope to do to win the peace, and to create such a peace that we shall have no losers, nothing but winners all over the world. We shall never be able to agree as to the connecting link unless we can agree on the big problem to which it leads.

The after-war problem divides into two sections, one that will face us at home, and one that has to be dealt with abroad. These are really just two different phases of the one and only problem, but we may have difficulty in getting all our people, or all the people of other countries, to realize it. If China's problem is that her people are starving because they cannot get grain, and if Canada's problem is that her people are starving because they cannot get rid of their grain, there is a direct association between the two problems. But it is hard to get a mining prospector in North Bay to realize that he may be down and out and unable to find a fresh grubstake, because a million people are starving along the Yangtze valley; nor would it be easy to get the starving Chinese to realize that the fact of a mining slump in northern Canada was in any way responsible for their plight.

And yet, if we are to get a solution of this problem, we must have all the countries of the world participating in it. Otherwise, it will not work. Because as soon as one little wheel goes out of gear, the whole clockwork goes wrong. And we cannot have Canada cooperate whole-heartedly in a world-wide programme unless and until the big majority of about five million adults in this country have agreed on it. And to get them to agree, even on the general principles, you must make them understand the definite economic relationship between the starving Chinese in the Yangtze valley or, if you like, a million starving workers in Czechoslovakia, and the unemployed miner in Sudbury or a down-and-out prospector on the shores of Great Bear lake.

Those of us who realize the intensely growing interrelation between national and international problems the world over, however, realize that the victim nations, the ravaged nations, must be helped back on their feet, because there is not a chance in the world of Canada going ahead to steadily increasing happiness and prosperity if half of Europe is in the depths of economic misery and despair.

As an American writer, addressing these words to citizens of his own country, has well said:

> The cost of participating with the united nations in civilian relief, in comparison with the cost of any alternative course, is almost insignificant. One consequence of failing to do so would be the lengthening and protraction of the period of paralyzed and stagnant trade. Each month that European and Asiatic markets are unable to buy our goods costs us millions of dollars. The second consequence is that fighting would not stop with the armistice. We would be setting the stage for world war No. 3.

It is in the light of these considerations that some forty-four nations, belonging to the group we know as the united nations, met at the White House at Washington and signed the agreement whereby was created the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration, the destiny of which is to follow up the armed forces in their advance in Europe and in the far east, and bridge the gap between enemy occupation and independent, prosperous civilian administration.

UNRRA does not propose to take on the huge problem of creating a stable world, a world in which peace will prevail, the world which President Roosevelt was looking forward to when he spoke recently of a "common determination to build for the future a world of decency, and security and above all, peace." That is a problem for which we must prepare, but which cannot be handled now. The essential factors in the problem are not yet known. Many of them will not be known until the enemy has ceased to be the invader and the conqueror anywhere in the world; until he has become the invaded, the conquered, the beaten dog asking for mercy and relief. UNRRA is created to deal with the immediate problem of bringing urgent needed relief to peoples who have just been freed from the conqueror's yoke.

At the great conference which representatives of the united nations held at Atlantic City to lay the foundations of this work, the scope of UNRRA's activities was defined in a resolution which I will read to you:

> The supplies and services of which the administration will seek to ensure the provision fall under four heads:
> 1. Relief supplies: essential consumer goods to meet immediate needs, such as food, fuel, clothing, shelter, medical supplies.
> 2. Relief services, such as health and welfare, assistance in caring for and maintaining records of, persons who, by reason of war, have been displaced from their homes and in agreement with the appropriate governments, military authorities or other agencies, in securing their repatriation or return.

3. Rehabilitation supplies and services: materials (such as seeds, fertilizers, raw materials, fishing equipment, machinery and spare parts) needed to enable a recipient country to produce and transport relief supplies for its own and other liberated areas.

4. Rehabilitation of public utilities and services, so far as they can be repaired or restored to meet immediate needs.

In this way, UNRRA will follow closely on the heels of AMG, the allied military governments, which organization, military in nature, provides for the peaceful administration of territory which has just been relieved of enemy occupation, seeking to make use, whenever possible, of the then existing local authorities and local civilian organization. UNRRA will step in only when the military authorities think it wise, and only in full cooperation with them, to take over the job of bringing to the civilian population what they most urgently need.

As soon as the military authorities hand over the problems of the civilian population to UNRRA, there will be certain things that will have to be done immediately. It may be presumed that the military authorities and the AMG have already been busy with the work of distributing free rations of bread, possibly some supplies of clothing. The military doctors and hospitals have done some of the most urgent medical work among the undernourished, physically feeble civilian population. They, however, must pass on to immediately needed work in face of the enemy. UNRRA must now get down to the task of seeing that the civilian population can be permanently and regularly supplied with what it needs and, still more important, put as quickly as possible in a position to supply itself. I stress that last point seriously—"put in a position to supply itself."

One thing we do not want to do in Europe or in Asia, under any circumstances, is to establish any sort of world-wide system of direct relief. I have no need, I am sure, to go into any details, before this house, as to the evils of direct relief. We know too much about it already. But I may take a moment to point out that when you face a people that has been in practical slavery for four or five years, and has had its moral and physical resistance lowered by persistent malnutrition, unsatisfactory housing, insufficient clothing and brutal terrorization, it would not be a difficult thing to educate them down to a condition of permanent dependence by just handing things out to them and accustoming them to look to the overseas Santa Claus to keep on sending them manna from heaven. We know how easy it was to educate Canadians down to that standard, so I am casting no stones from my glass house when I say that it would be still easier to do so with peoples who have been through the agonizing experiences of the past few years in Europe or Asia.

We must feed them for a few days and then start them feeding themselves.

Let us consider now the situation likely to face us when we liberate a section of, say, Europe from German domination. If the Germans have had time to retreat slowly, we shall find everything useful destroyed. Millions of people will want water, clean, sterile water safe for drinking, and be unable to obtain it because their waterworks plants will have been destroyed. UNRRA will not be able to build brand new aqueducts and filtration plants for them. But it will, with their help and ours, be able to fix them up with temporary equipment to bring them water from reasonably safe sources, and with chlorination equipment to render the water bacteriologically safe, until such time as they themselves can acquire adequate equipment and rebuild their water plants. When that time comes, if the liberated peoples have a reserve of American or Canadian dollars stored away somewhere, perhaps a reserve in this country that has been stored here since the early days of the war, they will buy the machinery they need in this country and UNRRA will simply give all the help it can to see that they get delivery as quickly as possible; may perhaps provide them with technical help and guidance in rebuilding their plants.

If the country recently delivered from enemy hands was an industrial one, its industries will probably have been wrecked, either deliberately by the enemy or by the actual fighting from house to house and street to street. They will need some machinery at once to get their industries going again, either for industrial production or, alternatively, as part of the united nations war industry producing war equipment. And later, if they are not to be dependent on us for ever for their supply of machinery, we must see that they get the machine tools with which to start making their own machinery.

Their farm lands have lain idle for years. They have in many places undergone the scorched-earth policy twice, or even oftener. Either we resign ourselves to sending them farm produce for an indeterminate period, which would be "direct relief" again, or else we must get their farms back into production quickly. The latter proposal implies getting them supplies of seed, of fertilizer and of farm machinery. It may also imply help in organizing locally, so that farm machinery sent over from this continent may be used collectively on many farms.

Again, millions of people have been taken from one part of Europe and carted away to other parts, hundreds of miles away from home, to work in German munition factories. These people want to be sent home as soon as possible. A big organization will be needed, in which UNRRA will cooperate with local authorities in sorting them out. But they cannot be sent home until transportation facilities are available, and the enemy will have pulled up the railways, destroyed the rolling stock or stolen it. The military authorities will repair enough to make the railways usable for military purposes. UNRRA will help the local civilian authorities in completing the repair job, so that people may be transported back to their homes, when and if it becomes geographically possible. To that end we shall have to provide them with rails, locomotives and rolling stock to begin with, and later machine tools with which to make more locomotives and rolling stock for themselves. If this sort of thing is not done on a systematic basis, with proper organization carefully worked out in advance, it has to be done anyhow, sooner or later, by someone, and will cost the whole world, Canada included, a hundred times more when done later and by hazard.

A practical example of how the presence of a well prepared organization can work wonders by prompt intervention is found in the case of the Tunisian olive crop, which was saved, soon after the allied troops entered that country, by the intervention of the Office of Foreign Relief and Rehabilitation, a United States agency which preceded UNRRA. The crop was on the verge of being lost because the olive farmers had no cloths to spread on the ground, to catch the olives as they were shaken from the trees. The American agency had big stocks of cloth in North Africa accumulated for supplying clothing and the like in relief operations. They brought this cloth out and put it at the disposal of the olive farmers, and the crop was harvested. That saved, for the markets of the world, an enormous supply of olive oil—not a small matter in view of the shortage of vegetable oils these days. From the pressing of the olives there remained a residue of fat which was available for the making of soap. In North Africa the local soap industry depends on the olive industry for its fats. Skin diseases are very prevalent in North Africa, and one of the most urgently needed supplies to combat them is plenty of soap. So that if the olive crop had not been saved, many cargo ships would have had to be diverted from the transport of war supplies to cart soap and disinfectant supplies to North Africa; the shortage of vegetable fats in North America would have been still more acute than it is, and a large part of the agricultural population of North Africa would have been in the depths of despair from the failure of its crops. That is only a very small example of the things that UNRRA will have to do when the enemy troops begin rolling back in Europe and Asia and conquered populations become free again.

Now, the natural question that arises in everyone's mind, I suppose, is "What is it going to cost us?" Since in the opinion of the highest authorities in forty-four fighting nations it is a question of whether democratic civilization survives or not, some people might be inclined to say that the cost does not matter. We have to pay or go under. Or they might look at it like the women in a recent cartoon, "Quit looking at those income tax papers. We can't afford it anyhow." But the most intriguing feature of that, to my humble mind, is that we can easily afford it; in fact, it is a mere bagatelle. I have seen official figures to the effect that the united nations will subscribe together about two and a half billion dollars to carry out this work of providing the victim nations with their immediate needs, and helping them get on their feet and become able to take care of their own needs. That figure is based on the decision taken at the Atlantic City meeting, that participating nations should tax themselves one per cent of their national revenue for the year ending June 30, 1943. I understand Canada's contribution is to be between $70,000,000 and $90,000,000.

After all, I recall that Canada has on two occasions contributed a billion dollars to the cause of the united nations. And I have yet to meet a Canadian citizen who is one cent worse off for it. I have yet to find a Canadian who was better off in the years when Canada did not give anything to that cause than he is now, unless misfortune has hit him from some other source entirely unconnected with war finance. The dominion government is having as hard a time preventing people from spending their money foolishly and unpatriotically to-day as it ever had before the billion dollar annual contributions were inaugurated. There seems to be a general feeling that if the Dominion of Canada had kept two billions of dollars in its own coffers, the people would not have had any more money to spend, Canada would not have been any richer; nobody would have been any richer, and nobody would have been any better off. How that works out, not being a trained economist, an international banker or a chartered accountant, I do not know. I am quite prepared to concede that perhaps the economists, the bankers and the accountants do not know either. All the other sciences have outrun their exponents to such an extent that the leading men of science have little or no idea how they accomplish the marvels of science which they do accomplish. I read the other day that no one in the medical world really knows how penicillin and the sulpha drugs accomplish their wonders. They only know that they do. As good old Galileo said: "Se muove." It may be contrary to all sense and reason, but it works. And I suspect that the science of economics has also progressed so far ahead of the economists that they do not know how it works, and are having a hard time realizing that it does work.

It is, of course, an interesting point, that the annual billion dollars was never given in money and that the $70,000,000, or $90,000,000 will also never be given in money. According to the Atlantic City agreement, the contributing nations are supposed to provide only ten per cent of their contribution in available foreign exchange. The remainder will be spent in the contributing country, buying the goods which that country produces and which UNRRA will need for the relief of newly-delivered nations. That means that a great deal of Canada's contribution will in reality be in grain and flour. Now the grain is already in the elevators. It is only a few years ago that farmers in the west were going bankrupt and stevedores in Montreal were on relief because we could not get rid of this grain. All right; now we are going to get rid of it. Should we not be happy? The farmers do not have to get the money for the grain; they have it already, or at least, if not money, they received its equivalent in credit when they sent their grain to the elevators. No doubt the government may have to strike from the credit side of its books an entry concerning millions of dollars which it credited to the farmers for having delivered the grain. Of course the government has to pay interest on that money, because when it gave credit to the farmers somebody gave credit to the government and now holds government bonds. But does anyone suggest that the government will be any less able to pay three per cent interest on $90,000,000 because it blacked out a debit entry in that amount in its books as against a number of farmers?

Without knowing all the technique of the science of economics, nevertheless I have a shrewd suspicion that disaster is more likely to hit the Canadian economic equilibrium through a too sudden cessation of gifts of two billion dollars a year than through the introduction of any single $90,000,000 gift into the dominion budget. Let me point out in more serious vein, however, that this is a measure of immediate military necessity, a contribution toward winning the war now as well as a step toward winning the peace afterwards. A high official of the organization has explained the military needs in this way:

> The advancing United States armies must have stable civilian conditions in their rear. Troops must be protected from epidemics of disease, which can originate in a malnourished population lacking adequate clothing, soap, medicines or means of repairing and restarting their own equipment for producing those things. The more quickly local production can be revived in liberated areas, the less will be the strain on military supply lines and the more adequate will be the materials and equipment that can be made available to our men at the fighting front. This will save the lives of our soldiers and shorten the war. Also the fact that prompt aid is known to be forthcoming to liberated peoples will encourage and inspire those still unliberated, increase their resistance and further weaken the enemy, hastening his ultimate military collapse. If a well planned and well organized and previously announced programme of relief and rehabilitation helped to shorten the war by only one week, the straight dollars and cents savings would be a tremendous return on the investment, not to speak of the much more important matter of the lives of our soldiers and of civilians that would be spared.

Then there is the long-range economic effect on supplying countries of helping people to help themselves. People always forget that helping other people to produce helps them to consume. In the long run, helping the farmer in central Europe to grow his own wheat again may make him independent of Canada's wheat, but by that time he will have become a considerable purchaser of Canada's newsprint, automobiles, farm machinery and heaven knows what else. Helping the people of central China to get on their feet and produce goods of world marketability will enable them to vary their rice diet with wheat bread and other cereals, and to buy from us the surplus wheat which central Europe perhaps will not want. The more every single part of the world is prosperous, producing and consequently consuming, the happier, busier and more prosperous every other part of the world must be in consequence.

I would not venture to offer advice, because I do not care to give advice or make suggestions to my betters, but my own reaction to this problem would be that never again can we take the attitude that if one wheel of the watch breaks down we must make all the rest of the watch go slow in order to accommodate it, and must concentrate on preventing the broken wheel from being repaired. If we want the mechanism of the world to work efficiently we must all cooperate to the limit in helping to rectify anything that goes wrong in any part of the world, because a break-down in the machinery at one point must in the long run do harm to all the rest of the machinery. Or, as Hon. Francis B. Sayer has wisely expressed it—and with this quotation I think I should conclude these remarks—

> The issue before every nation of the earth to-day is whether or not the peoples of the world can learn to work constructively and whole-heartedly together for human progress and welfare. If humanity, with its proud dreams and high visions, can in the world of reality find no better way of settling its differences than by war, humanity is doomed. The present struggle has made manifest to all that totalitarian war aided by modern war has become so deadly and can be organized on so world-wide a scale, unless humanity exterminates war, war will exterminate humanity.

In other words, if the nations of the world will not learn to hang together they will hang separately. If we can learn to cooperate in the common interest of the whole world; if we can get the idea through to every day labourer in every Canadian city that his next week's wages depend largely upon the fate of a million peasants in central China or a hundred thousand shoemakers in Czechoslovakia, then we can build the kind of world of which President Roosevelt dreamed.

To the realization of that end UNRRA is merely a first halting step. UNRRA is significant because it is the first sharing of a major task which has both military and post-combat implications, the first sharing on a really international basis. Not only do all the united nations participate as members of UNRRA; the associated nations participate also. But if we dare not undertake it, God help us all.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, the feature of Bill No. 84 to which there is the greatest objection is, I think, contained in that sentence in the explanatory note which states that the method proposed is to empower the governor in council to do whatever may be proper and expedient, or whatever it may think proper and expedient, for giving effect to the said agreement. I should like to read some of the powers and functions of the administration, as contained in article I of the agreement. Turning to page 2 of the bill we find that this administration shall have power to—

> . . . acquire, hold and convey property, to enter into contracts and undertake obligations, to designate or create agencies and to review the activities of agencies so created, to manage undertakings and in general to perform any legal act appropriate to its objects and purposes.

Then I read section 2 of that article:

> Subject to the provision of article VII, the purposes and functions of the administration shall be as follows:
> (a) to plan, coordinate, administer or arrange for the administration of measures for the relief of victims of war in any area under the control of any of the united nations through the provision of food, fuel, clothing, shelter and other basic necessities, medical and other essential services; and to facilitate in such areas, so far as necessary to the adequate provision of relief, the production and transportation of these articles and the furnishing of these services. The form of activities of the administration within the territory of a member government wherein that government exercises administrative authority and the responsibility to be assumed by the member government for carrying out measures planned by the administration therein shall be determined after consultation with and with the consent of the member government.
> (b) To formulate and recommend measures for individual or joint action by any or all of the member governments for the coordination of purchasing, the use of ships and other procurement activities in the period following the cessation of hostilities—

And I would ask the house to notice that the powers of the administration extend into the post-war period.

> —with a view to integrating the plans and activities of the administration with the total movement of supplies, and for the purpose of achieving an equitable distribution of available supplies. The administration may administer such coordination measures as may be authorized by the member governments concerned.
> (c) To study, formulate and recommend for individual or joint action by any or all of the member governments measures with respect to such related matters, arising out of its experience in planning and performing the work of relief and rehabilitation, as may be proposed by any of the member governments. Such proposals shall be studied and recommendations formulated if the proposals are supported by a vote of the council, and the recommendations shall be referred to any or all of the member governments for individual or joint action if approved by unanimous vote of the central committee and by vote of the council.

Canada is in a favoured position, so far as providing some of the essentials of relief are concerned, and she is anxious and willing to do her share in the relief and rehabilitation of a war-torn world. She is just as anxious and just as willing to do that as she is to find out the causes of wars, and to prevent their recurrence. Perhaps some of those basic causes may be found in the fact that the good things of the world have not been democratically spread around among the various peoples. We may learn a great deal from UNRRA. It is my belief that this should be done democratically. That being so, why do we have to perform our part in UNRRA by order in council? Does the government wish a continuation, in the post-war period, of the powers and controls it now has? Surely it will be realized that the War Measures Act was made necessary by the exigencies of war, when immediate action was essential. I can see, too, that in certain phases of post-war activities there may be necessity for direct orders in council. But surely they should be brought before the House of Commons, and approved. Only those of an urgent nature should be passed, and even then a full explanation should be given—not just a report.

Surely the government does not fear the people in a matter such as that of providing relief and food for other nations. This democratic principle must be maintained, or we are fighting in vain. The dangers of a continuation of order-in-council government are too great to be ignored, and Canadians will not tolerate its continuance into peace time.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I begin by stating that I know of no legislation to come before parliament which represents a more forward step in international relations than does the setting up of the united nations relief and rehabilitation organization to be ratified under the provisions of this measure. For the first time in all history nations are collaborating with a view to removing the causes of suffering and future wars in all parts of the world. For the first time since the beginning of the war; indeed, for the first time in history do we find the Soviet Union joined with other united nations, as well as with nations associated with the united group, in an effort to assure that when the sacrifices of the war are at an end, and when territories are retrieved, or taken back prior to the actual conclusion of hostilities, the responsibilities for the rehabilitation of peoples occupying distressed countries shall rest upon the signatories to this agreement.

As I see it, this measure represents a pattern of principles which might very well lead to the establishment of universal peace, through collaboration and cooperation. It assures post-war rehabilitation. I repeat it is the first time that the united nations and those associated with them have joined in the dedication of their respective nations to the principle that the welfare of all nations is the responsibility of all others.

I feel that we in this parliament have the opportunity and privilege of participating in implementing the arrangements which were made by the forty-four governments concerned, whereby will be established the first step to the parliament of man, the dream of generations of mankind, whereby international plans will be adopted having as their purpose the attainment of universal peace.

As I listened to the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Fauteux), particularly to the eloquent peroration to his speech, my mind went back to 1937 when, as a member of the Vimy pilgrimage, I sat with others in historic Westminster hall in London and there heard the then Prime Minister, Mr. Baldwin, expressing his hope that the future of the world would be one of peace, but with the warning that unless peace could be maintained civilization did not deserve to live and would perish.

It is my belief that this legislation represents the greatest step forward made within the last two years, a period of momentous events, and one which all will hope will culminate in a great world organization. There are, however, some matters in connection with the agreement concerning which I should like to have some information. I believe no one could be better qualified to give that information than the parliamentary assistant to the president of the privy council (Mr. Claxton), who was privileged to participate in the conference from which flowed the agreement now under discussion.

As the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden) has said, Canada has a great interest in the implementing of the united nations relief and rehabilitation administration. It is set out in the preamble of the agreement that the purpose is that of granting "aid and relief from their sufferings, food, clothing and shelter, aid in the prevention of pestilence and in the recovery of the health of the people." In order to assure the type of life these peoples are to have under this agreement, the greatest contribution that can be made will be that of supplying agricultural products. For that reason Canada's interest, in an economic way, is considerable. Under the provisions of the agreement contributions are to be made by the various nations. The United States will make an estimated contribution of from $1,400,000,000 to $1,500,000,000; the United Kingdom one of between $300,000,000 and $400,000,000 and Canada one of between $75,000,000 and $90,000,000, making a total amount of from two to two and a half billions of dollars available, in the main, for the supplying of food and supplies to peoples in liberated territories.

The situation is well set forth in a booklet, "A Greater Canada among the Nations," by Mr. Lionel Gelber, wherein he says:

> When the guns are silenced, the gigantic agricultural resources with which Canada has been blessed will play a decisive part in feeding the hungry multitudes of Europe and Asia. As a matter of fact they should be second in importance only to those of the United States.

I think, Mr. Speaker, we should have the assurance of the government that in so far as Canada's contribution is concerned, the contribution of food products, and not currency, should be one of prime consideration. The set-up is that a committee on supplies, of which a Canadian representative is chairman, will be in charge of distribution and of general policy regarding the provision and transport of supplies. We should have the assurance of the minister that Canada's contribution, apart from her currency contribution, shall be, in the main, agricultural products.

I read on now from the point at which I stopped a moment ago:

> Freedom from want in this sphere has two aspects. There is the short-run aspect of immediate relief and the long-run aspect of elevating the whole level of nutrition all over the earth. That the principle of mutual aid would be extended by Canada to relief, the short-run aspect, was announced on January 27, 1944. It was the other, the long-run aspect, which the representatives of the united nations assembled to discuss at their first general conference in Hot Springs, Virginia, from May 18 to June 3, 1943.

He goes on to point out that a Canadian was made chairman of an interim committee on food and agriculture and says:

> This was an acknowledgment of her leadership—

That is of Canada's leadership.

> —in the domain of food relief and nutrition. This clearly exemplifies the new, dynamic role she is getting ready to discharge in the post-war world.

For that reason I again repeat that Canada should be assured that the contribution that we shall make will be, in the main, one of agricultural products, to the end that our farmers will be assured in the post-war period a security of opportunity in world markets for Canadian agricultural products.

During the past year large amounts have been expended in connection with Mutual Aid. According to the last figures that I have seen, approximately $600 million has been expended for assistance under the Mutual Aid act. I think we should have a statement from the government as to the expenditures that have already been made under Mutual Aid and, in particular, as to the extent to which agricultural production has figured in the distribution that has already been made.

This bill is important as a stepping-stone on the road to peace as an indication of the degree of collaboration that there is between the united and associated nations. I was pleased last night to hear the parliamentary assistant say that in the conference that took place, which resulted in the agreement being signed, where difficulties might very well have arisen as between the great powers and the small powers, a spirit of sincere collaboration characterized the assembled representatives of those nations.

I intend now to refer to some of the sections of the bill with a view to securing information in regard to them. As I read the agreement, in its purport, it sets up a new type of league of nations, designed on a functional basis to assure the rehabilitation of the devastated occupied countries. It sets up a most powerful central committee composed of representatives of China, Russia, the United Kingdom and the United States of America. The dominating authority is the director general. We hear much to-day, Mr. Speaker, of the necessity for the sovereign nations giving up some of their sovereignty, but this is the first time, to my knowledge, that that has actually been done. It indicates something of the advances toward wider collaboration which have been made among the united nations and those associated with them since the outbreak of war. It indicates something of the sacrifices that they intend and are willing to make in the interests of world collaboration.

I read from article IV of the agreement:

> The executive authority of the united nations relief and rehabilitation administration shall be in the director general, who shall be appointed by the council on the nomination by unanimous vote of the central committee. The director general may be removed by the council on recommendation by unanimous vote of the central committee.

Great powers are placed in the hands of this director general. Once he is appointed by unanimous vote of China, the Soviet Union, the United Kingdom and the United States of America, he cannot be removed except upon a unanimous vote of the central committee.

It may be noted that the organization as detailed in the agreement is more elaborate, more complicated, and more extensive than that which set up the League of Nations some twenty-five years ago.

Under paragraph (c) of section 2 of article I the purposes and functions of the administration shall be, among other things:

> (c) To study, formulate and recommend for individual or joint action by any or all of the member governments measures with respect to such related matters, arising out of its experience in planning and performing the work of relief and rehabilitation, as may be proposed by any of the member governments. Such proposals shall be studied and recommendations formulated if the proposals are supported by a vote of the council, and the recommendations shall be referred to any or all of the member governments for individual or joint action if approved by unanimous vote of the central committee and by vote of the council.

This provision gives wide and, if I may say so, ambiguous powers, and I would ask the parliamentary assistant to explain their nature and intent. To what extent do these powers thereby granted interfere with or abrogate the powers of this parliament and of the parliaments or other representative institutions of the other participating countries?

Then I refer to article V, section 1, which provides for contributions. It says, "Each member government will contribute to the support of the administration", and then follow a few words which are inapplicable. "The amount and character of the contributions... will be determined from time to time by its appropriate constitutional bodies." What does that mean? Does that mean that each of these forty-four signatory countries will determine for itself the amount of its contribution, that there will be no control as to the contribution which shall be made by nations, whether in accordance with population, resources or other considerations? That section by itself may have within it the germ of uncertainty and might, unless classified, very well cause dissatisfaction among the participating nations, in that it leaves to each nation the right of determining for itself the amount of its contribution. One can well picture the situation when the war is over and the influence of a common dedication to common ideals is ended; then difficulties and jealousies may arise, when one nation makes as its contribution an amount less than that of another nation with equal or almost equal resources and population.

As to the general principle of this bill, while it grants very large powers to the governor in council, discussion with regard to that phase may well be left until the bill is in committee. Personally I believe that altogether too wide powers are being granted under this bill, and that the exercise of authority should, as soon as the war is over, rest with parliament, not with the governor in council. I can appreciate the fact that during the war, when immediate action is necessary, the governor in council might well have to exercise the powers it has, whether under the War Measures Act or otherwise; but why should those powers be continued after the end of the war is something I find it difficult to understand. I realize that in taking this view one does not earn the popularity of the government. But to-day in this country there is an ever-increasing practice of surrendering on the part of parliament to administrative boards, to the governor in council, to bodies independent of parliament, rights which should be exercised by parliament, and although that tendency may be justifiable in time of war, it certainly cannot be justified in time of peace. As far as this bill is concerned, if I have the opportunity I shall move an amendment providing that the authority of the governor in council shall be applicable only during the period of the war and not beyond the termination of hostilities. In referring to the end of the war I do not mean the signing of the peace treaty, for to-day we all believe that the signing of a peace treaty may be removed four, five or even ten years beyond the end of hostilities, and by the end of the war I mean the actual conclusion of hostilities so far as Canada and the British commonwealth are concerned.

In saying what I have, I do not want it to be understood that I do not support the principle of the bill. Heartily I give my support to the first step which this parliament has made to the realization of the ideal of all the centuries, the achievement of peace, by each nation assuming as its responsibility the welfare of all other nations. It was stated in a recent issue of the magazine Foreign Affairs that this agreement represents the beginning of the international set-up which we shall see in the world after the war, whereby the nations comprising the council under UNRRA may establish in their various spheres of influence their own national police force, collaborating together instead of having an international police force, whereby the peace of the world will be assured.

This bill is one which, if properly administered, will do much toward affording a laboratory wherein the nations of the world will be able to work out a post-war plan for international security and economic welfare. For Canada to have the privilege of participation is a great honour. For Canada there are economic possibilities as well, if the government is prepared, in the administration of this legislation, to assure that our contribution shall be, in the main, one of agricultural production, whereby Canadian farmers, when the war is over, may have a share in the greater international trade which we believe will be established when the principles of the Atlantic charter are implemented.

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, in speaking for a few moments on this matter, I feel I should start where the hon. gentleman who has just spoken concluded. He began his speech by saying that the conference which provoked this bill was perhaps the most momentous conference since the war began, in terms of setting up some measure of permanency in the international organization of the world; and he concluded his speech by saying that if the opportunity was afforded him he would move an amendment to make the provisions of the bill applicable only for the duration of the war.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No, Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted—only in so far as the powers conferred on the governor in council to act independently of parliament.

Mr. GRAYDON: He wanted to get rid of red tape and bureaucracy; that is all.

Mr. MARTIN: Even allowing for the refinement that the hon. gentleman has made, in view of the importance which he attached to the measure he will see how wholly negative the application of the bill would be if it were to be restricted simply to the duration of the war.

Mr. GRAYDON: He did not say that.

Mr. MARTIN: He did commend the bill as a step in the right direction. He took the same view as that taken by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), who said that Canadians above all should be the first to give support to this kind of measure. He added that Canada was heavily endowed with the resources of nature and that our standard of living was sufficient to place us in the first line of those who should give support to this bill. I would say to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, if he were in his place at the moment, that I trust he will repeat that remark instead of making many of the statements he has made throughout the country, sometimes in depreciation of this country's position in terms of its standard of living and in terms of what it affords in the way of opportunity to the masses of our people. I agree with him, of course, that Canada should lead as one of the great supplying nations of the world in regard to a measure of this sort.

It seems to me that the significant thing about the organization set up at UNRRA, to which this bill is related, is that it represents the collective effort of the united nations. At the conclusion of the last war the same kind of relief was provided through what might be called a one-man organization, the organization headed by Mr. Hoover. That was an effective organization, but it was subject to all the dangers of that kind of organization, and particularly subject to undue political influences, which this time, because this represents a collective effort, will not, I trust, apply.

The criticism levelled by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) and by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar in particular, in their two carefully considered statements, was that the bill, and that UNRRA itself, did not go far enough. It was intended merely to apply now to relief and not, as formerly understood, to relief and rehabilitation. What should be remembered is that the bill, as did the conference, deals with a situation which has to be faced at the moment, and while long-term programmes are desirable, the important thing is to deal with situations as they arise. Every hon. member knows the need for food and clothing, the need for health and medical supplies in Europe, and this is something which requires emergency action, and not action based upon the long term, although that, too, will be needed.

But just as the Hoover programme, just as the efforts of Doctor Nansen and others, prior to the setting up of the League of Nations, were gradually integrated so as to become a part of the League of Nations and of collective organizations generally, so it may be presumed, I think, that this work now begun in the emergency stage will become part of the permanent international organization contemplated in the speeches we have had by the leaders of the three great powers and by our own Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King).

The hon. member for Lake Centre, when appraising the event, might have gone a step farther and praised the contribution made by Canada at UNRRA. He was not wholly correct in saying that UNRRA was the first of the patterns for the future organization of the world. He was perhaps correct in giving it a high place. Perhaps we should give the first place, though possibly not in terms of ultimate balance, to the food conference held at Hot Springs, which certainly did assist in setting the pattern. But UNRRA was, as has been said, a significant conference. It was, during the war, an attempt to set up what every thinking man and woman in this country and throughout the world must hope will ultimately be established among the nations, and Canada played a very special part at UNRRA.

I do not believe that this debate should conclude without some reference to the contribution made by Canada. The house will remember that some time ago, in the enunciation of the government's foreign policy, the Prime Minister laid down the principle which has come to be recognized and used as the principle of functionalism in international affairs. That principle was recognized at UNRRA and had much to do with the successful operation of the conference, and it is only significant, it is only fair, I think, to say that the Prime Minister's parliamentary assistant (Mr. Claxton) played a notable part at that conference, as indeed did Mr. Pearson, now our minister-counsellor at Washington, who has come to be recognized as one of the important men at conferences wherever members of the united nations now meet. So that I agree with the hon. member for Prince Albert—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MARTIN: —the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) rather, the hon. gentleman who hopes to be the member for Prince Albert, in his appraisal of the significance of UNRRA. The world is a contracted one; the world is an interdependent one, and having in mind the tremendous sacrifice of treasure and property, as well as of man-power on the part of this country and of all other nations, we must regard this matter as one of the greatest importance. We are now going to build, I trust, successfully an organization among the nations of the world by which we shall again attempt to minimize the occasion of war. Now is the time to begin, and we have begun it in an auspicious way through the conference that has led to our considering this bill. In discussing this measure, therefore, I do so with the thought that Canada has not shirked its responsibility, first of all, toward the starving peoples of Europe and Asia; and more particularly has she played a leading part in the building up of an international organization without which in the long run we cannot hope to avoid the mischief of war.

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to join for a few moments in the favourable comments that have been made concerning UNRRA. I share in the thrill, if I may put it in that way, that has already been expressed, that in the midst of this war definite steps are being taken to meet the problems of the immediate post-war period. I also share in the thrill that something definite is being accomplished by way of getting together a large number of the nations of the world.

One might say that the endeavour to think in these terms goes back even farther than has been suggested by previous speakers. Some hon. gentlemen may think back farther than I do, but just now I am reminded that it was a significent moment when President Roosevelt coined the phrase "united nations" and suggested that we should think in the terms implied in those two words.

What I rose particularly to say is this. I hope that we in this house will realize the long-term significance of what we have done to meet the emergency of the present war, and what we are now doing to meet the emergency of the immediate post-war period. In connection with both of these situations we have recognized the need of joining together in a united effort. That united effort, so far as the war is concerned, has not been confined to military matters; it has gone into the whole field of things economic and is very well expressed in the mutual aid legislation of the United States and of this country. In these acts we have accepted the principle that every country should contribute what it has to meet the need of the moment. That is the principle upon which we have acted in this conflict, and it is playing a very real part in the victory we are sure to win. Similarly we are now carrying that principle into the immediate post-war period. We are conscious of the importance of providing food and other necessities to people who will be in dire need at that time. The whole idea underlying UNRRA is that the countries which have the goods should supply them and that they should be made available where they are needed. It is quite clear that this is the acceptance of the principle of world economic planning, and it is being accepted to meet an emergency in the immediate post-war period. As I see it, it is unwise to stress the word "emergency" too much. I look back to the thirties and feel that that period was just as much a period of emergency as the one through which we are now passing, except that we did not look at it in that way. Similarly I feel that the period after the immediate post-war period is over will likewise be a time of emergency in the sense that there will be with us a pressing problem, namely building up the kind of world we hope will come out of our present sacrifices. I hope that when that time comes we shall not discard the principles we have accepted and found to work so well in the war and in the immediate post-war period. In other words, one of the reasons why I am pleased with the development of UNRRA and am glad to join in the complimentary remarks that have been made is that I feel we are laying down a principle and establishing a foundation upon which we can build in the distant future after the immediate post-war years are over.

When that day comes it seems to me that we must think in terms of planning the world's production in the light of the productive capacities of the various areas and countries of the world and also in the light of the needs of all the people of the world. If we can carry the principle underlying UNRRA into a creative effort of that kind, future generations will look back and perhaps regard the setting up of this administration as even more significant than we realize at the present time. Therefore, without any hesitation I express my support of the general principle underlying UNRRA and consequently the general principle underlying this bill.

Nevertheless, I regret that the last speaker found it so difficult to understand the objections made by the two previous speakers to the continuance into the post-war period of the order-in-council technique. I hardly need to defend the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). He can do it fairly well himself. But as I listened to his remarks I did not understand that he wished this legislation to terminate with the war. As I understood it, he was asking that when the war terminates the measure be altered or that we make provision now so that at that time matters connected with UNRRA will have to come before this parliament for its approval. I share the view in this connection expressed by the hon. member for Lake Centre and by the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden).

I shall mention one or two things contained in the agreement which has been made a schedule to the bill and which I feel should not be left as matters to be dealt with exclusively by order in council. For example article X refers to the possibility of a country withdrawing from UNRRA. I do not feel that that power should be vested solely in the governor in council. We in this parliament, after we pass the bill, as we shall I am sure, are expressing our approval of this general principle, and as I have indicated, the extent to which I hope it will go in the years that lie ahead. On that basis I feel that the power to withdraw from UNRRA should not be a matter left to the governor in council. It is a matter that should be referred to this parliament.

I refer also to article VIII, which deals with amendments that may be made to the agreement. As the bill now stands before us, these amendments can be concurred in on behalf of Canada by our representatives under the direction of the governor in council. When we pass the bill in that form we are for all time, at least so long as the measure remains in force, conferring wide powers. I feel that these two examples, articles VIII and X, are matters which it would be well to reserve to this parliament. As a matter of fact, so far as these two matters are concerned, I see no reason why their control should not be left in the hands of parliament as a whole even now; here there is no necesity of waiting until the war ends.

I shall not take up the time of the house to go into other points in the bill or in the agreement, but I do feel that that point has been well taken. When the war ends I believe that we should give consideration in matters of this kind to the policy of bringing more of these important decisions to parliament instead of leaving them to the governor in council.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. member should consider section 3 of the bill.

Mr. KNOWLES: The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour is referring me to article III. If he wishes me to consider it he is likely to invite me to make some comment about subsection 3 of article III, although perhaps I should not go into that at this time. In view of the importance that Canada as an agricultural nation will play in the whole set-up of UNRRA, I feel that we may have some criticism to make of the policy of confining the central committee to so few nations, namely, the four great powers named in the agreement. If we are to move in the direction of a really united effort in UNRRA with respect to the war and the post-war period, and the future world we are trying to build, I believe we shall have to get over the notion that the four largest powers are going to run things for us. I am in accord with the sentiments expressed by the leader of this group on a number of occasions, namely, that Canada as the largest of the small nations should give a lead in seeking to make a place for these small nations in councils and administrations of this kind. I believe we should help to bring other small nations into the realization that there is a place for them in the councils of the world that we are seeking to establish, not just as inferior powers, but as equals.

At this time I should like to express my support of the functional technique to which reference has already been made to-day. We of this group have no hesitation in endorsing something that is good, no matter the source from which it comes. We believe on that basis we have something good here in that it is not simply a case of waiting until the war is over and then trying to draft something idealistic, but that we are here setting up an administration to deal with a specific matter. In so doing we are taking a definite step in the direction of achieving world peace. It was on that basis that some of us were pleased with the sort of thing the government was trying to do a short time ago in connection with post-war civil aviation. I shall have something to say about that a little later on to-day, if we come to deal with matters under the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe). So it is with other matters, particularly those relating to trade, to the production of foodstuff and the necessities of life—seeing to it that they are made available to the people who need them, planning with respect to our raw materials, and so on. The more we move in that direction, the more shall we remove the occasion for war and make possible the better world which we hope will come after this struggle is over.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I conclude my remarks by repeating that I hope we in this house will realize that the principle of united effort, which is good for the winning of the war, which in UNRRA we recognize to be good for the immediate post-war period, likewise is good for the building of a better world after the immediate post-war period is over.

Mr. BROOKE CLAXTON (Parliamentary Assistant to the President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the bill we have been discussing will authorize the government to carry out the provisions of the agreement entered into by forty-four united nations and associated powers to establish the united nations relief and rehabilitation administration. All the speeches that have been made this afternoon properly emphasized the importance of that agreement; and with the possible exception of the speech of the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe), I think all speakers agreed in principle with the agreement and the legislation. If it would meet the convenience of hon. members, perhaps when we are in the committee stage, I might answer specific questions that have been brought up in regard to details.

I suggest that UNRRA is of special significance as the first effort in the history of forty-four nations to join together to carry out a great human purpose; and as the first organization to be set up to represent the united nations and associated powers it carries our collaboration a further step forward in working together to lay the foundations of peace. The liberation of territories occupied by the enemy must be and will be carried out by the combined actions of the soldiers, sailors and airmen of the united nations in defeating the enemy in the field. The relief of liberated populations is a military necessity, and in the first instance will be carried out by the allied military authorities, who will decide when the time has come for UNRRA to take over the administration of relief.

The work of UNRRA represents the first step in the path from war to peace. It will provide relief for those nations that cannot help themselves. The purpose of UNRRA is to help nations help themselves. UNRRA is designed to fill an urgent, immediate, short-term need. We are planning now to bridge the gap between starvation and survival for tens of millions of people who have been crushed under the heel of the enemy, and to assist in restoring to their homes the twenty million persons in Europe alone who have been displaced by war. The object of UNRRA is to serve humanity, but the result will be in the interests of every country, including Canada. It is in the interests of every country that each should be restored to health and strength at the earliest possible moment. In helping the people of Europe and Asia to establish themselves, we shall be helping to restore conditions in which trade can be carried on as the basis of the prosperity of all nations. The work UNRRA will do will help to restore relations between nations that have been isolated by war. In providing assistance to liberated countries, we shall be assisting ourselves in a very real sense, by providing employment for those in Canada who produce the goods which will largely make up our contribution.

The agreement establishing UNRRA was tabled on January 28, and is printed as an annex to the bill. For the origin of that agreement, however, we must go back to September 24, 1941, when the interallied relief requirements committee was set up in London. The extent of the problem already had impressed the representatives of the allied governments with the necessity for starting to plan to meet it. In the last war relief had been administered under the supreme economic council set up after the armistice. The chairman of the food committee was the Hon. Herbert Hoover, who was also food administrator of the United States. He had direct charge of the administration, and the work of relief was largely carried on by the United States. Its costs were met by gifts from governments and individuals totalling $377,000,000, by purchases totalling $520,000,000, and by loans of $1,423,000,000. In addition, credits were allowed direct to allied governments by the United States.

Difficult as was the programme after the last war, no one can have any doubt but that it will be very much more difficult after this war. Reports from enemy occupied countries show that the actual conditions of destruction, starvation and undernourishment exceed our worst imagination; and as the war goes on, those conditions will get worse. Their full extent will depend upon how quickly we can beat the enemy, how bitterly the enemy carries on his resistance, and to what extent he pursues a scorched earth policy as he is fought back.

The interallied relief requirements committee made a final report on June 30, 1943, in which it estimated that 23,000,000 tons of food would be required to be imported into Europe in the first six months after the armistice, and that excludes the requirements of the Soviet Union. Of this some 14,000,000 tons would have to be brought from overseas. Reliable reports indicate that some 20,000,000 persons who have been displaced from their homes must be restored to them, and that is one of the tasks with which UNRRA is charged. That is the situation in Europe alone, and the task of UNRRA is to deal with countries liberated from the enemy, wherever they are.

This cannot be the job of any one nation, but must be the task of all nations who wish to serve humanity.

To bring about common action an agreement was drafted, and the draft was circulated by the United States government in its note of June 9 last. That note was printed in the Votes and Proceedings of this house of June 18, 1943. Representations were made to the government of the United States by various governments, with the result that the agreement was substantially changed in some particulars. It was signed by forty-four nations at the White House on November 9. At the signing President Roosevelt said:

> The people of these forty-four nations include approximately eighty per cent of the human race, now united by a common devotion to the cause of civilization and by a common determination to build for the future a world of decency and security and above all peace.

In a sense UNRRA constitutes an international community chest for a purpose which is urgent and limited. Once the agreement was signed, no time was lost in organizing the administration. The first meeting of the council was held at Atlantic City the day following the signing, when all forty-four nations were represented. During the next three weeks, from November 10 to December 1, the work of laying down lines of policy and organizing the administration was pressed forward in a spirit of cooperation reflecting the common desire of the participating nations to meet a great human need.

The result was that forty-one resolutions were unanimously adopted, laying down lines of policy and setting up the administration. Many of these resolutions make recommendations to the member governments. The purpose of the bill is to authorize the government to carry out such of the recommendations as are appropriate, and otherwise to implement the agreement and any resolutions of the council or committees of UNRRA. The moneys to be spent on UNRRA remain completely under the control of parliament, and this bill applies only for an appropriation of $10,000,000 out of the war appropriation mutual aid bill for 1943.

No small part of the success of this meeting was due to the able chairmanship of the Hon. Dean Acheson, Assistant Under-Secretary of State of the United States. In his closing speech he said:

> We have reached agreement upon a practicable programme, of defined scope, fully possible of achievement in action. A general purpose has been translated into a definite plan.
> We have formulated for submission to the lawmaking bodies in our countries a workable plan for financing our programme—a plan, the fairness and practicability of which we believe will commend it to those in authority.
> We have devised a procedure for ascertaining and meeting needs, which fits into the existing procedures for supplying the materials needed in the prosecution of the war and which assures fairness and expedition in the supply of liberated areas.
> Finally, we have chosen the men to lead us in the continuing cooperation without which this work cannot succeed, and we have provided for an international organization to administer the policies laid down.

The first meeting of the council of UNRRA showed that forty-four nations could look at the problem of relief, not only as a European problem but as a world problem affecting every nation whether occupied or not. The results of the council showed that the united nations and associated powers could work together effectively without domination by the great powers and without obstruction by the small. It also showed that Canada had a definite contribution to make not only as one of the principal supplying nations in the world but also in the work of international organization. She received recognition by being made chairman of the very important committee on supplies and also a member of the regional committee for Europe.

As one of the members of the Canadian delegation, and as a member of the house I should like to pay a special tribute to a class of people we are often apt to forget in our discussions. I have in mind particularly the leader of the delegation, Mr. L. B. Pearson, who has a standing throughout the world today which would be hard to match in any country. As one moves around, and meets the representatives of all the nations, he finds that Canada has a reputation and a standing hard to equal. In no small measure that is due to the character and the capacity of the men in our Department of External Affairs—and in this connection I should like particularly to mention Mr. L. B. Pearson.

Since the Atlantic City meeting the executive has been organized under Governor Lehman, the director-general. It has its headquarters in Washington, but a considerable organization is already established in London under the deputy director general for Europe, Sir Frederick Leith Ross. A Canadian, Mr. Van Gelder, is deputy director general in charge of administration at Washington, and other Canadians are serving on the staff there.

It has already been announced that the second meeting of the council will be held at Montreal on the 23rd of June, and the Prime Minister expressed the feeling of all Canadians when he extended a most warm welcome to the administration.

UNRRA is a partnership of the nations which stands for civilization to help all humanity. President Roosevelt said, "Nations will learn to work together only by actually working together."

Canada is a fortunate country. Our cities and ports and fields have not been bombed and scorched. Our people have not been tortured, starved, enslaved and shot. Canada is one of the most fortunate countries on the face of the earth with greater resources for her population than any other. Providence has been generous to Canada, and our position gives us opportunities and gives us responsibilities to match our opportunities.

The hope may be expressed that the house will be unanimous in the acceptance of this bill and show that all Canada is united in willingness to do our share in helping humanity.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Power to carry out agreement.

Mr. COLDWELL: I would ask the parliamentary assistant what steps had been taken to ensure that there will be adequate supplies. The united nations food conference had a great deal to say about that last summer. Have any plans been worked out to ensure that we have all supplies required for this particular purpose? I have in mind, of course, that at the conference there was some discussion as to the necessity for some of the more favoured nations, including ourselves and the United States, continuing rationing for a time in order to ensure that food supplies would be available for the nations to which we shall make these contributions when the war is over.

The stocks of wheat are going down, and the supplies of animal products are becoming shorter all the time. Has there been some discussion between these two groups with respect to providing adequate supplies to meet the requirements of this objective?

Mr. CLAXTON: The UNRRA agreement provides that the director general, in assessing supplies requirements, shall consult with intergovernmental authorities. In this instance those intergovernmental authorities are the combined food board, the combined production and natural resources board, and the shipping board. As hon. members are aware, on those boards are representatives of the United Kingdom and the United States, with Canada as the only other member of the combined food board and the combined production and resources board. Those boards are charged with the duty of allocating supplies of commodities in short supply. UNRRA will be a claimant on the boards for supplies. In this way the whole global picture involving supplies to the military authorities and to civilian countries will be surveyed in one place, by one set of authorities. Those authorities have not any final say, but they make recommendations which are usually effective.

Already there have gone forward from UNRRA and from the military authorities requirements for the supplying of relief; and the administration is discussing with the combined boards the sources of supplies which will be approached. I believe the hon. member for Lake Centre, who referred to the use of agricultural products, need have no further assurance, because the fact stands out that for some time after the end of the war there will be a shortage of foodstuffs throughout the world. Our farmers can grow everything they have any capacity to grow, in confidence they will find a ready market for their products.

Mr. COLDWELL: I had this in mind: is it not the duty of the government or, if you like, the house, to see to it that our people are kept aware of the fact that we shall require large quantities of food, not only now but after the war, and particularly quantities of protective foods such as meats, dairy products and the like?

Mr. CLAXTON: I think there is something in what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has said. However, we do not know yet how short supplies will be, nor have we had yet any demand from UNRRA, or any indication as to the kind of supplies she will need from us. We may assume that the largest in quantity will be wheat, and after that various kinds of foods, and even protective foods of which we may have a surplus at that time.

Mr. COLDWELL: Are there not two points of view regarding that? Cereals are grown more rapidly than live stock, and it is thought by some that we might be called upon to provide protective foods while Europe is growing cereals and preparing to rebuild her live stock. Are there not two points of view on that?

Mr. STIRLING: There is only one point of view, Mr. Chairman, namely, that it is six o'clock.

Mr. COLDWELL: I had overlooked that.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MacNICOL: Before asking one or two questions with reference to the bill, I wish to endorse what has been said by some other members, that it is to be hoped that the power to issue orders in council will not be used when parliament is in session.

Referring to the schedule. In article I, section 1, it is stated:

> The administration shall have power to acquire, hold and convey property. . . .

Will the parliamentary assistant explain what circumstances are likely to occur wherein property would have to be bought, and if such property would be bought in Canada; or does the section refer only to property to be acquired in the occupied countries; what would be the nature of the property, and for what would it be used?

In the same article, section 2, paragraph (a), it is stated that the purposes and functions of the administration shall be—

> To plan, coordinate, administer or arrange for the administration of measures for the relief of victims of war in any area under the control of any of the united nations through the provision of food, fuel, clothing, shelter and other basic necessities, medical and other essential services. . . .

First, would Malta be deemed an area eligible to receive assistance under this programme? If any part of the British empire outside the British isles themselves deserves assistance, I would think it would be Malta, which has given an example to the world of endurance of a blitzkrieg the like of which no other area outside London has suffered. I should like to know particularly as to the position of Malta in this connection. Last Saturday was Malta tag day in Toronto and I saw many people "chipping in" for Malta. I do not know whether in any other part of Canada a tag day is being held for Malta, but I hope the government will do something in a special way for this brave little island, which has given an example of heroism that has thoroughly entitled it to the George Cross, the first award of its kind, I believe, which has been made.

Also, would that portion of Egypt which suffered during the advance of the German army be eligible for assistance under the provisions of this bill?

In paragraph (b) of the same section reference is made to purchasing. What would likely be included in "purchasing"? This afternoon the hon. member for Lake Centre referred particularly, I believe, to food products, which come, of course, under paragraph (a). I am not sure whether he mentioned anything about machinery; I believe that someone did. The streets of these devastated areas will have to be cleared out; roadways will be needed for the transportation of food and supplies, and trucks will be required for distribution; also a certain amount of road machinery and, perhaps, building machinery and related equipment will be needed. Would all that material as well as food be purchased by the committee set up under this bill, or is food the only thing to be purchased?

Paragraph (c) of section 2 also relates to what I have asked. The distribution of supplies will require trucks and perhaps other transportation equipment. Will transportation equipment be purchasable under the terms of this bill? If so, I assume that Canada through its representatives will get its fair share of orders; we could not expect any more, and perhaps should not expect any less.

I wonder whether, in surveying the whole job which will have to be done after the war, the council might say to Canada, "We will turn over to you the responsibility for Malta or the "blitzed" part of Egypt; France may be the responsibility of the United States, and Germany the responsibility of some other country." Is it possible that the work to be done will be divided in some such fashion among the different countries, so that each country will have an opportunity of doing a real job by itself, of course under the direction of the central committee?

Then, in article III, section 1, it is stated that "each member government will name one representative, and such alternates as may be necessary, upon the council"; that is, each of the member countries is to have one member of the council "and such alternates". Will each country name just one alternate; if more than one, upon what basis will alternates be named? Population, or ability to assist, or on what basis?

Section 2 of article III states:

> The council shall be convened in regular session not less than twice a year by the central committee.

As I understand it, Canada will not have a representative on the central committee, since it consists of the four major members of the allied set-up, namely China, the Soviet Union, the United Kingdom and the United States. Apparently this means that the Canadian representative would be called only twice a year. How would he exercise his influence in the general work of the council if he is called upon only twice a year to attend?

Section 3 of article III gives the composition of the central committee, namely representatives of the four major nations and the director general, but the director general is not to vote. What will happen in case of a tie on any question or any number of questions?

Section 6 of article III makes reference to technical committees. They would be, I take it, engineering committees, consisting of men capable of laying out and building railroads; railroad engineers, men who design and lay out tracks; also, perhaps, electricians. Would each of the member nations have the privilege of supplying engineers in these various technical branches to assist in rebuilding? Perhaps those are all the questions I have to ask.

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. member for Davenport asked first a question with regard to article I of the agreement.

Mr. MacNICOL: Article II, subsection 1.

Mr. CLAXTON: I believe it was article I, subsection 1, in connection with which he referred to the administration having the power to acquire property, and he inquired as to what property that might refer to. I think it should be understood that the agreement generally creates UNRRA as a kind of international corporation or partnership, and it is intended that with the proceeds and contributions made by the member governments, as the act of their constitutional authorities, the administration will then buy where it can best buy the supplies that are needed. I should interpolate that it is provided in the financial resolutions that member governments will be asked to contribute not less than ten per cent of their contribution in free exchange—money that can be spent outside their respective countries, but that the rest of their contribution can be given in the equivalent of their cash contribution in goods produced in their own country. Once that is done, however, whether the goods be contributed as equivalent of cash or whether they be purchased by the administration, they will become the property of the administration and will be handled by the administration, so that all the relief supplies acquired by UNRRA would belong to the administration and be distributed by the administration in accordance with policies laid down by the council. That is the reason for that provision in the agreement.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would it refer to the purchasing of land or buildings?

Mr. CLAXTON: There is no intention of purchasing land anywhere. However, in an occupied country, the administration might have to acquire shelters for displaced persons, storehouses or something of that kind, but there is no intention of purchasing anything of a permanent nature. The intention is to give relief, and provide measures for rehabilitation that will assist in giving relief.

The second question asked by the hon. member for Davenport was whether or not Malta would receive assistance under the agreement, and he referred there to article I, section 2, paragraph (a) of the agreement. Malta does not appear to me to qualify under the agreement, because, thank Providence and the fortitude of the people who defended Malta, it has never been occupied by the enemy and therefore will never be territory liberated from the enemy, whereas the agreement provides only for relief for territories so liberated. There is, however, another reason why Malta would not qualify for relief, and possibly this also applies to the case of Egypt, which the hon. member also mentioned. Under financial resolution No. 14 adopted by the council it is provided in section 16:

> It shall be the policy of the administration not to deplete its available resources for the relief and rehabilitation of any area whose government is in a position to pay with suitable means of foreign exchange.

The British government is the government which controls Malta, and the British government not only is in a position to pay but also is a very large contributor to the resources of UNRRA. So that on those two counts Malta would not qualify, and on the second count Egypt would not, though perhaps the case of Egypt may be less certain in view of the special position with regard to Great Britain. In any event, however, I should think Egypt would be regarded as a country which was able to pay.

The next question was with regard to paragraph (b) of section 2 of article I, and in that connection the hon. member asked what would UNRRA be purchasing. I think I have already answered that question. Ultimately all supplies made available for relief will be purchased by UNRRA, so that it will purchase everything it supplies, although in the great proportion of cases it will receive supplies in kind in the equivalent of cash that is contributed.

Mr. MacNICOL: And food?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes. As regards the articles that will be furnished by way of relief, that is covered partly by article I of the agreement, section 2, paragraph (a); and also by resolution No. 1 which was read this afternoon by the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Fauteux) and which perhaps I need not put on the record again. If I may read the headings, they cover (1) relief supplies; essential consumer goods, to meet immediate needs, such as food, fuel, clothing, shelter, medical supplies; (2) relief services, such as health and welfare, et cetera; (3) rehabilitation supplies and services; materials (such as seeds, fertilizers, raw materials, fishing equipment, machinery and spare parts) needed to enable a recipient country to produce and transport relief supplies for its own and other liberated areas, and such technical services as may be necessary for this purpose; (4) rehabilitation of public utilities and services, so far as they can be repaired or restored to meet immediate needs such as light, water, sanitation, power, transport, temporary storage, communications, and assistance in procuring material and equipment for rehabilitation and educational institutions.

The next question was whether or not it would be possible for the responsibility attached to the giving of relief to be handed over to the different countries in a position to give that relief. In view of the further explanation I have given of the nature of the administration it will be seen that this would not be a convenient way of doing it, because these supplies will have to be put in ships, transported abroad and put down at the place where they have to be used, and it would not be possible conveniently to earmark supplies, say, from Australia, going to Belgium or any other country. The matter will be handled entirely by the administration in the best way it can without regard to the source of origin of the supplies.

The next question was with reference to article III, section 1, of the agreement, and that is as regards the position of alternates on the council. Section 1 reads:

> Each member government shall name one representative, and such alternates as may be necessary, upon the council of the united nations relief and rehabilitation administration, which shall be the policy-making body of the administration.

On that council each nation has only one vote, and if a nation is not represented by its delegate or member his place can be taken by an alternate. At Atlantic City there were set up no less than four committees and sixteen subcommittees, and on each one of these subcommittees every nation had the right to be represented. Obviously one person could not attend all meetings, so that he named an alternate from his delegation to vote for his country in his place at that meeting.

The next question was with regard to article III, subsection 2, in which it is said:

> The council shall be convened in regular session not less than twice a year by the central committee.

The council is the policy-making body. It meets twice a year in order to receive reports from the executive and to decide further questions of policy. It is then the duty of the executive head, that is the director general, to carry out these policies; therefore it is thought that there is no need for the council to meet oftener than twice a year. I think that provision has been borne out so far by the experience. There will be an accumulation of policy questions to come before the council at its next meeting in Montreal, but they will be dealt with in good time. A number of questions relating to supplies will have already been dealt with by the supplies committee. A number of questions have been dealt with by the regional committee for Europe. The central committee has power to make policy-making decisions in between meetings of the council. Therefore ample machinery is set up to deal with matters in an effective way and yet preserve the powers of the representative organs over policy. It would be interesting for the committee to learn that three meetings of the central committee have been held so far and seven meetings of the supplies committee.

The next question had to do with section 3 of article III and was as follows: "If the director general has not a vote, what will happen when the central committee splits two to two?" I have never been present at such a meeting; but when there are representatives of China, the United Kingdom, the United States and the Soviet Union present I should think they would not decide anything if they could decide it only on a vote of two to two. They will have at least a vote of three to one before they arrive at a decision. I should think that in a small committee such as the central committee, having to deal with matters of high policy, they would have to have three to one or else they would not act.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is possible to have a vote of two to two.

Mr. CLAXTON: It is quite possible. There is no way of resolving that that I know of.

Finally the hon. member for Davenport asked a question with regard to the technical committees for which provision is made in section 6 of article III of the agreement. Those technical committees were provided for in resolution No. 26 adopted by the council and the committees are committees on agriculture, displaced persons, health, industrial rehabilitation and welfare. It is provided:

> That such committees shall consist of such members of the council as indicate to the director general their intention to participate in the work of a committee or committees, or of alternates nominated by such members of the council as shall elect to do so, such alternates to possess special competence in the problems relating to the work of the committee to which they are nominated.

That, I think, answers the question.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask one more? I had this question in my mind but I had forgotten the wording of it. Something was said this afternoon about the rehabilitation of industry in the various overrun countries. To rehabilitate an industrial plant would require the purchase of a large number of lines of machinery. Would that machinery be supplied under this legislation, and if so, how would the purchases be made? It would likely have to be purchased outside Europe with the exception of Sweden, Great Britain or Northern Ireland. It could be purchased there or in the United States or Canada.

Mr. CLAXTON: The rehabilitation of industries is dealt with by resolution No. 12 of the council. It is a very long resolution and perhaps I should not take up the time of the committee to read it. However, I shall say this: UNRRA does not undertake the job of reconstruction. It is established to do the immediate job of relief and rehabilitation in so far as that rehabilitation will enable the countries to help themselves to provide their own relief. When we come to purchases of machinery I can see that it would be very wise for the administration to assist in the repair of milling machinery in ports which will be bombed, so that instead of having to bring flour in sacks we can bring wheat in bulk and thereby bring about a very great saving. In those circumstances the administration would no doubt plan the repair of milling machinery; but when we get to the actual handling of that operation it must be remembered that UNRRA does not intend to take the place of any administration in any territory. Ordinarily it will deal through the government in that territory. We may assume that UNRRA will come into operation only after civil order has been restored, after which the military authorities would turn over the administration of relief to UNRRA. Therefore the taking over by UNRRA of the job of giving relief almost assumes that there will be a civil government in effective power there. That being so, UNRRA will deal with the civil government almost exclusively. It does not intend to set up a new civil service or bureaucracy or even distribution agencies everywhere throughout Europe and the far east. It will do only whatever is necessary in the existing circumstances, and as far as possible it will use the existing governmental and other agencies.

Mr. STIRLING: That leads me to a question I have wanted to ask. Can the parliamentary assistant outline the details of what he sees with regard to the future at the receiving end? I presume that when an occupied country has been relieved from the thraldom of the enemy that country's government in exile will return and take charge and, as the hon. member has just said, it will be the authority to deal with the receiving end and the distribution. I wonder whether a considerable time will not elapse before UNRRA can do any distributing? I do not know whether UNRRA is in touch with governments in exile at the present time, but even those governments when they return to their own countries will surely take a considerable time to look around. However, estimating even roughly what the requirements will be for the restoration of the people both materially and spiritually, what does the parliamentary assistant expect UNRRA to do in that regard?

Mr. CLAXTON: The situation as I understand it is this: The interallied war relief requirements committee was set up in London in September, 1941, as I described this afternoon. That committee included representatives of, I think, eight of the occupied countries. They were in close touch with conditions in their own country, and over a period of two years they worked out estimates of the requirements of their countries as they saw them. Those estimates were carefully considered by the committee and embodied in the report of the interallied relief requirements committee, which was dated June 30, 1943. That report is no doubt being used by the regional committee for Europe and by the UNRRA administration at Washington in working out estimates of relief requirements.

We have a good deal of material to go on by reason of the experience in North Africa, Sicily and Italy. All that has been carefully watched. There is close cooperation between UNRRA officials and the combined civil affairs committee of the combined chiefs of staff. They work out the over-all requirements for Europe on the assumption that she is liberated as of a certain date. These requirements are submitted to the combined boards in order to ascertain whether and where the supplies are available. Now, all those estimates may be wrong. They may be made wrong by the enemy suddenly stopping, or they may be made wrong by the enemy bitterly resisting and pursuing a scorched-earth policy. They may vary, depending upon the time of year when a country is liberated, whether or not the harvest is in. But still they are the best estimates that can be worked out at the present time. On the basis of those estimates, constantly revised in the light of changed conditions, UNRRA is setting about procuring the supplies that will be necessary.

Mr. STIRLING: Do these planned operations cover that part of Russia, for instance, which has been liberated? Do they cover those countries in eastern Europe which we hope will be released shortly, through the operations being carried on by Russia? When that occurs, will UNRRA get busy in regard to those countries?

Mr. CLAXTON: I am not familiar with the exact situation in regard to relief in connection with the liberated territory of the Soviet Union. I do not know whether Russia has put forward any requests; I do not believe she has, to this date; but when they are put forward and when the nations are in a position to supply relief, it will be made available to Russia either in accordance with the policies laid down in the resolution or in accordance with such other policies as the council may adopt.

Mr. REID: I should like to ask the hon. gentleman one or two questions, and perhaps while I am on my feet I can put them all together, so that they may be answered in the same way. The first question has to do with the amount of money that is to be spent. Has any decision been arrived at or any estimate made as to the amount of money likely to be required from all countries, and in particular from this country? If a total sum has been arrived at, will a bill be introduced later this session in which that amount will be set out? Otherwise it would seem to me that if an emergency should arise at any time in the future we might not be in a position to meet it, because, as I read this bill, only some $10,000,000 can be used for this purpose.

That was one of the questions I had in mind, but I rose particularly to ask another question. Several committees will be set up under this administration. In the first place we have the council consisting of representatives of all countries signatories to the agreement, of which council Canada is a member. Then there is the central committee, which is to consist of representatives of China, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom and the United States of America, with the director general presiding without vote. It is true that the council must meet at least twice a year, but I would judge that the central committee is a very important body indeed, in that it can formulate emergency policies which, of course, later on must be referred to the entire council. The thought I have in mind is this. Where does Canada come in? Why is Canada not represented on the central committee? After all, we are beginning to take our place in world affairs, and in my opinion the more we know about Europe the better. I cannot understand why Canada should not have a representative on that central committee. If the minister would answer those two questions I think it would be of some help.

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. member referred to the amount Canada might contribute toward the total requirements of UNRRA. The amount provided by the present bill is $10,000,000, but order No. 7 on the order paper of to-day is a resolution preceding a measure to provide for sums of money not to exceed $800,000,000 in connection with Mutual Aid, and it will be seen that in addition to Mutual Aid that money may be used, if the resolution passes, for the purpose of fulfilling any obligations arising out of the united nations relief and rehabilitation agreement. So that part of the money will be made available by this bill, if it passes, and part by the Mutual Aid bill, if it passes. As for the total requirements of UNRRA, it is estimated that the one per cent of the national income which the nations are recommended to contribute if they are in a position to do so will bring in a total of between two and two and a half billion dollars. That is the best estimate anyone has been able to arrive at. Already the United States has passed a resolution approving an appropriation of $1,350,000,000, and the United Kingdom has passed a resolution approving an appropriation of £80,000,000, so that they are well on the way already.

With regard to the question of Canada being a member of the central committee I can only say that the agreement was signed at Washington by the forty-four nations, and Canada did not become a member of the central committee but was made chairman of the committee on supplies. Under the agreement the chairman of the committee on supplies has a right to sit in with the central committee when supply questions are being considered. I cannot conceive of the central committee having many meetings without considering questions of supply, so that while it is not quite the same as being a member of the central committee, Canada, by reason of the fact that she is chairman of the committee on supplies, does occupy a rather special place.

Mr. STIRLING: She is also a member of the regional committee for Europe.

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes; that is quite right. While I am on my feet may I correct one statement I made last evening, when the hon. member for Lake Centre asked whether or not UNRRA was recruiting a staff for service abroad. I have checked up that point and I find that UNRRA has just begun recruiting a limited number of people for service abroad. They are to commence a course in the United States on May 1, and are, I understand, limited to welfare and social workers and others of that class. They are to come to UNRRA on the recommendation of such voluntary agencies as the Red Cross, and their salaries are to be paid by those agencies, while expenses of travel and maintenance will be paid by UNRRA. The position in regard to Canadians serving there is that as a result of the rather exceptional status of our voluntary agencies, most of which are in receipt of government aid, an arrangement has not been quite worked out as yet. I would suggest, however, that if any Canadians wish to serve abroad in that capacity, they should forward their applications now to the Department of National War Services, which can pass them on. In connection with administrative personnel, applications should be made to UNRRA headquarters at Washington, as I indicated last night.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was going to ask the parliamentary assistant, who was present at the conference, what consideration was given by the conference to the recommendations contained in the report of the interallied post-war requirements committee. He will probably remember that in its report this committee submitted a number of questions, six in all, which I have before me and which were sent to the various allied governments. The report to which I refer was presented last June; but it was not until last November, when the meeting to establish UNRRA was held, that this report was made available to the public. I should like to place the questions on record, because they have a vital bearing on what we are discussing, and since we are approving the UNRRA agreement attached to the bill I think we ought to understand what should be done, what is being done and what is our responsibility in the matter.

The first question was:

i. What arrangements are proposed for the procurement and distribution of supplies to meet requirements?

There we have a very important question, particularly in view of the dire need which exists in many countries. The other questions are:

ii. What arrangements are proposed in regard to the allocation of shipping?

iii. On what principles are supplies and shipping to be financed?

iv. What arrangements are contemplated for restoring and controlling the inland transport system of Europe?

v. On what basis are arrangements for field missions and essential services to be organized?

vi. Is the need for restoring employment recognized as an essential part of any relief programme?

It has appeared to me, while listening to the discussion to-day, and also after reading the agreement which has been signed—and this is what I had in mind this afternoon when I was speaking about the need for widening the scope of this agreement—that very little attention has been given to some matters arising from the questions, which seemed to worry the interallied war relief requirements committee, when it reported to the allied governments in June of last year. Its report went on to say:

The allied governments may consider that these questions can best be settled by the united nations relief and rehabilitation administration, if and when it has been set up—

And it has now been set up.

—but the committee feels bound to stress the importance of clearing up these issues as soon as possible, so that definite plans may be prepared by the appropriate authorities.

It seems to me that the defect in the agreement is that we do not know how these plans are to be formulated. The director general has certain responsibilities, as outlined in the document attached to this bill. But how those duties are to be carried out ought to be, I think, a matter of close scrutiny by the nations that are parties to the agreement.

As a matter of fact, so far as production goes I would say that no arrangements which can be made for the acquisition of stock and the piling up of supplies can meet this situation in the years to come. I do not think we shall be faced with the problem for two or three years. It is my view that the rehabilitation of these devastated and scorched-earth areas will require a very considerable time, and the rehabilitation of other backward countries, in the economic sense, will require a very much longer time.

So far as I know, all we have in the report of the meeting attended last November by the parliamentary assistant is a reference in section 4 of resolution 22. I believe he has the resolution before him tonight. One of the functions of the committee on supplies is there set out as follows:

To cooperate with the director general and the established intergovernmental and governmental agencies in efforts to increase production and the availability of supplies.

As I have indicated, some anxiety was shown on that score in the inter-allied post-war requirements committee. They were not satisfied, unless because of the possibility of world shortage some real effort were made, and unless nations like Canada, where we have had ample supplies during the war, and where we have been short of very little in the way of basic foods, would consent not only to a continuation of rationing of the protective foods, but perhaps even to an extension of rationing to some of the other foods which have not been rationed during the war. That is not necessarily my view, but I may say I believe it is probably the correct one. I am, however, simply quoting the opinion of the interallied post-war requirements committee, as indicated in its report. That was its view, and so far I have been unable to find that anywhere provision has been made for the kind of world-wide planning of the necessary production which the committee considered essential to meet the tremendous requirements of the post-war period.

We know to-day that there are many millions of people in Europe, to say nothing of the countless millions in China and in the far east, who are starving. In our own country we have watched our supplies of certain commodities, of which we had very large quantites two years ago, diminishing to the point where it is altogether likely that by the end of this crop year a very large percentage of that great surplus of cereals which we had on hand will have entirely disappeared, either because those supplies are required for bread foods, or because they are required for the feeding of live stock.

In Europe we know that food supplies have been wiped out, and probably for some time we shall have to replace the rye bread of eastern Europe with wheat from one or another of the wheat-producing countries. Yet, as I would judge from the discussion I have heard to-day, there seems to be no plan of a world-wide sort for the building up of the required stocks of food and other supplies to meet the situation.

Before the dinner recess I was asking the parliamentary assistant about what was expected of Canada, both as a cereal-producing country and as a source of protective foods. My understanding is that while cereals can be grown more rapidly on land in Europe that has been liberated and is in process of rehabilitation, the building up of European stocks of hogs and cattle will require a very long time. While our main obligation probably is still the thing which we can do best, namely the production of cereals, yet I do not think we should allow the idea to get abroad that we should in any way reduce our output of protective foods which requires also the conservation of feed grains.

Our lack of policy illustrates what I had in mind, namely, that there seems to be no method of achieving a plan to guide the producing nations. The united nations co-operate and set up some authority to recommend and advise—I know those words are used in the document but that is all. It seems to me that is not enough. You can recommend and you can advise—but there is no one authority which can direct. I do not know how that can be achieved under the form or organization suggested. It is my view that a great deal of consideration ought to be given to the problem. We know that the executive committee of UNRRA, if we may so describe it, consists of representatives of the major powers. But I share the view of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), that while perhaps we cannot expect to be on all the committees, yet Canada, as a producer of large quantities of the very things the world will need, ought to make her voice heard in a constructive manner. Otherwise when the war is over we may find that the world is short of the very essentials required to carry out the agreement which we are about to enter into, and which we are approving to-night.

As I said before, there seems to be no authority but to advise and recommend. Nowhere is there any authority—and I do not like the word "enforce", but in this instance I shall use it—nowhere is there any authority to enforce decisions regarding the planning of production. May I repeat that I do not like the word "enforce" but for lack of a better one I use it. I should like to know what consideration was given to the points I have raised when the agreement was reached by the signatory nations.

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. member has said that there is no authority to enforce the recommendations or decisions. In that he is quite right. It was not the plan of the united nations and the associated powers in signing this agreement to set up a world authority. I do not suppose they would have agreed to the signing of the agreement, had that been required of them. On the other hand there is ample and, I think, effective machinery provided, not only by the agreement but by the resolutions, for the assessment of requirements and to secure the allocation of supplies from the combined boards and for the purchase of supplies in so far as they are available. I refer to resolution No. 1, which sets out the procedure for dealing with requirements; resolution No. 17, which sets out the procedure dealing with supplies; resolution No. 2, which deals with the duties of the committee on supplies. Others will also be found indicating that there is ample machinery for the use of the administration.

With regard to the suggestion that Canada should have been a member of the central committee and play a rather large part in these affairs, I subscribe to the view, as hon.

members may recall, that Canada has had a great opportunity. She has not failed to make use of her opportunity in UNRRA. She has a place there which is second only to the great powers. I ask hon. members to consider the fact that Canada is chairman of the committee on supplies; Canada is chairman of the interim food commission; Canada is a member of the regional committee for Europe; Canada is a member of the combined food board and is a member of the combined production and resources board. We can apply the functional principle too far. We cannot be on every board that there is in the world. Hon. members will, I hope, see that Canada has not only fair representation but also great opportunities, and her place is recognized by the nations.

In answer to the question with regard to protective foods, it is important to recall that cereals are the easiest means of providing energy, preventing starvation, and providing relief in the shortest possible time. We have had a good deal of experience in this through the provision of relief to Greece. Many Canadians do not realize that since August, 1942, we have been providing 15,000 tons of cereals a month to Greece. At Atlantic City I met the representative of the Swedish Red Cross who had charge of the administration of relief in Greece, and he told me, if I remember the figures correctly, that the wheat we provided enabled Greece to increase their food ration by 400 calories a day to over three million of the population and that it represented the difference between starvation and survival for half the population of Greece. Since that supply of wheat has been made available through Canada, other nations have made available other foods. The prime necessity for that kind of food having been filled by Canada, other nations are making available to Greece protective and other foods, while Canada herself is also making available some protective foods to Greece to-day. We have had that experience. We have found that the easiest way to provide relief is with cereals. But that, of course, does not eliminate other foods. I can assure my hon. friend that in the schedules of requirements that I have seen, the kind of consideration that he has mentioned has been kept in mind by some of the best qualified food experts and transportation experts in the world who are engaged in this work.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Is the Red Cross handling that work in Greece?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes. It is done by Swedish and Swiss representatives for the International Red Cross and done, I am told, with very great efficiency. I am informed that all the wheat we send reaches the people for whom it is intended.

Mr. SLAGHT: One of the points on which I had intended to ask the parliamentary assistant for information was the one just raised by my hon. friend, as to whether or not the Red Cross with all its traditions, training and efficiency will be used as an agency in working out the details of the agreements under UNRRA. I do not find that in the agreement itself; I fancy it is a matter of administration.

It does seem to me—perhaps I should have said this on the second reading—that this bill is the most important piece of legislation which the Parliament of Canada has had to consider since we met in September, 1939, and declared war on Germany and that we would stand by the side of the mother country in this struggle. It is a piece of legislation of which any country which professes Christianity and a belief in the doctrines of the Sermon on the Mount may well be proud, because it is a declaration of those great principles carried into realistic effect for the purpose of clothing the naked and feeding the hungry. There is nothing but the greatest humanity behind the whole principle of this bill.

I endorse the view of my hon. friend the member for Rosetown-Biggar that this will not end in a year or two. I believe that we as one of the "have" countries are embarking upon an international programme which we shall be proud to carry on for many years to come for the benefit of the less fortunate "have not" countries. In that connection the committee may be interested in knowing something of the terrific and deliberate devastation that our gangster enemies are carrying out in European countries. I do not propose to give the committee any harrowing details. But in the early part of March last, our allies the Russians, in defeating certain of the German army corps, came upon and took over a series of documents issued by the German high command which were startling in their disclosures of a deliberate policy of inhumanity by the German high command. I have in my hand a copy of the English edition of the Moscow News of Wesdnesday, March 15, 1944. It is published in Moscow, and I should like to read a very few extracts which will demonstrate the extent of the devastation wrought by Germany in European countries which we are hopeful and expect to relieve under the provisions of this bill. The quotation starts:

> To the monstrous dossier of Hitlerite infamies new documents have been added, in which the executioners themselves reveal the methods by which they effected the terror that has come to be synonymous with Hitlerism.

What are these documents about? In the first place, they contain secret directives for the extermination of Soviet people.

Secondly, apart from the general directives providing for wholesale extermination, these documents include orders and instructions for the slaughter primarily of Soviet leading workers and intellectuals.

The whole essence of Hitlerism in all its hideous nakedness is revealed in this meticulously thought-out programme for the extermination of nations.

The documents in our possession draw a frightful picture of the planned and deliberate extermination of the Soviet peoples. But are these plans any different from those which have been and are still being effected in the west, in southeastern Europe, in the north and wherever else the ominous swastika still flies?

One has but to recall the destruction of Rotterdam and Warsaw, the slaughter in Belgrade, Lidice, all the sanguinary activities of Himmler, Heydrich and other Hitlerite satraps in the occupied countries of Europe. Who can count the number of common graves in Poland or estimate the number of patriots in Norway, Holland, Belgium, Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia and France brutally murdered or tortured to death?

Then this conclusion:

The peoples of occupied Europe are anxiously and impatiently awaiting deliverance.

Surely that is an inspiration for the passing of this bill, and a reason for recognizing that future expenditures will probably be on a serious scale. But when we can vote, as we did this year, $5,000 million for killing and destruction, surely $90 million for feeding the hungry is not too much. It does seem to me that Canada and the Canadian people, when we pass this bill, will be happier, happier in finding that we have appreciated a real duty. I recall a philosophy of life which was given to us by Robert Morrison, a member of the British delegation of the Empire Parliamentary Association who visited us last summer. In one of his addresses he left with us a thought which it seems to me the House of Commons may take when they conclude the passing of this bill, as I am sure they will. He put it in this way, "I searched for happiness, and happiness eluded me. I turned to service, and happiness found me." That applies, in my view, to nations as it does to individuals.

Mr. HANSELL: I notice in the schedule to the bill, article III, sections 1 and 2, that the council is appointed by each of the member governments. It goes on to state that the council when assembled shall select its own chairman, and there are some provisions respecting the general constitution and the working of the council. But when we turn to section 3 we find that the central committee of the council has been already selected, and that it consists of what I would term the "big four"—Great Britain, the United States, China and Russia. The central committee is already decided upon. It seems to me that this is putting the cart before the horse, and I should like the parliamentary assistant to enlighten us as to why the appointment or selection of the central committee is not left to the larger council when it meets, at the same time that it appoints its chairman.

I am in favour of the bill. I believe that we have a moral obligation to our fellow man, and that there must be a recognition that no human being should go hungry or cold. That is what I would like to term Christian humanism. Therefore I am favouring the bill, but I am not doing so without making one or two other observations which are not so complimentary to things that are related in a way to the principle of the bill.

I do not know how far I can agree with the hon. member for Parry Sound and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar as to the length of time it will take to rehabilitate the liberated countries. I understand it is provided that the united nations shall furnish about one-fifth of the cost of rehabilitation. In other words, the devastated countries will have to supply four-fifths of the agricultural products and other materials they require. I should be glad if the parliamentary assistant would throw some light on that, because if that is the case the bill is rightly called a relief bill, for that is all it is. It embodies a principle which we have recognized for a good many years, namely, that we have to give some sort of relief. We have tried relief schemes before. We tried them at home, but I do not think the governments in power in those days did a very good job of relief. While this, I know, is a slightly different matter, there seems to be a little irony about the fact that the very government which could not solve its relief problem internally now joins an international organization to try to solve the problem of the relief of the world.

While I am on that point I wish to mention another matter which has given me a good deal of concern. It gives me concern when we set out to pass a bill like this and such bills as the billion dollar gift to Britain and the united nations mutual aid bill and so forth. Not so long ago we heard of the terrible starvation in India. I mention this because India may be a little closer to us than some of the countries which have been devastated in this war. India is within the British commonwealth of nations, and if ever the rest of the British empire had a responsibility upon it, that responsibility was upon it last year. The Hindu is as much a human soul as any other human being in any part of the world, yet here in our own commonwealth, one of our own members was permitted to get to the point where thousands were starving and dying on the streets every day. Somebody has something to answer for there, and I do not know whether the parliamentary assistant has anything to say about that. He is a student of world affairs and I wish he would throw some light on it. I did read of course, after so many thousands had died upon the streets, that the Prime Minister of Canada offered to send them a shipful of wheat. That might be all right for the rest of them who were not yet dead, but we can sum it up by saying, once again, "too little and too late." We are asked to pass bills of this kind when such things are happening within our own empire, and that, I think, is something which should give us all considerable concern.

I am not very much disposed to favour international organizations. I think we must draw a distinction between international cooperation and international authority. I certainly believe in international cooperation, for as no man liveth unto himself, so it is true that no nation liveth unto itself; nevertheless, I am apprehensive when I think of the tendency of our times toward international control.

I am in favour of this bill, but I trust it is not the thin end of the wedge that is to be driven into our whole world scheme to let in further international organization that will control democratic countries from the top. I hope this is not one of the little cogs in the great big world machinery that eventually will be driven to squeeze from the sovereign people of Canada that which is their own sovereign right. The very moment anything comes up in this house that has any tendency to do that, then here is one who will not let it go by without voicing vigorous protest. However, this bill does not seem to me, at least on the surface, to contain those elements. It seems to me to be a bill whereby there is cooperation toward our fellow men in other parts of this unfortunate world.

Before I sit down I have something else to say with respect to the schedule and the signatories that are attached to it. As we all know, there are forty-four signatories representing forty-four separate countries. I notice very often throughout this document that one of the signatories has added a proviso before signing it. I cannot read all the languages but I can read a word or two here and there, and I think I am right when I say that every one of these provisos is to the effect that this must not come into power until the signatory's own particular parliament or legislative authority has passed it. I am going to read those who have signed with that proviso: Chile, Columbia, Cuba, Ecuador, Ethiopia, Guatemala, India, Iran, Iraq, United Mexican States, Peru, Uruguay, and Venezuela.

I wish it to be noticed, and I am calling this to the attention of the committee, that all these thirteen signatories that refused to sign it as a contract, a binding force, until their own legislatures shall have passed it, were tiny countries. The reason I call that to the attention of the committee is this. Here is where the signatories of some smaller countries recognize the value of democracy. Now I say this, as I have said it before in this house. When certain trade agreements have been placed upon the doorstep of parliament the whole thing is signed, sealed and delivered before it ever comes to parliament, and what parliament is requested to is to play the rubber stamp, so that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) can stamp us on that agreement.

That is the antithesis of true democracy. I may say too, by the way, that the big four, Great Britain, the United States, China and Russia, do not through their signatories make any such reservation. Our own minister at Washington, Mr. Leighton McCarthy, signed the agreement without any reservation whatsoever. I am beginning to think that democracy has gone from the shores of Canada. We have a government that is continually grinding out orders in council. The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) has shown that time and again by questions on the order paper, whereby we see that these orders in council have been ground out continually. Not only that, but now we find that certain agreements are entered into, and if they were not now ratified by this parliament it would mean a want of confidence in and a censure upon our government.

Here we find agreements signed, and after they are already signed the Prime Minister trots down to parliament and asks us to be good boys and ratify what he has done. I for one am going to protest against that. There is no reason in the world why an agreement of this kind should not have been entered into as a sort of preliminary step, with each signatory going back to his country and explaining the agreement to his government, and his government coming to his parliament or his legislature and saying to the people, "Is this what you want?" That is the way it should be done, and I am getting tired of this—

Mr. MacNICOL: Everybody is.

Mr. HANSELL: I mean, I am getting tired of this sort of thing.

An hon. MEMBER: That is what he means.

Mr. HANSELL: I am not getting tired of myself.

Mr. MacNICOL: We are all getting tired of order-in-council government.

Mr. HANSELL: The other day the Minister of Munitions and Supply brought down a very important matter. Now I have not got access to the caucus records of the Liberal party, but I will make a pretty good guess that neither the international airways agreement nor the agreement at present before us was ever brought before the Liberal party as a whole. I will offer that as a good guess. I think I am right in my guess. Here are a few men sitting in Canada heading a government. They asked for the responsibility. The people have given it to them, given it to them as their servants; yet they go and do things in this way without first calling upon parliament for the advice of the people. That is my protest. Although I make that protest, I repeat I believe this is a good bill. It manifests the right spirit toward the unfortunate. I believe we should pass this bill, but let me add that I think, too, that we have reason to solve our internal problems as well.

Mr. REID: I have two questions to ask—

Mr. HANSELL: The parliamentary assistant has not answered my question. Hansard would read a little better if the answers were given now.

Mr. CLAXTON: I do not know that at this time I can go into a discussion with the hon. member for Macleod on the wisdom or lack of wisdom of changing our long-established constitutional practice with regard to the execution of international agreements, a practice which we have taken with our inheritance of British parliamentary institutions from the United Kingdom, a practice which has worked well there and which I think has so far worked well here. However, I doubt if the reservation in an international agreement that it shall be subject to approval by a legislature is necessarily an effective test of a working democracy. There are other tests, and I think our democracy in Canada is able to stand comparison with that in any one of the countries which have that provision in their constitutions.

With regard to the first suggestion that the contributions of UNRRA would cover only one-fifth of the cost of relief, may I say I hope that the contributions of UNRRA will cover the whole cost of relief; but they will not cover the whole cost of feeding Europe or the far east. A great deal of the food and supplies necessary to feed Europe will be supplied in Europe by Europeans working their own land. Under the agreement and resolutions passed in pursuance of the agreement part of the total cost of relief will be borne by the countries which are able to bear that cost themselves. At Atlantic City the French committee of national liberation indicated that France was such a country; that she would be prepared to pay for the cost of the relief furnished to her. In all probability the Netherlands, Belgium and perhaps Norway may be in the same position of being able to pay. Under the resolution the countries which are able to pay are to pay in so far as it does not interfere adversely with their international exchange position. The hope is that the cost of relief as relief will be borne by the contributions made by the nations.

With regard to the selection of the four nations of the central committee, I can only say that the agreement was delivered at Atlantic City after it had been signed by the forty-four nations the day before in the form in which it is. There must have been negotiations at the diplomatic level, which resulted in those four nations being selected. In connection with this agreement the argument can be advanced that there is a special reason why the supreme powers should have a special position, namely, that the administration of relief will take place as countries are liberated by the armed forces of the united nations, and those armed forces will principally be the forces of the four greatest powers. That liberation will be followed by allied military occupation and by the administration of relief by the allied military governments. During that whole period those powers will wish to have an effective say in affairs. But I point out that the central committee has power to make decisions relative to policy only between meetings of the council, and those decisions must be communicated to the members of the council, and are subject to review by the council. Therefore there is an effective check in that respect.

While I am on my feet may I reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Parry Sound. He asked what the position was regarding voluntary agencies such as the international Red Cross. The agreement provides in article IV, section 2:

> Foreign voluntary relief agencies may not engage in activity in any area receiving relief from the administration without the consent and unless subject to the regulation of the director general.

That is necessary in order to exercise control. At Atlantic City the council passed resolution No. 9 dealing with welfare services and volunteer relief agencies. I shall read section 2:

That it shall be the policy of the administration to enlist the cooperation and seek the participation of appropriate foreign voluntary relief agencies, to the extent that they can be effectively utilized in relief activities for which they have special competence and resources, subject to the consent and regulation of the director general in accordance with article IV, paragraph 2, of the agreement.

Therefore the resolution expressly directs the director general to utilize the cooperation and assistance of such agencies. I understand that committees have been set up in the United Kingdom and in the United States to coordinate the activities of such agencies.

Mr. REID: While I realize this agreement has been signed and nothing that we do or say can alter it, yet the members of the House of Commons have a duty to examine the bill closely and to obtain the fullest information possible before it becomes law. I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant a question based on article I. In that article I see no mention made of the statement which appears in the preamble. I presume that the nations signing the agreement would pay little attention to the preamble. After the agreement is signed and it comes into effect, the governor general in council, and the council of nations will look to the articles themselves in the carrying out of the agreement. They will not look at the preamble. This is what the preamble says:

Being determined that immediately upon the liberation of any area by the armed forces of the united nations or as a consequence of retreat of the enemy the population thereof shall receive aid and relief from their sufferings, food, clothing and shelter, aid in the prevention of pestilence and in the recovery of the health of the people—

That part of the preamble is carried out in article I, but the following portion of the preamble is left out. I can see no mention of it at all. To me it is very important. I shall read it to the committee:

—and that preparation and arrangements shall be made for the return of prisoners and exiles to their homes and for assistance in the resumption of urgently needed agricultural and industrial production and the restoration of essential services.

It seems strange to me that although the preamble outlines the duties of the united nations, yet when it comes to the agreement itself that very important provision is left out. I think an explanation of that is due the committee.

The other matter I had in mind has to do with article IV, section 5. This is the section in which I am interested:

The director general—

Who, by the way, shall have the power to administer the agreement.

—shall make periodic reports to the central committee and to the council covering the progress of the administration's activities.

Then, Mr. Chairman, listen to this:

The reports shall be made public except for such portions as the central committee may consider it necessary, in the interests of the united nations, to keep confidential.

If there is one thing that has brought about great distress in Europe, it has been secrecy, and I thought we were heading into a new era when these reports would be open to the world, because surely there will be nothing to hide. Canada, however, is not a member of the central committee, and accordingly will have no say as to what parts of the reports should be kept confidential and what parts may be made public, and it seems strange that no protest has been made in regard to this section. I should like the hon. gentleman who is in charge of the bill first to answer the question I asked and then to give the reason why the director general should submit his reports to the central committee rather than to the council of nations.

Mr. CLAXTON: It is quite true that the words in the preamble to which the hon. gentleman made reference are not repeated in article I, but if the agreement is read as a whole I think it will be found that there are references throughout to services for the relief of victims of war and similar expressions which would be sufficient to carry over the expression in the preamble. I refer to section 2 of article I, which reads:

To plan, coordinate, administer or arrange for the administration of measures for the relief of victims of war in any area under the control of any of the united nations. . . .

Those who have been displaced from their homes are "victims of war".

Mr. REID: Through the provision of food only.

Mr. CLAXTON: Not only that; "through the provision of food, fuel, clothing, shelter and other basic necessities, medical and other essential services". Therefore I would suggest that this form of words is sufficient to carry over from the preamble the language to which the hon. member has referred. In further explanation I may say that the resolutions adopted by the council at Atlantic City make specific reference to dealing with the problem of displaced persons. I refer particularly to resolution No. 10, which gives in great detail recommendations as to the policies to be adopted by the administration.

In regard to article IV, in which it is provided that the central committee may prevent certain parts of any report from being made public, I should recall to hon. members the fact that probably this administration is going to operate while the united nations are still at war. I can imagine that reports are marked "most secret" which deal with the assessment of requirements in occupied countries, with sources of supply, with shipping schedules and similar matters which certainly should not be made public to-day. I suggest that is sufficient reason for putting this provision in the agreement.

Mr. MacNICOL: A few moments ago the parliamentary assistant made reference to Russia, and that encourages me to ask what is going to happen to Roumania as far as UNRRA is concerned, after that country has been liberated by the Russians. Will Roumania, which was an enemy nation, be entitled to relief under this programme?

Mr. CLAXTON: The position of enemy countries is dealt with in resolution No. 1, in part I, section 3, which reads:

> If it appears necessary for the administration to operate in an enemy or ex-enemy area in carrying out the purposes of the agreement, it will do so only from such a time and for such purposes as may be agreed upon between the military command, the established control authority or duly recognized administration of the area on the one hand and the administration on the other, and subject to such control as the military command or the established control authority may find necessary; provided that the council approve the scale and nature of the operations it is proposed to undertake and the standard of provision, and that all expenses connected with such possible operations in an enemy or ex-enemy area should be carried by the enemy or ex-enemy country concerned.

That is part of the provision. At the time of the first meeting of the council in Atlantic City the war had not reached a stage where it was possible for the nations to work out in very great detail policies with respect to the treatment of enemy countries, but I think it may be safely assumed that at the meeting to be held in Montreal on June 23 this will be one of the questions to come before the council for further attention. I should point out that it is not expected that UNRRA will operate in any field until after the military authorities have turned over to it the administration of relief, so that there is still some time for the working out of policies as well as for the accumulation of supplies.

Mr. ROEBUCK: The success of this agreement will depend very largely upon the business ability with which the policies of the general committee are carried out, and I observe with some consternation the method of appointment and, worse, the method of disposal of the director general, who is to be the Pooh-Bah of the business end of this agreement. If we turn to article IV, under the heading "director general" we find that section 1 reads:

> The executive authority of the united nations relief and rehabilitation administration shall be in the director general—

If you look through the other paragraphs you will see the very great powers that are placed in the hands of this individual, how he appoints subdirectors, who in turn take care of the rehabilitation, supplies and so on that are to be made available through the votes of the member nations. Then observe:

> —who shall be appointed by the council on the nomination by unanimous vote of the central committee.

In other words, it is going to be difficult to select an individual who will receive the unanimous approval of the four members of the central council, but once he has run that gauntlet notice this:

> The director general may be removed by the council on recommendation by unanimous vote of the central committee.

In other words, as long as this individual can retain one vote on the central committee, he is secure and can carry on the business of the united nations as he sees fit. Then observe:

> The central committee of the council shall consist of the representatives of China, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom, and the United States of America. . . .

The important thing in that clause is that Canada is not included, though in my judgment Canada has now achieved the status of nationhood and stands fourth in military and economic power. Possibly without the aid of Canada in the carrying forward of our present war effort the result attained might have been different. Canada's place in the post-war world, in the rehabilitation of the down-trodden nations, can scarcely be overestimated in importance; yet this council, which must be unanimous in the appointment of the director general who spends our money, does not include a representative of this country. I would be much better pleased with this agreement if Canada were represented on the central committee. I would also be better pleased and more hopeful of the successful outcome of this agreement were the director general subject to simply a majority vote in the retaining of his position. The position is not dissimilar to that occupied by Mr. Hoover following the last war. Those whose minds go back that far will remember that while Mr. Hoover achieved a great reputation in the work he carried out, he was by no means free from criticism in the doing of that job.

It is a difficult job, and its success will depend upon the favour received from those who supply the money. That is not a democratic arrangement. I suppose, as the hon. member for New Westminster has said, that this agreement has already been signed. As one hon. member opposite has already pointed out, it is rather too bad that agreements of this kind are completed and signed before deliberative assemblies, such as this one, have any chance to apply their combined wisdom, and bring out those little points of criticism which might otherwise be missed. It is too bad that we have adopted that method, and that we have followed it for so long. I do not criticize the procedure in this instance only. There is something to be said for the rule in the United States which requires ratification by the senate of any treaty entered into by the United States. So far as the senate of that country is concerned, I do not approve the two-thirds rule; but I do approve the regulation which makes it impossible for the executive to bind the nation by an agreement with outside nations, irrespective of and without reference to the parliamentary institution of the country. It would be well if we changed the rule in Canada.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: This afternoon I asked a number of questions, which the parliamentary assistant has not yet answered. One of my questions had to do with article V, section 1. With regard to that question I asked why it was that there was no equality, in so far as nations signatory to this agreement were concerned. Then, I should like to ask in connection therewith this question: If a decision is made by the central committee, and before ratification by the council, is that decision binding on the signatory members to the agreement? And in the event that a decision has been accepted by the council, is it then mandatory in its effect upon the members signatory to the agreement?

Then I asked a question as to what expenditures had been made, to date, in connection with the Mutual Aid measure, and the distribution among those expenditures with respect to the various commodities covered thereby, including agricultural and industrial commodities and the like.

I wish to return, too, to the question I asked last night in regard to appointments and recruitment of staff. At that time I asked what was being done in connection with the recruitment of staff to assist in the administration of the measure, once it becomes law. The answer given last night was that nothing was being done to that end. This evening the parliamentary assistant has pointed out that something has been done, and that a number of Canadians will shortly be trained for purposes of administration at a school to be convened in the United States. He said that appointments to administrative positions would be made on the basis of applications filed with the Department of National War Services. I should like to know under what authority that department is to have anything to do with the passing on of applications to the central authority. I would ask how it came to be named, and whether there is an order in council making provision for applications being considered by that department. To my mind it is a serious matter to find that appointments, so far as Canada is concerned, are not to be made by the civil service commission, but rather by a department of government. We would expect to find that the recommendations would pass through the commission to the central authority, or to Governor Lehman, who is charged with the responsibility of making those appointments. I should also like to ascertain how many Canadians will be sent over to take the course; and, as the scheme develops and becomes more or less all-embracing, has any estimate been made as to the number of Canadians who may be expected to secure employment under the scheme? Is there any information as to the basis of their qualifications, or the basis upon which they will be chosen?

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. member for Lake Centre first asked a question with respect to section 1 of article V in the agreement, and seemed to indicate that in some way that article laid down some basis of unfairness.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No; inequality.

Mr. CLAXTON: The article reads:

1. In so far as its appropriate constitutional bodies shall authorize, each member government will contribute to the support of the administration in order to accomplish the purposes of article I, paragraph 2 (a). The amount and character of the contributions of each member government under this provision will be determined from time to time by its appropriate constitutional bodies. All such contributions received by the administration shall be accounted for.

There is, I submit, no room for misunderstanding there. The member governments are to contribute what their constitutional authorities determine. At the meeting of the council a resolution was passed dealing with the matter of finance, in which the recommendation was expressed that nations in a position to do so should endeavour to contribute one per cent of their national income, estimated by themselves, as at June 30, 1943. If they wished to give more, they could give more; and if they wished, they could give less. But nations like the United States, the United Kingdom and, we hope, Canada, will conform to the one per cent target set forth in the resolution. But the extent of any contribution is left entirely to each nation. There is no possible room for misunderstanding, and I believe there is none among the nations.

Then the hon. member asked if the decision made by the central committee, under section 3 of article III, was binding on the council. The article itself, I should think, made that clear.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No; binding on the nations until ratified by the council.

Mr. CLAXTON: UNRRA cannot bind any nation. No resolution of the council or of the central committee, and no resolution of any organ of UNRRA can bind any nation. All they can do is to make recommendations. It is an administrative organization, set up to administer funds made available to it by the contributions of the nations concerned. They cannot bind any nation. All they can do is, through the appropriate organ, to make a recommendation; and a number of those recommendations have been made. If the central committee decided, as a matter of policy, to include a new country, let us say, in the scope of relief, and that decision was unsatisfactory to the member governments, it could be reconsidered at the next meeting of council, and reversed by a majority vote.

The hon. member asked a question in connection with the Mutual Aid legislation. This is not a Mutual Aid act, and I would submit that now is not the proper time to ask that question. That can be dealt with properly when the measure on the order paper for Mutual Aid comes up.

As to the number of Canadians who will be trained in the United States to work for the administration, and the other questions asked in that connection, I have already pointed out that UNRRA is to set up an international administration with a genuine international staff. Canada will not make any appointments to UNRRA in any way shape or form, either through the civil service commission, or the Department of National War Services or any other department. But for purposes of convenience, if there are Canadians who would be interested in serving in work in the field and who have the necessary qualifications as welfare or social workers, they may forward their applications to the Department of External Affairs or to the Department of National War Services, and those applications will receive consideration. I understand that the actual appointments made will, however, be made by UNRRA itself, and the policies that are to be followed by UNRRA in making appointments have been laid down by the council.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That still does not answer the question as to what the qualifications are that have been laid down, or as to the number of Canadians shortly to take a course of instruction in the United States and the number who may ultimately be expected to be employed under this scheme.

Mr. CLAXTON: The number ultimately expected to be employed under the scheme depends upon the action of the administration at its headquarters in Washington and also upon the development of the services in the field. I have not the slightest idea how many will be employed under the scheme or how many Canadians will be found suitable for employment under it. But I am sure that applications from Canadians will receive consideration.

With regard to the qualifications required, I may tell the committee with all frankness that I only learned about this by long distance to-day. It is being developed exceedingly rapidly, and that information will be made available at the earliest possible date.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I understood the parliamentary assistant to say that the administration will not have power to bind any member of the council by its action. I would ask him how he interprets section 1 of article 1, which reads:

> The administration shall have power to acquire, hold and convey property, to enter into contracts and undertake obligations, to designate or create agencies and to review the activities of agencies so created, to manage undertakings and in general to perform any legal act appropriate to its objects and purposes.

Mr. CLAXTON: I interpret that in the sense in which the words are used there. The administration in that sense is in exactly the same position as an international corporation which has power to acquire property and make contracts. But it has not the power to bind Canada as a state to a course of action to which our own legislative authority has not agreed by our own constitutional practice. It has not the power to bind any country.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Until the government has agreed to any particular line of action.

Mr. CLAXTON: That is this government acting. Once we act, that is our action, not the action of UNRRA.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That brings me to the point I had in mind. This government acts by order in council.

Mr. CLAXTON: This government in implementing the agreement acts in virtue of the statute.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That is this bill?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes. In implementing the agreement the government may act by order in council, but the number of actions that will have to be taken by order in council on anything other than in connection with purchases and the like should be exceedingly few. The kind of action I envisage has to do with the purchase of supplies or the setting up of agencies to purchase supplies to make up our contribution to UNRRA, or to supply UNRRA with what it wants to buy from us. Apart from that I can hardly conceive of anything of a legislative nature having to be done in order to carry out the agreement. It is true that the government might have to grant certain rights similar to diplomatic immunity with respect to the communication of dispatches or for the travel of representatives of UNRRA. Apart from what I have said, I cannot conceive of any legislative action that would be required in Canada to carry out the agreement.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I would feel much better if the limitations were provided in the bill.

Mr. CLAXTON: We have to look at every piece of legislation with an eye to the purpose for which it was intended, and surely there is nothing alarming about the purpose for which this agreement is intended. If I judge the course of this debate, members in every quarter of the house are anxious to see us carry out what is necessary to be done to implement the agreement, and that is all the power that is sought here. I may tell the committee that the model of this bill was the Treaty of Peace Act of 1919. This is in substantially the same terms. I also point out that UNRRA is dealing with an emergency situation, and it is not expected that it will carry on for a great number of years. It is not expected that its operations will endure for probably more than three years after hostilities cease. That, I think, would be the minimum. That is one reason why those who drafted the agreement thought it desirable to fix the director general permanently in his office, because otherwise you could not get a man of the character that was wanted, a man of the charcter of ex-Governor Lehman, who was chosen by the unanimous vote of all the forty-four nations.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Is it not true that the only control that parliament can exercise over the administration of the legislation will be through the voting of the money that is required year by year, and that under the circumstances parliament will have very little choice but to vote the money? We certainly could not with any good grace refuse to vote our share of the money required for a purpose of this kind. Is it not also true that the governor in council is given authority up to the point where Canada's participation can be withdrawn through order in council, without the consent of parliament, as set forth in article X of the agreement?

Mr. CLAXTON: I do not think there is any possibility of Canada withdrawing. I am bound to admit that I am not competent to describe the kind of procedure that would be necessary to withdraw—whether it could be done by executive authority alone or would require the approval of parliament, I do not know. But I am fairly certain that no power given under this agreement affects whatever power the government has to withdraw from an agreement of this kind.

I submit again that I do not know of any other way of carrying out the provisions of this agreement. Parliament surely would not want to have brought before it fifteen hundred or two thousand orders dealing with the purchase of a hundred thousand bushels of wheat and various other matters of that sort. That is the kind of action that is to be taken under this power. In addition, there may be some other actions that may have to be taken, but, in so far as we can see, they will be of an administrative nature.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I still have not had an answer in regard to the employment of Canadians under this scheme. I do not want to refer to a subsequent section, but the parliamentary assistant for some reason does not seem to want to answer the question as to how many are going to take this course in the United States. If he does not know I will accept his answer.

Mr. CLAXTON: I have told the hon. member I do not know.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Will the information be furnished? I see in section 2 of the bill the following provision:

> The governor in council may make such appointments . . . as appear to him to be necessary. . . .

Mr. CLAXTON: I have assured the hon. member for Lake Centre that the governor in council is not going to make any appointments to the administration. It will not make a single appointment.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: All right; we are not going to split hairs over that.

Mr. CLAXTON: It is not a question of splitting hairs; it is a question of stating what the situation is.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Very well. How many appointments is it expected will be made in Canada to carry out the provisions of UNRRA?

Mr. CLAXTON: I do not know, and I never will know, because that is a question within the control of no one within Canada or of the Canadian government. It is a question within the control of the administration itself, which appoints the staff.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: This is what the section states:

> The governor in council may make such appointments . . . as appear to him to be necessary. . . .

Not the council, nor Governor Lehman, nor anyone but the governor in council of Canada.

Mr. CLAXTON: My hon. friend has now switched from dealing with appointments of people to work for the administration, to the question of possible appointees in Canada to work for Canada; and if I did not follow him earlier I am sorry. I am not in a position to say whether any appointments will have to be made to carry out the provisions of the agreement in Canada. So far as can be seen now, the arrangements between UNRRA and the Canadian government can be conducted through the ordinary channels and with existing agencies. It may be found necessary to appoint two or three people—perhaps a few more, but a very small staff—to handle the actual arrangements. I am not in the confidence of the government; but it might be anticipated, for example, that the arrangements between Canada and UNRRA would be conducted through agencies already existing such as the mutual aid board, the Department of Munitions and Supply, the Department of Agriculture, or the Canadian Wheat Board, and it may be that those agencies will be found quite sufficient. I am not in a position to go beyond that.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Report to be laid before parliament.

Mr. GILLIS: There is just a point on that. I am in agreement with the hon. member for New Westminster and the hon. member for Trinity; it is surprising to me to find that as important a contributor to this scheme as Canada will necessarily have to be is not represented on the central council. Is the parliamentary assistant in a position to inform the committee why Canada has no representation on that central council? I think we should have an answer.

Mr. CLAXTON: That question has been dealt with, I think, three times, and I can give no further answer than I have already given. This agreement was an agreement of forty-four nations; it was worked out after it had been distributed on June 9, 1943, by the United States government, which was responsible for circulating it. Representations were made by various nations after that, and the agreement was signed in its present form. What diplomatic representations were made I am not in a position to say, and I do not think anyone would be.

Section agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre) moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. STIRLING: Next sitting. I suggest it is far more customary for a measure of this sort to stand on the order paper for one day.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I have not the slightest objection.

Motion stands.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Friday, March 31, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of National Defence for Air): On March 16, as reported at page 1539, my assistant placed on Hansard a certain number of answers to questions which had been asked during the course of the discussion on the estimates of the Department of National Defence for Air, and some objection was taken. The hon. member for Yale said:

> I suggest that these answers be allowed to go on Hansard and at some time convenient to the minister for air and to the minister for naval services, supplementary questions can be asked.

I assume that supplementary questions are to be asked on those matters which were placed upon Hansard that day.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: If hon. members who are particularly interested in the questions referred to on that page are not here, I would point out that on February 29 the minister made a statement in regard to the closing of airports across Canada. He remarked, as reported in Hansard, at page 1029:

> We are not proposing a winding-up of the air training plan, even progressively, on the contrary we are providing, and have agreed with the United Kingdom for a continuation of the plan after March, 1945, the date on which the 1942 agreement expires, but a continuation with a reduced output, which reduced output will not be noticeable or in effect before eighteen months hence.

In the next column of the same page he said:

> I have already stated that the Royal Air Force transferred schools will be the first to close, beginning about midsummer and running well into next year. With respect to others, there are many factors to be taken into consideration.

The minister mentioned about nine of them—whether the property is leased or owned, whether it is required for civilian purposes, such factors as travelling expense between types of schools, costs of operation, disturbance to civilian economy, geographical location, air training conditions, fog area or obscure visibility, air congestion, et cetera.

About two weeks later he announced the closing of about twenty-eight schools, including eight in Alberta and eight in Saskatchewan. I should like to know from the minister, first, what relation these various items listed on page 1029 of Hansard have as regards other training schools across Canada, and whether the reasons which are given on that page are those which caused the closing of these schools in western Canada. Our experience in the west would lead us to believe that the conditions for flying training schools there were much superior to what they were in eastern Canada. Certainly the number of hours in which these schools are not operating because of air conditions or disturbance to civilian economy, obscure visibility or air congestion, would make us believe that the western area is the most favoured and suitable for air training.

The other question that occurs to us is this. With a plan of constant expansion continuing even until the late months of 1943, people are somewhat at a loss to understand the complete reversal of policy which necessitates the closing of twenty-nine of these schools across Canada, when we would have imagined that the plan would have worked to a certain level of peak production and then tapered off gradually. The continued opening of schools even late in 1943, followed immediately in 1944 by a reduction of about twenty-five per cent of the air schools in Canada, would seem to show a lack of planning there and, as I say, people are at a loss to understand it. Is there any statement which the minister can make in that regard?

Mr. POWER: I have already made several statements with respect to the closing of these schools. I made a statement to the press on December 3 when the first closing of schools took place; I made a statement to the press and to the house on February 16 as a result of a meeting with the United Kingdom representatives, and I also made reference to the subject of the closing of schools in introducing my appropriation on February 29. Perhaps the concrete reasons were not sufficiently clear to the house, and with the permission of the committee it might be well for me to go over them again as briefly as I can.

What we must bear in mind first is that the purpose of the British commonwealth air training plan was to man all aircraft which the commonwealth produced and which were planned to be manned by men from the British commonwealth. That was number one. Number two was that the contract between the partners, signed in June, 1942, expires in March, 1945, when normally all schools would have been closed, because that is the expiry date of the contract. It must also be understood that Canada trains flyers not only for its own squadrons but for the whole of the British commonwealth. It has an unlimited commitment to train flyers.

In the course of its work under this agreement Canada, before the end of this month, will have trained its 100,000th aircrew. On March 31 we had trained 92,000, to which must be added 5,000 who belonged to R.A.F. schools before R.A.F. schools became a part of what was called the combined training organization, and roughly the 3,500 whom we turn out every month.

The first intimation we received that there might be a curtailment in air training capacity came in December. Up to that time we had already been told to turn out aircrew as fast as we could and as well as we could, and we did that. We fulfilled our contract. We fulfilled our contract so well that provision which had been made not only for expansion but for replacements was found to be adequate. When making provision, it is all very well to talk of planning, but it must be understood that planning in war, particularly planning the production of a certain type of human material, is somewhat more difficult than the ordinary planning for the turning out of shells or machines or something of that kind, and casualty rates must be taken into consideration. The high command figured that the casualties would be at a certain rate and they asked us to produce not only for expansion but for replacements up to that rate.

Fortunately, the allies obtained air superiority earlier than they had anticipated, with the result that the German air force is not so dangerous from the point of view of casualties as had been expected and that we have fewer losses in combat than were expected, particularly among pilots. We turned at one time, in 1941 and 1942, from combat with fighter pilots and fighter aeroplanes to heavy bombing. At that time heavy bombers usually carried a first and a second pilot, and it was decided by the higher command that they did not need a second pilot, so that they replaced him by a flight engineer or a wireless operator air gunner, and so on.

Most of our training originally was devoted to pilots. Now we find there is a surplus of pilots. When a bomber is shot down the loss is only one pilot; there are seven other members of the crew, but only one pilot. The German fighter air force have not been taking the heavy part in the fighting that was anticipated, and the result is that our casualties, thank God, have not been anything like what had been feared, so that at the present time there are more pilots trained than were expected. That is number one.

The margin that was allowed for is still there. It is not any indication that there is any intention on the part of the allies or on the part of the United Kingdom, where most of these aircrew go, that there shall be a slackening of the war effort. On the contrary, there is, first, the circumstance that we still have a surplus of pilots, and, second, that this year is to be the critical year of the war, and the United Kingdom and its allies are endeavouring to concentrate, so far as they can, all their fighting power in the front line.

As this committee well knows, there is an immense training organization behind the fighting line. This training organization can be pushed forward and utilized at the proper time.

As I said, there have been two changes. The first change took place in December when the Royal Air Force announced the desire to close a certain number of their establishments. St. Catharines in Ontario, Stanley in Nova Scotia, Caron in Saskatchewan, and Cap de la Madeleine in Quebec, were closed. All these except Caron were Royal Canadian Air Force stations. But in order to keep schools going in western Canada we closed R.C.A.F. stations in eastern Canada. Neepawa, which was an R.A.F. school, Estevan which was an R.A.F. school, North Battleford, Swift Current, Weyburn and Assiniboia were all to be closed, because the R.A.F. decided they wanted to bring their men home. By a reshuffle and by a shift of schools we decided to close the R.C.A.F. school in Moncton, because there was already certain congestion on that aerodrome owing to transportation work which was being carried on. We moved Moncton to Battleford, and we decided to close St. Hubert near Montreal, because there was also certain congestion there, and to fill the R.A.F. station in western Canada, Weyburn. Therefore there was no dislocation in western Canada; but we did close Stanley, Cap de la Madeleine, St. Hubert and Moncton in eastern Canada.

Then came the decision to hold an empire training conference in order to determine what was to be done after March, 1945. We have to hold a conference months in advance in order to lay out the plans for the purchase of aircraft, for the entrance into the scheme of trainees and so on, because aircraft cannot be purchased off the shelf. They must be ordered from eighteen months to two years in advance. Therefore we decided to have a conference with our other partners of the empire some time in the month of March. Before that, as a preliminary to the conference the air ministry asked if it would not be a good idea for the Right Hon. Mr. Balfour to come here to discuss these matters with us. He came here and after a certain amount of discussion announced to us that the United Kingdom government had decided to close a further number of their schools, in fact had decided to close all the R.A.F. schools properly so-called. They had decided to close them progressively during the course of the next year.

Mr. GRAYDON: How many would there be?

Mr. POWER: Oh, from twenty to twenty-five. He also advised us that the higher command had come to the conclusion that the output of the plan should be reduced, beginning about fourteen to eighteen months hence. It must not be forgotten that a recruit entering the plan to-day, with the backlog that we have, in all probability will not strike the front line for from eighteen months to two years; therefore if we are to make preparations for closing this scheme progressively sometime it behooves us to begin reasonably early. It was decided at this conference that the air training plan would continue after March, 1945—that is number 1—but that it would continue at a reduced capacity with the output reduced about fourteen to eighteen months hence. Most of those schools will not close until between December 15, 1944, and January 1, 1945. Let us remember that. We are not closing the schools suddenly, as has been said in the committee; but we are advising the interested parties that this training scheme must begin to close up sometime and this sometime starts next fall.

I should like the committee to bear this in mind. I have never given these figures before but I presume I have to. I do not think there is any great secret about them now anyway. Whereas last year we produced about 39,000 aircrew, in 1944, the year in which we are closing the schools, we are going to produce 41,600, and with the 100,000 already produced we are going to have a substantial number of aircrew. There will begin to be a slackening up when these schools are closed and a slackening up in 1945; but I hope it will not be forgotten that at the present time we have a surplus. We are still producing at peak capacity or practically at peak capacity, and we shall be doing so up until the end of 1944. In order to slacken our capacity in 1945 we have to begin now. At the present time there are in the United Kingdom enough trained front-line aircrew for the expansion of all the squadrons required by the British commonwealth. Back of that we have all the replacements we require. We have all the men we need for 1944; with what is produced in 1944 we shall have the men required for 1945, and I presume with the backlog of the accumulation we shall have all the men required for 1946.

Now, I ask myself why we should continue training men in a hazardous occupation if they are not absolutely necessary, and why we should spend very large sums of money required for training? I have forgotten the amount it requires to train a pilot, but it is something over $20,000—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): $25,000.

[Mr. Power.]

Mr. POWER: Yes, $25,000 to train a pilot and a little more than that to train an observer.

Mr. GRAYDON: That covers overhead and everything.

Mr. POWER: That is the figure we have given. It costs somewhat less than that to train a gunner, and so on. I ask myself why we should continue training these men? After all we are contractors. We made a contract with the United Kingdom and the people of the governments of the British commonwealth to turn out aircrew in an unlimited quantity as long as they wanted them, but we cannot train men if they do not want them. To my mind it would be the height of absurdity, first of all, to risk the lives of these young men in the hazardous job of training and, secondly, to spend the people's money. That, I think, is the justification for the closing of the schools after it is no longer considered necessary by the higher command to train men. Do not forget we are not closing all the schools by any means because, I repeat, the air training plan will keep on after 1945.

There was some suggestion that there had been perhaps favouritism shown in closing schools in western Canada and in eastern Canada. Let us see what we have left in the way of flying schools. Prince Edward Island has three flying schools; Nova Scotia has three flying schools; New Brunswick has one; Quebec has four; Ontario has eighteen; Manitoba has eleven; Saskatchewan has six; Alberta has six, and British Columbia has four. With the exception of Ontario, where most of the recruits come from and where most of the schools were established in the early stages, the balance as between the provinces is fairly well kept.

Mr. HANSELL: The figures the minister has given are for a certain type of school, are they?

Mr. POWER: Schools where flying goes on. Of the twenty-eight schools to be closed several are Royal Air Force schools. The Royal Air Force say they want to bring their schools home, and I cannot stop them from doing so nor can anyone else. If they want to bring their men home that is their business, and I do not think any of us can criticize them, for they know their business best. They have said they want to bring their schools home in order to bring their men closer to the front line, so as to bring greater power to bear during the critical year of the war. That is the reason they give, and I think that reason should be good enough for any of us

The first of these schools is No. 31 O.T.U. at Pennfield Ridge; and in passing I may say that we have found it will be not only possible but necessary to keep that school open for another purpose, as a transport conversion unit. Recently, that is within the last two or three weeks, we have been advised that transport aircraft which were ordered two years ago, which were required for the purpose of transporting troops from one end of Canada to the other as part of the defence of Canada plan, aircraft which we were told not to expect until 1945, will be delivered in 1944. That is an indication that the United States aircraft industry is progressing far beyond perhaps what they themselves anticipated. The result is that we will be enabled to carry on the sort of training which I think will be best for our young men, particularly for the future; that is, training on heavy transports. In order to operate heavy transports one must have an aerodrome with a long runway. During the time we were somewhat anxious about the defence of Canada we decided to lengthen all the runways in the home war establishment in eastern Canada, and one of those was the runway at Pennfield Ridge. That school not only has a long runway; it has what I think they call a parallel runway, and from that point of view it is ideal for the purpose of carrying on with these heavy transports, these Liberators, which require a much longer take-off and landing space than the ordinary aerodrome where we have been carrying on training with Ansons and similar planes, where the runways are something like 3,000 to 3,500 feet in length. So that Pennfield Ridge will not be closed. Another to be closed is No. 31 E.F.T.S. at Winton, Alberta; that is R.A.F. Another is No. 32 E.F.T.S. at Bowden, Alberta; that is R.A.F.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does the minister mean that Pennfield Ridge will not be fully closed?

Mr. POWER: We will carry on training to about the same extent as hitherto in the R.A.F. schools. This was an R.A.F. school, an O.T.U. It is quite possible there will not be so many men there, or so many machines, but a Liberator carries a crew of seven or eight, whereas a Ventura, the machine they have been using, carried a crew of about four, so that I think it will balance up. There may not be quite so many men; I assume there are about 1,400 men at Pennfield Ridge at present, and perhaps when we take over there will be something like 1,000.

Then No. 31 bombing and gunnery school at Picton, Ontario, will be closed; No. 32 S.F.T.S., Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan, will be closed; they are both R.A.F. schools. No. 34 S.F.T.S., Medicine Hat, Alberta, R.A.F., is to be closed; No. 36 S.F.T.S., Penhold, Alberta, R.A.F., is to be closed; No. 33 S.F.T.S., Carberry, Manitoba, R.A.F., is to be closed. All these schools will close between December 15 and January 1, so that there is nothing very sudden about it.

The following schools were devoted to the training of the Royal Navy fleet air arm, and they say they no longer require them. These were two R.C.A.F. schools: No. 12 E.F.T.S. at Goderich, Ontario, and No. 4 E.F.T.S. at Aylmer, Ontario.

The following had been R.A.F. schools prior to December 15, and were made R.C.A.F. schools in the reshuffle of which I spoke, and under the new arrangement are no longer required: No. 39 S.F.T.S., Swift Current, Saskatchewan; No. 8 S.F.T.S. at Weyburn; No. 25, which was a former R.A.F. school, at Assiniboia, and No. 26, which was also a former R.A.F. school, at Neepawa.

Three of the schools to be closed are initial training schools. At present we have seven of these, and it has been decided that four will be sufficient to look after the reduced entries. The initial training schools are the schools to which the boys go before they start their actual flying experience, and the population of these schools is usually composed of young men beginning their training as pilots; at least these form the greater proportion of the population. It was decided to retain four schools of the seven, and it was thought best to divide them among the provinces. One was retained at Edmonton, Alberta; one at Regina, Saskatchewan; one at Toronto, and one at Victoriaville, Quebec. The three that are being abolished are at Saskatoon, Toronto and Belleville.

Of the remaining R.C.A.F. schools three are elementary flying schools where we train only pilots. These are at Fort William, Windsor Mills and Regina; they are to be closed. Of the service flying training schools, where only pilots are trained, the following are to be closed: Yorkton, Brantford, Dunnville and Macleod. These are R.C.A.F. schools; they are devoted entirely to the training of pilots and will be closed in December or January.

There are four wireless schools in Canada and it was decided to close one. It was thought that in the interests of civilian economy and agricultural planning it would be advisable to hand back to Ontario the school at Guelph which that province had kindly placed at our disposal, and we are handing it back to Ontario sometime in September or October of this year. Two bombing and gunnery schools will begin their closing sometime late in December, when we shall have reached a point in our training of gunners where we shall be on the verge of achieving a surplus.

What is to become of these schools? In my statement I mentioned what was the long-range situation, and it is a situation which will be faced by every locality in which a school is located. Eventually these schools will be turned over to the Surplus Assets Corporation for disposal, and I presume they will be handed over to the Department of Transport.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister means the War Assets Corporation?

Mr. POWER: Yes; and in due course the War Assets Corporation will ask the different departments of government what use the schools can be put to. I presume, if no other department takes them on, eventually they will be handed over to the Department of Transport, which looks after civil aviation.

For the moment we are not proposing to abandon any of these schools mentioned. In the first place, whatever our plans may be, we are certainly not going to abandon schools, when some eventuality might arise, because of which we might have to reopen them—not that I anticipate it, but simply because we want to make sure about that.

In the second place, we have some use for them. They will be utilized as aircraft storage units, which store and maintain aircraft required as stored reserves. They have an estimated service establishment of about 200. There will be aircraft holding units, which will hold aircraft being stored, and awaiting disposal by the War Assets Corporation. They have an estimated service establishment of approximately 100. There will be equipment holding units for storage of all types of R.C.A.F. equipment, which will have service establishment of about 175. There will be personnel holding units, because every now and then, particularly with these changes, and this reshuffling and shuffling, we find we must hold personnel between courses, and we have to put them somewhere. So that some of these units will be taken into personnel holding units for the storage of personnel awaiting another stage of training or, in some cases, awaiting embarkation, if they are backed up because of a shortage of shipping. There will be service establishments there of about 100.

Then there will be pre-aircrew education schools. Up to the present time a very large number of our men who come in have not quite reached the educational standards required for aircrew. We have been sending them to universities for that training. From now on, however, we will take on that job, ourselves, and instead of sending them to universities we will train them in our own units which have been or will be left available. That is for the training of pre-aircrew personnel, by R.C.A.F. instructional staff which was formerly carried on by the universities. That requires a service establishment of about 100.

I wish to put on Hansard—and I might as well do so now—what is going to happen to them all. Pennfield Ridge will continue as a transport conversion unit. Edmonton, Alberta, which was known as No. 2 A.O.S. will become No. 2 wing headquarters to the Northwest Staging Route. That is a very congested airdrome.

Weyburn, 8 S.F.T.S., will become an equipment holding unit.

Belleville, which it was announced might be closed, will now follow on, until December, 1944, as a flight engineer school.

Saskatoon I.T.S. will be returned to the lessor. It belonged to the normal school and Bedford collegiate.

Fort William will become an aircraft holding unit.

Goderich will be an aircraft holding unit.

Windsor Mills will become an aircraft holding unit.

Assiniboia will become a pre-aircrew education school, for about 240 trainees.

Neepawa will become a pre-aircrew educational school with about 240 trainees.

Dewinton will become an aircraft holding unit.

Bowden will become a pre-aircrew educational school with about 240 trainees.

Regina will become a pre-aircrew education school with about 170 trainees.

Brantford will become an aircraft holding unit.

Dunnville will be an aircraft holding unit.

Macleod will become an equipment holding unit. There is a very good hospital there, so that it is probable that we will use it as a convalescent hospital.

Yorkton will become an equipment holding unit.

Aylmer will become a flight engineers' school.

Moose Jaw will become a personnel holding unit.

Carberry will become an equipment holding unit.

Medicine Hat will become an equipment holding unit.

Penhold will become a radio maintenance unit. That will be for radio mechanics, and the maintenance of radio equipment.

Mossbank will become an equipment holding unit.

Lethbridge will become an equipment holding unit.

Picton will become a pre-aircrew educational school, with about 600 trainees in it.

Guelph, as I said earlier, will be returned to the lessor.

Estevan will be an equipment holding unit.

Swift Current will be a pre-aircrew educational school.

Mr. GRAHAM: What will be the number at Swift Current?

Mr. POWER: About 240 trainees at Swift Current.

Mr. SENN: What service establishments will be necessary at these aircraft holding units?

Mr. POWER: One hundred.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Is the department at the present time constructing, or completing the construction of any air fields?

Mr. POWER: I do not think so—well, when I say that I do not think so, I should add that in all possibility there would be certain buildings to be completed. I do know of one, where the school was about to close, and where we had to put a roof on the building. We do that; in order to preserve the property it would have to be done. But orders have been given, generally, to close all works. It must not be forgotten, however, that so long as we are in operation, just as if we were operating a plant or a factory, we will keep that plant up to the highest possible capacity. I am not going to let the plant go down just because there is a possibility of closing in the near future. We are not undertaking any new works, but we are not going to let the plants go down to nothing.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Probably the minister will explain why, in a return brought down on March 23 in my name, regarding the airfield at Mount Pleasant, Prince Edward Island, it is stated that up until February 20, 1944, more than $2,702,000 had been spent, and that there were commitments to date of something over $4,000,000. Does that $4,000,000 imply that there is construction work to be done, or work that has already been done?

Mr. POWER: I would think, frankly, that might mean that work would be done, because I know Mount Pleasant is now in operation. The work must be pretty well completed by this time. But there is always work to be done before the thing levels out and becomes as good as we want it to be.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: We are glad to have the minister's explanation, and I am sure it will do much to prevent further misunderstanding. In his remarks the minister did not say anything about the relative merits of schools in eastern and western Canada, so far as flying conditions are concerned.

Mr. POWER: I certainly have said many times in the house that if I had to start this plan over again I would prefer to go to western Canada. There is no question about that—except that certain operational training units might not be placed there, where it is important that the trainees become acclimatized to conditions somewhat similar to those which they will have to meet on the other side. But for ordinary elementary training, and perhaps for service flying training there is no question in my mind that the western prairies is the best country for it.

Mr. HANSELL: A great deal of concern has been registered in different parts of the country concerning the announcement that these air training schools were to be closed. Of course, if the war is soon to come to an end, and if that is the reason for the closing of the schools, the people may rejoice. On the other hand we do know that some are extremely concerned about the closing of the air schools and their concern is clearly from a business point of view. That must not be regarded as an indication that the people have selfish motives, but should be regarded only as an indication that they are interested in their business arrangements, and do not want to see them come to an end. Be that as it may, we recognize that it has to be done sooner or later. The question I would ask the minister is one that concerns many communities, and I would ask him to throw some light upon it. When the government desires to close certain schools, I should like to know the basis of their decision. For instance, the minister said that there were six student flying training schools in Alberta, and that four in Canada are to be closed, one of them being at Macleod. The question that is in my mind and in the minds of the citizens of Macleod is why that particular school has to be closed. I know that if the minister announced that some other school had to be closed, the citizens of that community would ask the same question. What is the basis of the decision to close that particular school?

While I am on my feet let me say that I have had, as the minister would expect, a great deal of correspondence from people in the community of Macleod. I shall read only a paragraph from one of the letters to indicate that the people there are satisfied that the Macleod student flying training school is one of the best. The minister will know more about it and perhaps can confirm that opinion. Here is the paragraph:

> Macleod No. 7 S.F.T.S. was one of the schools closed. Now the record of this station will stand any investigation, the flying hours are among the highest, the health is exceptional, the upkeep has been small in comparison, the accidents have been almost nil, the surrounding country is level and lends itself to assisting forced landings; it is on the sewage system, the water is no problem, the lights are direct, everything would tend to make this station one of the easiest places to keep intact.

That is the tenor of most of these letters that I have received. Assuming that the Macleod training school is one of the best, I am wondering why that particular school should have to be closed.

Would the minister also mind telling me what are the six flying training schools located in Alberta?

I wish the minister would throw some light on this question of closing schools, because naturally the people of a certain town who have been informed that their school is one of the highest rating naturally ask why that particular school should have to be closed.

Mr. POWER: Every school has the highest rating. I do not know of any school that has not the highest rating. My hon. friend over here has a school in his constituency at Dunnville, an excellent school, but it was closed, and the same with the school at Goderich, an excellent school. The hon. member for Moose Jaw has had three schools in his constituency closed, at Moose Jaw, Caron and Mossbank, all excellent schools, but they are all closed just the same. We closed an elementary school, an excellent school too, in the constituency of the Prime Minister. I closed an elementary school in my own constituency once. It was an excellent school, with an excellent man in charge, but it was closed. We have to close them somewhere. The R.A.F. schools closed first, and we have to close something like an equivalent number. I do not know that there are many reasons I could give why one particular school should be closed more than another, except that the officers of the department checked up and said that they thought it should be done. In some cases I intervened. I thought Brantford could stand the closing of its school without interfering with its economy because it is a manufacturing town where a lot of manufacturing is being done. Regina had two schools, and one had to be closed. The same with Saskatoon, where there were two schools. We closed down the I.T.S. and left the other, and so on all down the line. I cannot give my hon. friend any particular reason for the closing down of the school at Macleod any more than I could with respect to the school at Yorkton. I do not know that I should be asked to go into these details. They are all good schools—the training is good; the sewage is good; the people are good; everything is good.

Mr. HANSELL: I quite agree with the minister that they are all excellent schools and I am glad at least to hear that the sewage is good. That is not the question I asked. The question I asked was as to the basis of the decision to close certain schools. I agree that they are all excellent schools, but they cannot all be the best. There must be one a little better than some of the others, and of course the people of Macleod think theirs is just a little better than some of the others. I am asking the minister the question so that I can satisfy my constituents. When I asked him the basis of the decision to close down certain schools he said—and I do not think it was a slip—that his officials checked up. What did they check up? Was it the efficiency of the school or what? I am not suggesting that there is any favouritism one way or the other. I think everyone in the house will agree that the minister's department is one department that has been run with exceptional efficiency. We have trained a great air force in Canada and credit has to go to the minister. But again I ask him the basis of the decision to close certain schools.

Mr. POWER: The officers looked over the schools. There is sometimes the question of travelling from one school to another, and so on. I do not think there is any particular reason why the school at Macleod should have been selected rather than some other. I really do not know. The officers came to me with a list of schools which they thought ought to be closed and in certain cases I intervened for economic reasons; for instance, at Regina and Brantford where normally the schools would not have been closed at all, but I thought those places could better afford to have their schools closed down than some other places.

Mr. HANSELL: What are the six service flying training schools in Alberta?

Mr. POWER: They are at High River, Calgary, Claresholm, Vulcan, the wireless school at Calgary—that should not be in, I made a mistake—I should have said five—and one at Pearce.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned until Thursday at 3 o'clock p.m., pursuant to special order made Monday, February 21, 1944.

Thursday, April 20, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

MESSAGE OF PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT THROUGH HON. RAY ATHERTON, UNITED STATES AMBASSADOR

Mr. SPEAKER: I desire to make a statement to the house.

After His Excellency the Honourable Ray Atherton, United States Ambassador, had presented his credentials to His Excellency the Governor General, he made a formal visit to the Speakers of the Senate and of the House of Commons, that through them he might tender his respects to both houses.

Mr. Speaker Vien and I returned the visit together and took the opportunity to express not only personal congratulations to His Excellency but the appreciation of Canada that the United States of America had honoured us by accrediting as ambassador to Canada one of the most distinguished members of its diplomatic service, a gentleman whose reputation had preceded him and who in the short period of his stay here has demonstrated vividly that his high qualities have not been exaggerated.

At the same time we expressed our profound thankfulness for the unbounded confidence which existed between our two countries, a confidence strengthened and cemented by that great occasion on 25th August last when the President spoke to Canada in this our own capital.

His Excellency was good enough to say that he would wish to convey our sincere tribute to the President personally. This he did, and on Tuesday last His Excellency received a letter from President Roosevelt. I have a copy of this letter, and I have permission to read it to the house:

The White House, Washington,
April 6, 1944.

My dear Mr. Ambassador:

I am glad that you told me in your letter of March 23, 1944, of the visit you received from Messrs. Vien and Glen of the Canadian parliament, and of their deep attachment to the great tradition of Canadian-American friendship.

At some appropriate time would you please thank them for their kind words of me, both when I was in Ottawa and when you spoke with them at the Chancery.

I wish also that you would tell them of the instinctive regard and affection for Canada and Canadians which a century and more of successful neighbourliness has engendered among Americans. It means much to us that Canadian-American relations have developed a quality all their own.

I think also that it can fairly be said that we Americans face the immense tasks ahead with greater confidence because of the practical lessons of the past, the strongly rooted co-operation of the present, and the concrete ideals we share for the future.

Very sincerely yours,

Franklin D. Roosevelt.

The Honourable Ray Atherton, American Ambassador,
Ottawa, Canada.

I would like to say, and I believe the house would wish me to say, that Canada affirms and endorses these utterances of President Roosevelt, articulating as they do ideals which link our two countries. We have demonstrated in what are now ages the blessings of peace between nations; we are proving now that the pursuits of peace have neither destroyed nor impaired the virility of our peoples, and we shall in the future seek, in unity to dwell, a peace which shall be for the benfit of mankind everywhere based upon justice for all.

INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENTS

CANADA-NEWFOUNDLAND—CANADA-MEXICO—CANADA-UNITED STATES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I desire to table exchange of notes between Canada and Newfoundland constituting the agreement for the settlement of claims arising out of traffic accidents involving Canadian and Newfoundland vehicles; St. John's, Newfoundland, January 24 and February 7, 1944.

Also exchange of notes between Canada and Newfoundland prolonging for a further period of one year the agreement on the operation of a commercial air service to Newfoundland by Trans-Canada Air Lines, effected by an exchange of notes, February 6, 7, 9 and 27, 1942; St. John's March 1 and 2, 1944.

Exchange of notes between Canada and the United States of America constituting an agreement for the settlement of claims arising out of traffic accidents involving Canadian and United States vehicles, signed at Ottawa March 23, 1944.

Exchange of notes between Canada and Mexico recording the agreement in respect of conscription for military service in Canada and Mexico; Mexico, February 29, 1944.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In connection with the exchange of notes between the United States and Canada in regard to the settlement of claims for injuries to members of the armed forces, as I gathered it, I desire to ask the Prime Minister if any arrangement has been made with the government of the United States whereby Canadian nationals may have some chance of getting claims against agencies of the government of the United States settled without having to resort to actions in United States courts. Perhaps I could go a little further and say this. It is a well known rule of international law that a foreign government may not be sued in Canada, we will say. That rule apparently is being extended to cover and include agencies of foreign governments which have incurred obligations in Canada for and on account of a foreign government. In a case that has come to my attention suit was brought against a foreign agency and a default judgment was entered; then, as I understand it, the Department of External Affairs intervened and asked that the judgment be vacated, on the ground of a breach of international comity. Personally I think that is carrying the rule a little far; but the effect of it, if accepted and carried to a conclusion, is that no Canadian national can recover in a court of law in Canada his just claims against a foreign government; he must go to the foreign country to pursue his claim, at great expense to him. If it is possible to make an arrangement in this regard similar to the arrangement made in regard to the subject matter covered by the notes tabled to-day, I suggest to the Prime Minister that some arrangement ought to be made to cover these claims for supplies and materials, we will say, furnished by Canadian nationals to United States government agencies in connection, for instance, with the construction of the Alaska highway. I know of one case where a bill of $30,000 has been unpaid for fifteen months. The person concerned has a judgment which he is being asked to vacate, and on which he cannot collect unless he goes to the United States to pursue it. Of course that ought not to be the case.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps my hon. friend would allow me to look into the matter and give him an answer to-morrow.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Certainly.

UNITED NATIONS

APPLICATIONS FROM CANADIANS WISHING TO SERVE ABROAD ON STAFF OF UNRRA

Hon. L. R. LaFLECHE (Minister of National War Services): During the course of the discussion on Tuesday on the second reading of the bill for the carrying into effect of the agreement for United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration, the statement was made by the parliamentary assistant to the President of the Privy Council that if any Canadians wished to serve abroad on the staff of UNRRA, applications might be forwarded to the Department of National War Services, which would pass them on to UNRRA headquarters at Washington.

As a result of the publicity which has been given in the press and over the radio to this matter, I should like to offer a word of explanation as to what the situation is at the moment. There are two classes of positions which UNRRA will be called upon to fill. The first includes administrative and executive posts, and the selection of personnel for these positions rests entirely with UNRRA. Canadians who may be interested in such opportunities should forward their applications direct to the Director General, UNRRA, Dupont Circle building, Washington, D.C.

Should any such applications come to the Department of National War Services, their receipt will be acknowledged and they will be forwarded immediately to UNRRA.

There is a second class of positions for work in the field which contemplates, I understand, small groups of planning and supervising personnel. It is expected that these positions will be filled from voluntary agencies interested in UNRRA activities. We have given an assurance to UNRRA that we shall be prepared to offer our best assistance in organizing cooperation between these agencies and in the recruiting of such personnel.

As mentioned by the parliamentary assistant to the President of the Privy Council, no indication has yet been received by the government as to how many employees will be required under this scheme, nor do we know the requirements in regard to experience.

However, in anticipation of the receipt of this information immediate steps are being taken to communicate with the voluntary societies and to set up the machinery to deal with applications. The voluntary agencies are being invited to communicate with my department and we will welcome inquiries from others interested in this work. In the meantime, any applications received by my department will be duly recorded and the applicants advised that as soon as any details are available, they will be informed as to the procedure to be followed.

ALBERTA PROVINCIAL BANK

MOTION FOR REFERENCE TO STANDING ORDERS COMMITTEE OF PETITION FOR INCORPORATION

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge) moved:

That,—

(1) The petition of Ernest C. Manning and others, of Edmonton, Alberta, presented on March 29, 1944, praying for the passing of an act to incorporate The Alberta Provincial Bank;

(2) The report of the clerk of petitions on the said petition; and

(3) The private bill deposited with the clerk of the house on April 17, 1944, based on the said petition;

be referred to the standing committee on standing orders to consider the suspension of,—

(a) Standing order 92 (late presentation of the petition);

(b) Standing order 93 (1) (late depositing of the bill); and

(c) Standing order 93 (3) (a) and (c) (consequential penalty charges).

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend has given the first intimation of his motion to the house itself. The government has had no previous knowledge of his intention to bring up this matter to-day, and perhaps he would oblige us by allowing the motion to stand until another day.

Motion stands.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

APPOINTMENT OF GEORGE A. TOUCHE AND COMPANY AS AUDITORS

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Transport) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 86, respecting the appointment of auditors for National Railways.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

GOVERNMENT FINANCING OF INDUSTRIAL CAPACITY EXPANSION

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. With reference to the report on the government-financed expansion of industrial capacity in Canada as at December 31, 1943, issued by the Department of Munitions and Supply, how much of the total commitment of $856,983,614 was allocated for use in each province?

2. How much of the total expenditure of $714,258,389 was expended in each province?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1 and 2. It is impossible to give a money breakdown by provinces, that will properly reveal the extent to which each province is participating in war orders made possible by (a) government-financed expansion of industrial capacity, (b) the operations of crown companies, (c) by ordinary award of contracts.

LABOUR CONDITIONS—INSTRUCTIONS TO REGISTRARS

Mr. DORION:

1. Has the Minister of Labour given instructions to registrars under order P.C. 1355, section 6, subsection 1?

2. If so, (a) to whom; (b) at what date; (c) what were those instructions?

Mr. MARTIN:

1. No. The Minister of Labour has not found it necessary to act under section 6, subsection (1) of order P.C. 1355.

2. Answered by No. 1.

POSTAGE STAMP VENDING MACHINES

Mr. BOUCHER:

1. Has the government of Canada a contract with the Canadian Stamp Vendors Limited?

2. If so, does the company sell stamps by use of a stamp-vending machine?

3. What commission or profit is allowed to the company on stamps so sold?

4. What was the total amount of commission or profit accruing to the company on stamps sold by vending machine during each year since the contract was entered into?

Mr. MULOCK:

1. No. In 1938 permission was granted the Canadian Vending Machines, Limited, to install machines in certain locations for the sale of postage stamps, as a measure of convenience to tourists, transients and other members of the public who require stamps after regular hours when post offices and ordinary licensed vendors are closed.

2. The machines vend stamps at the following prices: 4 one-cent stamps, 5 cents; 2 two-cent stamps, 5 cents; 3 three-cent stamps, 10 cents; and a notice to this effect is placed in the machine for the information of the public.

3. No commission is paid by the department to the Canadian Vending Machines, Limited. All stamps sold through their vending machines must be purchased at face value from the local post office of the city or town in which the machine is located.

4. The stamps sold through these machines of the Canadian Vending Machines, Limited, are in the same form as the regular rolls of stamps purchased by business concerns, using stamping machines, and as they are purchased at face value from postmasters in the same manner as stamps sold to the general public no record is kept of the amount of postage stamps sold in stamp vending machines.

COAL SUBVENTIONS

Mr. HANSELL:

1. How much has been paid by the government by way of subventions for the movement of coal in each of the years 1939 to 1943 inclusive?

2. To what firms and persons were these amounts paid?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. Subventions which were paid directly in Canada to the railways or coal mine operators or distributors are as follows on a calendar year basis:

1939	$4,092,399 26
1940	4,315,589 83
1941	4,489,229 05
1942	4,420,380 37
1943	2,533,084 18

2. Amounts paid during the calendar years 1939, 1940, 1941, 1942 and 1943 by way of subventions on the movement of coal and before deducting any refunds were as follows:

Firm	1939	1940	1941	1942	1943
Acadia Coal Co. Ltd.	$ 34,624 37	.....	.....	.....	.....
Algoma Central & Hudson Bay Railway	2,512 15	.....	.....	.....	.....
Canada Coal Ltd.	13,580 00	.....	.....	.....	.....
Canadian Collieries (Dunsmuir) Ltd.	211,083 28	$ 183,173 57	$ 74,025 83	$ 103,950 96	$ 32,851 02
Canadian Import Co.	21,083 98	37,863 53	.....	.....	.....

PAMPHLET "EMPLOYERS' GUIDE"

Mr. DORION:

1. How many pamphlets entitled "Employers' Guide" have been printed?
2. How many have been distributed?
3. To whom have they been distributed?

Mr. MARTIN:

2. 469,500.
3. Direct mailing to individual employers, 162,000; to employment and selective service offices and regional offices, to be available to meet requests from farmers and supplementary requests from mercantile and industrial employers, 279,100; to divisional registrars of the mobilization section, to meet employers' requests and for information, 25,200; casual distribution to interested parties and enquirers, 3,200; on hand to meet further requests, 80,500.

PARACHUTES

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. Has the government awarded contracts for testing silk to be used in the manufacture or repair of parachutes to persons or companies in the city of Montreal?
2. If so, to what persons or companies have these contracts been awarded?
3. During the years 1939, 1940, 1941, 1942, 1943 and 1944, what were the amounts of such contracts?
4. During the same years, what sums of money were paid with regard to these contracts by the dominion government, and to whom were such sums paid?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. No.
2, 3 and 4. Answered by No. 1.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

BRITISH COLUMBIA SECURITY COMMISSION

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. What is the total personnel of the British Columbia security commission, and what are the names, position or duties, and salary of each member?
2. How many are located in Vancouver; how many elsewhere than Vancouver, and at what points?
3. Has there been any reduction in the staff of the British Columbia security commission during the past fiscal year, and if so, by how many?
4. How many parcels of real estate formerly owned by Japanese have been disposed of by the custodian of enemy property to date?
5. What amount has been realized from such sales, and what disposition has been made of the funds so realized?
6. In what cities, towns or districts was the property situated which has been disposed of by the custodian?

WAR HISTORIES

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. Will the official history of the first great war be completed?
2. How many volumes were to comprise the completed history?
3. (i) How many persons have been employed from 1918 to date in the preparation thereof, and what is the total expenditure to date for, (a) salaries, (b) other expenses; (ii) when is completion of the history expected?
4. What steps are now being taken to accord an official record with regard to Canada's participation in the present war?

FOREST RESEARCH

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. Does the federal government do any research work on forestry projects other than those in the forest products laboratories in Ottawa, Montreal and Vancouver?
2. If so, what type of research work is being done, and by what agencies?
3. What were the federal government expenditures on forestry research projects in 1938, 1939, 1940 and 1941, (a) by the Department of Mines and Resources; (b) by the national research council?
4. What were the total expenditures of the national research council on all projects during the years 1938, 1939, 1940 and 1941?
5. What is the area of forest land in Canada?
6. How much of this land is considered as having commercial value at present?
7. How, and from whom were these data obtained? Are they based on actual ground or air surveys?
8. Were representations made to the Minister of Mines and Resources in May, 1943, in respect to federal assistance to the provinces for forestry work?
9. If so, was a brief submitted by these representatives?
10. What action, if any, has been taken in respect to these representations?
11. Did representatives of any forestry industry group meet with and make recommendations on forestry matters to the Minister of Mines and Resources at any time during the years of 1935, 1936, 1937, 1938 or 1939?
12. If so, what was the date of such meeting, and what actions, if any, were taken by the government in respect to these representations?
13. Is sales tax collected on all lumber sold in Canada?
14. Is sales tax collected on the production of lumber produced by small portable mills and sold in Canada?
15. How many such portable mills, if any, are exempted from the payment of sales tax on the lumber they produce and sell in Canada?
16. How many of these mills are located in each of the provinces of Quebec, New Brunswick, Ontario, Manitoba, and British Columbia?
17. What was the total of the taxes, other than sales tax, collected by the federal government from pulp and paper companies in Canada during the years 1940, 1941 and 1942?
18. What was the total of the taxes, other than sales tax, collected by the federal government from lumber companies in Canada during the years 1940, 1941 and 1942?

19. What was the total of the taxes, other than sales tax, collected by the federal government from pulp and paper companies and from lumber companies in Canada during the year 1943 (estimates only)?

REQUIREMENT OF EMPLOYERS TO REPORT EMPLOYEES FOR MILITARY SERVICE

Mr. DORION:

1. Has the government received any protest against the putting into force of the order of the Minister of Labour, dated the 28th January, 1944, authorized by order in council P.C. 9919 of the 31st December, 1943, obliging employers to report their employees even if such employees are their sons or relatives?

2. If so, from whom did such protest originate?

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION TO MEET CERTAIN EXPENDITURES AND GUARANTEE OF SECURITIES AND INDEBTEDNESS

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to issue securities not exceeding $10,549,500 in principal amount to provide the moneys necessary to meet capital expenditures made or capital indebtedness incurred during the calendar year 1944; to make provision for the purchase or refunding of capital obligations of the company, or of any company comprised of the Canadian National Railway system, during the said calendar year and for the issue of substituted securities for such purpose; to authorize the governor in council to guarantee the principal, interest and sinking funds of securities issued by the company for the purpose aforesaid; to authorize the making of temporary loans to the said company secured by such securities and not exceeding $10,549,500 in principal amount to enable the said company to meet such expenditures and indebtedness; with authority to give financial aid and assistance to other companies of the said national system.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PRESS REPORT AS TO WORKERS' DEMANDS RESPECTING POST-WAR FINANCIAL AND ECONOMIC POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): It is reported in the press to-day that at the session of the International Labour Organization which convenes at Philadelphia to-morrow, demands will be made by the workers' delegates for some machinery whereby world trade unions can help to direct any peace treaty or post-war agreements on financial and economic policy. This move if approved would, the dispatch says, greatly broaden the powers of the International Labour Organization, which are at present limited to labour and social policy. Approval of the idea is said to have been given by the British Foreign Secretary, the Hon. Anthony Eden. Has the government given consideration to this point, and, if so, what decision has been reached as to Canada's policy? Have the Canadian delegates to the meeting received any directions from the government relating to the matter?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The communication which the leader of the opposition has just read to preface his question is a mere press report. It makes no definite statement about anything. It says that the demands of the workers' delegates may be put forward for the reasons mentioned, and that it is rumoured or alleged that Mr. Eden was favourable. I would say to my hon. friend that the government has received no communication with respect to the matter one way or the other. If and when any communication is received it will receive due consideration.

Mr. GRAYDON: I take it there have been no instructions given?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There could not be any instructions because there is nothing on which to instruct anyone.

DOMINION ELECTIONS

PRESS REPORT AS TO STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE AT HANNA, ALBERTA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): A Canadian Press dispatch of yesterday's date from Hanna, Alberta, says that:

Federal Agriculture Minister Gardiner told a nomination convention here last night he could not predict the date of the next federal general election, "but I advise you to get busy immediately." He said Prime Minister Mackenzie King had ruled against extending the life of the dominion government.

I do not know whether the word "government" was a misquotation or not.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Wait for Bracken.

Mr. GRAYDON: He is worth waiting for. I continue. Having in mind that the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson), speaking in Hamilton some weeks ago, indicated that there was a likelihood of a federal election this fall, and in view of this further reported statement of the Minister of Agriculture, will the Prime Minister kindly inform the house if his views coincide with the views which his ministers are reported to have expressed?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I do not know that I am obliged to disclose my views on any matter, least of all on the subject of the time of a general election. I would say with regard to that matter that I have nothing to add to the statements I have made from time to time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We can assume it would not be before August 25—it could not be.

CANADIAN FORCES

ORGANIZATION OF WELCOME TO RETURNING MEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): An organized effort on the part of municipalities and groups of citizens across Canada is being made with the very laudable objective of giving to members of our armed forces who are returning to Canada a proper welcome when they arrive. Will the Minister of National Defence kindly inform the house as to what cooperation his department or other departments of government give to these organizations in connection with the work, and whether or not a lead is being given by the government to the formation of such welcoming committees in districts where no committees have been so constituted? Many citizens would like to be on hand to welcome our men from the services when they come back, but very often news of the arrival reaches the public only after the event has taken place. Perhaps the minister would be good enough to indicate what steps are being taken by his department to notify the next of kin of the return of these men and women, and also if it would be possible to inform the public as well as to the date of their expected arrival.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I do not propose to make any extended answer to my hon. friend's question to-day because it involves setting out the procedure which has been adopted by the department under various circumstances. I wish to say to the house that there are two different classes of those who are coming home in respect of whom it is so desirable to extend warm welcomes—those who are on board hospital ships, and those who are on board transports. In the case of the hospital ships it is much easier to give notice in advance because of the fact that no security considerations are involved that is to say, the nominal rolls of those who are on the hospital ships are sent to us soon after they leave the other side, and it is public knowledge that the hospital ship is afloat. We are glad to make it known when the ship arrives and therefore are able to give more advance notice than we can in the case of the transports. In the case of the transports, security provisions prevent us from publishing anything about the arrival of the ship until at least twenty-four hours have elapsed. As a matter of fact men arrive in Montreal generally before it is known that the transport is in. But procedure has been adopted in connection with both cases in order to give the maximum of notice, and I hope to give the house a further statement on it within a day or two.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

CORRESPONDENCE WITH SASKATCHEWAN MOBILIZATION BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): On March 6 of this year, or thereabouts, a motion was passed for the return of certain correspondence between the national war service mobilization board of Saskatchewan and certain individuals. Could the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour tell me anything about that return?

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): I am glad the hon. gentleman has asked this question, for I was about to ask that he, together with the rest of the house, agree that we be not required to comply with the order. To do so would mean an examination of some 135,000 files in the office of the registrar at Regina. However, I believe the hon. gentleman is entitled to have the matter cleared up, and it is proposed to appoint a commissioner, perhaps under order in council P.C. 4020, to deal with the matter, to take evidence, and in that way bring it to a satisfactory conclusion.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have no desire to overwhelm the department with work, and I shall be glad to discuss the matter with the parliamentary assistant and to accept his suggestion.

CANADIAN ARMY

GRANTING OF FARM LEAVE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Some weeks ago the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) announced the regulations in regard to the granting to men in the armed forces of farm leave for spring work. That is now a matter of extreme urgency, because spring work is beginning on the farms. Together with many other hon. members of this house I have received complaints that in the administration of these regulations there is not the uniformity there should be, and that there have been unnecessary delays. I should like to ask the minister what is being done to make sure that commanding officers in all parts of Canada look into the applications for leave and make decisions thereon at the earliest possible day. Men are needed now, and decisions should be made without delay.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I shall look into the matter and give my hon. friend an answer to-morrow.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

EXCLUSION OF PROFESSIONAL EMPLOYEES FROM PROVISIONS OF P.C. 1003

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): Has the Department of Labour or the national wartime labour relations board received any protest from the association of technical employees against the reported decision of the board excluding professional employees from the provisions of the new wartime labour relations regulations, and, if so, what consideration is being given to the protest?

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour): I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question. It is true that a protest has been received from the national chairman of the association of technical employees with regard to a reported decision of the national wartime labour relations board excluding professional employees from the provisions of the wartime labour relations regulations under P.C. 1003. With regard to the consideration being given to the protest, it is necessary to quote the decision of the board, which reveals that such protests and their consideration have been anticipated. The decision of the board reads in part as follows:

. . . for purposes of the regulations, persons employed in a professional capacity shall be deemed to be employed in a confidential capacity, with the board reserving the right to review its decision in six months.

It will be recalled that the wartime labour relations regulations exclude from "employee" as defined, persons employed in a confidential capacity. By reserving the right to review its decision the board has realized that all interested parties require time in which to prepare their cases for presentation to the board at a subsequent date, when the matter will come up again.

INQUIRIES OF THE MINISTRY

STATEMENT OF MR. SPEAKER AS TO QUESTIONS ASKED ON ORDERS OF THE DAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. SPEAKER: I would point out to hon. members that questions of a kind which should not be asked on the orders of the day should not be answered when so asked. I have endeavoured to enforce this rule as far as possible, but I must have the assistance of the house in regard to it. These questions should be placed on the order paper. To-day several questions of this kind have been asked and answers have been given. I do suggest that questions which are improperly asked should not be answered.

HYDE PARK DECLARATION

PRESS REPORTS AS TO SUSPENSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I hope the question I am about to ask will be in order; it is prompted by the fact that to-day we welcome back the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). We are pleased indeed to see him looking so well, and hope his health will continue to be good. On Monday of this week I asked the Prime Minister a question with respect to the Hyde Park agreement, and the right hon. gentleman was good enough to indicate that he would answer the question when the Minister of Finance came back. I am only mentioning the matter now as a reminder, in the hope that we may expect an answer soon.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I had hoped to be able to make a statement to-day, but it will not be possible for me to do so. I expect to be able to make the statement either to-morrow or Monday.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Tuesday, April 18, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Air services branch—

3. Civil aviation: operation and maintenance of municipal (terminal) airports, $398,260.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): I should like to say a few words in connection with civil aviation. There are many aspects of the problem, and when one reads the minister's statement respecting the domestic problem of aviation, and also the international air transport convention, he realizes the vastness of the subject. To my mind however the whole international situation is wrapped up with the question of civil aviation. This matter is both international and domestic, and the settlement of the whole problem will not be easy.

I should like to make a few observations respecting the domestic problems. It is proposed to set up a board, something like the board of transport commissioners, and, as the minister said, it will be charged with the responsibility of——advising the government on ways and means of bringing about a rapid and well-planned expansion of transport by air. The proposed board will examine the needs for new commercial services, and make recommendations for their establishment and expansion, in both the domestic and international fields; receive applications for the services and issue commercial licences; establish tariffs and regulate rates; examine the ownership, financial structure, operations, and financial position of carriers; make recommendations for needed financial assistance; advise the government on matters affecting the operation of existing aerodromes; report on the need for new aerodromes; and perform such other allied duties as may be determined.

I agree that this board should be set up, but I think it should be the intention of the government to give the board absolute freedom of action. They should have as much latitude as possible, should act as a judicial body, and should not be interfered with. The board must be free from government or political control, in order that it may operate in the best interests of Canada.

As the minister has said, the board will make a study of the whole situation. From time to time it will have to make decisions, and for that reason it must be free from political control. I believe Canada should wake up to the necessity of expanding, particularly in the field of air transport, farther than we have gone so far; but that expansion must be carried on through both public and private ownership. The board will be necessary under any circumstances, even if the government were to agree to the operation of Trans-Canada Air Lines as a non-competitive and non-profit system, with a monopoly of trans-Canada traffic. As the minister pointed out, a second system would probably be wasteful and unjustified at the present time. This may be so just now, but I must point out that our decision as to whether we should have a competitive system in the future will depend on the service given by the one publicly-owned system.

The minister points out he does not want to have a second system in competition because, as he has suggested, we have had an example of ruinous competition in our transportation systems. But I do not think competition in railway transportation systems, as we have seen it before, is parallel with the air transport situation. Moreover, it was competition not only between two systems, but among various systems subsidized by the government. That was what got us into trouble. There was the idea that Canada was not being adequately served and was not expanding sufficiently with one railway system, the Canadian Pacific. There was a clamour on the part of the public for further systems, and when those systems were instituted they found it easy to get subsidies of one kind and another from both provincial and dominion governments. We did in fact get into a serious situation.

The position in connection with air travel is not the same. As I see it, there is no doubt that Canadian Pacific Air Lines is threatening the position of Trans-Canada Air Lines in Canada. But Canada was fortunate in the fact that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company entered the field of aviation. We should be very thankful for the work it has done. I doubt very much if the north country in Canada would have been opened up to the same extent, during the difficult days through which we have passed, had it not been for the enterprise of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and its formation of Canadian Pacific Air Lines. In those times the small and independent private companies, or bush lines, for various reasons were on the verge of ruin. That was not altogether the fault of the former government, but rather the result of the times through which we were passing. Canadian Pacific Air Lines paid fair prices for those lines, and in many cases gave employment to the men who had been their originators.

I think, too, that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had in mind their tardiness in entering the field of bus and motor traffic, and they did not want to have a repetition of that type of competition in respect of air lines. Altogether it is my view that they deserve a great deal of credit for the position they have taken. There is no doubt that the divorcing of the air companies from the railways is a blow to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. It may be justified at the present time—the minister seems to think it is, but I have some doubts about it. It is my view that a great deal of study is required before such a drastic measure is adopted. The same would apply to the divorcing of Trans-Canada Air Lines from the Canadian National Railways. Much study is required before that is done.

The minister has made a statement with respect to leaving the bush routes and feeder lines open to returned men. Well, to my mind that is just so much eyewash. Why has the minister changed his mind on this point? In 1937, as reported at page 2216 of Hansard, the minister said:

> In my view it is only reasonable that the railways should have a part in the development of air transportation.

Then the minister went on to give his reasons, and said:

> In the first place they are in the transportation business; and in the operation of air lines there are problems in common with the operation of railways.

What are these problems? They are maintenance of equipment, overhaul of equipment, the safety of passengers, and all that sort of thing. Can that be done better by a number of small companies, or can it be done better by one large company? The safety of passengers is a matter which must be given careful consideration. The minister went on to say:

> For instance, both must have ticket offices; both must have facilities for soliciting express and passenger business. The legal problems of both are more or less on a par, and a legal staff trained to railway transportation matters would be valuable in air matters. I could set out many other points where the services are more or less parallel.

As I pointed out a moment ago, there would be the question of overhaul, maintenance and so on. The minister continued:

> So it seemed to me from the start that in a properly organized trans-Canada system the railways should have a part.

The minister made a pretty powerful argument in 1937 for railway participation in civil aviation; why has he changed his mind? He continued:

> In any event, after the consideration of these matters the government has decided that its agency for transportation, the Canadian National Railways, should be the means of organizing this company, just as it was used as the means for operating such shipping as the government has owned, and the means of operating other government transportation facilities.

The Canadian National Railways, as the originator of Trans-Canada Air Lines, had to share the aeroplane business of Canada with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, but, as the minister pointed out in his statement, the Canadian Pacific did not choose to enter into an agreement with the government. On the other hand, as I have indicated, they have done a splendid job in building up feeder lines and generally developing Canada. The minister continued:

> The question now arises: Have we invited the private interests to participate? That question was asked. May I say we did not need to invite them. They came from every part of Canada and the United States, and put on the most persistent lobby in Ottawa that I have ever seen.

Will that lobby be repeated? The minister continued:

> The only way we could make progress was to absolutely refuse to talk to them. We said, "Go back home. We will write our bill, and when we get it written and bring it down you will see it. If you then want any part in it we will give you the chance to discuss the matter." How could we make a deal on the one hand with perhaps a dozen clamouring aviation companies, or with one or two of them, and on the other hand bring down a bill which the government or parliament would approve?

Are we to have the same situation develop under this new system proposed by the government? The minister continued:

> The thing was absolutely impossible. Some one had to make up his mind as to the proper set-up, pick out the responsible people to take care of the initial financing, and after that sit down and see what these services had to offer in the way of experienced personnel, trained operators, and so on; and then decide whether one, two, four or some other number of private companies should be associated in the new organization, whether each would give it strength or otherwise, and then determine the final set-up accordingly.

Many years have gone by, and the Trans-Canada Air Lines and the Canadian Pacific Air Lines have been developed. I am amazed that the minister or the government should have changed their minds. If the Trans-Canada Air Lines, under the management of the Canadian National Railways, have been successful and have been fulfilling the functions for which they were created, why should there be any change? The Canadian Pacific Air Lines is part of an organization, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which for years has been synonymous the world over with Canada and Canadian affairs. Have they not been giving the people the service they should be giving? Have they been exploiting the public? Have they been exploiting their employees? Is there something wrong with the service? Or is it simply that they are doing a better job than the government-owned organization and are thus threatening the government-owned system? The minister said that he did not want to have to meet ruinous competition, but in my opinion the divorcing of these lines from the railway will create competition of the worst kind in the carrying of passengers and express.

Has the minister changed his mind in relation to the legal problems? Instead of having a legal organization for each railway, he intends to have a multiplicity of legal organizations all over the country. This will probably be very good for the lawyers. Will the divorcing of the air lines from the railways facilitate the sale of tickets? The minister said in 1937 that the private interests came from every part of Canada and the United States and put on the most persistent lobby in Ottawa that he had ever seen. This will be repeated. I should like to know just why the minister has changed his mind. Perhaps a little later he will tell us. It is hard for me to find any justification for it, unless this is some more of what we call political eyewash. Is there any reason for this action on the part of the government? Is this an attempt to counter the policies of the C.C.F.? Is the government trying to go one better than the C.C.F. in the taking over of enterprises of this kind? So far as I know, the railways are running the air lines quite well. Not only that, but I think there is far more possibility of Canadian Pacific Air Lines providing positions for our boys when they return from overseas. If we are to set up a number of independent air lines, they will have doubtful success.

Is this being done because the United States have decided to divorce their air lines from their railways? I cannot help but think of the position of the feeder lines of Canadian Pacific Air Lines and realize that the shortest route to Europe and Asia is over the roof of the world. I believe one reason for this action is the fact that the Canadian Pacific Air Lines are threatening the position of Trans-Canada Air Lines. It is doubtful whether the maintenance of a monopoly in international traffic as a continuing policy is advisable. There is no sound reason why we should continue after the war a government-owned system along international lines. The well-entrenched United States lines which cross our border are constantly reaching out for additional entry permits. As I understand it, the United States have eight entries into Canada, while we have only one into the United States. There may be some military reason for this, but I do not think we want to have any competition so far as the development of our country and our airways is concerned. Certainly we should have a quid pro quo basis with the United States so far as entry permits are concerned; that is most necessary. We have the opportunities of developing our air lines, and Canadians should be able to do so on equal terms with our cousins to the south.

Another statement made by the minister is rather alarming. Speaking on March 17 he said as reported in Hansard, page 1578:

> Moreover, in thus establishing freedom of transit, countries such as Canada, which are strategically placed, will be making a very great contribution to an effective international system, particularly when, like Canada, their population is not great and the amount of traffic which they have to offer for international carriage would consequently not be large.

Our population not large, the amount of traffic we have to offer not great! That is not my understanding of Canada's position—the senior self-governing dominion, the fourth amongst the united nations from the standpoint of production of war material, the third or fourth largest trading nation in the world. Is this attitude commensurate with the fine achievement of the men and women of our armed forces, or with the assiduity and enterprise of our war workers as manifested by their magnificent accomplishments, or with the willingness of our people to make sacrifices, or with their support of our victory loans? These attributes which, more than anything else, we can read in the statute of Westminster, are the hallmarks of our nationhood. They indicate the important part that this dominion will have to play on the world stage in the days which lie ahead. Is the attitude of the minister as expressed in the words I have quoted commensurate with our untold natural resources to be developed, with our frontier opportunities to the north being more and more pushed back and opened up to us? Is not the past performance of Canadians indicative of the future possibilities of Canada? Is this attitude of the minister commensurate with our strategical position in regard to Asiatic and European civil aviation prospects over the roof of the world? It seems to me that this kind of thinking shows an inferiority complex. "A small population and not much traffic"—that is not what we should be thinking about.

Another question: is our territory to be used merely as a convenience for international traffic? I do not think we ought to take that attitude. What Canada has to do is to assert her place in the aerial world, both as to world-wide transport and as to domestic and cross-frontier position. Canada's hinterland is still open for discovery. The pioneer spirit of our people must be maintained and further developed. There should be room for both public and private ownership of air transport. If there are opportunities for international and cross-frontier transport, the government must take advantage of them as quickly as possible. If public ownership is not adequate for this purpose, it must be done privately, but the government must see to it that we do not lose out. Take as an example the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The Havana conference gave Canada some sixty-one channels, only forty-four of which are occupied at the present time. I do not know how many channels the United States got, but I can tell you that they have 912 stations operating, while comparatively speaking we have very few. I do not think we should nourish an inferiority complex in this connection; we must stand up for our rights.

May I point out that the board, as it is to be constituted, introduces exactly the same principle as that advocated by the Canadian Association of Broadcasters, that is, an independent board free from government control. This proposal, of course, has been rejected by the Minister of National War Services, but I think a board of this kind would be equally valuable in connection with air transport and with radio.

As regards the proposed convention, as reproduced in Hansard, page 1582, article II, section 1 reads:

> Each member state recognizes that every state has complete exclusive sovereignty over the air space above its territory.

That is as it should be. But then we come to article V, section 4, which gives the duties of a regional council:

> To grant licences to operate international air services within the region; to withhold licences . . .

And so on. That, it seems to me, takes away the rights we have to sovereignty over our own air.

[Mr. Douglas G. Ross.]

In connection with the convention, if I were sure of Canada's power in representation being commensurate with her strategical importance, with the importance of her potential traffic as fourth trading nation, with her potential industrial and agricultural importance in traffic, with her importance as I have indicated before, not as having a population of 11,500,000 people, but of having 25 to 50 million in the not too far distant future, I would be more satisfied.

Can the minister tell us what the position will be? How many votes will Canada have? Who are the eight designated member states? What will be the proportionment of votes? Will Canada have one or six? Will Canada be one of the designated states?

One factor which must not be overlooked is that Canada's area is vast and the problem of policing the air will be one of much moment. It cannot be taken too lightly to see to it that innocent passage over the country is only innocent passage, and not preparation for future aggression.

Another factor: What effect will this convention have on Canada's position in the commonwealth of nations and the British empire? Will it still be possible for the commonwealth and British empire to have an air transport plan? Are there any understandings with the other empire countries—Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, Great Britain and Ireland? Are there any understandings with the self-governing colonies? For myself, I think that Canada has a strategical position in the British commonwealth of nations. Under the statute of Westminster she is a free sovereign and independent nation, and she cannot stand aloof from the world in extreme nationalism. We know that now. We know that distances have very greatly shrunk. We hear rumours of non-stop flights over distances which are far greater than merely across the Atlantic. Canada therefore must assume her responsibilities as well as her advantages in world affairs. She may well, by means of aviation, be one of the strongest forces in knitting together the commonwealth and empire as a power for good and peace in the world. She must be a strong nation in a strong commonwealth and empire, and she can be a strong nation in the formulation of commonwealth and empire policies. Her position and facilities must not be used as a mere convenience. We can use the words of the minister as reported at page 1626 of Hansard and say that Canada may make "as great a contribution as possible to the successful solution of this problem", that is, the problem of international air transport. But this is so largely wrapped up in other international affairs that in making the contribution to air transport she will of necessity make a contribution to peace and stability.

Canada has the opportunity of drawing together, in conjunction with our neighbour, the United States, the English-speaking peoples in their job of enforcing the rule of law and order in the world. In reestablishing the democratic way of life, Canada must have representative power equal to her geographical position, her strategic position and other future possibilities.

Mr. FRED ROSE (Cartier): I welcome the fact that the government has given and is giving some consideration to the problem of post-war aviation. I especially greet the decision of the government to implement Canada's air policy through the medium of a strong government-owned air line, both on the international field and on the main-line routes of Canada. I sincerely believe that under present conditions this approach by the government is best adapted to give the country efficient air transportation and to provide opportunities of employment for returning airmen and workers in the aircraft industry.

In his statement on air policy on March 17, the minister said that Canada's position carries with it great responsibilities and great opportunities. What are these responsibilities and opportunities? In my opinion they are as follows—and when I say in my opinion, unlike others who believe they have the last word, I realize that we are discussing something new, the most concrete discussion that we could have over something for the post-war period, and I am willing to listen to the arguments of others. I repeat therefore that in my opinion these responsibilities and opportunities are as follows:

1. We should strive for cheap, efficient air transport, both inside and outside Canada.

2. We should make the utmost use of facilities created during the war, but wherever these are not well adapted to commercial use they should be replaced.

3. We should create employment for returning air force veterans, both in the field of air transport and also in other fields.

In the interest of Canada we have the responsibility to adopt an attitude to the United States of America, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and Britain which will help promote the maximum cooperation in air transport development to our national advantage.

There is prevalent a tendency to overemphasize the importance of probable international air developments, at least as far as Canada is concerned. The glamour of rapid travel to far places stirs the imagination and focuses attention on the international routes. But a sober appraisal must come to the conclusion that economically domestic air transport will be much more important to Canada for a long time to come.

In order to get the possibilities into proper perspective, let us examine specific routes and traffic.

1. North Atlantic routes to England and Europe: For passengers and freight, both the United States of America and England will have the advantage over us.

Mr. REID: And Scotland too. Keep the record straight.

Mr. ROSE: You can include Scotland. They have powerful aircraft industries, and in addition a larger volume of traffic with which to keep their overhead down. However, there will most likely be sufficient traffic to support a line to the British Isles.

2. Trans-Pacific routes to Australasia and southeast Asia: The Americans have pioneered these routes and undoubtedly will be operating them again after the war. Canada could originate little traffic to these destinations, either passenger or freight. For somewhat the same reasons as enumerated previously for the north Atlantic routes, only more so, it would be folly to expect that Canada could operate in this area without tremendous losses. Many of the American experts do not expect the Pacific routes to be profitable for years.

3. Routes to South America: Again, Canada could originate little traffic and would face the competition of well established United States lines with a large traffic pool to draw upon. It would be extremely difficult to substantiate our right to enter this field, with the possible exception of Mexico.

4. Route to West Indies: Canada could supply a reasonable amount of passenger traffic and possibly some freight on such a route. Our trade connections with these islands and the established tourist travel to them lend some support to the need for an air service direct from Canada. If we also obtained the right to pick up passengers in the United States there is no question as to the desirability of starting such a service.

5. Trans-polar routes: These are the much-discussed short great circle routes from America to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, India and China. They traverse, however, a traffic desert for long distance, and this puts a premium on the maximum pay load to gross weight ratio. The long distances between inhabited places will necessitate long hops with fuel using up a substantial part of carrying capacity. This suggests the need for using equipment stripped of all non-essentials.

Since it would be extremely difficult to provide even passable passenger facilities on the ground in the polar area, the future of these routes appears to be largely for the carriage of freight where speed is essential. Conditions somewhat less rigorous would be characteristic of the route from Canada over Greenland to the Scandinavian countries and the northern part of European Russia. To make use of Canada's geographical advantages by operating the trans-polar routes would require the active collaboration of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. It is in this field that the greatest possibilities are apparent for taking advantage of our geographical position. We should operate a specialized air freight service over these routes. We should lose no time in beginning discussion of this question with the Soviet Union.

6. Carriage of freight anywhere in north America: Canada has led the world in the development of air transportation to handle freight which must reach its destination with all possible speed, such as repair parts, or freight destined for delivery in undeveloped and relatively inaccessible areas. If we could obtain from the United States reciprocal rights for each to carry this type of traffic anywhere in the other's territory, we should have no fear of obtaining our share of the traffic offering.

In addition to our international lines we should make a real effort to benefit from our geographical position by building up service functions to sell to foreign lines using our bases on their international routes. Besides the obvious fueling and servicing of planes, the provision of passenger accommodations, weather reporting and radio directions, we should consider the opportunities to be found in the opening up of free port areas in Canada for air traffic analogous to the great free port areas of the world for ocean traffic. For example, if Halifax, Montreal, Winnipeg and Edmonton were to become important cross-roads on international air routes, then there may be important possibilities in setting up free port areas at these centres, where goods of various nations can be interchanged and even processed without incurring the necessity of passing through customs. For all these services we would of course collect tolls from the foreign lines making use of them.

On the basis of these perspectives, what kind of international air policy is best suited to meet Canada's needs? Obviously the minister was correct in excluding from any general international agreement the question of cross border services of contiguous countries. We need this freedom of action to try to obtain from the United States the right to operate special air freight service anywhere.

Freedom of air transit, as defined by the minister in his statement, gives away the geographical advantages which Canada possesses without getting any advantages for us in return which are of practical use. The minister himself admitted as much when he said on March 17, 1944, at page 1578 of Hansard:

> Moreover, countries such as Canada, which are strategically placed, will be making a very great contribution to an effective international system, particularly when, like Canada, their population is not great, and the amount of traffic which they have to offer for international carriage would consequently not be large. On the other hand, the right of transit would be of particular benefit to those nations which have a great deal of potential traffic for international air services, but are less strategically located.

If this means anything, it means that Canada gets nothing useful in return for granting freedom of air transit, while countries like the United Kingdom and the United States do get very real benefits. Why should we give up this right so cheaply? What we should do is to grant this right in return for a very concrete quid pro quo, for example, from the United States some integration of the aircraft manufacturing industries in the two countries by which Canada may be guaranteed an outlet for certain definite types of planes which we can make here, plus the right for us to pick up and deliver in the United States traffic to and from the West Indies; from England, the benefits of cheap air mail rates to empire destinations; from the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, reciprocal landing and freight traffic rights on trans-polar routes.

It is quite true that "our interest lies in a liberal course of cooperation with other nations," but "cooperation" does not need to be defined in such a way that it means giving away our natural advantages for nothing in return. Neither should we attempt to play dog in the manger. But it is quite within the realm of full international collaboration for us to ask for and expect to get some usable advantage, such as those just described, in return for making our airfields and services available to the air lines of other nations. As noted previously, for these services we provide we expect to receive a fair fee—not a hold-up charge, but a fair return for services rendered.

We do need, just as do the other countries, a multilateral agreement providing for such things as uniform safety rules and air worthiness standards, uniform plane and ground markings and signals, joint accident investigation, weather and direction reporting. It would also be desirable for the various countries to agree on uniform operating standards and exchange information. Yet there are practical limits to which such an agreement can be expected to go under existing conditions. For example it is naive to expect that an international regulatory body will eliminate subsidies. Every major country that decides to have an international air line will have one whether it requires a subsidy to do so or not. In fact, there are many ways of subsidizing air transport indirectly, and no set of rules could successfully stop the practice. Only a few weeks ago, Sir Archibald Sinclair, the British Air Minister, told the House of Commons that British Overseas Airways Corporation would have to be subsidized heavily. A report of this speech appears in the Wall Street Journal for March 17, 1944.

The government policy, already established, of retaining control of all main-line air operations is sound. The minister stresses the importance of encouraging returning airmen to establish bush and feeder routes wherever practicable. I agree with this. I believe our returning airmen should be given all possible help in this respect. While the total employment thus created will not likely be large, it is a field to which the returning airmen will naturally gravitate. However, if they are to be able to start up new air line operations, no matter how small, most of them will require access to capital which is not readily forthcoming from the banks for such activities. It would seem, therefore, that if the government is sincere in its desire to promote this field for returning airmen, it should change the provisions of the Industrial Development Bank bill to make it possible for this institution to grant credit to the airmen to start up in business for themselves. Unless the government takes some such action to make credit available, the creation of post-war employment in this kind of activity will remain a pious hope.

The civil aeronautics administration of the United States Department of Commerce has been planning, and civil aeronautics administration officials have been giving publicity to, extensive domestic airport and facilities developments by the government after the war. It has been strongly recommended that in the first few years after the war the number of airports in the United States should be raised to 6,000, about double the present number. It is estimated by civil aeronautics administration officials that this will involve an expenditure of some eight hundred millions. At the present time about eighty-five per cent of airport facilities have been built with federal money, so that the planned extension of airport facilities contemplates, in effect, a gigantic public works project largely done by the federal government. This data on United States airport development was given in a speech by William A. M. Burden, special aviation assistant to the Secretary of Commerce, before the first national clinic of domestic aviation planning, Oklahoma City, November 11, 1943.

If domestic air transportation is to develop as it should in Canada, some comparable expansion of facilities will be necessary. Many of the war-time airfields are in locations which will be of no commercial value after the war, so that despite the expansion which the minister says has taken place, it is evident that much more will have to be done to equip Canada with the requisite facilities for a large expansion of both commercial and private flying.

For Canada, it is strongly recommended that the airport and airway developments be done by the federal government in order to obtain the best possible organization of facilities from the national point of view. The history of Canadian railroad building, where different municipalities vied with each other to obtain the line through their jurisdiction, should not be repeated with the airways. Financially, none but the largest municipalities can afford to build the type of airports demanded by modern transport planes. Therefore there are both economic and financial reasons for making the provision of airway facilities a federal responsibility. In this way, too, proper standards can be enforced.

The minister's comprehensive statement to the house and the tabling of the draft international air transport convention illustrate vividly the manner in which important post-war policies for Canada are being determined behind the scenes and the country half committed to a policy before any discussion of the issues takes place in parliament. The draft international air transport convention is a document of far-reaching implications. Yet this expression, or suggestion, of policy from Canada was presented to foreign governments for discussion without any previous expression of opinion by the people of Canada or their elected representatives. In this connection we have had a conference in Montreal, and very little is known as to what happened there.

The whole question of air policy, both domestic and international, is of such outstanding importance to the future of this country that it should be the subject of a complete and thorough investigation by a complete royal commission. To mention but a few of the important matters which need first a thorough presentation of the facts and then a discussion of policy based thereon:

(a) The future of the aircraft manufacturing industry: What should be done with the present excessive capacity for peace-time uses? Which plants are best adapted to continue production? What type of planes should they make? Should we produce aeroplane engines? What should be the relation of Canadian industry to its counterpart in the United States and England?

(b) The planned promotion of commercial operations in Canada: What government public works investment is necessary? Where should the additional facilities be established? How quickly can this be done? What research work should be the responsibility of the government as to safety measures, improved ground equipment and communications, new or specialized types of planes?

(c) The relations of air transport to other transport agencies: Will the best development of integrated transportation in Canada be attained by the divorce of air lines from the railroads? What changes are required in the organization and personnel of the board of transport commissioners to assure the competent regulation of all kinds of transport by this one body? Or can it be better done by a separate air body?

(d) The appropriate fields of development in international air transport: What routes can be best operated? What specialized services can we best offer? What kinds of specialized equipment do we need to develop? What undertakings should be done jointly with other nations? What are the necessary terms of an international agreement suited to our particular needs? What service functions can we develop and what should we charge therefor in connection with the operations of foreign air lines over Canadian airways? What bilateral arrangements should we promote with the United States to assure our air lines an equitable share of the trans-border traffic? Can we develop some integrated services with both the United States and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics instead of starting out to try to compete with both?

Until a royal commission has developed the necessary information on all such points and presented it to parliament for discussion, how can we determine an appropriate air policy for Canada? The government should give an undertaking not to make any more commitments or to fly any more kites on tentative agreements until this royal commission has brought in its report and it has been discussed by parliament. Only on the basis of a thorough presentation of the facts can an air policy be developed which will effectively bring closer together not only the people of the various Canadian provinces but also the free peoples of the world.

[Mr. Rose.]

Mr. KNOWLES: I spoke on this matter at some length on March 20, immediately after the minister had made his statement on the subject of post-war civil aviation. Accordingly I do not intend to make a speech at this time, but I should like to direct a number of questions to the minister. I imagine he can be forgiven for not having answered the questions asked as we have gone along, in view of the fact that most of them have come in the midst of full length speeches, but I trust he will do me the honour of answering the questions I am going to put to him at this time. With your permission, Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the questions one or two at a time, get the minister's answers and then ask others.

In connection with the domestic policy which the minister announced on March 17, I should like to ask if the government is planning to take over the northwest staging route and operate it under T.C.A. May I ask another question which is germane to this one. The magazine Canadian Aviation recently published an article concerning this whole subject, and if my memory serves me correctly the statement was made that Trans-Canada Air Lines was endeavouring to get control of this route. It was suggested that this was unfair to Canadian Pacific Air Lines and Yukon Southern, because they had been encouraged to go ahead with their developments in that part of the country and had no prior intimation that a course such as that now proposed might be adopted at some time in the future. In view of that suggestion I should like the minister, when he deals with this subject, to indicate whether Yukon Southern received any assistance from the government in pioneering that route, in the form of mail contracts or in any other way, and also whether in the early days Yukon Southern was given any intimation to the effect that at some time in the future the whole route might come under T.C.A. That is my first question, with respect to the northwest staging route.

Mr. HOWE: I think it has been stated in the railway committee that while Yukon Southern has an annual licence from the board of transport commissioners, it holds a contract with the Post Office Department to carry mail on the route, which contract is cancellable on one month's notice. From the time that service was inaugurated, it has been made perfectly clear to Yukon Southern that the service was temporary, and that at some time the government would wish to operate the service by Trans-Canada Air Lines. The northwest staging route is part of an international route, and it is the policy of the government to operate international routes by Trans-Canada. Perhaps that will answer my hon. friend's questions.

Mr. KNOWLES: From that answer one might infer, then, that in due course that route will come under the control of T.C.A.?

Mr. HOWE: I would point out that two factors are involved. One is the international traffic and the other is the local traffic. I would not like to be quoted as saying that the government would take over the local traffic on the route. As my hon. friend knows, a number of mail stations are served by Yukon Southern, and I should not like to say how these will be served in the future. I will say, however, that at some time Trans-Canada will operate over the northwest staging route, at least to the extent of operating an international route.

Mr. KNOWLES: I think perhaps it should be on the record at this point, at least I should like to have it there, that when we speak of Yukon Southern we are speaking of a subsidiary of Canadian Pacific Air Lines. Further in the same vein I should like to ask if any consideration is being given to taking over the route down the Mackenzie or the route to Labrador.

Mr. HOWE: There is no established route down the Mackenzie. There are a few air stations which serve local points, a few landing strips which serve the Canol project and also local traffic, but at the moment there is no route down the Mackenzie river, and it is not the intention of Trans-Canada to operate a service in that area. In connection with the route from Montreal to Labrador, that route is flown by many planes, and a good deal of the local traffic is handled by government planes. I am told that Canadian Pacific Air Lines do not have a service there at the moment. The only operation from here to Labrador is by government planes, chiefly military.

Mr. KNOWLES: In connection with what I referred to as the route down the Mackenzie I should like to point out, though I said I was not going to make a speech, that this serves a part of Canada in which there is a great deal of mineral wealth. I believe on the C.P.A. air map of Canada a route is indicated in that region, and I hope consideration will be given to the taking over of this route, in view of its importance to the country as a whole. However, I have noted what the minister has to say in this connection. I should like also to ask if the minister could indicate to us what steps have been taken to make sure that when C.P.A. has been separated from the C.P.R. we shall not have the same interests operating the C.P.A. by whatever name it may be called, with the same financial power behind it and the same ability to threaten the position of T.C.A. or to threaten the policy of the government.

Mr. HOWE: I would not care to go any further than to repeat that it is the intention under this policy to divest the railways of their holding of air line ownership. I would not care to go beyond that at the moment.

Mr. KNOWLES: Could the minister say whether this matter will come before the house this year in the form of a bill or legislation of any kind, or is that asking too much?

Mr. HOWE: A bill will be introduced setting up an air transport board, but we shall have to wait until the measure is introduced to see just how far it will go.

Mr. KNOWLES: Now I should like to ask the minister if he feels that the separation of T.C.A. from the C.N.R. is really necessary, if it has any economic advantage or whether it is being proposed merely as a talking point to make it more convenient to insist that the C.P.R. divest itself of C.P.A. If I may repeat my question, is there any economic or other advantage to Canada involved in separating T.C.A. from the C.N.R.?

Mr. HOWE: It is the view of the government that air transport should be developed as such rather than as a subsidiary of surface transportation. The same view is held in all parts of the continent of North America. It is believed that air transport should develop free from railroad traditions, shipping traditions or the traditions of any other form of surface transport. It is a different type of transportation; it requires a different type of salesmanship and a different method of operation, and we believe it is good business at this time to make it an independent form of transportation.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is there to be any other body, apart from the government itself, which will serve as a coordinating agency among various kinds of transportation? There will be an air transport board looking after matters connected with aviation, and a similar board connected with railway transportation. Is there to be a superior board to these, or will coordination of all kinds of transportation, including rail, bus, truck, air and water, head up in the government itself?

Mr. HOWE: Road transportation is within the control of the several provinces. The federal government has no jurisdiction over highway traffic. The board of transport commissioners have jurisdiction over railway traffic, and over certain types of inland steamship traffic. The air board will have jurisdiction over air traffic. I presume if there is any serious interference between rail and air traffic, the two boards can compare notes and work out their problems jointly. There will be no super-board coordinating all traffic.

Mr. KNOWLES: In the minister's statement on March 17 he referred, and with a sense of annoyance, to the fact that Canadian Pacific Air Lines had been able to get aircraft for its transport services, when Trans-Canada Air Lines and others had not been able to do so. In the publication Canadian Aviation to which I have already referred, the minister is criticized on the ground that the government, of which he is a member, should have known of this and should have been in a position to check on the whole question. Will the minister elucidate further?

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend is quite wrong in saying that I spoke with a sense of annoyance.

Mr. KNOWLES: I will accept the annoyance, then.

Mr. HOWE: We were very glad indeed to see Canadian Pacific Air Lines obtain aircraft from the United States. The planes were obtained for military purposes, or to be specific, to assist the United States army in building the Canol project, and also in connection with work on the northwest staging route and on the Alaska highway. I simply pointed out that because of the fact they were serving that area, Canadian Pacific Air Lines did obtain aircraft. Trans-Canada Air Lines is a purely domestic service. True, it was performing certain military functions and carrying military personnel; but its appeal in the United States list of priorities was not as strong as that of Canadian Pacific Air Lines, which organization was performing services directly for the United States army. That was the only point I made.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to ask a question or two respecting the international aspect of the subject of post-war civil aviation. Once again may I express my appreciation of any step taken at any time to get something started which will deal with the problems of the post-war period. I have no hesitation in repeating that I am pleased that the government went so far as to throw into the pool its idea as to how an international air transport authority might be established. In fact it seems to me that a mere empire air scheme is not good enough for the kind of world we will have when the war is over. An empire scheme, if established, would in my opinion immediately call for the making of all kinds of bilateral agreements between the empire air authority and other countries or other combinations. After all, far-flung as the empire is, it would not be possible to carry on very extensive routes without crossing the territory of other nations, and it would be no time at all until an attempt would have to be made to reach agreements. My fear is that if we start off on that basis it will be no time at all until we have a certain amount of horse-trading as between certain countries or groups of countries. It is my opinion that right at the start we should pull all the weight we possibly can for an international plan in the field of international post-war aviation.

I have no hesitation in expressing considerable concern at the difficulty the world is having in making any progress along this line. Some time ago some of us dared to hope that an international gathering to discuss these matters was shortly to be held. A British United Press dispatch carried in this country on February 15 indicated that a post-war air conference was to be held in the United States within a few weeks after the date of that dispatch. The time the conference was to have been held came and went, but it was not convened.

This matter was dealt with in the issue of Time for March 27. In part it states:

> A United States-British-Russian-Canadian air conference was scheduled to take place in Washington in the third week of March. The third week came and went with no conference, but plenty of conjecture. The scheduled meetings were supposed to be mere preliminaries leading up to a full-dress united nations conference. But the preliminaries to the preliminaries turned out to be a caricature of the minuetlike delicacy with which diplomats approach foreign affairs.

I shall not read the article further, but it goes into details as to the number of plans for international gatherings which were mooted, and points out how all of them went on the rocks. Time then indicated that it looked now as though the best we could hope for would be a series of bilateral conferences. Since that time there have been a number of references in the house to bilateral conferences, and so far as this matter is concerned, that now seems to be the recognized technique. I dare to hope that good will come out of these bilateral conferences; but, as I see it, it will be real good only if these conferences lead up to a real international gathering.

Now that this government has thrown into the pool its proposal, as contained in the draft agreement tabled on March 17, has it taken the lead in trying to convene an international gathering to discuss a plan? Further, since bilateral conferences are being held, has this government endeavoured to hold bilateral conferences with any nations other than those reported upon thus far in the press? Canada's position as the largest of the smaller nations places great responsibility upon her. One of those responsibilities is to make other nations smaller than Canada feel that there is a place for them in international councils and authorities of one kind or another. If the government is unable to get the major powers to meet in conference to discuss plans like this, I would hope that it would approach the smaller countries in South America and in other parts of the world and enlist their support and cooperation in the kind of thing the government has set forth in this draft agreement. I can pick out plenty of flaws in this agreement, but I am not going to dwell on them any more than I have already. I consider it is important to get something like this going and that the little flaws that might turn up are of no great consequence.

Perhaps I have taken a long time to state it, but my question is this: Has the government taken the lead in arranging bilateral conferences, or has it endeavoured to get an international gathering together? I hope the answer is, "yes". If it is not, I hope the minister will be able to give us the assurance that this kind of thing will be attempted by the government as soon as possible.

Mr. HOWE: The government of Canada has had discussions with all the British dominions, with India, with the government of the United Kingdom and with the government of the United States and has signified its desire to take part in an international conference with very wide representation. All the nations that are actively considering post-war civil aviation have the same objective in mind. At the present time bilateral conversations are going on between a number of them for the purpose of reconciling the views of the different countries, so that when the conference takes places there will be some hope of obtaining agreement.

Canada is active in that direction. It must be recognized that no group of small countries can have any great influence on the final outcome. I think we must question the wisdom of attempting to group the small countries together as a bloc to go into a conference of that kind. To date Canada is the only country that has placed its post-war policy before the world in detail. I think the fact that we have done so has been helpful. Canada's policy has been widely studied and commented upon, and the fact that it is a concrete policy will, I believe, tend to encourage other countries to make their policies detailed. I think we are making a contribution toward a final settlement. I do not know of any contribution we could make at this time that would tend more in that direction than the policy we are following now.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does the minister know whether any international conference on this matter is in prospect at the present time?

Mr. HOWE: To my knowledge no international conference has been called, but it is hoped that such a conference will be called. No time has been set but, as I say, conversations are going on looking toward the obtaining of sufficient cooperation among the major countries to enable the conference to work out a successful conclusion. Simply to call a great number of nations into conference, without having had earlier discussions, would not be likely to produce a plan that would be wise and to which all the countries present would agree. By having a number of plans discussed in bilateral conversations, it is hoped that some plan can be evolved which when put before a conference, will receive a considerable following.

Mr. REID: Now that Trans-Canada Air Lines are to be under new management and are to develop to greater lengths and heights, perhaps this would be an opportune time to bring up a matter affecting the service between Montreal and Vancouver. As the minister knows, the Vancouver air terminus is located on Sea island. Like Topsy, this airport, just grew up. It was started many years ago when a few air-minded individuals obtained a piece of land and on their own initiative and at their own expense started to develop flying. Great credit is due to those people. Following that, the city of Vancouver, which was looking for an airport close to the city and had no available land within the city itself, bought a large tract of land on Sea island, which embraced the original flying site.

Later on Trans-Canada came into the picture. They had to have an air terminus at which to land and they took over the terminus belonging to the city of Vancouver. This was developed until practically the whole island was an air field. While this airport is ideal in many ways, it has one disadvantage. At certain times fog occurs and the result has been that planes have had to return as far as Lethbridge. Back in 1935 when the Trans-Canada began to realize that they were in the flying business permanently, they began to look for new sites throughout Canada, and a chain of sites was chosen by the pilots and aircraftmen of the company. A site known as Langley Prairie was chosen in the constituency of New Westminster. This is some eighteen miles from Vancouver and it was picked out as an emergency landing field. Since it was free from fog, planes which could not land at Sea island because of fog could land at Langley Prairie and the passengers could be taken into Vancouver or New Westminster by car.

Later on, with the approach of the war this and other fields were taken over by the Department of National Defence. When the war broke out some $150,000 had been spent on this field in clearing, levelling, seeding for grass, ditching and draining, and the whole field was made in readiness for aeroplanes. However, only the odd plane landed there. In 1940, schools were set up throughout Canada to train pilots and it was expected that this emergency field would be used as an overflow for some of the training schools. However, with the advent of Japan into the war the training schools on the Pacific coast were moved farther inland and operational schools were set up in their places to act as defence units in case of attack by enemy aeroplanes. The result is that the field at Langley Prairie has not been used. I suppose it has been thought that it is not large enough to be used by the large planes used by the operational schools at Boundary Bay and Sea island.

My suggestion to the minister is that something be done about this field. I would recommend that the matter be looked into, and in saying so I am not adopting what is sometimes termed "the Vancouver view" of wanting to "hog it all", because Vancouver has to have an airport and should have the airport at Sea island continued. But looking to the great development which Trans-Canada must have following the conclusion of hostilities, steps should be taken to find an airport close to the city of New Westminster or Vancouver and free from fog; and it can be found. Many projects were put before the department; but, since they were recommended by laymen or so-called laymen, the authorities just poohpoohed their ideas and turned down their suggestions.

I seriously advise the minister that the entire countryside be looked over, because we must have more airports than Sea island. Vancouver and New Westminster must have a better service. Although the flight from Montreal to Vancouver does not take very long, under certain conditions aeroplanes have had to turn back as far as Lethbridge. Under these circumstances it is time we had an airport better located than Sea island, close enough to Vancouver and New Westminster so that these cities can be reached by car, and one free from fog. Already we have one available at Langley Prairie, and I ask the minister to find out what use can be made of that field. I feel sure that if he does so, his officials cannot take the point of view now that it is of no use to them, because I remember that when the project was first put forward they positively asserted that it was one of the best sites in the country, although I think at that time I could have found a better site in that district. Now it sits, with $150,000 expended on it, not being used at all, although to my mind, since it is fog free, it would make a splendid emergency landing place for planes heading for Vancouver and New Westminster. I put this matter seriously before the minister and ask that note be taken of the suggestion.

Mr. HLYNKA: I view the subject of civil aviation to be one of the most important and far-reaching topics ever to be discussed in the Canadian parliament. Upon the policy governing civil aviation, and particularly what is termed "international air policy", will depend to a great degree the future of this nation's commerce. The policy adopted with respect to international aviation will undoubtedly influence our foreign policy. As a matter of fact the aviation policy in the international field can only reflect the foreign policy of a country, and vice-versa. The decision which Canada will have to make is so important and far-reaching that it may have a bearing on the whole course of our history. It will certainly be the turning point in our history, profoundly affecting the whole economic structure of Canada. Many are convinced that civil aviation is destined to become one of the most potent factors in civilization.

To discuss this subjects adequately one must discuss the foreign policy of Canada, particularly our future foreign policy. To my mind the two are indivisible. I should like only to remind the committee that air transportation will to a great degree displace land and water transportation sytems. This is what a reputable United States magazine, Fortune, has to say in its March, 1941, issue:

> Perhaps the most significant geopolitical fact of our time is the overwhelming possibility of the air as a new road to world power and trade.

Two decades ago, Admiral Sims stated categorically that "command of the air" gave "command of the surface, whether it be sea or land."

That article states further:

What does this mean to us? It means that just as men and nations from the beginning of time have fought for control of the sea and land routes as highways of commerce and communications, so must they inevitably fight for control of the air and for the ocean and continental bases, which, like the naval bases and bunker stations in the grand strategy of sea power, will enable them to fasten their grip on the coming routes of the air. It means that just as sea power dominated the conceptions of major nations fronting on the sea, so must the air increasingly dominate the conception of all nations having the technical skill, the industry, the capital and the imagination to embark upon it. And just as the shifting patterns of sea power held the key to the rise and fall of ancient empires, through the expansionist mercantilism of the 17th and 18th centuries and into the great period of the British sea power, so the unresolved patterns of air power must inevitably hold the key to the rise and fall of existing empires and others not yet born.

To quote further from the same article:

. . . what the rise of air power means to the future of . . . as a world power, not only in moral and strategic terms, but in terms of trade—in terms, finally, of the great merchant fleets of the air, the carriers of goods and people, which will come as certainly as the ultimate peace, and which like the merchant marine and the seafaring class . . . concept would constitute a "shield of defensive power" behind the protection of which we could, if attacked, develop a "reserve of strength."

So much, Mr. Chairman, for the importance of air transport system at this time.

May I now state that I am unequivocally opposed to the proposed air policy announced by the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) on March 17 on behalf of the government. Unlike other hon. members who spoke on behalf of other groups in this house, I disagree with the civil aviation policy which this government has embarked upon.

First, in the domestic field, the proposed domestic policy as announced by the minister is purely and simply a state monopoly scheme. I do not believe in either private or state monopoly. Next, by adopting this policy the government is entering into the business field itself instead of directing the policy. Further, by adopting this policy the government will adopt the policy advocated by the socialists. It appears as though the government intends to head off the socialists by putting socialistic measures into practice.

In the international field I am opposed to the government's proposal for the following reasons:

1. The government's international air policy as announced by the minister is anti-British, anti-British commonwealth of nations, and anti-Canadian. It is pro-international world authority, which will operate under a financial dictatorship.

2. It is the negation of the principle of the British commonwealth and of Canadian sovereignty.

3. It is a move toward a world dictatorship under the authority of a world police force of international finance advocated by Clarence Streit. Incidentally, the government should tell us whether they received congratulations from Mr. Streit for putting his proposals into effect. If the proposal advanced by the minister is accepted and supported by this house it will constitute a segment of the international dictatorship scheme.

4. If Canada adopts the proposed international air policy it will have adopted a foreign policy which is international in principle and ideology.

5. The proposal discards and throws overboard certain heritage fought for by the British and handed to us with no cost to us whatsoever.

6. For the first time in our history I believe, the government has departed from a major common policy, from a policy which could have been very well worked out to serve the entire British commonwealth of nations.

Speaking in the house on March 17, the Minister of Munitions and Supply made several significant assertions and thereby revealed the strong leaning of the government toward internationalism and federal union proposals and away from the principles upon which rests the British commonwealth of nations. In Hansard of March 17, at page 1575, the minister is reported to have said:

The young men so engaged—

He meant in aviation.

—will be internationally minded.

On the same page he states:

There appears now to be a general agreement that this whole field must be brought under the control of a new and expanded international authority.

Another significant statement made by the minister on page 1577 was:

What is true of relations between the various parts of Canada is true also of relations between the nations of the world.

Then the minister made another statement which is most interesting:

The briefest fashion in which I can describe the situation which will exist at the end of the war is that the position and sovereignty of the Canadian government have been protected completely in all arrangements that have been made.

But a little later the minister forgot what he had said about the protection of Canadian sovereignty and made this statement:

As I have already mentioned, on April 2 last year the Prime Minister gave a statement of the government's position with regard to international air transport, making it clear that our policy would be one of international co-operation and collaboration and that we would support whatever policy seemed best calculated to serve not only the immediate national interests of Canada, but our overriding interest in the establishment of an international order which will prevent the outbreak of another war.

In explaining this view, the minister leaves no doubt as to the viewpoint which the government holds. It is plain that the government supports a world authority and has committed Canada to this international policy rather than to a common policy for the entire British commonwealth of nations.

It must be remembered that Canada is one of the senior partners of the commonwealth, and by taking this stand she influences other members of the commonwealth to take a similar stand. This can only result in diminishing the status of the British commonwealth of nations from a European world power number one to that of a secondary power. To my mind, a policy of this sort is the height of folly; it certainly is not in the interests of Canada.

Then at page 1580, March 17, the minister repeats the same viewpoint when he says:

Our representatives in the international discussions, therefore, will be authorized to support or initiate such proposals as, in the government's opinion, will be likely to result in the establishment of an international air transport authority. . . .

Finally, the minister endeavours to impress upon the house that when, under his chairmanship, the Canadian delegation participated in the discussions held in London in October last there was a "broad general agreement". This is what the minister said, at page 1579:

No final decisions were taken in London, but I may say that it was evident from the outset that all participants had the same general objectives in view—the objectives which I have described earlier in this statement—and that there was a broad basis of general agreement as to the way these objectives might best be attained.

The minister told us that there was a general agreement on broad principles. Well, let us see. In an article entitled "Britain in the Post-War Air" appearing in Fortune magazine, March, 1944 issue, the following report is given:

He said—

Meaning Lord Beaverbrook.

—the British government wanted to see if the dominions were prepared to work with it and with one another as a unit, and, if so, how far they were prepared to commit themselves to a basic policy. If we could establish a common denominator, then he would go to the Americans, and from them to the Russians. Afterwards we could deal with the rest of the world.

That I suggest was the proper stand to take. But the article continues:

But Canada and Australia came to London to argue that the air must be developed for the common good under an international body that would also keep the peace. Their representatives held fast to this thesis long after the Beaver had impatiently dropped it as impracticable.

The article said that "the British were prepared to be just as international in their air policy as the rest", and that "it did not take long for the dominion representatives to become convinced that a common policy was going to be hard to find". Yet the minister tells us that there was a general agreement. That is not all. The article states further:

Canada, the senior dominion, presents a special problem, in many respects the most serious of all.

One of the most important statements, however, is the following:

Now some Britons descry an anomaly in Canada's attitude toward her commonwealth partners. The Liberal government of Mr. Mackenzie King favour relinquishing control of international civil aviation to an international agency intimately associated with a world security body. Why then does it hold back from allying its air policy with that of an empire which even the South Africans, their traditional separatist instincts notwithstanding, have decided is still by a long way the most widespread and influential unit in world affairs.

And yet the minister told us that there was a widespread agreement.

Finally, the article has this to say about the agreement:

Nevertheless it is clear that his (Lord Beaverbrook's) scheme to forge a common empire policy has come—at least temporarily—to a dead end. In the phrase of the British foreign office official: "The conference agreed there would be no agreed policy."

How could there be when the senior member of the commonwealth is bucking in favour of international world authority? But the minister and the government are not alone in this. They have company in our Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said on March 20, as reported at page 1650 of Hansard:

On behalf of the group with which I am associated I wish to say without any hesitation that we welcome the statement made on Friday by the Minister of Munitions and Supply.

The leader of the C.C.F. party, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, said on the same day, as reported at page 1656 of Hansard:

I think in the field of civil aviation we must have international understanding, international operation and international control. I should like to see the world go beyond where I think it can go to-day. I should like to see an international system owned internationally.

Further down he says:

I welcome this step forward.

So that there may still be a union of the Liberal and the C.C.F. parties. To be sure, it appears that the Liberal party is crowding the C.C.F. with respect to socialistic principles.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is the hon. member sure there is not a union now?

Mr. HLYNKA: That is what Clarence Streit calls it. They are apparently travelling in the same direction and much along the same path at least in this international arena.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre quoted Lord Bennett in support of the government's proposal. May I quote Lord Bennett's more recent view which he expressed in the British House of Lords on this subject, when he said:

Unless this country recognized the importance of air, largely as a substitute for sea, with respect to our prestige and importance and place in the world, we shall cease to be a first-class power. That is a terrible statement to make, but I believe, and I believe it strongly.

Again, as late as March 29, the Canadian Press cable carried a dispatch from London, and Lord Bennett is quoted as having said:

If we are going to maintain our lives, we must see to it that our foreign policy is the policy of all the dominions as well as this country.

Then Sir Archibald Sinclair, Secretary of State for Air, during an all-day debate on civil aviation in the British House of Commons last June, made this statement, and the government should take note of it:

After the war we shall be one of two things: Either we shall be a small island of forty-five million people in a world dominated by the great United States of America, with 130 millions, and a great Soviet Union, with a . . . population . . . which may reach up to 200 million—either we shall be in that position or we shall be the centre of a great empire which will be bound together by our air routes, with all the business of the empire greatly simplified by the fact that ministers and high officials will be able to move rapidly and easily from one part of that empire to another.

My view is that at this point of history we should refuse to support any policy which may reduce the power of the British commonwealth of nations to that of a secondary position. Canada, in my opinion, should assist in the shaping of the commonwealth policies and should not engage herself in any wild goose chasing on her own. I believe that Canada's international foreign policy should commence with a common denominator suitable to every member of the commonwealth; then a complete agreement should be sought with the United States, and finally with the rest of the world. It has been said that control of the world's air routes will be the richest economic prize of the war. Let us then make sure not to commit a blunder of giving away our rights to some strange international power, which owes no allegiance to any flag and which is not committed to any set of Christian principles.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I think the position of this group has already been made sufficiently clear, and if, as the last speaker intimated, the government is attempting to head us off, then I say that is reason for congratulating the government.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): It will not help the country though.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I may say personally that we are pleased to find that the government has taken steps to secure for the Canadian people in the domestic field the vast investment which the Canadian public has made in the aircraft industry in this country during the war. That industry at the beginning of the war was a mere midget, struggling for existence. To-day it is a flourishing giant. It has been built throughout the war years on the strength of government contracts and public money. Canada to-day has well-equipped airfields, is well equipped with air navigation facilities and is well equipped with trained personnel. Technological improvements have been made in that field and paid for over the years out of the war. These improvements should make it possible, when the war ends, to reduce considerably the cost of passenger travel by air, the cost of carrying freight by air, and the cost of carrying our mail. That cost was the greatest single handicap to air transportation up to 1939. The investment of large sums of public money will make it possible for air lines to use these facilities after the war without the payment of heavy carrying charges, which should go a long way in the reduction of the costs of travel to which I have referred. The use during the war of multi-engined transport planes also should go a long way in helping to solve the problems of freight transportation, and unquestionably air facilities will be used much more in that field.

These possibilities raise many questions with regard to the future of the entire aircraft industry in this country. While the government has set forth its policy in regard to the future of our air lines, I am not so sure that any policy has been set forth as to the future of the aircraft industry, and this afternoon I want to ask the minister a few questions on that subject. I shall state all my questions while I am on my feet, and I hope the minister may be able to make a statement with regard to the policy of the government in this matter. First, what is to be our position after the war with regard to the acquisition of aeroplane engines? That matter has been discussed time and again during the last few years. I think the minister made it quite clear that it was not the policy of his department to embark, during war years, upon the manufacture of aeroplane engines in this country. He suggested, and I think perhaps rightly, that our war effort could be better facilitated by importing engines from countries that had much more experience in that field. The question arises, of course: are we to remain indefinitely in the position of being dependent upon other countries for the engines we will use in our commercial aviation? That is the first question I submit for the minister's consideration. The second question is: what will be our position in post-war days with regard to the production of transport planes? My information is that one-third of all the planes of the United States army and navy are transport planes, and that in the United States they have huge factories engaged in the production of these planes. On Tuesday evening the Minister of National Defence for Air indicated that Canada will be or is dependent upon the United States for transport planes to be used in training on our own fields, and that the government had received information that a number of these transport planes would be delivered by United States factories later this year. Are steps being taken to ensure that we can produce in Canada the type of plane that will be needed for heavy transport in the post-war years?

My third question is: what is to be our position in regard to the ownership of the aircraft industry, which at present is partly government-owned and partly privately-owned? The Progressive Conservative party, I assume, have announced their stand on this question; I should like to give my understanding of their position, and if I am wrong I am sure the leader of the opposition will correct me. Both the Premier of Ontario and the leader of the opposition, speaking in the Toronto district, voiced considerable protest over the placing of contracts for transport planes with the Vickers plant in Montreal instead of with the government-owned plant at Malton. I presume their protest was based upon the fact that a privately-owned company was getting that contract rather than a publicly-owned company, and that as a result the privately-owned plant would have a lead over the government-owned plant in post-war years. I am quite sure both these gentlemen are much too big and much too concerned with the national welfare to take a geographical or provincial point of view on that question. I am quite sure the basis of their criticism was not the fact that this business was being given to a city in a sister province rather than to a city in Ontario. As yet the government has not announced its policy; whether in the post-war years it will lend its support to the publicly-owned aircraft plants or to the privately-owned plants, or whether the one or the other or both are to be assisted in developing Canada's post-war civil aviation.

Another question is with regard to the government's policy concerning assistance in the post-war years to the aircraft industry, whether publicly or privately owned. As I have indicated, this industry has been built up over the years by the expenditure of public money; and I think it is generally agreed that if the aircraft industy in Canada is to compete with that of other, larger countries, regardless of whether it is publicly or privately owned, it will, in large measure, have to depend upon government support and assistance in order to meet that competition. It will need assistance, perhaps by way of subsidies or government contracts that will be assured for a given number of years, so that in the realm of manufacturing costs it may be able to compete with Great Britain and the United States.

Another question is: what type of plane is to be developed as most useful for the post-war period; upon what designs are we to concentrate? Has the government given any consideration to this question; has it reached any decision, or is that matter being investigated at the present time?

There is the further question of our position with regard to designing staffs capable of competing with similar staffs in other countries. I think it is generally agreed that if Canada is to maintain a successful aircraft industry in the post-war years, such designing staffs as we have at present should be retained in Canada, and in that industry. Unquestionably some government consideration and government support will be required to be given in that field.

Then there is the question of how such work as will be available in the aircraft industry after the war shall be distributed among the firms, both publicly and privately owned, which are now in that business. Decisions will have to be made as to which of those plants, or how many of them are to remain in the business in the post-war years.

There is a vast number of people in Canada interested in the future of the aircraft industry, and consequently I believe the committee is entitled to a more complete statement than has been given to date regarding the future of the industry. My information is that at the present time there is a committee of men, headed by Mr. Bell of the minister's department, which has made a study of the subject, and has made definite recommendations to the government. I say the committee should be told what those recommendations are, what attitude the government is taking, and what decision it has reached in respect of recommendations made to it. I am sure a statement of that kind would be in the public interest, because to-day that industry has become a most important one in the industrial life of Canada.

Mr. HOWE: I think I have gone fully into the subject of aeroplane engines in earlier statements.

With respect to the future of the aircraft industry, I believe I have made it clear that at all times the government will give that industry all the backing it is possible to give. But to ask me to make plans for more than eighteen months ahead, or more, shows lack of appreciation of the uncertainties of war programmes. Production of war planes, including bombers and fighters, will continue. I can say that so long as there is any need for aircraft of that type, our industry will produce all it can. Plants producing trainer aircraft have passed the peak of their production for the present, just as the air-training plan is curtailed, the production of trainer aircraft will be curtailed. The war planes we are making are the best of their type, and we expect continued production at a high rate.

So far as post-war plans are concerned, we would like to know approximately the date when the post-war period will commence before we announce our plans too definitely. Plans which might suit the ending of the war in 1944 might not at all suit the ending of the war in 1946. Steps are being taken to see that Canada enters the field of civilian aircraft production on the best possible terms, and I believe we shall be able to supply any demand made on Canada for that type of aircraft. So far as costs are concerned, may I say that our costs are just as favourable as those of Great Britain or the United States. I see no reason why the Canadian industry should not be in an excellent competitive position with the industry in other countries.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Following what the minister has said with regard to the manufacturing of aircraft in Canada, may I ask if the government has considered the establishment of a school of aeronautical science in Canada, as has been done in England? I understand that in Great Britain they are proposing to, or have already established a school of aeronautical science. Does Canada intend to do the same, so that we shall have our own plans and specifications for aircraft? I am, of course, referring to new models.

Mr. HOWE: I think the statement that there has been established a school of aeronautical engineering is hardly correct. There are courses in aeronautical engineering given by our universities. As a matter of fact I recall that the university of Toronto took the lead in that matter, before the war and I know that similar courses are given in certain United States universities. Further, courses in aeronautical engineering are given in certain universities of the United Kingdom. I know of no college of aeronautical engineering.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I am referring to aeronautical science. I find something in the British Hansard for December 1, 1943, which I might draw to the minister's attention. On that date Mr. Bowles asked the British Minister of Aircraft Production whether the aeronautical research committee had yet made any report regarding the possibility of founding a school of aeronautical science. The Minister of Aircraft Production, Sir Stafford Cripps, replied:

> Yes, the committee has made a report, the main recommendations of which have been approved in principle by the government. With the agreement of my colleagues, I have appointed an interdepartmental committee, under the chairmanship of Sir Roy Fedden, to prepare and submit detailed proposals for the establishment of a school of aeronautical science within the general framework of these recommendations.
> Mr. Bowles: While thanking my right hon. and learned friend for his reply, may I ask whether he could give the house the terms of reference of the committee?
> Sir S. Cripps: The terms of reference were: "To prepare and submit to the Minister of Aircraft Production detailed proposals for the establishment of a school of aeronautical science within the general framework of the recommendations of the aeronautical research committee in their report of tenth August to the minister."

Mr. HOWE: Without knowing anything about it, I should imagine that the school established would be inside a university, or that the reference is just another way of saying that courses in that science will be added to the curriculum of a university.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): But it would have to be subsidized by the government, so that the university would have plenty of money to find ways and means of perfecting new machines. That is what the British government have done—and they certainly have the best designs in the world.

Mr. HOWE: I do not believe it follows automatically that a new course in a university must be subsidized. As a matter of fact the federal government has given some help to the university of Toronto in establishing courses in aeronautical engineering, and I presume it is prepared to give reasonable help to other universities. The science of aeronautical engineering is no different from the science of mechanical or civil engineering. It is just something to be added to the curriculum. I presume it should not be placed in too much of a preferred position.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Does the minister think we should have the very best planes in the world?

Mr. HOWE: What relation has the hon. member's suggestion to that?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): If we have men here in Canada who can design planes, and if we make money available for purposes of experimentation we shall have the planes.

Mr. HOWE: Students do not design planes until they have graduated.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The young boys who are coming along to-day are designing planes, on their own, and they want to put those ideas into effect later on.

Mr. McNIVEN: Mr. Chairman, I am not at all sure that what I have in mind might properly be discussed now. However, it will be recalled that, after the last war, not only members of the armed forces but the civilian population in general were anxious to get away from anything and everything that savoured of war. In sharp contrast with that prevailing thought there were small groups in many centres of Canada who envisioned what air transport could mean to the development of this country. These small groups of individuals formed themselves into flying clubs. These flying clubs through the activities and energy and self-sacrifice of certain individuals have contributed a great deal in the way of money and otherwise to creating an air consciousness. They were primarily responsible for maintaining a semblance of air service in many parts of Canada and they provided facilities for the training of young men. These flying clubs promoted model aircraft leagues, made up of the youth of the country who were thus able to acquire skilled knowledge in connection with amateur air construction and aeronautics. When Canada began to lay the foundations of an air force she drew heavily upon the personnel of these flying clubs.

These clubs grew to such proportions that they ultimately banded together into the dominion flying clubs association. I have been present on occasion when the minister and his worthy deputy, Commander Edwards, and other members of the Department of Transport have expressed their tribute in glowing terms of the work done by these flying clubs. When war broke out and the department established elementary flying schools, in many cases they turned to the flying clubs and asked them to manage the schools. This was done with conspicuous success as is evidenced by the repeated statements of the Minister of National Defence for Air and many members of his department.

Matters have progressed to the point where elementary training schools and air schools in various parts of Canada are being abandoned. In the building up of these schools there has been developed a group of individuals who are experienced in administration, while another group has obtained considerable skill and experience in the mechanics and repair of aeroplanes. A number of trained airmen have been employed in the last three or four years as instructors and as managers of elementary flying schools.

I do not wish to be narrow or provincial in my remarks, but I can best illustrate what I have in mind by referring to the Regina flying club which has managed No. 15 elementary flying school during the past four years. This is one of the schools that are to be abandoned. It has a civilian personnel of some 258 persons, who, as I have mentioned, have gained considerable experience and skill. I should like to know if in the development of civilian air operations there will be a place for the men who have gained this experience. Is there to be a place in future civilian operations for the flying clubs in recognition of what they have done for aviation during the last twenty or more years?

I wish to know if in the development of civilian aviation there is any immediate prospect of the development of routes in western Canada, either north or south of the main line of Trans-Canada Air Lines, which would provide opportunities for the individuals to whom I have just referred? We hear frequent rumours of the desire and inclination of certain United States lines to enter western Canada, in particular Northwest Air Lines which operates from Chicago and Minneapolis, through Regina to Edmonton and on into Alaska. Can the minister tell us of any possible developments which would provide opportunities for the men to whom I have just referred? I know the minister will be glad, as he has been on previous occasions, to pay tribute to the excellent public service which members of the flying clubs throughout Canada have rendered to the development of civil aviation and the proud position which Canada occupies in the air picture.

Mr. HOWE: I am very glad to endorse everything the hon. member for Regina has said about the flying clubs. These clubs rendered a great contribution to the development of aviation in Canada prior to the war, and have also performed great service in the advancement of the war effort by sponsoring elementary training at various airports across Canada. The Department of Transport has been a strong supporter of these flying clubs since their inception and an annual grant is still made to the flying clubs association. While the work for which the flying clubs were organized has been suspended, the usefulness of the clubs has not ended. In some cases the flying clubs which undertook responsibility for elementary training have finished their work, and it will be necessary for them to suspend training activities for the time being. Because of the necessity of saving gasoline, and for other reasons, it has been determined as a matter of policy that training activities, for the time being, shall be confined to the Royal Canadian Air Force, but the day will come when we shall be glad to have the flying clubs resume training in which they were engaged before the war.

My hon. friend has dealt with the activities of the men who supported the flying clubs. I suggest to him that the policy of the government in connection with the operation of feeder lines, may offer a field of activity for some of the men who supported the flying clubs prior to the war. It is our desire to have a number of small operations in civil aviation to supplement the Trans-Canada operation. It is our desire that the men coming back from overseas should be able to enter into civilian flying as owners rather than as employees; I suggest to the directors of our flying clubs that they could find a very useful field of activity in surveying routes that could be made self-supporting and in banding themselves together to sponsor that kind of civilian operation. I throw that out for what it is worth. My hon. friend asked the question, and I am giving him an offhand suggestion.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. NEILL: I suppose I ought to begin by expressing my gratitude for the courtesy of allowing me to speak at all at this time. It is a somewhat belated courtesy, but better late than never. I would have spoken three hours ago had the hon. member who was then in the Chair adhered to his written and verbal promise. It is a small matter, but adherence to good faith in these small matters of priority in speakers does help to prevent friction in carrying on the business of the house. I suppose I might be expected to go a little farther, although the words rather stick in my throat, and express my gratitude, slavishly and crawlingly, for being allowed to speak this week at all, because had I been headed off until next Tuesday, when the amended rules of the house come up for consideration and the government, with its majority, can no doubt force them through, then the opportunities of a private member expressing his own views or the views of the people who sent him here will be very greatly reduced.

However, to proceed to the item under discussion, I should like to ask the minister three questions and they are all to the point. Is it the policy of the government to aid the formation of municipal air bases in the vicinity of towns? If so, to what extent? If, for instance, the site were provided free by the municipality, what contribution would the government be prepared to make?

Most of these claims put forward by private members centre around some particular case in their respective ridings, and it is no different in my own case. The situation I have in mind is this. The city of Port Alberni has requested me to bring forward its claim for assistance toward an aerodrome in the vicinity. The Alberni valley contains a population of something like 10,000 or 11,000 people, and Port Alberni is the largest centre in it. We are cut off from any of the air facilities, and it takes us a day to go to Vancouver where we can get such. Primarily we are looking forward to the use of this aerodrome in connection with the development of the town and there are ample evidences that such service will be increasingly required. The town is growing, not only from war development but by reason of certain industries recently located there, and while the most outstanding feature in our mind is the usefulness of this provision as developments occur after the war, yet I have in my hand evidence that it would be useful to a certain extent during the period of the war itself.

I will not give any names, because it might possibly be of interest to the enemy, but planes come from Vancouver and the east coast over the Beaufort range to the west coast to certain air bases that lie a considerable distance beyond Port Alberni, and when they come over that range of mountains they are apt to run into a foggy condition preventing them from going on. They circle around a bit; their only alternative is to go back to Vancouver, and they might possibly not have enough gas to go there, whereas if they had a landing stage in the vicinity of Port Alberni they could land there and wait a few hours, when the fog would lift and they could go on, or at any rate they could make a safe landing without any danger of crashing from fog or lack of gas.

An air base has been located in the vicinity, and I think I can say it would cost the government nothing because the site would be presented to them. It is a suitable site which would not be too costly to develop. Last fall the city tried, and I did my best on their behalf, to get the department over which the minister presides to put a landing base there as a war necessity, but we were turned down from the point of view of spending money out of the war vote; yet the opinion was expressed by the deputy minister that a landing strip in this area would be of much value.

It was stated that the war need is not sufficient to justify the expenditure that would be involved in carrying out the development at this time, and further that the matter is viewed now only from the point of view of military necessity. It is admitted, however, that it would be of some value even to those who are directing military affairs under present conditions, and I imagine what leads them to this conclusion is the condition I have outlined, where a military plane might come over the mountain and find itself unable either to go forward or to turn back.

I want to emphasize what I might call the present-day value of such an undertaking, even though they might not go to the extent of spending all the money that might be required at this time. The suggestion, therefore, is this. Will the department, either for its usefulness, or partly for its usefulness under wartime conditions, and partly for its usefulness in the future as a development base for the city of Port Alberni—and remember that fogs will always be there in the future and there will be the same necessity of having a safe landing place—give any consideration towards construction, and, if so, to what extent?

[Mr. Neill.]

The other question I wish to ask is this. The Aeronautical Institute of Canada is holding its annual convention in Toronto on May 2 and 3. I have before me the programme of its meetings. They propose to deal with thirty-four different subjects and it will take them all their time to dispose of those in two days. These subjects are all connected with aviation and they relate to the benefits of airports, increased tourist traffic, post-war market expansion and so on. Is it the intention of the department to be represented at the meeting? This does not appear to be a money-making scheme. Apparently they are anxious only to develop the aeroplane industry for the benefit of Canada. They do not seem to be interested in any particular aeroplane company or in any particular place. Would the minister tell us what assistance his department is prepared to grant, if any, to municipal air bases, provided the municipality furnishes the site? Second, will his department have representatives at the meeting on May 2 and 3?

Mr. HOWE: Prior to the war it was the policy of the Department of Transport to assist municipalities in building airports. A sum of money was voted by this house for the purpose, and that money was allocated to various municipalities, to help local activities in building airports. When the war broke out, that work was entirely suspended, and since the war began it has not been the policy of the Department of Transport to assist municipalities in building airports. The only airports that have been built are airports that have been selected by the aerodrome committee of the Royal Canadian Air Force. The Department of Transport has one or two representatives attending that committee. Since 1940 the military needs have been the sole consideration. My hon. friend spoke of part military and part local need. That has not been recognized. It must be a wholly military need to warrant the building of aerodromes at this time.

I think we can safely assume that after the war is over, the policy of assisting the municipalities will be resumed. In the meantime if my hon. friend thinks the need at Alberni is urgent, a survey could be made by the department and placed on file for action when the policy I spoke of is once again reestablished.

Mr. NEILL: What was the nature of the assistance given before the war, and to what extent was it given?

Mr. HOWE: As the first requirement the city had to furnish the site; beyond that other considerations entered in. I do not know that I can say that there was a definite uniform policy, but the assistance given by the department was substantial.

The second question had to do with the Aeronautical Institute of Canada. This is an informal organization, I think, designed to promote interest in aviation in Canada. If I may comment on the point of view of the department, there is quite enough interest in post-war aviation at the present time. We would very much prefer that the Aeronautical Institute be not quite so active until the war is over, when the department can devote expenditure to the development of civil airports. Therefore the Department of Transport is not taking active interest in the affairs of the institute at this time. I daresay the institute will be a very useful instrument after the war.

Mr. HANSELL: We are now discussing an appropriation of the Department of Munitions and Supply which, according to the little schedule before me, constitutes an expenditure of about $6,500,000. I am a little at a loss to understand just where the civil aviation announcement that the minister made a week or two ago fits into the general appropriation of war expenditures. However, I am not going to make a particular issue of that. Perhaps it does not make very much difference whether it comes out of the war appropriation or out of some other fund. I wish, however, to make one or two observations with regard to the announcement that the minister made the other day, in which he gave us some light on the negotiations that have been carried on in respect of world airways in the post-war period.

I believe that the importance of his announcement has not been recognized in Canada as seriously as it should have been. The significance of the announcement cannot be entirely grasped without a bit of diagnosis of the tendency of movements and events in this present day in this present world. The wheels of time grind slowly but, as the sage has said, they grind exceedingly well. What one generation may accomplish or fail to accomplish or destroy is left for a succeeding generation either to enjoy or to suffer. One generation after another passes on, each playing its part in the process of events leading either to the world's happiness and sweet content or to the ultimate destruction of civilization.

Governments that have been given power by the people have authority, but with that authority there comes a grave and great responsibility. In making these observations and criticisms I wish to lay down a premise which I believe to be a fact, namely, that the world is gradually moving on toward a world dictator; that the stage is gradually being set. Over the process of time the props are gradually being placed upon the stage, and perhaps the time is not so far distant when the stage will welcome the entrance of a world dictator. I state now unequivocally that any move on the part of any government of any nation that plays into the hands of international authority or control is aiding and abetting a programme which sets the stage for that coming world dictator.

Let me make it clear that I have no objection to cooperation with other nations, or, as the hon. member for Lethbridge says, we have no objections to coordination with other nations. We have no objections to international cooperation and coordination. But to propose anything in the nature of international authority and international control is another matter altogether, and I, for one, am personally opposed, absolutely and positively, to any authority and control being passed over from the Canadian people to any outside body.

May I make a little analysis of the minister's speech of March 17? I find that on page 1577 of Hansard the minister is reported to have stated:

> The briefest fashion in which I can describe the situation which will exist at the end of the war is that the position and sovereignty of the Canadian government have been protected completely in all arrangements that have been made.

I do not know whether the minister made a little slip there or not; but I do wish to ask him when he thinks the Canadian government ever became sovereign. If he had talked about the sovereignty of the Canadian people that would have been another thing, but I maintain that particularly to-day there is a vast difference between the sovereignty of the Canadian people and the sovereignty of the Canadian government. I maintain that very little is done in this house by the present government that is in any way at all a reflection of the sovereign will of the Canadian people. I stated the other day that I doubted very much whether issues of this kind were ever brought before the entire Liberal party.

I do not want to take time further to emphasize statements I have made previously in this chamber, but I know what happens in regard to the provincial government of Alberta. The government there has a majority of the seats in the legislature; because of their particular electoral system they have a majority vote of the people reflected in that legislature, and when that government desires to introduce any piece of legislation that legislation is brought before a caucus of the entire party in order that the caucus may represent to the government what they believe to be the will of the citizens of that province. If the caucus says, "No, this does not meet the wishes of our people," the government makes no further move. That is the procedure followed in a province, which is much smaller than this whole country; but when it comes to the larger and perhaps tremendously more important matters, what do we find the government of Canada doing? We find a handful of men attempting to impose their will upon the people of Canada without attempting in any way whatever to ascertain the will of the people. Therefore, I say that the government of Canada is not sovereign except as far as it reflects the sovereign will of the people, and who is to say whether or not this agreement as to international airways is what the people want? I am going to suggest, Mr. Chairman, that if the people realized all the implications involved in this international agreement certainly they would turn it down. Of course I am only a small fish in a big puddle; our group may cry with a still small voice, but I would say to my Conservative friends that in connection with a measure of this kind they are missing the opportunity of a lifetime to place before the people of Canada the tremendous implications involved. I take it that a measure like this is the thin edge of the wedge to sell out to an international authority the sovereign rights of the British people.

Now let me go a little further; I shall return to that point later. I was analyzing the minister's speech, and at page 1577 of Hansard I find these words:

> We believe that in the field of international air transport our interest lies in a liberal course of cooperation with other nations.

I have no objection to that if it means cooperation; but the thread of the minister's speech seems to go beyond international cooperation and to deal with international authority and control. On the same page I notice these words:

> What is true of relations between the various parts of Canada is true also of relations between the nations of the world.

I wonder whom the minister thinks he is fooling in making that statement. Does he mean to say that the relationship between certain parts of our own country—if you want to take the extreme, say the relationship between the province of Quebec and western Canada—is the same as the relationship between the Canadian people, as part of the British commonwealth, and the Japanese or the Germans or the Italians or the people of any of the South American countries? Certainly it is not. You cannot talk of the relationship between the people within a nation being the same as the relationship between nations; not at all, unless you are going to break down all international boundaries. If you do that, then I say you are doing the very thing with which I prefaced my remarks; that is, you are paving the way for a great world order under a great world dictatorship. Again on page 1577 of Hansard I find these words:

> As I have already mentioned, on April 2 last year the Prime Minister gave a statement of the government's position with regard to international air transport, making it clear that our policy would be one of international cooperation and collaboration—

That is all right.

> —and that we would support whatever policy seemed best calculated to serve not only the immediate national interests of Canada, but our overriding interest in the establishment of an international order which will prevent the outbreak of another world war.

First, I should like to know who are the calculators. Are they the seventeen or eighteen men who constitute the government of Canada? Further, I want to ask what authority the minister has for being so bold as to say that such cooperation and collaboration in an international world order will prevent the outbreak of another world war. I say to this committee that it is a false philosophy to teach that a world order will prevent war. I venture the suggestion that under a world order, if war ever does break out it will be a world civil war. I do not say there should not be international cooperation; but the very moment we tie up our sovereign rights, or hand them over to any international authority with, shall I say, interlocking treaties bound up with that international authority, then when war breaks out between two smaller nations the world itself becomes plunged into blood.

> The decision which the united nations must make in the near future in the post-war organization of air transport thus is vital, and an enlightened settlement will go a long way toward establishing a lasting peace, and a new world order of security.

Once again he is presupposing something that is false, that a world order will bring security. A world order may and I believe will bring about world war.

He said again, on the same page:

> From the point of view of practical politics the problem is to find some method of international control.

Once again he harps upon control. There cannot be any international control unless somebody gives some body international control, and if we give up our control to some international body then we are handing over to an outside power what is the sovereign right of our own people. That is my contention.

Again, at page 1579, he said:

> Not only should some international air transport authority supervise the administration of the freedoms and rights suggested above, but the authority should also have power—

Note those words—authority, control, power.

> —to regulate international air services in order to prevent the dangers of unnecessary and uneconomic duplication.

Again, at page 1580, speaking of Lord Beaverbrook as chairman of the London conference of some time ago, he says:

> Lord Beaverbrook added that it had been agreed that "the international air transport authority should be intimately associated with and responsible to any united nations security organization which might be established."

So that you see the plan ties us up with any united nations or international security organization. What we are doing here is simply tieing ur whole airway scheme up to an international authority which will have as its bodyguard some force in order to protect its interests in the international field. I say once again that it is a false philosophy to think that an international organization or authority can prevent world war.

Nor do I agree with the policy that is sometimes stated by leading diplomats that in the post-war order, peace must be secured by force. I believe that force is the absolute antithesis of the freedom of man. We all heard Mr. Anthony Eden, standing where you are sitting now, Mr. Chairman, addressing the members of the House of Commons and the Senate, when he distinctly declared that in the post-war world some international authority would have to use force in order to maintain peace. I say to you, Mr Chairman, that it is absolutely contrary to the freedom of mankind to use force. What we want is a world order where there is no need of force, and that can be obtained by a proper approach.

I have finished with my analysis of the minister's speech and I wish to refer briefly to the speech of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in which he welcomes the government's move but, of course, is sorry it does not go farther. I do not need to comment on that, for I am sure I could not speak any more forcefully than the hon. member for Vegreville did this afternoon when he tried to show, and did show, the committee that the present government of Canada is indeed going socialist. I could not point that out better than the hon. member for Vegreville did, and when he was trying to point out to the committee the danger of any policy that would tend toward the disintegration of the British empire, the feeling came over me how strange it was that here was a man born in the Ukraine who came here with his family at two or three years of age and was brought up and educated in Canada, and now in his youth was standing here in the House of Commons and calling for the safeguarding of the sovereign rights of the Canadian people under British democracy, while all around us and by the minister's own policy we are attempting to take away some of the sovereign rights of our people and hand them over to some outside authority. Is the minister Canadian? Is the Prime Minister Canadian? For they are the ones who are responsible. Is the cabinet truly Canadian and British? I say that in this matter I will bet on the hon. member for Vegreville as being the truly British Canadian. The proof of the pudding is in the eating. I want a government in Canada that will safeguard the rights of our Canadian people.

I was going to refer to the statement made by the leader of the C.C.F. party who also welcomes the government's stand, but I shall refer to it only in this way. The leader of the C.C.F. party must really try to distinguish between cooperation and control. This is what he says at page 1656 of Hansard:

> Accordingly in the field of international air transportation it becomes apparent and, I think, important, that only public control should function. International cooperation does not mean, in reality, a diminution of national sovereignty. What it really means is, sometimes, the transfer—

Mr. Martin: The expansion of it.

Mr. Coldwell: —of national sovereignty between nations.

He continues, but he does not get along very far before he uses the term "international control." We are in favour of international cooperation, but I for one am not in favour of any centralized international body controlling anything inside Canada.

In what I have to say now I do not intend to pose as an authority on constitutional matters. I might as well confess at the start that I do not know anything about them. Strange as it may seem, I am going to talk about something about which I do not know anything. That is just a simple confession; the rest of the members of the House of Commons have never confessed that as yet. I doubt very much whether a constitutional government has any right to sign an agreement or treaty of this kind. I have done a little browsing, some snatching here and some snatching there, in order to get a little information. I read the British North America Act, and the only thing I could find in it referring to foreign treaties or agreements was section 132, which reads:

> The parliament and government of Canada shall have all powers necessary or proper for performing the obligations of Canada or of any province thereof, as part of the British empire, towards foreign countries arising under treaties between the empire and such foreign countries.

I tried to study what might be meant by treaties. Generally speaking, I think that would be confined to peace treaties and international trade agreements. I can quite understand the logic that nations must make agreements with other nations, but I doubt very much whether any agreement that purports to hand over any of the sovereign or civil or other rights can be made by any government. Whether or not that would be constitutional, I do not know, but I doubt very much that it could be done. It certainly is not common sense. I should like to ask when the people of Canada gave the government power to hand over any of the sovereign rights of the people to any other country, much less to any international authority that would be responsible to no one.

In connection with treaties and so forth I also did a little browsing. I have before me a book entitled, "Methods of Ratification of Treaties," published by the government printing office at Washington. This covers the history of certain treaties. On page 11 reference is made to the treaty entered into at the close of the last war, and I quote as follows:

> Lloyd George made the following statement in the House of Commons, on February 11—

That would be 1919.

> The third question asked about the peace conference was whether the treaty will be placed upon the table of the house before ratification. I believe that is the ordinary course. Of course, subject to the ratification of the treaty, the representatives of this country will follow the same course as the representatives of every other country and provisionally sign the treaty at the peace conference. The treaty will undoubtedly then be placed upon the table of the house for ratification. I believe constitutionally there are parts of the treaty which must be placed upon the table of the house by the constitution of this country. If the House of Commons chooses to repudiate the treaty the House of Commons is all powerful.

I know what the minister will say to that, namely, that that is exactly what we are doing here. I have not made a study of what parts of the treaty Mr. Lloyd George was referring to when he said:

> I believe constitutionally there are parts of the treaty which must be placed upon the table of the house by the constitution of this country.

There must have been something in there which he did not consider the government had a right to sign apart from the approval of the house. Reference is made on page 16 to what Mr. Gladstone said along the same line in days gone by. I have very little more to say except that I question the right of any government to sign over to any other authority anything that belongs to the people of Canada. I can understand a gift of money being made such as has been done in the past few sessions; I can understand a gift of materials, but I cannot understand how any government has the authority to hand over the rights of the people. It is very easy to hand over the sovereign rights of the people, but it will take a war to get those sovereign rights back again.

I conclude by saying what I started out to say, that the picture is gradually being filled in. I believe that in the world to-day there are two great forces at work. That applies not only to this country, but to the world in general. One force is attempting to bring about a world dictatorship under a certain type of world state socialism. On the other hand there are those who are struggling to maintain the freedom of man. I know that some one will accuse me of uttering platitudes, it will be said that I am talking in terms that are ethereal and so forth, but may I make the following quotation:

> Some of the biggest men in the United States in the field of commerce and manufacturing are afraid of somebody, are afraid of some thing. They know there is a power somewhere, so organized, so subtle, so watchful, so interlocked, so complete, so pervasive that they had better not speak above their breath when they speak in condemnation of it.

That is a statement by the late President Wilson of the United States. I say that there are sinister forces which operate behind the scenes of human affairs and have for their objective the ultimate destruction of free agency among men, and this cannot be assigned to mere chance. I call upon the members of the House of Commons to rise in defence of the freedom of our people. I know the minister will say that this does not interfere with their freedom, but I say it is dangerous in that it represents the thin edge of the wedge, in that it seeks to establish that a few men at the head of the government can hand over control to an international body.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCann): The hon. gentleman has exhausted his time.

Mr. HANSELL: I have just a few more words, Mr. Chairman, and they will take me only a minute. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) said that the picture outlined by the minister was a rosy one. It may not be such a rosy picture if it is looked at with the proper focus. If we want peace, we must eliminate the causes of war. But that is not the primary purpose of this. What is proposed by the planners is the preservation of the present system with all its evils, but in order to make it work and to preserve it they want to put in policemen. As the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Jaques) said the other day, what the world needs is a physician, but what they are providing her with is a policeman.

Mr. HOWE: Just a word in reply to my hon. friend. I have listened with great interest to the foreign policy of the Social Credit party. I think this is the first time it has been expounded in this house.

Mr. KNOWLES: International anarchy.

Mr. HOWE: I find that the hon. member for Vegreville has declared for an extreme imperialistic policy, and accuses this government of catering to the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation.

I suggest that his party are trying to take the place vacated by the late Conservative party, and I think perhaps he has "something there," because Progressive Conservative foreign policy as enunciated by the various and several leaders of that party seems so different from the old policy that there may be a place for the Social Crediters.

Mr. GRAYDON: Don't joke about it, now.

Mr. HOWE: If I may make a speech—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Talk about something you know something about.

Mr. HOWE: Will those who are always complaining about being abused and appealing to the protection of the chair please remain quiet while I make a few remarks, if they do not mind? I did not rise to make that comment, but I wanted to say something about the remarks of the hon. member for Macleod. He sees great danger in entering into international agreements for the control of international aviation. I may say that we have been a party to international aviation agreements for a great many years. The conference on international air navigation which was held in Paris in 1919 or 1920 laid down rules for international navigation, and Canada was a signatory to the agreement of that date. That agreement provided for certain freedom of the air. It laid down specific rules for safety standards and control of air navigation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Was that not a purely voluntary affair?

Mr. HOWE: It was a convention.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Was it ratified by this parliament?

Mr. HOWE: It was. It has been in effect for many years. It is believed that at this time we should take a step toward greater freedom of international transit. My hon. friend is familiar with the fact that there is freedom of the seas, and that freedom of the seas is maintained by international agreement. That freedom allows a ship of any country to enter a harbour of any other country. It gives to that ship certain rights by international agreement, while in that harbour.

Mr. HANSELL: That is not control.

Mr. HOWE: I think it would be a backward step if each country undertook to establish its sovereignty and to deny to the ships of friendly nations the rights which, guaranteed by international agreement, make world traffic on the oceans a right of all friendly nations.

Mr. HANSELL: We are not opposed to international agreements.

Mr. HOWE: Well, what are we attempting to do in the Canadian proposal for regulation of international air transport? Prior to the war, in order to extend our air service, we will say to South America, it would be necessary for the government of Canada to enter into a treaty with every country which must be crossed en route. If one country objected, then unless it were possible to avoid that country by plotting a route around it, the service would be impossible. Air services are now established under that arrangement, but with extreme difficulty. Take, for example, the case of Canada, which stands at the crossroads of all the important air routes of the northern hemisphere. We will say that Canada refuses to enter into any international agreement and that it will permit planes to fly over our territory only by agreement with each country concerned. What would be our position? Every country in North America and in Europe would be demanding from Canada a bilateral agreement. Suppose we gave it to one country and refused it to another; would that lead to friendly relations, or would it lead to war? Suppose we refused permission for Russia to cross Canada with an air service to the United States, yet permitted the United States to cross Canada to fly to Russia, would that be a comfortable position for Canada? We believe that there is potential disagreement of a serious nature in such a system of carrying on international air transport by bilateral agreement. It is not impossible, but it certainly has presented in the past great difficulties, and will in the future present great or greater difficulties as the volume of international aviation steps up.

We believe that all countries can agree on certain freedoms. One is freedom of innocent passage; that is, the right of a plane of a peaceful country to fly over the territory of another peaceful country. We also believe that there should be the right to land to refuel in any country, by international agreement, on the same principle as the freedom of the sea. However, it is accepted, by those who know the technical difficulties of flying haphazard over another country, that there must be regulation of the exercise of the right of innocent passage and the right to land and refuel.

Canada has proposed certain other freedoms which can be exercised only by international regulations, namely, the right to pick up in another country passengers destined for the country of origin of the plane, and to take from such country of origin its own nationals destined for another country. These freedoms can be exercised only by international regulations. Therefore Canada proposes an international body to carry out the provisions of these four freedoms in the interests of international aviation as a whole.

The document submitted is Canada's proposal. It is by no means a treaty. We are not asking the house to ratify a treaty. We have advanced it as a proposal from Canada for a basis of agreement with other nations interested in international aviation. It has been suggested, I believe, by the last speaker that Canada is doing this surreptitiously without the support of the majority party in this house and without the knowledge of all members of the house. I cannot imagine how that conclusion can be reached. Canada is the one country of the united nations that has placed its full air policy before the house and before the people of the country. We invite discussion on the policy and, when the time comes, if agreement can be reached, we will then follow the tradition of the British government. The government will take the responsibility for agreeing on the part of Canada and later will ask parliament to ratify Canada's signature to the agreement. That is British policy, which has been followed for a great many years. I think my hon. friend will find that the doubts he has expressed in that regard are unjustified. I do ask him to study the past history of international aviation and to read the agreement of 1919 to which Canada is a party and then to make up his mind whether further freedom under a convention is not in the best interest of post-war civil aviation.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: When the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) spoke I did not know that there was to be a world dictator. However, I am not going to speak in that regard other than to say I do not want the position if I have to pay income tax.

I am rising now to reply to certain remarks made this afternoon in connection with the airport outside Vancouver, because I am interested in that question. I was given two weeks' holiday to go to Vancouver, a distance of 6,000 miles, involving eight days' travelling, which would have allowed me eight days at home. But someone stole my car at Vancouver and it took me four days to find it. Someone says that I should not live there. Well, I do not know who stole the car, but I may remark that the C.C.F. were holding a convention there, and Bracken was trying to form a club.

The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) this afternoon rather left the impression that planes coming to Vancouver suffer on account of fog at certain periods. I do not think he intended to convey exactly the impression which he did, but that was what I gathered from his remarks. I do not want the committee to get any such idea, because the minister knows that one of the best airports in Canada is the airport at Abbotsford, forty-two miles from the centre of Vancouver. I am not going to go into any details, but I can assure the committee that that airport is big enough to handle any bomber made on the American continent. For the minister's benefit I may say about three weeks ago a fifty-passenger transport took off across the centre of the field. It did not have to use the middle of the runway. That will give hon. members an idea of the kind of airport that is there. I simply want to correct the impression which may have been left by the hon. member for New Westminster as to existing airports near Vancouver, and in this regard I have the authority of Grant McConachie. I do not know this gentleman, but I do know that my hon. friends of the Conservative party consider him an excellent man and that they would prefer to have him in charge of Trans-Canada Air Lines and all the rest of the airways. Let me quote what he says:

> The Fraser delta was not only inadequate to handle big plane traffic but outright dangerous due to prevailing wind conditions.

I do not wish the impression to get abroad, which was created, in my mind at any rate, by the remarks of the hon. member for New Westminster, that a plane would have to return to Lethbridge if the fog were down. While I hate to say that anything can be wrong with that part of the country, I may admit that in October of last year we had a fog which lasted for three weeks. And how! someone says—not Howe the minister. Whoever says that simply means that it was a very bad fog. Well, for seventeen days in that period the T.C.A. landed at Abbotsford, and not at Lethbridge.

I have nothing to say about the international aspect of this matter, because if I did say anything about it I would have to follow the example of the hon. member for Macleod and preface my remarks by admitting that I know nothing about it. The only difference is that whereas it took him forty minutes to make that admission, I can state it in just so many words, that I know nothing about it.

Mr. ROY: On March 17 the Minister of Munitions and Supply made a statement to the house on the international discussions on air transport policy which took place in London in October last. He told the house that all the participants were desirous of improving the air services between their territories, and agreed that such development must take place within an international framework, and that closed discriminatory systems could only promote disharmony, and endanger the chances of reaching that broad agreement which is necessary.

The minister also tabled the draft international air transport convention which, by consent of the house, was published in Hansard of March 17, at page 1580. I would not be surprised, Mr. Chairman, if you thought it necessary that I should make the same confession that was made so humbly a minute ago by the hon. member for Macleod, namely, that I am going to speak about something I know nothing about. Strange as it may seem, one cannot be misled if one listens to the voice that is heard in one's subconscious being or the voice that comes through a very faithful kind of aerial, the voice that gives us warnings of dangers to be encountered. If we listen to this voice we cannot be misled, and it tells me that this project of international control for air services in the post-war period does obviously present some dangers to the autonomy of the country.

A careful examination of these agreements makes me believe that we are preparing another monster cartel which will take charge of all air lines of the world. We have had already for many years, and more specially in these last years, and again these last days, the occasion of complaining about monopolies and cartels; and lately we heard from reliable authority that if we are in the midst of the most terrible cataclysm ever known in the past, it is due to the work of those monopolies and cartels. At the present time, we are endeavouring to prepare a post-war policy and are studying all kinds of projects for social security and post-war reconstruction; but my contention is that if we do not go to the root of the sore, if we do not remove the real causes of the present conflict, if we allow these monopolies and cartels to survive and not only that, but if we encourage the formation of new monopolies and cartels, we shall be again facing, not an enduring peace that everybody desires, but only a temporary truce.

Without commenting for the moment on the opportunity of nationalizing our large enterprises, but favouring in all cases a direct and efficient control over these large enterprises, I think it must, without doubt, be admitted, with regard to air transport, that these Canadian air lines companies have been formed under Canadian laws and certainly have some recognized rights.

Enterprises like our railroad systems and air lines services are so huge that there can be no question of provincial or municipal control or of any cooperative ownership. Nevertheless the government would do the wrong thing to force them into an international cartel, and so much the better if they are willing to remain independent. These companies, having largely contributed to the easing of the transportation of war materials and members of armed forces as well as civilians, deserve a better reward for their admirable achievement.

I should like to mention also the help that was given to the development of the unknown sections of the country by companies like Trans-Canada Air Lines, Canadian Pacific Air Lines and many other smaller companies, which have all contributed, to a large extent, to geological surveys, to the development of our mining areas and to the exploitations of our hydraulic powers, and therefore to the development of all our natural resources.

Having always been opposed to all the cartels, I strongly objected to the amalgamation of our railway systems, because I believed that such an amalgamation would result in another monopoly which would become the supermaster of all our transportation systems; and unfortunately not to the benefit of the public. I wonder how, being opposed as the majority of our people are, to such an amalgamation, when it comes to air lines, which is another means of transportation, they could accept a project such as the one proposed in London last October. I am under the impression that the public would be very suspicious of this project, especially when it is brought up by a government that has lost the confidence of the people.

I wish to recall the fact that for the last two years the government has lost every by-election; and this, according to the Prime Minister's own word in this house in 1934, shows that this government is no longer the representative of the people of this country. Therefore, how can a government be entitled to adopt a policy that will bind the future of our country, especially with so vast a scheme as the one coming out of this London convention? Furthermore, this is much more important, when everybody knows that as soon as the government decides to hold a general election, it will be thrown out of power.

The public would be interested to know—and I wonder if the minister could not give the committee some information in this regard—who are the real sponsors, and who are the technical and financial advisers who led the political authorities to such an agreement. I wonder if we would not find among them some who are very closely connected with this famous Bank of International Settlement?

There is so much yet unknown in this project; it requires so many explanations. People are so worried about the future of the country, that they will ask themselves if we are still heading to the aim for which we are supposed to be fighting. The people would be so glad to be assured that our war targets are still the defence of civilization, the maintenance of our liberties and the safeguarding of property rights and so forth. With all that is going on to-day, with all these new schemes, they are asking themselves if they will not be once more misled, especially when they consider that the establishment of the post-war policy comes from a government that, as I said a few minutes ago, has no longer the confidence of the electorate. Would it not be only fair, logical and just to submit this future policy, which is such a drastic one, to the decision of the people, so that the democracy for which we are supposed to be fighting at the present time would not be a "vain mot?"

Furthermore, a project such as this one makes the people much more suspicious, when they know that within a short time there will be in London an imperial conference, at which other like projects may be adopted, which will bind the future of our country. Our people would like to rely on Prime Minister Churchill's statement when he said that an imperial conference would take place in London at which all the dominions would be represented by newly elected prime ministers. There is only one way to correct all this, only one way to assure the people of the country that nothing will be done against their will, namely, the immediate holding of a general election. No one can conceive that a government, which is supposed to know what is going on in the country, would refrain from asking the people to confirm its mandate, and to renew it, so as to enable the government to make such important commitments.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Macleod and also to the address made by the hon. member for Vegreville, and I do not think the minister answered the thesis that they advanced. I agree with the minister that in so far as this discussion is concerned it is but an exploratory one for the purpose of ascertaining the views of the members of this committee, and that the convention is merely tentative. But I should like to have a statement from the minister this evening in regard to several matters, some of which I dealt with when I spoke on March 23. I asked a number of questions on that occasion, but the minister did not have an opportunity that evening to answer them. Unless we have an answer to a number of questions that were asked this afternoon and also earlier in this debate we are merely shadow-boxing with unrealities. We should know the position the government is taking, first in connection with the international set-up; second and very important, the attitude of the government toward a British empire or commonwealth air scheme operating under an international authority, and, finally, various matters in connection with the domestic field which as yet have not been explained. I intend to ask a number of questions in order that we may get the picture as to what has taken place at the various conferences that have been held in recent weeks; something of the decisions made or the agreements reached at the Beaverbrook conference that took place in October, and the reasons that have caused the minister to change the opinion he expressed in the past, that railway companies were an ideal medium to operate airways in this country.

I was surprised at a statement made by the minister in reply to an hon. member who referred to some contention that had been made by the Aeronautical Institute of Canada. The minister, if I took down his words correctly, said, "We would prefer that the Aeronautical Institute of Canada was not so active in regard to post-war aviation at this time." Why? The minister has enunciated the policy which the government is to put into effect one year after the cessation of hostilities. Why should the institute not be allowed and, indeed, invited to consider the propositions that have been put forward, and to make suggestions in order to ensure that the domestic policy to be put into operation in this country will be the very best available?

The hon. member for Macleod referred to an international authority, and the minister stated that there had been previous conventions, beginning with what was known as the Paris convention of 1919, and so on through the years. I ask the minister whether under the Paris convention any power was conferred upon an international authority similar to that contained in article VII of this convention, which provides:

> If an air carrier licensed by the board or a regional council is of the opinion that the airports or other ground facilities on the territory of a member state are not reasonably adequate for the safe, regular, efficient and economical operation of the air services which it is permitted by its licence to perform, it may so inform the government or governments of which it is a national. . . . Each member state undertakes, at the earliest practicable moment, to give effect to the request of the board or regional council.

The next section deals with the matter of expenses. Is it not a fact that this article goes farther than any other convention designed to ensure proper, safe operation and the like? Does not this article in fact grant to an international authority jurisdiction over the sovereignty of each of the member states, which heretofore has not been contemplated under any previous international air agreements? I ask him also whether the suggested international convention represents only the viewpoint of the government of Canada, or does it represent the consensus of nations with which there have been discussions? Has the U.S.S.R. been consulted as to its willingness to enter an international organization? I ask that question because I notice that provision is made for bilateral agreements between member states and adjoining, contiguous states. If that be so, the Soviet Union, having on its boundaries practically all the nations of the world, would not be required, in the operation of its airways, to enter an international organization unless it saw fit to do so.

Then the minister made reference to the doctrine of freedom of transit, which all accept as necessary in the interests of post-war aviation, and which, as he pointed out, is somewhat analogous to the doctrine of freedom of the seas. Are the great nations of the world willing to accept the principle of freedom of transit? Have there been consultations; has there been any agreement in regard thereto? Furthermore, in an international set-up the position will be that T.C.A. will operate transoceanic aircraft. Does the government intend that T.C.A. shall operate a service round the world? If not, what portion of the world is it contemplated will be served by aircraft operated by T.C.A.? Without some knowledge of these matters any discussion of the question of international aviation is merely theoretical.

I now come to the next phase; this is something as to which I particularly wish to ascertain the position of affairs. I refer to the aviation position of the British empire or commonwealth. When the hon. member for Macleod mentioned the British commonwealth the minister rather forgot himself and departed from his usual dispassionate consideration of matters such as these to suggest that the Social Credit party was taking up the position of the official opposition.

Mr. HOWE: Oh, no; I said, "the late Conservative party".

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a play upon words.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It was said with a sneer, and quite unnecessary in any serious discussion of this problem, and quite unjustified by anything that had been said. I am trying to discuss these matters without heat and without partisan considerations. When it comes to a consideration of the British empire and our relations within the empire, it seems passing strange that as yet the house and the country have been given no report, not even a cursory one, as to what occurred at the Beaverbrook conference. On October 18, 1943, in London, the minister vouchsafed an answer to newspaper correspondents who interviewed him:

> The empire will enter future conferences on post-war civil aviation with a common viewpoint as a result of the recent imperial air talks here, Hon. C. D. Howe, Canadian munitions minister, said to-day.
> To a press conference questioner who asked if this indicated a British delegate would represent the whole empire, Mr. Howe replied "No." He said the dominions would have their own representatives. . . .
> The minister reiterated previous declarations that the recent conference, to be followed by one with others of the united nations, was merely a clarifying "family discussion" on the background of the question and said only "broad principles" were discussed.

Is it true that a common viewpoint was arrived at in the conference which took place in London? Did the various parts of the empire agree that the proper solution of the empire situation was not to set up an empire scheme within an international set-up? I ask him also to say whether Canada's position was one of opposition to an empire scheme, and, if so, in taking such a position did Canada take it in opposition to the United Kingdom, New Zealand and Australia?

I read, too, a Washington dispatch of October 29, 1943, which quotes the New York Times in a Washington dispatch as saying:

> . . . that the commonwealth air conference in London went as far as President Roosevelt in favouring freedom of the air. But Canada's position was said to have differed from England, New Zealand and Australia. The mother country and these two dominions share a common view.

Both of these analyses cannot be correct. The minister stated that we had a common viewpoint. I ask him, therefore, was the question considered at this conference of an empire set-up within the ambit of a great international organization, and, if so, did Canada's representatives agree or disagree with that suggestion? I may have some further references to make with regard to the suggestion that I placed before parliament and the country on March 28 last, that we should set up an empire scheme without prejudice to the setting up at the same time of a great international organization to govern safety, after the minister has answered these questions, and to assure that after this war airways development and the development of aircraft will not spell the beginning of another world war.

To come now to the domestic field, much has been made of the fact that under the set-up suggested by the minister for the domestic field, our men who are overseas will be able to return to greater opportunities of employment than they would have under a scheme whereby there would be competition between the national lines and the lines of private companies operated by the railway companies. Doctor George Weir, speaking recently, said that he believed that after the war there was the possibility that 25,000 of our airmen might be able to secure employment in post-war domestic aviation.

Mr. HOWE: Who is Doctor Weir, may I ask?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Doctor Weir was employed in connection with recommending to the government the setting-up of post-war schemes for employment. In any event, he made a survey in order to assure that after the war the roseate promises that had been made of employment to the men overseas when they return to Canada would, in fact, be carried out and the work be available to them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He was brought here from British Columbia.

Mr. HOWE: He was minister of education there?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister asked me who Doctor Weir was, and that surprised me.

Mr. HOWE: I know at least three Doctor Weirs, and I was wondering to which particular one the hon. member was referring.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I said Doctor George Weir.

Mr. HOWE: I understand now to whom the hon. member is referring.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister asked who Doctor Weir was. It shows that Doctor Weir could not have consulted with him in connection with the post-war employment of the men who return from overseas. I ask the minister, was Doctor Weir's estimate founded upon information given him by his department?

Furthermore, the minister made a statement recently in which he said that a very large number of applications had been made for domestic airline franchises in Canada, but that no franchises would be granted until after the war. How many such applications have been made by Canadians and how many by nationals of other countries?

Finally, I ask the minister to explain what changes or alterations or developments have occurred since 1937 which have made it necessary for him to require that the railway companies dissociate themselves from the operation of air lines in the Dominion of Canada. That is a matter on which I think the country should have information. There may be valid reasons known to the minister himself, but as yet the information has not been made available to the country.

The picture so far as the post-war situation is concerned is that Canada holds out the promise to the men who are serving in the air force that some twenty-five thousand may secure employment in aviation in Canada when the war is over. If we do not carry out that promise to the men we shall be doing them an injustice that is totally unjustifiable. I ask the minister how many are employed to-day in Canada in connection, first, with the T.C.A.; and second, how many are employed by private companies within Canada, and how many is it expected will be employed immediately after the war? These are matters that must not be considered from a partisan point of view. They are matters for which we as members of parliament will remain responsible to the men when they return. It is they who want to know the answers to these questions. Our servicemen are not asking for charity. They are asking for the effectuation and the implementing of the promises that we make that there will be employment for them. Has the government considered both sides of the equation? Has it considered how many men returning from overseas could be employed should the present system of domestic air lines be continued, and how many more men could be employed if the proposed change is effected one year after the war? I ask the minister to explain these matters in detail, because all that we have had so far is a general statement. We have not had the evidence to support what the minister has said, nor have we been given the background which he alone can furnish to the house and the country.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend has asked several times for the conclusions of the London discussions. I may say that the discussions of a committee headed by Lord Beaverbrook with committees representing the various dominions was not a conference. It was stated clearly at the time that it was a family discussion, the purpose of which was to endeavour to arrive at a common viewpoint among the empire countries. All countries, including India, were represented. Many different ideas were presented. Naturally all parts of the empire would not think alike on a matter of this kind, but I can say that a common viewpoint was reached. I assure my hon. friend that the statement on international aviation which was presented to this house, and the draft convention which was placed on Hansard are wholly consistent with the conclusions which were unanimously reached in those discussions.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is the result of the conference?

Mr. HOWE: This is an elaboration of the viewpoint of the conference. The conference discussed general principles and Canada has elaborated upon those principles. Naturally a three-day conference could hardly write an elaborate convention. Doing so involves study by experts.

Mr. GRAYDON: If the policy enunciated by the minister in this house prior to the Easter recess is the policy which the government intends to propose to the world on the question of civil aviation; if that is the result of a common viewpoint which the minister says was reached in the empire discussions, will that be followed up by other parts of the commonwealth making similar declarations to the world?

Mr. HOWE: The various governments of the empire perhaps will have their own ideas as to how much each should take their parliaments into their confidence at this stage. We feel that we have gone quite far in that direction, that being the policy of this government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You did not do it with the war.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not want to interrupt; I just want to clarify this point. If the other nations of the commonwealth take their parliaments into their confidence as this government has done in this instance, is this the policy they would present to their parliaments in view of the common viewpoint which the minister says was unanimously arrived at?

Mr. HOWE: I think that is stretching the point quite far. I said that certain principles were agreed upon by all commonwealth countries, or rather that there was reached by those countries a common viewpoint which is wholly consistent with the document which was placed on Hansard here. A corresponding document prepared by another country elaborating those same principles, might contain quite different clauses.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is only a matter of language.

Mr. HOWE: Every point in this long document naturally was not discussed in detail. I will say, however, that it was cabled to London for comments before it was submitted here, or submitted to any other country. No comments were received which were material. There were one or two small comments, and one or two changes were made as a result. But the point I make is that there was no material difference in viewpoint. I will say that perhaps if London had been preparing this document it would have been different in some particulars, but my point is that it is not inconsistent with the common empire viewpoint.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I ask this question?

Mr. HOWE: I do not mind being interrupted.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You never interrupt anybody. May I ask a question? If I have not your permission, I shall sit down.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the minister be good enough to state the principles upon which agreement was reached by the London conference, so that we may be able to interpret for ourselves whether this convention is a correct interpretation of those principles? We are entitled to that.

Mr. HOWE: I think you will have to take my word for it. I have stated definitely that they are.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You say they are not inconsistent; that is as far as you have gone.

Mr. HOWE: At the conclusion of the discussions in London a press statement was prepared and agreed to which gave the gist of the discussions. I do not think, as one member in attendance, that it would be proper for me to expand upon the information given at that time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That would not be taking us into your confidence.

Mr. HOWE: I think I have gone a long way in that direction. I thought I had the questions asked by the hon. member for Lake Centre clearly in mind, but I must say that there have been a few rabbits across the trail, since he spoke.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Perhaps I could help the minister. I was asking about the British empire scheme. I asked whether a British empire scheme by which aviation would be established within the empire under an international set-up was before the conference. I would point out that the minister is reported at page 1580 of Hansard as saying:

> Lord Beaverbrook emphasized the unanimous agreement which the conference had reached on every issue presented to it.

What was the empire issue that was presented? Did Canada agree to an empire set-up? What was the attitude taken by the conference with reference to that matter?

Mr. HOWE: I must say that I am not just clear as to what my hon. friend means by an empire set-up. There was a discussion of routes between empire countries. Routes between empire countries are wholly consistent with the principles which were laid down in the discussion of international aviation. But there are routes apart from empire routes. If the British empire were to confine its aviation to flying between British countries, that could hardly be called a comprehensive international system of aviation. I think the empire countries hope to have routes to countries outside the empire. Naturally an international pattern should be broad enough to include both.

[Mr. Howe.]

My hon. friend was rather shocked by a provision that if airports in a member country were not suitable for international traffic other countries could provide funds to improve the airport and, if necessary, to do the work of providing an airport. May I point out that this is a voluntary association of nations; it is not imposed on any nation. A nation signs the agreement in order to obtain rights in other countries. Each country will have the use of airports in other countries, and I suggest that it is hardly fair to offer a country first-class airports in other parts of the world and not have that country offer in return first-class airports within its own boundaries. It is quite conceivable that certain countries will not be in a financial position to provide these airports at their own expense, but as members of a voluntary association there could be, I think, no possible objection to permitting other countries to do the work if the sovereign country is financially unable to meet the situation.

Perhaps my hon. friend will give me his next question.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: With regard to the empire scheme, the minister said that he did not quite understand what I had in mind. What I had in mind was a set-up similar to that constituted under the agreement of 1935 between the United Kingdom, Newfoundland and Canada, whereby a transport company was set up with ownership in definite proportions being held by each of the countries. Was any such proposition for an empire set-up considered by the conference, and, if so, what attitude did Canada take with regard thereto?

Mr. HOWE: I think every country that is familiar with the agreement of 1935 would be reluctant to propose another such agreement. It was entered into with great hopes, but it failed to function. Few countries would wish to be a minority shareholder in an international air line. However, no proposal of that kind was put forward, and it was generally conceded that the agreement of 1935 is no longer applicable.

A further question was, why should I change my mind? It is regarded as inconceivable that I could have one opinion in 1937 and another in 1944. I think it was the Hon. Joseph Howe who said there was nothing he valued so little as his own opinion of yesterday. I think that is a very sound position to take.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He was on the spot when he said that.

Mr. HOWE: I had little experience in 1937. I have gained a bit in the intervening years, and I have come to the conclusion that the policy of developing air transport as an enterprise separate from surface transportation is the correct form of procedure. Not only that; the United States arrived at the same conclusion in 1938. It took us six years longer.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That was for another reason.

Mr. HOWE: Not at all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, yes.

Mr. HOWE: The same reason exactly.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The reason why the United States arrived at that conclusion was that they did not want the railways in a position to hold their railway rates in place.

Mr. HOWE: That is not the main reason.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I differ with the minister, and I have read as much about it as he has.

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps so. But there are other reasons. For example, I said in 1937 that the ticket-selling facilities of the railways would be very useful to the air lines. It took only a matter of a few short months to determine that the ticket agencies of the railways could not sell air transport successfully. A wholly different brand of salesmanship is required; and even though the ownership of Trans-Canada Air Lines was maintained by the railway, the ticket-selling facilities were completely divorced some years ago. There is very little in common between the two operations; they are quite different fields of activity, and I have come to the conclusion that they can best develop separately.

It has been suggested that the separation was an attempt to weaken private operation by forbidding consolidation into a great system. Private air transport in this country was developed as a series of small enterprises, and I believe that the development was more sound as a small enterprise group than it was as a unified enterprise. Unless the individual routes could be interconnected by another transcontinental system, I think there was ample evidence to show that the economy of operation was not as favourable under the larger system as it was under a series of separate operations.

The leader of the official opposition has had a great deal to say about small enterprise. I must say I agree with him, and I am shocked to find that he thinks there is no place in the air for small enterprise. I believe that the development of air transport as a series of small enterprises was a sound and healthy one. It lacked certain safeguards which have since been provided. The weakness of the development was that as soon as a small enterprise became successful, another small enterprise would enter the same area, and if both were successful, still a third would enter, until the competition was overdone and one of the three had to go.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Was there not control for that?

Mr. HOWE: Not at that time, no. We passed the Transport Act in 1938 which prevented that sort of competition. Perhaps we were too late in doing so. Had we done so ten years before, we would have had a much more solid growth of these small air lines.

The policy of the government is to allocate areas to a separate air line, to protect each area against competition, and to give such assistance to the enterprise that it can grow into strong and healthy air enterprise capable of serving the needs of its particular locality. I believe that is the sound method of development. It gives a place for small enterprise, and it allows returned men to enter the field of air transportation not as employees but as owners.

Mr. GRAYDON: Well, does it? That is a point which has been bothering me.

Mr. HOWE: Oh, quite.

Mr. GRAYDON: Just how will an airman coming back from overseas be able to start in on one of these air routes which the minister is—theoretically—holding out for him when he returns? I must confess that I have never been able to convince myself that the minister's statement is a possibility. I cannot see how a young fellow coming back will start up his own line as the minister suggests. I think the committee, like myself, would like to know, how does the man practically go about it? Could we have the mechanics of how it is done?

Mr. SLAGHT: He applies to the authority for his licence.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, he has to have money and backing.

Mr. HOWE: We have had groups of business men in every large and medium sized community in Canada, as well as in a number of smaller communities, that have been willing to support aviation enterprise financially. I believe there are thirty-three or thirty-five flying clubs across Canada supported by citizens in their districts, interested in aviation, who have supported the enterprise financially and given of their time to its business direction. Those groups are still interested in aviation, and I believe that if a profitable aviation enterprise is open in that neighborhood—and we intend to have a number developed which our experts believe will offer profitable operation—the same group of citizens would be glad to support a group of returned men in that operation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. HOWE: Well, now, just a minute.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All right, I do not want to interrupt the minister.

Mr. HOWE: Could I explain my theory a little?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, the minister is very interesting.

Mr. HOWE: A bill has been introduced in this house for a commercial bank. The purpose of that bank would be to finance an enterprise of this kind. A promising enterprise, offering the probability of profitable operation, with the good business management offered by the group I suggest, would find backing at that bank.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a new thought, but it was not told to us in the committee.

Mr. HOWE: I think that if the hon. member reads the bill he will find that it is suitable for just that type of operation. My hon. friends opposite are very sensitive about being interrupted and I have not been able to say twenty consecutive words since I rose in my place.

Mr. GRAYDON: We are eager for information.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the desk pounders keep quiet. That is all they ever do here.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The hon. member is the worst offender in the house.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend's next question was how many airmen—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before the minister leaves that question, may I ask a question?

An hon. MEMBER: Keep quiet.

Mr. GRAYDON: Be polite over there.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I ask the Chairman to request this hon. member, who never does anything but pound his desk and abuse other members, to withdraw that remark. The remark was shouted at me across the floor to keep quiet. That, of course, is an improper thing for him to say to me when I am on my feet addressing a question to the minister. I wish to know whether, when arriving at this policy—and this is the only place for learning from the minister, by cross-examination—of divorcing the railways from the operation of the proposed policy of operating air lines, private enterprise was in any way consulted—private enterprise which had invested millions in the air lines of the country, private enterprise whose business is to be destroyed by this policy. Were they consulted or given any advance notice?

Mr. HOWE: Let me say at once that no business is going to be destroyed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It looks like confiscation.

Mr. HOWE: There is no confiscation involved either. The properties were taken over either in 1940 or in 1941. Small enterprises were taken over by large enterprise. The individual companies are certainly not weaker in 1944 than they were in 1941. They will be returned to separate operation. As a matter of fact, many of the smaller companies were never consolidated into Canadian Pacific Air Lines. I believe that only about fifteen per cent of the mileage was actually consolidated into Canadian Pacific Air Lines. In the other cases Canadian Pacific Air Lines are simply the majority shareholder of separate enterprises.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not my question. Were they consulted?

Mr. HOWE: Separate enterprise will be re-established and I see no reason for any loss. I assume they were bought at a reasonable price and that the equipment was worth the value represented on the books of the company. I have every confidence that the operations can be separated without loss to any one.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Was private enterprise consulted?

Mr. HOWE: It was not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a complete answer.

Mr. HOWE: The government made their decision. Public enterprise was not consulted, nor was private enterprise. The decision was the decision of the government, announced in the House of Commons, which again is respect for democratic institutions.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No. It is just Hitler rule; that is all it is. You come to a decision before parliament is consulted.

An hon. MEMBER: Order.

Mr. HOWE: I suppose the correct procedure is to come and ask parliament to make up the mind of the government; is that the idea?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The correct procedure is to come to parliament with a policy and not to announce an accomplished fact.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The correct procedure is to have a leader of the opposition in the house.

Mr. GRAYDON: You are just an echo of the Prime Minister; that is all you are.

Mr. HOWE: The number of employees of Trans-Canada Air Lines at December 31, 1943, was 2,343, of whom thirty-five per cent were women, and Canadian Pacific Air Lines, I happen to know, had a considerably larger number than that, many of whom were engaged in overhaul work.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They were doing work for the government?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, some 6,000, all told.

Mr. GRAYDON: How many men coming back from overseas, coming out of the air force, does the minister estimate can go into the type of private enterprise which he is theoretically holding open under this policy?

Mr. HOWE: I should think Doctor Weir's estimate of 25,000 is not unreasonable. My hon. friend will appreciate that it takes from twelve to fifteen men on the ground for every man in the air. Doctor Weir did not mean 25,000 pilots, but 25,000 personnel. The present personnel, I presume, would be about 9,000, and I expect a very much more dense operation when we can obtain aircraft freely. I should think that within twelve months after demobilization we would easily have 25,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: Out of those 25,000 how many would be aircrew?

Mr. HOWE: It would be one in twelve perhaps.

Mr. GRAYDON: That would mean that very few of the actual airmen who are flying would get jobs so far as the question of flying is concerned.

Mr. HOWE: I do not know that that is a fair conclusion. Airmen can work on the ground as well. All our traffic men are airmen. Perhaps all men qualified as airmen may not be flying, but they certainly would have jobs in aviation, other than mechanics. Was there another question?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I did want to ask the minister some other questions. I realize how difficult it is to be asked a number of questions and then to be asked a large number of others in between, I know the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) will agree with that.

Mr. SLAGHT: I agree that there is a consistent monopoly over there.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In connection with the international set-up I asked the minister whether the united nations had been consulted and, in particular, whether the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics had agreed to an international set-up, whether along the lines indicated in the convention or otherwise, and who the eight nations were that are referred to in the tentative agreement or covenant.

Mr. HOWE: Let me make one thing clear. No nation has agreed with any other nation to do anything about post-war civil aviation. Can I make that clear? There have been certain conversations to obtain viewpoints, but nothing has been reduced to agreement. Not even the empire discussions have been reduced to agreement. There has been no ratification. None was asked and none given. My hon. friend asks how many nations have agreed; I do not think any nation has agreed with any other. He asked whether Soviet Russia had agreed. Certain delegates of Soviet Russia are on their way to North America to hold discussions of the type that have been referred to here to-day. I believe there was some delay on account of weather, and I am not sure whether the delegates have arrived on this side or not. They have an engagement to hold discussions in the United States and have been invited to hold discusions in Canada and in London, and other bilateral discussions of that kind are in the offing. It is hoped that, as the weeks go by, all the countries that are concerned will have had a chance to discuss the problem with other countries in an informal way, and it is also hoped that out of these informal discussions will come a basis for agreement. Final agreement can be reached only when all the countries interested sit down round a table for a formal conference.

Mr. NIXON: The map at the back of the annual report of Trans-Canada Air Lines shows the proposed extensions of a line running from Toronto through Sault Ste. Marie to Port Arthur and so on. Could the minister tell us what the plans are for carrying out the proposed extension and also for locating an airfield at Sault Ste. Marie?

Mr. HOWE: I have said several times that no material development of civil aviation can be expected in the war years. The post-war plans will certainly call for an airport at Sault

Ste. Marie to implement the Trans-Canada Air Lines map that was published in the last annual report. The intention is to have a more direct route from Toronto to Sault Ste. Marie, the lakehead and Winnipeg, to supplement the longer route that is now being operated. I am not suggesting that the longer route will be abandoned; it certainly will not be, but there will be a shorter route for through traffic, which will include Sault Ste. Marie and the lakehead.

Mr. McNEVIN: I wish to make a few observations with respect to civil aviation. I shall not deal at any length with the international aspect of the situation except to say this: It might be well if we refreshed our memories with respect to the four freedoms of the Atlantic charter. As I recall them, they are, freedom from want, freedom from fear, freedom of worship and freedom of speech or freedom of expression. I think most hon. members will agree that if we go back at least to the years immediately preceding the great war and up to the present time we shall find that nationalism was rampant throughout almost the entire world. I believe one of the ideas contained in the four freedoms would be the replacing of nationalism with internationalism, and that being true, I think we should at least be prepared to support the internationalist idea in civil aviation in the post-war period.

With respect to civil aviation there is a local matter that I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. During the period of preliminary investigations with regard to the aerodrome sites secured for the British commonwealth air training plan a number of sites were investigated in the riding of Victoria, Ontario. The city of Peterborough and the town of Lindsay, together having a population of well over 40,000, represent the two largest inland populated places between Ottawa and Toronto with the possible exception of the town of Pembroke. I think an aerodrome site located in that area would be on an almost direct route between Ottawa and Toronto. At least one or two sites in the vicinity of Lindsay warranted flight checking and quite extensive investigations.

I was pleased to note in the minister's remark this evening that he intimated in the post-war period consideration would be given to reenacting the principle of giving some assistance to municipal airport enterprises, and I should therefore like the area to which I have referred to be remembered when further consideration is given to civil aviation in the period immediately following the war.

Mr. HOWE: I may say that we shall be glad to keep the needs of Lindsay in mind. We should like to have an airport there. My hon. friend knows it is difficult country in which to locate an airport. We hope that after the war the combined wisdom of the area can find a suitable spot and that we can have an airport there.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to ask the minister a question with respect to the operation of air lines along the Mackenzie river valley. A gentleman from that country told me some days ago—he may not have the picture correct, and in what I am about to say I am repeating what he told me—that the airfields all the way down as far as Fort Norman are more or less under the control of United States groups. Whether that is so or not, I do not know, but I should like to know.

What will be the position of the airfields built between Fort Norman and White Horse? I expect to fly there this coming summer. I believe that airfields have been built all along the Canol pipeline. I do not know whether that is so or not, but if they have been built, to whom would they belong and under whose control are they at the present time? Are they wholly under the control of the United States army? Then, from the places I have mentioned down to Aklavik, under whose control are the airfields? By whom were they built? I know that some were built by Canada, but have additional ones been built by the United States army, and, if so, what is the position with regard to those airfields at the present time, and what will be the position when the war is over?

Mr. HOWE: The ownership of all airfields in that area is Canadian. Certain air strips were built in connection with the Canol project as part of the project. They were built by the Americans who built the project. The fields, if you can call them that, are probably under the control of the Americans at the moment except in a few instances. Most of the transport work is handled by Canadian Pacific Air Lines. United States planes undoubtedly fly there as well. It is not like an organized air line; it is simply a landing-strip, or what we would call a bush operation, but there are services—

Mr. MacNICOL: That is between what points?

Mr. HOWE: That is along the Canol project, up toward Aklavik.

Mr. MacNICOL: Will the minister kindly tell us a little more about the situation between Fort Norman and White Horse?

Mr. HOWE: There are two or three emergency strips there which were used in constructing the pipeline. A trip can, I suppose, be made by land planes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Do C.P.A. planes fly between those two points?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, they fly there. Control of the staging route is in the hands of the Royal Canadian Air Force. My hon. friend was speaking of the airfields along the Mackenzie river. To-day probably three-quarters of those airfields are under the control of the Americans who built them and are working in the vicinity. Two or three have been taken over by the Department of Transport, and control of the others will be taken over as soon as that can be done conveniently. I presume that by autumn all those airports will be under the control of the Department of Transport.

Mr. MacNICOL: Supposing I want to fly from Fort McMurray to Fort Providence, and then from Fort Providence to Fort Norman. Will I travel on a United States plane or on a C.P.A. plane; do I land on C.P.A. fields or do I land on fields under the control of United States officials?

Mr. HOWE: If you go at all you must go on C.P.A. planes, for any United States planes flying there do not carry tariff passengers. The fields in that area represent the ideal condition we are trying to bring about in international aviation, in that there is freedom of transit, freedom to land and refuel, and freedom to deliver passengers. You will have no trouble; if a field is there, you can land on it. As a matter of fact, my officer tells me that the field at Fort Providence has recently been taken over for Canadian operation. If my hon. friend lands at Fort Norman, however, at the moment it will be a United States operation.

Mr. LACOMBE: On March 30 of this year the following question was passed as an order for return:

1. Has J. Francois Leduc, consulting engineer and associates, whose offices are located at No. 354 St. Catherine street east, Montreal, obtained any contracts from the dominion government during the years 1939, 1940, 1941, 1942, 1943 and 1944?
2. If so, for what total amount?
3. What amount has been paid to them up to the present time by the government, and how much money was paid them during each of the above-mentioned years?

The reply, as contained in sessional paper No. 263, was as follows: Contracts between the Department of Transport, air services branch, and F. J. Leduc and associates, covering the inspection of materials at various airports under construction by the Department of Transport, were: Mont Joli, authorized contract, $12,877.80, amount paid $11,539.73; Saguenay, authorized contract, $19,000, amount paid $15,702.09; St. Honore, contract authorized, $12,000, amount paid, $11,968.36.

(Translation) Mr. Chairman, since we are discussing the appropriations of the Department of National Defence for Air, I wish to bring to the attention of the committee what is, to my mind, a downright abuse. A friend of the government who is a member in the Quebec legislative assembly has been awarded government contracts for $43,877.80 solely for the inspection of materials at three airports under construction. That member, Mr. François Leduc, has already been paid by the government $39,210.18 for the mere inspection of materials.

Why were the questions I asked in that connection passed as orders for returns? I would not believe that everything was arranged so that the government's answers might not appear in Hansard. That is far from my thought. But I want to know, down to the least detail, about the staggering price paid for the inspection made by Mr. François Leduc, because I want and have a right to know, as a member of the Canadian parliament, where the people's money voted by this house is going. I wish to know whether the inspection of those materials was detailed or special or whether a general inspection was made.

Mr. Chairman, as civil aviation is becoming more and more important, we must provide immediately for the evolution of this system of transportation. All sections of our vast country should be the subject of a thorough survey. Civil aviation is destined to render priceless services in all fields: agriculture, commerce, industry, mail carrying, etc. It will become our most efficient protection against forest fires and other major calamities. Epidemics, which so often have decimated the populations far removed from large cities, will be tamed by the easy availability of adequate medicine, doctors and nurses. In other words, civil aviation will play a worthy part in the protection of our natural resources as well as our investments and man-power. I can visualize it in a still nobler role. It will furnish the quickest and most powerful help to future pioneers and missionaries. It will greatly facilitate the civilization of Canada and the spread of the gospel throughout the country. These last two accomplishments alone would be sufficient to deserve for civil aviation the best that our government can offer.

Mr. JAQUES: It seems to me that the minister replied to the hon. member for Macleod in a disparaging way. I gathered that the impression the minister wished to leave with the members of the house, and, I suppose, with people outside the house, was that this scheme contemplates nothing further than what is connected with civil aviation. On March 17, when the minister introduced this scheme to the house he said, as reported at page 1577 of Hansard:

> As I have already mentioned, on April 2 last year the Prime Minister gave a statement of the government's position with regard to international air transport, making it clear that our policy would be one of international cooperation and collaboration and that we would support whatever policy seemed best calculated to serve not only the immediate national interests of Canada, but our overriding interest in the establishment of an international order.

That seemed to me a horse of a totally different colour. This scheme is a great deal more than merely dealing with civil aviation. It contemplates an international order: in other words, a world government. I call the attention of the committee to another international scheme which this government is behind, namely a scheme for the international control of exchange and currency stabilization. Let me read this statement which I take from the Keynes scheme for world currency stabilization:

> (b) It might set up an account in favour of an international policing body.
> (c) It would provide excellent machinery for enforcing a financial blockade.
> (d) We have here a genuine organ of truly international government.

This is not the right time to say any more about that scheme, but we shall have plenty to say later. I should however, like to leave this thought with the committee, that there is a great deal more about this apparently innocent scheme of civil aviation than meets the eye.

Mr. LACOMBE: Will the minister kindly give me the details regarding the contracts which the department let for work at Saguenay, Mont Joli and St. Honore?

Mr. HOWE: I am sorry I have not the information at hand, but I shall be glad to look it up.

Mr. SLAGHT: I desire to clarify, if I can, the real situation regarding Canada's position in post-war civil aviation. I believe that the members of this house and the people of Canada owe a deep debt of gratitude to the minister and his government for the position he has taken on behalf of our country with reference to this problem. It will be recalled that he crossed the ocean in October for the special purpose of attending a conference with Lord Beaverbrook in London, and there met with the representatives of India, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa; and the nations of the commonwealth sat down and evolved in an exploratory way the attitude they felt they should take on this important subject. The minister placed on Hansard at page 1580, on March 17, the joint press release that followed that conference, and may I remind hon. members again of what was issued:

> The conference with the dominions and India on civil air transport, which has been meeting in London since Monday last, concluded its sessions this morning. The conversations were informal and exploratory, and the conclusions reached are subject to confirmation by the governments represented at the conference. Unanimous agreement was reached as to the recommendations which should be made regarding the lines on which civil aviation should be developed after the war, and as to the contribution which the governments of the commonwealth and empire could make towards international cooperation in this field.

Then, on the same page of Hansard, Lord Beaverbrook, in referring to the issues which they had discussed at the conference said that they were "adequate for testing immediate opinion in relation to civil aviation". That is as far as the commonwealth nations have gone. Canada, we are agreed, occupies probably first place strategically and geographically on the map of the globe with regard to post-war civil aviation. You must cross Canada going east, west, north, or south, in practically any direction. So that we are a pivotal country in whatever plan is ultimately agreed upon. I am sympathetic with the curiosity of hon. members, particularly those of the official opposition, who ask so many questions and endeavour to put the minister in a position where he might appear not to be taking the committee into his confidence as fully as he might with regard to the exact programme.

But let me point this out. The commonwealth nations have had their conference in an exploratory way. It yet remains, before any final agreement can be reached, to sit down with the United States, Russia and China. We are fourth in war production among the allied nations, and before the war we stood fourth or fifth in world trade. Yet it seems to me that, by the aggressive attitude our minister and government have taken, in the matter of civil aviation, Canada now occupies first position among the nations of the world because, instead of having a national isolationist attitude such as was taken by the great leader of the gentlemen of the official opposition a few years ago when he said he would blast a way for Canada into the markets of the world, this government has adopted the very opposite attitude. We have had the courage, and we have been the only nation in the world to have the courage, to lay before the parliament of our country Canada's full, all-out exact attitude with regard to international post-war civil aviation. That policy which we have been the first to announce it seems to me is a splendid declaration of international friendship and cooperation. We are now in a position to go with outstretched arms not only to the United Kingdom and the other nations of the commonwealth but to all the countries of the world and say: We have had the courage to tell you what we think should be the world basis for post-war civil aviation. Here is our plan. Now let us sit down with you as soon as conveniently possible and discuss it, and make changes where changes are necessary. But here is a basis for us all to gather around and discuss at the conference table, to bring about a final solution of this all-important problem. What more could one ask of any country? If the official opposition in congress charged the authorities of the United States with not having placed before them a declaration of their all-out post-war civil aviation policy, there might be some point in their criticism. If some member of the mother of parliaments took the same position there might be some point in it, but as far as this country is concerned we stand first, the other nations in the world coming after, in the matter of friendly proposals for a final, definite authority and cooperation. This committee might well recognize that fact to-night. I wish to pay my personal tribute to the minister and his government for having had the courage to take a position of that kind and be the first to endeavour to bring a real and final policy into being among the nations of the world.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): This evening the minister told the committee that the industrial development bank which is to be set up would look after boys returning from overseas who might want to establish air lines. I find that the preamble of the industrial development bank bill states:

> Whereas it is desirable to establish an industrial development bank to promote the economic welfare of Canada by increasing the effectiveness of monetary action through ensuring the availability of credit to industrial enterprises.

The interpretation of "industrial enterprise" is given as follows:

> "Industrial enterprise" means a business in which the manufacture, processing or refrigeration of goods, wares and merchandise or the building of ships or vessels or the generating or distributing of electricity is carried on.

It does not say anything about aviation; in fact aviation would be entirely out. In the banking and commerce committee there was some discussion about a ceiling on loans, and the governor of the Bank of Canada said that there should not be a ceiling. Mention was made of men returning from overseas, and the governor of the Bank of Canada said that there was no reason why loans of $10,000 or $15,000 should not be made. However, no mention was made of aviation and, as I say, no mention is made of aviation in the industrial development bank bill.

Mr. McNIVEN: Change the bill.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The bill will have to be changed. Evidently the minister was under the impression that the bank could take care of things of that kind. When the boys return from overseas many will be wanting to establish garage and repair shops along our tourist highways, and that is not covered.

Mr. McNIVEN: It should be.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): It should be, absolutely. When mention was made of loans of $5,000, $10,000 or $15,000 to permit boys returning from overseas establishing businesses, it was practically left out. We were talking of loans of $100,000, $200,000 or $300,000, and then we got down to $10,000 or $15,000 or $20,000. I think this bank should be able to take care of what has been mentioned to-night, namely, aviation enterprises and garages which the boys returning from overseas will want to establish. There is every likelihood that our tourist trade will be greater than ever. The government is setting up a tourist committee, and a convention was held the other day to discuss these matters. I think everything possible should be done to encourage boys returning from overseas to set up garages along our tourist routes.

Mention was made to-night about Peterborough and Lindsay. We should have a field there. The deputy minister has stated that surveys have been made in the Peterborough district. That city is most anxious to have an airfield. It is one of the industrial centres of Canada. I think the hon. member for Victoria, Ontario, (Mr. McNevin) stated that Peterborough and Lindsay had a population of about 40,000. Peterborough and its suburbs have a population of about 32,000. The country there is rolling, but it is a beautiful country. Perhaps it may be hard to put in an airfield, but they have put them in in more difficult places. I think everything possible should be done along that line.

Mention has been made of the possibility of establishing small air lines, and I was wondering if the minister had in mind the selling of bombers and other types of planes. In a return that was brought down I notice that six Boeing planes were sold to the T.C.A., and one to the Maritime Central Airways Limited. Is it the intention of the government to sell these planes in order that transport lines may be established for carrying freight and passengers?

Mr. HOWE: The Boeings referred to by my hon. friend were an old model of transport plane. They were suitable for transport work, if no better type was available, but they were outmoded. It would hardly be a kindness to anyone preparing to start up in the transportation business to sell him a bomber or military plane. If certain military planes are capable of being converted economically to transport planes, that conversion will be made, but very few military planes are. The intention is to make any reasonable use of military planes that can be made, but it is not to sell military planes just for the sake of selling a plane to someone to fly hither and yon. Unless they can be converted economically they will not be sold to air lines or to the general public.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The disposal committee will be selling some of these planes after the war?

Mr. HOWE: Some of them, yes.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): And some of those planes will be suitable for carrying freight?

Mr. HOWE: Possibly.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): In the United States some planes have been turned over to passenger lines?

Mr. HOWE: No. Certain military planes are capable of being used for freighting with a different fuselage, but such planes have not been turned over to the air lines. The Liberator is used as a bomber, while another version is used as a freighter. Both have the same wings and the same engines, but the fuselages are different.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): What use do the T.C.A. make of the Boeing machines?

[Mr. G. K. Fraser]

Mr. HOWE: For carrying passengers and freight, but the Boeing is a civilian model.

Mr. GRAYDON: The conversion of our aircraft from military to civilian use brings to mind one type of plane which the minister has not mentioned, the Lancaster. Can he give the committee any information as to the possibilities of using what Lancaster bombers may be still usable when the war is over, for cargo or passenger carrying purposes?

Mr. HOWE: The Lancaster bomber is being used by Canada to transport mail and a few passengers across the Atlantic. It has not been converted for use as a passenger plane; at least it is not an economical civilian plane. It is a very useful plane; it carries a very large load of mail, larger than any other plane that crosses the Atlantic. But it will carry only a few passengers; it is not a plane which could possibly survive in competitive conditions after the war. However, as I mentioned the use of a civilian fuselage on the Liberator bomber, the same is possible with the Lancaster. The York was an attempt to put a commercial fuselage on a Lancaster assembly, but it has not proved to be the type of plane which is required on this continent. I believe a few have been built for use in Europe. We are hopeful that a fuselage will be developed which will produce a commercial plane that will be competitive. We are looking forward to that, but it will be a matter of a good many months before that can be brought about. That is the hope we have regarding use of Lancaster planes in the post-war period.

Mr. GRAYDON: My understanding, although perhaps the minister can enlighten the committee on this, is that the Lancaster is a much better machine from the point of view of transoceanic travel than the D.C. 4 would be. Would the minister give some information on that from a post-war point of view?

Mr. HOWE: I do not understand what my hon. friend means by a "better" plane. Better for what? It is a better plane to drop bombs, but if you ask me to go in competition with a Lancaster plane to-day against a DC 4 plane across the north Atlantic, I can tell you at once that the Lancaster plane operator would starve to death. When we are talking about civilian planes, the earning power of the plane is the important factor. The DC 4 carries forty-two passengers across the Atlantic. The Lancaster will carry ten passengers. If it is a matter of freight, the Lancaster will carry a bigger load of freight than the DC 4 across the Atlantic; but, as my hon. friend knows, freight is not a pay load in peace time.

Mr. GRAYDON: My hon. friend is, of course, speaking of the Lancaster as at present built, but he intimated a few moments ago that experimentation is proceeding so far as the fuselage is concerned, presumably with the object of increasing the passenger possibilities and to put it in competition with the DC 4 or another passenger plane.

Mr. HOWE: Yes. That is one of a great many planes that are on the drafting board to-day as post-war possibilities. I do not think anyone can predict the performance of a plane on the drafting board. It takes anywhere from four to five years after a plane is first flown to make it a first-class aeroplane. I do not think anyone should speak with great certainty about what the Lancaster will be with a passenger fuselage. I think we shall have to wait and see.

Mr. GRAYDON: I assume the situation at the moment is such that there is a possibility that the Lancaster may yet be the plane best adapted for passenger and freight use in the post-war years. As I understand it, there is no definite decision with respect to either the DC 4 or the Lancaster so far as post-war possibilities are concerned.

Mr. HOWE: We do know the DC 4; we can go and look at it. There is at the moment no such thing as a post-war Lancaster passenger plane. As I say, it is on the drafting board, just as are twenty other planes, for post-war use. Which will be the best plane of the lot, I am sure I cannot say. All I can guarantee to my hon. friend is that none of them will be flying within two years.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There is one matter on which I should like to get some information, having to do, I suppose, with the establishment of the new type of machinery designed to control aviation in this country. I will refer to what the minister said, as reported in Hansard, at page 1574.

It is proposed to establish a new board, to be called the air transport board, which will confine all its activities to air traffic, and which, in addition to performing the regulatory duties now lodged with the board of transport commissioners, will be charged with the responsibility for advising the government on ways and means of bringing about a rapid and well-planned expansion of transport by air. The proposed board will examine the needs for new commercial services, and make recommendations for their establishment and expansion, in both the domestic and international fields; receive applications for the services and issue commercial licences; establish tariffs and regulate rates; examine the ownership, financial structure, operations, and financial position of carriers, make recommendations for needed financial assistance; advise the government on matters affecting the operation of existing aerodromes; report on the need for new aerodromes; and perform such other allied duties as may be determined.

Is that board to be merely an advisory board, or will it have mandatory powers such as are to-day possessed by the board of transport commissioners in so far as transport in general is concerned? If it is to have mandatory powers, then it will have to control all our international as well as domestic routes. If it is to have merely suggesting powers, then it is a body that in reality has no powers whatever; it is a pseudo-judicial body whose decisions may or may not be accepted by the government. Is the minister prepared to explain what he has in mind, and particularly whether the decisions of this new board are to be subject to the veto of the government?

Mr. HOWE: The nature of the proposed board is quite different from that of the board of transport commissioners. The board of transport commissioners is a judicial board administering an act. The proposed air board is almost an exact parallel of the civil aeronautics authority of the United States. That board functions within the department of commerce and through executive powers of the president. The air transport board will be a board within the aeronautics branch of the Department of Transport and will get its power through the Minister of Transport. I think my hon. friend would not seriously propose that the government divorce itself entirely from air policy. That would be an abrogation of responsible government. The policy must be determined by the government, and administered with the advice of the air transport board.

H. R. H. PRINCESS ELIZABETH

GREETINGS FROM PARLIAMENT OF CANADA ON THE OCCASION OF HER EIGHTEENTH BIRTHDAY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Hon. members will recall, Mr. Speaker, that to-day is the eighteenth birthday anniversary of Her Royal Highness Princess Elizabeth. Last night I sent a message to Her Royal Highness on behalf of the government and the people of Canada, but I am sure that Her Royal Highness would be pleased to receive greetings from the parliament of Canada to-day. I would therefore say, if I may; Mr. Speaker, on behalf of hon. members, that this House of Commons sends its warmest and best wishes to Her Royal Highness, and among them the wish that she may have very many very happy returns of the day.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Following the Prime Minister's remarks in recognition of this very happy occasion, I should like to take the opportunity of associating the official opposition with the message which he has suggested may properly go from the House of Commons at this time. May I add, to what he has said, that Her Royal Highness celebrates, on this her eighteenth birthday, the occasion on which she becomes officially a councillor of state on the grim and momentous threshold of climacteric events so far as the war is concerned. The royal family has, I think, attained a position in the esteem of the nation and empire more elevated than perhaps it has ever held before, since that family has been sharing in a very intimate way in the trials and tribulations, the sorrows and sadness of the people. One is prompted at this time to make some mention of this, and I should like therefore to associate the official opposition with the remarks of the Prime Minister and to couple therewith our felicitations and expressions of respect, devotion and affection to Her Royal Highness in the very happy event now being celebrated.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): May I just say briefly that we too would join in the felicitations to Her Royal Highness Princess Elizabeth. We regard the royal family as a symbol of unity among the nations which comprise this great commonwealth, and as such we honour and respect them.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): The members of my group are pleased to join with the Prime Minister and others who have spoken in tendering to Her Royal Highness and the royal family very best wishes for a long and happy time following these dreadful years.

PARLIAMENTARY RESTAURANT

PRIVILEGE—RESOLUTION ADOPTED AT MEETING OF JOINT COMMITTEE ON MARCH 21

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): I rise to a question of privilege. Under date of April 20 I have received a notice, signed by the Clerk of the House, which I think is unfair to the Clerk himself, in connection with the parliamentary restaurant. As I read the declaration, it actually bars one of the most responsible officers of the House of Commons, the Clerk himself, from eating in the parliamentary restaurant. Perhaps it is a misprint; I do not know. It is not rationing, but certainly, according to the letter I have received under the date indicated, the Clerk of the House of Commons is barred from admission to the restaurant which he supervises, Mr. Speaker, under your jurisdiction. It also bars Brendan Bracken and Elmer Davis. I do not see why I should not have the privilege of taking these gentlemen to the parliamentary restaurant, or why any member of the press should not be allowed to do so. I do not know of any better way of cementing the friendly relationship between the united nations than that I should have the privilege of taking Elmer Davis and Brendan Bracken to the restaurant.

[Later:]

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite certain whether my inquiry should be directed to Your Honour or to the Prime Minister. It concerns a matter which has been made the subject matter of a question of privilege at to-day's sitting. On March 21 last the joint committee on the parliamentary restaurant adopted certain regulations affecting members of the Senate and the House of Commons, deputy ministers, private secretaries, and members of the press gallery, as well as others mentioned in the regulations. I have no desire to reflect upon the wisdom or otherwise of the regulations so passed; that would be highly improper. I should like however to inquire if it is the custom in respect of a joint committee of both houses of parliament for a report to be presented and concurrence asked, the procedure which is followed in respect of the reports of single chamber committees. I raise this point merely to seek information, in view of the fact that the rights and privileges of some of the persons mentioned appear to have been drastically affected by the new regulations, without any opportunity having been given to parliament to express its opinion.

May I add that in my time in parliament I cannot recall a parliamentary joint committee having made a report to the house. I cannot recall on the other hand that there has been any regulation which has so drastically affected certain persons who perhaps have not the same opportunity to express their opinions in the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: The restaurant committee is not a committee of the house, but is a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons. At several meetings they have had under consideration the conduct of the restaurant, and came to the conclusion that there were many abuses which had to be rectified, more particularly in these days of war. The committee has met, and will again meet. May I say that these are the considered opinions of the committee, and are not those promulgated by the Clerk of the House, who is in fact only acting as the clerk of the committee. These other matters have to be taken into consideration. I rather think the committee may feel that they should make some report to the house respecting their deliberations, and their reasons for coming to this conclusion. That is a matter I shall bring before it, when the proper time comes.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I say that I hope nothing in my remarks would indicate that I was placing any responsibility upon the Clerk. I did not mention that. I realized that it was a resolution of the joint parliamentary committee, as was indicated. However, I do hope that Your Honour will review the situation and perhaps find it possible to have the matter dealt with again by the committee in case there are certain injustices which should be remedied.

Mr. SPEAKER: I used the words, "promulgated by the Clerk" because they appeared in one of the Ottawa newspapers. If it is suggested that responsibility for what was done rests upon the shoulders of the Clerk, that is entirely wrong. As I have indicated, the matter is before the committee and it will be the subject of further conversation and discussion. I think I can say that the committee may consider that a report be made later to the house.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I wonder if I might be allowed to speak a sentence, or at any rate not more than two, in connection with the remarks made by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) and later by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) on the new rules governing the cafeteria and the restaurant. Of course, I must endorse the remark made by the leader of the opposition that the Clerk is in no way responsible. He merely sent out the notice. The committee is responsible. The leader of the opposition is the leader of a party and perhaps he spoke with due care and consideration having regard to the fact that he is a leader. I am not the leader of any party; I am responsible only to my constituents, and I am prepared to take a chance with them.

After twenty-eight years of experience in public life I consider the rules suggested here the most colossal piece of snobbery I have ever seen in print. If the house allows them to go without being changed I shall be ashamed to be connected with a body that has produced this kind of class legislation, which I thought had gone out of fashion fifty years ago. The day before I was first nominated in 1898 to run as a member I was working in a gravel pit shovelling gravel, and none of my constituents thought any the worse of me, nor was I ashamed. Yet apparently we as members of parliament are to be treated as being superior to the people who sent us here.

Mr. SPEAKER: The remarks that have been made by the hon. member are entirely contrary to what is intended by the committee. I cannot allow such a statement to go to the country, that a pedestal is being set up for members of the Senate or of the House of Commons. The restaurant is subject to rules which the committee are endeavouring to apply as properly as may be for the convenience of members, senators and others, and such remarks as the hon. gentleman has made are entirely contrary to the whole spirit of the committee.

Mr. NEILL: I challenge the Speaker to put the notice into Hansard so that the public will get it and can judge.

PRIVILEGE—MR. HANSELL

REFERENCE TO REMARK OF MR. KNOWLES IN DEBATE ON APRIL 20

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege respecting what I believe to be a reflection upon the entire Social Credit group in this house. After I spoke last evening the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) replied as appears at page 2207 of Hansard. He said:

> Just a word in reply to my hon. friend. I have listened with great interest to the foreign policy of the Social Credit party. I think this is the first time it has been expounded in this house.

Then the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) made this remark: "International anarchy". I heard the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre make that remark. He did not say it very loudly. I did not want to make a public example of him by asking him to withdraw it then, as I thought the Hansard reporter did not get it. Evidently he did, since it is recorded here. I ask my hon. friend to withdraw that remark. If he is a gentleman he will do it.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Speaker, may I say that in making that remark I was simply expressing my view as to what was involved in the kind of policy which the hon. members were expounding. It stands.

Mr. HANSELL: The hon. member is still not a gentleman.

Mr. KNOWLES: I rise to a question of privilege—

Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. member (Mr. Hansell) to withdraw that statement.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. SPEAKER: I ask the hon. member for Macleod to withdraw that statement.

Mr. HANSELL: Mr. Speaker, might I ask the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre first to withdraw his remarks with respect to the policy we are expounding, which he has described as "international anarchy"? If he will do that I shall be pleased to withdraw my remark.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has made a statement reflecting on another hon. member which he must withdraw. It is not parliamentary.

Mr. HANSELL: I will be a gentleman and withdraw that remark.

STANDING COMMITTEES

CHANGES IN PERSONNEL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the name of Mr. Nicholson be substituted for that of Mr. MacInnis on the special committee on social security.

That the name of Mr. Noseworthy be substituted for that of Mr. MacInnis on the standing committee on banking and commerce.

That the name of Mr. Farquhar be substituted for that of Mr. McKinnon (Kenora-Rainy River) on the special committee on defence of Canada regulations.

That the name of Mr. Rickard be substituted for that of Mr. McKinnon (Kenora-Rainy River) on the special committee on reconstruction and reestablishment.

Motion agreed to.

HYDE PARK DECLARATION

PRESS REPORTS AS TO CANADA'S FINANCIAL RELATIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): The other day the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) made some inquiries based on certain speculations which have appeared in the press concerning Canada's financial relations with the United States. I wish to take this opportunity to explain to parliament the present situation and some of its background, and thereby, I hope, to correct some of the false impressions which may have been created by the rumours to which the hon. gentleman referred.

May I state at the outset that as a result of a recent series of conferences between the treasuries of Canada and the United States, I was able to reach a complete understanding with the Hon. Henry L. Morgenthau, Jr., Secretary of the United States Treasury, in regard to our mutual financial arrangements which had their origin in the Hyde Park declaration of April 20, 1941.

The house will recall that that declaration was made at a time when Canada's reserves of gold and United States dollars had been reduced to dangerously low levels as a result of our huge and steadily increasing purchases in the United States of machinery, equipment and materials, which were required both for our own war effort and for the production of war supplies for our allies. Even in normal times, Canada purchases much more from the United States than we sell to our neighbours. Since the outbreak of war, however, these imports from the United States have shown an extraordinary increase and last year according to the trade returns they amounted to no less than $1,424 million, of which imports for the armed services and war production accounted for roughly one-half. It is therefore not difficult to realize why our limited supply of United States dollar exchange was for so long the most serious bottleneck in our war effort or why we had with considerable reluctance to take so many drastic measures to conserve our dwindling resources of this scarce commodity.

This exchange problem was the most urgent problem in our economic relations with the United States, which engaged the attention of the Prime Minister of Canada and the President of the United States when they met at Hyde Park just three years ago yesterday. However, there was also a growing danger of possible unnecessary duplication of production facilities on the north American continent, with consequent undue pressure on scarce labour and materials, if each country tried to make itself wholly self-sufficient in the field of war supplies. The basic principle of the Hyde Park declaration, therefore, was an agreement that "in mobilizing the resources of this continent each country should provide the other with the defence articles which it is best able to produce and, above all, produce quickly, and that production programs should be coordinated to that end." Hence, while Canada's purchases of war supplies in the United States had increased greatly and were bound to increase still further, the United States undertook to increase its purchases in Canada of urgently needed war supplies in respect of which we had facilities for speedy and economical production. A second provision of the declaration was that in so far as Canada's defence purchases in the United States consisted of component parts to be used in equipment and munitions which Canada is producing for Great Britain, Britain would be able to obtain these parts under the lend-lease act and ship them to Canada for inclusion in the finished articles being produced here for her account. This provision has proven difficult to apply in practice and its effect has therefore been limited.

This very simple understanding, which by the way was never embodied in any formal treaty or document, is an outstanding example of the neighbourly good will and the capacity for constructive cooperation which our two countries have so frequently displayed in their relations with one another. It was not a one-sided arrangement but was entered into for the mutual advantage of both countries. True, one of its primary purposes was to assist in solving Canada's exchange problem, but the reason for desiring to solve this problem was merely to enable Canada to continue to make her enormous purchases of war supplies and other goods in the United States. We never wished to ask the United States for lend-lease assistance—we always felt that, as a nation in a favoured position, free from the ravages of war, we were in duty bound to stand on our own feet and indeed to share with the United States in assisting other less fortunate of our allies in carrying on the war against the common enemy. That position we have been able to maintain and we shall continue to do so—I am sure it is a position which this house and the Canadian people will approve. I need scarcely add that to the extent that the United States increased its purchases in Canada, Canada gave full value for the money in the form of vital munitions of war which contributed to the war effort of the United States without increasing the strain upon its material and labour resources.

The successful working of this Hyde Park declaration has been referred to on previous occasions. In my budget speech of last year, for instance, I stated that our shortage of United States dollars had ceased to be a major problem. Early in 1943, therefore, we reached an understanding with the United States Treasury to the effect that if our holdings of gold and United States dollar reserves should tend to rise above an agreed maximum we would take appropriate steps to offset that tendency, and the United States on its part agreed to follow a programme of procurement of war supplies such as to prevent our holdings of these reserves from falling below an agreed minimum.

Hon. members are aware of the legal provisions of the Exchange Fund Act prohibiting disclosure of our exchange holdings, and I shall not assist the speculators by transgressing in respect of that principle. It will perhaps be sufficient for me to say that the agreed range to which I have just referred was measurably below the country's total holdings of gold and United States dollars at the outbreak of war, a time at which those holdings were not unduly large.

During 1943, unanticipated developments, not related to the Hyde Park declaration, served to increase our supply of United States exchange beyond expectations, in spite of the steps taken to offset its expansion. The arrangement which was concluded with the United States Treasury last month covered, therefore, a series of measures, to be taken by Canada, intended to reduce our balances to the agreed range. In addition to immediate payment for certain past purchases of United States equipment and supplies for which bills had not yet been presented, the Canadian government has undertaken to reimburse the United States for all the airfields constructed by the United States government in Canada and for the telephone line from Edmonton to the Alaska boundary also built by the United States government. Some time ago, the decision to reimburse the United States for all permanent improvements to airfields on the northwest staging route and in the northwest generally was announced. This arrangement has now been extended, and Canada is assuming the cost of permanent improvements to all airfields constructed in whatever part of Canada by or for the account of the United States government. A conference of officials of the two governments will be held shortly to finalize the cost of these permanent installations. Further, a number of contracts placed by the United States army and navy in Canada will be cancelled. This procedure affects, of course, only a relatively small part of the United States contracts placed in Canada. The productive capacity which otherwise would be released by these cancellations of United States contracts is being taken up by orders placed by the Mutual Aid board for the purpose of meeting the urgent war needs of other united nations.

The understanding which I reached last month with the Secretary of the United States Treasury brings to an end the special financial arrangement entered into last year. Canada and the United States are mutually released from the obligations assumed under that special arrangement.

However, in so far as the Hyde Park declaration is concerned, the principle of close collaboration in war production, which was an essential part of that declaration, and the provision relating to components for the United Kingdom, still stand.

I trust that information which I have given will not lead hon. members to jump to over-optimistic conclusions. We have passed safely through a period of extreme gravity in our exchange position. I hope that it is now over, but the experience which I have had in the first three or four years of war has given me a vivid appreciation not only of the seriousness of exchange problems but also of the rapidity with which the position may change.

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND

PRINCIPLES GOVERNING CONSTITUTION AND OPERATION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I desire to take this opportunity of making an announcement which is being made to-day in other capitals.

Over many months, officials of a number of the united nations have been giving close study to the international monetary arrangements which will be desirable after the war. The house will recall that on April 14, 1943, I tabled in the house a proposal by United Kingdom officials for an international clearing union and one by United States officials for an international stabilization fund. On July 12, 1943, the Minister of Finance tabled tentative draft proposals of Canadian experts for an international exchange union. These proposals were all directed to the same ends, namely, the achievement of international monetary arrangements compatible with the balanced growth of international trade and with domestic economic policies aimed at high employment and incomes, but there was a considerable divergence in the methods suggested for achieving these objectives. Since that time, continuous efforts have been made to reach a common view as to the principles to be followed in post-war monetary arrangements.

I am glad to be able to announce that as a result of discussions among experts of the united nations there is now a consensus of opinion among those participating on the need for the establishment of an international monetary fund and a statement has been drawn up of the principles which should govern its constitution and operation. I wish to make available, with the permission of the house, a document setting out this statement of principles, but to conform to arrangements with other governments, it will be tabled when the house reassembles at 8 o'clock.

In announcing this agreement on the principles which should govern the constitution and operation of an international monetary fund, I should like to make quite clear that what has been achieved is an agreement among experts. No government is in any way committed to this document or to the views of its experts. The statement is made public at this time in order that there may be public knowledge of the progress which has been made and informed discussion of the proposals before governments proceed further.

This statement of principles on international monetary relationships is conceived as part of a general plan of international economic cooperation, which as a whole will have for its objects the progressive expansion of international trade, high levels of employment, improved standards of living, reasonable stability of prices and machinery for orderly exchange arrangements. The Canadian government is thoroughly aware of the importance of establishing international monetary arrangements favourable to the expansion of trade and employment, and is keenly sympathetic with the particular objects to which this statement of principles is directed. It is equally anxious that common views should be reached on other parts also of a general plan of international economic cooperation, particularly on a reduction in the barriers to trade expansion, a reduction vital to Canada's welfare and necessary if conditions favourable to stable monetary arrangements are to be achieved. The view which will ultimately be taken by the Canadian government of any proposed monetary arrangements will be greatly, perhaps decisively, influenced by the progress which it is possible to make in achieving agreement on other aspects of international economic policy with which monetary arrangements are inseparably linked.

Mr. QUELCH: Can the Prime Minister say whether or not a day will be set aside for the discussion of the international monetary proposals before any commitment is made?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot make any promises at the moment.

INTERNATIONAL LAW

STATUS OF CLAIMS BY CANADIANS AGAINST UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT AGENCIES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Yesterday the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) referred to the question of claims by Canadian nationals against agencies of the United States government. As the hon. member has pointed out, it is a well settled rule of international law that a foreign government cannot be sued in a local court without its consent. This principle covers, of course, all instrumentalities and agencies of the foreign government. It is a long established practice, both in the United Kingdom and in this country, for the attorney general to intervene when suit is brought against a foreign state, in order to establish the immunity of the foreign government.

In the case to which the hon. member for York-Sunbury has referred, suit was brought against the United States public roads administration. The United States government brought to our attention the fact that the public roads administration is not a private corporation but is simply a branch of the United States government, and therefore identical with the government with regard to the principle of immunity. Accordingly, the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), appointed counsel to intervene, in order to have the suit set aside in accordance with the principle I have referred to. The claimant in cases such as this is not without remedy. If a just claim against an agency of a foreign state remains unpaid, the proper course is for the local government to bring the matter to the attention of the foreign government through diplomatic channels, with a view to having the claim settled.

In the particular case referred to by the hon. member, there appears to have been no clear refusal to pay by the public roads administration, but rather a difference of opinion as to the exact amount owed. While the matter is in negotiation between the company and the United States government agency and until the Canadian government has completed documentation on the case in order to be sure that the claim is legitimate, it would be improper for the Canadian government to bring the matter to the attention of the United States government. The Canadian company has been advised that if a clear case of refusal to pay on legitimate contracts is established, the matter will be brought to the attention of the United States government through diplomatic channels.

HOUSING

EVICTIONS ON MAY 1 NEXT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have an inquiry to direct to the Prime Minister. On Monday last I directed an inquiry to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance with respect to the acute rental and housing situation in Canada, to which I received the answer that he had nothing further to add to the previous statement he had made to the house on March 27. I would not raise the question again were it not for the extreme urgency surrounding it. Cases of hardship appear to be multiplying, and in some instances they involve the wives and families of our fighting men overseas. Because of the acute situation which has arisen, and in view of the fact that more than one department is involved, I am asking the Prime Minister if he will indicate what steps the administration is taking to meet this problem.

Before he answers may I say that the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) only a few moments ago brought to my attention a more detailed suggestion with respect to relieving the situation. I would link the two together in my question to the Prime Minister.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was not aware my hon. friend was going to ask this question. I understand he sent a copy to my office, but I came into the house rather hurriedly and had no chance to see it. I would say, however, that even had I seen it I should have replied to the effect that I have nothing to add to the statement made by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance. It was a statement of government policy, and it stands as such.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, may I call attention of the house to the insufficiency of a return tabled two days before the Easter recess on Toronto housing, and dealing with the same subject. It showed that there were no war-time houses built there at all during this war, and that only $50,000 had been spent on the conversion of eight properties, or thirty-four units there. I suggest an amendment to the return; it would involve only three or four sentences. May I ask the house to be good enough in this emergency to allow me to read this, so that I may have an answer to my question on Monday.

In the first place, there was a considerable amount of property which the city of Toronto gave the government gratis for the duration. I may say the city and the government have been working together in the matter. I would suggest that the old Havergal college on Jarvis street, in which about 350 of the women's army were housed, might be used. They are moving out on April 30th, and should before that to make it available.

Then, the second property, an R.C.A.F. equipment depot, is on the waterfront; seven of these sheds could be given as an emergency, and there are some buildings in the exhibition grounds which could be used temporarily.

Then, there is a lack of motor trucks until May 1 to move some of these poor people away. Surely the military authorities could provide a few trucks. There are the equipment buildings I refer to on the waterfront, and some harbour property. I would suggest that three or four of these buildings might be made available so that these people might have a place in which to store their goods. At the present time they have not sufficient storage space. Further, I would suggest the loan of some military construction and housing staff of the forces to erect temporary buildings, or portable emergency houses.

I am asking that this housing matter be considered over the week-end, because it is serious.

QUESTION OF EXTENSION TO WINNIPEG OF HOUSE CONVERSION PLAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): On Tuesday of this week I asked a question with respect to the government's house conversion plan. I did so on behalf of the Winnipeg city council. The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) indicated that he would endeavour to make a reply on Thursday. I was telephoned yesterday morning from the Department of Finance and told that in view of the absence of the parliamentary assistant from Ottawa he would not be able to make this reply on that day. However, I had hoped that the reply would be made to-day. Can the Minister of Finance indicate whether an answer is ready? My question was:

Is consideration being given to extending to Winnipeg the benefits of this plan?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I looked into the matter to which the hon. member refers and I found that the city council of Winnipeg made an application some months ago for the extension of the housing conversion plan to that ctiy. The hon. gentleman perhaps realizes that many cities have applied for the extension of this plan to them, and every application has to be considered carefully. The machinery set up for the consideration of these questions is in the form of a committee called the housing coordinating committee, and I believe this matter has received some consideration by that committee. It has not yet been decided to extend the housing conversion plan to the city of Winnipeg, but the matter is under consideration by the committee, according to my understanding of the situation.

Mr. KNOWLES: Unless a reply has gone forward in the last few days, no reply to the application made last October has been received by the Winnipeg city council. If the minister finds that to be so, will he endeavour to see that the communication is answered right away?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

DISPUTE AT THE PLANT OF FORD MOTOR COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask a question of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour. In view of the serious threat to war production involved in the dispute between the Ford Motor Company of Canada Limited and several thousands of its employees, will the parliamentary assistant give the house full details of the present situation, and indicate what steps the government is taking so that war production may be resumed with a minimum of delay?

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of the hon. member's intention to ask this question. On Friday last the Department of Labour asked one of its officers who happened to be in that section of Ontario to cancel some other engagements he had in other industrial plants, and to proceed to Windsor at once. That officer has been in Windsor since Friday morning. Last night another officer of the Department of Labour proceeded to Windsor by air to assist in doing everything possible to resolve the differences, so that a halt in production might be avoided.

May I add that the department at Ottawa is alive to the matter and is in constant association and touch with its conciliation officers. Everything is being done to bring about the objective the hon. member has in mind.

Mr. GRAYDON: Replying to the answer which has been given, may I say that I did send a notice of my question to the parliamentary assistant, and I am sorry it did not reach him in time. May I add only this, that I do not wish my remarks to be regarded as indicating that fault for the strike rests on any particular shoulders. Most strikes cannot be regarded in that way, and I am quite sure this would be in the same category. But I believe the public would like to know how it is that these things occur in a war-time industry, under the present complicated legal and constitutional arrangements set up for this particular purpose. Can the parliamentary assistant give any information as to how this condition has arisen in the present situation?

Mr. MARTIN: I am sure my hon. friend will realize the difficulties inherent in the question. I can only repeat that the department is doing everything it can to bring about a satisfactory conclusion to the matter. Application for a hearing by both parties is now pending before the wartime labour relations board. That matter will be disposed of, I presume, on Tuesday next. I am sure that under those circumstances the leader of the opposition would not expect me to add anything more. There is a disposition to bring the matter to as speedy a conclusion as possible.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I should like to address a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour. The leader of the opposition has persisted in referring to the difficulty at Windsor as a strike. One of the factors involved is whether it is a strike or a lockout. There is a great difference between the two. Can the parliamentary assistant inform the house whether the department has determined whether this is a strike or a lockout within the meaning of order in council P.C. 1003?

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. gentleman has not given me any notice of his question. He will appreciate that the war-time labour relations board is the body that will determine a question of that sort. I am sure on reflection the hon. gentleman will agree that it would be wholly improper for me to pass judgment on the matter.

Mr. GILLIS: That is the reason I raised the point. I think in the House of Commons it is wrong to classify this difficulty as a strike when there are other factors involved.

Mr. MARTIN: I did not say any such thing.

Mr. GILLIS: No, but the leader of the opposition did.

Mr. GRAYDON: On a question of privilege, I know my hon. friend is very quick to take some political advantage of—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, this is—

Mr. GRAYDON: I am speaking to a question of privilege.

Mr. COLDWELL: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am speaking to a question of privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER: In speaking to a question of privilege the hon. member should not impute motives to the hon. member for Cape Breton South.

Mr. GRAYDON: If I have imputed any motives I shall be glad to withdraw them unconditionally. I am asking that motives imputed to me be withdrawn, and perhaps it would not be proper for me to impute motives while I was doing that. My question of privilege is this. If I used the word "strike"—I will accept my hon. friend's word that I did—I did so inadvertently because I recognized in looking over the news reports that that was one of the problems involved. I think I was careful in my remarks with respect to the matter at Windsor to indicate that I was only seeking information, rather than taking any stand with respect to the matter. If I did make a slip of that kind I am sure that my hon. friend will realize that he and I as well as others in the house sometimes are guilty of inadvertence. That is what this was.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not a clairvoyant, so that I do not know what the hon. member is thinking.

Mr. SPEAKER: There cannot be any argument on the matter.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

CONFERENCE OF PRIME MINISTERS IN LONDON

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members are aware, I expect to be leaving Ottawa shortly to be present at the meeting of Prime Ministers to be held in London in the near future. I have been discussing with my colleague the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) the distribution which it would be desirable to make of my duties as Prime Minister, President of the Council, and Secretary of State for External Affairs. Mr. Crerar has expressed the hope that the duties of these several offices might be assigned to different members of the government. I have accordingly decided to ask him to act as President of the Council, to preside at meetings of the cabinet and of the war committee and to continue to act, as he has done for some time past, as deputy leader of the House of Commons. I intend to ask Mr. Ralston, the Minister of National Defence, to act as Prime Minister and leader in the house, and Mr. St. Laurent, the Minister of Justice, to act as Secretary of State for External Affairs. I am sure that this arrangement will commend itself to hon. members.

CANADIAN ARMY

FARM LEAVE—HOUSING—WELCOME TO RETURNING MEN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) referred to the matter of spring leave. He mentioned two points. One, he suggested that there was some lack of uniformity in administration and, two, that more promptness might be exercised in dealing with applications. With regard to the matter of uniformity, I should like to say what I said at the time the present method of granting spring leave was put into effect. There is bound to be a certain lack of uniformity when applications are being dealt with by the different district officers commanding instead of being sent to national defence headquarters. That method was adopted deliberately because it was felt that there would be considerable delay in having everything sent down here. There were some complaints last year in that regard, and so the new order was put into effect. I do not think hon. members or the country generally would want us to revert back to the other method whereby everything had to come to national defence headquarters. It was decided that instead of referring these applications to national defence headquarters, which might ensure uniformity, they would be referred to the general officers commanding in chief and the district officers commanding. It was felt that these officers, being on the ground and having had some experience in connection with requests for agricultural leave, would be in position to appraise the applications and deal with them more quickly. I think generally speaking that that has proved to be true.

Now, regarding the time taken to handle these applications, there were some complaints that sworn declarations were being required to substantiate particular cases. To meet that situation, instructions were sent out on April 11 to this effect:

> Complaints have been received that applicants for spring leave are required to submit with the applications supporting evidence in greater amount than might reasonably be considered necessary or of requiring such supporting evidence to be in the form of a sworn declaration.
> While it is not desired to restrict in any way the discretion given to G.O.'s and D.O.'s C. in satisfying themselves that applications for spring leave are meritorious, it is pointed out that no particular form of evidence is required.
> It will be appreciated that in many rural areas difficulties are experienced in securing declarations under oath and it is therefore suggested that except where doubt exists this should not be insisted upon especially when the supporting statements are made by responsible municipal or other officials or are those of persons of known standing in the community.

And then there was this paragraph, and this in regard to the matter of speed:

> It was intended by the order authorizing spring leave to make available all soldiers eligible under the terms of the order for this type of leave who could possibly be spared, and it is desirable in order to meet urgent labour requirements that applications be disposed of as expeditiously as possible.

I could refer the house also to what was said in the previous order, but I think that that is sufficient to indicate that headquarters are doing everything they possibly can in this respect.

I just want to say this further, that if there are any specific cases my hon. friend has in mind, and he will refer them to me, I will have them looked into immediately.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: If I might be allowed a question—and I wish to thank the minister for his statement on a matter that is of great importance—do men of the active army who have enlisted for overseas service have the right to apply for spring leave as well as the men under N.R.M.A.?

Mr. RALSTON: It depends on what employment they are engaged in in the army. My hon. friend will find on Hansard at page 1641 the full statement that was made by the parliamentary assistant setting out exactly the terms on which men are granted spring leave. There are instances in which general service men are entitled to apply for leave just the same as N.R.M.A. personnel.

The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) spoke of some requirements which he thought might be needed in the city of Toronto with respect to handling the housing situation there. I want to say to him that I have had no requests so far from the city of Toronto with respect to these requirements, but I understand that the city's representatives will be in Ottawa on Monday. I regret that on account of an imperative previous appointment I shall not be able to attend the conference, to which I was invited, but at the same time I am seeing to it that inquiries are made with regard to the matters he has mentioned in so far as they affect the army, so that information will be made available.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) asked yesterday with regard to the arrangements made by the department for the reception of members of the armed forces returning from overseas. The welcoming of our men from overseas is a very live question and we are sincerely making every effort to inform the public of their return, commensurate with security.

I indicated yesterday that the men return home either on a hospital ship or troop transport. The hospital ships carry only invalid personnel and in that case there is no question of security. The names of all such personnel are received in Canada well in advance of the arrival of the ships. Copies of these nominal rolls are then sent to each military district and others concerned, together with the names and addresses of the next of kin. In every case the next of kin are notified promptly by letter from national defence headquarters of the expected early arrival.

On the day the hospital ship docks, that information is given to the local press of the districts. Any inquiries are dealt with at district headquarters. When the hospital ship docks, the information is given to the press, and when the trains leave the port each military district is notified and kept informed periodically as to the progress of the train and the expected time of arrival at the various districts along the route. The same information is given by public relations officers who are on the train and who give press releases from time to time. Then at the districts the public relations officers assist the press with regard to details of the personnel aboard. In addition to that, in some districts radio broadcasts are given to indicate the time when the train will arrive. That is so far as the hospital ships are concerned.

With regard to troop transports, the procedure manifestly must be different. There the next of kin are not notified in advance, for security reasons. As I indicated yesterday no information can be published in the press for at least twenty-four hours after the transport docks and then the name of the ship and port of entry cannot be mentioned.

Arrangements, however, have been made whereby representatives of the telegraph companies can go on board and take telegrams from the returned soldiers to their relatives and friends advising them of their safe arrival in Canada. These telegrams are held by the postal censor until the necessary time has elapsed, and then they are dispatched to the next of kin all over Canada. That does not give information as to when the soldier is going to arrive in his home town. All that is said there is that he has arrived in Canada.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does the man have to pay for the telegram himself, or is that taken care of by the government?

Mr. RALSTON: I gave instructions that the department will pay for the telegrams.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think that would be much more satisfactory.

Mr. RALSTON: Again, as in the case of the hospital trains, the districts are kept informed periodically as to the time of arrival of the trains at the city or town where the district headquarters are located, and all assistance is given to the press there.

With regard to comforts on the trains—and this applies to both hospital and troop trains —there is a representative of a voluntary organization on the train who distributes newspapers, magazines, fruit, games, et cetera. Then other voluntary organizations from what might be called Welcome Home committees welcome the boys at the port of entry and at the larger centres through which they pass and on arrival in each military district, distributing fruit, coffee, cigarettes, et cetera. I know many cases in which arrangements are made whereby returning soldiers are transported to the homes of citizens if they have to stay over any time, particularly at divisional headquarters.

The difficulty comes with regard to the particular point raised by my hon. friend, and that is notice to the relatives in the home town as to what train the soldier is coming on and what the time of this arrival will be. Here I pause for a moment to make this explanation.

Men have to go to the district headquarters first before they go home in order that their documentation may be completed and that they may be paid, their ration books issued and a great many other details attended to. Then the man is given leave, and he is on his own. He is entitled to select the train he wants to go home on. Therefore it is manifestly very difficult in a city like Toronto for instance, where there are many attractions, to know just exactly what train the soldier will decide to go on if he is going to stay over there for a few hours. What we are doing is having the officers at the depot get from the soldier the train on which he proposes to go home. The officer gives him the time of departure of the trains which go to his particular locality, and when the soldier indicates what train he is going on a wire is sent to his home. That I am afraid is the best that can be done. I have discussed it thoroughly with the officers and it has been considered to be about all we can do to give notice to the folks at home as to the time at which the soldier may be arriving. We have had the greatest help from the Legion in that respect. They are anxious to get the nominal rolls and we give them to them, and they assist us materially in looking after the soldier in the particular town where the district headquarters is situated. Often they see the soldier on the train and help him to give notice to those at home of the time of his arrival.

As the numbers increase, I think there will be greater opportunity for voluntary organizations to assist in this welcome. The department is giving constant and unremitting attention to every possible method whereby we can improve the cordiality, the warmth and the spontaneity of the reception given to soldiers coming home. Of course it is not in every instance that soldiers want welcoming committees at the train. Sometimes I find that towns arrange if they have a number of soldiers coming home, one on one train and others on other trains, to wait for a civic reception until everybody is there, so that they may have perhaps a somewhat more orderly and more comfortable arrangement than would be possible by simply going and meeting the men at the train.

What we are trying to do is to give the best information we can, having regard to the situation which exists, whereby the soldier himself has the right to select his train, inasmuch as he has the transportation warrant and is entitled to go on the train of his choice. That does not apply to the same extent to casualties who are still needing treatment, because so far as they are concerned they generally go to a hospital or rest home, and wait until a particular train leaves, and then they are seen to the train by military personnel.

Mr. BOUCHER: I was talking to some members of the Legion in Ottawa and they felt that some improvement could be made in notifying them rather more accurately of the times when trains will arrive. I understand it has frequently happened locally that the notice received indicates that a train will arrive in Ottawa at a certain time and when that time comes it is found that the train has not yet reached Montreal and those concerned have not been notified. I do believe that some little checking up could be done to ensure more specific and up-to-the-minute notice being given parents and others concerned in that regard.

With reference to what the minister has said regarding spring leave, I should like to ask one further question. Where farm helpers on leave are being called back to military headquarters for examination, I find locally that there has been some complaint for a considerable time about the men being detained. I believe that when the farm boy calls for examination there is some delay in examining him physically, and after that examination his plea for extension for spring leave is dealt with. I have known of several instances in which a boy very much needed at home has been kept two weeks longer for that very reason. I would ask the minister to look into this matter and see whether the process cannot be somewhat expedited.

Mr. RALSTON: I will.

CITY OF OTTAWA AGREEMENT

AUTHORIZATION OF PAYMENT OF $100,000 FOR THE YEAR ENDING JULY 1, 1944

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize the Minister of Public Works on behalf of His Majesty to enter into an agreement to pay to the corporation of the city of Ottawa the sum of $100,000 for the year ending July 1, 1944.

Mr. G. J. McILRAITH (Ottawa West): The grant to the city of Ottawa has come up for a number of years now in the form of an annual bill. In going back over the debates it seems clear that a great many hon. members feel that they have not sufficient information, or at any rate all the information they would like to have in order to form an opinion on this subject, and that therefore they are not able to judge the adequacy or the inadequacy of the amount granted. As representative of Ottawa West constituency, which is situate wholly within the limits of the corporation and comprises about two-thirds of the area of the corporation, I have had occasion to examine in detail all the various items that must be considered in arriving at a proper amount. As a result of that examination I have felt that the amount provided is wholly inadequate.

An unfair burden is being placed on the real property owners, the taxpayers of the city of Ottawa. In each of the last three sessions I have pointed out the inadequacy of the amount provided, and in 1942, on the second reading of the bill, I gave the house extended details of the various items and factors having a bearing on the relationship between the city and the dominion. I take it that the matter of details as to these items is not a proper one for discussion in the resolution stage. The data up to that time will be found at page 2683 of Hansard for the year 1942. In addition to emphasizing the inadequacy of the amount I urged that the method of providing the sum by an annual bill was not wholly satisfactory. I urged the setting up of a special committee of the House of Commons to consider the whole matter.

There are certain relative factors entering into consideration of the matter, upon which I am sure hon. members would desire to have information. I am sure they would desire to have the matter dealt with in a way which would permit the summoning of witnesses before the committee and the production of evidence and relevant documents as they see fit. I am sure that the procedure of having an annual bill rather than a bill covering a longer period of time is not satisfactory. The city of Ottawa as the capital of the nation, is the concern and the interest of all parts of the nation. I feel confident that hon. members will look at this measure from that point of view.

The city can no longer be expected to provide services on the scale expected by the dominion, which services must come out of the taxpayers of the city. At the same time the rest of the country cannot afford to have the development of the nation's capital impaired by the inadequacy of the city's revenue. It is the desire of all Canada to have a capital developed in a manner worthy of the ideals of the nation, and I am sure that is the desire of all hon. members. Yet by permitting this annual injustice to go on from year to year we are impairing the development we all so much desire.

I quite agree with the point of view that the energies of the House of Commons must continue to be directed first and above all to the prosecution of the war, but I do suggest that we have now reached the stage in the development of the war where we can properly have regard to post-war measures and developments, and that we must look to these matters at this time. As part of this larger question of development, the city of Ottawa, the capital of Canada, must have its proper place. I therefore again urge, as I have done repeatedly in the past, and particularly in the last two sessions, the setting up of a special committee of the House of Commons to look into the whole matter. I ask that it be done at this time.

Mr. G. RUSSELL BOUCHER (Carleton): I do not wish to delay the house much longer on this matter, because for the last four years the matter has been discussed in minute detail. We are getting on in the session, and we are making plans for post-war reconstruction and development. That being so, I think it is only proper that the House of Commons, meeting here in the national capital, should realize how that capital has been disturbed, and I may say upset, by war-time economy, owing to the fact that the government has taken over a great deal of property in Ottawa and has built many temporary buildings here and there all over the city. Along with that a large number of people have come into the city of Ottawa to perform war services. All these things emphasize a little more in Ottawa than perhaps in any other place the necessity of reconstruction and reestablishment in the post-war period.

For the last four years it has been said in this house that the $100,000 grant, which has been paid year after year, is a yardstick that nobody could say was fair. That being so, the 245 members of the House of Commons have stood by and acted as rubber stamps or automatons and have not weighed the pros and cons. That does not seem to me to be proper economy. It is apparent that the people of the city of Ottawa have thought likewise, because I believe in the last year a special committee has been making research and investigation into the relationship between the city of Ottawa and the dominion government. They have been taking into consideration the services rendered by Ottawa to the dominion government and offsetting against that the advantages that accrue to the city of Ottawa by reason of parliament sitting here. The city council has taken into consideration, and will continue to do so, the advantages that accrue to Ottawa by reason of its being the capital city of Canada. They are proud to look upon Ottawa as the capital city. I think it is only fair at this particular time, and in view of post-war reconstruction, that we should direct our attention to a proper arrangement between the dominion of Canada and the city of Ottawa with the view of building in Ottawa a capital that is worthy of the pride of the nation.

I noticed in the press recently—and I hope the Prime Minister is entirely in agreement with my sentiments in this regard—that the Prime Minister and the mayor of the city of Ottawa had a conference some time ago. I hope they have come to some conclusion that will bring a little better arrangement for the city of Ottawa. This parliament should make an arrangement with Ottawa not measured by an arbitrary sum of $100,000, but something that will go a long way to meet the services that are given by the city to the government. I hope to see an investigation made by a committee, which will go into all the facts and circumstances, and will bring into this house a thorough and fair explanation of the relationship between the government and the city, and that as a result the members of this house will see that justice is done.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The hon. member who has just taken his seat has referred to an interview which His Worship the Mayor had with me recently. Perhaps I should place on record the communication that came from His Worship a little earlier in the month and my reply thereto. I received the following communication some days ago:

Office of the Mayor
4th April, 1944.

Rt. Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, P.C.,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa.

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

The following motion was unanimously adopted by our city council last night at its regular meeting:

"That His Worship the Mayor of Ottawa, be, and hereby is, authorized by council to request the Right Honourable the Prime Minister to appoint a committee representative of the federal government and parliament of Canada to meet in conference with a committee of council to be appointed by His Worship the Mayor, for the purpose of discussing the relationship and financial agreements existing between the Dominion of Canada and the municipal corporation of the city of Ottawa, with a view to formulating and recommending a revised agreement which will be mutually equitable as between the Dominion of Canada and the city of Ottawa."

On behalf of city council I beg to urge, Mr. Prime Minister, that the government take action immediately to set up a committee so that the whole matter may be gone into during this present session of parliament. We are prepared to meet with a government committee at once.

Sincerely yours,
S. Lewis,
Mayor.

I replied to that communication as follows:

Office of the Prime Minister
Canada
Ottawa, April 4, 1944.

His Worship,
Mayor Stanley Lewis,
Ottawa, Ontario.

My dear Mr. Mayor:

I wish to acknowledge your letter of to-day's date, setting out a motion adopted at last night's regular meeting of the city council, with regard to a conference between a committee of the city council and members of the government of Canada.

The city council's request will be brought before the cabinet at an early meeting, in order that arrangements may be made for a meeting with the city representatives for the discussion of the relationship between the municipal corporation and the government. Thereafter, I shall be glad to see that arrangements are made, through your office, for a mutually convenient time for the meeting.

Yours sincerely,
W. L. Mackenzie King.

On Tuesday last, the 18th, I had a brief interview in my office with His Worship the Mayor, at which time, among other reasons mentioned by His Worship for the meeting referred to, was that he and the members of the city council have the responsibility of the future development of Ottawa as a city. His Worship spoke of the greater Ottawa as a city. The council feel that it would be of assistance to them if they knew in a more definite way than is possible at present what the future relations between the government and the city in connection with financial and other matters are likely to be. I mentioned to His Worship that the government felt, of course, a special interest in the development of a greater Ottawa as the capital of Canada, and that we too were very much concerned that the development made in the creation of a greater city should be such as would take into full account the future of Ottawa as the capital of Canada.

I subsequently drew the representations of the mayor to the attention of my colleagues in the cabinet. We discussed the matter fully; and it was thought that, instead of a meeting of the government with the mayor and his colleagues, it would be preferable to have a committee of this house, or a joint committee of both houses, meet with the mayor and his colleagues and have them go carefully into the whole question of the relations of the city and the government, allowing the council to make its own representations to the committee, and the committee to gather such information as would be helpful to the government in reaching a decision on financial and other matters which it would be necessary to make. As it is uncertain how long the work of a committee may take, what the extent of the representations may be, and as it is obviously desirable that the city should be immediately secured in the matter of an agreement between the corporation and the government, it was thought both by the mayor and myself that it would be advisable that a bill based on the resolution which appears on the order paper should be proceeded with by both houses forthwith, but that if passed it should be without prejudice to any action which the government might wish to take as a result of the representations which might be considered between the city officials and the parliamentary representatives appointed on a committee to meet them.

My hon. friend the member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith), who has spoken, suggested a committee of the members of the House of Commons. He has done so before. I am not sure that it might not be advisable to have a committee representative of both houses of parliament. One advantage of such a committee would be that it would enable hon. members from other parts of Canada to appreciate some of the considerations of which the corporation of Ottawa has to take account as a consequence of Ottawa being the capital of Canada. It would, too, I believe, be regarded throughout the country as helpful to have the views, not merely of the government and the council, both of which are located in Ottawa, but to have as well that larger and possibly more impartial consideration which might be expected to be given by representatives of both houses of this parliament, from all parts of Canada, meeting with the mayor and his officials. Both the city officials and the government would bring before such a committee their own experts and officials, presenting all aspects of the relationship between the two which it might be desirable to have taken into account.

I do not know how many years it is that a measure similar to the one foreshadowed in the resolution has been passed.

Mr. BOUCHER: Since 1928.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. Well, since 1928 there have been a good many changes in this city, and for that reason among others it would seem advisable that the whole situation should be carefully reviewed in the interests alike of the government and of the city. It has been understood that this measure would be regarded as a temporary one. I remember some years ago giving an undertaking to the city that the situation would be carefully reviewed, and that review, it would now appear, might well take place in the manner suggested.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I point out to the Prime Minister that in any event it is only for the period ending July 1, 1944.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This measure?

Mr. GRAYDON: Yes; it is just for one year.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just until July 1.

Mr. GRAYDON: Of the present year.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The future situation can be taken care of either as has been done in the past or as modified as a result of the conference.

I just wish to say that the government is wholly sympathetic to the idea of appointing a committee of both houses of parliament to meet with His Worship the mayor and his officials, and a resolution to that effect will be brought before the house for its consideration at an early opportunity.

I should like to take advantage of this moment to say just a word in regard to the future of Ottawa. I have spoken on this subject a number of times, and some years ago I made the suggestion, which others have also made, that some day the capital of Canada might become a federal district to be administered by a commission, in a manner similar to the capital at Washington. I am not putting this forward as anything which should be done immediately. It is a matter which will require a great deal of consideration. But I feel that just now, if there is to be any immediate consideration of the planning of greater Ottawa as a city or as a capital, that planning ought to have in mind all possibilities of the development of this capital. I have often hoped that if the capital were to become a federal district, that district would extend far enough to include a very large area on the other side of the river as well as the Ottawa area. I would like to see—I may not live to see it but I hope others may—the day when the Ottawa river, instead of flowing along the north border of the capital, will be flowing through the heart of the city, the greater Ottawa that is to be, and that we shall have a capital city which will extend as far into the province on the other side of the Ottawa river as it may extend in the province on this side. I do not think that is a vision of future needs or of future greatness by any means too broad or too large. We have seen in recent years how rapidly this city has grown. We may well expect to see a capital city of Canada of dimensions beyond anything we are likely to contemplate at this time.

I have one other thought in mind to which I should like to give expression, and it is this. The sacrifices of the men and women of Canada who served in the last war have been memorialized by a national war memorial in the heart of this city. It would be difficult, if not impossible, to create another memorial which could pay due tribute to the service and sacrifice of those men and women of Canada who will have served in the present world conflict. What finer memorial could there be than a capital city which would serve as a model of community planning for all the other cities of Canada, and which would be symbolic of the world-wide effort of Canada in the present war, and the significant place we hope our country will occupy in the world of the future—a national capital which would be not only the pride of Canadians but also an object lesson to other cities and to other countries? The national war memorial of the last war is in the heart of Ottawa. Might not the national memorial of the present war find noble expression, carefully planned, in a federal district as the site of the Canadian capital, through the heart of which would flow the Ottawa river.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should not like to say one word which would reflect upon the proposed agreement, one which has always been so near and dear to the heart of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), who is one of the leading citizens of the city. But the measure is based upon what is known as a subvention given in exchange for services.

I have read that 18,000 people have come to Ottawa since the beginning of the war, and by this addition to the normal population the burdens of the community have been increased. Buildings have been torn down, and by that means the municipality has been affected. I must point out however that something on the same principle as this vote should be done for other large centres of population in Canada which are giving almost the same type of municipal services to the government, but receive nothing for those services. I have in mind fire protection, police protection and many other forms of municipal aid, including the construction of sewers, pavements and roads.

Up to a few years ago the Ontario government did not pay for those local improvements. However at that time Sir James Whitney introduced a measure by which the government was obligated to pay for local improvements, the same as would any other private citizen in the community. It is true that the ctiy of Ottawa has given splendid service, but I must point out that something should be done for the larger centres of population, the provincial capitals also, throughout Canada. The Ottawa improvement scheme is nearly all federal, but it has some local features in that it provides parks, playgrounds and the like for the rising generation. In other cities those services are provided exclusively by the municipalities.

All the people in the city from which I come are admirers of Ottawa. We wish to see the capital of Canada properly looked after in every way, and in a way befitting its importance as the capital of Canada. However an investigation was made a few years ago by the Australian and United States governments on the very principle of this agreement, namely, with respect to the subventions which should be paid by federal, provincial or state governments. For example, one of the states of the Australian commonwealth gave $2,500,000 a year to maintain a police force in Sydney. A similar procedure has been adopted in many of the states across the border in the United States of America. In most cases police and fire protection are given, and in some instances cash grants are allowed in exchange for services rendered the various governments. In my view the same principle should be applied to those larger cities in Canada which are giving similar services to the federal government. If one were to survey the budgets of municipal departments of many communities he would find that two or three mills on civic tax rates of those communities could be traced to assuming a federal burden. That is imposed by federal statute law on the municipalities, and they in turn must transfer it to the taxpayers. This practice has had a deteriorating effect in respect of the ownership of real estate—so much so, in fact, that many people do not want to own real property, with such federal taxes placed upon them.

I am hoping that within the next short while Ottawa may have a better system of accommodation for the public. We have here a federal government and a municipal or local government. Something should be done to improve the accommodation available for visitors, members of the public who come to Ottawa from other parts of Canada, from the United States and other parts of the world. These people are sometimes driven away because they cannot find housing accommodation or a place to stay while they are here.

I would hope, too, that there might be some improvement in the train service offered at the Union station. I have come to the point where I consider the conditions there at times a death-trap. Almost every day one train is coming in while another is going out, and at the same time hundreds of people are jammed in between those two trains in a space of only twelve or fourteen feet in width. Surely something should be done about those depot facilities.

I hope the day is not far distant when the federal government will be a little more liberal toward the municipalities of Canada, so that subventions may be given to provincial capitals and other cities which are giving the very same kind of service, at the expense of the local taxpayers, as is the city of Ottawa, and are getting nothing.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, with what has been said this afternoon regarding the city of Ottawa I believe all hon. members will agree. The question as to the relationship existing between the federal government on the one hand and the city council and the people of Ottawa on the other is one which is discussed in the house year after year. Every member realizes of course how beautiful this city is. I could not help thinking, however, when the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) was speaking that perhaps it is not fully understood that only a small percentage of people in Canada ever have the opportunity to see their capital city.

In his speech the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) visualized the great growth we may expect to see in Ottawa, and he pointed out how in later years the city of Hull might be included in the federal area. I wish that the vision had been broader when the capital was located at this point, because I am sure that in those days if the fathers had realized the great extent of this country the capital of the dominion might well have been placed farther west. I say that because one must realize that while there is only a distance of a thousand miles from this point to the east coast, there are three thousand miles to the west coast. The result is that the capital city is not placed in the centre of Canada; rather it is more to the east.

While I have every sympathy with the people of Ottawa and realize that they may have been at times dealt with unjustly in the matter of finance, I cannot come to any conclusion other than that Ottawa holds an advantage over other cities in which the government has appropriated properties. The advantage is that Ottawa has a permanent civil service which is not found in any other city of Canada. I am pleased indeed that this year a committee is to be set up, but I for one would like to see its powers go beyond Ottawa. I say that because we find in this measure the principle outlined only a few moments ago by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church). There are cities in Canada where as much as three-quarters of the entire territory has been appropriated by or taken over by the dominion government, and where no return has been given whatsoever. The war has accelerated this condition. I have in mind one small district in British Columbia where over one-third of the territory has been taken over by the government for war purposes, and the land taken off the tax rolls. I am not referring at this moment to the appropriation for the city of Ottawa, which I think we all agree is not adequate. I rise merely to point out that I should like to see the whole principle involved in this resolution investigated in detail. I should like to see a commission set up to consider the whole problem, which extends from one end of Canada to the other. I do not know whether there are other districts in Canada where the same condition exists as exists in certain districts in British Columbia where three-quarters of the area has been taken over by the dominion and provincial governments. No property taxes are paid on this property. I join with other hon. members who have contended that proper consideration should be given to the city of Ottawa.

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Victoria, B.C.): Mr. Speaker, I cannot let this occasion go by without saying a word or two. I am not opposing this grant of $100,000 to be made to the city of Ottawa, nor am I opposing the setting up of a committee to consider the future relations of Ottawa with the government. However, as the last speaker (Mr. Reid) has mentioned, there are other districts in Canada which are just as badly off so far as tax exemptions are concerned, and yet they receive no consideration from the government. The naval dockyard is located in the township of Esquimalt. This small municipality has a population of about 4,000, and yet sixty per cent of the area is owned by the federal government. We have been unable to get even a small grant to cover the upkeep of roads and sidewalks. Unless something is done, this municipality will find itself in a very embarrassing position.

It is some time since the government decided that crown property would be exempt from taxation. At that time there was no doubt about what was in the minds of the people. It was thought that a post office would be located in each municipality, and customs houses in certain other places. These facilities, however, were to serve only the needs of the particular district. But since that time the government has gone a long way. We now find services which are national in character set up in many districts, and I maintain that when that is done there should be some grant paid by the national government to cover upkeep. Where the services supplied by the federal government are of a purely local character, they should be exempt from taxation.

The time has long passed when this whole question should have been reconsidered. Many of these municipalities will have to be given assistance if they are to keep out of difficulty. At the present time there is a shortage of many thousands of houses in Canada. This condition has been created largely by ourselves. We now propose to cure it by building more houses. So much taxation is being placed upon property that no one wants to own land or build a house. It has been said, and I think quite rightly, that only a fool builds a house, while the wise man lives in it. As I say, where the service maintained by the government is national in character some contribution should be made to the municipality to help it to carry on. I think a committee should be set up to investigate the whole problem of tax exemption on crown property.

Mr. W. F. KUHL (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) and the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Boucher) are justified in suggesting that the taxpayers of Ottawa should not be expected to keep up appearances in harmony with the dignity which a capital city should have. I agree with them that a more equitable arrangement should be made to relieve the taxpayers of that responsibility. I agree also when they suggest that this is a responsibility of all the people of Canada, not just the taxpayers of Ottawa.

When it comes to considering the best method of overcoming this difficulty we must consider a number of things. Since I came to Ottawa I have spent a considerable amount of time in studying the subject mentioned this afternoon by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and I agree heartily with his suggestion that the proper method of obviating the necessity for such a measure as we are considering to-day is the creation of a federal district. But that would remove just one of the many anomalies which now exist in our constitutional position. My contention is that these anomalies should be removed in a systematic and proper fashion. These things cannot be done in a piecemeal or patchwork way; they should be done by adopting a well organized national policy.

In times past I have made several speeches in this house indicating what I considered to be the constitutional position of Canada and the manner in which I think it should be changed and brought up to date to harmonize with our constitutional status. The creation of a federal district is one of the things that should be done to remove one of the anomalies which exist. Perhaps I would not be in order this afternooon in discussing some of the other anomalies, but I should like to mention a few which I think ought to be removed.

There is the matter of the constitution itself. We refer to the British North America Act as our federal constitution. I have contended in times past that the British North America Act never was and is not now a proper constitution. It certainly cannot be called a federal constitution.

Allied with that is the manner of amending the constitution. In a federal union proper the states or provinces comprising that union should have the privilege and the power to amend their own constitution. That is still not the case in Canada.

Then there is the matter of the ratification of the constitution. The British North America Act was never ratified by the people of Canada. A federal constitution proper must be ratified.

Under our constitution there is still the power of disallowance which is an anomaly that must be removed and should not exist in a democratic country.

There is also the question of citizenship status in Canada. There is on our statute book no statute which makes provision for the status of a Canadian as such. We have also had raised from time to time the question of having a distinctive flag for Canada, and finally there is the matter of a federal district.

These are some of the many anomalies that ought to be removed. But personally I do not consider that tackling them one at a time is the proper way to do it. I feel, as I have stated in times past, that the Canadian people since 1931, through the enactment of the statute of Westminster, have had the privilege of removing all these anomalies by creating a proper federal constitution and establishing a federal district.

In concluding my remarks I should like to place on the record a statement of the policy of the group and movement with which I am associated. It is as follows:

Whereas the Statute of Westminster, in granting complete sovereignty and equality with Great Britain to Canada and other nations of the British commonwealth, has changed the relative positions of the provincial and federal governments as provided in the B.N.A. Act; and

Whereas it is desirable and expedient in the interests of national unity that an interprovincial conference of appropriate representatives of the Canadian provinces be held for the purpose of reviewing and adjusting the constitutional relationship as between the provinces and their central government with a view to providing effective democratic government in Canada:

Therefore be it resolved that without in any way prejudicing or jeopardizing the rights and privileges of any minority group in Canada, a comprehensive conference of representatives of the provinces be held for the purpose of considering:

1. The existing legislative and administrative organization in the provincial and federal spheres.

2. A more expedient allocation of powers as between the provincial and federal authorities.

3. Ways and means of facilitating the drafting, the adoption and the implementation of a Canadian constitution in keeping with the rights granted in the Statute of Westminster.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if such a policy were adopted the bill which we are now considering and matters allied to it would never again arise. Personally I feel that that is the only sound and proper way of dealing with this anomaly as well as with all others that obtain under our present constitutional position.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Fournier (Hull) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 87, to authorize an agreement between His Majesty the King and the corporation of the city of Ottawa.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull) moved the second reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 1—Agreement with city of Ottawa extended for one year.

Mr. KNOWLES: Are copies of this bill available, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): We have sent for a copy.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull) moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, quite consistently, and without malice at all with respect to this matter, let me say that I have always insisted that a copy of a bill must be before us before it passes through this house. I think the minister will see the position in which we would be if we were not to stand up and maintain our rights in this matter. I have no desire to hold up this bill in any way. I think it is one which we all want to see go through as quickly as possible, and I hope I shall not be misunderstood when I ask that this bill be not now read a third time until we have a copy of it before us. I have no objection to our coming back to this bill and giving it a third reading once we have a copy of the bill in our hands, proceeding with some other item of business in the meantime. But to protect the position which we have consistently taken during many sessions in this house we must insist on having a copy of the bill before us before it is given a third reading. Otherwise we shall be subjected, and properly so, to a good deal of criticism for laxity. I am not singling out this particular piece of legislation. I am taking the stand I have taken on several occasions before with respect to other legislation coming before us and will do so again, and I caution the government now to have their bills ready so that they can be put through their stages properly in this house. As I said I shall be very glad to see the bill get its third reading after we have passed some other item of business if a copy of the bill is before us.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): With the point raised by my hon. friend I have no quarrel at all. The bill, I take it, will be practically in the same form as the resolution. It is a very simple matter, the giving of a grant to the city of Ottawa, but if my hon. friend so desires we are prepared to let it stand. We thought we might dispose of it, however, since there are no new phases of the measure that will be revealed when the bill is before the house.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask why the bill is not before the house when we are asked to give three readings.

Mr. CRERAR: At the moment I am unable to give my hon. friend the information.

Mr. GRAYDON: The responsibility for the delay in this matter certainly cannot, by the greatest stretch of the imagination, be regarded as resting on our shoulders. The government should have the bill here if they are anxious to make the grant to the city. I am anxious that it should go through as quickly as possible, but the government is the obstacle.

Mr. FOURNIER: At the next sitting.

UNITED NATIONS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved the third reading of bill No. 84, for carrying into effect the agreement for united nations relief and rehabilitation administration between Canada and certain other nations and authorities.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I realize that there is no desire on the part of the house to debate further at any length the bill which is now before us for third reading. There were two points which I wished to make, and I have now been afforded that opportunity by the motion for third reading.

I would refer the house to that portion of the schedule known as article I, paragraph (c) of section 2, and I should like to read particularly that part in which I am interested at the moment, and that is in connection with the purposes and functions of the administration. I quote:

> To study, formulate and recommend for individual or joint action by any or all of the member governments measures with respect to such related matters, arising out of its experience in planning and performing the work of relief and rehabilitation, as may be proposed by any of the member governments.

My sole reason for raising this point at the moment is that this schedule constitutes the agreement which has already been signed at Washington by a number of nations; and this nation did not see fit, by reason of its government's policy, to wait for ratification before the signing of the agreement. A number of other nations did this, but in its wisdom or otherwise Canada saw the matter in a different light.

Although the agreement has been signed and perhaps, as some members have said, matters cannot be remedied, I do not think this procedure should be allowed to pass without a protest on my part, and I would draw to the attention of the government the implications which are patent in the particular part of the schedule that I have mentioned. So far as this nation is concerned, and this government as well, we have actually signed the agreement with a number of other important nations, and we may find ourselves perhaps in a position which is not now contemplated, since we have agreed to study, to formulate and to recommend for individual or joint action by any or all of the member governments measures with respect to "such related matters". It is not just relief, not merely the provision of supplies, but matters related to the provision of relief and of supplies. The interpretation is pretty loose and that may perhaps lead us into positions not contemplated by the resolution when brought up.

I would caution the government, because I believe that this particular section may be fraught with dangers which have not been indicated and which apparently have not come to the attention of the government. I envisage this, that under this section it might be possible that in some of the smaller countries in Europe relief and rehabilitation will become necessary as conquest has actually been achieved and the nations freed, and, after the relief and rehabilitation programme had been under way for some time, certain experience in planning and performing the work of relief and rehabilitation, as mentioned, might be used as a means of going farther. How much farther we do not know, and having regard to the circumstances, I think there should be at least some limiting clause with respect to the length to which these nations banded together are going to go in matters further than relief and rehabilitation provisions.

I would point out by way of warning and caution that this nation, by signing the agreement and particularly by adhering to this section, may conceivably be adopting in the international field a policy that may go much farther and into much more perilous and dangerous undertakings than those contemplated by the government, or evidently by those who have become signatories to the agreement. With that I rest my case at the moment.

The other point I wish to make is this. It is not sufficient for this nation simply to propose plans for what it is going to do for other countries. This nation has to do more under UNRRA than that, and the one weakness of our position in relation to UNRRA, as I see it, is the fact that Canada failed last year actually to plan for its food supply. That was a matter that came before this house on several occasions. The suggestion was made time after time, not merely from this side of the house but in other quarters as well, that there should be plans with regard to food in Canada. The suggestion was made that there should be a food minister and that plans and schemes should be on foot for the provision of supplies not only for the war but for the days of the rehabilitated peace-time period.

I think it can be properly said that we are entering into this UNRRA agreement completely unprepared to play our part with respect to food supply. I am not going to mention the reasons to-day. I am not catechizing the government farther on that point, but at a more suitable time I think the government, through the appropriate minister, must answer certain questions with respect to the manner in which we are prepared to do something in support of the paper writing into which we have entered as one nation in the international field. Food is one thing for which we have not planned very well in war. We have had surpluses of one thing and we have had deficiencies of another. Our food supply has been a serious question. If the war ends unexpectedly, where is the surplus except for perhaps one or two staple lines? Where is the surplus we are to use under the terms of the UNRRA agreement? It is one thing to sign an agreement and it is another thing to provide the things that we are prepared to provide under it. This country must solve the inevitable problem, and that is why I think we must have a food policy and a food plan, not only for the remainder of the war but for those days envisaged and contemplated by the agreement in question.

I rose to protest, first of all, against one of the provisions in the agreement, and, second, to protest against the lack of a plan to provide the necessary materials and food supplies contemplated in the agreement in the time in which it will operate. I am hopeful that the government will heed some of the suggestions that are being made in this regard. The suggestions are made honestly, because I have great fear as to what our position is to be with respect to this agreement unless the government simultaneously, collaterally and concurrently have a proper internal and domestic plan at home by which we can fulfil the terms of the agreement into which we have entered with other nations of the world.

Mr. BRUCE McNEVIN (Victoria, Ont.): I am surprised by some of the remarks of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon). He now states that there should have been a minister of food. I think it was only yesterday or the day before he took the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to task for suggesting some new departments headed by a minister.

Mr. GRAYDON: Do not misrepresent me, now.

Mr. McNEVIN: That is as I understood it.

Mr. GRAYDON: The food minister was to be under the Minister of Agriculture. My hon. friend knows that. There was no new ministry to be set up.

Mr. McNEVIN: My hon. friend said a minister of food.

Mr. GRAYDON: Quite; my hon. friend listened to the debate last session, and surely he should have known that.

Mr. McNEVIN: I am listening to it this session. The leader of the opposition said a minister of food.

Mr. GRAYDON: Do not misinterpret.

Mr. McNEVIN: I take issue with the statement that the food production plan of the Dominion of Canada has not been given leadership or has not been a definite plan. When we compare the production figures of 1938 with 1943 and take into consideration the fact that for the latter period there are at least twenty-five per cent fewer people engaged in the production of food products and that we had in 1943 a forty per cent increase in the total amount of food produced over the figure for 1938, I think that definitely establishes the fact that the food production plan of the Dominion of Canada was well directed and well guided; and, in addition to that, that the farmers of Canada responded magnificently to that leadership and to the direction that was given. For that guidance the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) must be given the major portion of the credit.

Mr. GRAYDON: The farmers responded in spite of the leadership.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): I should like to say just a word concerning the remarks made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon). I take it that the first point he raised was in regard to paragraph (c) of section 2 of article I. I do not attach to the language of that paragraph the implications which my hon. friend endeavoured to read into it. After all, paragraph (c) provides that the council or the administration may—

. . . study, formulate and recommend for individual or joint action by any or all of the member governments measures with respect to such related matters.

All they do is to study, formulate and make recommendations.

Mr. GRAYDON: No; read farther.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Such proposals—

That is, such recommendations or formulations as they make.

—shall be studied and recommendations formulated if the proposals are supported by a vote of the council, and the recommendations shall be referred to any or all of the member governments for individual or joint action—

Mr. GRAYDON: That is the point.

Mr. CRERAR:

—if approved by unanimous vote of the central committee and by vote of the council.

My hon. friend states that this will bind the member governments. I do not put that construction upon it. I am free to say that I have not given perhaps as close study to it as my hon. friend has done; but I do not think there is any commitment there that would bind this government or any other government to any fantastic or impossible proposition.

On the second point I wish simply to supplement what the hon. member for Victoria, Ontario (Mr. McNevin) has said. I think the leader of the opposition was a bit wide of the mark in his criticism of the administration for lack of a food policy. His suggestion that something in the nature of a food ministry should be set up was covered by the hon. member for Victoria, Ontario. As a matter of fact, the Minister of Agriculture

(Mr. Gardiner) and the Department of Agriculture have, since the outbreak of the war, been mainly concerned with an increase in the production of foodstuffs in this country. And with what results? We undertook to supply Britain with vast quantities of bacon and pork products. As I recall it, in the year prior to the outbreak of the war, our shipments to the United Kingdom were something on the order of 140,000,000 pounds. Last year they were over 600,000,000 pounds. Does my hon. friend claim that there was a lack of planning, a lack of energy and a lack of effort in a few short years in securing this tremendous increase?

At the present time and for some time past I understand substantial shipments of beef as well as dairy products have been going to Great Britain. How has this been achieved? Is it the result of a hit-or-miss method, of a haphazard plan or a lack of plan that my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, described it to be? Not at all. It is the result of organized effort and planning in the production of those food crops. Cheese, one of the most concentrated of foodstuffs, has been sent to Great Britain in far greater quantities in the last few years than was ever sent before the outbreak of war. We have sent milk products of one kind and another, powdered milk and concentrated milk. These were the commodities that the people of Great Britain wished to have and we have produced them. We have done that without placing any undue hardship upon the people of our own country. No one in this house will presume to say that the government in its policy has been niggardly in supplying meats, dairy products—milk, particularly for children—to the people of this country.

Cereal production is also subject to weather conditions, over which, unfortunately, the government has no control, but for which some people would like to blame the government, and cereal production has been maintained and increased. The hon. member who is parliamentary assistant to the Prime Minister, in speaking to the measure the other day, stated, as I recall, that it was expected that a substantial contribution from Canada would be in wheat. I can assure my hon. friend that we have the wheat in this country at the present time. I think, therefore, my hon. friend was extending himself considerably in an effort to find ground for criticism of the food production programme in this country. He may not know it, and he may not believe it when I tell him, but from one end of Canada to the other there is full recognition to-day of the magnificent job which the Minister of Agriculture has done in the production of foodstuffs. I find evidence of this on every hand. What do the authorities in Great Britain say; what do the authorities in the United States say, about Canada's effort in this regard? They think it has been a very fine effort and has made an exceedingly great contribution to the purposes of the war.

I simply wished to say this because in the absence of my colleague the Minister of Agriculture I did not wish to let pass unchallenged the rather strong criticism which was made by the hon. gentleman who leads the opposition.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CITY OF OTTAWA AGREEMENT

AUTHORIZATION OF PAYMENT OF $100,000 FOR THE YEAR ENDING JULY 1, 1944

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): I understand that, my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) concurring, we may revert to order No. 7 and get the third reading of bill No. 87.

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works) moved the third reading of bill No. 87, to authorize an agreement between His Majesty the King and the corporation of the city of Ottawa.

Hon. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): We are prepared to allow this bill now to proceed. I only want to caution the government; on future occasions, when there is a bill to be presented, do not place us in the embarrassing position of having to object to the passing of a bill in which we are interested and which we support. I leave that as a word of caution.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): I want to add one further word. Do not let the leaders think, either, that because one or two copies of a bill are distributed to the leaders, only, in the house, that carries it, merely with the leaders' support. I warn the government now that I will not support any bill merely because the leaders get copies of it. A bill has to be distributed to every member of the House of Commons. With that protest, the bill may go ahead.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

JUDGES ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR SALARY OF THIRD JUDGE OF THE EXCHEQUER COURT OF CANADA

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 85, to amend the Judges Act.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Before the bill is read a second time I should like to suggest that we should have what in some legislatures is known as a legal committee. A great many members of the House of Commons are not lawyers, and it may be a good thing that they are not, but I believe this house needs a committee on legal bills of this kind. Five or six matters have arisen, of which this bill is one, to which a legal committee could usefully give consideration—matters affecting the judges, their status, the question of salaries, criminal code amendment, the justice department, and related legal subjects. I believe that such a committee would strengthen the hands of the Attorney General of Canada, the present Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent). He is right most of the time, and I hope that shortly he will be promoted and become right honourable, perhaps when the birthday honours are announced.

Another matter for such a committee was referred to several times by Chief Justice Robertson in the Ontario court of appeal, namely the problem of delinquency. I hope the minister will consider this suggestion for such bill as the one now before us. I support the second reading of the bill.

Mr. A. H. BENCE (Saskatoon City): This bill gives us an opportunity of drawing one or two matters to the attention of the administration with respect to the judiciary. The position which the judiciary of this country finds itself in at the present time should, I believe, be broadly reviewed for the purpose of determining whether the conditions which exist are the best possible in the interests of the administration of justice. There are a number of important questions which must be given serious consideration. One of the first is, are we providing sufficient compensation for the judiciary to attract the very best type of man to the bench? It seems to me, in view of the fact that the judges are the custodians of the rights of the people, and sit in judgment on matters which concern the liberty and the property of the subject, they should be in a position, financially and otherwise, so that no question might arise about their being beyond reproach. It is not asking too much of parliament to suggest that the scale of financial remuneration of the judges be such that, first of all, we can obtain the best men available, and, second, that once they have been placed in the judicial position, they shall have no undue worries as far as their financial future is concerned.

In connection with this matter I would draw to the attention of the minister and the administration a matter which I know has created considerable concern among members of the legal fraternity, namely the fact that no provision is made for the maintenance of widows and dependents of deceased judges.

I should also like to take this opportunity of discussing the vexed question of the compulsory retirement of judges. This matter has been referred to on a number of occasions, not only in this house but in the press. The situation which exists with respect to compulsory retirement is, to say the least, anomalous. Under the provisions of the British North America Act the governor general, which is to say the government, is authorized to appoint two different types of judges, those of the county or district court, and those of the superior court of the province, consisting of the trial judges and the appellate judges. In addition to that, under the provisions of the other acts which are in existence, the Supreme Court Act and the Exchequer Court Act, the governor general may also appoint judges to the supreme court and to the exchequer court.

With respect to judges of the district or county courts, the lowest courts to which appointments are made by the government, there is a provision that there shall be compulsory retirement at the age of seventy-five. That provision is contained in the Judges Act, and I believe was first passed in 1913.

The provisions for the supreme court are contained in the Supreme Court Act, and we find that the justices of that court are also compulsorily retired at the age of seventy-five years. That provision came in a little later, and was passed by parliament in 1927. Section 9 of the Supreme Court Act states:

> 9. The judges shall hold office during good behaviour, but shall be removable by the governor general on address of the Senate and House of Commons: Provided that each judge, whether heretofore appointed or hereafter to be appointed, shall cease to hold office upon attaining the age of seventy-five years, or immediately, if he has already attained that age.

A similar provision was placed in the Exchequer Court Act at that time. Thus we now find ourselves in the position where judges of the lower courts, namely the county or district courts, and judges of the highest court of the land, namely the Supreme Court of Canada, are compulsorily retired at the age of seventy-five years. On the other hand, members of what I might describe as the intermediate court, referred to as the superior court, consisting of the trial and appellate courts, are not subject to the same provision. We find ourselves in the position where we have men sitting on those courts who have attained ages as great as ninety years. We have had many examples of judges over eighty years of age who have sat in these courts.

I believe I should first point out the reason for this condition. District court, county court and supreme court judges are appointed under acts of parliament, and hold office by virtue of those acts. On the other hand, superior court judges hold office partly by virtue of a provision contained in the British North America Act, to be found in volume 5 of the Revised Statutes of Canada. Section 99 of that act states:

> 99. The judges of the superior courts shall hold office during good behaviour, but shall be removable by the governor general on address of the Senate and House of Commons.

Consequently, as a result of the provisions of that act, parliament has no authority to deal with the compulsory retirement of judges of the superior court. On the other hand, parliament has authority to deal with, and has dealt with judges of other courts.

As I said before, the provisions respecting the compulsory retirement of supreme court judges were brought into effect in 1927, at which time considerable discussion took place in the house. It was decided at that time that there should be compulsory retirement, and that it should be retroactive.

The next step in the picture came in 1933, at which time a measure was introduced and passed in the house, despite the opposition of hon. members of the party now occupying the treasury benches. The measure at that time did not deal with compulsory retirement, but provided that when a judge of the superior court reached the age of seventy-five his salary would be reduced to the amount of the pension he would receive if then retired. In my opinion the method adopted to achieve the purpose the administration had in mind was not the best one available. In other words, it was a roundabout way of achieving an object which, I believe, could have been attained in a direct fashion.

At the time that matter was before the house for consideration a fairly lengthy debate took place. The objection taken to the measure was voiced briefly by the then leader of the opposition, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), when he stated, as reported at page 4790 of Hansard for 1932-33:

> The provisions of this bill appear to violate contracts between the crown and members of the judiciary. Perhaps my hon. friend would explain to us on the second reading whether that is the case or not, and if it is the case, on what grounds he justifies the measure at all.

[Mr. Bence.]

Subsequently, during the debate, the Right Hon. Mr. Lapointe took strenuous objection to the effect that the legislation would be a breach of contract between the judges and the crown. Generally speaking, it was opposed on that basis by members of the Liberal party then sitting in opposition. It is indicated in Mr. Lapointe's speech that they felt the question of politics came into the consideration of the administration, and he pointed out the following at page 4795 of Hansard for the same year:

> I am free to confess that I believe the purpose is to create vacancies for the appointment of new judges.

Unfortunately, I believe one of the greatest difficulties different administrations in this country have encountered has been that oppositions have felt that the reason why certain measures were being introduced might be partly political, giving the administration of the day an opportunity to fill appointments from adherents of their own political groups. It seems to me that was a great mistake. Surely the attitude taken at that time was the wrong one, because if the measure had been passed by parliament we would not find ourselves in the impossible position we have to-day, and the situation would have been immeasurably improved by this time. Possibly I should add in passing that while the measure was passed by the House of Commons, it was eventually turned down by the senate on the grounds advanced by the then opposition in the house.

I am not in favour of a policy of breaking contractual obligations with anyone, certainly least of all the judges. I believe this problem could have been solved quite easily in another way. First of all, an amendment should be made to the British North America Act so that parliament could deal with superior court judges in the same way as it deals with judges of the lower courts, and with those of the highest court in the land. There would appear to be no sound reason whatsoever why that should not be done. A provision could be inserted in the proper act along the same line as those provisions now applicable to other judges, and there could be compulsory retirement at the age of seventy-five.

In order, however, that there may be no question of breach of contract, I believe it should be provided that the compulsory retirement would not apply to present members of the judiciary, or that financial provisions be made whereby those now sitting in the various courts might be compulsorily retired at seventy-five, but with the full salary they now receive. In that way we would avoid being accused of a breach of faith which otherwise might follow. It would only be a few years before the matter would be completely straightened out. Judges now on the bench could be permitted to act until they retired or were possibly removed, a procedure that is not often adopted in this country, and then provision could be made with respect to new appointees on the same basis as now applies to the district courts and the Supreme Court of Canada. In accepting an appointment, a man would know exactly what his position was. If it is felt that something should be done immediately about the retirement of judges who have reached seventy-five years of age, I think we should consider giving compensation on the basis of their present income. That is the only fair and sensible solution of the problem.

I do not want to get into any argument as to whether any particular man who is over seventy-five years of age still retains his faculties sufficiently to perform his duties in the same manner as he did in earlier life, because there are certain exceptional examples of men who can do this. However, I think generally speaking it must be concluded that when a man has reached seventy-five years of age his faculties are not nearly as good as they were when he was younger. In addition, I believe the public has not as much confidence in the judgment and ability of a man of eighty-five or ninety years of age as in the judgment and ability of men twenty or twenty-five years younger. We must consider the position of the public in this matter, because the administration of justice affects the public. These courts have been created and these judges have been appointed purely and simply for the purpose of being of service to the public. Also, if judges were retired greater opportunity would be given to younger and more aggressive men to enter the judicial field.

I think the political angle should be entirely disregarded. I doubt if there will be any opposition, or at least not very much, from any of the parties in this house should the administration decide to proceed along the lines I have suggested. I do not think it will be contended that vacancies were being created for the purpose of appointing particular men.

This matter has to be faced, and the sooner it is faced the better. When the exchequer court bill was before the house I took the stand that judicial appointments should be made as quickly as possible. The minister took exception to my remarks and suggested that I had said that such appointments were dangled before the eyes of prospective appointees. I was not making that suggestion with respect to the minister himself; I was making it with respect to the administration generally. I think it is agreed that in many cases appointments are held up because of the political situation in which certain gentlemen find themselves. That is a situation which should be avoided if at all possible. The minister may think the administration of justice in Saskatchewan has not been impaired because a certain position has not been filled, but in the long run I think it is a better policy not to put off these appointments indefinitely. The minister will clear up this matter to my satisfaction, and I am sure to the satisfaction of all members of this house, if he makes this appointment to the vacancy which exists there as soon as possible and not let politics intervene in any way. The minister has referred to the fact that members of the legal fraternity who were not adherents of the political party at present in power have been appointed to the bench by this government. He may know of such cases, but I must say they have not come to my attention and I do not think they exist in Saskatchewan. I suggest to the minister that the present vacancy in that province offers an admirable opportunity to him to demonstrate the spirit which he has suggested exists. Possibly some leading member of the Progressive Conservative party could be appointed to that post.

As far as the situation in that province is concerned I should like to reiterate emphatically a protest which I made when the exchequer court bill was before us. I believe we have reached a time when the learned gentleman who occupies a high post in the diplomatic service of this country as high commissioner to Australia should make up his mind, or the administration should make up his mind, either to continue in the diplomatic service or to return to his duties on the bench. Personally I think it is unfair that he should be allowed to retain a judgeship in his hip-pocket, so to speak, while he spends a number of years in other countries.

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take just a few minutes to express my support of the contention of the previous speaker that steps should be taken as early as possible to strengthen the position of the judiciary in the eyes of the people of this country. I feel he has done something worth while in the presentation he has made in connection with the desirability of the retirement of judges of the provincial superior courts at a determined age. As he has pointed out, we find ourselves in a rather odd position. The judges of our highest courts, the Supreme Court of Canada and the Exchequer Court of Canada, and those of the lower courts are subject to compulsory retirement. On the other hand, judges of courts in the so-called middle brackets, the provincial superior courts, are appointed for life. The British North America Act denies either to this parliament or to the provincial legislatures the right to fix a compulsory retiring age for these judges.

While it is agreed that some men of ripe years maintain their mental and physical vigour, I think as a general rule it would be much better for the administration of justice and the prestige of our courts if we adopted the principle that the judges in all courts should retire at a fixed age. In my view the retiring age of seventy-five years which applies to those judges who are compelled to retire, and which is the age the hon. member for Saskatoon City (Mr. Bence) thinks should be applied in all cases, is too high. I believe in this day a lower age should be fixed and I suggest that seventy years might be given consideration. When I use the phrase "might be given consideration" I do so in the hope that the government is giving serious thought to this matter. I dare to hope that when the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) speaks, as I hope he will a little later on, he will give some indication whether this matter is under consideration by the government.

In the province from which I come, one of the newspapers on its editorial page not long ago gave itself to an expression of opinion on this whole question. I think many of us will agree it was regrettable that the kind of thing had to be said that was contained in that particular editorial. The principal objection was that it seemed by inference to cast reflection on some of the older men of one of the courts of Manitoba who undoubtedly had given good service. It is not necessary for me to defend the Winnipeg Free Press, but I do wish to say it is regrettable that that kind of situation could develop where, in order to press an important point such as this it seemed necessary to involve the prestige and personalities of revered gentlemen such as those who have sat on our bench. That, of course, was not intended, but it grew out of the failure of governments of the past, as well as the present administration, to deal with this matter.

I feel that the previous speaker is on sound ground when he suggests that we should not delay further in connection with this matter. I understand that at the present time in the provincial superior courts of the country—these courts have a wide range of names—there are twenty-nine judges between the ages of seventy and seventy-five, and eleven judges of the age of seventy-six or over, running as high as ninety-two years.

Like the previous speaker, I affirm that undoubtedly there are men in the higher brackets with mental and physical vigour greater than that of many who are much younger, but as a general principle I think members of this house will be agreed that there ought to be fixed a reasonable retiring age for judges of all courts in this country. I agree with the previous speaker in his suggestion that an amendment to the British North America Act should be sought to make this possible. If there are reasons which make it difficult to secure such an amendment for a period of time, I would suggest that some other method might be found to bring about this result. I have, as a matter of fact, on the order paper a bill which, while not in a sense concerned with the retirement of judges, would have that effect. My purpose in rising at this time is to express the hope that during the course of this debate the Minister of Justice will give us some indication as to whether or not the retirement of judges of the provincial superior courts is being given consideration.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think in about two minutes I can give the assurance that hon. members have sought, that at the very first opportunity the matter of an amendment to the British North America Act to deal with the provision which now gives judges of the provincial superior courts a life tenure in their office will be considered. This is in my opinion a matter which should not be presented for amendment to the imperial parliament without previous discussion with the provinces, because the administration of justice and the establishment of the courts are matters that are within provincial jurisdiction. It is my view that the proper procedure with respect to amendments to the British North America Act when dealing with any portion that gives jurisdiction to provincial legislatures should involve prior conference and consultation with the legislatures, and if it is sought to take away from them something which has been allotted to them, their consent should be obtained.

Mr. BENCE: That is not the case here, may I suggest.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I would consider that it is a case where there should be consultation with the provinces, because under section 92 they have jurisdiction in respect of the constitution of the courts, and section 99 is not placed specifically within dominion or provincial powers because it is something which affects both the powers of the governor in council and the powers of the provinces with regard to the setting up and the manning of the courts of justice. It is a matter which was on the agenda for discussion at the last provincial conference, and it certainly will be one of the matters to be considered at the next provincial conference. All I can say to the house is that as far as I am concerned I would recommend that that conference agree to an amendment to the constitution to give the proper Canadian authorities the right to fix an age limit for the exercise of judicial authority. I am not going to discuss at the present time whether it should be seventy or seventy-five years. I think that is a matter which should be left entirely to the good judgment of the Canadian legislatures including this dominion house, and I would hope that the provincial legislatures would find it in the general interest to leave that to the discretion of parliament, as it is in the discretion of parliament with respect to federal courts and with respect to district and county courts.

As, however, everyone here has recognized, the direct way of going about it will be to get an amendment to the British North America Act, and then have parliament deal with it in its wisdom, as it should be dealt with according to the circumstances.

For the supreme court and the exchequer court—and of course this bill is only concerned with the exchequer court—the age limit that parliament has seen fit to set is seventy-five, and the same age limit has been set for the district and county courts. I do not think the constitution should fix what the age limit should be. I think it should be left entirely to the Canadian legislatures to determine from time to time what the proper age limit should be. At the next provincial conference, if I am there, I will strongly urge that something be done so that Canadians can settle in their own legislatures what should be the proper age limit.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does that mean that the conference is apt to be very soon? Is that the implication?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The conference, as far as the federal authorities are concerned, will take place just as early as the provincial representatives can be brought together. We cannot have a conference without them. They have been invited and have been urged to come just as quickly as they can find it convenient to do so.

There were two other matters discussed by the hon. member for Saskatoon city (Mr. Bence). One was, are we providing sufficient compensation for our judges? This bill is to provide compensation of $9,000 for an additional puisne judge of the exchequer court. It would probably not be proper to make that figure any different for that position from what it would be for the president of the exchequer court or the other puisne judges of the court. It probably would not be proper to make it different from the general scale which applies to the superior court judges throughout Canada.

Mr. BENCE: I did not suggest anything like that.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is a matter about which the Minister of Justice has received for several months urgent representations not only from judges and lawyers but from a large number of organizations that have expressed the view that under present conditions the country was not making sufficient provision for the compensation of the judiciary. That, however, cannot be dealt with on this bill. It is a matter that is being given serious thought by a great many people.

It is the same with respect to the question whether or not there should be some provision for widows or dependents of judges. Hon. members may be assured that these matters are receiving serious consideration, but there are, of course, a great many factors that have to be taken into account, especially during a war period, when the burden on all citizens is so great. I trust that with this assurance the house will be prepared to accept the provision of this bill for the additional judge to be appointed in the exchequer court.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Section 1 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND

JOINT STATEMENT ON ESTABLISHMENT TABLED

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): I would ask that we revert to motions, Mr. Speaker. On behalf of the Minister of Finance, who is unavoidably absent, I table, in accordance with the statement which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made to the house this afternoon, three copies in English and three in French of the joint statement on the establishment of an international monetary fund. Printed copies of this statement will be available for members either to-morrow or Monday.

Mr. COLDWELL: Did I understand the minister to say that copies would be available or printed in Votes and Proceedings?

Mr. McLARTY: I said that printed copies will be available. I am more or less pinch-hitting at the moment, but my advice is that they will be printed.

Mr. COLDWELL: As long as they are printed I am content.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

APPOINTMENT OF GEORGE A. TOUCHE AND COMPANY AS AUDITORS

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of bill No. 86, respecting the appointment of auditors for national railways.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 1—Appointment of auditors.

Mr. GRAYDON: I fancy this is a non-controversial measure, but there are two questions I should like to ask the minister. Is this bill, as it stands, on all fours with the bill of the previous session covering the same matter? Are the terms of remuneration for the employment of the firm of auditors the same as they were in the previous bill?

Mr. MICHAUD: The answer to the first question is that the bill is almost on all fours with last year's bill except that in the twelfth line the numerals 1944 were substituted for 1943 to make it applicable to this year. The same remuneration is provided for as in past years.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has the minister with him the exact remuneration which the company received during the last year?

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes. The remuneration is provided by agreement and has been for some years. It is $50,000 annually. In the last few years an additional amount of $1,800 was provided as remuneration for auditing the accounts of the Trans-Canada Air Lines.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

[Mr. McLarty.]

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Thursday, April 20, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Air services branch—

3. Civil aviation: operation and maintenance of municipal (terminal) airports, $398,260.

Mr. GRAYDON: At least one member of our group desires to say something on this this item.

Mr. MacNICOL: I shall not be long. Unfortunately, I had to be out of the house during the time much of the debate was carried on. I was in when the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) spoke, and I congratulate him upon the presentation he made and upon the clear evidence of how he digs into matters in which he is interested. He presented an exhaustive statement to the committee. I was in when the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) spoke. I greatly enjoyed his speech, too, because of the amount of material he presented. Many of the other hon. members made excellent speeches as well, but I do not recall them at the moment. The two committees of which I am a member took up a good deal of my time and therefore I missed much of the debate. I was in last evening when the minister spoke and I enjoyed his remarks. He was much more explicit last night than he was when I heard him on March 17. If he had said on March 17 what he said last evening, perhaps the debate would have been shortened. However, I feel I ought to state my position as clearly and as briefly as I can.

I am convinced that the discussion so far has done good and that much information has come out. I keep asking myself, as I did in the beginning, when I heard the minister speak on March 17, what is the situation? I say frankly I was greatly dismayed. Not knowing all the facts at that time I feared the direction in which we were headed. I have always been a strong advocate of maintaining Canada's sovereignty in full. For years I have looked forward to a great expansion in Canada's airway programme. I envisioned some city in the maritimes being made the centre of air operations in that section. I am not familiar enough with the airfields in the maritimes, or the air currents, fogs and so forth that would have to be taken into consideration in the establishment of airfields, to know much about the best centre there; but I presume some one big centre could be developed from which Canada's whole eastern air programme would be operated.

I had envisioned Montreal as a great air centre. When I speak of Montreal I mean the airfields adjacent to Montreal and used by that city and vicinity. I had envisioned an airfield there from which the whole territory north to Ungava and perhaps Baffin Land, when that territory is opened, as it will be by-and-by, both commercially and for passenger traffic, could be served. I know enough about the north to realize that its resources are far beyond the conception of the average Canadian, in fact beyond the conception of most people anywhere. I have envisaged an air transport service some day, consisting of planes of one to three hundred tons capacity and even more, moving products down to Montreal from the north. I envisage another great airport at or near Toronto. I am not sure whether the department have finally settled on any specific site, although they do use Malton and perhaps the island airfield. Certainly the country north from Toronto around Hudson bay will open up for both commerce and passenger traffic a great field of future expansion. The same applies to the country north of Winnipeg along the west coast of the Hudson bay, in which area minerals are being discovered. I fancy I can see in the future great fleets of aeroplanes coming down from the north, helping to build up Winnipeg into a great city of half a million or more. The same applies to Prince Albert, perhaps the last really big centre for northern Saskatchewan, which has a great northern hinterland. The same is also true of Edmonton. Every time I go into the territory north of Edmonton, whether by boat, plane or otherwise, I picture to myself the day when Edmonton will be a city of half a million. It has, I am convinced, one of the surest futures of any of our cities. The same would apply to Vancouver or whatever airfield is established near that city for traffic on the west coast and across to Asia.

So that I had envisioned a great and wide air programme for Canada, and when I heard the minister speak my heart went down, for, I said to myself, "This is all going to be put, at least to a certain extent, under foreign control." In that I may be wrong; I hope I am. But when I read the minister's speech, and I have read it carefully two or three times, I first asked myself, "Just why the hurry to submit either to this house or to any other body our proposals?" The minister stated that he attended the conference at London last October, at which, perhaps, air programmes both national and international were under discussion; but he ended his remarks in that regard by saying that that conference had been only exploratory, and that the intention was to hold other conferences here and there and perhaps everywhere and explore the matter farther. Then I asked myself, how can we have before us these draft proposals for discussion if other conferences, perhaps much more important, are to be held? I would have thought that any draft proposals would be left until every possible avenue for both international and national airways had been explored.

To come back to the subject of the national airways, has the minister, both in his remarks and in the draft agreement, indicated that we are to have full possession of the air over our respective countries? In the words of article II, section 1:

> Each member state recognizes that every state has complete exclusive sovereignty over the air space above its territory.

I cannot reconcile that with the section immediately preceding namely section 3 of article I, which reads:

> The authority—

That is the international authority which is to be set up, not the local authority, and on which Canada will presumably have her fair share of members.

> —shall have exclusive jurisdiction, pursuant to the provisions of this convention, over international air services between two contiguous member states, provided that any two contiguous member states—

For example, I suppose, countries with extended borders, such as the three or four thousand mile border between Canada and the United States.

> —may agree that services between them shall come under the exclusive jurisdiction of the authority. When such an agreement has been notified by both states to the board, and until such agreement has been terminated, the authority shall have exclusive jurisdiction, pursuant to the provisions of this convention, over the services between the two states.

To my way of thinking, if an outside international authority has control over air lines in Canada or between Canada and the United States, that is a surrender of our own absolute control over airways in Canada; and it seems to me that, if that is the case, we would always have to submit to some international authority a request to multiply and extend our air lines. Knowing this country as I do.

I foresee great expansion to the north. Canada's northern territory has not even been scratched. An extremely limited survey of these areas reveals that they are full to overflowing of resources and have vast possibilities. Steffansson, the great arctic explorer, who has written so much about the north, spent a couple of years in the arctic without having taken with him any resources for the maintenance of himself and his crews, in order to demonstrate to the world that the white man can live in the north without supplies from the south. Having made discoveries of vast resources up there, he has recorded them in his books.

I myself, while on my trips to the north, have met many other men who have been farther north than I have, priests and clergymen of the Anglican church and the Roman Catholic church who have lived for many years in Baffin island, Southampton island, Banks island and elsewhere, and all of them record the existence of great resources. The time is coming when Canada will not only receive from our incomparable north vast resources but enjoy the possession of a playground which, even though it be cold for part of the year, will be visited by millions of tourists. I myself just love it; I cannot get enough of it. I do not know when I am going to be satiated with travel in the far north, and I believe that those who go there once will want to go again. How are we to control the air lines—not one, two or three, but maybe twenty-five or thirty—which will radiate from our great southern centres to aid in the exploration, survey, development and transportation of the products of the north? I say, how are we to do it if some international body is to control our routes? I have great respect for the minister. He is a hard worker, and has had a lot of experience. I sincerely hope, however, that in proposing this convention and the articles therein he is not surrendering any of Canada's sovereignty to do what she likes within her own boundaries. When he speaks again I hope he will reassure me that that is not the intention.

During the course of his remarks he did say something that I thought was real news, namely, that the government had determined that after the period set out in his speech the great Canadian Pacific Railway—and I suppose the Canadian National Railways too—are to divorce their activities from aircraft. I shall have to be shown before I will support that. Someone will have to present facts, figures and arguments to convince me that any other transportation service could carry on air transportation better than either of the great railway systems.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

In the course of his remarks the minister said that about two years ago he had invited representatives of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Canadian National Railways and Canadian Airways to sit in and to cooperate under one management. He pointed out that he would allow two directors to each of them. In the end the Canadian Pacific Railway and Canadian Airways representatives declined to enter into that arrangement. I have just been wondering if the minister has been somewhat piqued because the Canadian Pacific representative did not come in on that plan. I think the minister is too big a man for that. But his action in divorcing the Canadian Pacific Railway from any connection with airways prompts me to ask myself if the minister is not just a little piqued?

I cannot find anything but praise for either of our two great railway systems because both have done marvellous jobs. Perhaps the Canadian Pacific, being the first in the field, and having been longer in the railway business—although it was not ahead of the old Grand Trunk—deserves unstinted praise and support from this country for the vast contribution it has made to our development. I do not know what Canada would have done had it not been for those wonderful men who built and operated the Canadian Pacific, right down to today. When I say that I am not detracting in any way from the Canadian National system. I am one who greatly admired the work done by the late Sir Henry Thornton. I am one who was deeply sorry when I learned of his sad and tragic end. In my view, even if he made a few mistakes, even if he did take some steps which did not pan out as had been hoped, he deserves great credit.

I am convinced that the two big railway companies, either together or separately—and I prefer separately—have done masterly jobs, even if under the minister's direction. The minister did say something about competition. As one who was in big business, one who helped to build big business, I know that the sharpest and strongest competition with which any business house can be confronted is the best possible means of sharpening the wits of the men who are at the head of that business. It induces them to develop their business. I do not believe any big company in Canada would have got anywhere, had it not been for competition.

I am one who believes that competition is the life of trade, and it results in initiative. Why does government service fail? Although occasionally government can do something right, in the great majority of cases businesses operated by governments are failures, because there is no inducement for the management to initiate anything. They are on the government payroll, and they do not need to care a fig whether they make ends meet or not. As one example, ample evidence of that is to be found in the oil business at Fort McMurray, and that is only one of many examples. Private business thrives, advances, increases employment and gives more jobs when it is operating under conditions of the strongest competition. That has been my experience. I have seen businesses grow to great strength from very small beginnings, because in their operations they were at all times face to face with other brilliant men who were designing, thinking and initiating. One cannot get anywhere in this world without initiative.

I fear that there will not be anything to induce any air company to expand, initiate, and develop unless it has competition. I am not one who would for one moment criticize anybody else who thinks the government can operate business. My experience has been, however, that private business cannot operate successfully in competition with it—that is, if they are not on the same footing. Private corporations have to finance their operations with a view to making a profit from their business. On the other hand, government business does not need to care whether there is a profit or not. All it has to do is to appeal to the treasury, if it wants more money.

I fear that if all air transport is put under one control we are not going in the right direction—either that, or all competition is a failure. That is something I do not believe. I fear the placing of Canada's lines before some outside international body for approval. We have got along very nicely without that sort of thing, and I should like to have some reassurance from the minister, when he speaks again, as to whether I am right or wrong in this regard.

I ask the minister: Whither is Canada drifting? Where is the old spirit? Where is that spirit of development? On each of the last two occasions I visited the old country I heard men talking about our imperial conferences. The last time I was over there I examined into a certain matter I wanted placed before an imperial conference which was to meet later. However, I shall not go into that now. Reading what I could read about imperial conferences I learned that those conferences are usually divided into two camps. In one camp I found New Zealand, Australia, India, Great Britain and Newfoundland, while in the other there were Canada, the Irish Free State and South Africa. That may be all right, and I am not finding fault with it. I say that each part of the empire has a right to think what it likes, and to do what is best for itself. At the same time, however, it should consider the empire as a whole, and what is best for the empire.

What has happened now? So far as the empire is concerned, the Irish Free State has more or less gone out—and I shall not make further comment upon that. I am glad to see, however, that South Africa is getting closer. May I at this point say that General Jan Christian Smuts is, in my judgment, one of the greatest men into whom God ever put breath—and I say that reverently. He is getting closer to the empire; and I am glad to see that both Australia and New Zealand are thinking much the same way. I would hope that when our Prime Minister goes to the conference to be held in the near future he will keep before him, more than ever before, the thought that after all our duty in Canada is to get closer to all the other parts of the empire. I cannot think for one minute but that all other nations would be pleased to see a stronger empire. But we cannot be stronger if we are disintegrating. Let us hope there is no dissension at any empire airways conference, for that might be followed in turn by our occupying a less important position as far as international airways are concerned. We should be ready to cooperate in full in the decisions arrived at by the representatives of the different empire countries at that conference.

I want to say quite frankly that next to the empire my love is for our cousins to the south. We are fortunate in having a neighbour like the United States. Many of us have relations living in that country. I admire that country, and I know those people will think more of me and more of Canadians generally if they see us acting in cooperation with the other countries of the empire instead of trying to set ourselves up as independent and doing as we like, apart from the empire.

It seems to me that the programme set out in this draft agreement would tend to disintegrate the unity of the empire, and if it does I am opposed to it. I am for unity of the empire above everything else. Recently I read an editorial in the Globe and Mail. Some of my hon. friends opposite do not like the Globe and Mail. I do not need to say anything for that great paper, but I read their editorials and the editorials in other papers, whether they are friendly to me or not. I always try to put myself above any selfish interests. I like to try to put myself on the plane of thinking of Canada. I want to do the best I can for this country. This editorial seems to express my opinion; they can write what I want to say much better than I can say it. It appeared in the issue of April 19, and reads:

Here is the crux of the issue between Mr. King and his sympathizers on the one hand and Lord Cranborne and Mr. Bracken on the other. As far as we can gather from his statements, Mr. King would work out a foreign policy framed primarily in the selfish interests of Canada, and then would be willing to hold intermittent consultations with the other British governments to discover whether his policy could be dove-tailed into the policies of the rest of the commonwealth.

Lord Cranborne and Mr. Bracken, and presumably also Mr. Curtin and Mr. Fraser, before they sponsored any special policy for their own nations, would engage in close and constant consultation to determine if the views of the partner nations could not be harmonized in support of a policy which would be acceptable to the whole commonwealth. Its attainment might not always prove possible, but it would occur very frequently.

The last paragraph sets out my position.

Mr. HOWE: The Globe and Mail has changed its position.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am sorry to hear the minister say that, because I have refrained from talking politics. Canadian aviation and international aviation in which Canada is to be associated is above politics.

Mr. HOWE: I was not talking politics; I was talking about the Globe and Mail.

Mr. MacNICOL: The older I get, the farther I try to keep away from politics. I think hon. members will admit that I seldom mention politics in this house. I like to think of what I can do for Canada. When I reach the stage where I cannot render any service to my native country outside of politics, then there is no interest here for me. I wish to read another extract from the Globe and Mail of April 18, as follows:

In 1926 Canada, along with Great Britain and the other dominions, accepted the following as a just and worthy definition of the mutual relations, rights and responsibilities of members of this commonwealth:

"They are autonomous communities within the British empire, equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs, though united by a common allegiance to the crown, and freely associated as members of the British commonwealth of nations."

That is the position I like to take. I cannot see why we in the empire cannot present a solid front. We do not want to do anything that will cause enmity. We want to create harmony among the nations, and especially we want harmonious relations with the great republic to the south. I do not want to be alive if the time should ever come when bitter enmity exists between the northern and southern halves of this continent. I like to think of our cousins—they are our first cousins—being the best friends there are of the empire, and the empire being their best friend. We should endeavour to avoid enmity against any other nation. The time has come when all nations must try to cooperate and avoid international strife.

International strife does not get us anywhere. The cost of this war would have provided freedom, would have provided homes and would have provided all the social requirements necessary to make every man, woman and child in the world, whether white, black, yellow or red, contented for the rest of their lives. I advocate the closest connections with the other countries of the empire. I want to advocate unity in the empire in order that the empire may more fittingly induce other nations of the world to follow its ideals. Every hon. member will admit that the ideals of the British empire have been a great example for the other countries of the world, and many of them have been adopted by other nations, especially by our cousins to the south.

I was greatly dismayed when the minister sat down on March 17. I hope that when he replies at the end of this debate he will reassure us that there is to be a maintenance of our own sovereignty, and that we are to retain our sovereign position within the British empire.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, I should like to direct the attention of the committee to one or two matters. First, let me say that I have a great deal of respect for the minister and for his deputy. I am sure the minister attends the theatre, although I have not been in one for ten or twelve years. Apparently in civil aviation he expects to play the part of Edgar Bergen, and he is quite capable of doing it, while the rest of us act the part of a lot of Charlie McCarthys in civil aviation. The minister deserves a great deal of credit for the way in which a lot of the work of his department has been carried on.

Many of us followed this question of civil aviation during and after the last war and during the depression. Many hon. members have shown the utmost interest in civil aviation and in the work of the huge empire air training scheme which has achieved such magnificent results. Aviation if developed will be the most important industry in this country, along with agriculture. In 1938, long before Munich, I proposed in debate in this house an empire air training plan; that we should give some of the young men who were then out of work some form of military drill, pocket money, clothing, deferred pay, on an apprenticeship plan, and had that policy been adopted we would have been in a much better position to-day, and have had, as I said then, 25,000 skilled air pilots and mechanics when war came.

I would like to have the attention of the committee, Mr. Chairman. I do not often interrupt hon. members and I do not like being interrupted. This question of civil aviation is one of the most serious before the British empire to-day, and it demands a proper solution. But the policy now before us, if carried through, would be the death-knell of the British empire. Only to-day in the British House of Commons Mr. Churchill made reference to the fact that the dominions must be taken into full partnership both during and after this war. We saw the result of lack of cooperation with New Zealand and Australia in what happened in the far east, during those dark days when we lost Hong Kong and Singapore and when the fate of civilization hung in the balance. These great sister dominions wanted to be consulted in empire policy regarding the air, defence and security; they were opposed to decisions being taken on these matters without their being consulted, and they pleaded for an empire war cabinet.

Where do we stand in connection with civil aviation to-day? Nearly one year ago the university of Toronto established a chair of civil aviation. But the classes are slow in coming in. That university has contributed in war much in men, leadership and money. Many of the young men who have come from that great university were young engineers from your constituency, Mr. Chairman. But we have the statement of Professor Lowden that since the announcement of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite on civil aviation the young men are not coming into the classes. After all is said and done, who saved civilization in the darkest days of 1940 when Russia had a treaty with Germany? It was the young men of Britain who fought in the air. Russia after that was attacked by Germany and has made a glorious contribution to the winning of the war. The United States was brought into this war by being attacked at Pearl Harbor. But the election of 1940 in the United States was fought and won on the issue of complete isolation. This aviation policy of the government is a straight Washington policy, pure and simple. In the election of 1940 in the United States the fight was won on the issue of going back to the policy of George Washington and Andrew Jackson of not taking part in foreign wars unless America was invaded, and the people voted in 1940, "no part in the war". But then came Pearl Harbor, and the United States has proved a glorious ally of ours since then and has helped to save civilization. But who saved civilization in the darkest days of the war? It was Britain, who stood alone for two and a half years with the exception of aid from her dominions, and those dominions gave that aid while still retaining their status of autonomy and sovereignty.

The British dominions in the last war sent a million men to the front, men who went of their own free will and fought by the side of the mother country in the same cause, which became the cause of all. One hundred thousand fell in the fight. By that action the whole history of the world was changed. The very same thing is happening in this war. From the ends of the earth, from cape and island and continent, the sons of the empire rushed to the side of Britain. It was those glorious young men who fought at Dunkirk and Dieppe who saved civilization and rewrote the history of courage so gloriously. They went up in the air by night and by day, for twenty-four hours a day, and we owe our very existence as a people to these young men. While they are away, are we, behind their backs, going to make such a policy as this? I have had letters from many of them and I know that many of them will be looking for work when they return. Many of them will want to take up aviation as a civil career, and work of this kind will have to be provided for them. In the last war some 16,000 to 18,000 air mechanics in the Royal Air Force were trained in Toronto. Many of them afterwards went to the United States. In the United States many of the young men who had been given air training in Canada in the last war went into the manufacture of aeroplanes, with the result that the United States led the world in that field, and she got a large share of aircraft production under Chamberlain's rearmament air policy after Munich in 1938.

The minister and his deputy and other officials went over to England last May for a conference. I know that the minister nearly lost his life crossing the Atlantic in connection with this war. He has worked hard and I give him credit for it. I am not criticizing him personally. But I am fighting for a principle. One of the great mistakes that Canada has made since the outbreak of the war, one of the most fatal mistakes—and it was referred to in the debate yesterday in the British House of Commons—was that by our policy, land, sea and air, we are surrendering too much in military, political, economic and financial initiative to Washington. I stand by the principles that I supported last year in the debate on the address on March 28 and again on March 31. The C.C.F. have always been wrong about this war since it started and before. They were complete pacifists to begin with. They did not believe in the war when it started. You would think it was a political war so far as the C.C.F. is concerned, for Germany is hardly ever mentioned by them. The leader of that party referred to the fact that the two old parties were just Hitlerites. As I said to my hon. friend here the other day, everything seems to be fair in love, horse races, politics and sporting events. My friends of the C.C.F. say anything they like outside the house because they have no one to hold them in check there like you, Mr. Chairman, and Mr. Speaker who act here as referees, together with the learned clerk of the house, and long may he continue. We are under some restraint in what we say here, although no libel laws apply to what is said in the House of Commons.

But as Mr. Churchill said to-day in the British House of Commons, the war is the primary thing that should occupy our attention, and it is far from won yet on land, sea and in the air. Although these domestic matters are of vast importance, the primary thing is the war and its winning.

I believe that this policy of the minister should go for study by a committee of this house. A committee of this house was sitting the other day for a day on the T.C.A. I cannot refer to its proceedings because it has not yet presented its report. I read the questions asked and answers given the other day before the committee, and I venture to say that if the information elicited there represents all that we know about aviation in Canada there is not much hope for this country. Nothing was done to study aviation but there was a good deal of bouquet-tossing at the Trans-Canada. One would think from the committee dialogues that they had discovered America as well as Charlie McCarthy. I suggest that this matter should go to a select committee of the house where the policy could be considered from every angle. Is this policy to be decided here without full consideration, with a conference of Prime Ministers in the offing? I say no. If it is, the Prime Ministers might just as well not meet.

Civil aviation will hold the empire together more than anything else that has been done in the past, and this is the time to recapture the spirit of empire. Unless we recapture that spirit before the war is over, that spirit will go into liquidation. The policy of the government in regard to civil aviation is a small-nation policy; that is all it is. It is a narrow nationalist, anti-empire, anti-Canada, pro-Washington policy. It is a policy that overlooks all that has been fought for in this empire of ours in the two wars to which I have referred.

The hon. member for Parry Sound last night referred to the proceedings in London. That is all right. They had a nice time over there in and around London with the heads of all the countries in the world. They assembled there, made some investigations and had an opportunity of discussing certain matters, but in my opinion it was purely exploratory. Nothing much was decided and indeed nothing could be decided, apart from press interviews with Lord Beaverbrook and one or two others. In the British House of Commons Mr. Shinwell, a labour member of parliament for Shoreham, made a statement last week with regard to these matters generally. He wondered if the policy with regard to civil aviation was not a poor-relations' status policy, and he declared that consultations between the British government and the representatives of the United States on these matters were causing people to ask what arrangements had been made for the future of the country. He said that parliament had never been consulted. Lord Beaverbrook had made certain concessions to America on the question of civil aviation, but parliament, he said, had not been consulted and there were rumours that a commercial monetary agreement was likely to be reached. He added that the empire would become an economic vassal of the United States and that the future economic policy would be determined by that country.

I am as strong as anyone in this house for Anglo-American relations. I know we all admire the Americans for what they have done for us and for the civilization of the world. We admire their wonderful president, and all that. But we are living in a different world to-day. Conditions are not the same as in the past. I submit, therefore, that it should be the policy of this government first to make some exploratory arrangement or consultation with Washington so that we might come to a better understanding with the United States. The more we understand them, the more likely we shall be to like them, and the more likely it will be that we shall be able to appreciate our differences and remove them when we have a proper knowledge of the facts.

In my opinion we have not had anything like a wise policy in international affairs. The policy of the government fails entirely to realize that the air arm of the future should be considered in relation to the purposes of peace time. Civil aviation up to the time of the war was regarded as merely an adjunct to land transportation. In the future, travel will be reserved largely for speed. Fast-travelling aircraft will be needed to carry passengers and some perishable goods as well as samples for securing commercial orders, and air transport will function almost exclusively as a means of rapid transit. I have no desire to see us enter into competition with any of our allies, and by that I mean competition that can be avoided.

Canada was asleep in the period between the two wars. Our government failed to see what the United States was doing in civil aviation in the way of research and so on. In other words, America has been right all along and we have been wrong. The people in Canada and our empire who have been using the air for commercial purposes cannot be blamed if they have thought of the future in commercial terms, but I see no reason why this country should be asleep at the switch again. We should prepare for the technical development that is bound to come in the future and be ready to provide a better transport service for the public.

Will the government's plan take this broad outlook? I say no. Civil aviation before the war was neglected by the government. It was fostered only by private initiative. Private enterprise built it up in the face of many obstacles which were unnecessarily put in its way in the period between the two wars —obstacles that were created by this house, by methods of control, heavy taxation and so on. We have never had a foreign or empire policy on this question. We have never had any really practical policy which would co-ordinate affairs from the point of view of domestic, imperial and international circumstances.

The policy which the government has announced will never be carried into operation in view of the coming conference and the pending election. I submit that civil aviation should never become a political question. It is in no sense a political question, and for that reason all parties should get together and first settle our domestic problem to find out what is the best thing to be done. Do you mean to say that all that the Canadian Pacific Air Lines have done, all that has been built up by the railways on land and sea and in the air to promote the interests of the empire, all the services that have proved so valuable in transporting food and munitions in this war, must now be discarded and go into liquidation? Must it all be thrown to the winds of the heavens?

What has become of the sacred doctrine of Liberalism, "vested rights" and all that sort of thing? We made a great mistake before the war in 1937 and 1938. Let us not repeat that mistake. When this house was told that war was coming, what did we do? We had certain regulations in connection with the board of transport commissioners, previously known as the board of railway commissioners, and notwithstanding the Transport Act of 1937, ships of the merchant marine, ships of the Princess type, were sold at ridiculously low figures. A ship called after me, costing $1,700,000, was sunk by the Germans a few days after the Athenia, and cargo ships of eight and nine thousand tons were sold for forty, fifty and sixty thousand dollars by the present government, notwithstanding that a war was obviously coming and that Britain had a considerably reduced tonnage as compared with her tonnage in the last war. That I say was a great mistake. Where were the regulations then? We are supposed to have regulations by a transport board in regard to ships, railways and telegraph and telephone lines, but I fail to see any evidence of their application or any attempt at regulation, nor will any aviation transport board do a thing to regulate.

The policy of the government is wrong for three reasons. They should settle Canada's domestic policy first and then move up to the empire civil aviation plan. The lifeline has been thrown out to us by Mr. Curtin of Australia and Mr. Fraser of New Zealand. When the domestic affairs are settled the empire scheme could be then settled. The empire is gone unless we have a proper civil aviation policy. When you settle your empire policy you have something to go on in the next step internationally. In the result neither Russia nor the United States will have anything to do with this international policy. The government made this policy without considering one important fact, namely, that there is an Anglo-Soviet treaty which was signed and sealed at Moscow last year by Mr. Churchill and the head of that great country, Russia. What for? According to the text of that treaty the dominions are not a party to it. It deals with some of these very questions. Russia made an agreement with the mother country. It is not a small nation policy, far from it. The policy provides that England shall be at one end of Europe and Russia at the other end to act together as policemen of the seas and on the land for the security of the whole world. There is an example of power politics with our ally Russia, and the British are going to make another one with the United States for protection.

In view of these things, how does the policy of the government fit in with the Anglo-Soviet treaty? We do not fit in at all. It is all very well for us to think we are a nation and that kind of thing. That policy is just a small nation policy. Unless the dominions hang together—none of them is able to go it alone—they will all hang separately. We shall be a junior partner, and a junior partner in a concern has to make concessions and accept them. He has to give all he has or get out. Unless the dominions hang together they will hang separately, and they will not have much to say in the peace conference. Britain without the dominions will only be a second-class power. The whole policy of the government is wrong. It does not commend itself to the judgment or wisdom of the country. As to regulation of the railways I have very little confidence in them.

I shall touch on one or two matters and I shall conclude in five or six minutes. I wish to say in all sincerity to the minister that I believe he is making a fatal mistake in the attitude he has taken with regard to the Douglas DC-4 in selecting it as the plane for civil aviation in the dominion. I think he is making a mistake. I pointed this out on two or three previous occasions. We are behind in research for a more modern plane. What is science going to do to the industry of civil aviation in the years that lie ahead? We have seen what was done after the great Schneider races, financed in 1931 when the government would not do that much for Britain even in civil aviation. Those races were financed by Lady Houston and magnificient planes came out of the discoveries that were made at that time.

The improvements that science brought about at that time saved Britain in the battle of London. Science should be explored more than it has been by this Canadian department. Science has made a real contribution. Let us look at what science did in the years to which I have referred. The glorious history of science in every generation has been magnificent. Take the history of science in medicine and compare it with what science has contributed to this industry, notwithstanding the tens of millions of dollars that this country has spent in that line. Yet so impressive, so far-reaching are those achievements as not merely to silence all criticism but to arouse a noble enthusiasm. At Lent, Mr. W. MacNeil Dixon, the great scholar in Gifford lectures in the university of Glasgow, comparing medicine with the modern needs, in view of the battle of Britain, of science as applied to civil aviation, said that the accomplishments were so impressive and far-reaching as not merely to silence all criticism, but to arouse a noble enthusiasm and enlist in the cause of humanity a legion of recruits, missionaries of her gospel. Take modern medicine alone, which he compares with civil aviation. He stated that medicine is the child of science, the most promising and brightest-eyed of her family. If it has not mastered, it has so diminished as to rob bodily pain of its terrors. Plagues and pestilences have been stayed; a multitude of diseases, diphtheria, rabies, smallpox, typhus, yellow fever, Maltese fever, to mention only a few, were almost exterminated. Great scourge ridden tracts of the earth's surface have been rendered habitable, food values understood, vaccines and anti-toxins discovered, antiseptic surgery so established as to open up new fields of remedial agency, ailments of the mind as well as of the body controlled and relieved. This is a record, indeed, to which no previous age in history can produce a parallel. Within a century the expectation of life in all civilized countries has amazingly increased—in our own by sixteen years; in Denmark by seventeen; in parts of America, by fifteen. Give to man and to his science their due. Who can be blind to such facts or deaf to their eloquence?

That there have been accompanying disadvantages cannot be denied. All goods are associated with evils, and nature will not let us rest. A static world is not, never was and never will be. There have been revolutions in the past, there will be revolutions hereafter, in the world of thought as in the world of events. We must expect the sudden and unpredictable. You may desire a stabilized system, an international agreement to keep things much as they are in respect of national boundaries, and international treaties, material advantages in wealth, air, coal, oil, trade facilities. It will not be given you. For all your entreaties and agreements, the world will not cease to revolve. Nature is no friend of stagnation. Parliaments change; economic conditions change; birth rates rise and fall; labour is cheap here and dear there; a new invention, a new commodity is in demand, and cities spring up to meet it. Factories are built; uninhabited areas become crowded; peoples migrate; once populous districts are deserted. The seats of ancient empires are lost in the desert or the jungle.

We have made practically no discoveries. Take the policy of the government with regard to the Lancaster. My leader is absolutely right about that, and so is Mr. Drew, the premier of Ontario. The Lancaster is not merely a war machine. It can be changed by design, research and equipment. Four to six seats can be placed in it and all that kind of thing. That is where we are, I believe, failing. It is said that the Douglas is more suitable. I read the debate in the British House of Commons on this very question. It was said there by men who have flown in the air and in all the theatres of war that the Lancaster is a good machine, and could, by research, be fitted for civil aviation. Their remarks bore out what was said by the gentleman to whom I referred. We are in need of modern research so that we could use the planes to which reference was made.

We are far behind the times. Reference was made to the Boeing plane. Mr. Johnston, once with the Trans-Canada Air Lines, was president. I have nothing against Mr. Symington. He is an old friend of mine and has been since he was at the university of Toronto; but he is on the wrong side of the fence at this time. He has always been a private ownership man, and one cannot serve two masters at a time like this. That is one of the mistakes that have been made in selecting men for the Trans-Canada Air Lines. That company should be organized from top to bottom and somebody who is a supporter of public ownership put at the head, if we are to have real public ownership. The head is the important man. In the T.C.A. we are getting the same kind of public ownership that we got years ago in the Canadian National Railways between the two wars. I could give the list of companies with which he is associated. I have them here but I shall not refer to them. The whole T.C.A. system should be reorganized from top to bottom and a different man should be at the head.

When our young men come home they will be looking for jobs. You talk about this famous bank, the industrial development bank. That will be a bank to lend money without any security. I am surprised that some of the Scotch members of the committee adopted a policy like that. I am surprised at some of the Scotch members falling for a policy like that, lending money without security, even for feeder lines in civil aviation. I look upon a Scotsman as only an improved Irishman, and I am very much surprised at the Scotch members of the committee adopting such a policy. I read the proceedings of the committee from the point of view of a public ownership man, because I have been an advocate of public ownership and have never deviated from that position.

The present T.C.A. monopoly policy is all wrong. We shall just be putting a lot of yes men in here who will agree to everything the government says about civil aviation, and so far as this phase of their policy on civil aviation is concerned the British empire might just as well disband immediately, if we are to have isolationism and separatism; whereas, by encouraging the empire conference method, by adopting the aeroplane instead of the cable as a means of commonwealth consultation. We could draw the empire more closely together.

Mr. BENCE: I do not want to make a speech. This matter has been canvassed and recanvassed and canvassed again during the course of the debate, and most of the important points have, I think been completely covered. However, there are one or two questions I should like to ask the minister, particularly with respect to some of the answers he gave last night, which I do not think are completely adequate.

First, I put this to the minister. This convention is being passed under the provisions of one of the items of the estimates, and included in his statement is the following, as reported in Hansard, page 1580:

> Our representatives in the international discussions, therefore, will be authorized to support or initiate such proposals as, in the government's opinion, will be likely to result in the establishment of an international air transport authority. . . .

What I wish to know is this: when this matter is concluded and the item is passed, does the minister feel that that is tantamount to an agreement by this House of Commons with respect to the policy set forth in the statement and with respect to the suggested convention, as being matters of policy and as being a matter of a convention with which we as one nation should approach the other nations in the discussion of these proposals? If that is the case, he should take us more completely into his confidence than he has done so far. If we as a House of Commons are expected to pass on these things and come to an agreement upon them, surely we should be taken into his confidence to the extent of knowing as much about it as he does.

Reference was made last evening to the fact that in the latter part of the statement of March 17 there is an allusion to the press statement issued by Lord Beaverbrook at the close of the conference last October. According to Hansard, page 1580, the minister said:

> Lord Beaverbrook emphasized the unanimous agreement which the conference had reached on every issue presented to it. He said that those issues were "adequate for testing immediate opinion in relation to civil aviation."

It seems to me that if we are asked to pass on this thing we should be advised as to what those issues were; they should be set down seriatim, if necessary, so that we can come to a conclusion in our own minds as to what field was canvassed in the discussions and what items were not discussed. In addition, we should be advised as to the attitude which was taken by us and the information which was obtained by the minister at the conference which he held a short time ago with Mr. Burrell, assistant secretary of state of the United States, prior to Mr. Burrell's departure for England, when he entered into discussions with Lord Beaverbrook. We need to know these things if we are expected to come to a conclusion, particularly in that connection.

The hon. member for Lake Centre was inquiring last evening of the minister with reference to the matter of an empire set-up, and the most the minister was prepared to say was that there was a discussion of routes between empire countries and that routes between empire countries are wholly consistent with the principles which are laid down in the discussion of international aviation. What I should like to know is whether or not—incidental, if you like, to this discussion which took place in Great Britain last fall—the minister considered with the other members of the commonwealth the setting up of an immediate empire system which could be dove-tailed into an international set-up; because, as I see it, there may be a great deal of difficulty and it may take a very considerable time to establish an international set-up, whereas we might easily and rapidly come to a conclusion as far as the empire is concerned, and might set up as preliminary to the international organization an empire scheme which would give service within the empire countries. I do not suggest for a minute any scheme which would be opposed to an international arrangement, but it seems to me that grave consideration should be given to this matter I have mentioned, because it is obvious that before we can come to a conclusion on an international scale much time will be occupied and, perhaps, many difficulties encountered.

Lord Beaverbrook, who was one of the leading members of the conference last fall, and has been delegated by the British government to speak on behalf of the government in connection with these deliberations, made reference to the empire in a statement he made last January, which gives an indication that an empire set-up must be in his mind, as incidental to an international set-up, because obviously the international organization was also within his mind if, as was said, the commonwealth had come to conclusion on every issue which had been presented to it, for one of the issues was an international set-up. On January 20, according to the Canadian press, Lord Beaverbrook said:

> Our empire can be made to yield to the new science of transportation over the sea and through the air. I hope we shall make good use of our opportunities. We did not in the past.

From that I conclude he must have had in his mind some kind of empire proposals, possibly along the lines which I have suggested.

The other questions I should like to ask are these: I do not recall that they have been referred to in the discussion so far. First of all, I am curious to find out how it was that the scheme proposed by Canada became public property so long before it was presented to the Canadian House of Commons, and what steps have been taken to ensure that such an important thing as this shall not occur in the future.

In connection with the domestic issue, I was intrigued by the statement of the minister that Canadian Pacific Air Lines had been able to obtain planes and equipment which other air transport companies had not been able to procure. It was, I think, in connection with the routes in the Pacific northwest, and was obtained as a result of the fact that the company was collaborating with the United States in that field. What I am interested in in that connection—and it is merely incidental—is why the minister was so concerned about the fact that Canadian Pacific Air Lines were able to obtain these machines. Did the fact that they did so prevent the Trans-Canada Air Lines from obtaining them; and if not, what possible complaint can he have in the fact that the company was so enterprising and energetic as to be able to obtain planes which could give service, and good service to this country?

Mr. KNOWLES: Does the minister wish to reply?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. I might say that the item which the committee is discussing, and which I hope will be passed, is an item for the operation and maintenance of municipal airports, involving a sum of $398,260. This discussion is taking place on the estimates of the air services branch of the Department of Transport, but the question being discussed is the policy of the government on aviation. Hon. members opposite asked the government to place on record its air policy. The government did so, and an opportunity is being given for discussion of that subject now, but there is nothing before the committee having to do with the government's air policy. These are war estimates of the Department of Transport, and not even civil estimates; but by agreement we are discussing post-war civil aviation. The discussion has been helpful. I can assure my hon. friend that he is making neither commitments nor entangling alliances at the present time. Much water must go over the dam before any agreements can be obtained. The government has put on record its desires in the field of international aviation. I think no one would be more surprised than the government if its programme were accepted in toto by all the united nations which will wish to join in carrying on civil aviation in the international field. Nevertheless the government has put its plan on record and for discussion before hon. members. We welcome discussion.

Then, I was asked whether an international agreement of the type discussed interfered with Canada's sovereignty of the air within Canada. The answer is that it would not interfere in any way. No foreign aircraft could carry traffic between one point in Canada and another point in Canada. That comes under the principle of cabotage, and is expressly prohibited by the terms of the draft agreement. Then, flying between points in Canada and points in the United States is reserved for bilateral agreement. The reason is, as I said earlier, that such lines are merely extensions of domestic air lines, and it is felt that bringing such problems under an international board would be less satisfactory than direct dealing. I believe that answers the questions the hon. member asked.

Mr. BENCE: I asked whether the administration had considered, in view of the difficulties which would probably arise under an international agreement, the setting up of an empire agreement, so that we could get some kind of air route into effect, with a certain amount of expedition.

Mr. HOWE: Expedition is not needed. Air routes are being flown everywhere, as military operations.

Mr. BENCE: I mean after the war.

Mr. HOWE: After the war there will be need for international air routes. So far as empire routes are concerned, no extended agreement will be required. I believe there will be no great difficulty in flying from Canada to Great Britain, or from Great Britain to British possessions in the middle east, thence to Australia, and from Australia to Canada. It so happens it is not necessary to leave British territory to make that route, so that there could be no great problem involved. But all countries are concerned in a broader application of international aviation principles, in order that routes must not necessarily be confined within an empire family, or within empire possessions. That is the problem being discussed here. If the problem were the simple one of travelling from one empire country to another, I do not think there would be any great need of discussion in the house. It would be quite simple.

Mr. BENCE: But it would require some planning, would it not?

Mr. HOWE: What would be required? If each country had a strong aviation service, with suitable aircraft, the rest would be quite simple.

Mr. BENCE: It would be a question, for example, of what British aircraft would fly across the Atlantic, whether there would be a duplication of aircraft across Canada, which of them would fly from Canada to Australia, and so on. That is the sort of thing I have in mind, and I wanted to know whether that was deliberated upon.

Mr. HOWE: That would be a very simple problem to work out.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to ask the minister one or two questions about the airport at Winnipeg. Before doing so, however, there are two or three comments I should like to make because of some of the things which have been said in this debate—one which, by the way, has now become quite extended. In that connection, however, we should not be dismayed, because after all, this is a very important subject.

I should like to make this comment, that if it were not for the tremendous losses which would be involved, both to the individuals concerned and to the country as a whole, I believe it would be a good idea to let those who want a free rein for private enterprise in respect of civil aviation have it for a little while, just to see what would happen. If private enterprise in civil aviation were really carried out, it would involve private firms building airways and airports, and providing all the meterological and other services the government is now providing. It would involve the maintenance of all these services at private expense. Then, if we had private enterprise, in the strict sense of the word, we would have to permit any number of individuals to operate any number of firms, until they had cut each other's thorats, and denied the country the advantages of a planned civil aviation policy.

I thought the hon. member for St. Paul's gave the case away the other day when, in criticizing the minister for talking about a large number of individual firms which would operate after the boys came home, he said in effect that it would be ridiculous, and that it would be far better to let the Canadian Pacific Air Lines give jobs to those boys. The contention was that this would be better for returning R.C.A.F. personnel. In other words, the hon. member for St. Paul's was pointing out that in this day and age, when one talks about private enterprise he is really asking for private monopoly.

Another discussion has crept into this debate, one concerning which I should like to make one or two comments. But first, before turning to that—

The CHAIRMAN: It was understood that on one item in this war appropriation measure we should have a general discussion of civil aviation. I believe this is now the sixth day we have been discussing the items of this department, and in my opinion we should now come to a discussion of the items. I give that thought to hon. members.

Mr. KNOWLES: I shall be as brief as I can. However, the discussion has roamed literally all over the world, and in view of some statements which have been made which, by the way, have been in reply to contentions from this group, I think I should have an opportunity of replying briefly.

The statement has been made in defence of private enterprise in the air that the country would have suffered greatly had it not been for private enterprise in railway development, and in that regard the Canadian Pacific Railway has been mentioned specifically. There again I would remind the committee that the same thing applied as now applies to aviation, namely, that it was not private enterprise by itself that accomplished all this development. It was accomplished through tremendous public subsidy and public assistance.

Also, in this whole question of international aviation there has come into the debate what one might refer to as a question of—

The CHAIRMAN: I must say, as I said before, that I do not deny the right to anyone to make a statement. But surely we have reached the stage in this committee when we should try to bring the discussion within the orbit of the item before the committee. There was an understanding, I believe, on the part of all groups in the committee that on the first item of the war appropriations we would have a general discussion. We have often been criticized, and I suppose I shall have to accept part of the blame, for tedious repetition, in not applying the rules of the committee in our discussions.

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps I can speak on your ruling, Mr. Chairman. Early in the debate it was agreed that there would be a full discussion on the government's statement on civil aviation on some item. Part 2 of item 3, civil aviation: operation and maintenance of municipal (terminal) airports, has been chosen as the item under which that discussion will take place. Since the discussion has been carried on for two or three sittings, I would suggest that it be concluded with ample latitude so that the general discussion on civil aviation can be completed.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, germane to the whole question of international civil aviation is the question of the propriety of a country like Canada delegating authority in this matter to an international body. That principle has been attacked and opposed in the house, and I regret that such attack has been made. I should like to state briefly our position which is in keeping with the principles of democratic government. Under that type of government we delegate certain authority to responsible bodies. In the provinces it is impossible for the population to get together and decide at a mass meeting as to what laws shall prevail. Therefore, the people of the province elect a government and delegate authority to that government. So long as the principle is maintained that in due course the government must go back to the people for endorsement or for replacement, you have a practical working out of the idea of democratic government.

We have the same thing in the federal field. It would be utterly impossible for Canada's 11,500,000 people to get together at a mass meeting in order to govern themselves. We want to govern ourselves, and accordingly during the process of time we have worked out a policy of electing certain citizens of the country as our representatives in parliament. We delegate to those people for the period of time that they are our representatives authority to direct the affairs of the people as a whole. There is nothing autocratic or dictatorial about that; it is just plain, ordinary common sense. It is democracy; it is being practical.

Some of us feel quite definitely that the time has come when that sort of thing should be extended to the world as a whole. I cannot help deploring—I hope I am a gentleman in doing so—the opposition there is to this idea on the ground that it is building up a dictatorship. When we attempt to carry this principle into world affairs we are trying to avoid having what I referred to last night, international anarchy. So long as the international council or authority which we set up and to which we delegate authority and power is responsible to the governments which have set it up, there will be nothing dictatorial or autocratic about it. That is what we must do if we want to make progress in this world which has literally become very small.

I wish to affirm again my pleasure that some steps are being taken, that some concrete accomplishments are emerging which indicate that it is possible for the peoples of the world, through their various governments, to get together to discuss the possibilities of a government wider than a government on a national scale. I maintain that we should be practical when we discuss this kind of thing. There is no use in setting up bodies that merely meet together and talk. You must have an authority which will be able to carry out the wishes of the people they represent. That is why we in this group strongly supported the bill in connection with UNRRA; that is why we in this group were not hesitant to give our support to the government's attempt to throw into the pool of world thought some plan for the international control of international aviation.

I suppose, having said that, it would seem to add weight to the charges that have been hurled at the government from the left and right of us that they are trying to usurp the C.C.F. position in this matter. If they are trying to do that we can only congratulate them, but I should like to say to the minister that since March 17 I have had a feeling that he has receded from, shall I say, the C.C.F. position, which he took at that time. Neither he nor the government can trade for all time on the fact that he made a good statement on March 17. What we are interested in and what we believe the people of this country are interested in is what the government is going to do in connection with the policy announced in that statement.

Perhaps I should be specific and state what I mean when I say that the minister has retreated from the forceful and aggressive stand he took on March 17.

Mr. GRAYDON: He has seen the light.

Mr. KNOWLES: He has been under a great deal of pressure since then from hon. members sitting on our left and on our right. His own back benchers have not had an opportunity to get into the debate.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: We have not had a chance.

Mr. KNOWLES: I said it first. The only support he has had has been from this group. I felt that the minister was fairly definite on that occasion as to what was going to happen to Canadian Pacific Air Lines. I took it from the speech of the minister that we could anticipate during this session of parliament the legislation setting up an air transport board along the lines referred to in his speech and also legislation providing for the divesting by the Canadian Pacific Railway within a year after the end of hostilities of their air line properties. Yesterday I asked the minister whether we could expect such legislation, and all he could say was that there would be legislation setting up an air transport board. What has happened to the rest of the aggressive policy in the domestic field announced on March 17?

Mr. HOWE: What did I say after that? I said we had better wait until we had seen the bill.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is exactly what the minister said.

Mr. HOWE: Why not do that?

Mr. KNOWLES: That is not the forceful, aggressive position the minister took on March 17. If he is now giving me some hope that he is coming back to the C.C.F. position he took on March 17, I shall be glad to wait.

On the other hand, I suppose the minister will have to be forgiven for the many qualifying remarks he has made with respect to the government's proposal for an international air transport authority. The policy has been under attack from our right and our left. I quite realize that the minister's reply that there has been no commitment is true, and he has also indicated that any changes can be made. He has taken credit that at least a policy has been given to the house for the full discussion we have had, although he admitted when he first tabled the document that one reason for doing so was that it had already been made public in another country.

As I indicated earlier, I have studied the document closely and I find many flaws in the policy, some of which I have already indicated to the committee. But as I have said before, I feel it is a good thing that some thought is being given to this matter. Instead of the minister making qualifying statements, I would rather see him taking an attitude indicating an aggressive desire on the part of the government to do all they possibly can to get something in the way of international direction of international civil aviation. It is a very important matter, and now that the debate is over and the minister has managed to answer all the arguments fired at him, I hope he will come back to the stronger position he took on the 17th of March, even if that does seem to entitle him to an honorary membership in the C.C.F.

Before I sit down, there are two or three questions which I rose particularly to ask. I think the minister will recognize that in all that I have said about this question of civil aviation, and indeed with respect to other matters of which I speak in this house, my concern is not a narrow or provincial one, because I think in terms of national policy and of things that affect the people as a whole. Therefore, I hope the minister will not impute any narrow provincial interest to me when I ask a question concerning the airport at Stevenson Field in the city of Winnipeg. As the minister knows, Winnipeg is almost certain to be a very important point on the world air map of the future. The people of Winnipeg are conscious of that and are keenly interested in anything that relates to the development and enlargement of their airport at Stevenson Field, which is under the jurisdiction of the St. James-Winnipeg Airport Commission. If that airport is to serve the airways of the future as it can, and we feel it must, it will require considerable enlargement. I have had the privilege of seeing diagrams which indicate the kind of extension that might take place, calling for doubling the length of the present runways. If that is to be done, some thought will have to be given to the purchasing of property adjoining the field on the east end and the south, and some property on the west where buildings are located. There is also an open area to the north which is separated from the present field by a branch line of one of the railways. Thus there are many matters that will have to be looked into if that airport is to be enlarged, and the people of Winnipeg and of Manitoba are interested in this matter, to which the St. James-Winnipeg Airport Commission have been giving a great deal of thought and study. I believe they are in fairly steady contact with the minister, and it would mean a good deal to the people of Manitoba if the minister would make a statement as to any plans which the government may have for enlarging the airport at Stevenson Field. I say again that I raise this question because I feel it to be of interest to the people not only of that area but of the whole country, because of the inevitable importance of Winnipeg on the air map of the future.

Mr. HOWE: There is no question of the importance of Winnipeg on the air map of the present. It is the operating centre of the Trans-Canada Air Lines and the major overhaul base for Trans-Canada Air Lines. Stevenson Field is a very important airport. Trans-Canada planes going from coast to coast all stop there, and as far as I know it is adequate for any possible use that can be made of it. The largest planes that are flying stop there from time to time en route from the United States to Alaska. If at any time it becomes inadequate for the class of plane using it, I am sure that steps will be taken to enlarge the airport, but no steps are contemplated at present. The department has been asked to indicate how the field could best be enlarged when the time comes, and a plan was drawn up indicating how the runways could be lengthened. That was done by the Department of Transport. There is no thought on the part of the government that any enlargement is now required. It is a first-class field in first-class condition, but if any time a larger field is required Stevenson's Field can and will be enlarged to meet such requirements.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I remind the minister of two questions which were asked by the member for Saskatoon City which have not yet been answered. One was in connection with the so-called leak, to use a common term, with respect to the publication in another country of the convention which the minister put on the record here on March 17. Prior to that time, as the minister well knows, the question was raised, if not in the house most certainly in the press, as to why the convention which the minister tabled had previously been made public in the United States. There was quite a bit of speculation about that matter, and finally the government placed the convention on the records of this house. I think the minister overlooked that question, which I think deserves an answer.

The other question asked by the hon. member was as to what report the minister can make with respect to what occurred at the conference held by the minister and Canadian officials with Mr. Berle of the United States which took place at Montreal.

Mr. HOWE: As far as the leak goes, no one knows how that occurred. The draft convention was prepared in Canada, was studied by the war committee of the cabinet, and was forwarded to the dominions office in the United Kingdom as a matter of information. That was the only circulation it had at the time. But a copy of it evidently came into the hands of an aviation daily, published in the United States. I have no opinion whatever as to the route by which the document came into the hands of that publication.

In reply to the second question as to what happened in the conversations with Mr. Berle and Mr. Warner, naturally I was a party to the conversations, and I cannot divulge any more than was released in the press statement mutually agreed upon. My hon. friend will understand that conversations of that kind are necessarily private, and that they were purely exploratory. We learned the views of the government of the United States; the government of the United States learned our views, and discussions were held in the direction of reconciling the views. That is all I can say.

Mr. GRAYDON: That I presume was an official conference between the officials of the civil aviation authorities in the United States and the civil aviation authorities here. I believe the minister said, in answer to a question of mine some time ago, that that conference between Berle and Warner and the minister and officials here was the counterpart of the conference held by Lord Beaverbrook with Berle during the last few weeks. I take it that this conference was the conference in which there was an exchange of views, an explanatory conference between Canada and the United States, and now there is the conference between Beaverbrook and Berle as representing Great Britain and the United States respectively. Then the previous conference in Great Britain between the minister and the United Kingdom officials was preparatory to that and these two that followed. I presume that is the sequence.

Mr. HOWE: I dislike the word "conference" in connection with any of them. They were described as conversations. The first was a conversation within the empire. These are conversations between the United States and two countries of the empire. I understand that the purpose is to have other discussions between other countries that will eventually be represented at a conference of all countries interested in world aviation.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the minister one other question arising out of that. Has a procedure been arrived at between Canada and the other countries whereby these agreements will be subsequently made between various countries with Canada? By way of clarification, perhaps I should say this. Canada is apparently the first nation in the world to publish what she is prepared to do in the international air field. Is it proposed that the United Kingdom, other parts of the commonwealth, and the United States, and perhaps the Union of the Soviet Socialist Republics, shall do likewise to their people and to the world and then finally agreements will be made, or is Canada going to be alone in her experiment of publishing what she is prepared to do, while the other nations take an entirely different course?

Mr. HOWE: How can I possibly know what Soviet Russia or Britain or the United States will do in that direction? I can only say what Canada has done. I have no idea whether the others intend to publish their views or not.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the minister this question, and it is important. The thing that concerned me when the publication was made was simply this—and I may be assuming too much. I wondered why Canada should be the first to make public what she is prepared to do. It is perhaps the first time that this has ever been done where international affairs are involved, and one reason why I asked the question was that I took it that this was agreed upon first at the empire conference in London. May I ask the minister this question —he shakes his head and negatives that suggestion. Then Canada, in making public her position and what she was prepared to do in the field of international civil aviation, did so without consultation or approval or consent of either the United States or Great Britain or any part of the commonwealth. I do not want the minister to take that as indicating that there was any disagreement, but in any event Canada acted on her own.

Mr. HOWE: Yes. I am surprised at the attitude now being taken. The hon. member for Lake Centre was demanding the government's policy on aviation. Now great surprise is expressed that we did bring down government policy in detail.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: We have not found it out entirely yet.

Mr. HOWE: There is nothing strange about it. Canada prepared a policy for civil aviation, prepared as nothing but a Canadian proposal. It was prepared with the knowledge of the views of certain other countries, but was wholly Canadian. Canada could do what it liked with its policy. It did, as a matter of fact, place it on the Hansard of the Canadian parliament. There may be two schools of thought on that. Was that a good thing to do, or was it a bad thing? There can be two opinions on that, but it has been done, and knowing the interest it has created in all countries which are interested in aviation, perhaps it was a good thing to do. That would be my opinion at the moment.

Mr. GRAYDON: I should like to clear up this point with the minister. So far as getting the policy of Canada is concerned, I am quite certain that it was the proper thing for the government to enunciate its policy with respect to international civil aviation. We asked for it.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: We do not go back on that. All I am concerned about is this. Having done so, it seems to us that other nations perhaps might properly have done the same thing, to give us some idea of what they were proposing to do, as well as ourselves. I wish to ask the minister this question, and perhaps he may not want to answer it. Was the leak in the United States, which in part put on the public record what Canada was prepared to do, a factor in the publication of the policy of the government of Canada, or had the government the intention of making public to the nations of the world their policy first before other nations had agreed upon theirs?

Mr. HOWE: I think that is hardly a fair question. The leak occurred and the government published the full document. Whether they would have done so anyway I can hardly say definitely.

Mr. GRAYDON: Was there any discussion at any of these conferences with respect to other nations publishing what they are proposing to do in the international field?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister said that it was I who asked for the revelation of the government's policy in reference to aviation, and I have no apology for having taken that stand. What we have been endeavouring to do during the period the matter has been under discussion has been to ascertain what the government policy is; but in one or two matters, while we have received a considerable number of answers, many of them have been so equivocal as not to convey the information asked for. Before I ask certain other questions, in order to clear away a misapprehension created by two statements made by the minister, I should like to ask him the question whether the convention which was placed on Hansard on March 17 was prepared before the Beaverbrook conference or consultation or conversation, whatever is the proper description, or whether it was prepared after the consultations that took place among the nations of the empire.

Mr. HOWE: I think that is hardly a fair question.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. HOWE: What do you mean—was it typed before or typed after?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is the usual way the minister has of answering. Was it prepared before the Beaverbrook conference?

Mr. STIRLING: Was it born?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Was it born, the hon. member for Yale says, or was it conceived in the conference and born afterwards? That is what we are trying to find out, because it is very important that the committee—

Mr. HOWE: Suppose I say "yes" or "no." What difference does it make?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is not what the minister is here for.

[Mr. Graydon]

Mr. HOWE: What is the hon. member here for?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister is here to give us information in regard to this problem. It is material to know whether this convention was a convention representing Canada's viewpoint as presented to the Beaverbrook conference, or whether it was a convention based on the understandings arrived at, generally speaking, at the conference. I ask him the categorical question.

Mr. HOWE: I suggest to my hon. friend that he assume that it was, and that it was not, and then expound both situations and tell us where he arrives.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister's attitude is not the attitude of a minister endeavouring to give information on events. That appears to be a continuing attitude shown by the minister toward members of this house and toward the country as a whole. I am asking him the categorical question as to whether or not the convention presented to the Beaverbrook conference is Canada's attitude? I am asking the minister that question, for at one time during this discussion he made one statement indicating that the convention represented Canada's view and was available at the Beaverbrook conference; and at another time he indicated that it was the consensus of the ideas of the various nations of the empire. Surely we have the right to know which is correct, or whether he was misunderstood. I ask the minister, was that convention Canada's stand before the Beaverbrook conference, and was it presented there as Canada's stand?

Mr. HOWE: In other words, you want to know the details of a private international conversation.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: One knows the answer now, and the answer is that this convention was the stand that Canada took before the conference. I ask the minister to challenge that statement if it is not true. I now ask the minister this question: was or was not Canada definitely opposed in this conference to an empire set-up?

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend is building up the greatest piece of nonsense that I have ever heard in my life. I suggest he stop questioning me, make his speech and sit down, because I am not answering questions of that type.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is the attitude that the minister has repeatedly taken in this house toward questioners. He speaks of nonsense, grousers, yappers of the maritimes, et cetera. He endeavours to treat members of parliament the way he might treat those who are under him in corporations. That is not the attitude that begets cooperation.

Mr. HOWE: I am not looking for cooperation.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is perfectly reasonable to—

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend should understand that I am not looking for cooperation.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister says he is not looking for cooperation, but we are looking for information. The minister made a statement, and I am going to get answers to these questions which the people have a right to have answered. When I asked the minister this question in regard to an empire set-up last evening, he said:

> Few countries would wish to be a minority shareholder in an international air line.

He did not directly say that an empire scheme had not been considered, nor would he say what the attitude of Canada was. This matter is one of the most important matters to come before this committee in so far as the future of the empire is concerned, and the people of Canada have a right to know what stand the government has taken with regard to this matter, binding as it will be on the people of Canada. We often hear it said in the House of Commons that there should be no reference to the empire, no flag-waving, as they call it. This is what Mr. Churchill said to-day in the British House of Commons amid cheers:

> In a world of confusion and ruin the old flag flies.

Then he went on to point out the necessity for cooperation in this empire. One sometimes wonders whether we are arriving at a position in this country where it is not considered the proper thing to express pride in the empire and its future. To those I would answer that this is what Mr. Churchill said to-day in the British House of Commons:

> Methods must be devised without haste to bring the nations of the British empire into intimate and secret council on world events not only during this war—because that is being done with great labour and efficiency—but after the war so that they will know fully our position and we know theirs in regard to the march of events and action which might have to come from them.

We ask a minister of the crown what stand the government of Canada takes in reference to an empire scheme, and the answer is one of contemptuous words. This is a serious matter, Mr. Chairman. We have endeavoured to place our viewpoint before the country and before the government—

Mr. HOWE: Tell us your viewpoint in a very few words.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I asked a brief question and I did not get any answer. The question was perfectly pertinent. We endeavour to find out whether or not the government's attitude in this empire conference was one of cooperation after the war, and the answer we get is to the effect that—well, we are not going to be given an answer. We have a right to an unequivocal statement from the minister as to whether or not the matter of empire connections, future communications in the empire in a world-embracing air scheme were favoured or condemned by the representatives of the people of Canada at that conference. There must have been some discussion and yet we have no information on it. I find the following appearing in the Australia-New Zealand agreement of 1944:

> In the event of failure to obtain a satisfactory international agreement to establish and govern the use of international air trunk routes the two governments will support a system of air trunk routes controlled and operated by governments of the British commonwealth of nations under government ownership.

I ask the minister, what did take place in this regard at the Beaverbrook conference? Did Canada take a position different from that of Australia and New Zealand, the United Kingdom and South Africa? Did she oppose a set-up within the empire, not excluding the international set-up, which will be necessary? Did she take the attitude she would not participate in a system of inter-empire trunk lines? These are matters upon which we as representatives of the people of Canada have a right to receive information. We cannot force the minister to give the information. All we can do is, as representatives of the people of Canada, to ask him whether one stand or the other was taken before that conference. The press reported that Canada was opposed in certain particulars to the stand taken by other dominions.

Mr. HOWE: What press?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I referred to it last evening, and quoted it.

Mr. HOWE: What press? A United States journalist, was it not, writing from Washington?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I referred to it in detail last evening, and the minister heard what I had to say.

Mr. HOWE: Time magazine, was it not?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: If the minister could just refrain from interruptions! If he has a question to ask I will answer him, if I can.

Mr. HOWE: I was asking the hon. member what publication he was quoting from.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I gave the quotation last evening, and the authority, and there was no challenge from the minister.

Mr. HOWE: Give it again.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister was present then and I have not it before me at the moment, but the reference is in Hansard, and no doubt the minister knows it. I ask him this: Did Australia and New Zealand and South Africa and the United Kingdom ask for consideration of an empire scheme? Did the minister representing Canada refuse to cooperate in such a scheme?

Mr. HOWE: What did the press statement at the conference say? What did Lord Beaverbrook say?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Chairman, Lord Beaverbrook is not in this house. I am asking the minister in charge of the department.

Mr. HOWE: I will give the hon. member the same answer as he gave me. My remarks are on Hansard. I once said that if my hon. friend would read more and talk less he would be much more accurate.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: If the minister would refrain from statements which are so loose as to be equivocal, there would not be any difficulty in passing these estimates. I am asking the minister a question which he can answer unequivocally, and it will be accepted. But the people of Canada have a right to that answer; they have the right to know what attitude the government is taking in reference to this very important matter, which concerns the future of this empire; and I ask the minister to elucidate it, and give us an answer.

Mr. HOWE: Question.

An hon. MEMBER: Carried.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Macleod has the floor.

Mr. HANSELL: If the leader of the opposition is calling on the minister—

Mr. GRAYDON: I am, for the moment.

Mr. HANSELL: Very well; I yield.

Mr. GRAYDON: I want to say to the minister that I do not think he has been quite frank with the hon. member for Lake Centre.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. HOWE: Let me ask my hon. friend this question.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not want my hon. friend to get up while I am speaking.

Mr. HOWE: I merely want to ask him one question, which will save a great deal of time.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister is not to ask me a question, because I want to ask him a question. I want him to sit down, because, after all, I have the floor. There is no reason why the minister and I should be at cross-purposes.

Mr. HOWE: After the hon. member has spoken I have something to say, but I am in no hurry.

Mr. GRAYDON: This is another example of the attitude of a minister who said he did not want cooperation, and it is, in my opinion, one way in which it will be very difficult to get it. I am prepared to give the minister cooperation with respect to this matter, but I want him to answer frankly the questions which were propounded to him by the hon. member for Lake Centre. He sits in his seat and dodges the issue—if you want to put it in such terms as that—and then attempts to cross-examine those who are attempting to question him. That is not the way a minister should give information on these questions. It seemed to me, sitting here and listening to the debate which took place and the questioning of the minister, that there was not much reason why the minister could not give information to the hon. member for Lake Centre with respect to these very simple inquiries. As the minister knows, the hon. member asked what was the exact position of this government with respect to an inter-empire aviation scheme. Why should the public and the committee be left so delightfully in the dark, by the minister simply refusing to answer? The minister knows my feelings are kindly toward him in connection with the matter, as are those of the hon. member for Lake Centre, but we should like to have the information. It is not a question of putting the minister on the spot. That, I think, is a despicable thing to suggest. We should like to have the information, and I myself am going to ask, in support of what the hon. member for Lake Centre has said, that that information be given by the minister. If he refuses, that, of course, will be his responsibility.

Mr. HOWE: I might say to hon. gentlemen opposite that it is the custom in an international conference of official representatives of governments to unite on a statement of procedure which is agreed to by all governments, and published. It is then quite improper for any member of that conference to issue information about the conference which has not been agreed to by the other members. I would expect my hon. friend to know that. That is one other reason why we should like to see in the house his extra-mural leader, who is familiar with the practice of conferences. Perhaps I have given the reason why I cannot disclose the contents of an international conference beyond the point that those present agreed to disclose the information.

The CHAIRMAN: Is the item carried?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member for Macleod has the floor.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not want to interrupt the continuity of an argument.

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member takes his seat, he yields to the hon. member for Lake Centre.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not want to take a lot of time. I spoke on this matter once last night. Some hon. members have spoken on it several times. But just for a minute or two I should like to ask a question or two with respect to some remarks which were made last evening.

Yesterday afternoon the hon. member for Vegreville spoke in terms of a loyal British subject, and with respect to the present international air agreement indicated that he was alarmed lest some of the sovereign rights of the people of Canada should be sold out to some international body. I followed last evening and pursued a similar line with some additional remarks. When the Minister of Munitions and Supply answered our speeches he said something to the effect that the foreign policy of our party was like the old Conservative British imperialism. I do not know exactly what he means by that. I am not posing as a profound student of political history, but I know that embodied in the British crown are the great principles of freedom, justice, righteousness and equity, and it is British policy that wherever the British flag flies those principles should be adhered to.

Mr. GILLIS: But never have.

Mr. HANSELL: I admit, of course, that in the very weakened democracy and under the very weakened leadership of that democracy which we have had, a good many injustices have been done; nevertheless it is not the fault of those great principles for which the British empire stands. If by adhering to such principles as the love of freedom, justice, equity and righteousness we must be labelled with a tag called "British imperialist," we cannot help it. I have sent for the dictionary—by the way, a dictionary is a good thing to consult once in a while—and I find that "imperialism" means the rule of an emperor. I do not think any one will doubt we have a king. Then there is the further definition: "Extension of British empire where trade requires protection of the flag." It is a great British tradition, that wherever the flag flies there must be liberty and freedom of mankind. I ask the minister if he believes that? If he does, then, according to the dictionary, he must be an imperialist.

Mr. GRAYDON: He cannot be C.C.F., too.

Mr. HANSELL: The leader of the opposition may have something there. Then, with regard to "imperialist" the dictionary says, "Adhering to an emperor." I should like to know if the Minister of Munitions and Supply is adhering to the King of England, Great Britain and the Dominions beyond the seas?

The CHAIRMAN: The chair must rule against bringing into the discussion in the House of Commons the name of the king or any member of the royal family.

Mr. HANSELL: I did not think the rule applied to the mere mention of His Majesty. However, I do not need to go farther in that respect. I believe the minister is just as loyal to the crown as we are. I have no doubt about that, and I do not relish at all his flinging some term across the floor which is designed to discredit the Social Credit group, when we are only trying to be loyal to some of those great principles of British democracy. I shall not deal with that farther.

I cannot quite understand why there has been all the hurry in signing international agreements of this kind. It seems to me there must be some vying for position, while the world is in a turmoil. It would seem that somebody somewhere wants to get in on the ground floor. There is a war going on, and we do not know when peace will come, although we hope it may come soon. But the invasion of Europe is not even started, and it is anybody's guess when the war will end. It is also anybody's guess what kind of peace table we shall have, or whether we shall have a peace table. Yet, while the war is in this state, nations gather together and begin signing agreements with regard to post-war air routes.

We do not know what the outcome of the war will be, in all its details. We know, of course, that we are going to win, because we will fight until we do win. But we do not know what the alignment of nations will be after the war is over. Italy is on our side only because she is in process of being conquered. There was a time when she was not with us. There was a time, too, when Russia had an agreement with Germany, and that was at a time when we were fighting Germany. The alignment of nations has changed since then, and we do not know what changes will take place before ultimate peace comes to the earth. The whole picture may be changed.

Yet the Canadian government has to rush somewhere to bring about an agreement concerning which the people of Canada know very little. I do not wish to be too suspicious, but there is a feeling in Canada that there is something underlying these actions, and the way they are done. What difference would it have made, or what difference could it possibly make if this whole thing were deferred until peace comes, and the nations settle down to a better understanding? Would there be any harm in waiting until after the war? Would it alter our position at all?

Mr. HOWE: There will be an awkward situation at the end of the war, if no international agreement is in effect. The air lines of various nations are flying over the world to-day in a manner which is suitable in a time of war, but which would involve great difficulties in peace time. For instance, British Overseas Airways maintain a military service flying around the world, over a great many countries. For that service Great Britain has no peace-time air convention. The United States flies to almost every section of the world. Canada operates a war-time service across the Atlantic, for which it has no peace-time franchise. To sort out these various services, so as not to cut off air communication entirely, requires an elaborate system of agreements. I believe it is highly desirable that, if possible, a comprehensive agreement be evolved before the end of the war, or before the termination of war-time aviation agreements.

For example, aircraft flying across Canada are operating under a permit for the duration of the war, and six months thereafter. At the end of that time Canada will be hard put to it to deal with the situation, unless agreements have been arrived at. There seems to be the suggestion that this draft agreement is ready for signing. I suggest that it is a long way from that stage. Preliminary negotiations are in progress, and I think one would be very optimistic indeed if he believed that these negotiations would not extend over several months. I feel we are not starting too soon to discuss this very important problem.

Mr. GILLIS: I had really wished to ask the minister something respecting the future of present airports in the field of civil aviation. However, I have sat here for the past eight days and listened to this discussion, pro and con, and I have heard some members make almost the same speech on at least four different occasions. To-night I heard one man read into the record about forty minutes of talk that I have heard nine times since I came to this house—and it had very little bearing on the question before the committee.

When the hon. member for Macleod said last night that he was going to talk on something he knew nothing about, I believe what he said might be applied to practically everyone I have heard discuss this question, including myself. I shall not attempt to discuss the matter in all its details. However, I agree with the position taken by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, when he states that if we are to achieve the objectives for which we are fighting, then there must be some international understanding with those people we term our allies in the fighting of the war. I agree with the position taken by the minister in trying to arrive at some understanding as to the future of aviation. Anyone reading the press, for the past eighteen months particularly, must be aware that those who have been in favoured positions for the last fifty years, those who have held imperialistic views and have controlled the cartels which have controlled production throughout the world, those who have controlled the machine which has strangled the world for the past fifty years, that small group in Great Britain and the United States, that powerful group which has had a monopoly of everything in the past have been endeavouring to achieve the same monopolistic position in regard to our airways.

I think the minister was well advised to have this tentative agreement drafted in such a way as to attempt to protect the rights of the people of Canada. I think this is the first step that has been taken in connection with any industry to protect the future of the people of this country. An effort has been made to protect this industry from those who were slowly but surely getting hold of it. The Canadian Pacific Railway were quite prepared to take over all airports and meteorological services. The complete development was carried on by the government with the taxpayers' money; the job of organization was done and the job of exploitation was about to begin.

The hon. member for Macleod and others have expressed their own opinions, but I think they are confused when they believe that the rights of the people of Canada are being given away under this agreement. For the first time our rights are being protected. I hope the time has passed when somebody in the United States or Great Britain can draft an agreement and bring it to Canada and have it accepted. I think this agreement is a step in the right direction. I am not going to say that I will agree with the minister or the government as to the manner in which this is to be put into operation. I am sceptical of some of the people who are behind the scenes or who will be in responsible positions when the organization is completed.

The hon. member for Lake Centre quoted a statement made by Mr. Churchill in the British House of Commons to the effect that in the midst of a confused world the flag still flies. The world is not so confused to-day. For the first time in some time the road ahead is beginning to look somewhat clear. Lines are being sharpened. World imperialism plunged us into the war, but the picture is becoming clearer. The peoples of the world who have been reading and thinking and hoping for a break in monopolistic imperialism see a much clearer picture to-day. We are not disagreeing with the fact that the flag stands for many great principles, but those principles have never been implemented. If this group is given the opportunity we intend to see that the principles for which the flag stands are fully implemented, something that has not been done, at least in my lifetime.

In spite of all the confusion that seems to exist about the action that is to be taken, may I say to the minister that I think he is on the right road. He should stick to his guns. I hope he will be realistic in the national picture when it comes to taking complete control of aviation in the future and will give due regard to seeing that the men and women who are to carry out the administration of this policy do it in the interests of the Canadian people.

I should like to ask a question about the use that will be made of our airports in the future. Many of these airports were established by small community groups and the local people have some equity in them. Many of these fields were taken over for military purposes, although I do not know whether they were bought outright or leased. They have been greatly extended and are in a position to do an important job in future aviation. I am wondering what will happen to the equity which these local groups had in the air fields prior to their being taken over. Will these local groups be compensated for the investment they have made?

Mr. HOWE: The municipal air fields were leased to the Department of Transport for $1 a year, under an agreement which provides that the department would become responsible for the operation of the airports, and for any capital expenditures required to fit them for war purposes. The ownership of the airports still rests with the municipalities. Such extensions as have been made will revert to the municipalities when the present arrangement is cancelled, unless some other disposal is decided upon by agreement. The ownership has never been disturbed. I presume the leases will be brought to an end and the properties again operated by the municipalities. There is always the possibility that by agreement with a number of municipalities a different policy may be adopted, but at the moment nothing has been done toward that end.

Mr. STIRLING: If I understand him aright, the minister takes the position that since he was Canada's representative at a set of conversations in London last October, and since a press statement was issued at the end of those conversations, he cannot go behind that statement or amplify it. That would appear to me to be a perfectly tenable position. A statement was made in a responsible United States newspaper, which was referred to by the hon. member for Lake Centre, to the effect that Canada's position was said to have differed from that of England, New Zealand and Australia; that the mother country and those two dominions share a common view. Since that statement has been made we should like to know whether or not it is accurate. If the minister takes the view that because of the position he occupied he cannot go behind the statement which was issued, that is a tenable position and we must be content with that.

Mr. HOWE: May I say that the official statement of the conference as well as the statement made by Lord Beaverbrook in the House of Lords on behalf of the British government, would make it quite impossible that the statement referred to, which I understand is taken from a United States publication not greatly noted for being reliable—

Mr. STIRLING: Oh, yes; it is a Washington dispatch in the New York Times.

Mr. HOWE: I thought the hon. member said it was from Time. Nevertheless the New York Times was not represented at the conference, and those who prepared the press statement, and Lord Beaverbrook, were there. Therefore I think my hon. friend would be well advised to accept the official statement and the statement of Lord Beaverbrook.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister place on some phrases that he used the same interpretation that I did? I listened to these sentences when the minister uttered them and was not at all sure whether I got his meaning. At the bottom of page 2193 of Hansard of yesterday he said:

> Canada is active in that direction. It must be recognized that no group of small countries can have any great influence on the final outcome. I think we must question the wisdom of attempting to group the small countries together as a bloc to go into a conference of that kind.

When he made that statement I wondered whether that to a considerable extent explained the position which the government takes with regard to the empire attitude. Is he there referring to small countries, Canada being one of them, the other commonwealth nations of the empire being others, including the United Kingdom, and does he question the value of those nations coming together for discussions in the hope of arriving at a common policy? Does he question the wisdom of that being done on the eve of a consideration and conversations which will be undertaken by a far larger number than the nations of the commonwealth?

Mr. HOWE: What does my hon. friend think? If he will read back a little he will find that I was referring to a suggestion that came from his left, that Canada should join with other small countries. That had nothing to do with the empire. My hon. friend, I am sure, cannot be serious in suggesting that I considered Britain a small country or Canada a small country. I assume that this is a serious discussion, and I think my hon. friend should ask serious questions.

Mr. STIRLING: My question was most serious. I listened to the minister with great attention yesterday.

Mr. HOWE: I hope I have definitely cleared my hon. friend's mind on that point.

Mr. STIRLING: Right.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Were the possibilities of expansion into long runway airports taken into consideration when choosing the sites for the original airports in the commonwealth air training scheme when it was started in Canada?

Mr. HOWE: We thought of everything, yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Some of them will be rather queer long runways.

Item agreed to.

3. Civil aviation: Canadian government trans-atlantic air service, $400,000.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I would ask the minister with regard to the matter of the chosen instrument. He has told us in his statement that he and the government believe in a chosen instrument to operate the international air lines, and I presume they will be founded on the basis of the present trans-Atlantic air lines. Is it the government's intention to have transoceanic air lines operated on a round-the-world basis or on a regional basis?

Mr. HOWE: That is a difficult question. Would my hon. friend elucidate what he means by a round-the-world basis?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I mean a world basis. What is the basis of Canada's post-war international air service to be? Is it to be on a regional basis whereby Canada will operate air lines in only certain parts of the world, or is it to be on a world basis?

Mr. HOWE: If my hon. friend wants a categorical answer to his question I shall have to ask him to elucidate a little more. What does he mean by an aeroplane operating on a round-the-world basis and one operating on a regional basis?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, Mr. Chairman, all I have to say is this, that the Canadian government has decided on a system of the chosen instrument and intends to operate international air services. My question is are these international air services to be operated on a regional basis?

Mr. HOWE: Just what is a regional basis? Where do we go when on a regional basis?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Just a minute. This is one question on which I am going to get a categorical answer. Are these international air services to be operated on a regional basis whereby certain areas will be allocated to Canada under international agreement, or does Canada intend to operate air services in all parts of the world on a transoceanic system? Under present conditions the situation in Great Britain is that she has a chosen instrument. Canada has taken a stand in favour of that policy. The United States has not a chosen instrument policy. The importance of this question arises in connection with the question whether we in Canada can operate international air services on a transoceanic basis, whether we have the necessary ability to do it unless we operate within an empire or some other international system. I am endeavouring to ascertain from the minister what the plans are with respect to air transport on a world basis.

Mr. HOWE: I may be overoptimistic, but I think Canada has the ability to do whatever any other country can do. We are operating across the Atlantic at the present time. I do not know whether that is on a regional or on a round-the-world basis. I am still mystified by my hon. friend's terms. Would he say that across the Atlantic would be on a round-the-world or on a regional basis?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Facetiousness is never an answer, even from a minister.

Mr. HOWE: Really, I am not trying to be facetious. Regional is an odd expression. We expect to operate across the Atlantic and we hope to operate across other oceans.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Across the Pacific?

Mr. HOWE: We hope to, yes, and we hope to operate into the south Atlantic. I do not know whether such operations would be round-the-world or regional. Perhaps my hon. friend would know. Perhaps he will be satisfied with that explanation.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL WAR SERVICES

Departmental administration, $90,907.

Mr. MacINNIS: Is the minister going to follow the example of the other ministers and make a statement before there is a general discussion of the item?

The CHAIRMAN: I believe it is the feeling of the committee that there should be a general discussion first.

Hon. L. R. LaFLECHE (Minister of National War Services): The same question was put to me last year, and I then said that I did not intend to make a general statement but that I would give any information required as we came to the particular votes. The Department of National War Services is not organized to do any one particular thing but to do a considerable number of different things. I suggest to hon. members that they can obtain information more readily by dealing with each item separately. The item that you have just called, sir, is a normal item. It is slightly lower than it was last year. It is a few hundred dollars less than the equivalent vote for the fiscal year ending March 1, 1944.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Would the minister explain the increase of $5,000,000 under auxiliary services?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I shall be pleased to do so when we come to it. At the moment we are on the $90,000 item.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is administration?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not know whether the minister expects us to discuss the work of the department generally under this item or to take each item as we come to it. I think it would be more satisfactory if we had a discussion of the work of the department as we usually have at this particular stage. It is unfortunate that the minister is not prepared to make a general statement regarding the work of his department. Can he tell us just what the organization of the department is, how it is organized as compared with other new departments? It is a war department. Last year we did not get a general statement nor did we have a general discussion, and I would appreciate it if we knew what this department comprises, what its functions are, and if we could get some general information about it before going into the items.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Yes, but I would repeat that I had thought of doing this year as was done last year. I may remind the committee that lengthy statements about the department were made in previous years. During the last fiscal year the department has grown to some extent, there being now nearly 300 more employees in it than in the previous year.

Mr. COLDWELL: What is the total number of employees?

Mr. LaFLECHE: About 1,300. There are a number of departmental activities, and they are very well set out under the separate votes given in Hansard of February 11, 1944—War Charities Act, salvage, the civilian Canadian fire-fighters overseas, the committee on co-operation in Canadian citizenship, censorship with its subheadings, information and records branch, postal censorship, censorship of publications, telegraph and cable. There is an item here for the short-wave station of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation which is under construction at Sackville, New Brunswick. This is nothing new; it is merely to carry on.

Mr. GRAYDON: When does the minister expect that to be finished?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I replied to a question in the house about a month ago. The officials of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation then told me that the buildings would be completed next month as a matter of fact, in May, and also that they hoped to be able to use the new short-wave station at Sackville late in this coming fall. There had been a delay, but it was an anticipated delay, the trouble being in getting the required equipment from the manufacturers. The delay itself was caused by the difficulty in getting favourable priorities over other war requirements. On that point I am quite satisfied that the officials of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation have done excellent work in going after priorities. There will still be a delay of perhaps four months over the opening date as originally anticipated, or as anticipated last year at least. I think they have cut that by two or even three months. Then there is the national film board, and we have the women's voluntary services, the government economies control, and the next-of-kin of prisoners of war branch of my department. I am only too happy to meet the pleasure of hon. members in attempting to give information, but I shall take the liberty of saying again that I think the best way to get information concerning my department is to take it up by sections such as represented in Hansard, pages 397 and 398, because we deal with such a large variety of matters between which there is no possible similarity.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was going to ask the minister under which item the discussion will come in regard to educational services.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Under the next, auxiliary services. That is a large amount, $12,000,000.

Mr. COLDWELL: On Monday, or when we take this up again, perhaps the minister will be prepared to tell us something about the auxiliary educational services. I believe that this is one of the best things being done in connection with our war services at the present time, and I should be glad if the minister could give the committee a detailed story of what is being done in regard to both prisoners of war and our own young men overseas. It would be a good thing for the country and the house to get a complete picture.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I shall be pleased to do so, and I thank the hon. member for suggesting it. I think there is a nice story to tell.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, April 24, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

ALBERTA PROVINCIAL BANK

MOTION FOR REFERENCE TO STANDING ORDERS COMMITTEE OF PETITION FOR INCORPORATION

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): On Thursday last I made a motion respecting the incorporation of the Alberta Provincial Bank. The Prime Minister suggested that I allow it to stand until another day. I now beg leave to move once more, seconded by Mr. Jaques:

That,—

(1) The petition of Ernest C. Manning and others, of Edmonton, Alberta, presented on March 29, 1944, praying for the passing of an act to incorporate the Alberta Provincial Bank;

(2) The report of the clerk of petitions on the said petition; and

(3) The private bill deposited with the Clerk of the House on April 17, 1944, based on the said petition;

be referred to the standing committee on standing orders to consider the suspension of,—

(a) Standing order 92 (late presentation of the petition);

(b) Standing order 93 (1) (late depositing of the bill); and

(c) Standing order 93 (3) (a) and (c) (consequential penalty charges).

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

PRICES—LIVE STOCK

Mr. GERSHAW:

1. What board or department of government is responsible for maintaining a fair price on live stock, particularly cattle, sheep and lambs?

2. How is this being done, and what basis is used in relating the value of live animals to the dressed meat prices?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. The Department of Agriculture provides a support price for live stock through the operations of the meat board in purchasing meat for export to the United Kingdom.

2. The meat board purchases lamb carcasses and all better qualities of beef suitable for rationing in either carcass or boneless form and lower qualities of beef in boneless form for manufacturing purposes, at established floor prices. The purchase of surplus beef and lamb for export to the United Kingdom provides a support price for live stock in the same manner as the purchase of bacon for export provides a support for hog prices. The price of live cattle and lambs in relation to the floor price paid for beef and lamb purchased by the board is entirely dependent upon the dressing percentage and the quality of live animals slaughtered.

FLOOR PRICES ON BEEF

Mr. SENN:

1. Has a floor price been placed on beef by the government or any department thereof?

2. If so, when did it come into effect?

3. When was the decision announced?

4. What price has been set for the different grades of beef?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Yes.

2. For the period May 27, 1943 to August 14, 1943, with successive seasonal adjustments thereafter.

3. On or about June 7, 1943.

4. Floor prices were established in relation to ceiling prices, in the various W.P.T.B. meat zones, and for the various qualities of beef (special, commercial, plain, cutter, cow and bull) as follows:

May 27, 1943 to August 14, 1943, .25 below the ceiling.

August 16, 1943 to September 18, 1943, $1 below the ceiling.

September 20, 1943, to December 18, 1943, $2.25 below the ceiling.

December 20, 1943, to February 5, 1944, $1.75 below the ceiling.

February 7, 1944, to March 18, 1944, $1.25 below the ceiling.

March 20, 1944, to April 22, 1944, .75 below the ceiling.

April 24, 1944, to August 14, 1944, .25 below the ceiling.

ALLOTMENT OF CARS TO LINE ELEVATORS

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Are cars allotted to elevators for shipment of grain based on 1939-40 handling?

2. What amount of grain did the line elevator companies handle at Craik, Saskatchewan, in 1939-40?

3. What amount of grain did the pool elevator handle at Craik, Saskatchewan, in 1939-40?

4. How many cars have been allotted to line elevator companies at Craik, Saskatchewan, between August 15, 1943, to April 1, 1944?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

1. No. Cars for the shipment of wheat from the majority of shipping stations have, since October 23, 1943, been authorized in accordance with the percentage of business the various elevator companies at each station handled during the crop seasons 1938-39 and 1939-40 combined. At stations where some of the elevators were closed, part or all of these seasons, it was not considered equitable to put this basis into effect and it was necessary for the board to work out some more satisfactory plan.

2. 256,910 bushels net.

3. 440,340 bushels net.

4. 181 cars of wheat authorized for shipment.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE—PAYMENTS SINCE 1939

Mr. FAIR:

1. What amount was paid as bonus to farmers in each of the prairie provinces since 1939 under the prairie farm assistance, prairie farm income and wheat acreage reduction bonuses?

2. What was the cost of administration of each bonus each year?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Bonus payments (to February 29, 1944):

	Manitoba	Saskatchewan	Alberta
Prairie Farm Assistance	$1,557,795 56	$27,130,035 69	$6,375,391 42
Prairie Farm Income	2,992,508 72	10,320,762 39	5,680,521 17
Wheat Acreage Reduction	12,046,450 48	44,949,725 74	24,021,402 24

2. Administration costs:

	Prairie Farm Assistance	Wheat Acreage Reduction
1939-40	$266,595 62	....
1940-41	346,764 89	....
1941-42	422,459 67	$ 979,535 05
1942-43	197,927 92†	1,342,230 06
1943-44 (to Feb. 29, 1944)	205,794 37	763,413 20

†Incurred in investigation of claims carried over from 1941 and in inspection of 1942 crop.

Prairie farm income administrative costs are included in the above figures for P.F.A. and W.A.R. administration.

WOOL SUBSIDIES

Mr. REID:

1. Is any subsidy being paid by the government for the production of wool?

2. If so, what subsidy is being paid wool growers in the various provinces?

3. What provinces, if any, have not accepted any subsidy offered the wool growers by the dominion government?

4. What amounts of money have the wool growers received in each province during 1943?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. No subsidy is paid by the government for the production of wool. Under authority of order in council P.C. 1/2519 of 29th March, 1943, however, the dominion government was authorized to reimburse any provincial government one-half of any bonus (the dominion government's share not to exceed 2 cents a pound) paid by the provincial government on wool of the 1943 clip, delivered to registered wool warehouses and prepared in accordance with specified standards of cleanliness. Under order in council P.C. 2/1000 of 18th February, 1944, a similar arrangement is authorized for the wool of the 1944 clip.

2. The bonus paid for the 1943 clip by those provinces participating was 4 cents a pound. No definite information is available as to the rate of bonus which provincial governments will pay in regard to the 1944 clip.

3. 1943 wool clip—British Columbia and Manitoba did not participate. 1944 wool clip —British Columbia and Manitoba have intimated they will not participate; Alberta and Saskatchewan have the matter under consideration; other provinces have indicated they will participate.

4. Prince Edward Island, $990.28; Nova Scotia, $8,197.36; New Brunswick, $641.16; Quebec, $3,406.12; Ontario, $109,293.10; Saskatchewan, claim not yet received; Alberta, claim not yet received.

QUEBEC HYDRO

Mr. DORION:

1. Has the government of the province of Quebec obtained from the wartime prices and trade board a permit to operate an industry in the province of Quebec called the Quebec Hydro?

2. If so, when was such permit obtained, and by whom was it issued?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1 and 2. No. Under section 11, subsection (b) of wartime prices and trade board order No. 284, respecting commencement, acquisition and expansion of business, a permit is not required by any undertaking operated by or on behalf of the government of the dominion or any province of Canada or by or on behalf of any agency thereof.

TROOPS RETURNING FROM OVERSEAS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What is being done within Canada to notify in advance next-of-kin of the arrival home of wounded soldiers and those on leave from overseas?

2. Will some change be made in the "troop movement rule" now existing to enable next-of-kin to meet them at the station on arrival home, as in the last war?

3. Are arrangements being considered for the loan of military bands at depot, and any available motor vehicles to aid civil power taking them home on arrival?

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): Answers which I think will be found satisfactory by the hon. member for Broadview were given by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) in answer to questions asked by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon). Those answers will be found at pages 2181 and 2233 of Hansard for this year. I would ask that the question stand in order that the hon. member may look at these references to see whether or not they sufficiently answer his questions.

Question stands.

PUBLIC SERVICE—LADY INVESTIGATOR IN OTTAWA

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. At the present time, does a certain lady visit employees of the federal government during their working hours, in the city of Ottawa, and is she holding an investigation with regard to such employees?

2. If so, who is this lady, and who gave her authority to make such investigation?

3. For what purpose is the lady engaged in such investigation?

Mr. McLARTY: I believe this question will have to be clarified before it will be possible to answer it. A number of ladies are employed in investigating working conditions, in regard to reclassifications, and so on; and the way the question is drawn at the moment it would be impossible to answer it. I suggest that the question be dropped and that the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains may wish to frame another question which will better serve his purpose, and clarify the particular information he requests.

Question dropped.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

CANADIAN VICKERS LIMITED

Mr. BOUCHER:

1. Is the Canadian Vickers plant in Montreal, at which the Douglas D.C. 4 is to be produced, owned by the government of Canada?

2. What is the amount of the total investment of the government of Canada in Canadian Vickers Limited of Montreal?

3. Is there any person or company holding any interest, by capital investment, mortgage loan or otherwise, in the Canadian Vickers Limited, other than the government of Canada?

4. What is the name of each member of the board of directors of the Canadian Vickers Limited, and by whom were they appointed?

CIVIL SERVICE—CERTIFICATES OF APPOINTMENT TO MEN OF MILITARY AGE AND FITNESS

Mr. DUBOIS:

1. Have any temporary or permanent certificates of appointment been issued by the civil service commission to men of military age and fit for military service for employment in the public service since the passing of order in council P.C. 4759 on June 27, 1941, to March 31, 1944?

2. If so, what are, (a) the names of the appointees; (b) details of the position appointed to; (c) dates and reasons for such appointments?

BELL TELEPHONE COMPANY

Mr. NICHOLSON:

What is the total amount which has been paid to the Bell Telephone Company of Canada by the dominion government since the outbreak of war?

OTTAWA PUBLIC BUILDINGS

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. Did the government buy any buildings in Ottawa since January 1, 1943?

2. If so, what buildings?

3. What was the purchase price?

4. Did the government build any buildings in Ottawa since January 1, 1943?

5. If so, what buildings did they build?

6. How much did each cost?

FUEL WOOD

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. Did the government, through the wood fuel controller, or any other official, issue a directive to any pulpwood operators in Ontario to cut fuel wood in the spring and summer of 1943?

2. If so, on what date was such a directive issued?

3. To how many persons or firms was such directive issued?

4. Were contracts entered into with the companies or persons indicated above?

5. Were meetings held at the lakehead by the wood fuel controller in May or June, 1943, to discuss wood fuel production?

6. If so, were records kept of the meeting?

7. What representations were made by person or persons attending these meetings, regarding the advisability of continuing to cut pulpwood, and as to the feasibility of supplying fuel wood shortage during the winter of 1943-44 out of pulpwood stocks?

8. Did the wood fuel controller make any report, finding or order that if necessary pulpwood could be diverted to use as fuel wood in case of need?

9. Did any official of the government make a report to the wood fuel controller on the lakehead fuel wood operations during the spring or summer of 1943?

10. If so, what action was taken in respect to his recommendations?

11. How many cords of fuel wood were produced at the lakehead in Ontario under these special contracts?

12. How many cords have been shipped from there to, (a) points in the Ottawa valley; (b) points in Manitoba?

13. What were the freight charges per cord of wood on the wood shipped to, (a) points in the Ottawa valley; (b) points in Manitoba?

14. How many cords, if any, were shipped to points in Ontario?

15. Was any of the fuel wood shipped to Manitoba used for purposes other than fuel wood?

16. To whom was fuel wood shipped from the lakehead to Winnipeg, and what price per cord was paid for the same, and were any shipments of wood designated as fuel wood disposed of to box manufacturers? If so, what price per cord was paid for the same?

17. What price is paid by box manufacturers in the open market for wood produced for that purpose in the province of Manitoba?

18. Was there any shortage of fuel wood in the lakehead region in the winter of 1942-43?

19. Was there any shortage of fuel wood in Port Arthur or Fort William during the winter of 1943-44?

20. Was any attempt made to have pulpwood producers or logging companies in the Ottawa valley, Sudbury or North Bay districts, take out fuel wood during the winter of 1943-44?

21. Are there stands of timber in Renfrew county, Nipissing, Sudbury districts, Sault Ste. Marie district, Kenora district, or Rainy River district, suitable, (a) for pulpwood; or (b) for fuel wood?

22. If so, were any attempts made by the wood fuel controller or any official of the government to encourage the cutting of, (a) pulpwood; or (b) fuel wood in any of these districts?

23. Were directives issued to Quebec pulp and paper companies to cut fuel wood?

24. On what dates were such directives issued, if any?

25. Were arrangements made during 1943 to have Quebec pulpwood producers cut fuel wood?

26. If so, on what terms were the contracts made?

27. If contracts were authorized, or authority issued for the cutting of fuel wood by pulpwood producers in the province of Quebec, did the government fuel authorities receive any representations from operators in Ontario, or their representative association, asking that the Ontario contracts be written on the same basis as those for the province of Quebec?

28. How much fuel wood, if any, was cut by the Quebec pulpwood operators?

29. How much has been shipped, and what was the freight per cord on this fuel wood?

30. How much was paid out in the form of subsidy to fuel wood producers in, (a) Ontario; (b) Quebec; and (c) New Brunswick?

YUKON CIVIL SERVANTS

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

1. Is the amount paid to civil servants in Yukon made up of stated sums termed salary, and stated sums termed living allowances?

2. Are both such sums considered salary for the purpose of income tax?

3. Are civil servants in Yukon assessed income tax on both of such payments?

4. If the answers to questions 2 and 3 are in the affirmative, are such civil servants assessed on both said amounts for contribution to civil servants' superannuation fund and, if not, why are they assessed income tax on both?

ST. VINCENT DE PAUL PENITENTIARY

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. Did the government, since January, 1940, appoint guards or officers at St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary?

2. If so, how many were appointed during the years 1940, 1941, 1942, 1943 and 1944?

3. What are the names of these guards or officers, and their respective places of residence?

4. Was the appointment of these guards or officers recommended by other persons than the Minister of Justice, and if so, who are these persons?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

ELDORADO MINING AND REFINING LIMITED

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

For a copy of the agreement forming the basis of the taking over by the government, by order in council P.C. 535 of 1944 (through a crown company known as the Eldorado Mining and Refining Company) of the property of the Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited, and the purchase of the shares from its shareholders; together with a statement showing the name of each shareholder, the number of shares in each case, and the price paid by each shareholder for the shares turned over to the crown company, or to the agent acting for the government.

Mr. HOWE: I have had a word with the mover of this resolution, and I understand he would like to have it dropped, with the possibility that he may reword it later.

Motion dropped.

ELDORADO MINING AND REFINING LIMITED

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

For a copy of the trustee agreement between "The Trusts and Guarantee Company Limited" and the government, or its agent, or the crown company known as the Eldorado Mining and Refining Company, giving effect to order in council P.C. 535 of 1944, regarding the acquisition by the crown of the property of the Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited; together with a copy of the balance sheet of the Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited for the year 1943. Also a copy of the list of shareholders of the said company as at the date of surrender of the affairs and property of the company to the government, or its agent, under order in council P.C. 535 of 1944.

Mr. HOWE: My remarks in regard to the previous resolution apply to this one as well.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

Mr. GRAYDON: I take it the minister means that the dropping of this motion would be without prejudice to the hon. member bringing forward a different motion on the same subject on another occasion.

Mr. HOWE: How could it possibly be to his prejudice?

Motion dropped.

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY—ADJUSTMENTS WITH CONTRACTORS

Mr. BOUCHER:

For a copy of all statements of adjustments made with contractors by "proceedings on a less formal basis" than by exercise of powers under subsection 4 of section 13 of the Department of Munitions and Supply Act, and said to have been made with sixty-seven manufacturers.

Mr. CHEVRIER: In connection with this motion I must say that it is definitely not in the public interest to produce the papers requested, for the reason that it would be prejudicial to the success of future negotiations with contractors to the department. As was pointed out in reply to a similar question by the hon. member for Hastings South (Mr. Stokes) on February 24, 1944, at page 802 of Hansard, such excellent cooperation has been received from manufacturers in making refunds against too-great profits made possible by new manufacturing techniques that in no case has it been necessary to exercise the powers given the minister under subsection 4 of section 13 of the Department of Munitions and Supply Act. Also I would point out that in many of the sixty-seven cases mentioned by the hon. member renegotiations are in progress for added savings to the government, in addition to the $119,107,000 mentioned by me in my report to the house at page 1761 of Hansard for March 23, 1944, in which I also dealt with the renegotiation of contracts. Therefore I request that the motion be dropped.

Motion dropped.

AIR TRAINING PLAN—CLOSING OF AIRPORTS

Mr. WHITE:

For a return showing the names and numbers of the airports established under the joint air training plan, which are to be closed during the year 1944, with the total cost to date of each airport, including cost of lands, buildings, runways, water supply, sewerage, equipment and all other costs of construction.

VISIT TO CANADA OF REV. K. KOTOWSKI

Mr. DORION:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and other correspondence between the department of public information, the wartime information board, the Department of External Affairs and Rev. K. Kotowski, with respect to the visit to Canada of this gentleman.

AIRPORT CONSTRUCTION—INSPECTION OF MATERIALS —J. FRANÇOIS LEDUC AND ASSOCIATES

Mr. LACOMBE:

For a copy of all telegrams, letters, correspondence and other documents exchanged since January 1, 1940, between the dominion government or any department thereof, and J. François Leduc, and associates, consulting engineers, 354 Ste. Catherine street east, Montreal, regarding the awarding of contracts by the government, for the inspection of materials at the various airports under construction by the Department of Transport.

SWITLICK CANADIAN PARACHUTE LIMITED

Mr. ROY (for Mr. LACOMBE):

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence and other documents exchanged since the 1st January, 1940, between the dominion government, or any department thereof and Switlick Canadian Parachute Ltd., 3575 St. Lawrence street, Montreal, concerning contracts awarded by the Department of Munitions and Supply to the said company.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I wish to point out to the hon. member that over 250 files and well over a thousand pieces of correspondence would have to be produced to satisfy his motion. This work would require to be done by personnel directly engaged on current war orders, and I suggest it is not in the public interest to have this done at this time. If the hon. member would care to indicate to me or to officials of my department the specific information he requires, I shall be happy to see that he gets it. I request that this motion be dropped.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is not in his place; should the motion stand?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Dropped.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

Mr. GRAYDON: I know nothing about this question, Mr. Speaker, but by the same department it has been stated twice that it is not in the national interest to give certain information. Having regard to the circumstances in this case, with the hon. member being away, I think in all fairness the motion should be allowed to stand.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The motion has been made and the government is expected to give an answer. The answer has been given, that it is not in the public interest to meet its request. The motion should therefore be dropped. Since the motion is not debatable, there is nothing to be gained by having consideration of the matter postponed until the hon. member is in his seat. I think it should be dropped.

Motion dropped.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION

Mr. NEILL:

For a copy of the draft of an immigration treaty, which was presented to the Chinese minister on January 17, 1944, and referred to by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister in his statement to the house on April 17, 1944, at page 2126.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni will recognize that his motion involves an important question of principle, that principle being that the privilege of privacy must be granted to exchanges of views between negotiating countries. Perhaps I might say a word to the house on this matter of the negotiation of treaties.

Hon. members will realize that international treaties and agreements require a thorough and frank exchange of views between the parties involved. In some cases it is possible, after a certain fundamental stage of agreement has been reached, and especially when the treaty is a multilateral one, for the final modifications and expressions of view to be made at conferences which are open and public. However, the general principle is recognized in all countries and is, I think, of basic importance in international relations, that exchanges of views between countries in the course of negotiation of an agreement should not be made public by either party. It is obvious that the fear of misunderstanding, and the necessity of defending publicly any expression of view which might be only a tentative one set forth to explore all possibilities, would make it impossible for governments or their representatives to express themselves freely and frankly if they had to consider the possibility of publicity being given to their every word and proposal. Such a situation would render virtually impossible the negotiation of agreements and understandings between countries.

Mr. NEILL: Did not the Prime Minister make it a public document when he alluded to it in the house?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. I alluded to the fact that a treaty was being negotiated, but beyond mentioning the subject, I did not disclose any of the terms of the treaty.

Motion dropped.

CUSTODIAN OF ENEMY PROPERTY

Mr. AYLESWORTH:

For a statement giving the name, in each case, of the custodian of enemy property and his full staff, together with a description of the duties and salaries received.

LABOUR CONDITIONS—HUDSON BAY MINING AND SMELTING COMPANY—FLIN FLON

Mr. NICHOLSON:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Department of Labour and Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company and/or the welfare board of Flin Flon, Manitoba, during 1943 and 1944 in connection with wage agreements.

GRAPEFRUIT JUICE—IMPORTS AND SUBSIDIES

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, permits, or authorizations, passing between or issued by the wartime prices and trade board (or any of its officials), to any person or persons, or firm or firms, regarding the purchase and importation to Canada of grapefruit juice during the past year; together with a statement showing the invoice price and the amount of subsidy paid on the same, and to whom the subsidy was paid.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Speaker, this raises an important question which has been dealt with on several occasions. It is not regarded as being in the public interest to disclose the names of individual recipients of subsidies. The reasons for this position have been given by me in the house on at least two occasions.

I find that on April 17, 1944, an answer to a question by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) contains this:

A statement of government policy in connection with revealing the names of applicants or recipients of subsidy appears on page 2719 of Hansard for May 14, 1943.

One ground for the rule which has been adopted is that to give the subsidies paid to recipients reveals to importers the business of their competitors, and gives them information as to the amount and type of business being done.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

Mr. GRAYDON: Have there not been instances where similar questions have been answered by the government?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; I am practically sure that there has never been such an instance. The position was very carefully considered in the spring of 1942 and again in the spring of 1943. It was stated in the house at the time, without any exception being taken to it, so far as I know.

Mr. COLDWELL: It seems to me that this principle should be clarified, because it involves the payment out of public moneys to individuals. It is the duty of the house to see to it that all such moneys are scrutinized in parliament. The principle which has been followed is a dangerous one.

[Mr. Aylesworth.]

Mr. ILSLEY: I admit the difficulty. Generally speaking it has a salutary effect on the whole public service if it is realized that any amounts, payments for which are authorized, are subject to review by parliament. One has to weigh that advantage against the disadvantage of making available to competitors the current business of those about whom the information is sought. The effect would be to make available to importers the current business of their competitors. We thought it would be best not to give this information. The department thought it could be given later in another way. If the hon. member will look at the debates on the subject he will see that that point is considered. I must say however that I do not regard it, nor does the government regard it, as in the public interest to give information which would tell importers of the particular commodities, the exact amounts, and the extent and type of business done by their competitors.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): At the present time practically every grocery store in Canada is pushing the sale of grapefruit juice in gallon cans. I believe the public should know whether a subsidy is being paid, and to whom.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, well; there is no objection to that. I will give the information as to whether a subsidy is being paid, with the basis upon which it is being paid. The only thing I would object to is giving a list of the names of importers, and the amount each one gets. It would be on the same basis to everyone.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Would there be any difficulty in the minister's tabling that?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): And after that, would there be any harm in showing me privately to whom these are paid?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not like the latter part of the suggestion.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): It has been done before.

Mr. ILSLEY: I really do not like it, because I do not think it is fair to other hon. members.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is right.

Mr. ILSLEY: But I will readily comply with the first part of the request. If the hon. member will reframe his motion I believe there would be no objection to it.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Why not let the minister table the answer, as he has suggested?

Mr. ILSLEY: All right; I will consent to the passing of the motion, subject to the considerations and exceptions I have mentioned.

Mr. GRAYDON: The question raised by the minister is an important one. Despite the fact that decisions have been made previously in respect of government policy, I think it is a question of balance, of deciding whether the public interest would be better served by having the information tabled in the house on occasions such as this, or whether there would be the possibility of an abuse arising from having matters hidden in the public accounts. That is a matter to which I suggest the government should give consideration.

Mr. ILSLEY: We have given consideration to it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I should like to say a word on this matter. Too often lately there has been a denial to hon. members of information they wish to have and to which I believe they are entitled. The other day in sessional paper 267 I asked certain questions, to which a return was given. My questions were these:

1. From whom was coal purchased for Dundurn military camp in the province of Saskatchewan during the year 1943, and to date?
2. What were the grades supplied, and the price per ton?

And so on. The answer I received was this:

It is the policy of the department not to give unit prices or contract amounts against tonnages.

After all, hon. members have a right to information, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Rosetown-Bigger. Here is a department of government which refuses to give information to members as to the cost prices of coal purchased with government money. Certainly the public interest does not deny information of that kind to hon. members.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion, subject to the reservations made by the minister?

Motion agreed to.

SUBSIDIES ON POTATOES

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury):

For a copy of all claims made for subsidy on new potatoes produced in the province of New Brunswick together with all correspondence connected therewith, exchanged between the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation and all others relating in any way to payment of same between August 1, 1943, and the present time.

Mr. ILSLEY: The same consideration exactly applies to this motion, and I do not see any way in which it could be amended, because the only information asked for is the names of recipients and the amounts paid to them. The period covered comes down to a late date, August 1, 1943.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the government to be good enough to allow this to stand?

Motion stands.

FUEL WOOD—LAKEHEAD TO WINNIPEG

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

For a statement disclosing the particulars of any contract or arrangement authorized by or made between the wood fuel controller and any manufacturer of boxes for the utilization of fuel wood shipped from the lakehead to Winnipeg, showing the price per cord paid for the same; also a copy of any correspondence, record of discussions, contracts, or agreements appertaining to the same.

FUEL WOOD—CONTRACTS WITH ONTARIO OPERATORS

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

For a copy of all documents, letters, correspondence, proposals, or representations, made by pulpwood producers of the province of Ontario, their representative or association, to the wood fuel controller or any other official of the government, asking that the Ontario operators be granted contracts on the same terms as those granted to producers of pulpwood in the province of Quebec.

PULPWOOD AND FUEL WOOD PRODUCTION

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

For a copy of any correspondence, contracts, arrangements, or directives, made or issued by the wood fuel controller or any official of the government with pulpwood producers in the province of Quebec during the year 1943; together with reports or recommendations or minutes of any meetings where pulpwood and fuel wood production was discussed with producers in the province of Quebec.

FUEL WOOD AND PULPWOOD

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

For a copy of all instructions, or directives, or contracts, made by or entered into between the wood fuel controller, or any other official of the government acting on behalf of the government, and the pulpwood operators in Ontario during the spring and summer of 1943, for the cutting of fuel wood, or the cutting of pulpwood which might in an emergency be used as fuelwood; together with copies of reports or minutes of any meetings held at the lakehead by the wood fuel controller in May or June, 1943, at which meetings fuel wood production was discussed; together with a statement of copies of any representations made by pulpwood operators or their representatives to the effect that they be permitted to continue to cut pulpwood, and that if a serious fuel wood shortage developed during the winter of 1943-44, the said pulpwood be taken over and used as fuel wood under the direction of the wood fuel controller; also copies of the report or reports of the wood fuel controller on the lakehead fuel wood operations during the spring and summer of 1943, including therein a copy of his recommendations.

CANADAN VICKERS LIMITED—D-4 AEROPLANES

Mr. BRUCE:

For a copy of all correspondence and contracts between the government of Canada and Canadian Vickers regarding the building of D-4 aeroplanes.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

FURTHER LEGISLATION—THE BUDGET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Following my inquiry of Friday last I should like to ask the Prime Minister what further legislation the government proposes to bring down during the present session. Perhaps I may couple with my question, as I did on Friday, an inquiry as to when the budget may be expected.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the latter part of the inquiry I may say that I hope to be able to present the budget shortly after the middle of May.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): In reply to my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, may I say that in addition to the social and other legislation already on the order paper and the usual financial measures, the following measures, most of which were forecast in the speech from the throne, have still to be introduced. There will be the Bank Act amending bill and a measure respecting the Quebec Savings Bank. There will be ancillary legislation to provide for credits for agriculture, and a measure for the insurance or guarantee of export credits. There will be national housing legislation, and a measure to provide for family allowances. There will be legislation to provide for a floor under farm prices, and legislation respecting administrative machinery for the disposal of surplus war assets. There will be an act to amend the Aeronautics Act to provide for the establishment of an air transport board with consequential amendments to the Transport Act. There will be an amendment to the Dominion Elections Act to provide for the exercise of the franchise by members of the armed forces. There will be an amendment to the Civil Service Superannuation Act. There will also be any measures to supplement the existing rehabilitation programme, including war service gratuities and an amendment to the Veterans' Land Act. There will be amendments to the Naval Service Act, and possible amendments to the criminal code. There will also be such legislation as may result from reports of committees.

As indicated in the speech from the throne it is anticipated that there will be measures respecting health insurance and contributory old age pensions. In some particulars this legislation will depend upon the degree to which agreement can be reached with the provinces. Should the proposed treaty with China, which I mentioned on Monday last, be concluded before the end of the session, there will be a measure to amend the Chinese Immigration Act. There is always the possibility that some situations may arise while parliament is still in session which will require the bringing in of additional legislation. I would not wish the government to be bound verbatim et literatim by the statement I have just made, but I have tried to indicate to the house as fully as possible the legislation which, so far as I can see, at the moment it is proposed to have introduced at this session.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I make one suggestion to the Prime Minister with respect to the legislative programme? I think the house is cognizant of the amount of legislation yet to be dealt with in addition to war measures of a financial character. Perhaps the Prime Minister would be good enough to hold a conference with the government leader in the other house with the idea of having initiated in the other house such of the legislation he has mentioned as may be so dealt with. With that arrangement and with the help of committees some of the burden of legislating which falls upon this house might be diverted to the other house and we would thus have a somewhat better balance as between both houses.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that I have had several conferences with the leader of the government in the Senate and he himself has brought forward the very question my hon. friend has just raised. The difficulty is that at a time of war most of the legislation is in the form of measures financial in character and most of them of necessity must be introduced in the Commons in the first instance. I mentioned an amendment to the Dominion Elections Act to provide for the exercise of the franchise by members of the armed forces. At first glance this might seem to be legislation that might be initiated in the Senate, but hon. members will realize that it pertains to representation in the Commons and for that reason the measure could not very well be taken up there in the first instance.

The leader of the government in the Senate has in mind asking the members of that house to consider in committee some phases or aspects of the bills that will be before the Commons so that when these measures do reach the Senate the members of that honourable body will have more or less covered the ground which might otherwise have to be covered in lengthy debate. In this way it may be possible to have consideration of some of the measures carried on more or less simultaneously in both houses. I assure my hon. friend that the government is desirous of having as much of the existing programme initiated in the Senate as may be advisable and possible, but the exceptional character of a war session is something which lies beyond the control of both houses.

PRIME MINISTERS' CONFERENCE

QUESTION AS TO CONSULTATION WITH LEADERS OF CANADIAN POLITICAL PARTIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Prime Minister a question based on the probability that he will be leaving shortly for the conference of prime ministers in Great Britain. I am sure that the entire house wishes him godspeed, a safe journey there, a profitable conference, and a safe return. While he is away no doubt he will be called upon to make exceedingly important pronouncements and perhaps commitments. My question is this. Has he considered the advisability of calling into conference before leaving for Great Britain the leaders of the various parties and groups in parliament in order that he may ascertain the attitude of the entire body of parliament upon the problems which will have to be dealt with at the conference?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I assume that my hon. friend's question has reference to the groups in the parliament of Canada, and not to any groups in the parliament of the United Kingdom.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would reply to him that the government has responsibility, as he is aware, for whatever is done in the name of the government either in this house or elsewhere, and having that responsibility the government has to be the judge of the best method of proceeding in these matters. I hope that I am familiar enough with the views of the members of all groups in this house to be able to express, I trust quite sincerely and intelligently, any point of view that it may be desirable to have expressed on their behalf, but I have not thought it would be necessary to have any meeting of the kind which my hon. friend has just mentioned before attempting to deal with the proceedings of the conference. What will be discussed at the conference—I should call it rather a meeting of the prime ministers of the nations of the British commonwealth because it is not to be a conference in the sense in which that term is generally used—will depend largely on the questions that may come up at the meetings. No doubt there will be many subjects discussed, some of which I am already aware of, and others which I shall not know about until I am present.

May I say to my hon. friend that I thank him very warmly for the good wishes he has extended to me, and I thank hon. members of the house for the kind manner in which they have received the hon. member's expression of those good wishes. I shall endeavour as best I can not to disappoint any hopes or expectations which hon. members may be kind enough to cherish, with respect to a consideration of the matters to be taken up in London.

CANADIAN ARMY

PRESS REPORT AS TO FORMATION OF VOLUNTEER BRIGADE OF 6TH DIVISION FOR OVERSEAS SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Department of National Defence. A Canadian Press dispatch from Vancouver, published in Ottawa this morning, states that an attempt is being made to raise a volunteer brigade from the troops of the 6th division, which is composed largely of home defence troops, and that this brigade is to be sent to one of the fighting fronts. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) is out of the city to-day, I understand, but I would ask that the house be given a statement in regard to this matter to-morrow.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of National Defence for Air): We will take the question as a notice, Mr. Speaker, and I will advise the Minister of National Defence.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Friday, April 21, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL WAR SERVICES

Departmental administration, $90,907.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Will the Minister of National War Services make a general statement? We have no break-down before us.

Hon. L. R. LaFLECHE (Minister of National War Services): Mr. Chairman, on Friday last towards the end of the sitting I was giving information in reply to questions put to me regarding specific operations of the Department of National War Services. I would ask the indulgence of the committee in order that I may give some further information which I suggest will be found interesting to the house and the country at large.

The men and the women of the Canadian armed forces have not been forgotten in an important matter, and by that I mean their continued education. From the very beginning of the war an educational movement was started, and that has increased as the years have gone by. I am satisfied that an excellent job is being done in that direction.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Chairman, what the minister is trying to bring before the committee is a matter of great importance and of great moment, but I am unable to hear him because of the noise that is going on in the chamber. In order to help him, so that his voice will remain intact during the afternoon and evening sittings, I would ask you, Mr. Chairman, please to call the committee to order and see that some semblance of order is kept while the minister is making his statement.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Mr. Chairman, my voice being in its present state I am truly indebted to the leader of the opposition. I have some notes, and while they are lengthy I do believe they are worthy of putting on the record so that they may be read by the citizens of Canada at large.

Educational services for all branches of the armed forces were initiated in 1939 by the Canadian Legion under the authority of the Departments of National Defence, now three departments. The intention at that time was to make available adequate educational facilities of a constructive nature to occupy idle time, which does form a considerable part of military life at different intervals, and eventually during the pre-demobilization period. The services were designed with three objectives in mind: first, that service personnel might become more efficient fighting men; second, that interrupted or deferred studies resulting from service might be continued; and third, that service personnel might prepare themselves whilst in service for civil reestablishment.

As the work developed, practical courses were established to meet the purely voluntary demands of service personnel. Later, the needs of additional educational facilities as part of military training were recognized by the three armed services. As an example, it became necessary to teach mathematics and other necessary subjects for which adequate facilities were not available within the services.

Canadian Legion Educational Services, having become established and capable of providing the necessary facilities for educating armed personnel proceeded to fit men in this respect for their military duties. The next step was for the three armed services themselves to develop in service organizations a knowledge of how to coordinate and integrate the educational facilities available through the Canadian Legion. Accordingly, the navy made use of its existing directorate of education, the army established its directorate of education in 1943, and the air force appointed educational officers in 1942. As a result of the establishment of these educational controls within the three services, all educational requirements, both for in-service training and extra-service training, are now initiated by these officers, and required services—text books, libraries, supplies and instructors—are supplied through and by the Canadian Legion.

Because of the wide variation in school standards across Canada and because of the many different types of textbooks used in the autonomous provincial systems, it was found necessary to prepare numerous sets of academic, technical and vocational courses, ranging from the subjects on the lower level of the elementary school to those of the senior matriculation level. The collaboration of the provincial departments of education, extension departments of the universities, the Canada and Newfoundland educational association and other educational authorities was obviously necessary and was obtained by the Canadian Legion through its committee on education. Through its collaboration, the services now provide an interprovincial bilingual school system for the personnel of the fighting forces in which each registered student may obtain regular school credit. The core of the system provides sixty-seven specially prepared courses set out in text books which can be used in both oral courses and correspondence courses. This list includes certain special courses prepared at the request of the service authorities to assist in the more rapid preparation of service personnel in becoming efficient members of the fighting forces. One example of the manner in which such special courses have assisted in the training of personnel is that of the pre-aircrew courses. When the Royal Canadian Air Force had exhausted the supply of young men with sufficient academic education to take advantage of flying training, the Canadian Legion Educational Services were requested to provide pre-aircrew courses to bring ground crew personnel up to the required standards. To date, 12,603 students have taken advantage of pre-aircrew English, 21,428 have studied pre-aircrew mathematics and 15,430 have studied pre-aircrew science. This has materially assisted the R.C.A.F. in maintaining a steady flow of aircrew.

It is a matter of note, I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that through these operations, through the activities of the Canadian Legion Educational Services, there has been brought about, for the first time so far as I know, a system of teaching, or a school system if you like, which is identical in the nine provinces of Canada. That has been possible only because of the very fine cooperation which the several provinces without exception have afforded this plan.

Total voluntary registrations for correspondence courses using these text booklets as at March 31, 1944, was 129,361. During the past two years the total number of papers corrected has been 210,197. Many of the students are not interested in academic credit, but study in preparation for promotion within the services, and consequently courses are dropped when the immediate aim is achieved.

Mr. COLDWELL: Has the minister any comparison between those two years, as to whether there has been a substantial increase over the preceding year, so that we can see if there has been a progressive increase in the value of these courses? I do not want to interrupt.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I had intended to speak of that later on in my comments. That comes really at the end of my remarks on this subject. I think I can satisfy the hon gentleman on that.

Despite this fact, some 58 per cent are classified at present as active students working to complete courses. When consideration is given to the difficulties under which service personnel have to study, this average appears to be extremely good. Courses most in demand are mathematics, which includes trigonometry and practical courses designed especially for the army and the air force; conversation Anglaise; pilotage and elementary navigation; and series of technical, vocational and agricultural courses. Requirements for class instruction are provided in each military district or command of the R.C.A.F. by regional committees of the Canadian Legion Education Services, under the chairmanship of outstanding educationalists who serve in a voluntary capacity.

The following are the chairmen at the moment of these several regional committees in Canada and Newfoundland: Dr. G. M. Shrum, University of British Columbia; Professor Donald Cameron, University of Alberta; Dr. J. S. Thomson, President of the University of Saskatchewan; Dr. Sidney Smith, President of the University of Manitoba; Dr. M. K. Inman, Director of Extension, University of Western Ontario; Dr. W. J. Dunlop, Director of Extension, University of Toronto; Mr. Robert Westwater, Inspector of Ottawa Schools; Dr. J. C. Bonar, of the Canadian Pacific Railways; Mr. Victor Doré, Superintendent of Education, province of Quebec; Dr. N. MacKenzie, President of the University of New Brunswick; Dr. Henry F. Munro, Superintendent of Education, province of Nova Scotia; Honourable J. W. Jones, Premier of the province of Prince Edward Island; Dr. A. G. Hatcher, President of Memorial College, Newfoundland.

On these regional committees are representatives of the director of education of the three armed services, department of education, teachers' societies, local school boards, auxiliary service officers, the provincial departments of agriculture, fisheries, mines and forestry. They are responsible for all operations within their respective areas. As will be seen, the planning has been central, with provincial consent; whereas the operations are in a sense decentralized; their geographical designations may rightly be compared with the several military districts.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is there a central advisory committee?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Yes. I am coming to that. Under this arrangement, from the time of inception until December 31, 1943, some 7,670 classes have been conducted with an enrolment of 196,849 men and women. Classes for in-service training are conducted entirely by the service authorities, but in many cases text booklets for such ordinarily are provided by Canadian Legion Educational Services, the only source really from which such textbooks can be had. Slightly over 275,000 text booklets have been supplied at the request of the three services. Many instructors for classes in extra-service studies give their services voluntarily. In cases where payment is required, local rates of remuneration prevail. Such rates vary, because of location and difficulty of subject, ranging from about $3 to $5 for class sessions of two hours. Instructors' fees for correspondence courses average around forty cents per paper which is marked, and the student is individually instructed in respect to errors. Personnel engaged in correspondence instruction are drawn from the ranks of professional correspondence instructors accredited by the provincial departments of education.

There are handicraft and art classes carried out by the Legion and the other auxiliary services. Classes are provided by regional committees at the request of the armed service as and when need arises. These classes embrace such fields of interest as handicrafts, arts, household science and pre-discharge classes leading to rehabilitation. Crafts and arts of special interest are: leather, wood and metal work, knitting and needlepoint, weaving, photography, sketching and painting. Handicraft and arts programmes were initiated about November, 1943, and interest in such courses developed rapidly. For example, during the four months following inception 30,863 English and French manuals were distributed and 2,174 individuals received instruction in Canadian Legion classes alone, not taking into account the classes operated by the other auxiliary services. I am sorry I have not the figures for the other auxiliary services, but I wish to point out that the Y.M.C.A. carries out handicraft and art classes at those stations where they operate as an auxiliary service. They are large.

To satisfy the increasing demand from service personnel for university classes the armed forces requested the Canadian Legion Educational Services to bring a full variety of courses to the attention of interested students. Bulletins which provide information relative to both English and French speaking universities have been prepared and are available to service personnel.

The three services have been giving consideration to pre-discharge training which will aid individuals in their civilian reestablishment, and at the same time provide constructive guidance during the period prior to demobilization. In cooperation with service representatives and representatives of the Department of Pensions and National Health, Canadian Legion educational services have provided vocational guidance manuals on some fifty gainful occupations, in addition to more comprehensive courses on the basic industries, namely, agriculture, mining, fishing and forestry.

To implement the whole educational programme requested by these services, Canadian Legion Educational Services have built up a large library service in Canada, Newfoundland and overseas with the following purposes in mind. I am told there are something like three hundred different textbooks. The purposes in mind are: (a) to supply prescribed and collateral readings in support of correspondence courses; (b) to provide reference texts on subjects in which oral classes have been arranged at the request of the services; (c) to assist the personnel to pursue studies in subjects for which correspondence courses have not as yet been provided; (d) to supply certain technical books specially useful for men in the navy, army and air force from lists approved by officers of the three branches of the service.

Reference books, both English and French, in 1942 and 1943 in Canada and Newfoundland total 71,324, being both cloth and paper bound and averaging in price about $2.50 each. Trades journals are sent out monthly to the camps in order to keep men in touch with their civil occupations, and such trade journals are provided without cost by the respective publishers.

There is a short university course for R.A.F. personnel at Bishop's university. As a result of the examples set by British universities in providing short university courses for Canadian personnel overseas, the western Quebec regional committee of the Canadian Legion sponsored a series of one-week courses at Bishop's university, Lennoxville. They were designed to provide air personnel from the Atlantic transport command particularly with information concerning Canadian affairs, and lectures and tours were provided.

So far I have been outlining the operations carried out by the Canadian Legion Educational Services in Canada and Newfoundland. May I now say something about what is being done overseas? The requirements overseas closely parallel the work performed in Canada, and is under the direction of a committee of outstanding British educationalists, the chairman of which is Sir Frederick Clarke. On this committee are also the directors of education of the three services, in addition to the Canadian Legion Educational Services overseas directors. Up to December 1943 some 33,739 service personnel have registered for correspondence courses, and 25,407 directed reading requests were attended to.

In one month 3,106 classes were conducted with an approximate attendance of 71,059. The same text booklet or booklets and library facilities are available to Canadian personnel overseas and in any theatre of war in which our personnel serves. For instance, I am very happy to say classes were actually conducted during operations in Sicily and are being provided for at the present time in Italy.

We also do whatever we can for prisoners of war. All Canadian Legion Educational Services courses, all Canadian university courses, and whatever special courses and educational material are requested by next-of-kin, are available to Canadian prisoners of war in Germany and enemy occupied territory. Arrangements have been made through the International Red Cross Society in Geneva and the Canadian Red Cross Society to distribute such material. Examinations for all these courses are forwarded to the university of London, England, for marking, and the credits granted by that university are accepted by departments of education and universities in Canada and Newfoundland. To date some 87,787 text booklets and 662 University texts, together with 400 Canadian university correspondence courses, have been dispatched to Geneva. Some 35,981 text booklets, and library books for special reference numbering 527, have been sent to individual prisoners of war upon direct request. Some indication of the interest and value may be gained from the fact that of a total of 4,686 men in one German prisoners of war camp in October, 1943, some 2,373 attended school classes. Proof of receipt of material and appreciation of the services are received from time to time in cards and letters from the recipients and from senior Canadian and R.A.F. officers.

Now I come to the committee on education. The whole programme is supervised and co-ordinated by the national committee on education of the Canadian Legion war services, in conjunction with its regional committees in Canada, Newfoundland and overseas, under the chairmanship of Lieutenant-Colonel the Honourable Wilfrid Bovey, this committee is composed of representatives of the Canadian association of adult education, the Canadian and Newfoundland educational association, the Department of Pensions and National Health, the directors of education of the three armed services, together with two representatives of the Canadian Legion. The value of voluntary services provided by numerous outstanding men and women in Canadian and British educational fields cannot be estimated in monetary terms. These public-spirited citizens, Mr. Chairman, I believe deserve the gratitude of all.

I have here a list of text booklets, totalling 67. I shall not venture to read them into the record, but this list is available—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Put them on Hansard.

Mr. LaFLECHE: With the permission of the committee I should like to place the list on Hansard without reading it.

The CHAIRMAN: With the unanimous consent of the committee.

Mr. LaFLECHE: The list is as follows:

Hon. members might be interested in the size of the staff required, and I have the figures as of March 31, 1944. At that time there were engaged in administrative work at headquarters 48 full-time employees. Civilian assistants, regional secretaries, clerks and stenographers, librarians and so on in the field, also full-time employees, numbered 88. Engaged in the correction of correspondence course papers were 60 part-time employees. Service personnel instructing in the field numbered 246. The number of those serving voluntarily on the national committees, the regional committees, as honorary librarians, lecturers, teachers, film specialists, operators, translators, authors and artists is estimated to be in the neighbourhood of 350. Therefore as of that date we had approximately 136 full-time employees and 906 others, both service and civilian, full-time and part-time, including those who gave their services without charge.

In regard to operations and analysis as to costs, the basis for any comparison as to increase or otherwise, at present the operations show an increase over those indicated in the six months' period ending December 31, 1943. The present ratio of expenses for headquarters administration to expenses relative to teaching is indicated by analysis of the expenditure for the six months' period ending December 31, 1943. During the period July 1, 1943, to the end of that calendar year, a total expenditure of $372,257.04 was required for the provision of educational services in Canada. Of this amount the sum of $30,169.38 was spent on headquarters administration salaries, or a percentage ratio of 8.1. The total cost of headquarters administration, including travel, rentals, furnishings and equipment, was only $37,447.22, or ten per cent of the total expenditure. The amount devoted to the provision of actual educational training and required materials, together with local regional administration, was in the sum of $311,165.93, or 83.6 per cent of the gross expenditure for the period. The balance of $23,643.89 was expended on special projects such as material for prisoners of war, preparation of material for pre-discharge training, and short courses, and represents 6.4 per cent of the total expenditure. From the above analysis it will be seen that a very modest ratio of administrative expenses obtains, and that the expenditures for actual educational purposes required the volume of the total budget. Moreover, the amount of voluntary technical, academic and advisory assistance provided by unselfish, public spirited educationists throughout Canada and Newfoundland, and I might add Great Britain, makes the total operation a most economical as well as a most efficient enterprise.

I have figures as to cost. Expenditures in Canada from the inception in October, 1939, to December 31, 1943, total $1,267,021.74. Expenditures overseas for the same period total $637,677.04.

Mr. COLDWELL: Do I understand that the total expenditure since the war broke out is less than $3,000,000?

Mr. LaFLECHE: It is just under $2,000,000, both for overseas and in Canada.

[Mr. LaFleche.]

Mr. COLDWELL: Could the minister tell me the total budget for the services both in Canada and abroad for the current year?

Mr. LaFLECHE: You mean the year ending March 31, 1944?

Mr. COLDWELL: Whenever the current fiscal year ends.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I must deal in fiscal years, whereas of course the educational year ends roughly in June; we have had some little difficulty in that regard. The figures requested are, for Canada and Newfoundland, $922,000 for the year, and overseas $240,000.

Mr. COLDWELL: Does the $922,000 include overseas?

Mr. LaFLECHE: No, I have given them separately. Those would total $1,162,000. It is apparent that in this respect we are on the increase, and it would seem that that is only natural. Experiences of the past have permitted those carrying out these operations to perfect their systems. It has also become a matter of intimate knowledge of all members of our forces that these services are at their disposal. And they—as we, I presume—hope that this war will end in the not too distant future. It is encouraging to note that the members of our armed forces take education seriously.

Mr. COLDWELL: For the amount of money expended, we have been told a remarkable story. I am wondering if sufficient money has been expended to make this the kind of service it ought to be. When we hear of $1,100,000 as the total expenditure for the kind of services the minister has outlined for the armed services in Canada and overseas, and for prisoners of war—and I regard that as a very important service—we must realize that relatively it is a very small sum. I am thinking of a city of perhaps 50,000 or 60,000 inhabitants where the expenditures for public and high schools—and we might include the separate schools, too—would approach this figure. I do not know how the amount of service can be given for the money the minister has mentioned. I believe the committee would be warranted in urging that the minister discuss this matter with the national committee, to see if they are obtaining adequate sums for this important auxiliary service. I know of no service more important than the one we are now discussing.

We must remember that in this time of war we have taken from their normal way of life hundreds of thousands of young men and women who might otherwise have been completing their education. We owe it to those young people to see that the very best possible educational facilities are provided for them while they are in the armed forces. I feel this way about it, too, that if our democracy is to survive, those younger people who are serving in the armed forces and others who are growing up must be given every opportunity to appraise policies, to understand the public, social and economic environments in which we live, and be able to use democracy as it ought to be used. For, after all, in my opinion we have never had democracy. True, it was defined as government of the people, for the people and by the people; but in most of the spheres of life in which people have to move they find they are governed by self-constituted and autocratic controllers who are anything but democratic, and who do not allow the people to exercise any degree of democracy.

My real thought is that those of us who are interested in this matter should express our appreciation of the tremendous voluntary effort undertaken, and the manner in which it has been worked out by Colonel Bovey and by the Canadian Legion. I do not think a finer piece of work has been undertaken than the educational service for the armed forces. But in my view it has not gone far enough. I believe we could have spent many times the amount we have spent in this field.

I rise this afternoon, as a former teacher and one interested in education, to urge upon the committee that they see to it that this great service is in no way starved, but on the contrary is extended, fostered and financed to the very best of our ability.

I was going to ask the minister one or two questions. Is any supervision given to the amount of money asked for by the legion? Is the government advised or is the legion advised, by any committee other than those about which we have heard this afternoon? To be precise, is there a citizens' advisory committee which has any say as to the allocation of expenditures?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Perhaps I might be permitted to give a somewhat lengthy reply. It would seem to me that at this point I should explain to the committee just how all this originates, and the various steps through which proposals pass. In educational services, as in the establishment of canteens or anything else for the comfort of our fighting personnel, the requisitions arise in the defence department concerned. It may be the navy, the army or the air force. Each of the defence departments has a director of education, and it is he who says that such-and-such facilities shall be made available, and that so many people will probably wish to attend classes in this or that camp. That comes to my department as a proposition initiated by the defence department involved, and carrying the approval of that department. In effect it is a demand upon me to see that certain things are carried out.

While I am now speaking about educational services, the same would apply to the establishment of a hostel, a canteen, or any other service for the troops. The requisition then goes to the national war services fund advisory board, a committee composed very largely of sound, careful business men—and, of course, some women.

Mr. COLDWELL: Would the minister give the names?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I have the entire list here.

Mr. BRUCE: I suggest it be placed on the record.

Mr. COLDWELL: Who is the chairman?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Mr. C. L. Burton of Toronto is the chairman, and the members are:

Mr. Henry W. Binning, Annapolis Royal.
Mr. Wallace R. Campbell, Windsor.
Mr. J. Arthur D'Aoust, Ottawa.
Mr. John Caswell Davis, Winnipeg.
Mr. Leon T. des Rivieres, Quebec.
Mr. T. S. Dixon, Vancouver.
Mr. Walter S. Grant, Charlottetown.
Mr. J. J. Leddy, Saskatoon.
Brigadier General C. H. Maclaren, Ottawa.
Mr. John W. McConnell, Montreal.
Madame A. J. Major, Ottawa.
Mr. F. K. Morrow, Toronto.
Mr. James Y. Murdoch, Toronto.
Mr. Gordon F. Perry, Toronto.
Mrs. Louise M. Vroom, Rothesay, King's county, N.B.
Mrs. Edgar Hardy, Ottawa.
Mr. W. T. Henry, Edmonton.

Then there is an overseas committee or subcommittee, the chairman of which is Sir Edward Peacock, and the members:

Mr. S. Kilpatrick, London, England.
Sir Hardman Lever, London, England.
Mr. E. B. McInerney, London, England.
Mr. W. Garfield Weston, M.P., London, England.

Mr. GILLIS: For example, if the Canadian Legion war services educational committee were desirous of starting a new project or expanding its work, would it be necessary to call all the members of that committee in order to get the money or appropriation?

Mr. LaFLECHE: The proposition would not originate in that fashion; it must originate in the department of national defence concerned. None of the auxiliary services initiate any particular proposal, nor does my department. The three departments of national defence, in the interests of their personnel, decide, I assume after due deliberation, that it is necessary to do this or to do that. It is then the work of national war services to do it. The proposal then follows the procedure I had begun to outline. I assume it is the desire of the committee that I continue.

The proposal then goes to the national war services funds advisory board, which is composed of the ladies and gentlemen I have just mentioned. Representatives of the auxiliary services of the department of national defence concerned appear before the board and full explanations are given. The board satisfy themselves, not that the proposal is good or bad but that it is going to be carried out economically. Its duty is to advise the Minister of National War Services, who then acts and it is his responsibility from then on.

I should like to say a word about the national war services funds advisory board and pay a tribute to the ladies and gentlemen who serve on that board. Their duties have been quite onerous, and they have been most assiduous and careful in their work. I assume that they feel that they are there for the purpose of seeing that the taxpayers' money is not wasted. From the beginning I have appreciated at all times the fruits of their labour. I have appreciated their recommendations. The Minister of National War Services is not bound to accept their recommendations, but as in all cases they would have gone to the trouble of considering the merits of the proposal in detail the information they obtain is certainly worthy of the most serious consideration.

In connection with education services I am glad to say that in not one case have I reduced the recommendation as to the budget by one cent. On some occasions, the matter having been carefully discussed with the Legion representatives and the national defence representatives, they have recommended that certain reductions be made. I would then discuss the matter with the Legion representatives or sometimes with the Department of National Defence representatives, and I can say that the Legion has never been held up because of lack of funds. So far as I am concerned they will not be held up by a lack of funds in carrying out the projects of the department of national defence concerned, which have been passed by the national war services funds advisory board and by the officials of my department. However, there is great value in being careful in expending public money. I think we all agree as to that.

I am in a position to say that so far as I am concerned no moneys have been wasted. I am satisfied that every dollar has been put to good use. I am satisfied that those concerned are careful in their operations. Rarely has my attention been drawn to cases where sufficient care seems not to have been taken. I have experienced no trouble because of suspicions or anything of that nature; everything has been perfectly clear and aboveboard. As far as I know I can assure my hon. friend that he need have no fear. I feel sure the national war services funds advisory board is aware of the importance of educational services. This does not mean that when the board meets to discuss the details of the different budgets there is not serious discussion. I would not wish it to be otherwise. So far as I can humanly do so, I shall see that the members of the armed forces are provided with courses and are able to carry on their education to their hearts' content, to their own benefit as well as to the benefit of Canada.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was trying to follow out a series of questions which I had in mind. I do not think anyone will say that any of the money appropriated has been wasted. We have had a vigorous statement this afternoon by the minister that there has been no waste. The marvel to me is how this service could have been undertaken for the amount of money that has been appropriated.

While I agree that we owe thanks to the ladies and gentlemen who have acted on the advisory and other committees, I feel that in regard to education quite often the wrong people exercise control over expenditures. I think it is a mistake to have in a position where they can void education expenditure people who do not appreciate the necessity for education in this period in which we are living. Mention was made of Mr. Burton, general manager of Robert Simpson Company Limited. With all his attributes I do not think Mr. Burton is a gentleman who should have any say with regard to educational expenditure. I say that because of his own statement. I hold in my hand a report of an interview which he gave to Wellington Jeffers of the Globe and Mail on December 11, 1943. After discussing immigration he went on to discuss education. This is what the gentleman said:

> There is a growing suspicion, however, that many young people would have a greater ambition to succeed in whatever business or vocation they follow if they started to earn earlier. This fully recognizes every cultural claim for giving Canadians a good education, but also says that that great education, experience, is not allowed to have its influence early enough when minds and character and habits are most impressionable and have greatest influence on later life.

I started work at fourteen years. I think that is the best age for many children to commence work. If they are in earnest about going back to school later, most of them nowadays can find a way to do it.

In my work in the Big Brother Movement and as chairman of the Industrial School Advisory Board, I have often found it true that many boys would be better off, after fourteen years of age, to be at work than in school. Probably the fact that many boys and girls over fourteen years of age have for many years been denied the opportunity to get into work when they desired to do so has been much to the disadvantage of the social fabric of the country. Too few recognize the strain involved in the fact that most families in Canada are trying to live on a $2,000 basis with a $1,500 income.

In other words, if you put the children to work earlier, the parents can get something out of them to help meet the family budget.

A large increase in juvenile delinquency has resulted. This will not be cured by theorists, by psychologists, by social welfare workers nor by education experts if the economic strain is forgotten. A great deal of the strain would be saved if children were allowed to take full-time jobs at fourteen years of age and then encouraged later to continue studying either at school or on their own volition.

I have read that because I have received from boys who are taking some of these courses indications that there have been delays in getting the courses, the papers and so forth, and delays in getting the results. From the figures placed before us this afternoon I believe that that is due to an insufficiency of facilities, too small a staff, inadequate funds, too much perhaps of voluntary work, although we all appreciate what has been done in that way; nevertheless a person who undertakes a job voluntarily very often finds other things intervening from time to time which are his livelihood and must come first, and in that way delays may occur. I would point this out to the committee, that we are appropriating only one million dollars for this tremendously important service to which other countries are contributing as much as twenty per cent, not of their total war expenditures, but of their total expenditures on auxiliary services. By comparison our one million dollars, or one five-thousandth of the amount of money we are spending for the war, is an exceedingly small amount for this great educational service. I think that the people who are directing this service, or are responsible in any way or have any say as to the appropriation and the amount of service that shall be given ought to be people who believe in education, who do not believe, as this gentleman does, that a child of fourteen ought to be turned on to the labour market. In every progressive country in the world to-day an attempt is being made to prolong the full-time school age to sixteen. The age of fifteen has already been adopted by many countries, and sixteen is the objective.

I think we should be careful not to allow any of our educational services to be interfered with by people who do not believe in education beyond the age of fourteen, and this gentleman evidently does not. I recognize the fact that he is a great business man and may be doing an excellent job in some other respects in connection with the auxiliary services, but I question whether anyone holding his views on education ought to be in a position where he can in any way interfere with the expenditures, which of course mean either expansion or curtailment of educational facilities. I urge upon the minister and the house that they see to it that we spend much more than we are now spending on our educational services for the army, the navy and the air force and for prisoners of war. I hope that too will go for the entire country.

I was reading only to-day the bulletins which no doubt other members have received because evidently they are sent out from Washington on a list obtained from parliament. They are published by the Soviet Union; and I have noted over the past four or five months the tremendous expansion they are undertaking in their educational facilities, even during the war. Twenty per cent of their budget for civil projects this year is for the expansion of education in Russia. We have to keep on our toes if we are to build up the kind of Canada that most of us hope to see. We may differ as to the methods, but I believe every member of the house wants to see a better Canada than we have at the present time. I think we will all agree, no matter what our views may be as to methods, that a better Canada must be based on a sound and progressive educational policy.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Mr. Chairman, I have listened very carefully to the views which have been expressed by the hon. member. I wish to assure him and the house and the public and members of the armed forces that all the demands made by the departments of national defence for educational services have been met. I wish to make it clear beyond peradventure that it is the departments of national defence which set the pace in this matter. The Canadian Legion Educational Services do not of themselves initiate any particular programme. They carry out what is demanded of them by national defence working through my department.

Mr. Burton, a distinguished gentleman, who is chairman of the national war services advisory board, is fully aware of the fact that when he deals with a budget, as it is called in these circles, he is dealing with requests made by the departments of national defence, and his only motive is to see that their demands are satisfied without extravagance and with due regard for economy. It has been my privilege to meet Mr. Burton only since I have had the honour to be the head of National War Services, but since then I have seen him on a number of occasions and I have been with him and with the ladies and gentlemen of his committee when they were going over the details of these budgets. I have seen them at work on a number of occasions, and I have not discovered in Mr. Burton, in the fairly large number of contacts I have had with him in discussing these and similar proposals, the slightest trace of narrow-mindedness, whether it be in education or in anything else.

I am not of course in a position to interpret the words which are attributed to Mr. Burton through the source mentioned by the hon. gentleman. I do recall from what I heard read that Mr. Burton would have some boys go to work earlier, but he added that they should resume their studies later. He may have had some particular things in his mind when he said that. I judge Mr. Burton from his value as chairman of the advisory board, through his value to my department and his value to Canada. It is needless, I think, for me to say much about his many great acts of charity and public service. Whatever his real views may be upon education, I can assure hon. members that the members of the forces have not suffered; on the contrary, countless numbers have very greatly benefited through the efforts and the contributions in kind and in money made by Mr. Burton.

Speaking so of him, I think that in a general way my remarks about this distinguished gentleman can be applied generally to the other members of that committee.

I say again that I shall review carefully the suggestions and the representations made this afternoon, that Canada may continue to be the best democratic nation on the face of the earth, where true democracy flourishes, in my opinion, better than in any other nation.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has the department or the Canadian Legion Educational Services considered giving to what may be called their students, who are the soldiers who have now been in the army from one to four years, and in attendance at their schools, some form of certificate or diploma which will assist them when they come to make application after the war for positions in business or elsewhere? I believe it would help them materially if they could show evidence of having attended courses given by the Canadian Legion Educational Services. A young man who has spent perhaps five years in the army and makes application for a position in civil life may be more or less handicapped in competition with a young man who has attended business college or some other school, unless he is able to give evidence of having been trained vocationally during the years he was in the army.

I did not hear what the minister said about educational facilities for Canadians in war prisoner camps. I gathered that something was mentioned by him, and I should like a further explanation in that regard if he is in a position to give it. The Germans themselves, being so fond of education, surely would have no objection to the provision of educational facilities for our young men who are now prisoners of war.

I was sorry to hear the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth party say what he did about Mr. Charles Burton.

Mr. COLDWELL: It is true. He said it himself.

Mr. GILLIS: You have his own words.

Mr. MacNICOL: You have stated what he is reported to have said. Now I am going to say what I want to say.

Mr. COLDWELL: I gave his own words.

Mr. STIRLING: You distorted it.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mr. Burton at the moment is gravely ill.

Mr. COLDWELL: I did not know that.

Mr. MacNICOL: He has devoted a lifetime of keen application to the building up of this country. He began at fourteen years of age; he was trained in the school of hard knocks. In that school he learned how to develop this country. For a considerable time he has been the head of a great company, the Robert Simpson company, employing, I suppose, from ten to fifteen thousand people. I am always ready to take off my hat and give the sincerest feeling of my heart to the man who provides employment. I know many Robert Simpson company employees, and I have never heard one of them speak other than highly of the management of the Simpson company. I am not very well acquainted with Mr. Burton, but in my business days I came in contact with his work, and I am sure that anyone who knows the facts will admit that his association with the Toronto Industrial commission and his direction of that organization for quite a number of years has resulted in the establishment in Toronto of between a hundred and two hundred and fifty small companies and the provision of considerable employment. I will never sit quiet and listen to censure of a man who gives employment. Men who give jobs to people in large numbers—

Mr. COLDWELL: One day a week.

Mr. MacNICOL: —deserve commendation instead of censure. I have known, too, of Mr. Burton's activities in the Big Brother movement; they have been legion and have resulted in rich returns to society. I do not know what our great city would have done but for this movement and many others of a helpful kind with which Mr. Burton has been associated. He needs no defence from me, and I do not know him well enough to engage in such a defence in detail; but I do not like to see any of these men who do things, who make things, who give employment in a big way, as Mr. Burton has done, censured for what they have done.

Mr. COLDWELL: I did not censure them for what they had done.

Mr. MacNICOL: Particularly when they started to work as young as the age of fourteen.

Mr. COLDWELL: And want everybody else to start at fourteen.

Mr. MacNICOL: I like to see a young fellow start at an early age, right in the school of hard knocks, if necessary, learning things with which he can not only advance himself but elevate along with himself a multitude of others.

I have known Mr. Burton to be associated with many good works. I know he is most charitable; he gives freely, and what he gives he has made during his lifetime, in a career which began on the lowest rung of the ladder. There is not a man or woman in this chamber who had a more humble beginning than Mr. Charles Burton had, and I know of no one in the House of Commons who has done more for his family and relations, and not only for them, but for a multitude of others, than Mr. Burton has done. I am very sorry that his name has been belittlingly dragged into the story of the educational work which has been so ably recounted by the minister.

May I add, too, that I admire the way in which the minister has accustomed himself to speak English fluently. His achievement is somewhat of a reflection upon those of us who cannot speak his language with equal fluency. I like the way he set out his record of achievement in his department. It is a great achievement as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar observed, and I congratulate the minister upon it, with the small amount of money at his disposal.

I repeat that I hope some way will be found of giving recognition to these young soldier students. It might be done by means of a certificate which could be called the certificate of the Canadian Legion Educational Services, or of the national war services educational committee, or something of the kind. It could be used to support the soldier's application after the war when he finds himself in competition with others who may be able to cite a long list of the schools or other edutional institutions which they have attended. Will the young applicant be able to put in his application:

> I herewith enclose copy of certificate awarded to me by the Canadian Legion Educational Services or by the National War Services Department for the use of my time in the evenings and in my spare time while serving my king and country during the late war?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I am indeed pleased to assure my distinguished and esteemed friend the hon. member for Davenport that there is already in effect a system whereby students will receive certificates of attainment as they leave the army. I take it that is precisely what my hon. friend had in mind. In regard to prisoners of war I did place on Hansard a while ago something of which this is the gist:

> All Canadian Legion educational services courses, all Canadian university courses, and whatever special courses and educational material are requested by next-of-kin are available to Canadian prisoners of war in Germany and enemy occupied territory.

That applies to all prisoners of war except those in Japan. We know that all prisoners of war held by the Japanese must be considered to be suffering more than our men held in prison camps by others of the axis powers. I am sorry I have to make that exception with regard to Japan, but otherwise the statement is correct.

Mr. GREEN: The minister stated that the request for these courses must come from one of the three defence departments; that is, either the navy, the army or the air force. I should like to know to what extent it is possible for a man in hospital to take advantage of these courses, both the educational courses, using the word in the ordinary sense, and the handicraft and art courses. I do hope that there is some way by which these men can get all these courses. My understanding is that at the present time that is not the case, and yet these men have little else to do. They are in hospital where practically all their time could be devoted to taking those courses. Not only would it benefit them mentally but it would also be of great aid to their health. Could the minister tell the committee what the position is with regard to the men in the various hospitals not only in Canada but also in the Mediterranean and Great Britain?

Mr. LaFLECHE: The hon. member is quite correct in stating that I said all these proposals must originate with one of the defence forces, but the courses he has mentioned are available at this moment to the men whom he mentioned. It may be that the officer commanding the hospital the hon. member had in mind has not yet asked the district educational officer to see that the courses are made available to the patients; but if he will inquire again from the district educational officer he will see that these courses are available to him, as they are to those overseas.

Mr. GREEN: To what extent are they being given in the large pensions and national health hospitals, for example, the Christie Street hospital in Toronto, the Shaughnessy hospital in Vancouver, and the other large pensions and national health hospitals in Canada?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I think my hon. friend has in mind the cases where the civilian officer of the Canadian Legion calls and makes the necessary arrangements for cases such as that.

Mr. GREEN: No. What I am interested in is to what extent the men who are in these large hospitals are able to take the educational courses. How many of them are taking the courses? I believe if the minister checks that he will find there is a field there for a great extension of this educational work. It may be possible for the men to get it under the present regulations, but I doubt very much whether they are getting it to any large extent.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I am afraid I must say I shall have to look it up. I have forgotten the figures of how many men are taking it, how many patients in any given hospital out of the total number of hospitals are taking the classes. I gave the total figures and they go away up; however, I shall see that my departmental officers make a check. Most assuredly those courses that have been made available should be brought to the attention of those eligible several times.

Mr. GREEN: The number of men in those hospitals is increasing all the time. The wounded men are coming home from overseas and it is likely the number will increase as time goes on. It may well be that that field will be larger than the field in the actual fighting services.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Ultimately, yes.

Mr. GREEN: I would ask the minister to check up on that situation and let us know, perhaps after the six o'clock adjournment, what the situation is at the present time.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. LaFLECHE: I shall do my best to get the figures but I cannot promise to have them ready for to-night. I shall, however, give them to the committee. I wish to assure the hon. member that the men he has in mind are eligible for these courses, and I shall check it up to see that the proper people are apprised of the fact that a number of these men either do not seem to be aware of it or perhaps are not intent upon taking the courses.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I should like the matter of the advisory committee to be cleared up a little more. As I understand the situation, any private of the armed forces may make application for educational services and that application goes through the minister's department. Does the advisory committee decide whether this service shall be given, or does it decide the amount of money that shall be spent in these particular services, or does it simply make a recommendation regarding the amount of money that shall be spent, which, as I understand, the minister has always approved? I wish to find out what the position is.

Mr. LaFLECHE: The third supposition is correct. The advisory board has power to make recommendations to the Minister of National War Services; and I may say again to the hon. member that on no occasions have I cut down their recommendation in regard to educational services. Perhaps on the contrary I may say that I have at all times made it quite clear that I favour granting educational facilities to our boys and girls in uniform.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: The minister has said that on no occasion has he reduced the amount recommended. Would he make the same statement in regard to increasing the amount?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I put it this way: I have always argued or made it clear that I was in favour of granting educational facilities to the full extent desired by the Department of National Defence concerned. It might be said, therefore, that I have increased the amounts recommended, but only by my never-failing readiness to say that I believed in education, which has had the effect of preventing decreases whereas I have not as yet increased an amount recommended.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Is it a widespread practice to have the amounts voted by parliament to be spent by departments of government pass under review by a committee of business men before they are spent? Just how widespread is that practice within the minister's department, or within other departments?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I think the answer is that all expenditures by all departments should and do receive very careful scrutiny. Sometimes that scrutiny is by what are termed permanent civil servants; in other cases it is by temporary civil servants, and in others, as in the case of the board we have been discussing, by those who are serving Canada in the class of dollar a year men and women, though they do not receive the dollar. They serve an excellent purpose in scrutinizing the proposed activities, or rather the proposals made to carry out the demands of the Department of National Defence. In that way comparatively large expenditures may be scrutinized by those who are not full-time empl yees of any department.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Is this, to the minister's knowledge, the only instance in which the expenditure of money voted by parliament for a specific purpose is largely determined by committees of business men?

Mr. LaFLECHE: That is a question I had not anticipated, but I think we can place what is done by the national war services funds advisory board on about the same basis as what is done by the various associations which receive grants from the government. I need not name any particular association, but to numbers of them, particularly in the past, this house voted money to permit certain activities to be carried on. The amounts so voted were, I am perfectly certain, decided after consultation with ladies and gentlemen who had given careful thought to the extent of the activities in question. I think basically that case is about as good a parallel to the present instance as one could find. I would have to look up the situation in regard to other departments.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Are there any other instances in the minister's department?

Mr. LaFLECHE: No; that is the only one.

Mr. COLDWELL: Then where does the responsibility of parliament come in?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I take the responsibility. I do not have to act upon the recommendations of the committee.

Mr. COLDWELL: I realize that, but surely an extra-parliamentary committee supervising a government expenditure is something entirely new for a democratic parliament such as ours. It seems to me that we are witnessing something creeping into our parliamentary procedure which we as members of parliament ought to resist. If this is permitted to go on, by and by we may see all kinds of committees of business men coming along after parliament has appropriated the sums of money and deciding how and where that money shall be spent. Perhaps the minister can justify this, though I cannot; nevertheless I think the principle is bad and wrong, and one which this house should condemn.

Mr. LaFLECHE: The committee is properly named; it is an advisory committee which has been in existence for nearly four years. As I tried to explain some time ago, the committee does not initiate projects; it does not say where the money shall be spent. It merely recommends that so much money, or a maximum of so much, could be devoted to a certain purpose to good advantage, and goes into the matter in detail.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is what parliament does when it adopts the estimates. That is the business of parliament, not the business of any advisory board composed of private citizens.

Mr. LaFLECHE: For the moment at least my hon. friend is doing very much the same thing in regard to these estimates, though perhaps it is done in a somewhat different way. Representatives of the several auxiliary services, including the Canadian Legion, the Salvation Army and so forth, sit around a table with the committee and discuss the matter. They say, "National defence wants to do this thing. How do you intend to do it; what will it cost and why?" These matters must be gone into in great detail, by the committee in question and by my department. Officials of my department go over the details of the proposed expenditures in regard to these various projects. Thus we have the advantage of the constructive suggestions of these bright, mature men and women, in addition to what we have in mind ourselves. I can assure hon. members that this committee has done very well by Canada and by the members of the armed forces. I see in this procedure very great advantage to all concerned.

Mr. CHURCH: I have had a long connection with this charity business. At the present time education and other kinds of auxiliary work are being added which are really entirely outside the charities act. Where do we stand on this matter at the present time? The present Minister of National Defence for Air, who was then Minister of Pensions and National Health, on September 9, 1939, shortly after war was declared, introduced and put through the house in about half an hour what is known as the charities act to set up a regulatory body over all the auxiliary services which were brought into being by the war. What was the result? These services had to apply to the minister for authority to carry on, and they had to be listed with his department.

The matter was discussed in this house on July 13 last, when the attendance was very small because a dinner was being held in connection with the meeting of the empire parliamentary association; but in the second year of the war complaints were made, and as a result the Minister of National Defence decided to send the late Doctor Manion to England as a commissioner to investigate and report upon the various bodies that had qualified under the act, including the Canadian Legion, the Knights of Columbus, the Salvation Army, the Y.M.C.A., the Y.W.C.A., the Navy League and some others, to see if there was overlapping. Doctor Manion made a report, which I believe showed considerable duplication, and there is no doubt that there was a great deal of duplication. We have altogether too many of these organizations doing the same work.

Then back in May of last year I asked what the proposed expenditure was for 1943, and in reply the minister gave a list totalling about $6,000,000. Along in July, however, when we asked for a break-down of the figures, that amount had been increased to $7,000,000. A meeting was held here in Ottawa from which the representatives of all these bodies went away feeling very happy, as the hon. member for Qu'Appelle said. No wonder they were happy! They got a million dollars out of it, in the same week. No wonder they were happy. Then they all left Ottawa, singing Hip! Hip! Hurrah! for the various organizations.

Let us see where we are in this matter. We had gone up from $6,000,000 to $7,000,000. Now we have reached a sky-high figure of $12,000,000, which is fifty per cent higher, to be expended this year. Of course they serve many more soldiers now overseas. Then one comes along and says, "We are qualified under the Charities Act." We know that all these organizations are doing good work. They are all doing good work; there is no doubt about that. But that is not the point. The point is: Are we running this affair in a businesslike manner, from a commercial aspect? Are the taxpayers paying, through overlapping and lack of control, once, twice, or three or four times for it?

Those people went away feeling happy, and it was thought that would be the last increase to the end of the war. Now the amount is up to $12,000,000. The finest organization of the lot, namely the Red Cross, came along later in the day and said, "We do not want to be in with these other organizations. We are a separate group, because we have a standard agreement, as we had in the last war, through the International Red Cross. We cannot take government funds because we are a voluntary organization and are in a position quite different from that of the other organizations." There may be some weight in that argument, I am ready to admit. No one can speak in greater praise than I of the Red Cross, because I saw its work in two wars, and during the period of peace between those two wars. I know it was doing a great deal of charitable work. But it must be pointed out that there is duplication. Let me tell the committee this, that that one organization did not get a cent from the auxiliary services. These services have now been expanded, until they extend almost to all the letters of the alphabet.

I have in mind another body which has done a great amount of good work, and has itself collected about $2,500,000. I have in mind the British war victims fund, sponsored by the Evening Telegram of Toronto. They do not get a cent from this vote, but they have provided care for those people, and have done good work not only in England but also in Malta and many other places, since the beginning of the war. For that they have not received a cent. They are a voluntary organization, and do not receive anything from this vote. They have financed everything they have done, and their educational work has been good.

What do we find when we come to what are known as auxiliary services? I can say now that the report of the commissioner was never carried out—and I refer to the late Doctor Manion. That was a good report, but nothing has been done about it. Not only do the services get funds from this $12,000,000, but they go to the provinces, and as a result we find much duplication. They have campaigns throughout Canada. The Y.M.C.A. had a campaign for $250,000; and the Navy League, which has done good work, has had a campaign for $200,000. We know that the Salvation Army, one of the finest groups of all in the country, conduct separate campaigns for funds. They go to the municipalities and ask for tag days. There is a tag day almost every Saturday, with the exception of a few Saturdays in the middle of summer.

The minister said last year that he hoped they would expand, and I have no doubt they have expanded. I know the minister has done good work, and I have no doubt, too, that many of these organizations will follow the army in the field. But there is duplication in all this. To-day the army has an organized press following it—a small standing army. And I can tell the committee this, that when there was criticism about Dieppe and Dunkirk, there was military criticism which suggested that there had been some tip-offs. But the army is followed around, in this Hollywood fashion, wherever it goes, by many organizations, all of which do good work.

The same applies in connection with these auxiliary services. Some of them are operating in connection with churches and other charitable organizations. Some organizations may want to supply a movable canteen, or to send one overseas. Under present circumstances that is not permitted, because of provisions in the War Charities Act. Well, if we are going to have a War Charities Act, then let us have a War Charities Act, or wipe it off the books altogether.

So far as I can see, the auditor general has no control over this fund. My hon. friend, the Minister of National Defence for the Army is not at the moment in his seat. However, the other night, speaking about the war expenditures committee, he said that the auditor general had control of those expenditures, and quoted from a blue book. I hold in my hand a letter from the auditor general, and I shall send a copy of it to the minister; in fact, I did send him a copy. This letter is addressed to me under date of October 2, 1942, and in it the auditor general states that everything I said was absolutely correct, and that he has no control over the war expenditures committee, nor has he any control over expenditures under the war appropriation measure.

A new officer known as the comptroller of the treasury is now in charge of any expenditures coming within the five corners of the war appropriation measure. I refer to security and defence, peace and order, the conduct of military affairs, protection of trade and the carrying out of measures deemed necessary, by order in council.

I can see very little public control over these organizations. I have before me a note with respect to sporting goods used by the auxiliary services, and that brings to mind the fact that in a pamphlet sent out from week to week by the Department of Munitions and Supply there was an item—I believe it was in the issue for last May—stating that that department had contributed $175,000 a year to send sporting goods to the armed forces within Canada and overseas. Many organizations are doing the same thing.

I have looked into this matter as well as any hon. member, and I am convinced there is duplication by application to other departments for funds, and that some restraint should be imposed. What was the purpose of the War Charities Act? It was to protect an invasion by auxiliary organizations of the time allotted to victory loan campaigns. The public are asking that something be done, and that some brake or check be imposed on some of these expenditures.

Let me add that I receive many letters from the forces. I believe the minister should carry out the object of the War Charities Act, and should not allow these organizations to come here without hindrance and increase their vote from $7,000,000 to $12,000,000 in one year. There is no doubt the work done is good work, but from what I have seen of it I am convinced that there is much duplication, as there was in the last war. People club together to collect money to send equipment to the soldiers. Even the school children have been raising funds for movable motor canteens, and I say it was never intended that under the War Charities Act that this condition should exist. It was for that very purpose that, when war broke out, there was a determination not to have charity as we had it in the last war.

We are going to protect the victory loan, and see that something is done to eliminate some of the mistakes made during the last war. I know the minister has given a great deal of time to this work, because I have seen him on many occasions in Toronto. His work has been laborious, but I would ask him to try to straighten this matter out. I really believe there should be some further meeting in Ottawa of these public bodies with a view to reducing expenditures, and thereby protecting the pockets of the taxpayers. I say that because with victory loans, Red Cross campaigns, and other campaigns almost every month, I do not see where the money is to come from in this fifth year of the war.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): As one listened to the statement by the minister this afternoon he could not help appreciating the great debt of gratitude owed by the citizens of Canada to the executive of the Canadian Legion. It has been through their efforts that the present educational programme has been carried on and made available to the armed services. Those people above all others in this country are deserving of the gratitude of every Canadian citizen, not only the soldiers and their relatives but those of us who live from coast to coast.

I well remember in the early days of the war suggesting to the then war services minister, the Hon. Mr. Thorson, that instead of having tag days and collections of different kinds for war charities and auxiliaries, they should be taken care of by means of taxation and a pro rata distribution made. I should like to know upon what basis distribution is made to the various organizations such as the Canadian Legion, the Salvation Army and other auxiliary services. I understand that the Red Cross is the only organization allowed to make a canvass but they must first obtain a permit from the department. I desire to know what control the minister's department has over the Red Cross in other respects.

I wish to repeat what has been said by other hon. members this afternoon and suggest that certificates of educational qualification be granted to those chaps in the armed services who are taking courses. Educational standards will mean a great deal to those chaps in the post-war period, and certificates of standing will be valuable to them in getting employment in certain quarters.

I had an experience over the week-end when I met a young chap who had been in the Dieppe raid and was taken prisoner. He had been in a prison camp in Germany until October when he was repatriated. I was glad to learn from him that those men are now able to attend educational classes in that large prison camp. That is a worth-while project and I am glad to know that those men have an opportunity to improve their education. This chap enlisted at the outbreak of war in the Cameron Highlanders of Winnipeg. I was interested personally because he is a pal of another chap who worked on my farm prior to the outbreak of war. This man had had to work very hard all his life. He was married and had four children when he enlisted and went overseas, and I am glad to think he is now able to attend one of these classes and improve his educational qualifications.

All this is due to the Canadian Legion and its executive, and they deserve great praise for the manner in which they have carried out this work. I know that in the early stages of the war they did have difficulty in having their budgets passed by this board headed by Mr. Burton and I am glad to hear the minister say that they are now receiving practically all they ask for. I should like to have him explain how the division is made among the various auxiliary services such as the Legion, the Salvation Army and others.

We cannot say too much in praise of the volunteer efforts which have been put forth by the citizens of this country in connection with the Red Cross. Had it not been for the Red Cross many men who have been taken prisoners of war would have had a rather tough time at certain periods. The Red Cross parcels have proved a wonderful help, and we owe thanks to those citizens who have given so generously of their time and money to foster the work of this organization. Many of us do not know just how much these parcels mean to prisoners of war.

[Mr. J. A. Ross.]

Mr. LaFLECHE: The hon. member for Souris has asked about the Canadian Red Cross. Of its own volition that organization chose not to come in with the other auxiliary services. They pointed out, and have pointed out since, that the Canadian Red Cross Society is in close affiliation with the International Red Cross Society and their work is covered by conventions. Therefore they felt that they could do better work and their position would be clearer if they continued to ask Canadians to provide privately for their many requirements. As in the case of the auxiliary services, the Department of National War Services looks over the budget of the Red Cross and discusses it with them. Finally a certificate is issued to permit them to go out to try to raise so much money. It goes without saying that every hon. member and every Canadian wish the Canadian Red Cross well. They do a splendid work. A great deal of the money they obtain is used to provide food parcels for prisoners of war, not only Canadian and British but of allied countries.

I should like to say to the hon. member for Souris what I said to the hon. member for Davenport, that students who come under the Canadian Legion Educational Services will receive certificates of attainment setting out the success they have had under that plan. The hon. member wanted to know how much money was supplied to the different organizations. I can give him the figures for 1943. While they are not up to date they will show substantially just what has taken place.

Before I give the figures I should like to reiterate that it is the Department of National Defence which says to us, "We need this at such and such a place," be it a hostel, a canteen or an educational service; they tell us what is required and what auxiliary service they want to carry it out. In other words, the particular department of national defence say what they want and by whom they wish it carried out. My department does not say which auxiliary service will run the canteen at point A, the educational service at point B, the hostel at point C, or anything like that. The approximate figures for 1943 are as follows:

Canadian Legion	$3,286,000
Knights of Columbus	1,782,000
Salvation Army	1,928,000
Y.M.C.A.	4,000,000
Y.W.C.A.	520,000
Navy League	361,000

The total is approximately $11,900,000. The Y.W.C.A. is the only auxiliary service looking after the women of our armed forces, and it operates in Canada only. The Navy League operates in Canada only in so far as these figures are concerned. I would point out to the hon. member for Broadview that the auxiliary services I have just mentioned provide in Canada, in Newfoundland and overseas, the type of service for the Canadian armed services which is provided for the United States forces by the U.S.O. The American Red Cross provides the same services abroad for the United States as is provided in Canada by these auxiliary services. The navy, army and air force institute provides auxiliary services to the imperial forces similar to those provided by the organizations I have mentioned. It will be seen that it is a necessity to look after the morale and the education of the members of the armed forces, and so far as Canadians are concerned, those necessities are made available through these organizations.

There has been an increase, and I am very happy that my hon. friend the member for Broadview brought it up. The increase is due to the very large increase there has been in the number of armed personnel as compared with the year previous. There has been an increase of over fifty per cent in the number looked after by these auxiliary services. I should like the hon. member for Broadview to believe me when I say I am satisfied there is no duplication, and that is borne out by the fact that there is one authority for these six organizations and no two operate the same service.

It will please the hon. member for Broadview who, along with others, to my knowledge has for so long been such a great worker for the returned men—I know and have always admired his very great patriotism—to learn that by reasons of the precautions taken and the arrangements made well in advance by the representatives of the auxiliary services, comforts for the soldiers went to Sicily and to Italy on the very same boats as the soldiers themselves. It is a peculiar story, but some of these comforts, cigarettes and so forth, were packed in Canadian tanks for the voyage across the water. The tanks, of course, were emptied of the comforts before they went ashore and the comforts were carried ashore separately. Therefore the representatives of these auxiliary services shared in the great glory of carrying on side by side in Sicily and Italy with our Canadian fighting men.

Mr. CHURCH: On July 13 of last year, at page 4751 of Hansard, the minister gave a break-down for these six or seven services, showing the estimates of their requirements and the allotments.

Mr. LaFLECHE: The figures I then gave were of expenditures. It is not possible with any degree of accuracy to estimate far in advance just what the forthcoming year will bring in the way of expenditure, because there are always changes, new institutions and new establishments. It depends to some extent upon the changes in training. The training is now pretty nearly completed, and our moving armies must be followed by these auxiliary services. That costs money, of course. The increase is due to the establishment of numerous new bases, camps and sites in Canada on both Atlantic and Pacific coasts; new services to navy personnel due to the establishment of new bases; the increase of women personnel in the forces, requiring new services, particularly the establishment of urban health centres; changes in the nature of overseas operations, including new theatres of war. The educational services were budgeted for a year and a half ago, necessarily, so that we can look after the beginning of the coming school year. Then there was the necessity for capital expenditures for the purpose of furnishing Canadian supplies in Newfoundland and in actual theatres of war. There was also an increase in navy, army and air force personnel of approximately fifty-four per cent over the previous year.

Mr. CHURCH: I understood that under the War Charities Act the minister was required to lay before parliament, within fifteen days after the opening of the session, a statement of the disbursement of these moneys, audited by the auditor general. Has that practice been followed?

Mr. LaFLECHE: That comes in the auditor general's report.

Mr. GRAHAM: Mr. Chairman, I wanted to add my meed of praise for the very fine work that the Canadian Legion war services is doing in bringing educational services to the young men and young women in our armed forces who desire to make use of them. Education in its broad sense is the great leavening force which, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar suggested, will in the long run make democracy work. I do not think, however, that the word education should be narrowed down—I do not think he intended to do so—to merely scholastic training. In its broad programme the war services organization has done and is doing excellent work among our young men and our young women in the armed forces, particularly on those occasions when they might feel life becoming monotonous and when their youthful energy demands some form of activity to occupy themselves. If we can on such occasions divert their attention to improving their minds and equipping themselves a little better to take their part in the post-war world, they themselves—and Canada—will reap a very great reward from this educational work that is being carried on under this department of government.

I do not know Mr. Burton, to whom the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has referred, but I do say that he and the members of his committee must be given some credit at least for the very fine results which the minister has laid before us this afternoon. I will go farther. Certainly I would not condemn Mr. Burton for suggesting that it might be wise for young students at the age of fourteen, or fifteen or sixteen, to go out into life.

Mr. COLDWELL: He said fourteen.

Mr. GRAHAM: Many educationalists of the highest repute believe that it would be a very wise thing if every student who intended to pursue higher education were given an opportunity at some stage to go out into the world and learn something of the practical things in life, learn some of those things which a good student must know if he is to make the best use of higher education.

Mr. COLDWELL: Fourteen is normally too young for that.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am inclined to the opinion that fourteen may be too young, but nevertheless Mr. Burton was only suggesting their going out into the world for a period and from my experience in my own family I consider it a wise thing to do, so that the young student, having gained actual experience in the practical things of life, will then take up his education with a new purpose and a new energy to equip himself for life. Undoubtedly he will be benefited greatly by that period of settling down, shall I say, into a purpose that will guide him in the avocation he has chosen. It happened to be my privilege to meet some of the officials in charge of this particular work, and cerainly nothing that I learned on that visit to the headquarters of the Canadian war services lessened the admiration which I have for the work that is being done.

I was told of one incident which will illustrate the real value of education as a morale builder, apart from the training which is given by any educational programme. I believe that many persons, particularly young people, have a sense of inferiority which may develop into a complex if, in this day and age, they find themselves not equipped with reasonable educational qualifications. I was informed that out of a number of army units—regiments or battalions—about one hundred indivdiuals were about to be discharged as unlikely to become efficient soldiers. Anybody who has been in the army knows that in any battalion there are certain individuals who do not fit in and cannot apparently become an efficient part of army life. Consequently these men were being drained out of these battalions and were about to be discharged, when it was suggested that they be brought together and that some examination be made of the factors which rendered them unfit for the duty which was being asked of them. The result of the experiment was remarkable. These men were discovered to be quite illiterate. They could not write and they could not read. Not knowing what was posted on the order board, or able to read any publications, they were incapable of participating in the discussion and appreciation of the orders and documents which were being distributed among their comrades. Accordingly the Canadian Legion war services undertook the task of teaching them to read and write. I shall not enlarge on what was done, but I would point out the result. Of the hundred individuals involved in this experiment, eighty were returned to their battalions, and their subsequent records were those of fine, able members of our Canadian army forces.

That is an extreme instance of the value of education. It shows that the real reason why these young men did not fit into army life was their complete inability to appreciate the nature and purposes of the tasks imposed upon them. To them these tasks seemed nothing but drudgery, a series of regulations and orders which perhaps irritated them and aroused their antagonism. The ability to read and write gave them an opportunity to appreciate the contribution they were making, so that they went back to their units with an entirely different viewpoint. Of course, in all walks of life, including our own, and at all ages, further education along proper lines greatly increases morale and heightens the appreciation we have of the part we play in life.

For this reason, while I do not know that the department over which the minister presides is not sufficiently generous toward this particular project, I urge upon the minister the advisability of making generous provision to carry on this very fine work.

One thought which gave me some concern as I gave consideration to the work of this particular branch in connection with our armed services was that the young men and women who perhaps least of all need this assistance are the most likely voluntarily to take advantage of it and to devote the time and effort necessary to equip themselves, and unfortunately those who most need this assistance will be the last to volunteer. I suggest to the minister that he strongly urge those in charge of this particular programme to see to it, not only that the opportunity is given to all these young men and young women, but that a certain amount of encouragement—not compulsion—is given to those who most need it to take advantage of the opportunities of training in some particular line. You can lead a horse to water but you cannot make it drink. Sometimes, however, by wise methods you can persuade it. I suggest to the minister that that is one point to keep in mind, namely, that most likely those who readily volunteer to take advantage of this splendid opportunity will be those who least need it, and an effort should be made to bring to the attention of those who do not appreciate it, the advantages to be gained in equipping themselves for later life.

We have learned with great interest of the programme of post-war rehabilitation. This is an important opportunity which, if made use of, will prepare those who take advantage of it, either not to require government assistance in rehabilitating themselves, or, if they do require it, the better to take advantage of it.

In conclusion, I would, as I say, add my meed of praise to the organization itself and to the committee of volunteers who have made possible the results which the minister has outlined to-day. It is a great work, and we can readily and wisely provide the funds which will enlarge and expand and make even greater and finer the results already achieved.

Progress reported.

PRIVATE BILLS

NEW BRUNSWICK RAILWAY COMPANY

Mr. H. R. EMMERSON (Westmorland) moved the second reading of bill No. 39, respecting the New Brunswick Railway Company.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): So far as I can recall I do not think that on the introduction of this bill or on the first reading of it the hon. member who is introducing it gave any comprehensive statement as to its effect. This would seem to be the appropriate time to have that done.

Mr. EMMERSON: Mr. Speaker, this bill had its origin in the senate and was passed by the senate on March 22 of this year. The purpose of this bill is to enable the company to reduce its capital by paying off pro rata among its shareholders paid-up capital which is now in excess of its wants.

The company was incorporated in 1870 by chapter 49 of the statutes of New Brunswick. In 1881 the work of the company was declared to be work for the general advantage of Canada, and the company is subject to the jurisdiction of parliament and to the Railway Act. On July 1, 1890, the company leased and demised all its lines of railroad, having an aggregate length of about 420 miles, and all the company's plant, rolling stock and equipment, to the Caandian Pacific Railway Company for a term of 990 years. As a matter of fact, the railway has become part and parcel of the Canadian Pacific railway system in New Brunswick.

By this lease, subsequently made binding on both parties by parliament in 1891, the Canadian Pacific Railway company undertook to maintain and operate the railway system and the New Brunswick Railway company agreed to maintain the corporate existence of the company until the termination of the lease. It is accordingly impossible for the company to go into voluntary liquidation and distribute its assets. Apart from the railway properties the only remaining assets of the company were certain freehold timber lands in New Brunswick which had been granted to it by way of subsidy when the original lines were constructed.

Since 1890 the business of the company has consisted solely in managing these timber lands, granting stumpage rights, and from time to time selling portions of them. In recent years these lands have consisted of about 1,600,000 acres; a substantial portion of this acreage has now been sold to purchasers in New Brunswick, and the purchase prices have already been paid or shortly will be paid in full. The result is that the company will have on hand capital in excess of its requirements. The capital stock of the company consists of 30,000 fully paid shares of the par value of $100 each.

Under the Dominion Companies Act a company incorporated by letters patent can reduce its capital and pay off any paid-up capital which is in excess of its wants (section 49).

Under the Railway Act power is given to a company to increase its capital stock from time to time, subject to the approval of two-thirds of the shareholders and of the governor in council (section 78), but no general provision is made for reduction of capital. Consequently in each case it is necessary to apply to parliament for legislation permitting such reduction.

In the present bill the by-law enacting the reduction has to be confirmed by at least two-thirds of the shareholders and subsequently by the governor in council, after publication of notices of the application for the reduction. In practice this would mean that the governor in council would act on a report and recommendation of the Minister of Transport, because the New Brunswick Railway Company falls within the jurisdiction of his department. The company would, naturally, satisfy the Minister of Transport that they had taken care of liabilities and had funds on hand with which to pay off their shareholders.

I understand that the Minister of Transport has no objection to the bill nor has the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. It is also my understanding that the income tax authorities have no objection to this bill which, in point of fact, merely gives the company, which is to all intents and purposes a land company, the same rights as any other company subject to section 49 of the Dominion Companies Act.

Full details and explanations will be given by those representing the company when the bill comes before the railway committee.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Could the hon. member tell us why this bill came in the back door of the Senate instead of coming into the House of Commons?

Mr. EMMERSON: I understand that is usual. I know of no reason why it came in the back door as the hon. member suggests.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is what makes me suspicious. I wonder why that was done.

Mr. McLARTY: Private bills are usually introduced in the first instance in the senate, which explains why this reference comes from the other house to this house.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Why the exception in the case of bill No. 37?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What is the amount involved in this bill?

Mr. EMMERSON: I am afraid I cannot give the details of that, but that information can be supplied when the bill is in committee. The capitalization of the company is 30,000 fully paid-up shares at $100 each. I make that $3,000,000.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

SECOND READING

Bill No. 40, respecting Gore District Mutual Fire Insurance Company.—Mr. Homuth.

[Mr. Emmerson.]

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL WAR SERVICES

Departmental administration, $90,907.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The following news item appeared in the Ottawa Evening Journal of February 17, 1944:

Four Canadian women—Mrs. Gordon Konantz of Winnipeg, Miss Agathe Dore of Montreal, Mrs. Jules Laine of Toronto and Miss Helen Doherty of Ottawa—have arrived in the United Kingdom to study the voluntary war work of British women's organizations, the war services department announced Wednesday. The trip was sponsored by the department.

Different fields of study have been allotted to each of the party, so that as wide a survey as possible could be made in the time available. The visit will include both rural and urban centres in the United Kingdom.

The four reports to the department will deal not only with women's war activities but also with their plans for work in the post-war period.

Another item appearing in the same newspaper under date of January 4, 1944, reads:

While the war services department refused to give any information, Liberal ward workers in Ottawa West to-day were protesting the appointment of Miss Helen Doherty to head a delegation of four women on an "inspection" trip to Britain.

Miss Doherty, former secretary of the National Liberal Federation of Women, and now special assistant to War Services Minister LaFleche, has been assigned to survey the work done in Britain by women's volunteer organizations.

And further:

It had been established by this morning that the Catholic Women's League, the Red Cross, Protestant Women's organizations, the Y.W.C.A. and other organizations, which have been doing the actual work in voluntary services, had not been consulted on the appointments.

Miss Doherty left her post in 1940 as secretary of the national federation of Liberal women and shortly afterwards received an appointment to the war services department.

On March 18, 1943, I asked certain questions in regard to Miss Doherty, as follows:

1. In what capacity is Miss Helen Doherty employed in the Department of National War Services?

2. What are the duties attached to such position?

3. How long has she been employed in such position?

4. What is the total remuneration which has been paid to her, either by way of salary or honorarium?

5. What is the total which has been paid to her by way of travelling expenses and living allowance?

The minister gave the following information:

1. General assistant.

2. Assists generally, makes surveys and special studies of activities of the department, exercises supervision as required.

3. Two years and six months.

4. $9,190.

5. $162.85 travelling expenses.

The minister stated that this lady made surveys for the department. Later on I should like him to tell us what surveys she has made. Then on March 24, 1943, I asked another question:

What sums and on what dates were payments made to Miss Helen Doherty as special assistant to the Minister of National War Services?

The minister replied as follows:

The following payments have been made to Miss Helen Doherty as general assistant, Department of National War Services, as authorized by order in council P.C. 118/8785 on the 26th of September, 1942:

1942—
October 7—To August 31, 1942 (deductions were not then being made at the source)	$7,090 00
October 7—To September 30, 1942, $300 less deductions	199 42
October 31—To October 31, 1942, $300 less deductions	199 42
November 30—To November 30, 1942, $300 less deductions	182 61
December 31—To December 31, 1942, $300 less deductions	182 61
1943—
January 30—To January 31, 1943, $300 less deductions	182 61
February 27—To February 28, 1943, $300 less deductions	182 61

On March 5, 1941, the hon. member for Huron North asked these questions:

1. Is Miss Helen Doherty employed in the Department of National War Services?

2. If so, in what capacity?

3. When was she appointed?

4. What salary or other remuneration is paid to her?

5. Was she assigned to this position by the civil service commission?

6. If so, on what date was the assignment made?

7. If no assignment was made by the civil service commission, by whom was the appointment made and under what authority?

8. Was any request made to the civil service commission for the appointment of Miss Doherty to such position?

9. If so, what action did the civil service commission take thereon?

I should like the minister to answer these questions, and I wish to ask further why it is necessary for Miss Doherty to visit this House of Commons quite frequently. I know she was around last session. I do not think she called upon any of the Progressive Conservative members or any of the members belonging to the other opposition groups, but certainly she paid visits to Liberal members and senators. I should like to know what amount Miss Doherty received by way of expenses for her trip to Britain, and what the other women received. I should like to know also if we can get a copy of any report that may have been made as a result of this trip. I think the committee would like to know what Miss Doherty does in the department, and also why the lump sum of $7,090 was paid to her. I think it is very unusual to pay a lump sum to a person who is supposed to have been in the service for two years. Why was she not paid on a monthly basis from the very first?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I take it, Mr. Chairman, that the questions which have been read by the hon. member have been answered in this house.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Partly answered.

Mr. LaFLECHE: As to the matter the hon. gentleman mentioned a moment ago, in regard to this young lady visiting the House of Commons, I have no knowledge of that unless it was to call at my office with reports when she had occasion to do so, as do other employees of my department. As to her expenses for the trip to Great Britain, and the expenses of the other ladies, I have no knowledge; this is the first time that question has been asked, but I shall be very happy to get the information and bring it down in the house. My hon. friend asks what Miss Doherty does. When the Department of National War Services was first contemplated a staff had to be found, a plan of organization had to be drawn up and certain positions had to be filled. I have it on good authority that at the very beginning this lady was considered for a position carrying a remuneration greater than she is now paid. I do not know precisely what was in mind but I have seen a proposed plan of organization under which the department was to have been divided into four divisions, and Miss Doherty was under consideration to head one of these divisions at that time. That did not materialize. Yet she had been called into the department in August or September, 1940, on the understanding that she was being called in to take over the work. I think she was given an idea of about what was in mind by way of organizing the department. She remained there and, finally, at the time mentioned by the hon. member for Peterborough West, she was paid at the rate of $10 a day, if I remember correctly, for the time she had put in in the department.

Then she was appointed general assistant, or special assistant, at a rate of $3,600 a year. That is the story of Miss Doherty's coming into the department and remaining there. Since then Miss Doherty has gone to Great Britain, with three other ladies, to represent the department there. She has returned, and with the other three ladies is busy writing a report of what was seen. Since her return, however, she has taken on other duties, one having to do with discussions concerning repatriates, which have just arisen, and about which I do not know very much myself.

Another piece of work she has taken on for the department—or for me, if you like—has been to follow the proceedings of the special committee of the House of Commons on radio broadcasting. Then, again, since her return to Canada, very recently also she has been a member of an interdepartmental committee in respect of UNRRA, which was mentioned last week in the house.

That, I regret, is, as well as I can remember, the hon. member's questions.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Would the minister tell us why these four women were picked? How were they picked?

Mr. PINARD: The department picked them; you would ask.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I know I have asked; we want to know.

Mr. PINARD: You ought to know.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): We want to know.

Mr. PINARD: I should like to know what difference there will be, so far as the interests of the general public are concerned. Every member who rises from the other side of the house—not every one, but some of them—always says, "I want to know, and the people want to know". Do the people ask you to find that out?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The people of Canada certainly need to know where their money is going. And any hon. member in this house who thinks they do not want to know is absolutely wrong. The hon. member who has just spoken has made a very peculiar statement. It is a statement which will go down with this government, and will help to put the government absolutely out of power when the next election comes along. The hon. member who has just spoken knows perfectly well that money is being spent which should not be spent.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Squandered.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Money is spent in that way. Is there an hon. member in the house who knows of any civil servants being paid a lump sum for work they did two years ago?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Just a hand-out.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Is there any hon. member who knows of that? If so, I wish he would rise in his place and tell us.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The question is whether it is due or not.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I believe the amount is $9,070—a lot of money.

Mr. PINARD: For how long?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West). And you are asking the people of Canada to-day to go out and buy victory bonds.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): And for what service?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): We want to know, and there is no reason why a member of parliament should not know. I asked a question in the house to-day in regard to grapefruit juice. The minister in his reply said it would not be in the public interest to give that information. Then I asked if he would tell me privately. Why did I ask if he would tell me privately? Because I wanted it on Hansard that a member of the House of Commons—

An hon. MEMBER: Order.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I do not think the hon. member has any right to say "order".

Mr. ROSS (Souris): He does not want the story.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): We want the truth; do not try to hide it. I asked a question, and asked if the minister would let me see the figures and the names. I asked that for one purpose only, namely to have it on Hansard that a member of this house in opposition has absolutely no chance in the world of getting at the facts, to find out where the money is going.

I have asked why this lady was appointed. I have asked by whom she was appointed. I have asked why she was appointed and who appointed her to go overseas, and how those ladies were appointed. There are women across Canada—thousands of them—doing voluntary work, working day and night in salvage depots, and doing other work; and they are not getting one red cent for it.

An hon. MEMBER: And do not want any.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): And, as an hon. member says, they do not want any. They do not expect any. They are doing it for love of country.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): This might be love of party.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): And I do not think the hon. member for Ottawa East would have risen in his place and said what he did, had he thought things over. We want to know the facts.

Mr. PINARD: This is probably one instance when it may be shown—

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Speak louder; I cannot hear you.

Mr. PINARD: My throat is sore; you had better try to hear me. It is not surprising to me that I cannot get the ear of hon. members on that side of the house, and particularly the hon. member for Peterborough West, when a question of this kind is raised. If you touch the smallest item you get more from that hon. gentleman than you get from any other hon. member in the house, so far as criticism is concerned. But he would let millions go by without any interference. He talks about his patriotism. He talks about many things—

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. PINARD: Take your time. I will speak louder later when my throat gets better. I have followed my hon. friend for a long time. I know what service has been rendered by the ladies of this city and outside this city. When he says that people have not been paid for two years, after being employed for the last two or three years, I do not see how he finds that out, or how he got that information.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): It is right in Hansard. I will refer to it.

Mr. PINARD: I am not speaking for the minister at the present time. Anyone who has given service for a year, or two years, or three years, is entitled to a remuneration. I do not know whether it is taxed or not.

Mr. TUSTIN: Do you agree to paying her for two years after she has rendered the services?

Mr. PINARD: I agree to pay for whatever services she rendered.

Mr. TUSTIN: Possibly you made the recommendation for her appointment.

Mr. PINARD: Well, why not?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. BOUCHER: Are there any other illustrations just like that?

Mr. PINARD: Sit down, Carleton!

Mr. TUSTIN: I said that maybe you made the recommendation.

Mr. PINARD: I did not. She is not in my riding, and there was no question of politics so far as her appointment was concerned. I know a little bit about this case, and I am glad I rose to get the facts before us, because it is said all the time by the Tory opposition, whenever they rise, that they do not only speak for themselves, but speak also for the people of Canada.

Mr. BOUCHER: Tell us what her position was before she got this appointment?

Mr. PINARD: The hon. member for Carleton is very anxious about the appointment. It will take you a long time to recommend anybody who will be placed in an appointment, because you are staying there for a long time. You do not want to hear about the appointment.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is the hon. gentleman whistling to keep up his courage?

Mr. PINARD: May I say to the leader of the opposition that my courage has always been the same. All members of the house are trying to render the best service they can, and yet here we have an hon. member making so much fuss about an expenditure of five, six or seven thousand dollars when much more money is thrown away—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. PINARD: The members of the opposition applaud, but let me finish—so much money thrown away by organizations directed by Tories, commissions and all that kind of thing. I do not know why Mr. Boucher will not say a word about this.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member must refer to other hon. members by their ridings.

Mr. PINARD: He is the hon. member for Carleton. I do not know why so much fuss should be made about this particular case. It was said a moment ago that I recommended this appointment. I do not like to ask my hon. friend to withdraw because it is picayune business on the part of any hon. member to speak of recommendations.

Mr. TUSTIN: I did not state that the hon. member had made a recommendation.

Mr. PINARD: I will say "small," if you do not like the word "picayune." My English has been learned on the street.

Mr. TUSTIN: You have a lot to learn all right.

Mr. PINARD: Are you going to be my teacher?

Mr. TUSTIN: I certainly should not like to be.

Mr. PINARD: These things should not be brought up when we are doing the best we can to win the war.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Who are "we"?

Mr. PINARD: The minister is endeavouring to conduct his department in the best interests of the general public and I cannot understand why we should lose so much time over such a small item. My hon. friend may like to do this, probably from a sense of fear, but I dislike it. I do not think it is proper. I do not think it can be said that this department has thrown away one five-cent piece, that it has not made all the expenditures it has made in the interests and for the advancement of the country.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Was it not Caesar who said, Methinks thou protest too much, dear Brutus?

Mr. PINARD: My friend protests too much about his honesty.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I have never said I was honest, but I hope I am. The hon. gentleman has said that I only go after small things. The reason why we have to deal with small things of this kind is that when we get into the big money, the items where millions are spent or thrown away, as the hon. gentleman said himself, we cannot get an answer. If the hon. gentleman will look at page 1041 of Hansard of March 2 he will see that I asked a question with regard to shipbuilding, which means millions and millions.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member realizes that we are not on shipbuilding. I hope hon. members will keep within the item that is before the committee at the moment.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, but I just wanted to show the hon. member that I have tried to get proper answers. Whenever that has happened we are told by the government that it is not in the public interest. I want to tell the hon. gentleman and this committee that the people of Canada are interested in where their money goes. That is why I asked the question I did to-night. I should like to get an answer. I should like to know why these four women were picked. I should like to know who selected them to go overseas. I should like to know whether the women doing volunteer war work were consulted as to who should go. I do not think they were, but I want to know.

Mr. BOUCHER: Perhaps I could amplify the question somewhat. The hon. member for Ottawa East seems to know a lot about Miss Helen Doherty. Probably he can tell the minister and he will be able to give us some of the answers to these questions. What was Miss Helen Doherty doing before she went into the Department of National War Services? What was she doing during the two years for which she received $7,090? Upon whose recommendation was she appointed? What were her peculiar qualifications for the work she was doing? What was the pay of the two women who went over with her? What report did she make? We should be given full details of that report. I am sure if the minister cannot answer these questions the hon. member for Ottawa East will be able to help him since the hon. member seems to know so much about Miss Doherty. This is an item of $9,000, but if the hon. member for Ottawa East thinks that $9,000 paid to a lady for two years' services is picayune and if he knows of other occasions where money is being wasted, probably he will tell the committee and we will try to get to the bottom of them. This thing is in the fire, so let us pull it out of the embers.

Mr. PINARD: The hon. member's question is so elaborate that I would ask him to put it on the order paper and I shall try to answer.

Mr. LaFLECHE: If I am permitted I shall do my best to give an answer. I trust that my words will not be taken amiss when I say that as far as I am concerned personally it is a matter of regret that the names of individuals who cannot be here to defend themselves are mentioned, as occurs at times. The question of the payment of public money is a matter of great importance; every hon. member has a right to ask his question and every question should be answered carefully and correctly. No one has a greater interest in the careful spending of money than those who have the honour to be members of the administration. As far as the department over which I have the honour to preside is concerned, I make bold to say that great care is taken in expending the people's money. I have been told by the civil service commission at times that I was attempting to run my department too economically. I leave that statement with the hon. members of this committee.

To return to the case in point, when the lady whose name has been mentioned this evening first joined the department there was no staff; there were no superintendents; there were no directors; this was a department that started at full speed before there was time to get it organized. All the employees of the department—they will be glad to confirm this if necessary—were going night and day for at least the first year and a half, each doing what he could to see that the work was kept up to date. Among these was the lady whose name has been mentioned this evening. The payment that was made to her was made a long time after she had carried out her work. She rendered great assistance to the department, but because of a series of events it was impossible for her to be paid. This went on from month to month and year to year with the employee not being paid and nevertheless not protesting, although that was not a very comfortable position for anybody to be in. Finally my predecessor saw to it that it was made possible to pay the lady. The larger amount mentioned by the hon. member was such only because it covered nearly three years.

The question of sending the ladies overseas to represent the department arose early in 1943 when I, as Minister of National War Services, thought it would be helpful in promoting the contribution of all Canadian women to the dominion's war effort to send a small delegation of Canadian women representing the Department of National War Services to survey what was being done in Great Britain by the women of that country, and upon their return to report on what they had seen. Then that information would be made available to all Canadian women through their organizations or otherwise. The Dowager Marchioness of Reading, Chairman of the Women's Voluntary Services for Civil Defence in the United Kingdom, having learned of my intention in this regard, last May indicated that her organization would be delighted to extend every possible cooperation to the ladies who would come from Canada to survey the work being done by the women of that country in Britain's war effort. At a business conference of the Canadian women's voluntary services and others in Ottawa on June 28, 29 and 30, 1943, I expressed the hope—I announced, if you like—that the war services department would try to send a delegation of three or four Canadian women to study and report upon the operation of British women's organizations doing patriotic war work.

In this house, Mr. Chairman, in reply to a series of questions by the hon. member for Danforth on July 12, 1943, I set out precisely how the choice of the department's representatives would be made, and that procedure was followed. My proposal, as I thought was thus made clear from the very outset, contemplated a somewhat broader mission than merely sending representatives who would confine their activities to surveying any one women's organization in the United Kingdom, and was designed to make available to all Canadian women information that they could use to the best advantage in their work in Canada. It must be remembered that there are many women's organizations doing patriotic work in Canada, just as there are in the United Kingdom, and the Department of National War Services has a broad and continuing responsibility to assist, in whatever way may be possible, the Canadian women doing patriotic work in Canada in support of the war effort.

No objection reached me following my statement in this house on July 12, 1943, in reply to a series of questions by the hon. member for Danforth as to how the department's delegation would be chosen, and I proceeded accordingly as had been announced.

The members of the department's delegation were Mrs. Gordon Konantz of Winnipeg, Miss Doré of Montreal, Mrs. Laine of Toronto and from the department, largely for departmental purposes, Miss Helen Doherty of Ottawa. Since Mrs. Konantz and Miss Doré were prominently identified with women's voluntary services working in Canada, quite naturally they were assigned the duty of observing what was being done by the women's voluntary services for defence in Great Britain. Mrs. Laine, who had been active and very successful in regard to other women's work, and Miss Doherty who has a splendid record of work in connection with women's work, and particularly in work for returned soldiers, were given other assignments.

I should like to emphasize that these four Canadian women were chosen, not as individuals representing any particular group, but as representatives of the department, with special emphasis in the case of two of these ladies in connection with women's voluntary service work. One departmental official was included for the obvious and necessary purpose of ensuring continuity in the interests of the department and of patriotic work by all women's organizations in the dominion. It was necessary, however, before the ladies left Canada, to deal with this matter with great secrecy for security reasons, to safeguard the delegation in travelling by boat to and from the United Kingdom in the midst of hazardous war-time conditions at sea.

Maybe because they did not apprehend all aspects of my intentions and of the department's intention in sending the departmental delegation to Great Britain to examine the patriotic work of all women's organizations there for the benefit of all Canadian women's organizations and of all Canadian women, some ladies in Canada were moved to express regret that the delegation was not composed exclusively of women identified with women's voluntary service work here. My conception of the situation and of the requirement was that if we took up any women's work we had to do our best to take up all of it, and that will be the result when we read the reports from these four ladies. I have already said this evening that the four ladies in question are now busy writing their reports.

I should like to add that the ladies in question, each one of them, were highly recommended to me. In the case of Miss Doherty, she being a departmental employee, that matter was not of so much significance as in the case of the other three. Not only were they very highly recommended, but the reports I have had from Lady Reading in Great Britain are that she had great admiration for the work these ladies did over there. I hope to have their reports soon, when they will be brought to the attention of all Canadian women's organizations for their information and, I trust, for their assistance. I think that is the answer which my hon. friend requested.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I wish the minister to understand that I have absolutely nothing against Miss Doherty or any of the other ladies. It is wholly a question of how these people are engaged and how they are paid. The minister said that it was owing to a series of events that Miss Doherty was not paid for over two years—almost three years, he said. He did not tell us what the series of events was, or why, when she was hired, no provision was made in the order in council for payment. I asked, what did Miss Doherty receive for expenses on the British trip; how long was she on that trip; did the other ladies receive their expenses; did they receive any salary, or how was the matter worked?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Miss Doherty being a departmental employee, her pay continued. All the ladies were given the same amount of expense money. I am sorry that, since I did not know the question was coming up, I have not the figures. Mrs. Laine, one of these ladies, has advised the department that she will not put in any claim. She not only offered her time but has declined to accept any expense money. That is greatly to be admired. It is only fair to say, however, that it is not possible for all persons under such circumstances to refund advances and to decline to put in their accounts. However fine it is, it is something we shall all agree cannot be expected of everyone.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I quite agree with the minister that there are many women who cannot afford to pay their own way, and who should be reimbursed. Perhaps at the next sitting the minister will be able to tell us what they got.

Mr. LaFLECHE: If I may, I will treat it as a question.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Yes.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The minister in discussing this last matter said that Miss Doherty had been engaged in radio broadcasting. I have had many letters from people in western Canada asking about a Miss Claire Wallace, who is engaged in radio broadcasting, and I have received many newspaper clippings, and inquiries as to what salary and what expense account this lady receives from the government. If this comes under the minister's jurisdiction I believe it would be well, in the interests of the country, if we could have a satisfactory answer immediately. Many people are asking if this woman is worth her hire in the matter of war savings stamps. I believe that is the chief reason why she is engaged; and since the sixth victory loan is just now being launched many people may make this matter an excuse for dilatoriness about subscribing to the loan. Perhaps the minister would give a detailed statement of what this lady's salary and expense account have been during, say, 1943; what salary she now receives per month, and what expenses she is allowed. It would give our fellow citizens who are trying to sell victory bonds an opportunity to clear up possible misconceptions, because this question is very interesting at the present time to many people throughout western Canada.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. Before the minister answers, may I say this. We are now discussing the item of war charities. I hope it will be found possible to restrict the discussion to that item.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): This is administration.

The CHAIRMAN: Well, this is administration of war charities. The committee will have before it items concerning administration of all the other branches, and I think it would simplify the work of the committee and also of the minister concerned if the discussion were related specifically to this item.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I trust that, when we come to other items which have already been discussed, hon. members will recall the fact. I welcome questions such as have been put this evening. The hon. member for Souris mentioned Miss Claire Wallace. I regret very much that I am not the competent authority to answer. I have seen, of course, something in the press, and the matter was brought up in the radio committee. But the lady is not employed by my department or by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I believe she was given some work to do, that her services were required by the war finance committee. To give any figures would be to guess, and I hesitate to do that. But the matter is not in my department.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The reason why I asked this question on administration was in order that the minister, if it related to the C.B.C., could deal with it. I now understand that she probably is hired by the war finance committee to sell war savings certificates. I do not know anything about this myself, but I have had dozens, if not hundreds of letters from many parts of the west in recent months, and because some people are making it an excuse to hesitate about subscribing to the victory loan, the sooner the matter can be cleared up, the better. I may have to wait to ask the Minister of Finance, but I thought it might be answered under the C.B.C. item.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I feel very much as the hon. member does, and I can only say that I regret very much that I have not the information. All I could say would be guesswork, and he does not want that.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Oh, no. It has been reported that this lady now receives $200 a week and an expense account. If the minister could get the information and give it on behalf of the government, it would be in the interests of the country to have the matter cleared up quickly.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not want to interrupt the continuity of discussion; that, perhaps, is one thing which frequently happens when we are in committee. From one matter we jump to another; then we return to the first subject, then jump to something else, and so on.

This afternoon the minister gave us quite an adequate picture of the courses which are administered through his department to men serving in the armed forces. I should like to know whether his department is responsible for the lectures which are now being given in various branches of the armed services with respect to post-war rehabilitation. A series of lectures is being given to inform members of the armed forces of what will be done for them after the war. If this activity comes under the minister's department, I should like the opportunity of discussing it now. If it does not come under his department, would he tell us what department has to do with it, so that I may discuss it under the appropriate item?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I understand that the lectures in question are prepared primarily by the directors of education of the defence departments and by the Canadian Legion's educational officers. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that if the hon. member wishes to discuss an item it might be better to wait until we get to the next one; but, since we have not differentiated so far, this is just as good a time as any.

Mr. HANSELL: It does not matter very much really, whether it comes under the minister's department or not. The only point is I want to be in order. I think we are all aware that a series of lectures is being given to members of our armed forces on the matter of their rehabilitation when the war is over. I should like some information in that respect and perhaps the other ministers can give it to me. What sort of lectures are they and who prepares them; who are the officers who are lecturing? I understand it is an officer in the particular camp where the lectures are given who gives the lecture. Who prepares these courses? Are the officers competent to give lectures? Who informs them as to what the rehabilitation programme is to be? I have talked with quite a few men in the forces with respect to those lectures. I wonder why the lectures are given. I have no objection to the soldiers being informed as to what the country is to do for them after the war, but I wonder whether there may not be a principle involved. Is it because the members of the armed forces are getting a little restless as to what may happen to them, and we have to pacify them by telling them this?

There is another principle involved and I do not want to be misunderstood as I propound what is in my mind. In making a speech or answering a question the other day the minister said we had to have faith. My work for a good many years taught me that I had to live by faith, and perhaps I know just a little bit about that. There was a time in my life when I used to make it a rule, because I thought it was quite ethical to do so, to trust everyone and consider that everyone was honest until I found that they could not be trusted because they were not honest. I thought that was a pretty good rule to follow in those days, but I have been in politics now for a few years and it seems to me—perhaps

I have fallen a little bit from those high ideals—that I am gradually unconsciously slipping into that place where I do not trust anybody, and consider that everybody is a crook until I make extremely sure he is just and honest. That seems to be about the way I have a tendency to feel. I hate myself for it. But somehow or another that is the life of one who is in politics very long.

I cannot see what kind of lecture can be given to these men on post-war rehabilitation except a lecture on what the present government proposes to do for them. I cannot see what they can be told, apart from the legislation that is at present on the statute books or the legislation that the present government is contemplating bringing down this session.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): They can be told to vote Liberal.

Mr. HANSELL: My hon. friend says they can be told to vote Liberal. I would not go so far as to accuse any officer giving those lectures of deliberately doing that. But what is the result? What can be expected? It seems to me that it is only natural to say that if the lecturer satisfies the men in the armed forces that the government who is preparing this legislation is going to look after them when the war is over, naturally they will go away with the impression—well, I guess it is a pretty good government after all; I guess we will have to put the X mark down in the right place, and so forth. I hope I am not overemphasizing my fear in that respect, but I believe that is the natural tendency.

Of course, the only proper thing that could be done to offset that would be for officers to be trained and schooled in what all of the other parties in this country would like to do for the returned soldier. In that way the men in the forces would be able to know that between the three in some way or another they would be looked after, and then perhaps the tendency would not be as it is to-day. I believe the lectures that are given to-day on the basis of the present legislation are a bit lopsided.

There is another point. I do not know whether the minister is aware of this, but these lectures are compulsory. The members of the forces are paraded and they have to listen to them whether they want to or not. I hope I do not go to the extreme when I say there is a possibility that the members of the armed forces are forced to listen to our Liberal friends' programme. I am voicing that observation. I trust the minister as much as anyone else does. I have as much faith as anyone else has, but unfortunately I believe that to be the case.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I do not think it is for me to reply to the respected hon. member for Macleod in regard to faith, but I may tell him that the saddest thing is to lose one's faith, and if he would be happy to believe not only in God, but as far as he can in man, it would be a fine thing.

In regard to the lectures mentioned by the hon. member for Macleod I think I explained that they are prepared by the educational officers of national defence working with Canadian Legion educational officers. I do not know that any of those lectures are compulsory; but having been in that position myself for a long time, it may well be that some conscientious commanding officer would parade his men to hear those lectures because he believed in them himself. It is not correct, I am sure, to think, and even less to suggest that these lectures are in the nature of an appeal to vote in favour of the administration. If one were to express one's full thoughts on such a matter one might guess, perhaps, that certain zealous persons might have infiltrated behind the lines and there had some effect upon what was said; but I think in both cases one would be wrong. The motives of these people who work to educate others are good. The commanding officer is there to watch how things are going. I have not heard any stories which would substantiate in my mind the thought which has been expressed by the hon. member for Macleod. I trust that this will be accepted by the hon. member as a reply to his question, but, if not, I shall be glad to listen to and try to answer any other questions he may care to ask.

Mr. BENCE: In connection with the board, headed by Mr. Burton, which was mentioned this afternoon, I endeavoured to follow the minister as closely as possible and he may have given the information I want, but, if so, it did not come to my notice. Would the minister say in what manner the members of this board were chosen. In other words, how did he go about ferreting out the individuals who compose this board? For example, did he obtain recommendations from the various organizations or associations which receive grants? Did he obtain recommendations from the Canadian Legion, the Knights of Columbus, the Navy League of Canada, the Salvation Army and so on? How were the members from the various provinces selected and appointed to this board? Then I wish the minister would tell the committee what expenses have been incurred by the board since its organization. I understand the members are not in receipt of any salary, but perhaps the minister would tell us the number of meetings that have been held, the per diem allowances, if any, which have been paid the members of the board, and the total expenses to date.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I should like to point out that these ladies and gentlemen were appointed at least two years before I became head of this department, and I am not in a position to say how they were chosen.

Mr. BENCE: You were the deputy minister, were you not?

Mr. LaFLECHE: This came under my associate, the Hon. Mr. Justice T. C. Davis; it did not come under my direction at that time. I am not in a position to say how the members of the board were chosen; but from a few things I have heard I make bold to suggest to my hon. friend that he need have no fear whatsoever of any desire on their part, even three and a half years ago or whenever they were named, to play a game on the loyal opposition.

Mr. BENCE: I am not suggesting anything like that; I just want to get the information.

Mr. LaFLECHE: May we look upon them as good Canadians and judge their value from that one point of view alone? If I were permitted to do the judging I would and I do assure hon. members that these people are excellent citizens; they are very hard workers; they are conscientious. I owe them this further tribute: they seem to have taken great care to see that the Minister of National War Services is always kept in a safe position in regard to approving expenditures. That is what I would expect of ordinary departmental officials, and I feel deep gratitude to these people. Yet I find them broad-minded and personally extremely generous, though very careful with the money of the taxpayers. I like Canadians like that.

Mr. BENCE: If I may interrupt with another question, I do not know anything about it but I want to find out the basis on which the representation was obtained. For example, on what basis would they go to Saskatchewan and select a man? On what basis would they go to British Columbia and select a man? Was it in reference to the type of work they had to do or the experience they possessed; was it in reference to any recommendations which might have been made, and, I think, should have been made, by the organizations interested?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I have already said that I am not aware of the basis of their choice; but speaking of them as persons who are members of the board and judging them from that point of view alone, I do give my hon. friend my assurance that there is not a poor selection in the entire membership.

Mr. BENCE: Were they appointed by the Hon. Mr. Justice Davis, or were they appointed by some other person in the department?

Mr. LaFLECHE: They were appointed when the present Minister of Agriculture was the Minister of National War Services. His successor, now the Hon. Mr. Justice Thorson, renewed their term, and I also have renewed their term; at least on my recommendation they have been appointed for another year. As far as I recall, this is the first time this question has been raised. Just what I mean by that I do not know myself, except that as far as my knowledge goes their appointment has never been questioned, and I do not believe their actions can be questioned.

If I may continue with my answer, there are about ten meetings a year of the full committee and/or the executive committee. Members of the board receive no salary; travelling expenses are paid, but a number of the members pay their own expenses. The cost of the meetings on a yearly basis is about $4,000. I hope that answers my hon. friend.

Mr. BENCE: I am not satisfied yet. I do not wish to cast any reflection upon these gentlemen; from what the minister says I assume that they are perfectly reputable citizens. I want to find out how well they are qualified to judge the sort of things they have to judge in connection with these matters, and I thought perhaps the minister might be able to give us some lead as to why different individuals were appointed to that board; their knowledge of education, for example, or their knowledge of returned men, or their knowledge of some particular phase of the matters which they must take under consideration.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I would point out that when these ladies and gentlemen were first appointed, the whole of Canada was being combed for persons who would consent to take on such difficult and onerous jobs. I do not know what the authorities had in mind at that time by way of necessary qualifications. There would hardly be reason for exacting, in any great number of cases, knowledge of education or educational methods, because at that time educational matters were but one subject of many that had to be dealt with. The putting up of canteens and hospitals and things like that, I imagine, were of much greater urgency than anything else. As time has gone on, however, educational matters have properly assumed greater importance, but these ladies and gentlemen who were named at that time know the work and the details of these organizations. I have seen them at work a number of times; I make it my business to attend their meetings whenever possible. They are good enough to invite me to the table; they do the talking and I do the listening. I do not interfere with their decisions, which are laid before me later, but it has seemed to me that each member of the board appeared to understand the problem thoroughly. I should say that each member of the present board is an excellent member. If he did not have the particular qualifications at the beginning I think he has acquired them by practice, as so many attainments are acquired.

Mr. BENCE: As far as the minister knows, then, these men were not appointed as the result of recommendations made by the various organizations who share in the grant that is made?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I do not know, I am sorry. I have no knowledge of that.

Mr. GILLIS: I agree with the hon. member for Saskatoon City and with other hon. members who spoke earlier in the debate. In my view the time has passed when this remote control organization, known as the Burton committee, can serve any useful purpose. I could understand that when the Department of National War Services was first set up, because it was a new department entering a new field under the leadership of the Minister of Agriculture, it was entering upon duties concerning which he had very little knowledge. He had to reorganize the whole thing, from the bottom to the top, and I could understand his desire to set up a committee similar to the Burton committee to assist in scrutinizing the expenditures.

I think, however, the time has come when the present minister is in charge of a pretty thoroughly organized department. The defence organizations, which recommend in the first instance, and the auxiliary services, have well-defined organizations. I cannot see how a committee comprised of people from one end of Canada to the other, and particularly of very busy people, can be of much use. We were told this afternoon that unfortunately Mr. Burton is ill, and that leaves him out of the picture at the present time. However, when he is enjoying his good health he is very busy in other fields. I am sure, too, that Mr. Wallace R. Campbell is a very busy man in Windsor at the present time, because he heads a large organization. I cannot see how that board, which would have the final say in respect of any recommendation coming from the army, the navy, the air force or the auxiliary services, in connection with any extension or expansion of service, could do anything but block, or act as something which would retard progress. It has to be called together from all parts of Canada.

For example, the Canadian Legion war services may decide that they need literature, textbooks or printing. But before they can go ahead with their educational work they must secure requisitions from the committee. A month or two may elapse between the meetings of that committee. Meantime the Legion services, or other auxiliary services, are waiting for an approval from the board.

It is my view that the time has arrived when the board is no longer necessary. With the four years' experience they have had, I believe the defence and auxiliary services are in a position to-day to conduct the affairs of their departments through the Minister of National War Services. That organization is sufficiently well developed now, under a permanent minister, to be able to say just how the money which is being appropriated by parliament is to be spent. I believe it is desirable to get away from these controls. I have noticed the Minister of Munitions and Supply is dropping some of them. I believe the committee in question is the only one of its kind; there is no other which functions in any other department of government.

I see the treasury board as a stumbling block to the wheels of progress. Many departments of government are desirous of doing certain things, but they must obtain the approval of the treasury board before they can proceed. The committee in question is a similar one. In the first instance I can well understand that it took some of the work from the then minister, and at that time it was desirable to do so. But with the machinery now developed I do not believe the committee is necessary, and I believe, further, that it now retards progress.

I have sufficient confidence in the auxiliary services, the defence organizations and the Department of National War Services to believe that they can handle the business now, without the advice of busy men like Mr. Burton, Mr. Wallace Campbell and others, whose names I shall not mention. I am thinking about the work begun by the Canadian Legion educational services, both in Canada and overseas. Many boys in the armed forces have begun work on those educational courses, but before completion of the courses they may be discharged from the services. Is there any provision whereby, in cooperation with the legion in Canada, when a man of that kind returns from overseas with a partly completed course he may pick up the work in Canada? Or, does that man go back to the supervision of the Department of Pensions and National Health, and receive further instruction through a process of rehabilitation? If he is routed in that way I believe he will be forced to lose valuable time he has already spent in study, and it is my view that his studies should be continued in Canada, through the same organization. I believe that if these studies are continued through the regular processes of rehabilitation, in other schools, much of the work done will have been wasted.

I suggest strongly to the minister that in the light of present circumstances the decision to maintain this remote-control board is one which should be reconsidered, because I believe it has outlived its usefulness and serves no purpose to-day.

Mr. LaFLECHE: At the beginning of his observations the hon. member said that some members of the board were extremely busy men. Undoubtedly that is so, and perhaps it is just another instance of the willing horse doing a large part of the work. But I have great faith in busy men of a certain calibre who accept national duties. Here we find these gentlemen working, not for themselves, but so that they may place all their talents and abilities at the disposal of the state.

May I assure the hon. member that the board has not authority. Authority and responsibility are those of the minister. The board only recommends. The minister acts, and he is responsible for what he does. That is the way it works.

The suggestion has been made that the board should be disbanded. May I assure the hon. member that, had I not the benefit of the services of the board in question I would feel very much cut adrift. My anxiety, rather, is that some day they will tell me that the war is ending or is over, that they have other things to do and, having done their job, that they will ask to be excused. That would be my fear. I do not like to see the hon. member for Cape Breton South worrying about anything that might have an adverse effect upon members of the armed forces, as a result of the operations of this board. It is my feeling and my conviction that the members of the armed forces benefit greatly from this board, because of the kind of people who are on it.

As to members of the armed forces beginning courses overseas, and then returning to Canada, may I point out that any member in that position may pick up in Canada the threads of the course he began in Great Britain.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, I should like to add just one more word to what I said this afternoon. We are dealing with the estimates having to do with the charities division, all of which comes under the charities act of September 9, 1939. The principle is that these auxiliary services will be financed from a general fund. The minister has said that this is a changing war, and it does change from year to year, from month to month and from week to week. The fifth year of the war is different from the fourth year; there are more soldiers overseas and more services are required. I understand that the practice now is for some of the charities which have been named, such as the Canadian Legion, to obtain the sanction of the minister to collect funds which are in addition to those obtained from the general fund. Then there is still another duplication. Many of these organizations go to the municipalities and obtain permission to hold tag days, and other organizations receive contributions from some of the various community efforts. There is no doubt that there is duplication in the collection of funds, but this may be explained by the fact that this is a changing war.

I come now to the distribution of the services. There has been a change in the war since the minister dealt with this matter on July 13 last. I understand that now five or six different charities have been allocated particular work and there is no longer any duplication in this regard. The amount involved has been raised from $7,000,000 to $12,000,000, and there will have to be a further increase when we enter the sixth year of the war. We do not know when the war will close. I think the work of the department has been quite satisfactory, although I would raise the point that the public are not sufficiently informed about this matter. They know there is duplication in the collection of funds, but they do not know much about the distribution.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister if his department has been able to make any calculation of the total amount collected in one way and another, not just for charitable work but for providing goods and services to make the life of the soldier overseas a little easier. For instance, in the Chateau Laurier, and I suppose in other hotels as well, we find boxes in which people staying in the hotel can contribute to provide cigarettes for soldiers overseas or for some other purpose. The Canadian corps have a definite programme for the raising of funds and they provide many necessary supplies to our soldiers overseas. The same is true of the Canadian Legion and the Amps Association, et cetera.

The Bloor street business men's association of Toronto, with which I am associated, each month sends many thousands of cigarettes overseas. In the stores up and down Bloor street they have some sort of affair like a small lighthouse made out of cardboard into which customers place deposits. The St. Clair avenue business men's association do the same thing, as do many other associations throughout Canada. I shall not take the time to name them all but they are many in number. The women's branch of my own political organization, the Progressive Conservative Davenport-Dovercourt women's association, each year at Christmas sends an average of two hundred boxes overseas filled with goods to a value of not less than $5 each. This organization has received many interesting letters from soldiers overseas who have received these boxes.

The Montreal Star has been sponsoring a Queen Elizabeth fund which now amounts to some millions of dollars. The Toronto Evening Telegram has sponsored perhaps the greatest fund of all. This fund was started by Alderman John Innes, who came to Ottawa last evening with a Toronto city council delegation and met a number of the Toronto members this morning and during the afternoon. This fund was started two or three years ago by the alderman making the first contribution of $10. I went out a moment ago to try to get the exact amount, but I was not able to locate it.

Mr. GRAYDON: $2,395,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: My leader got it more quickly than I could. The editor of the Toronto Telegram, Mr. C. O. Knowles, told me that his paper has been assisted by many newspapers in Ontario, the Orillia Packet and Times, for example. These newspapers in the smaller communities sponsor funds and the proceeds are sent to the Toronto Evening Telegram fund. I have wondered on more than one occasion whether the department sends a letter of appreciation to these newspapers in recognition of the work they are doing? Then I imagine that every church in Canada is sending regular supplies to the members who are overseas.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I am glad to add my voice to that of the hon. member for Davenport in tribute to the generosity of the Canadian people. The more experience I gain, the more I deal with the Canadian public, the more I like and admire them. They are extremely generous and always respond to an honest appeal. Up to the end of the fiscal year of 1943, a little over a year ago, the total collections by the several organizations, a number of which were mentioned by the hon. member for Davenport, amounted to $86,000,000. Returns are now coming in for the last year and are being tabulated up to March 31, 1944. We estimate at the moment that about $26,000,000 will have been collected from a generous Canadian public for the purposes which my hon. friend has in mind.

The public organizations mentioned by the hon. member for Davenport are very well known to me and my department, and I am a hearty admirer of those who do such good work. May it be suggested that perhaps we have not yet reached the stage in this war where much public recognition can be given to many. However, records are being kept, and I do hope that when the time comes, the Canadian public will be made aware of the excellent work done by so many. I could, of course, add a number of excellent organizations to the two or three mentioned by the hon. member for Davenport. I could add the Toronto Star, the French newspapers in my own province, and the Montreal Star, which has done excellent work. I think every public service in Canada and every man connected with the Canadian public are sensitive to the necessity of doing well by their brother Canadians.

Mr. MacNICOL: I thank the minister for mentioning the Toronto Star. If I did not mention it, I should have done so.

Mr. BURTON: There are a few questions I should like to ask, and hon. members will pardon me if they are already familiar with these matters. As I understand it, we vote the money for these recognized war charities. Who has the control to say which of these charities shall operate in the various camps maintained by the armed services? Is it this advisory board of which we have heard so much to-day?

Then, as to the money we vote for these various organizations, who passes on the question of whether the money is properly spent? I had an opportunity of speaking to a number of persons who were at a certain camp which a certain organization was servicing, and I was told that the individual in charge of this particular service at the camp did not seem to realize the importance and the necessity of carrying on the work he was really sent there to do, whereas at another camp a similar organization was doing excellent work. No doubt the difference was due to the difference in the representatives of the organization at the two different camps. Who has control of the money that we vote? Who sees that good use is made of the money? Who inquires whether at another camp a certain organization might not be coming across with the goods, so to speak? That is something that some of us would like to know.

Again, where a camp no longer requires the number of war charities that were servicing it, who decides which organization shall pull out and which shall stay? These questions are of concern to the public. We realize that the expenditure is small in comparison with some other expenditures. Nevertheless, we would like to know how this work is carried on. Have I made myself clear to the minister?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I shall try to answer my hon. friend. The hon. member for Humboldt perhaps did not hear me this afternoon when I told the committee that each one of these projects is initiated by the department concerned, army, navy or air force. National defence makes the choice and advises me which auxiliary service shall carry on the work. If it is a canteen, that would be run by one service. If it is a hostel, that would be run by an auxiliary service chosen by national defence, not by this department.

As to the successful operation of a project, of course much depends upon the manager or supervisor. At the beginning of the war perhaps they did not have a great many experienced supervisors, but time has seen to that and the reports I get are that the supervisors are doing a better job each year. At any rate they are followed up carefully, as in all other businesses, and there are auditors and inspectors. I hope and really believe that each one of these services is doing an excellent job.

Mr. BENCE: This item is for departmental administration. I do not know under which item I should ask a question with respect to the government office of economy control which was in effect at least last year. I do not know whether it is now in effect or not. Under which item would that question come?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Under the last item, for sundries.

Mr. HAZEN: This afternoon the hon. member for Vancouver South brought to the attention of the minister the desirability of educational services being made use of by the patients in our military hospitals. I understood the minister to say that he would make inquiries and let us know to what extent these services were being made available in some of our larger hospitals. I rise to inform the minister that I was told recently that these services have not been available in the Lancaster military hospital at the city of Saint John. I was disappointed to receive this information, and I hope that situation will be corrected.

I understood the minister to say this afternoon that the application for these educational services in our hospitals had to be made through the officer commanding the hospital. If that is so, I would suggest that some change be made in the regulations, because the officer commanding, in charge of a military hospital, has a good many duties. I would suggest to the minister that officers from his department or from some other department be appointed to visit these hospitals and to point out to the military patients the opportunity they have, while there in hospital, of obtaining this education service and of the advantage it would be to them to apply themselves to some of these subjects while they are confined to the hospital.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I am grateful to the hon. member for bringing this matter up again. Men in hospital could undoubtedly benefit greatly from the educational service. I told the hon. member for Vancouver South this afternoon that I did not believe I would be able to get the information for this evening. I promised to let the committee have it; I recall that because I saw a copy of Hansard just after dinner, and I know that is there on record. We shall have to get the information; we will bring it down, and we shall also have the remarks made by my hon. friend and will see that they receive attention.

Mr. WHITE: This afternoon the minister was speaking about courses for soldiers and he said that a certain class of certificate was issued. I wish he would explain a little more fully what he means by this "class of certificate." Is it a certificate which is recognized by high schools or by the various universities in the different provinces?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I said this afternoon that there would be given a certificate of attainment to those members of the forces who followed an educational course such as we have been discussing. I have not a copy of the certificate. I know that will be done; my hon. friend may rely on that.

Mr. WHITE: Yes, but the point is, what is the benefit of this certificate of attainment? Does it entitle the soldier to a standing in a college or a high school or a university? Does it mean anything?

Mr. LaFLECHE: The certificate of attainment will have the same force in the scholastic world as a certificate from a school. If a pupil is able to show a certificate that he has attained the level of senior matriculation, that will be given credence and effect in the school which he wishes to enter. That is the plan.

You cannot let these men study and then not have credit for the work which they have accomplished. When they attain a particular level of scholastic attainment it will so be certified and they will be given credit.

Mr. WHITE: Could the minister give us some idea of the number of soldiers who have attained a certificate equal to either junior or senior matriculation?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I am sorry I have not that. This afternoon I read what I took at the time to be too many statistics. I shall get them if my hon. friend wishes it.

Mr. WHITE: Does the minister know approximately how many soldiers are taking these courses?

Mr. LaFLECHE: My hon. friend will find that in Hansard. Would my hon. friend say what information he wants to get, and I will see that he gets it.

Mr. WHITE: The approximate number of soldiers who are taking these various courses.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Again, for fear of making an error I do not wish to make any statement, because I am not absolutely certain. I gave the figures this afternoon.

Mr. WHITE: That is all right. Just one further question so that there will be no misunderstanding. I take it from what the minister says that these certificates of attainment will be recognized by any school or college in any province of Canada, and that if a soldier obtains a certificate of attainment in England equivalent to senior matriculation, that certificate would entitle him then to enter Toronto university or any other university in Canada?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Yes; I have that information in my book, and it comes from the authorities. That is exactly what I take it to be, and it is in that light that I gave this information to the committee.

Mr. WHITE: I want to be sure it is not just an opinion that the minister is giving, but that he knows definitely that this certificate will be recognized and accepted.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I have been advised that such will be the case, and I have not the slightest reason to disbelieve what I have been told. Whether the course takes place overseas or here, it has the same value.

Item agreed to.

Salvage division, $310,750.

Mr. BENCE: Will the minister give us some details of this particular expenditure? There are probably three main portions of it, namely, salaries, travelling expenses and publicity. Would he give us particulars of the publicity angle of it?

Mr. LaFLECHE: My hon. friend will have noted that there is a decrease of $86,215 as compared with last year. The break-down of the total for the present fiscal year which I am now submitting to the committee is $310,750, composed of: salaries, $90,000; cost of living bonus, $3,500; unemployment insurance, $250; travelling expenses, $53,000; printing and stationery, $4,000; publicity, $150,000; miscellaneous, $10,000.

Mr. BENCE: Has the minister the figures indicating the manner in which that $150,000 for publicity is spent?

Mr. LaFLECHE: The item of $150,000 for publicity makes provision, of course, for the maximum we anticipate having to spend for that purpose. Our experience in dealing with salvage has been that it is impossible to estimate in advance exactly what may happen in that field during the coming year. To illustrate, may I say that, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1944, we had earmarked $250,000 for publicity but we spent only about $37,000; we found it possible to carry out the work without spending the money. We were very fortunate in the last year in getting a vast amount of contributed advertising. There are several firms in Canada who patriotically gave salvage the advantage of their sponsorship in the papers, in the public press, and on the radio. The time will come when I shall be in a position to express thanks to those several firms for the outstanding contributions which they have made. It was not necessary for me as minister to take steps to spend more than a relatively small amount out of the quarter of a million dollars voted for publicity last year. That item is $100,000 less this year than it was last year. We are very careful in spending money on publicity and other things. I hope, and I believe, that $150,000 will be enough. I hope that it will be too much and that we shall not have to spend it all.

Mr. BENCE: That is surprising to me because the figures that are given on page 397 of Hansard for last year are $396,965. Does the minister say that that money was not spent?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I was speaking of the item for publicity.

Mr. BENCE: Yes, I know.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Last year that item was $250,000. The figure now before the committee is $150,000. I explained that last year we spent $38,000 out of $250,000. I explained why it was possible to save a very great deal of money.

Mr. BENCE: How much was spent by the department altogether last year on salvage?

Mr. LaFLECHE: The books have not yet been closed, but the last recorded expenditures that I have are $171,975.

Mr. BENCE: That is the total?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Yes; it will be more than that, but that is a very large part of the expenditure.

Mr. BENCE: What it means is that last year the publicity was down considerably from what it was the year before?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Yes.

Mr. BENCE: Because the year before it was $146,000.

Mr. LaFLECHE: That is correct.

Mr. BENCE: That has been reduced to $38,000?

Mr. LaFLECHE: It was possible to achieve the results without spending the people's money.

Mr. BENCE: The point I am making is this: What is the difference between the $146,000 spent the year before and the $38,000 spent last year? Why should there be such a large spread? How was it the government could save so much money in the two years?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I began by explaining that it has been borne upon me through observations that it is not possible to judge clearly and correctly in advance the game of salvage. In the last fiscal year the department was very fortunate. It was able to fill every demand made upon it, I am extremely happy to say, and we did so at very little expense. For instance, one decides to advertise in an acute emergency. After having tried all other attempts, one then is driven to go to paid advertising. Last year that was not necessary. At the present moment we are faced with an acute shortage of waste paper. We have had inestimable benefit from certain generous sponsors. Since some paper mills may be forced to close down I am now considering with the officials of my department and with the other departments of government in close touch with the paper industry the getting out of a campaign of advertising to cost somewhere around $60,000. Despite all the assistance we have had we are not satisfied that we have safeguarded the position sufficiently. In order to make sure we are going to do some advertising. That will come, of course, out of the $100,000.

Mr. BENCE: Could the minister give us an indication of the amount of revenue that was obtained last year as a result of the salvage campaign?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I must explain that the department cannot claim that all the results of its salvage campaigns are reported to the department, because while the urge to save secondary materials or salvage materials may be very great, yet the persons who save and turn in waste materials may do so through channels which do not report. The department does not say that they must turn in their salvage to certain people or certain firms. What the department does is to promote and bring the Canadian public to the point of finding the materials which we absolutely need if we are to carry on our full war effort. Nevertheless we have in dollars a figure well over $3,000,000 in value.

Mr. BENCE: For what period?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Since May 1, 1941. That figure comes up only to last year. We know the value of salvage materials is much greater than that, but those reports were not made to the department. When the country needs certain salvage material what we try to do is to see that the scrap iron is made available to the mills. We want the waste paper turned in to the mills. We think about one-half of the actual salvage resulting from our campaigns come to us in the form of reports.

Mr. BENCE: Was there a complete change made in the administrative set-up of the salvage campaign last year?

Mr. LaFLECHE: No. I am afraid I am taking the hon. member's question on too wide a basis. There has been no revolutionary change. There have been betterments; there have been extensions of organization where necessary adjustments were possible. Things have gone on very much the same. It is true the machine has run better because the employees and officials know their job better than they did before. Perhaps my hon. friend would ask a more precise question.

Mr. BENCE: The reason I ask that question is this: in the city of Saskatoon from which I come we had an able and active association in charge of salvage. Last year at some time or another the officials came along and changed it, took it away from them and changed what I think was the whole set-up as far as salvage in Saskatoon was concerned. I should like to know why that was done in view of the fact that this organization had charge of it from the beginning. It was the only organization that was prepared to take it over from the beginning. I should like to know whether the same attitude was taken in other communities where organizations had taken on salvage campaigns and had made a success of it. Did the administration or administrative officials come along and change the whole set-up?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I understand that the case mentioned by my hon. friend was that of a voluntary committee and that there were changes; but the changes came from within the membership of the voluntary committee. My hon. friend shakes his head.

Mr. BENCE: I know they did not.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I can only repeat the instructions I am given. I would remind the hon. gentleman that we have something like 1,800 of these committees scattered throughout Canada, and it would take a formidable memory indeed to recall everything that has happened. Perhaps my hon. friend would help me by giving some further information which might be of assistance.

Mr. BENCE: All I can say is that this association was carrying on efficiently and adequately and that for some reason or another—that is what I wanted to find out—the officials of the department came along and said they were going to take the work away from them. Actually the fact is that when this thing was established in the first place this was the only association prepared to go in and do the work. They did an adequate job, and I thought they were treated very unfairly.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I am sure my hon. friend will not mind if I say I hope he is mistaken. I do not get the story that way at all; I understand that the original chairman—moved from the city and that he was replaced. That is what I am told. However, if my hon. friend would be good enough to give me further information I shall look into the matter in the interests of all concerned.

Mr. BENCE: I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. MacINNIS: The minister is discussing the matter of salvage, and as I came in I thought I heard him say there was a great need for the collection of waste paper. Quite recently it was drawn to my attention that there has been a tremendous waste of paper at the Barriefield barracks near Kingston, and I would suggest that the minister look into the matter. The person who brought the situation to my attention was disturbed, in view of the fact that the government was spending a certain amount of money in advertising the need for saving waste paper. I would hesitate to say now the quantity that I was told was being destroyed every day at this point, but it was very considerable. I suggest that the minister look into this matter, and also into the waste that may be going on at other military camps.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I am very glad the hon. gentleman has brought this to my attention. The salvage division of my department deals with these matters through the army disposal board, and we have a committee which looks after these things. I shall look into the situation mentioned by the hon. member.

Mr. REID: I wonder if paper salvage is still going on. Is the salvage division still collecting waste paper?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Yes.

Mr. REID: I do not wish to criticize the minister at all, but I should like to show him something I brought back with me from New Westminster, which has caused me a great deal of concern. The people out there are asking why we should be trying to conserve paper on the one hand, while on the other hand people who cannot get enough paper for their requirements are asked to display large posters such as the one I am holding up. The person who gave me this said, "The government will have to supply me with a new wall on which to hang it." Here is a paper poster which would cost probably fifty cents; these are sent out from Ottawa by the ton, no doubt. I should like the minister to look into this matter, though I realize that it does not come under his department. It seems to me, however, that his efforts in regard to salvage are being sabotaged, at least as far as paper is concerned.

My particular reason for rising at this time is that I have found that many departments here in Ottawa pay no attention at all to the criticism made by a member of parliament outside the House of Commons. I feel so keenly about this matter that I made up my mind that when the proper time came I would bring it to the attention of the appropriate minister in the hope that the officials responsible for the production and distribution of posters of this kind might be told that there is a scarcity of paper, and that they should consider the cost of preparing and sending out things of this kind. I feel sure this poster would weigh almost a pound. The man who gave it to me has had his own paper supply cut by some twenty-five per cent. He said, "I cannot obtain paper; I am put on a quota; yet I am asked to place a poster like this on my wall." He gave me at least half a dozen of these posters, though they were not all the same size. The minister is not to blame, of course, but I want to show that his efforts in regard to paper salvage are being sabotaged by other government departments which are not giving him the cooperation I think he should have.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I have taken note of the advertisement in question, though of course it does not come under my department. This deals with a very difficult question, in regard to which the interest of Canadians must be aroused without fail. As regards the departments in Ottawa, I am very happy to say that they have gone in for a combined, well coordinated, well backed up waste-paper salvage campaign. I am in touch with a committee on which each department is represented, and as far as salvage is concerned I think the results will be better this spring than at any time in the past.

Mr. REID: I can send them these posters; I have plenty of them.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Has the minister been given full cooperation by the various manufacturing plants throughout the country? I ask this question because I had occasion to bring to the attention of the management of one organization the fact that several tons of paper in the form of cartons and things like that were being burned every day or so. That was not a very good example for the men in the plant. As soon as the situation was made known to the management the matter was attended to and the paper saved. I wonder if there is close cooperation between the salvage branch and the various manufacturing concerns in Canada so that much of the paper that has been destroyed in the past may be saved in future.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I have mentioned already the salvage operations being conducted by the various departments of government. Within the last months the usual collections of waste paper have been more than doubled, and any increase of one hundred per cent is a good increase. Through the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, boards of trade, chambers of commerce, trade papers and so on we hope within a short time to increase the usual tonnage of waste paper collected throughout Canada by about 150 per cent. I must say that we have the finest of cooperation from the associations I have just mentioned. For instance, a trade paper called the "Drug Merchandiser" has shown the greatest of generosity. They have appealed to the druggists of Canada to make certain to save the waste material—waste paper—and turn it into the regular trade channels, so that at an early date it will reach the paper mills of Canada. I must say I have taken the responsibility, toward another department, to see that the salvage division find an average of 20,000 tons of waste paper monthly.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I understand that different committees have had difficulty in trying to find out whether the department in Ottawa wished them to collect bottles. They started in to collect, and then they received a letter on January 15, 1943, stating that the sale was off. Then they got another on March 5, 1943 encouraging them to buy again. Bottle dealers, wine dealers and distillers were to agree among themselves as to the method of procedure, and maximum prices to prevail. But the salvage committees have had no direction at all in respect of some lines of salvage collection. One day they are told to do one thing, and the next day they are told to cancel that order. Would the minister tell us how things stand in respect of paper prices, and the position as to rags and bottles?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I think I must suggest to my hon. friend that he has not been fully informed, or that he has received information from a person who has not been fully informed. I hold before me a bulletin—

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): What date is it?

Mr. LaFLECHE: This is bulletin No. 81 respecting salvage, and it is dated March 20, 1944. I suggest that a branch of this kind cannot get out 81 circular letters, very closely printed, and containing a great deal of information, and at the same time accept the statement that local committees are not well informed.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Perhaps I should have put my question another way. I have followed this matter of salvage collection very closely. Prices were supposed to have been given some time ago in regard to bottles. I took the matter up with the head of the salvage department at that time—I forget his name, but I have it in my office. Three or four weeks after that some men came to see me, here in the House of Commons, and I had a talk with them in regard to bottles. At that time the people were told to collect them. Collections were made, and following that they found there was no sale for what they had collected. The result was that they had to break the bottles, and sell them as broken glass, at so much a ton. The women who collected were very careful to pack the bottles properly, and to sort them, and they were very much disappointed when they had to sell them as broken glass.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I sympathize with those ladies.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): They have done a fine job.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I fully agree with that. But may I say that the salvage division of my department does not control supply and demand. That division moves when required, and moves quickly and well. When the director of salvage is informed by another department that bottles are needed, or that other materials are in demand, he moves. I understand that not for about a year has any request issued from the salvage division asking the public to save and to turn in bottles.

Quite apart from that, I recall hearing it said by manufacturers of glass containers that at one time not very long ago—perhaps two years ago—there was a great demand for bottles. They started a campaign to reclaim second-hand bottles. Then—and I do not know why—the story goes that there was a great supply of them, with the result that they ceased collecting second-hand bottles, and began to use the new bottles which were available.

Before dealing harshly in one's thoughts with the salvage division, I believe one must keep in mind that they act only when they are told that a supply is needed. Then, of course, they must pass on that information to local salvage committees. I must say to my hon. friend that I think the branch does a very good job. I have heard many commendations of the work it has done, and I think much credit is due it. I hope the hon. member will follow me in that respect.

Mr. BENCE: Who is the present director in charge of salvage?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Mr. Charles Laferle.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am happy to say that the minister has in Mr. Charles Laferle a capable man at the head of the branch. He was one of the chief officials, and one of the most successful officials of one of the largest businesses in Toronto. I, for one, was surprised that his firm allowed him to come here to help. However, I am glad they did, because the figures given by the minister show that he has obtained from salvage about $3,000,000 which would have been lost otherwise. That has been collected through an expenditure of a comparatively small sum of money supplied by the government. I believe that the salvage branch, under the minister's direction, deserves unstinted credit.

Mr. BENCE: Who was the immediate predecessor of Mr. Laferle?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Mr. William Knightley.

[Mr. G. K. Fraser.]

Mr. BENCE: Is Mr. Knightley in the employ of the department?

Mr. LaFLECHE: No, he is not. He returned to the Department of Transport some considerable time ago.

Mr. MacNICOL: I might add that Canada owes a debt of gratitude to that brave little island of Malta in the Mediterranean, where Mr. Laferle was born, for allowing him to migrate from that part to this part of the empire.

Mr. PERLEY: I should like to add a word of praise in respect of local voluntary committees which have been doing this work for the last two or three years. There is a feeling now that they are not receiving proper cooperation from the authorities in Ottawa. For instance, after doing all the work of gathering rubber, paper and bottles they have had difficulty in getting facilities for shipping. I would draw to the minister's attention the fact that in a great many centres along the main line of the Canadian Pacific railway—and I refer to that line in particular—there are to-day many piles of scrap metal. Local committees are having difficulty in shipping it. Have any steps been taken to clear up those piles? At practically every loading platform throughout western Canada you will find this scrap iron piled, either in the road or on the platform. When a farmer comes to ship grain he finds this stuff in the way. Has any effort been made to get these piles cleaned up and out of the country?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I am glad to join with the hon. member in working for the farmer. Perhaps he may not have thought of it, but there are easterners who have great regard for the farmer. We have excellent farmers in the east, although our soil has grown many more crops than the soil of the west.

Mr. PERLEY: It has not worn out as many implements.

Mr. LaFLECHE: My hearing is not sufficiently good to permit me to hear the remark of my hon. friend. I want to say that action has been taken to clear up the situation he mentions. We have been at the steel controller, shall I say, with regard to this particular matter, and I shall bring it to his attention again. I understand that the situation is greatly improved and that there is not a vast quantity left.

Mr. PERLEY: I wish the minister would take a trip through the west.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I wish I could go there now.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Is there any chance of the salvage department stabilizing the prices of the different salvaged goods in order that the people who collect these goods will not lose everything? Sometimes it costs a lot of money to do the collecting.

Mr. LaFLECHE: The matter mentioned by the hon. member has received attention and will receive further attention to the end that everything possible may be done to stabilize prices.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The hon. member for Qu'Appelle mentioned iron and steel. Is there a demand for those metals now?

Mr. LaFLECHE: What is left of the metal mentioned by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle is in reserve stock-piles which are available to the steel controller. As I said a moment ago, this matter has been brought to his attention again.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I have a complaint to make with regard to the salvage and marketing of bottles in Nova Scotia. I think we are all in sympathy with the salvaging of as much material as is possible, but it is disconcerting to find that in certain instances efforts to salvage are blocked. The complaint I have to make is in connection with a man in Nova Scotia who for years purchased empty bottles to ship to the brewers of Ontario and Quebec. Administration order A-505 of December 14, 1942, was promulgated by the administration. It provides that bottles shall not be shipped out of Nova Scotia except with the permission in writing of the chief commissioner of the Nova Scotia liquor commission. The chief commissioner of the Nova Scotia liquor commission requires that all bottles shall pass through certain channels.

This individual who has been in this business for a number of years is blocked in his efforts to salvage bottles. Lately he has had inquiries from breweries in upper Canada who wish to purchase bottles and are ready to enter into contracts over a period of years. But he cannot sell bottles collected in Nova Scotia to the better market in central Canada because of order A-505. I should like an explanation from the minister as to why there should be interference with the ordinary course of trade. Salvage undertakings should be facilitated, and yet this man is not able to market what he collects.

Mr. LaFLECHE: The order mentioned by the hon. member is a wartime prices and trade board order. I shall take this matter up with the board. They are in a much closer position to the actual market than is the salvage division of my department. The salvage division of the Department of National War Services starts or stops the flow of materials upon hearing from the wartime prices and trade board that a certain material is in short supply. The wartime prices and trade board has the power to order; the salvage division has no such power. Our work is carried on almost entirely by voluntary workers. I shall undertake to look into the problem to-morrow and speak to my hon. friend as soon as I get any information.

Mr. POULIOT: I do my best to encourage salvage operations. A few weeks ago the chief clerk of the committees wrote to me asking what should be done with a number of files that filled one filing cabinet in his office. I wanted to know what they were, and he told me that these files were collected by me when I was chairman of the civil service committee in 1938. I told him that at the time they had been quite useful because we had brought in a unanimous report, but that since nothing was done to implement that report he could give the files to the salvage. It should help a little bit.

There are many things that can be said about salvage. At one time we had some legitimate salvage in connection with shaving-cream and toothpaste tubes. We were told that the metal used in these containers was very helpful to the war effort and we had to turn in an old tube before we could get a new one. However, this restriction was removed and the people can now get new tubes without turning in any old ones. They can throw the old ones in their waste-paper baskets. This is not the right kind of salvage. The first system was the proper one; now we just have waste. There are a number of things I could enumerate in connection with which there is waste. I cannot understand why such things are done. I can understand it the less because those who decide matters of salvage sit in the most magnificent building we have in this country, the new supreme court building, which was put up to house the supreme court and the chief justice of the land. I have said it before and I repeat it again that in no other country of the world would you see the chief justice of the country and the other judges of the supreme court sitting in a barn like they do in Canada, while dollar a year men who look after salvage are housed in our most magnificent office building, costing several million dollars, with lofty ceilings and brass doors just as heavy as the gates of Gaza that Samson carried on his back. The doors of the supreme court building are so heavy that even Samson could not carry them away. I am so sorry that hon. members laugh. We should weep about it because there is no sense in it at all, and I say to my hon. friend the member for Winnipeg South Centre that I am fighting his cause now because I am sure that he would not want to sit as a judge of the supreme court in an old barn. In no other country of the world would such quarters be tolerated for our supreme court as the present building where they are housed. Think of the millions of dollars spent on that other magnificent building which was put up for the express purpose of housing the supreme court, and that is now used by the salvage men, looking after ash-cans! It is an incredible situation. Mark Twain would have written something marvellous about it. It is a thing that hardly anybody outside Ottawa would believe, but we in Ottawa know it is a fact. Imagine a lawyer from outside coming to Ottawa and saying to a taxi driver, "I want to go to the supreme court." He is driven to that awful building that now houses the supreme court, and then he sees another building, a magnificent one, and asks the taxi driver what that is for, and the taxi driver tells him "Oh, that is the salvage building."

It is a waste of money, having such a magnificent building with brass doors and lofty ceilings to be used for ash-cans, and I hope hon. members will join with me in protest against such a ridiculous state of affairs. Who is responsible for it? Here we are to-night listening to talk about salvage. Now is the time that we should honour the bench as it deserves to be honoured and see that our supreme court is housed in the temple of justice, in a building befitting the dignity of the court. That is why we spent money for such a magnificent building. If at the time we were asked to vote such a tremendous amount of money for the supreme court, would anyone have agreed to vote the money if they had been told that the building was to be used for garbage, while the judges are in the ash-can and the doghouse.

The other day the Minister of Justice said that conditions were not as bad as I have described them. Well, an official paper has been published. It is the report of the inspector of the health department, and he goes much farther than I do. He described things as they were. I can say that what I have done I have done at the request of a judge of the supreme court who is now dead, and of another judge now living, whose name I shall not mention, but who can corroborate what I have said.

I have had occasion several times to use the most valuable books that are to be found in the supreme court library. There are treasures in that library that cannot be found anywhere else. If they were destroyed by fire it would be a national loss, just as if the archives were destroyed by fire. But the archives are housed in a fireproof building, while these most valuable books in the supreme court library are in that old building on Wellington street, exposed to all hazards of fire, when there is a fireproof library in the new supreme court building which now serves for salvage. Is there any sense in that? I hope that the government will reconsider the matter and that before the end of this session the salvage branch will be moved into the building that is at present occupied by the supreme court and the exchequer court, and that the supreme court and the exchequer court will take possession of their own quarters in that new building the cornerstone of which was laid by Her Majesty the Queen. What has been done up until now is ridiculous, but there is always time to do better, and I hope that the necessary change will be made.

The other day I was amazed when I read in a report of a committee of this house that parliament had fallen in public respect. It is because of things like this of which I have been speaking to-night that public respect for parliament, respect for the bench and for our democratic institutions, has fallen. If the Canadian taxpayer carries the burden of heavy taxation for the construction of that magnificent building which was erected to house the supreme court, he does so because that building was erected to honour the bench. He does so to show the respect that every Canadian citizen has for the bench. But if the present situation is not changed it will contribute in no small way to destroy those feelings in the hearts of our fellow citizens.

Item agreed to.

Corps of (civilian) Canadian Fire-Fighters for United Kingdom, $744,905.

Mr. BENCE: I want to say a word on this item, particularly in view of the fact that the city from which I come has made a good contribution to this corps. First I would remind the minister of the statement that he made last year when speaking in this house on July 22, he is reported at page 5244 of Hansard as follows:

> But may I say that Canada will never forget the fact that these men volunteered for a service considered then to be as dangerous as that performed by any human being in the British isles, whether in uniform or not.

Prefacing my remarks by that quotation, I would suggest to the minister and to the administration that there are two or three matters in connection with the rehabilitation of these men which should receive the serious consideration of the government. In the first place, the impression got abroad last year that the fire-fighters were going to be in exactly the same position as the returned men of the armed services. I will grant that that was not quite borne out by any suggestion made by the minister in his statement, except when he stated that "if members of this corps are injured or killed, they or their dependents receive the identical benefits as paid to the members of the armed forces in similar circumstances". That statement led a lot of these men to reach the conclusion that they were being put in exactly the same position with respect to all benefits that the armed services had, and I must confess that from a cursory examination of the statement I came to the same conclusion. But as far as rehabilitation is concerned there are three respects in which the fire fighter is treated differently from the man who has been retired from the armed services. In many ways these men have made as big a contribution as have many men in the armed services, and certainly have entered into a more hazardous occupation than some members of the armed services who are entitled to these benefits to which I wish to refer.

In the first place, I suggest to the minister, the fire-fighter who has been retired from the force should be entitled to the same benefit with respect to thirty days with pay, which he gets now; but in addition to that he should get, what the men of the armed services, get a rehabilitation grant of one month's pay. I suggest also that some recognition should be given to him of the fact that he has performed this service in a theatre of war, much along the lines of the type of recognition given to the returned man when he is awarded his service badge. In addition to that, it seems to me that if the man or his dependents are entitled to the identical benefits that are paid to the dependents of men of the armed forces, certainly he should be put in the same position when he is retired from the force as is a man in the armed services with respect to free hospital, doctor and dentist bills for a period of one year. In view of the fact that the service is so similar in many ways to the type of service which has been performed by men who are now returned, I suggest that the minister should put the fire-fighter in the same position, in view of the contribution he has made and the risk he has taken. I hope the minister will make a comment on that, and at the same time will explain to the committee the method which is used in providing the returned fire-fighter with rehabilitation benefits, such as they are, and the provisions under which his dependents are paid pensions in the event of his death in the service. I do not know whether they come under the provisions of the Pension Act, but I am sure the minister will be in a position to enlighten us.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I am very happy to hear the sympathetic manner in which the hon. member for Saskatoon City has approached this subject. I myself wish to do everything I possibly can for the members of the civilian Canadian fire-fighters corps, but in one word in their title I have found very considerable difficulty; they are officially known as the "Civilian" Corps of Canadian Fire Fighters for Service in Great Britain.

With regard to the three points raised by my hon. friend, we do give to members of the corps who are retired or discharged the thirty days' leave. I think my hon. friend knows that. It is possible, and I believe it is the case, that the regulations covering the discharge of men from the armed forces may have changed in that respect recently. I am not quite certain, but officials of the department are looking into that.

I think I can save a great deal of time and speak as forcibly as one can and cover the entire ground when I say that my department is trying at this moment to make certain that members of the fire-fighters corps receive benefits identical with those granted to men who are discharged from the armed forces. For instance, and to illustrate the difficult and peculiar position in which fire-fighters find themselves: the hon. member for Saskatoon City mentioned recognition; I take it that he meant a service ribbon.

Mr. BENCE: Well, some kind of acknowledgment.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Quite right. I have wanted and I have tried to get them a service medal. But they are not a military corps. Decorations and medals, one knows well, come from the crown, from the sovereign, and conditions in regard to the award of medals and decorations are surrounded, we all know, with many safeguards and with a keen eye, I suppose, both to tradition and to the future. I believe we are on the verge of getting some recognition of this kind for these men, in the form of the right to wear service chevrons on their tunic sleeve. That seems to be promising, though I hope the boys will not feel too badly if it does not come through, but we have had some encouragement in that respect.

I have tried to answer the questions put by my hon. friend.

Mr. BENCE: Would the minister not consider the granting of some type of badge or button which might be exclusive to the fire-fighter, but which he would be able to wear, and which would indicate to other people that he has seen service really in a theatre of war during this war?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Yes; many thanks for the suggestion. It is difficult, though, for any minister to give an answer to a question just like that. There will always be some connection between whatever may be suggested and what is in practice in other respects, but I am very much sold upon the merit of giving these men some tangible form of recognition; I think it is coming to them. We all remember that when they first went to Great Britain it appeared that their duties would oftentimes be more dangerous than those of the armed forces.

Mr. BENCE: Very hazardous.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Since, of course, our land army or part of it has moved off to active war fronts, perhaps that comparison is not as favourable to the fire-fighters as it used to be. Nevertheless, there is very little to choose when under bombs, whether they come from cannon or from aircraft.

Mr. BENCE: Does the minister express an opinion in connection with the matter of free hospitalization, dental and medical care for a year after discharge, in the same manner as is provided for members of the armed forces?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I am still trying to get every one of these things. Last year, when I said "identical benefits under the Pension Act", I meant, of course, the stated amounts that one finds or used to find in the schedule of the Pension Act. That applies as it did then.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, April 25, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

INCOME TAX

POSTPONEMENT UNTIL AUGUST 31 OF BALANCE OWING ON QUARTERLY INSTALMENT BASIS

On the order of motions:

Hon. C. W. G. GIBSON (Minister of National Revenue): I should like to clarify the previous statement I made on March 27 concerning the extension of time for the payment of income tax by individuals. Strictly interpreted the statement would exclude those taxpayers who pay their taxes on the quarterly instalment plan. I should like to make it clear that taxpayers who have estimated their tax on a quarterly instalment basis, as required by the Income War Tax Act, will be granted until August 31 to pay, without interest, any additional tax that may be owing over and above what was estimated.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON REVISION OF STANDING ORDERS

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 7, consideration in committee of the report of the special committee on the revision of standing orders, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: The first amendment proposed is to standing order 9, which at present reads as follows:

Upon a division, the yeas and nays shall not be entered upon the minutes, unless demanded by five members.

The amendment proposed is as follows:

And every member present in the chamber when the question is finally put by Mr. Speaker shall be obliged to vote, and if he does not vote Mr. Speaker shall call upon him to vote and his name shall be recorded accordingly. If he persists in not voting he may be named by Mr. Speaker for having violated a standing order of the house.

Mr. GRAYDON: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether the procedure you are now adopting is that which was agreed upon unanimously at a previous sitting, when this report was discussed. But it would appear that this procedure would bar any general discussion with respect to this matter, and I rather fancy one or two hon. members in any event would wish to make some general observations before going into the more limited discussion on the amendments to the various standing orders.

Mr. POULIOT: Speaking to the point of order, Mr. Chairman, when an official paper is submitted to the committee of the whole house that paper must be considered in full. The Prime Minister expressed some doubt as to the wisdom of the preamble to the report of the committee. That report has been reprinted; the preamble begins on the first page and continues for three pages. In the first place, Mr. Chairman, I submit that we cannot consider the report now before the committee unless we start at the very beginning and consider the preamble. This is one objection to the reading of the amendments in the first place, except by unanimous consent. And there will be no unanimous consent, because I object to it—even if I am alone I will do so. That is my first point.

The second point is that when a special committee is appointed for a definite purpose, and a final report is sent to the house, that special committee does not any longer exist. A standing committee may exist, but not a special committee. Therefore unless there is unanimous consent we cannot do otherwise than examine in the first place the very same preamble to which I was referring. If the report is to be amended by a committee, a new special committee should be appointed to modify the report and to strike out the preamble.

Are we as members of parliament to stand for this general criticism of parliament? It is much more than a criticism of government. I say it is a criticism of parliament, coming from a committee headed by His Honour the Speaker, and on which there were two cabinet ministers. This, sir, is most unusual, and I must join with the leader of the opposition in making my protest. I do not see how any member of the house can stand for it. I hope, Mr. Speaker, you will be kind enough to make your decision on the two points raised by the leader of the opposition and myself.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a very short comment upon what has been said in this matter. I believe the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Pouliot) is somewhat beside the point when he refers to the first part of the report as being a preamble. It is not a preamble, except in a very general sense. Certainly it is not a preamble such as one finds at the beginning of a bill.

But the hon. member is quite correct in his statement that when a committee of this kind reports it thereupon ceases to exist. That will be found in paragraph 664 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, which states:

> If a committee at the conclusion of their inquiry, make a final report to the house, the sittings of the committee are assumed to have been closed, and if further proceedings were desired, it would be necessary to revive the committee.

That does not matter so much at the moment, except that I believe Mr. Speaker told us the last time the matter was discussed that the committee might further consider the matter and make further representations. That, of course, would be impossible under the circumstances.

The leader of the opposition raised a further point of order. He said that some members might wish to speak on the general aspect of the report. I would also point out that in the earlier part of the report—which the chairman appears to have ignored, because he begins in the middle of it, at page 4—recommendations are made. What are we going to do with them?

I say that there is a definite recommendation by the committee, which reads as follows:

> We therefore recommend that, when the yearly estimates have been brought down, one day a week be set aside for consideration of supply.

Then there is the further definite recommendation:

> Our recommendation is that, when there is reason to believe that debate will be protracted, parties and groups recognized in the house shall confer and make arrangements—

And so on. It provides that groups shall get together and do something about it, a procedure which I submit is quite illegal.

There are two definite recommendations. What are we going to do about them? Because, the amendments to the standing orders having been considered, I presume the thing will conclude. Or are we to go backwards and begin again? Would it not be better to do as the leader of the opposition has suggested, namely, begin at the beginning and deal with all the recommendations, after having a general debate? The debate was by no means concluded when the matter was up some time ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Chairman, might I say a word for purposes of expedition. It will be noted that on March 7 Mr. Speaker closed the debate, as it appears at page 1262 of Hansard, with these words:

> I therefore suggest that the committee report progress and ask leave to sit again on another day when, if the committee so desires, we may deal with the amendments which are printed on pages 149 to 152 of Votes and Proceedings.

I am suggesting that if we make the progress which I am assuming we would make in connection with the specific amendments to the rules of the house, we should vote upon them as soon as we can. We can give some indication as to whether we are against them or in favour of them, and have some action in the matter.

Ten specific recommendations are made by the committee. I believe the committee was unanimous in respect of most of them. But on the other hand I do not think it would insist upon any if the house were against them. In my view the essential procedure this afternoon is to find out upon what the house agrees, and to do it with all possible expedition. I do not think debate will help us much in regard to these specific recommendations. I suggest we leave the generalizations and the introductory features mentioned, so that we may deal with the specific amendments suggested by the committee.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I speak again on a point of order? In my view it would be unfortunate if this debate were to be extended to any great length.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I cannot hear the leader of the opposition.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am not disagreeing with my hon. friend. I try to speak as loudly as I can on these occasions, so that he will be able to hear. I agree to this extent with the Minister of Pensions and National Health, that perhaps it would be unwise, unless there is some special reason for so doing, to have an extended general debate in the matter. Nevertheless there are a number of members who, if the procedure were directed along more restricted channels, would be deprived of an opportunity to speak. Some hon. members who spoke on the earlier occasion had the advantage of speaking generally, and if the debate were restricted I believe those of us who perhaps now have something to say along general lines would suffer an injustice. I think it would be unfair to make that restriction, even at the expense of extending the debate a little longer than might normally be required.

When Mr. Speaker on the earlier occasion made his observations at the conclusion of that sitting, I do not think he had in mind any curtailment of the rights of those who might wish to speak in a general way, and in respect of the general aspects of the matter.

The report dealt not only with specific matters affecting changes in the rules, but it went on in some detail to philosophize somewhat in respect of rules generally, and house deportment. It is my belief that we would make just as much headway, and perhaps in the end save considerable time, if hon. members were given leeway in the same manner as obtained on the earlier occasion. I have always felt that when there is an attempt—I am not saying any such attempt is being made on this occasion—to curtail general discussion in the house it takes longer than if we proceed in the regular way. If hon. members have something to say we might as well allow them to have their say at this time. It is my suggestion, in order that the matter may be clarified, that we go on with the general discussion, beginning where we left off on the earlier occasion. Then, having finished that, we could get down to the particular items. I fancy it would not take quite so long then to deal with those items.

Mr. CRERAR: How shall we determine when that debate is finished?

Mr. GLEN: When I spoke at the last sitting of the committee in connection with the rules I did not intend there should be any limitation of discussion on the part of any hon. member of the committee. I was concerned, of course, principally with the passing of the amendments that will have to be discussed. The hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) speaks of this as a preamble. It is not a preamble; it is simply the bases upon which the committee is being asked to pass amendments to the rules. When the amendments to the rules are being discussed there is nothing to prevent any hon. member of the committee from referring to what is a commentary on the reasons why the amendments were being asked for. But in view of the attitude of the hon. members who have spoken, which I think is the mind of the hon. members of the committee, I should be willing and agree that there should be the general discussion to which the leader of the opposition has referred. But I would point out that we are still on the first portion of the report, which is, if I may say so, the historical part of the reasons for the amendments. The matters before the committee, after all, are the amendments of the rules. That is the question for the committee. It is a matter wholly within the hands of the committee. Our committee have met and have reported. It is now within the judgment of the committee of the whole whether these few rules shall be amended or not. In so far as the committee is concerned it is entirely in the hands of the committee of the whole, which is now sitting.

Mr. ROY: After listening this noon to the finest music and the most harmonious melodies coming from the tower of the parliament buildings, it is painful to be confronted in this chamber with a report submitted for the purpose of restricting some of the most important rights, privileges and liberties of the people's representatives in parliament.

I would have no objection to most of the amendments submitted in this report. For the moment I shall not state any objection I may have to the amendments to standing orders 9, 12, 31, 37, 40, 43 and 44; but I am strongly opposed to the proposed amendment to standing order 49. This amendment completely contradicts the principles set forth in the presentation or preamble, if we can call it that, which appears in the report of the special committee.

The CHAIRMAN: I would ask the hon. member to speak to the point of order raised by the leader of the opposition. We are discussing the point of order at the present time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I believe we should go on with the fullest, frankest and freest discussion of this whole matter. Parliament is the place where the people's representatives meet to talk. While the committee which considered the matter had a good chance to go into all the aspects of the proposed changes, a large number of the members of parliament have not had such an opportunity. I believe it will be altogether beneficial to have a complete discussion in this committee, even if it takes us a day or two. Let us remember that the rules as they stand to-day are the result of the experience of our forefathers over hundreds of years. We cannot afford lightly to change them. We should give most careful consideration to every proposed change. I therefore favour allowing complete, frank and general discussion before we proceed with the items.

Mr. CHURCH: I believe the point raised is either to call for a general or a clause by clause discussion of this report. There is one point I should like to point out. I think it would save time if we took up the report as a whole first and then considered the list of very moderate changes. The reference to the committee called for a revision of the standing orders of the house. It was a broad resolution and gave the committee the power to go much farther than they have gone. I refer to one matter that does not appear in the list, rule 9. In the British House of Commons under their rule 9 private members and all the members may question the government, ask questions which are not on the order paper, up to a quarter to four. They can practically cross-examine the ministers on any questions of urgent public importance. What is our rule? We have to move on an urgent matter the adjournment of the house and get twenty members to stand up. One may wish to question the government on one of the most important emergency questions that could arise, but unless one gets the support of twenty members one cannot do it. Take a question like housing. I could not ask a question on it to-day under our rules without moving the adjournment of the house and having twenty members stand. Even then the Speaker automatically has the power to say whether in his opinion it is an urgent matter. That I think is unwise. I suggest that general discussion take place first.

The CHAIRMAN: We have been discussing the questions asked by the leader of the opposition. The hon. member for Témiscouata mentioned a preamble. I think that has been answered. There is no preamble, only an introduction. I believe I know the consensus of the committee. I believe hon. members want a general discussion. It is recognized that this is not an ordinary measure. I believe it would be in order to allow a general discussion. There is no possibility of amendments as far as the introduction is concerned, but there is a possibility of amendments when the proposed amendments are brought before the committee for discussion.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Before we begin the general discussion, may we have some definite ruling from the Chair? After all, what we are dealing with here is a report of a special committee. Is the Chair proposing that we shall first of all have a general discussion and then consider the report section by section? If we have the general discussion, would amendments then be in order? Will there be a vote on the report as a whole? These amendments are not a series of proposals; they are brought down as one proposal as a report of the committee. I should like the Chair to make that clear; otherwise we may do a lot of rambling.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I agree with the hon. member who has just spoken. I think there are ten distinct amendments. Each one is separate and each one should be dealt with separately. We should take the judgment of the committee as a whole on each one, and either reject it or adopt it, as the committee so decides. It is impossible to discuss the report as a whole, because the committee may agree with some of the changes and oppose others.

Mr. NEILL: How long are we going to take to dispose of the recommendations contained in what has been called the beginning of the report? We are starting in the middle. Are we going to go back to that, or ignore it?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I should be inclined to ignore it.

Mr. RALSTON: One who proposes anything in connection with the rules has to take some responsibility. The hon. member has asked a pertinent question, namely, when do we proceed from the general to the particular, and when do we know that we have finished with the general discussion? If, Mr. Speaker, who is carrying this particular item on the order paper, would consent, and if the committee would consent, even though it may be irregular, that the first item might be called as it has been called now, with no limitations imposed except those which are imposed by the subjects discussed in the so-called preamble or the general introduction to the report; on that item full discussion might then take place on any of the subjects which are in the minds of hon. members. When that item is disposed of, the general discussion would be concluded, and we would then proceed with the different amendments which are to be dealt with. I can understand that the general discussion in some respects will not be germane to the particular amendment to standing order 9, which is the first item. But at the same time if we all agree that it would mark the termination of the general discussion when the amendment is actually passed or disposed of, then the other items could be proceeded with. If we adopt that procedure we may get along.

I am sure that in amending the rules of the house we do not want to transgress the present rules more than is necessary and make the discussion any less regular than it would be under the rules we are endeavouring to amend. I cannot see how we are ever going to do anything practical if we just have a general discussion without terminating it with some sort of action by the committee on the items itself respecting standing order 9. It seems to me that the method proposed might provide a termination point for the general discussion.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, for the last few seconds the discussion has been over spilt milk. You have rendered a very wise decision. You have decided according to the wish of the committee. This is the very best kind of decision that anyone in the chair can render.

There are things that I disapprove and others that I approve. One of the things that I approve very highly is the fact that the Prime Minister notified the house a week ago that to-day, Tuesday, April 25, we would take up this matter. As a rule at eleven o'clock at night the government does not know what will come before the house the day following, but in this case we were told a week ahead. That is a good practice, which should be followed with respect to the agenda for every day of the session. Members should be notified long in advance of what is to come up on certain days, so that they can prepare themselves for discussion.

I have said that the first part of the committee's report is a preamble. His Honour the Speaker said that it was the basis for all the amendments proposed to the rules. That shows the importance of the matter, and I wonder if that preamble should not be read in the same fashion as a prologue to a Shakespearian tragedy. And what would be the tragedy? The tragedy would be that each member of parliament would put his head on the block, to deprive himself of rights that our forefathers gained for us.

What was the purpose of the amendments to the rules in 1927? It was to allow the Prime Minister, the leader of the opposition and some of the cabinet ministers to use some of the time of the private members; it gave them full latitude at the expense of the rights of private members, whose speeches were curtailed to forty minutes. The rights of members of parliament were taken away by those amendments, and the same sort of thing is proposed to-day. Why is it done? It is because of the fear that the government and the opposition have of the yellow press, which has been complaining, not of the government, not of the opposition, but of the role of parliament. I defy the press tycoons of Montreal, Winnipeg or anywhere else to discuss that matter with a member of parliament who knows what the rights of a member of parliament are. What are the rights of a member of parliament? It is shameful that in this country those who do not know anything about the work performed by members of parliament dare to criticize us and vilify us before the people. Long enough have members of parliament been considered nonentities. Long enough have members of parliament not been consulted on matters of great national concern, but have been told instead that such and such a matter is a military secret or that it was none of their business to be informed of the progress of the administration, whether in the right way or in the wrong way. But this is an abdication of the rights of parliament to be signed by ourselves. Are members of parliament going to sign the decree of execution of their own rights, the rights for which our forefathers fought so hard more than a century ago?

And now because some tycoon who is receiving a big rent for the selective service administration building here in Ottawa, and another one who is after all the ministers who have contracts for fine paper in Montreal, and another one who is here all the time seeking jobs, are so much concerned about the vigilance of members of parliament in denouncing them when they get things like that at the expense of the taxpayer, we are to have amendments to the rules of the house. I denounce these tycoons most bitterly as the enemies and foes of the common people. We must be respected, and we must be respected by the government as members of parliament if we want to be respected by our own constituents. We deserve more respect precisely from those who desire to curtail the rights of members of parliament to denounce them when they do wrong. That is why I feel so much humiliated on reading the preface which is the basis of the amendments, these uncalled for and untimely amendments that are proposed.

Why should members of parliament willingly abandon their own rights? Some members who sat on that committee had a smile on their lips. It would save the time of the House of Commons, they said. Would it not save time if we had proper accounts? Would it not save time if the public accounts were just as good to-day as they were when Mr. Robb was Minister of Finance and Mr. Gonthier, a French Canadian, was auditor general?

But now it is different. Even the leader of the opposition, who is a genial fellow, rises in his place and says, "I do not want to take up too much of the time of the house." He has the right to take up as much time of the house as he wishes. Why should he apologize when he rises to speak, if he has something important to say? There is no reason for his apologizing at all, or for any member of parliament excusing himself for rising in this House of Commons to voice the complaints of his constituents. I do not see why there should be such an inferiority complex in members of parliament towards the government or towards the leader of the opposition or of any group.

Once someone wrote to the chairman asking him if there was not a precedent for some people speaking in committee. There are no precedents, Mr. Chairman, and if there were one, it would be the precedent of service to the country by a member of parliament. Long service? I never claimed it. I believe we are all equals. But I believe that my colleagues and myself deserve the respect of the Canadian people, and it is shameful, sir, that some press tycoons, taking advantage of the fact that they do not sign their articles, throw insults in the faces of members of parliament.

Sir, we must have some dignity. We have some rights. Let us keep them. I strongly protest against the three first pages of this so-called prologue or preamble. It is shameful. There is no reason to have those three pages in the record of parliament. It must be voted down; and then I shall be ready to discuss the amendments without fear or favour.

In my view all members of parliament should be on the same footing. There is no reason why anyone, whether the Prime Minister or the Leader of the Opposition, should be entitled to any more time than the least back-bencher on either side of the house. All members of parliament, whether on the treasury benches or to the rear of them, should have the same rights. I do not see why members have to curtail their speeches to forty minutes, except it be to give more time to others who are regarded as more important than private members in this chamber. But why should that be? It is opposed to the first principles of democracy. We contend that Canada should be on an equal footing with other nations; let us in the first place be equals amongst ourselves. That is the first thing. Then, let us have enough esprit de corps to join together to censure those journalists who spend their time in throwing contempt on members of parliament. Personally I am indifferent to their attacks; I have proved that again and again. They do not impress me. When anyone does his duty, why should he be fearful of criticism?

I ask my fellow members kindly to consider these matters, to read the first three pages of the paper which is before them; and then I invite them to reflect upon what they will say to their constituents when the general elections come, when someone may read to them the first sentence of this report:

> Your committee, in the performance of the important duty assigned to it by the house, has taken into account the existence of general criticism of parliament both by members and representative citizens.

Who are the members of parliament who have criticized parliament itself? Where are they? If there are any, let them raise their hands. I do not see anyone raise his hand. The chamber is full of members, but not one has raised his hand, and there is no one who will dare to do that. Then, who are these representative citizens? One daily newspaper in Ottawa, one in Montreal, one in Winnipeg, have spoken against the fact that members of parliament are voicing the complaints of their constituents here in this chamber. That is what we are here for.

I have said enough to bring to the attention of hon. members this most important matter, which has been overlooked by all those who were on that committee. It is not by kneeling down before the press that parliament will be respected. We can defend ourselves; our parliamentary life is an open book, and they have only to look at the records of parliament to see that we are not responsible for the legislation which is passed by a stroke of the pen by some individuals, contrary to the old way of passing legislation. But nevertheless we are doing our best to help our constituents —in a different way, if you wish. I admit that my hon. friends opposite are animated by as much good-will as those on this side of the chamber. I have never questioned their good-will, nor have I ever imputed motives to them, not merely because I desire to act in accordance with the rules of the house, but also to show my good-will towards them. I have been associated with members of parliament for twenty years, and I do not complain about that association. I think that members of parliament are a lot of good fellows, working together in difficult circumstances, trying to do the best they can for their people, and they deserve something better than this. If someone says "This is an innocuous remark, you must pass it over and pay no attention to it"—as the Minister of Pensions and National Health has just said—that is childish. We must consider what will happen to our official status if this is passed; we must weigh it on its own merit. My fear is that it will be a stigma which will be attached to members of parliament, especially to the one who has just spoken, and who will be defeated at the next election by a tremendous majority—and for the good of the country—and that hon. members will sink down under public opprobrium.

Mr. GLEN: The leader of the house made the suggestion that in order to obtain some finality with regard to our discussion to-day the first amendment should be considered as an open amendment with a general discussion to take place upon it; and after that discussion has been had, and the first amendment passed or rejected, that we go on to the other amendments. He put the question to me whether I would be agreeable to that. I of course am perfectly agreeable to it. Perhaps it can be understood that on the first amendment there shall be the general discussion which would have taken place in the ordinary course prior to it, and when that is completed and the first amendment passed, we can then proceed to the other amendments on their terms.

Mr. NEILL: May I ask the Speaker a question? While that seems a very suitable solution, there is this objection to it. When you are dealing with the amendment to standing order 9, it is to be agreed that we are to discuss the general subject, and when that passes we go on to the next amendment. But that will not afford us an opportunity to vote on these two other recommendations which the report contains and which do not happen to be amendments of standing orders. That is where the mistake has arisen. Certain recommendations have been made. Some of them are quite good and worthy of consideration, and we ought to vote on them. We want an oportunity to vote on each one of them. If that could be arranged, I think the thing would go along quite smoothly.

As regards what has been termed the preamble, the Minister of Pensions and National Health suggested that we should "forget it". Well, that is not a very polite way of dealing with a recommendation of the committee. I believe that the Prime Minister said the other day that we should regard the first portion of the report with something like mental reserve—not pay too much attention to it, he said. But that is not my view. There is a definite recommendation in the earlier part of the report on page 2. I want an opportuntiy to discuss it and to vote on it. That seems reasonable enough.

Mr. GLEN: What part is that?

Mr. NEILL: In what is called the preamble. I read it out a moment ago. They make two definite recommendations:

> We therefore recommend that, when the yearly estimates have been brought down, one day a week be set aside for consideration of supply. If that is done, the house is not likely to find itself under the necessity of passing a great part of the estimates in the dying days of the session.

I think that is a good idea; I would vote for it. But that is not the point. The next recommendation is:

> Our recommendation is that, when there is reason to believe that debate will be protracted, parties and groups recognized in the house shall confer—

It does not say, with whom.

> —and make arrangements either for allotting days or laying any plan for saving time. . . .

And so on.

I strongly object to that—there is the more need for discussion. But let us do something about it; it is a definite recommendation. It is suggested now that we should start in the middle of the report and go on from there, and the minister of pensions says, "Let us forget the first part". I think it would be a good idea to forget the whole thing.

Mr. GLEN: I cannot follow the reasoning of the hon. member with regard to the first part of the report. It is not intended that anything in the first part of the report shall be an alteration in the procedure of the house. What is intended by the report dealing especially with the standing orders of the house is what is contained in the latter part of the report, and to that the attention of the committee is recommended. The first portion of the report, to which my hon. friend has referred, is purely the thought of the committee; it is theoretical, it has no bearing, and cannot be amended by anything the committee could do because it does not change the standing orders of the house. All that will be changed, if the report is adopted, are the amendments that are proposed, to be found on page 4.

Mr. NEILL: How can we accept or reject these recommendations without dealing with them?

Mr. GLEN: The hon. member may make his protest with regard to it, and when the time comes, if it ever does, that an amendment is made to the standing order, the hon. gentleman will have the right to propose an amendment. At the moment, however, an amendment cannot be moved to the first portion of the report which would have an effect on our standing orders. All that we have to-day before us are the amendments, and these only can alter the standing orders. I suggest to the committee that on the first amendment with which we are dealing the general discussion should take place, and that immediately it is disposed of we proceed to the other amendments.

The CHAIRMAN: On the point raised by the hon. member for Weyburn, which was properly answered by the leader of the house, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), it was the intention of the chair first of all to call the proposed amendments one by one, and that is why the first was called, so as to allow a general discussion.

Mr. NEILL: That is not the first one.

The CHAIRMAN: The first proposed amendment. There are ten which are enumerated in the document I have before me. In the matter brought up by the leader of the house, as to when the discussion will terminate, we have in this instance a procedure similar to that in connection with the war appropriation bill, and I believe hon. members as well as the minister himself realized that we secured a great deal of cooperation so far as the general discussion was concerned. When we feel that the time has arrived when we can properly proceed with the proposed amendments, the general discussion will be terminated. We will follow the same procedure in this instance as in the war appropriation bill.

Mr. REID: I think His Honour the Speaker has clarified in the minds of most hon. members of the committee what it is that we are about to do. It is distinctly understood that the committee is not going to pass, nor will it become the law of the house, what has been termed the preamble. That understanding will obviate a great deal of discussion. I take it from the remarks of the Speaker that we are about either to pass or to reject the recommendations which are numbered, and if passed they will become the rule of the house. But the opening observations of the committee simply stand as their considered opinion and are in no way binding on the members of the committee.

Mr. LOCKHART: With all due deference to what has been said by the member for New Westminster, my understanding of parliamentary procedure is that when a committee makes a special and final report and uses such language as "we therefore recommend", which has been referred to by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, that recommendation is followed by something that is relevant to it. But can anyone show me where in the recommendations that follow there is any reference to one day a week being set aside for consideration of supply? Yet the committee in their preamble, or whatever you choose to call it, deliberately use these words, "we therefore recommend". I would ask any member of the committee, I would ask you, Mr. Chairman, to show me where there is a reference to that language in the recommendations themselves. I suggest that it is superfluous and we ought to clear up that point. I accept, as the member for Comox-Alberni does, this language inserted by a special committee of this house as being definitely a recommendation to the house, and I do not see how it can be discarded as being merely idle and useless words.

Mr. POULIOT: I move, Mr. Chairman, that pages 1, 2 and 3 of the introduction be struck out of the report.

The CHAIRMAN: It has been moved that paragraphs 1, 2 and 3 of the introduction be struck out of the report.

Mr. NEILL: Pages, not paragraphs.

Mr. POULIOT: Pages, Mr. Chairman. To support my amendment—

The CHAIRMAN: I shall have to rule the amendment out of order for the reason that the introduction is not before the committee. We have the word of His Honour the Speaker, as everyone will readily see, that we are dealing only with the proposed amendments to the rules of procedure of the House of Commons, so that the introduction is not before the committee.

Mr. POULIOT: If you will permit me, sir, I submit that what we have before us is not the interpretation of His Honour the Speaker but certain sheets of paper that are here and that we see with our eyes. It is not enough to say that certain language is not before us. That was not the meaning of my motion at all. What I expected was that the committee would show its disapproval of what is contained in these three pages. It is not a matter of our passing them over. The point is that as members of parliament we cannot accept what has been said in that introduction without becoming the laughing-stock of the country, and that is why I have moved to strike out those pages. At present it is not a question of His Honour giving his interpretation. His Honour is not in the chair; it is the chairman who is in the chair.

I submit that these pages form part of the official document. I regret that the signature of the chairman of the committee is not on this report, as it should have been if it were a true copy. We always see the signature of the chairman on reports that come from committees. This is a special committee but there is no signature. That, however, is a small point on which I will not insist. I hope that the committee will consider the seriousness of the situation and will not kneel down before those who try to depreciate our parliamentary institutions—those outside the house who do that job. I will therefore ask you, sir, to be good enough to reconsider your ruling. I will not appeal from it, because I do not like that kind of procedure, and I resort to it as little as possible. I hope however you will reconsider that ruling in the light of what has been said, which is an insult as much to you as to any other hon. member of the house, including Mr. Speaker. I protest strongly against it.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is there a motion before the committee? If there is not a motion I do not see how we can vote on it.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member was not in the chamber when I called the first proposed amendment to the attention of the committee.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): But there is no motion before the house.

The CHAIRMAN: Yes. There is a motion.

Mr. LOCKHART: His Honour the Speaker was chairman of this committee. I want to get myself clear on this before we proceed.

An hon. MEMBER: You had better.

Mr. LOCKHART: I will refrain from saying what was passing through my mind. I will ask His Honour to clarify this point. Probably I am not as brilliant as my hon. friend across the floor who interrupted. When language like this is used, "we therefore recommend that one day be set aside for supply," why is it that there is no properly written amendment in what follows later on to carry out that recommendation? To me these words are definite. That was in the mind of the committee, and I should like to know why there is no such amendment. I should like to know the reason for that, because these words, "we recommend" appear to me to be one of the most important things dealt with in the whole report.

Mr. GLEN: If the hon. member will look at page 2 of the report he will see these words:

> The procedure required to keep this privilege unimpaired—

That is with regard to the estimates being referred to a standing committee. Then it goes on:

> Certain estimates may be occasionally referred to a select committee in order to ascertain facts which the house desires to know, but this practice should be adopted guardedly and only in very special circumstances. Your committee does not think it would be advisable to change the present system and it believes that the elasticity of the present rules makes it possible to apply them in new situations from time to time. We, however, desire to submit that considerable time could be saved if the committee of supply sat oftener in the early part of the session. We therefore recommend that, when the yearly estimates have been brought down, one day a week be set aside for consideration of supply.

The next sentence is:

> If this is done the house is not likely to find itself under the necessity of passing a great part of the estimates in the dying days of the session.

It was the thought of the committee that some procedure should be adopted with regard to the estimates, but they were not in a position to suggest an amendment and in fact rather deprecated the idea of making suggestions at this time in regard to the manner of dealing with the estimates.

Mr. LOCKHART: Then that was definitely in the mind of the committee, if they wished to insert that reference into their report.

Mr. GLEN: They were definitely dealing with that matter; yes.

Mr. LOCKHART: Then could you explain why there is no reference to it in the recommendations?

Mr. GLEN: I think they were almost unanimously of the opinion that this was not a proper time to make any change with regard to the submission of the estimates to the house, and at the beginning of that paragraph the reasons for that decision are set out. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment which has been moved is not in order. There are no recommendations before the committee in this preamble; there are no amendments set out in pages 1, 2 and 3. At the moment we are dealing only with standing order 9, so that I think the amendment is out of order.

Mr. REID: If I may say another word, the statement has been made that there is no motion before the committee. I submit that there is a motion before the committee, the motion for further consideration in committee of the whole of the report of the special committee on the revision of standing orders and this is what we are considering to-day. We are considering the revision of the rules; we are revising the standing orders. We are not passing the first three pages; we are dealing with the rules of the house, and that is what is before this committee.

Mr. POULIOT: May I remind you, Mr. Chairman, that the special committee sent us a report which contained an introduction. The report was discussed in this committee on a previous occasion, and progress was reported; to-day we are resuming that discussion. The report of the special committee cannot possibly be changed unless it is amended by this committee. No one has the power to delete the introduction to the report that was presented to this house. It was not the report of one or two gentlemen; it was the report of a special committee to the committee of the whole, in which we are now sitting. Now the special committee has vanished, after its final report has been presented, and the committee of the whole is the only body that can change the report. I positively deny what has been said by any minister or any other hon. gentleman to the effect that the first part of the report is not before this committee. It is, by the very fact that no one but this committee has a right to change the report.

My second contention, Mr. Chairman, is that we cannot deal with this report unless it is put in better shape by a revived special committee. Was it not the Prime Minister himself who suggested that the paragraphs should be numbered and who expressed dissatisfaction with the introduction? I agree that the introduction should go; but even if it is not on the pieces of paper which have been placed before you, Mr. Chairman, it is before the committee just the same, because it is part of the report of the special committee to this committee. That being so, I would ask you to reconsider your ruling and to decide that the introduction should be deleted from the report of the special committee, just as it has been deleted from the pieces of paper that are before you. After that is done we will have a breathing spell in which to consider the amendments.

Mr. ROY: I should like to give my heartiest support to the suggestion of the hon. member for Temiscouata; I am in perfect accord with what has been said by him and by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. There must be a reason for everything. If this preamble is not worth looking at, I do not know why it is here. Furthermore, as was pointed out by a previous speaker to my right, this preamble is full of recommendations which are very important, but which are not followed up by suggested amendments in the remainder of the report. If this introduction is not to be studied before we deal with the amendments there is no need to have it there at all. Moreover, it is dangerous to retain it. Just to give an example of the danger involved in this preamble I should like to quote a few lines from it. At the bottom of page 2 I read this:

> Our recommendation is that when there is reason to believe that debate will be protracted, parties and groups recognized in the house shall confer and make ararngements either for allotting days or laying any plan for saving time whilst protecting freedom of speech for every representative of the people who sits in this house.

That is a very important recommendation, and many others are contained in this introduction. If we should take up the amendments and adopt the whole report, the introduction together with its recommendations would have to be adopted as well. That is the danger I want to bring to the attention of the committee. Moreover, not only recommendations of this kind are contained in the preamble; we find also some contradictions of great importance. Hon. members have just heard what I have read from page 2. I say that suggestion is not in accordance with the premise appearing on the first page. It sets forth a principle which is not in accordance with what I have just read.

In the third paragraph of the first page, at line 13 we find this:

> Parliament is the assembly of representatives elected by the people where great issues are debated, or should be debated; it is not primarily a body of auditors charged with the inspection of departmental accounts. Freedom of speech is one of the inalienable privileges of members of the House of Commons. It is in truth the privilege of their constituents and it is secured to members not for their personal benefit but to enable them to discharge the funtions of their office. Without it, the essence of the country's liberty does not exist.

Apparently that principle is not taken into account when it is suggested that when debates are protracted there should be some kind of agreement among the recognized groups or parties, and that private members must not have anything to do with any decision so made. Why include the recognized groups? Why not the opposition and the government only, or the government alone? That would look even more like Hitler's way of governing a country.

As I said before, we should study the introduction, and see what we are going to do with it. The amendment proposed to standing order 49 is as follows:

> Only one amendment and one subamendment may be made to the motion for the address in reply to the speech from the throne and to the motion for the Speaker to leave the chair for the house to go into committee of supply or ways and means.

Here is an amendment which restricts the very principle set forth in the first page of the introduction. How can we accept this amendment? How can we accept that suggestion with respect to the understanding which should be arrived at among groups or parties, if at the same time we are to recognize this other principle? There is too much contradiction in that. That is why I support the suggestion made by the hon. member for Temiscouata to the effect that either we discuss the introduction fully, before we study the amendments themselves, or that it should be stricken from the report.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman, I hardly know where we stand. I understand the hon. member for Temiscouata moved an amendment to delete the introduction, and that you have ruled it out of order. Nevertheless the hon. member who has just taken his seat made a lengthy speech in support of that amendment. Surely we should have matters clear in our minds. I see no reason for such confusion. Mr. Speaker made the situation quite clear. The only observation I would make, possibly to make it somewhat clearer, is that the word "recommend", in the two instances where they occur in the introduction, should be changed to "suggest". I say that because the committee is not, in fact, recommending. There are general matters within the ambit of the government's right in organizing the business of the house. The committee was merely making a suggestion that the government should follow a certain procedure. With this further clarification of what Mr. Speaker has already said I would hope that we might now proceed with the discussion of the specific amendment to the standing order proposed by the committee.

Mr. GLEN: The hon. member for Vancouver East has made the suggestion with regard to the word "recommend". I entirely agree that the meaning of the whole paragraph would be more clear in the minds of all hon. members if the word had been "suggest" instead of "recommend". That, I may say, was the intention of the committee. It was not the intention to recommend; rather it was to suggest. The very words in the paragraph indicate that we were making no recommendation; rather it was to be a matter for consideration by the government of the day. The hon. member for Vancouver East is perfectly right when he says that the word "suggest" would convey the meaning of the committee better than the word which was used.

Mr. NEILL: Unfortunately we are dealing with what was said, not what was thought.

[Mr. Roy.]

Mr. CHURCH: May I add a word to what I said earlier in the afternoon? First of all may I compliment Mr. Speaker, Mr. Deputy Speaker and the Clerk of the House. These three gentlemen especially have been performing great public services in a time of war.

There is no doubt that in war time, rules are to a great extent unwritten. That has been so in the British parliament. In some instances before us now changes have been very radical, while in others they have been of minor importance. One of the points which I thought might have been considered was considered in England ten years ago. I have in mind parliamentary reform, constitutional reform, cabinet and law reform, and a more equitable division of the work of parliament between the two houses, namely the House of Commons and the one in another place.

In my view more latitude should be allowed for the asking of supplementary questions, more than the three mentioned in the report, especially in a time of war. For instance, it was not until the 119th day of the last session that the matter of foreign affairs was discussed in this house. An amendment has been suggested with respect to questions asked when the orders of the day are called. When the committee reported there was a statement to the effect that no hon. member had written making any request. The fact is that both one year ago and two years ago I wrote letters of that kind, and gave copies to leaders in the house. It was not necessary, I said, to pass a resolution in order to allow us to put supplementary questions to ministers when the orders of the day are called.

In England standing order 9 provides that questions which have not appeared on the order paper, but which are of an urgent nature and relate either to matters of great public importance or to a rearrangement of the business of the house, may be put at the opening of a sitting, extending from a quarter to three to a quarter to four. Under that rule members have an opportunity practically to cross-examine the ministry in respect of matters of great public importance.

I have in mind a new book issued in 1930 by G. F. M. Campion, then second clerk, now Clerk of the House of Commons at Westminster, who has since been knighted. I believe the book written by our own learned and able Clerk compares most favourably with this great text book, which, in part, states:

Not later than three o'clock the question hour begins. This is a more important item of business than any yet described. It is expected to provide lively moments and seems to be of unfailing interest to members and the public. It is modern and affords a useful method of supervising the administration of the government. Its effectiveness is generally recognized. Questions 'turn a searchlight upon every corner of the public service.' (Lowell, i. 332). Their chief object is 'the explanation to the public of the meaning of political events,' and 'they are often arranged by the government itself, so as to give them an opportunity of making announcements in a somewhat informal way.' (Redlich, ii. 241 and 242). They are 'serviceable as obviating the necessity in many instances of more extended debate and of motions for papers.' (Todd, 1982, ii. 85). And finally, 'questions afford to the private member under modern conditions almost his only opportunity.' (Marriott, i. 571).

Under standing order 1 of our rules, according to the Parliamentary Rules and Forms, so well written and edited by our learned Clerk, in all cases not provided for in our orders, the usages and customs of the British house as in force at the time shall be followed. Under our rules as they are at present an hon. member should have the latitude on the orders of the day of asking these supplementary questions, because it is a useful method of supervising the administration of the government. Its effectiveness is generally recognized. Questions turn a searchlight upon every corner of the public service. Their chief object is the explanation to the public of the meaning of political events, and in the old country they are often arranged by the government itself so as to give them an opportunity of making announcements in a somewhat informal way. I think the rule recommended by this report before us allows only three supplementary questions. In view of the importance of the war I think that more questions than three should be permitted, because it would mean saving time.

There are only one or two other matters that I should like to refer to. I should like to say a word about select committees and special committees of the house with reference to the submitting of expenditures of money to these committees. Very little value has been obtained in that way. The same thing applies to the finding of facts and obtaining of information through committee work. Take the railways and shipping committee. It was a special committee. It has now been made a standing committee. They meet and hold three or four meetings and then adjourn. A report is brought in. At the last session it was brought in the last day but one of the session. There is very little control over those expenditures. Steps were taken in England three hundred years ago to give parliament control over the executive and a civil war was fought there to secure such control. To-day we are back where we were two hundred years ago. There is a war on and four billion dollars have been expended. What do we know about it? We have the war expenditures committee sitting but we cannot discuss the report. So far as the members of the house are concerned they are forgotten now as a body by their special committees and references to control boards and commissions. Practically all our rights, privileges and functions have been taken away, with the result that the high court of parliament has been turned into something which it was never intended to be. We are a legislative body and those other bodies are created with executive powers. In the olden days under the constitution the executive was the cabinet, but to-day we have such a number of these control bodies and their subcontrols—there are now nearly one hundred —that parliament has divested itself in actual practice of any control over one dollar of expenditures.

What I point out to the committee is this: I believe the time has come to adopt constitutional reform. I proposed it fifteen or twenty years ago when I first came into the house. I proposed that we adopt the municipal system of supervising the estimates of the public departments. I suggested that the committee of the whole house be given the power to suggest to the minister that for economy purposes he reduce his estimates ten per cent, twenty per cent, thirty per cent or whatever the committee saw fit to do. That is what is done under the municipal organizations where the expenditures of the heads of departments are supervised. Under our constitution, which has been in existence for two hundred years, that cannot be done because if one dollar is struck off the estimates the cabinet must resign and a new election be called. I suggest that something along these lines should be done. I believe that the time has come to assign to the other branch of parliament in another place some executive powers and further powers in war time. They made that reform in England in the House of Lords at least fifteen years ago with the result that when the war came along they were found to be doing good work. The Prime Minister suggested a select committee be appointed to look into the Ottawa agreement. He suggested that that should be a joint committee of the two houses. We have had this committee on the revision of the rules sitting during the war, and some of the recommendations that they have made are very good. But further power by changes of rules should be assigned to the other branch of parliament.

The other matter I should like to refer to has to do with public bills versus private bills.

There is a whole list of these private bills on the order paper. They come mainly from the other place, since they are largely divorce bills. At the end of the session they are put through. Bills of business concerns originate in the other place and that should as private bills originate here. There should be some check and control over that. Public bills of private members have been relegated to the last page on the order paper. They may as well not be moved. While some of the agencies of these public bills would assist the conduct of public business, parliament has ignored them since the war started and for many years before, and this parliament has been losing its prestige in the country. The taxpayers of the country are the people who pay the bills. The members of the House of Commons do their part, but the large body outside the house, the man in the street and on the bus pays the bills. This is the only forum that I know of where the average man on the street can get his grievances remedied. When this parliament ceases to function as such, parliamentary government is at an end. The private member is the connecting link between the government of the day and the elector, and when he ceases to function efficient parliamentary government is at an end. The rights and privileges of the private member have been curtailed and thus taken away from him. He cannot ask a single emergency question in war time without coming in conflict at times with the rules. We have been very fortunate in our Speaker and Deputy Speaker in that they have sensed the feeling of the house, as has our learned Clerk. But I say, Mr. Chairman, that there could be more latitude given to the consideration of public bills in order to improve the conditions of the taxpayers who pay the bills. They should have precedence over the private bill of some individual or some company that seeks legislation mainly for its own benefit.

Mr. LALONDE (Translation): On page 2 of the report which is now before us, I notice the following:

> Your committee, in all its deliberations, has kept in mind the importance of not impairing the rights of minorities.

I believe that we have started the discussion of this report the wrong way in interfering on two different occasions with the rights of minorities. In the first place, I asked one of the pages to bring me a French copy of the report, but the French translation is not yet ready. I do protest, Mr. Chairman—and those who know me are aware that I harbour no feelings of bitter fanaticism—I do protest against the fact that such an important report has not been printed both in French and in English and distributed to French-speaking members in their own language.

I take this opportunity to protest against the practice which is followed in this house of distributing official documents in one language only.

I should, of course, have liked to have more time at my disposal in order to make a detailed analysis of this report, which amends to a considerable extent the rules of parliamentary procedure.

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): For the information of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Lalonde), I may say that the committee's report was published in the French language in the French edition of the Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons on Friday, March 3, 1944, as well as in the official report of debates on Tuesday, March 7.

Mr. LALONDE: I thank the chairman of the committee for that information, which I had already obtained, but I do protest against the fact that French copies of the report have not been made available to French-speaking hon. members. The other minority groups to which I refer are able to take care of themselves and I shall not take up their defence. The hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy) has emphasized his opposition to rule 49. On page 9 I notice the following:

> The debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne covers the whole ground of administration and is repeated when the budget is brought down. This debate has been abolished in the House of Assembly of South Africa where the following standing order is now in force: "Mr. Speaker shall report to this House the Governor General's speech, and there shall be no debate on such report."
> Your committee felt that the house could not abolish this debate, but it realized that the scope of discussion was so wide and the question of relevancy almost non-existent on this particular occasion that the freedom of speech of every member, party or group would be fully preserved by limiting the number of amendments in the same way as on the motion for committee of supply. These two motions are in the same category, namely, they furnish occasions for airing grievances and making suggestions to the government.

And the amendment which is suggested, Mr. Chairman, is as follows:

> Only one amendment and one subamendment may be made to the motion for the address in reply to the speech from the throne and to the motion for the speaker to leave the chair for the house to go into committee of supply or ways and means.

Must I understand, Mr. Chairman, that only one amendment will be permitted, or, on the other hand, will any member of the house be permitted, if his amendment is relevant to the main motion, to move as many subamend-ments as he likes provided they are discussed one after the other? Otherwise, if just one subamendment is permitted I cannot see how the rights of the minorities in this chamber will be protected. I understand that any member of the house has the right to move a subamendment to an amendment provided he is within the scope of the main motion or the amendment.

I would like to have a clear explanation from the Chair or from Mr. Speaker concerning this proposed amendment to our standing orders.

Without prejudice to what I have said, Mr. Chairman, I shall now conclude those brief remarks, in expressing the hope that they be favourably considered by yourself and the members of the committee.

Mr. ROY: Hear, hear.

Mr. LALONDE: I would like to have an answer to my question if possible, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: As the hon. member for Labelle realizes, we called the first proposed amendment and allowed a general discussion. The question he has asked is pertinent to another proposed amendment which we shall reach later, and then his last question could be more readily answered.

Mr. LALONDE: I thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I will be there to discuss it when we reach it.

Mr. NEILL: If the amendment to standing order 9 passes, it automatically passes the whole of the preamble, which contains two definite recommendations which I wish to discuss. This committee did not agree to that. The chairman has just told the hon. member that that was the arrangement. That was not the arrangement, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. RALSTON: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, there is no question with which the government officially has as little to do as on a question of this kind. It is a question absolutely for members of the house, and I would not intervene in any way except perhaps to the extent that I may have some responsibility for assisting in promoting regularity of debate and helping to expedite, if I may, the business of the house. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni is perfectly right. There was no agreement that the suggestion I made would be accepted. But is not the situation this? There is at this minute before the house an amendment to standing order 9 which has been regularly moved and which has been called by the Chair and which is now open for debate. Some objection was taken to discussing standing order 9 before discussion of what was called the prologue or preliminary part of the report, and it was suggested then, in order that there might be the greatest latitude possible, that we should have some general discussion of the preliminary part and of some of the principles which were there laid down. Then I had the temerity to suggest that in order to regularize debate and to know when the general discussion had ceased and when we were embarked on the job of dealing with the different amendments in order—in other words, to provide some terminal facilities for the general discussion—we treat the general discussion as taking place on the amendment to standing order 9, and that when the amendment to standing order 9 was disposed of, either voted down or agreed to or amended, the general discussion would be over and we would go on with the other amendments.

Mr. NEILL: That is just my objection. The general discussion would then be over, and the preliminary part of the report which comes under the general discussion contains two recommendations on which I wish to speak. If the amendment to standing order 9 passes, that other part goes through automatically. I protest against that, and I think I am within my rights when I say I want an opportunity to vote on the two recommendations contained in the earlier part of the report.

Mr. RALSTON: My suggestion does not meet my hon. friend's desires if he wants an opportunity to vote as well as to discuss the two recommendations he mentions, but it does provide him with ample opportunity to discuss them, because I suggested that the general discussion, including the two recommendations my hon. friend mentions, take place on the item now before the Chair. I thought that was probably sufficient for members of the house. I have looked at these two recommendations and I think my hon. friend will agree with me that no changes in the standing orders are required to give effect to them. One is a recommendation with regard to regulation of the business of the house, and the other is more or less of a pious recommendation, if I may say so with all respect to the committee, that people of good will shall confer one with the other with regard to the conduct of the business of the house. That is not something which you could embody in a standing order or in a regulation. So it seemed to me that all that was necessary in connection with either of these recommendations mentioned by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni was that they be discussed and perhaps their futility, if that is the opinion of some members of the house, be exposed or their merits proclaimed, if that is the opinion of some other members; and then call it a day so far as those preliminary recommendations or suggestions are concerned.

Mr. NEILL: But we cannot vote on them.

Mr. RALSTON: If my hon. friend wants an opportunity to take the opinion of the house upon them, the only way I can suggest, and I do not know whether it is in order or not, is that after we have disposed of the items somebody might bring in a motion either censuring the committee or commending the committee and provide an opportunity to vote on his motion. I mean that seriously; I am not sarcastic. It seems to me that that would be one way of dealing with it. I cannot imagine that it would be quite in order for a committee of the house solemnly to express the opinion that the government might do so and so in the way of arranging business of the house or that groups should confer about procedure. I would regard that merely as a suggestion which could be acted upon or otherwise as they thought fit.

May I suggest that perhaps some members have read this preamble or prologue too critically. All it does is to indicate that there have been criticisms of procedure in the house but that those criticisms are more or less based on a misconception, and it endeavours to point out those misconceptions. In any case, I suggest to my hon. friend that those criticisms really have not much to do with the recommendations to which he refers. If he himself feels that he should criticize the committee for making those remarks, well and good, but that does not get him very far in wanting to vote on those two particular recommendations.

Mr. NEILL: I want to vote for one and against the other. How am I to do that?

Mr. RALSTON: If the hon. member asks my advice, I would simply make the statement he has now made and give his reasons for it, and he has plenty of opportunity to do that in the debate. He can be sure of this, that in connection with the one he wants to vote against, the fact that there is no vote now will not prevent him from voting against it if it should ever come up, because this committee will not have passed on it favourably, will not have approved it. Therefore at any time that anyone wants to adopt the proposal which he says he is against, it will be open to him, he can be sure, to oppose it. With regard to the recommendation of which he is in favour, it is true that he does not get the opportunity of finding out whether the committee is with him on that particular point, but I would say here again that the fact that he has not just now an opportunity to support it will not prevent him from voting for it whenever it should come up in some regular form. I assume that the one of which he is in favour is that with regard to supply.

Mr. NEILL: I do not know that I have to state my case, but that happens to be it. All I ask is the opportunity to vote on a definite recommendation made by a committee of this house. The minister can explain it away as he likes, but I am not going to be deprived of my rights, and there are others here who share my views.

Mr. RALSTON: I am sure my hon. friend has misunderstood me entirely. I thought he was trying to explain what recommendations he favoured and what recommendations he was against. I withdraw my question entirely. I do not want him to disclose anything he does not want to disclose. The only reason I wanted to know which he was in favour of was to find out if he was in any way prejudiced because he was not able at this time to vote, because the committee would not be dealing with his particular question.

Mr. NEILL: The minister is correct.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not know what the question is. However, I submit to the committee, as a humble member of the house, like anyone else, that we have some pretty important amendments before us, which do afford opportunity for a full discussion of important questions of procedure, questions which involve not only the saving of time but the expediting of business generally. I suggest that, if that be the fact, there is a definite recommendation before the committee. There is full opportunity of discussing the report. Nobody has seen fit to bring forward the two recommendations to which my hon. friend refers, and neither of them I have pointed out, is germane to an amendment of the standing orders. I submit that we should proceed now as members of the house to the discussion of the first amendment, including a full discussion if it is desired, by everyone who is interested, on the two recommendations to which my hon. friend refers, although they are not embodied in the amendment of the standing orders. Then when we have discussed that, we can deal with the other amendments to the standing orders and go through with them. I tell my hon. friend that I will do the best I can to see if I can find any procedure under which he can get this committee or some committee of the house on record with regard to the two recommendations in which he is interested. I believe that when he comes to think the thing over he will content himself, as other hon. members have contented themselves, with expressing an opinion on a recommendation which is purely a suggestion and which is not before this committee, and leaving that opinion on record to be implemented by his vote whenever that recommendation comes up for actual discussion and decision by the house.

Mr. NEILL: Pardon me; it is before the house.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think it is. It is not before the committee. The motion before the committee is the amendment of standing order 9.

Mr. NEILL: We have never reached that.

Mr. RALSTON: It has been called. My hon. friend will remember that there was a distinct agreement, I think on everybody's part, that the job to be done was to put these recommendations in order and number—that is, the recommendations which were recommendations with regard to standing orders.

Mr. NEILL: It has not been done. They are not numbered.

Mr. RALSTON: They are in order. It was agreed to put them in order so that they might be dealt with as resolutions.

Mr. NEILL: Except the two.

Mr. RALSTON: But the two are not amendments of standing orders.

Mr. NEILL: No, I did not say they were.

Mr. RALSTON: And they are not amendments of the procedure set out in this book of parliamentary rules.

Mr. NEILL: I never said they were, but they are recommendations of the committee.

Mr. RALSTON: But we are talking about amendements to standing orders. Now, that is what is before the committee, and that is the matter which has been called.

Mr. KNOWLES: I rise to what I think is a point of order. The Minister of National Defence referred to a formal motion now before the committee with respect to amending standing order 9. I should like to ask him, or you, Mr. Chairman, when such a formal motion was made. As I understand it, the only motions which have been made with respect to this matter were motions made when Mr. Speaker was in the Chair: one made on March 7 by the Prime Minister that we go into committee of the whole to give consideration to this report, and a similar motion made to-day while Mr. Speaker was still in the Chair. I believe one of the reasons we are having so much difficulty is that we are simply considering a report without any specific, formal motion before us. The only actual motion which was made to-day in committee was the one made by the hon. member for Temiscouata and which was ruled out of order. It seems to me that it would expedite matters if someone, preferably a private member I would say, were to move formally the adoption or the approval of the proposed amendment of standing order 9, so that we might get on. I rose to a point of order really to ask the Minister of National Defence if he would indicate when the formal motion to which he referred was made.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not know just what Hansard will show, but I distinctly heard, I think, the Chairman, after he took the Chair, use some such words as these, "The motion is that standing order 9 be amended" by doing so and so, and that is what I understood to be the item before the Chair. The Chairman can correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. NEILL: Who made the motion?

Mr. RALSTON: The motion, of course, would be called by the Chair and would be made by the Speaker. Let us check on that. The Chairman is here.

The CHAIRMAN: The statement of the minister is correct.

Mr. ROY: May I ask the Minister of National Defence a question the answer to which might clarify this deadlock? If the discussion should proceed on standing order 9, after general discussion of other items or amendments, and when those amendments or any of them should be accepted, would the report be accepted altogether, or would the latter part be accepted separately?

Mr. RALSTON: I understood that the agreement the other day was that we were to have the amendments to the standing orders put in order, in the form of separate amendments. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni objected to our talking about recommendations without identification, for instance "the recommendation in the middle of page so-and-so." He wanted them where they could be identified and separated; and as I understand it, we are dealing to-day with those amendments placed in that form. He has pointed out, quite properly, that they are not actually numbered, but they are in order, and can easily be identified as amendments of standing order so-and-so. My hon. friend has asked whether, if the amendment of standing order 9 is passed, that includes the passing of the so-called prologue or preamble. I take it that it does not, that it has nothing to do with the prologue or preamble, that the prologue or preamble has nothing to do with the amendment of standing orders as such; that, as each amendment is passed, the disposition of each one stands on its own feet. Consequently what emerges will be such amendments of standing orders in this book of parliamentary rules as are approved by this committee. There would therefore be no action by the committee approving these first two pages, which deals with certain general subjects and includes what the hon. member for Comox-Alberni calls "recommendations", but are really opinions and suggestions on two points of procedure in connection with handling the business of the house.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): May I ask if this procedure is not the accepting of the committee's report and if, in so doing, you certainly are not accepting or adopting the recommendations made by the committee? I rather agree with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni when he says that he does not want the preamble put in with standing order 9. If you look at page 2, regardless of what the Speaker has said in defining that word "recommendation", which he suggests should be changed to "suggestion"—I would point out that that has not been done yet—the report distinctly says "we therefore recommend". That is a recommendation. It goes on to say what the committee recommends. Taking the suggestion of the Minister of National Defence, that you include the preamble with the first amendment—

Mr. RALSTON: No. I have not suggested that; I said you could talk about it.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I believe it would expedite matters greatly if we would so arrange it as to vote on the preamble first, because there are recommendations there. If the chairman of the committee, who is the Speaker, wishes to change the word "recommendations" to "suggestions", that might alter the opinion of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and of others as well who object to it. But if you accept this language as it stands, in the final analysis you are accepting the recommendations as laid down in the preamble. They are recommendations; there is no doubt about it. They may not be intended to be regarded as recommendations, and I take it from what the Speaker said a few moments ago that that is not the intention, that they are offered only as suggestions to the committee. But that does not alter the fact that as stated in the preamble they are recommendations. I suggest that we could solve the difficulty by taking the preamble first and disposing of it.

Mr. REID: I take it that the report of the committee differs in no way from other reports submitted to the House of Commons, and until this committee adopts the report that is before us, the report does not become effective. We have the report before us at the present moment and we are now deliberating the question of changing the standing orders and rules of the house. We may either adopt or reject the amendments, but in our discussions we shall not be deliberating upon what has been called the preamble to the report.

Mr. RALSTON: I think I am correct in saying that the preamble is always the last portion of any measure that is passed, not the first. It simply means in this case that we do not reach the preamble but everyone will have expressed his opinion on it if he so desires. May I say this to the hon member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston). The last recommendation to which he refers is that:

> When there is reason to believe that debate will be protracted, parties and groups recognized in the house shall confer and make arrangements either for alloting days or laying any plan for saving time whilst protecting freedom of speech for every representative of the people who sits in this house.

I ask my hon. friend, suppose the word "recommendation" were changed, would it make the slightest difference? The house is passing a resolution about something it cannot enforce. It is dealing entirely with a suggestion to the leaders of the various groups in the house with reference to conference, and it is really not an effective recommendation at all. It is a suggestion to those who have to do with the proceedings of the house that they may by compromise and convention make certain arrangements. I agree with the member for Comox-Alberni that the other is a little more definite. The recommendation is:

> We therefore recommend that, when the yearly estimates have been brought down, one day a week be set aside for consideration of supply. If this is done, the house is not likely to find itself under the necessity of passing a great part of estimates in the dying days of the session.

—that is really a suggestion to the government, or whoever may be responsible for determining the day-to-day business of the house. It is not a suggestion to the committee.

Mr. LOCKHART: Does the word "recommend" there mean something different from what it does on page 4, where it says, "The following amendments to standing orders are recommended"?

Mr. RALSTON: Perhaps the word there has the same meaning as in the context I have quoted, but the point is that it is a recommendation to someone else. One recommendation is to the house, that we make certain amendments to the rules, and the other is to the government, that, in allocating days for business, they do certain things. My attention is called to the fact that in 1927 there was a similar committee sitting, and while the preamble of the report then submitted was very much more innocuous than this one, at the same time there were, however, one or two expressions indicating principles to which the committee had adhered and which might have been taken exception to by anyone who was then considering the report. I am instructed that the preamble to the report on that occasion simply treated as an introduction. It was not dealt with at all, and we find in volume 64 of the Journals of 1926-27 a tabulation setting out the amendments to the standing orders which were then dealt with, just as we have tabulated the amendments now proposed. The preamble itself, in the report of 1927, stated that the committee had agreed to certain amendments. I quote:

> Your committe has adhered to the principle that the greatest freedom be allowed the house in both its debate and proceedings.

I am sure that someone could get up then and say that the committee had done no such thing.

> Factors tending to restrict liberty have been eliminated.

That could have been made a controversial issue.

> The tendency has been to reduce the number of standing orders and to make them clearer, with the object that only absolutely necessary rules be in force, so that the house will be more particularly guided by the general principles followed in British legislative assemblies and familiar to parliamentarians in Great Britain and the self-governing dominions.

That report was passed, not by dealing with the preamble but by dealing with the standing orders.

Mr. GLEN: There is apparently a great deal of confusion in the minds of some hon. members on the question whether in the forepart of the report the intention is that what is stated shall be binding on the house or on the government as the case may be. I believe, however, that every member of the committee is clearly of the opinion that no such intention was contemplated when the report was drafted and framed. The whole intention was that it was a suggestion only and not a recommendation, and personally I cannot see how any possible amendment can be made. The first part of the report, as well as the evidence of the words in themselves, is clear that that was only intended as a recommendation, or a suggestion or direction, if you like, to government as to certain matters in connection with the estimates, and also, in the second part, in connection with the rules and as regards the protraction of debates. I think I am speaking definitely the minds of the members of the committee when I say that this was a matter which they discussed and which they thought should be dealt with, but that they did not intend to make any revision of the standing orders for the purpose of giving effect to it. Their whole intention was that they should consider only the amendments which they felt they should submit to the house, and that is what I submit we should now deal with.

Mr. NEILL: May I make one last and no doubt futile effort to convince the government or the chairman as to the merits of this question. I do so in no spirit of antagonism to the government. Indeed, I wish to vote for one of these recommendations. I cannot understand however why the Speaker, the chairman of this committee, appears to be anxious to do the Charlie Chaplin act and disavow the paternity of his own baby. True, he may claim that it is not entirely his individual paternity, but he shares the responsibility with other members of the committee and now he appears like Charlie Chaplin to be hesitating and is anxious to repudiate paternity.

The report was brought into the house and, as the hon. member for Lincoln very truly says, it is obviously a report. The Speaker has made the suggestion that the word "recommend" in regard to the estimates is a general phrase; it is like the man who wrote a beautiful poem in regard to his regret over the mistakes of his lifetime, or perhaps even of the previous twenty-four hours, when he said something like this, "Flowers you might have sent, dear, are your haunting ghosts to-night." The Speaker seems to think this is a sort of academic thing which can be dismissed with his blessing in that way, but that is not the way in which it is brought into the house. This is what was said about it by the most astute constitutionalist in Canada, the Prime Minister, at page 1255 of Hansard for March 7:

> We might well assume, I think, that so far as the first half of the report is concerned, if I may so designate it—

We seem to have a hard job defining it; one calls it a preamble, another calls it the first half; I think another called it an epilogue, and the next thing we know it will be a funeral oration.

> —hon. members should not be committed too literally to all the statements which it sets forth, or to all its observations. They are general in nature, and in voting for or against the adoption of the report, if we are expected so to do, we might well, I think, be allowed to have certain mental reservations with regard to the adoption of all that appears there.

The Prime Minister wanted to have certain mental reservations, but some people object to that. They say, "We are going to vote on that on its merits, yes or no; we are not going to have a corner of our minds or hearts in which we believe something different from the way we vote." Now the Minister of Pensions and National Health comes along and says the best thing we can do is to forget about it. That would be a very sad end to this report, which has been drawn up by some of the cleverest lawyers in the house; of the fourteen members of the committee I think nine were lawyers. Now we come down to the simple view. I am not opposing the report, but I want to discuss it. This matter can, I think, be settled in five minutes. The hon. gentleman who is leading the house tries to cover it up by saying that this does not really mean "recommendation" but that it means "suggestion", and I think one hon. member went so far as to say it was only a pious hope. It means just what it says; it is a recommendation. The word "recommend" on page 2 means exactly the same as it does on page 4, where we read:

The following amendments to the standing orders are recommended.

Get out of that if you can; say that in one place on page 2 it means nothing while in another place on page 4 it means everything. I cannot understand all this difficulty; all that is necessary is what I asked should be done the last time this matter was under discussion, that the recommendations should be put all together and numbered, so that we might vote on them one by one. To-day the leader of the government said he thought that had been done, but it has not, for two recommendations have been left out. The others have been grouped together so that we may understand them, but the first two recommendations have been omitted. Here we have eight or nine recommendations beginning on page 4, but the two recommendations contained on page 2 are not included. This can be settled very easily by putting at the top of the list of recommendations, or at the bottom —I do not care where they are—the two recommendations which are found on page 2. Is there anything wrong or anything difficult about that?

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend does not really mean that seriously, does he, in regard to the suggestion as to members of the groups conferring? Surely he does not mean he wants to have the committee record its opinion about that.

Mr. NEILL: I meant that it did not matter to me whether those two recommendations were at the head of the list or at the end of it.

Mr. RALSTON: But I am talking about the second recommendation. Does the hon. member really mean that he wants this recommendation put before this committee and solemnly passed upon?

Mr. NEILL: If I could stop that recommendation from going through I would stay here for a week or a fortnight. I think it is a thoroughly rotten recommendation, and I want to discuss it and vote it down.

Mr. RALSTON: Then why does the hon. gentleman bother with it?

Mr. NEILL: I want it to be condemned—

Mr. RALSTON: Supposing it should be passed; it would be ineffective.

Mr. NEILL: —because only a short time ago the hon. gentleman himself made the suggestion that we should go on with the proposed amendment to standing order 9, and that when this amendment was adopted it would carry with it the first part of the report. I know he has now receded from that position, but I think Hansard will show that he took it a short time ago.

Mr. RALSTON: I really must be a little firm about this. My hon. friend will not find in what I said previously one syllable which could be interpreted in that way, and I have not receded from anything. I took my position in the beginning and I repeat it now, that the discussion can take place when we are considering the amendment to standing order 9, but that all we would vote on would be the amendment, and we can go on from there with the other amendments.

Mr. NEILL: I accept the minister's statement; my opinion was different, but perhaps I was wrong, and I know the minister is a reputable gentleman. But supposing we put that recommendation back alongside the other one; it is only a pious hope thrown up to the government, who can do what they like about it. I do not want any pious resolutions like this put up to anybody; I do not want it to be left so that only parties and groups who are "recognized" in the house may confer. My hon. friends in the far corner will not be recognized. That is a definite thing; and perhaps two or three years from now the ministry of the day would be perfectly justified in saying, "We are going to put this into effect, because it was one of the recommendations made in writing by this committee." There is no question about that. If the thing is right let us pass it; if it is wrong let us vote it down.

Mr. RALSTON: I say it is just futile.

Mr. NEILL: I say once we get through discussing these amendments of the standing orders the debate will end. If anyone will give me a guarantee that nothing will be done along this line I shall be satisfied. I am not alone in this. I am not in collaboration with anyone else, but I am quite sure I am voicing the wishes of many other hon. members when I say that we want an opportunity to support or turn down these specific things. Why not just include these two recommendations at the bottom of the list, and let us have every opportunity to express ourselves? We do not want to adopt the second recommendation; perchance we may want to adopt the first one, in regard to the estimates.

I am taking up a good deal of the time of the committee and I apologize, but I have not spoken very much this session; I am not able to do so. I do not see why we could not be allowed to follow that course. Someone suggested that we might strike out the word "recommend" and insert the word "suggest". That might meet the difficulty in a way, but in a house of two hundred and forty-five intelligent people it is no use saying that "recommend" means one thing on one page and something different on another page. Now I have said all I am going to say; this discussion will have to go on, but time and history will show that I am right.

Mr. GOLDING: As a member of the special committee I want to endorse what the Speaker has said. The committee did express certain opinions in the preamble, but they did not ask the house to make those opinions into rules. The only things we wanted to change were the standing orders.

Mr. NEILL: You did not say so.

Mr. GOLDING: I hope my hon. friend will let me have a moment in which to say a few words. I am trying to express my opinion, speaking with my knowledge as a member of that committee. While these opinions were expressed, it was not intended that they should become standing orders. If we expressed the opinion that in order to facilitate the business of this house it would be a splendid thing for the different groups to get together, that does not mean that it should be made a rule or anything of the kind; that is only an expression of opinion. I think the matter was put very clearly by the Speaker and by the hon. member for New Westminster. We did give a good deal of attention to the recommendations we made, and hon. members are at liberty to adopt or reject them, as the case may be. Perhaps we were not unanimous in regard to everything, but we were fairly unanimous on the recommendations we have made in regard to amendments of standing orders. As to the opinions expressed in the preamble, however, we did not ask that they be translated into rules of the house, and I think hon. members generally understand that. Surely that point has been explained now; it was dealt with by the acting leader of the government as well.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think we should try to find some way to break this deadlock and get on with our business. I hesitate to disagree with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, for whose parliamentary acumen and experience I have the greatest regard. But I do insist that he is wrong in his attitude toward this report. As a matter of fact the report is clear, as is also the intention of the committee. It made certain recommendations respecting the standing orders of the house. Those recommendations are definitely stated. Then the committee suggested that other things might be done, but it did not include those as changes or amendments of standing orders. The committee had the same power in regard to those matters as it had in regard to the standing orders for which it seeks amendments.

It would seem that the first recommendation on page 2 has caused much of the discussion. Before that suggestion was made the committee said this:

> Your committee does not think it would be advisable to change the present system—

That is, the present standing order.

> —and it believes that the elasticity of the present rules makes it possible to apply them in new situations from time to time.

This makes it quite clear that the committee did not wish to change the standing order in regard to estimates. Had it wished to do so it would have offered the amendment among the other recommendations found on the following pages. The committee felt, however, that the government in dealing with the business of the house might make certain changes which would facilitate that business and give better satisfaction to hon. members.

The committee has said:

> We, however, desire to submit that considerable time could be saved if the committee of supply sat oftener in the early part of the session.

That deals with the point I have mentioned.

We now come to the suggestion in the next paragraph, found in these words:

> We have recommended a few amendments but we feel that this house cannot go further in regulating its discussions.

Feeling that way, we are not offering any amendments in that regard.

Then the introduction goes on to say:

> In spite of limitations now existing, every resolution and bill is given ample opportunities for debate in committee of the whole, standing and select committees and on the second and third reading; but as the allotment of days, under a special rule, might prevent members from speaking, it should not be ordered under the authority of a standing order.

Consequently the committee is not making that recommendation. But it is suggesting that the government consider facilitating business by holding consultations with leaders of other groups in the house. That is all the committee has done in that connection.

I suggest that we deal with the amendments of the standing order. If any other member wishes to have a standing order in respect of those two suggestions, I believe the rules of the house would allow that the amendments be made. I do believe, however, that it is this sort of futile discussion which brings parliamentary institutions into disrepute.

Mr. McIVOR: I believe if this committee were to meet again it would have another amendment to offer, in view of our having spent two hours on the discussion thus far. However, as I see it, the purpose of the committtee was to bring about a condition whereby the business of the house might be carried on more efficiently.

I have two suggestions to make. Some years ago I presented a petition to a former minister of public works in which we pointed out that some way should be found whereby hon. members occupying seats in far corners of the house would not have to leave their seats and move to other places in the house in order to hear. It is difficult to hear in this chamber. We note that four seats are reserved for the debates reporters. Why would those four seats be set aside in the centre of the chamber, if it were possible to hear with ease?

Why do we come to parliament? Do we not come to listen to and to take part in debates? Unless one has a strong voice, it is impossible for another member in a far corner to hear what is being said. I believe the Minister of Public Works and his staff should find some way to facilitate the hearing of speeches. People in the gallery would like to hear, too—especially those in the press gallery.

Mr. POULIOT: And especially when you speak.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. McIVOR: This afternoon the leader of the opposition could not be heard by members of the C.C.F. When the matter was called to his attention he had to turn his face away from the Chair, with the result that the Chair could not hear him. Surely this matter should be considered.

I made a suggestion a while ago that the doors should be opened before Mr. Speaker proceeds to open the day's sitting. I believe this would be a good thing, and for this reason: All those who, through courtesy, come to hear the proceedings of the house would see how the sitting is opened. They would see, too, that the House of Commons stands upon a solid foundation. When Mr. Speaker, in a petition from the prayer says, "May Thy Kingdom come", it is clear that members in all parts of the house, through Mr. Speaker, are really pledging themselves to work for the kingdom of heaven to come on earth. Surely the general public should know this. If it is good for a few members of the house to come here and silently worship the Almighty, then I say it would be good for the general public. And it is in keeping with the statement of Him who gave us that prayer, when He said, "Whosoever will may come."

Some have urged that freedom of speech has been curtailed. I fail to understand that position, because I have been able to find lots of opportunity for anything I have had to say. Since I have come to the house I have found no minister, no whip, or anybody else who has attempted to curtail my remarks. I am going to think for myself and vote as I like.

Further, in respect of standing order 9 it is my view that no member should sit in the house and refuse to vote. Why is the member here? Surely he or she should be prepared to take sides, if they have any convictions whatever. Certainly I support that amendment.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I shall take only a very few minutes to make my contribution to the confusion which apparently already exists.

Mr. STIRLING: And add a little more.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: It is clear that this general discussion is precipitated because of the introductory material in the report. Most hon. members feel that by adopting the report they will at the same time approve the suggestions or recommendations made by the committee in that introductory material. I would ask Mr. Chairman to indicate, if he will, just how or when we shall register our approval or disapproval of the introductory part of the report? Shall we by adopting the first amendment at the same time approve the recommendations or suggestions or, when we have finished with the specific recommendation, shall we then be asked to adopt the report as amended? Is there any place in the procedure where we shall be asked to approve the introductory material in this report? Personally I should like to see that opportunity offered. There are a number of suggestions in the introductory part of the report that in my opinion, if followed by the government, will improve the procedure in the house. Would the Chairman indicate if there will be an opportunity of approving by vote the introductory part of this report?

The CHAIRMAN: The committee is asked to approve the report of the committee for the amendment of the rules of the house. At the present moment we are dealing with the proposed changes and amendments to the rules and proceedings of the House of Commons. That will be the final report as far as the committee of the whole is concerned.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have waited now for nearly two hours for the point to be decided as to what the procedure shall be. I have listened intently to the proceedings so far. If we as a committee are not able to determine the procedure by which we shall attempt to improve the procedure of the house then I say we are in a very bad way indeed. I think the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver East might properly be emphasized at this time. The public fail to understand proceedings of the kind that have taken place this afternoon in this chamber; such proceedings tend to throw a shadow of disrepute in the minds of some people on the proceedings of this house, and parliament to some extent becomes a bit of a laughing stock to the people who do not understand the general situation as it exists.

As I understand it, we are dealing with a report of a committee. If we depart from that and get into a discussion on a number of items in connection with the report, then I think we are departing from what we should be doing. I suggest that regardless of the discussion this afternoon, we should decide finally to deal with the report as such. Let us go on with the general discussion as I suggested in the first instance. Let us deal with the first part of the report, thereby having an opportunity to deal with the two recommendations which the hon. member for Comox-Alberni suggested. Let us get that out of the way. Surely that is a short-cut to all of this. Let us decide one way or the other about it and then let us go on to the particular items. I find that the introduction is included in the conclusion of the report as well. That shows the extent to which we have gone in completely confusing the whole issue before the committee. I have some things I should like to say in a general way about the matter of house procedure, but I have been unable to do so because the procedure has not yet been determined.

The CHAIRMAN: Perhaps I did not make myself very clear. I have tried to trace a line of conduct in the present discussion. We all realize that this is not a bill. It is something like the war appropriation bill where wide latitude is given. I think I have gathered the consensus of the members of this committee. At the beginning wide latitude was given to the discussion. I have ruled that there is no preamble. We are dealing with a matter that touches on the freedom of parliament and parliamentarians. I thought I should allow the discussion to be fairly general. I agree with the leader of the opposition. I hope we shall now come to the first amendment that is before the committee. Going back to the introduction, there is a schedule to the report. As far as a preamble is concerned, we may call it that or anything else, but I have nothing of that kind before me. Standing order 76 reads as follows:

> In proceedings in committee of the whole house upon bills, the preamble is first postponed, and then every clause considered by the committee in its proper order; the preamble and title to be last considered.

This is not a bill. I must leave it in the hands of the members of the committee of the whole. I thought I should give a lead in the general discussion and then go on to the passing of the proposed amendments.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): It seems surprising that the members of the house now in committee of the whole should be so much exercised about the introductory remarks that the committee submitted in its report on the amendment to the standing orders and rules. The introduction is headed as a commentary on parliamentary procedure, reviewing in general parliamentary procedure as we have it here in this house and making some suggestions and perhaps unfortunately using the words: "We recommend". The committee did not go so far as to offer any specific amendment of any standing order to carry out a recommendation. It will lie entirely with the house and with the government as to whether they go farther than to adopt or not to adopt the specific amendments of certain standing orders which the committee recommend. There are 121 standing orders governing the house. After a number of meetings of the committee it was decided to offer amendments to only ten of the standing orders. These are the amendments that were offered.

They appear in the report, ten in all. I submit that if these amendments are considered and adopted or defeated, then there is no necessity of adopting the preamble to the report or the introduction to the report. It stands merely as a general representation to the house. It does not profess to bind the house at all. There is no motion before the committee that the report be adopted. As I understand it, the motion now before the committee is that the suggested amendments to standing order 9 be adopted. That is what we are considering. That is what we should do or refuse to do. Having done that, we should then go on to the next one, which is No. 11. The committee may never be called upon to adopt the introduction. There is no reason why they should. It stands merely as a record of the opinion of this committee and the committee does not ask the committee of the whole to deal with it at all. It asks the committee of the whole to deal merely with the specific amendments that have been suggested.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I thoroughly agree with every word said by the hon. member for Yukon. His statements will be confirmed if we look at the terms of reference to this committee which may be found in Votes and Proceedings of this house of Tuesday, February 1, 1944. The reference is as follows:

> Mr. Mackenzie King, seconded by Mr. Ilsley, moved,—That a special committee consisting of Messrs. Black (Yukon), Fauteaux, Golding, Hanson (York-Sunbury), Isnor, Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre), MacInnis, McIlraith, Maybank, St. Laurent and Quelch, be appointed to assist Mr. Speaker in revising the standing orders of the house with a view to simplify, accelerate and expedite its business, and to report to the house during the present session.

Therefore the contention of the hon. member for Yukon is absolutely correct. We are concerned only with the terms of the reference which calls for an inquiry into a revision of the standing orders, and that the said committee report to the house during the present session. I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, with the consent of the committee, that we should now proceed to discuss these revisions in detail.

Mr. POULIOT: The first thing to do is to know what is before us. There has been some conflict of opinion regarding what is called in different ways the expression of the opinion of the members of the committee. I have the Votes and Proceedings of February 1 containing the order of reference which states that that committee should be appointed to assist Mr. Speaker in revising the standing orders of the house with a view to simplify, accelerate and expedite the business and to report to the house in the present session. The reason why there was the misunderstanding is not due to what has been said by the hon. members here. It is precisely because the report has to be put in the hands of Mr. Chairman. That is the first mistake. A report that comes from a special committee cannot be amended except by the committee of the whole house itself. That is the way it is done; it cannot be done otherwise, and even if some sheets of paper are not before you, Mr. Chairman, it does not mean that the full report of the special committee is not before you. That is as clear as crystal.

The CHAIRMAN: I have rendered my decision. There is a way of appealing from my decision. I rule this discussion out of order, because there is no preamble before the Chair.

Mr. POULIOT: That is all right, but if there is no preamble there is an introduction which I have in my hand. But leaving that aside, if the first three pages are the basis for the proposed amendments, we must know what they contain, and they contain a series of contradictions and of errors in constitutional law. They contain some errors that a first-year student in constitutional law would detect. Let us see what is the basis of these proposed amendments. The report says:

> Your committee, in the performance of the important duty assigned to it by the house, has taken into account the existence of general criticism of parliament both by members and representative citizens.

That I deny. The second sentence reads:

> It has fully realized that much is expected of the House of Commons where the views of the people are finding expression and where industrial and economic conditions are demanding parliamentary attention and solution.

That is insignificant. It goes on:

> The main question before the committee was whether procedure should be amended so that the house may be able to do more legislative work in the time at its disposal and increase its efficiency as a critical and controlling assembly.

The work that we do here does not depend upon the rules of the house but upon the legislation that is submitted to us by the government. If, for instance, the selective service legislation had been submitted to parliament instead of being passed by order in council it would have been much better and it would have shown a proper deference to parliament, much more than the amendments to the rules now proposed. Again the report says:

> Criticisms of parliament seem to have been inadequately considered in relation to the whole structure of parliament—

Imagine, criticism in regard to the whole structure of parliament!

—the necessary party system and the complex situation created by a war which is now in its fifth year.

Everybody knows that. It goes on:

These criticisms arise from opinions concerning the functions of parliament which are often based upon such misconceptions as the view that parliament is primarily a board of directors with the members of the cabinet as its executive staff, and that members, instead of endeavouring to reconcile as much as possible all the elements of public opinion, which is difficult in our diversified country, should rigidly consider every question on its own exclusive merits.

That is insignificant.

Such, however, is not the true function of a legislative body composed of 245 members elected to discuss the management of public affairs.

Here is what I find wrong in this introduction. I find voices of good and voices of evil. There are some statements in these three pages that are absolutely true and some that are absolutely wrong, and when something is partly good and partly bad, I consider it all bad and I want to get rid of it. That is my point of view. It goes on:

Debates may sometimes be lengthy but they bring home to the administration the advisability or unpopularity of a particular line of policy and they must be heard because democratic government rests upon public opinion.

That is true.

Parliament is the assembly of representatives elected by the people where great issues are debated, or should be debated;—

That again is true.

—it is not primarily a body of auditors charged with the inspection of departmental accounts.

That is false. It is one of the principles of the British North America Act that parliament should have a check on expenditures. It is our duty to look into the expenditures of this country and to have its accounts before us. We are not auditors, but we have that right, which was won after a constitutional fight by our forefathers. Therefore I say that that statement is absolutely false.

Freedom of speech is one of the inalienable privileges of members of the House of Commons.

True.

It is in truth the privilege of their constituents and it is secured to members not for their personal benefit but to enable them to discharge the functions of their office.

The second part of that is true, but the first part of the sentence is partly true and partly false. It says:

It is in truth the privilege of their constituents. . . .

It is not the constituents who sit here. We sit here as the representatives of our constituents, and we have the right to discuss all matters pertaining to their welfare. It goes on:

Without it, the essence of the country's liberty does not exist.

That is true.

The present procedure was devised to reflect the freedom of all the members of the house, but we must realize that in war time parliament is bound to divest itself of some of its prerogatives in order to strengthen the government's power.

That is wrong, and it is in contradiction with the first part which says that the rules are amended to increase the efficiency of parliament. How can anyone reconcile those two statements? On the one hand it says it is to strengthen the power of parliament, and on the other hand it is to give our legal powers to the government. Most absurd, most wrong —total ignorance of parliamentary rights and of the constitution. It goes on:

The principle of majority rule is a constitutional convention upon which all British parliamentary government is built—

True.

—but this must collapse in proportion as the principle of the protection of minorities begins to decay.

What is the meaning of that sentence? It is so foggy, so impossible to understand, that it should be explained. It is most foolish. It goes on:

Rules are not sufficient to preserve freedom of speech and to uphold the dignity of the House of Commons.

I admit it, and for this reason, that practice counts for more than rules.

Standing orders depend for their success upon the prevalence of good will amongst all members who have to work under them.

A member—he was an old member too—once asked me what the standing orders were. I told him they were the rules of the house. He said, "Thank you." He did not even know what they were. The first thing is to read the standing orders and try to understand them. They are not so bad, after all, although they were mutilated a little over fifteen years ago.

Standing orders depend for their success upon the prevalence of good will amongst all members who have to work under them.

That is true, but they depend for their success upon the rulings of the chair, and some of the rulings that were given some years ago were most unjust. I shall not recall them now because they are in the minds of all members. The chairman must know the rules and apply them according to their spirit. That was not done for some time when another speaker was in the chair and when another chairman was occupying the chair here.

The house must rely on the forbearance of its members and on the general acquiescence in the enforcement by the Speaker of the rule which requires that members should strictly confine themselves to matters immediately pertinent to the subject of debate.

That is true but the rule is there already. What is the use of repeating the same thing? It is useless redundance. It goes on:

In a report presented to the United Kingdom House of Commons in 1931, the following statement appears: "Your committee would urge that unless understanding and a common loyalty prevail there will be a danger of the collapse of the system of representative government . . . if the principles of equality among members, publicity of the house's proceedings. . ."

Publicity of the house's proceedings! How is it that members of the wartime information board go around to the press with scissors, telling them not to publish this and that which hon. members have said? I am not making complaint of the two agencies, the Canadian Press and the British United Press, but there are those who do not want these reports to be published, and who do mutilate them, and it is these very gentlemen who complain afterwards that members are not doing their duty. Let them inform first their readers of what we are doing. Afterwards they will be in a position to criticize what we have done, and their readers will be sufficiently informed to give a fair judgment.

". . . freedom of speech, majority rule, or the right of the minority to an adequate expression of opinion are consciously challenged, there is an indication of some serious defect in the life of the nation. . ."

That is true, sir. If there is no freedom of speech in the house, there is an indication of some serious defect in the life of the nation. It was said in England, but it is just as true here as it is true in England:

"These larger considerations cannot be regulated by rules and orders: they are the responsibility of each member of the house."

They are the responsibility of the Chair, and they are our responsibility, as a body of men who have to maintain our traditional liberties. The report continues:

Your committee, in all its deliberations, has kept in mind the importance of not impairing the rights of minorities.

That is right. I agree with that.

Two fundamental principles govern the procedure of the house. They are, that the government shall, so long as it can maintain a majority, be able to secure such legal powers as it considers necessary for administration, . . .

That is absolutely wrong. Where does the government have legal powers? Anyone can look in the constitution and ascertain that the government has no legal powers; it has only executive powers. It is against this kind of thing in the report that I protest. Why should we abandon our rights to the government? We have rights here. We have the right to check legislation, and to do so at each one of the readings of a bill. Why should we abandon our rights as a parliament? This is the kind of thing in this report which I find absolutely wrong and despicable.

The report goes on to say that it is a fundamental principle—

. . . that minorities, however small, shall be able to criticize that administration.

That is all right, but let us see how it works. In the first place is asserted something which is absolutely false, which is absolutely opposed to the constitution, and in the second place it is commended as giving a chance to the minority. "I give you poison, but it is for your good; it will make you strong. I will kill you, but it is to send you to heaven."

Standing orders must protect them, and it is all the more important that they be founded on right and justice because they are merely resolutions of the house which can be swept away by a majority vote.

"Founded on right and justice"! I do not suppose anybody thinks we can change the constitution.

Your committee is of the firm opinion that these rights cannot be alienated even if the house, in maintaining them, may protract sessions and lay itself open to severe criticism.

In saying that, the committee does well.

The suggestion that estimates should be referred to standing or select committees has been given earnest consideration and carefully reviewed. It strikes at the root of ministerial responsibility and it divests members of the privilege of criticizing from the floor of the house without advice, suggestion or influence of any kind, all departmental expenditures submitted by the government. No proposals subversive of this settled rule of action can be safely embodied in any scheme for securing closer parliamentary control. One of the objections to this proposal is that if all the estimates are referred to a standing or select committee the motion for the Speaker to leave the chair shall be abolished, which means fewer opportunities for private members to move amendments setting forth grievances or expressing want of confidence in the government.

Reading that, one would suppose that everything is done to give hon. members more liberty, more freedom of speech than we have now; yet there come the scissors, "cut the speech, cut the speech, cut the speech," all the time. I think it is hypocrisy to say one thing and do another. Anyone reading the preamble would gain the impression that the object is to give hon. members the fullest and most perfect freedom of speech; yet we know that members cannot speak here, they cannot speak there; more members must rise in the case of an appeal; but all this is said to be for their own good and for the strengthening of parliamentary institutions, to allow members to say anything they like, and to protect minorities. That is the way it is done. If to sustain charges, more members must rise, it is for the protection of minorities! The number required to appeal from Mr. Speaker's rulings must be twenty instead of five, but it is to protect minorities! And so forth and so on.

One of the objections to this proposal is that if all the estimates are referred to a standing or select committee the motion for the Speaker to leave the chair shall be abolished, which means fewer opportunities for private members to move amendments setting forth grievances or expressing want of confidence in the government. The procedure required to keep this privilege unimpaired would reduce the efficiency of the committee's functions and it would be so involved as to be misunderstood and hard to enforce. Certain estimates may be occasionally referred to a select committee in order to ascertain facts which the house desires to know, but this practice should be adopted guardedly and only in very special circumstances. Your committee does not think it would be advisable to change the present system and it believes that the elasticity of the present rules makes it possible to apply them in new situations from time to time.

Here we have it.

We, however, desire to submit that considerable time could be saved if the committee of supply sat oftener in the early part of the session.

We do not need rules for that. Everything is in the hands of the government. When they want to submit estimates it is up to them to do so. We do not need rules for that, although such a rule would not be any more absurd than standing order 12, paragraph 4:

No member may pass between the chair and the table, nor between the chair and the mace when the mace has been taken off the table by the sergeant-at-arms.

"The chair" is the chair in which Mr. Chairman sits. How can anyone pass between Mr. Chairman's chair and the mace? And there are other things which are unbelievable. Standing order 5 states:

Every member is bound to attend the service of the house, unless leave of absence has been given him by the house.

What hon. member indicates with his fingers that he wishes to obtain the leave of the house to dictate his correspondence or attend a committee? That is a rule of the house which is not observed. What is the good of having rules which will never be observed? They should be stricken off the record; they are obsolete.

To return to the committee's report:

We therefore recommend that, when the yearly estimates have been brought down, one day a week be set aside for consideration of supply. If this is done, the house is not likely to find itself under the necessity of passing a great part of the estimtaes in the dying days of the session.

This is the recommendation which I am precluded from discussing on its merits because it is not supposed to be before Mr. Chairman now, as he told me that he had ruled.

The allotment of a certain number of days for the debates which appear to become protracted was considered Your committee was averse to multiplying rules of this character. There are already several restrictions which have been found necessary for parliamentary work and which are accepted in almost every elected assembly.

Not in England. Are they accepted everywhere except in England? Not everywhere; in only a few dominions.

Mr. RALSTON: I have been out of the chamber for a few minutes. May I inquire if anything happened since I was out whereby the Chairman made a ruling that the suggestions or recommendation contained in what we have called the preamble of the committee's report might not be discussed? I thought the Chairman had indicated that it could be discussed under the amendment of standing order 9.

Mr. POULIOT: He said both.

Mr. RALSTON: I would take the ruling in which he said "yes."

The CHAIRMAN: The ruling I had given was that we have no preamble before the committee at the present time. I assumed it would be very hard to stop hon. members from what might be called a general discussion.

Mr. POULIOT: I will tell the leader of the house that I am reading it so that it may be on record, so that those who see Hansard to-morrow will know what we have been discussing and that we have been fighting for the cause of liberty, for freedom of speech. That is what I want. If the hon. gentleman will permit me, I was saying that there is something of a paradox in these pages. The suggestion is being made that the House of Commons should divest itself of its legal powers in favour of the government and against the constitution itself, and I deny that we have the right to do that. That is the suggestion that is twice repeated in these incredible pages. I continue:

We have recommended a few amendments but we feel that this house cannot go further in regulating its discussions. In spite of limitations now existing, every resolution and bill is given ample opportunities for debate in committee of the whole, standing and select committees and on the second and third readings; but as the allotment of days, under a special rule, might prevent members from speaking, it should not be ordered under the authority of a standing order.

It is just to give an opportunity to members to speak; it is not to prevent them from being able to speak that their speeches are curtailed. Most incredible!

Your committee is not prepared to recommend such an innovation in our procedure which must be adapted to our own conditions and be thoroughly Canadian.

Here it is, "Canadian". If it were truly Canadian it would be better.

Our recommendation is that, when there is reason to believe that debate will be protracted, parties and groups recognized in the house shall confer and make arrangements either for allotting days or laying any plan for saving time whilst protecting freedom of speech for every representative of the people who sits in this house.

Once again the voices of good and evil. These gentlemen will meet together in the most undemocratic fashion and decide that private members have not the right to speak.

Mr. GOLDING: They do it.

Mr. POULIOT: They may do it but it is a shame that it is done.

Mr. GOLDING: They do it now.

Mr. POULIOT: I know they do, but I have always protested against it. I do not see why any member who is the leader of a group should have any more rights than a private member who is a back-bencher. That is my point. In the house we are all equals. The Prime Minister said so in 1926. He said he was the first among equals, and he said something to that effect not long ago. It is not disrespect for any one to point this out. If anyone sits here he does so in his capacity as a member of the House of Commons. If someone is elected grand commander of the illustrious and noble order of such-and-such, that does not give him any right to sit in the House of Commons. He sits here because he is a member of parliament, and all members of parliament have the same rights. I do not see, therefore, how any men belonging to any party or group may join together to prevent any member from saying what he has a right to say. It is most undemocratic, most despotic, most dictatorial.

Your committee did not think it advisable to take up at this time the question of the alleged suppression of initiative on the part of the private member.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Here again is the voice of good.

As the nation has been at war for over four years—

It was supposed to be five years, here it is only four years. The more we read, the less we are at war.

—and government business has been given precedence over private members' motions and bills, this is not the proper session to consider that part of our procedure.

I do not insist.

Conditions prevailing in war time are such that private members notices of motions and private bills must give way to war measures.

I am willing to agree to that.

The order of business followed since 1940 has been based on resolutions which practically abolish private members' days. It is an exceptional situation and perhaps the house had better wait until normal conditions return before the private member's place in the house can be considered.

I believe that the private member's place in the house must be considered in all discussions of public affairs, and if for the duration of the war we give precedence to government business I do not see why the rights of private members should be curtailed in debate.

Rules of practice are necessary in the House of Commons as well as in any court of justice and other public institutions, but the multiplicity of standing orders dealing with the basic principles of parliamentary procedure ought not to be encouraged.

That is why I am against having new rules. I find this statement very timely. We should not have more rules. I am against new rules. Here we have something good and something bad, something bad and something good—it is like an orange. Take an orange, part of which is rotten; will you eat it? No; you will throw it away. The orange that I hold in my hand has something good in it, but most of it is bad, and that is why I want to throw it into the waste-paper basket, as I did the famous Purvis report on unemployment. To continue:

There were no standing orders relating to public business in the United Kingdom House of Commons until 1707, and there were only three from 1715 to 1821—over a century. There are ninety-five to-day. We have 81, besides 10 dealing with the staff and 28 governing the library of parliament. Your committee is aware that members of this house are reluctant to impose restrictions on their freedom and independence, and that any attempt to translate procedure into precise rules will deprive them of the very quality which render them adaptable to new and varying conditions, or unusual combinations of circumstances, and might have the effect of restricting rather than safeguarding their privileges.

Amen. Then there is another paragraph. It was said that members had been asked to express views about the matter. That is the part I object to because it leaves those who read it under a false impression, that the purpose of these regulations is to give more latitude to the members when, in fact, as I understand it, it deprives them of all rights they have now. The leader of the opposition has to defend his own move, because he himself suggested changing the rules. He did not know what he was speaking about when he mentioned a certain matter to the house, and I told him that the first thing to do in connection with the public accounts committee was to lay a charge and ask for a sitting of the committee on a specified charge. And then he went on with it. It has become a Bracken slogan, that we must reform the rules of the house. Was it not his intention to depreciate members to your right, Mr. Chairman, so that they could be easily defeated at the next election? To me, it was a political move. That was the intention, to depreciate the majority of the house in order to have an easy success at the next election. And then we went on. Who had a diary to get in touch with editors at various intervals? It is time enough to write another article to remind the Prime Minister and the cabinet that the rules of the house should be changed. We had certain views periodically expressed by the man with a diary. He must have had connections in Montreal and Ottawa, in Toronto and in Winnipeg, and perhaps in the press gallery. When will he write another editorial about the change in the rules of the house.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. McNEVIN: Mr. Chairman, throughout the afternoon session we were dealing with the proposed amendments to the standing orders, but to my mind we made very little progress. I agree with the point of view expressed by the hon. member for Yukon, a former Speaker of this house, and supported by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. I view the first three pages of this report as explanatory notes outlining the opinions of the committee upon certain aspects of the rules governing the procedure of this house, and even if the whole report should be adopted I cannot see that what is contained in these three pages would in any way amend any of the standing orders.

Throughout the discussion it has appeared to me that the emphasis has been placed upon the necessity of protecting the rights and privileges of private members of parliament. I would be the last to support any suggestion which I thought might violate the rights or the independence of hon. members, but I do think that in this chamber we should not overlook the fact that if we are to maintain that high prestige which should be maintained with respect to free, democratic parliaments, we must keep in mind the necessity of so regulating the business of parliament as to expedite the important and essential matters which come up for consideration. In this discussion I think too little emphasis has been placed upon that important feature. I am not unmindful of the fact that in many countries democratic parliaments have disappeared as a means of government; nor am I unmindful of the fact that what has been substituted for those democratic institutions has eliminated to a very large extent not only the independence of elected representatives of the people but also the rights of individual citizens. Something has been said with respect to free speech. I believe the parliament at Westminster is the citadel of freedom of speech; and that brings me to a thought which is expressed at the bottom of page 2 of this report, in these words:

> Our recommendation is that, when there is reason to believe that debate will be protracted, parties and groups recognized in the house shall confer and make arrangements either for allotting days or laying any plan for saving time whilst protecting freedom of speech for every representative of the people who sits in this house.

As far as I am concerned, as I said in a debate last year, the parliament at Westminster adopted the principle of the allocation of time as applied to the consideration of bills, estimates and other business of the house. I have not altered my opinion; I am still in favour of the adoption by this house of the principle of the allocation of time, but after fully considering the matter the committee decided that this was not an oportune time to recommend to the house the amendment of our standing orders to bring that regulation into effect. I am quite prepared to go on and discuss these other amendments and not press that matter at the moment, but I want to make one point clear. I am quite sure that the adoption of the principle of the allocation of time by the parliament at Westminster has neither violated nor destroyed freedom of speech in that citadel, where the importance of freedom of speech is considered as great as in any other part of the globe. In view of the fact that they adopted that principle as far back as the early eighteen-eighties, I am sure we might well give consideration to following their example. In the meantime, I do not see why we could not dispense with this endless discussion on the foreword, and get down to the discussion of the amendments to the standing orders as they are listed in this report beginning with standing order 9 on page 4.

Mr. RAYMOND: I wish to register my protest against the proposed amendment to standing order 9, which reads:

> And every member present in the chamber when the question is finally put by Mr. Speaker shall be obliged to vote, and if he does not vote Mr. Speaker shall call upon him to vote and his name shall be recorded accordingly. If he persists in not voting he may be named by Mr. Speaker for having violated a standing order of the house.

What is the purpose of this amendment? When the Prime Minister moved the resolution setting up the committee he expressed himself in these words:

> That a special committee . . . be appointed to assist Mr. Speaker in revising the standing orders of the house with a view to simplify, accelerate and expedite its business, and to report to the house during the present session.

Can anyone tell me how this amendment will help to simplify, accelerate and expedite the business of the house? This was the purpose of the appointment of the committee. The first amendment is to oblige a man sitting in the house to register his vote. I do not see any reason to support any such amendment. In the Votes and Proceedings of March 3, there were some explanatory notes as to the amendments. It is said that the practice for many years was that a member who remained seated during a division was often required by Mr. Speaker to declare on which side he voted. I have sat in the house since 1925, and my recollection is clear with respect to 1931, in which year on the occasion of a vote a few members remained seated in the house, and did not register their votes. In that year Mr. Speaker did not render a decision; as a matter of fact he refused to intervene.

Then on April 28, 1931, Mr. Bourassa moved a motion, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) that the standing orders of the house be amended by inserting the direction that upon a division a member is not obliged to vote. As a matter of fact, later on a committee was appointed, on the initiative of the then Prime Minister, Mr. Bennett. A special committee was set up to consider amendments to the standing orders of the house governing procedure to be followed in taking a division. I do not know that any report was made. But that was the only occasion I recall when members were challenged to register their votes.

[Mr. McNevin.]

In the explanatory notes to which I referred a moment ago it is pointed out that in 1906, in the United Kingdom house, a standing order was passed relieving members of the obligation to vote. Certainly the practice in the United Kingdom cannot be held out as an argument in favour of this amendment, because over there members are not obliged to vote, or register their votes. I am trying to find a single reason which might lead me to support the amendment. In the preamble —some call it a preamble, while others say it is not a preamble—there is reference to freedom of members. Well, when a member is entitled to sit in the house he is entitled to his seat all the time deliberations of the house are in progress. He is entitled either to listen or not to listen to the debates. Some members may read their newspapers—as they are now doing. No one objects to their doing so. They can participate in the debate, or refrain from doing so, and no one will object. They are at liberty to do as they wish in that regard. When a division is taken, should a member be obliged to register his vote for or against a motion?

There are many inconveniences connected with a rule of that kind. For instance, with respect to the speech from the throne at the present session we know there was a main motion, an amendment and a subamendment. Members were called upon to register their votes on that division. If an hon. member did not want to vote on the subamendment, he could not have stayed in the house. He would have had to leave. What would have happened? Mr. Speaker read the main motion, the amendment and the subamendment, and then said that we would vote on the subamendment. As soon as the vote was taken on the subamendment, the amendment was voted on, without reading the amendment again or, in fact without reading anything, and without ringing the house bells. If a member did not want to vote on the subamendment, but wanted to vote on the amendment, he could not have registered his vote. He would have been outside the house, and would not have known when to come in. Surely that is an inconvenience.

Sometimes a member may agree with part of a motion, and disagree with part of it. If he votes for the motion, then he is registering his approval of everything contained in it. On the other hand, if he votes against it, he is registering his disapproval of the whole motion. The only alternative is to abstain from voting. Possibly that is why in England they have passed the standing order to which I referred a moment ago by which members were relieved of the obligation to vote and, if they wished, could remain at their seats.

I shall not detain the committee longer. My submission is that the committee was not appointed to propose such an amendment as this, that there are no arguments which could be offered in favour of it, and that on the other hand there are many which could be urged against it.

Mr. REID: Mr. Chairman, the subject we are discussing is the amendment to standing order 9. If it were not for the fact that the amendment may come to a vote, and no amendment to the amendment is permitted, I would be inclined to move an amendment to proposed new standing order. I say that because, first of all I am opposed to compelling a member to vote. I can see no good reason why a member of the House of Commons cannot sit in his place and, if he feels he should not vote, be permitted to remain seated, without being forced to leave the chamber. If the matter is to be cleared up so that a member can do so, then I think some note should be taken of citation 69 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, second edition. And, by the way, referring to voting in the House of Commons may I point out that there are some twenty-two citations dealing with standing order 9. However, citation 69 at page 25 reads:

> 69. Under ancient custom, refusal to vote was considered a serious parliamentary offence, but the practice was changed in 1906 by the British House adopting a standing order whereby a member is not obliged to vote. That standing order does not apply to the Canadian Commons. The practice has not been changed in Canada where every member who has heard the question put is bound to vote.

So that, if we want to clarify it, that is if it is the unanimous opinion of the committee that a member should be allowed to remain seated in the House of Commons and not be compelled to leave, as is the custom in other parliaments, then I suggest that citation 69 be looked up. Apparently there is still doubt in the minds of the Speaker and other hon. members as to whether a member should be compelled to register his vote.

I remember I think it was 1931, when Henri Bourassa was nearly named by the Speaker. The Speaker of that date, the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Black), called upon Mr. Bourassa to say which way he intended to vote. For about half an hour things were very tense in the house, as I might tell hon. members who were not there at that time, because the Speaker was about to name him, upon which he would be supposedly sent to the tower but actually, I suppose, it would have been to the Chateau Laurier, where he would have been well looked after. Under the rules he could have been named by the Speaker and, if named, he would have been escorted from the chamber. After some argument the request was withdrawn, but that provision is still in our rules. To my mind it should be completely clarified.

I am against forcing an hon. member to say whether he will vote. When a vote is taken our names appear on Hansard as a record for the people of our constituencies and the rest of the country to see. If an hon. member does not vote, his name is not there. We have the protection of Hansard to show whether an hon. member voted. Personally I cannot see why an hon. member should be compelled to leave the chamber if he is not going to vote. I am against compulsion, and if it were necessary to do so I would be prepared to move an amendment to the new standing order as proposed by the special committee. I am hoping that the matter will be put up to the committee and a standing vote taken, either for or against it, but I did want to register my protest.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Chairman, I had intended to make some extended observations with respect to the general aspects of the report of this committee, but since much of the ground has been covered by those who have spoken I shall confine myself to three or four matters which I think are germane to the subject under discussion. In his first speech in connection with this matter His Honour the Speaker referred to the fact that no suggestions had been offered in writing to the committee by members of the house, nor had they accepted the invitation sent out by the committee to present suggestions as to the changing of the rules. I think many hon. members feel as I do, that if a formal invitation to present verbal suggestions to the committee had been given it would have been more acceptable. I believe that would have brought forth many suggestions. I only say this because His Honour the Speaker made some mention of it. It is one thing to put suggestions in writing and quite another thing, and I am sure much more valuable, to go to a committee and give suggestions or evidence as may be required.

One matter that has been dealt with very lightly is the question of reading speeches in the house. I do not intend to dwell too much on this because I am free to admit that I would rather hear read a well prepared speech than I would to listen to a poorly delivered speech, even though it may actually be a better one. There is sometimes an advantage in having remarks put in a condensed form and read. However, my remarks must not be taken as an endorsation of the reading of speeches in this house. Frankly I think it ought to be discouraged. Debate in the House of Commons is of most use to the people and to the house when it comes freely from the representatives of the people.

I remember one experienced parliamentarian who is no longer in the house but who continues to follow the debates very carefully and studiously. He told me that he never reads the debates which occur while Mr. Speaker is in the chair because he never knew from reading Hansard whether they had been read, whether they had been prepared by the member himself or whether they represented a thesis or some philosophical utterance which was being placed upon Hansard. He read only what occurred in the committee stage of a bill or a resolution. It seemed to him that that is when the best debate occurs. If I may say so, it is at that time that we hear from hon. members what they would be likely to say in normal conversation. I have listened to some experienced debaters, and I notice that except on rare occasions when a statement has to be letter perfect they do not read their speeches. We offer a poor example to have speeches read in the house, and it should be avoided if possible. However, like everything else I do not suppose any hard-and-fast rule can be followed and I repeat the reservation which I made at the beginning of my remarks.

There is one more matter I should like to bring to the attention of the committee. I think most hon. members have come to the conclusion that there is something wrong in the division of a private member's time. The average elector fails to realize the amount of work a conscientious, industrious and hard-working private member of parliament has to do. I have been a private member myself, and I still am classed in that category. I have found, and I think most private members have found, that the mornings are largely taken up with correspondence, interviews and taking care of various odds and ends. This constitutes one of the most tedious and perhaps hardest tasks a member has to do. If an hon. member takes an active part in committees, he must attend committee meetings during the mornings and perhaps in the afternoons as well. Then he has the afternoon and evening sessions of the house to attend.

I should like to make a suggestion, although I am not sure that it can be properly accepted. However, unless we have suggestions we shall not be able to arrive at definite conclusions. When the days of war stress have passed, when the cabinet and the government have more time at their disposal to devote to ordinary matters, the time of a private member should be worked out on a different basis. I hasten to point out that this is not a war-time recommendation; it is one for the more normal and perhaps more leisurely days which we hope will come with peace. I think the private member ought to have his mornings free from parliamentary duties in this chamber or in committee. The afternoon sittings of the house might perhaps begin at an earlier hour and extend a little later than six o'clock. Perhaps a six-hour sitting could be arranged without much dislocation by starting a little earlier and ending later in the afternoon, leaving the evenings free for private members to do their committee work. That might establish a better balance for the ordinary private member of the house, because there is no doubt that the average private member, if he is a busy member, has an overlapping and duplication of his duties from time to time from which he should have some relief so far as the rules of the house will permit. I hasten to point out again that I am not proposing this as a solution of the problem but simply throwing out the suggestion in the hope that its advantages and disadvantages might be considered.

It is difficult to arbitrarily restrict members of the house in their speaking time, but from my own brief experience in the house, while I have perhaps never made any very effective speeches in the house, as most hon. members will agree, I do say, open confession being good for the soul, that the most effective speech I have ever delivered in the house as a private member, if this may be used as a yardstick at all, is one that I made on a budget debate when I spoke for only two and a half minutes. At all events I am proudest of that speech as I stand here to-night.

It is all very well to say that parliament must be shorn of much of its debating rights, but we must use caution in this matter because the interests of the constituencies which private members represent must be safeguarded, and when their interests are at stake there should not, of course, be any undue curtailment of speeches by their representatives. Parliament is often spoken of as being the safety-valve of the nation. While I object to long speeches and to repetition, and I think we all must share guilt in that respect, let us not forget that it is better for discussion to take place in the House of Commons than in the cellars of the nation, for where there is a damming up of free expression, there is no safety-valve and an explosion may take place. That is a matter which may properly be of concern to the house.

There is a germ of assistance in the suggestion that has been advanced that there should be a better organization of our debates which would assist in forming a more favourable public opinion, and public opinion, of course, is of great consequence to this chamber at all times. It is important that we should keep the prestige of this chamber as high as possible, also our standards of debate. There have been times, I believe, when the public feels that this chamber has taken too much time in debating subjects which have not seemingly been of as great interest to the public at large.

Another great difficulty, so far as the public is concerned, is that during the war so much legislation has been taken out of the hands of the legislative chamber and passed through administrative orders and orders in council. That has been dealt with before, and I have no desire to enlarge upon it to-night except to say that since the War Measures Act was put into operation there have been many times and are times and perhaps will be times again when the government has mistaken the urgency of the situation and resorted to that method of legislating, as witness the 42,000 orders in council passed by this government. I want to protest against that method except in cases where the emergency is of the urgent character contemplated by the War Measures Act itself.

Coming to the proposed amendment to standing order 9, I find myself very much in agreement with the opinions expressed to-night by the hon. member for New Westminster. It seems to me that we should not compel a member to cast his vote in a division in this house. There are two reasons for that which will at once occur to every hon. member. I am not going to go into the pros and cons of compulsory voting throughout the country, but so long as we have not yet adopted compulsory voting for the electors, and so long as we do not compel a voter, once he gets into the polling booth, to cast his vote for any particular candidate—he may spoil his ballot or not mark it at all—we have no right to apply a different set of rules to the representatives of those electors in this House of Commons. I just say that by way of emphasizing the argument so well advanced by the hon. member for New Westminster to-night. I take my stand against compelling members to vote in this house.

The procedure of the house in dealing with estimates is dealt with in the general introduction to the committee's report, and I am in agreement with what it says as to estimates. I think it would tend to get away from ministerial responsibility to take consideration of the estimates away from the committee of the whole and assign that work to a smaller committee. It may be argued that it would save time, but I am doubtful of that. It might even increase the time which would be taken up in debate in this house. I do not think the suggestion is feasible and I suggest that the committee was right in opposing it. I have dealt with these matters briefly because there are a number of other matters which will have to be discussed as we reach the various proposed amendments to standing orders. Anything further I have to say I shall defer until the other amendments are before us.

Mr. McGARRY: I am at a loss to know whether I am out in the wilderness. I do not know whether I shall be in order in making a few remarks with regard to the principles of this report; but my understanding was that the amendment to standing order 9 has been introduced and that a free discussion may be had on that amendment.

As a member of the special committee, and, may I say, having had some experience in serving on committees, I never knew of a committee where there was such unified intent on the part of the members to carry out the purpose for which it was constituted. I firmly believe that, but for our persistent adherence to the principle which we believed we were required to follow, that of expediting the work of the house and at the same time preserving the rights of minority groups, more recommendations would have appeared in the report. Yet I believe, in spite of restrictions on that account, the committee has made recommendations which will expedite the work of this house, and that no minority group will suffer thereby.

While we were unanimous on the principle of the recommendations which we submitted, there were some differences with regard to certain of the items. I do not mind confessing that when the matter of curtailing the time for speeches was before the committee, I advocated that instead of forty minutes being the duration of the time for speech making, it be reduced to thirty minutes. Possibly I was not alone in this respect. I advanced this change on account of an opinion which I hold in this regard that, apart from ministers of the crown or others who possibly would not be reckoned as back-benchers, we can say in thirty minutes all the worth-while things on any subject. I have been a listener-in so often, in this chamber and out of it, to men who made excellent speeches so long as they stopped at thirty minutes, but spent ten more minutes—

Mr. GRANT: Spoiling it.

Mr. McGARRY: —spoiling it, yes, not adding any force to it, their rhetoric no more eloquent and their logic no more convincing than if they had stopped at the end of half an hour.

An hon. MEMBER: They did not stop when they were through.

Mr. McGARRY: Usually we fellows who do not speak very often are in the category of listeners. I can tell the committee this, if you listen for thirty minutes to any man who is probably not an artist in an oratorical sense, when a member of the house is a silent listener for thirty minutes, I cannot help thinking some compassion should be rendered him, and that a period of thirty minutes is about as large an oracular contribution as even a member of parliament should be expected to make. However, that is only my opinion. I took issue with the committee on that point, and possibly I had a few supporters. I still hold that opinion. But as for the principle of the recommendations which we submitted, I am absolutely in accord, and when the time comes to show that, either by vote or otherwise, I shall be pleased to support the recommendations.

Mr. POULIOT: In listening to the able speeches which have been delivered by hon. members, I have noticed a contradiction in the speech of the leader of the opposition. He said in the first place that the free expression of views in this chamber was a safety-valve, but afterwards he spoke of wasted time. This is contradictory. He may feel that the speech of a fellow member is a waste of time, and have a different opinion about his own. That is human; I do not blame him for that. The retort which comes from any hon. member when one asks the specific question, "What is wasted time?" is, "Your own speeches". Then everybody will laugh, and there will be an end of it; it will be regarded as a conclusive retort by many parliamentarians to the fellow who is caught in that trap because he spoke too much. It is a very easy answer: "Did you do it?" "No, I did not do it; you are the one that did it." Laughter, cheers, applause. Most conclusive, very weighty. But one should be more specific than that. The leader of the opposition must say what he means by "wasted time". He was the first who spoke about it; whenever he speaks, or one of his party speaks, that is not wasted time, but time usefully spent for the good of the nation; but if another hon. member disagrees with them, he speaks too much; he is wasting time and his speeches cost so much to the Canadian poeple. That is the first point.

[Mr. McGarry.]

The second thing I noticed in his short speech is what he said in pressing the adoption of the amendments to the rules of the house. He rose very often to insist upon the Prime Minister so amending the rules that there should be no waste of time, and what does he propose to us? He proposes a brain diet for parliament after the war. It is a post-war programme which he gives us. In the morning, no sittings of parliament, no sittings of committees; in the afternoon, another little diet; at night, another little diet. Three diets, one for correspondence, one for committees, one for sittings of the house, and it will be for appreciation after the war. It is not necessary now, and if it is not necessary now let us drop it, finish it and take up something else. If the hon. gentleman does not hold the view that it is important to amend at this time the rules of the house, let us finish it right now by dropping it in the waste-paper basket, the place where it belongs. It is the kind of thing which the Canadian people should not have to listen to. Speaking here on behalf even of members of the Tory party who do not recognize the importance of the matter and do not realize that when the election comes there will be hecklers in their own counties who will ask them to report on what has been done by their leaders themselves about this most important question, the defence of parliamentary liberties, I would ask them, what will they have to answer? Poison is given them by speeches like that of the leader of the opposition. He has depreciated the work of parliament; he has spoken of wasted time. I remember wasted time when Arthur Meighen was leader of the opposition; wasted time—lots of it—when Bennett the humbug was Prime Minister of Canada; wasted time when all the other gentlemen whom I have known, so many of those who have led the Tory party, one after the other, in the house, wasted time; when the hon. member for York-Sunbury was making speeches which lasted for hours; when there was a marathon of speeches all the time between the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition. And if it was wasted time for the Prime Minister to speak for hours, it was even more a waste of time for the then leader of the opposition to speak for hours.

The present leader of the opposition tells us that on one occasion he spoke for two and a half minutes and that he did not waste time. Well, wasting time is a relative matter. One could waste time speaking for one minute, and even half a minute might be a waste of time. It would be a waste of time on the part of the present leader of the opposition, because the best speech he could make would be a wink—say it with flowers. The hon. gentleman is a most likable man. In fact, he is the first one I have seen in that seat, in the twenty years that I have been a member of parliament, who could be said to be a likable man. That is why he has not been chosen leader of his party. That is the reason. The reason is an obvious one; they always choose the wrong man. They did so the last time, and when they select a leader they have the next one in mind. They are untruthful when they select the leader of the party.

I am discussing what the hon. member has referred to as waste of time, and when we come to this very important matter I want hon. members to realize exactly how important it is. I was greatly offended and shocked when I heard the hon. gentleman say, "We will come to more important matters afterwards." It may be more important to him to discuss trivial matters such as garbage and recuperation, but he must know that there are spiritual values and certain rights that count for much more than an ash-can even if it is kept in a million-dollar building. That is why I call the attention of the members of the opposition to the importance of spiritual values which are a legacy to us from our forefathers and which were worth fighting for, and it is for that reason that to-day I protest most energetically and emphatically against the first three pages of this pronunciamento, in which every sentence swears at the sentence following. It is something most incredible. It is not hash; it is not a stew; it is what we call in French gâchis—something incredible, an incredible mess. We are to stand for it because it is supposed to be the basis of the amendments that appear on that paper.

I do not believe that members of parliament will support it. It is beyond my expectation. I might have expected the worst, but I did not expect this. It is worse than the worst. Those who will come after us, whether we are successful or not; those who have been opposing this matter from the start, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy), and some others who have opposed it on basic grounds, will deserve the gratitude of future members of parliament.

Not long ago the Prime Minister said something that gives us food for thought. It is food for thought for many members of parliament. He said that after the next election there will be great changes in the House of Commons. Did he mean by that that the members who were supporting these amendments were putting a rope round their necks? I do not know, but I presume the Prime Minister is clever enough to have meant that when he made that statement in this chamber. I do not see, therefore, why we should have to carry the burden of these contradictory and unacceptable statements, like the Volga boatman, during the whole term of our parliamentary life.

It is time to get down to brass tacks and to realize that when a member makes a speech that is not satisfactory to some other member he exercises the right that is his and the right which that other himself can exercise at any time, and therefore what is being said by a handful of members, who, I hope, represent the opinion of the majority of their colleagues, is that these three pages should be censored by the committee, that they should disappear from the official publication, and the other amendments be considered in turn. In my view, the thing has to be done for the safeguarding of our parliamentary institutions, for the safeguarding of our liberties, and when during the next elections, whenever they come, anyone who has supported official statements of this kind, when addressing the people, need not be surprised if he or she is heckled. Such persons will get only what they deserve because, if our rights are not safeguarded, if the charter of our parliamentary liberties is changed, they will have no reason to complain should they encounter any trouble in addressing audiences outside parliament.

This is my last appeal. I hope that the committee will consider the matter carefully. Someone says, "Oh, oh". That hon. member who says "oh, oh," will be defeated by a huge majority at the next election. He had better look around him at the lights in the chamber; he had better look at the carving of the moose around the ladies' gallery, because it will be the last time he will see these sights, and I will give him a picture of the House of Commons to put in his living-room so that he may remember the days when he was a member of parliament and when he said "oh, oh", when I was discussing a serious matter.

Mr. NEILL: Before dealing with the immediate amendment to the standing order in question I want to take the privilege granted by the leader of the house, and taken advantage of by several members of the committee, in order to consider for a moment that portion of the report which has been variously described as a running commentary, a prelude, an introduction and by several other names, but never really identified in all its nakedness. I wish to mention one or two things, but I do not want to be charged with holding up the committee. There are two points I should like to bring to the attention of the committee in this regard, and one is in connection with the reading of speeches, a question touched on by the leader of the opposition. If this house really wants to expedite its business it should have put that proposal at the very top of the list as an instruction, that there should be no speeches read in this House of Commons. The reading of speeches is the cause of more delay than anything else, but personally I share the view of the leader of the opposition; I would rather listen to a well read speech than a badly delivered one. Because a man reads his speech it does not follow that it has been prepared by some sinister hand outside the house; not at all. There are very able men who can express themselves well in writing, if given time, but who cannot do so spontaneously, and who cannot learn their speeches by heart. Personally I would be in favour of letting them read their speeches, but for one thing; that is, I always object to lending myself to the doing of anything that is made into a farce, and this prohibition against the reading of speeches in this house is absolutely a farce. No genuine attempt is made to enforce it. I am not saying anything against the present Speaker or the present Chairman; I have been here for many years, and it was always the same. The Speaker hesitates to call a man to order, and if he does so the man simply says, "No, Mr. Speaker, I am only adhering somewhat closely to my notes."

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Then why not let him hand in the speech to Hansard without reading it?

Mr. NEILL: Some men, of course, have good eyesight and can do what I cannot; that is, read their speeches at a distance. I have only notes, and I must look at them closely, but I have seen men give the impression that they were delivering a speech with the aid of but very few notes, while actually they were reading every word of it. Quite inadvertently the other evening I happened to pass behind one of these hon. gentlemen; I looked down at his desk and saw that he had the whole thing written out, even to commas, semicolons, subheads and so on. While listening to him I had the impression that he was not reading his speech, because he did not need to look at it too often, but actually he was reading every word. So that if we are really sincere in wanting to save the time of the house, let us enforce that rule. No one is trying to enforce it now, but if the rule is retained it should be enforced.

I wished to refer to one other matter which should engage the attention of this house and which should have been dealt with by the special committee, which steered clear of it entirely. That is, they should have brought in, and we should pass here to-night, an amendment providing that the defeat of the government on a petty matter shall not mean its resignation. An adverse vote on a small amendment to some bill, for instance, should not be regarded as a defeat of the government. While perhaps comparatively few hon. members would admit it, I am sure that on many occasions they would have voted differently if it had not been for that custom. A loyal supporter of a party does not like to vote against it; when the whip comes along and tells him that the government will have to resign if they are defeated on some small matter, which will mean an election, he says, "Well, boys, I did not like that bill but I could not face an election just now." Because of appeals to his loyalty to his party many a man must vote in a way he would never dream of voting if it were left to his own conscience. Why should that be the case? It was never so in the old days. I recall that in the legislature at Victoria a party came in with a very slim majority; if one member went out to have a drink or to get his hair cut, the government might be defeated before he came back. The government, very sensibly, said, "We are going back to the custom of fifty years ago; we are not going to regard an adverse vote in this house as a vote of want of confidence unless it is on a resolution which contains those precise words." That is the proper way to do it. Let the opposition, if they feel strong enough, move that the house no longer has confidence in the government; that is the way to defeat it. Many years ago, when I was quite a young man, it was the custom in Britain—I do not know what it was here—that a government would never resign because they were defeated in the country. They always met the house, even though they knew they were hopelessly in the minority. Then the leader of the opposition would rise and make a motion of want of confidence; it would pass, the government would be formally and officially defeated and would resign.

Now the custom has grown up, though not supported by any rule of law so far as I know, that when a government is defeated at an election it packs its bags and steps out. Whether or not that custom should be adhered to is not so important; the important thing is that no hon. member should be compelled by a sense of loyalty or for any other reason to vote against his own conscience, because it might mean the defeat of the government. There is no reason why a provision such as I have suggested should not be adopted. I am quite certain it would make for better government, because I have seen things pass in this house that never would have passed if they had been left to open votes. I do not know why on earth the committee did not deal with this most important question.

I now come back to the amendment we are supposed to be discussing; that is, the amendment which proposes to compel every hon. member who is in his place to vote, whether or not he knows what he is voting about. The hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie made a point this evening with which I had not dealt. He said that the alternative to voting would be for a man to go outside the chamber before the vote took place. I could not hear the hon. member very clearly, but I take it he was referring to an instance which occurred only a few weeks ago, when we took votes on several amendments to the main motion. One vote was taken, then another, and finally the last vote was taken without ringing the bell at all, and without giving anyone outside an opportunity to come in. In that instance a rank injustice might have been perpetrated. A few months ago I sat here during a division and did not vote. To tell the truth I have forgotten what was the occasion, but I was quite decided that neither party had a good case, and I did not see why I should express sympathy with either side. I felt they were both playing politics and that there was no need for me to endorse the one side or the other.

What was the purpose in mind in setting up this committee? It was "to simplify, accelerate and expedite the business of the house." I do not know why it was necessary to put in the two words; either "expedite" or "accelerate" would have been sufficient, but that was what the committee was appointed for; that was what we call the reference, what we told them to do. How are we to expedite the business of the house by adopting this amendment? We have been told that this is an urgent matter, that the public demand it, but that is all bunk. No one is demanding it; no one is outspoken about it. It is some thirteen years since this matter has been brought up, and there has never been any trouble about it. Not since 1906, which is thirty-eight years ago, has the British parliament, to which we look for guidance in cases of this kind, forced anyone to vote whether or not he wanted to do so. Surely, as some hon. members have said, we can leave it to the honour of a member, and to his constituents. The constituents do keep note of how their members vote, and they would be quick to ask, "Why didn't you vote this way or the other?"

Then a man might have private reasons for not voting. I believe there is a rule of the house, though I have not had time to look it up, which says that a man may not vote if his private, pecuniary interests are involved. For instance, he should not vote on a bill to give a franchise to some company in which he had a financial interest. The house does not always know a man's private affairs. He might have a perfectly proper pecuniary interest in a company and his sense of honour would lead him to abstain from voting. Then he would be compelled to stand up and be pilloried. He would be asked, "Why did you not vote?" He would reply, "I had my own reasons for not voting." Then he might be told that was not sufficient, after which the absurd procedure of naming the hon. member would be gone through, though that died out a hundred years ago, and ostensibly he would be committed to the tower. I remember that on one occasion a man was committed to the tower in Victoria, which meant the best hotel in town. By and by the government realized what idiots they were making of themselves and said to the man, "You can come out." He replied, "Not if I know it. I am living comfortably here; I can come and go as I please all day," and he stayed there until the end of the session, when the law automatically let him out. It is a very unpleasant experience, as some of us here know, to be named. It is a disgrace. It is put on the record, and it stands against a man for all time—that he has been named, and escorted by a policeman outside of the chamber.

It is not necessary to do that, unless it is absolutely unavoidable. A question of religion might be involved. I might say to some of my people, "I am not in favour of that, but I will tell you what I will do; I will do nothing against it; I will not vote against it if it comes up." Here, in one way or another, I am obliged to do something against my promise and my conscience.

Can anyone tell us where there is any precedent for such a rule? Great Britain has gone on for thirty-eight years, and we have gone on for a number of years without enforcing it. Who asked for it? I ask this: Will that simplify, accelerate or expedite the business of the house? Every time this comes up there will be a squabble about it, and someone will put up a fight. If a person must give his reasons he is perhaps revealing his private affairs. Will that expedite the business of the house? I can remember Miss Macphail being compelled to vote. There was a complaint about it, and it led to our adopting a rule, more or less unwritten, that we should never compel anyone to vote.

The penalty is so severe that it is undesirable. I submit that the proposed amendment ought to be thrown out, because it is contrary to the instructions we gave the committee.

We instructed that committee to take steps to accelerate the business of the house. I can safely say that that will not accelerate the business of the house.

I am glad to see how many are willing to vote against this change. And having had all this discussion, I find, as a matter of fact, that that is the rule now. The present penalty is not put in, but the only difference is the penalty. It is a very unjust penalty. Let me refer the committee to citation 68, standing order 9:

> If a member who has heard the question put does not vote, and the attention of the Speaker is directed to the fact, the latter will call upon him to declare on which side he votes; and his name will be recorded accordingly.

But, following the custom, and by agreement on both sides of the house, that was abandoned. Its abandonment was animated by common sense, and it was dropped out. Why is there all this fuss about putting it in now, with this very unjust and unfair penalty?

The hon. member for New Westminster has said something about moving an amendment. He does not need to do so. All he needs to do is vote against this abortion of a rule.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to get into this discussion. However, if someone did not take part it would continue as a two-man show. I am surprised at this debate. A House of Commons committee was appointed for the purpose of bringing in recommendations as to how the work of the house might best be carried out. In my opinion it requires and can stand considerable improvement. Each group in the house was privileged to appoint members to the committee, and the committee sat under the chairmanship of Mr. Speaker, a man whom we all respect, whose fairness we recognize and in whose judgment we have confidence.

Under his chairmanship the committee, as is set out in the preamble to the report, asked any hon. members who so desired to place their views on procedure before the committee in writing. As the preamble states, no suggestions were received. If we were interested in expediting the business of the house, in protecting the interests of private members, and in all those other things we now appear to fear, then certainly we were lax in our duty in not assisting the committee to come to an understanding in accordance with our views. No member of the house availed himself of the invitation by the committee to send it the benefit of our views.

One would have to listen carefully to realize that we are discussing standing order 9, and the preamble to the report. Any committee which understood its business would, in dealing with a matter of this kind, write a preamble to any specific recommendations it might have to offer. So far as I am concerned, I believe this matter was considered carefully by the committee, while a member of this group was listening in. We have confidence in the man we placed on that committee. Reading the preamble to the report, I must say I can find nothing wrong with it.

For example, it states that one day of each week should be set aside for the purpose of discussing supply. Surely that is an improvement on sneaking into supply at ten minutes to eleven at night. No one knows when we are going to have supply, and all are guessing about it. The committee, in the preamble, definitely suggests that we set aside one day a week for that purpose; and with that suggestion I find no fault.

They set out the many problems with which they had to contend, and they have expressed the fear of interfering with the rights and privileges of anyone. They point out the difficulties connected with amending regulations or standing orders, particularly in view of the war situation, and the encroachment the government has already made on the privileges of private members.

Then they suggest that where a protracted debate is likely to take place, in order to give each member an opportunity to express the views of his particular group, representatives of each group should meet. That is a matter of custom; it is done anyway. It is merely a reiteration of a custom which has grown up in the past. So far as I can see, there is nothing wrong with the preamble.

I am not going to say anything about the other specific recommendations. I have, however, this to say about standing order 9, which we are now discussing. A member of the House of Commons is sent here to represent his constituency. What he does in the house is not his business; rather it is the business of the people who sent him here. He will have an opinion on any legislation passing through the house. Such legislation will be either good or bad for his constituents. They are not able to judge, but he is. He sits here, listens, takes part in the debate and has an understanding of the legislation. If he is in his seat in the chamber, it is his obligation to vote, and it is his responsibility to his constituents to show them, by the written record of the house, how he voted, whether he was taking care of their interests, or otherwise. If he wishes to leave the chamber and say he was not present, that is his own responsibility.

But I believe it should be the duty of members of the House of Commons to vote, and it should be the duty of those enforcing the rules to see to it that when the bell rings the members are in their seats. When a motion or an amendment is before the house, one which means something to a member's constituents, it is his moral obligation to show them how he voted on that motion, and to show whether or not he was interested in their welfare. I do not think there should be any argument about that. For any hon. member to take the position that what he does is his own business alone is not my conception of carrying out the duty devolving upon a member of parliament. I consider myself to be the spokesman of the people of my constituency and of the people of the Dominion of Canada. The people of my constituency have sent me here with certain hopes and aspirations as to the manner in which I will carry out my responsibilities in taking care of their problems. What I do in this house should be done with a thought to the welfare of my constituents. Any matter that is before this house offers me a supreme test as to whether or not I am interested in it, whether or not I have the courage of my convictions. I must consider what action I shall take, whether it is good or bad for me politically. I do not think any member who is in his seat when a vote is taken should shirk his duty to his constituents.

I am surprised at the length of time that has been spent in discussing this matter. I think the committee have done as good a job as they could in the time at their disposal, having regard to the many complications surrounding the matter. I consider that the amendment to standing order 9 is quite good and should be accepted, plus the preamble. We will speak about the other amendments as we come to them.

Mr. HANSELL: I am glad to learn from the previous speaker that we are discussing an amendment and the preamble, since I have been trying to find out about that. This afternoon I listened to some long speeches in connection with the suggestions contained in the preamble. I must confess that I am not entirely in sympathy with those who object to them. I see no harm in those recommendations, but at the same time I would not care to cast my vote for all that is expressed in the prologue. I do not agree with the contention expressed in the second paragraph. I shall not take the time to read it; I simply make that statement. I do not agree with the statement made in the first part of the third paragraph, which reads:

> The present procedure was devised to reflect the freedom of all the members of the house, but we must realize that in war time parliament is bound to divest itself of some of its prerogatives in order to strengthen the government's power.

I absolutely do not believe that statement; I absolutely am not in favour of that statement. My contention is that the government has too much power, that it has taken unto itself more power than parliament ever intended it should have. I quite agree that parliament should give way to war-time legislation, but for my part I will not let it go by without vigorous protest. I do not agree to giving the government more power. The fact of the matter is that power in a demorcracy rests with the people, not with the government. In Canada parliament is the body which represents the people; the government does not represent the people. The government is the administrative body that has been called upon to execute the legislation that parliament puts into effect. But the government does not represent the people; parliament represents the people.

I should like to say a word with regard to the amendment to standing order 9. I cannot say that I have any objection to this amendment. I do not agree with some who have contended that a man should not be in his seat in the chamber when a vote is taken if he is not going to vote. I do not know why he needs to be here if he is not going to vote, unless it be to watch the rest of us perform as we make our little bows to His Honour. When a standing vote is taken the bells are rung for two or three minutes, and if an hon. member does not want to vote he has plenty of time to go to the lobby, put his feet up on a chair and smoke his pipe if he wants to while the rest of us decide which way we intend to vote.

If this amendment carries I fancy it will put an end to the custom of pairing. I do not know why pairing is allowed. Personally I never could see any wisdom in that practice. I think it tends to encourage loyalty to party rather than loyalty to the people. When a man must be away he gets a member on the other side to refrain from voting in order that the parties may still retain their proper standing. I do not go much for party machinery. I think private members when they take their places in the house should do so as representing the people, rather than a party. Having made these observations, I am prepared to favour the amendment to standing order 9.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I doubt if this amendment would stop a man from pairing with another.

Mr. GLADSTONE: The committee is discussing the report of the special committee appointed to revise the standing orders of the House of Commons. I desire to renew my plea for greater independence on the part of private members. I set this forth in a speech I made on February 8, which is reported on page 263 of Hansard as follows:

To this end members of parliament, especially in this time of world crisis, ought to exercise their right to advocate and consider legislation with less regard to party affiliation. Members now have freedom, in theory but not in general practice, of voting according to their judgment. Consequently I advocate that the defeat of a government measure shall not constitute defeat of the government.

Confidence or want of confidence in the government, after non-acceptance of proposed legislation, should be determined by a separate vote. An adverse majority on a confidence vote would then constitute defeat of the government.

In the United States there is no such thing as a vote adverse to the administration. An adverse vote means no more than a favourable vote. Under their constitution an election is held every four years, and consequently members of the senate or the house of representatives need not fear that they are forcing a defeat of the government and bringing on a general election when they vote in a certain way.

Since I offered those suggestions on February 8 I have had much favourable comment in editorials and in very kind letters sent to me by Canadians from all parts of the country. I have some evidence that in emergencies this practice of continuing in office even in the face of an adverse vote is being employed. For instance, I find an article in the Toronto Globe and Mail of February 25, which carries the following heading: "Premier Drew prepared to accept test on confidence." Premier Drew's comments at that time were as follows:

This is not a minority government. It is the government called to give executive direction to the affairs of this legislature. It may be a healthy thing to see members free to express their own opinions and vote in accordance with their own views.

This cannot be a minority government. You have the power to move a want-of-confidence motion which we will be glad to accept as an issue. If this is not done, we must imply you have confidence in the continuance of our work as the government of the province.

As for the terms on which we will govern, there are no terms and no thought of dictatorship. Even a hint of dictatorship is a reflection on the man who makes it.

We are in the position where we must depend entirely on your support of what is done.

We do not intend to govern in a spirit of fear. We assume full responsibility, and as soon as you feel we have not confidence, the democratic test is there.

We have another instance of a government arriving at a situation in which they had difficulty. I have in my hand a Canadian Press dispatch dated March 28, from London, and it is headed: "No censure intended in vote against government." Members will recall that on that day Prime Minister Churchill's government suffered the first defeat in its history by a single vote. The situation was reviewed, and on the following day, on a definite vote of confidence or no confidence, the government was sustained by an overwhelming majority.

What is the effect in parliament of the practice that the government is defeated on an adverse vote? One serious drawback is that private members supporting a government that has a very large majority need give no concern to studying the legislation that is before parliament. If they take their cue from the Prime Minister or the cabinet ministers as to how they will vote what need it matter whether they give any study whatever to the legislation or not? I can say to any young man in Canada who is contemplating entry into parliament that he will be grateful if when he comes into this house he finds himself on the opposition benches because there he has an opportunity to speak whenever he wishes, whereas on the other side of the house, according to the practice that prevails of ministers leading and carrying on the discussions, there is very little for private members supporting the government to do when that government has a large majority. Therefore I would say that in the interests of careful consideration of legislation, members, if they will not do it of their own accord, should be forced into the position where they must study the legislation in order that they may know how they should cast their vote when the division bell rings. I do not desire to enlarge on this point, but I think Mr. Speaker and his committee would do well to consider, if possible at this time, a further amendment to the standing orders in order that private members may be given additional freedom and additional encouragement to take a greater interest in the legislation that is presented day by day. I am sure that the effect of forcing private members into the position where they must study the legislation in order to know how to vote would go a long way toward keeping this chamber filled during the discussions and get us out of the present situation in which we are criticized for taking little or no interest in what is going on.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I may say one word in regard to the exact issue as between the proposed amendment and the present state of the rules. If hon. members will look at citation 69, on standing order 9, in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, second edition, page 25, they will see that the last part of that paragraph reads:

The practice has not been changed in Canada where every member who has heard the question put is bound to vote.

The citation in that book has not the force or sanction of a standing order, and the amendment proposed by the special committee to the house would make it a rule as part of standing order 9. If the proposed amendment is defeated, the practice of the house, according to its custom, will be exactly what it is now, but His Honour the Speaker will not have a definite rule with the sanction of a standing order to guide him in ruling when occasions arise as they did between 1930 and 1935, as those of us who were in the house then will recall, when there was uncertainty because the practice was not embodied in a standing order. That is the issue concisely and clearly. Whether the amendment is defeated or not we will still have the practice, but the Speaker will not have a definite standing order to guide him in the decisions he has to make.

Mr. STIRLING: Can the hon. member find the same wording that he quoted in the third edition of Beauchesne? I presume, if we are to be guided at all, we are to be guided by the latest edition of Beauchesne, and I am unable to find that wording in the third edition.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I was unable to find it repeated in the third edition, may I inform my hon. friend. It is only a comment of the clerk of the house and has not the force or sanction of a standing order. Any observer can make such comments as he sees fit, but they are not binding on the house. The citation quoted only indicates what the practice of this house has been, and the practice has been in force as a matter of custom, but not as a matter of law and not because of a standing order.

Mr. CARDIN: As to the observations made by the Minister of Pensions and National Health, I think I am bound to take issue with him. His argument is based on a citation on the standing orders in the book prepared by Doctor Beauchesne on the rules of the house. These marginal notes are only an indication or a recording of the practice of the house; they are a record of decisions of Speakers in the Chair, but there is no rule of the house and no standing order existent at the present moment obliging a member to register his vote. There is nothing beyond a citation which has been written out of the precedents which have prevailed in the past. But I have observed that for a number of years, five or even ten years, the practice has changed, and hon. members have been allowed to remain in their seats and not register their votes on the question. Thus a new practice has been developed which contradicts to a certain extent the marginal note referred to by the minister. At present hon. members are at liberty, according to a practice which has prevailed for several years, not to vote on a question when they feel they are not bound to do so, or when they are not convinced that it is proper or in the interests of their constituents to vote yes or no. This may happen very often on a matter of relative unimportance, upon questions which are coloured by political advantage for one party or the other. An hon. member may feel that he should not take side on an issue which is purely political and which has no other purpose than to reap some political advantage later on.

I am in favour of every member of the house being at liberty to register his vote or to refrain from registering it. The argument has been advanced that we are speaking here for our electors. It is true that each of us represents a section of the country, but it is left to the member to execute his mandate according to his own judgment. If he feels that there is no justification for his registering a vote on a question of no importance, or when, in his judgment, a case has not been made out, he should be free to refrain from doing so, and if there is any criticism to be made of his action, let the electors who sent him here make that criticism. It is not for the house; it is not, with all due respect, for the Speaker, and it is not for the government to impose upon a member an obligation to vote when according to his conscience and his judgment he feels he should not register a vote. Liberty should be preserved to the member to decide that matter for himself.

I do not like the severity of the amendment which is proposed. It seems to me that the penalty to be imposed is much too severe and too great for the offence. It is though we were to decide that a man should be hanged because he stole a bottle of whisky. The penalty is out of proportion to the offence.

I propose to vote against the amendment. It is not on account of any fear I entertain of expressing my opinion on any question which is brought before the house, or that I am afraid of expressing my views on any matter which is being discussed in public or in this chamber. I am going to vote against it because it changes a practice which has prevailed for several years, and because I want to preserve the liberty of a member to decide what he is going to do in this house and in what way he will represent the electors who have sent him here.

So much for the amendment. But it has not been made clear to me exactly what proposal we are discussing or arguing. The whole afternoon we have heard arguments against the preamble to these proposed amendments, and a very strong case has been made against the suggestions contained in the preamble. What is at present before the committee? It is a report of a special committee appointed apparently to improve the business, the deliberations of the House of Commons. That report is composed of two sections. In the first section will be found recommendations or suggestions or advices which are being given, without stating that they should be embodied in any standing order, but nevertheless suggestions which are of a very important and serious character and which, if applied, might raise sound objections and are likely to curtail the discussion in this House of Commons to a dangerous degree and prevent groups and minorities from expressing their views with regard to questions which come up for discussion here. We are told that these are only pious wishes, that they are merely suggestions; but that is a point of view expressed by those who have delivered speeches supporting the report. We have a document which has been placed before us in accordance with a motion by the Prime Minister. He moved:

> That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole to consider the report of the special committee on the revision of standing orders.

And the question being put on the said motion it was agreed to. The house accordingly resolved itself into committee of the whole on the said report, and progress having been made and reported, the committee obtained leave to consider it again at the next sitting of the house.

We are at present considering the report of the special committee appointed to revise the standing orders; and when all the amendments proposed are approved, or some of them disapproved, and you, Mr. Chariman, make your report to Mr. Speaker, you will report that the committee of the whole has been considering the report of the special committee. So that if we agree to the report made to Mr. Speaker, approving the report of the special committee, it will mean that the House of Commons has also approved the recommendations or the suggestions or advices included in the preamble of that report. You cannot separate the two things. If we do not agree about the preamble, let us advise the Chairman not to report on the report of the special committee but only on the amendments which have been considered by the committee of the whole, if such a procedure is permissible.

I think we should have some clarification of the situation so that we may know exactly what we are dealing with. Are we dealing solely with the amendments proposed, or are we dealing indirectly with the suggestions or proposals contained in the preamble of the report? This ought to be made clear. The report is rather awkward because it contains two sections which do not agree. If what is contained in the preamble is worth our consideration, why did the committee not suggest some amendments to carry out the proposals contained in the preamble? It is an indirect way of amending the rules or suggesting a method of procedure to the government with regard to the transacting of the business of the house.

I am inclined to agree that it would not be necessary to have the suggestions contained in the preamble clearly embodied as standing orders, because practically all the suggestions that are made in the preamble can be put into effect as the rules stand at present. They are suggestions that are made to the government as to procedure. But if we approve the report as it is before us at present, we approve the suggestions that the special committee has been making to the government, and we authorize the government to proceed according to these suggestions. And possibly not this government, but some other government might look upon it as a precedent and might say, if the same questions should arise later on, "Well, the procedure that we are at present following has been suggested to us by a special committee appointed to consider the standing orders, and the suggested methods of directing the debates of the House of Commons have been approved by the whole House of Commons, so that we are justified in following those suggestions now, since they constitute a precedent approved by members of the House of Commons sitting as committee of the whole."

That is why I insist upon some clarification being made of the situation and some clear indication being given to us as to what we are really voting on at the present time. I would be inclined to accept the statement that has been made, if I remember correctly, by the Minister of National Defence, that the preamble contains only the pious wishes and advice and recommendations of the committee, which the government is not bound to follow or to put into effect. But I should like to have a little more definite pronouncement that the government as a government do not accept them as a direction and do not interpret the voting of the committee on these amendments as an approval of the suggestions made in the preamble and as a direction to the government for the conduct of the business of the House of Commons. If that clarification were made there would be less difficulty in accepting or disposing of the suggested amendments.

I suggest that we need to know what is really the position and what is to become of the preamble.

Mr. NEILL: May I interrupt the hon. member. Perhaps he was not in the house when we discussed this question before, but the Chairman has ruled that it is not a preamble but a part of the report, and that makes the position worse.

Mr. CARDIN: It makes my position stronger if it is a part of the report of the committee. In dealing with it at the present time and approving the suggested amendments which we are presently discussing, we are approving that other part of the report with which so many members have expressed disagreement. That is the position I propose to take myself, and I do not hesitate to give my vote against the first amendment, having in mind that I am also opposing the suggestions that are contained in the preamble.

Mr. GLEN: Several questions have been asked this evening regarding the amendment to standing order 9. One statement was that it was not contained in Doctor Beauchesne's, third edition. The reason is this. It was not transferred from the second to the third edition because of the uncertainty of the law with regard to voting in the house. When that matter was brought before the committee I perhaps insisted more than others that some declaration should be made by this committee, because after all we were dealing with the rules of the house where corrections could be made which were necessary in the light of the experience of past years and this was the time to do it. I had it brought before me in the house the week before the first meeting of the committee. There was a vote in the house, and one hon. member asked me whether a certain member who had not voted should not be compelled to vote. I stated that I preferred not to give a decision then because the law to my mind was not clear and I did not know what powers I had to compel a member to vote, and if I did endeavour to compel him I did not know what penalty I could impose upon him if he did not vote. The result was that the question has been in a state of indecision, and it is a serious matter, because I can quite well understand that a question might be raised on some issue which was being voted upon, upon which there might be keen anxiety, and there might be considerable delay in the proceedings of the house, which might give rise to contentions that need not ensue. Consequently, when the committee considered the matter, they adopted this amendment and put it before the house. As I have already said, the committee have endeavoured as best they could to interpret what might be the wishes of the house. Hon. members have now this amendment before them and must decide what shall be the law of the house when this report is finally disposed of.

The difficulty in this matter is that if the house does not agree to the amendment, we are then placed in the same position as we were in before, with an indecisive law so far as the house is concerned, and that makes it rather difficult for a Speaker to enforce the law, supposing he is asked by the house to do so. The rejection of the amendment will mean, therefore, that we shall be back where we were before. I do not know how we can rectify that. I should like to see some declaration from the house either for or against, but if it is against then I think something should take its place. Either the member should be obliged to vote, or he should not be obliged to vote. If the house in its wisdom arrives at a decision in that regard, that is all I want; but speaking personally I do wish to have some direction from the house.

The hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) has referred to the introduction to the report. I have emphasized already that there was no intention on the part of the committee that the introduction should be considered as obliging either the government or the house to make amendments to the rules. These recommendations, as they are called, in the preamble were never intended to be recommendations which the government should implement; they were simply the thoughts in the mind of the committee at that time as to ways in which the procedure of the house might be altered in the discretion of the government and of the house. I think the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères is not correct when he says that the report as a whole will be reported by this committee to the house. What the chairman will report will be the amendments the committee has approved; it will not be the report itself. That is what was done in 1927. There was no long preamble then, but on March 22 of that year, at page 316 of the Journals, I find this:

The report of the special committee appointed to consider the advisability of revising the standing orders usually called the rules of the house, was again considered in committee of the whole, reported with amendments, considered as amended, and concurred in, on division, as follows.

There was no preamble, if it can be so called, to the report of that special committee, but in conclusion this is stated:

If the proposed changes are concurred in by the house, it will be necessary to renumber and reprint the rules. Your committee recommends that the present report be only put in force at the next session of parliament. All of which is respectfully submitted.

Rodolphe Lemieux,
Chairman.

The position will be that the chairman of this committee will report the amendments which have been moved and to which the concurrence of the house is desired. There is no question in my mind, and I think there can be none in the mind of any hon. member of this committee, that a government could possibly propose to found any legislation upon recommendations such as those referred to, especially in view of the expressions of opinion which have come from hon. members in opposition to the recommendations contained in the first part of the report. The house will simply concur or not concur, as the case may be, in the recommendations of the committee as far as the proposed amendments are concerned.

Personally I saw no necessity for the discussion that took place on the introductory portion of the report, because after all what the house has to deal with are the amendments that are being proposed to the rules of the house. These proposed amendments have been approved by the special committee; if reported by this committee and adopted by the house, they will form part of the rules of the house. The hon. member for New Westminster referred to a citation in connection with amending the rules of the house. Hon. members will realize that a citation in Doctor Beauchesne's book is of value in showing the practice that has been followed in the past, and possibly in pointing out the law, but it has not the effect of a standing order. You cannot amend a citation in Doctor Beauchesne's book, but you can amend a standing order.

The hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères requested the government to make a statement with respect to the introduction to the report and the statements contained therein, to the effect that the government disagrees with it and that it will not be considered as a precedent. The fact is that this report comes from a committee of the house, not from the government. Each member of the government is only an individual member of the house as far as this report is concerned. After the discussion which has taken place to-day, however, I am sure any future government that proposed to found any action upon the report would only have to read the pages of Hansard to know that the introduction was not considered as part of the proposed amendments to the rules.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres asked by what authority I was occupying the Chair at the present time and what sort of report would be made to the house. The authority will be seen at page 1107 of Hansard for March 3, 1944:

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to present the first and final report of the special committee appointed to assist Mr. Speaker in revising the standing orders of the house.

Hon. Ian A. Mackenzie (Minister of Pensions and National Health): With the consent of the house I move:

"That the report of Mr. Speaker for the special committee on the revision of the standing orders be referred to the committee of the whole on Tuesday next."

Motion agreed to.

This afternoon when Mr. Speaker left the Chair and the house went into committee of the whole, after calling "order" I presented the following order to the committee: "House in committee of the whole to consider certain amendments to standing orders. Standing order 9". Then I read the amendment which is now before the committee. When I make the final report on the matter now under consideration by the committee of the whole, this will be the report to Mr. Speaker: "Mr. Speaker, the committee of the whole have adopted certain proposed amendments to the standing orders of the House of Commons, and have directed me to report the same".

Mr. CARDIN: May I draw your attention to the fact that when you are reporting to the Chair a matter which has been considered in committee of the whole, you do not report that certain amendments have been considered by the committee of the whole. You report a bill that has been considered by the committee, together with the amendments that have been made in committee of the whole. In this case your power has been given under the motion of the Prime Minister on March 7 that the house proceed to take up in committee of the whole the report made to the house by the special committee. That is what is now before this committee; that is the report we are at present considering. I submit with all due respect that when you report to the Chair your report must be, "The committee has been considering the report made by the special committee appointed to consider amendments to the standing orders of the House of Commons." If you want to make a report in accordance with the motion, you must state that the committee of the whole has considered the report of the special committee; you cannot say simply, "I am reporting certain amendments." Amendments to what? Where have you taken them from? Who proposes these amendments? You have been taking these amendments from the report of the committee, so that you must present to the Chair the report of the committee, not just the amendments, which means that you must report the preamble as well as the amendments themselves.

The CHAIRMAN: I must repeat that this special committee was appointed to assist Mr. Speaker in revising the standing orders of the house. The special committee reported to the house and the report was referred to the committee of the whole, to consider and pass or amend the amendments contained in the report.

Mr. CARDIN: But that does not alter the fact that what we have before us is a report, with which we must deal in its entirety. You cannot separate one section from the other. We are considering the whole report, whatever it is.

Mrs. NIELSEN: Mr. Chairman, for the sake of the record may I say that, generally speaking, I am in agreement with the preamble as set out in the report. But definitely I wish to say I regard the amendment to standing order 9 as a detriment to the rights and privileges of private members of the House of Commons.

Generally speaking, issues which come before the house are so clear-cut that, after considerable debate members have enough information and knowledge to decide whether they wish to vote one way or another. But now and again it may so happen that even after debate a private member is not in a position, and does not have sufficient information upon a question to vote. Only once since I have been a member of the house has such an occasion arisen, and I should like to recall it. That was the time when the official opposition asked that certain documents be placed before the house. The documents had been before the war expenditures committee and had been seen by that committee in camera. I was not of the opinion that those particular documents should be brought before the house and published in a time of war. Therefore I could not vote with the opposition. Neither could I vote in support of the government, because I had not seen the documents. To have voted in support of the government would have been a blind vote. Upon that occasion, knowing that if I sat here I should vote, I went outside the chamber and did not vote.

Even if this amendment passes, and if occasion should arise when Mr. Speaker must name me, may I say that I would prefer to be named by Mr. Speaker than to vote blindly upon any measure. It is possible that such a question might not arise again for years. But it is also possible that a private member might be placed in another situation of exactly the same kind. I see no reason why a private member should be forced to vote, if that member does not have sufficient information to make it possible for him to vote according to his conscience. In the instance I have indicated I could not vote unless I saw the documents in question and read them through, and had satisfied myself that they were correct or incorrect. Neither, on the other hand, could I support the idea of having this placed before the public in a time of war.

In an instance such as that I feel that if one were controlled by an amendment such as the one now before us it would be somewhat of an indignity if Mr. Speaker should have to name me, or I should have to remove myself from the chamber. Therefore I state most emphatically that I shall vote against this amendment.

Mr. RALSTON: Following what has been said by the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres, as to the attitude of the government, may I say to him and to the committee that, assuming that the amendment now before the committee should pass—and that is all that is before the committee, in my humble opinion—so far as the government is concerned it will not regard that as an approval of anything more than is contained in that amendment.

I wish to say further, in reply to the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres, that the committee was appointed in the first place for the purpose of assisting in revising the standing orders of the house; and the preamble which my hon. friend ties on to this particular amendment has, I submit, nothing to do with the question we are now considering. The only substantive resolution before the Chair is the resolution amending standing order 9. That stands on its own feet, and is dealt with separately from anything else.

Mr. POULIOT: I move:

That the word "recommend" at line twenty of the second paragraph on page 2 of the report be stricken out, and that the word "suggest" be substituted therefor.

I note that in reading my amendment Mr. Chairman has had some difficulty. In the committee we have no stenographer to which we might dictate our amendments. I realize my handwriting is hard to read, so that I can understand the trouble he has had.

The sentence now reads:

We therefore recommend that, when the yearly estimates have been brought down, one day a week be set aside for consideration of supply.

With the amendment, the sentence would read:

We therefore suggest that, when the yearly estimates have been brought down, one day a week be set aside for consideration of supply.

That amendment is important, because it is no longer a recommendation from the committee. It is just a suggestion. I hope the leader of the house will understand that I have done my best to catch the olive branch he has offered to the committee. I have showed my good disposition, what the Prime Minister calls good will, in making the amendment. This will put everybody in a good mood, and will bring about an early settlement of the difficulty.

I have never attended any meetings of the League of Nations at Geneva, but I have tried this peace movement, this appeasement, for those who have been dissatisfied with the way in which the report was drafted.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I must say to the hon. member for Temiscouata that his amendment is out of order.

Mr. POULIOT: It may be out of order, but it is the basis of the proposed amendment. And, instead of taking out the basis of the amendment, I wanted to put a little cement in it, so that it might be in better shape than it was before. Even if my amendment is out of order, it has shown my good will.

Now, if we are about to talk about the proposed amendment, we will talk about it. How many times have I boosted parliamentary institutions in the United Kingdom! His Honour the Speaker has said that at times he has been embarrassed because we have no definite rule about the right to vote when one is sitting in the house. He has said that we have no definite law. But let us first read the first standing order of the House of Commons. It states:

In all cases not provided for hereinafter or by sessional or other orders, the usages and customs of the House of Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland as in force at the time shall be followed so far as they may be applicable to this house.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

We may now turn to page 28 of Doctor Beauchesne's book published in 1927. The second part of citation 87 which appears on page 28 reads:

A member is not obliged to vote. S.O. 29, British H. of C.

I am very sorry to have to disagree with Mr. Speaker about the matter. If the former Speaker, the Hon. Mr. Lemieux, was embarrassed about deciding this matter during the hectic session of 1926, it was due to his ignoring the fact that there was a standing order at Westminster which ruled that members were not forced to vote. I remember that Ted Garland was a member of the house at that time, as were the late Mr. Woodsworth and Mr. Bourassa, and they all decided not to vote. They were handicapped to a certain extent when they were told that it was their duty to vote. They asked to be shown the standing order by virtue of which they were bound to vote, but nobody could show it to them.

It is now suggested that we should penalize an hon. member who remains in his seat during a division, who is not hypocritical enough to want to go behind the curtain when a vote is being taken and where all he needs to do is just cover part of his body. I maintain that it is the right of a member of parliament to stay at his desk and decide whether he will vote or not. A member should have the right to remain in his seat without having to run behind the curtain. This concerns the independence of parliament. A member of parliament should not be faced with the possibility of being named by Mr. Speaker, a thing that would bring shame upon him. He should not be forced to have to run behind a curtain where he can show his face but where he must keep one-half of his body hidden. It is the most ridiculous thing on earth to state that the report could be acceptable to anyone. I have my own reasons for saying that.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. POULIOT: It is all right for the hon. member to interject during this debate because he will not have a chance to do so after the next election. The hon. member for Fraser Valley is one of those who will be defeated with a large majority.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. POULIOT: I have the floor and I do not want to be interrupted by anyone.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I rise to a question of privilege. Perhaps my hon. friend will listen to me for a minute. I did not interject.

I have listened to his nonsense and I never interjected in any way, shape or form. I was speaking to another hon. member in front of me, and I was certainly not lowering my dignity or the dignity of the house by interrupting such nonsense while we are at war.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, will you please ask the hon. member to withdraw the language he has used. I rise to a question of privilege. The hon. member has no right to say that the remarks of another hon. member are nonsense. I want your ruling on that. If you rule in favour of the hon. member for Fraser Valley, then I will use the same language about him a million times.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not believe the statement made by the hon. member for Fraser Valley is unparliamentary.

Mr. POULIOT: Then I use it a million times against the hon. member for Fraser Valley.

Mr. McCANN: This debate appears to have resolved itself into what constitutes a report. I am of opinion that what is called the introduction or what has been referred to as the preamble should constitute part of the report. Hon. members should by their votes say whether or not they are in favour of that particular part of the report. If one looks in a dictionary he will see that the definitions of "preamble" and "introduction" are much the same; they are almost synonymous terms. "Preamble" means preliminary remarks.

It states here specifically that this is the first and final report of this committee. In the report are two specific recommendations, which read in part as follows:

> We therefore recommend that, when the yearly estimates have been brought down, one day a week be set aside for consideration of supply

The next recommendation—note that the term is "recommendation", not "suggestion"—is as follows:

> Our recommendation is that, when there is reason to believe that debate will be protracted, parties and groups recognized in the house shall confer and make arrangements either for allotting days or laying any plan for saving time

What is the position? If we concur in certain recommendations which appear later on, there are still two substantial and important recommendations which will not have been dealt with and for which at some time or another there will have to be further standing orders provided. As far as the amendment to standing order 9 is concerned, I shall vote against it. I do not see why it should be obligatory upon any member of this house to vote unless he sees fit to do so. As far as I am concerned I shall be responsible to my constituents for what action I take, whether I vote or whether I withhold my vote. I suggest that it will be high time to oblige members of the house to vote, to make it obligatory that they vote, when the law of this country is that everybody shall be obliged to vote in a general election.

The position I take is that the report in its entirety should be discussed and concurred in, perhaps with some amendments. I am ready to assume the responsibility to my constituents as to whether I vote on any question that comes before the house. I can get away from that responsibility by absenting myself, but that is a poor way of doing it; that is a childish way of doing it. I submit that I should have a perfect right to exercise my own discretion and judgment and not have to face a certain penalty.

Mr. MAYBANK: I am in entire concurrence with the statement of the previous speaker that the forepart of this report could be voted upon. Furthermore, I see no harm in registering the opinion of this committee upon these two recommendations. Before the dinner recess the hon. member for Comox-Alberni was urging that they be set out specifically at the conclusion of the discussion on the other recommendations. I should have liked to see the committee agree that at the conclusion of these recommendations, or at the first if you like, we record whether this committee is in favour of these recommendations or contrariwise. We should not have had the difficulty we had this afternoon. I submit that we can very well settle the amendment to standing order 9 immediately. Surely we all have our minds made up on it. For my part I do not think it is very important one way or the other. I do not believe that most of the members of this committee think it or the two recommendations in the early part of the report merit all the debate we have had upon them.

I should like to make this suggestion to you, Mr. Chairman. There is no thought of applying closure or anything like that, but we have had a field day here this afternoon on these various proposals and also a sort of field day on a great many asides that some member or another would make, and we would then barge into a debate on them. I would appeal to you now, Mr. Chairman, that we agree to vote in due course on the two recommendations that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has so often brought to our attention this afternoon, and then let us dispose of the amendment to standing order 9 right away, and see if we cannot get one step forward before the hands of the clock move on many minutes.

Mr. KINLEY: I was pleased to hear the minister who is leading the house say a few minutes ago that the preamble or introduction was not to be considered in this committee. I was glad of that because it contains a strange doctrine to which I do not subscribe. Paragraph 2 of the committee's report reads as follows, speaking of criticisms of this house by those outside:

> These criticisms arise from opinions concerning the functions of parliament which are often based upon such misconceptions as the view that parliament is primarily a board of directors with the members of the cabinet as its executive staff, and that members, instead of endeavouring to reconcile as much as possible all the elements of public opinion, which is difficult in our diversified country, should rigidly consider every question on its own exclusive merits Such however is not the true function of a legislative body composed of 245 members elected to discuss the management of public affairs Debates may sometimes be lengthy but they bring home to the administration the advisability or unpopularity of a particular line of policy and they must be heard because democratic government rests upon public opinion. Parliament is the assembly of representatives elected by the people where great issues are debated—

'Debated", mind you.

> —or should be debated; it is not primarily a body of auditors charged with the inspection of departmental accounts. Freedom of speech is one of the inalienable privileges of members of the House of Commons.

And thus it goes on. This report by a committee of the House of Commons would reduce parliament to a debating society. Furthermore, it says:

> Mr. Speaker, from the special committee appointed to assist him in revising the standing orders of the House of Commons, presented the first and final report of the said committee, which is as follows.

Then follows the introductory part of the report which we are told now is only drapery to the main report. We are told that it has no virtue. If it has no virtue, why is it there? When we had a motion made earlier in the evening to delete that part from the report it was ruled out of order. We are told by the people who support it that it has no virtue, and we are told by the minister leading the house that it is not to be considered by this committee. Why, then, should we not delete it? That is mysterious to me. I cannot subscribe to this part of the report and for that reason I shall vote against it.

[Mr. Maybank.]

Mr. NEILL: I think the hon. member was slightly mistaken in his conception of what the hon. gentleman who is leading the house said a few moments ago. What he said in answer to the lady member was that passing of the amendment to standing order 9 in no way conveyed approval or concurrence in the earlier part of the report. The hon. gentleman behind me took that as meaning that that part of the report would not be considered at all. But the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres made it very clear that the report as a report must be adopted as such or rejected. I wish to compliment the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres upon the able way in which he expressed so well what I was saying much worse this afternoon.

The hon. member for Renfrew South made a very good suggestion. He said that he was not going to vote for this amendment to standing order 9. But a little difficulty arises there. I also agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, who made the best suggestion of all. He said that if these amendments are amendments—and they are—why not dispose of them for good or evil and let us get on. There is only one slight divergent point. I was impressed by the remarks made by Mr. Speaker. He said that there has been confusion in some places as to whether a man had or had not the right to vote.

I should like to make this suggestion, which ought to meet the whole situation and expedite the thing. Mr. Speaker gave the impression that he was not so deadly struck on putting through this amendment in its present form, but he did want a definite ruling by which he could govern himself in the days, and I hope years, which are to come. I therefore move the following amendment:

> That all the words after the word "added" in the proposed amendment be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> "A member present in the chamber when the question is finally put by Mr. Speaker shall not be obliged to vote."

That would give us a definite ruling which should satisfy the desire of Mr. Speaker for definite instructions. I think it would also meet the wishes of a large number of members, and it would also be in accordance with the rule which has prevailed in the British House of Commons for thirty-eight years. It might be said that this amendment is unnecessary, since voting against the main motion would have the same effect, but I am moving it to meet the situation envisioned by the Speaker.

The CHAIRMAN: Standing order 9 reads:

> Upon a division, the yeas and nays shall not be entered upon the minutes, unless demanded by five members.

The special committee propose the following amendment:

And every member present in the chamber when the question is finally put by Mr. Speaker shall be obliged to vote, and if he does not vote Mr. Speaker shall call upon him to vote and his name shall be recorded accordingly. If he persists in not voting he may be named by Mr. Speaker for having violated a standing order of the house.

Mr. Neill moves as an amendment to the amendment:

That all the words after "added" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"A member present in the chamber when the question is finally put by Mr. Speaker shall not be obliged to vote."

Mr. KINLEY: Before the motion is put I should like to know what is the position of the preamble at the moment.

The CHAIRMAN: That matter was discussed this afternoon when we went into committee. I made a ruling, and a general discussion was allowed on the report.

Mr. KINLEY: Moreover, Mr. Chairman, you ruled out an amendment to delete the preamble. There was a motion made to delete the preamble and you ruled that out. Subsequently, the minister who was leading the house said, I think, that the preamble was not being considered by the house and would not be part of the report.

Mr. RALSTON: If my hon. friend is referring to the passage which I think he is referring to, it was in answer to the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères, who asked for an assurance by the government that an approval or a disposition of the amendment to standing order 9 would not be regarded as an approval of the sentiments or the recommendations or the suggestions contained in the preamble, and I made the positive statement that the passing of the amendment to standing order 9 would be regarded only as an approval of that amendment in the terms in which it was set out.

Mr. KINLEY: What is the position of the preamble in the picture?

Mr. RALSTON: As I see it, if I may suggest this to the committee, there is before the committee no motion with regard to the preamble at all, but there is a definite motion before the chair that standing order 9 be amended by adding the clause which is here, and that is all that is before the committee. The committee was desirous of discussing the preamble, which contains no amendment whatever to any standing order—and I remind the committee that the special committee was appointed for the purpose of amending the standing orders, not for the purpose of making suggestions or recommendations of the kind which are contained in the preamble—but because of the fact that this amendment is the only thing which is before this committee, and not the preamble, that is the thing which I think the committee should consider.

Mr. KINLEY: Do you not think that the fact that the matter has been dealt with in the way it was gives the unanimous approval of the house to the introduction?

Mr. RALSTON: Let me make it clear that the government is taking no part in this. I am sitting back and watching the members of the house deal with the rules of the house, and I am taking just as little part in it as possible. I am glad to help if I can, but I have heard a good deal this afternoon about democracy, free speech, and things of that kind, and I think Hansard will show pretty good evidence that there has not been much restriction in that respect. Whether or not that has contributed to the effective consideration of the serious question which we have had to consider, namely the substantive recommendations in the committee's report, remains to be seen. However, as far as the government is concerned, hon. members have had a perfectly free rein in that respect, and all I have done is attempt to help if I could, to see that the rules of the house which we have at the present time and which are not amended are carried out, and hon. members are at liberty to make any such motions as they think proper if they are within the rules of the house. My own thought was that a motion regarding the preamble was not within the rules of the house, because a motion had been made by the Speaker and was put by the Chairman, a specific motion amending standing order 9. No motion is before the Chair at the present time with regard to the preamble, and I find it difficult to bring myself to think that by any stretch of the imagination, either the approving or disapproving of that amendment to standing order 9 can be regarded in any way as expressing any view one way or the other on what is set out in that preamble. It just means that it is disregarded, and that when these matters come up for consideration—and, by the way, one of them could be germane to a standing order of the house—they will have to come up, not by way of a recommendation such as we have here, but by way of an amendment to the standing orders. The one I have in mind could be related to standing order 17, which provides that when government business has precedence, government orders may be called in such sequence as the government may think fit. If the committee or anyone else wants to attempt to put into effect the suggestion or recommendation contained in that preamble with respect to the setting aside of special days for the discussion of estimates, he would have to bring forward and place in the hands of the Chairman a substantative amendment to standing order 17, and that has not been done. The preamble does nothing more than express some pious opinions as to what might be done, in the opinion of a committee of this house. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the situation is pretty clear. We have roamed over a great deal of ground, but we are back to just one thing; that is, must a member vote or may he not? That is all there is to it. The amendment suggested, if I may say so, is rather vague; it just says that hon. members shall not be obliged to vote. Somebody will say, "So what?" Supposing a question is put and no hon. member votes; what then?

Mr. STIRLING: I wonder if I may ask the hon. member for Marquette whether in his opinion this is a proper amendment.

Mr. GLEN: I have no objection to the amendment personally, for reasons I have given already, though it might have the implications of an expanded negative. The amendment merely provides that a member in the chamber at the time a vote is called shall not be obliged to register his vote. Penalties are provided in the original amendment which will be deleted if this amendment carries; and while I do think it comes somewhat near the realm of an expanded negative, yet I think it is in order. It denies the purport of the original amendment, but it adds a provision to the standing order.

The CHAIRMAN: Those in favour of the amendment will kindly say, yea.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yea.

Mr. KNOWLES: Before the vote is taken—

Some hon. MEMBERS: The vote has been taken.

Mr. KNOWLES: Before the vote is taken, in view of the fact that the more recent statements which have been made in the committee have been opposed—

Mr. McNEVIN: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I maintain that the question has been put.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

The CHAIRMAN: On the point of order, I may have been a little hasty in calling for the vote.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. KNOWLES: As I started to say, in view of the fact that the more recent statements made this evening on this subject have been in opposition to the idea of compulsory voting, I feel that I should briefly state my view, which is on the other side. As a matter of fact, it seems to me that if this amendment should carry, the last state would be worse than the first; then we would find ourselves with a standing order stating specifically that hon. members were not obliged to vote. My fear is that, as a result, in the future there would be more abstention from voting than there has been in the past.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We might not have a vote at all.

Mr. KNOWLES: As the Minister of Pensions and National Health interjects, there might be no vote at all. I see it in very simple terms. I was sent here by a constituency which has a population of some sixty or sixty-five thousand people. I am supposed to be a responsible person representing those people; I feel it my duty to give consideration to all matters that come to a vote in this house, and I feel I should be obliged to vote. I hope that the amendment will be defeated and that the main motion will carry.

While I am on my feet may I say that I shall oppose some of the other amendments that are to come before us just as vigorously as some hon. members are opposing this one. So far as this one is concerned, I feel that in the form in which the committee gave it to us it should be adopted.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am still a bit puzzled as to the point of order. As I understand the position at present, this matter is before the committee as a result of the motion of the Prime Minister that the Speaker leave the Chair for the house to go into committee to consider a report from a special committee. If that is the case I ask for your ruling, Mr. Chairman. I may be wrong in this, but it would appear to me that the extent to which we can go is either to reject that portion of the report we are dealing with or to refer it back to the committee with appropriate recommendations. If my understanding of the matter is correct, this committee has no power of its own volition to amend a committee's report that is before us in the manner in which this report is before the committee. I want a ruling on that point of order.

The CHAIRMAN: I did not clearly catch the point the hon. member was making. There is quite a bit of murmuring around me.

Mr. GRAHAM: My point of order is this. The particular matter we are discussing comes before the committee as a result of a motion of the Prime Minister that Mr. Speaker leave the Chair to permit us to go into committee to consider this report from a special committee. Has a member of this committee the right to do more than reject, to vote against the recommendations of that committee, or to move that the report be referred back to the committee for further consideration?

The CHAIRMAN: The report could be amended.

Mr. POULIOT: This is exactly what has happened before. The hon. gentleman's question refers to the proposed subamendment to standing order 9. It is exactly the same as before, when I moved to dispense with the preamble or introduction or prologue contained in the first three pages. I was told it was not before the committee; but whether any motion is made by any member of this house, whether he is Prime Minister or a backbencher, makes no difference. The committee has the right to reshape it as it sees fit. It is the rule of the majority that governs in spite of what is said in this pamphlet—may I call it that—about the rights of minorities. I am ready to submit to the rule of the majority, the majority of this committee, and I am not bound by what has been decided by a special committee. They were appointed to report to us and they have reported to us. Are we or are we not satisfied? If we are not satisfied we have a right to tell them so. We can accept what they recommend to us or we can reject or change it. We have that right and that is done by the majority. That is why I appeal to the majority of the committee to get rid of the report, not to hear any more about it, because these changes would not improve the debates in the house, but would be a source of trouble and would deprive members of the rights they have. When I think of what the hon. gentleman has said, it is a matter of great concern to all of us at the present time. It is suggested by the subamendment that members shall not be obliged to vote. That is right. But there is something else. It is the basis of that recommendation, which is the three first pages, these invisible pages, which we cannot get rid of because they do not seem to be before us. If they are the basis of the report, then they are not only the basis of this subamendment, but they are the basis of each one of the subamendments and can be discussed on each one of the subamendments. Is it not better to get rid of it right away? To show how wrong the basis was for each one of the subsequent amendments, we might as well dispense with it right away by unanimous consent and say that it is made clear that these three pages are not before the Chair at the present time.

Mr. CHURCH: After to-day's debate, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that we leave the rules alone until the rules of Hitler are beaten.

Mr. MacINNIS: I was going to suggest that the amendment is out of order since it is a direct negative, but in view of the fact that you have accepted it, Mr. Chairman, and said that it is in order, all I can say is that it is about as crazy an amendment as I have ever heard of, because we are sent to this house to carry on the business of the country; the business of the country is decided by the votes of the members and all that the amendment says is that although we are sent here to carry on the affairs of the nation, we need not do so when we come here.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): A reductio ad absurdum.

Mr. MacINNIS: What I was going to say might not be parliamentary, but we have here a good demonstration of about as nice a filibuster as I have seen in a long time to prevent anything being done.

Mr. WOOD: I feel it would be my duty to vote against this amendment. We have frowned upon the apathy of the public in not registering their votes, and it would be a good example to the public if they could say that even members of parliament are not obliged to vote. In consequence of that I am going to vote against the amendment.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Call it eleven o'clock.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned until Thursday at three o'clock p.m., pursuant to special order made Monday, February 21, 1944.

Thursday, April 27 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

GRAIN

STATEMENT RESPECTING GOVERNMENT MARKETING AND PRICE POLICY

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I desire at this time to make a brief statement in connection with some aspects of the 1944-45 grain policy.

The house will recall that last September a major change was made in wheat policy and a basis was established, effective until July 31, 1945, which of course includes the full crop year 1944-45. At that time the fixed initial price of wheat was increased to $1.25 per bushel for No. 1 northern wheat in store, Fort William, Port Arthur or Vancouver. This fixed initial price will be in effect for the coming crop year.

In regard to the wheat policy for 1944-45, the government has yet to determine the quantity of wheat which will be marketable in that crop year. Members will recall that for 1943-44 the limitation was first placed at fourteen bushels per authorized acre and was later increased to eighteen bushels per authorized acre—the understanding being that about 280,000,000 bushels of wheat would be marketable in western Canada during the present crop year.

The government is not prepared at the moment to state the exact quantity of wheat which will be marketable in the coming crop year, owing to the uncertainties of the growing crop and uncertainty in respect to the volume of transportation which will be available for the movement of grains in 1944-45. In establishing the basis of marketings for the coming crop year, which will be announced at a later date, the government will take into account probable domestic and export demand in 1944-45 as well as the volume of grain which the railroads and elevators can handle during the crop year.

I can say at this time that the demand for grain both in Canada and for export is now running at very high levels and that the volume of wheat which will be marketable in 1944-45 will be considerably larger than the limitation in effect during the past two crop years.

I might refer briefly to the present grain position. Accumulated stocks of wheat are moving rapidly into consumption here and abroad and the main problem to-day is meeting demand with the transportation which is available for the movement of grain. It is estimated that the carry-over of wheat next July will amount to about 330,000,000 bushels as compared to over 600,000,000 bushels last July. Given adequate transportation the crop year 1944-45 will see our wheat stocks reduced to a nominal figure. Oats and barley are in good demand and there will be no difficulty in disposing of surpluses from the 1944 crop. The expansion in the acreage seeded to these grains in recent years has been more than justified by marketings and the Department of Agriculture is urging that seeding of at least as great an acreage as in 1944.

The government's policy in regard to oats and barley for 1944-45 will be the same as in 1943-44. Minimum prices for these grains will be guaranteed on the same basis as in 1943-44. Equalization funds will again operate and the government will make advance payments free from the equalization funds at the time of delivery. The advance payments are ten cents per bushel for oats and fifteen cents per bushel for barley.

The government has already announced that there will be a guaranteed price for flax of $2.75 per bushel for No. 1 CW flax, basis in store Fort William and Port Arthur or Vancouver. This represents an increase of twenty-five cents per bushel over the guaranteed price in effect in 1943-44.

Respecting sunflower seed and rape seed the government's policy for the 1944-45 crop year is to continue in effect the prices for these seeds established for the 1943-44 season. That is to say, the Canadian wheat board will be authorized to pay five cents per pound for sunflower seed and six cents per pound for rape seed, delivered f.o.b. shipping points to be designated by the board for the top grades.

Mr. DONNELLY: The minister mentioned a quota for wheat of eighteen bushels per acre. Can he tell us the quotas for oats and barley?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): At the present time the quotas are open.

Mr. PERLEY: The minister has announced prices for all grains for 1944. Does that mean that this is to take the place of the proposed bill to establish floor prices?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): This has nothing to do with the legislation concerning floor prices which will be introduced by the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. WRIGHT: Has the government considered increasing the premium on malting barley?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): There is nothing on that point to be announced now.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): How soon does the minister expect to be able to announce what the actual quota will be for the 1944-45 crop?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): That matter has been the subject of a great deal of consideration, and it is receiving consideration at the present time. I cannot say now just when any definite announcement will be made.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The quota will naturally affect the amount of grain which the farmer will want to store.

Note.—The terms "permanent" and "temporary," as applicable to answers 4 and 5, are given the same meaning as in the civil service regulations.

WEATHER ANNOUNCEMENTS—NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. Are the restrictions regarding announcing the weather still in effect in New Brunswick?

2. If so, why?

Mr. LaFLECHE:

1. They are still in effect.

2. Because this information would be of benefit to the enemy.

EXPORTS OF SPRUCE AND POPLAR PULPWOOD

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. What quantity of spruce and poplar pulpwood was exported from the province of Ontario to the United States during the years 1942, 1943 and 1944?

2. At what price per cord was this wood sold?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. Pulpwood originating in Ontario and exported to the United States was as follows:

[Mr. W. C. MacDonald.]

	Calendar Year		To Mar. 31,
	1942	1943	1944
Spruce (rough cords)...	636,278	491,039	29,198
Poplar (rough cords)...	155,112	129,367	28,137
Jack pine (rough cords)...	125,915	34,030	2,453
	917,305	654,436	59,788

2. This information is not available. The prices paid by United States customers for Ontario pulpwood are not covered by Canadian price ceiling regulations and are the result of negotiations between the supplier and the purchaser.

AIR RAID PRECAUTIONS—NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. Does the A.R.P. still function in New Brunswick?

2. If so, who is the director in New Brunswick?

3. How many blackouts were ordered in New Brunswick in 1943-44?

4. By whom were the blackouts ordered?

5. What was the cost of A.R.P. in New Brunswick, M.D. No. 7?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre):

1. Yes.

2. The chairman of the provincial civil defence (A.R.P.) committee of New Brunswick is Hon. J. B. McNair, K.C., premier and attorney-general of the province. The director of civil defence for New Brunswick is D. L. Maclaren, Esq., Saint John, N.B.

3. Two province-wide and twenty-seven local or area blackouts.

4. By the chairman of the provincial civil defence (A.R.P.) committee, under powers delegated to him by the Minister of Pensions and National Health under authority of regulation 35, defence of Canada regulations.

5. The cost to the dominion government of A.R.P. in New Brunswick during the fiscal year 1943-44 was as follows: Cash grant to province to meet costs of administration of civil defence (A.R.P.), $39,210.

Special equipment and supplies (including fire-fighting equipment, medical and first aid equipment and supplies, anti-gas protective clothing and equipment, and personal equipment for civil defence workers), the estimated total cost of which is $103,193.40, was issued on loan to the New Brunswick provincial civil defence committee for re-issue on loan to local civil defence committees in municipalities and districts in which civil defence organizations have been established. This equipment remains the property of the dominion government and is subject to recall.

TROOPS RETURNING FROM OVERSEAS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What is being done within Canada to notify in advance next-of-kin of the arrival home of wounded soldiers and those on leave from overseas?
2. Will some change be made in the "troop movement rule" now existing to enable next-of-kin to meet them at the station on arival home, as in the last war?
3. Are arrangements being considered for the loan of military bands at depot, and any available motor vehicles to aid civil power taking them home on arrival?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): I referred the hon. member for Broadview to answers which had been made by the Minister of National Defence to similar questions. Therefore, I ask that his question be dropped.

Question dropped.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT BOARD—KENNETH ZINCK

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. Is Mr. Kenneth Zinck, formerly of Lunenburg, Nova Scotia, employed by the government or by the soldiers' settlement board, with office at Kentville, Nova Scotia?
2. If so, (a) for what period was he employed; (b) what is his yearly salary; (c) what were his expenses to March 31, 1944; (d) what duties does he perform; (e) what are his qualifications; (f) by whom was he recommended?

Mr. CRERAR:

1. Yes, employed by Soldier Settlement and Veterans' Land Act.

2. (a) Appointed April 3, 1944.

(b) $1,620 per annum, plus $221.04 cost of living bonus.

(c) Nil; answered by (a).

(d) Field supervision of settlers in a designated area; collections; leases; investigations and reports as required.

(e) Long practical farming experience; experience as land appraiser with Canadian Farm Loan Board; qualified veterinary; returned soldier war 1914-18.

R.C.A.F.—WOMEN'S DIVISION—TUNICS

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. Were certain tunics for the members of the women's division of the Royal Canadian Air Force discarded since the declaration of war?
2. If so, when, and why?
3. What is the quantity of such tunics, and the cost of each?
4. Who was awarded the contract for the manufacturing of such tunics?
5. What amount has been paid to such contractor by the government, to date?

6. Were such tunics subsequently used by one or several cadet corps of the Royal Canadian Air Force?
7. If so, why?
8. Were the contractors ordered to refund to the government the money and material losses suffered by the government in connection with these tunics?
9. In these tunics were there any manufacturing defects which rendered them unfit for use by the Canadian air force women?
10. If so, what were such defects?

Mr. MACMILLAN:

1. No. The design of the uniform was changed but all tunics of the old design are still being issued for station wear. Each airwoman is issued with two blue uniforms. Since the change in design, one of old design, and one new has been issued. The old design is for station use, the new for walking out.

No uniforms have been discarded except after full period of wear.

2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9 and 10. Not applicable.

LIEUT.-COLONEL GRAHAM ELLIOTT

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Is it to the knowledge of the government that Lieut.-Colonel Graham Elliott, chief instructor at A-21, C.O.C.T.C., Barriefield, from the spring of 1943 to the following November, has said publicly and repeatedly at Barriefield: "This government (meaning the dominion government) is rotten. We should have conscription"?
2. Was he ever on any theatre of war and, if so, where, and how long?
3. Did he come from the war office?
4. Where is he now?
5. Are officers in His Majesty's forces in Canada allowed to use such language as mentioned in No. 1?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax):

1. No.

2. Record not available.

3. Lt.-Col. A. G. Elliott is an officer of the British army on loan to the Canadian army as an instructor.

4. In the United Kingdom acting as chief instructor at No. 1 Canadian ordnance reinforcement unit.

5. Officers are not debarred from expressing their personal opinions on public matters in private conversations.

HOUSING—TORONTO

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Did the government receive a deputation of the mayor, controllers and aldermen of Toronto this week regarding the housing situation?
2. What action will be taken to provide houses in Toronto for, (a) soldiers' families; (b) civilians?
3. What reply was given to the deputation, and will any action on their request be announced, and when?

[Mr. Lacombe.]

Mr. ABBOTT:

1. Yes.

2 and 3. The following letter signed by the Minister of Finance was sent to the mayor of Toronto:

"The city clerk's letter of April 19, 1944, transmitting the text of a resolution of the Toronto board of control, as well as the supplementary representations made to me and to my colleague, Mr. Howe, have been carefully considered.

I must advise you that the government has come to the conclusion that no change can be made in the policy announced nearly a month ago and reiterated on several recent occasions. As indicated in the previous statements referred to, the government feels that the wartime prices and trade board has gone to the limit in imposing restrictions on the ordinary rights of an owner to obtain possession of his property.

Dealing with the specific proposal contained in the resolution adopted by the board of control, this proposal would place upon the wartime prices and trade board a responsibility which it should not assume and which it is not equipped to discharge.

Moreover, I question whether any county court judge should be asked to decide as to the respective needs of landlord and tenant in particular instances, and I would fear that the enactment of an order in council such as has been suggested would result in the courts being overburdened with applications by tenants—some good, some bad—which it would be quite impossible to dispose of within the period contemplated in the resolution.

As to the other recommendations contained in the resolution concerning the provision of low-cost housing, while this does not affect the immediate problem of possible evictions on May 1, these recommendations are being given most careful consideration."

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

NATURALIZATION

Mr. HANSELL:

1. How many persons have been naturalized since the commencement of hostilities?
2. What was their nationality, and the number of each?

Mr. McLARTY: Return tabled.

2. What were the rank and duties of the said n.c.o.s and officers on each one of the above-mentioned dates?
3. What was the total number of, (a) officers; (b) n.c.o.s, and (c) men at that training centre on each one of the above-mentioned dates?
4. Who were, (a) the commanding officers; (b) the second in command; (c) the chief instructor, and (d) the senior French instructor, if any, of that training centre since September 1, 1942, and for what period?
5. What were, (a) the birthplace; (b) age; (c) military record of the officers referred to in No. 4, and (d) what was the technical experience of the chief instructors and of the senior French instructor?
6. Was the said commanding officer absent from that training centre in 1943, and if so, from when to when?
7. Who was the chief instructor during that period?
8. Did the said chief instructor recommend one or several new establishments, and if so, (a) what were they, and (b) upon what grounds did he recommend them?
9. Were such new establishments approved and ordered by the G.H.Q.?
10. If so, was the minister, or the associate minister, or an acting minister in charge of the Department of National Defence when the said new establishments were, (a) approved, and (b) ordered?

11. On each one of the dates referred to in No. 1, how many men, and how many French-speaking men were assigned to G.D. and that training centre?

12. What was done for the coordination of technical courses in French at that centre since September, 1942?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): This will be subject to the usual reservations as to the disclosure of confidential information.

3. How long have they resided in Canada?

4. How long have they been employed in postal censorship?

5. What are their respective salaries?

CANADIAN ARMY—OFFICERS RETURNED FROM OVERSEAS

Mr. HAZEN:

1. How many officers serving in the Canadian army overseas have been returned to Canada with a recommendation that they be discharged and not further employed, or with a recommendation of a similar nature?

2. What was the rank of each of these officers?

3. On what grounds were these recommendations made, and how many officers have been returned on each of these grounds?

4. In how many cases have the recommendations been acted upon?

TEST DRILLINGS FOR OIL

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Has the government provided financial assistance to persons or companies to aid them in carrying on geological surveys or test drillings for oil?

2. If so, in what provinces are surveys and test drillings being made; what persons or companies are doing the work; what are the terms of the agreements under which the work is being done; how much has been paid to each of these persons or companies to date?

3. In what areas, if any, have the surveys and drillings been completed, and what have been the results in these cases?

[Mr. Pouliot.]

DUNDURN MILITARY CAMP

Mr. BENCE:

1. What officers who were stationed at Dundurn military camp on January 1, 1944, are being retired from the armed services?

2. Why are they being so retired?

3. What are the ages of such officers, and how long has each been a member of the armed services in this war?

4. Which of said officers were engaged in the armed services of Canada or her allies in the war of 1914-18?

5. Have such officers been replaced, and what are the names, ranks and ages of such replacement officers?

6. Which of such replacement officers have served overseas in this war?

7. Which of such replacement officers were overseas in the war of 1914-18?

NAVY AND AIR FORCE PERSONNEL RETURNING FROM OVERSEAS—REGULATIONS AS TO REPORTING

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Are the members of the Royal Canadian Air Force and of the Royal Canadian Navy arriving on leave in Canada or discharged from overseas allowed to go direct to their homes without first reporting at Ottawa?

2. What are the rules of these two services in this connection?

ALLOWANCES TO EX-SERVICE MEN

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What is being done on this the forty-seventh day of the session as to increase allowances for civilian clothing of ex-service men honourably discharged from the forces after serving overseas, for soldiers, sailors and airmen, beyond $65?

2. What amount of cash in addition to a grant for clothing is given to them?

ROBERT MITCHELL PLANT, SAINT LAURENT, QUE.

Mr. RAYMOND:

1. On the 1st March, 1944, who were the male employees appointed to inspect production at the Robert Mitchell plant, Saint Laurent, Quebec, on behalf of the inspection board of United Kingdom and Canada?

2. On the 1st April, 1944, who were the male employees appointed to inspect production at the Robert Mitchell plant, Saint Laurent, Quebec, on behalf of the inspection board of United Kingdom and Canada?

3. From the 1st March to the 1st April, 1944, did the general controller of the inspection board of United Kingdom and Canada, or his representative in Montreal, dismiss male employees appointed to inspect production at the Robert Mitchell plant, Saint Laurent, Quebec?

4. If so, (a) at what date were any or all such male employees dismissed; (b) have any or all such dismissals taken place following complaints received or made to the knowledge of the general controller or his representative in Montreal on the ground of misconduct; (c) if any of such employees have been dismissed for misconduct, what are these acts of misconduct; (d) what are the names of the dismissed employees, and their address?

HOUSING

SITUATION IN TORONTO AND ELSEWHERE—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), the adjournment of the house to discuss a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the urgent need of houses in the city of Toronto and other places in Canada and for the purpose of calling the attention of the government to the urgent need of immediate emergency measures relating thereto.

Mr. SPEAKER: Under standing order 31 a member has leave to make a motion for the adjournment of the house after the ordinary daily routine of business has been concluded and before notices of motions or orders of the day are entered upon. The ordinary daily routine of business has been concluded and we are now on another order—questions. The hon. member will have to present his motion on another occasion, since we have passed the stage where a motion for leave to adjourn the house can be made.

Mr. CHURCH: With great respect I would point out to Your Honour that there has been no substantive motion made in the house this session on the question of housing. Questions have been asked, and all that, but there has been no substantive motion moved on the subject.

Mr. SPEAKER: Standing order 31 reads as follows:

> Leave to make a motion for the adjournment of the house (when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance) must be asked after the ordinary daily routine of business (standing order 15) has been concluded and before notices of motions or orders of the day are entered upon.

We have already concluded routine proceedings and are dealing with questions.

Mr. CHURCH: I understand that such a motion can be made up to the time the orders of the day are called.

Mr. SPEAKER: Routine proceedings under standing order 15, which is referred to in standing order 31, are dealt with in standing order 15 as follows:

> (1) Mr. Speaker shall read prayers every day at the meeting of the house before any business is entered upon.
> (2) The ordinary daily routine of business in the house shall be as follows:
> Presenting reports by standing and special committees.
> Introduction of bills.
>
> First readings of Senate bills.
> (3) The order of business for the consideration of the house, day by day, after the daily routine, shall be as follows:

Then follows the business with which the house may deal.

Mr. CHURCH: This morning I gave notice of my motion to Your Honour and to the acting head of the government and the leader of the opposition and others. As I read the rules, Mr. Speaker, a motion of this kind can be made after the daily routine of business has been concluded and before the orders of the day are called.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member will look further at what business can be taken up after routine proceedings on Thursday, private members' day, he will find, at page 7, "Questions." We dealt with questions after the routine proceedings had been completed. I am sorry, but the hon. member will have to present his motion on another day.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I make one observation with the consent of Your Honour? This is a matter of urgent importance—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not want to have to call for the protection of the Speaker, whose consent I received to make an observation. I do not want to be interrupted. I will sit down for the Speaker but for no one else.

Mr. SPEAKER: The position I have to take is in conformity with the standing orders. But when the leader of the opposition wishes to make an observation with regard to what I have said, I am always glad to listen to him because I do not want to do any injustice. In the circumstances there can be no question as to what our standing orders and routine proceedings are, and the fact that the hon. member for Broadview omitted to notice what is stated by standing order 31—

Mr. GRAYDON: I will bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, if I cannot say another thing, but the one thing I wanted to bring to your attention, and which I think should be brought to your attention at this time—

Mr. CHURCH: May I ask what your ruling is, Mr. Speaker? Have you ruled the motion out of order?

Mr. SPEAKER: I have ruled that the hon. member has not conformed to the standing orders of the house which I have read. Under standing order 31 a motion for the adjournment of the house can be made immediately after the routine proceedings of the house have been dealt with and before any other matter of business has been entered upon. I therefore say that the hon. member is not in order.

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to appeal from your ruling, Mr. Speaker. I think there is an appeal under our procedure.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am afraid that I must take the position that I was not deciding a point of order. I was simply pointing out what the rules are. They are clearly set forth, and I think there can be no difficulty about that. I was not dealing with a point of order.

Mr. GRAYDON: Would the Speaker ask for the consent of the house for the motion to be made?

Mr. CHURCH: We wasted six hours discussing the rules of this house on Tuesday.

Mr. SPEAKER: There may be objection to the suggestion of the leader of the opposition. The remedy is for the hon. member for Broadview to present his motion to-morrow.

Mr. CHURCH: That ruling has never been given before since I have been in the house. It has always been possible to ask for leave to make a motion for the adjournment of the house on the orders of the day.

MONTREAL—INQUIRY WITH RESPECT TO USE OF BUNGALOWS FROM CLOSED AIR TRAINING CAMPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. FRED ROSE (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct the following question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the government's refusal to freeze leases temporarily, would the minister consider the possibility of installing in Montreal and vicinity, bungalows from closed air training camps as a means of immediate alleviation of Montreal's housing crisis, pending the commencement of a low rental housing scheme?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I am not sure whether the hon. member has directed his question to the Minister of National Defence or to myself. His question related to military bungalows, did it?

Mr. ROSE: That is right.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know whether it would be possible or not. I will have to bring the question to the attention of my colleague.

EVICTIONS ON MAY 1—POSSIBILITY OF STAY OF PROCEEDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Out of the 1,155 families who must move on Monday, May 1, there will be many applications to the local county court judges for ejectment under the Overholding Tenancy Act. Will the Minister of Finance instruct the housing officials in Toronto, who will be summoned before the learned county court judges, to tell the judge that they have been asked to request a stay of proceedings for one month, as they can do?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY Minister of Fnance): I could not give such an undertaking as that. It occurs to me if the city authorities wish to do that there is nothing to prevent them from doing so. I do not even say they should do it, but certainly it would be stepping well beyond our accustomed jurisdiction to make representations of the kind to any county court judge.

Mr. CHURCH: Could not the minister request his own officials there to act in the way I suggested? Could not he ask the Toronto federal housing officials summoned before the county court judge on these eviction notices to take the action I have suggested?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like an answer to the question. Could not the officials ask the judge for a month's delay?

Mr. ILSLEY: I answered the question the first time the hon. member asked it. As I suggested before, there is nothing to prevent the municipal authorities, who are more directly concerned with this matter, and who know the conditions, from making any representations they wish to the county court judges. In my judgment it certainly would not be appropriate for the officials of the housing administration at Ottawa to make such representations.

Mr. CHURCH: The housing officials here said the tenants were too choosy—"too choosy," when there are no houses left to be choosy about!

CANADIAN ARMY

QUESTIONNAIRE TO HOME DEFENCE TROOPS AS TO ATTESTATION FOR OVERSEAS SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have before me a questionnaire in reference to which I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. This questionnaire is being circulated to-day among the various home defence units by officers apparently authorized by National Defence headquarters. In the questionnaire the various personnel are asked whether they will sign active, whether their family has been affected adversely or advantageously by the war, whether a civil job is held open for them after the war, whether they would consider signing active if service guaranteed under French-speaking officers and N.C.O.'s, and whether they have any other reason for not signing active. The questions I desire to ask arise in connection with that questionnaire and also in connection with the statement made the other day by General Pearkes, V.C. Have instructions gone forth from National Defence headquarters that officers of the various units are to interview their personnel with a view to inducing or coercing them to enlist for overseas service? Have instructions been given to these officers to advise the men that unless fifty per cent of them are secured for active service, conscription for overseas service will be put into effect, and generally what is the situation with respect to reinforcements for the army overseas? These are matters which I think are urgent, having regard to recent statements that have been made.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to take the usual course and ask for time in which to answer the question asked by my hon. friend. This is the first I have heard of the questionnaire to which he refers. I have nothing to say with regard to the questionnaire; I presume it is being circulated by officers who desire to get that information, which I am sure would be very useful to the Department of National Defence.

The hon. member asks whether any instructions have gone forward for officers to interview personnel in the units with a view to inducing them or "coercing" them—I think that was the word he used—to enlist for overseas service, or with a view to threatening that if more than fifty per cent did not enlist for overseas service, conscription would be introduced. I want to say to my hon. friend and to the house that two or three weeks ago a meeting was held of the officers commanding the different districts for the purpose of discussing the matter of recruiting. The house knows, I presume—I have indicated this to the house previously—the sources from which overseas personnel come. They are the general service personnel in the units in Canada; the N.R.M.A. personnel in the units who may volunteer for general service; the general service personnel in the training centres, and those who are recruited from time to time. It was thought highly advisable that the army should do its duty with regard to the raising and maintaining of the volunteer army overseas of which Canada is exceedingly proud; and I have not heard anyone in this house or anywhere else suggest that the volunteer army was not a desirable thing. I have indicated repeatedly that I prefer a voluntary army, and I think most Canadians will agree with me. In that connection the army has its duty to maintain, if it can, that volunteer army; and for that purpose the army has engaged in recruiting activities for the last three years. The activities which are referred to or which are implied in the questionnaire to which my hon. friend has referred I presume are the result of the conferences which have been held. No such questionnaire was authorized in express terms, but I do not repudiate it, nor do I see anything whatever wrong in it. The same sort of questionnaire might well be circulated to anyone who was being asked to subscribe for victory bonds. Persuasion is being used in Canada at the present time by way of meetings, by bringing very prominent people here, by way generally of persuading people to subscribe their money for a good three per cent security. It seems to me that the army is not only entitled to see to it, but it is the duty of the army to see to it, that the needs of the volunteer army are put before the people of Canada in exactly the same way. That is being done and will be done; and when my hon. friend uses the word "coerce" he uses a word which is not only unauthorized but is totally unjustified in any shape or form.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is plenty of coercion.

Mr. RALSTON: I want to say to my hon. friend that I know of no coercion. I do not desire to cast any reflection at all upon the war loan campaign, but I say to my hon. friend that I do not think any inducement or any effort is being put forward in connection with recruiting that is comparable to the effort being put forward by citizens of this country to endeavour to induce and persuade their fellow citizens to subscribe their money. I make no apology whatever for asking men to enlist in the service, and I deprecate more than I can say the attempt which has been made to disparage recruiting activities in Canada. There has been a constant effort to do that. Only the other day the suggestion was made that because a great soldier went out west and addressed the soldiers there, indicating what the needs of the army were and what had been his experiences overseas, he was being humiliated. No such suggestion is made when great people come here and tell us of the need for money, and try to influence us to buy bonds. That is regarded as in every way desirable; we attend these meetings and rallies. But recruiting seems to be something which must be disparaged, and I can only think it must be because there is some sort of fetish on the part of some people for conscription. The objective is not to get men for the army; the objective is to get men, provided you get them by conscription; and I want to say that with these people it seems to be the method rather than the result which is important.

The army proposes to keep right straight on in connection with its recruiting activities. Right here and now I want to thank the citizens of this country who have helped so valiantly in connection with recruiting all over Canada, and I am going to ask those citizens to keep on, and not to be disconcerted in any way by the efforts which are being made in some quarters to suggest that recruiting activity is something in which it is unworthy to engage. That is all I have to say in answer to my hon. friend's question.

PRESS REPORT AS TO FORMATION OF VOLUNTEER BRIGADE OF 6TH DIVISION FOR OVERSEAS SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): On April 24 I directed a question to the Minister of National Defence which the minister will find at page 2283 of Hansard, and which reads as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Department of National Defence. A Canadian Press dispatch from Vancouver, published in Ottawa this morning, states that an attempt is being made to raise a volunteer brigade from the troops of the 6th division, which is composed largely of home defence troops, and that this brigade is to be sent to one of the fighting fronts. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) is out of the city to-day, I understand, but I would ask that the house be given a statement in regard to this matter to-morrow.

In reply to that question the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) said:

> We will take the question as a notice, Mr. Speaker, and I will advise the Minister of National Defence.

Could the minister make a statement to-day in reply to that question?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Certainly. This question is along the same lines as the question to which I replied a few moments ago. In connection with the army's activities with respect to a volunteer army, I have told the house repeatedly that from time to time we withdraw general service personnel from the units in Canada in order that they may go overseas. In this particular instance the general officer commanding out west suggested that instead of withdrawing the general service personnel from the units and sending them overseas, it might be possible that quite a number of N.R.M.A. men in the units would volunteer if the unit could go overseas as such, without any undertaking that the unit would be preserved as a unit after getting overseas. That matter was taken up and discussed, with the result that the general officer commanding, General Pearkes, V.C., and his officers undertook to put the matter before the men of the units. The result was that in the particular units themselves, in which were included something like 2,700 N.R.M.A. men, some twenty-six per cent, or more than 700 N.R.M.A. men volunteered. In addition, about 400 N.R.M.A. soldiers, from other units in the Pacific command, volunteered, making about 1,100 N.R.M.A. personnel who volunteered in that way.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Over what period?

Mr. RALSTON: Oh, I would say two or three weeks, or something like that; just a very short time. The result is that a certain number of these units will proceed overseas as units. I may add that as time goes on other units will be selected along similar lines as and when the situation permits.

Mr. CHURCH: Do I understand the minister to indicate that it is not now necessary to pass such an order in council?

Mr. RALSTON: I am indicating to my hon. friend that what we are doing is getting volunteers along the lines which I have suggested, and in addition to that I may say that about 3,000 men a month are volunteering. That is in addition to the men who are on general service personnel who are being withdrawn. I hope my hon. friend will not be disappointed at that.

Mr. GREEN: Arising out of the statement made by the minister in answer to my question, are we to take it that there has been a change with regard to the policy of sending units overseas? The minister said on February 14, as reported at page 462 of Hansard:

> Canada has reached the peak so far as the sending of new capital units overseas is concerned. A year ago we took that stand, and that policy was endorsed by this house. The suggestion has been made to me that I am simply crazy to build up the army, that the army overseas is big enough now.

I take it from the statement to-day that the policy is being changed. May I also ask whether there is any question of a change in the general policy of the government with regard to the use of men called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act? I ask that question because General Pearkes, in his statement to the troops at Vernon, is quoted in press dispatches of April 21 as using these words:

The decision has been reached by the government—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member has laid a sufficient foundation for his question to enable the minister to give an answer.

Mr. GREEN: It is simply a matter of completing the question.

Mr. RALSTON: It is not a supplementary question, but I will answer it. My hon. friend asks whether or not there is any change in policy with regard to what I said on February 14 in reference to the increasing of the size of the army overseas. The expression which the hon. gentleman read to me was that we had reached the peak so far as sending units overseas is concerned.

An hon. MEMBER: Tactical units.

Mr. RALSTON: Perhaps that is unfortunately put—

Mr. GREEN: Capital units.

Mr. RALSTON: —but he will see from the context later that what I was leading up to was that it was not expected to have an increase in the number of units overseas, that is to say, in the capital of the Canadian army overseas. What I have said does not indicate any change in that policy. I may say that from time to time units have been sent over. Sometimes they have been sent over and have replaced other units overseas, and at other times the personnel of these units have been posted for purposes of reinforcement or for reserves, but there is no change in the policy I referred to when I said that an increase in the units of the Canadian army overseas may be expected.

Mr. GREEN: The other part of the question was—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. RALSTON: Will my hon. friend give notice?

Mr. GREEN: I also asked the minister at the same time whether we were to take it that there was any change in the general policy with regard to the use of men called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act.

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. GREEN: He did not answer that.

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): There never was a policy.

FLYING ACCIDENT IN MONTREAL

INQUIRY AS TO THE HOLDING OF AN INVESTIGATION AND THE PAYMENT OF COMPENSATION FOR DAMAGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the hon. the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power). Is an investigation now being held on the terrible accident that occurred in Montreal on Tuesday last, when a bomber crashed in the heart of the city, and will the government take action with a view to compensating the people who have suffered damage?

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of National Defence for Air) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I have had no notice of that question, but I have seen in the papers, this morning, that the Montreal coroner has just opened an investigation on that accident. In the second place, an investigation is also being held by the R.A.F. in Montreal, at the headquarters of Aviation District No. 3; it is presided over by an officer of the R.A.F. and Aviation Inspector Blondeau, of the Department of Transport, and Squadron Leader Gobeil, of the R.C.A.F., are attending it. We are now considering whether those two investigations will be sufficient to satisfy the public and the government. If we find, as a result of an inquiry which is now under way, that it would be desirable to pursue an investigation more extensive than those that are now going on, the government will take a decision and inform the house.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power). I believe it comes within the jurisdiction of his department. May I inquire of him whether a board of inquiry has been set up in connection with the Liberator bomber crash which occurred on Tuesday? I was attempting to follow his answer to the previous speaker and I gathered, from my faulty interpretation of his answer, that perhaps my question was somewhat different from that asked by the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe). I should like to know whether or not a board of inquiry has begun its investigation and whether or not that investigation is being carried on under the auspices of the Royal Air Force and of the minister's department.

Mr. POWER: I am sorry that my faulty French was such that my hon. friend could not understand it. I answered the very same question in French a few moments ago. The fact of the matter is, as the house well knows, that this was an aircraft belonging to the United Kingdom government and was being ferried across by R.A.F. ferry command. An inquiry is now being held in Montreal under R.A.F. auspices.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): R.A.F.?

Mr. POWER: Yes. It is being held in No. 3 Command, R.C.A.F. headquarters. Associated with the inquiry are Mr. Blondeau, of the civilian transport department, Canadian, and Squadron Leader Gobeil, of the R.C.A.F. There is also being carried on at the moment, I read in the newspapers, a coroner's investigation. We are considering whether or not these inquiries will be sufficient to satisfy public opinion and to reveal all the facts that should be disclosed. It may be that we shall decide to set up a board of inquiry under R.C.A.F. auspices, and should that be the case the public will be advised.

WAR MATERIALS

INCREASE IN CANADIAN SHELL PRODUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): May I direct a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply? Will he kindly amplify the interview he gave the press, as reported on Tuesday last, in connection with the stepping-up of Canadian shell production, so that the house may have full information with respect to plans for increased production in certain lines of war materials?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): The interview referred to was hardly a press interview. It was simply a question as to the accuracy of a newspaper article. I may say, however, that we are stepping up the production of heavy ammunition at the present time. In the early days of the war we had a large capacity for heavy ammunition. In time it was found that supplies in hand were adequate for that particular time and about two thirds of the capacity was closed. The tempo of the war is now at a higher pitch. The requirements are therefore larger and we are opening all the capacity that we ever had in this country for the production of heavy ammunition.

Mr. GRAYDON: From the press reports I would not gather that the explosive industries are being opened up as yet.

Mr. HOWE: The explosive industries are stepping up correspondingly. The two plants now in production will operate at full capacity. Whether or not production will be required from the plant at Nobel, which was closed, is a matter of doubt at the present time. There may be some small production required from there but it is not certain at the moment. The shell filling plants will also run at full capacity.

HIGHWAYS

PAN-AMERICAN CONGRESS IN PERU, JULY 15-25

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. On March 2, 1944, at page 1053 of Hansard I asked the following question:

> Has Canada accepted the invitation of Peru to send representatives to the fifth Pan-American highways congress to be held July 15-25? If so, who will represent Canada at this congress?

The Prime Minister said that no official invitation had been received. I have since been informed by a very reliable party—and I know the information is correct—that some days ago the government received an official invitation. Can the minister now tell the house if Canada will accept the invitation, and if so, how many representatives will be going down there? As I understand it, Peru wishes as many delegates from Canada as possible. Who will those representatives be?

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Transport): The matter is still under consideration. As soon as a decision has been arrived at it will be made known.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Monday, April 24, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette. in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL WAR SERVICES

Corps of (civilian) Canadian fire fighters for United Kingdom, $744,905.

Mr. CHURCH: This question of firemen from Canada in the United Kingdom was up last year about a month after the minister took charge of the department—I think it was July. At that time the minister said he was going to look into it and make some changes, owing to the fact that the civilian fire fighters of England were assuming their regular duties and that the raids were few and far between. I appreciate what the firemen have done. I have some letters here from firemen who served overseas. I shall send them to the minister. One of them is from a fireman living at Billings avenue in Toronto in the constituency of the hon. member for Greenwood. This fireman has just returned from England. He points out that there is really nothing for them to do there. He says they are doing nothing in the line of fire duty as the regular fire services in England are looking after all the little bombings that are going on. The corps of Canadians in Southampton and Bristol have never been in a raid, according to this fireman. He never saw one while he was there, and he was there for two years. He says on March 10, 1943, he moved to Portsmouth and they had one small raid on August 16 of that year. He says that the group at Plymouth have had a little action. They are looking after their own camps and fields in England. He refers me to the fire chiefs of two large cities of Canada, one in western Ontario and the other in Halifax. He refers also to two officers in the Toronto fire department. He is asking for further information.

I appreciate what the minister has done in reducing the item. It has been reduced from $957,850 to $744,905. Are these firemen overseas working actively? There are practically no raids. The raids have been eliminated. Firemen may have been necessary in the first and second years of the war during the battles of London, Coventry and Cardiff. But because of the way the raids have been reduced surely we do not need three-quarters of a million dollars in the estimates to cover this item when some of the firemen have returned home. When fire departments in the mother country are going back to their civil occupations, why should we have a large staff over there, when men are needed in Canada and in the forces overseas? After all is said and done we must not forget that wars are won by soldiers, sailors and airmen at the scene of combat. The same applies to firemen; they must work at the scenes of fires. That is where they are needed. They are not needed at home when men are required in the army. Dear knows where we will be when the time for invasion comes.

As I have said, the time has come when we should give some consideration to the municipalities. Sitting here as a committee we should reduce the item by two-thirds. I believe good work was done over there by a splendid body of men. They learned a great deal about fighting fires. We know there was a time when Canada might have been invaded, because the enemy was pretty close to our shores.

In passing may I compliment the minister. I had much to do with him during the last war and I found him always to be an obliging official. Last session when we were talking about salvage he said he would look into the matter, with the intention of possibly reducing it.

The question now arises as to whether those men are or are not needed over there.

Hon. L. R. LaFLECHE (Minister of National War Services): I would remind the committee that a request for Canadian firefighters was made by the British government, and they were sent by the Canadian government in response to that request. At that time there was no question of our troops leaving the British isles. In those days the British isles were strictly on the defensive, and behind those defences preparations were being made to do what we hope may soon be done successfully. Up to now there have been tens of thousands of people in the national fire service devoting their time to preparing defences against enemy raids, and particularly defences against incendiaries. Our very brave fire fighters, each a volunteer, have been stationed in dangerous centres. They have been in raids—thank heaven only a very few have suffered from the effects of enemy bombing. But they stand on duty over there, and do suffer the monotonies connected therewith. We know that wherever we find a group of men who are not actively engaged against the enemy each day, or almost each day, they suffer from monotony. But so do the firemen in fire halls who stand by to save our dwellings and business places here at home.

May I point out that there has been a reduction of $212,945 in the vote. It is necessary to make provision for all the services, pay and allowances, lodgings, travelling expenses and everything else for that body of men, not knowing how long it will be necessary to keep the corps in the British isles. It was seriously considered during the early part of last winter whether the corps would be left in England. After taking the best possible advice, including the considered opinions of British fire fighting authorities and the British government, it was decided to leave them there. I believe those in England who gave us the benefit of their advice, knowledge and recommendations anticipated what we believe will take place shortly, when our army moves against the enemy, let us say on the continent of Europe.

We have had an intimation that possibly the imperial force, the national fire service of Great Britain, will offer an opportunity to some of the members of our corps to join them in certain extra duties which possibly would take them beyond the British isles. That matter is receiving attention to-day. No decision has been taken, because we have not all the information. I bring the matter to the attention of the committee because, there again, it may be that Canada will go along in the vanguard of the invading forces, in the defence of all we hold dear.

If the war ends quickly the corps will be brought back as quickly as possible. If the raids over Great Britain continue it will be extremely difficult indeed to bring them back until we have reached safety. That is the situation in regard to the corps overseas. I have had the very best reports about them—their lodgings, their meals, their equipment, and their clothing. I am extremely happy to say that upon reading the reports which come to us, the conduct and discipline indicated therein show that members of the corps honour it, by their very good conduct, and thereby have gained esteem in the eyes of their neighbours in Great Britain. Hardly an offence worth mentioning has been lodged against any member of the corps.

May I repeat that I sympathize with men who must sit and wait until the enemy comes over to bomb them.

Mr. LOCKHART: Have there been no definite transfers of men who went over with the corps? A letter which came to me yesterday indicates that transfers have been made. One man, I know, became tired of the monotonous life and, upon application, was transferred.

Mr. LaFLECHE: A small number have volunteered for Canada's fighting forces, and several have gone with the auxiliary services.

Mr. GREEN: How many are there remaining in Great Britain?

Mr. LaFLECHE: There are 362.

Mr. GREEN: How many went over?

[Mr. LaFleche.]

Mr. LaFLECHE: In all, 417 were recruited. Only one is deceased, and his death was due to an accident over there. His widow is pensioned.

Mr. COLDWELL: Where is the reduction in the amount? I must say I disagree sharply with the hon. member for Broadview. I receive numerous letters from London, the west of England and some from Yorkshire, and I know from recent letters that bombings in the last couple of months have been pretty bad. Many thousands of incendiaries have been dropped on some of the larger centres mentioned by the hon. member. I was just wondering what were the reasons for this reduction. I agree with the minister who said that while many of these men must of necessity be posted at points where conditions are monotonous, you cannot tell where a bomb is going to fall. At any moment they may be invaluable to the local community. Those of us who have visited the old country know that there are places which are under almost constant bombing. The hon. member for Parry Sound is in his place and he will remember that we visited one city which is seldom mentioned as having been bombed to any extent but which in fact was one of the worst-bombed places that we saw. Before I approve what the hon. member for Broadview has suggested, that this vote be reduced by two-thirds, I would want to be assured that there is a good and valid reason for any reduction that has been made already.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I shall compare the items in this vote with the vote of last year, and then I shall have another word to say about the necessity of keeping the corps together until we know more about the results of what lies ahead. There is a very definite connection between the two.

The items are:

	This year	Last year
Salaries	$ 2,220	$ 2,850
Pay	370,000	395,000
Subsistence allowance	116,330	250,000
Dependents' allowance	150,000	172,000
Clothing and equipment	65,000	100,000
Medical care and hospitalization	9,500	9,500
Transportation	25,500	15,000
Printing and stationery	1,000	3,000
Miscellaneous	5,000	10,000
Cost of living bonus	325	430
Unemployment insurance	30	70

The reduction in the pay item is brought about by the reduction in the force. Last year we provided for 400 men, and this year we are providing for 362 men, all ranks. The pay item of $370,000 is worked out by the financial officers. They know how many men of all ranks they must provide for, for 365 days. This is the figure. The subsistence allowance is calculated for the full year and is in accordance with the number of persons to be provided for. This covers the cost of food and lodging. I have it on the best authority that these men have an excellent table. They are provided with the regular rations which can be improved with proper care and preparation. They are lodged in very comfortable buildings and they have upon them the benevolent eye of their fellow firemen in the national fire service.

Some items of equipment were issued when the corps was set up and they need not be renewed, but clothing must be renewed regularly. Up to date we have authorized, as it became necessary in the eyes of the commanding and other responsible officers of the corps overseas, two and one half issues of clothing. The original clothing was purchased in Canada because the men were here. At a moderate cost each member of the corps was provided with a semi-fitting uniform which was then fitted to him by competent tailors. The same practice is being followed in England, and this corps is able to present an extremely smart appearance without its costing more than it should. The amount of $65,000 is considered sufficient to provide the necessary new shoes and clothing and equipment to the members of the corps.

The increase of $10,500 in the item for transportation reflects to some extent the possibility of bringing back to Canada a number of these men, but, as I have explained already, circumstances which have been inquired into very carefully tell us that they should remain there because they are badly needed. These are gallant men and I am certain they do not want to come home until they have done their full job.

Mr. COLDWELL: I did not catch the reduction in personnel overseas which the minister gave.

Mr. LaFLECHE: There has been a reduction of 38.

Mr. COLDWELL: How did that occur? Were men returned to Canada or transferred to other services? I know that one man died.

Mr. LaFLECHE: The reduction in personnel has been quite gradual. Casualties are always to be expected for one reason or another. All the reasons mentioned by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar can be offered for the reduction. Unfortunately one man was killed. The physical condition of others has deteriorated overseas, but this occurs in all groups of men.

Mr. LOCKHART: Some have been brought home?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Yes.

Mr. LOCKHART: How many?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Since the beginning there have been discharged or struck off strength a total of 60 men. Twelve were discharged in Canada before the corps proceeded overseas; one died overseas; ten were discharged overseas in order to join active or auxiliary services, and thirty-seven were returned to Canada for discharge.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, after the blitz in London, there was a campaign in Canada to send firemen's ladders to Great Britain. While that campaign was on, a firemen's convention was held in a United States city, which the fire chief of a Canadian city attended, and there he had a talk with the fire chief of that United States city and spoke about this campaign for ladders to be shipped to Britain. To his great surprise he learned that that very city had called for tenders for new firemen's ladders and that the lowest tender had come from Great Britain. That showed that the British people were not so much excited over the blitz that they were forgetting trade. They were asking us to ship them ladders and at the same time were offering to sell ladders at the cheapest price to that city in the United States. That I think is a lesson for all of us that we should not forget during the war.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I listened to the hon. member for Broadview and I cannot find myself in accord with him. He stated that the bombing of Britain had ceased. I think probably, Mr. Chairman, we are taking too much for granted. The bombings may have ceased for the time being, but I do not think we should take for granted that the bombings have permanently ceased. Too often in Canada we are apt to feel that the war is getting away from us, too far away. I feel that we are very much in this war, just as much to-day as ever we were, and we are still a long way from winning it. It is possible that there may still be very heavy bombings of Great Britain.

I was glad the other day, Mr. Chairman, to hear the minister say that he hoped that the members of this fire fighting force would in time be entitled to the same benefits as the men who served in the armed forces. I do trust that such a regulation will soon be put into effect. These men went to Britain when there were heavy bombings and offered their lives in the protection of the persons and property of the people of that country, and they are entitled to the same benefits as the men who served in the armed forces.

There is one thing I should like to bring to the attention of the committee as a matter of interest, and that is that when this fire fighting force was being organized the government looked over Canada for the best fire fighting chief in the country to head the force. Hon. members will be interested to know that in addition to selecting expert firemen from Brantford, the man who commanded that force, took it over to Britain and is still in command of it was the chief of the fire department of the city of Brantford.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mr. Chairman, I have not heard anyone speak of what must have been the good effect on the morale of the people of England, if their morale could possibly have been improved, of the landing over there of firemen from Canada to assist them in putting out fires caused by bombings if they occurred. I am glad to hear that the fires did not occur to the extent that had been anticipated, but that would not be any argument against sending the fire fighters over, because had another big blitz occurred our men would have been there to help put the fires out.

While the hon. member for Brantford City takes great credit for his city in the fact that the chief of this fire fighting force was selected from Brantford—it was an honour to his city, and I have no doubt that the chief was an expert fire fighter—I am happy to say that a very large number of the personnel of that force were recruited from Toronto. The fire fighters who went from Toronto, like those who were selected from other cities in Canada —because I am not going to claim more credit for Toronto than anywhere else—were all experienced and expert fire fighters. I have no doubt that all these selections were made because of the men's ability and experience in fighting fires. I knew quite a number of them who left Toronto to go over to Britain, and to my knowledge they were the very best men that could be sent.

Mr. LaFLECHE: My hon. friend will be interested to know that fifty-six came from Toronto.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am proud to hear that fifty-six enlisted from Toronto. Whoever was responsible for recruiting that fire fighting force to aid the old country, which had gone through so much, deserves a great deal of credit for the formation of this force which consisted of the very cream of the fire fighters of Canada.

[Mr. W. R. Macdonald.]

Mr. GREEN: When the estimates of the minister were up on the last occasion, a number of questions were asked which he could not answer at the time, and he promised to bring down the information when next his estimates were up. One of the questions had to do with the possibility of men in the hospitals in Great Britain, in the Mediterranean, and in Canada, getting the benefit of these educational courses. I pointed out that my information was that the courses were not readily available to the men in hospitals, and I thought some improvement should be made in that regard. Is the minister prepared to make any statement to-day?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I should have explained before we began consideration of this item to-day that the Canadian Legion educational courses may be arranged for members of the services. But if they are not begun before the men have been discharged from the army—

Mr. GREEN: They may not begin?

Mr. LaFLECHE: No, that has not yet been arranged. It is under consideration. But the courses may be completed after a man has been discharged. I have been advised that the men in hospitals overseas and here in Canada can have these courses, and it is desired that they should have them. The matter has been brought to the attention of the Department of Pensions and National Health and of the educational officers of the Canadian Legion. There was seemingly some misapprehension—but my departmental officials since we met last Monday have taken the matter up with these other authorities who are in very close contact with the men. My opinion is that these educational courses should be made available to all the men. Already nearly 200,000 members of the forces have enrolled in these courses. It may be that my hon. friend has in mind an odd case, or a few cases, perhaps in some isolated spot. But we have brought the matter to the attention of the other authorities and, as I say, I am all in favour of these courses being made available to all the men.

Mr. GREEN: I think that these courses should be made available to all the men in the forces. But the minister says that a man who has been discharged from the army cannot get these courses. As the minister knows, when these men are discharged from the army and go into a pensions hospital, they become charges of the pension department, and apparently under the present regulations they cannot take a course at that time. There is great need for facilities being provided to enable the man who is in a pensions hospital to get the benefit of these educational courses. He is there wounded, or perhaps ill, and he has more time to study than he would have on active service with the navy, the army or the air force. There is great need for these courses to be provided for these men. I am told definitely by people who have visited one of the Pensions and National Health hospitals that the men are not getting the courses, certainly not to any great extent. They are very much concerned about it, and would be greatly interested in getting them. I suggest that this comes under the minister, who should see to it that the necessary arrangements are made with the Department of Pensions and National Health for the men in these big hospitals to have the full benefit of the educational courses. Has the minister taken any steps to see that this is made possible?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I am afraid my hon. friend did not follow me when I said that men in civilian hospitals, after being discharged from the forces, may have the courses.

Mr. GREEN: You said "may not."

Mr. LaFLECHE: Just a moment; they may have the courses if they took them up before they were discharged from the army.

Mr. GREEN: But that does not meet all cases.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Just a moment, please. Then a short time ago I added that we have again taken up the matter of allowing a man to begin a course after he has been discharged and is in a Pensions and National Health hospital. I may add that to my knowledge this situation has been under discussion with the competent authorities for at least two or three months, because we want these courses given to all the boys who desire them, whether before discharge or while in hospital following discharge. We believe in these educational courses; we think they are good for the boys. Therefore we have tried—and have not found any opposition—to open up a demand for these educational courses. This educational programme began, I would remind the committee, as something for the troops while in uniform; but as the war goes on men are discharged and are kept in hospital, and these courses are good for them. So that we are doing exactly what the hon. gentleman said would be a good thing.

Mr. GREEN: You are not doing it yet; you are trying to do it.

Mr. LaFLECHE: We are trying to popularize it.

Mr. GREEN: What are the obstacles to getting such courses started in these hospitals? Why have they not been made available before this?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I do not know. I explained earlier when we were on this item that my department fills requisitions made upon it by the defence departments. Naturally this is for men in uniform, but men are no longer under the Department of National Defence after they have been discharged. Of our own accord we have tried to follow this into another department, and discussions are going on in order to see whether the boys will want the courses and whether the departments can make the necessary arrangements to that end. Everybody is for it.

Mr. GREEN: Will that include handicraft and art courses?

Mr. LaFLECHE: They have those in the hospitals now.

Mr. GREEN: Then may we take it that these educational courses will be made available to men in the Pensions and National Health hospitals within a short time?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Yes, most assuredly, so far as the Department of National War Services is concerned.

Mr. GREEN: What about the Department of Pensions and National Health?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I cannot answer for that department, as my hon. friend knows.

Mr. GREEN: But it is a government responsibility.

Mr. LaFLECHE: While a matter is under discussion between two departments it is too early to announce any decision. I have told my hon. friend very carefully what we are trying to do; now let him wait.

Mr. GREEN: I do not mind waiting, but the men concerned should not be kept waiting.

Mr. LOCKHART: I am keenly interested in the matter which has been brought up by the hon. member for Vancouver South, but without interrupting his line of thought or the minister's answers I should like to return to the matter under discussion previously, that is, the corps of civilian fire fighters overseas, in order to ask a further question. Apparently the minister is expecting these men to remain over there now. I want to associate myself with all the good things that have been said about them. Casualties of one kind or another have been suffered by some of these men, and I should like to know what is done for their families. What would be done for the family of a fire fighter overseas who became totally incapacitated, or eventually died, as the result of some injury?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I am happy to be able to tell the hon. member for Lincoln that if death occurs the family is pensioned.

Mr. LOCKHART: On the same basis as the family of a member of the overseas forces?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Under the same act. They are under the Pension Act; that is the whole situation in a word.

Mr. LOCKHART: Then if I may follow that up, eligibility for pension is worked out on exactly the same basis as in connection with soldiers who serve overseas?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Yes. If injury is suffered while on service overseas, the man is eligible for pension. As I said a moment ago the widow of one member of the corps, who was killed in an accident in Great Britain, is being pensioned.

Mr. LOCKHART: Does the Canadian pension commission deal with these applications?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Yes, in precisely the same way as it deals with other applications.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to say a word about these fire fighters. As I understand it, the minister is not responsible for this programme; he took it over from another minister last July. These are trained firemen whom we have sent overseas, but in many cases they are not needed there. The other day I received a letter from a fireman just back from England, in which he gave a list of the cities which said they did not need any help; they included Southampton, Bristol, Plymouth, and others. The fire fighters belonging to those cities have done the work, while, he says, the men we have sent over have not been asked to help at all. Then I should like to know where these men come from, by provinces. There is a third point. In a return brought down the other day it was stated that the loss from fire in army, navy and air force camps in Canada since the beginning of the war has amounted to about $4,500,000, with practically no insurance except what may have been taken out by a few contractors. As I said the other day, this war is a changing war; it changes from week to week, month to month and year to year, and in my opinion the need for Canadian firemen in Great Britain has practically vanished. If they should be needed there, let them stay, but in view of the letters I have received and the conversations I have had with some of the men who have returned, I do not believe they are needed any further in England. These men in their letters have said that they have little or nothing to do over there, and they might as well have been at home in Canada.

In this connection there is something I cannot understand at all. We have the army, the navy and the air force in Britain; they are on the job twenty-four hours a day, and they get no holidays. Right next door to them are these Canadian fire fighters, many of whom have very little to do and some of whom are given leave to come back home for a holiday. Some of the men in the forces have been over there for going on five years, but they have been given no holidays at all. The minister is a military man himself, having had a long and able career in the army, and he knows that civilian firemen receive some military drill and physical training, and he knows that under any modern fire chief there are competent instructors, so that altogether these men are hardy and quite fit for military duty. I have received, in the letter to which I referred, information that in four or five Canadian cities the chief thinks the work in England is over for these men, and I am led to believe that the men overseas, if they are kept there, should be transferred to the army. They should form as a fire unit and be a part of the army if they are to be of any use in Great Britain. I suggest that as a fire-fighting unit they should form a part of the army of invasion if we are to keep them there. We are spending three-quarters of a million on them and I fail to see the use of it. If it were necessary I would not say a word; I would go for it one hundred per cent. As matters stand, however, I do not believe it is necessary and I suggest that we should have some further explanation. The fire departments throughout Canada have suffered very considerably from a depletion of their forces. Firemen are needed in all our cities and towns because in many cases the new men are not as well equipped to fight fires as those who have had years of experience. There may be some merit in the retention of the men in their present capacity if they are to take part in a reconstruction programme in Britain, but so far we have not heard whether their duties will include the rebuilding of cities that have been bombed over there.

We wish to give the minister every encouragement in his work, and our criticism is intended to be constructive, but I suggest that this item should be cut down and as many of the men as possible drafted into the army as a fire unit. They should be transferred from the minister's department to the army. I understand that the civilian firemen in Great Britain are able to cope with the work they are called upon to do.

Mr. LaFLECHE: May I reassure the hon. member that if the corps is still in England it is there because the authorities there, after studying the question very carefully at our request, reported that it was necessary that they should remain there. The events of the near future may change the situation entirely, but at the moment I am quite satisfied that it is necessary that the corps should remain where they are, doing the work in which they are at present engaged until events take their course and we can see a little further into the future.

Mr. MARSHALL: The majority will agree with the minister, I think, when he says that these fire fighters have a definite place to fill in the work in Great Britain. As he said, this request came from the British government, and so far as our information goes now that request still stands. There are one or two questions I should like to ask the minister. The auditor general's report for the year ended March 31, 1943, states that each member discharged for medical unfitness or other cause, after 183 days' service, receives a clothing allowance of $35. It is my understanding that the men of the fire fighting corps have the same status as the men in the various branches of the fighting service. If that is so I cannot quite understand why the clothing allowance for these men should be as low as $35. Why is it not $65? Is this an old regulation, and has there been a change since?

Mr. LaFLECHE: The hon. member has replied to his own question. He was reading from a report made at a time when the clothing allowance in the armed forces was $35. It was raised to $65 and it has been similarly increased in the case of members of the fire fighting corps.

Mr. MARSHALL: There is another question. There seems to be a difference of opinion between the auditor general on the one hand and the Minister of National War Services on the other with respect to the collection of income tax from members of the corps. On page 58 of the auditor general's report the statement appears that the minister instructed the comptroller of the treasury that these taxes should not be collected from members of the force. I wish the minister would enlarge on that and say whether or not authority has been given, by way of order in council for example, to exempt those men who are overseas from the provisions of the income tax act.

Mr. LaFLECHE: The auditor general's report from which the hon. member is reading is presumably up to March 31, 1943, a year ago. From the very beginning there was some difficulty about income tax. There has been of course a difficulty in that regard in other cases as well. From a very early date the matter was taken up with the competent authorities of other departments and recommendations were made that the members of the corps be not subject to income tax while overseas. As yet that has not been finally decided in their favour. By arrangement at the time of the report mentioned by my hon. friend, it was decided that the paymaster should not make the deduction. At present the point is again being taken up with the competent authorities. The great difficulty is that the Canadian corps is a civilian corps, not a military one. I even thought of giving them a status which would have been a military status, but we encountered difficulties there. It was not possible to do so. That would have solved that rather small problem, but it was not possible to do that. We then went back to the other authorities and we are still discussing the merits of the recommendations I have made on more than one occasion, namely, that income tax be not applied in the case of these men once they are overseas.

Mr. KNOWLES: On that point may I suggest to the minister that he look up what was done by the government in connection with the men who went to Kiska last summer. He is probably familiar with it anyway. According to the strict wording of the Income War Tax Act as amended last year, those men were taxed at the rate of fifty per cent while they were at Kiska. Following representations on the matter in the house the government decided to change the situation and did so by order in council. I suggest to the minister that he might use what was done in that case as an argument to support him in what he is trying to do for these men.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I am grateful for the suggestion.

Mr. KNOWLES: To follow the matter up I offer it as a suggestion.

Mr. LaFLECHE: We are using it, but again the position of the corps is not that of the units which went to Kiska. They were military units; the fire fighters are not. Nevertheless it is up to our department to bring it to a finality. We have to tell them finally "yes" or "no," and we are doing our very best to put the members of this corps upon the same footing in that respect as the members of the military corps.

Mr. KNOWLES: As a further suggestion, may I point out it seems possible to do marvellous and wonderful things by order in council. For example, the order in council to which I refer read this way, if I recall it correctly: "For income tax purposes Kiska shall be regarded as outside the western hemisphere." As the minister knows, the phrase "for purposes of" so-and-so creeps into many orders in council. It does seem to me the minister should use that argument in this way: For income tax purposes these men may be considered as members of the military forces.

Mr. LaFLECHE: That argument is being used, and I think I used the best argument of all, namely, that these boys who went overseas went into an area of at least as great danger as did the members of any of the armed forces. For my own satisfaction I cannot find any better argument than that. I have used it and I am going to keep on using it.

Mr. GREEN: The auxiliary service groups do not get complete exemption from income tax. Why is that?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I do not know. I cannot answer for what happens in another department. In a sense they have been given a military status and it is on that score that they receive the benefit. I attempted to attain that status for the members of the fire fighting corps but was unable to do so. Earlier this afternoon I said something about the possibility of some members of the corps being given an opportunity to go beyond the British isles presumably in the not distant future. So far as I am concerned I will not want them to go unless the matter under discussion is settled in their favour. Unfortunately if they go they will go as members of a civilian corps. I assure the committee the particular matter of military status or otherwise is the dividing point, or has been found to be the dividing point, and indeed a very high partition has been set up which we have not been able to hurdle in favour of these boys up to now.

Mr. GREEN: Why is there a difference in the case of the men in the auxiliary services?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Because the others have a semi-military status.

Mr. GREEN: Why do they not get complete exemption as do the men in the army?

[Mr. LaFleche.]

Mr. LaFLECHE: I am not fully aware of the reason myself. They accompany the armies. I told a glorious story the other day of some supervisors of the auxiliary services putting their supplies of comforts in tanks. Those tanks were placed in ships and shipped to Sicily. The comforts were removed from the tanks and the tanks went on as fighting units. The auxiliary services took their cigarettes and chocolates and other things and went ashore for the comfort of our fighters.

Mr. GRAYDON: I presume the civilian corps of Canadian fire fighters take their places in some organization of United Kingdom fire fighters with like duties. If that is so, is there a distinction between the military and the fire fighters in so far as income tax in Great Britain is concerned? I have an idea that may have a bearing on the point. Has the minister made any inquiries in that regard?

Mr. LaFLECHE: In England the equivalent of our fire fighters corps is known as the national fire service. That definitely is a civilian corps. I happen to know that whatever may be projected over there in the distant future these men will maintain their status of a civilian corps. The workings of the income tax in Great Britain are different from what they are here. I cannot answer that part of my hon. friend's question.

Mr. GRAYDON: There would be this distinction and difference: the Canadian fire fighters who go over are sent overseas. The national service in Britain would be at home. Because of that I fancy our men would have a greater moral claim to exemption from the income tax provisions.

Mr. LaFLECHE: May I express thanks for the support I have received in this matter.

Mr. MARSHALL: The minister has repeated on a number of occasions during the last few minutes that this is a civilian corps. I would deduce from that that little hope arises for these men getting very much consideration with reference to the matter of income tax. Yet from his own statement one learns that the comptroller of the treasury has been ordered not to collect taxes from these men. It would appear to me there is going to be trouble ahead unless some action is taken to clear up the matter, and clear it up very soon. It would not be a very pleasant thing for these men to be faced with the payment of at least two years' taxes if it is discovered that the Minister of National War Services cannot assist them. Would it not be better to collect the taxes and hold them until the point is decided one way or the other upon an official basis? From the way it is being done now, it looks to me as if there are going to be breakers ahead.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I hope it will not come to what the hon. member for Camrose has stated. Instructions have not been given. But an understanding had been arrived at with the treasury officials, which took place before the date of the report mentioned by my hon. friend, in which it was tacitly agreed by all concerned that they would await a final decision in this matter. While I have not the figures here, the fact is that in nearly all cases the amount of income tax is not great. The department will continue to try to find relief for these men.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Do they live in barracks or are they boarded out?

Mr. LaFLECHE: They live in barracks. They are comfortably put up and, through their own exertions and care, they have a very good table.

Mr. MacNICOL: Firemen who have gone from Canada to Great Britain will learn something over there about fire-fighting under difficult conditions, and will have experiences which they might not have in Canada. It would seem that when they return they would be even better qualified to put out fires in this country. So that their training over there will have been worth while.

Mr. LaFLECHE: The hon. member is quite right. While there is a certain amount of monotony, owing to their having to wait for the enemy to come, it is not that way all the time. Members of the corps are continually being sent to training schools in the British isles operated by the national fire service. I am pleased to report that the performance of members of our corps at such schools has been very good indeed. They learn about that which has to do with fighting fires under conditions prevailing in the British isles, taking into consideration incendiary bombs, the possibility of asphyxiating gases, and they have to be familiar with making rescues at sea. I would expect to see future chiefs of Canadian fire brigades drawn from members of this corps.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: What are the hurdles which have prevented the minister's department for more than two years from arriving at a satisfactory solution of this simple problem?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I assure the hon. member it is not a simple problem, because it might run into many spheres of the civilian side of war activities. A favourable decision would have to come from the Minister of National Revenue. But he cannot make his recommendation offhand, since he must take many factors into consideration. For instance, the relief recently given to supervisors of auxiliary services was under consideration for a very considerable time.

Mr. GREEN: Too long.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Perhaps. But due care and attention must be paid when something of that kind is undertaken. The action taken is hardly ever limited to the particular field one may have under survey at the moment.

Item agreed to.

Committee on cooperation in Canadian citizenship, $46,367.

Mr. POULIOT: I have two or three questions to ask. First I would ask for a detailed account of the item.

Mr. LaFLECHE: That section of the Department of National War Services known as the committee on cooperation in Canadian citizenship had approved for it last year a total of $18,347, while this year the amount asked for is $46,367. The estimate is made up as follows:

Salaries	$33,892
Cost of living bonus	1,100
Unemployment insurance	75
Travelling expenses	10,000
Printing and stationery	300
Miscellaneous	1,000

It may be known to only a few that this section has suffered in a most noteworthy manner, in fact has suffered as no other organization of which I have known, from the crippling effects of illness and indisposition among the small membership of the staff. Each member of the staff has at one time or another been off work with what was certified to by a doctor as an ailment sufficient to put the employee on the shelf for the time being. The aims and objects of the branch are very high. They have to do with helping newcomers to Canadian citizenship to become better Canadian citizens. The aim is somewhat idealistic, but I have always felt that there is a definite place for it, and that people who come to live here should be assisted as much as possible.

I am certain it is not known that the recommendation was made to me, as minister, that this branch be done away with. I kept it on—nursed it, if you like—because I have always felt that we have to have some such organization. The past work of the branch has run pretty much on a level until recently.

It has always done about the same thing; in fact, I do not think a graph would show much deviation.

Recently, however, it has been possible to obtain the services of a gentleman who, in my opinion and that of others, is highly qualified. I believe he will be able to lift up this work to that high level I believe it should occupy. I refer to Doctor Robert England, who has accepted a civil service certificate appointment to come to Ottawa to do this work. He will stay here for a few months, during which time I am sure that, not only will this branch show renewed strength, but its work will develop and become greater. So that we may have the extra staff required, I ask for an increase of $24,280 in the salaries item.

Mr. STIRLING: What does it actually do?

Mr. LaFLECHE: It keeps in touch with groups of what are known as new Canadians. These are people who come from other lands to settle in Canada. My hon. friend knows there are many such persons. They are to be found everywhere. An attempt is being made to make these people feel at home.

Mr. STIRLING: How is the work carried out?

Mr. LaFLECHE: By personal contact at meetings of these persons, and by keeping in touch with the editors of what are known as the foreign language newspapers. Different matters touching on Canadian citizenship are brought to the attention of these people wherever possible through their own publications.

Mr. POULIOT: Might we have the amounts paid to these employees?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Will the minister also state the number of employees there are this year? Last year there were four.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Five, with Doctor England, and we are increasing the staff. Last year Mr. Tracey Phillips received $4,392, and Doctor Kay, a foreign language newswriter, $3,000.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): That has been jumped by $500 this year.

Mr. LaFLECHE: On the recommendation of the civil service commission. There was an editorial assistant at $2,400, which is an increase. There was a stenographer at $1,200. Those are the four for last year. For this year there is a director at $4,500; one research assistant at $3,600; a liaison officer with the foreign language press, $3,000; a liaison officer with the English and French press, $3,000; one editor at $2,800; two readers at $1,920, and two stenographers at $1,080.

Mr. GREEN: Are the present personnel being retained?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Yes, and there will be additions this year. As I see the picture, it is necessary to add to the staff. It was recommended that I disband this section, but I could not see my way clear to do so. I think we owe it to these newcomers to carry on this cooperation in this way.

Mr. POULIOT: Some hon. members have complained about bureaucracy. Last year this item was $18,000 and this year it is $46,367, almost twice as much. Time marches on, bureaucracy marches on. Doctor England is employed to teach something that is non-existent, Canadian citizenship. We have been told that our nation is the equal of any nation in the world, but the fact is that we are just colonials. I have been criticized many times because I told the truth, because I did not want to feed people with words to make them believe that they were more important than they were. We have heard much about the progress that has been achieved by the enactment of the statute of Westminster, but that is just bunk. Mr. Chaloult, provincial member for Lotbinière, has been arrested because he has expressed his feelings in public. If there are people who are called ultra-nationals in the province of Quebec, it is because some people have given more importance to the statute of Westminster than it deserves.

Over the radio we hear a silly programme called, "Metairie Rancourt". There are imperialists who want to have the union jack as our flag. That is their business, and that is our flag at the present time. Some people are for having a Canadian flag. I think the matter deserves consideration. But the fact is that our national flag is now the union jack, and we are the only country in the British empire without a national flag. We are asked to provide money to promote cooperation in Canadian citizenship. What is this for? Is it to put in the minds of the people who listen to the radio the idea that there is a Canadian flag?

As I say, I listened to a programme over the C.B.C. called, "Metairie Rancourt". I do not know who wrote this nor do I know how much was paid for it. I intend to quote from this programme in English as well as in French so that it may be understood by those who are bilingual as well as by those who are not. I had never heard of this programme before, but it was supposed to be a father talking to his children and telling them, "Nous avons notre drapeau, notre drapeau, c'est le drapeau fleur délisé". I have not the proper translation of that, but in effect he was saying that we have a flag, that this is our flag, that this is the old French flag. That was what was going out over the national network. Someone was trying to fool the people who were listening to that programme. I object to that sort of thing most strenuously.

What we should do to have Canadian citizenship is a change in our passports; they should refer to us as Canadian citizens instead of British. But the minister would never dare to suggest that, and there are very few members who would dare to suggest it. Why talk of Canadian citizenship when we are still British citizens? I am not ashamed of being a British subject, but I would be prouder if I were a Canadian subject, if I were respected throughout the world as a Canadian subject. Hon. members should read the speeches made by Mr. Lapointe on two occasions during the first session of 1939. He was referring to citizenship, and he stated that a Canadian was a British citizen in this country as well as in the British isles, which was, according to him, another reason why we should not be neutral during the war.

The Minister of National War Services will not increase the importance of his department by increasing the staff of such branches, which should not be there to fool the Canadian people. If someone says that I am against Canadian citizenship, that is untrue. But I want my people to be informed of the facts as they are. Instead of being giants internationally, we are dwarfs, and we are dwarfs just because of an inferiority complex on the part of these people who try to give the Canadian people the impression that they are international giants when they are not. Is that clear enough? And that is done in times of war when it is impossible to get a pension for our boys who are wounded and for those who are discharged from the army. There will be all these doctors, the pests of the universe, who will come here to bring about "cooperation in Canadian citizenship". It is just a waste of time and money because, when it comes down to facts, nothing is done. It will not take $46,367 to give Canadian citizenship to our own people. The only thing to do is for the Prime Minister, now in London, to say to Mr. Churchill: The Canadians want to be called Canadian subjects. And they will remain in the British empire just the same. That will be sufficient to give us Canadian citizenship and that will save $46,367 to the Canadian people.

Moreover, I cannot see why we talk about Canadian citizenship when not long ago Senator Robertson or Robinson—I am not sure of his name but he is the national chairman of the National Liberal Federation—dared to say in public that the Prime Minister would go to London as the leader of the small nations, and when Viscount Cranborne said in London the other day that everything would be decided by the big powers and that the small powers would have to listen to the big powers. How can we speak of Canadian citizenship then? We must tell the truth to the Canadian people, and if the wartime information board is the misinformation board, it is the duty of the members of parliament to inform their constituents and the Canadian people as to the real facts. That is my view, Mr. Chairman, and I cannot conceive that members of parliament will let this item pass.

Cooperation in Canadian citizenship! What is that? The worst thing for national unity is the campaign that is made for it. The Canadian people are under the impression that if somehting is done or is not done, it is to appease one of the provinces. How many are afraid to do the right thing and to tell the people that if conscription has apparently not been passed, it is not to appease the province of Quebec because man-power in that province is at rock-bottom just as it is in the rest of Canada, and that it would destroy the war effort of Canada to impose conscription. But no member of the government has the courage to say to the Canadian people that the man in overalls is doing as much to win the war as the man who carries a rifle. And so it all comes on the back of the province of Quebec. It is to appease the province of Quebec, forsooth, that we have not conscription! Is that not a shame? Why not tell the truth so that the people will understand? I am against the policy of appeasing this one or that one, of not doing this thing or that thing for fear of displeasing someone. There must be a reason for doing a thing, and why not give the right reason? Then no money will need to be wasted on such an item as this. It is revolting to see how public money is wasted. Cents are economized and dollars are wasted, especially in this department, which I denounce with all the strength I have.

Then there are publications presumably to give out news. Little papers are sent out. It is like the images which supposedly would cure stomach ills if swallowed by a sick person. Probably "Nouvelles Catholiques" are got out to make people forget the distribution of condoms by the department of health—

"Nouvelles Catholiques" on the one hand and condoms on the other. It is sanctimonious. Religion itself is a very good thing and it would be excellent to have chapels for the soldiers in the camps. But those chapels are not built. We should have chapels for spiritual worship. Then "Nouvelles Catholiques" are published and sent all over, while the young men in the camps very often have no place to worship. Instead of wasting time on these useless branches of the department, the Minister of National War Services, who has had good experience as a former deputy minister of the Department of National Defence, should say something to his colleagues, especially his colleague the Minister of National Defence for Air, to see to it that the bright young men in any branch of the army should have facilities for worship, so that each one can pray to God in his own manner. They must rely on the Divine Providence for help in their undertakings, and they must have the fullest support from the government in that connection. That is one thing.

Next, dispense with all these frills and get back to fundamentals. See that the people of Canada are not deceived by false propaganda. Then I hope that there will be a strong wind to dissipate all the clouds that prevent information from reaching the Canadian people. When one speaks as I do, if he does not commit blasphemy, he may be accused of being sacrilegious when he is throwing down false idols.

The only way to have true Canadian citizenship in this land is first to get rid of an inferiority complex as compared with any outsider. A Canadian, even if he is a British subject, does not have the official right to call himself a Canadian citizen. But first he must have pride in his own country, whether Canada is his native country or his country of adoption. A Canadian must be proud of being a Canadian. That is the first thing.

The second thing is that there should be no false representation to anyone. Then there must be no appeasement of any kind, and by appeasement I mean the abandonment of the rights of some people under the pretext of pleasing some other part of the population. These are most serious matters. When the right thing is done, no one is afraid to call it by its proper name; when the wrong thing is done, everyone is evasive.

Since there has been a denunciation of bureaucracy throughout Canada I hope the protests against this item will be so strong that the Minister of National War Services will cancel the engagement of Doctor England and all his staff and wait until we are Canadian citizens in fact as well as in name before undertaking any further expenditures of this kind.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to find out something about this famous committee. I believe it is a waste of money to have what appears to be a new item for $46,367 for a committee on cooperation in Canadian citizenship. We have so many committees that the House of Commons has very little control over expenditures. This committee is to consist of four men; soon there will be five, and it will be their job to try to improve the standard of citizenship among newcomers. I am absolutely opposed to this proposal. We had a gentleman named Professor Kirkconnell, who wrote a national war book for the government glorifying those who had been born in Europe, at the expense of the native born, the British born and the French who have been here for so many years. He was engaged by the predecessor of the present minister. I do not blame the minister for these items, because most of the abuses which have been brought to his attention were there before he took over the department. This is an innovation.

The other day he discussed a charities committee headed by Mr. Charles Burton, who has done splendid work in connection with education, and in many public and private charities, and is a great citizen of Toronto and an outstanding Canadian. That committee includes men like Mr. F. K. Morrow, Mr. Gordon Perry and others, who have worked day and night and have effected large economies in the war charities branch. I have known the chairman of that committee, Mr. Charles Burton, for many years; he is a leading citizen of Toronto, a large employer of labour, who has rendered splendid service to the city, the province, the dominion and the empire. Now we are to have another committee of a different kind altogether appointed, which as I see it will be largely a political committee that will create more disunity than unity in Canada and do nothing but talk.

In the fifth year of the war why should it be necesary to appoint a committee to bring about cooperation in connection with Canadian citizenship? Why are these people admitted to the country unless they know all about citizenship and matters of that kind? This is just catering to a certain element in the country, many of whom have taken no part at all in our war effort. Some of them are conscientious objectors. We are spending four billion dollars of the money of the taxpayers, and dear knows the time has come for retrenchment and economy. I said this long before the present minister was at the head of this department; I am sorry to have to say it again, because he is not to blame for a great deal of it. I do say this is appealing to sectional interests and will cause widespread disunity. There is no such thing as unity in Canada at the present time, and we might as well admit it. We had some evidence of that this afternoon in regard to the war. Wars are won by soldiers, sailors and airmen at the scene of combat. They do not need any committee to teach them cooperation in Canadian citizenship or to tell them what to do. I believe this new item should be struck out; I do not want to take the government by surprise, but if this were estimates I should like to move that the item be reduced to $1. We must find some method of paring down these estimates, something similar to the system I have already mentioned. Before we know it they will have a hundred on this committee; it will be beyond comparison with the committee of one hundred. When I was head of the Toronto police commission there was a committee of forty and a committee of one hundred; I was asked what the difference was, and I said there were sixty more men on one committee than on the other. One committee looked after the theatres and endeavoured to censor programmes, while the other committee sought to get cooperation in other ways. When my leader was at law school he probably saw some of the work of those two famous committees.

This is an absolute waste of money. Where is the committee to meet; how will it function; how many officials will it have? Is it a military body? I have referred already to one book which was written in connection with cooperation, by Professor Kirkconnell. What has he said? He got up in a lecture at the university of Toronto in January 1942, and said there was no room in Canada for the British-born. In his book for the government he glorified the Japanese, saying there were fewer Japanese than British-born in the law courts. Now he has changed his tune and is writing different pamphlets on communism all the time. I suppose this new committee on cooperation in Canadian citizenship will take university professors who are free in the summer months and have them write another book. Probably the committee will have secretaries, under-secretaries, managers, assistant managers, and so on; they will set up an office here in Ottawa; they will have regional committees all over Canada, and the thing will be ridiculous. I cannot find any such committee in England. This committee is to cooperate in connection with citizenship. What does citizenship mean? It means different things to different people. Some who come here will accept all the privileges of Canadian citizenship but will do nothing to defend the country in time of war or to aid the government in prosecuting the most disastrous war the world has ever known.

We should cut out a great many of these frills. I predict that next year this item will be for $100,000, and I think this is a great waste of money. I suppose there will be lectures all over Canada, radio appeals and all that sort of thing. I think it is just a lot of humbug; that word is very often used in the British parliament. You cannot fool the public this way, the taxpayers are getting sick of this sort of thing. All sorts of committees, control boards and so on have been foisted upon parliament, and we have nothing to say about it. I protest; I think the whole thing is becoming farcical; almost every day we are appointing another committee. I move that the item be reduced to $1; that is enough.

Mr. HLYNKA: I happen to have followed the work of this branch perhaps a little more closely than some hon. members, and I feel that I may be in a position to say something which may throw some light on the subject under discussion. In the first place I wish to congratulate the minister upon having refused to do away with this branch of his department. In my opinion the personnel of this branch should be increased to at least fifty. I am not sure whether many hon. members know there is a similar department in the United States. Too many of us, I think, do not realize that some people who come here from other countries encounter certain special difficulties and problems in which they require assistance and guidance. This branch studies these matters and makes suggestions to various departments of government in regard to these problems.

I know personally some of the men in this branch, and I have had the privilege of appearing with a number of them on platforms addressing various ethnic groups and trying to bring them together in an effort to find a common ground upon which all of us could meet. In the United States there is issued a publication known as "Common Ground", and the title itself suggests the material it contains. This particular publication is devoted entirely to the problems which confront different ethnic groups, and those who contribute to it endeavour to point out to the people of the United States that unless they are ready to find a common ground, unless they do their best to unite on major issues facing their country, they cannot possibly be a strong nation which should be united in regard to all matters that demand unity.

To many of us, it seems that there are no special problems of this kind in Canada. Let me say to the committee that in Canada we need not only a branch of a department of this kind to look after this particular work, but an entire department to handle the different groups and to iron out all the difficulties confronting them.

This committee studies the press in foreign languages and records certain valuable information, and if hon. members would care to drop into its office they would be welcome to all the material which they would care to have along the lines I have indicated. I know that had this committee been in existence at the beginning of the war, the government would not have made the blunder it did in putting the ban on all foreign languages with respect to radio broadcasting during the war.

Let us consider some of these groups. They have been exemplary citizens. Their sons are in the armed services and they themselves are doing their best to help Canada win the war. They have always been an ideal type of citizens. But what do we find? At the beginning of the war the government had not the proper information and advice and it refused radio services to any group which did not happen to speak English or French. In my opinion the government has done itself a lot of harm. Surely we should trust our citizens. We should be intelligent enough to be able to use to our advantage the various languages spoken. Why be afraid of them? As I say, the government made a mistake because it did not have the proper advice in these matters. It, therefore, clamped down on so-called foreign broadcasting in Canada. That, in my opinion, was definitely a mistake.

In the United States the government, if I remember correctly, is broadcasting in thirty-six languages. Why not? Why not use every language we know, and do so to our own advantage? It could not harm us at all. It surprises me to find that some hon. members take it for granted that this particular branch of the minister's department is useless, that it is not rendering any useful purpose to Canada. Personally, therefore, having the information which I have about the work of this department, I strongly endorse and support the government in its appropriation of this money for this particular branch and I should like to see the estimate increased and the personnel of the branch extended.

Let us, therefore, tackle properly the problem which we often call the "problem of unity". Well, you can tackle it only by studying it, and believe me there are in Canada to-day many problems that could be very well ironed out, resulting in unity.

Mr. BURTON: When I noticed this item under this heading in this department I was at a loss to understand why it should appear there. However, after listening to the speaker who has just taken his seat, it has come to me that in all probability this is only a war measure, so to speak. That really astounds me. If it is so, then I would say that this work has been commenced fifty years too late; it should have been commenced years and years ago. I support the hon. member who has just taken his seat and urge that this work be continued, because I know it has great potentialities, and there is a big field for it.

Just how wisely or well the money has been spent I do not know, but I know the opportunities are there to do a really worthwhile work. I differ with the hon. member for Broadview, who I am sorry is not in his place at the moment, when he says that the item should be reduced to the sum of $1. There is great work to be done in this country. I urge the minister by all means to continue with that work. If I may be permitted I would suggest that not only is that work required among the so-called new Canadians but there is room for that education among other types of Canadians. Some of the things that people take exception to in so far as the new Canadians are concerned go back to the doors of those who in their smug complacency think they are the only ones on God's green earth.

Very often in the past new Canadians have been used when it has suited the advantage of others to do so. When times come along in which they do not need this help the new Canadians were simply no good. That does not tend to Canadian unity. It does not tend to build up Canadian citizenship. I wish to draw this to your attention, Mr. Chairman, and especially to the attention of people who hold that view. Some of us are new Canadians by choice. Many of us are Canadians only by accident of birth. Many of us are new Canadians because we came here prepared to do our part as citizens of this country. We came here of our own volition appreciating the benefits and the opportunities of this land. We came here prepared to do our part in return for those opportunities. In this country of ours there is room for many, many more people; but we cannot build up Canada, we cannot build up a true Canadian citizenship so long as we have one section pulling here and another section pulling there. We must build upon a foundation that anyone is prepared not only to accept the benefits and privileges of citizenship in this country, but to do his part in his community life as well. As citizens of Canada we must give equal opportunity to all who are willing to do their part.

In conclusion, may I draw to your attention what I find in many cases to be a sore spot with the so-called new Canadian and in their offspring? May I draw to your attention the system that is followed out in the taking of the census in this country? When the census taker comes around he goes into the homes of these new Canadians and their descendants. He sits down and takes their names. He then asks for the racial origin. Let me give you an example of how it works. I know of a case—and there are many others of a similar nature—where the father was born in the United States of parents who were born in the United States. The grandparents had come from the little duchy of Luxembourg. Later on, these people came to Canada. This man married a girl who not only was born, raised and educated in Canada but whose children to-day are the seventh generation Canadian-born on the mother's side. When they try to explain that situation to the census taker he writes down the racial origin as German. As I have said, on the mother's side these people were the seventh generation Canadian-born. Even the grandparents on the father's side had never seen the old country, much less Germany, and yet they are entered on the records as of German racial origin. I have nothing to say about any person's racial origin, but that is what happens in this country. You find cases where certain people's children and their children's children are born and raised in this country and yet we have no Canadian racial origin.

I just leave that with you, Mr. Chairman, and with the hon. members of the committee. I realize that possibly it has nothing to do with the matter that is before us, but it is one part of the many problems that we have to face in this country. Many of those so-called new Canadians are doing their part. I can take you to the constituency I have the honour to represent and show you sons of men who were born in Germany and who to-day are flying over Germany and dropping bombs on it. We have every race, religion and nationality represented in that constituency, and by and large every one of them is trying to do his utmost to be a true Canadian. Let us forget these differences; let us pull together as Canadians and not one pull gee and the other haw.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. LaFLECHE: This afternoon we heard something about Doctor Robert England. I think I owe it to that gentleman and to the committee to say something more about him. He is a distinguished gentleman in the scholastic field, a man who has devoted much of his time to a study of matters concerning the national welfare. But what perhaps attracted me first to him was that he has a gallant record of service at the front in the last war. I note he was awarded the military cross, and was wounded at Vimy. I know, too, that Doctor England was overseas during this war. I honour him as I honour all those who have fought the enemies of Canada. I believe that with his assistance it will be possible to bring this branch to the point I should like to have it brought, one of very real service to the large numbers of those whom we now term new Canadians. There is good work to be done, and it is my intention to see that that work is done.

Mr. GREEN: I was surprised, and a little disturbed to hear the criticism levelled against this work this afternoon. My understanding is that this is really the nationalities branch of the Department of National War Services. The minister will corect me if I am wrong in that.

Mr. LaFLECHE: That is quite right.

Mr. GREEN: It is described in the vote as a committee on cooperation in Canadian citizenship. I also understand that this branch is comparatively new, having been established some time after the commencement of the war, with the objective of ironing out some of the difficulties arising among groups of people in Canada who, although Canadians, were of foreign birth, most of them having come from the continent of Europe.

My understanding is that the purpose of the nationalities branch is to help develop a Canadian outlook. It is to help Canadians of all stocks to meet understandingly on common ground. I believe very good work has been done along that line. Particularly was I impressed by the support given by the hon. member for Vegreville who is the only member of the house born in the Ukraine. He is our only Ukrainian Canadian, and the house is most fortunate in having him here as a member, because he brings us an outlook which perhaps most of us did not have. I thought his support of this work, which he indicated this afternoon, was most impressive and very much to the point.

I hope the minister will not be downhearted or discouraged by the statements made this afternoon, because there is much to be done to build up a Canadian outlook, a Canadian nationality. The work of the nationalities branch is a step in that direction. I suggest that eventually we shall have to have immigration; the work of this branch, which is that of making our people better acquainted; and the work of naturalization dealt with in one department. Immigration, the welcoming of people who come here, and eventually naturalizing them, whereby we accept them into full citizenship, should be handled by one department. I suggest that hon. members turn that thought over in their minds, because I believe in that way we would be able to build up citizenship in a manner which would be much more satisfactory than if the three different types of work continue to be handled in three different departments as at the present time.

I do think, however, that the minister should take warning from the criticisms offered this afternoon, most of which I believe originate in the thought that the nationalities branch might play politics. I do not know that that is so now, nor would I suggest it for a moment. However, that thought may be in the minds of some hon. members. They may feel that whatever government happens to be in power may, from time to time, use the nationalities branch to try to get votes from groups of Canadians of different stocks. For that reason I suggest that the work of this branch must be kept absolutely clear of the slightest suspicion of political interference.

I would warn the minister, too, against expanding the work of the branch too quickly. The vote this year is nearly three times that of last, and I believe it would be wise to make haste a little more slowly. I would ask him, too, to give some further details of the work being done. For example, Canadian clubs in Canada, from one coast to the other are deeply interested in this subject. They want the Canadian people to become acquainted with one another, so that they may help build up a Canadian outlook. Has anything been done by the nationalities branch to cooperate with those Canadian clubs? What other steps of that kind have been taken by the branch?

I am certainly convinced, however, that the objective is excellent, and hope that the work will be carried on. Let me repeat that the minister should not be downhearted or discouraged because of some of the criticisms levelled at the branch this afternoon.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, I have only a few words to say. The question is not one of encouraging or discouraging the minister, but rather one of seeing things as they are—and no more than that. I would be the last to oppose any move toward Canadian citizenship, but we cannot have cooperation between things which do not exist. Obviously Canadian citizenship does not now exist, and if it is deemed advisable to have Canadian citizenship we must build it, before attempting any coordination. There are many newcomers in this country; there are many refugees, and every one should have the Canadian spirit. It is not enough to have Canadian citizenship; we must all have the Canadian spirit. What is that spirit? It is love of this country before anything else. Some people do not understand it in that way. One considers that love of this country precludes love for any other country. Some say, "We must have the empire first."

The empire is all right, but the imperialist in Canada is a man without a country. He is a colonial; he thinks first of the motherland. I do not say that in any offensive way, I say it in a realistic way. But we who are not imperialists are also colonials because Canada is just a colony in spite of the pompous designation given to this country. I want to make myself clear about this.

A lot has been said about Canada being autonomous, being the equal of the other countries in the British empire. That is the bunk, that is untrue. Whether imperialists are in the majority or not in this country, the password comes from London as far as they are concerned. Everything said in London impresses them to such an extent that they cannot have a really Canadian spirit. So long as there are imperialists in this country; so long as the imperialists rule this country, it will be impossible to have a Canadian spirit prevail. There may be some people who are imbued with the Canadian spirit, but that is not seen in our legislation. I think it should be easy to discuss this matter without offending anyone.

An imperialist has the right to be an imperialist, just the same as one who is not has the right not to be. It is simply a viewpoint. I shall not surprise the committee by saying that I am not an imperialist. I think of Canada before I think of any country in the British empire or anywhere else. But that does not mean that I am an anti-British. The point of view of some imperialists is to call traitor those who do not share their views. I respect the views of the imperialists even though I do not share them, and I ask for the same treatment. I do not expect them to share my views, at least right away, but I want them to respect my views.

How is it possible for one who is Canadian in spirit to show that he is faithful to his country? It is the simplest thing in the world. In the first place he should have no inferiority complex as far as any other country is concerned. He should consider himself equal to anyone in any other country, not superior but equal. He must not only consider himself so, but act accordingly. Then he must speak the real truth. Why are there difficulties between Canadians at times? It is because the truth is not spoken to all of them. The same gospel is not preached in all the provinces at the same time. There is one kind of thing for one province, and another for another province. Is it any wonder that when people from various parts of the country meet together they are like strangers?

They have not been fed with the same food. The people in Ontario have been told that the people of Quebec are rebels, that they are disloyal to the empire because they do not hold the same views about the British empire being their own country. We may be within the British empire, but we should be Canadians first. This fact is recognized by a large number of Canadians of British origin. Hon. members would be surprised at the number in the armed forces who hold this view. One of the most extraordinary things that has been said is that the French Canadians want to take possession of this country and impose their rule. That is not our point of view at all. All that the French speaking Canadians of Quebec or anywhere else want is to be at peace with their fellow citizens.

They lose no opportunity to help their fellow citizens in the other provinces in times of disaster or catastrophe. Quebec has subscribed very well to all the victory loans. In this loan the village of Cabano, the birthplace of Major Paul Triquet, V.C., was the first place to reach its quota. If we are to have unity, we must act as we speak; we must tell the truth. We should have nothing to hide from our fellow citizens. There are ambitious people who try to create prejudice in order to make a personal gain, but that is all wrong. My hon. friends may go to Quebec at any time and they will see how well they will be received. Good roads have improved the national unity because they afford an opportunity to people from one part of the country to meet those in another part, to talk to each other and to find out that there is really no difference in their problems. There is no difference between a good Canadian farmer in the province of Quebec and a good Canadian farmer in the province of Ontario. even though the one may be French speaking and Catholic and the other English speaking and Scotch Presbyterian or English Methodist or a good Irishman. There is no difference at all. The people should meet together and talk things over. We should not have to listen to such false stories as I referred to this afternoon, stories about the French flag being our flag when everyone knows it is not. That was not told in English, it was told in French. It was not sent over a private network, it was sent over the C.B.C.

Why tell lies? Why give people a false impression of other people? That is my view. That is why I object strongly to the statute of Westminster, which is an act of the imperial parliament. That statute was intended to give the dominions or the colonies—I am calling the dominions colonies on purpose—the impression that they were more important than they really are. We hear about the halibut treaty and things like that. We are told that England was not holding Canada by the hand when that treaty was signed. Why was that? We are not autonomous, according to the letter of the law. There are provisions for disallowance in the constitution of Canada, and those sections have never been repealed. But if we pass legislation for two consecutive years it cannot be disallowed by Westminster. I maintain that we shall have no true Canadian citizenship so long as those provisions in the constitution are not repealed. We are not masters of our own destiny, not even to stay within the empire. We are in a state of minority and of guardianship. That is why I cannot listen to anyone who says we are on an equal footing with the other nations of the British empire. That is my point.

To summarize what I have said, I do not want anyone to deceive the Canadian people. I hope that it will be possible to speak to them the plain language of truth, and the country will be so much the better for that.

The minister has said that the aims of this branch are very high. They are to help the newcomers to become better Canadian citizens. What does he mean by that? It is important that the minister explain what he means by good Canadian citizens. He said that it was an idealistic branch and that he had nursed it. I wonder why he cherishes it so much.

Then he said that Doctor Robert England had accepted a civil service appointment. He said that Doctor England had behaved well during the last war and during this war. That I do not deny at all. But once again, because a man has behaved well in a theatre of war he is not necessarily qualified for any position or to promote Canadian citizenship. He may be willing to do so but he might be unable to do so. I am all for helping the Canadian veterans, and I have proved it. Only recently the government acceded to my request in favour of a man who had the finest record in the last war. It was not a military organization that made that request but the member for Temiscouata, and I appreciate the fact that the government saw fit to grant my request and to honour this man who deserves public recognition. But that is not all. There is a feeling in this house that a returned man can fill any job in this country.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Hear, hear.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. member for Fraser Valley, for instance, is a very clever member, but I wonder if he could perform the duties of astronomer at the experimental farm. He might be given a preference in such an appointment, but my fear is that he would see too many stars. What I also regret is that some people speak of the military preference in order to catch votes. I say that the returned men have done enough to deserve consideration by this country and to be helped by being put in a position where they can render the best service.

The minister also said that this branch keeps in touch with groups of what are known as new Canadians. Who are the new Canadians? Are they the refugees who come here by the shipload, or are they those who have been freed from anti-nazi camps? I do not know; we should be told.

The minister also said that people come here from other lands to settle in Canada and an attempt is being made to make these people feel at home. How is it done? Is it promoting good Canadian citizenship to make them feel at home?

The minister also said that different matters touching on Canadian citizenship are brought to the attention of these people wherever possible through their own publications. What are those publications? We have not been told.

I should like to have full information about Doctor Robert England, where he was born, how long he has been in Canada, and what his qualifications are for the post. I should like to have the same information with respect to Mr. Tracy Phillips and Doctor Kay, a foreign language newswriter, and the same information with respect to the two editorial assistants. The stenographer was there last year, and I presume she is a good stenographer. But then a director has been appointed this year at $4,500 and a research assistant at $3,600; also two liaison officers, one with the foreign language press and the other with the English and French press. These two are the niggers in the woodpile. I wonder how many liaison officers there are in all branches of the government. There are liaison officers here and liaison officers there. They are the ones who prevent the people from being informed. The press gallery was infested with some of them who were there all the time telling the journalists what to write and what not to write, that if they wrote such and such a thing there would be trouble with Washington or somewhere else. In that way they were trying to get the press gallery to cater to their own views by suppressing views of public interest. That was done by many of them. One of my good friends from Toronto asked a question about one of these men who was spending his time in the press gallery, and it was thought sacrilegious for him to ask that question. But this sort of thing continues and it prevents the Canadian people from getting the news. That is probably the work of liaison officers in the wartime misinformation board. It would be a good thing to know who they are and what are their qualifications. If a military preference is required for the position it would be interesting to know their military record in a theatre of war.

The minister said that Doctor England was a returned man. If one has to be a returned man to get one of these positions, what is the military record of these men, because the same requirement must apply to all? I will leave out the stenographers because there is no conscription for women. A girl is not bound to be a C.W.A.C. in order to be patriotic. But it is important to have the information with respect to every one of these other positions. There is for instance an editor at $2,800; two readers at $1,920. They are pretty well paid for proofreading. I wonder if the proofreaders at the printing bureau are as well paid. Then there are two stenographers at $1,080, and it is stated that there will be additions to the staff this year. The salaries for the present financial year amount to $33,892; bonus, $1,100; unemployment, $75; travelling expenses, $10,000—$10,000 for these people to travel all over the country; printing and stationery, $300; miscellaneous, $1,000. I do not insist on details with respect to the item of $300 for printing and stationery, because that does not seem extravagant. On the other hand some explanation must be given in connection with the $10,000, and we must know what are the directions given these men.

What is meant by the minister when he speaks of Canadian citizenship? He must tell us if it exists and, if it does exist, since when; we must have some information about it. I am rather surprised that the hon. member for Broadview and myself should be the only members to protest against this extravagance, this abnormal increase in bureaucratic inefficiency. I wonder if other hon. members will not join us. I should hope that we might be joined by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, my genial friend the Minister of Pensions and National Health, the Minister of National Revenue, the Minister of Mines and Resources, the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services, the Minister of Justice, the Minister of Munitions and Supply, my good friend the Ontario whip, and my good friend who defeated the former leader of the opposition. I hope they will all join me in telling the minister that this expenditure is extravagant and that we cannot go on like this. Before the dinner recess the hon. member for Vegreville made a very good speech. I do not agree at all with what he said, but he said it well. But I tell him that even though the intention is good he must not expect anything good to come from this branch. It is impossible, because these people are too clever to do a good job. They are the product of universities; they are the finest of intelligentsia; they are those who will mould the heads of the new Canadians, though I hope not to their liking.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What is wrong with being intelligent?

Mr. POULIOT: Not intelligence but intelligentsia, which is altogether different; intelligentsia is the excess of intelligence. We have it everywhere in the civil service.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Go right after him; tell him he will not be elected.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. member for Fraser Valley is an example of intelligentsia. But it is more than intelligence; it is genius, though I can tell my hon. friend that the genius is not public-spirited. They think of themselves first; they have all sorts of nice little schemes to make a nice little bit, to speak to these nice Ukrainians and convert them to Canadian citizenship; to speak to our good French Canadians and make them still warmer toward Canadian citizenship; to speak to these good Hebrews who have come from the United Kingdom, 973 in one group, and tell them to shave off their beards and look like ordinary Canadian people who are clean shaven. They will tell people things like that, and for that the genius will have two maids instead of one and will have a brand new car instead of his old Ford dating back to 1900.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Are you talking about the genius of Fraser Valley?

Mr. POULIOT: No, I am talking about the intelligentsia now. That is enough of that; there is no reason to go on with it, because at the present time it is ridiculous when we speak of it. As soon as they start their work they will be obnoxious, and there is no reason to pay out this amount of money. As a good Canadian, as one who is proud of his country, I hope the minister will change his view and get back to normalcy by removing this item from the estimates.

Mr. CRERAR: May I trespass upon the patience of the committee for a brief time to discuss some aspects of this vote, which has been under consideration since early this afternoon. I am afraid some hon. members who have spoken on this matter, including the hon. member for Témiscouata, are under a misapprehension as to the purpose of this estimate. Last November I was asked to address a rather unique gathering in the city of Winnipeg. A few public-spirited citizens, some of Anglo-Saxon origin and others not of Anglo-Saxon origin, undertook to organize what is known in Winnipeg as the Canada Press club. This club embraces not only representatives of the English language newspapers but also representatives of the twenty foreign language newspapers published in that city. It was the first time these gentlemen had been brought together; some of them had never met the others. Some had brought to Canada from Europe their old ideas, with perhaps some lingering traces of the old racial animosities. The effort that was made was simply to bring them together to promote understanding, to give them a wider view of Canada, its problems, institutions and form of government.

Well, I was asked to address these gentlemen at the initial meeting, and I was profoundly impressed by what happened on that occasion. I endeavoured to explain, I am afraid somewhat inadequately, some of the aspects of Canadian life that were new to many of these people, some of whom had come from Europe only recently or at any rate within recent years. Practically all of those who attended had a word to say. I recall that one was a Sudeten German refugee whom I had the pleasure of admitting to this country in the autumn of 1938. I was greatly impressed by the manifest desire of these gentlemen who were the editors or publishers of these foreign language newspapers to be identified as Canadians. During the debate to-day I have heard the term "new Canadians" used. It is rather interesting that this phrase was referred to by one of these gentlemen in his remarks on this occasion. He said, "Why should we be called new Canadians? We are no more new Canadians than are the people who have come in recent years from Scotland or Ireland or England or the United States. We are Canadians; Canada is our home. We want to be citizens of Canada. Some of us are citizens of Canada now. We look forward to having our children educated in Canada. We look down the vista of years when we and our descendants will be Canadians; not new Canadians but Canadians in the full sense of the word."

When I left the meeting I happened to walk out with the late J. W. Dafoe. I asked him, "What impression has this meeting to-night made upon your mind?" He replied at once, "The strong desire manifest in the minds of these gentlemen to be recognized as Canadians and to be recognized as taking their full part in our Canadian life."

There is not a member of this house; there is not a good citizen anywhere in this broad dominion who would not welcome that spirit, because it is upon that spirit that we are going to build our Canadian nation.

If the committee will bear with me, I should like to give another instance that happened within my knowledge. It happened less than ten years ago in a district that was almost solidly Ukrainian. Our Ukrainian people in Canada are fond of social life. In almost every rural Ukrainian district, at any rate those I have visited, one will find the Ukrainian community hall. Moreover they are fond of having picnics. Well, on this particular occasion a picnic was being held in this village. I was asked if I would address an assembly in the afternoon along with several other speakers. I demurred because I did not speak the Ukrainian tongue, but my Ukrainian friend said that would make no difference because they all understood English except perhaps a few of the older people who were well advanced in years when they came to Canada.

I should like to tell the committee about that gathering, if I may be permitted. There was a band composed of local people who gave music in the afternoon, and I may say it was an excellent band. After the speechifying was through I walked across two or three blocks to where a baseball tournament was in progress. The teams were wholly Ukrainian young men, but the jargon, if I may term it such, on the baseball field was what one would have heard in any English-speaking community. Some were for killing the umpire—

Mr. MAYBANK: If the hon. gentleman will permit me, on the first base line it is patter, not jargon.

Mr. CRERAR: I am thankful for the correction from my hon. friend the member for Winnipeg South Centre. At any rate, the point I wish to make is that the proceedings were all in the English tongue. In that gathering of over a thousand people I heard twice as much English spoken as I heard Ukrainian. In the evening a few youngsters of eight or ten years of age were playing on a vacant lot across from the little hotel where I was staying and they were carrying on their game wholly in English. That I think is a significant fact.

There is one other thing I would mention. The enlistment among all these Canadians who came from European countries has been admirable. I will speak particularly to-night of the Ukrainians. Ukrainians have enlisted in our armed services, not in hundreds or in thousands but in tens of thousands. They are to-day on every battlefront where Canadian troops are engaged. Some were at Hong Kong, many are in Italy, many are in Britain, and some are still in Canada. Why did this happen? These young men were glad of an opportunity to serve their country in the highest form of service that any individual can give.

We have, therefore, no reason to complain of the vote which the Minister of National War Services is presenting to the committee. Those of foreign extraction, if we may use that term, are of all professions in Canada, they are in business in Canada; they are on the farms of Canada; they take their place in rural municipal councils and in our legislatures, and I am very happy to say, and I am sure the committee share the sentiment, that we have in this house a member of the Ukrainian race. I do not altogether agree with his political theories, but I wish to say that he is an acquisition to the house. In the Manitoba legislature, with which I am more familiar, there are seven Ukrainian members, one of whom is the deputy speaker in that legislative body. There is no one who knows the facts who will deny that they are making just as fine and full and useful a contribution to the public business of the country as any other group in our population, and I do not except even those of Anglo-Saxon origin like myself.

The purpose of this vote is simply to broaden the knowledge of the place that our Ukrainians and others as well, Germans, Czechs, Poles, Hungarians, have in the Canadian mosaic of our citizenship. I cannot see why that is not well worth while. I have some personal knowledge of the benefits that have flowed from the work done under this vote, and I would be very sorry indeed if the judgment of the committee was adverse to it. I am sure it will not be. I am sure there will be general recognition that the vote is serving a very useful purpose.

After all, these Canadians, I care not from what country of continental Europe they came, are making their contribution to our Canadian life. They are making their contribution in agriculture, in the ranks of labour, in our factories, in the professions and in the arts. I believe they have a great contribution to make in what might be termed the aesthetic side of our life, a side often neglected and overlooked. In the arts, and particularly in music, these people have distinguished themselves and have made and are making a splendid contribution to our culture.

I merely wished to make these few remarks in the hope that the committee will agree to the passage of the vote.

Mr. POULIOT: I am so delighted with the Minister of Mines and Resources, who is now leading the house, that I will not insist any further on the point.

Mr. ROSE: I agree that we need such a committee because we have in this country people of various nationalities who have to be drawn closer to what we would call the Canadian ideology, people who do their utmost for the war effort. If you go to the steel mills and the aircraft plants, if you go to the factories around Montreal, you will find people who have come from Europe who are producing the weapons of war and who are subscribing money generously to every war loan. They want to do their best for Canada, but it is not very easy for them at times. I have come across Canadians who have come from Europe who, when they had gone to look for a job, were asked what nationality they were. One of them was either Ukrainian or Polish, and somehow or another that fact did not go over very well. They had very great difficulties in procuring employment. I have had people come to me with compensation claims. Everyone of them claimed they could not get the same type of justice as others did. They could not explain themselves very well. They needed somebody to help them.

I would say that the committee as at present constituted is not the best committee that we should have. We have an advisory committee. That advisory committee is composed of English- and French-speaking Canadians. Why should not there be Canadians of European extraction on the advisory committee, people who have been in this country for a long time? They know something about their people; they know something of their problems. If we must have an advisory committee we should have on it representatives of at least the larger groups of European origin in Canada. There is one man on this advisory committee with whom I want to deal to-night, namely, Watson Kirkconnell. I should say from the start that Professor Watson Kirkconnell cannot make good Canadians. Watson Kirkconnell could advise nobody on how to integrate those people into the war effort. Watson Kirkconnell does not possess the spirit of the united nations. Watson Kirkconnell is at war with the members of the united nations. Those charges may sound drastic. I do not resort to them often, but in a corner store on Sparks street I picked up a little booklet cynically called "Seven Pillars of Freedom". Here are some extracts from that book, and I say to you, Mr. Chairman; that a man who writes this type of material to-day can only do harm to the war effort, to Canadian and united nations unity. He cannot advise anybody on how to be a good Canadian. Speaking about terror, Watson Kirkconnell says the following:

> As for the continuing terror, Hitler's concentration camps and party purges have taken at least five million lives (quite apart from the vast destruction of the war); while the Soviet regime, in maintaining its iron rule over the Russian people, has done to death in the neighbourhood of twenty-five millions.

Stalin, according to Kirkconnell, is five times as bad as Hitler. This is said by a man who is going to educate the people to be good Canadians and good followers of the united nations:

Mr. GAUTHIER: What is the truth?

Mr. ROSE: We shall discuss that at some other time.

Mr. JAQUES: It is true.

Mr. ROSE: I am not surprised at the hon. member making this statement.

Then a little farther on, Watson Kirkconnell makes the following statement:

> It is little wonder that the Finns have so long been staging their queer sit-down strike on the frontiers of Russia, since they know all too well the probable results of "unconditional surrender" and the occupation of their country by Soviet troops.

Hitler said the same thing a few weeks ago in an interview with Stockholm correspondents.

He said that the Finns should not give up; that they should continue fighting. Watson Kirkconnell tells the Finns the same thing.

In speaking about wages and aid to widows in the Soviet union, Watson Kirkconnell has the following slander for the Soviet people. I say it is an outrage.

Obviously the widow—

Who, according to him, does not get enough support.

—is forced into industry or prostitution.

We have heard from people who have come back from the Soviet union, and others, that the Red army has no venereal disease. Watson Kirkconnell has the temerity to say that women who work to give arms to that army do so because they are forced to work or become prostitutes. Remarks like that from an adviser to people in Canada are an insult to the heroic Soviet women and to an ally.

What has he to say about Stalin? These are his words:

It began with the promise of democracy; it has ended in the reign of a vozhd more absolute than any Czar.

The word "vozhd" means "leader." I should like to read what a leader of the united nations, Churchill, thinks of Joseph Stalin, according to a speech he made a few weeks ago. This is what he said:

The peoples of all the Russias have been fortunate in finding in their supreme ordeal of agony a warrior leader, Marshal Stalin, whose authority enables him to combine and control the movements of armies numbered by many millions upon a front of nearly two thousand miles and to impart a unity and concert to the war direction in the east which has been very good for Soviet Russia and very good for her allies.

Watson Kirkconnell is also supposedly a specialist on the Yugoslavia situation. In a little booklet also sold in the store around the corner he makes the following statement:

No people of Europe have a more heroic record in this war than the Serbs. Among them, no hero is more glorious than General Draza Mihajlovic.

I shall go back to Churchill to see what he has to say about General Mihajlovic:

General Mihajlovic, I much regret to say, drifted gradually into a position where some of his commanders made accommodations with Italian and German troops, which resulted in their being left alone in certain mountain areas and in return doing nothing or very little against the enemy.

Contrast what Mr. Churchill has to say with what this great adviser, Mr. Watson Kirkconnell, said.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): What is the hon. member reading from?

[Mr. Rose.]

Mr. ROSE: A book entitled "Third Year of Guerilla," by D. J. Tosevic, with a foreword by Watson Kirkconnell. Again I say that it is impossible for a man like Kirkconnell who thinks as he does, not to be partial, not to play with a small group of Ukrainians who happen to fall in line with his ideology, not to play with a small group of Yugoslavs who think as he does. That is not unity. That is unity with small groups, small cliques. I would say that Watson Kirkconnell must go from that committee. He has no place on it. A book like the one I mentioned, "Seven Pillars of Freedom," should not be tolerated at the present time in this country. What is more, I should think that article 39-A of the defence of Canada regulations is a good article with which to deal with Mr. Watson Kirkconnell.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I do not intend to follow the hon. member who has just spoken. I am sorry to think the hon. member for Temiscouata has an inferiority complex and considers he is still a colonist. I do not think I am colonist. I do not think Canadians are colonists. I think it is all nonsense to talk as if we were colonists. We are not colonists. We are a free and sovereign country. We ought to be proud and should not have that inferiority complex attitude. As long as we have that kind of thinking, as long as we think we are inferior, Canada will never take her place as a great nation in the commonwealth of nations. I visualize Canada not as a nation of 11,500,000 people, but as a nation of 25,000,000 to 50,000,000 some time. We shall never get there if we continue thinking with an inferiority complex. We all know that we rule ourselves, that we make our own laws and can do just as we like. What is the use of talking such nonsense?

We want to think about the British empire and the British commonwealth of nations, not of the mistakes which have been made but of the great things that the empire has done. It has been the greatest force for freedom the world has ever known, the greatest force for liberty, the greatest force for the institution of self-government, the greatest force for freedom of speech, as illustrated in our parliament, and as we have just heard.

I am in favour of setting up this board and, provided it operates in the right way, I believe a great deal of good work can be done. New Canadians want to be Canadians. I have known many of them, and I know of the good work being done by those men from various European countries. As a matter of fact, the forbears of many of our people came from the British isles. Some of my forbears came from Scotland, and others from England. People who come from the British isles may be called new Canadians. When they come here they are Canadians, I do not care what anybody says.

Difficulties in connection with racial prejudices and religious prejudices must be ironed out. If we are to have unity in Canada we must do something to iron out those prejudices. Let us keep our traditions; let us remember the past; but for goodness sake do not let us always be harping on the mistakes made hundreds of years ago. Let us think of Canada as a Canada in the great British empire; let us remember what that empire has stood for in days past.

To do its best work for Canada this board must work in cooperation with the educational institutions of our country. It can do much in guiding the work of our schools. Whether we have national unity or do not have it depends upon the work of those schools more than upon what is done by this board. It depends upon what our schools are going to teach our people, and upon whether they are going to teach the best and not the worst of our history, the best of the history of Scotland and the best of the history of Canada. But do not let us have any inferiority complex; do not let us always harp back to some grievances which took place many, many years ago. If we do that we shall never have national unity.

Let us think of Canada as a country of great possibilities; let us think of it as a country in which fine citizens of the future may be made, the same kind of citizens who in the past carved their livings from the woods of this country. Let us not forever have an inferiority complex, expecting the government to do everything for us; rather let us recognize the spirit of free enterprise and democracy. There is lots of room for a great Canada, and that is the way we are going to get it. A board of this kind can be very useful. I have not mentioned one class specifically as being new Canadians, although there are plenty of them. There are Ukrainians, and many other groups. I know what fine citizens they are, and the work they have done in this time of war. Those, like our pioneers, are the people who will help make this country great, and I believe this board can render great service in straightening out the little difficulties and misunderstandings which might arise in our dealings with those new citizens. It could be of great assistance.

Mr. BRUCE: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words at this time. I was called out of the chamber a few days ago on official business when the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar spent some time in trying to disqualify Mr. C. L. Burton as a suitable chairman of the war charities committee. In other words, the hon. member thinks Mr. Burton is not competent because of views he expressed in an interview, based upon his experiences when he was compelled to earn his own living at the age of fourteen, and the fact that he could not afford a university education.

May I point out to the hon. member that all education is not necessarily obtained in classrooms; rather, only a very small part of it is obtained there. Some of our most highly educated and cultured men in Canada to-day, of whom Mr. Burton is one, left school in their early years, even as early as the age of fourteen. It is Mr. Burton and men like him who have been responsible for creating the great industries in our country which, with the loyal help of labour, have made possible Canada's great contribution to the winning of the war. But Mr. Burton needs no eulogium from me; his work speaks for itself.

I am afraid this bad habit to which I have referred has been spreading of late. When I find that Mr. J. W. McConnell is on this committee I recall that on another occasion the hon. member for Lethbridge made some uncomplimentary and, I thought, entirely unjustified remarks about him. Mr. McConnell, like Mr. Burton, started life as a poor boy. His parents could not give him the advantages of a university education; but because of his natural ability, his great energy and splendid character he attained his present position as one of the great industrial and humanitarian leaders of Canada.

The habit of men like the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and others of besmirching the character and integrity of our leading citizens tends to discourage such men from giving public service, and is therefore much to be regretted.

Mrs. NIELSEN: Mr. Chairman, I should like to assure the minister that I support the idea behind the committee now under discussion, provided that committee is really promoting the national unity which we all so much desire. For my own part, I think that in addition to the work of such committees, the best thing we could do to promote national unity and to give people in Canada who come from other countries a sense of being truly Canadian would be to see that they have equal opportunities for education, for employment and for all the other amenities of life in Canada.

I myself was not born a Canadian. Those of us who were born in other countries must naturally take an interest in the countries from which we came. However, I believe I am not even second to the hon. member for Témiscouata in my pride at being called a Canadian, wanting to be called by no other name at the present time. I believe the future of all countries belongs to the peoples who live in them. Although I am interested in the people in England, I believe the future of England and its destiny should be looked after by the people who live there, and not by people living in Canada. The destiny and the future of the people who live in the Ukraine is the responsibility of the people living in the Ukraine, and not of the Ukrainians living in Canada. The future of Poland should be looked after by the people who live in Poland, not by Polish people who live in Canada. The first and foremost duty to every person who lives in Canada, from wherever he may have come, is the destiny of Canada itself, not the destiny of any other nation. The thing that matters to all of us is the future course which Canada takes; the national unity which we promote must be for the good will of all people who earn their living and who help to add to the national income and the betterment of Canada itself.

If this committee is really helping to promote unity in Canada, it is a good thing. But if by any chance there are those who have influence with this committee and who, instead of doing that, are in sly ways keeping alive in the minds of some of the foreign born people of this country old conflicts and ideas which they have brought from the old country, then I would say definitely that this committee is not acting as it should for the unity of Canada.

Some hon. members may have thought the remarks made to-night by the hon. member for Cartier were a little extreme, but I would support what was said by him. I believe that if every honest Canadian who sits in this chamber had read the last book by this man Kirkconnell—I hesitate to call him a professor because that would disgrace the title of many other good men—if they had seen the strong political trends which are so apparent in all his writings, if they realized that this man acts in an advisory capacity to this committee, they would realize that he is not the man to promote national unity. He has written a number of books, the last one being entitled, as has been said already, the "Seven Pillars of Freedom." He professes friendship for our ally the Soviet Union; yet his book is full of sly slanders against that country and its people. He attempts to mislead the people in an artful way and not let them really see the intent behind his book.

I do not want hon. members to think I am defending communists as such. I think everyone knows that the communists do not need anyone to defend them. Their matchless loyalty to the cause of the peoples of the world, their intelligence and heroic fight against the rising tide of fascism when the majority of us did not even know what it meant, will stand the test of time. They do not need me to defend them. This man Kirkconnell says in his book that he expects all communists will attack him and his book. To me that is a sign of his own guilt. He knew perfectly well he was guilty in writing the book, but he had a definite purpose in mind when he wrote it. Anyone who is honest, anyone who is desirous of maintaining unity within the allied cause will realize the disruptive nature of the material which this man is trying to disseminate through this country.

One fact above everything else which is true during this war is the necessity we have for allies. None of us can stand alone in this global war. We shall need these allies in the peace which is to follow if we are to maintain the peace on a global scale also. The future of Canada rests upon two things. First of all, it rests upon a united nations victory. It then depends upon the united nations being able to maintain peace and cooperation among the nations. It depends also to a great degree upon the ability of Canada to export her raw materials, foodstuffs and manufactured articles. Any person or any group acting in an advisory capacity to a committee of this type who deliberately attempts to destroy any chances Canada may have after victory of cooperation with the great nations or of establishing trade relationships with our allies is definitely a traitor to this country. I should like to quote from a speech which was made by Professor Ernest J. Simmons, of the department of Slavic languages of Cornell university, made before a business men's luncheon in Toronto on November 13, 1943. He said:

> The time has come to plan for the peaceful resumption of trade with the Soviet Union. In this I am sure that Canada will play a significant role. The path of trade is the path of peace, for where diplomats may bring nations together with ties of silky words, commerce can unite them with hoops of steel.
> In looking at the vast possibilities of trade with Russia, you must think of their immediate needs as well as post-war. Recently I asked the head of Amtorg, the Soviet commercial agency in America, what Russia's purchasing market would be on this side of the water. The impression he gave me was staggering. He mentioned among other items machine tools. I suggested it might be advantageous to place orders now since no doubt we should be running a surplus of these products even before the end of the war. He smiled and said that huge orders for Russia's peace time consumption of machine tools had already been placed. The Russians move fast. And so must big business in Canada.

He continues:

If Canadian business is to compete on equal terms with its rivals education concerning Russia is essential. Equally essential for future security and progress is for us to rid ourselves of political isolationism, which is a reflection of intellectual isolationism. The intolerance often manifested towards the people of Soviet Russia as well as towards other peoples, is born of ignorance of their way of life.

This man Kirkconnell is not ignorant of their way of life. He has deliberately distorted and misrepresented things for his own end, so that the Canadian people will be confused even more than they have been in the past over this question. Do Canadian business men want such distortions of the truth? If the business men of Canada are to have a chance with our Soviet ally after the war we shall have to build up trust, not create mistrust and suspicion which had their places in the uneasy days from the last war to this war. We must build up a different understanding; we must be prepared to cooperate in peace as we have cooperated in war.

We do not need a man of Mr. Kirkconnell's type spreading slanderous propaganda around the country and largely destroying the opportunities which it is necessary for us to have in the future. I do not believe that either Great Britain or the United States will act in this way. They will do everything possible to build up trust by their people in this ally, so that after the war their business interests will be secure. We do not want Canada put down in third place; we want Canada in first place in having opportunities for trade after the war.

I do not intend to place any more excerpts from this book of Kirkconnell's on the pages of Hansard, because I should not like to sully the pages of Hansard with such slander. What the hon. member for Cartier has put on the record is all that is necessary for the purpose. If any hon. members are interested they can read for themselves what has been said in this book. I should like to compare that with what was said recently by a great Canadian; at least I think of him as a great Canadian. I refer to Mr. Brockington, K.C. I shall always remember that Mr. Brockington was responsible for bringing Sir Norman Birkett to this country in 1941. I shall always remember his clear exposition of British democracy, which was like a fresh wind in the somewhat fetid atmosphere in Canada at that time. Mr. Brockington is known throughout the empire as a purveyor of good will. He does not take the attitude of this man Kirkconnell, and this is what Mr. Brockington had to say at the Canadian-Soviet Friendship Congress held in Toronto, on November 12, 13 and 14, 1943:

Into the consciousness of us all there has come some knowledge of a land with a sacrificial passion for education, that has raised the number of its school children and students from 8 million to 47 million, of its high school pupils from 1 million to 12 million, of its university students from 100,000 to 600,000, that has built more schools in 20 years than the governments of the Czars built in 200 years, of a land where work is the right of all, but, more important, the duty of all.

Where motherhood is a sacred calling and sickness a national calamity.

Where hundreds of devoted scientists follow knowledge like a sinking star and willingly and freely share their achievements with all; where the only hero is a man of action and a man of honest toil.

Where art and music and a strange living beauty walk unchained amongst the people. Where there is no racial inequality amongst 150 diverse peoples and men really believe that "the good Lord has written one sentence of his thought upon the cradle of every race." Where men worship in their own way in the fullness of freedom.

Those are the words of Mr. Brockington, and that is the kind of idea we should spread among our own people, belief in our allies, belief in our ability to work with them for victory and for peace after victory—not to have the name of a gallant ally scurrilously misrepresented and distorted and placed before our people in such a way as to destroy their faith in it. I would feel that this man Kirkconnell is a most undesirable person to have acting in an advisory capacity to this committee. I know he has more than once been recognized to be spreading propaganda of an evil character. There was a time when he was speaking before the Canadian club of Toronto, away back on February 1, 1943, and his speech was to have been broadcast, but after the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation saw the text of it they regarded it as so subversive in the breaking down of unity and in the spreading of prejudice that they did not allow his speech to be broadcast over the air. I would say that such a person definitely should have his whole record looked over, and I certainly hope that the minister will do this before he allows this man to act in any advisory capacity whatsoever. I am sorry to have to say this but I think I must: If the minister does allow this man to stay on in the service of this country in any capacity, and I believe he also acts in some capacity for the Minister of Justice, it can only be understood then that the ministers who employ this man are in sympathy with his ideas. Perhaps I should not call them ideas but rather phobias, because they are not just ideas. I would be sorry to think the minister of this department would share anything with this man Kirkconnell.

I can only say in closing, Mr. Chairman, that any man who does as this man Kirkconnell deliberately does, distort the truth, should suffer as Mr. Churchill says all people should suffer who seek to destroy the unity of the united nations. Speaking in the House of Commons at Westminster, Mr. Churchill once said this of people who try to destroy unity, and I stand by these words:

> Whoever by word of mouth or by written statement attempts to destroy the unity of the united nations, it were better for him that a millstone was hung about his neck and he were cast into the sea.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Mr. Chairman, we have heard this evening what I really think is a pity. We have heard one person after another disparaged for something that has no connection with the item before the house. I would much rather listen to a discussion for the development of Canada or for our own edification and happiness. I would much prefer to hear the hon. member for Parkdale speak as he did this evening. We all know many men who give of their time and their strength and, though not as important, of their money, to work for Canada. They are men of good will, and when I think of those gentlemen, whether it be Mr. Burton, Mr. J. W. McConnell or anybody else, however powerful or however humble, who gives of himself for Canada, particularly at this stage of the world war, I cannot help being reminded of what the angels sang, when our Saviour was born: "Peace on earth to men of good will". There are many men of good will. Let us honour them.

Mr. REID: The setting up of this committee has given rise to quite a number of speeches this afternoon and evening, and as I listened to them I could not help coming to the conclusion that this subject is of great interest to each and every member of the house. The hon. member for Vegreville spoke particularly well. During his speech he asked why people like him who were born in European countries and came to Canada should be called new Canadians. As one who was born, not in this country, but in Scotland and came to Canada in 1909, if I give to him and to the house the viewpoint I had before coming here, it will perhaps answer his question why those from European countries who come here are looked upon as new Canadians rather than those of us who come from England, Ireland or Scotland.

When I left Scotland in 1909 to come to this country I felt that I was coming to a part of my own country because, whether we like it or not, the fact remains that Great Britain had at one time conquered this country and at the time I came here Canada was looked upon as a colony of Great Britain. It was a British country, so that when I came here as an immigrant in 1909 I felt that I was coming to a part of my own country where the language I spoke and the life I had led in Scotland would be understood and find a ready response. When I say, Mr. Chairman, that I knew the language or tongue I spoke would be understood in Canada, it may interest the house to know that I have at various times been called a foreigner, and when I first came to the House of Commons it was said that I spoke neither of the two official languages here. But I would have you bear this in mind, that nevertheless I was always able to make myself distinctly understood, and when I read my remarks in Hansard I am sure they compared favourably even with those of members who had won a Rhodes scholarship in Canada. So that I have no apologies to offer in that respect. I well remember the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and myself going before a committee of this house to oppose a certain group from the province of British Columbia. We went before that committee to oppose the Japanese delegation who also appeared before it; and I remember that the reporter in Ottawa for the C.C.F. newspaper wrote what I thought was a rather cheap criticism of our attempt to do some good, when he referred to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and myself as two foreigners who were more or less on a par with the Japanese. However, the Scottish people always have been of a very forgiving nature and we just let that remark slide.

With regard to this committee and the work it will have to do in Canada, it seems to me that very often the emphasis is placed upon what Canadians should do for the various groups in this country. During the years I have been in this country I have come to the conclusion that perhaps we should ask the groups who come here to do something for themselves. It may well be that we are suspicious of them, that we are somewhat jealous of them and perhaps do not welcome them into the community as cordially as we should. I for one, however, do not see how we can ever become a united country, and a great nation if we allow certain groups within the country to live off by themselves, speak their own language and practically carry on as they did in the country they left. Something has been said recently about Russia and the communists. I am not going to enter into a discussion of those matters to-night, but I have heard a great deal of talk by people who have come from Europe and who belong to the communist organization, on the subject of what a great country is Russia. I well remember that during the unemployment years from 1930 to 1938, when people were on relief, I found upon investigation that not one of these Europeans was willing to return to Russia or any other European country, but I learned that some 60,000 people had made application to be returned from Canada to Great Britain, and I say that with a great deal of pride. There must have been something worth while in the British isles when 60,000 people in this country would request that they be returned there during those trying years, while none of those who were condemning the country, the government, the system and everything else, requested that they be sent back to the land of their forefathers.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I say in future we shall have to be more careful than we were in the past in admitting people into this country; and I do not say that from any wish to put up the bars against immigration. In the past, however, we have permitted to enter this country certain races who can never become really true Canadians. There is the question of blood. I do not see how you can ever mix Asiatic blood and our blood and make a better race. We must face these facts. We had nothing to do with making the black man, the red man or the white man, but the facts are there; and from my reading I have come to the conclusion that wherever the experiment of mixing oriental and white blood has been tried, the resulting progeny has not contributed to the uplift of the race but rather has been a retrogression. So that I say that in future we shall have to give more careful consideration to the kind of people we permit to enter our country for permanent residence.

Then there are the classes or groups of people who have come to Canada and successfully defied our laws. I do not know how this problem can be met. We have in British Columbia a group known as the Doukhobors, who were brought here under order in council. We in British Columbia seem to be alone in our troubles in that regard; at least no other province has the same problem to face. These people do things which are contrary to our laws; they do things we believe to be disgraceful, but nothing has been done to make them obey the law. If any group from the British isles, a group of Scotsmen or Englishmen or Irishmen, had undertaken to disobey the laws of this country, strong measures would have been taken to make them obey; and no matter what it cost I would see to it that every citizen of this country obeys our laws. Until we face actual facts and make up our minds that this must be done, I believe we shall always have trouble. I do not think the fault is altogether ours. These people are living their own lives, speaking their own language and going their own way. They are doing well, far better than they would have done in Russia. They are living much happier lives than they would live in the country they came from; at least that is what I have been told by those to whom I have spoken; yet they are not willing to obey the laws of Canada. This is one of our great problems. If this committee can solve it they will receive all the encouragement and support I can give. This problem has faced every government in the past, however, and is likely to face our governments in the future unless something quite different is done.

I rose particularly to mention these groups within our country and to say to the Minister of National War Services and the Minister of Mines and Resources that those who wish to come to this country after the war will have to be more closely scanned. I for one would not permit any large number of people to take up permanent residence in this country if they could not be assimilated. From some quarters we have heard criticism of the Jews. I do not suppose any country on earth has treated these people better than they have been treated in the British isles, where they look upon those of other racial origins in a different way. We are a little jealous of the business acumen of the Jews; we back away from them, but the Jews who have gone to Great Britain have spurred the British people on to greater efforts in the way of business, and they have been accepted in that country as in no other country on earth. I think we can learn a great deal from the British method of handling these people, notwithstanding Lord Vansittart's statement that the British have been the most foolish of all nations in the handling of foreigners.

A little later in the session I intend to deal with the oriental question, but this is all I have to say at the moment.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): In view of certain statements made during the debate this afternoon, I should like to say just a word in support of this item for cooperation in Canadian citizenship. I was greatly impressed with the remarks of the hon. member for Vegreville this afternoon, the only person of Ukrainian nationality in this House of Commons, and a very worthy member who on many occasions has contributed greatly to the debates of this house. In the province of Manitoba from which I come, some seven members of the legislative assembly are of the same racial origin, and on various occasions these members have made worth-while contributions not only to the debates of that chamber but in various other ways. In the prairie provinces we have many citizens of various racial origins, and I have been surprised at the extent to which they favour an all-out war effort, giving a lead in this respect to many of our citizens who were born in this country. We may well be proud of these people.

For some years I have been concerned over the lack of pride in Canadian citizenship exhibited in certain sections of Canada. This, I believe, has been due principally to lack of leadership in certain high quarters of this country during the past generation. I cannot help thinking that. One probably should not make comparisons, but that great cosmopolitan nation of various racial origins, the United States of America to the south of us, does exhibit far greater pride in national citizenship in its country than we find throughout the Dominion of Canada. For some reason or another that is the fact, and I think we should try to find out just what that reason is and do something to foster greater unity of pride in the citizenship of Canadians. I believe that all our people should unite in a much greater feeling of pride in Canadian citizenship and in all the worth-while successes of this nation. As was pointed out this afternoon, I think something should be done, in the taking of the census in Canada, whereby persons born in this country might be regarded as Canadians rather than as entirely of the racial origin of their father's side of the house. I am sure this would add greatly to pride of citizenship on the part of people of different racial origins. There should be an amendment in this direction.

I suggest also that there should be some amalgamation of the various services which are split up at present under four departments. We have under the Department of National War Services this item that we are now considering for cooperation in Canadian citizenship. This is something that appears as well in the civil estimates. We have in the Department of Mines and Resources the matter of immigration to Canada. Then we have under the Secretary of State the matter of naturalization, while we have under the Department of Trade and Commerce the taking of the census once in so many years. It seems to me that sound business suggests that these four matters should be consolidated under one department which might be designated the nationality branch.

I am one of those who think that in a country such as Canada, with our vast undeveloped natural resources, our very cheap electrical power and the possibilities for the development of cheap electrical power, we might well expect, during the generation following the cessation of the present war, a population of from thirty to fifty millions. That being so, it means that we shall have to have far greater immigration on a selective basis, which is a matter that the authorities must take into account and to which they must give a great deal of thought.

I simply want to add this word in support of the vote before us. I do not think the vote for the work that is being done in this regard is enough. In the public accounts, if I may be allowed to refer to them, there is an item of expenditure for the year ended March, 1943, for a gentleman named Simpson, who comes from Saskatchewan, and who has done splendid work in cooperation in Canadian citizenship. I am informed that though these people have been doing great work during the past year, there has been a cessation or a let-up in their activities. That should not have been permitted, and I should like to have an explanation from the minister. I think he should let us know why there has been a let-up.

In my opinion this vote is well worth while. Indeed, I think there should be a great deal more work in this connection. I simply want to add my word in favour of the work that is being done in this regard. Many of these people do not like to be called new Canadians. Many of them are younger people who were born in the country and they make splendid citizens. I think we should have a greater mixing of racial origins throughout the country. We should put ourselves out to bring about a greater assimilation in various districts throughout Canada. I would appreciate it if the minister would explain the let-up in the work in the past year.

In conclusion, may I express, on my own behalf and, I believe, on behalf of my colleagues, our appreciation of the work that is being done, and urge that it be augmented.

Mr. LaFLECHE: There was less of a let-up than is supposed, in that it did not grow as I had desired. This afternoon I explained how this particular branch, in an extraordinary manner, had been held up by the sickness of the members of the small staff. There were other reasons why it did not grow faster. There was the difficulty of getting proper staff, the difficulty of getting a man to head the branch such as we have now. The increased vote is the measure of the importance I attach to the matter, taking into consideration that one cannot overnight increase the branch several times over with any degree of efficiency. One cannot grow too fast.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): At the outset, Mr. Chairman, I wish to assure you that I am very much in favour of the vote and I regret that it is not a good deal larger, because it is time that some work was started along this line. May I give you my observations. I am one of the new Canadians. I came here before Tom Reid and Ian Mackenzie, but I am still a new Canadian. When I left my own country to settle elsewhere I read about Canada, about its resources and possibilities, and I read that there was room for everyone who was anxious to work. I came to Canada and was told that Canada was a nation composed of two nationalities that were working together, the French Canadian and the Anglo-Saxon. I came to this country forty-four years ago; I have lived here since that time, and I still find that Canada is trying to build up a united nation, while having, not two nationalities but, so to speak, three; because we have approximately 5,000,000 Anglo-Saxons, approximately 3,000,000 French Canadians, and approximately 2,000,000 so-called foreigners. Consequently, we have to reconcile, both outside this house and inside as well, French Canadians, British Canadians and so-called foreigners.

How are we to make a united nation out of this mixture? It is forty-four years since I came here and I find that we are still struggling to bring about unity. In the country to the south of us do you ever hear of anybody being a Swede or a Frenchman or a Scotsman? No; they are all Americans. When the minister is setting up a committee to study this matter he is doing something which is at least one-third of a century behind the times. If we are to have a united nation in Canada we have to forget the various nationalities I have mentioned.

When I first came here there were many Europeans in the country, most of them good people. They came to Canada hoping to find unity, but what did they do? They went to the United States. Many good native Canadians did the same. Now the United States is filled up and is not asking for more immigrants, whereas we are asking for immigrants, and we need immigrants to develop our resources, which are second to none in the world. As long as we squabble among ourselves, however, French Canadians, British Canadians and foreigners, we shall never get anywhere. If this committee that is set up to study this question can do something we shall be accomplishing a great deal to help unite our country and make a nation out of it. I do not intend to take up any more time, but I give that as my observation in support of this committee and this vote. It is a vote that should have been presented to the house at least one-third of a century ago.

Mr. McIVOR: As I have listened to this debate I have learned much. Of course I have been in this country longer than the hon. member who has just taken his seat. I came to Canada from the land of the green isle. I came here because I felt it was the best place on earth to which to come and I have never changed my mind. I have not very much patience with any man who leaves a country and then talks about the great things there were in the country he left behind. If he is any good he will bring some of those things with him.

As I listened to the debate I thought of the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier when he was addressing the youth of Canada and giving them some advice. He said:

> You will be face to face with race prejudice, religious prejudice, class prejudice and nationality prejudice. But I would advise you to understand that love is stronger than hate and faith is stronger than doubt.

When I think of the tie that binds us to the old land—and by the old land I mean England, Ireland, Scotland and Wales—I think the tie is the affection of a mother. You cannot break it. What is the tie that connects us with the country to the south of us? It is the tie of another member of the same family. A neighbour is not strong enough, and we have to be careful to treat both as they ought to be treated. When I hear people speak of their nationality I ask myself, What good are they? What can they do for their country? What can they produce for Canada? What are they thinking about and what is their character worth? I remember when a great artist was asked to paint a picture in support of the text where Christ said:

> Suffer the little children to come unto Me.

When the canvas was removed, those children were not all white; they were not all black; they were not all red; they were the children of all nationalities. I remember when I came by the Canadian Pacific railway in 1894. I was expecting great things from my first view of Canada. I was convinced when coming along the Canadian Pacific railway, I looked at the rocks, that this was a rocky country. When I came to Winnipeg and heard the different expressions of speech, heard men saying, "You bet"; "that makes me mad"; "that makes me crazy," I wondered what use Canada was making of the English language. But, of course, you may not agree that I come from that green isle in which is spoken the best English the world over. When I heard a Scotsman use the Scotch accent I used to sit back and wonder how he was able to do it, but he could with comfort, as shown by the hon. minister for New Westminster.

I agree with the hon. member for New Westminster when he says that when we came to Canada we came not only because she spoke the same language but because there were the same sentiments, the same branches of the Christian church to which we could send our children if we were so blessed. When we think of Canada to-day we should be proud of the fact that she is not all British, not all French, and that she does not belong to any other nationality in the world, but that we are a mixture. Look at our position to-day. Over yonder in the west is Russia; to the east is Great Britain; to the south the United States and Canada in the centre is the heart and soul of the world to-day. There never was a nation that had such opportunities as we have. We have to keep the right things first. I have never considered the right thing to be the dollar yardstick. Leave God out of your nationality. Worship Him as you will but do not leave Him out, and then the peoples who come to this country will get a taste of something which will give them heart to go on.

What about those young Canadians who fall in love with English girls? There have been about three thousand of them. What is to be our reception of them? Are we to tell those little lassies, those young wives and their little ones, when they come, that we love them too; that we are going to see that they get fair play, and that we shall allow them to develop Canada in a way which will beat anything that they have ever seen in the old country? This is a live question and I support this vote wholeheartedly. Let us be men; let us forget narrowness of religious and class bigotry. Let us keep the Almighty first, and then, according to His own statement, all other things shall arrange themselves in rightful order.

Mr. HLYNKA: I just wish to add a few words to what I have said this afternoon. In the first place I believe I should not allow the remarks of the hon. member for North Battleford and the hon. member for Cartier to pass unchallenged. I refer to the remarks which they directed against Professor Kirkconnell. Professor Kirkconnell is not in this committee to defend himself. The very booklet which the hon. member for Cartier and the hon. member for North Battleford quoted contains the following words on its first page:

To my four children for whose sake I covet a democratic and Christian Canada.

[Mr. McIvor.]

In his preface Professor Kirkconnell has this to say. When he undertook to write this booklet and others of similar nature he states that he chose the subject:

For or against Canada?

He then goes on to state:

On that score, the communists were found guilty of treasonous activity against our country at war, their organization was banned, and many of their leaders were interned. After the Soviets had been attacked by Germany in 1941, our communists professed that the war had now become a holy one—

I believe that Professor Kirkconnell can speak for himself, but he has not the opportunity to answer the remarks which have been directed against him to-night. The hon. member for North Battleford said that she hated to call him "professor" because he degraded the very word. I feel that the hon. member of this committee using such extreme and vitriolic language is really casting a reflection upon herself. It is always the best policy to criticize others, if we choose to, but at the same time reserve our tempers to ourselves. So I say the hon. member for North Battleford, who has been in the house as long as I have, could have chosen her words a little more carefully when speaking of a man who is a fourth generation Canadian and who has written in the neighbourhood of thirty books.

This is what appears on the inside of the cover of the little booklet which was quoted:

Watson Kirkconnell, the author of this volume, is a Scotch-Canadian of the fourth generation, born in 1895 in Port Hope, Ontario. He was educated at Queen's university, Kingston, and at Oxford university; and is now Professor of English in McMaster university, Hamilton. He is the author of some thirty published works, more than half of them written in the interests of inter-racial understanding, and was awarded in 1942 the Lorne Pierce Gold Medal of the Royal Society of Canada "for distinguished contributions to Canadian literature."

During eighteen years in western Canada, he acquired by close study a unique familiarity with the languages, the press and the political affiliations of the Canadians of European ancestry.

And this is what is found on the back cover:

Professor Kirkconnell has profound admiration and gratitude for the military prowess of our Soviet allies. He insists, however, that we are being flooded with false propaganda regarding the Soviet Union's economic and political system, and that the exploitation of Russia's war record by our Leftists is part of a revolutionary offensive that has been actually intensified since the dissolution of the Comintern.

That is all I wish to quote from the book.

In addition to that, I should like to quote from a pamphlet written by Professor Kirk-connell in which he gives us information about a similar branch in the United States. He says:

The most important single body set up was the foreign nationality branch of the office of strategic services. This branch has a paid staff of forty, under a director with long foreign service in east-central Europe. There are also some sixty voluntary consultants in the universities of the armed services.

In Canada, when this pamphlet was written, there were only four on the paid staff.

Professor Kirkconnell sets out four reasons for the organization of this branch. He states that some of the methods used have been as follows:

(1) Discrimination against these groups in Canadian industry has been combatted by the initiation of directives to employers throughout Canada and by constant field work by Doctor Philipps.

(2) A major task was the mobilization of European-Canadian communities behind the war effort. This must not be misunderstood. There was no desire to call new "nationality organizations" into existence. The aim was rather to call for a truce on the old political quarrels and hatreds that so often split up these groups into warring factions, and to associate them rather in a single "holding committee" pledged to the support of Canada at war. All this called for the greatest patience and diplomacy. Sometimes the political fires that were thought to be banked down for the duration showed signs of flaring up. But on the whole, there has been a striking development of conscious "Canadian thinking" in the communities that have been thus coordinated.

(3) There has been continual close cooperation with the armed services on the subject of recruiting. In order to encourage this by a recognition of equal rights, steps were taken to have eminent war services by members of New Canadian groups brought to newspaper notice, to have chaplains of their churches appointed to the forces, and to select promising young soldiers of their groups to training as Canadian officers.

(4) The foreign language press is being supplied with a regular mimeographed service of war news and articles from a Canadian point of view. A typical contribution, with a view to encouraging a Canadian consciousness based on knowledge, has been a series of biographies of prominent Canadians, including Sir Frederick Banting, Vihjalmur Stefansson, Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and J. S. Plaskett. This material is being supplied by the Writers' War Committee of Canada—

Under the chairmanship of Professor Kirkconnell.

One last word. I am not sure whether Professor Kirkconnell gets any remuneration for what he is doing in connection with this committee; but I am sure that it takes hours of his time daily, and I know he is best qualified for the job. He is the only man in Canada who commands over forty languages. He has an opportunity to read newspapers and appear at different functions organized by various groups. Undoubtedly he is in a position to know whether he should or should not make certain recommendations to this branch. He acts in an advisory capacity. I may say, too, that no one man could swing the entire branch his way, if there were not enough grounds for his views.

I wish to reiterate what I said previously, that Professor Kirkconnell in these trying years, when it is pretty difficult for some Canadians to know and understand the mental attitude of each and every group within our boundaries, has given much valuable service to Canada. What has been said has shown that sometimes, instead of receiving credit for public service rendered to the people, one receives blame. Evil is thought of him because he does not happen to suit the wishes of one or another group. Instead of that, I should like to see manifested in Canada a spirit whereby we would be ready to give credit to anyone who has done his best in these times to help Canada. I do not think Professor Kirkconnell deserves the remarks which have been levelled against him to-night.

Mr. WOOD: Mr. Chairman, it has been refreshing to me to hear the hon. member for Vegreville come to the defence of Professor Kirkconnell, who is a personal acquaintance of mine. The hon. member has done credit to himself by the gracious attitude he has taken toward this distinguished gentleman. At a time like this when we should be attempting to develop national unity it is unfortunate that the hon. member for North Battleford and the hon. member for Cartier should see fit to refer to this distinguished gentleman in the way they did simply because he happened to write something which did not agree with their own political philosophy. We must adopt a different attitude if we are to have national unity in a country like this where there are so many nationalities.

I am one generation removed from the old country. My grandfather brought my father over to this country from Scotland. My people had the blessing of poverty. I am told that my grandfather's income was $25 a year; yet he raised a family of eight children, educated some of them, and landed in Canada in 1852 with approximately $800. I cannot boast of having been born outside Canada, but I am proud of the type of people my ancestors were and that they had courage enough to come to this land in order to create greater opportunities for me.

We cannot expect to hold this great expanse of country on the northern part of this continent with but 12,000,000 people. I agree with the hon. member for New Westminster, who said that when we bring people into this country it is not only to our own interests but to theirs as well that there should be a reasonable amount of selection. We should try to be sure that they will assimilate Canadian ideals.

I regret that anti-Canadian feelings should be expressed within the walls of this building. I believe that if in the past our immigration authorities had showed more care in selecting those who were permitted to come to Canada it would have been better for all of us. If these people have not been able to accept Canadian ideals, they must be very unhappy. They are not contributing anything to Canadian citizenship by advocating their particular philosophy of life. While I have always believed in a selective system of immigration, I have also believed that we should try to maintain a certain standard of Canadian citizenship. People who desire to come to this country should be subject to the scrutiny of our immigration officers. An attempt should be made to see that they are ready to accept the blessings of this country, accept our ideals. If they are not ready to do that, they should get out of the country.

I rose for the purpose of defending Professor Kirkconnell because of the vilification he had been subjected to to-night. I was proud to follow the hon. member for Vegreville. As he has said, he is one of our new Canadians, a Ukrainian, and he has exhibited a high degree of Canadian idealism even though we may not all agree with his particular political philosophy. He has shown the spirit of toleration which is the only thing that will make Canada a great country.

Mr. MAYBANK: I should like to take part in this debate for a few minutes. Along with other hon. members, I am glad to see this vote in the estimates and I think it would be better if it were a larger vote than it is. I am in agreement with several hon. members who have spoken, because I believe the work of a committee such as this can create tolerance in this country. Tolerance is necessary in Canada and also it is badly needed. Tolerance leads to harmony and there can be no progress in a country without harmony or a reasonable approach to it.

Two hon. members who represent a small minority in this country have spoken to-night, the hon. member for North Battleford and the hon. member for Cartier. In words they advocate tolerance; yet they have given a very poor exhibition of that quality. The hon. member for Vegreville referred correctly to the addresses as being vitriolic. For my part I could not help thinking that the spirit of tolerance shown by these two members was like the quality exhibited by a certain Irishman. A shoemaker who wanted to set up a business was on the road on the way to Antrim, when he met an Irishman. He inquired about the characteristics of the people in that city, the division as between Protestants and Catholics and so on. The man replied that he would find them pretty well divided, and he added that he got along pretty well with both sections. The shoemaker asked him how he did it and he said it was because of his tolerance. But when he described his tolerance it was somewhat of the quality exhibited to-night by these two members. He said, "On the 17th of March I wear an orange ribbon and on the 12th of July I wear a green shamrock, and if anyone asks me where I hang my hat of a Sunday, I tell him to go to hell and punch him on the jaw."

As I listened to the attack by these two hon. members upon an outstanding Canadian citizen I could not help thinking they have no understanding whatever of the quality which they would like to see current in this country. I do not think there should be any multiplication of words on my part in supporting what has been said by the hon. member for Vegreville and the hon. member for Brant. Professor Kirkconnell was for a long time a citizen of my city and one of our most honoured citizens. The people of my city are a discriminating people, and the fact that Professor Kirkconnell was a particularly honoured citizen of Winnipeg is itself a passport that will carry him anywhere in this country or in any other country.

I had the honour of knowing him slightly, not nearly as well as I should have desired. From all that I have known about him I regret that I was not personally better acquainted with him. My chief reason for rising is that I did have some slight acquaintance with him and I have been able to watch his work over a number of years. He came from my city, and for me to have sat silent when there were ill-tempered outbursts against him would, in my opinion, have been to condone a wrong. I shall say no more than that in characterizing these attacks.

I only hope that the minister will never see fit to deprive himself of the benefit of the advice of that kind of man. If we had many more men like Professor Kirkconnell in this country Canada would be a great deal the richer for it, and I am sure that the few members who have attacked him, when they stop seriously to think this over, will be found to agree with me. The man is doing a great service and has been doing a great service for many years, and it is very cheap stuff to come into this house where he cannot reply and from this safe place be a detractor.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Mr. Chairman, I should like to support this vote. In view of the fact that the amount asked for by the minister is only twelve and a half dollars for every million dollars we are voting, the hon. member for Broadview is not on very sound ground when he complains of extravagance.

I wish to present a point of view which has so far not been advanced in the debate and suggest that the department should pay some attention to the older Canadians. We have heard a good deal to-night about the new Canadians. Nothing has been said about the responsibility of the department for the old Canadians.

For some fifteen years I have lived in a community in northern Saskatchewan where I have belonged to a minority group. Like the hon. member for Brant, I happen to be of Scottish racial origin and people of Scottish racial origin are in the minority in that community. The 1941 census shows how very cosmopolitan a community Mackenzie is. The largest racial group there is the group to which the hon. member for Vegreville belongs, the Ukrainians. I should like to say, in passing, that I envy the hon. member for Vegreville his ability to speak so fluently in the English language. If the old Canadians would make some effort to become familiar with the language of other peoples—I refer especially to the English-speaking in this country who refuse to become familiar with the French language, and as we know a great many of our old Canadians refuse to make any effort to become familiar with any of the languages spoken by the peoples who come to this country—it would be very much better for us all. The hon. member for Vegreville puts us to shame when he speaks the English language as very few of us are able to speak it.

I was saying that the largest racial group in Mackenzie is Ukrainian, numbering 18,334. The next largest is the Scandinavian group, numbering 8,424; then English, 6,979; Polish, 5,097; Russian, 4,664; Scottish, 4,025; Irish, 3,955. As a member of one of the minority racial groups in that community I wish to say that it has been a great privilege to live with peoples of so many different nationalities who have made a contribution to this country which has been very valuable indeed. So that I hope that the department will not pay too much attention to the suggestions coming from the hon. member for Brant and the hon. member for New Westminster, that at this stage time should be lost in worrying about whether these people conform to the standards that prevailed in Scotland fifty or sixty or a hundred years ago or conform to the standards which prevail in New Westminster.

I should like to make reference to the valuable contribution which the largest racial group in my community, the Ukrainian group, has made to Canada. They have settled in the northern part of the province where years and years of hard work were required. Many of them went a long distance back from the railway and worked from early morning till late at night, making a great contribution in building up this country. In this time of war, as the Minister of Mines and Resources has said, they have responded in a remarkable way. The man who brings the milk to our home every night is a Ukrainian who has earned his living in a hard way. He has two sons in Italy with the Canadian Army, one being a major and the other a lieutenant. The father and mother, so-called new Canadians, have made a valuable contribution to Canadian life.

In some parts of the country criticism is made of our Jewish Canadians. I have a very small number of Jewish citizens in my riding, some 178 persons, but they responded at the earliest moment in the war and have performed distinguished service. Just the other day I received from the headquarters of the Department of National Defence for Air a photograph of Flying Officer Gelmon, from Preeceville, Saskatchewan, who is in service at Ceylon. This young man who is in charge of flying a Catalina observed a ship that had been torpedoed by a Japanese submarine. He landed his flying boat on the water and rescued all the members of that disabled ship's crew. His record was mentioned over the BBC some time ago, and it was not until his parents drew attention to the fact that he suggested it was all part of the day's work. So that I urge that the minister consider increasing this vote and have some regard for the old Canadians and their responsibility, as citizens in a democracy, to their fellow Canadians who do not speak their language.

Just one final word regarding our responsibility to our Chinese Canadians. It is almost a year now since members of this house heard one outstanding woman of the Chinese race, Madame Chiang Kai-shek, address this House of Commons. We were all deeply moved by the message she brought on that occasion and by the leadership she and her distinguished husband have given. We have all been inspired by the contribution which the Chinese people have made in saving democracy for the world. Yet in Canada we refuse to consider the Chinese born in Canada as fellow Canadians should be recognized when we have the four freedoms at stake. Just this week I had occasion to take up with three departments of government the case of a young Chinese Canadian in British Columbia who has been given the run-around in connection with his offer to do his bit in an important public service. We make it very difficult for those who do not fit into the conventional pattern to make their greatest contribution both in war time and peace time. Therefore, I hope the minister will not be unduly influenced by those who have suggested that this vote should be reduced to $1, or who complain about any expenditure of this kind.

In conclusion, I wish to congratulate the minister upon having secured the services of Robert England who, as the minister pointed out, has a distinguished record in the last war and in this war and who during the years has demonstrated that his viewpoint will inspire confidence and good will among the peoples who have come to Canada to make their homes.

Mr. ROEBUCK: I could not permit this debate to conclude without expressing just a word of approval to the minister for having placed this item before us. It seems to me that if there is any criticism of the amount it is that it is too small, not that it is too large. Earlier in this debate various hon. members have been able to speak as newcomers to this country and to tell of their experiences in coming to Canada from some other land, either a part of the empire or a part of Europe. I am not able to express myself along that line, because I am the fourth generation on both sides of my house to call Canada home. I think I am thoroughly acclimatized as a Canadian, and if anyone, other than my French Canadian friends, some of whom have been here for three or four hundred years, has a right to call himself a Canadian, I think I have that right.

With some deference and some humility, I say that it takes time in order to understand Canada and the spirit of Canada. That understanding is not readily acquired. Canada is different from many other countries of the world, because here there is no dominant religion, no dominant race, no dominant nationality other than Canadian. We have been very fortunate in this country in the development of a broad and sympathetic attitude toward others. Tolerance consists for the most part of good manners. Intolerance always expresses itself in unkindness and bad manners. In our early days we were forced to get along one with the other. I think the French Canadians frequently fail to realize how much in their culture, their diversity of life, their general happiness and well-being they owe to the English-speaking portion of our population. And I can say definitely that we of the English-speaking portion of the Canadian population seldom realize how much we owe to the French. Each owes to the other a great debt of gratitude, if only for the one thing, that we have been forced to live together and to get along with our neighbours. So that we have developed in this country a constitution and society broad enough to tolerate somebody other than ourselves.

Then, following that experience as between the English and the French, we have had the inestimable value of the introduction into our society of people from other lands, chiefly central Europe. I cannot speak too highly of those people whom we somewhat wrongly call new Canadians. They are not much newer than many of the rest of us, but the term designates them and it will do. I come from a riding which is probably as cosmopolitan as any in Canada, and I have always been proud to claim to be a representative of these various groups. For instance, I have a very large Polish vote, and I am pleased to say that it supported me very generously. My heart bled for these people in 1939 when the German mechanized machine overran their country. We of the English race frequently refer to Great Britain as the motherland, but we fail to realize that Canadians have many motherlands. To a great many Canadians Poland is the mother country, and the Polish people in Canada were sorely hurt when Poland was conquered by Germany. I look forward to the time when I can rejoice with my Polish friends, when once more Poland will be free. On many occasions I have joined in the pledge given to the Polish people by the Prime Minister of Great Britain, the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of this country, that we of the united nations will never sheathe the sword until Poland shall be free. Poland has contributed something to Canada by supplying us with a portion of our population from that bold, fighting race which has struggled for freedom as heroically and as long as any other nation on earth.

I have always been happy to think of myself as a representative of the Ukrainian people of my riding, and I wish to join in the compliments that have been expressed to the hon. member for Vegreville. I was sorry, however, that in his recent speech he discussed personalities. I am not much interested in persons, either in attacking or in defending them, for usually they can look after themselves, and that is particularly so in this instance. It is unfortunate that personalities should have been brought into a debate so lovely as this. We are struggling for unity among these races, and you cannot get unity by bringing up here the divisions that you may find in the old land. That is an unfortunate thing that is happening in Canada. These various groups of our population should divide now upon Canadian questions, not upon European matters. So often I find that various portions of the same racial group hate each other because of imported divisions, not because of Canadian divisions. I have been proud to represent the Ukrainian people, whom I have found to be of sterling good character, industrious, strong, healthy, vigorous both in mind and body; a kindly people, very much like ourselves. I have been proud to represent the Italian people of this country, of whom I have a considerable number in my riding. My heart bled for them when we declared war upon Mussolini and left them in a most unenviable position. They are a kindly people thoroughly Canadian, as has been proved by their actions during this war.

Fortunately I come from a riding in which there is not one dominant religion but which is fairly equally divided as between the Catholic, Protestant and Jewish faiths. I feel sure that if more people enjoyed the advantages I have had they would recognize the virtues of these different groups, and there would be less anti-Semitism and fewer antagonisms over opinions on religion.

I welcome this vote. I know it is not necessary to defend it, but I do want to express my approval of it and I hope that every dollar will be spent wisely, as I am sure it will, in developing the idea of a Canada different from most countries, as I have said, not of one race, not of one nationality, not of one religion, but rather a collection of groups each with a respect for the rights of the others and each with sufficient good manners to get along with the rest. Let us have in Canada a nationality broad enough to include within the folds of our common flag men of all races, of all religions, of all nationalities, yes, and of all political opinions.

It is not necessary that men who come from other countries should forget the country of their origin. I have always thought and have preached to those various groups that they are doing a favour to Canada when they maintain their ancient traditions and teach their children the language of their own country. True, it is necessary that they should learn English because that is the language of the dominant language group. It is the dominant language. They will be handicapped if they do not know English. At the same time, they will lose the culture of their own country unless they teach their children the language of their birth.

It is wise that the Polish Canadian should remember the Polish language, its customs and its glorious history. It is wise that Ukrainian Canadians should remember the history of the Ukraine and rejoice that the foreign invader is being chased out of the Ukraine. It is wise that the sons of the Italian Canadian should know the music, history and literature of Italy, and that his children should carry on that glorious inheritance. Canada has been the gainer by the culture, the language, the knowledge and the diversity that these people have brought to our shores. Canada will be a great nation when finally we unite all of these nationalities and groups into one great united and homogenous people.

Mr. KNOWLES: There is one note of warning in connection with this vote which I should like to sound, but before I do so I wish to say that I agree with those who feel that the amount is far too small for the purpose to which it is to be devoted. I am sure it is significant that there has been a debate of this length on an item relatively so small. It indicates that the members of this house feel the importance that attaches to any effort to develop the consciousness of Canadian citizenship among all our people and the sense of unity throughout our country. I feel, too, that I should add to what some other hon. members have said by way of commendation in connection with the securing of Robert England to head this work. I was disappointed and a little disturbed some months ago when Mr. England's resignation was announced from a post in another department of the government, and therefore I was pleased to learn that he had been secured for this very important work.

The minister, speaking earlier this evening about Mr. England's qualifications, mentioned a number of points. I am not sure whether he referred to the fact that his interest in this kind of thing is by no means new. I happen to know Mr. England personally and I know that his interest in the matter we are discussing extends over a number of years. In fact, several years ago he produced a very worth-while book on the subject of central European immigrants in Canada, and I am sure he brings to this task not only the kind of interest that one needs to further this sort of work but the knowledge, ability and experience that are also very necessary. I hope, therefore, that the government will be able to secure, in addition to Mr. England, others who will likewise add to the calibre and quality of the work of this branch, and I hope it will be recognized by the government not just as a branch for which money should be voted in a time of war but rather as a phase of work that should be established on a permanent basis.

I said when I rose to my feet that there was one note of warning I should like to sound. I understand that part of the work of this committee is to feed to our foreign language newspapers material which will enable readers of those papers to get the best ideas about the country in which they are now living, and I may say to the minister that certain complaints have come to me from time to time. I am not sure whether the material that is complained about results from the work of this committee, but it sounds as though it does, from what the minister said earlier to-day. The complaints have been that the material, while it seemed to be boosting Canada and our institutions and form of government, did seem to flavour of propaganda for the government of the day. I sound that note of warning not out of any sense of jealousy. My point is that if anything of that kind does creep in it will defeat the very purpose of a vote of this kind, and I hope the minister will see to it that in so far as it is the job of this committee to feed to the foreign language press of the country articles that boost Canada, to sell to our people the glory of Canadian citizenship and of our institutions, he will see to it that this work is kept free from anything that could be labeled as partisan propaganda.

With that note of warning I wish to repeat what I have already said, that I not only support this vote, but commend the minister for having secured the services of Mr. England to head this work, and I hope that the government will see to it that it is established on a permanent basis.

Mrs. NIELSEN: Some remarks have been passed this evening regarding what I said on the matter of Mr. Kirkconnell. I think the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre stated that I was a little intolerant and a little vicious in my remarks, and so on. I am intolerant, toward one thing, fascism, as I would be intolerant toward any foul and evil thing. I am intolerant, too, of those who by their activities over a period of years have striven to misrepresent to the people of this country fascism and the forces which have fought against it. Although some hon. members of this committee may have personal relationships with Mr. Kirkconnell, that is not the question. It is his work over a period of years, which can be traced very distinctly from his writing, that I am concerned with. The hon. member for Vegreville states that he speaks forty languages. He read out some of the publisher's remarks. That does not say anything to the man's credit at all. Because he speaks forty languages it does not mean to say that he promotes unity. It is a very nice thing for the hon. member for Vegreville to speak about unity and tolerance. You see, the spectacle of the hon. member for Vegreville supporting Mr. Kirkconnell is quite simple to understand. I understand it perfectly. They have had a relationship over a period of years, and it is a case of the two of them being very like-minded. Naturally the hon. member for Vegreville thinks Mr. Kirkconnell is all right. I have in my hand a series of small magazines. They are printed in Ukrainian. The name is "The Call". A series of them have been translated for me. I find in them some of the most vicious and intolerant statements that I have ever found anywhere. Here you will see a gruesome picture and underneath a series of statements, vicious anti-Semitism. The editor is the hon. member for Vegreville. It is very nice for certain people these days to turn around and speak about tolerance. I have no tolerance for fascists and for those who have promoted disunity in the past in this country. I want unity against fascism, and whoever likes to disagree with me let them take their stand. I am against fascism. That is all I wish to say.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I wish to say a few words before the vote carries. As we all know, there are groups of people whom we term new Canadians. They are found nearly everywhere in Canada. I take it from the excellent speeches made this evening that this committee is definitely of the opinion that these new Canadians shall not remain strangers within our gates; that there is a widespread desire, as represented by what has been said in this committee, to do our share to help these men, women and their children to love Canada more because they will know Canada better.

I must say that I am tolerant, although in some respects I find it extremely difficult to be kind even in thought to certain kinds of people. But those who live in Canada, those who during this war have done good work, have my appreciation. I certainly am tolerant toward them, and in saying that I have in mind the gentlemen who have been taken to task this evening altogether too harshly. In my opinion that is the case. I do not know Professor Kirkconnell very well, but from my point of view and my knowledge of the work he does for my department I have every reason to believe he is an excellent gentleman. What other people may think of him I do not know, because I do not know their relationship with him.

At any rate, Mr. Chairman, this has been a very encouraging day to me. Whilst our boys are fighting for our safety we at home should work at national unity. I think this has been a good day in that regard.

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to say that in so far as Professor Kirkconnell is concerned I reaffirm what I said this afternoon. He was engaged by this government to write a book to which I objected in this house in 1940 and 1941. The book dealt with the British born and the foreign born. It was the glorification of the foreign born as against the other. From the information contained in the immigration figures at the time I say the information contained in his book was wrong. In this book he said that the British born had more cases in the law courts than the Japanese. I opposed it at the time and called the attention of the committee to the booklet. It was circulated in England and did a lot of harm to immigration. He made a speech at the university of Toronto in January, 1942, in which he said there was no more room in this country for the British born. He said there was no land available. That was after the battle of London. I looked into the book. It was a glorification of one section of the country against the other. He has changed it all now. He seems to be writing books the other way at the present time. He seems to be writing books on communism now. I have expressed no opinion about what he said, but I have been an opponent of that particular system for many years. My views are well known to this committee. I reaffirm and reassert what I said this afternoon. I believe there should be equality of treatment for all classes. I believe there should not be race or religious jealousy in this country. I have never had any and I have not had any at any time in this committee. That is all I wish to say regarding that professor. He goes on to refer to other component races who have been here for generations. I obtained the booklet at the time it was printed. Large numbers of copies were distributed in England at a grave time of the war in 1941 and did great damage to immigration from the British isles and from other places.

Mr. HLYNKA: I wish to take a minute or two to correct the impression which perhaps may have been left by the remarks of the hon. member for North Battleford. It seems that the hon. member is making a habit of attacking certain individuals. She made a statement to the effect that some of my writings which appeared in the publication which I published in 1935 contained writings which were anti-Semitic. I wish to state, here and now, that at no time in my life have I ever written anything or said anything which was anti-Semitic. I wish to add also that just because I was the publisher of the magazine it does not necessarily mean that I wrote every word that appeared on the pages thereof. Certain individuals contributed to my publication and I published the things which I felt would be of interest to my people. One of the writers who came from Europe and who was a witness of conditions there, and who knew the history, wrote an article which condemned certain leading men of Jewish nationality in the Soviet Union. That was all. Therefore the article was not mine at all. There were two articles altogether on this subject. The other article which appeared was a translation by another man also. He asked me to publish it and I did. I published not only articles that were anti-this or anti-that, but articles that were of various natures, articles which gave information on various topics

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I wish to correct this propaganda which has been circulated and levelled at me personally for many years of being anti-Semitic. I never have been and I never intend to be, because I have not the reason for it, and it is not in my make-up. So I just wish to correct the remarks which the hon. member made to-night.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. RALSTON moved the adjournment of the house.

Mr. GRAYDON: What is the business for to-morrow?

Mr. RALSTON: As business for to-morrow we propose to continue with the war appropriation resolution, but it is proposed to suspend consideration of the item under the Department of National War Services and take up the items under the Department of Labour.

If that should by any chance be finished, we shall resume with the Department of National War Services.

Mr. GRAYDON: I wish to lodge a protest to the acting leader of the government with respect to this change in the order of business in connection with the war appropriation resolutions. There was a definite arrangement made both last session and this session that these departments would be taken up, one department after another, and when one department was finished another would be commenced. This is the first time in two sessions that the government has asked for a change in that arrangement, which was entered into at the time at the instance of the government, if I may say so. I wish to protest. I do not know how far my protest will go, because I recognize the government has some powers in these matters. However, we are not in favour of it.

Unless there is some extraordinary circumstance of an emergent nature we do not wish to have the order changed, because this procedure establishes a change not only now, but also establishes a precedent which perhaps might be carried into another session as well. I think our rights must be protected, and for that reason I rise to protest, and ask the government not to make the change which is suggested.

Mr. RALSTON: I say to my hon. friend that I would be the last to attempt to break any arrangement which has been made. I am not conscious of any arrangement such as my hon. friend suggests. We do this in connection with other items; that is to say, on the estimates. We take up one department and do not finish it, and another department may come in next. My hon. friend is quite right when he says it has been the custom to continue with one department and go through with it before another is reached, under the war appropriation measure.

However, in this instance, the circumstances happen to be special, and I would hope that my hon. friend would so consider them. They happen to be of a special nature. My colleague the Minister of Labour will have to leave to go back to the conference at Philadelphia very shortly and he is anxious, and I believe the house and country will be as anxious as he is, that the items under his name might be taken up—and I hope finished—before he goes.

In connection with the length of time which has been taken in the discussion by the estimates of the Department of National War Services, I may say, without any criticism whatsoever, that they have been considerably longer than was anticipated. It is necessary that the committee should at least begin the discussion of the items under the department of the Minister of Labour, because there are one or two other matters of very important business which necessarily will have to be brought in next week. And it may be that if this procedure is not followed the items under his department may not be finished before he goes. That is the special circumstance under which this is being done.

I join with my hon. friend most heartily in the desire to finish one department before another is brought on, because I think that is the easiest way to do business—certainly it is the easiest for the government. Then, members of the cabinet are not kept waiting for their estimates, and they are not so uncertain as to when they may come up. But this is a special case, and I trust hon. members, including my hon. friend, will so regard it, having regard to all the circumstances.

Mr. POULIOT: How long is the Philadelphia conference supposed to last?

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot tell my hon. friend that.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I say to the leader of the government that there is no guarantee, as I see it, that the Minister of Labour will be allowed to proceed during the next week to a point where he would finish his war appropriation estimates. That puts it in a very awkward position, so far as we are concerned. I believe we are perhaps going to find ourselves with the estimates of the Department of National War Services unfinished, with those of the Department of Labour unfinished, and with certain new legislation which it is expected will be taken Monday in an unfinished state. That is the position.

For these reasons we protest against the change. As I say, perhaps the government has the right to set the programme, and to make a change in a succeeding session; but I must confess that I am very much disappointed that the government has taken this position. It has upset, and will upset the arrangements which were arrived at and which, I repeat, were not arrangements entered into lightly. They were arrangements which definitely formed part and parcel of the whole war appropriations resolutions debate structure.

Mr. RALSTON: I am sorry my hon. friend has repeated what he said, because I think he will find there was no arrangement that each department would be taken through to the last item. In the second place I submit to the house that the circumstances which I have mentioned are extraordinary and should be taken into consideration. I hope the house will do that.

Third, may I say I do not quite share some of the apprehensions entertained by my hon. friend with respect to the fact that there is more than one item of unfinished business before the house. With all due respect, in my fourteen years in the house I have not seen much evidence of the house going right through with any important item before taking up anything else. The house has been anxious to put its business forward one or two stages at least, and then proceed to the discussion of some other item.

That is what is being done here, and I do not think there is anything very shocking about it. I do trust that the result will show that nothing has been done to interfere with the rights of hon. members, and I hope it will be found that this procedure will expedite public business.

And last, but in my mind not the least, the items standing in the name of the Minister of Labour are extremely important. I have been anxious particularly to see to it that the service departments, and the departments more vitally connected with the war, should be before the house as soon as possible. I hope the house will enter upon the business to-morrow as I have outlined it.

Mr. POULIOT: Would the Minister of Labour be kind enough to say how long that conference is intended to last?

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not know.

Motion agreed to, and the house adjourned at 11.10 p.m.

Friday, April 28, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

THIRD AND FINAL REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. SAMUEL FACTOR (Spadina): I wish to present the third and final report of the special committee appointed to consider the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, in relation to the taking of the vote of the armed services. May I suggest that the reading of this report be dispensed with, as both the report and the schedule will appear in Votes and Proceedings. The report itself is short, but the schedule is quite a lengthy document.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think we can come to an agreement with respect to that, provided that no concurrence is moved to-day and hon. members in the meantime will have an opportunity of reading the documents.

Mr. FACTOR: There will be no concurrence asked for to-day.

Mr. SPEAKER: It will appear in Votes and Proceedings.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 88, respecting the Kettle Valley Railway Company.—Mr. Stirling.

HOUSING

DEPENDENTS OF MEMBERS OF ARMED FORCES

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Acting Prime Minister): I should like to make a brief statement with regard to the matter of housing which is forecast in the speech from the throne. An announcement will be made in due course regarding the scope and the purpose of the programme, but I want to say now that it is proposed that the measure will be wide enough to include special provision for houses which may be required to accommodate dependents of members of the forces for whom housing accommodation is not otherwise available. It is expected that this particular class of house will be dealt with along the lines of the procedure adopted concerning houses built under the Wartime Housing Act, certain of which were, in special instances, allotted to city and municipal authorities to be administered by them for the relief of dependents of members of the forces urgently in need of housing accommodation.

SITUATION IN TORONTO AND ELSEWHERE—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to move the adjournment of the house. It is the same motion as the one I asked leave to move yesterday.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member yesterday sent me a notice of his motion, which reads as follows:

Mr. Church asks leave to move, seconded by Mr. MacNicol, the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the urgent need of houses in the city of Toronto and other places in Canada and for the purpose of calling the attention of the government to the urgent need of immediate emergency measures relating thereto.

Naturally, when a motion such as this is before the house, moved by an old parliamentarian, and, if I may say so, one of the most highly respected members of the house, I have considered it with care, and with more particular care because of the fact that before such a motion can be put to the house there must be a degree of urgency to justify me in doing so. In the motion before me I cannot find that degree of urgency.

There is a motion on the order paper standing in the name of the hon. member for Broadview which deals with the question of housing, which in the ordinary case, if these notices of motion had been dealt with as they have been in previous sessions of this parliament, might not have been reached. But when the hon. member introduced his motion I recalled that some statement of policy had been made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) with regard to the legislation which was to come before the house. On the 24th of April last the Prime Minister, at page 2282 of Hansard, indicated the legislation which would come before the house, among which he mentioned national housing legislation; and to-day I heard for the first time, as the hon. member has heard, the statement of the acting leader of the government (Mr. Ralston) that legislation with regard to housing will be brought into the house, and it will then be discussed.

I must therefore rule that there is not that degree of urgency in the motion to justify my putting it to the house, because the hon. member will have the opportunity of discussing housing when the bill is before the house.

Again, there is this feature, that the hon. gentleman may bring up the subject of housing on the motion that the house go into committee of supply. I must therefore rule that there is not the degree of urgency in the motion of the hon. gentleman to justify my putting it to the house.

Mr. CHURCH: May I point for the consideration of Your Honour that the rule of anticipation is not relevant here. The rule about asking leave to move the adjournment of the house provides that the subject must not have been discussed in the house before during that session, meaning a substantive motion. There has been no substantive motion on housing. True, questions on housing have been asked, and there was some comment on housing in the debate on the address. The matter I wish to bring before the house is one of very great urgency, and I would point out to Your Honour that I have had no opportunity of bringing it before the house as an amendment to the motion for supply because we have not had a motion for supply in the last few weeks. Surely this is an emergency question, and might I not have the leave of the house to speak on it for only a few minutes? I suggest that I be given five minutes to point out the urgency of the situation in Toronto. There are only forty-eight hours left in which to take action. That is the reason for the urgency.

Mr. SPEAKER: Personally I have no objection to listening to the hon. member, but if I gave him the opportunity to discuss the matter I could not withhold the same privilege from other hon. members. I have carefully considered the motion of the hon. gentleman and I have come to the conclusion that there is not that urgency in the motion which would justify me in giving leave to discuss it.

Mr. CHURCH: May I point out, Mr. Speaker, that you have related this motion of mine to other resolutions. In view of that, I appeal from your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no appeal. Under standing order 31 I have already decided in this session, as well as in previous sessions, and my decision is confirmed by most of the Speakers who have had the question before them, that this is not a point of order which the Speaker has to decide. It is a matter for the judgment of the Speaker as to whether there is that degree of urgency which would justify him in putting the motion. I have already dealt with that. As a matter of fact, in order that this point may be made absolutely clear, although I think it has been made clear by the decisions which have been given by Speakers in former parliaments and by myself in this parliament, to remove all doubt the special committee on the revision of the rules has brought in a recommendation dealing with that very point. In the meantime there can be no appeal. It is not a point of order, but a question which lies absolutely within the discretion of the Speaker to decide.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted a word on this?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: I rise to a question of privilege.

Some hon. MEMBERS: The hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) has the floor.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have no objection to the hon. member preceding me.

Mr. A. W. ROEBUCK (Trinity): I do not give precedence to anybody in the house in my right to speak. Your Honour, I appreciate that your decision is based on the question as to whether there is urgency—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman must take his seat. I have given my ruling, and I cannot and do not intend to recede from it. I cannot allow any discussion on my ruling.

Mr. ROEBUCK: There has been discussion.

Mr. GRAYDON: I thought that the hon. member for Trinity was rising to a question of privilege and I did not want to precede him. My question of privilege is this. Your Honour mentioned that the committee on the rules has brought in a recommendation on this point of procedure, which indicates that there is at present a doubt about it. I think therefore under the circumstances allowance should be made for an appeal from your ruling. My second point is that I was surprised that the acting leader of the government made the announcement he did at this time with respect to housing and that it should then have been referred to by Your Honour.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to follow a bad example. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition, may I suggest, is taking perhaps more than full advantage of a courtesy which has been extended to him from time to time as leader of the opposition to rise and make protests after rulings have been given by the Speaker. That is a courtesy; it is not a right. The remarks my hon. friend has just made, as he knows, are entirely out of order. I rose to make a statement with regard to housing because of the fact that there is in the country and has been for some time past some concern with regard to housing and I thought it might relieve the situation if I indicated one of the subjects which would be dealt with this session in the housing programme of the government. I am open to no censure for having done so. I thought my hon. friend would have appreciated the fact that I had mentioned that housing would be dealt with this session so that he and the house and the country might know that the government had in mind this very important subject.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have always given the leader of the opposition a certain latitude, more than any other member, because of the very fact of his position. But when he says that there is a doubt as to what the rule is, may I say that, if doubt may be in the minds of some, it is not in my mind. I am perfectly clear that the action I have taken is in accord with the decisions of previous Speakers of the house, as it is in accord with my own judgment But in order that there may be no possible error, that all who read may know, the question has been dealt with by the special committee on the rules of the house.

I may say also that I knew nothing of the statement that was made by the acting leader of the government. Apart altogether from statements which may have been made by him to-day, I had come to the conclusion yesterday to rule the motion out of order, on the ground I have already stated. Therefore there can be no further discussion.

[Later:]

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I wish to know from the acting Prime Minister whether supply will be called shortly, so that the matter of housing may be raised by the opposition.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Acting Prime Minister): I cannot give my hon. friend an answer at the present time.

Mr. LOCKHART: Arising out of the statement which the minister made with respect to housing, did I understand him to say that legislation will be enacted shortly? There was a disturbance in the chamber and I could not catch his words.

Mr. RALSTON: What I said was that an announcement of the general programme would be made in due course. I rather anticipate that an announcement with regard to the particular subject I dealt with here may not await an announcement of the full programme, but I would not go further than that. I rose to indicate that this particular subject will be specifically dealt with.

Mr. LOCKHART: I want to urge upon the minister that he try to deal with this subject independently of other matters.

Mr. CHURCH: People are being thrown out on the street. Surely that is evidence of urgency.

QUESTION OF EXTENSION TO WINNIPEG OF HOUSE CONVERSION PLAN

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I have a question to direct to the Minister of Finance, notice of which I sent to his office earlier to-day. In view of the telegram he received from the Winnipeg city council on Tuesday, and in view of his statement a week ago that the matter was being considered, will the minister say whether a decision has been reached in the matter of extending to Winnipeg the benefits of the house conversion plan?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, when I answered the hon. member before I was not aware that this matter had been referred to the housing coordination committee and that the application had been refused. I asked that it be considered again, along with some other applications, and I do not think that that consideration has been given.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister did receive from the Winnipeg city council the telegram to which I referred?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think so. I do not recollect that I did.

Mr. KNOWLES: It was a rather strong telegram from the Winnipeg city council which was sent to the minister on Tuesday. I received a copy, and I referred to it in a letter which I sent to the minister on Wednesday.

Mr. ILSLEY: At any rate, I took steps to get it before the housing coordination committee after my hon. friend asked the question, and it has not been considered yet so far as I know.

CANADIAN ARMY

OVERSEAS SERVICE—PRESS REPORTS OF REMARKS OF MAJOR GENERAL PEARKES TO PERSONNEL IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. ROY (Gaspe): I desire to address a question to the Minister of National Defence in connection with the important statement made by him yesterday as to the campaign that is going on among the draftees in order to get them to sign for overseas service. Should one understand from that statement that the minister endorses and supports the language or talks of Major General Pearkes which he used speaking to the draftees last Friday at Vernon and Saturday at Victoria and as reported by the press?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I have not seen any report of the remarks to which my hon. friend has referred. General Pearkes is a soldier and a citizen with a very distinguished record and one who has done magnificent service not only to the army but to Canada generally. I would fully expect that any statement which he actually did make—I do not know whether the reports to which my hon. friend refers reproduce his statements accurately or not—are such as I can endorse.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROY: I do not question the gallantry of Major General Pearkes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ROY: I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that I do not question the gallantry of Major General Pearkes, but what I want to know is whether such language as he used can be used among draftees or not.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Why don't they join the army?

Mr. ROY: And what he said at Vernon and Victoria has been published in every newspaper in Canada.

LABOUR CONFERENCE

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANIZATION—POST-WAR FINANCIAL AND ECONOMIC POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to address a question to the Minister of Labour. News dispatches appearing in to-day's press indicate that the Canadian delegation to the international labour organization meeting in Philadelphia yesterday failed to achieve unanimity with respect to a resolution introduced by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour said to be designed to take from the current meeting the authority to define the role of the international labour organization in the post-war international order. It is stated that one of the Canadian delegation, Percy R. Bengough, indicated his opposition to the proposal, stating that he would fight against its adoption. On April 20, at page 2180 of Hansard, I directed an inquiry to the Prime Minister with respect to this matter, asking him if the government had given consideration to the point and, if so, what decision had been reached as to Canada's policy. I also asked him if the Canadian delegates to the meeting had received any directions from the government relating to the matter. To this inquiry the Prime Minister stated that no instructions had up to that time been so given. I would like now to ask the Minister of Labour if the stand taken by his parliamentary assistant was made on the instructions of the government and if the position taken by him at the meeting has the full approval of the minister and the government.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I would say by way of preface that since the international labour organization is a deliberative assembly like this House of Commons, at times differences of opinions arise in the early stages of discussion and upon particular questions. Further in answer to the leader of the opposition, I would say that the resolution which was submitted in line with the policy expressed by the Canadian government delegate in his speech, far from being a move designed to block or delay progress, is designed to secure the earliest possible and most effective action on four fundamental constitutional problems before the international labour conference. Each of these involves important considerations which cannot, because of the constitution of the organization and the nature of the subject, be finally settled at this conference. The Canadian government delegates fear that the conference might come to an end with no machinery having been set up to continue work on these questions. The resolution provides for consideration of them by the conference now and continued consideration after the conference. They accordingly have proposed that a committee shall sit during and after the conference. Their resolution is intended to help the organization to secure the action which all members of the organization want in the shortest possible time.

The government believe that the I.L.O. has an important role to play and they favour the adoption of a broad declaration of purpose along the lines proposed to the conference by the international labour office. No step must be taken which will interfere with the legitimate and most useful role of the organization, made up of representatives of governments, workers and employers. The main consideration now is to see that the future of the I.L.O. is not jeopardized, and that the I.L.O. is fitted into its proper place in the emerging international organizations.

Mr. GRAYDON: I take it from what the minister has said that the stand of the parliamentary assistant was in accordance with government policy.

SUGAR

RATIONING—REPORTED CHANGE IN UNITED STATES ALLOTMENT FOR CANNING PURPOSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Inasmuch as it is reported the United States government has promised to allow United States people twenty-five pounds of sugar per member of the family for canning purposes in 1944, while Canada is reported to be allowing only ten pounds per member, will the minister make a statement to the house on Monday or at some early day setting forth the facts of the situation and the reasons therefor?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I shall have to verify the fact that the United States government has promised twenty-five pounds per person. I had no knowledge of that. I would think that when the wartime prices and trade board estimates are before the house would be soon enough to go into the matter, but if the hon. gentleman wants an answer sooner, and I can do it briefly, I will give it to him. I do not think it would be appropriate to make a long statement on the subject on the orders of the day.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It need not be long. There is a great deal of uncertainty in the country by reasons of these reports. I am merely stating what is reported.

Mr. ILSLEY: If I can make a short statement I will do so at an early day.

WHEAT

PARTICIPATION CERTIFICATES FOR CROP YEARS 1940-41-42

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can he inform the house whether any payments have yet been made on the producer participation certificates for the crops of 1940-41-42. There are a good many million dollars involved and many producers are waiting to see if they can get the money within the next few days to enable them to buy victory bonds. It would help materially in the sale of bonds if payment could be rushed in the next week.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The payments referred to will be made immediately, I believe.

Mr. PERLEY: In time for the farmers to use the money for the purpose I have indicated?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I wish to amplify the statement I have just made The hon. member for Qu'Appelle knows the extent of the actual physical operations involved in getting out these payments to roughly two hundred thousand farmers in western Canada. The facilities of the wheat board have been stretched to the utmost to get the work under way. They are working practically day and night to get the payments out and I am in continuous touch with them urging that they do what I know they are trying their utmost to do, to get the payments out at the earliest possible date. I expect they will start within a day or two, very soon at any rate.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Thursday, April 27, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

National selective service programme, $11,002,429.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Chairman, the committee have been given the latest information on the expansion of our armed services and have been brought up to date on the production of the materials and facilities for war.

Man-power is basic to all accomplishments, and my colleagues, I believe, will be the first to agree that the work of the Department of Labour is an integral part of the story of achievement which they have been privileged to tell.

In my opinion the true yardstick of a successful man-power policy is the degree to which the armed forces are mobilized for the job of fighting and the material resources organized for maximum output of munitions, food and all the other things necessary.

At the end of 1943 we had more men and women in our forces than at any previous time in our history. Despite this, production for war was on an unprecedented scale.

It must be realized that as new types of war equipment are required, or as the emphasis of military requirements changes, we must revise our man-power allocation to meet the new needs.

I have before me a table which shows that 5,057,000 or 57 per cent out of a total population of 8,820,000 aged fourteen and over were in the armed forces or at work at December 1, 1943. From the beginning of the war to that date there was a total increase of 1,317,000 or 35 per cent in the number at work or in the armed forces; from January 30 to December 1, 1943, we added 177,000.

Growth in the number of women in employment and in the services has been phenomenal, increasing from 638,000 in August, 1939, to 1,075,000 as of October 1, 1943, a gain of 437,000 in the four years.

The strength of our armed forces has gone up by 759,000 since war began; 124,000 joining the forces in the ten months ended December 1, 1943. The number of workers of both sexes in war industry alone was 1,104,000 at the same date.

[Mr. J. A. MacKinnon.]

We have arrived at our present position by constant adjustment of the selective service machinery capable of putting the most workable plans into effect.

Every effort has been made to bring into our man-power pool the skill and services of all our people. We had, as we know, a breathing space in the early months of the war. We were able to study the problems of man-power control, in which we had little experience on this continent. After the fall of France in the summer of 1940 Canada was looked to as an arsenal of supply in the battle for world freedom. Compulsory calls for military training were introduced. We took stock of our human resources through national registration. We buckled down to the task of augmenting our skilled man-power, notably through the war emergency training programme. Many other measures were adopted to effect a general mobilization of our industrial and man-power assets.

Selective service was introduced through orders in council which became effective on March 23, 1942. Under P.C. 2250 permits to enter certain classes of industries and occupations were required. P.C. 2251 stabilized employment in agriculture. These two orders in council were the basis of operation for two months.

P.C. 5038, passed in June 1942, ordered every person, male or female, regardless of age, to obtain a permit for any employment. There were a few minor exceptions to this broad rule.

In August, 1942, P.C. 7595 replaced P.C. 5038. Under this order:

Permits to seek and enter employment were required;

Employment could be terminated only on service of notice of separation;

Employers had to report vacancies;

A basis for a labour priority schedule was established.

Advertising for help was controlled. Compulsory direction of unemployed persons to employment came into effect.

Provisions were made for reinstatement in employment and supplementary allowances.

These selective service regulations continued in force until January 19, 1943, when the present order in council P.C. 246 took effect. This order consolidated all the selective service regulations relating to civilians, includings those dealing with technical personnel and labour exit permits. Major developments in the regulations since then have been in the way of compulsory transfers of civilians.

Selective service also was given authority to direct to any suitable employment persons who had been found unfit for service in the armed forces.

In September last, it was decided that no person employed in a "designated establishment" could leave his employment without the permission in writing of a selective service officer. Correspondingly, the employer could not discharge an employee in such an establishment without permission. "Designated establishment" means an establishment which has been given an "A" or "B" labour priority rating.

Our major problem on the civilian side is to maintain an adequate working force in the high priority industries. The system of separation notices has done much to maintain man-power in war production.

The rules are not inflexible, being administered in a practical sense as a control rather than a prohibition. Where good reason for termination of employment either by employee or employer is shown, the selective service officer gives approval and an attempt is then made to place the worker in other high priority employment. In order that the local office may do the job assigned to it, it must have a complete picture of both supply and demand. It must have available information regarding all existing vacancies and knowledge of the men and women available to fill those vacancies. It then is in a position to make use of the labour priority schedule and continue the movement upward of available employees into the higher labour priority brackets.

During 1943 some 1,944,026 placements were made by our employment service offices.

The national selective service advisory board was reconstituted in March, 1943. No significant regulations concerning man-power are issued without approval of this board. It is one of the major instruments for consultation and collaboration between government, employers, workers and farmers.

Next is the national selective service administration board, over which the director of national selective service presides. This board is composed of the associate directors of national selective service and carries the burden of the day-to-day administrative problems. As members of the administration board are also members of the advisory board, coordination of advisory and administrative functions is as complete as possible.

Decentralization has been provided for by the appointment of regional directors and regional national selective service advisory boards in Quebec, Ontario, the prairies and the Pacific. An advisory board for the maritimes will be constituted in due course.

These regional boards are under the chairmanship of the respective regional directors and include the chairmen of the mobilization board and the regional employment committee, the regional employment superintendent, one or more representatives of labour, representatives of the wartime prices and trade board and the Department of Munitions and Supply.

These boards act in an advisory capacity to the regional director in the same way that the national board assists the director of national selective service. To these boards I am adding representatives of the Departments of National Defence and Agriculture.

It was extremely fortunate that unemployment insurance was inaugurated in 1940 as this led to the creation of a national employment service. Thus we laid a solid foundation for our war-time man-power machinery. Up to 1940 there was no wholly dominion employment service. Now there are 242 offices in five regions across Canada, staffed by some 5,200 persons.

It is in the nature of things that complaints are given publicity, whereas the praises of our employment service are seldom heard. An incident comes to my mind which suggests the other side of the picture. It concerns the work of the Edmonton office. The American authorities called the manager of the local office one Saturday morning requesting 250 men for a construction camp to leave for Waterways on the following Monday. When the manager inquired what they wanted in the way of men, the reply was to the effect, "You know what we want—superintendent, foremen, carpenters, labourers, cooks, handymen—everything that goes to make up a camp, and we want them on the train Monday morning." When asked whom the men would be working for the reply was, "We don't know yet—you will have to coin a name for the contractor because we haven't let the contract yet or formed any company to handle it." To cut a long story short, the local manager got busy with two radios, sending out calls at intervals on Saturday afternoon and evening. He opened the office at 6 a.m. on Sunday, kept it open all day, opened again at 6 a.m. on Monday, arranged for a special train and at 11 a.m. on that morning the train pulled out for Waterways with 250 men on board.

When I addressed the committee in June last only two compulsory labour transfer orders had been issued and our experience in the problem of compulsory direction was limited. We have now seven orders which are applicable to every male person who has attained the age of sixteen years and has not attained the age of forty-one years. The orders issued to March 15 have involved an examination of the employment of no fewer than 99,453 individuals who have been personally interviewed. There have been 15,359 transfers. It is worth noting that very few of the 15,000 raised any objection and in the extremely few cases which did arise, forty or so in number, there were adjustments without having to resort to prosecution.

I do not mean to imply, Mr. Chairman, that national selective service regulations in general would be of value if there was not some power of enforcement behind them, but it was recognized that time should be given to allow for public education.

As of August 1, 1943, only a small number of prosecutions had been commenced. It was then decided to take a more serious view of instances of non-compliance and contraventions. A vigorous policy of enforcement has since been carried on.

At the present time, the machinery of the department includes an extended enforcement organization operating in our five regional divisions. From July, 1943, to the end of February of this year, 14,765 cases of reported contraventions were investigated and studied. Apart entirely from the number of actual prosecutions much constructive work is being accomplished in the adjustment of complaints and settlement of disputes.

It will be noted that the number of reported contraventions indicates that a very important work is being done in adjusting and settling disputes in the field, in fact over ninety-five per cent of the cases are settled without prosecution. The general acceptance of these wartime rules and restrictions by employer and employee alike indicates a spirit of cooperation on the part of the great majority of those affected.

Steps have been taken to protect the personal liberty of the individual against what might be felt to be an arbitrary ruling of a national selective service official. Any man who is directed by a selective service officer to leave his employment for higher priority work, or who is directed to remain in his present employment, or any person who is affected by the ruling, order or direction of a selective service officer, has the right of appeal to a court of referees.

These courts were originally established for hearing appeals regarding unemployment insurance benefits. They have an equal number of employer and employee representatives on them, with an impartial chairman, are constituted on a district basis, and are not subject to administrative control. The result is that an appeal is heard by a court whose members are familiar with labour conditions in the district. Here is democracy in action. These courts have heard over 2,500 appeal cases up to the 31st March, 1944. Considering the tremendous volume of work which has fallen upon selective service officers it is of considerable significance that such a small number of their decisions have been appealed. The fact that less than one-third of the total number of appeals heard were allowed, is also strongly indicative of the soundness with which selective service officers have made directions, rulings and orders.

I should like now to deal with the specific branches, particular problems and achievements of the Department of Labour's wartime activities.

Women's division. I am glad to record here the magnificent part played by the women of Canada in all phases of our war effort. They have come forward voluntarily to accept all kinds of work at a rate and with a spirit that is nothing short of spectacular.

Mr. GRAYDON: They do not always get enough credit for it, though.

Mr. MITCHELL: I would agree with my hon. friend, and would go further. I speak more particularly now of Great Britain, where I have seen how it has worked out, but I do not think we could win this war without the women. I believe the contribution being made by the women of Great Britain and Canada is perhaps a little better than that of the men. I may be criticized for making that statement; nevertheless, I believe it.

Mr. GRAYDON: Excepting the contribution of the armed forces, you are on pretty safe ground there.

Mr. MITCHELL: This has released much man-power for the armed forces and for essential industry. As I stated earlier it is estimated that on October 1, 1943, 1,075,000 women were gainfully employed in Canada as compared to 638,000 in August, 1939. In addition, there are over 760,000 women—wives and daughters of farmers—who are supplementing the work of men to maintain the high record of farm production. Each year these women have taken on more and more of the farm work in addition to their work for the home and family, at a great sacrifice of time and energy. It is, of course, in war industry that we have seen the greatest expansion in the employment of women. In June, 1941, there were 40,000 women so employed. By September 30, 1943, that number had increased to 235,000 to keep pace with the heavy and varied demands of war production. This large employment of women in a thousand different industrial plants has created problems of its own in connection with work conditions. The provincial governments, as members know, have jurisdiction over conditions of work for women. Therefore we maintain close cooperation with provincial departments of labour with respect to such matters; and frequent discussions are held with employers concerning adequate welfare service for their employees. As a result many new services and improvements in accommodation have resulted.

Last year it became necessary to make an appeal to women who ordinarily would not be seeking employment. It was recognized that many such women might be able to accept only part-time employment, either part of each day or part of a week. So that employers had to be encouraged to make greater use of the part-time worker. As shortages developed in one area after another the Local Council of Women or the Women's Institute sponsored a campaign appealing to women to take full-time or part-time employment.

No such appeal was made in any area where it was not urgently required. Acute situations developed in Hamilton, Peterborough, Ottawa, Toronto, Halifax, Edmonton, St. Catharines, Welland, and in every instance the required objective was reached. These appeals not only secured many additional full-time workers; they also established the part-time worker as an integral and valuable part of our wartime man-power resources. As a result I am glad to be able to say that in all industrial centres the labour situation was very materially improved.

The entry, within two years, of nearly 200,000 women into war industry alone has had the effect, of course, of creating a shortage of help in other industries and services in which women workers have always predominated. One of these is hospital service. Our hospitals are crowded to their limit and more nurses are being employed than ever before. The non-professional personnel in hospitals has been augmented; and the number of student nurses in training is the largest in our history. Hotels and restaurants have absorbed thousands of new women workers; and we have been hard pressed to supply the labour requirements of laundries and dry cleaning establishments to enable them to take care of the needs of the armed forces as well as of their regular customers.

During the past year, the women's divisions of the employment offices have been augmented to deal more adequately with the great numbers of women passing through them. By means of intensive training, the quality of the work of our officials is steadily improving; and we are, I believe, now giving better service both to the woman applicant and the employer.

One of our problems has been the care of children during the days when their mothers are at work. Under the terms of agreements with the provinces, day nurseries have been expanded and increased in number to twenty-six. In Ontario the day care of school children outside of school hours has been developed to a considerable degree and units now approved are capable of providing for 1,700 children.

Farm Labour. Last year I pointed out that with fewer people on the farms during each successive year of the war, farmers had pushed the production of vitally needed food to higher levels. This record of our farm people was repeated in 1943. This meant working longer and harder each day. Results have been clearly revealed this past winter in the huge deliveries of live stock and live stock products to markets and processing houses.

Doctor G. S. H. Barton, deputy minister of agriculture, recently stated:

> In the course of the last four years Canada has increased the agricultural output by 50 per cent in spite of a reduction of 23 per cent in man-power.

He also gave the following figures with regard to quantities of agricultural products shipped to Great Britain during 1943.

Bacon	588,000,000 lbs.
Cheese	129,741,000 lbs.
Eggs (powdered)	34,743,510 lbs.

This exertion by the farm people themselves when under normal circumstances they work so hard, has been the major factor in overcoming the labour shortage. Because of a full recognition of this fact, we derive much satisfaction in that the plans which were put into effect in 1943 provided additional help for them. The results of our efforts to meet the farm man-power shortage were due to the co-operation of every provincial government in Canada working in partnership with the Department of Labour through dominion-provincial farm labour agreements.

The provincial departments of agriculture field staffs with the local farm committees organized by them have been indispensible to the successful execution of the plans of our employment service. These agreements provide for the sharing of expenses on a dollar for dollar basis for active programs in each province to recruit, transport and place help on the farms. Each of these programs is directed by an officer who is a joint employee of both governments.

Early in December last, we called these men and other senior officials to Ottawa for a conference on farm labour. Our purpose was to consider what progress had been made in 1943 and what improvements we could make in respect to the plans for 1944. It was clearly evident at this conference that the working arrangements with the Department of Labour were harmonious and satisfactory.

Hon. members from one province will be familiar with the term "emergency farm labour service," in other provinces it is "farm help service," or "farm service force", or "farm labour bureau." These organizations, Mr. Chairman, represent our farm labour agreements in action.

In British Columbia last year more than 11,000 people registered with the dominion-provincial emergency farm labour service to help on farms. On the prairies the dominion-provincial farm labour organizations transferred hundreds of workers from point to point within each province and organized and distributed harvest help.

In Ontario the farm service force, operating under the dominion-provincial agreement reports nearly 100,000 placements of workers on farms in 1943.

The farm labour bureau was formed in Quebec under the agreement for the purpose of tapping every possible source of help and placing this help on farms.

In the maritime provinces the dominion-provincial farm labour organization helped to recruit labour for dairy and live stock farms, organized local sources of help for haying, potato and fruit-picking and distributed this help to those farms where it was most needed.

One of the most valuable features of the farm labour programme has been the financial assistance in transporting workers to their places of employment on farms. The Department of Labour paid the costs of interprovincial movement of labour and shared equally with each province the cost of transporting labour within the province. This plan greatly increased the mobility of farm labour.

During the 1943 season three large-scale excursions of farm workers were organized. Women and girls were recruited in Alberta and transported at public expense for berry picking in the Fraser valley in British Columbia. Early in July over 700 Saskatchewan farmers were brought down to Ontario to help with haying and early harvest. These men remained on Ontario farms until late in August when they returned to Saskatchewan for their own grain harvest. This excursion should be noted by our historians. We have been accustomed to organizing harvest excursions to the prairies, but we have no knowledge of their ever before having been put in reverse. This project was an outstanding success and proved a most valuable source of outside help to the hard-pressed farmers in Ontario. The Ontario farmers were grateful. They expressed their thanks to the people of the west by acting, not merely by words.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

When harvest help was badly needed on the prairies in September, more than 5,000 farmers and farm workers from Ontario offered their services. Over 3,700 actually made the trip. More could have gone, but when our farm labour officials on the prairies called "Halt, enough", no more applicants were sent out. We have been told that never before has such a good class of man been sent out on a harvest excursion.

We received splendid assistance during the past season from members of the three armed forces. In September and October more than 15,000 men from the army, the air force and the navy helped to take off the crops in all parts of the country. Men from the army, which made up about 11,000 of this number, were supplied in two ways. The majority were granted compassionate leave to return to their own farms or those of immediate relatives. The second source of help from the army was from men supplied through the farm duty plan. Under this plan, which to my knowledge was developed for the first time, men were detailed under military discipline for work on farms. About 2,500 men were made available and worked in all parts of Canada, the majority being employed by farmers in the prairie and maritime provinces.

Last session my colleague the Minister of National Defence for Air stated rather bluntly that he "was not training an air force to go farming". I am glad to say that the natural generosity of his disposition could not for long be suppressed, because he did authorize the issuing of an order providing up to six weeks harvest leave for certain personnel in the air force. A total of 4,326 men were granted leave under this order. All provinces benefited.

Through a special arrangement made by provincial agricultural officials and the federal departments concerned, more than 600 sailors from Deep Brook, Nova Scotia, assisted with apple-picking in the Annapolis valley. This proved a most useful source of help during a critical emergency and the work done by the sailors was greatly appreciated by the apple growers in the valley.

There has been a great deal of discussion about men called from farms to serve in the army. Later on I will table an analysis of postponements in effect at the end of January, 1944, by mobilization divisions and by industries.

Out of a total of 246,133 for all industries, 142,400, or about 58 per cent, represent the number of farm workers on postponement. This large number of postponements given to farm workers, I am sure hon. members will agree, is tangible proof of the favourable treatment given to agriculture by the mobilization boards.

That our efforts respecting postponements of military service for essential farm workers are appreciated is illustrated in the following unanimous resolution which has recently come to hand:

> The Ontario Concentrated Milk Producers' Association wish to state their appreciation of the efforts of the federal selective service in making it possible for experienced farm help to obtain deferment privileges and thus remain on the farms.

The farm people, even with their reduced members, have not remained satisfied with having achieved the greatest food production in our history. Last fall, and early winter, thousands of farmers, farmers' sons, and other farm workers, responded to our appeal for help and moved to the woods, mines, food processing plants, and other essential industries. We appealed only to those who could be spared from their farms during the winter and they were given other work on the understanding they would be released in the spring to return to their farms. This principle was emphasized in extensive publicity conducted as part of the recruiting campaign.

Assistance given by these farmers greatly eased the labour shortage in many industries. Cooperation of provincial field men and local committees made possible a more thorough checking to see that farmers needed on their farms during the winter remained there; also through this assistance we have a much more complete record of those entering other industries.

The return of these men to their farms is now practically completed. Because of a late spring season in certain areas some permits were extended, after consultation with provincial departments concerned, until May 1. The vast majority of farm workers have returned to the farms of their own accord. Only in a very few cases was it necessary to follow up on the cancellation of permits.

We shall avail ourselves of every possible source of help for farm work during the coming season. Extensive plans are under discussion with the Department of National Defence. Already special spring farm-leave orders, authorized by the Department of National Defence (army and air), are resulting in a large number of men being granted temporary leave to assist with seeding operations.

Selective service officers stationed at military reception centres now interview all men rejected or discharged from the armed services, with a view to referring suitable men to farms. In industrial plants where lay-offs are occurring, those experienced in agriculture are as a matter of policy laid off second only to those suitable for military service.

During the past few weeks officials of the Department of Labour have visited all the provinces to discuss the renewal of dominion-provincial farm labour agreements. Every province is anxious to continue agreements and confidence seems high in the provinces that this year's problems will be handled effectively. We feel that the successful experience of 1943 which was really our pioneer year in an all-Canada programme to meet the farm labour problem will enable us to do a better job in 1944.

Lumbering and Logging Employment. For some time, it will be recalled, there has been a pronounced labour shortage in the lumbering and logging industry. The situation has been met in various ways.

As usual, the industry, east of the Rockies, drew the major portion of its labour in the peak winter season from agricultural workers. But west of the Rockies, where a more highly skilled type of labour is called for, most of the woods labour had to be secured from other sources. Labour shortages were met by men transferred from agriculture and from other industries; by men granted special leave from the army; by postponement of military service; by the employment of enemy aliens, and prisoners of war and conscientious objectors.

Transfers from less essential industries have been effected both on a voluntary basis and as a result of compulsory employment transfer orders.

To March 15, 1944, 869 workers were transferred to lumbering and logging by such orders.

Over a year ago the Department of National Defence arranged to grant three months' leave of absence to army personnel having previous logging and lumbering experience in British Columbia, to return to such employment in that province. The duration of the leave was subsequently extended to six months and leave is now granted for this period and is subject to renewal for further six months' periods at the discretion of military authorities.

Interned aliens have been used on reforestation and fire control work in Ontario and British Columbia; Japanese have been engaged on actual logging and lumbering operations in Ontario and in the interior of British Columbia; services of prisoners of war have been utilized in labour camps. They have been used extensively in Ontario, Quebec, and in the west, in logging and lumbering operations and also in fuel wood cutting.

Conscientious objectors have also been directed into logging and lumbering operations.

Through the steps mentioned and as the result of an extensive campaign undertaken by national selective service in conjunction with the provincial government officials and the industry a greater number of men were employed in woods operations since the end of November than a year ago.

Because of the many small operators and the fact that farm workers may enter employment in the woods for less than sixty days without a permit, it is difficult to obtain an exact record of the total number of men employed in the industry at any given time. However, we know from the records of the local employment and selective service offices that, during the period from October to December 1943, there were over 7,000 more placements than last year. During the first five weeks of this year, there have been some 6,000 more placements than in the corresponding period of 1943.

The reports we have received from the pulpwood committee of the pulp and paper industry of Canada further substantiate the conclusion that there are more workers engaged in woods this year than last. East of the Rockies there were nearly 9,000 more men employed on February 26 of this year than at the same time last year.

In the fall of 1943 the timber control estimated that lumber production for the year 1944 would be about 5 per cent less than in 1943. In view of war demands, this was a serious situation. It now appears that Canadian lumber production this year will equal the 4,630,000,000 feet produced in 1943. A similar improvement has taken place in respect to pulpwood production. Whereas a decrease in production as compared with the previous cutting season had been anticipated, this winter's production will record an increase of 3 per cent to 4 per cent.

In the fuel wood branch of woods operations, the situation has been satisfactory. Sufficient fuel wood has been cut to satisfy the needs. The mild weather was an easing factor.

Shiploading Operations—Halifax. In the last year we have met the increasing demands made at Halifax on our shiploading facilities. It had become increasingly apparent that the turn-round period of ships would have to be shortened to keep pace with the rising tempo of ship movements. It was realized that a speed-up in loading would in effect amount to an increase in the actual number of ships available. Following an investigation made in 1942 a wartime reorganization plan was put into effect in May of that year, and has been adjusted and improved as occasion necessitated. A controller of loading operations was appointed vested with complete authority to coordinate the activities of all agencies directly or indirectly engaged in shiploading.

A new method of hiring longshoremen, through a central despatching agency, was put into effect regularizing the method of hiring and providing a permanent gang system.

But that could not of itself overcome a constant over-all shortage of men caused by enlistments and the drift to war industries. Therefore selective service regulations were amended to provide for the return to the docks of ex-longshoremen, for the "freezing" of the existing personnel, and for making other men available by specific directed transfer to longshore work.

A longshoremen's reserve pool was then set up, each man required to report to any longshore work to which he was dispatched, or to any other type of work in Halifax to which he might be directed, or to longshore work in any other port in Nova Scotia or New Brunswick. Provision was made for all longshoremen registered at the dispatching agency and in the reserve pool to receive a guaranteed minimum weekly wage based on a forty-eight hour working week at daytime rates.

By arrangement with the Minister of Transport, bunkhouse accommodation was secured for five hundred men who were recruited by national selective service and a staff engaged under the direction of a pool superintendent.

Night work has hitherto been very unpopular; but by setting up a system of regular gangs and their rotation as between day and night work, an increase in night work has been obtained. This will increase with the opening shortly of a Government operated canteen at the north-end terminals provided particularly for night workers.

The supply of labour has been stabilized; there is a considerable improvement in the system of hiring; and the previous wasteful turnover of labour has been reduced.

By a recent arrangement with the Department of National Defence, port companies are to be useed at peak-load periods when civilian labour supply is insufficient.

The situation is under constant review, of course, as conditions are not static.

Prisoners of war and Japanese.—A special problem handled by the department is that of utilizing the labour of prisoners of war, on essential work projects outside internment camps. This has been chiefly in fuel wood, pulpwood, and lumbering operations, and to a lesser extent, in agriculture. Other projects using prisoners of war labour include a tannery and a company cutting peat fuel.

There were approximately 4,117 prisoners of war working on such projects outside internment camps at March 9. The prisoners employed in woods operations are, for the most part, working in groups of forty to sixty men in camps of private operators. Guards on the projects have been chiefly provided by the veterans' guard.

A number of prisoners of the civilian type such as German merchant seamen have been individually placed with farmers. It is the intention to extend the use of prisoners in agricultural work during the course of the current year so far as reasonably possible, consistent with security requirements.

Employers have, in general, been well satisfied with the work of the prisoners, and in many instances have later asked for an increased number.

The major administrative problem involved in putting prisoners to work is that of security. Where the percentage of guards in relation to prisoners is high, there is nothing gained in the productive use of man-power. Some risks as to escapes have therefore to be accepted in putting prisoners to work. Escapes have, however, been few in number and in every instance, the prisoners have been picked up within a short time.

The policy followed by the department, in close cooperation with the Department of National Defence, is one of careful selection of prisoners coupled with the use of sufficient guards to ensure discipline and control and to maintain a guard patrol on the project.

The hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) inquired some time ago as to the base rates paid to prisoners of war and the regulations under the Geneva convention which cover this.

Prisoners of war are paid under "Convention relative to the treatment of prisoners of war," which was concluded at Geneva on July 27, 1929.

After reference to the imperial prisoners of war committee the rates paid to prisoners of war in Canada were fixed by order in council in accordance with chapter 5, article 34, of this convention.

The Canadian rate is 50 cents per day; the United States rate is 80 cents per day; the British rate is one shilling per day.

The British Columbia security commission, which handled evacuation of 21,000 Japanese nationals and Japanese-Canadians in 1941, was dissolved early in 1943, and the powers of the commission reverted to the Minister of Labour acting through a commissioner stationed on the ground.

The labour department's objective for 1943 was to place the employable men and women in useful work where they were most needed in Canada, to provide adequate welfare for the unemployables, and to provide at least a minimum Canadian education for the children.

Special emphasis has been placed on reallocation of Japanese, both singly and in family groups, to areas where essential industries have urgent labour shortages.

By the end of 1943, there were 4,000 Japanese in self-supporting employment in British Columbia (including women and children), 4,700 on the prairies, and 3,000 in eastern Canada, these totals in each case including a few hundred who were there prior to Pearl Harbor. Thus approximately one-half of the Japanese in Canada were supporting themselves at useful labour in various parts of Canada at the end of 1943.

During 1943, there were approximately 4,700 Japanese working on sugar beets in Alberta, Manitoba and Ontario, an increase of 1,000 over the preceding year.

About 600 Japanese have been employed in lumber camps in British Columbia and approximately the same number in woods operations in Alberta, Manitoba and Ontario. The latter were transferred from farms and will return to farming this spring.

Japanese in the settlements of British Columbia have produced 35,000 cords of fuel wood, of which 20,000 cords have been shipped to Vancouver, also 1,700,000 board feet of lumber and a variety of other wood products.

There also are at least 2,000 more Japanese men and women scattered from British Columbia to Quebec—as railway section hands, fish and vegetable and fruit canners, domestics, and cooks, factory and office workers, dry cleaners, tanners, and so on.

With few exceptions, the Japanese in Canada, especially the Japanese Canadians, who are seventy-five per cent of the total number, are working industriously and causing no trouble.

Mr. GREEN: How many are interned?

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not know. I could only give an off-the-record-guess.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Has there been any sabotage?

Mr. MITCHELL: None at all. The Department of Labour plans in 1944 to apply selective service direction more fully to the employable Japanese not yet in essential industry, thereby also accelerating the reallocation programme.

Mr. GREEN: Could the minister give us the general policy of the department with regard to the Japanese?

Mr. MITCHELL: If my hon. friend will wait until I have finished this little digression, the sky is the limit and I will answer what he wants to ask me.

Coal mining. The situation of the coal mining industry was declared to be a national emergency in May, 1943, and last June the steps taken to that time to solve this situation were outlined to you. Since then our efforts have been continuous.

With the cooperation of the Department of National Defence, employment and national selective service officers have made every effort to locate soldiers in the army in Canada with coal mining experience, who could be spared from army duties. As a result, 2,144 were on leave from the army to work in the coal mines as of March 15, 1944.

Last May, order in council P.C. 4092 was passed, and directed that men with coal-mining experience then engaged in other industry, and who were physically fit, should be returned to the mines. They were exempted from military service until February 1, 1944, and, in fact, prohibited from enlisting voluntarily. P.C. 121 of January 10, 1944, has extended the effect of this order until August 1, 1944.

Up to March 15, 2,276 men were referred to the mines under these orders. A further 485 workers have been referred to coal mines under other orders. (P.C. 4861 and 6077).

There remains a demand for highly skilled miners to work at the face of the mines, particularly in the maritimes, but until such time as they are obtained the need for unskilled workers has been met.

After long negotiations training classes to provide skilled workers at the coal face will, it is anticipated, be started in the near future in the maritimes under the war emergency training programme. It is hoped this programme will develop and that it will provide a number of the required certificated miners.

Gold Mining. During 1943, an acute manpower situation developed in the gold mining industry. This was due to the fact that in 1942 it was necessary to curtail gold mining in order to ensure man-power for the mining and production of more essential metals and minerals, nickel particularly.

In 1941, the average number of employees in the gold mining industry was 33,348. In 1942 the average dropped to 26,501. In 1943 there was a further drop to 18,320. At the end of 1943 there were only about 16,000 men employed in the gold mining industry, a drop of 52 per cent from the 1941 average.

In September, 1943, the gold mining industry claimed that this labour loss had caused operations to fall considerably below the economic point, and that essential maintenance work was being neglected. It was represented to the Department of Labour that if the situation continued, some of the mines would be forced to close down entirely, and thus jeopardize future operations.

In October, 1943, a survey of the gold mines was made by selective service to determine the minimum number of men needed to keep each mine in operation. On the basis of the report, I approved a temporary change in the labour priority of gold mines to permit the hiring of 800 men not immediately required for high priority jobs.

In certain industries and occupations, notably flour mills, meat-packing and cold storage plants, replacement of trained and able-bodied male help by female workers and older men had proceeded to such an extent that it had the effect of creating a demand for more able-bodied male workers.

At August 28, 1943, there were 12,276 male and female workers on the payrolls of Canadian packing plants. There existed an almost immediate demand for another 4,000 male employees. At December 4, the payrolls had increased to 16,300. The employment service had found 4,024 more workers for this industry.

The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance on February 29, 1944, stated:

> During the first 8 weeks of 1944 the inspected packing plants in Canada have slaughtered 780,000 more hogs, 50,000 more cattle, 10,000 more calves and 30,000 more sheep and lambs than in the corresponding weeks of 1943. These figures represent an increase of 80 per cent in hogs, 50 per cent in cattle, 20 per cent in calves and 35 per cent in sheep and lambs.

We have supplied workers for flour and feed mills to enable increased shipments of flour overseas and to meet a shortage of feed for live stock in Canada.

During the past eighteen months the staffs of coal merchants, especially in large centres, became depleted to a point where drastic action became necessary to assure coal deliveries to householders. An order was issued temporarily halting calls to military service, and a special effort made to provide more men. By the end of November the situation had cleared.

The primary textile industry has received special attention. An officer was loaned to the industry to survey the mills and to direct the recruiting campaign for labour. Enough workers were found to assure the output of supplies directly required for military needs, but the civilian supply has been necessarily curtailed. Production for civilian needs is now being stepped up and plans adopted to provide for the current year.

To meet the labour shortage in tanneries, special campaigns were conducted and a supply of men made available from prisoner-of-war camps.

Agricultural labour available for release from the farms following the harvest was also transferred to essential civilian industries, and this relieved a serious shortage. These men are being returned to agriculture this spring, thereby creating a demand for labour to fill the vacancies.

Many civilian industries not classed as essential, but nevertheless of primary importance, have maintained production in many instances by the use of female labour working part time.

War industries: construction and transportation, base metals—My colleague, the Minister of Munitions and Supply has given you figures on shipbuilding, aircraft building and products of munition plants.

Our war production is delivered not only to Canadian forces at home and abroad but is going to Britain, the United States, India, Africa, China, Russia, Australia, New Zealand and the south Pacific.

Canada ranks fourth amongst the united nations as a producer of munitions with a weekly output of more than $55 million worth of munitions.

By the end of 1943 Canada had produced more than 10,000 planes; 600,000 motor vehicles; 750 escort, cargo and patrol ships; vast quantities of chemicals and explosives, and millions of dollars worth of signals equipment and instruments. All of this has meant supplying and using to the best possible advantage, man and woman power.

To attain this objective it was necessary to develop a close liaison between the Departments of Labour and Munitions and Supply. As changes in the production programme were made, shifts in man-power had to be made.

It is true that we never attained a position where every vacancy was filled. Nevertheless, it can be said that the various programmes were not seriously impeded by shortage of man-power. In fact the production figures prove this to be correct. Since September, 1943, the demands have lessened somewhat, although there are shortages for strong labourers who can do heavy manual work and also for skilled mechanics.

The requirements of the base metal mining industry have been very heavy and were particularly difficult to fill in view of the fact that the men required were necessarily of good physique and most of this type are in the armed forces. This necessitated the constant combing of other industries for the essential men required by the mines. Special campaigns of various kinds were inaugurated to keep the working forces of the mines at the necessary levels. Particular attention was given to the needs of the nickel mines.

At the close of the 1943 season large numbers of farm labourers were supplied to the International Nickel Company, Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, the Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company, and Sherritt Gordon Mines Limited, and to other base metal mines.

The development of the iron deposits at Steep Rock lake in Ontario was pushed forward during the year. This project necessitated draining lakes, driving large tunnels through rock for considerable distances, making new railway facilities and developing loading machinery. A river has been diverted that required at the peak of this project a labour force of one thousand men.

It should be appreciated that this undertaking involving the employment of thousands of workers has been carried on as a special task in the midst of war, and that all of this labour has been supplied through a system of labour controls and priorities. Generally production was maintained at high levels, this being due largely to the excellent cooperation between management and workers.

Shortages of men in the construction industry were partially met by transfer of thousands of workers to the more important construction projects. Demands were mainly for strong unskilled men.

Many large projects were completed on or near to their scheduled dates, as for example, the synthetic rubber plant at Sarnia.

The labour needs of rail, water and road transportation systems also were heavy during the peak months of summer and early fall. We did our best to meet them. The Department of National Defence cooperated and lent soldiers for urgent track maintenance. Some Italian prisoners of war were also used.

Special drives were made to obtain lake seamen during their off-season, and by arrangements made that these men returned for the reopening of navigation.

There is still a shortage of workers on combat aircraft, ship and aircraft repair, and for highly skilled workers in other lines. There are also insistent calls for both common labour and partially skilled labour.

Lay-offs. The matter of lay-offs in war industries has come to the fore in recent months. As the war progresses, changes in production programmes and the curtailment in production of certain supplies necessarily involve cancellation of some contracts and changes in others.

Early in November last it was announced that such changes would make it necessary to lay off a considerable number of workers in various plants. The employment service studied the situation. Arrangements were rapidly made to have these lay-offs effected in an orderly manner with a minimum of time loss in transferring workers to other jobs.

As a general policy it was decided that all those men who were on military deferment should be called for the army unless they were considered to be indispensable to industry.

Further it was decided that the order in which workers were to be laid off should be:

(1) those with previous agricultural experience, particularly dairy farming and stock-raising;

(2) workers who were needed in other high priority industries in the same vicinity;

(3) workers required by outside high priority industries, and who could be moved;

(4) young workers without family obilgations and

(5) married women if their husbands were supporting them.

Up to the present, lay-offs have been considerably less than anticipated. This is largely due to new contracts being placed. I have in mind a certain lay-off which was being carried out at a steel plant. Before the lay-off had been completed a new order came for overseas account which required the reemployment of more men so that overnight the "lay-off" problem changed to one of finding additional staff.

Mr. SENN: Has the minister the figures showing the number of agricultural workers laid off, or does he not care to give them at this time?

Mr. MITCHELL: I will make a note of the question and endeavour to get the information.

Wartime bureau of technical personnel. There has continued to be a short supply of technically trained personnel and the work of the wartime bureau of technical personnel, which was set up in February, 1941, has thus remained of primary importance.

A large proportion of the requirements of the armed services and war and essential industries have in fact been met. This has been accomplished very largely through the efforts of the bureau.

The bureau, acting in an advisory capacity, has succeeded in many instances in assisting those in need of the services of engineers and scientists and also in advising individual technical personnel how the national interest might best be served.

By the use of the employment permit system the bureau contributes largely in directing technical personnel to high priority industries and in securing a high degree of stability of employment.

Working in close cooperation with the universities, the bureau has through the administration of the university science students regulations assisted materially in ensuring that university students in science faculties make the best use of their training period.

Upon graduation, the bureau has dealt effectively with the question of their allocation as between the armed forces and industry and as between industries.

War emergency training (Canadian vocational training). The war emergency training programme has been in operation since April, 1940.

Up to the end of March, 1944, approximately 12,300,000 man-days training have been given at a cost of about $20,000,000.

The gross enrollment of full-time and part-time trainees was 333,458. Of these 134,534 were full-time preemployment industrial trainees, 102,357 of whom are known to have been placed in employment prior to March 31, 1944.

Of all full-time industrial trainees, thirty-one per cent have been women, but during the present fiscal year the percentage of women has been raised to forty-six per cent.

As the demand of war industry and the armed forces for tradesmen diminishes, steps are being taken to adapt the training centres to provide rehabilitation training along vocational lines for men and women discharged from the forces. The Department of Pensions and National Health has asked the Department of Labour to assume responsibility for training of this type.

It is anticipated that a large percentage of rehabilitation training will be given in industrial or commercial establishments in those occupations for which training cannot be given in any preemployment centre.

An order in council was passed on January 21, 1944, making provision for the first time for dominion financial assistance to approved apprenticeship plans to be carried on by the provincial governments under apprenticeship acts. This is to provide for long term training in apprenticeships lasting at least two years and should prove of valuable assistance in helping to reestablish discharged members of the forces.

Special Placements. Many men and women are working today at jobs which at one time they might have thought themselves physically incapable of filling. A special placements division of the employment service was set up for the purpose of:

(1) Promoting efforts to place physically handicapped men and women in suitable employment, and

(2) Assisting in the placement of handicapped persons who have been trained by the vocational training branch of the department, or by other approved agencies.

A study is now being made of approved methods in use in other countries so as to provide our employment offices with practical information which will enable them to give the best possible advice to young people entering employment for the first time.

Wages policy. Wage rates in Canada to-day are at an all-time high level. They are considerably higher, in fact, than in 1920, when the cost of living was at the peak as a result of the first world war.

The wage rate index in 1920, the previous high in the pre-war history of the index, was 112·7. (Based on 100 for 1935-1939 average.) The index for 1942 was 127·5. While the index for 1943 has not yet been definitely determined, I do not hesitate to predict that it will show an advance over 1942.

It must also be remembered that the wage index does not give the complete picture. Overtime pay and bonuses have to be added.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): And it is nearly all taken off in taxes.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is quite true. I learned that to-day to my sorrow. If we have to pay taxes to win the war I do not care if they take everything off me.

The number earning has also greatly increased, as is shown by the fact that the employment index rose from 113·9 in 1939 to 184·1 in 1943. (At December 1943 the index stood at 190·6.)

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The 113·9 refers to what year?

Mr. MITCHELL: 1939.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What was the basis? What year was taken at 100?

Mr. MITCHELL: I have not that with me. I shall take a note of it and look it up for my hon. friend.

In 1939 the total wages and salaries paid amounted to 2·55 billions of dollars. In the following years the totals rose steadily until in 1943 the figure of 4·7 billions of dollars was reached. (Source of figures—Dominion Bureau of Statistics.)

Since the outbreak of war, vacations with pay have been introduced, covering an aggregate of 600,000 employees.

Group insurance plans have been authorized in the case of 1,717 employers and covering 443,854 employees, while wage incentive plans have been approved covering some 30,000 workers.

Permission has been given to pay war risks bonus to crew members of vessels operating in dangerous waters.

I wish to emphasize that these improvements in the wage position of a large number of workers have taken place within the framework of the government's policy of controlling inflationary processes.

The flexibility in the government's wage stabilization policy is further illustrated by the records of the war labour boards, which since their inception to November, 1943, have dealt with 43,535 applications, covering more than three million employees under the wartime wages control orders. Of these applications, 36,829 were granted in full; 3,005 were granted in part and 3,701 were denied. Of these 43,535 applications, no less than 29,010, involving 906,182 employees, were requests to the boards for increases in wage rates. The wage applications granted involved an annual increase in employees' wages of nearly $100,000,000 a year. In addition, 3,395 applications for increases in cost of living bonus were dealt with. These applications involved 479,047 employees and resulted in an annual increase to employees concerned of approximately $50,000,000. The government's wage control policy has succeeded in my opinion, because of its flexibility; wage boards were given power to adjust inequalities, and I have given you the evidence that these adjustments were made.

The improved position of wage earners is best realized when the cost of living index is taken into account. Canada's record in this respect is outstanding among allied countries.

I have a statement here which I would like to have taken as read but which I now table so that it may appear in Hansard at this point in my remarks.

Industrial Relations. The officers of my department in settling disputes have relied upon persuasion and appeals to the common sense and patriotism of labour and employers. In the large majority of cases such appeals are successful.

In 1942, a reorganization, enlargement and centralization of the conciliation services of the department was brought about and in addition a system of cooperation with the various provincial authorities has been developed. A director of industrial relations was appointed and also made registrar of boards of conciliation and investigation under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

An important piece of legislation under the administration of the industrial relations branch is section 5 of order in council P.C. 4020, which provides for investigation into allegations of discrimination for union membership and activity. The commissioners appointed under this section are usually judges, and if they find the allegations well founded, they may recommend to the Minister of Labour the reinstatement of the dismissed employee.

In the two and a half year period that section 5 has been in effect, down to the end of 1943, sixty-four investigations have been conducted involving 431 individual employees. Of these, 124 were reinstated voluntarily by the employers as a result of the investigations, twenty-nine were ordered reinstated with back pay; twenty-one persons received a monetary settlement of their claims.

Figures as to strikes and lockouts show a total of 402 during the year 1943. These involved 218,404 workers and caused a time loss of 1,041,198 man-days.

Preliminary figures for the first three months of 1944 indicate that time lost in man-working days has been less than one-third of time lost in similar period in 1943.

Year (1st quarter)	Time lost per 1,000 work days
1944	·28 of 1 day
1943	·94 " " "
1942	·39 " " "
1941	·06 " " "
1940	·14 " " "

While the number of strikes and the number of workers involved in 1943 were both greater than in previous years, 310 of the 402 strikes lasted less than five days, while 150 were of one day's duration or less.

During the year 1943 the average number of days lost per worker on strike was 4·8 and in 1942 it was 3·9 days, as compared with 8·1 days in 1918 and 22·3 days in 1917.

During the 21 months previous to December 31, 1943, industrial relations officers of my department were called upon to mediate or give technical services in connection with 834 industrial disputes or controversial situations in which about 303,000 workers were involved. A great measure of success has resulted from this work of the department.

Members of the committee will be familiar with the recent order appointing the industrial production cooperation board. The order, it will be recalled, was sponsored by my colleague, the Minister of Munitions and Supply and myself. This order represents a recognition of the very real contribution which labour management production committees have made in the past and a further expression of the government's policy of encouraging their growth in industry. Steady progress has been made in this work and it is confidently hoped that the newly created board will give a further impetus to this work.

P.C. 162 established this board which is composed of H. Carl Goldenberg, Director General of Economics, Department of Munitions and Supply, as Chairman; M. M. Maclean, Director of Industrial Relations, Department of Labour; H. J. Carmichael, Coordinator of Production and Chairman of the Production Board, Department of Munitions and Supply; and Paul Goulet, Associate Director of National Selective Service, Department of Labour.

The board is to be assisted in the performance of its duties by an advisory committee of representatives of labour organizations and employer associations, which is provided for in the order in council.

The members of the advisory committee are: Pat Conroy, Secretary of the Canadian Congress of Labour; Percy R. Bengough, President of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada; J. A. Parent, General Organizer of the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour; Willis George, representative of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association; J. Clark Reilly, Secretary-Manager of the Canadian Construction Association; Colonel J. A. W. LaBelle, representing employers; and D. B. Chant, Secretary-Engineer of the Ontario Pulp and Paper Manufacturers' Safety Association.

Mobilization for armed forces.—Under our man-power policy, it is our duty to provide the required number of men for the army, while at the same time supplying the necessary men and women for our war industries, farms, base metal mines, lumber camps, railways, inland and sea-going shipping, and in other spheres.

Additional men have been designated for military service since last year. These were men who were born in the year 1925, but they were not callable until they had reached the age of 18 years six months.

Men who were married on the 15th July, 1940 and were born in any of the years 1913-1916, inclusive, also are now callable.

In order to summarize the situation, the following are the age groups subject to military call-up:

(a) every man born in the years 1913-25, inclusive, with the proviso that men born in the year 1925 are not callable until they reach the age of 18 years six months;

(b) every man born in the years 1902-1912, inclusive, who, at July 15, 1940 was

(i) a widower without child or children; or

(ii) was a judicially separated man, with or without child or children; or

(iii) was an unmarried man; or

(iv) was a divorcee, with or without child or children; or

(v) who, since July 15, 1940, become divorced, whether or not he has a child or children; or

(vi) who, since July 15, 1940, has been judicially separated, whether or not he has a child or children; or

(vii) who, since July 15, 1940, became a widower without child or children.

However, we are not calling any man who has passed his thirty-eighth birthday as at present he is not acceptable for enrolment in the army.

We are still experiencing difficulty in locating men to whom call-up notices are sent but not complied with. Arrangements have been made for locating these men through various tracing agencies, provincial police and Royal Canadian Mounted Police. While each month sees a new group of delinquents, owing to call-ups being constantly forwarded, nevertheless we are steadily catching up with the backlog.

When a mobilization order which has been issued by the registrar is returned by the post office authorities marked "undelivered", or when a man does not comply with the order, the case is turned over to the Hooper-Holmes Bureau or to the Associated Credit Bureaus.

If he cannot be traced by them within a reasonable time, the case is then turned over to the R.C.M.P. However, the credit organizations continue their work and if ultimately successful, notification is immediately sent to the R.C.M.P.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How many men have been located by the credit bureaux?

Mr. MITCHELL: I have the exact figures somewhere, but at a guess I would say it was around 22,000.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is, 22,000 have been located by the credit bureaux?

Mr. MITCHELL: I think so. That is an approximate figure; it is around that, more or less.

A fee of $2.50 is paid to the tracing organizations, but not to the R.C.M.P., for each case in which they successfully locate the man. No moneys are paid if they are unsuccessful.

Checking of records of enlistments in the armed forces with our records is exceedingly difficult in some instances. The date of birth is used as final evidence in identifying men. Owing to the zeal of our young men to enlist, many state their date of birth as prior to what it actually was. Older men do the reverse. We saw the same thing happen during the last war. It also is surprising the number who are confused regarding their birth date and who give varying dates. Conflicting dates necessitate a tremendous amount of painstaking study and search when there are many men of exactly thet same given and same surnames. As an instance, in one of our offices there are seventy-eight men of exactly the same surnames and same given names. Birth dates are the final check as addresses have been changed so frequently since national registration.

Everyone will agree that in a country the size of Canada, it is exceedingly difficult to locate every missing man. Many men join the forces of the United States—and of course that works the other way also; many men from the United States have joined the Canadian forces—and the merchant marine without notifying our offices. This adds to the difficulty.

Some time ago we arranged for a series of raids of public gathering places throughout the country whereby R.C.M.P., assisted by the local police, checked on the men present to see if they had complied with the requirements of the mobilization regulations. Here are some of the facts about these raids as at March 31, 1944:—

Number of places visited, 3,775.

Persons checked, 63,506.

Persons charged under mobilization regulations, 373, or less than one per cent.

Number charged under national registration regulations, 271.

Number of deserters apprehended, 145.

Number of persons found not gainfully employed and referred for employment to national selective service, 1,008.

The R.C.M.P. and civilian police authorities are to be commended on the manner in which they have applied themselves in apprehending delinquents. Many stories could be told by police authorities of long, arduous trips that were made under adverse conditions by snowmobile and dog sleighs in this work.

The regulations were recently amended whereby all employers in Canada were required to make sure that their employees in the designated age classes were in possession of some document to show that they were in good standing under mobilization regulations. Literature explaining the reasons for this step was sent to all employers on record.

The object of this action was to bring to notice the case of any man who had been overlooked or who had not complied with mobilization orders. It was carefully explained to employers that they should only report cases in which there was doubt. Employers were given a period of two months to May 1 in which to undertake this check.

The number of men on whom reports have been made to April 15, 1944, was 3,896. Of these 2,334 were in good standing, 411 were not in good standing, and 1,151 have still to be reviewed owing to men not having notified change of address so that the file is still in the division from which the man removed.

Any man engaged in agriculture, on whom a report is rendered, is granted postponement, provided investigation proves this.

With regard to university students, recently we set up a university advisory board comprised of the heads of universities. The board convened in January and deliberated on the question of what course would be essential to the prosecution of the war and in the national interest. As a result, recommendations have been put into effect whereby students in selected courses would be given postponement in order that they might complete their course to make their contribution to our war effort. When a student fails to reach the required standard his postponement order is cancelled and if medically fit he is enrolled in the army. With the assistance of the university advisory board we intend to weed out those students who fail to attain the required standard.

Since last July, a reciprocal arrangement has been entered into between the United States and Canadian authorities whereby nationals of either country, who are resident for a period of three months in the other country, may be called for military service. They have the privilege of electing to serve in the forces of the country of their residence or of the country of which they are nationals.

Considerable uncertainty still seems to exist regarding the method of call-up. Instructions are issued to the registrar in each division to call as many men as possible to meet the requirements of the army. Even with the utmost effort, it has been increasingly difficult for some time to obtain the number of men required by the Department of National Defence each month. I am saying this to disabuse the minds of any members that in certain divisions where enlistments are high, particular pressure is exercised to increase the number of enrolments. This is not the case. I previously dealt with this subject at greater length on page 3944 of Hansard of June 23, 1943.

We are now finding it more difficult to fill the army requisitions. As the war progresses it is evident that we will soon have to rely largely upon those at present deferred and the young men coming of age.

War industry has passed its peak and it is reasonable to assume that many young men whom the demands of an expanding war production required in industry and who were therefore given temporary deferment will become available for the armed services.

The proportion of fit men in the higher age classes is becoming increasingly smaller. This entails a greater effort for smaller returns.

There is another point I would like to mention. Recently my colleague, the Minister of National Defence (army), made the statement in the house that he would require 60,000 men in the year commencing the first of April. In further correspondence with me, he has stressed the absolute necessity of obtaining these men, particularly bearing in mind the requirements of operations which are in prospect. In the last six months, September 1943 to February 1944, there actually have been more than 5,000 men per month who were enlisted and enrolled in the army alone. However, the monthly average has been decreasing, and at times enlistments and enrolments have fallen below the numbers required by the army. For this reason I think it is only fair to state in the house that further postponements in industry generally will have to be curtailed. This policy should not adversely affect industry; for, as I have already stated, its maximum demand has been passed. I mention this in order that all members will realize that the retention of young men of military age and fitness in industry can only be justified under very exceptional circumstances.

Previously when a man received an order—medical examination, he proceeded to a physician of his own choice. In September last this method was changed, in order to have as many examinations as possible conducted at the reception centres by army doctors and in more remote areas by designated panels of doctors. This was also with the object of lightening the burden on doctors generally and securing more uniform examinations.

Men who reside within a radius of a reception centre, which would enable them normally to proceed from their homes, undergo the examination, and return to their homes within forty-eight hours, are instructed to report to the reception centre. This takes care of sixty per cent of the medical examinations.

A similar practice holds for panels of physicians, namely, that the limitation of forty-eight hours is the guiding factor. Over six hundred doctors undertake such work. There are still men in more isolated areas who report to doctors of their own choice.

Under the call-up system and as provided by P.C. 9041 of November 30, 1943, we are now selecting men as guards for service in penitentiaries.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister has stated that in recent months there have been occasions on which the number of men requisitioned by the Minister of National Defence have not been supplied. Can he give us the figures for the months to which he has reference, and when did that condition begin?

Mr. MITCHELL: I can get those figures for my hon. friend, but I think he will appreciate that when you are operating machinery of the magnitude I am, you cannot remember all these little details. They are beyond the apprehension of any human being. I shall be glad to make a note and get those figures at the earliest opportunity.

I would like to refer to our industrial mobilization survey plan. In summary, the survey plan provides:—

1. A proper allocation of men as between the needs of the armed services and essential industry.

2. A means of quick withdrawal of men from a specific plant or retention whichever may be most in the national interest.

3. More efficient handling of men in event of a lay-off, allocating those who are medically fit and subject to call to the army—assisting in transferring those whose skill or experience can best serve the national interest to another high priority industry.

4. Acquaints the employment service with the needs of a plant or industry and sets in motion machinery necessary to assist the employer.

5. Provides an employer with definite knowledge as to the time his employees will be called for military service and allows him time for proper planning.

6. Presents factual evidence as to why any man or group of men are granted postponement of military training in any plant or industry.

7. Gives mobilization boards information helpful in deciding on application for postponement of military training to individuals or groups in any given plant or industry.

8. Brings to the attention of the divisional registrars those men who may be delinquent or who have not notified their registrar of any change of address and for whom they are looking.

9. Indicates to employment service any surplus labour.

10. It has the approval and cooperation of both management and labour.

Conscientious objectors. Up to March 31, 1944, mobilization boards had given deferments to 8,932 conscientious objectors. Subsequently, 245 offered their services to the armed forces and were accepted as combatant soldiers or air force personnel. One hundred and twenty-two others have enlisted as non-combatant soldiers in the medical and dental corps.

The great majority of conscientious objectors have been quite willing to undertake alternative service work as directed. As at March 31, 1944, some 3,188 have been placed in agriculture under alternative service employment agreements, and 1,295 contracted in non-agricultural employment. A number have been placed in hospitals as orderlies or have been sent to employment where conditions have made it difficult for employment offices to supply workers.

Wartime labour relations regulations. Recently I tabled in this house order in council P. C. 1003, known as the wartime labour relations regulations. These regulations will, I hope, mark a milestone in the history of labour legislation in Canada and contribute to a reduction of time lost through industrial disputes and to sound industrial relations generally.

It is very gratifying to note the warm reception the order has received both from representatives of the employers and of the workers and I should like to express my appreciation of the cooperation of the provinces and the employers' organizations and trade unions.

When I addressed the committee last year I took the opportunity to point out the extent to which labour representatives were serving on various boards and committees of my department and to record my appreciation of the very fine contribution which labour is making in this way. This year I wish to repeat my words of appreciation, and it will interest the committee to know that to-day labour has 352 representatives serving on 125 boards and committees of the Department of Labour, including the Unemployment Insurance Commission. This does not, of course, give the whole picture, for labour representatives are serving on many other government bodies. It does, however, suggest a segment of the contribution which labour is making to assist the government.

The contribution of employers and other citizens in regard to these boards and committees is equally great and deeply appreciated. The manner in which men and women from all walks of life have given voluntary service in this way is one of the outstanding features of the work of the Labour department.

Current situation and future problems. In conclusion I should like to say something of the labour supply situation at the moment and suggest some of the problems which we expect to face in the coming months.

Our man-pwer statistics show that the peak of labour demand for 1943 occurred early in September with 219,000 needed. The labour requirements of A and B priority industries alone (that is of war industries and essential civilian industries) were in excess of 160,000.

During the latter part of 1943 the situation improved considerably from the viewpoint of demand, due partly, of course, to seasonal factors, but also to two causes, namely, a levelling off process in war production, and the fact that our placement plans had shown definite results.

In December, 1943, gainfully employed persons numbered an all time high of 4,288,000.

There are still some pockets of labour demand. At March 30 last, labour demand for all industries (not including logging) totalled 92,300, while there were 35,000 applicants for employment who, on that date, had not been referred to jobs.

It is difficult to predict with any degree of certainty the developments which will occur in the labour market situation during the next few months. However, it is possible to make some general observations.

It may be that further cut-backs in war production will result in other lay-offs over the next few months; thus small pockets of temporary unemployment may develop from time to time. However, it should be possible to place most of these men with little delay. There will still be numerous shortages in certain high priority industries.

It is possible that some materials hitherto reserved for war production will be released for the manufacture of essential consumers' goods and so the consequent expansion in civilian production should absorb many workers of both sexes.

Men who were given military deferments because of the essential nature of their work may be made available for military service.

To sum up:

The major task of the selective service system over the next few months will be:

First, to provide the required men for the armed services; second, to meet the labour needs of agriculture; third, to place in employment men discharged from the armed forces; fourth, to meet, as they develop, the urgent needs of certain key industries; fifth, to place men laid off as a result of changes in munition production schedules as quickly and efficiently as possible.

Over the next year it appears that the general shortage of manpower will continue, yet there will be in certain localities at certain periods areas of local, though temporary, unemployment. This is inevitable in a changing war economy.

I am confident, Mr. Chairman, that whatever problems are forthcoming, my department is equipped to meet them efficiently.

I should like before I take my seat to express my appreciation of the cooperation which the Department of Labour has received in the past year. Organized labour, employers, the provinces, particularly the departments of agriculture, the mobilization board, the various advisory boards, all have been of great assistance.

The very large staff of the department has worked hard and faithfully under considerable pressure.

I now ask that the following statistical statements be reproduced in Hansard:

NOTE.—The above estimates are based on the most recent information obtainable from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and other official sources. In some cases (such as agricultural males, farm women, and employers, own accounts and no pays), they are subject to a possibility of considerable error, as little statistical information is available.

(i) Includes prisoners of war and persons missing but still on strength. Excludes persons enlisted but on leave and engaged in civilian occupations.
(ii) Does not include women gainfully occupied on farms or in farm homes, who are icnluded in item 3. Does not include wage and salary workers who are temporarily unemployed owing to "No job" or "Lay-off".
(iii) Includes employment on direct and indirect war production and construction, and the war content of employment in ancillary industries.
(iv) "Own accounts" are persons who carry on their business without assistance of employees. "No pays" are mainly family workers receiving no fixed money payment.
(v) The variation in employment during 1943 is due to seasonal factors.
(vi) Since it is impossible to measure statistically the amount of farm work done by women, all women residing on farms are here included except students, women 65 years of age and over and those gainfully occupied outside the farm.
(vii) In 1943, the number of unemployed was accounted for almost entirely by persons temporarily out of work while moving from one job to another.

(1) From Dominion Bureau of Statistics. The wage and salary figures do not include payments to the armed forces.

(2) From Department of Labour. The figures include cost of living bonus payments.

(3) Preliminary estimate made in the Department of Labour by applying the Bureau of Statistics index of aggregate payrolls to the 1942 total wage and salary figures.

(4) December, 1943. The yearly average was 184·1.

Note.—The index numbers of wage rates apply to wage rates only, not salaries.

The changes shown by the index number of wage rates are not necessarily reflected in the total wages and salaries earned as total earnings are affected also by the changes in the size of the working force (employment index) and by the shift from "short time" in depression years to "overtime" in boom years.

Mr. MASSEY: Mr. Chairman, as I rise to address the committee I would crave through you the indulgence of hon. members in that I have been back in Canada but a very short time on temporary duty and have been fully occupied; I am to return almost immediately to my duties overseas. Accordingly, I have had and will have little opportunity to be in the chamber, and thus the remarks which I purpose to address to the committee may not be exactly under the item which is at present before the committee. I crave indulgence if I seem to stray to some extent from what otherwise would be in order.

It is a matter of years since I have had the privilege of speaking in this chamber, and during the last fifteen months of those years it has been my rare and distinct privilege to have been overseas on duty in the United Kingdom. Therefore my view of the deliberations of this house has perforce been a long-range view and my knowledge of its proceedings vicarious. On the other hand, the experience which has been mine as a serving officer both in Canada and overseas since the early beginning of this war has been nothing short of priceless, and I have been able to observe at first hand what has been accomplished in the service to which I am so proud to be attached, the Royal Canadian Air Force.

As I have said, I am in Canada but a short time, and it might seem a presumption on my part to take an active and direct part in the domestic deliberations of this house. Therefore in what I have to say to-day I shall speak from an overseas point of view.

Hon. members will realize as I proceed that my whole purpose in taking the time of the committee this afternoon is from a purely constructive point of view, and what I have to say is said earnestly and will, I hope, be for the benefit of the Canadian sailor, soldier, and airman. If I particularly stress the airman of that noble trio, it is because I frankly admit that I am a prejudiced witness on his behalf, a position which I know will not be misunderstood.

Those who have been in Canada in recent years and more particularly in recent months will perhaps not recognize as do those of us who have been far away from it, how much the domestic scene has changed. To return home after over a year's absence is to realize something which is, to say the least, disquieting. In the last three or four weeks I have seen, I frankly admit, only three Canadian cities, Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto, but what I have seen in those cities is to me as alarming as it is tragic. If I may generalize from these local observations I would say that Canada at the moment is not so much a nation motivated by a full-out war effort, but is on the other hand, it would seem, in many ways a nation enjoying the greatest prosperity in its history. These days appear to me to be as gilded and as giddy as those of 1929. I regret to say it, but I say frankly that I am not particularly impressed, in the time I have been in this chamber on a few occasions, with its atmosphere. There seems to me to be an unreality about it; there seems to be a lack of appreciation in the fullest sense that the finest of Canada's young manhood is daily dying that those at home may live under British freedom. I hazard the statement that there are times when visitors may sit in these galleries for a whole sitting and then leave the house, hardly realizing there is a war on.

To have lived in a country where every—and I say "every"—able-bodied man or woman is contributing fully under an organized and well regulated selective service to what is in fact as well as in name an all-out war effort is to realize what an all-out war effort is. In the United Kingdom one does not see able-bodied men holding down jobs that could be filled as effectively by women. Those who are not in uniform are productively employed in some essential jobs, and after working hours may be, for several nights a week, out literally all night on A.R.P. duty, fire watching, whatever it may be, back again on the job in the morning, and one or two other evenings in the week and at the week-ends out at manœuvres with the local home guard. How fully do I recognize that there are in this country tens of thousands of homes from which men have gone to duty in the armed forces, many of which homes are to-day sorrowing under the greatest tragedy that could have befallen them. But these homes are not Canada as a whole as I see it, and one cannot but feel that in the atmosphere which prevails in parts of the country which I have seen since I came back there is almost a carnival spirit, prematurely anticipating the victory which indubitably will come but which has not yet been achieved. One almost feels that the war has brought to Canada in 1944, as I have said, a period of prosperity rather than a period of grim crisis.

During the last three or four weeks I have had the opportunity of sitting in this chamber but a few times and briefly. It has been a very sobering experience. I have not come back to Canada, as, I regret to say one who had the opportunity of meeting the enemy directly in the air or on the land or on the sea. That privilege is denied me because, I am told, I am too old. My opinion of that point of view I cannot express in parliamentary language, Mr. Chairman. On the other hand, I have been in London recently and through most of England; I have returned to Canada by troopship, and therefore I have had the opportunity of seeing some activity. To see the people of England in general and the people of London in particular under the stress of the February raids on London—which incidentally were not particularly amusing—to live under the rigid rationing of the United Kingdom, to feel one's way through the blackout, is to impress upon one what might be called the grim unreality of the atmosphere of this house. Across this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific this week, plastered on billboards, spread throughout the press, and echoed on the radio, is the slogan of the sixth victory loan, "Put Victory First". It might not be an unworthy suggestion to propose that that slogan be hung in this chamber.

I hold in my hand a copy of Hansard dated Tuesday, April 25, 1944. It records a debate about as far removed from the war as the sunny sands of Palm Beach are from the bloody sands of Anzio. I should like to ask hon. members if they would care to have that Hansard circulated among our armed forces on active duty to indicate to them what parliament is doing back home to back them up. There is the record that the proceedings of an entire day were devoted to wrangling on a motion to accept the report of a standing committee to amend the rules governing this house. I wonder what would be the effect upon the morale of those who are in the front line of this war if this debate had been broadcast to them. It was a shocking experience, particularly just at the beginning of the sixth victory loan, to have such a fatuous performance as that which was conducted in this chamber last Tuesday.

This, Mr. Chairman, is the seat of government. It is from here that stirring leadership should come. If there is a strange unreality about the conduct of this house that atmosphere will permeate the whole of Canada. On the other hand, if the government sets the pace it should, equally that atmosphere will permeate the whole of Canada. Therefore there rests that intangible and yet fully tangible responsibility on the shoulders of the government of Canada to provide that realistic, active leadership which is described in the slogan of the sixth victory loan, "Put Victory First." This is the type of leadership that this government must give. It was never more required than at this moment when we are on the threshold of the greatest and grimmest adventure in which this country has ever had a part. D-day will be news in Canada. D-day will be a stark reality to the men in the front line.

I hold in my hand three periodicals, one of them Canadian, Macleans, and two of them American, Life and Fortune. I suggest to hon. members that they look through such publications, at the advertising pages. In their pages are advertisements designed to prime the public for purchases after victory. One would think, to glance through some of these pages, that victory was assured, that it was at hand to-morrow. To hear and overhear some conversations, one would be led to believe that all we have to do to win the war is to step ashore from the barges and walk to Berlin through a Germany flattened by the air force.

We must realize that no beachhead can possibly be established on the steps of the European fortress without the payment of a ghastly price. The road to Berlin can be no other than a bloody road, but that is the price we are going to have to pay before victory is ours. As I see it at the moment, Canada is all tee-ed up for a sickening shock. Some day, soon possibly, the unreality of this present era of prosperity will be brought to a sudden end by the sacrifice which this country will then realize it is making.

I do not wish to be lugubrious or morbid, but I should like this house, in its deliberations and in its plans, to think soberly upon the brave homes to which telegrams will be sent, telegrams which commence with the words, "Regret deeply...". I can say nothing more earnestly and sincerely in this chamber than I say this: In the name of every Canadian lad in the armed forces, let this house away with petty politics, away with useless and fatuous wrangling; and may this government rouse itself to the full and active responsibility of the leadership which it should give.

Never forget for a moment that this war is not won until the armistice is signed. Never forget for a moment that the hun is not defeated, and the Jap does not cease to be a deadly menace, until the last shot is fired. Never forget for a moment that if we relax, if we take on a cock-sureness, if we assume a complacency, if we assume that victory is already ours, then the war can yet be lost.

I have said what I have said, Mr. Chairman, as strongly as I have said it, because of the impression that has been made upon me in recent days in the few times I have sat where I now stand. I say it because in some ways it is the most singularly important single thing I can say in the brief time it is my privilege to speak here. Not for a moment in anything I have said however, have I overlooked what this country has done to date. I have it very clearly in mind. I have seen at first hand the contribution it has made and is making. No more sincere compliment can be paid to the skill of the designers, the craftsmanship of the workmen, and the acumen of the business executives than is paid daily by the efficiency, the effectiveness, and the quantity on hand of the war materials which we have produced and are producing in such vast abundance. Yes, Canada's contribution in war materials is vast, magnificently effective, as our troops well know. Any Canadian who goes to the United Kingdom or elsewhere to-day may look with pride on Canada's contribution in materials to this war.

I do not profess to know directly the activities of the men in the Royal Canadian Navy or of the Canadian Army, but I know something about the men and their activities of the Royal Canadian Air Force. But for our sailors, let me say this. My station in England is adjacent to a very large naval training station, and consequently many naval officers are now numbered among my friends. Notoriously, the Royal Navy is the silent service, and any praise from a well-salt-watered naval officer is praise indeed. Repeatedly my heart has been warmed by those who have seen action in the battle of the Atlantic in particular, and in other waters in general, where they have met the Royal Canadian Navy and now speak so magnificently of its work. It was indeed a thrill a rare thrill, on the voyage home the other day to see Canadian naval vessels on duty in the Atlantic and to feel that those ships which we saw were just a few of the many of our splendid, efficient and very new Royal Canadian Navy.

Then, too, as a result of other contacts I have made, having talked to those who have sat side by side with our lads in Sicily and in Italy, and heard the words of praise that have been spoken to me sincerely, I know they are words to make any Canadian swell with pride.

Canada has every reason to be proud of her fighting troops.

And then our airmen. Groundcrew as well as aircrew, inferior to none, superior to most, have set up in this war a record which is in the best traditions, built up by that mighty group of the last war who flew their "bird-cages" with gallantry and valour. The joy and the thrill of the old dog-fight have gone. Most of the sorties to-day are a pretty cold-blooded and lengthy proposition requiring the greatest courage, endurance, ability, skill and sheer guts. Youngsters of nineteen and twenty are captaining huge aircraft with a crew of seven and a load sometimes of eight tons of bombs, flying through flak, fighter opposition and "soup" to the target for the night, dropping their bombs with devastating precision. No nobler pages have been or are being written in the annals that record deeds of heroism, valour and courage than are being written every day and every night by the lads of the Royal Canadian Air Force.

And so I say to the government, these sailors, these soldiers and these airmen are your responsibility. They have volunteered to go. You have trained them to go. They have gone. The best is not too good for them; the least that we can do for them is the most that we can do. When I speak of the lads overseas I think too of the lads who have volunteered for overseas duty and yet who to-day are still in training stations, headquarters or other units in Canada. It is trite to say that one in uniform goes wherever he is sent and does what he is told. It is equally true. But do not criticize the volunteer in Canada who is not sent overseas. The chances are that he has repeatedly requested an overseas posting and it has not come through for him yet. I say in the minister's presence that it took me three years to get there.

Let me say a word for the ground officers and men of our air force and those airmen of our services who are denied the privilege of operations by their medical category, their age, or whatever it may be. Apparently it is altogether too easy for some to criticize those of us who are "chair-borne" and who are only permitted to fly a desk. One sometimes hears wholly unjustified and disparaging remarks about the general duties of airmen or the administrative officers. These men are just as essential to the services as the lads who fly. Their job may be colourless, undramatic, and in many cases routine. It is one thing to fly. It is another thing to "keep 'em flying." Aircrew is dependent upon groundcrew. We are a team; all praise and honour to the aircrew, all credit and honour to the groundcrew.

In what I have said so far I have not forgotten for a moment that this government would be most remiss in its duty, in its responsibility, if it did not plan immediately for the days of demobilization and the battle of peace, which in many ways will be just as difficult, trying and expensive as the war. It is vitally necessary that plans be made. Some plans are, of course, already in the process of making. It is vitally necessary that schemes be designed and programmes laid down now for the day when the member of the armed forces hangs up his uniform or hands it in for the last time.

Let me say here that part of the functions of my station overseas is in connection with repatriation. Through it flow all the lads, aircrew as well as groundcrew on their way back to Canada. I personally see and interview large numbers of them in the course of duty, and, of course, after hours. I think I can give the committee a fair idea of what is in their minds when they are at the point of coming home. I say this immediately to you: there is not one of them who wants to be milk-fed when he comes back. There is not one of them who wants your sympathy or your pity. Goodness knows he has demonstrated to the full his unselfishness and sincerity. He has certainly proved himself a worthy citizen. He expects something from his government, and justly so. He does not want much, and he does not want to be coddled. What he wants is reasonable, and I can tell you he expects it. All he wants from his government, to put it in a sentence, is an even break to rehabilitate himself. He realizes that he has not had too much experience in the art of living a normal life. He knows that in the last few months or years he has lived a hectic life under a terrible strain; that inevitably that strain has taken a toll of him to a greater or lesser degree, and the period of adjustment is certainly not going to be easy for him. He wants counsel. He wants a bit of help, a bit of advice. What is already going forward in our service or in the process of development along these lines is a most worthy project, and I compliment the minister upon setting it up. Yes, the man when he returns wants help and counsel in the rehabilitation period; and yet when it comes right down to it hon. members will fully realize how little many of these youngsters, thousands of them, yes, tens of thousands of them, fresh out of school, know about earning a living or maintaining themselves. For his whole service life everything has been found for him. On the whole, the chances are he has had a pretty decent place in which to live and he has had good food. The chances are that he has earned more money than he could hope to earn in civilian life until he has had a bit of experience and has climbed up the ladder a little.

Yes, he needs your help. He certainly expects it. It would be his idea, in which I heartily concur and which I recommend strongly to the government, that he should be kept on strength at his rate of pay until such time as his rehabilitation period or training period for civil life, whether it be in a school, college, university or as an apprentice in a job, or in a technical school, is complete. I do not suggest for a moment that he feels he should be kept in uniform. He could be on leave with pay and permitted to wear civilian clothes, but kept on strength until he finishes his training.

Then he expects on his discharge, on the completion of his training, that a job be ready for him as he will be ready for it. This he feels is due him by the government. He also wants a place to live. He wants to be sure that he is going to get a place to live. There is nothing he wants more than a home. Many of these lads have been to the four corners of the world. They have been away from their country for years, and Canada looks pretty good to them when they come back. In some cases, yes, in thousands of cases, he will be bringing his bride home with him. He has already heard about the shortage of homes in Canada. He is a bit worried about that and he expects the government to do something about it.

Another thing he thinks about is the fellow who stayed back home, perhaps through no fault of his own because he was in an important war job or, maybe, because he did not want to go. The man in the services overseas appreciates fully that there is a home front as well as a war front, but he takes a pretty dim view of the fellow who could go active but did not. What he expects—and he does expect it—is that the lad who stayed at home will not be permitted to pick off all the plums in so far as jobs are concerned before he has had a chance to get them too. In other words, he wants his future safeguarded for him while he is away. These are the principal things about demobilization which the lads I have seen are thinking about when they have time to think about their future or they find they are on their way home.

There is another point that some of them, perforce have to think about, and that is a pension. So many of them are coming back with the mark of battle upon them. Lots of them have disabilities that are permanent. What about the pension? He does not like the present pension legislation. He thinks it is un-British in that the would-be pensioner is considered guilty until he is proven innocent. By that he means that the onus of proof is on the applicant. He feels it should be the other way. In other words, he feels that the applicant is entitled to his pension unless his application is proved unjustifiable. That matter is of no small importance.

He is pleased to know that his government is in the process of introducing legislation to set up three new departments, the departments of social welfare, reconstruction and veterans' affairs. He feels that is a step in the right direction. You see, for much of his life, just to take one point, he has had the best of medical and dental care, and his needs in those fields have been at his disposal without cost. He is going to be out on his own some day soon, he hopes; and to obtain the benefits of these necessary services is apt to be a big expense. Therefore he feels that by the time he gets back something should have been done to make these essentials accessible to him, and within his means.

Then, too, for the present, while he is still on active duty, he feels that a bit more could be done for him. About all he gets now is his pay. I am breaking no confidence, Mr. Chairman, nor am I transgressing my privileges as a serving officer or as a member of this house, when I say that I know the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) has some plans in mind in this regard, which plans it is not my privilege to mention here. To him I should like to say: All power to you and your ideas; and to his colleagues in the government I say: Give him your full support. You see, these airmen of ours are scattered over the face of the globe; some are in far-flung, distant places, remote and woolly. Sometimes some of these lads think they have been forgotten; in most cases in such places they are with a service other than their own, namely the Royal Air Force. They are still Canadians; they are still our responsibility, and they feel that their own service should look after them. So I say to the minister, carry on with the plans you have in mind; and again I urge his colleagues in the government to give him their full support in order that these plans may be implemented.

These, Mr. Chairman, are only a few of the things about which the airmen are thinking. If time permitted I could discuss other points, perhaps of less importance but still of great importance. Some of these matters have already been brought forward in this chamber by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair). For example, the clothing allowance on discharge is $65. The airman knows and the government knows, that you cannot re-kit yourself in a civvy outfit for $65; at least if you do, you look as if you had. Another thing he does not like is this quaint $44.20 for living allowance during a training period. The mathematics of it somewhat befuddles him, but he does know one thing; it is not enough. What he dislikes most of all is the vast difference between what the low-ranking airman gets on discharge as compared with what the senior officer gets. He feels that it is all out of balance and unfair. Therefore I urge upon the government, with all the earnestness of which I am capable, that they listen to what these lads of ours have to say in regard to what they want and expect. Take their word for it; they have earned what they ask for. As I have said, they are not asking much; they are not unreasonable; they are not selfish; they are not grasping. This country has no finer possession than these lads. They just want a fair break; that is all. This government has no greater challenge in connection with its war responsibilities than in connection with its responsibility for the future of the men and women in Canada's armed forces.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, let me return to the point from which I began, "Put Victory First." In the midst of the planning which is so vitally necessary for to-morrow, let this house never relax for a moment from its full responsibility toward the winning of the war. Let it discourage private bickerings and quibblings; let it set a standard for the whole of Canada, so that by its actions it may provide the leadership which this country so sorely needs. Since returning to Canada I have been asked repeatedly, "What do the lads talk about when they are not on duty?" I can give you the answer to that question in three words: Winning the war. Visit our units in the United Kingdom, or wherever they may be; visit stations and squadrons, where our lads are in such great numbers. There you will find the noblest body of young men produced by any country. You will find their spirits high, their determination deep, never flagging or failing. To win the war; that is their slogan.

As I take my seat and then leave this chamber to return to duty I express the hope of every one of us in the armed forces, that the stern reality of the moment as we face D-day will impress itself upon this house and this country. Something was written during the last war which has been repeated time and time again, and it cannot be repeated too often these days. It was written by a Canadian for Canadians. They are simple words, but how deeply they should sink into the very fibre of this house and this nation: "If ye break faith . . . we shall not sleep. . . ."

Mr. RALSTON: Before the committee takes recess I should like to place upon the record, in connection with the matter of housing particularly as it affects dependents of members of the armed forces, a telegram which was sent out by the chairman of the dependents' board of trustees to the different dependents' advisory committees all over Canada, as follows:

Immediate

Para. one: The dependents board of trustees are empowered to provide supplementary grants or special assistance to qualified dependents of members of the armed forces where such dependents have special or emergency needs.

Para. two: Advisory committees are reminded that this provision covers assistance to such dependents who may be threatened with eviction and have other accommodation available but require financial assistance to meet transportation costs.

Para. three: Please arrange with your committee and your cooperating local welfare organizations to give immediate and sympathetic consideration to applications of this nature.

Para. four: Grants may be made locally as necessary within usual limits of committee authority. Where reference to the board at Ottawa is required please use telephone or telegram. Special arrangements have been made by board to deal immediately with these emergency cases.

Para. five: Your mayor and municipal authorities should be reminded immediately of the assistance available through your committee and that D.B.T. is both ready and anxious to help qualified dependents who need emergency assistance.

Para. six: I bespeak your close personal attention to this matter and urge the most prompt and sympathetic action. You may be assured of the fullest cooperation of the board.

Jack Pembroke,
Chairman, D.B.T.

Mr. GRAYDON: Was that telegram sent this afternoon?

Mr. RALSTON: It was sent to-day.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mr. Chairman, for a moment or two I should like to deal with a few of the matters to which the minister referred. I was interested in what he said about section 5, that under the present regulations it is rather difficult for an employer to discharge an employee. This change has been long overdue, and I hope it is now official that employees cannot be discharged without official consent. I am sure this will be a relief to workmen generally, particularly in large plants. I believe he said also that an employee cannot just quit his job when he feels like it. I hope the regulations referring to each of these facts, if I may call them facts, are not just something that can be set aside at will. I hope that they will be kept in force.

I wish to say a word about selective service. First, I should like to compliment the minister upon his deputy, Mr. Arthur MacNamara. I have had considerable dealing with Mr. MacNamara, but it has been by correspondence and I do not think I have ever met him. Upon the presentation of the facts to him I have always found him ready to deal with them in a proper way.

The operation of labour offices has long been a matter of inquiry with me. I have followed their operation in Great Britain and continental Europe, and I have been specially interested in the opening of labour offices in this country under national selective service. I am glad to note that national selective service are now sending its staff employees into the different plants in order that they may determine, as far as one not actually a labour operator can, just what is being done, and be in a better position to advise applicants for employment. Some time ago I talked with a young woman in the Toronto selective service office and she told me about having been sent to visit a large plant. She was quite thrilled over it, and she said that she felt herself better qualified and more competent after that and other visits to advise those making application for various types of employment. I can see how the personnel of the selective service are acquiring an experience which will be very valuable as time goes on.

In the great plant with which I was associated for many years we had workers of many races. There were Poles, Italians, Czechoslovakians, Ukrainians, Russians and others. At all times they were found to be capable workmen. I have been wondering if the people of these races have been given a place on the staffs of selective service branches. I often think of the people who were brought into this country from Europe. They built up this country to a greater degree than they are given credit for. At the commencement they were brought out by the large companies for one reason or another, perhaps because of a scarcity of labour, although I can not say yes or no to that. On account of their not being able to speak English, the positions they held always entailed hard work. I am glad to see that they are now getting above that and are taking a part in other activities in this country. I should like to know if these people have been given a part in an administrative way in the operation of these offices.

I am going to suggest to the minister that he should look over the administration of his predecessor, the late Hon. Norman Rogers. I had a very high regard for the former Minister of Labour. He was not only fully qualified; he was most capable in an administrative way. He was head of the department during the deep depression, and I remember his presenting a programme to the house some time before he had the sad ending that came his way. I have often thought that had he been permitted to live, perhaps the depression would not have got down as far as it did.

The minister mentioned Steep Rock. The development there has been due largely to the ability of the hydro electric power commission to do what it did to enable the promoters of this property to divert a river which was injurious to the property and upon which was a power plant producing about 10,000 horse-power and belonging to the Minnesota Ontario Power company. The hydro electric power commission of Ontario were able to say to the owners of that power plant that if they would agree to the river being diverted they would supply them with 10,000 horse-power, the utmost capacity they were able to develop. The Ontario hydro electric power commission were able to put another dynamo into operation at their Alexander plant on the Nipigon river and provide the power.

Because of its ability to develop large blocks of power the hydro electric power commission has been of tremendous help to this country in the carrying on of the war munitions task that faces us to-day. If things should get tough for the minister after the war, I suggest that his department interest itself in assisting the provinces to produce power in a big way. I suggest to him the possibilities of producing hydro electric power in the great central province of the west, Saskatchewan. While that province produces some power from coal at Estevan and other cities, the production of hydro power, if carried on, is only in a small way.

The minister referred to old age pensions, and I should like to say one word about this. Years ago I supported a programme which was advocated in this house by the late leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, and one of his confreres, as well as a number on the then government side. This was not adopted by the government, since apparently they did not think they could get the money to carry it out. I advocated the reduction of the age limit to sixty-five years and the increasing of the contribution of the provinces, and that of the government from what is now called for by statute—$20 a month, plus what is given by the provinces, plus a war bonus—to at least a dollar a day.

The minister said something about apprentices. There, I believe, is a big field. Anyone who has been associated with employment, in a big way, knows what a real system of apprenticeship in this country would do. We never had it, except in some of the individual trades. I am going to suggest to the minister that between now and the next session, if this government remains in office for another year, he might prepare a programme of apprenticeship for Canada, and present it at that time. That is all I shall say about the minister's speech.

In reference to the subject of labour, itself, the minister will know that, in the years he has been acquainted with me, I have always been greatly interested in labour problems, having myself been associated with labour for many years. I have always taken the stand, and I shall never fail to take it, that the labour unions have had a much larger place in maintaining harmony in labour ranks in Canada, and in the building up of our country, than they have been given credit for. It has been my experience that in the great majority of cases the heads of labour unions with which, when I reached the position of an executive, I had to deal were anxious to keep labour employed. I know that in more than nine cases out of ten they were anxious and willing to keep the members of their unions employed. They were not in favour of strikes. Only very rarely did a labour leader call for a strike, and then only under the greatest provocation.

Therefore I have always had a warm feeling for labour unions; and the whole labour movement from the earliest days has had a long, long struggle up, up, up, up, up, all the time, until to-day they have reached a position they never reached before. I believe it was away back in the eleventh century that what we now know as labour movements originated. They had their beginning in the early guilds, although at that time the guilds were not completely confined to labour operators, themselves, but took in various groups. Then, following the guilds came the craft unions, in the fourteenth century. In the beginning of the last century the modern labour union movement started in Great Britain, and had marvellous success. From that time on, down through the years of the last century, the work performed by great union leaders—and there have been some distinguished leaders—has been the basis of the present set-up with which the minister is so familiar, because I have no doubt that he was associated with labour unions in the old country.

I feel this way about labour unions: it was developed from guilds to crafts, and then to trade unions. Then in recent years we have found the principle of collective bargaining. I believe the former head of the labour movement in Canada, a man who commands high respect and who, I am pleased to know, is improving in health, must be mentioned in this connection. I believe it was in 1934 that Mr. Tom Moore—if I may speak of him familiarly—set out clearly and strongly the advantages of the principle of collective bargaining when he attended before the price spreads inquiry of that year. He was one of the early advocates of collective bargaining in Canada, and had to support him a bill which had been passed in the United States. Section 7A of the National Industrial Recovery Act of that country states, in part:

> Employees shall have the right to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and shall be free from the interference, restraint or coercion of employers of labour or their agents, in the designation of such representatives or in self-organization, or in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining.

From that time—and that was only ten years ago—until recently perhaps under the minister's term of office, the principle of collective bargaining has become fairly well established in this country. And I do not see why it should not be. The whole structure of plants has changed greatly in late years. Machines are automatic, and particularly those machines for the operation of which men had to be thoroughly trained. It used to take years and years of training to operate a lathe. It was one of the most complicated machines of that time. I must confess that I never could master the operation of the various gears in a lathe, so as to turn out work as it should be turned out. It was something at which I never became proficient.

To-day, however, that is largely done automatically. We find that now the single craft union in the big plant has lessened to such an extent that it really becomes necessary for the personnel of such plants, no matter what the crafts may be, to bargain together. To my mind that is the real principle of collective bargaining.

I say to the minister that the problem of employment after the war will be the responsibility of the Minister of Labour. That is in my judgment his primary duty or one of them. In the last few years, because of the operations of the Department of Munitions and Supply, and perhaps one other department, employment has got out of the minister's control. But after the war it will be his duty to look after it, and no doubt it will be back under his supervision.

I support what was said this afternoon by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey), namely, that when the troops return, those who have not positions to go to and those who will not be employed in the armies accupying a relieved Europe, or are not required in our own armed forces, or are not training in colleges or schools, should be kept on the armed services rolls until positions are ready for them. If that is not done, the Minister of Labour will have a terrific job on his hands.

May I express further opinions about labour. Having served for many years with many hundreds of men, I have always had a warm attachment to the labouring man and his family. It would seem that labour has suffered all the distress, and unless a big change takes place in the attitude of the state toward the labouring man, his difficulties, trials and troubles, we shall not arrive at the point at which we should like to arrive, namely the elimination of the fear of want among labour and labour troubles.

Something was said yesterday about the reduction to fourteen years of the compulsory age limit at which children should be at school. I do not agree with that. It may be all right if, as we sometimes find in Toronto, a child of fourteen years has to procure employment, and gets it upon the request of his widowed mother or perhaps the request of a father who is unable to work. In Toronto the consent of the board of education must be obtained for children to leave school at fourteen years of age. I have known cases where this has worked out satisfactorily. Of course the board requires that the child shall attend night school for so many days a week until it reaches the age of sixteen. The lad who does that will want to continue even beyond that age. I do not think the school leaving age should be less than sixteen. I agree with what was said some time ago before the reconstruction committee by a group of educationists, namely, that every Canadian child—the child of the labouring man as well as of any other citizen—is entitled to the best education that can be given it up to at least sixteen years of age. What part the minister has in this I do not know, but I believe he should insist that children be kept at school until they reach the age of sixteen. After that, what is the boy or girl to do? I have seen many cases of lads put to work for which they were not equipped. I wonder whether the minister has given any thought to a suggestion which is often made here, namely, the encouragement and extension of technical schools and vestibule schools associated with industrial plants, wherein lads who are leaving school can be trained in the industry, receiving some compensation for the returns they make to the company while in training, and the foremen, seeing what progress they made, could place them in positions in the plant itself where they could get better pay than they would probably receive if they started to work without any such special training. I strongly favour giving the sons of the workers an opportunity as soon as possible so to equip themselves as to obtain the largest possible remuneration.

I also suggest that the minister interest himself in the question of whether companies, great and small, should not be permitted to use part of their excess profits, at any rate when the war is over, for the reconstruction of their plants in order that working conditions may be healthier and pleasanter. I often think with regret of men spending their lives in large dingy factories, with dark greasy walls and floors, when the companies, if they were encouraged to do so by receiving part of the excess profits which to-day must necessarily be used for the war effort, would restore and recondition their plants to the great benefit of the workers. Surely the time is coming when every plant where men and women work should be as attractive as it can possibly be made. The time is past for men and women to operate all day long under disagreeable conditions which it would not be difficult to remedy. Then, why should not every plant management do as so many plants are doing to-day, namely, give their workmen and workwomen a period of rest in the forenoon and the afternoon? I know of many plants where this rest period is in effect; indeed, if I started to name them I would take too much time, besides running the risk of omitting to mention a great many others which no doubt are doing the same thing. I therefore would simply make the general statement that many plants to-day allow their employees, as they should, as relief from the constant application which modern fast moving machines require, fifteen minutes' rest in the forenoon and a similar period in the afternoon, giving them an opportunity to refresh themselves with a cup of coffee or a sandwich. I believe that practice should be general; it does not seem fair to have it applied to a certain number of plants when it is not applied in others, although I am informed that in those plants where the practice prevails the output per employee for a similar period is greater than in factories where it has not been adopted. But the rest period should be of general application; the time has come when all workmen and workwomen, and not merely some of them, should be treated with fairness and consideration.

As I understood the minister this afternoon, he said that labour is participating to a greater extent than ever before in membership of government boards and commissions. That is as it should be. I have observed in reading history that as the franchise has been extended, so labour has taken a greater share in the world's business. I should like to see in this house many more labour men. By this I do not mean—and I say this without making reflections upon any party or person—those who call themselves labour men; I mean those who, like the minister, have worked for years and years at the bench or with the tools of their trade, not those who serve for a couple of weeks in the summer holidays at some manual occupation and talk from then on as if they know all about labour. I am not reflecting upon any group in the house when I say that I should be glad to see more labour people in it. We all know that the government of Sweden is represented as being perhaps one of the finest governments in the world. Whether this is so or not, anyone who studied the personnel of the present Swedish parliament knows that the government contains a larger percentage of downright labour men than the government of any other country. That is a credit to Sweden.

I should also like to see in the house a larger number of business men of the type of the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton, men who do big things, who make big business and give large numbers of men employment. I know it is almost impossible for a man to run a business and be in the House of Commons. Nevertheless, if we had more business and labour members the work of the house would be pepped up and we should get through much earlier than we do.

What is labour entitled to? First, security against unemployment, which means, of course, security of employment. The insecurity which labour has been up against all down the years is a main reason for the stresses and troubles which have developed between employer and employee. That should not be the case. Employer and employee should co-operate, and in that regard I should like to see—and I am glad to know that the practice is spreading all the time in the plants themselves—not only the management but those under the management rising from the ranks within the factory. That is gradually increasing to the good of the factories. I have experienced that myself and I know.

I have heard people denounce industry generally, but I could show hon. members many great plants in Toronto in which all those who are managing operations, from the manager, the assistant manager, the engineers and so on right down through the plant, have been educated so to speak in the plant itself in the particular line in which they are engaged. That is as it should be. Labour cannot do it alone, nor can capital accomplish this end alone. It takes the two together, both capital and labour, and each has its absolute rights. The rights are not all on one side or the other.

I feel that we have reached the stage where there should be just cooperation between management and labour in every plant and just cooperation between capital and all those engaged in the plant. May I suggest to the minister that after the war his great problem will be that of providing employment. The Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) has spoken of a big programme that is to be put into effect after the war to produce employment. Well, personally I do not know of any big programme. The Minister of Pensions and Natioinal Health may know of one but I do not. At any rate it is the duty of the Minister of Labour to urge, as strongly as he can, on all the departments that may be concerned the preparation of plans for employment on a large scale after the war.

We all heard the speech delivered this afternoon by the hon. member for Greenwood. It was a brilliant speech in which he excelled himself, and he pointed out that the heroes coming back after the war will want positions. He said, and I am sure we all endorse his views, that no one is more entitled to positions than those men and women who will be discharged from the services. The Minister of Labour has, therefore, a tremendous job to see to it that somebody shall make preparations for the time after the war, because the war may end sooner than anyone expects.

We have not had any difficulty in raising billions to spend on the war—for what purpose? For the destruction not only of buildings, of property, of wealth in general, but, on a large scale, of human life. I do not think as much money will be required after the war, but should it be difficult to obtain billions, if needs be, to put our men and women to work at that time? I do not think so. I believe that if the minister and other members of the government do their part there will be no unemployment after the war. There should be no unemployment in Canada with our incomparable resources and the thousand and one opportunities which we have to-day to do what should have been done years ago during the depression.

I trust that the Minister of Pensions and National Health, who has these plans either in his pocket or in his head, will tell the house one of these odd days just where we shall send 100,000 men and women to work after the war, because certainly we cannot return to the condition that existed in the days of the depression.

[Mr MacNicol.]

My time is up, and I should like to conclude by summing up these remarks as to what labour should have.

1. Certainty of employment.

2. Healthy working conditions. Every man and woman in Canada should have such conditions of employment.

3. Adequate compensation to enable labour to take care of their families, and if necessary, should they have no other means of doing so, lay by something for themselves for old age. They should be freed from the necessity, if they accept the old age pension, of surrendering the right to their homes. They are not asked to do so in Australia, in New Zealand, or in England, and I do not see why they should be asked to surrender their homes in Canada if they wish to accept old age pensions.

4. There should be compensation for unemployment. We have unemployment insurance, but it is not everyone who has such insurance. No one unemployed after the war should be in a position where he will not have any revenue coming in.

5. There should be sick benefits for the people. There have been such benefits in England for many years.

6. I think the time has come when labour should have a larger share in plant management, assisting the managers.

7. They should have pleasant employer-employee cooperation.

8 There should be no lock-outs. Men should not have gates locked in their faces and be sent away. The minister, I believe, has in mind setting up some board that will ensure the elimination of such a condition.

9. If there are excess profits the men should have a part of them.

Finally, I hope the government will set up a real labour board. There are now fine men in the government service who are well trained and one of whom I have in mind. He writes a great deal in the labour press. I refer to Bernard Rose, K.C., of Montreal. There are many others like him qualified to sit on such a board, and the activities of such a board would in my opinion tend to eliminate the possibility of strikes.

Surely there should be governmental machinery to keep men working and to see that they get fair play and are not chased out of employment and locked out, suffering in consequence. The time has gone by when such a condition should exist. The time has come when labour should have fair play all along the line.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I intervene in the debate for one minute. I agree entirely with my good friend the hon. member for Davenport as to the nature of the address heard this afternoon from the hon. member for Greenwood. It was in every way a highly effective speech, but there was one part of it in which I crave permission to make a correction, because I am sure the hon. gentleman himself would be the first to assist me in doing so. He was speaking of our comrades overseas and he said that he does not like the present pension system. He thinks it is un-British in that the would-be pensioner is considered guilty until he is proved innocent, and by that he says he means that the onus of proof is on the applicant.

It is my duty, in a cooperative spirit, to correct that statement because it might be disturbing to those overseas and to their families as well if it went out in that form. The practice at the present time is this. On the first hearing the responsibility is definitely on the commission to show why an award of pension should not follow, and on the second hearing, in which of course the applicant can submit additional evidence to overcome obstacles that may occur, both at that hearing and before the appeal board, there is a duty and responsibility upon the commission to set out the reasons why pension is refused.

I will conclude by quoting, not the opinion of anyone, but what is the statute law of Canada. I do so because I do not think the statement which I have quoted should go out unchallenged. Section 62 of the Pension Act reads:

> Notwithstanding anything in this act, on any application for pension the applicant shall be entitled to the benefit of the doubt, which shall mean that it shall not be necessary for him to adduce conclusive proof of his right to the pension applied for, but the body adjudicating on the claim shall be entitled to draw and shall draw from all the circumstances of the case, the evidence adduced and medical opinions, all reasonable inferences in favour of the applicant.

This is statutory and mandatory. The hon. gentleman inadvertently used the term "un-British". May I say to him in a kindly manner that our Canadian pension provisions are far superior to those that have been in existence in the old country, my native land, in the last twenty-five years.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): May I ask the minister the date of that from which he has quoted?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The present Pension Act.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What is the date of it? That was not the system in effect.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The administration may not have been strictly carried out to the letter of the law, but that is the way it works on the first and the second hearings and before the appeal board.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): It has not always been that way.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Oh, yes, for many years.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If it has always been that way and has worked out as unfortunately as it has in the past I do not know whether there is much comfort to be drawn from the minister's remarks.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): There is not.

Mr. DONNELLY: What is the date?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): 1930, chapter 35, section 4.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I say to the minister that he may be able to read to the committee the letter of the law, but the spirit of the act has been criticized very fairly but perhaps not in the language that the minister would use. Nevertheless, it is the spirit in which the act has been administered that has led to the criticism of the hon. member for Greenwood this afternoon. When I spoke a couple of weeks ago I dealt with these matters in the hope that the minister would see that the very thing which the hon. member for Greenwood spoke of to-day would be carried out and that the whole philosophy of the pension commission and department would be changed so that what he suggests would be carried out.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): This is not the appropriate time to carry on a debate on this matter. There will be plenty of opportunities when my estimates are before this committee. I wish to tell my hon. friend that the spirit of the present commission is 100 per cent for the soldier. Six out of nine were privates in the line in the last war. Every one saw service. There is continuously a misrepresentation of this section 62. In every case where it is possible to do so the benefit is given to the applicant for pension, and it will be done as long as I have anything to do with the department.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is the minister himself satisfied that the administration of the Pension Act has been working out satisfactorily?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Of course, in any administration there are cases of hardship and cases of unfairness. There are bound to be. The spirit and the intent of the Canadian pension commission is to give the benefit of the doubt to every applicant. That is certainly my intent, as it is my hon. friend's.

Mr. GILLIS: I listened with a great deal of interest to the Minister of Labour presenting his war estimates this afternoon. I know he has a rather difficult job. He has been in the United States these past few days and perhaps he did not have an opportunity to study his war estimates and to give the committee an opportunity of understanding something about the presentation he made this afternoon before we were called upon to discuss them. He spoke for approximately an hour and a half, and we who are obliged to participate in the debate to-night have not had an opportunity of reading his remarks. I should like to have done that.

To-night I intend to deal in a general way with some of the aspects of his report and some of the sub-departments of his department. I have stated in the house on many occasions that I consider the Department of Labour the most important war department of government. I think that was exemplified in the minister's report this afternoon. That department has within its administration the complete mobilization of man-power, since it handles the call-ups in the first instance. Through the selective service organization it has the first approach to the ex-service man who comes back seeking a job. It has complete charge of controls which have a lot to do with the whole economic set-up of the country. It has under its administration and direction complete industrial education. It is pioneering the way in that field. For the first time in the history of the country a very necessary job is being done in that direction. That is why I should have liked to have an opportunity of studying the minister's report before I was obliged to speak on it; because I believe it behooves every member of this committee to make a careful study of that report. Not only has it a bearing on the war effort itself; it has within its purview almost complete control in the field of reconstructing Canada when the war is over. It is a department that we should all study carefully.

To-night I am going to comment briefly on the labour relations end of the minister's department and to make some observations on order in council 1003, as I see it. I am very much disappointed with that particular order, in view of the fact that for the last seventy-five years in Canada we have been struggling to establish some uniformity in labour relations in the different provinces. It has been more or less a hit-or-miss proposition with different regulations in the different provinces, and in some of them none up to very recently. During the whole process of fighting the war perhaps the most contentious problem that the minister's department has had to handle is the problem of labour relations. An effort has been made to adjudicate the democratic rights of the workers of this country in the field of industry.

I was pleased when the Prime Minister announced to the house, after considerable wrangling and a lot of unnecessary disturbance in the industrial field, that he was appointing a board headed by an eminent member of the judiciary. The obligation of that board was to make a complete examination of industrial relations in Canada as it affected both the employer and the employee and any others who might be interested. The Prime Minister stated specifically in the house that this was not to be an ordinary board and it was not to bring in an ordinary report. He said that what he was endeavouring to do was to set up labour jurisprudence in Canada; that this was to be labour's court, established for the purpose of ironing out labour's national difficulties in the field of labour relations.

That board sat and examined witnesses from one end of Canada to the other, employers and employees and others who were merely interested. Along with the hon. member for Vancouver East I had the pleasure of presenting a brief to that board, and I had considerable hope for it. After a mass of evidence was assembled the board went into a conference and they first divided among themselves. A majority and a minority report were written. Finally the provinces were called in and the basic order in council known as 1003 was drafted. I was surprised and disappointed after reading that particular order. I did not think they did the job they should have done. I see the situation left pretty much as it was. I read the majority report and the minority report. I do not think the order in council in any way reflects the opinions expressed in either of those reports. While those who drafted the final order may have been influenced somewhat by the reports, yet I see very little relationship in the order to the basic principles set out in either the majority or minority report.

The majority report deals with the right of the workers of this country to organize, and with the guaranteeing to them of collective bargaining, because there is no use in organizing unless that organization brings about a collective agreement. I am taking the majority report on that point because it was not as drastic and far-reaching as the minority report. On that point, at pages 2 and 3, the majority report had this to say:

> The recognition of the right has been far from universal. By far the majority of employers have resisted it over the period. Generally speaking the great mass of employers until comparatively recent years have employed all weapons in their power to resist and discourage the trade union movement.

Then it goes on to say:

> It is perfectly natural that labour should have felt generally resentful in such circumstances, particularly when it had the opportunity of observing the progress made in ensuring its place in society in the sister dominions of Australia and New Zealand and later in the United States. The feeling of frustration became accentuated with the depression years commencing in 1929, when a great part of labour had to exist on relief furnished by the state on account of industry's failure to furnish even a reasonable measure of employment.

That is pretty strong language, and from it one would believe that on the question of making union certification mandatory it was the intention of those who wrote the majority report that there should be no room for quarreling with respect to the certification of a union if and when the workers demonstrated by a vote that they wished to become members of any given collective bargaining organization. But I do not see that the language contained in the majority report has been carried forward into the code itself. I think the quickest and easiest way to dispose of that contention is to see how the code has worked out and how it has been recognized by employers since its inception. Of course I admit that it has not had a fair trial as yet, but the attitude on the part of the employers as set out in the majority report is still very apparent. I am going to mention two quite recent examples of that attitude. The first is contained in a night letter, dated April 24, to the Prime Minister, protesting that in connection with an application for certification for the employees of the dominion arsenal at Lindsay, which I presume to be a crown operated company, the same old difficulty is being encountered. There is no need for me to read that night letter; it has been sent to the Prime Minister. Therefore these difficulties are still very apparent, and not very far from this city of Ottawa, though the code was designed to overcome them. The second example is given in a letter dated April 17, which states that the national association of technical employees has been experiencing, in connection with the certification of a collective bargaining agency, the same difficulties that have confronted the arsenal workers at Lindsay.

Without going into all the machinery provided by the code for the certification of a union, I think the procedure is still too long drawn out; it is cumbersome, and in the final analysis throws the whole thing back into the lap of the old conciliation machinery, so that I am afraid that in future we shall continue to have the difficulties we have had in the past. I do not suggest that the people who drafted the code and those who are trying to administer it were not perfectly honest in their intentions, or that they do not want to see the situation cured, but I am convinced that by and large the employers of this country are hostile to organized labour and will use any loophole they can find in any legislation in order to frustrate the intentions of those who drafted the legislation. Unless this code is tightened up and has more teeth put into it; unless these matters are more clearly defined, we are not going to solve the difficulty. It seems to me that when a group of people decide by a vote that they want to do something, it is their democratic right to do it, and no one in this country should be able to deny them that right. I believe that under the code the certification of collective bargaining agencies should be made mandatory after the simple process of taking a ballot, under the direction of the Department of Labour, has been carried out. In my opinion, all this business of going back to the conciliation machinery in order to determine that right defeats the purpose which the code was intended to serve.

Many other criticisms could be offered, but I am not going to deal with them just now because, as I have said, this code is new and has not had a fair trial. However, I think the two cases I cited demonstrate that the antagonism on the part of those with whom we are dealing, the employers, is still being encountered, and unless more drastic measures are taken in regard to this matter we shall not get very much comfort from the code as it stands at present.

The second point I should like to discuss briefly was touched upon this afternoon by the minister; that is, the matter of labour representation on government boards. I am not going to labour the point. The national war labour board, upon whose majority report this code was founded, also made a pronouncement on this matter, one which I think is extremely important. At pages 13 and 14 the board had this to say:

> Labour feels as well that it should have representation on boards whose work generally affects labour's interests. We feel so too. A great deal of misunderstanding and confusion in respect of the principles involved could be overcome to a large degree if labour were represented on such boards. Then again, labour is uneasy about cessation of production in certain lines, uneasy as to what is going to happen to it, or where or when, or whether a place is to be found for it in other activities. If labour had some advance notice, through its own representatives, a much better feeling would prevail and more confidence in government would result. To give labour representation on such boards as local selective service boards and deny it representation on policy-making boards is only to pay lip-service to an important principle.

I am absolutely in accord with that statement.

The minister stated this afternoon that he had, I think some hundred and fifty—

Mr. MITCHELL: The total is 352.

Mr. GILLIS:—some 350 representatives of labour on different boards. I am not quarreling with that statement, nor do I dispute it because I do not know.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is a matter of record.

Mr. GILLIS: I am taking the minister's word for it. The point I make is that by and large those representatives are acting in an administrative capacity. There is no labour representation on the policy-making bodies. Those labour representatives are placed in a position of having to administer legislation which they had no part in making. Be it good, bad or indifferent, they have to try to justify it. I know many of them have a difficult job to do in that connection. Until such time as the government is prepared to give the representatives of labour an opportunity of sitting on the bodies where the legislation is drafted, where there will be an opportunity of getting their opinion—

Mr. MITCHELL: May I say this to my hon. friend? You must be elected first. I think every grown up man understands that.

Mr. GILLIS: No, I do not. The legislation they are administering to-day is largely legislation by order in council. There are no elected representatives of the people drafting those orders in council.

Mr. GRAYDON: My hon. friend is suggesting that much of the legislation is initiated by order in council. I would suggest that there is only one representative out of nineteen where that is being done.

Mr. GILLIS: I presume that is the minister. The minister said that you have to be elected.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is the hardest thing.

Mr. GILLIS: I do not see it in that way. As I pointed out to the minister, most of the legislation is by order in council.

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. MITCHELL: You will find that out if you ever get over here.

Mr. GILLIS: The members of this house are not writing those orders in council. The representatives of industry and business behind the scenes are taking good care of their own interests. The legislation is passed along to the labour representatives to try to justify it, and a lot of them are having a rather difficult job. If you can call in the heads of industry and give them an opportunity of saying what their needs are in drafting orders in council, why cannot you call in the representatives of labour and give them the same opportunity? I think you would have a lot less trouble with the legislation.

Mr. MITCHELL: We are doing that very thing every day in the week. My hon. friend should know that.

Mr. GILLIS: I do not know that. That is the reason why I am talking about it.

Mr MITCHELL: You are out of touch with things.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not out of touch; perhaps I am too closely in touch with things. That is not being done. The board that drafted that report made exactly the same observation and they were in position to find out. I do not think the men who sat on that board would make the observation they did in their report if the assumption of the Minister of Labour were correct. I still insist that if labour is to be expected to do a job of administration in the field, it should have some say in the writing of the legislation.

My next reference is to the wage control order 9384, which was later amended by order 1727. The latter order removed some of the objectionable features of the original order 9384, but certain aspects still remained. The cost of living bonus was incorporated into the basic rates. I would not quarrel with that if the cost of living bonus were uniform, but it is not. The result is that many of the injustices which existed under the bonus arrangement were perpetuated when the bonus was absorbed into the basic rates. In many industries the basic rates were thrown completely out of line. I do not intend to argue that too long, because anyone who wants to get in touch with those who administer wage agreements will be able to find out for himself.

Under the wage order as it stands to-day the Department of Labour, through the war labour board, has set up more or less of a dictatorship in the matter of wages. However, I think there will be one beneficial result of this; it will force the unions to go into the question of national wage scales. By this order in council the government have attempted to regulate wages nationally, and they have practically fixed a minimum of thirty-five cents an hour. Restrictive measures are set out with regard to increases in wages. In order to get an increase you must prove that the rates are grossly unfair, but there is a little latitude if the rates are below thirty-five cents an hour. To me that means that a floor of thirty-five cents an hour is being placed under wages.

I think it is foolish for representatives of the workers to attempt to determine wage rates on a local or regional scale. I know what the mine workers are thinking about. They have been organized for a long time, and they are thinking in terms of national wage rates and of using their organization across Canada, in British Columbia, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Alberta. They are thinking in terms of a national conference and the fixing of a national and uniform wage scale for that industry. That is one thing this wage control order is precipitating in the interests of the workers of this country. I believe they will grasp the opportunity and attempt to lay down national minimums in the industries over which they have jurisdiction. Perhaps in years to come those who wrote that order for other purposes will realize that they were the force that organized the workers of this country 100 per cent in their industries and established national wage rates.

In the application of the order we must realize that those who administer it are to some extent tied in with the Department of Finance, because they cannot do the things with respect to increasing wages that they would like to do, without consultation with the war-time prices and trade board. That is something which is not generally understood, because the basic principle upon which the wage controls are set is the maintenance of the price ceiling, and the avoidance of inflation. I say this is definitely working a hardship, in that certain controls are there.

We will take as an example what is classified as a non-essential industry. I have an example before me. The salt miners at Malagash, Nova Scotia, made application to the national war labour board for adjustment in their basic rates, and their application was granted. I have the finding before me, but I shall not take time to read it. This is not a large industry; it employs probably 250 or 300 people. Nevertheless it is an industry in a province which has all too little industry. The operator claims he is not able to pay the award granted by the board, unless he is permitted to increase the price of the commodity he sells. He has made application to the war-time prices and trade board for that permission, and he is refused. He is told quite frankly that he must operate in competition with those who are importing salt into that province. That is competition which cannot be met. As a result of an award by the war labour board to a small industry, an industry which is necessary but which is not able to compete with importers—and they are probably subsidized, so far as I know, in the same way as applies in connection with coal—that industry is likely to close. They also have another handicap in that they have to maintain a railway line of their own in order to get the salt out to the main line of the Canadian National Railways. No subsidy is granted by the government for the maintenance of that short line, but the Canadian National, which picks up the salt at a given point, is receiving a substantial subsidy for the handling of that commodity. The picture is badly tangled up, and I am bringing it to the minister's attention. The application has already gone through all the machinery provided by his department, and I ask that he use his influence with the wartime prices and trade board to break the deadlock which exists in an essential industry.

There is no such thing as a non-essential industry. These are essential industries in the peace-time set-up, if we are to have employment in this country. It is silly to classify our peace-time industries as non-essential. Those which are now described as essential industries will cease to exist when the war is over. The other industries are essential in the post-war, and the one to which I have referred is likely to go out of existence, because of the interlocking jurisdiction which arises in connection with relieving a situation which the war labour board has already said can and should be corrected.

The wage question is a difficult one, and I am not going to labour it to-night, because I have not time to do so. The minister knows it very well, and he knows it leaves much to be desired. There are people who believe that family allowances are a solution for the inadequate wage scale. I want emphatically to state that I do not believe that. Under no circumstances must family allowances be used for that purpose.

Mr. MITCHELL: I agree with my hon. friend.

Mr. DUPUIS: We all agree.

Mr. GILLIS: I am in accord with the principle of family allowances, but they should be carefully worked out. I have my own opinion as to what they should be, and at another time I shall put my opinion on record. It is my view that certain mechanics must be followed out. However, that is a story in itself, and I shall not take the time to go into it to-night.

I am going to make one plea for one class of wage-earners, namely the teachers. Teachers are frozen to their jobs; that is something that is not generally realized. If there is any personnel in Canada working for wages who are underpaid, certainly it is the teaching profession. Right across Canada they are not allowed to leave their jobs, and particularly is that so in the eastern provinces. They are working for as little as $150, $350 or $400—outrageous sums.

I have received resolutions in this connection, some of which have been discussed in the reconstruction committee. Nevertheless the situation still remains. The situation in that section of the province from which I come became so tense just recently that the teachers walked out on strike—and when teachers do that, conditions are pretty bad. They have sent to me a long, very reasonable and fair resolution, urging that something be done to correct the condition.

Mr. DUPUIS: Would the hon. member read it?

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Would not wages for teachers be a provincial matter?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, but the freezing of the teachers to their jobs is a federal responsibility.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): But not the pay.

Mr. GILLIS: No, except that if they were not frozen to their jobs they would be able to shift around, and go somewhere else.

Mr. DUPUIS: Not outside their province.

Mr. GILLIS: The matter of wages is provincial. It is my personal view that the federal government should assume a greater share of responsibility in the establishment of adequate wage rates for teachers right across Canada. I believe that ultimately the federal authorities will have to have a greater say in the whole matter of education—at least I hope they will. It certainly has been most inadequate in every respect, under the jurisdiction which has had control. The resolution is lengthy, and I shall not take time to read it. However, it is a straight plea for the federal government to recognize their position, and it is suggested that by granting a subsidy or in some other way, with the cooperation of the provinces and municipalities, an endeavour should be made to recognize their problem, with a view to curing it. That is about the substance of the resolution. This one comes from a section of the teachers' federation, and there are many others from other groups. I am leaving that thought with the minister. His department has definitely entered the field of education, and I am reasonably sure there are people in that department who will take up the cudgel on behalf of the teacher.

The second point about which I would speak is that of selective service. Selective service is an organization which in my opinion requires some jacking up. At the head of it, in the minister's department, he has some of the most capable men in the country, and they are doing a very good job with, in my view, some inadequate machinery at the bottom.

The part of selective service in which I am interested to-night affects those who have the first approach to the employee seeking employment. I refer to those who give the initial interview. A boy returns from overseas, or a worker from an industry from which he has been transferred approaches selective service. I know that mostly the approach is made in an antagonistic frame of mind. They have the feeling that they are being pushed around. The person whom they first meet, with whom they have the initial interview, is one of the most important factors in the whole set-up. His job is not a clerk's job, not one which can be handled by someone you can pick off the street because he can write down a name or read a form. Those who give this first interview should be carefully trained; they should be of the type you have on your army induction boards, people with some knowledge of human nature, people who can question an applicant and get some idea of his aptitude for a particular line of employment. Selective service is, in fact, something to sell; the customer is the person who is seeking employment; the person who interviews him is just as important as the person you send on the road to sell a commodity for you. He must have some knowledge of the job he is doing.

Things are not working out that way now. Most of the complaints and criticisms I get in discussing the matter with those who have a grievance against selective service arise from the feeling that they are not being treated courteously; that the tendency is to get rid of them as fast as possible or to push them off to something for which they are not suited. The tendency has been to take the ablest men and put them in top positions as administrators, with the idea that these subordinate positions are just clerks' jobs which anybody can handle. The idea is wholly wrong; it is here that you need personnel who can sell the service to a customer who is wanting to buy something.

Justifiable complaint has arisen as to the handling of some of the problems. I might mention particularly the routing of the miners back to the coal mines from other industries. One such case, which I think is known to the deputy minister, is that of an employee at the Ford plant at Windsor. He is called in under the order and is told he must go back to his original employment. He is sent to Edson, Alberta, where there is no work for him; he cannot qualify; he has not miner's papers in that province. He was sent out as a rock driller and rock drillers are not required. Accordingly, he is sent back to Windsor. Upon his arrival there he is shipped off to Nova Scotia. Having worked for a short time there, he is examined, declared unfit, and returned to Windsor again. Meanwhile his family is trailing him. He is now working at Windsor. His complaint is that none of the time lost en route to Alberta, back to Windsor, or to and from Nova Scotia, was paid for. His family was uprooted, and he is still separated from them, his wife and children being in Nova Scotia while he is at Windsor. Over a period of months I have tried to obtain payment for him for that uprooting. I met this man and took the matter up with the department at Ottawa. They immediately started action, but they have to check with the authorities in Alberta, in Nova Scotia, and in Windsor, and they are still checking.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member has now spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. GILLIS: I will finish up in just a few minutes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DUPUIS: That man must be a commercial traveller selling C.C.F. ideas.

Mr. GILLIS: Perhaps, when selective service regulations come in, it might be preferred that I speak for another forty minutes on it.

I have just this to say. The Department of Labour is, in my opinion, the most important war department of government and the most important post-war department. I am not concerned about the machinery which has been set up but with the objective behind that machinery. I trust that those who have the responsibility of administering the department, whether in respect of selective service regulations, unemployment insurance, wage controls, or any other phase of their work which relates to post-war problems, will not have that same psychology which permeated our national life a few years ago, when a certain gentleman who used to sit in this house made the statement that, in order to keep your economy in balance, you must have a shifting, mobile labour reserve, one hundred thousand or one hundred and fifty thousand unemployed, to be moved from one part of the country to another at will. I hope that will not be the prevailing complex.

Mr. MITCHELL: Who was that?

Mr. GILLIS: The Right Hon. R. B. Bennett. That was his philosophy. That was the cure for the whole problem, that shifting, mobile labour reserve. Just recently over the air we got it in this form from the bankers' association, "Full employment is incompatible with the spirit of free enterprise, which has a right to a normal flow of unemployment."

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): What is the hon. member quoting from?

Mr. GILLIS: This is from one of our daily papers.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Taken from a bankers' broadcast?

Mr. GILLIS: A bankers' broadcast. While the minister and, I believe, most of his officials are honestly trying to do what they can, the thing to keep in the back of their minds is the object for which orders in council are made, the purpose for which the economy of the country is organized, the right of the fellow who comes back to his job, of which the hon. member for Greenwood spoke. All these things are not possible if what I have pointed out is to be the philosophy behind our post-war planning.

Mr. GRAYDON: I would ask the hon. member the source of his quotation. I should be very much interested in any person who would make a statement of that kind.

Mr. GILLIS: It is from one of our newspapers.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps the hon. member will give it to me privately. I cannot conceive of any person making such an observation in this enlightened age.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The hon. member should listen to the bankers' broadcast.

Mr. McIVOR: In rising to speak on this question I think of my neighbour the late member for Kenora-Rainy River, Mr. Hugh McKinnon, who always made his outstanding speech when the Department of Labour estimates were up for consideration. I should like to pay my tribute to that gentleman, who was once suggested to occupy the position of Minister of Labour. When we think of him not only as a friend of labour but a friend of anyone in need, that takes away much of the sadness that we feel in our loss.

I go back farther than the hon. member for Davenport in getting to the foundation on which labour is built. He went back to the eleventh century, but I go back long before that time to the day when Adam, the first man, thought he could get a thrill out of breaking the law as his wife did, and the penalty was imposed upon him in the words, "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread." From that day to the present time the individual or the nation that fails to honour that law must pay for it. As you look back you can see Macedonia falling a victim to the dishonour of the worker. Greece caught that spirit from Macedonia and they, too, failed, placing great honour in citizenship and dishonour upon the toiler. Rome caught the same spirit and, too, declined. We in this country are reminded by a distinguished man from the city of Toronto, from which some fine things come, that the country is not ruled by money but by labour. We know how true that is or how true it ought to be.

We to-day honour labour as it was never honoured before. As some of you take your minds back to the time when that very fine lady laid the corner-stone of the supreme court building, you will recall that she did not just lay that stone and then walk away. She invited the man on the scaffolding to come down as he was dressed in his overalls, and I am sure she gave him a smile that he would never forget. Thereby our present Queen Elizabeth honoured labour.

Let me go back a little bit in the history of the Department of Labour. The first deputy minister of labour is at present in the city of London, England, and he will be there to help to direct affairs so that the man who toils or the man who is the friend of the toiler shall get a square deal. The Department of Labour was first organized in 1900 under the direction of the grandfather of the Postmaster General. The first deputy minister was our present Prime Minister, and the first Minister of Labour was the same man. I would like as briefly as I can to give the committee a few of the performances of that Minister of Labour. Between 1896 and 1911 there were many outstanding acts of parliament passed in the interest of the man who toils. There was the Conciliation Act establishing the department and providing for conciliation by officers of the Department of Labour. There were the Industrial Disputes Act, the Railway Labour Disputes Act, the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, the Alien Labour Act, and on July 13, 1906, there was the Lord's Day Act, which gave a man the right to rest from his labours on the Sabbath, ensuring to him the right to one day in seven. That was one of the greatest boons to labour. Then there was the Fair Wage Act in 1900.

I can remember very well that in 1922 there was the amalgamation of the Grand Trunk Railway with the Canadian National Railways. The Grand Trunk railway workers were deprived of pension and seniority following the strike of trainmen in 1910 and this was restored by the Prime Minister in 1922. Then there was the act dealing with the Winnipeg post office workers. I must admit I had a hand in that because I felt they were wronged, while I did not come out very strongly in the open because I was timid. The Winnipeg postal employees were required, after the strike of 1919, to accept the minimum rates of wages for new men guaranteed rates payable for work done by statute in 1929. This was amended and they got pay and seniority as usual.

In 1917 the Immigration Act was passed whereby the minister was empowered to deport any person deemed to be advocating violence or sedition except those who were British subjects by reason of birth in Canada or naturalization in this country. This was repealed in 1929 and the section made to apply to those who are not Canadian citizens. This to me was a generous act. Then in 1922 an act was passed restricting Chinese immigration and the members from British Columbia, I suppose, would wish that the Japanese had been restricted in the same way.

Labour was given representation in 1922 upon the board of the Canadian National Railways, and Tom Moore, a man we respect very much, was appointed a member of the board. The order issued by Mr. D. B. Hanna in 1920 prohibiting employees of the Canadian National Railways from standing as political candidates was withdrawn by Sir Henry Thornton in 1922.

In 1922 we had the Dominion Government Policemen's and Firemen's Act and in 1922 we had the Public Service Retirement Act. We had the Government Employees' Compensation Act in 1925. In 1924 a committee of the House of Commons was appointed to consider the subject of industrial and international relations. The suggestion was supported by the late member for Winnipeg North Centre. There was another act in which I was interested and which in my opinion has done good work for the protection of the worker. I refer to the act concerning union labels. Wherever you see a union label you know that the piece of work on which it is found is good, honest work. That protects the working man and helps to keep him in his job.

The fair wage policy was adopted in 1900. Government departments are required to furnish monthly to the Department of Labour reports giving information as to contracts entered into during the preceding month. This is under the fair wage policy adopted in 1900. Then there was the Technical Education Act in 1919. Following representations made by labour bodies to the government in 1936, the legislation was repealed whereby unlawful associations were declared against civil liberty and against the birthright of the people. I can remember standing in this house and making my first speech against section 98 of the criminal code. I do not know whether I had much influence or not, but I was on the side of right and we won out. Then in 1908 we had the Government Annuities Act, and we had the Home Improvement Act in 1937. Now we are coming close to home. In 1939 the criminal code was amended, and you can visualize standing over yonder the late Minister of Justice, the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe; he was the one who fathered the amendment to the criminal code which makes it a criminal offence for an employer to dismiss or to refuse to employ a worker for the sole reason that he is a member of a trade union. I have had experience, and experience does count. I remember an occasion in the city of Fort William when a man was dismissed for union activities. Perhaps he made some mistakes, but he was reinstated, and the man who dismissed him moved on.

The Unemployment Insurance Act of 1940 will stand out as a monument to the former Minister of Labour. We have many war regulations, but it will be admitted that the outstanding piece of labour legislation that has been passed by any government in Canada is the war legislation called the labour code. It will be remembered that when an order in council was brought in restricting wages, hon. members from all sides of the house, Liberals and those who are not, opposed that restriction and the code was amended. The seven amendments that were made to the wages control order are beautiful reading to me.

Then we have labour management. That is something to which we all agree. We agree that there should be cooperation between labour and management. It is only fair, because not all the brains of industry are confined to the office and managing staff. The man who toils has practical common sense and can see the thing to be done far better than the man in the office.

We pass on and think of the fact that during the past year men were granted holidays with pay. During the past year 600,000 men received holidays with pay. This is a great boon to the man who toils and it is to the credit of the first deputy minister of labour. Then we have labour representation on the wages control board, the cost of living bonus, and so on. When a man wishes to go from one job to another, if he asks the superintendent of selective service for permission, he is protected. He does not lose his job, neither does he lose his unemployment insurance card. He can be reinstated. I shall not take up the time of the committee to speak of the health and recreation facilities that were made available, the care that was taken of the toiler in the war production plants. I could speak of the comfort that mothers who have to work get from the assurance that their children are well taken care of.

I have a question to ask the Minister of Labour, and I should like him to consider it very closely. I do not think it is in the labour code. Should not those who work on a job, no matter what kind of job, be paid equally? There are some jobs that a man can do better than a woman. There are some jobs that a woman can do better than a man. I think a man would make a better policeman or fireman than would a woman, but a woman makes a better nurse. I have found that when male nurses were employed they were paid better than the women. There are jobs and work that are suitable to each. If the same work is done by a man or a woman they should have the same pay. That is only fair. If a woman does the same work as a man is doing, who gets the advantage if the pay is not equal? It is certainly not the man; neither is it the woman; it is the employer. I suggest to the Minister of Labour that the same pay be given for the same work, no matter whether it is done by a man or a woman.

Labour in Canada has its difficulties. The labouring people are just like lawyers. They may quarrel among themselves, but when they have a common cause then they can work together. You have seen lawyers fight like everything in a court and then go out and enjoy refreshments together. I think that is very much like labour to-day. When they have a common cause they will forget their differences and fight their common enemies. When I think of the growth of labour in Canada I am extremely proud of being associated with them. I have had a lot to do with them. I think the man who toils to-day is a credit to Canada. Labour has done an outstanding job in war production.

But the problem will arise after the war. We have some prophets who tell us there will be great unemployment after the war. I do not believe a word of it. With our present Minister of Labour and Minister of Munitions and Supply I do not think that will ever come. Of course, if others take their places I may not be so confident. But every man should have a job and every effort should be made to see that he gets one. I hope I shall never see the occasion arise when the men have to ride the rods again. If they ride the rods I will ride with them, because we have enough in this country to satisfy the needs of everybody here and a great many more if we can get them to come here.

I pay my tribute to the Department of Labour because I go in and out among its officers. I find a great many of them are saturated with the desire to help the men who toil, and most of them have in their vest pocket a union card.

Mr. CHURCH: It is not often that I have to follow in a church a pulpit orator like the hon. member who has preceded me. I may say if I were a pulpit orator I hope that I would draw a better audience than we have here to-night, because once upon a time I have drawn audiences of three, four and five thousand people.

We have on the government benches to-night eleven on one side, and five on this side. We have here about me eleven or twelve Conservatives and there are five members of the C.C.F. party, two of the Social Credit party and one who is Acting Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada. The members are tired of long debates. I am sure the hon. member who is acting as Attorney General, sitting in the seat of the learned hon. Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada will do a great deal to set things right.

Mr. GARDINER: This is the first Friday night that the hon. member has been here.

Mr. CHURCH: It is not. I have been here the last three Friday nights. I am not in the habit of addressing audiences of this size. I wish to say to the Department of Labour that I have been a consistent supporter of labour all my life. During my long public career, which I started in 1905 as an alderman in the city of Toronto, I have always had and maintained the consistent support of the overwhelming majority of the labour people of the city from which I come. Along with my late leader in the province we fought for the public ownership of light, power and transportation, and we enjoyed the support of a large part of the labour of that province which was engaged in that fight. The attainment of that objective brought joy to the cities and towns of Ontario and to the industrial workers and farmers. Cheap electrical power and light were made available to nearly all the farms.

I have never been one of those who thought they know something about this problem; far from it. I look upon the House of Commons as a sort of gentlemen's club where everybody has divergent views. As long as they express them sincerely and clearly I have no quarrel with them; far from it. I always listen to hon. members with a great deal of respect.

I have no quarrel with the Department of Labour, which the present minister took over at a critical time. If only we had had organized national selective service at the beginning of the war we would have been far better off; but unfortunately we did not; we did not adopt the policy that was followed in the mother country, where they were just a few minutes away from the bases for the planes which carried the bombs that nearly engulfed civilization. The mother country went it alone for two years, and with the aid of the glorious young men whe flew her planes she saved civilization. The working class and all other classes in Britain rallied to the colours and saved the world.

I repeat, it was most unfortunate that we did not have national selective service from the beginning, because the people of Canada were simply looking for leadership which they were not given. The country was not prepared for war, and perhaps the government were not prepared to go the distance they should have gone. In my view the entire situation was handled very badly for the first two years of the war. I never quarrel with the officials of a government department, because, after all is said and done, the backbone of any government, whether federal, provincial or municipal, is the permanent officials who advise the heads of departments, and we have a most able body of officials, who are loyal, sincere public servants of Canada and a credit to this country.

I have some respectful criticism to offer, but first may I say to the learned hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who is one of our best pulpit orators, that it is not usual for one orator to talk to another pulpit orator, especially when it is the Church that is speaking. I have great respect for hon. gentlemen down in the corner; they are becoming the pride of the haberdashers, but perhaps some of the things I have to say will be of interest to them. I do not like to see returned soldiers in the city from which I come going about trying to find someone to advise them as to what they should do. One or two of the newspapers have been criticizing that situation. I have had a great dead of confidence in the present deputy minister of labour since he cleaned up the dependency situation; I have often praised what he did in that connection in 1940, during the darkest hours of the battle of Britain. He comes from Winnipeg, he admits that, but it should not be held against him. I wish to point out to the minister, as I pointed out to his predecessor, that if I were a soldier coming coming home I would rather go and see a clergyman than go to some of these government offices. To-day I believe the average clergyman is doing a great deal of social work; I know the clergy of the diocese of Toronto, and that is so as far as they are concerned. When our soldiers go to the selective service offices trying to get jobs, the clerks have not time to interview them; they are sent home and told to come back the next day. I would far rather go to the office of a clergyman, because he could tell me where to go; probably he would know some of the aldermen or some members of parliament. In fact, some clergymen are great admirers of the Minister of Pensions and National Health, the master of ceremonies of the house. I sometimes think of him as the Beau Brummel of the cabinet, but around eleven o'clock at night he becomes the master of ceremonies and tells us in a most genial manner what we are to do the next day.

I want to point out to the government in all seriousness that it is not fair to expect returned men to travel all over the city looking for employment; many times they have to walk because they have no car tickets. There should be some solution to this difficulty. If national selective service cannot handle them, turn the job over to the municipalities so that these men may be looked after. Why should a poor soldier just off the train have to come home to his wife and family and say, "Well, I was down town and called at two or three departments, but they told me to come back again tomorrow." I hope that situation will be remedied. There should be no necessity for these men to keep going back; some other system should be introduced. After the last war there was a great deal of trouble in this connection, and unless we bestir ourselves I am afraid we shall have the same trouble after this war. We have heard a good deal about reconstruction. I would remind the minister that even now some industries in the United States are being converted to peace-time work. I am not altogether satisfied with our stay-at-home army of sixty or seventy-five or one hundred thousand men; we have had various estimates as to the size of it. If these men are required only for home defence many of them should be returned to industry, because in my opinion there is no such thing as home defence. Wars are won by soldiers, sailors and airmen at the scene of combat; that is where they are useful. I know many men who have been called up and sent all the way across the country, at vast cost to the government. Every train is crowded with men, some of them travelling from Vancouver to Halifax. That is a nice ride, I must admit. I have made that journey only twice; I have no time for rides. We waited until the third year of the war before bringing in national selective service, but now a great deal of money is being wasted. According to government reports, in 1941 the Canadian National received $2,500,000 and the Canadian Pacific was paid $2,750,000. It is just a waste of money transferring men from work with which they are familiar to work they know nothing about, and during the coming year I believe this matter should be looked into.

As I said, some industries in the United States have begun the conversion to peace-time production. They are not slackening their war effort, but they find that in some products they are overstocked and that the demand has ceased for others. In Washington the other day they wanted to get two million electric toasters, but they did not know to whom they should give the order, since the production of toasters has been curtailed for the last year or two. Finally they decided to place the order on the quota system. So far I have not heard of anything being done in Canada to convert our industry from a war-time to a peace-time economy. We must not forget that it has been a basic principle of economy ever since the early Roman days that after a great war each country must look after its own people first. After that is done they can begin to talk about international affairs. We have a committee on reconstruction, but they are building too many castles in the air. At the present time we have facing us a list of bills which will keep us here until Christmas; we shall not be out of these trenches until then. Before we get through here we shall be going down to Sparks street to buy a few Christmas presents, though no doubt the government will not be able to get through many of the bills which are proposed. A lot of them are only castles in the air. When we are talking about social security and reconstruction we must not forget that after the war this country is going to be desperately poor.

We have squandered our national resources at an awful pace and the result is that the people of this country will have a tremendous debt to pay. The state has no money for all these things. Where is the state to get the money? One would think they were able to mine tons of gold from the north country to pay for all these items of reconstruction and nostrums that are being proposed. I have been a Christian socialist all my life, and I supported the people in Ontario who advocated these measures long before the C.C.F.

When the war is over we shall have to go back to the old way of life. They are getting back to it in England. They have what they call the trade war practices act which is putting industry, large and small, back to where it was without all these controls, back to where it was before the war. Wholesale and retail business are beginning to get together. People seem to think the state is going to pay for all these things, but the fact is that generations yet unborn will have to help to pay for them. I believe in the principle of private enterprise. It has not failed, although it has made some mistakes and will, no doubt, have to clean house. It is doing as much as it can in the way of paying for these things. If we gave private enterprise a chance it would be our best source of employment after the war and do more to reestablish things than anything else.

They had a meeting a short time ago in the city hall at Edinburgh, Scotland, with thirteen speakers in the morning and fourteen in the afternoon. That is a total of twenty-seven, much better than we are doing here. They talked about reconstruction, and the statement was made that the home is gone. Some of the socialists claimed that the state would have to take the place of the home. The moderator of the Presbyterian church spoke at that meeting. I have heard two or three moderators once in a while because I am a moderate myself. The moderator told them about delinquency and all that kind of thing which was caused by the young people not having work to do. He told them that necessity was the mother of invention and that the homes should be reestablished. I think he was quite right in what he said.

In the early days this country was settled mainly by people from the British isles. The English and French got along well together because, as a rule, they were poor people. They hewed down the forests of Ontario, Quebec and other parts of this country. They did not have any of the things that are proposed to-day to be done by the state. The state cannot do anything unless it is paid for by the taxpayers. Are you going to raise the income tax? Are you going to put more taxation on the business man? The minister should look into the coal situation and the national fuel supply which was brought up by the Conservatives in 1921.

There is also the question of housing. We have been told that this is not an emergency. Then there are the questions of food and civil aviation. Russia will require generators and other electrical goods after the war. Our shipbuilding plants will have to be kept going. There are many other things that will have to be done. The reconstruction committee has done a lot of hard work, and I know the members of that committee have given a great deal of time and attention to their task.

I referred the other day to the Atlantic charter. Before this reconstruction can go on any further we shall have to decide some things first. We shall have to decide what we are going to do about the imperial preference, about favoured nation treaties and things like that. The Atlantic charter provides expressly for imperial preference. We shall have to decide about lower tariffs. In my opinion there will always be tariffs. It is all very well to talk about things, but we should wait until we see what happens at the peace table. Why should we throw away our best customer, the mother country, for others when we do not know what they will buy? The mother country has always been our best customer for grain and many other things. I believe we should stick to the empire which is our best customer.

Reference has been made to certain other matters, one of which is national selective service. I do not think we are getting the results we should for the money we are spending. The vote last year was $9,800,000, whereas this year it is $11,000,000. We should get some results for this money. When one looks over the list of men I think some of them might just as well be back in trade and commerce and industry and agriculture instead of our spending all this money upon them. They should be ready to return to industry unless they are prepared to fight the battles of this country at the front.

The minister, his deputy and others have been attending a convention. I have no objection to this, since I think they deserve a holiday because of the way they have worked. However, I do not think we should be considering international socialism when we do not know who is going to win the war. This convention at Philadelphia is part of the old League of Nations, now defunct. I support the international labour convention. This house has never voted any money for it. I never was a believer in the League of Nations because I think it was one of the things that caused this war. I cannot see just what good that meeting at Philadelphia will do because we do not know where we stand. Until the war is won, the war is primary. I am in favour of having conferences with the empire first of all. I think these international labour bodies will have a mission in the world to come. We hope it will be a better world for the working classes.

Something has been said about the Conservative party. The Progressive Conservative party was the pioneer, in both federal and provincial fields, with nearly all the social legislation we have in this country. They were the first to advocate the public ownership of our light, power and transportation facilities. They set up a national system of railways and they have advocated the development of water power for the benefit of the Canadian people. Ontario gave the public the workmen's compensation act, and many other statutes. It was the Conservative party in this house which in 1921 proposed a national system of unemployment insurance, prison reform, health insurance, and other social measures such as old age pensions and a national fuel policy. I had resolutions with respect to those things myself, in 1921, when I was first elected to the house.

It cannot be denied that in Canada and in England Conservative members of the House of Commons have worked for all these institutions. It cannot be denied that the Progressive Conservative party in this country and the Conservative party in the old country have produced a long line of great statesmen who have known how to tread the middle path of ordered progress and to sow a political harvest which subsequent generations of our empire have reaped a thousandfold. After every war we have brought about reconstruction and all that kind of thing.

It was Clarendon who restored Church and King on the basis of those admirable and incomparable laws of government; Danby who founded the party system; Edward Seymour who, by sponsoring the Act of Settlement, paved the way for the Protestant succession; Harley whose practice led to the adoption of the principle that the crown acts through responsible ministers; William Pitt the younger who revived the idea of the strength of parliamentary government when compared with the rule of the terrorist mob, and who gave the world and his country a priceless legacy of British opposition to arbitrary government and dictatorship; Peel who brought free trade to his country and converted the middle classes to Conservatism; Shaftesbury who stirred the conscience of his party on the urgent need for social reform; Disraeli who linked imperialism with democracy and issued his resounding appeal for the "two nations" of rich and poor to unite; Randolph Churchill, who in a brief life of intense activity gave colour and direction to the policy of conservative democracy; Joseph Chamberlain who fought for imperial trusteeship and brought idealism into imperialistic economics; Baldwin and Neville Chamberlain whose financial "revolution" gave new life to British industry in the thirties and unconsciously paved the way in no small measure for the mighty war effort of the forties; Winston Churchill who led the country in its finest hour. Those are some of the men. And I can tell you this, that the ranks over there in the mother country are filled with young Conservatives who can take their places.

So far as this particular bill-of-fare of the minister is concerned, there is a great deal of good in it. I agree with much of what was said by the hon. member for Cape Breton South. I agree with what he has said about education. A great mistake has been made there. I began public life by serving on a school board, and I know something about the low salaries of public school teachers. The mistake made at the time of confederation was that education was not made concurrent. There should have been concurrent jurisdiction, because it is the duty of the government to look after the health, peace, prosperity and success of its people, and especially of the rising generation. The government did give a lead with respect to technical education. I am surprised to hear the hon. member say that in his municipality salaries have been as low as $150. I believe in Toronto our high school teachers are paid as much as $4,000.

I am glad to see that the minister is providing some money for universities, in connection with medicine and dentistry. I hope there may be some amendment. Probably the minister is going a little too far when he asks these students to get fifty per cent of their marks on their examination, on penalty of not being allowed to continue. There will be a great scarcity of doctors. And, by the way, I see a very fine doctor sitting over here, a university man, who graduated from the medical school of the university of Toronto. I can remember the hon. member's name, but I do not remember his seat. Sometimes I remember the seat, and do not remember the name. The late Minister of Justice had great difficulty in remembering the name of the constituency of the hon. member for Greenwood. He could not remember that it was Greenwood, but after the speech made by the hon. member for Greenwood to-day, I am inclined to think there it not much "green" about it.

I do hope the minister will revise the provision with respect to universities, which states that only those who get fifty per cent or more of their marks can go back to school. Let us not forget that some of these young people have brothers at the front. These boys who are at school now are the junior members of their families, and many of them work all summer in order to get enough money to pay their school fees.

I agree with what has been said by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, with respect to low salaries. Some of those boys have to work hard to scrape up enough money to go to university. They are poor boys, from poor families, but they are most brilliant graduates. I know that the most brilliant graduates the university of Toronto has had from her school of science have had to work all summer to earn their fees. I hope something will be done to amend that regulation before it is too late.

I see my friend the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) who was at one time attorney general of Ontario. I believe the university of Toronto is dear to his heart. He knows about this condition, and I am just pointing out to the minister that there should be some revision in the university course by allowing these boys who have to work to earn their fees to pass their examinations without too great difficulty. Some of these boys have brothers and sisters engaged in war work; the fathers of some of them are at the front, and it is my hope that some amendment will be made. We need all these young engineers, young doctors and young dentists, and I do not see how they can complete their courses in the time allowed to them. It would be my hope that there might be some meeting arranged to look into this matter. The deputy minister, who has done a great deal for the universities, did, I understand, have a meeting with university officials. I hope he will see fit to revise this legislation before next fall.

I hope something may be done along the lines of a national coal supply. There may be some other "church" members here to-night. I notice the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor)—probably he is one—is going to take another pulpit, and probably will preach twice in one evening. But I think he has departed for this evening. I have no hymn to announce to close the prayer meeting, but I do want to say that if this is the bill-of-fare, then I do not see much in it for the average working man, when he comes home from war.

After all is said and done, the young men who come back from this war may never live normal lives again. Every day I receive letters from parents who have lost their sons. Just to-day I received half a dozen of them. These are young people who have been killed, young men of eighteen or nineteen years, who a year ago were going to high school. It is an awful thing to think about. To-day I was told about two young boys who were killed, and who had been going to McGill university in the fall of 1940 and 1941. Now they are killed. There have been about 860 from the high schools of my city alone.

I hope that when our men get back from the war we shall have something practical as a bill-of-fare to give them. I have dozens of them who come to see me every week-end. They are very much disappointed. I cannot tell them to whom they should go, because I do not know. We are not supposed to know where all those offices are. I hope the minister will see if this procedure cannot be simplified, with the cooperation of the provinces and the municipalities.

I had anticipated that the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) would have been ready to go on to-night.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): He is here, anyway.

Mr. CHURCH: But if he is not here I will call on the hon. member for West Kootenay (Mr. Esling).

I think my time is almost up, and I notice the attorney general is looking at me. I can only say this, that while I wish to give the government independent support, I must say that a great many mistakes are being made. Of course I know a great many mistakes will be made, but I do hope the minister will hearken to some of the handwriting on the wall before it is too late. I hope he will not be taking people out of jobs for which they are fitted, and put them to work chopping down trees. What good would we be at chopping down trees, except to get some new timber for a platform. That is all I can see in this chopping down of trees, when there is no pulpwood, and even the publisher of the Chicago Tribune will have to trim this log cutting and reduce the size of his paper if we go on in this way.

As I see it, there is no use in taking young people out of drug stores and grocery stores and sending them up to New Ontario to chop down trees. We know what we did before. I remember when the Grenadiers and the Footguards and the Queen's Own marched across lake Superior at 44 degrees below zero—men taken out of stores, clerical people and the like, under the command of Colonel Dennison: they saved this country from disintigration, and not one red cent have they got from that day to this. I would add a reference to the fine battalion from Lunenburg, Nova Scotia; I saw them at the foot of Jarvis street when I was only knee-high. In those days there was a large number of public houses around the city hall, at the foot of Jarvis street, which distributed sandwiches and glasses of beer to the boys; but when the soldiers came back they never received any pay; that was the sort of treatment which was given to the veterans in those days. I hope that this time and in the days to come there will be a different way of treating those who serve the country; and I am not in favour of this idea of sending this class of people out to chop down trees.

Mr. GERSHAW: I wish to draw to the attention of the minister a few facts about those who are labouring with the sick in this country. Of about 11,000 doctors in Canada, some 4,000 have been inducted into war service, and this has made things very difficult for the remainder who are working with the civilians. Many of these doctors are overworked and cannot possibly attend to all who require their services, and in large districts there are no doctors at all. This is a serious situation, especially with the shortage of gasoline, tires and means of transportation. The action taken by national selective service in assigning some doctors who are in uniform to these rural districts and giving them support was a move in the right direction, and it should be extended, so that there will be less suffering through lack of medical care in the far distant areas of this country.

In the nursing and hospital situation there is also a shortage of assistance. I recently read, in the book entitled, "Canadian Hospitals," of April, 1944, that although there is a long waiting list of patients desiring to enter two sanatoria, 168 beds in those two hospitals are being kept idle because of a shortage of nurses and orderlies and assistants in those hospitals. That condition applies to other hospitals in the country, and it is a serious matter, because if a tubercular patient is kept out of hospital he or she is a serious menace, because of the nature of the disease, to those who are attending that patient. More than that, surgical procedure will often cut short the course of these diseases and hasten the recovery, and that surgical procedure can only be taken in well-equipped hospitals.

The nursing situation is, I think, particularly bad in some of the smaller hospitals. It is true that nurses who have retired, nurses who have married, who have given up their regular work, for the sake of the service have gone into hospitals and done excellent work, and I would pay tribute to those nurses who have volunteered in this time of great need. It may be true that some nursing sisters are holding back to work in private practice and possibly making good fees, but as a general rule the nurses have tried to do their best. There again, however, complaint is frequently made that hospitals cannot compete with military organizations in holding these nurses. I know the minister and the deputy minister have given this matter a good deal of attention, and I assure them it is an important problem and a great difficulty which is facing those who are managing hospitals and trying to carry on the work at the present time.

Mr. STIRLING: I invite the minister to bring the committee up to date with a report on the Doukhobors. A year ago we had the benefit of the report which the mounted police had made, which was brought down, I think, in the month of March, and attention was drawn to the state of affairs revealed therein, which was, I believe, that some thirteen hundred of them had not submitted for registration. Since that time, of course, others have reached the age of sixteen years and should have registered. I do not propose to make a statement this evening on the subject of the Doukhobors. I did so last year and the previous year, and I recollect that the minister in his reply, which was but short, suggested that if the matter were left in his hands for another six months he might be able to report on what progress he had been able to make.

I should like the minister to describe the position first with regard to Saskatchewan, how the registration has gone there, to what extent have the provisions of the National Resources Mobilization Act been carried out, and, in that those Doukhobors of the proper age for military service would not be subjected to military service but would have to be used in alternate employment, to what extent he has been able to have these men do alternative service, whether it has been necessary to institute prosecutions, and to what extent those prosecutions have been carried out.

I should like the minister to deal with the matter in that way if he would be good enough to do so, because from there on the story can be taken up in British Columbia. Unfortunately it is evident that these Doukhobors have been travelling from Saskatchewan and adding to the difficulties in British Columbia. As the minister is well aware, there have been infractions of the law in British Columbia of recent times, and action has been taken to stop indecent parades and the like. To my mind, the real grievance that the people whom I represent have is that the law apparently is not being administered equally for the Canadian citizens and for the Doukhobors, and I shall be very much obliged if the minister will report on the situation and bring us up to date with information.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend mentioned Saskatchewan first. The situation there has been cleared up and the Doukhobors are complying with the law. In certain parts of Alberta the situation is not as good as it is in Saskatchewan and, as my hon. friend knows, in British Columbia the situation is difficult and always has been.

Mr. STIRLING: What does the minister mean when he says that the law is being adhered to in Saskatchewan? Take those who are of such an age that they would have to go into military service but for their peculiar views. Have they gone into alternate camps?

Mr. MITCHELL: Not necessarily camps but into alternate service. We have a diversification of alternate service. If a man is better fitted for agriculture that is where he goes.

Mr. STIRLING: And they receive $25 and the rest goes to the Red Cross.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, absolutely. In British Columbia, I am frank to admit, the situation is difficult; I would not be honest if I did not make that admission. It has been difficult for all governments since the Doukhobors came to Canada. Conferences are taking place between ourselves and the government of British Columbia in connection with the better observance of law and order among the Doukhobors in that province. The other evening I was talking to a large industrialist on the way from Montreal, and he indicated to me that the Doukhobors in this particular part of British Columbia were doing really good work at Brilliant, if I remember rightly.

Mr. GRAYDON: What kind of work?

Mr. MITCHELL: They are labourers.

Mr. GRAYDON: The pictures indicate that they are doing a strange kind of job.

Mr. MITCHELL: That might be true, too. It is very difficult. My hon. friend can rest assured that as far as humanly possible we are measuring up to the situation the best we know how, and I cannot go further.

Mr. STIRLING: Are prosecutions being carried out?

[Mr. Stirling.]

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes. Recently we have carried out prosecutions in British Columbia.

Mr. STIRLING: What has been the result of those?

Mr. MITCHELL: What my hon. friend referred to; that is what happened. That is the result of the prosecutions.

Mr. STIRLING: Is that their sole punishment?

Mr. MITCHELL: There have been some nude parades since the prosecutions.

Mr. STIRLING: Does the minister consider he has a sufficient police force to handle the situation?

Mr. ROEBUCK: That is not his department.

Mr. MITCHELL: Primarily the duty of enforcement is on the local authorities and then on the provincial authorities. We have not been requested to go and enforce the law. It is primarily the duty of the local authorities, then the provincial authorities, and if that cannot be done the federal authorities step in.

Mr. STIRLING: I do not want to question the minister's word with regard to that, but I gravely doubt whether that is the correct answer. I should like the Minister of Justice to tell us what the situation is. My information is that on a recent occasion the attorney general of British Columbia had the advantage of discussing the matter with him; I understand that the police force which should be called on for this matter is the mounted police, and the mounted police should have the assistance of the provincial police if it be necessary.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There is no duty on the mounted police, as suggested by the hon. member for Yale. The administration of the province of British Columbia in that regard is under the jurisdiction of the attorney general. There was an occasion some weeks ago when difficulties were anticipated, and there were communications between the attorney general's officers and the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. It was arranged that a detachment would be ready to move into a certain locality if they were requested to do so, but fortunately that did not become necessary.

There have been prosecutions, from what I learn from the newspapers. There have been prosecutions for indecent exposure and several persons have been convicted. We had within the last few days a communication from the warden of the penitentiary, accompanied by clippings announcing that there had been condemnations to the penitentiary of six women and some thirteen men, I think, and I am not in a position to state at this moment what has occurred since. Arrangements were made to transfer these women who had been condemned to the penitentiary to the only penitentiary for women that is maintained in Canada, and I am unable to say whether they are now on their way from British Columbia to that penitentiary or not. It was anticipated that there would have to be wardens and matrons to accompany them, and authority was given to the penitentiaries branch to make proper arrangements with a railway company to have a special car in which these prisoners, and those who would have to accompany them, would be sequestrated and might not mingle with others travelling on the same train. There had been some suggestion that they might be brought by air from British Columbia to the penitentiary for women, but after investigation it was found that this would not be practicable and the other method is the one that was authorized. But I am not at present able to say whether they have arrived or are on their way. There have been suggestions that very rigorous methods of enforcing the regulations against the whole of the Doukhobor population should be adopted. There are a great many cases, something over 18,000 reported cases throughout Canada, of failure to comply with the regulations.

Mr. GRAYDON: 18,000?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Something over 18,000.

Mr. STIRLING: With regard to registration?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Failures of every kind to comply with the regulations under the mobilization act. There are some failures to register, failures to comply with orders to report for medical examination, failures to report to camp after medical examination has been had, and so forth. The prosecutions are usually handled by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The usual procedure is for the registrars in the district when they have a file showing non-compliance with any one of the regulations to turn it over to the R.C.M.P. for investigation and prosecution if the investigation warrants prosecution.

Mr. STIRLING: That is exactly what I suggested, and I understood the minister to say that it was not the R.C.M.P. that carried out the prosecution.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The Royal Canadian Mounted Police do make investigations. When the registrars turn the files over to the R.C.M.P. they do deal with them, but in respect of the Doukhobor the complaint, as I understand it, is that the first step has not been taken. The registrars have no files concerning them. What would have to be done would be to go through the province and check on the possession or non-possession of a registration card by each individual.

Mr. GRAYDON: The fact is they have none. Very few of them have registered. I suppose that is the case.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think a large majority of them have not registered at any time. The suggestion has been made that a sufficient force should be raised to make the investigations and to compel them to register. The commissioner of the R.C.M.P. was of the opinion that there were not large numbers who were not engaged in useful work and who would, in fact, be transferred to work other than that which they are performing at the present time, and that the number of men who would be required first of all to make the investigation and then to make the show of force that would have to be made to compel compliance would be out of proportion to the benefit that could be expected from any attempt to speed up what is being done.

Mr. STIRLING: If the minister would permit me, the difficulty that remains is that the Canadian boy is proceeded against if he does not register, does not carry out the necessities of the act, and the minister calmly says now that no good would result from dealing with the Doukhobor, and yet they live side by side in those communities with Canadians. I think it is absolutely unfair to the Canadian boy.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The unfairness is not, I think, as apparent as the hon. member would suggest. I do not think there is any unfairness to anyone in having to comply with the regulations. In respect of those Doukhobors who are entitled to the benefit of the exceptional treatment provided by the orders in council under which they came to this country, may I say this? Under the terms of those orders in council they are not required to perform military services. Now quite wrongly they feel that any compliance with the mobilization act or with the statute requiring national registration would be a first step toward military service, and many of them refuse to take that step. The most that could be expected from them would be to get them into alternative service. The alternative service would probably have to be performed under conditions where their earnings would be more than the portion that they would be entitled to keep. That is the only benefit the public would receive from the mobilization of the men required to enforce the regulation against them beyond the other feature of having everyone realize that he has to comply with the Canadian laws. That, I appreciate, is very important; but it was felt at this time that the R.C.M.P. could not afford the number of men that would be required to give special preference to the Doukhobor problem.

For several months the R.C.M.P. have had a large backlog of those files that have been coming forward in the normal way in the various registration divisions of the country. These are so numerous that they are not diminishing the outstanding number very rapidly. Some progress is being made in disposing of more cases than are coming forward from month to month, but there is still a substantial backlog. The R.C.M.P. have to deal with those because the files are turned over to them by the mobilization officers. The other feature would require quite a large corps to seek out those who have not even registered; and it has not been found possible to make that number of R.C.M.P. personnel available. When I said to the hon. member that it was not the responsibility of the R.C.M.P. to handle the Doukhobor problem, I was referring to the suppression of those disorders that have arisen in the district.

Mr. STIRLING: Oh, yes; that is another thing.

Mr. St. LAURENT: That is being handled by the provincial authorities, and there is this understanding: The R.C.M.P. are prepared to supply personnel from the localities where they can be spared, if and when required to do so by the attorney general of British Columbia.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister agrees, therefore, that in infractions of the regulations with regard to registration it is the R.C.M.P. who take action.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is the R.C.M.P. who are called upon by the registrars under the mobilization act when they have knowledge of an infraction.

Mr. STIRLING: Will the minister be good enough to say whether any of those 1,333, who were believed to be unregistered as a result of the report of the R.C.M.P., have since registered? Could he say that registrations are now going on particularly with regard to those who have become sixteen years of age and who are consequently subject to the registration since the time of this report and since the year 1940 when registration was put into force? In other words, could he tell the committee how many of these people in southern British Columbia have snapped their fingers at registration and have not registered?

Mr. MITCHELL: Some of them have registered, but I do not think a great number. I could not give the exact figures of those people who have snapped their fingers at the regulation, as my hon. friend has suggested.

Mr. STIRLING: No doubt thousands of them have not registered.

Mr. EVANS: Could the minister give us any information with regard to the bottleneck that has become apparent in packing plants throughout Canada consequent upon the transfer of labour from those plants to the farms? Live stock have become marketable; the yards are full and the packing plants cannot get the help to take care of them. It has been suggested that some of these men should be transferred back to the packing plants. Experienced men went back to the farms on April 1, and the bottleneck has been the consequence. Could the minister give us any information on that?

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend is speaking of the packing situation generally across the country? Twice as many people are engaged in the packing industry to-day as there were in 1939. In the last season we put 4,000 additional people into the packing industry. I should like to say this about the packing industry: it is hard work, and requires men with strong backs and strong arms. I think we generally recognize that feature of it. What we did was we made possible the transfer of men from agriculture to the packing plants and so on. Many of these men were owners of farms, and when spring came along and it was time to seed, they went back to their farms. It has been said that some of them went back because they felt the special consideration given to agricultural workers under the mobilization regulations would be withdrawn if they stayed in the packing industry. We indicated clearly, and in fact instructions were sent to our officials in the field, that these men could stay in the packing industry and enjoy the same rights, if you call them rights, that were granted to agricultural workers generally. We appreciate that there is a shortage of labour in the packing industry at this time, but constant attention is being given the problem and it is no worse now than it was three months ago. It is this rush of cattle and hogs to the packing plants that has brought about the difficulty. I should like it clearly understood, however, that to-day we have twice as many people working in the packing industry as we had in 1939, and that selective service has made possible the continuation of that industry on a much larger scale than was the case in the days of peace.

Mr. SENN: Is it not a fact that instead of a shortage of labour in the packing plants the abattoirs and freezers are so full that they cannot handle the meat which is being processed at the present time?

Mr. MITCHELL: I could not answer that question; I deal with the man-power end of it and do not know much about any other phases of the industry.

Mr. EVANS: I have had some correspondence from the west in regard to the backing up of hogs on the farms, and it is serious. When a hog reaches a certain weight it should be marketed. The information I had from Saskatchewan was that last week the stockyards were full of hogs, and that an embargo was imposed at some of the shipping points. It may be that we have twice as many employees in the packing plants as we had in 1939, but we are marketing more than twice as many hogs. The fact that many of these men left the plants on April 1 has put the farmers in the west in a serious position, as far as marketing their hogs is concerned.

Mr. MITCHELL: The situation in Calgary is that they want no more men there at all. In the other plants there is some difficulty at the moment, particularly at Edmonton. We did offer to move a certain number of Japanese into this industry, but I am given to understand that this offer was refused by the industry itself. In the very tight labour situation which exists to-day, sometimes we cannot be too choosy as to the labour we may employ. Everything it is humanly possible to do is being done to face up to the labour situation in the packing plants. At the present time we are passing through a seasonal period when, by the very nature of things, there is a movement of labour from industry back to agriculture, and I can only repeat that everything possible will be done to man the packing plants in western Canada.

Mr. KNOWLES: Would the minister mind turning to some figures that appear at page 799 of Hansard?

Mr. MITCHELL: Read the figures.

Mr. KNOWLES: I do not wish to read the figures; I wish to ask the minister whether he can bring them up to date. The simplest way of explaining the figures desired would be to ask the minister or his officials to refer to page 799 of Hansard for February 24 of this year.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not think I can do that to-night; it is nearly eleven o'clock. If my hon. friend can give it to me across the floor now, or after the house adjourns, I shall be glad to do whatever I can to bring the information up to date.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am giving the information to the minister now; it will be in Hansard, and he can pick it up from there. The figures have to do with the total number registered at the employment and selective service offices, by provinces, under various categories, as set out at the page I have indicated. The figures given there were up to January 27 of this year, and cover the year previous, as at a number of specified dates. My question, which I take it the minister will answer on Monday, is whether he will bring these figures up to date as much as possible.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member wants the latest figures?

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I should like to ask the minister a question which has to do with one or two other departments of the government as well. Agriculturists, especially in the west, are having great difficulty in obtaining farm machinery. We questioned the Minister of Munitions and Supply in regard to the material available and were told that the steel available now amounted to 291 per cent of the steel available in 1939. Then we had a report from the war expenditures committee to the effect that plenty of factory space is available in Canada. Therefore, it would seem that there must be a shortage of experienced labour. Would the minister tell us if he has had any demand lately for labour from the manufacturers of farm machinery, or what are the prospects of the farm implement factories obtaining sufficient labour to carry on, because the situation is much more serious now than at any time since the outbreak of war, and the prospects are that it will continue to be serious for many months to come.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think my hon. friend is referring more to what we call the malleable iron industry, the foundries; that is the bottleneck. There has been a considerable movement of unskilled labour to that industry, but there is a considerable shortage of moulders, and there is nothing we can do about it. At the present time all the moulders are engaged in what might be called industries necessary for the production of war materials; but we are facing up to the problem and everything that can be done to move moulders into this industry will be done by selective service. It is a question of shortage of skilled labour.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, May 1, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

BANK ACT AMENDMENT

CONDITIONS GOVERNING TEN-YEAR EXTENSION OF BANK CHARTERS

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 91 respecting banks and banking.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I think I should give a very brief explanation on the first reading.

This bill is intended to constitute the basis of the decennial revision of the Bank Act. It extends the charters of the existing ten chartered banks for another ten-year period, in other words, until July 1, 1954. In addition, it provides for a great many changes in the present legislation governing the operations of the banks, their powers and the limitations and controls to which they are subject.

Several of these changes are not only important but complicated, and some of them tie in with other legislation to be introduced at this session. I intend to make an extended statement on second reading in order to give the house as clear and complete an explanation as possible of these changes, as well as of the philosophy and guiding principles with which we approached this revision of our banking legislation. At the present time all I will do is to call attention to the more important changes we are recommending.

These changes may be listed as follows:

(1) Changes regarding note issue, to be found in sections 60 and 61, taking away the right of a bank to issue or reissue notes in Canada after January 1, 1945, and providing for the complete retirement of such notes after January 1, 1950. Right to issue outside of Canada is limited to ten per cent of paid up capital, and there are a number of consequential provisions.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

(2) Various provisions making the Bank of Canada the exclusive agency for redemption of notes, both of defunct banks and, by 1950, of the existing banks.

(3) An amendment to section 92 to provide for transfer of unclaimed deposits, et cetera, and the liability to repay them, to the Bank of Canada—after ten years.

(4) Amendments to section 91, reducing the maximum rate of interest or discount which banks may charge from seven to six per cent, and allowing banks to make unsecured personal instalment loans on a basis equivalent to a five per cent discount for a one-year loan repayable in equal monthly instalments.

(5) Various amendments to make it possible for additional types of borrowers to get credit under section 88.

(6) Suggested amendments proposed for the consideration of the banking and commerce committee to simplify the complicated procedure now necessary in connection with section 88 loans.

(7) Various important amendments to sections 88 and 89 in order enable the banks to meet the special needs of farmers and fishermen, chiefly for intermediate credit. These provisions are to be, supplemented by other legislation, which I shall explain to the house on second reading of this bill.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, can the minister state now when he proposes to move the second reading and make the extended statement to which he referred? I gather from what he said that the changes proposed in the Bank Act are numerous and important. I have not been permitted to examine a copy of the draft bill; I hope to be able to read it now. It is a bulky volume, and anybody who intends to give any study to this bill should be given time to do so, notwithstanding what is no doubt the desire on all sides to have the bill referred to the banking and commerce committee at as early a day as possible. But I suggest to the minister that twenty-four hours is not enough time, and we might arrange by consent that the second reading come up on Thursday, when he will make his statement, if that is convenient and satisfactory to the minister. Before the minister turns down that suggestion, I would point this out to him, if I have the consent of the house. We are now entering on the fourth month of the session. This bill must have been in the minds of the administration for months before the house opened in January. Everybody knows that the Bank Act is revised every ten years, or, if it is not revised in the tenth year, the charters are extended for a very limited term. So that this bill must have been in preparation for a long time, and it is pretty late to be introducing it now. I am not complaining about that, because I imagine that the bill must have been revised and refined again and again; but I suggest that overnight is a pretty short time for hon members who are interested in this legislation to study the bill. I therefore ask the minister if he will be good enough to give the house assurance that before the second reading is called, before he makes his statement, hon. members will have an opportunity to read and study the bill, which we have not yet seen.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Speaker, I was very anxious to make the statement on the second reading, at the same time that the bill was circulated, but I sounded out certain hon. members and learned that I could not get unanimous consent to that course; otherwise I should have liked to make the statement on the second reading to-day. I am most anxious to make it on the second reading to-morrow, and then the debate can be adjourned to such time as the house sees fit. This is far better from every point of view, because a fairly long speech will be necessary to explain the provisions of the bill to the house and to the country. My proposal, therefore, is that we take up second reading to-morrow, and the government will then consent to an adjournment if hon. members desire it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not suppose I have the right to say anything. On its face what the minister has said sounds like a very reasonable request, but I have learned from long experience in this house that government statements on bills are not always factual, that there is a great deal of propaganda about them, and for that reason I am rather suspicious of these statements. However, the minister is adamant and does not want to oblige me, and there is an end of it. I think we ought to have until Thursday to read this bill before we are asked to agree to the second reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

WHEAT ACREAGE REDUCTION—BONUS AND COST OF ADMINISTRATION

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn):

1. What is the total amount paid in bonuses under the wheat acreage reduction scheme?
2. What was the total cost of administration?
3. What was the number of individual bonuses paid?
4. How many bonuses paid were, (a) under $100; (b) $100 to $500; (c) $500 to $1,000; (d) $1,000 to $2,000; (e) $3,000 to $5,000; (f) $5,000 to $10,000; (g) $10,000 to $50,000; (h) over $50,000?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. $84,558,162 (to January 31, 1944).
2. $2,459,975.77 (to January 31, 1944).
3. 1941, 181, 885; 1942, 179,033; 1943 (to January 31, 1944), 174,525.

4.	1941	1942	1943
(a)	71,960	108,743	84,569
(b)	99,178	67,420	84,345
(c)	9,040	2,540	5,002
(d)	1,599	327	599
(e)	100	3	8
(f)	5	—	2
(g)	3	—	—
(h)	—	—	—

In addition to the individual bonuses listed above payments in the following instances were amalgamated on claims submitted:

In 1941 a lump sum of over $50,000 was paid to a company which submitted 237 separate claims for farms on which they hired operators. The same company was paid between $10,000 and $50,000 on claims submitted for 208 farm units in 1943.

In 1941 payments between $5,000 and $10,000 were made in one instance where three claims were amalgamated and another where several farm unit claims were amalgamated and one payment made to cover all claims.

Again in 1943 one payment in the $5,000 to $10,000 class was made on five separate claims.

CERTIFIED SEED POTATOES

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. Were the growers of foundation A and foundation certified seed potatoes in the maritime provinces refused export permits?
2. If so, why?
3. Is the government considering any relief to cover their loss on this account?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Permits were released freely practically all season for varieties in plentiful supply but were withheld for certain varieties known to be in short supply to conserve such seed principally for the use of the seed potato growers in the maritimes.

2. A sharp increase in the percentage of fields disqualified for diseases has demonstrated the necessity of retaining more high grade seed for foundation purposes. Regulations governing the production of certified seed potatoes now require foundation or foundation A seed to be planted in all fields entered for inspection for seed purposes. The production of foundation grades of the two principal varieties produced in the maritimes, namely Irish Cobbler and Green Mountain, in 1943 were estimated as barely sufficient to plant the normal seed acreages of these varieties in the maritimes in 1944, therefore it was decided by the agricultural supplies board, on the recommendation of the science service, that no export permits be recommended for release for these varieties of foundation grades during the present season, except for those stocks in unsafe storages at harvest time and in danger of injury from frost.

3. No. See answers to 1 and 2.

FREIGHT SUBSIDIES ON WESTERN GRAINS

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. How many bushels of oats and other grains were shipped from western Canada to each of the maritime provinces during 1943 and 1944?

2. What was the amount of freight subsidy on the shipments to each of the maritime provinces?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. During the fiscal year 1942-43 the following quantities were shipped into each province (western grain and feeds):

	Wheat bus.	Oats bus.	Barley bus.	Rye bus.	Screenings tons	Millfeeds tons
New Brunswick	576,218	1,038,953	653,595	24,739	1,458	42,907
Nova Scotia	790,950	1,238,156	1,326,835	21,955	979	48,480
Prince Edward Island	336,666	297,647	351,696	3,811	188	10,867

During the fiscal year 1943-44 the following quantities were shipped into each province (western grain and feeds):

	Wheat bus.	Oats bus.	Barley bus.	Rye bus.	Screenings tons	Millfeeds tons
New Brunswick	799,546	1,548,218	1,171,800	6,846	683	44,430
Nova Scotia	1,309,716	1,651,376	1,490,700	1,685	420	49,049
Prince Edward Island	533,173	417,238	543,714	1,036	37	13,292

2.

	New Brunswick	Nova Scotia	Prince Edward Island
Fiscal year 1942-43	$717,697 50	$1,026,189 00	$285,064 80

BARRIEFIELD MILITARY TRAINING CENTRE—BILINGUAL SECTION

Mr. POULIOT:

What was the number of French-speaking men at A-21, C.O.C.T.C., Barriefield, when the bilingual section was, (a) established; (b) abolished?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): No bilingual section at A-21, C.O.C.T.C., Barriefield, has been (a) established or (b) abolished.

As French speaking candidates arrive at A-21, C.O.C.T.C., they are posted to sub-units and given instruction in French by French speaking instructors. New French speaking sub-units are formed at each regular intake to this training centre.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

FREIGHT SUBSIDIES ON WESTERN BEEF

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. What was the amount of beef shipped from western Canada to each of the maritime provinces during 1943 and 1944?

2. What was the amount of freight subsidy on the shipments to each of the maritime provinces?

Mr. ABBOTT:

1. No information.

2. The accounts of the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation do not break down the amounts paid by way of freight subsidy on shipments of beef from the west according to the destination of such shipments. The total amounts paid by the Commodity Prices

Stabilization Corporation on movements of beef from the prairie provinces to destinations in the east are as follows:

1943	$257,086.16
To March 31, 1944	64,223.94
Total	$321,310.10

FREIGHT SUBSIDIES ON POTATOES

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. What amount of freight subsidy was paid on the shipment of potatoes from British Columbia to eastern Canada?

2. What amount of freight subsidy was paid on the shipment of potatoes from New Brunswick to Nova Scotia?

3. What amount of freight or other subsidies was paid on the grade one table potatoes imported from Maine or other United States points by the Wartime Food corporation during 1943 and 1944?

Mr. ABBOTT:

1. No freight or other subsidies were paid on British Columbia potatoes moved to eastern Canada. The potatoes were purchased by the Wartime Food corporation, f.o.b. Vancouver, at considerably below ceiling prices and were sold in eastern Canada at ceiling prices. The net trading loss incurred was $45,055.70 or 46 cents per 100 pounds.

2. $3,039.33.

3. No subsidy or trading loss of any kind was incurred.

RADIO BROADCASTING—"OF THINGS TO COME"

Mr. BENCE:

1. How many broadcasts have been given in the series "Things to Come", sponsored by the C.B.C.?

2. How many broadcasts in such series have yet to be given?

3. Have forum listening groups of citizens been organized to listen to these broadcasts and to report the results of their deliberations thereon?

4. If so, to whom are such reports made?

5. Are such reports made available to the federal government or any members thereof, and if so, in what manner?

6. Are such reports made available to anyone not directly connected with the organization of the C.B.C., and if so, to whom?

7. What is the purpose of obtaining such reports?

Mr. LaFLECHE:

1. 23.

2. 2.

3. The Canadian Association for Adult Education has organized listening groups.

4. To the Canadian Association for Adult Education.

5. No.

6. See answer No. 5.

7. The Canadian Association for Adult Education prepares provincial summaries of the views of listening groups on the topic discussed the preceding week. These four-minute summaries are broadcast regionally by the C.B.C. at the conclusion of each broadcast in the series.

LONGUEUIL MILITARY TRAINING CENTRE—CIVILIAN PHYSICIANS

Mr. RAYMOND:

1. What are the names of the civilian physicians who have been in charge of the examination of recruits at the Longueuil military training camp since the opening of the camp?

2. What time did each of such physicians devote to examining recruits, and what has been the total amount paid to each physician for his work since the opening of the camp?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax):

1 and 2. The following table shows the names of civilian physicians employed to examine recruits at Longueuil military camp from 4th April, 1943 (date at which camp was first used for medical examination of recruits) to 31st March, 1944, the number of days employed and the total amount paid to each physician.

REVISED EDITION

PRODUCTION OF POTABLE SPIRITS

Mr. AYLESWORTH:

How many proof gallons of potable spirits were produced in Canada in the months of, (a) January, 1944; (b) February, 1944, and (c) March, 1944?

Mr. GIBSON: While the excise division has a record of the number of proof gallons of spirits produced in Canada during each month, in so far as production is concerned, it does not differentiate between potable spirits and spirits used for industrial purposes.

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND

Mr. STIRLING:

What nations participated in the discussions of experts on the establishment of an international monetary fund, recently tabled?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The discussions between experts concerning the establishment of an international monetary fund have proceeded throughout on an informal and non-committal basis and no fixed procedure was followed. For the most part the conversations with the experts of the different United Nations took place in series of bilateral talks with experts of either the United Kingdom or United States treasuries. Canadian experts have had several direct discussions with experts of the United States treasury and on two occasions participated in conversations held in London between experts of all the British Commonwealth governments. Recently conversations took place between experts of the U.S.S.R. and the United States. In one or two instances discussions were held between larger groups. On one such occasion when Canadian experts participated experts of the following countries were present; Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, China, Czechoslovakia, Ecuador, Egypt, France, Luxembourg, Netherlands, Norway, Paraguay, Phillipines, Poland, United Kingdom, United States and Venezuela.

DOMINION CURRENCY

Mr. HANSELL:

1. What is the total amount of paper currency media in use in Canada as at January 1, 1944?

2. What is the total amount of silver money in use in Canada as at January 1, 1944?

3. What was the total amount of money minted by the Royal Mint in Canada during 1943?

4. Does the government of Canada print any of its paper currency?

5. What firms printed paper currency for the chartered banks in 1944?

6. What firms printed paper currency for the Bank of Canada in 1944, and are copies of these contracts available to members of parliament?

[Mr. W. C. Macdonald.]

Mr. ABBOTT:

1. Bank of Canada notes in circulation		$874,395,312
Less: Bank of Canada notes held by chartered banks		122,900,254
Bank of Canada notes in hands of public		$751,495,058
Chartered bank notes in circulation		$ 43,118,373
Less: chartered bank notes held by other chartered banks		918,459
Chartered banks notes in hands of public		$ 42,199,914
Bank of Canada and chartered bank notes in hands of public		$793,694,972
2. Subsidiary coinage issued by mint less withdrawals:
Silver	$51,009,046
Nickel	4,826,033
Tombac	1,407,425
Bronze	6,300,627
Total		$ 63,543,131
Less: subsidiary coinage held by Bank of Canada and chartered banks*		8,196,798
Subsidiary coinage in hands of public		$ 55,346,333

* Bank of Canada and chartered banks do not report details of subsidiary coinage held.

3. Silver—50 cents	$1,564,000
25 cents	3,402,000
10 cents	2,078,000	$ 7,044,000
Tombac—5 cents		1,238,000
Bronze—1 cent		881,300
		$ 9,163,300

4. The government does not issue any paper currency.

5. Not of official government record.

6. Reference to notes of the Bank of Canada will disclose that the notes are engraved by the Canadian Bank Note Company, Limited and the British American Bank Note Company, Limited. The contract covering the engraving of Bank of Canada notes is a matter of internal management of the Bank of Canada and is not of official government record.

MOBILIZATION ACT—POSTPONEMENTS IN QUEBEC MILITARY DISTRICT

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Since 1940, how many requests for leave or postponement of training have been submitted by the army to the Quebec mobilization board for soldiers or conscripts who were farmers, farmers' sons or farm helpers?

2. In how many of such cases did the said board, (a) recommend leave; (b) refuse to recommend leave?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax):

1 and 2. The army does not maintain records on the number of applications for leave referred to mobilization boards nor on the number of those recommended or not recommended by such boards. To ascertain this information it would be necessary to examine the personal file in the district records office of every soldier.

Application for postponement of training is made direct to mobilization boards by the individual concerned before his enrolment into the army.

MOBILIZATION ACT—POSTPONEMENTS OTHER THAN IN QUEBEC MILITARY DISTRICT

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Since 1940, how many requests for leave or postponement of training have been submitted by the army to the mobilization board of each of the military districts other than the military district of Quebec for soldiers or conscripts who were farmers, farmers' sons or farm helpers?

2. In how many of such cases did the said boards, (a) recommend a leave; (b) refuse to recommend leave?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax):

1 and 2. The army does not maintain records on the number of applications for leave referred to mobilization boards nor on the number of those recommended or not recommended by such boards. To ascertain this information it would be necessary to examine the personal file in the district records office of every soldier.

Application for postponement of training is made direct to mobilization boards by the individual concerned before his enrolment into the army.

TREASURY BOARD

Mr. FAIR:

1. What are the names of the members of the treasury board?

2. What are their duties and responsibilities?

Mr. ABBOTT:

1. Minister of Finance, chairman; minister of National Revenue; Minister of Justice; Minister of Trade and Commerce; Minister of Agriculture; Minister of Mines and and Resources.

2. Chapter 71 of the revised statutes of Canada states that "The treasury board shall act as a committee of the Kings Privy Council for Canada, on all matters relating to finance, revenue and expenditure, or public accounts, which are referred to it by the council, or to which the board thinks it necessary to call the attention of the council, and shall have power to require from any public department, board, officer, or other person, bound by law to furnish the same to the government, any account, return, statement, document, or information which the board deems requisite for the due performance of its duties."

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

PICTOU, N.S., QUAY WALL AND WHARVES

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. How much money has been expended by the government on, (a) construction; (b) additions; (c) repairs and improvements to quay wall and wharves at Pictou, Nova Scotia, in each fiscal year since outbreak of present war?

2. Were such expenditures carried out by contract or by day work, stating amount paid for each project and to each contractor, and whether proposed work was completed?

3. Were any expenditures made by day work, and if so, state amount, and who was company and person in charge, and amount paid for each contract?

4. Is it proposed to make further improvements, and have public or private tenders been called within the past six months? If so, who were asked to tender, what was the amount of each tender, and to whom were contracts let?

MISS CLAIRE WALLACE

Mr. ROSS (Souris):

1. What department or departments of government is Miss Claire Wallace employed with?

2. What are her duties?

3. What salary is she now paid?

4. What expenses is she paid?

5. Does she broadcast over independent radio stations? If so, what does the government pay for this privilege?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CANADIAN VICKERS LIMITED—PRODUCTION OF DOUGLAS D.C. 4

Mr. AYLESWORTH:

For a copy of any or all orders in council dealing with the proposed production in Canada of an all-Canadian plane to be used by the Trans-Canada Air Lines (Douglas D.C. 4); together with a copy of any agreements entered into between the Trans-Canada Air Lines or any other person acting for the government and Canadian Vickers Limited of Montreal.

Also a statement disclosing the complete financial interests of the government of Canada in Canadian Vickers Limited, together with copies of documents setting out the terms and conditions for the operation of the plant at Montreal on behalf of the government.

SUBSIDIES ON POTATOES

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury):

For a copy of all claims made for subsidy on new potatoes produced in the province of New Brunswick together with all correspondence connected therewith, exchanged between the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation and all others relating in any way to payment of same between August 1, 1943, and the present time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I wonder whether it would be agreeable to the Minister of Finance, or whatever minister has charge of the commodity prices stabilization board, if there could be included the correspondence as to the potatoes produced not only in New Brunswick but in the two other maritime provinces as well. If that is too large an order I am content to let it go through as it stands, but the question has arisen with regard to the payments of subsidy in Nova Scotia. If the minister would allow me to amend the motion, I should like it to include Nova Scotia, at least.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have to take exception to the motion as a whole, whether as amended or not. The principle which has always been observed with regard to subsidy payments is that information as to subsidies paid on recent or current business is not revealed, on two or three grounds which I have stated. One of these grounds is that it reveals to competitors of the recipient of the subsidy the nature and volume of the business that he does. I am quite content, if any hon. member requests information as to whether a particular dealer or person has received a subsidy, to see that that is answered yes or no, and also to give information as to the principle on which the subsidy is paid to him. But to go further and give particulars as to the claims made as to subsidy or the actual amounts of the subsidies themselves to individual recipients, especially on recent business, which this is, would be contrary to the principles which have been laid down with regard to the production of information, and I have to take the ground that it is not in the public interest to give that information.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If I may be permitted, I should like to answer the minister. In the first place this was a temporary subsidy; it expired last summer. In the second place, I can tell the minister from the information I have that a good many thousands of dollars were improperly paid and that it was due to an interpretation of the regulations. If he refuses to bring down the information, we are entitled to draw any inference we like from that position. But this is public money, some paid out properly, some of it, in my opinion, paid out improperly, and we ought to know what the papers are and what the position is. I just happen to know that an attempt was made to get back some of this money and it failed after an opinion had been given by the Department of Justice that on a strict construction of the regulations the money could not be recovered in a court of law; nevertheless a substantial sum was paid out to producers and dealers, because the market price of potatoes did not exceed the ceiling price, whereas this was intended to take care of production in case the market price did exceed the ceiling price, to provide for the difference between the two. My information is that at no time in the Montreal market did the market price exceed the ceiling price—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): —and yet—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker, I did not observe Your Honour on your feet.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member will realize that this is not a debatable motion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have said all I want to say anyway.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If this is not debatable the minister has no right to speak.

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot allow charges like that to go by—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Give us the information, then.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ILSLEY: Let the hon. gentleman state the name of the person to whom subsidies were improperly paid.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the old gag; it is the old bluff. Ask Mr. Hector McKinnon, he knows.

Motion dropped.

SUBSIDIES ON FEED GRAINS

Mr. BURTON:

For a copy of all correspondence and reports by government inspectors covering the shipping points of Totzke and Bremen, Saskatchewan, in connection with the payment of subsidies on the sale of feed grains for the period from November 1, 1943, to date.

Mr. MACKINNON (Edmonton West): The Canadian wheat board pays no subsidies on the sale of feed grain. On the delivery of oats and barley, advance equalization payments of ten and fifteen cents respectively are paid. These payments arise from the equalization fund provided for by order in council P.C. 8898 of November 18, 1943. When western oats and barley are exported from Canada an equalization fee may be charged and these fees are accumulated in a fund and paid out to the commercial marketers of these grains. If the hon. member for Humboldt cares to speak to me about this I think I can help him with the information I believe he is seeking.

Motion dropped.

STEVENSON FIELD, WINNIPEG

Mr. KNOWLES:

For a copy of plans prepared by the Department of Transport with reference to the enlarging of Stevenson field, at Winnipeg, as referred to by the Minister of Munitions and Supply, on page 2264 of Hansard for April 21, 1944.

Mr. HOWE: Return tabled.

CAPE TORMENTINE-P.E.I. STEAMSHIP SERVICE

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland:

For a copy of the contract entered into by the government for the construction of a ferry steamer to operate between Cape Tormentine and Prince Edward Island; also copy of contract or sub-contract for diesel oil engine and equipment to operate same.

Mr. MICHAUD: Return tabled.

AERONAUTICS ACT

CIVIL AVIATION AND COMMERCIAL AIR SERVICES—AIR TRANSPORT BOARD

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Aeronautics Act to provide for the establishment of an air transport board to perform the functions of a licensing and regulatory body in respect of commercial air services and to advise the minister on matters connected therewith. Provision will be made by the said measure for the payment for services of the members of the board and the employment of necessary officers, clerks and employees.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

NAVAL SERVICE

LOSS OF H.M.C.S. "ATHABASKAN" IN THE ENGLISH CHANNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to make an inquiry of the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services, notice of which I have given him.

We all read with mingled feelings of pride, admiration and sorrow of the naval action which was fought in the English channel off the French coast in the early hours of last Saturday morning. It was with pride that we learned that His Majesty's Canadian Ship Athabaskan fought back, and gave as good as she got until she was split in two by an enemy torpedo, and sank.

Our admiration was roused by the brave unselfishness of Lieutenant Commander Stubbs, D.S.O., of Victoria, B.C., who gallantly chose to risk death himself in order to save the crew of the Athabaskan's sister ship, H.M.C.S. Haida, which later exacted quick revenge by driving one of the German destroyers ashore in flames. Coupled with the name of Lieutenant Commander Stubbs must be mentioned Commander H. G. De Wolf, of the Royal Canadian Navy, of Halifax, commander of the Haida, whose coolness and daring was responsible for the rescue of many of the Athabaskan's crew. I have learned since that on the Haida was the son of the late lamented Hugh B. McKinnon, who was such an honoured member of the present House of Commons.

Canadian people heard with sorrow in their hearts the news of the brave lads who lost their lives in this further bright page in the valorous narrative of our new but powerful navy, of which every citizen in Canada is so justly proud.

I have taken the liberty of making these observations as a preliminary to a question which I desire to direct to the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services. Is the minister in a position, within the limits of security, to give the house any further details of this action beyond those which have appeared up to the present in the press?

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend the leader of the opposition for his references, which I am sure are concurred in by every hon. member of this house. Certainly I myself share most genuinely his pride in the conduct of the Athabaskan's officers and men and his sorrow for those who have given their lives.

We do not know and we shall not know for some time how many men have been lost and how many have been made prisoners of war. The direct question which my hon. friend put to me as to further details of the action beyond those which have appeared already in the press is one that perhaps I cannot answer properly at the moment, because I am not sure that I have anything to add to what has already been given to the public either in the press or on the radio. I can however give to the house a summary of the dispatches received at naval service headquarters.

During an offensive sweep in the English channel early on Saturday, April 29, 1944, light forces of the Royal Canadian Navy encountered two enemy destroyers of the Elbing class in the vicinity of the Ile de Vierge near Ushant. The Canadian ships were: His Majesty's Canadian Ship Haida, under Commander H. G. de Wolf, R.C.N., and His Majesty's Canadian Ship Athabaskan, under Lieutenant-Commander J. H. Stubbs, D.S.O., R.C.N. Our ships immediately opened fire, to which the enemy replied with heavy and accurate fire. The Athabaskan was hit twice by shells, but continued firing until she was struck by an enemy torpedo and sunk.

Repeated hits were obtained by our ships on the enemy, and one of the enemy ships was driven ashore in flames. The remaining enemy destroyer escaped in the smoke and darkness. The action was continued to within close distance of enemy-occupied territory.

As to survivors: One officer and thirteen ratings, whose injuries are not serious, are at present in the Royal Naval hospital, Plymouth, England. Six ratings, whose injuries are also not considered to be serious, are in the West Cornwall hospital, Penzance, Cornwall, England. One rating, slightly injured, is in the Royal Naval barracks, Devenport, England. Twenty-five ratings are also in the Royal Naval barracks at Devenport. That makes a total of forty-six of the Athabaskan complement that we know to be in England. Of that number one officer and thirty-nine ratings were picked up by the Canadian ship Haida, and the remaining six ratings made their way to the south coast of England in a motor boat dropped by the Haida before leaving the scene. The Haida dropped other boats and rafts. It is reported by the German radio that eighty-five prisoners, including six officers, were taken from the water and are now in German hands.

The next-of-kin of casualties are being informed as soon as possible. I am glad to say that there were no casualties whatever in the Canadian ship Haida, which returned safely to port.

Mr. COLDWELL: We associate ourselves with the remarks of the leader of the opposition. Does the procedure that has been followed in this case mean that a new policy has been adopted and that the loss of ships and so on will be announced before the relatives have been informed as to casualties? I am sure we all sympathize with the relatives of the men in their period of anxiety and uncertainty. I thought the policy was that the announcement of losses would be made after the relatives had been notified of casualties. It seems to me that is the policy that should be pursued. When I heard the announcement on the air at noon yesterday I felt much disturbed because of the anxiety that I knew would prevail in a large number of Canadian homes.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the policy has been and still is to inform the next of kin of any casualties before any public announcement is made. But in this case, as I am sure many hon. members of the house know, announcements began to come over the German radio as early as Saturday to the effect that they had sunk a ship and that they had a certain number of prisoners; consequently it was felt that the only thing that could be done here and in Britain was that an announcement should be made by ourselves, giving such information as we had, meagre and sketchy though it might be. Furthermore, as to these men who are prisoners of war, my hon. friend will realize that it will be some time before those names are available. Often it takes as long as three months for this government to be informed of the identity of war prisoners. As my hon. friend undoubtedly knows, this information comes from the Red Cross. It would be necessary for us to make some announcement before the end of three months in any event, and our announcement would consequently have to be made before we had full particulars as to survivors.

SUGAR

RATIONING—UNITED STATES ALLOTMENT FOR CANNING PURPOSES—FRUIT JAR RINGS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) asked me on Friday to make a statement on the difference between the amount of sugar allowed for home canning in the United States and in Canada.

I understand that in the United States consumers may apply to their local ration boards for an allowance of twenty-five pounds per person for canning purposes. In Canada this year consumers will be entitled to obtain ten pounds of sugar for canning purposes by special coupons issued for that purpose. In addition twenty-six preserve coupons will be available each of which can be used either for the purchase of one-half pound of sugar or varying quantities of sweet spreads or canned fruit. It is possible therefore for a Canadian housewife wishing to put up her own preserves to obtain a maximum of twenty-three pounds of sugar for canning purposes in respect of each member of her household in addition to the ordinary weekly ration.

I want to make it clear that whereas in the United States the twenty-five pound allowance is granted only on application, in Canada application will not be necessary all consumers being entitled to the same amount of sugar for canning purposes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Could the minister tell us whether or not there is any limit on the amount of sugar which can be used for preserves, jams and jellies in the United States in addition to the twenty-five pounds?

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot tell the hon. member.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I think it will be found there is no limit.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I bring to the attention of the Minister of Finance, and also of the Minister of Munitions and Supply, a matter which is related to the one just mentioned? It may seem like a small matter, but it apparently is a big issue with the housewives of Canada, because many organizations have sent word to me asking me to plead the case in the house. I have not had an opportunity to do it and I would not do it now except that the matter has been mentioned by the minister. Apparently the quality of the fruit jar rings used in preserving last year was such that a great deal of loss resulted. Will the government consider that matter? I make no apology for bringing it to the attention of the government because of the pleas that those organizations have made to me.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall take note of the representation. I do not know that there is anything I can do about it, but I shall see if I can do something.

Mr. GRAYDON: It seems too bad if because of the quality of the rings some of the sugar now allotted for canning purposes should be lost by those who are making use of it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Will the minister tell us some time soon whether or not there is a limit placed on the amount of sugar available in the United States for jams, jellies and preserves? If there is not, it makes a tremendous difference. I believe the minister said there were twenty-three pounds available in Canada for canning and for all kinds of preserves. There are twenty-five pounds available in the United States for canning purposes, and, as I understand it, there is no limit on the amount for jams, et cetera. If that is so, obviously there is a great deal of difference between the amount of sugar available in the United States and in Canada.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Friday, April 28, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

National selective service programme, $11,002,429.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: With regard to the address of the minister on Friday last, I wish to accept his summing up, as found on page 2447 of Hansard, of the task of selective service during the coming months. He said that the major task of the selective service system over the next few months will be:

> First, to provide the required men for the armed services; second, to meet the labour needs of agriculture; third, to place in employment men discharged from the armed forces; fourth, to meet, as they develop, the urgent needs of certain key industries; fifth, to place men laid off as a result of changes in munition production schedules as quickly and efficiently as possible.

At the outset I wish to commend the Minister of Labour for the very full report he has given. His courtesy and willingness to furnish information deserve the highest praise. With some of the statistics he has given us I am not in agreement, but I do appreciate, as I am sure the committee does, the fact that the Minister of Labour is always willing to place before the house and the country the situation as he sees it. He claims that selective service has been very successful, but with that point of view I am not in complete agreement. I believe that the work being done by selective service in placing the men returning from overseas and those discharged in Canada has been most successful.

In that regard, I should like to ascertain what machinery has been set up to assist in the demobilization of the armed forces, and to assure them of work. What about the men who since the beginning of the war have been employed in war plants that are to be shut down? What about the men who joined the armed forces from munitions plants that will be closed down when they return from overseas? What provision will be made to assure these men of employment? What about the thirty thousand men who were not employed before they joined the armed services? The British government has announced its plan, under which the order of demobilization will depend upon age and length of service, with preference of course being given to service overseas. The local employment office here in Ottawa has done a particularly good job in a survey it made with a view to ascertaining whether jobs will be available when the war is over, and the order in which those jobs will become available. According to the information I have been given, the Ottawa employment office made a survey of 57·8 per cent of all war-time A and B priority industries in this area in order to ascertain how the industrial structure has been changed and whether after the war the demand and supply in connection with workers will be near balance. They found that as far as A priority industries are concerned, 6·6 per cent of the men will be released immediately upon termination of the war contracts; 37 per cent will be released one month later, 45 per cent three months later and 40 per cent six months later. In other words a vast army of men will be discharged from class A industries within a period of six months after the termination of their war contracts. So far as B priority industries are concerned, 2·4 per cent of the men will be released on the termination of war contracts, 3·7 per cent one month later, 4·7 per cent three months later and 6·5 per cent six months later. This means that hundreds of thousands of men and women now employed in A and B priority industries will be released within a few months after the end of the war. What about the employment of these people? I understand a survey has been made by the industrial mobilization survey board for the purpose of ascertaining how many positions will be available, and how many men can be combed out of industry for military service. I think we should have a report by the minister on the result of that survey. How many men may expect to be combed out of industry within the next sixty days under the findings arrived at by this organization?

There can be no disagreement in this house, of course, with the commendation expressed by the minister of the men and women in the armed services, and I am sure hon. members in all parts of the house will concur in his remarks concerning the contribution to the war effort made by the women of Canada. We have 235,000 women in industry, in addition to thousands in the armed forces and the hundreds of thousands in their own households, engaged in patriotic work and doing their part in sacrifice and service.

Now, however, I come to a phase in connection with which there is some disagreement. I accept as a premise in connection with the operation of selective service, and I do not think it can be denied, that the foundation of unity in Canada depends upon equality of sacrifice and equality under the law without regard to any outside considerations whatsoever. We have declared for total war, but total war is impossible unless there is full partnership between our citizens, both military and civilian; and there can be no unity in this country unless there is a willingness and determination on the part of our citizens to serve equally in this war effort. Canadian citizenship is meaningless unless it implies a single standard of duty and responsibility everywhere in this dominion. I accept that as a principle upon which the organization of the war effort of this dominion must take place. To-day we have heard of another instance of gallantry and sacrifice on the part of those who served on the warship that was lost, and greater tests are ahead. The war now enters a period during which stern and ruthless determination must characterize the efforts of all the united nations.

So, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that at a time like this we must have effective administration of national selective service in order to support the men in the forces and to gear up our production in all its phases, agricultural, industrial, mining and forestry. I find it difficult to understand why, after all the declarations that have been made, civilian industries not directly necessary in the war effort still continue to employ many thousands of men and women. I selected a number of these industries indiscriminately with a view to placing the matter before the government, in order to indicate that in this country we have various civilian industries employing more men than they employed before the war began, from which man-power has not been combed. I remember reading an article by

Mr. Dexter in April, 1943, in which he dealt with these various industries. The inquiry he then put was, as to why should there be such numbers engaged in civilian industries not directly necessary in the war effort? I now place the various statistics on the record:

Industry	Index numbers of employment (1926=100) Dec. 1, 1938	Dec. 1, 1939	Dec. 1, 1943
Furs	96·5	114·2	125·6
Furniture	88·4	91·6	110·2
Musical instruments	50·3	56·2	33·8
Personal services (laundries, etc.)	141·4	142·3	197·6
Retail trade	147·8	151·8	181·8
Wholesale trade	119·7	125·9	139·4

I might add that the number of employees in the fur industry stood at 2,336 in 1938, 2,765 in 1939, and 3,040 in 1943. And so I can go through the record showing that since 1939 there has been, in civilian industry, a material increase in the number of employees—with one exception, namely, musical instruments—in spite of the fact that within the last year some seven orders have been passed requiring compulsory transfer from non-essential to essential industry.

The man-power situation in general is in a precarious position to-day in this country. This is admitted by Mr. MacNamara himself, in an interview given in the Financial Post of April 29, 1944. It is pointed out there that the situation generally is most serious; 15,000 men a month are required for the armed services, and have been since December of 1943, according to the information contained in "Canada At War."

Mr. HOMUTH: For the home army.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Civilian production goods are not being reduced. Canada still goes on with increasing civilian production. I have the figures here which, because of my limited time, I cannot put all on the record. They show a tremendous increase, to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars, in civilian requirements in Canada. The total sales of all departments of Canadian department stores in 1938 was $280,799,000; in 1939 it was $291,593,000 and in 1940 it was $326,696,000. In 1943 the sales were $417,495,000. In other words, civilian production is continuing to increase over what it was before the war, and has not been decreased in order to meet the demands of the army and the services.

In base metals, lumbering and agriculture there is a shortage of man-power. There has been a considerable transfer of men from Quebec to Ontario to work in industry. All these factors point to one thing that the problem of man-power is the outstanding problem of 1944. It is the problem upon the solution of which the war effort of this nation will either continue or diminish. It is the problem upon the solution of which price control must depend; for a balance must be secured between production of civilian goods, sufficient partly to meet the demand, and the production necessary to the war effort. Underproduction of lumber, base metals and coal will lower war production. That is the problem we face, and none is of greater importance at this time.

The minister has pointed out, and properly so, that a great organization has been set up. Many laws have been passed and many regulations have been promulgated. But, Mr. Chairman laws and regulations will not prove effective unless they are effectively enforced. I wish particularly to refer to the failure on the part of the government to enforce the law to the end that man-power shall be adequate for the armed services as well as for agriculture, transportation and industry in general. The problem, as we all admit, consists in assurance of reinforcements, assurance of food production, and assurance of the necessary supplies for the munitions of war. The Prime Minister enunciated the policy of the government on March 24, 1942, in these words:

> Compulsion will be applied without fear or favour, wherever in the opinion of the government its use will aid in the achievement of a maximum war effort.

That was the promise. To-day we have a record of the performance.

I repeat that the keystone of unity upon which this country must be built is that of equality of service. I do not blame the minister for the present condition of affairs; for I do not think he has received the co-operation of the other members of the cabinet to the end that there should be equality of service. I pointed out a year ago that unless the regulations were uniformly applied, antagonism would be built up. I suggested the setting up of an appeal board to the end that from the Atlantic to the Pacific there should be uniformity of application of the law of selective service.

We come now to a period when the man-power situation is serious. We were given a great many statistics the other day in connection with this matter. But, Mr. Chairman, there is no statistician who can analyse the figures on man-power which have been laid before this parliament and the country. The figures given as of January, 1943, were full and complete. We analysed that statement; so they changed the set-up and detail. During the 1943 session various returns were brought down, all based upon dissimilar hypotheses, all based upon different foundations.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And none of them agreeing.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: They could not be expected to agree. In 1944, at this session, the same procedure is followed—one type of return, then another, then a third, but all so arranged that unless one devoted many years to a study of them it would be impossible to analyse the figures.

Mr. MITCHELL: We answered the questions as asked by the hon. member. Naturally it changes from day to day, as the hon. member must realize.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh yes, but obliquely.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have taken the trouble to put some of these statement side by side, and the answers given were so oblique that one does not fit with the other at all.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend admitted he was not a statistician.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He did not say that; he said no statistician could do the job.

Mr. GRAYDON: He is in good company, if he is not.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister says I am not a statistician. This information is not to be given to statisticians, or was not for statisticians. It is to be given to the people of Canada, so that they may understand the situation.

To pass on to something else, in spite of this difficulty in securing men, unemployment continues to rise. The number of men required at the present time for priority industry, according to a statement made by the Minister of Munitions and Supply the other day, is 71,092. In the month of February, 1944, there were 12,284 claims for unemployment insurance, as compared with 4,822 a year ago. In this fifth year of war, with selective service operating under the largest organization it has ever had, with hundreds of offices and thousands of employees, there was paid out in the month of February $301,390 for 158,455 days of unemployment—to men who were previously employed but who were not employed during that month. All of which indicates, Mr. Chairman, that this organization, tremendous in scope, large in number, comprehensive in so far as regulation is concerned, is not operating in such a way as to bring together employers and those who want work.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. McNIVEN: Is not that men and women?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That may be perfectly true.

Mr. McNIVEN: And only a temporary condition.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, the minister could not say that, because the record shows that the number of 11,500 unemployed in the month of January increased by some 500 in the month of February. There was nothing temporary about that.

Mr. MITCHELL: I will say it is temporary.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Furthermore, at a time when we are short of men, when men are required, for instance, in the pulpwood industry, and the Department of Labour allowed 3,500 men to go to the United States, and the period during which they may remain in the United States has been extended beyond April 1, 1944.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And is indefinite.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It has been made indefinite. If ever there was a time when it was necessary to take out pulpwood and to assure the press of this country of its fair and proper share of paper, it is now. Yet, on the one hand, the government admits having a shortage of man-pawer in the woods; so short indeed is that man-power that they have to take in Japanese and prisoners of war. On the other hand they allow 3,500 men to be sent across the line into the United States.

Here, then, is the situation: For 1944, 96,000 men are required for the armed services; 72,000 men are required for industry; men are required in the woods to cut pulpwood, where our production was 200,000,000 feet less than it should have been last year, and yet 3,500 trained men are given permission to leave Canada and cross into the United States to help in the war effort of that nation.

I come to the next question, the administration of the call-up. I want to speak as dispassionately as I can on this subject. The minister has stated that this year the number of delinquents is only some 49,000, and that the position has improved very much as a result of what has been done during the last year. Well, I have the various reports regarding the call-ups under N.R.M.A. before me, and I placed them together in order to see what the picture is. I have taken the returns which were brought down to the house; I have taken the various issues of "Canada at War"; and they, together with the answers to questions that have been asked in regard to man-power, are evidence of the practice of mathematical sleight-of-hand in order to secure credit for the government.

"Canada at War" shows that there is no equal enforcement of the law across Canada. I said that before, and I am not going to go into it in detail again; for no attempt has ever been made by the government to deny it. But I will repeat that in this country to-day there is a spread, with respect to call-ups and voluntary enlistments, of from 9·8 per cent of the male population between the ages of eighteen and forty-five to 42·7 per cent in the Toronto district, which according to the latest returns has the highest record, followed by Victoria, Halifax and Saint John.

What of the record of enforcement? I shall refer to return 142E, brought down on April 27 in answer to certain questions I asked. I refer also to what the minister said at page 4039 of Hansard of June 23, 1943. As a result I find that in this country a great legion of men between eighteen and forty-five years of age have disappeared without a trace. The minister said that only 49,001 are now unaccounted for, as compared with 67,674 a year ago. But that favourable statement is not borne out by the records. The records on this question cannot be balanced, and in many cases they show a fictional disregard of the actual facts. Take the return I mentioned a moment ago. It shows that the number of men called up was 1,449,417, and that the number who reported was 979,569. That means that 469,848 are unaccounted for, less 71,545, who, according to return 142A, enlisted on receipt of the order. There is still a balance of some 390,000 missing men.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the lost army of Canada.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: And the serious part of it is that this number is increasing. Last year the explanation given for this tremendous spread was that the machinery was not in operation. The statement given by the minister a year ago showed that 998,475 had been called up and that 608,642 had reported. Last year, as of June 23, 379,833 were unaccounted for. Deducting the numbers of those who must have enlisted, we find that there has been an increase within the past eight months of approximately 60,000 in the number of men unaccounted for.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Four divisions.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Where are the men of this lost legion?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): In the bush, like the government.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The figures seem like an intentional jumble of inconsistency. Where is this army of the vanished—the unfound—the undiscovered? I want the minister to explain that, and not by statements such as he made before, that no doubt some volunteered and got into the army and some went into the merchant marine.

Mr. HOMUTH: Where are the records to show it?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: They say they have their records, and very detailed records, to-day. All we ask is that they account for approximately 360,000 missing men. A year ago they said that the reason for inequality in the call-up was that in some provinces the number of fit men was higher than in others. But however good that explanation may have been, the statistics I have given have nothing at all to do with the state of health of the men. They show the number of men called up for medical examination and the number who reported for medical examination.

But that is not the end of the picture; it is just the beginning. We have lost about 360,000 now. Then military training orders went out, no doubt on the instructions of the Minister of National Defence, to the various military districts. These are to be found in return No. 142A, showing the number of military training orders sent out to January 31. They lost 300,000; then they sent out 433,453 orders for military training; and again what happened? There were 220,762 reported; and again there is a disappearance of 19,857 between the time the military order was sent out and the time the men reported, less the number of postponements.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Took to the woods.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There has been as yet no endeavour to answer that, as there was no serious endeavour to answer the charge I made last year, and repeated, that there is no equality of call in the various provinces.

Next, not only is there no equality in call for training, but there is no equality in the call for medical examination. Let me refer again to the return which I mentioned. The number called for medical examination to January 31, 1944 was 1,449,417. The number called up to June 23 last was 988,000. In other words, 469,942 have been called up for medical examination since June 23, 1943—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): To January.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Up to the 31st of January, as the hon. member for York-Sunbury says. Here is how they called them up. They called up a total from the various military districts of the number I have given. In Quebec military district, division F, they called up 8·6 per cent of the total population, or, in that period of time, only 8,724 out of some 460,000 men. I would like an explanation of why so few calls for medical examination were sent out in this district. The proper number on an equal percentage basis would be 39,000. I am giving the picture with regard to the unfairness of the call-up and the vast army which wanders about this dominion, free of any serious threat of prosecution. The total number of men found has been 22,000, at $2.50 per head. I say without fear of contradiction, after reading the records of the United States of America, of Great Britain, of New Zealand and of Australia, that the record as to call-up in this country reveals an appalling condition of default and disobedience unknown anywhere else among countries having any system of military call-up. It shows that either the departmental statistics are wrong—and they cannot be wrong, because they have been checked and cross-checked, and we have been assured of their correctness—or the enforcement is all wrong, and that is the conclusion to which any reasonable person must come under the circumstances. It shows that political expediency dictates the policy of the state and paralysis results.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend speaks of political expediency dictating the policy. Let me say without fear of contradiction that as far as my department is concerned there is no political expediency.

Mr. HOMUTH: Does the minister say that for the government?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I ask the minister to explain the reason for this. Where are these men? Why the break-down in the prosecutional facilities? Why the necessity, with police forces everywhere, to call in the credit agencies, the Associated Credit Bureaus and the Hooper firm, in order to find these men, the records regarding whom are in the possession of the government and have been since national registration? I repeat that none of the countries to which I made reference—and I have the statistics here—can show such an appalling record of default and disobedience in the administration of man-power as can this country. Three hundred and fifty thousand is the minimum that have gone; 22,000 have been picked up by the credit agencies; and the total number of prosecutions has been 4,214. What about penalties? Promises of immunity were made, and a few thousand turned up. Prosecutions—a paltry one or one and a half per cent—have taken place; and now the employers are called in and asked to cooperate with the government to ensure that those who are in default shall be identified and brought forth to the light of day.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Using employers as a club.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What of the penalties? They are an invitation to disobedience of the man-power regulations of this country. I have here return No. 142, dated January 28, 1944, which was brought down in answer to a series of questions by the hon. member for Red Deer. What does it show? The question is asked: What was the average fine imposed in each administrative division, and what was the average gaol sentence imposed? The answer is that the average fine runs as follows, by administrative divisions: A. London, $25; B, Toronto, $105; C, Kingston, $50; D, Port Arthur, no fines, always a gaol sentence; E, Montreal, $25; F, Quebec, $21; G. Halifax, $25; H. Saint John, $22; I, Charlottetown, no report; J. Winnipeg, $25; K. Vancouver, $50; M. Regina, $50; N. Edmonton, $75. In default of payment of the fines the gaol sentences run from twenty-one days to ten months.

I suggest that the realization by defaulters that, if they are picked up, they will not be penalized beyond a small monetary payment, is an encouragement to default. How much more money a man can make in two weeks outside the army than if he is in the army, knowing that if he is caught and fined the penalty will be only a matter of twenty-five dollars or thereabouts.

The number of prosecutions is ridiculously out of line with the number of offences committed. The record with regard to conscientious objectors shows that there were 8,600 registered. No one has any objection whatever to conscientious objectors receiving the consideration that every British country grants them, and I would say that in Saskatchewan and in the western provinces there are large bodies of Mennonites who came to Canada in the period from 1873 on, to whom I pay my tribute. These people's sons have played a remarkable part in the armed forces of the country. The Mennonites came here believing that it was wrong to participate in war, and yet to-day, if you look at the daily casualty lists, you will find records of young men.

professing the Mennonite faith revealing deeds of gallantry which have won them decorations in the service of their country.

As regards the Doukhobors, the minister says that everything is fine in Saskatchewan, but I intend to ask him a few questions about them. How many of the Doukhobors in Saskatchewan are doing their alternative service on their own farms? Under the regulations as they originally stood, a conscientious objector was required to go to an alternative service camp and to stay there for the period of the war or engage in other alternative service. Well, the Doukhobors in Saskatchewan decided that they were not going to any alternative camp for the rest of the war; they just said that they were not going. A number of them were prosecuted, and then an arrangement was made between the Department of National War Services and the leaders of the Doukhobors whereby they were promised that if they would go to a park and stay there for three months in the summer time—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On vacation.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, in as fine surroundings as any person in a summer tent ever enjoys, at the end of three months they were free for the rest of the war. That promise was made and carried out, and the minister says that everything is all right in Saskatchewan.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. MITCHELL: Does my hon. friend want another five minutes? I enjoy listening to him.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Let me finish this one subject. May I?

An hon. MEMBER: He has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. MITCHELL: First of all I want to thank my hon. friend for his very kindly references to the Department of Labour. Of course I appreciate the fact that he has had a difficult job in building up a case.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No trouble; anybody could do it.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend, if he is ever fortunate, or perhaps unfortunate enough to be a minister of the crown—

Mr. HOMUTH: No question about that; he will be.

Mr. MITCHELL: Let my hon. friend speak for himself. Goodness knows the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) has tried hard enough with many political parties.

Mr. HOMUTH: Had I been a minister I would have quit my job before I would let them make a mess of my department the way they did with yours.

Mr. MITCHELL: When my hon. friend talks about statistics, he will understand that it will be necessary for him to have a statistical branch of his department. When I took over the Department of Labour I saw to it that we expanded and developed the statistical branch of the department. I will endeavour as far as I can to answer my hon. friend's questions one by one, following the sequence in which he spoke this afternoon.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You would not tell us first about the lost legion, would you?

Mr. MITCHELL: I will do that too, if my hon. friend from the good old province of New Brunswick can be patient. With regard to demobilization, as I have said before, I am not one of those members who think that this war is over—not by a long way.

Mr. BRUCE: Neither do we.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think that first things should come first. First of all we have to defeat Hitler and the people in the Pacific. That is the primary job confronting this house and the people of Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is why we want the lost legion.

Mr. MITCHELL: As I say, first things should come first. The hon. member for Lake Centre spoke of demobilization. We have a special committee of the Department of Labour dealing with the question of demobilization, and associated therewith, of course, is the Department of Pensions and National Health. I do not know, however, nor do I think any member of this house knows, what kind of world we shall live in when the war is over.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You ought to ask Paul Martin.

Mr. MITCHELL: You can put all these things down on paper, and we have done a great deal of that; we have a good many plans under consideration at the present time; but until we know what kind of country, or rather what kind of world—not so much the country as the world—we shall live in when the war is over, our plans and all the rest of it will be of no avail.

I have a vivid recollection of what I wanted most when I was going through the last war, and I have no doubt other hon. members had the same experience. I took the position, as did thousands of others, and I am sure the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) also took that position, that we were concerned not so much about plans as about getting back into civilian life. The British government has taken the same view, and we have to a certain extent, with regard to the gradual demobilization of the armed forces.

It is difficult to expect young men after the war to stay in the services when the war is over. At least I am speaking as an individual. Be that as it may, the department is continually surveying the dominion from the standpoint of a change-over in industry and labour requirements at that time.

My hon. friend spoke of civilian consumption. I think he will agree with me that it was only logical and inevitable that with the increase in the tempo of employment the consumptive ability of the Canadian people—I am speaking of civilian goods—would increase, comparing conditions in 1939 with those that exist to-day. Just over a week ago I was in Philadelphia and New York and I saw something of the vast mass consumption of the people in those two great communities—much greater than our own, may I say. I have always held the opinion that war in its very essence demanded sacrifice. I have always felt that there should be regard for those conditions on the home front. I wish to say to my hon. friend that I do not take second place to any nation of the united nations, except Great Britain, as far as the machinery of selective service is concerned. Do not forget that in Great Britain they have the compelling force of the blitz, which we have not in this country. That may have something to do with the demand for consumption on the part of the people in this country. It is one thing to be in the immediate shadow of war and another thing to be three thousand miles away from it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What the minister is saying is that we have not the war fervour here that they have over there?

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend will agree with me that if the enemy were knocking at the gates of Quebec, or if the enemy were in Burrard inlet in British Columbia, there might be a different outlook toward the prosecution of the war from that which is expressed in certain quarters in this country. I mean, that is a practical thing; you have to recognize it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is true enough.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend spoke of the laundries. Of course there has been an expansion in laundries. There are tens of thousands of men in the armed forces of Canada whose clothes are kept clean by the ordinary commercial laundries of the country. It is a little bit different from what it was when I was in the navy. We then had to wash our own clothes.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: They have two shirts now to keep clean; we had one in the last war.

Mr. MITCHELL: We were lucky to have one in the last war—and I do not say that to cast any reflection on the good fellows who are fighting this war, either. In connection with these civilian undertakings may I say that we have moved tens of thousands of women into them. As I said the other day, had it not been for the women in Great Britain and in Canada—and possibly in the United States, but they can speak for themselves—I do not think we could have reached the point in this war that we have reached to-day.

My hon. friend quoted figures from the unemployment insurance commission to show the amount of unemployment in Canada. That I think is a very unstable position to take. In a seasonal country like Canada, where you get inevitable changes from season to season, unemployment conditions, by the very nature of things, particularly in the construction trade, vary. You get those pockets of unemployment that we have experienced in the last six months. May I say also that we are not alone in that regard. Our good friends to the south of us have experienced the same condition, and notwithstanding the magnitude of the organization in Great Britain they are more or less in the same position.

My hon. friend talked about conscientious objectors. I thought we had that section of the administration fairly well organized. There is this to be said when you compare the position to-day with conditions two years ago. At the moment those conscientious objectors are engaged in productive employment. I am not offering any criticism of what went on before. You take those leaps in the dark; you try a thing, and if it does not work you try something else. That is inevitable under our form of government. I am frank to admit that the old policy of having all the conscientious objectors in camps has been changed and changed considerably. We felt, in view of the shortage of man-power, in agriculture particularly, that those men would be far better off engaged in that important undertaking in our national life than they would be working in those camps in the Rocky mountains. My hon. friend said they would be very nice places in which to spend a holiday. I agree with him.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister spoke about parks.

Mr. MITCHELL: I should like to spend next summer in the parks, but I shall have to sit and listen to my hon. friends day in and day out.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister adopted a policy of appeasement. That is what this government always does.

Mr. MITCHELL: Let me say this to my hon. friend; there was no adoption of a policy of appeasement. We did the practical and sensible thing.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You forgave them. You said, "Go home and be good boys".

Mr. MITCHELL: We made the maximum earning power of those conscientious objectors $25 a month. Any amount in excess of that was paid over to the Red Cross. While I have not the figures in front of me at the moment, I think over the first eight months' period of that policy those people made a contribution of about one quarter of a million dollars to the Red Cross society in the Dominion of Canada. I think that is a constructive way to move in that regard. I think it is far better to have a man on a farm doing something that he understands, that he has been brought up to do, than to have him waste his time in some camp in the parks of this country. I have had some experience with those camps.

My hon. friend spoke about figures. I do not think he said we cooked the figures, but the implication was there. I do not want to take him too harshly to task on that, but I think that observation might be made in reverse, and I say that in a kindly way. I mean the figures my hon. friend quoted were all staggered.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: They were the minister's figures.

Mr. MITCHELL: Of course they were, but they were for different times and different conditions. I am not the keeper of the members of this committee when they sit down with a pencil and a piece of paper and try to write out a question. I have tried it myself. I know how difficult it is sometimes to try to catch the minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It was far easier in our time.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes. I think the hon. member will agree with me when I say this: while he quoted figures to suit himself, figures probably emanating from my department—and I am not being critical about that—I can see how his mind would be confused when he was trying to plead a bad case. I say to the hon. member that I will stand by the figures in table No. 7 which I submitted when I spoke on Friday. They are up-to-date figures and are from reliable sources.

My hon. friend from New Brunswick talks about the lost battalion. I know it looks nice on Hansard.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The lost legion.

Mr. MITCHELL: Nevertheless it is not true, and he knows it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Pretty nearly true, and the country knows it.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend is trying to convince the country of something that does not exist.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is all right; the minister will see when he goes out to meet the country.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think I should say something about prosecutions. I am not responsible for prosecuting or adjudicating a case that comes before some judicial tribunal in this country. I am not responsible for that. That is in the hands of the courts.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister has left out a very important matter, namely, the allocation of the call-ups. Why the low percentage in one place and the very high percentage in another?

Mr. MITCHELL: If my hon. friend will wait, I will come to that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Don't forget it. It is important; that is all.

Mr. MITCHELL: As my hon. friend for Lake Centre knows, I have not reached the stage where I would give direction to the courts of this country when a case comes before them. They adjudicate those cases in a manner which I think has been to the credit of the British people. I speak of "British people" in the broad sense. The hon.

member for York-Sunbury has asked: Why the difference in the approach to the different military districts? I am frank to admit that there are no two military districts alike. Some military districts are largely rural in their make-up; some are largely industrial. I think it is a fair observation to say that up to now the great mass of recruiting in this dominion, speaking now of the call-ups, has been in the more industrialized or urban communities of the country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The volunteers came from Prince Edward Island and the rural parts of New Brunswick.

Mr. MITCHELL: If my hon. friend will wait a moment, I think I made that clear; they have come more largely from the urban centres. The hon. member for Lake Centre raised the question of using these private agencies for tracing people. On Friday I gave him an approximate figure; the actual number of these men to date is 25,670. I would use any agency to trace a missing individual whom I thought owed an obligation to the state. In a vast country like Canada the police force necessary to do this work would have to be so large as to be almost beyond the imagination of most hon. members, and would create a great strain on the man-power of this country. If these people can be located through the simple device of using an agency, it is much more economical; and, if it answers the same purpose, I think it is a sound policy to pursue. That is all I have to say in that regard. I have endeavoured to answer all the points raised by my good friend from Lake Centre, and if he has any others in mind I should be glad to endeavour to answer them as well.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You had better revise your opinion when you look over Hansard to-morrow.

Mr. KNOWLES: The item before us deals with a sum of money to provide for the national selective service programme, one of the functions of which is to make certain that all of Canada's available man-power will be utilized in the national interest. In this connection I should like to refer to one particular group of men in the city of Winnipeg who have gone back to work. I refer to men over sixty-five years of age who were formerly employed by the Canadian Pacific Railway company in the Weston shops, who have been given extensions and have gone back to work in order to assist in all-out production. Naturally among men of that advanced age only those physically able to return to work are so employed, which focuses attention on the fact that many other men of the same age and circumstances have not been able to accept extensions for further employment, and find themselves in a difficult position because of the fact that in many cases no pension is available to them. This raises a question of labour relations which I should like to draw as forcibly as I can to the attention of the minister and the government in the hope that it may be given serious consideration.

As from January 1, 1937, the Canadian Pacific Railway company instituted a new pension scheme for its employees on a contributory basis, as distinct from the non-contributory plan which had been in existence for many years. Into that new plan was written a provision which has created a serious problem for many men, the effects of which are now being felt. I refer to section 8(a) of the rules of that pension plan, which reads in part as follows:

> Only those employees of the company shall be eligible for pension whose names are entered on its staff records, whose last entry into its service has or shall have occurred before attaining the age of forty years—

When this new plan was set up in 1937 the employees of the Canadian Pacific Railway company, at the Weston shops and elsewhere in Winnipeg, realized what it would mean a few years hence and, as I say, the effects of this plan now are being felt very keenly by hundreds of employees. To go for a moment into the background of this situation, I would remind the minister that in 1919 a serious strike occurred in the city of Winnipeg, in which many thousands of men participated. Of those who went out during the course of that strike, four thousand were employees of the Canadian Pacific Railway. When the railway company instituted this new pension plan it ruled that employees who had been out of work during the course of that strike should be regarded as having terminated their employment. In other words, no matter for how many years prior to 1919 these men might have worked for the company, their employment was dated as of the date of their return in that year. When this new plan was first studied by the men affected it was found that there were still in the employ of the Canadian Pacific Railway at Winnipeg, in 1937, 2,500 men whose employment had been interrupted during the strike of 1919. Of these some 2,100, when they returned to work in 1919, were still under the age of forty; in other words it was their right, when the new plan came into effect in 1937, to become participants in that plan since they were under the age limit prescribed when they returned to work. However, many of these 2,100 men had put in quite a number of years of service prior to 1919, so that even in their case the benefits of those years of service have been lost under the new pension plan. The other four hundred who were still in the employ of the company in 1937 were men who had been over forty years of age when they returned to work in 1919, so when the new plan came into effect they were denied the right to enter into it or participate in any pension scheme whatsoever. Hon. members will recognize at once that as a result many men who have given twenty, thirty or forty years of their lives in the service of the company in Winnipeg, upon retirement at the age of sixty-five are not eligible to receive pensions from the company.

As hon. gentlemen will expect, this matter was carefully considered by the unions affected, and in due course in 1937 they took it up with their general chairmen. Later a subcommittee of these general chairmen took the matter up with the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the late Sir Edward Beatty. The matter was under consideration from, roughly, December, 1937, until well into 1939. The last conference between the subcommittee of the general chairmen and the officials of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company took place on July 3, 1939. On October 18 of that year the subcommittee reported on their efforts to the unions affected, and I should like to quote briefly from the report given at that time. This is from the report of the subcommittee of the general chairmen back to the unions affected:

> After going very carefully into the matter at issue it was stated by Mr. Coleman that, apart altogether from the fact that the strikes in question were in violation of the law of the land, viz., the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, and were further unauthorized by the organizations now making a plea on behalf of these men—many of whom had gone on strike after the recognized representatives of the unions had advised against such action—the company was now being asked to find more than $1,250,000 in addition to the amount already required to meet normal expenditures for pension purposes. He made it very clear that the earnings of the company made such a task quite impossible, and regretted very much that, in such circumstances, he had to deny the request of the committee.

Further in this same report I find this:

> We have kept in close touch with this matter over a considerable period of time, always encouraged by the hope that sufficient improvement might take place in the financial condition of the company as to enable us to realize a firm conviction which we have always held that, in such improved conditions at least, some relief might be forthcoming.

Later I find the general chairmen saying this:

> We are still of the unanimous view that, had the financial conditions of the company been different, we would have made progress.

I have read those quotations to emphasize what appeared to be the view of the committee which met the officials of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, namely, that the chief obstacle so far as the company was concerned was the expense involved in meeting the request of the men. It will be noted that the official concerned, Mr. Coleman, stated there were two matters involved, first, that the strike in 1919 had—

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member will realize that we are discussing an item having to do with national selective service, and I do not think what the hon. member is saying comes under the present item. I believe the discussion might more properly be had when the civil estimates of the Department of Labour are before the committee. I cannot see any connection between what the hon. member is saying and the item now before the committee.

Mr. KNOWLES: As I have already tried to indicate, this is a matter affecting men employed and others laid off at the present time, including men who are being retired from time to time. My contention is that this is a matter of labour relations, one which is very much to the fore in these days, and closely connected with the carrying out of our war effort. It is a matter which in my opinion should now be discussed. Further, unless the discussion may now continue when we are dealing with general matters connected with labour relations, I do not know where it might take place. My submission is that we have not before us a schedule of items but rather a resolution on the war appropriation measure. For the sake of convenience we have consented to discuss items in committee as they come along, and in view of our having agreed to that arrangement we should be given the privilege of dealing with matters such as this, which seem to us to be related to the problem before us.

The CHAIRMAN: The only objection I would have is that it is repetitious. I have sat as chairman of the committee at nearly all committee sittings, and the greatest complaint would seem to be that there is repetition, day after day. If there were not that repetition the same objection might not be lodged.

Mr. KNOWLES: So far as I know this matter has not been raised before and I do not see how the suggestion of repetition is involved. It seems to me I should be permitted to continue, because this is a matter of great concern. I believe I should be allowed to proceed under the general heading of labour relations in time of war.

I should like to emphasize that Mr. Coleman's reply to these men was twofold; first, that in his view the strike was illegal, and second, that from the standpoint of the company the money could not be found to finance the pensions these men were requesting. In reply to the argument that the strike was illegal I would point out that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is the only large employer in Winnipeg which, so far as a programme of pensions is concerned, still takes cognizance of the 1919 strike. The Canadian National Railways were in the picture at the time. Later on they likewise instituted a new pension scheme, dating I believe from January 1, 1935; but no discrimination is levelled against any employees of that company who were out in 1919, as has happened in the case of the employees of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. The same holds true with respect to the dominion government. It took back its postal employees and other government employees in Winnipeg, and did not cut into their pension rights at all because of the events of that year. The same is true of the Manitoba provincial government, and of the city of Winnipeg, having special reference to the police of that city who were out during the course of the strike. It seems to me the commendable attitude all these other large employers have taken, including the dominion government itself, both as a government and through its connection with the Canadian National Railways, is the best answer to that argument.

The suggestion that the strike was illegal implies that the company feel that they lost money as a result thereof. Actually that is not so. There had been built up, through the fact that these men would have qualified for a pension on a non-contributory basis, had they stayed on, an equity which in fact was theirs. The company says it would cost them $1,200,000 to pay that equity to these men. It is admitting that it has made $1,200,000 out of the strike whereas, as I have already pointed out, other large employers have not taken advantage of their men in that way.

Answering the argument that the company cannot afford to pay these pensions, first of all I emphasize the fact that these men had an equity which belonged to them in the period prior to 1919. In connection with every wage negotiation which took place during that period, when the men were seeking higher wages, the company always pointed to the non-contributory pension plan as a factor which should be taken into consideration. In other words it assumed there was an equity under the former plan which belonged to the men.

I would point out, too, that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have had a great deal given to them by way of land grants, grants of money and tax exemptions right across this country, and that they have a responsibility not only to individual employees, such as those on behalf of whom I speak, but to the community as a whole.

I well remember during the depression years of the thirties, because I was living in Weston at the time in the home of an employee of the company, how these men agreed to a reduction in the number of their working days to as few as ten a month in order that there might be a minimum of actual lay-offs in the Weston shops. I would point out that the men by accepting this course and thus avoiding widespread lay-offs saved money for the taxpayers of the country and also saved the Canadian Pacific Railway Company from demands that would undoubtedly have been made upon it to provide funds to keep these men going had they been laid off.

There is one other point that should be emphasized when the company is insisting that it cannot pay these pensions, and that is to be found in the financial reports which the company has been making in the last two or three years. I find that the net railway earnings of the company in 1941, for example, were $45,957,536; in 1942, the net railway earnings were $48,187,689, and in 1943, $49,211,567. After making certain deductions and adjustments which appear in the figures listed in the company's own reports which I have before me, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company was still able in 1943 to add $37,939,936 to its profit and loss account, with the result that at the end of 1943 the credit balance in its profit and loss account was $239,190,419. I suggest that in the face of those figures the argument that the company cannot afford to pay the pensions which belong to these men is utterly ridiculous.

I have before me the details of a number of these cases. I shall not take time to go into them but I should like a few minutes to tell the story of one employee of the company, the file on whose case I have in my hand.

This employee entered the service of the company in 1912 and was with the company until 1942, a total of thirty years. In 1923 he had an accident while at work and lost a leg. In 1942, when he was 64 years and 3 months of age, his health became so poor that it was impossible for him to continue at work, and so the company wrote him a nice letter giving him leave of absence because of his illness, without pay. Nine months later he received another letter telling him that now he was sixty-five years of age he would be retired. But of course there was no pension because this employee was out of the service for a time in 1919.

When this employee wrote to the company and asked for consideration in view of his distress and his need, the reply that was sent to him, and which I have before me, said that the company were sorry but that nothing could be done under the rules as they stood, and the company were also very sorry that the man's health was such that he could not avail himself of an extension and go back to work, and keep himself alive in that way. Hon. members will see the position in which that man was put. He gave thirty years of his life; he gave a leg; he gave his health to the company, and all the company had to say in return was: We are sorry your health does not permit you to carry on and work beyond the age of sixty-five and thus keep yourself alive. And that at a time when the company is making the profits which I have already indicated.

These men, as I have already said, have taken this matter up repeatedly through their unions and through the chairmen of their organizations, and they have also endeavoured to take the matter up as individuals with the officials of the company. A short while ago, when Mr. Coleman was passing through Winnipeg, one of these men wrote him a personal letter stating the position in which he found himself and stating that others were in the same circumstances. He wrote this, in part, to Mr. Coleman:

> While we are aware of the failure of our general chairmen on this question, we think that the case might be placed in a more appealing way by some of the men affected. Hoping, sir, that you will pardon our presumption and grant us this privilege. . . .

In reply to this letter from an individual, Mr. Coleman under date of July 3, 1942, said in part:

> I was in charge of western lines at the time of the 1919 strike and am familiar with all the circumstances, and conducted the negotiations with the labour representatives. I have never felt that there was any injustice involved in the decisions then made.

I emphasize to the committee, Mr. Chairman, that the decisions made by the Canadian Pacific were wholly at variance with the decisions made by the Canadian National, the dominion government, the provincial government and the city of Winnipeg. I am satisfied that in Winnipeg to-day, despite the feelings of the past about the 1919 strike, all would agree that this matter should be reconsidered and that these men should be given their pensions. Mr. Coleman went on to say:

> There would, therefore, be no advantage in having a discussion with me. If there are any special circumstances surrounding your case, which may have been overlooked, I suggest that you communicate with Mr. Mather.
> Regretting that I am unable to write you in more encouraging terms, I remain,
>
> Yours very truly,
> D. C. Coleman,
> President.

All of this, as matters now stand, apparently seems to be under the complete control of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. The unions and their general chairmen have done their best in the matter, but the company has turned them down. I suggest that the argument that the company could not finance the pensions for these men, even if it had any merit years ago when it was made to the general chairmen, certainly has no validity to-day.

In addition to these efforts by the general chairmen, the individuals themselves have made efforts such as those to which I have just referred, but without avail.

We are forced back to the terms of the Railway Act, by which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and other railways apparently were given power to set up their own pension schemes without having to submit them to review by the federal government. The appropriate section of the Railway Act is section 122, which reads in part as follows:

> The directors may make by-laws or pass resolutions, from time to time, not inconsistent with law, for
> (c) the retirement of such of said officers and servants, on such terms as to an annual allowance or otherwise, as in each case the directors, in the interest of the company's service, and under the circumstances, consider just and reasonable.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that if it is necessary for the government to submit an amendment to the Railway Act in order to take care of this matter, the government should give consideration to such a course. If, on the other hand, it can be taken care of as a matter of labour relations where improvement is necessary for the war effort, I hope that the Minister of Labour will look into the matter. The section of the Railway Act which I have just quoted seems to have given the entire say over to the company. In other words, the employees concerned, who give their health and their lives in the manner I have indicated have no redress through their government, through the people whom they democratically elect to represent them.

I would urge that the government take this matter under consideration in an effort to see whether something cannot be done for these men. Whatever the views may have been about the 1919 strike; whatever ideas with respect to pensions and social legislation may have prevailed in those days, we are living now in a different era, when the country as a whole feels that working men are entitled to a proper share of the wealth they produce, and entitled in their old age to decent pension. I submit that these men have been dealt with most unjustly, that they have been discriminated against as compared with employees of the other large organizations to which I have referred, and I hope that this matter will be given consideration by the minister, or by the government.

Mr. MAYBANK: I have considerable familiarity with the facts dealt with by the last speaker. I know that the problem concerning the Canadian Pacific railway's fund is not, strictly and technically a government matter. Prior to the time that it changed its superannuation plan the Canadian Pacific had one which was non-contributory. It was not a bad scheme, when one considers that no direct contribution by the employees was required. Later the Canadian Pacific changed over to a plan which is quite similar to that of the Canadian National; at least there are many points of similarity. This change occurred not very many years ago. I do not think that at the time they were drawing up the by-laws for the new plan they had in mind particularly the 2,500 employees—if 2,500 is the right figure, in the Weston area who had been on strike in the big general strike of 1919. However, the result was that most of these men, or at any rate a large number of them, could not acquire pension rights, because of the break in their service in 1919. As I have said, I realize that it is not strictly a government matter, but I know the Department of Labour took a hand in it at some times in the past and endeavoured to effect changes beneficial to the men. While I do not think it is feasible to pass a law to coerce the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, I would urge that the department be astute to try to discover some way of influencing the Canadian Pacific.

I may tell the committee a story with reference to this sort of thing, the facts respecting which I know personally, because of the source from which they come. There was a strike on the Grand Trunk railway back in 1907 or 1908. The men lost that strike. When it was coming to an end, the then deputy minister of labour, the present Prime Minister of this country, made a bargain with Mr. Hays, who was the president of that railway, that, despite the men having lost, he would restore them to work as fast as opportunity offered. Notwithstanding everything that the then deputy minister, Mr. King, could do, Mr. Hays welshed on his bargain and did not take the men back to work, and they were scattered all over Canada working for other railways. I myself met many of them in the ten or fifteen years of railroad work that I did. All of them lost their jobs in spite of what was done by the man who later became the Prime Minister of this country.

The sequel to that story is as follows. In 1911 the president of that railway was looking for money from the Canadian government. The then deputy minister of labour had become a minister of the crown, and he said to Sir Wilfrid Laurier at that time, "Unless Hays acts differently from what he has done in the past—and he is not entitled to this consideration—I would not grant it to him." As a matter of fact the minister took the position that he would resign from the cabinet if Hays, without keeping his undertaking, got consideration to which he was not legally entitled. Sir Wilfrid Laurier delivered an ultimatum to the president of the railway, and parliament was dissolved in 1911 without his obtaining the government aid which he sought. Mr. King, the minister at that time, was defeated in that election. The next time he had to deal with the problem was after he became Prime Minister of this country, when Sir Henry Thornton was being appointed. At that time conversations were held with Thornton, and the Prime Minister, as Mr. King then was, after telling him the whole story, said, "I do not make it a condition of your appointment that these men will even yet get such measure of justice as can be given them, but I do make it a condition of the appointment that you will personally look into it". It was not more than six or seven months later that every one of the sixteen hundred men who had been discriminated against in 1907 or 1908 had been hunted up, and every one of them received whatever compensation could be given in lieu of those that had been taken away. In many cases moneys were paid to their estates. I know these facts to be as I have stated them, and if any minister of the crown is not familiar with the circumstances his best source of information is his own Prime Minister. This measure of justice was effected in this manner by the present

Prime Minister. Incidentally, it is altogether too bad that the story is not better known.

I do not know what the Department of Labour can do in a case of this kind, but I submit that it should concern itself to find a way to help these C.P.R. men. I know the minister and his department would desire to do anything that is possible. I do not make any specific recommendation about changing the law; indeed, I do not think a specific recommendation at this moment would be worth while, because it might turn out not to be feasible. But the time may come when the Minister of Labour can find a way of helping.

I wish to add just a few further words. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken did, it is true, point out that the pension law of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is out of line with that of the Canadian National Railways. I think it might have been a little more generous on his part had he drawn attention in a very special way to that fact. It was glossed over; it was mentioned but not stressed to any degree. The grievance was brought out into the open and stirred around a good deal, but praise was not given in the generous manner which might have been expected to the Canadian National Railways as an instrument of this government for the fair sort of pension scheme which it has. I suggest to the committee not to overlook, when a grievance is being told, the fact that this government and the instrument of this government have acted in an eminently fair way and have instituted what is probably the best pension scheme on the north American continent. This government has done not merely that which is right but that which is indeed generous, and I think it is no more than fair, when dealing with the subject, to draw attention to it.

There is only one other part of to-day's debate to which I wish to make reference. My comments arise from the speech made this afternoon by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). He was endeavouring to make something out of what he called an unemployment problem, calling attention to the fact that there had been certain payments made from the unemployment insurance fund and trying from that to show that we have a real unemployment problem in this country. The fact of the matter is that when you have unemployment insurance you are bound to have a statistic on unemployment. There has never been a year in any country which had unemployment insurance, no matter how prosperous that country was, when they did not have what some might choose to call an unemployment problem; but the right expression to use is an unemployment statistic, because when you have unemployment insurance, obviously every person who has paid a premium comes to get his benefit.

In substantiation of what I have said, I wish to call attention to this fact. In the two countries whose reports up to the end of last year are at present before us, unemployment insurance benefits have regularly been paid. I refer to Great Britain and New Zealand. The latest reports from Australia are not here, but I am confident that you will find a statistic from Australia. That country, right down into the middle of the war, has been paying unemployment insurance benefits from day to day.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Have those payments more than doubled in a period of one year, as from January, 1943, to January, 1944?

Mr. MAYBANK: No. They have not more than doubled in that period of time, as far as I know.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: They have here.

Mr. MAYBANK: I permitted a question, but I do not think the hon. member should continue to mumble and grumble over there after he has asked the question. I have no objection at all to being asked questions and I will sit down for the purpose, as I did on this occasion; but, the question having been asked, the hon. member should remain silent. I do not think the figures, as he says, have doubled in that length of time. I shall deal with them in a moment. However, the point I am getting at is this, that you cannot get away from unemployment payments when you have unemployment insurance, and you are bound to have a statistic on the question. For the hon. member, therefore, to say that by reason of the fact that we have been making payments, not very large payments, there is a real unemployment problem is, of course, just to make a complete mockery of logic.

His approach to every subject is well illustrated by that old adage about one swallow or even two swallows not making a summer. I am quite sure the hon. gentleman has heard that saying before, but he has not paid any attention to it as applying to himself or to his method or lack of method in logic. I also sometimes think he is a little like the old charwoman who, when asked by her mistress whether such and such was not after all just a rumour, took the attitude, "Well, if it is just a rumour my motto is to make the most of it."

In order that you may see the situation in Great Britain over the last two or three years, that country which, as the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) told us the other day, every single man is assigned to some useful work and there is really an all-out war effort, I wish to present certain figures. For, although people are so close to the war there, the British themselves have, over the last three years, been paying unemployment benefits. I cannot say whether they have increased or decreased; but in Great Britain itself, in the three years up to 1943, they paid out twenty-five and a third million pounds, which is an average of a little over eight million pounds a year; and if a country like that has unemployment under the circumstances in which they are living it is certainly not remarkable that there should be some here. Because the moment a person is out of work, he naturally comes to get the benefit for which he paid, and there is consequently an unemployment statistic showing that moneys have been paid out. But an unemployment statistic showing that moneys have been paid and an unemployment problem in a country are two radically different things, and all the rhetoric that my hon. friend may engage in cannot make an unemployment problem out of an unemployment statistic.

Again, in New Zealand, I have noted the figures from the latest book we have for them. In 1940 they paid out £434,497, which was reduced in 1941 to £299,161 and in the next year they still paid £138,528. These figures represent their payments of moneys in unemployment insurance benefits.

My only purpose in mentioning all this is to add a postscript to the story which the hon. member for Lake Centre has given. When presenting a case like this he will not give a complete review of the situation, stating any facts that are favourable and any that are unfavourable. He will only take out a few facts relating to this country and suggest by silence on other points that we are in a somewhat different position from that of any other country which has unemployment insurance. But such is not the case, and a fair examination into the problem will show to any reasonable and impartial person that indeed it is not the case. That is all I have to say on the matter.

Mr. McIVOR: How many years must a worker on the Canadian National Railways serve before he receives a pension?

Mr. MAYBANK: Fifteen, I think it is, but I am not quite sure.

Mr. McIVOR: And how many years must a man work on the Canadian Pacific before he gets a pension?

Mr. MAYBANK: I cannot answer that.

Mr. McIVOR: I understand it is twenty-five. The reason why I ask these question is that I have known men to have served for nearly twenty-five years and they have failed to get their pension by a margin of a month or two. That is something the Minister of Labour and the department should take into consideration. I suggest that when a man has served for twenty years he should have a scaling of his service, after the manner of the civil service, so that he would receive a pension, because if a man serves for twenty-four years and ten months on the railroad and is not fit for very much afterwards he should get some consideration.

Mr. MITCHELL: While this particular matter does not come under selective service I wish to thank the hon. members for Winnipeg North Centre, Winnipeg South Centre and Fort William for the remarks they have made. I have a clear understanding of the background of this dispute over pensions with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I have a vivid recollection of the strike of 1919 and the things that happened after that strike. I shall be very glad to do whatever lies within the power of my department to bring to the attention of the railway concerned the observations made by my hon. friends this afternoon.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to say a further word, if I may.

The CHAIRMAN: I must repeat I believe this discussion is out of order. I should have ruled it out of order a while ago. I do not believe it has anything to do with the Department of Labour and certainly on the war appropriation resolution it has nothing to do with the item before us at the moment.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to say a word or two because of one observation made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. I believe the hon. member slipped out of the chamber for a few minutes while I was speaking and consequently did not hear all that I said. I believe if he looks up Hansard he will find that I made fairly generous remarks about the attitude of the Canadian National Railways in this matter, and that I referred specifically to the Canadian National as an instrument of the government in this situation. While I am on my feet may I say to the Minister of Labour that the provision requiring continuous service commencing before the age of forty is still in the pension rules of the railway concerned, and some of the men now in the employ of the company feel that if there is any kind of interruption in work which the railway feels comes under this rule then they might in the future be adversely affected.

However, I appreciate the minister's offer to look into the matter as far as his department is concerned.

Mr. RALSTON: May I say just a word? I appeal to the committee, in the interests of getting on with the work, to try to keep within the item which is under discussion. We have tried to lay down a plan of procedure which we can all follow and understand and which gives opportunity for the application of rules of order. I am sure that the committee itself is not satisfied with the desultory sort of discussion that takes place on subjects which are far removed from the actual item which is before the committee. We want to get this war appropriation resolution moved forward just as fast as we possibly can. I would therefore ask that all hon. members take all the care they can to see that the discussion is kept within the bounds of the item which is before them. There will be an opportunity to discuss these other items. It simply means a duplication if we do it now.

Mr. WHITE: I wish to speak briefly on the man-power question, which I think the Minister of National Defence will agree comes under this item. This question has been most capably covered this afternoon by the hon. member for Lake Centre. I followed his remarks very closely, as I did the reply of the Minister of Labour. In his reply the Minister of Labour referred to the various tables and figures quoted by the hon. member for Lake Centre, and pointed out that these returns and figures all applied to different dates, which is correct. He referred to his table No. 7, which he placed on Hansard last Friday, as setting out the complete picture. But I would point out to the minister that table No. 7 follows a different set-up from what has been given in the various returns. I ask the minister if he will be good enough to place on Hansard during the course of this debate a table taking in any date he wishes in 1944? I believe that the figures are available down to some date in March, 1944. I should like that table to contain the following information:

1. The number of men available for military call-up in the various districts. This information could be given either by military districts or by administrative districts.

2. The number of men called for medical examination.

3. The number of men who reported for medical examination.

4. The number of men found medically fit.

5. The number of military training orders or notices sent out.

6. The number of men who reported for military training.

7. The number of men who enlisted on receipt of order.

8. The number of orders returned undelivered.

9. The number of postponements granted.

10. The number of men exempt under certain statutory regulations and exemptions.

If the minister will be good enough to give us that statement I think it would clear up the confusion.

Mr. MITCHELL: Would my hon. friend send me over the list when he is through?

Mr. WHITE: I shall make another one. I do not think the minister could read my shorthand. If the minister would give us a statement setting out these different items as a certain date, it would get over the somewhat confused picture that has been presented to us by the various returns filed in the house.

Apparently the question of man-power is to be an acute one this year, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Lake Centre. I know that at least in military district No. 3, which includes the city of Ottawa, there is a very great shortage of man-power. During the past month many young men who had obtained exemptions on account of living and working on farms have received notices, when applying for further extension, that they are to report to district depot No. 3 at Kingston, where they are to be reexamined and reclassified. That may be because of some change in the regulations, or it may be the usual routine procedure. But I do know in the past once a man who has been called for military service has satisfied the divisional registrar that he is a genuine farmer and is actively engaged in agricultural production he is granted a postponement, which is automatically renewed, or he is granted a postponement which reads: "Until further notice." If there is to be some change in this procedure, and if any of those men who are on farms are to be called and taken into the army, I think the minister should tell the committee.

Only to-day I received a letter from Kingston in regard to an extension I wrote about for a cheesemaker who is in charge of a cheese factory in the county of Hastings producing well over 200,000 pounds of cheese a year. His postponement runs out on June 1. The letter was to the effect that he would have to report at Kingston on June 1, when the exemption runs out. If there is to be any change I would point out to the minister that it is unfortunate to call these men off the farms at this particular time of the year, because in the district where I live mixed farming is carried on. The farmers there, in response to requests from the government, have increased the number of stock they carry on the farms; they have brought into cultivation quite a large amount of new ground. If those farmers are now to be deprived of those men who have received exemptions they will be left in a very unsatisfactory position.

I would refer the minister to a statement which appeared in a Belleville newspaper last week. This statement was given by Mr. H. H. Reed, manager of the local branch of the national selective service division at Belleville. The statement reads as follows:

> Wages as high as $75 and $80 per month are being offered by the occasional Hastings county farmer for experienced farm help for the coming season, it was stated here to-day by H. H. Reed, manager, local branch of the national selective service. Demand for farm help is quite steady with the office at present having thirty-six unfilled applications.

That figure may not appear very high to some of the farmer members from the west, but it is in eastern Ontario. As I said a moment ago, I hope that the minister will tell the committee if there is to be any change, or whether this is just the routine procedure and that those men who now have farm postponements will receive a further extension.

I agree with what was said by the minister at the close of his remarks, that the needs of the armed forces must come first, put the armed forces first and agriculture second. At the same time, however, the minister is a member of this government and must realize that the responsibility for securing men for the armed forces and for agriculture rests upon his shoulders and those of the other members of the cabinet. The minister presented a long report, but I would point out that as yet his department has not put into effect in Canada a real policy of selective service under which everyone in this country will be put in the place he is best suited to fill; nor has he yet put into operation a policy under which all men eligible for military service may be sent to any part of the world. How can the minister be consistent when he refers to the shortage of man-power that exists to-day, while at the same time he supports a policy under which, according to figures supplied by the government, there remains in this country a home defence army of from 75,000 to 100,000 men, who under present regulations cannot be sent out of the country? As was so well pointed out by the hon. member for Lake Centre, if we are to have unity in this country there must be equality of service and sacrifice. One has only to examine the various reports and returns published in "Canada at War" to see the unfair quotas filled by voluntary enlistment in the various provinces. I have said before in this house, and I repeat, that I could never understand why one province should be expected to contribute a much larger number of men to the armed forces than any other province.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): In relation to population.

Mr. WHITE: Yes, in relation to population. I say the policy of the government in obtaining men for the armed forces is one of political expediency; and I do not understand how they can expect to run a political war and at the same time create national unity. We all remember the great fuss that took place in this house at the time of the plebiscite. I was a member of the committee which revised the rules in that connection; the matter was so urgent that the committee was required to complete its work in two days. They were obliged to sit in the morning, the afternoon and until late at night in order that the bill might be brought into the house and rushed through. Well, we had the plebiscite; eight provinces voted "yes" and one province voted "no", but the conditions which existed before the plebiscite was taken exist to-day, and the regulations are exactly the same. The government continues its policy of attempting to induce men in the home defence army to go active. As I have said before, the responsibility for obtaining these men rests upon the shoulders of the government; it is a responsibility which cannot be delegated to any officers of the army. It is most humiliating for any officer, no matter what his rank may be, to have to appeal to men in the home defence army to go active. During the course of his remarks on Thursday last, as reported at page 2383 of Hansard, the minister said:

> It seems to me that the army is not only entitled to see to it, but it is the duty of the army to see to it, that the needs of the volunteer army are put before the people of Canada in exactly the same way.

I think the minister is wrong in that statement, because it is his department and the government who decide what are to be the needs of the army and how these men are to be obtained. It would be very nice for the minister and his department to pass the responsibility for securing recruits for the active army over to the officers. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that it all results from the failure of the government to adopt a policy under which men eligible for military service could be sent outside Canada. During the course of his remarks on the same occasion, at the same page, the minister went on to say:

> . . . I deprecate more than I can say the attempt which has been made to disparage recruiting activities in Canada.

The minister did not refer to any particular person or body of people, but I would draw to his attention the motion that was adopted in the Quebec legislature only last week. By a vote of some fifty-four to four the house approved a motion stating that they were opposed to sending any conscripted men overseas. The minister belongs to the same political party that is in power in Quebec, but as yet I have not heard any hon. member of this house repudiate or condemn the motion in question. Does the minister think a motion of this kind, on the very eve of the invasion, is in the interests of national unity, that it is in the interests of recruiting or that it will help the troops overseas? Are they going to feel that the citizens of Canada are behind them when they read of such a motion being passed by the Quebec house? Several members of the cabinet come from Quebec. If they do not approve that motion I think it is their duty and responsibility to say so in this house and to repudiate the motion that was adopted by such a huge majority.

Mr. RALSTON: If my hon. friend will permit me, I said I deprecated the efforts being made by some people to discourage recruiting activities. The hon. member is talking about some motion passed by a provincial legislature which opposed the sending of conscripted men overseas. Those are two different things. I say that my hon. friend is not only absolutely unjustified in his remarks but that he is doing something which is harmful to Canada's war effort when he suggests that it is humiliating to request officers to ask men to enlist, or to endeavour to see that they do enlist. I say that part of the job we have to do is to get men. My hon. friend has not suggested that there is anything objectionable when we are asked by the national war finance committee to bring back officers and men from overseas to ask me and him and all other hon. members of this house as well as the public in general to subscribe their money for the purpose of supporting those men. That is perfectly all right, but when officers of the army ask men to enlist, that is humiliating. I say that my hon. friend is making a statement derogatory to the war effort and absolutely unjustified, and one which comes from just the sort of attitude I mentioned the other day, namely, not so much a desire to see men come into the army but rather a desire to see that men come into the army through conscription.

Mr. WHITE: I can only say to the minister I repeat that it is humiliating for any officer, no matter what his rank may be, to have to plead with men whom he is supposed to lead, to enlist in the active army. Those men are already in the home defence army, and it is the duty of the minister and the government to get them into the army. The minister and the government are the ones to set the policy. It is not up to the officers, and they have no authority—I will not say they have no authority, but the government is not right in trying to shove off on to the shoulders of officers the responsibility of obtaining men for service overseas.

Mr. RALSTON: What does my hon. friend think this house has been voting money for, for recruiting officers and recruiting organizations, for the last two or three years? Has my hon. friend any objection to that? Does my hon. friend think the vote is wrong? We have had recruiting staffs in every part of the country—and so has the navy, and so has the air force. Does my hon. friend suggest that those procedures are wrong on the part of the officers of the navy or the air force? These staffs are employed for that very purpose; these officers are employed for that very purpose. Is there any humiliation in working in that particular job? The air member for personnel in the air force and the officer dealing with personnel in the navy, have as part of their responsibilities the getting of men to enlist in the navy and the air force. The adjutant-general in the army has the same job. Does my hon. friend suggest that that is a humiliating activity?

Mr. WHITE: I say again it is a humiliating activity—and the minister is not cross-examining me. While the minister speaks that way about obtaining recruits for the army I should like to refer him to the record of a recent meeting of the Ontario command of the legion. I am sure that no one will even suggest that members of the legion would do anything in the slightest degree to hinder or to harm the welfare of the armed forces of Canada. This was the motion passed at a recent meeting in Toronto of the Ontario command:

> This convention reaffirms the legion's mandate of 1941—"The legion's call for total war," and strongly asks the federal government for its immediate implementation in the matter of calling men for service anywhere.

The editorial continues:

> The legion does not believe in bludgeoning the draftees on to active service. They, the men who fought in the last war, refuse to be part of the campaign of shaming, of coercing men to go active. They realize that the fair way, the honest way, is for the government to pass the order in council which would send anywhere those who are in the home defence army. And in that course the legion is in keeping with the view of the majority of Canadians who voted "yes" in the plebiscite.

At the same meeting Mr. Alex Walker, dominion president of the Canadian legion, is reported in the press as speaking as follows:

I don't think the government should have officers going around and telling men to do their duty. Why couldn't the government put into power the authority it has and tell these men (in the home defence army) they are going wherever required? No one need fear the Canadian Legion. Our feet are on the ground, and in whatever we do we think first of Canada and then of ourselves. If more people would think of the country first and then of their political fences, it would be a better Canada to-day.

And the legion speaks not only for nearly all members of the armed forces of the last war, but also for a very large number of other citizens in Canada.

Mr. RALSTON: If my hon. friend's attitude is correct, then what should be done is to take off the road all mobile recruiting units of the whole three services, and simply wait for the men to volunteer. That was not done in the last war, and it has not been done in this war so far in any of the three services. I do not propose that it shall be done, so far as the army is concerned, and I believe my colleagues feel the same way about the navy and the air force.

Mr. WHITE: You would have recruiting centres all over Canada, of course.

Mr. RALSTON: But my hon. friend says it is humiliating!

Mr. WHITE: The exhibition that we have had out west of General Pearkes having to plead with the men to go on active service, stating—or at least he is quoted as saying:

I tried principally to appeal to their pride in Canada, and to the fact that the outcome of the second front might rest upon the number of home defence men who are ready to back up the troops already overseas.

I say to the minister that you can only take the inference from those remarks that there are not sufficient reinforcements overseas. I know the minister has said in this house—his exact words were:

Provision has been made for reinforcements on a scale which is regarded as adequate.

That statement was made, I believe, on February 14. If the minister is of the same opinion to-day, then General Pearkes was wrong in what he said to the troops out west, when he said that the outcome of the second front "might rest upon the number of home defence men who are ready to back up the troops already overseas."

[Mr. White.]

Mr. RALSTON: It is absolutely ridiculous for my hon. friend to say anything of the kind.

Mr. WHITE: Now—

Mr. RALSTON: Will my hon. friend permit me a word?

Mr. WHITE: You are not always so willing when I wish to interrupt you.

Mr. RALSTON: I believe I have allowed my hon. friend to interrupt me. I have said repeatedly that there is a necessity for maintaining the Canadian army overseas. I am doing all I can, and my officers are doing all they can, just as are the officers of the other services, to see to it that the men are ready for overseas when the need comes. And we propose to keep on doing that.

Mr. WHITE: The minister might proceed to tell us what he intends to do with the home defence army. He says that they are going to be ready to go overseas when needed. I say to the minister that if what General Pearkes says is correct the men are needed for overseas, and it is the duty of the minister and the government to see to it that all the home defence men, the men in the home defence army, are made available for overseas service immediately.

The government wishes to pass over to the officers the job of coercing, forcing, bullying and pleading with these men. "Get so many men to go active, and we will give you leave, we will give you days"—or we will give you other things.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is drawing on his imagination.

Mr. WHITE: Well, all right.

In conclusion, I should like to say simply this to the minister, that if the men are needed for overseas service it is up to the minister to see that they are made available. It is time that the government stopped this farce, this back-door system of recruiting. It almost compares with the brilliant thirty-day training scheme which was introduced by the government. I wonder what the Minister of National Defence would say now if he rose in his place to uphold the thirty-day training scheme.

Mr. RALSTON: I would say exactly what I said at the time.

Mr. WHITE: I am sure you would be very proud of it! And the officer who drafted and introduced the scheme I see has gone a long way up the military ladder.

Mr. RALSTON: And that will help the war effort a lot!

Mr. ROSS (Souris): There is a difference between being on the front bench and being in the front line. You see things differently.

Mr. RALSTON: I was on the front bench then, as I am to-day.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): It is far different.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of care the other day as the Minister of Labour made his statement to the committee, and I have since had an opportunity of reading his statement. I realize, as I have said in the past, that he has a tremendous job on his hands. There are many things that go to magnify the troubles of the Department of Labour. As I listened to the minister and as I have watched his work over the years, he seems to me a very conscientious sort of fellow who is working under great difficulty. He has to have two objectives always before him. He has to administer national selective service so as to ensure that there will be a sufficient supply of labour on the farms and in industry, and at the same time he has some responsibility for seeing that a sufficient number of men are left available to enter the home defence forces. So that he is really working at cross-purposes. Not only is he compelled to satisfy the Department of Labour and ensure that the demands of labour for better wages and better working conditions are met, but he has also to satisfy the three branches of the Department of National Defence, and has to satisfy also the Department of Finance. All this tends to magnify the difficulties of the position in which the minister finds himself. All these different aspects of his work have to dove-tail into one another as well as they can, and in some respects the minister is doing a very well worth-while job.

One notable feature of the minister's statement to the committee the other day was the educational training that is being given to civilians in war industry and to those who are being rehabilitated. That is commendable, but in that connection it must be borne in mind, and I am sure that the people of Canada will have this in mind, that there is not much use in training people for different jobs, especially civilians and those engaged in the war industries, if there are to be no jobs for them after the war. One of the big things which this country has to do after winning the war, which I think we all agree is our first objective, is to see that there will be jobs for our men after they return home, and jobs that will be remunerative—not the kind of job that was going during the depression when a man could hardly make a living for himself and family. The returned man will expect a great deal more than that after this war, and rightly so. I could hardly conceive of the men being satisfied if, after they got home, they found the same conditions that prevailed during the depression years. Yet I have noticed a great deal of political propaganda that is going out all over the country and to the armed forces, some of it broadcast over the air, all to the effect that great preparations are being made in this country for the post-war period. I just do not believe that. Some measures are being taken, but very few. Actually we are not doing a great deal to ensure that when our men return from overseas they will find Canada a really well worth-while country.

There has been a great deal of talk here this afternoon about the war effort and the necessity for getting recruits. But if we are in a position to assure our people that this Canada of ours is to be a really well worth-while place after this war is won, we shall not have so much difficulty in getting recruits. Now you cannot ensure that, merely by putting out a lot of propaganda. To-day I received a bunch of pamphlets from the Liberal organization. They were addressed to J. A. Johnston but they came to me and I opened them by mistake. These pamphlets were on post-war reconstruction—what is to be done for the soldiers after the war. I could not see that there was a great deal in the pamphlets that was true, as I glanced over them, because really we have not done a great deal. We have a social security measure before us, but it is a long way from being put into effect, and I doubt whether the whole of it will ever be put into effect, though parts of it may be.

Mr. MacNICOL: Who sent the pamphlets?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The Liberal organization. I have not that in mind alone. A great many pamphlets have been got out by the government themselves and sent to members of the active forces, giving the idea that great preparations are being made in Canada for the post-war period. Those boys are going to be badly mistaken if when they come back they find that actually very little has been done to prepare for the post-war period. That is one of the difficulties in which the Minister of Labour finds himself.

The minister in his statement to the committee the other day referred to certain industries in Canada, and I was particularly interested in what he said about the coal industry, because there is a coal industry in my part of the country. I know very well that the minister might say that that is a purely local question, that the conditions there apply in only one area of Canada. But that would not be true. It is true that in Nova Scotia there are not the same difficulties in coal mining that there are in Alberta. But conditions in Alberta are not just a temporary thing. They demand attention and have done so for a long time, and they call for planning to carry us over a crisis. It is summertime now and perhaps our coal requirements do not seem so pressing at the moment, but winter will come again, and as the minister stated in his speech some weeks ago, now is the time to start planning. But no planning with regard to the coal industry has been done apart from the announcement that a royal commission is to be set up to investigate conditions in the coal industry, with a view, I suppose, to creating a national fuel policy. We have needed a national fuel policy for a number of years now. I have advocated such a policy ever since I came into this house in 1935. That is a long time, and I am not very hopeful that the royal commission which is to be set up will have any far-reaching effects in the establishment of a permanent fuel policy for Canada. Why? Because we have had these things in the past, and up to the present no action has been taken as a result.

Speaking on Friday last, the minister said, as reported in Hansard at page 2438:

> The situation of the coal mining industry was declared to be a national emergency in May, 1943. . . .

It was a national emergency at that time. We remember what a desperate need there was in all parts of Canada for coal, and drastic measures were taken at that time to overcome the emergency. In my opinion we are drifting right now to the same position we were in last winter. We are depleting the mines of their help; the miners are being scattered again here and there, and it would not surprise me if we found ourselves in a much worse position than before. It will be recalled that on the last occasion we were able to alleviate the shortage by having soldier miners sent back to the mines. We may not be able to repeat that operation this coming winter because a great number of these men may have gone overseas. We cannot foretell conditions as regards the defence of this country and whether we shall be able to send soldier miners from the home defence army for occupation in the mines if an emergency should arise. Certainly we shall not be in any better position this coming winter to obtain the services of miners who are seasonally occupied in agriculture. It follows that by every indication the condition will be worse this coming winter than it was last winter.

The minister went on to say:

> Last May, order in council P.C. 4092 was passed, and directed that men with coal-mining experience then engaged in other industry, and who were physically fit, should be returned to the mines.

From the point of view of emergency that policy was all right, and it did assist in overcoming the emergency. I have never criticized the principle of selective service; in fact, I thought it was the proper thing as soon as the war began, and our group was the first in the house to advocate it. But the administration in many of the local areas was extremely faulty, as I have pointed out to the minister on other occasions.

One instance which I recall, and which I do not think I have brought to his attention before, was drawn to my attention by the words he used which I have just quoted, "who were physically fit". Five men were sent from Ontario to the Drumheller area by national selective service. It may be a regulation, in accordance with the minister's reference to men "who were physically fit", that there should be a medical examination by competent authority to ascertain that they are physically fit; but the five men sent from Ontario, who were supposed to be miners, were too old to do the job, and were proved by medical inspection in Drumheller to be physically unfit for it. They could not stand the work, and after working two or three shifts they were compelled to quit their jobs. This was an unfortunate occurrence not only from the point of view of the cost to which the state was put in sending these men three thousand miles or more and withdrawing them from the armed forces, but because of the inconvenience and disturbance to which the mining company itself was put. All five men returned, and it is definitely known that the return fares of three of them had to be paid. The unnecessary expense was incurred of transferring these five men from Ontario to Drumheller, taking up valuable space on the trains, and transporting them back again. Altogether eight men were sent. Three others who came from Camp Borden had had no experience in coal mining, though they had had hard rock mining experience in Ontario. The minister says that they were physically fit. Probably they should have been, but definitely they were not. There has been no effort to overcome such situations as that.

Matters have now gone to the other extreme, and in both Calgary and Edmonton districts coal mines are having to shut down. When last I spoke on this question, a few weeks ago, having reference in particular to the closing of the mines at Edmonton, I was assured by the minister that national selective service was operating so wonderfully that, should the mines close down, these men would immediately be taken care of; in fact the minister thought I was unduly pessimistic about that situation. As the facts have developed, it does not seem that I was, because, I am informed, the mines did close down and some of these men are not yet reemployed and are still receiving unemployment insurance. That is not a satisfactory condition when we are supposed to be having an all-out war effort in which everyone is taking his place.

In the Drumheller area the same situation prevails, possibly to a greater extent. I am informed by a letter recently received that in that mining area a great deal of trouble is occurring with national selective service in the payment of men who are receiving unemployment insurance. Since the mines closed, large numbers of men have been forced to apply for unemployment insurance, but have had difficulty in getting their pay. Sometimes it is delayed two or three weeks, or even longer, and the situation is coming to a point where the miners are about ready to take drastic action unless something is done. These conditions, which are directly related to selective service and unemployment insurance, require considerable attention by the minister.

There is one other item to which I wish to refer, because I think it too touches on this problem of national selective service. There has been some talk this afternoon about the defence army, and since this comes under the man-power policy, I would refer to a few remarks made by the minister himself. When he was speaking the other day he had this to say, as reported at page 2430 of Hansard, with reference to the man-power policy:

> In my opinion the true yardstick of a successful man-power policy is the degree to which the armed forces are mobilized for the job of fighting, and the material resources organized for maximum output of munitions, food and all the other things necessary.

I will agree with him in that statement, that the true yardstick is the result of policy. I wonder how true that has proved to be? Let us see what he said further on, because under the minister's department comes the duty of getting men for the defence army. He has to supply them and, after they are in there, they are out of his department. We have been given so many pictures of our mobilization effort that it is exceedingly difficult to know just where we stand, but as reported at page 2445 of Hansard the minister said, in the same speech:

> We are now finding it more difficult to fill the army requisitions. As the war progresses, it is evident that we will soon have to rely largely upon those at present deferred and the young men coming of age.

I said at the opening of my remarks that the minister was between two fires: he had to supply men for the defence plants, civilian occupations, and also get men for the home defence army. He goes on to say:

> The proportion of fit men in the higher age classes is becoming increasingly smaller. This entails a greater effort for smaller returns.
> There is another point I would like to mention. Recently my colleague, the Minister of National Defence (army), made the statement in the house that he would require 60,000 men in the year commencing the first of April. In further correspondence with me, he has stressed the absolute necessity of obtaining these men, particularly bearing in mind the requirements of operations which are in prospect.

I would call your attention, Mr. Chairman, to the fact that there is a great deal of concern about the man-power problem in the army in the very near future. Here we have a statement about the absolute necessity of obtaining these men, particularly bearing in mind the requirements of operations in prospect. There cannot be any fooling about that. The Minister of National Defence has pointed out to the Minister of Labour the great danger that lies ahead and the great need for sufficient recruits for the army. He is taking great care to point that out. I quote further:

> In the last six months, September 1943 to February 1944, there actually have been more than 5,000 men per month who were enlisted and enrolled in the army alone. However, the monthly average has been decreasing, and at times enlistments and enrolments have fallen below the numbers required by the army. For this reason I think it is only fair to state in the house that further postponements in industry generally will have to be curtailed. This policy should not adversely affect industry; for, as I have already stated, its maximum demand has been passed. I mention this in order that all members will realize that the retention of young men of military age and fitness in industry can only be justified under very exceptional circumstances.

That brings me to the question which has been partly discussed this afternoon, of getting men from the farms and from industry to meet this shortage of man-power in the army. When the Minister of National Defence was speaking I was surprised at some of the things he had to say with regard to the method of getting these men, and I doubt very much whether the Minister of Labour agrees with the present policy of obtaining men for the armed forces. He may, though I am inclined to think he does not. The duty of the Minister of Labour is to see wherever possible that men are made available for the defence army. I recall apearing before the board in Edmonton a couple of years ago when I was endeavouring to get some farm lads postponed. As a matter of fact, I got the postponements because the board was very reasonable and saw the necessity. But this was the situation as they put it up to me: Here we have received an order from Ottawa directing us in this district to obtain 25,000 young men; we are not told where to get them but we must go and get them. The chairman of the board said to me, "Where would you get them? You are a westerner and you know that we have got nearly all the boys in the towns. Where shall we get these 25,000? Yet we have received an order from Ottawa to get them." Obviously there was only one place where they could be got, namely, out of industry or from the farms The minister's problem, therefore, is becoming more and more magnified as the situation to which he refers becomes more acute. I do not know where he will get men, but I am opposed to the method that is used now. I am wholly against the method used to obtain these men from the draft army into the active army, and I am amazed at the attitude taken by the two old line parties in this house over this question.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the matter with ours?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Yours?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Its policy is just as despicable as the Liberal party's, for the reason that when the war started you sat over there in this house and the then leader, Doctor Manion, made it definitely clear where your party stood.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It was not I that stood there and made it clear.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): But you did not change it after you came in.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I can show you where I changed it.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The only time there has been a change has been in the last year or so, and then it is only the younger members of the party who have had judgment and foresight to see the necessity of a change.

The CHAIRMAN: I must ask hon. members to address the Chair.

[Mr. C. E. Johnston.]

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The younger members did not wait until last year.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I will give the younger members credit for this, that they had different views though they did not express them when the war came on. That was the proper time to lay down policy. That was the proper time to lay down a national policy on selective service in regard to man-power, and we were the only ones of all the parties in this house who took that stand. We were the only ones that did not have political views in mind when advocating it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Never had.

Mr. MacNICOL: Not even on the twenty-five dollars per month programme?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): We never had political ambitions. The member for York-Sunbury says we never had political ambitions and I am glad he recognizes that. I am sorry that I cannot say the same for his party. When the plebiscite was on, the same thing happened. It was a political issue. There again we stood out differently from all the others. But when you advocate a policy such as that you cannot expect to have any better results than you are having right now. In fact I am surprised that you are having as good results as you are.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Everybody is out of step but "Our Willie."

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I have not seen any great contribution made by the Conservative party when my hon. friend, the member for York-Sunbury was the leader. In fact I have not heard him make much of a contribution to the house since he has been here. He may have at times. I do not mean to belittle the hon. gentleman; but I would not do that. I think he has been doing his best; but you see where his best has landed us, because his best on the mobilization problem was exactly the same as the Liberal party's best. They were both in accord. Well do I remember seeing the late Doctor Manion rising in his place in this house and patting the government on the back for the policy they were pursuing in regard to the raising of man-power for this war. I will say that there were some members of the Liberal cabinet who objected to the practice being used then and are no doubt objecting now, but they are not getting very far with it.

When I see the method being used to get the boys out of the defence army into the active army I think it is nothing short of shameful. If I were the government I would be absolutely ashamed to have any officer in the active army go out to intimidate or coerce these men who have complied in every degree with the government's request and have joined the defence army. They are trying to coerce or shame them into going active.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): They are good and ashamed too.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): If they are not, they should be. The government should get out and speak to some of these boys in the defence army. You do not need to think for one minute that all these boys in the defence army are yellow; they are not by any manner of means. I have had them tell me this, and I think they are quite justified in the stand they take. They say: We joined the defence army because that was the government's policy and they asked us to do so. They sent us a call and we complied with it. We have joined the defence army, and we will join the active army when the government makes that their policy so that everybody has to go. Instead of that the government has agreed with army officers who go out and speak to the defence army in the way in which Major General Pearkes did the other day.

May I quote from the Canadian Veteran of April 30, 1944? This is what Major General Pearkes is reported to have said:

> Major General G. R. Pearkes, V.C., general officer commanding-in-chief, Pacific command, in an address to a group of soldiers at Vernon, B.C., training camp recently said: "Cease wavering, play the man's part, and join the active army of Canada."

What kind of language is that to use to men in the defence forces who have complied with the government's regulation and the government's policy? That language should be addressed to the Minister of National Defence and the Prime Minister. The article goes on:

> General Pearkes said later: "I tried principally to appeal to their pride in Canada."

Why appeal to their pride? Why not appeal to the pride of the government? They were the ones who put this policy into operation. They were the ones who asked these boys to join the defence army. Why take it out on these boys? The government sends out officers to tell these boys they should be ashamed of themselves to be in the defence army of Canada. What kind of hypocrisy is that? Then the article goes on to say:

> . . . and to the fact that the outcome of the second front might rest upon the number of home defence men who are ready to back up the troops already overseas.

What is the import of that statement? He says that the very existence of our Dominion of Canada may depend upon the willingness of the defence army to go active. Those words should be applied to the government of this country and never to a man in uniform in the defence army.

Where are we to get the men for our active army? As the Minister of Labour pointed out, he was cautioned by the Minister of National Defence that there was a great danger of our not getting enough men for the active army. It is the job of the Minister of Labour to see to it that these men are forced into the defence army, and forced from there into the active army. Can one find anything more despicable than that? It is almost subversive; I think it is. We have young men in industry or in agriculture receiving calls. They have to go before the selective service board, and the very first thing the selective service board asks them is: "Why are you not in the army?" Or they send them to some job to which the boys do not want to go, and they say: "If you do not go we will push you into the army." That was done in the selective service office in Calgary and I brought it to the attention of the minister. When they are in the defence army, by using that method we then send honourable gentlemen, worthy army officers who have served their country overseas, among these men, and we put the shameful task on such officers of going out to these men who have complied in every way with the government's law and the government's regulations to induce them to join the active army.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River). We say to them—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I rise to a question of privilege. The hon. member who has had the floor up to this time this evening has, I submit, totally, wilfully and knowingly misrepresented my position on the question of national selective service. I desire to call the attention of this committee and the country to the amendment which I moved in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne on January 26, 1942. In that debate I moved, seconded by the hon. member for Yale, the following amendment to the motion then before the house:

> This house regrets that Your Excellency's advisers, instead of giving to the country the leadership so essential at a time properly described in the speech from the throne as the greatest crisis in the world's history, on the contrary, have sought to evade their responsibility by holding a plebiscite, which, in the view of this house, is the negation of responsible government.
> And this house regrets that Your Excellency's advisers have not seen fit to recommend to parliament without delay additional measures designed to

(a) completely mobilize the wealth and material resources and, on a selective basis, the full man and woman power of the nation, to the end that the nation may wage total war in any theatre of war;

(b) supply the imperative needs of agriculture, industry and the fighting forces of the nation; and

(c) prepare for the post-war period.

I call upon the hon. member to recall the statements he made with respect to myself, deliberately, falsely, ignorantly and, I say, maliciously.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): On a point of order I respectfully submit that this is not a question of privilege. I also submit that the words used by the hon. member for York-Sunbury in regard to another hon. member of this committee are absolutely out of order and unparliamentary according to the well-known examples in Beauchesne and should be immediately withdrawn, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: I must state, of course, that this is not a question of privilege. The remarks made by the hon. member for York-Sunbury about the hon. member for Bow River of wilful misrepresentation are out of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): According to Beauchesne, second edition, an hon. member cannot make those remarks about another hon. member.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, I think your point of order is well taken. Since the hon. member for York-Sunbury has made those direct accusations about me and he cannot substantiate them—and he knows that—I have not Hansard of that date before me—I think he should, if he is a gentleman, recall those statements, particularly where he said that I had done so deliberately and intentionally.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am a gentleman, all right, and I do not recall anything that I have said. I may take back the word "malicious", but that is the only thing I will take back.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am surprised that the hon. gentleman should take back that much.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am rather surprised myself, to tell you the truth.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Well, we were at war for three years before the hon. member for York-Sunbury rose in his place in this house and moved the amendment he has just read, and that was the first time he ever put on record anything like that. That was opposed to the stand he took in 1939. Go back and look up the records.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Are you sure about that, now? I think I could find plenty before that.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am sure of that. Then what stand did the hon. member take on the plebiscite?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is no doubt where I stood on that.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): No, and there is no doubt where the hon. gentleman has stood throughout in regard to the war; his party is well on record. I could go back and quote for an hour or more from speeches made by members of the Conservative party when the war first broke out.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. BRYCE: I should like to get some information from the minister in regard to naval personnel. Naval general order No. 3098, entitled "discharge for return to essential industry or to agriculture," has this to say in paragraph 5:

A notation is to be made on the service certificate of any rating discharged under this order to the effect that he is discharged "at own request to return to essential industry or to agriculture," as applicable. The Department of Labour have given assurance that selective service mobilization boards will grant deferment from army call-up to persons who present service certificates so inscribed, until such time as the circumstances which warranted discharge have altered materially.

We have these young men who have been in the navy for some considerable time, perhaps a year or more, and have been trained at the expense of the nation. For some reason or another they are discharged at their own request, perhaps following the death of the father, and they return to civilian life. But in paragraph 6B, page 7 of "Canadian War Orders and Regulations" dated March 4, 1944, I read this:

1. When a registrar receives a notice in prescribed form from a representative of the Department of National Defence that a designated man has ceased or will soon cease to be a member of His Majesty's Canadian naval or air forces on active service and is considered fit for military training, the registrar may, whether the man resides in the registrar's division or not, serve him or cause him to be served, either personally or by registered post, with an order, in prescribed form, requiring him to report at a military centre, at a time and place indicated therein, to be dealt with in accordance with the orders and regulations of, or relating to the Department of National Defence, and any man to whom an "order–military training" is sent under this subsection shall comply therewith and shall submit to the medical examination for which provision is made in the National Resources Mobilization Act (army) regulations, 1943.

2. Where an "order–military training" has been served pursuant to this section, the provisions of these regulations shall apply mutatis mutandis as if it had been served pursuant to section six.

Here you have a man who has served in the navy for perhaps twelve months and has been trained as a stoker or a seaman. He returns to take his place on the farm, as authorized by the naval department. Then he is immediately called up; the man who has been a volunteer becomes a conscript and is taken into the army. I want the minister to look into this matter and straighten it up. I consider it very unfair that a man who volunteered but who, because of conditions recognized by the navy, has been allowed to return to the farm, should be called up again by the war services board and put into the army as a conscript.

Mr. MITCHELL: With all the noise on both sides of the chamber I have not been able to follow the hon. member very well.

Mr. MacNICOL: Could you understand him?

Mr. MITCHELL: I could understand him very well; I spent two of the happiest years of my life in Scotland during the last war. If I might answer my hon. friend, if he is through—

Mr. BRYCE: I have another matter to bring up.

Mr. MITCHELL: Let us get rid of this one first. I do not know of any case of the kind mentioned by my hon. friend, and if he has one of that description I wish he would turn over the details to my department or to me; I should be very glad to look into it. To be perfectly honest with my hon. friend, I am quite unaware that such a condition does exist.

Mr. BRYCE: I can assure the minister that it does exist, and I shall be pleased to let him have further information.

Then on Friday evening the minister referred to the packing industry, which he said was employing twice as many people as in 1939. That is quite reasonable, because in 1939 we killed 5,389,000 animals, while in 1943 we killed 8,572,000, an increase of sixty per cent In addition, we must remember that more women and more unskilled labour are being employed. I should like to impress upon the minister that the packing plants require the extra ten per cent of man-power at this time. It is estimated that the weekly run of hogs will be 140,000 for the next six weeks, and the packing plants have not the people to kill them. This means that the farmers will have to take it in the neck again; the hogs will be sent from Edmonton right through to Toronto to be killed, and there is a tremendous shrinkage when that trip has to be made. According to the Department of Agriculture the weekly run of cattle will be 16,200, and the plants will be able to kill only 13,800 with the men they now employ. If you could give them ten per cent more help they could always work a few hours extra and cope with the situation. Will the minister be good enough to look into that matter, because it means a great deal to the farmers of the west? If cattle and hogs have to be shipped from Edmonton and Calgary to Toronto for killing, the loss through shrinkage is tremendous.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think it is some achievement that we have been able to double the number of employees in the packing plants of this country. I am not trying to wish myself out of a difficult position; there are not enough men and women in our packing plants, particularly in western Canada. I know something of the contribution made by the farmers of that part of Canada, and we are well aware of this condition. I think it can be truthfully said, notwithstanding some of the expressions of opinion here this evening, that we of selective service have measured up to our responsibilities. As I said this afternoon, the man-power of this country is organized as well as or better than in any other of the united nations with the exception of Great Britain. Let those people who sit behind editorial desks in some of the larger centres of this dominion repeat that statement, if they will. We are alive to this situation in western Canada. We are doing everything humanly possible to meet the labour requirements of the packing industry there. Only to-day meetings were held in Winnipeg, Regina and Edmonton, and I feel confident we can put the necessary man-power into the packing industry in that part of the country within the next two weeks.

Perhaps I should not say this, but I have no control over the number of cattle or pigs born in this country every year. I was not there when that was decided, and you cannot blame selective service for it. But once the fact exists, and we are conscious of it, we can move man-power into the packing plants to do the necessary slaughtering and to make preparation either for consumption in the home market or for shipment overseas.

Mr. BRYCE: I was not criticizing.

Mr. MITCHELL: I understand that.

Mr. BRYCE: If arrangements can be made for that ten per cent, the way it was arranged last fall, we shall be able to help the farmers who have produced the cattle and hogs that were wanted. They have never fallen down on the job. They have continued the supply, and the government has not made arrangements to take care of it.

Mr. QUELCH: I should like to ask a question somewhat similar to that asked by the hon. member for Selkirk. I have had drawn to my attention a number of cases respecting men who have served overseas, in some cases for several years, and who, upon being returned to Canada and being discharged because of medical unfitness, have been called up by local mobilization boards. I am not certain whether these are mistakes, or form part of the government's policy. It is done, apparently, with the full knowledge that these men have served overseas, because a letter I have received from the Canadian Legion states:

> Whoever is in charge of the calling up in this city is taking a very dictatorial attitude by calling these men up, and when it is pointed out that these men have already served, simply remark, "We do as we please."

So that it is not done in ignorance, when these men are called up. The mobilization board must know full well that they have served overseas.

One case brought to my attention concerns a man who was discharged as recently as April 3. Now he is called by selective service. I am asking the minister to clarify this situation. I understand that in January of this year regulations were passed which, in effect, excuse a man with overseas service from being called up. I have in mind a man named Coyle who, apparently, has been released again. Apparently when the matter was referred by selective service to the Department of National Defence, that department took the attitude that they did not want to have the man called up. Is that just one isolated case, or will that apply in regard to all men who have served overseas? What is the general policy?

Mr. MITCHELL: First of all may I offer an apology to the hon. member for Selkirk. I spoke loudly only so that he could hear; I was not being critical.

We do what the hon. member for Acadia has suggested, namely, make reexaminations. Men who are discharged from the navy for seasickness—and there are some cases of that kind—are quite capable of serving in the army. With the exception of crossing the ocean on a transport, the soldier does not have much opportunity for seasickness. I have suffered from seasickness, and I do not treat the matter lightly.

Then there are cases of colour-blindness of men at sea or in the air, where it is necessary that they should not be colour-blind. Anyone with any knowledge of the sea will understand the reason for that.

Mr. QUELCH: Are those exceptions? I am more interested in the men who, after having served overseas probably for a number of years, are discharged because of medical unfitness, not because of colour-blindness or seasickness. They are discharged because their health has deteriorated on account of overseas service. I think it is very wrong that men who have seen overseas service should now be drafted. These men have a real right to feel that they suffer a grievance against the country. Surely after a man has volunteered to serve, has served for three years overseas and has been discharged on account of his health, he should not be drafted. It is something we should be thoroughly ashamed of, and certainly it should not be done.

Mr. MITCHELL: To be perfectly frank, these men are designated by the military authorities, and we do the examining. It is quite true that we have reached almost the bottom of the man-power barrel, so far as able-bodied men are concerned. As I said before, we have to examine six in order to get one man for the armed forces; that is the position we are in at the present time. There are some who say that there is almost total mobilization in Canada. When we reach that position I think we have reached a position on a par with almost any country in the united nations groups. That is the position we find ourselves in to-day, namely, that we have to examine six men to get one for the services.

Mr. KNOWLES: Where this policy has to be carried out, I wonder if it still would not be possible to do something to take care of two kinds of grievances of which I happen to know. I have in mind a case into which, in response to my request, the minister's deputy is examining. I dare to hope that it may be taken care of. The case is that of a young man who had served three years and seven months in the air force and was discharged as being medically unfit for further service in the air force. I was permitted to look into his file by one of the senior officers, and I discovered that while his medical condition upon discharge was such that he could not continue in the air force, still it was clear that he could be of some use in the army. The young man did not object to going into the army, but he had two grievances. The first was that he would now be a conscript, despite the fact that he had served as a volunteer for three years and seven months. His second grievance was that, although upon being discharged from the air force he held the rank of sergeant, upon entering the army he would have to start again at the bottom.

Is there anything that can be done about these two grievances? The information I have received confirms what the minister has said, namely, that it is a matter of policy. I was told by an officer in the air force, with whom I was in contact, that when the air force discharges a man as being medically unfit selective service is notified and, in most instances, these men are handed their call-up slips at the time they are given their discharge papers. Can these grievances be looked into?

Mr. MITCHELL: I shall be glad to do that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to ask the minister some questions in connection with national selective service. My questions are based upon two paragraphs in the minister's speech of Friday last. At page 2431 of Hansard he is reported as follows:

> Next is the national selective service administration board, over which the director of national selective service presides. This board is composed of the associate directors of national selective service and carries the burden of the day-to-day administrative problems. As members of the administration board are also members of the advisory board, coordination of advisory and administrative functions is as complete as possible.

Of course that is a very general statement.

Mr. MITCHELL: Certainly.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then, this is the important paragraph, and the one upon which I shall base the questions I shall ask the minister:

> Decentralization has been provided for by the appointment of regional directors and regional national selective service advisory boards in Quebec, Ontario, the prairies and the Pacific. An advisory board for the maritimes will be constituted in due course.

I want to know why there has not been an advisory board appointed heretofore for the maritime provinces. I express this fear to the minister, that unless great care is taken, while war work is still going on actively in Canada—and that may be for the next two years—we are going to be denuded of our population down there. That would not be a good thing for the maritimes or for Canada. That is not decentralization; it is centralization. We must watch out to see that labour is not drawn off from the maritimes and other parts to the central provinces, where they may stay when the war is over and so denude us of our population. But that process is going on. I know, for instance, that the production of certain plants is being curtailed. I have one in mind at the moment, where the workers are being offered positions in upper Canada, and a good many of them are going. Is there any board whose function it is to watch that situation and see that too much of our population, perhaps a very fine part of our population, is not being depleted for the benefit of the central provinces?

The minister knows as well as I do that there is a tremendous cry in Canada, in the east and in the west, against so much centralization of industry in central Canada. I do think that is a bad thing for the body politic. I would think there are a good many contributing factors. I know this, that geography, which we cannot overcome except by means that are perhaps uneconomic, has had a tendency to drain off our industries to central Canada. I remember discussing this very problem with the late A. O. Dawson, who was for many years head of Canadian Cottons Limited. We have several cotton factories in New Brunswick, and all the raw material has to be brought in by rail. It comes up, I learned much to my surprise, all the way by rail from New Orleans in the south to Fredericton and Saint John and Milltown. I had thought that it would be brought by water, pre-war, but they tell me that that is not the case. Then, because we have such a limited population in the maritime provinces the finished product has to be sent back and marketed in central or western Canada. So that geography is distinctly against that industry in the maritimes.

I know that industries have a tendency to move to where the demand for their goods is, to where there is more money and more consumption. I have in mind a candy manufacturing establishment, very well known, producing a nationally known product. I am afraid that if that industry were damaged by fire or what-not, it would not be started up again in the maritime provinces but probably would be established in Toronto.

And hon. MEMBER: Is that Moir's?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not mentioning any particular firm. We all have our favourites; they are all good, and I am not here to advertise any nationally known product. The point I am making is that, so far as I know, national selective service has not yet set up any administrative board to take care of that situation and prevent what I fear may become quite a heavy drain of our population, denuding us perhaps of the very best part of our people. I should like to have some reassurance from the minister on that point because it is important.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am a great believer in decentralization. I think it is the greatest stabilizer that one can have in a country as large as Canada, which in area is a continent in itself, not a country. Selective service, moving along in progressive stages, reached the point where we thought there should be a measure of decentralization, and so we are setting up five regional boards, one for the maritimes, one for Quebec, one for Ontario, one for the prairie provinces and one for British Columbia. These boards resemble the national board in make-up but have fewer representatives. They help to take the weight off the national selective service board, and by their familiarity with the peculiar problems of different parts of this dominion are able to have a bearing on the policies of the national board. We hope to set up such a board in the maritime provinces in the course of the next week.

Might I say to the hon. member for York-Sunbury that while there has been some movement of population from eastern Canada, there has also been a movement into the maritime provinces from other parts of Canada, and if one looked into the figures I think they would show that more people have moved into the maritimes than have left those provinces during the war.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Those figures would be very interesting; I should like to see them. I know that a large population of women has been moved from the maritimes to Toronto.

Mr. MITCHELL: At Halifax and Truro—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are populated by an influx of the armed forces, the navy particularly.

Mr. MITCHELL: I had in mind shipyards, which come directly under my jurisdiction, also the construction industry, and when you take these into account you will find that the balance is fairly even, as between the movement of labour from one part of the dominion to another.

Coal mining has been mentioned. I had a delegation to see me the other day in connection with an industry in the city of Amherst. It turned out that there was an agreement between the trades union and the employers containing a seniority clause that in any reduction of personnel the rule should be: the last man on, the first man off. Now it so happened that many of the men and women working in that plant had come in there from upper Canada, as it is called in those parts, and in view of this clause in the agreement, many of the people first laid off were the local people, being the last ones taken on. I will not say what they called the workers from upper Canada who retained their jobs in Amherst.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They did not call them out of their name, I hope.

Mr. MITCHELL: Labour men do not always make their language conform to the rules of order we have in this house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the minister give us some assurance the situation I have spoken of will be watched carefully, and will he tell us who will compose the board for the maritimes?

Mr. MITCHELL: There will be a chairman, a representative of the wartime prices and trade board, a representative of munitions and supply, a representative of agriculture, and representatives of employers and labour.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You have not named them yet?

Mr. MITCHELL: No.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister knows very well why so many large industries have centred in his own riding. It is because they get the cheapest electrical power there in all of Canada. Would he suggest that these industries should decentralize and move out of Welland to somewhere else, just for decentralization? Business is not made that way. Business goes where it can get cheap power as well as for other reasons.

Mr. BENCE: I should like to pay a compliment to a very large body of workers in this country, the largest single body of workers in the country, namely, the railway men and women of Canada. In the wrangling that sometimes goes on in some parts of the country and amidst all the disturbances that sometimes arise, we are apt to forget the tremendous contribution which these railway men and women are making to Canada's war effort. They have had to overcome almost insurmountable odds in the way of lack of help and obsolete equipment such as I think no other body of men have had to face in this dominion. Everyone who travels the trains must realize the difficulties with which our railway men have to cope, and I think the patience, courtesy and restraint with which they go about their work is a remarkable example to the rest of Canada that might well be emulated by those who use the facilities which the railways provide. One of the reasons why in my opinion the railroads have been able to do the remarkable job they have done in Canada during the war is because of the strength and the sanity of the great railway brotherhoods of this country and the good understanding they have with their members. They have applied themselves in a way that commands the admiration of all Canadians, and it seems to me that when we are discussing labour and the men who toil we should say a word of commendation for our railway men.

In a statement the other day the minister referred to vocational training, something in which I am very much interested. As reported in Hansard at page 2440, he stated as follows:

> As the demand of war industry and the armed forces for tradesmen diminishes, steps are being taken to adapt the training centres to provide rehabilitation training along vocational lines for men and women discharged from the forces. The Department of Pensions and National Health has asked the Department of Labour to assume responsibility for training of this type.

To my mind this is one of the very important activities of the Department of Labour, and it should be given every encouragement. I suggest to the minister that in his consultations with the Minister of Pensions and National Health he should also call in the Minister of National Defence for the purpose of determining wherein the methods which are now being used may be best adapted for transition into the peace-time period. I know that the vocational branch of the Department of Labour has cooperated with the Department of National Defence, and I understand that it has supplied in the main the instructors for most of the army trade schools in this country. The thing I am concerned about is that we shall miss an opportunity if the department does not discuss with the Department of National Defence the question of endeavouring to dove-tail vocational training in with army trade training for the purpose of ensuring that we shall have the maximum set-up, one which will be as completely efficient as possible when we arrive at that peace-time period.

I have particularly in mind something which arose a short time ago when the Department of National Defence items in the war appropriation resolution were up for consideration. At that time I raised the question with the Minister of National Defence and asked him, when it came to the matter of the retention of army trade schools in certain centres, or of the transfer of these schools, to give consideration to the post-war period. I know that in my own city of Saskatoon, where we have, in my opinion, better facilities than will be found anywhere else in Saskatchewan, we are very well equipped to perform this work, and we have been doing it in conjunction with the army and with the Department of Labour, vocational training school branch, but I find there is not as close a liaison between the army and the Department of Labour as there should be.

Mr. MITCHELL: If I might correct my hon. friend, there has been for some time what we call an interdepartmental committee on the problem my hon. friend is discussing at this very moment. It has been in existence for some months, and includes representatives of the three defence departments, the Department of Labour and the Department of Pensions and National Health.

Mr. BENCE: I am very glad to hear that. The only thing that concerned me was that I did not think the committee was working as closely together as, in my view, it should, and I made some investigations in this connection.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member will be amazed at what we are doing.

Mr. BENCE: If the minister would only listen to me and investigate the particular case I have in mind, I would be very grateful to him indeed. I have discussed it with the director of vocational training, whom I found to be very cooperative in this connection, and I was hoping I might appeal to someone higher up, such as the minister, to ensure that there shall be that cooperation between the departments of national defence and the Department of Labour that I hope and believe should exist.

In his remarks the other day, the minister mentioned a yardstick of success which he regarded as applicable to matters of man-power. It seemed to me to be a very peculiar one; he suggested that it should be the number of men and women who are employed in industry or are in the armed forces. He pointed to the fact, for example, that we had more people employed to-day either in industry or in the armed forces than we ever had before. Well, I should hope to goodness we have, because, after all, this is the fifth year of the war, and one would not want for a moment to have it suggested that we should be in the unfortunate position in which we found ourselves in 1939 or the few years succeeding 1939. We would be in a very peculiar position if it were not the fact that to-day more men and women are employed than were employed a few years ago. That is not my idea of the yardstick which should govern when we determine whether or not there has been a successful manpower policy. To my mind the yardstick is, to determine whether or not, upon an examination of the whole field, we have the right men and the right women in the right jobs. For example, is agricultural production being curtailed because more men are required in the army? Are there more men in non-essential industries than there should be? Are there more men in essential industries than there should be? I do not know. It is impossible for us, sitting here, to know whether there has been a proper allocation of man-power in this country unless we know what the ultimate objective of the administration is, how many men we are going to have in the army, whether or not a useful purpose is to be made of the home defence army, whether or not the maximum in the way of agricultural production has been reached. Until we receive the over-all picture there is, I suggest, no yardstick we can usefully apply to determine whether the administration's man-power policy has or has not been a success.

One part of the minister's statement would be, to my mind, highly amusing but for the times we are passing through, but because we are at war that statement is nothing less than tragic. I refer to the tremendous industry which is being exerted through the "head-hunting" bureau, through the employers and through the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to chase up the draftees in this country. Money is being spent; time is being wasted, and already harassed employers are being pestered, for the purpose of doing what? For the purpose of determining whether there are men in this dominion who should be in the home army. They are searching out draft-evaders for the purpose of doing what? For the purpose of putting them in uniform, for the purpose of setting them down in some particular part of the country and allowing them to eat their heads off at the public expense, with no useful purpose in mind as far as I can see.

The minister related the long, arduous trips which had been made by the gallant members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police under adverse conditions, travelling in snowmobiles, travelling with dog teams, and all that kind of thing. I wonder what runs through the minds of these men when they are performing this duty? I wonder what runs through the minds of the head-hunting bureau, for example, when they are paid $2.50 to hunt up these men, and I wonder if they feel that these men are worth $2.50 after they find them? I wonder what the tired business men of this country, already overcome with masses of red tape, already in a position where they find it very difficult to get along, because of lack of help, because of lack of supplies, and owing to what are sometimes necessary and sometimes unnecessary handicaps in their business, think of these proceedings?

In that respect, the newspaper in my own city of Saskatoon, the Star-Phœnix, which is by no means of the same political persuasion as myself, put this matter very aptly the other day when it stated as follows, with respect to this particular order requiring employers to investigate their employees:

> The burden that will be put on employers and employees alike to meet the new requirement seems entirely out of proportion to the value of the order. The department may very well find that it will take as much time and trouble to enforce the new regulation as it does to track down the evaders themselves.
> The order reads like something issued just for the sake of getting another order on the books. Canadians are quite willing to accept what is needful for the prosecution of the war, provided they can see the relationship between the orders and the war. But to require employers in every part of Canada to examine the credentials of their employees and to oblige men who have served in the army or who have otherwise fulfilled all the many previous regulations to justify themselves all over again appears to be going rather farther than the situation warrants.

In this connection I should like to have an explanation from the minister with respect to a statement, found in Hansard on page 2512, which was made by the minister on Friday last:

> Instructions are issued to the registrar in each division to call as many men as possible to meet the requirements of the army.

What instructions are given by the army to the Department of Labour, and what does the Department of Labour endeavour to do as a result of those instructions by the use of the call-up method? For example, a short time ago Mr. MacNamara, in a Canadian Press staff writer's statement dated April 10 of this year, is reported as follows:

> Canada's armed forces require 98,000 men between now and next March 31, and the national selective service officials are preparing to see that the requirements are filled either through enlistments or by compulsory call-ups, it was indicated to-day.

I should like to know, in connection with these instructions given by the army to the Department of Labour, which in turn instructs the registrars, how many of these men are required for the home defence army and how many are required for the active army. I should like to know through what means, by the method of call-up, the department hopes to get men, and how many men they expect to get, for purposes of the home defence army and the home defence army alone.

With respect to postponements, and more particularly applications for leave for agriculture and other essential purposes, I would ask the minister to consult with the Minister of National Defence for the purpose of removing political partisans from positions where such persons have the right to say whether or not a man shall receive leave—and I say political partisans advisedly. I mean people who are actively interested in the affairs of one political party or the other. In the interests of the men involved, who happen to be appointed to these positions, I think a very careful study should be made before they are put in such a position. For example, in connection with an application for temporary leave from the active army, it frequently happens where men are stationed in this country that application is made for temporary leave for purposes of agriculture or for other essential purposes of a temporary nature, and the usual procedure is for the application to be made by the man to his commanding officer; from his commanding officer it goes to the office of the deputy assistant adjutant general in the particular military district in which the man is stationed, and then the mobilization board of the district is consulted. I do not know that this is done as a matter of regulation; I do not believe it is. The mobilization board is consulted because the machinery is there and the policy of investigation is to consult it. It is consulted to determine whether or not the man should be granted leave, but the general practice is that the deputy assistant adjutant general has considerable influence in the matter of granting the leave.

I suggest that no man should be placed in that position who has very close political affiliations, not because I suggest that he will necessarily be swayed by those affiliations, but because the public will naturally distrust his judgment. I have in mind a particular situation in Saskatchewan at the present time.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend is not suggesting that political influence is brought to bear on the question of calling men for military service or granting leave?

Mr. BENCE: What I am suggesting is that where a person is in a position such as a Liberal member of a legislature and is also in a position of passing on the question whether a man shall be allowed leave or not, then there is great suspicion in the minds of the public that political considerations may be involved, and I suggest that this kind of thing should be avoided.

Mr. MITCHELL: It cuts both ways. Why talk about Liberals? Why not talk about Conservatives or the C.C.F.?

Mr. BENCE: Well, take the Progressive Conservative party, or the C.C.F.—

Mr. MITCHELL: I always take this stand: I think all men are honourable until I find otherwise.

Mr. BENCE: The minister either does not get my point or he does not want to, I do not know which. What I am concerned about is this. Where a man applies for leave and is turned down and he believes he has every reason for getting leave, and he happens to be a well known supporter of the party to which I belong, or the Social Credit party, or the C.C.F., he will naturally jump to the conclusion that because the man who refused him that leave is a Liberal member of a legislature there was political influence. I submit that even a suggestion of that kind of thing should be entirely avoided.

Mr. EVANS: Who is the political member of the legislature?

Mr. BENCE: The hon. member knows it is Captain J. C. Knowles. He is the member of the legislature and has been renominated.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Is that factual enough?

Mr. BENCE: I do not know why the hon. member for Maple Creek wants to ask that question. He knows as well as I do. The point I was trying to make was that we should avoid the possibility of a man being placed in the position where he has the right to say whether or not leave should be granted. Suppose an applicant came from this man's constituency. The officer might be leaning over backwards as far as he could; nevertheless the suspicion remains and it should be removed.

Whenever this matter of man-power is discussed, or when it comes to my mind, I cannot help thinking about the man who was appointed a few years ago by this government for the purpose of dealing with the man-power question. I refer to Mr. Elliott Little, a man who had great vision and courage. I believe that if he had been given an opportunity he would have done a good job long ago and we would not find ourselves now where we are, with many mistakes having to be rectified. I wonder to what extent the present set-up, which has come about only piecemeal, differs in any major detail from the plan produced by Mr. Little a few years ago. I suggest that except for a few minor details it is not much different from the plan that was originally suggested, and if that plan had been adopted, then we would not find ourselves in this position to-day. We would not be sending men back to vocations from which they were allowed to go a year or two ago. Certainly men and women would not have been shifted around to the extent that they have had to be shifted.

Mr. HANSELL: I wish to ask the minister a question, to make a short observation and then to give him a suggestion. I am not altogether satisfied that the selective service boards are turning out in the way in which they were first expected to operate. I am going to ask the minister to consider making the situation such that when men and women go to the selective service offices seeking employment they will have a certain amount of freedom. The picture as I see it is this. The employer has an opening for a man, perhaps in a store or an office. He applies to the selective service offices. I do not know what is done there, but a man who wants a position goes to the selective service offices. He does not know who his employer may be. The employer does not know whom he may have to employ. Instead of the selective service offices being a sort of clearing house to keep the records straight and attempt to supply and satisfy all industry and all employers, it becomes a sort of bureaucratic institution which has a tendency to push men here and there, and to push on to an employer perhaps somebody with whom he is not altogether satisfied. That is the picture as I see it, and I believe I am right in giving that picture.

I am reminded of what seemed to be the situation last fall. I bring this to the minister's attention, but I do not want him to think what I am about to say is all hearsay, because in this case I happen to know what I am talking about. Last fall the Royal Canadian Air Force put on a campaign to induce women to join the R.C.A.F. I know there was an attempt on one or two occasions by the selective service officials to persuade, very carefully and very cleverly, certain young women to join the R.C.A.F. when they went to the selective service boards looking for employment. I know that happened. I know what took place. The conversation goes along something like this: "What sort of work do you wish?" says the official. The reply is: "Well, I would like anything I can get. I am willing to work hard. I do not want to go out minding children, but I do not mind working in a store." The next question is: "Would you like a stenographer's job?" The answer is, "Well, I cannot do stenography." Then eventually the conversation gets down to the place where the official says, "Well, you know, if you join the forces you can get a job there, and they will teach you. They will train you and you can receive pay while you are training." I know that is what happened. I am not making any drastic accusations or anything of that kind, and I do not want to be unkind. But I should like to know whether the duties of the selective service officer call for him to do that or whether he is to satisfy the employer and the person who is looking for employment. The thing seems to be a bit shrouded in mystery. A man or a woman goes into the office. They do not know what they are to get. They do not know what is open. They are not told what is open. They say, "I do this", or "I do that", or "I do something else". "I can do so many things. I should like to get employment". Then they are told where they should go. The same situation applies to the other side of the picture with the employer.

I suggest to the minister that when a man goes to the selective service offices there should be some way by which he can choose his position. I do not mean that the selective service officers should be turned into the old-time labour office where men went and paid so much and saw all sorts of positions put up on big cards on the side of the wall somewhere; but I believe that the selective service officers should be more open in this respect. I suggest that there should be a bulletin board where all those positions that are open should be displayed so that a man could look them over and say to the selective service officers: "I can do this; I want to apply for this position." The employer's name should be displayed as well so that the man has some measure of freedom in seeking the work he wants to do. The employer should be able to put an advertisement in the paper. I do not mean that he should be allowed to handle the whole thing himself, although I would not be adverse to that. The individual could then apply through selective service for the position, giving the name of the firm, and as far as that goes, the individual could go to the firm and say, "I am looking for this job; am I competent?" They should be able to say: "Yes, we will take you; go and clear with the selective service officials."

I make this suggestion to the minister, namely, that all the positions that are open should be open to the observation of the men and the women who want the jobs, and that the employer should have some measure of freedom in choosing the man or the woman that he wants to employ. Would the minister give some consideration to that? I think it would tend to satisfy the employer and the employee, much more than the system does at present. I have always thought that water would find its own level; that is, nature, if it is left alone, will do very well. I think the same principle applies in a world of free men. I do not believe that you can begin to push men around, regiment them, put them here and there against their will, or against their knowledge, and expect the most harmonious relationship between employers and employees and the middleman, which is the selective service board.

I believe that the minister will find all kinds of trouble and criticism if there is not a little more freedom among employers and employees in relation to the selective service board. Would the minister give some consideration to having these positions either on a bulletin board or exhibited in some way so that men seeking employment would know where they could go and have some choice in the matter?

Mr. MITCHELL: I appreciate the suggestions that my hon. friend has made, and while I am conscious that there is a measure of criticism of the Department of Labour and the minister, yet this is one of the few opportunities that the minister gets to meet his peers when we are discussing the policies in connection with the different departments of government. The first point raised by my hon. friend was that of the recruitment of women for the navy, the air force and the army. I want to be perfectly frank with him. This is the policy of the labour department. When France fell I was one of the strongest advocates of taking women into the fighting forces, because every woman you take in frees a man for a more active part in the three services. We are proud of the contribution that we have made to the fighting forces through the instrumentality of selective service as a recruiting agency for the young women who have joined the three departments of our armed forces. It is absolutely voluntary. There is persuasion, it is true, but let me say very frankly that there is no coercion.

On the question of selective service, at the top we have what we call the national selective service advisory board on which are represented all the armed services, the prices control board, munitions and supply, labour, agriculture and the various employers' organizations. On any major question of high policy no move is made until this board is consulted. May I say this to the hon. gentleman, who is not in his seat at the present time: Those of us who take our minds back to twelve or eighteen months ago realize you cannot solve a problem by running away from it; you have to stay with the ship. No one appreciates more than those in the labour department the difficulties and complexities of organizing the measure of selective service that exists in this country to-day. We have had to issue plenty of shalls and do's and don'ts and won'ts; but I want to say to the committee—and this is in line with the thought of my hon. friend—that when this war is over I hope it will be said of me that nothing I did had the effect of impairing the fundamental principles of freedom that have made this country what it is to-day. We have passed through many difficulties, including the poaching of labour when employers were stealing the employees of other employers. I remember the questions asked in that connection in this house before I came into the ministry. The real core of our man-power policy is the control of man-power. I was in Philadelphia a week ago. I picked up the Sunday Inquirer and found seven pages of "help wanted" advertisements, which is an indication that they are passing through the same uncontrolled condition in regard to industrial, farm and commercial labour that we passed through two years ago. I want to say to the committee that without the controls we have in operation at the moment, such as the priority of industries and control over the movement of men and women, we would have complete chaos in Canada.

The fundamental fact we must keep in mind is that to-day the per capita production of this country is the largest of any nation in the world. Do not take my word for it; Madame Chiang Kai-shek made that observation right in this chamber when addressing members of the Commons and the Senate. That is the result not only of the genius of the Canadian people but also of the measure of labour control we have in this dominion. I want to pay a tribute to employers, employees and farmers, and to their various organizations. We sometimes like things to reflect to our own glory, but these results would not have been possible without the active cooperation of those forces in the life of this nation. I cannot and would not promise any hon. member—and goodness knows I get enough pressure from all directions—that there will be any slackening of these controls until the labour situation is much easier than it is at the moment. I remember that last fall certain members of this house went up and down the country saying there would be an unemployment situation in Canada this spring, with 100,000 people out of work. I do not know why they said those things, whether it was for political reasons or to embarrass the government, but in my judgment it does not reflect credit upon any responsible member of this house to express in public a thought of that kind when we are facing the most desperate hour in the history of this nation.

Mr. TUSTIN: Who made that statement?

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend knows who made it.

Mr. HANSELL: Do not look at me.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am not looking at my hon. friend.

Mr. TUSTIN: Who made it?

Mr. MITCHELL: The leader of the C.C.F. party made the statement.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Does the minister know the number of unemployed at the present time?

Mr. MITCHELL: I can get that figure, but I can tell my hon. friend that I could put 160,000 people at work to-morrow morning if he could find them for me.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I suggest that there are a good many around that the minister has not found.

Mr. MITCHELL: I was trying to answer the very kindly suggestions offered by the hon. member for Macleod, and now I am going to sit down. Let us be frank and honest; I believe selective service works in a scarce market. When the market is freer there should be a measure of choice on the part of the employer as to those he employs, and on the part of the employee in search of a job; but while the present tight situation exists I cannot give any guarantee at all that the present measure of control will be relaxed one iota. I can go that far.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I listened with a great deal of interest to the comprehensive report the minister gave us the other evening, which contains very much that is extremely commendable. I was particularly interested in the features pertaining to education, and when those matters come up for review I shall have something further to say. This afternoon I was very much interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Lake Centre. I am not nearly so disturbed about the increased purchase of civilian goods in 1944 in comparison with 1939 as the hon. member appears to be. I think he loses sight of the fact that in 1939 large numbers of our people had been without purchasing power for many years. Now that they are in possession of some purchasing power it is only natural that they should spend part of it to acquire goods which they were forced by economic conditions to go without for many years prior to the war. The hon. member for Lake Centre also had a good deal to say about equality of service and sacrifice. On some occasion I should like the hon. gentleman or someone in his party to explain to the house just what they mean by that expression, which I have heard them use many times. Just what do they mean when they refer to equality of service as between different parts of the country or as between different classes within the country? I think it would avoid considerable confusion if we knew just what meaning they attach to the term.

In connection with selective service I should like to endorse the statement made on Friday evening by the hon. member for Cape Breton South as to the importance, in the selective service machinery, of those who make the first contact with people seeking employment. As the minister has just pointed out, it is very difficult to undertake to direct men from one industry to another, or to tell Canadians, who all their lives have been free to choose jobs to their own liking when they could get them, where they must work. I think a good deal of the criticism I have heard in regard to selective service arises from the lack of understanding and courtesy on the part of those who have the first interviews with people coming to selective service for positions. I realize that the minister has had to make use of untrained, unskilled people. Any effort that can be spent on training those people to make that first contact with the public, so that a man or woman who comes to discuss the question of a job with selective service is not given to feel that the selective service officer is looking down upon the unemployed person, would be worth while. Anything of that kind should be avoided, wherever possible.

As I have seen the long queues of unemployed, or those seeking to transfer from one job to another, as I have seen them lined up in some of the Toronto offices, particularly on Spadina avenue, I have wondered if there is not some way of avoiding some of that complicated procedure which is followed. It seems to me that when a man registers with selective service, and selective service have his card on file, they must know what he is capable of doing, and what his experience and qualifications are. They have the whole case history on their cards, and it seems to me it should be possible for selective service, upon being notified by an employer that he wants a certain type of employee, to notify such employee who might be qualified for the job, and to instruct him to go directly to that job. It should not be necessary for him to make a trip, sometimes of many miles, to the selective service office, and stand in line possibly for hours—and in many cases have to go back more than once to make contact with the job. Even then, a person may be sent to a job that has been filled by the time he gets there. I am wondering if there cannot be some short-cut whereby some of that inconvenience and annoyance may be avoided. Is it not possible to notify the employee direct as to where he may apply for a job for which he is fitted? Any study that can be given to that phase of the programme would help.

I have noticed from time to time that there appears to be little coordination between different offices of selective service. A man comes into a selective service office, and they have nothing that fits his qualifications. They appear to have no record of vacancies which would suit him, but which might be on file in other offices. I recall, for instance, a graduate druggist going into a selective service office, and the only job the office could offer him was one in a lumber camp. They had not a single opening on their files for a graduate chemist. I am sure there were other offices that had on their files vacancies for a man with those qualifications. I am wondering just what co-ordination there is among different offices within selective service.

As I have moved from province to province I have noticed that there is considerable lack of uniformity, particularly in the manner of getting those men from industry, temporarily employed on farms, back into their original jobs, or back into industry. I find that in Ontario the practice appears to be that of sending a registered letter to the employer, a similar letter to the employee, and a registered letter to the farmer for whom he has been working. That appears to be a good deal of duplication and waste of time. An enormous number of clerks must be employed as stenographers to write those three letters and to register them. Yet all this must be done to get a man back from a temporary farm job into his original job in industry. It seems to me there should be some shorter cut to effect that transfer.

Then I am wondering what cooperation the minister and his department are getting from employers in the matter of lay-offs. I was in Amherst, Nova Scotia, when a considerable lay-off took place from the Canadian Car and Foundry company, and I discovered that the men were on the streets before selective service knew anything about the lay-off. I am wondering if the department is getting the cooperation to which it is entitled. Certainly employers can assist in this whole business by keeping selective service informed well in advance with respect to lay-offs about to take place, and also as to what their needs will be, in order that selective service may have an opportunity to fill those needs. I have heard selective service officers in different towns complain that often men were thrown upon them, from industry, without very much notification, and that demands were made upon them by industry without much advance notice.

Certainly the minister or his department cannot be blamed for that; but it is one feature in which this whole business of selective service can be improved. I hear unofficially that the minister's department is now making a job survey across Canada. If that is so, I wish to commend the minister. It is something I am sure he should have done long ago, and something which is certainly most timely to-day. I would say simply this to the minister, that I have heard that those who are entrusted with this important task are greatly understaffed, and cannot be expected to make a really efficient survey, or to do an efficient job unless more assistance is given to them. In my opinion this is a very important job, and every possible cooperation and assistance should be given to those who are to undertake the task.

This afternoon I listened to the debate between the hon. member for Lake Centre and the minister with respect to all those missing men. I believe the hon. member for Lake Centre placed on record the estimated figure at 350,000. I believe the figures showed by the minister's department are to blame for the conclusion reached by the hon. member. I am surprised, however, that he kept the figure down to 350,000. I have before me three returns tabled by the minister's department, and I can prove conclusively from those figures that there are at least 700,000 men missing.

Mr. MITCHELL: You must be a statistician.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I am not a statistician, but I can add and subtract figures. It can be shown conclusively from three separate sets of figures issued by the minister's department that there must be at least 700,000 men unaccounted for. That, of course, cannot be the fact. But the tables published by the minister's department justify one in reaching that conclusion. I wonder if the minister is not the victim of circumstances in this case. Probably he has inherited something there. I wonder if the minister or any other department of government has a record or whether there is a cross-check between the Department of National Defence and his department that would show clearly just how many men of those called up had, prior to their call, or immediately upon their call, or between the time they were called and the time they were supposed to report, voluntarily enlisted. Without those figures one can only guess at how many men are unaccounted for. One cannot possibly estimate the number unless he has an accurate record. I should like to know if there is any such a record in the minister's department or in any other department, going back over the years.

There is another matter on which I have heard some criticism. This does not come directly under the minister's department, although it affects it. There is considerable confusion over the medical examination.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member cannot discuss the medical examination under this item.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Very well, Mr. Chairman, I will bring my remarks on that subject to the attention of the committee at some other time.

It is quite evident that there is a lack of uniformity across the country in the penalties inflicted for default. I think that was brought out quite clearly this afternoon. I would suggest to the minister that if the man who refuses to respond to his call is to be let off with a twenty-five dollar fine one may very well expect a great many men to shirk their call. The lack of uniformity in the penalty as between different provinces and different parts of the same province is a serious matter, and some check should be made of it.

The minister in his statement dealt with conscientious objectors. There is some confusion regarding the figures given. There are something over 8,000 conscientious objectors listed in the table given by the minister, and only about four or five thousand of them are accounted for by the minister's figures. I do not know where the others are, whether or not most of them are at Chalk River. I do not think the minister gave us the number of conscientious objectors in the camps.

Mr. MITCHELL: Five thousand is a cumulative figure.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I have had enough correspondence with conscientious objectors to realize the difficulty that the minister and his officials are running into, particularly with the class of conscientious objectors who refuse to submit to selective service regulations in any way or form. I just want to offer this caution. I am satisfied that some of these conscientious objectors are taken off farms and sent into work camps who, if they were not conscientious objectors, would be left on the farm.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is just the reverse. May I make this observation. If it were not for the fellows up in the air, or serving in the army or on the sea, there would not be any conscientious objectors left in this country. I always keep that thought in mind.

[Mr. Noseworthy.]

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I always keep it in mind, too, but my point is that the moment a man gets a deferment on the ground of being a conscientious objector, automatically he comes under the regulations of the labour department. If a man is granted deferment on the ground that he is essential to industry or agriculture he is left at his employment there. But conscientious objectors are taken off the farms. I do not know what the solution is. I can see the difficulty, but there is that point I have made and I think something could be done about it. Unquestionably there are men at Chalk River and at other camps who could contribute more to the war effort on the farms or in the industries from which they were taken.

I think the minister gave us, or I received from somewhere, an indication that some provision is being made or contemplated for the dependents of conscientious objectors. I have met with a large number of these dependents who have to depend upon monthly relief for the support of their family because the conscientious objectors are in work camps. If some provision is being made for these dependents I would say it is praiseworthy.

Mr. MITCHELL: We have already made that suggestion to the provinces.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask a question or two on these estimates. But first let me say that the hon. member for Lake Centre this afternoon proved, I think to the satisfaction of the committee, that Canada has the most embarrassing man-power situation of all the countries of the united nations. The minister will agree—

Mr. MITCHELL: You are just kidding yourself, trying to wish us into that position.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Let me say to the minister that I take second place to no member in trying to get recruits for the armed forces. When the minister of National Defence asked in this house for the assistance of hon. members in getting recruits, I will venture to say that no supporter of the government from any province did as much as I tried to do in getting recruits for the army, the air force or the navy.

In the debate this afternoon between the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough and the Minister of National Defence I interjected: What a difference it makes whether one is on the front benches or in the front line! The minister said that he had always been on the front benches.

Mr. RALSTON: I said I was on the front benches at the time of the thirty days training.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I realize that, but that is not what I had in mind. I pay compliment to the minister on his very fine record in the last war. That is what I was referring to when I said what a difference it makes when one is in the front line, because when the minister was in the front line serving as a gallant soldier and officer he wrote back to Canada urging national government and conscription. But now he occupies a position on the front bench—and that makes a difference! May I add that a good many members who are ex-service men and members of the armed services to-day did think they would have a very much better friend at court than they apparently have in regard to the man-power policy necessary for this country. I think that is a true statement. I want to make it quite clear that I have always taken every opportunity to assist recruiting for the three armed services. True enough, I may have been elected in 1940 as opposed to conscription. I made my stand very clear immediately upon the fall of France and other European countries; it will be found recorded in Hansard of November 10, 1941, at page 4210; and I have never veered from that stand at any time. I do not think we have national selective service in operation in this country yet.

Let me give the committee one or two examples. A young chap, a neighbour of mine, volunteered for service in the air force, hoping he would "make" the aircrew He did not make aircrew; he is now in groundcrew. He has clear title to a section of the best land in Manitoba, and it was a splendid farm. In recent months his father-in-law, who was operating the farm, has been told by his medical adviser that he cannot work any longer on the farm. This young chap thinks that, rather than be in groundcrew, he can render better service by operating that farm, but so far his efforts to get back to the farm have been fruitless.

I can take hon. members to another constituency over the border, in another province, and point out a somewhat similar case, a V.C. of the Boer war who is farming, who has only one son, that son being in the armed services, and has been unable to get him out of the service to assist him on the farm. A farmer next to him has six sons of military age, all exempt upon the pretext of assisting in farm work, though the story the neighbours tell is to the effect that they are not making any great contribution to the war effort, either on the farm or anywhere else.

I give those two cases as concrete examples. If there is no coercion, no conscription in respect of this recruiting system for home defence, I wish to ask the Minister of National War Services, are these officials instructed to advise a young man who answers the call as to where he can best serve? My understanding is that no young man is granted postponement or exemption unless he asks for it. Many young men to-day, under the patriotic urge, will not ask for postponement or exemption; and I say that this government are taking advantage of that fact in order to raise an army. National selective service is not functioning as it should As I see it, officials of that board should be in a position, after hearing the evidence of these young men, to advise them whether they can render the best service back on the farm, in some cases as executives in industry, or in the armed services; and I do not believe that that is being done, nor do I think that it is provided for in the regulations.

Mr. RALSTON: I may tell my hon. friend that—

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I believe it comes under the Minister of Labour. These services should be closely coordinated. After all, their work is interlocked. I deprecate the entire policy of the government in the matter of raising an army on that basis, and I say that national selective service is not operating as it should for the good of our war effort and in the national interest. I should like the minister to answer the question I have put to him. If I am wrong I want to be so informed. When a young man appears, the onus should not be upon him to enlist if in the opinion of the board he can render greater service in industry or agriculture. I do not know how the Minister of National Defence can argue that there is no coercion, because you are distinctly playing on the feelings of these young men, first to conscript them in the home defence army, and then, by sending V.C.'s and other officers with decorations to the camps, to try to coax these chaps into believing that it is their duty to volunteer. That is not a manly policy to have in effect in a country such as this.

Mr. MITCHELL: On a voluntary basis the only man who cannot join the army is the coal miner. At this moment he cannot enlist in any of the services. I thought that was generally known. In agriculture, all a young man has to say is, "I am in agriculture," and that is the end of the story.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Without asking for postponement?

Mr. MITCHELL: Certainly, he does not have to ask, if he says he is in agriculture.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): He is granted postponement?

Mr. MITCHELL: Absolutely—automatically.

Mr. TUSTIN: It is not as simple as that.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): It does not function in that way in our province, and we have an efficient board.

Mr. MITCHELL: Of course there is a measure of investigation. Take the case of the hon. member; I happen to know he is a good farmer; but a man might come to me and say that he is a farmer and yet be the only man on earth who thinks he is a farmer. In industry, the application has to be made by the individual and supported by the employer, and the employer of course does not have to support the application if he does not want to. It is just as simple as that. We do not call up coal miners and they cannot join on a voluntary basis. The farm situation is that if a man is a genuine farmer he is automatically postponed.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Without asking for it?

Mr. MITCHELL: If there is any doubt—

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Certainly, there is always a doubt.

Mr. MITCHELL: Then you get the third point, that in industry the man himself makes the application for postponement and he is supported by the employer.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The minister is not telling me that when a young man appears before that board and states he is an agriculturist he is granted extension without asking for it?

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I will ask the hon. member to address the Chair.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I am sorry.

The CHAIRMAN: It is a rule which should be followed.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I understood the minister to say that when a young man appeared and said he was an agriculturist he was automatically granted a postponement or an exemption. My understanding is that he must ask for a postponement or exemption.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is quite true.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): And then he does not always get it. But he must ask, in any event.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think that follows. If you went before a board, what is the first thing I would ask if I were chairman of the board? My first question would be, "What is your occupation?" The applicant says he is a farmer. It is just as simple as that.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The point I was trying to make is that this is a policy of playing on a young man's feelings to get him in the armed services, and the minister states he must ask for postponement or exemption. This board in no case advise the young man that he should be back on the farm or be in industry; they want him to enlist in this draft army, and every effort is put forward to achieve that end. I think the minister will agree that that is right.

Mr. MITCHELL: No. I cannot agree with that, and I cannot keep on explaining.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Under the regulations the young man must make application in writing for postponement.

Mr. RAYMOND: I desire to make a very few observations, and the first one will be with respect to the order in which the items of this department are discussed. When, on February 11, the Minister of Finance introduced his resolution to provide for the sum of $3,650 millions, he made a break-down of the estimated war expenditure and indicated the order in which the various items should be discussed. I do not know why there has been this inversion of the order which was indicated by the Minister of Finance for the discussion of the estimates. Is it because the minister wanted to pass his estimate on a Friday evening or on a Monday? To-day we were supplied with a sheet showing a statement of estimated amounts required by the Department of Labour, and instead of having as the first item, as indicated by the Minister of Finance, the war emergency training programme, we find the national selective service programme. I am at a loss to know why this change has been made. The leader of the opposition has time and again complained about not knowing what was going on, what was to be discussed after we come here. We do not know what discussion will take place or what the order will be. In this case the minister has seen fit to change the order indicated, which we were entitled to believe would be adhered to. Moreover, we were supplied this afternoon with a statement printed in English only. I asked for a French copy of it but I was told there was none. The French language has a right in this house, and I am one of those who believe that, if it has, it is high time we were entitled to a French copy of everything printed. Last week we were discussing amendments to the standing orders of the house and were supplied only with an English copy. An hon. member opposite asked for a French copy and could not get it and to-day again we cannot get a French copy. We have only an English copy, which is different, as indicated on February 11 by the Minister of Finance.

And now I intend to continue my observations in French.

(Translation): I wish to bring to the attention of the committee the obviously absurd manner in which the provisions of the mobilization act are carried out. I do not know whether conditions are the same in the other provinces, but such is the situation in the province of Quebec. On February 8, 1943, the minister sent us a copy of some directions given in connection with the growing shortage of farm labour. Here is one passage which I wish to quote:

> Owing to the growing shortage of farm labour, it becomes increasingly important to encourage essential farm workers to remain on the land.

That is the direction which the Minister of Labour was giving with a view to keeping farm labour on the land. Unfortunately, those instructions were not followed, and I am going to give many examples. The other day, during the discussion of the estimates of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), I brought some facts to his attention and he referred me to the Minister of Mobilization, adding that all he has to do is to ask the Minister of Mobilization for a certain number of recruits, and he undertakes to call them.

Well, it has happened many times that a farmer who had already been examined and placed in category E, and who was accordingly unfit for military service, was called again for a new medical examination in Montreal. The other day, the Minister of National Defence pointed out that it may sometimes be important that a new examination be made of recruits or of men liable to be called.

That was the case of a farmer who had already been called for medical examination and who, therefore, had applied for postponement as a farmer. The Department of Mobilization was aware of all the facts; they knew that the man was a farmer, that as a result of the first medical examination he had been put in category E, but they were calling him again for a new medical examination, at the very time when farmers were requested to remain on their farms. And I could mention several cases. There is, for instance, the case of a young married man who owned a 160-acre farm which he operated alone. He had to lose one or two days to undergo a new medical examination in Montreal and during his absence his neighbours had to take care of his herd of cows. That was an unnecessary expense, in the first place, and a loss of time for that farmer.

I would ask the minister to tell us how many farmers have been called for a second medical examination. I would ask him when opportunity allows, to kindly give me this information, and to tell me the cost of this second examination of farmers in the circumstances I have just mentioned. There are also other cases. A number of men were called for medical examination and although they applied for a postponement, they were ordered to report to a military training camp two or three days after undergoing the examination. This was a violation of the mobilization regulation which reads as follows:

> The registrar shall not, while an application for a postponement order is pending before the board, send the applicant an "order—military training."

After submitting to the medical examination, the applicant had fourteen days in which to apply for a postponement, and he had done so. And there is a large number of similar cases. I do not claim, however, that all this was done since the present minister is in charge of the department. However, I have in my files numerous cases where a called-up man who had applied for a postponement two or three days after receiving the first notice, received an "Order—Military Training". What was the consequence? A good many farmers went to training camps, under the impression that their request for a postponement had been rejected. And it took not only days and weeks, but often months to get them out of the camps after they had proved that they were farmers' sons and were entitled to deferments. During that time farms were neglected.

I recall the case of a 72 year old farmer, whose only son was called up. The old man was left alone to look after the farm and a herd of dairy cows. The son's postponement was not granted and he had to go to a training camp, where he had to stay for months before being released. The neighbours had to tend the cows and look after the other farm work. Farmers are asked to increase production; rationing has been resorted to; a shortage of farm help is being experienced; crops are rotting on the field and, nevertheless, farmers' sons are still being called up. Last week, a creamery operator who processes the cream of the farmers of the township, and who makes butter for which there is such an acute need, saw with great dismay his buttermaker called up for a medical examination although he had been given a postponement until next July. Can anyone imagine such a way of carrying out the provisions of the act? That man had been granted a postponement until July and he was called for a new medical examination. He was kept away from his farm during three days, and meanwhile there was an accumulation of cream because no one there could make his butter.

And what about the recruits who are called and who suffer from tuberculosis. The following question was recently asked:

How many members of the armed forces on duty in Canada only have been discharged on account of tuberculosis of the lungs?

The answer was that 2,489 persons had been discharged from the army because they were suffering from tuberculosis. And it was further stated:

Most of the cases had the disease on enlistment and were discharged as soon as the result of the X-ray plates was known.

How is it that they had been accepted in the army if they were suffering from tuberculosis? 2,489 men were suffering with this disease and were nevertheless kept in the armed forces, thereby exposing the others to possible contamination. Had ordinary care been taken, this would not have happened. I shall say nothing of the expense this represented for the taxpayers who always pay the bill in the end.

In spite of statements to the effect that fewer men are required, within Canada, for the defence of the country, more men are being called. I asked a question from the minister last March and, on the 27th of that month, he gave me his reply. Here is my question:

How many persons were called for their medical examination under the mobilization act, (a) during the month of January, 1944; (b) during the month of February, 1944; (c) from March 1 to March 15, 1944?

The answer was:

January, 1944, 26,007; February, 1944, 23,119; March 1-15, 1944, 8,174.

To a second question worded as follows:

How many persons received a notice to report for military training under the mobilization act, (a) during the month of January, 1944; (b) during the month of February, 1944; (c) from March 1 to March 15, 1944?

The following answer was given:

January, 1944, 14,766; February, 1944, 12,172; March 1-15, 1944, 6,950.

And it is stated that fewer men are required within Canada, for the defence of the country. Well, let us stop fooling the public by insinuating that the men called for defence of Canada within Canada are really brought into the army for this purpose. It is to train recruits for overseas service, as the minister admitted the other day. It is a method of disguised conscription for overseas.

I come now to the order issued a few weeks ago by the Minister of Labour and which compels every employer to report his employees who might not be complying with the Mobilization Act. This order even compels the father to report his son, the brother his brother, under penalty of a fine or imprisonment.

Male employee comprises any man in your employ, including those related to you.

And in a set of instructions, later supplied to employers, the same definition appears:

The expression "employer" also comprises any farmer operating a farm and who has a male employee even if he be his son or a relative.

I state without hesitation that, in this order the government is resorting to methods unworthy of a civilized country. To my mind, nothing is more inhuman, more antisocial than to compel parents to denounce their own children. In the name of the most elementary principles of justice and charity, I ask the government to remove this shameful order from our statutes. In this, I simply echo the numerous protests that have come from all parts of the country. All our public bodies have expressed their disapproval. In spite of all this, such an order is maintained.

I also wish to call the ministers' attention to order in council C.P. 1355, of March 4, 1940, which reads as follows:

The minister, upon being informed by the Department of National Defence that a specified number of men are required for military training, may instruct any registrar to apply these regulations to a specified number of men from his division, and may inform a registrar how many French-speaking men are required.

I ask the minister why he has inserted in this order in council a special provision relating to French-speaking Canadians. I thought that in this country of ours we were all Canadians and that when men are called into the army there should be no distinction between French Canadians or English Canadians or Canadians of any other race, because we are all Canadians. I fail to see the object of this special distinction applying to French Canadians. As long as the Minister of Labour has not given a satisfactory explanation, I shall take it that this provision has been aimed at the French Canadians.

I shall have other remarks to make on this department's estimates. For the present, I call the minister's attention to he facts I have indicated to the house, in the hope that he will give them due consideration and that he will take steps to remedy the difficulties I have mentioned.

Mr. HLYNKA: I would not have risen at this time had not the minister stated that "all a young man has to do when called up is to say that he is engaged in agriculture and he is automatically granted a postponement." The minister is entirely wrong. In practice the onus of proof at all times falls upon the man applying for postponement. As a matter of fact, the applicant is sent a questionnaire which must be filled out and signed by a mounted policeman if there is one within a radius of twenty miles; in most cases applicants send in sworn affidavits setting out the facts. I should like to tell the minister also that even many of those who have been granted postponements are advised from time to time that their postponements are cancelled, and that they must make new applications if they wish their cases reconsidered. In most of these cases conditions have not changed; yet the men are told that their postponements cannot be extended indefinitely. Why, then, should the minister make the statement in the house that agricultural postponements are readily granted when applied for, when he should know that such is not the case?

The point I wish to stress is that we know that men are needed for the armed services and that pressure is being applied to obtain men engaged in agriculture. They are told that their postponements cannot be carried on indefinitely and that sooner or later they will have to report for duty. We should be frank about the situation and state it in clear terms. The man-power policy of the government is that if a mobilization board finds that a man can be persuaded to enter the armed services, everything possible is done to get him to do so, even though he may be absolutely necessary on the farm. He cannot obtain his postponement unless and until he can prove beyond doubt that his parents could not possibly carry on without him. Statements like the one the minister made do not clarify the situation. When touring my constituency I was asked by many of my constituents, "Why does the government continue to announce over the air and in the press that postponements are being granted, while applications for postponement are in many cases flatly refused?" I think the minister should tell the house and the country that our man-power pool is being exhausted, and that pressure is being applied to get as many men as possible for the armed services, wherever they may be obtained.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not think my hon. friend should put up a straw man just in order to knock him down again. The hon. gentleman has suggested that I have not been frank. Perhaps I was too simple. Some people think that if they make a statement so complicated that they do not understand it themselves, other people should understand it. I told the hon. member for Souris it was as simple as this. A man goes to the board and asks for a postponement. If on investigation he is proven to be a farmer, the application is granted.

Mr. HLYNKA: Not so easily.

Mr. MITCHELL: Let us look at the record of postponements. The figures are as follows:

Farming	145,529
Fishing	2,317
Lumbering	5,382
Mining	2,562
Essential industries and services	52,341
Students	14,497
Conscientious objectors	8,285
Merchant marine	2,729
Compassionate	2,443
All others	16,540
Total	252,625

Most of the conscientious objectors are farmers as well. It will be seen from these figures that over fifty per cent of the postponements covering all industry in Canada are granted in connection with agriculture. I think that should be an indication that the boards across this country have given due regard to the directives or regulations concerning the protection of the industry of agriculture.

Mr. HLYNKA: I am not saying anything about the boards. The boards are placed in an impossible position. They are told to get the men.

Mr. MITCHELL: They are not told to get the men contrary to regulations. Probably my hon. friend wants to go out and make a speech when he gets back home, but I cannot let a statement like that go by.

Mr. HLYNKA: In my office upstairs I have a number of applications and affidavits concerning cases where there is only one son left at home, with two or three quarter-sections of land to look after. The father may well be up in his late sixties or early seventies; yet the application for postponement is refused. I am speaking from the practical point of view; I have taken up many of these cases. To say in this chamber that "all a man has to do is to say that he is needed in agriculture and he is granted a postponement" is not in accordance with facts. I did not find that to be true in the part of the country from which I come.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Did I understand the minister to say that one out of every six men called was rejected?
